CANA v. FRIEND.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 370.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1823.

PROMISSORY NOTE—PROTEST—NOTICE.

If the notary, not finding the indorser at home, leaves a written notice with some one of his family, it is sufficient.

[See Greatrake v. Brown, Case No. 5,743; Bank of U. S. v. Hatch, 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 250, affirming Case No. 918; McMurtrie v. Jones, Id. 8,905; Williams v. Bank of U. S., 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 96; Bank of U. S. v. Corcoran, 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 121, affirming Case No. 912.]

At law. Assumpsit [by Frederick Cana] against [James Friend] an indorser of a promissory note, for $164.80, at four months. Whetcroft, the notary public, produced his notarial book in which he had stated that he notified the defendant by letter, all the parties being residents in the city of Washington; and testified that it was his general practice to call at the residence of the indorser, and, if he was not at home, to deliver a written notice to any person who came to the door when he knocked, and to request such person to deliver it to the indorser.

Mr. Wallach, for plaintiff.

Mr. Caldwell, for defendant, objected that this was not sufficient notice.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) said it was sufficient if the jury believed from the evidence that such notice in writing was so delivered at the dwelling-house of the defendant in this case. Verdict for plaintiff.

CARRIERS—PASSENGER'S CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

Where the master of a schooner who had taken passage on a steamer to rejoin his vessel, was carried past the place for which he had bought his ticket, and at which the steamer usually stopped, he was held entitled to recover not only for his personal expenses and loss of time, but damages in the nature of demurrage for the detention of his vessel.

Libel for breach of contract in failing to land a passenger at the port to which he had taken passage. Libellant was the master of a vessel lying at Algonac, an intermediate port on the St. Clair river, between Detroit and Lake Huron. He had left his vessel, going up the river, and secured her a cargo, and on the 4th of July took passage on the Canadian, at Port Huron, paid his fare to Algonac, with the intention of stopping there and rejoining his vessel. Evidence was given that the steamer usually stopped there, and that the clerk informed libellant she would stop there on that trip. She did not stop, however, but carried libellant on to Detroit, whereby he was prevented from rejoining his vessel before the afternoon of the following day. The wind which had been favorable during the 4th and 5th, shifted to the northward on the evening of the 5th, and prevented the departure of the vessel before noon of the 7th. She thereby lost the cargo which libellant had engaged.

John S. Newberry, for libellant.
Alfred Russell, for claimant.

WILKINS, District Judge. This action is brought to recover damages for a breach of contract in failing to land the libellant at Algonac, for which place he had purchased his ticket. The contract and its breach are admitted. Libellant took passage on the Canadian for Algonac, with the assurance that the steamer would stop there on her downward trip. He procured his ticket with that understanding, the clerk stating she would land him there. When opposite this place he refused to put the libellant ashore, but the owner being on board directed her master "to put her through and not to stop," and the steamer passed on to Detroit, taking the libellant with her. These facts are not controverted. The only question is as to the damages. These must be limited to the actual loss sustained by the libellant in consequence of the failure of the steamer to perform her contract. He was at the time owner of the schooner Oceana, which was lying at Algonac waiting for him, he having gone up to Lexington to engage a cargo for her. It is alleged, though not very satisfactorily proven, that he failed to obtain this by reason of his delay in reaching the schooner. He is entitled, however, to remuneration for his loss of time and damages in the nature of demurrage for the detention of his vessel for three days. This, with his personal outlay, amounts to $103.50, for which a decree will be entered, rejecting the estimate of the probable profits of a trip to Cleveland. This action is clearly sustainable. The passenger thus wronged should be compensated in damages adequate to the nature of the injury, and passenger steamers must be kept to the fulfillment of their engagements. Decree for libellant.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE AFTER A YEAR.

1. A discharge may be granted to a bankrupt on an application made more than a year after the adjudication.

[Cited in Re Watson, Case No. 17,273; Re Lowenstein, Id. 8,573.]

2. The true construction of the 29th section gives the court a discretionary power, and, in a proper case, on explanation of the delay, a discharge will be granted.

[Followed in Re Forsyth, 4 Fed. 630.]

In bankruptcy.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. In this case the clerk has submitted to me an application by the bankrupt for his discharge.

The only objection to the granting of the discharge arises from the fact that the adjudication of bankruptcy was made by the court, on the 5th of December, 1867, and the application was not presented by the bankrupt till after the 5th of December, 1868.

The question is, has the court power to grant the discharge.

The 29th section of the bankrupt law [14 Stat. 531] declares, "That at any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy * * * and within one year from the adjudication of bankruptcy, the bankrupt may apply to the court for his discharge from his debts."

It may be thought the implication here is that no discharge can be granted unless application be made within the year, but I am inclined to think that would be rather a narrow construction of the language. The intention obviously was to promote diligence; but there is nothing which in terms forbids the discharge, if the application is made after the year. The words, it will be observed, are permissive. "The bankrupt may apply for his discharge"—not that he must or shall, within one year, so apply.

It will sometimes happen, from various causes, and without any fault of the bankrupt, that the application may be delayed, and, in such case, it would be hard to withhold the discharge. It seems to me more in accordance with the general scope and meaning of the law to construe this clause of the 29th section as giving a discretion to the court to grant or withhold the discharge, according to the circumstances of each case, when application is made after the expiration of the year. If, in a given case, the delay was the result of gross negligence on the part of the bankrupt, the court might well refuse the application. I think, therefore, that the true rule in the case under consideration is, not to grant the discharge as of course, but to permit the bankrupt by affidavit, petition, or otherwise, to explain in writing the causes of the delay; and that will be the practice adopted in the present case, and if the explanation shall prove satisfactory, the usual notice will be given to the creditors to appear and show cause why a discharge should not be granted to the bankrupt.

District Court, D. Delaware.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL — LEGACY TO MARRIED WOMAN—HUSBAND'S REDUCTION TO POSSESSION — PROMISE OF REPAYMENT — MOTION TO EXPUNGE PROOF—RIGHTS OF MOVING PARTY.

1. A residuary bequest directing certain real estate to be sold to the best advantage, and continuing as follows:—"and all the remainder of my estate, real, personal, or mixed, and the proceeds thereof, * * * I do give and bequeath to my daughters," etc., held to entitle one of the residuary legatees, a married woman, only to money, the proceeds of sale, and not to a share of the stocks (which constituted a portion of the residue), disencumbered, by force of the married woman's act of 1865, from the marital rights of the husband.

2. A legacy to a wife of a share of the residue of her father's estate, including the proceeds both of land and stocks, directed to be sold, does not constitute a separate estate in the wife, under the Delaware statute of 1865; and such legacy having been reduced to possession by the husband, a note and check afterwards given by him to his wife for the proceeds thereof, are nullities, and cannot be proved by the wife against the estate of her husband in bankruptcy.

[See Chappelle v. Olney, Case No. 2,613; Gallego v. Chevalle, Id. 5,200; Wickham v. Valle, Id. 17,613.]

3. Such note and check do not constitute a trust or gift in favor of the wife, nor are they sufficient evidence to support a trust, though the note bears an indorsement (assumed to be made by the husband) to the effect that the note was given for money accruing to the claimant from her father's estate.

4. Quere. Whether the doctrine of the wife's equity extends so far as to enable her to restrain her husband from proceeding at law to collect her chose in action, until he makes a provision for her?

5. The right of a wife to have interposed by bill in equity to prevent her husband from reducing to possession her chose in action by proceedings at law—even conceding such right to be established by the authorities—held insufficient to support a promise by the husband, to pay to the wife a sum equal to the proceeds arising from the sale of the wife's legacy, where the promise was made subsequently to its reduction to possession by the husband.

6. The doctrine of the wife's equity to a settlement, has no application to a case where the husband has reduced to possession a legacy to the wife, without legal process, and with her assent.

[See Shaw v. Mitchell, Case No. 12,722; In re Campbell, Id. 2,348; Ward v. Amory, Id. 17,146.]

7. In such case, there is no consideration to support a promise subsequently made, to pay to a wife a sum of money equal to the amount received from the legacy.

8. On the hearing of a motion to expunge a proof, the moving party is entitled to open and close.

9. If the testimony of the bankrupt is desired on a motion to expunge a proof, he should be summoned as a witness.

10. The answer to a petition to expunge a proof cannot be used as evidence.

11. The papers annexed to an answer to a petition to expunge a proof, can only be used as evidence by being proved in the usual manner.

In bankruptcy. Petition [by William Canby, assignee in bankruptcy of John P. McLear & Son] to expunge proof of claim [of Amelia F. McLear].

Several questions of practice were raised and decided at the hearing, viz.: First. The court held that as the proof stood as a prima facie claim on which a dividend would be paid, unless some proceeding was taken to impeach it either in law or fact, the burden of showing that it was not a proper claim rested upon the assignee, and entitled him to the opening and reply. Second. Upon affidavit of the claimant filed, application was made by her counsel for an order for the examination of John P. McLear, one of the bankrupts, and husband of the claimant, under section 5086, United States Revised Statutes. The record disclosed the fact that no subpoena had been issued for him. The court denied the motion, and remarked, that if an examination of John P. McLear were desired with respect to the present hearing, he should be summoned as a witness. John P. McLear was then offered as a witness, but objection being made to his competency, he was withdrawn without a decision being had upon the objection. Third. Claimant had annexed as exhibits to her answer to the petition, certain papers which were sought to be treated in the argument, supported by her affidavit to the answer of her counsel as proofs. Upon objection made, the court ruled, that neither the answer nor any papers annexed to it could have any effect as evidence; that the answer was a voluntary affidavit, operating only as a plea traversing the allegations of the petition, and could not be used as evidence for the claimant, though she bound herself by any admissions of fact contained in it; and that the papers annexed to it could only be made evidence by being proved in the usual manner, subject to the right of cross-examination.

George H. Bates and Edward G. Bradford, Jr., for assignee.

Benj. Nields, for claimant.

BRADFORD, District Judge. Amelia F. McLear, the claimant, is the wife of John P. McLear, one of the bankrupts, and is and was at the time of making proof of her claim, the mother by him of three children, now living. Her claim is based, 1st, upon a certain promissory note, which reads as follows: "$2,955.54. Wilmington, Del., January 1st, 1867. Six months after date I promise to pay to the order of Amelia F. McLear, at the First National Bank of Wilmington, twenty-nine hundred and fifty-five dollars and fifty-four cents, without defalcation, for value received. John P. McLear,"— and, 2d, upon a check for nine hundred and eight dollars and four cents, drawn by John P. McLear in favor of the claimant, January 1st, 1867: which check it is alleged was lost or mislaid, and could not be produced at the time of the proof of her claim. The two sums above-mentioned, with legal interest, constitute the amount of the claim filed.

Thomas C. Alrich, the father of the claimant, died in June —, 1865, leaving a last will and testament, by which he made provision for his wife and children. The clause in the will which bears upon the question presented is as follows: "And as my dwelling-house and lot would amount to more than I could give to any one of my children, I direct my executors to sell and dispose of them to the best advantage, and all the remainder of my estate, real, personal, or mixed, and the proceeds thereof, including the amount of the mortgage and bank stocks reserved for my wife, I do give and bequeath to my daughters, Elizabeth D. Porter, Susanna C. Bush, Adaline G. Besson, Harriet S. Clark, Amelia F. McLear, and my son William A. Alrich, or their heirs or assigns, to be equally divided among them, share and share alike. * * * I do hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint my two sons-in-law, William Bush and John P. McLear, the executors of this my testament and last will." The will was duly proved, and William Bush and John P. McLear were duly qualified as the executors thereof. The estate of the deceased embraced, among other property, sundry stocks, which were not sold by the executors, but were divided among the parties entitled to receive the same. The bequest to Amelia F. McLear was not a specific legacy, nor was it a demonstrative legacy, to be paid out of a specific fund pointed out for that particular purpose; but it was a general pecuniary legacy to be paid by the executors, who were directed to sell real estate and personal estate, including the stocks, etc., to raise the moneys thus to be distributed according to the terms of the will. There was no trust raised by the will in favor of the claimant, nor was any separate estate given to her by the will, in opposition to the marital rights of her husband.

The law of the state of Delaware at that time created no such separate estate; for this bequest did not come within the provisions of the act of 1865. That act provides, "That the real estate, mortgages, stocks, and silver-plate belonging to any unmarried woman at the time of her marriage, or to which she may become entitled at any time during her coverture, shall remain and continue to be her sole and separate property, and shall not be subject to the disposition of her husband, etc." It was claimed by the counsel for the claimant, that she was entitled, under the will, substantially to a share of these stocks ordered to be sold; that they constituted the substance of value which was intended by the testator to be given, and by a fair and liberal construction, should be considered as that which was given; and that consequently the claimant, under the laws of Delaware, was entitled to shares of stock, or the proceeds of their sale, disencumbered from any marital rights on the part of her husband. The court cannot take this view of the case. Money was here the precise subject-matter of the bequest, and the construction of the statute even in doubtful cases must lean to the support of the common law rights of the husband. Although the will of Thomas C. Alrich directed these stocks to be sold by the executors, and the proceeds thereof to be divided among the various legatees therein named, no sale was made by the executors, but by consent of the parties interested, the stocks were divided in kind among the parties entitled to receive the same; John P. McLear having had transferred to himself in his individual name on the books of the respective companies the shares which his wife would have taken, had he not asserted his marital rights to take them into his own possession. He also received into his possession, as his wife's share of the cash in the hands of the executors for distribution, the sum of nine hundred and eight dollars and four cents. Amelia F. McLear could not have validly claimed these stocks, for they were not bequeathed to her, or in trust for her; nor was there any act or consent needed from her to invest her husband with full power to take possession of the stocks, for, they having been substituted for money by consent of all the parties capable of giving consent, he was the proper person to take possession of them. John P. McLear subsequently sold the stocks which he had received on account of his wife's legacy, for the sum of two thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars and fifty-four cents. Thus, having not only become possessed of these stocks, but also having converted them into money, and having received the above-mentioned sum of nine hundred and eight dollars and four cents, John P. McLear reduced the legacy, or chose in action of his wife, into his absolute possession and control. And this is not all; for he completely converted it to his own use by reason of his putting most of this money into his own business operations as a banker, and the rest into a dwelling-house purchased in his own name, and for his own use and benefit. There can therefore be no dispute as to the fact of conversion to the husband's use. It is true that mere possession is not conclusive evidence of conversion by the husband; but in this case, so far as we have considered it up to this point, there was a complete appropriation to his own use and benefit, without the slightest intimation so far of any intention that his wife should have a separate interest in the moneys, or the stocks, or the fund produced by them.

On the 1st of January, 1867, some nine months, on an average, after the moneys arising from the sale of the stocks which had been transferred to John P. McLear, were received by him, and a considerably longer period after the above-mentioned sum of nine hundred and eight dollars and four cents had been received by him, the note and check in question were given. Assuming now, for the purposes of argument, that the words written upon the back of the envelope annexed to the answer of the claimant were in the handwriting of John P. McLear, and related to the shares of stock which he had received, and to the check for the nine hundred and eight dollars and four cents also received by him; and assuming further the genuineness of the handwriting on the back of the promissory note for two thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars and fifty-four cents, and waiving any objections which might justly be made to the deficiency of proof of the loss of the check, and that proper and diligent search had been made therefor, what are the equitable rights of Amelia F. McLear in the premises, in the enforcement of which a court of equity should assist her, growing out of the execution and her possession of the note and check? The writing on the envelope contains these words, "Certificates of stocks belonging to Amelia F. McLear" and "J. P. McLear's check for nine hundred and eight dollars and four cents," and also other words pointing to the time when, and the persons to whom John P. McLear sold some of the stock. The writing on the back of the promissory note is as follows: "This note is for money accruing to my wife from her father's estate. It has been invested by me in my business, except nine hundred and eight dollars and four cents which I put into my dwelling, No. 709 French street." Are these expressions and words, together with the other facts in the case, sufficient to entitle Amelia F. McLear to the claim she has made? The fact is beyond question, that a complete conversion of the stocks and moneys, both in point of fact and in point of title, had been made. The written statement on the back of the note above-mentioned is conclusive upon this point. All the declarations of John P. McLear in writing upon the envelope and the note, cannot alter or in any way affect the established fact that, long before this note was given, or the writing made upon the envelope, John P. McLear had converted to his own use the moneys arising from the property which represented the share of Amelia F. McLear in her father's estate. It may be, and we think, from the fact that John P. McLear several times spoke of the stocks and moneys as belonging to his wife, it is probably true, that he intended to make, and believed he was making some kind of provision for his wife, at least that he thought he was entering into a contract, which he hoped to have executed at some future time.

Of what value to Amelia F. McLear were this note and check? Amelia F. McLear was a legatee of her father, Thomas C. Alrich. Had John P. McLear been under the necessity of applying to a court of equity for assistance in obtaining this legacy, the court would not have granted it without his making a suitable settlement on his wife;—and even admitting the correctness of the law contended for by the claimant's counsel, that a court of equity would go so far as, upon the wife's application, to restrain the husband from proceeding in a court of law for the recovery of his wife's legacy, until he should make a suitable provision for her;—John P. McLear has not brought himself within either of these cases. He obtained the legacy without legal process and converted it to his own private use, and as it appears, with the consent of his wife. The real question is, will such a contract by a husband with his wife, made long after the legacy has been not only reduced to possession, but converted to the use of the husband, be valid? Every executory contract must be based on a consideration—no matter whether this contract be made between married persons or not—and the main question here to be decided is, was there any consideration for the note at the time it was given? There was none; for she had no separate estate to give to her husband as a consideration for the note; it was all gone, used, diverted into new channels. He required no aid at her hands to enable him to enjoy to the full his marital rights with respect to this legacy. None of the circumstances (which control many of the cases cited) of aid by the wife, necessary to the successful prosecution of her rights by the husband, occur in this case. And the claimant is driven to this position, that, as she had a right, if she had seen fit to exercise it, to have restrained her husband by a bill in equity, from proceeding at law to recover the legacy, had it been necessary for him to do so, this option to refuse her assent to his recovering this legacy, had it been necessary for him to go into a court of law for that purpose, constituted in itself a valid consideration for the note given by John P. McLear to his wife. Many and conflicting cases were cited, to show what is the law in this country as to the power of the wife to restrain her husband, by bill in equity, from proceeding at law to recover a legacy, or chose in action bequeathed her. An extended examination of authorities on this point would involve too much time and labor, since it is unnecessary to the decision of this case. It must be conceded, however, that

New York authorities and others in this country assert this right in favor of the wife—and if this question were presented, this court would have to decide between the more modern cases, enlarging the sphere of the rights of married women, and those which stand by the ancient landmarks, and rest upon the antiquated idea that separate and conflicting interests in one household do not conduce to domestic harmony and unity. This question, however, need not be examined, for we have already said that no such case was presented to this court—and the probability that Amelia F. McLear might have enjoined her husband, had it been necessary for him to sue for the legacy in a court of law, cannot create a consideration for this note and this check. No court has gone to such a length. Such a decision would overthrow all the settled law on the subject of enforcing voluntary executory contracts in a court of equity. The nearest case to this presented is that of Estate of Hinds, 5 Whart. 138, in which Chief Justice Gibson held, that a certificate of a husband, that he had borrowed money of his wife and promised to pay the interest to her annually, furnished sufficient evidence that he held the money as trustee for the wife, and not in his own right. It will be observed that case differed from this in two particulars—1st, the question was between the wife and the representatives of the husband; and, 2d, he received from his wife the money which was in her own possession, so that he had not as yet reduced it to his own possession. Had the case there been between the creditors and the wife, and had Hinds had the money in his possession, and used and invested it before making this certificate of loan and promise to pay interest thereon to his wife, it would then have been in point. This is a strong case to show what will amount to a declaration of trust—and it could have been decided on no other principle than that there had not been a conversion of the chose in action, and that this act was evidence that he did not intend to convert it; and his promise to pay interest on the sum loaned, was to be fairly construed as a declaration of trust. Indeed, the chief justice says in this very case, that the certificate of loan and promise to pay was worthless as a promise from a man to his wife.

In Tritt's Adm'r v. Colwell's Adm'r, 31 Pa. St. 228, Judge Strong, now of the supreme court and presiding judge in this circuit, who gave the opinion of the court, on page 234 says: "An actual use of the wife's chose in action for his own purposes works a transfer of her ownership"—a terse and admirable statement of the law as applicable to this case. In Woodworth v. Sweet, 51 N. Y. 8, the same principle is laid down by Judge Leonard, in the commission of appeals. This also was a case of retention by the wife of the separate estate, and borrowing by the husband. And he says a "promise to repay money so borrowed by the husband cannot be regarded as nudum pactum. The equity to have a settlement made on her constitutes the valuable consideration for the note." Now, in this case before the court, there was and could be no equity for a settlement to Amelia F. McLear when the note and check were given, for, in the language of Justice Strong, "there had been an actual use of the wife's chose in action for his own purposes" by John P. McLear, so that the equitable right was destroyed, and could not be the basis of any consideration for the note and check.

The case of Jaycox v. Caldwell, 51 N. Y. 395, is a like case, in which the promise to pay is based on the consideration of the wife having loaned to the husband her own estate in her own possession. The case of Riley v. Riley, 25 Conn. 154, is not in point; the notes given were in consideration of money borrowed by husband before marriage, and the husband said if she would not proceed to collect them against him, they would be good against his estate, and he directed her to keep the notes. The court held that this was in the nature of an ante-nuptial settlement. I can find no case where there has been an absolute conversion of the property, in which a promise to pay back money obtained from the separate estate of the wife is considered valid. If there is such a case, it is in the teeth of all the well-settled principles of equity governing such cases. There is, however, one case, Turner v. Nye, 89 Mass. [7 Allen] 176, which is in many points identical with this before the court. A note was given by the husband to the wife for the proceeds of sales of lands coming by descent to the wife; and another note for moneys received from trespass on lands of wife, and these notes were delivered to the wife; the husband made memoranda on notes, showing from what source the money was received, and that the money was used to build his dwelling-house, and at the time of delivery made the declaration that they belonged to her, and afterwards, when giving her money, paid it as interest money—yet the supreme court of Massachusetts would not hold his estate liable in equity for the payment of these notes after the husband's death. The court would not consider these notes as declarations of trust, and bases the decision on the special ground that there had been a complete conversion by the husband before the notes were given. This case is direct authority on the point, that this note and check could not be upheld as a gift; it could not be the subject-matter of a gift, even if a perfect delivery and separate possession had been proven; and it is also direct authority on the point, that as a note or contract as between man and wife it is utterly void.

It will be observed that in Turner v. Nye, "at or about the time of receiving the money" by the husband with the consent of the wife, the notes were given, so that the case is not so strong as the one before the court, where the conversion was nine months old before the existence of the note or check. The court regrets that the law will not permit the payment of this claim; as doubtless it was the bona fide intention of John P. McLear that his wife should be secured at some future day in this amount. Had he registered these stocks in the name of his wife; had he placed the money in the hands of a third party for her use; had he given her exclusive possession of the note or bond of a third person; had he allowed her to receive the stocks and money arising from their sale, and then borrowed from her and given his note, there might be ground for relief. But as it is, John P. McLear did nothing but give his promise to his wife, who was not capable in law of receiving it or profiting by it. It is to be regretted that Amelia F. McLear cannot be admitted on common and equal grounds with other creditors; but the court does not see how it can be done consistently with the decisions controlling such causes. The claim must, therefore, be stricken off. Let such an order be entered.

SHIPPING—PASSENGER ACT OF 1855—WHEN FINE A LIEN ON VESSEL.

Section 15 of the act of 3d March, 1855 (10 Stats. 720), which enacts "that the amount of the several penalties imposed by the foregoing provisions * * * shall be liens on the vessel or vessels violating these provisions," does not apply to the fine imposed on the master by section 1 of that act, upon his conviction of a misdemeanor, but only to the civil penalties imposed on owners as well as masters, by sections 2 and 8 of the act, for a violation of sections 2–5, 7.

[Cited in The Strathairly, 124 U. S. 570, 8 Sup. Ct. 612. Applied in The Sidonian, 38 Fed. 443.]

Libel of information by the United States against the brig Candace, alleging that the master took on board at a port in the Cape de Verd Islands, and brought to Boston eleven passengers, without providing them with the space required by St. 1855, c. 213, § 1 (10 St. 715). The allegations were, that the height from the deck or platform on which these passengers were carried, to the deck above, was less than six feet, whereby the master became liable to a penalty of fifty dollars for each passenger so carried, amounting in all to five hundred and fifty dollars, and that the amount of this penalty was a lien on the vessel. The owners of the brig filed their claim and answer, in which, after requiring the government to make out the facts alleged, they denied, as matter of law, the liability of the vessel. It was proved that the passengers had only the height of five feet and one-tenth allotted to them, instead of six feet as required by the statute. The master had not been tried on the indictment pending against him for these breaches of the law.

W. A. Field, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

The fifteenth section of the act provides, "that the amount of the several penalties imposed by the foregoing provisions regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels, shall be liens on the vessel or vessels violating those provisions, and such vessel or vessels shall be libelled therefor, in any circuit or district court of the United States where such vessel or vessels shall arrive." This applies to all penalties of a fixed amount. The master, if convicted, could be fined no more and no less than fifty dollars for each passenger.

T. H. Russell, for claimants.

Admitting the facts to be as laid in the information, we object, 1. That the penalty imposed by the first section of the act does not apply to the height between decks, but only to the superficial area of deck; and 2. That before any penalty under that section can be recovered by libel against the vessel, the master must first be convicted and fined.

LOWELL, District Judge. Upon a careful consideration of the statute, I am satisfied that the penalties referred to in section 15 are the numerous pecuniary penalties imposed by sections 2 and 8, and not the fines imposed by sections 1 and 6. By section 2, if the berths are not sufficient and suitable, the owners and master shall severally forfeit five dollars for each passenger, to be recovered by the United States in any port where the vessel may arrive or depart. By section 8, the owners and master shall severally forfeit and pay to the United States two hundred dollars for each violation of any one of the three preceding sections, and fifty dollars for each violation of still another section, to be recovered in any circuit or district court within the jurisdiction of which the vessel may arrive or from which she may be about to depart, or where the owners or master may be found. It is clear that the fifteenth section gives a right of action against the vessel itself as well as against the master and owners personally, to recover these sums or any of them; a point which was very doubtful upon those sections alone, because they do not, in terms, give an action against the vessel, though they do give jurisdiction to the courts of the district in which she may be found.

But to apply the fifteenth section to the fines which may be imposed upon the master when convicted of a misdemeanor under the first or sixth section is more difficult. In the first place, the penalty is or may be partly imprisonment. By the sixth section, for wilful failure to supply and distribute provisions, the master must be both fined and imprisoned, and both are discretionary with the court within certain limits; and both together are spoken of as a penalty; but it is a penalty which could not be enforced against a vessel. The case as applied to the first section is not so free from doubt; here the fine is a fixed amount, and could be ascertained before conviction, and is called a penalty, and whether there shall be any imprisonment for a violation of this section is discretionary with the judge; but if imprisonment is imposed, it is certain that both that and the fine are but one penalty for one misdemeanor, and no doubt they would have been so termed in this section if the context had required them to be mentioned together, as it does in the sixth section. It seems, therefore, that the penalty imposed by this section is not of a nature to be recovered against the vessel. But even if we could separate the punishment, and consider the fine by itself as the "amount of the penalty," referred to in the fifteenth section, there would be great difficulties and objections remaining. Suppose this fine to be recovered of the vessel in the first instance, how could the master on his trial for the misdemeanor avail himself of the fact? Not in bar certainly, for it is neither an acquittal nor a conviction, nor does it go to the whole of his punishment. Or suppose the master tried and acquitted, how could that judgment avail the owners of the vessel in a civil suit for the penalty?

Again, a lien is commonly, if not always, a security for a civil debt or responsibility, including civil forfeitures under the revenue laws. To hold a lien over the property of a wrong-doer as security for a fine which may be imposed upon him after conviction of the offence is unusual, and would not often be useful, because the defendant always stands committed [3] until his fine is paid; and this is the highest security known to the law for any pecuniary liability; but that such a fine should be sued for before it is imposed, and against the goods of a third person, is surely without precedent. Again it is to be observed, that what I have called the civil penalties of sections 2 and 8 may be recovered by a personal action as well as by proceedings against the ship, and are imposed upon the owners [in terms],[4] as well as the master; but the fines of the first and sixth sections are imposed upon the master only, and are to be recovered only by indictment, and no allusion is made in these two sections to any other remedy, nor to a proceeding in the district where the vessel may be found.

When, therefore, I consider the kind of penalty mentioned in the first section, which may be partly imprisonment, the person upon whom it is imposed, being the master only, the mode of its enforcement by a criminal trial and sentence, the absence of allusion to any responsibility of the owner or vessel; in all which respects it differs from the mere pecuniary civil penalties imposed by the other sections; and further that the ordinary office of a lien is to be security for a debt or civil liability, and the great difficulty of applying it in fact in aid of the criminal responsibility of a third person, and find that there are in the statute many civil pecuniary forfeitures or penalties to which the fifteenth section giving these liens is properly and exactly applicable; and that to the only other criminal penalty mentioned in the act, it cannot possibly be applied, before conviction of the master, because the amount is not fixed until then,—I am constrained to conclude, that it does not [at least before the conviction of the master,] [4] give a lien upon the vessel for the fines which may be imposed upon him for a violation of the first section of the act.

PETITION IN VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—PRIOR INVOLUNTARY PROCEEDINGS.

A petition by a debtor to be declared a bankrupt will be received, notwithstanding a petition for a compulsory decree has already been filed, and an order of notice to show cause thereon obtained by a creditor against the same debtor.

[Applied in Re Flanagan, Case No. 4,850.]

In bankruptcy. [In the matter of Philemon Canfield.] In this case the question was whether a petition by a debtor praying to be declared a bankrupt, could be received, notwithstanding a petition for a compulsory decree had already been filed, and an order of notice to show cause obtained thereon by a creditor against the same debtor.

CONKLING, District Judge. I can perceive no sufficient reason why the pendency of the creditor's petition, on which no decree of bankruptcy has yet been granted, should be considered a bar to the right of voluntary petition, secured by the act to the debtor. The act contains no such limitation of this right. The debtor may have good reasons for wishing to exercise it, notwithstanding the prior prosecution of a petition in invitum. He may be apprehensive that it may be voluntarily abandoned; or he may know that the charges it makes against him are unfounded, and think proper to contest their truth, and thus defeat the petition. I cannot see that any injury can possibly be done to creditors by allowing this practice, while in one respect it is advantageous, by giving them the benefit of the petitioner's schedules of debts and property without expense.

CANFIELD v. REED et al.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1832.[1]

SEAMAN—INJURY IN THE SHIP'S SERVICE—LIABILITY FOR EXPENSES OF CURE—LACHES.

[1. A seaman belonging to a whaling ship was injured in the home port so severely as not to permit of his removal for a considerable time to the marine hospital, even though he had a right to be admitted there. No measures were taken to place him in such asylum. Held, that the ship owners were liable to reimburse him for expenses of cure, and of board, nursing, and attendance.]

[See note to Case No. 1,992.]

[2. The omission of such seaman to make any claim for more than a year after the close of the voyage does not affect his right to reimbursement.]

[In admiralty. Libel by William Canfield against Sheffield Reed and others, owners of the ship Albion, for compensation and reimbursement for injuries sustained by the libelant, in consequence of exposure, while in the discharge of his duty as a seaman.]

Andrew Dunlap, for libelant.

DAVIS, District Judge. This libel is for the recovery of compensation or reimbursement of expenses for board, medicine, surgical aid, attendance, and nursing, incurred by the libelant in consequence, as he alleges, of his having been severely frozen in his feet, whilst he was in the service of the ship Albion, owned by the respondents, of which ship Sheffield Reed, one of the respondents, was master. The ship Albion, returning from a whaling voyage, anchored nearly opposite the light-house on Clarke's point, New Bedford, in the afternoon of February 17th, 1831. Captain Reed landed at Fairhaven, and gave permission for one of the mates also to go on shore. On the return of the boat which conveyed Captain Reed on shore, and when that permission was communicated, both the first and second mates, Severance and Hatch, expressed a wish to avail themselves of it. They finally concluded to go together, taking care to select a boat's crew for their conveyance, in whom they could assuredly confide that would return on board the ship that night, and in proper season. Winslow, a boatsteerer, Lyman, Nash, Spooner, and the libelant, took those officers on shore. They landed at New Bedford between seven and eight o'clock on that evening, and the boat's crew, excepting Spooner, who absented himself after visiting and taking supper at the house of one of Winslow's friends, left that house at nine o'clock, and immediately afterwards proceeded in the boat towards the ship. Soon after their departure from the wharf, there was a change of wind and weather; the cold became intense; they were surrounded and greatly impeded by cakes of drifting ice, and could not reach the ship, but, after unavailing efforts for that purpose, were driven out into the bay; remained in the bay, inclosed in ice, and, suffering extremely from cold, until between eleven and twelve o'clock at night of the following day, (the 18th of February,) when they were relieved by persons from the shore, and conveyed to New Bedford. Canfield, the libelant, was the greatest sufferer among these deserving individuals. His feet were so badly frozen as to render amputation of his toes necessary, and he was confined in a painful and crippled state, for relief and cure, at lodgings in New Bedford, for a long period,—a year or more,—and remained an unfortunate, and, in a great degree, helpless, cripple, having also incurred heavy expenses for board, nursing, and surgical aid.

This demand made on the owners, is repelled on various grounds. It is said that the service in which Canfield and his associates were engaged was a voluntary one, and not necessary for the service of the ship, or which they were required or compelled to perform; that the libelant and his companions disobeyed the injunctions of the mate, respecting the time allowed to them to remain on shore, and that they delayed their return unreasonably, feasting and drinking on shore, to a late hour, ten o'clock, before they attempted to go on board the ship; that the libelant was forthwith duly discharged, with the rest of the crew, and received his share of earnings in the voyage, according to agreement, without any claim or demand on his part or behalf for damages or compensation on account of the premises, and that he has not since made any such demand, until the commencement of the present suit; that the ship was furnished with a medicine chest, conformably to law, and that the libelant might have obtained relief and cure, so far as his case was curable, in the United States Marine Hospital, to which, it is said, he had a right to claim admittance.

[1] [Affirmed in Reed v. Canfield, Case No. 11,641.]

In regard to that portion of the defence which imputes the misfortune to culpable delay or disobedience on the part of the libelant and those who accompanied him, I cannot think it is sustained by the evidence. It was reasonable, and doubtless was considered so by the mate, that they should have some brief opportunity to refresh themselves before their return to the ship, and I do not find that the license given to them was abused. They did not spend their time "in feasting and drinking to a late hour," as the answer alleges, but merely partook of a moderate supper, at an early hour, offered at the house of a friend, and left the house at nine o'clock, laudably intent upon the performance of their duty to go on board the ship, and without any incapacity, as appears to me, from any improper indulgence, to perform all that their duty required. Nor can I think, that the ready engagement of the libelant and his companions to perform the service of bringing the two mates on shore, and to return that night, can have any just bearing or operation towards defeating or diminishing a claim to compensation, in consequence of an incidental misfortune, if otherwise well supported.

This is a calamitous case. Happily, there is seldom occasion to inquire into and apply the principle of maritime law, in reference to such casualties. The general and familiar doctrine, that a seaman, falling sick or wounded in the service of the ship, is to be relieved or cured at the expense of the ship, is indeed of frequent and familiar application in such instances occurring aboard, and expenses accruing from such cause are paid and sustained by the owners, excepting so far as they may be diminished by the ship being furnished with a medicine chest. It is argued that an obligation of this sort is only applicable to casualties occurring aboard; but I do not find sufficient ground for such limitation. "If the seaman," says Cleirac, "in the performance of his duty, and while rendering service to the master and to the ship, be wounded, and receive hurt or damage, he is to be cured, furnished with medicine, fed, and fully indemnified, at the expense of the ship." Us et Costumes de la Mer. 31. This passage is part of the learned author's comment on the 7th article of the Laws of Oleron, and, in the same connection, he quotes the 18th article of Wisbuy, 39th of the Hanse Towns, the 27th and 28th of the Ordinances of Charles II., and 16th of Philip IV. The ancient law, as we find it laid down by this venerable writer goes further in favor of the seaman than our usage. "If," says he, "the seaman be maimed in the defense of the ship against enemies or pirates, and be rendered incapable of labor for the rest of his life, he shall, besides his expenses, have a support so long as he may live, at the expense of the ship and her cargo. 'Il aura du pain tant qu'il vivra." He reports a case, in which a French seaman, who had been made prisoner by the Turks, the vessel and cargo being released, recovered, in a suit against the owners, the amount paid for his ransom, with other incident expenditures. The judgment, which was rendered in a court at Bourdeaux, was affirmed by the court of appeal. Such extensive relief we have not found urged or required from owners of ships in modern times. If compensation is to be expended on such a scale, we expect it rather from the public, than from the individual shipowner; and it is contended that in this case the legal provision, by the establishment of marine hospitals, fully embraces the subject, and that the owners of our ships, such provision existing for sick or wounded seamen at home, are exonerated.

But I do not find when the libellant, belonging to a whaling ship, could be admitted to the marine hospital. The crews of vessels engaged in the fisheries are not required to pay hospital money, and are, by the existing regulations, precluded from the benefit of the marine hospitals in cases of hurt or illness accruing in fishing voyages, unless it should appear that the applicant, in some previous voyages of another description, had paid hospital money. If, however, the libellant were admissible to the hospital by law, and according to the rules of the establishment, his case was so severe as not to admit, for a considerable time, of his removal; and, if the owners of the ship be legally bound for the expenses of such cure, until the suffering seaman be placed in the hospital, it would seem incumbent on them to take measures for placing him in that asylum. It appears, indeed, that the legal rights and duties of the parties, respectively, in reference to this unhappy case, were not considered at the time when the offences commenced and before the settlement of the voyage. This presents difficulties in the case for which, perhaps, there is no complete remedy. An enforcement of the libellant's legal claims, at this time, against the owners, may subject them to the sole payment of a demand, which may have been properly chargeable to the whole concern.

The omission to make any claim of this description, until more than a year elapsed after the close of the voyage, was probably owing to the libelant's want of information of his legal rights, and, as was suggested in argument by his counsel, his claim for reimbursement of his necessary expenses, under his distressing circumstances, did not occur to his view until the publication of the case, recently decided in the United States district court in New York—Case of Robinson v. Gifford [Case No. 11,951a], inserted in the New Bedford Mercury of March 2nd, 1832. I regret the embarrassment which such a demand now occasions to the owners of the Albion, but, in obedience to the rules and principles of maritime law applicable to the case, I find myself bound to award to the libelant a reimbursement for the expenses of cure and of board, nursing, and attendance during the operation.

Amount awarded, $415.11 damages, and costs of suit. On an appeal to the circuit court, this decree was affirmed. [See Reed v. Canfield, Case No. 11,641.]

NOTE [from original report]. When a seaman is disabled by an accident in the actual discharge of his duty, it is a general rule that he is to be cured at the expense of the ship. Holmes v. Hutchinson [Case No. 6,639]. If a mariner, sent out to sea, or on shore, in the service of the ship, is taken and carried into slavery, he will be entitled to receive his whole wages. And, if the ship arrives safe, he will be entitled to an indemnity for his ransom money. Code de Commerce, liv. 2, tit. 5, art. 267, cited in Jacobsen's Sea Laws, 147. See, also, Rodman's Translation, 182. This indemnity he will be entitled to recover of the owners of the ship and cargo. But the law is laid down with some variation in the Encyclopedie Methodique (Jurisprudence) under the article Matelot: "Le matelot pris dans le navire, et fait esclave, ne peut rien prétendre contre le maître, les propriétaires, ni les marchands pour le paiement de son rachat. Mais il en est autrement, lorsque, ayant été envoyé en mer ou à terre pour le service du navire, il vient à être fait esclave; il est alors fondé à prétendre le paiement de sa rançon; savoir, sur le navire seul, s'il n'avait été commandé que pour le service du vaisseau simplement; ou, sur le navire et la cargaison, si le service avait eu l'un et l'autre pour objet il faut néanmoins, pour que la prétention du matelot soit autorisée, que le navire arrive à bon port; au surplus, le paiement de la rançon n'est pas dû indéfiniment au matelot, ce n'est que jusqu'à concurrence de 300 livres; mais il gagne outre cela ses loyers entiers, comme s'il avait servi tout le voyage," etc.

Where seamen contract for a lawful voyage, but are made the victims of an illicit voyage, for which they never intended to contract, and in which they have no voluntary participation, and the ship and cargo is seized, and they are imprisoned, they will be entitled to full wages from the time of their shipping and on the voyage to the time of their return to the United States, deducting their advanced wages, and whatever they may have earned (if any) in any intermediate employment. Shepard v. Taylor, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 675. Where a ship is captured, and the crew are forcibly put on shore by the captors, and the vessel is afterwards ransomed, but the seamen have no opportunity of rejoining her, they will be entitled to full wages, subject to a contribution to the ransom money. Girard v. Ware [Case No. 5,460].

RIGHTS AND POWERS OF NATIONAL BANKS — PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—WHEN GRANTED.

[1. Under Rev. St. § 5136, par. 7, granting national banks such incidental powers as may be necessary to carry on the business of banking, a national bank may accept stock and notes for which it was given as security, as collateral security for a loan to the holder thereof, and may sell the stock at any time after the loan becomes due.]

[See note at end of case.]

[2. The power to sell the stock is unaffected by the fact that the notes and the loan have been long overdue.]

[3. Where complainants' equity is not clear, and reasonable doubt exists as to the facts upon which a motion for a preliminary injunction is based, it should not be granted unless it appears that the act sought to be enjoined will work irreparable injury.]

[In equity. Bill by Thomas H. Canfield against the State National Bank of Minneapolis and the Minneapolis Agricultural & Mechanical Association, to establish an equity in stock and property of the defendant corporation the agricultural association.]

In this cause a motion is made for an injunction, and is heard upon bill, and answer used by defendants as an affidavit, and a counter affidavit. The allegations in the bill of complaint are, briefly, that the complainant is the owner of about sixty-five acres of land in Hennepin county, in this district, of which he is in possession, and that the defendants claim some interest therein adverse to him, and he desires that the respective claims may be litigated. He states that the Minnesota Agricultural & Mechanical Association, was organized in June, 1871, as a body corporate, with a capital stock of $40,000, represented by shares of $50 each, all of which was taken by certain parties therein named, and that the corporation, soon after its organization, purchased the land now in the possession of the complainant, for the sum of $10,000, and erected buildings upon the same of equal value. That the object of the association, and the purpose for which the property was purchased and the buildings erected, were confined to holding fairs, of which one or two were held during 1871, and none since. That the real estate was placed under the control of William S. King, one of the stockholders, and a director, to be used by him as he saw fit, a majority of the stock being owned by him; and that prior to August 14, 1873, he had purchased and acquired the stock of the corporation, and that it had been transferred to him by the other holders and owners. Also, that King had, prior to the above date, acquired the real estate in fee, and free from all claims and demands of the association, and of each of the other directors and former stockholders, with an obligation on the part of the association to make and execute a conveyance of the same to King, his heirs and assigns, or to such person as he might designate as grantee. The bill further states that the complainant contracted with King for the purchase of the real estate, August 14, 1873, and the same was finally consummated and deeds were executed and delivered to him by King, and also by all of the directors of the association, but no delivery of any stock was made as he states on account of his forgetfulness and inadvertence in requesting it. It also appears substantially in the bill, that Brackett, one of the directors, borrowed money of the bank in April, 1873, for which he gave his note and transferred as collateral to it, two hundred shares of stock of the Agricultural and Mechanical Association, and three promissory notes of Wm. S. King, dated in November, 1872, for the payment of which the stock had been pledged; and also that R. J. Mendenhall, one of the directors of the association, borrowed money from the bank and gave his note and transferred as collateral, one hundred shares of stock and certain notes of Wm. S. King, dated 1872, for the payment of which the stock had been pledged. It is charged that the bank has no title whatever or claim to the remaining five hundred shares of stock, and that it was never deposited as collateral, or pledged in any manner. The maturity of the notes for which the shares of stock were pledged is alleged, and that the bank is about to sell them at public auction, having given notice thereof.

The answer of the defendant the bank denies the material allegations in the bill as above stated, but admits that it holds the three hundred shares of stock substantially as therein set forth, and also states that in July, 1873, King, owner of the five hundred shares remaining, borrowed certain gas stock, property of R. J. Baldwin, the cashier of the bank, to enable himself to raise a certain amount of money, and in consideration of the loan, transferred the five hundred shares to Baldwin, as security for the return of the gas stock, and also to retain as additional security for the payment of the Brackett and Mendenhall notes, held by the bank. It is charged that the security taken by the bank is in violation of law, and an injunction is asked restraining the sale of the stock by the bank.

Palmer & Bell, for the motion.
George Bradley, contra.

NELSON, District Judge. The shares of stock held by the bank are a security not objectionable, in my opinion, to section 5136, par. 7, Rev. St. U. S. If so, the right to sell three hundred shares pledged as collateral to the King notes, originally given Brackett and Mendenhall, is not doubtful. A second pledgee holds the security to the extent of the debt for which it is pledged, and can sell at any time after the debt is due and payable. It is optional with the bank to stand to its remedy against the pledge or sue for its debt, and the law gave it the right to sell, ex mero motu, on proper notice of an intention so to do, or to file a bill in equity to foreclose and sell under a decree. 2 Hill. Mortg. Append. 526. Although the King notes and the Brackett and Mendenhall notes had been overdue a long time, it is not deprived of this privilege given by law to select its remedy.

It is charged that the bank has no title to the remaining five hundred shares of stock, and that the same have not been pledged or deposited with it as a collateral security for any sum whatsoever, or with any right to sell. The answer of the bank, which was used upon the motion as an affidavit, denies this allegation, and the counter affidavit and exhibits produced by the complaint do not overcome, but rather support, the substantial claim set up in the answer by the bank to a lien upon this amount of stock. Applying the usual rule on motions of this kind, the complainant's equity is not so clear as to entitle him to an injunction, for there is reasonable doubt as to the facts upon which the motion is based, and the injury resulting from a sale of the stock is not irreparable. The purchaser would take only such title as the pledgor had at the time the security was given, and the rule of caveat emptor will govern.

Having come to a conclusion adverse to the complainant's application for the reasons stated, it is not proper to consider, at this time, the effect of the judgment set up in the answer as a defence, in a case in which the parties are substantially reversed. Motion for injunction denied.

[NOTE. After denial of the application for an injunction to restrain the sale, and on September 15, 1877, the 800 shares of stock were sold by the bank to one J. M. Knight. Knight thereafter transferred 720 shares of the stock to Dorilus Morrison, and on February 25, 1878, the agricultural association by its directors, elected for that purpose by Knight and Morrison as sole stockholders, conveyed the real estate to them in the following proportions: Nine-tenths thereof to Morrison, and the remaining one-tenth to Knight. On October 28, 1878, Morrison conveyed his undivided interest in the real estate, and his 720 shares of the capital stock, to Jacob K. Sidle and Robert B. Langdon, by deed adsolute, but in fact to them as trustees for a number of persons. On August 14, 1880, complainant filed a supplemental and amended bill, to which he added, as parties defendant, Knight, Morrison, Rufus J. Baldwin, to whom the 500 shares had been delivered as collateral security for the return of certain gas stock, Sidle, Langdon, and William D. Washburn, S. W. Farnham, James A. Lovejoy, and George A. Brackett, persons for whose benefit the deed to Sidle and Langdon was executed, setting forth that, at the time of the sale, the bank had in fact no lien on the stock, having settled King's indebtedness by the acceptance of certain Northern Pacific Railroad bonds, and seeking to charge Sidle, Langdon, and Knight as holders of the legal title to the stock and the property represented by it in trust for the complainant, and praying for an account and a conveyance. The circuit court rendered a final decree in favor of complainant establishing his equity as prayed for, subject to the payment to Knight of $569.58, and to Sidle and Langdon the sum of $8,646.55. See 14 Fed. 801. From this decree the defendants appealed to the supreme court.

[Prior to the filing of the bill, and in October, 1873, defendant the State National Bank, and Baldwin, its cashier, brought an action against Canfield in the Minnesota state court, to which action neither King nor the association were parties, wherein it was finally adjudged by the supreme court of that state that Canfield never acquired any title to the real estate from the agricultural association; that the defendant bank was the bona fide holder of the stock as collateral security, and had a right to have the property of the corporation applied to its redemption, but that Canfield was the equitable owner of said stock, subject to the rights of the bank. See Baldwin v. Canfield, 26 Minn. 43.

[On the hearing of the appeal from the circuit court, the supreme court of the United States, Mr. Justice Matthews delivering the opinion, held that the judgment of the Minnesota supreme court conclusively established for the purposes of the case, that the deed to Canfield was void, and that his equity to the stock was inferior to that of the bank; that the agreement between King and the bank as to the railroad bonds did not operate as a release of the latter's lien upon the stock, and that, in the exercise of the privilege of redemption, Canfield should be charged the sum of $12,430.33, the amount paid by Morrison for the nine-tenths of the stock; and, as thus modified, the court affirmed the decree of the circuit court, and remanded the cause for further proceedings. Case No. 2,383.

CANIZARES v. The SANTISSIMA TRINIDAD.

[Bee, 353;[1] Hopk. Rep.]

Admiralty Court, D. Pennsylvania. 1788.

BOTTOMRY—GROUNDS OF HYPOTHECATION—EXTRA WAGES—MASTER'S AUTHORITY TO CONTRACT FOR.

1. The true grounds of hypothecation are the necessities of the case, and the want of personal credit.

2. A captain has no power to bind his owners and their vessel to the payment of mariner's wages for three months after his discharge, and after all services at sea and elsewhere have ceased.

"To the Honourable Francis Hopkinson, Esquire, Judge of the Court of Admiralty of the State of Pennsylvania:

"The bill of Manuel Sagas de Canizares respectfully sheweth: That Don Juan Joseph de Aguire Perez, of the city of Cadiz, in the kingdom of old Spain, now resident in the city of Philadelphia, was and is owner of a certain brigantine called the Santissima Trinidad; and that Narisco Sanchez y Serna was commander of the said brigantine, being thereto properly authorized and appointed, the said brigantine being of the burthen of 120 tons, or thereabouts. That the said Narisco Sanchez y Serna, being on the high seas and within the jurisdiction of this court, viz. at the Havannah, in the island of Cuba, was under the necessity of taking up money on the freight and property of the said brigantine, the said brigantine having suffered by storms and tempests on the high seas, and the crew of the said brigantine being in want of provisions. In consequence whereof, and from the prolongation of the voyage thereby occasioned, the said Narisco Sanchez y Serna did then and there, upon the high seas, and within the jurisdiction of this court, borrow from Santiago Cupisono the sum of 200 Mexican dollars, equal to the sum of £75 lawful money of Pennsylvania; in consideration whereof, the said Narisco Sanchez y Serna did, on the 6th day of June, 1788, on the high seas, and within the jurisdiction of this court, by a certain writing, with the proper hand of the said Narisco Sanchez y Serna, then captain, thereto subscribed, (which said writing is here exhibited to this court) contract, covenant and agree with the said Santiago Cupisono, and to him did hypothecate the said brigantine, and her freight, in the words following, viz. (The contract, in the Spanish language), the meaning and purport of which words are as follows, to wit: 'Received of Mr. Santiago Cupisono the sum of two hundred dollars, current money of Mexico, for the victualling and first expenses of the brigantine, which sum I will pay at first sight, in the name of the owner Don Juan Joseph de Aguire Perez, who is in Philadelphia: which cash I receive, mortgaging the freight, the brigantine and her rigging, as the said Santiago Cupisono has lent me the above sum for the advantage of the vessel at Havannah. June 6th, 1788. Narisco Sanchez y Serna.' And afterwards, to wit, on the 13th day of August, in the year of our Lord last aforesaid, the said Santiago Cupisono, by his endorsement on the said writing,[2] with his proper hand thereto subscribed, did order the contents to be paid to your libellant. And your libellant in fact says, that the said brigantine did arrive safely from the port of Havannah to the port of Philadelphia on the 12th day of October in the present year. And the said Narisco Sanchez y Serna, the said captain, did not, neither did the said Don Juan Joseph de Aguire Perez, owner of the same brigantine, pay, or cause to be paid, to your libellant, the said sum of 200 dollars, or any part thereof, which, according to the true intent and meaning of the said writings, so as aforesaid exhibited, the said Narisco Sanchez y Serna, and the said Don Juan Joseph de Aguire Perez ought to have paid to your libellant; although your libellant hath demanded the said sum both from the same Narisco Sanchez y Serna, the captain, and the said Don Juan Joseph de Aguire Perez, the owner, at Philadelphia aforesaid. And your libellant begs leave further to represent, that your libellant is an able seaman and pilot, well acquainted with the several harbours in the island of Cuba, and on the continent of North America, and, as such, was shipped on board the brigantine Santissima Trinidad at Havannah, by Narisco Sanchez y Serna, now or late captain, master and commander of the said brigantine, at the monthly wages in the account hereunto annexed,[3] mentioned; to sail from the said port of Havannah to the port of Philadelphia; and that it was stipulated by and between the said captain and your libellant, that in case the owners of the said brigantine should think proper to discharge your libellant at the port of Philadelphia, in such case, your libellant should receive three months' wages, and be furnished with a passage back to the said port of Havannah.[4] That the said brigantine did accordingly sail from the port of Havannah and arrive at the port of Philadelphia, and your libellant continued on board the said brigantine during all the said voyage, and did his duty as a seaman and a pilot aforesaid, until the said vessel arrived at the port of Philadelphia, and your libellant was discharged from doing any more duty on board the said brigantine by the captain and owner thereof. And although your libellant hath requested the said captain and the said owner to pay him three months' wages, and to furnish him with a passage back to the Havannah, according to the agreement aforesaid, yet the said captain and owner have hitherto refused, and still do refuse, to do the same. Wherefore, your libellant prays, that the process of this honourable court may issue against the said brigantine, and that she may be condemned by a sentence and decree of this honourable court, and that the said brigantine may be sold, and the money arising from such sale may be applied to the payment of the said several sums due to your libellant. And your libellant shall ever pray, &c. December 19, 1788."

HOPKINSON, District Judge. This libel states two separate claims of Canizares, the complainant, against the brigantine Santissima Trinidad. The one founded on an hypothecation of the said vessel, made by the then captain to Santiago Cupisono at Havannah, for 200 dollars advanced by the said Cupisono for necessaries for the said brigantine, as it is said, and to enable her to prosecute her voyage; which instrument of hypothecation is endorsed or assigned over by the lender to the present libellant: and the other, founded on a written contract between the said Narisco Sanchez y Serna, then captain, and Canizares, the libellant, made at Havannah, respecting the wages he should receive for serving as pilot and mariner on board the said brigantine, in her voyage from Havannah to Philadelphia. As these claims arise from different contracts, it is manifest that they must be separately considered.

To determine on the force of this instrument of bottomry, I shall first state the circumstances necessary to the formation of a genuine hypothecation, according to the maritime law; and then take a view of the history of this vessel's voyage, and her situation at the Havannah, when Cupisono advanced the money in question. As to the first, I have had occasion, in three former suits in this court, to state the doctrine respecting a maritime hypothecation, and have not since found reason to alter my opinion of the principles on which these causes were decided. The cases to which I refer were Liebart v. The Emperor [Case No. 8,340], Turnbull v. The Enterprize [Id. 14,242], and

"The commandant general of the navy, and the intendant general, &c. having both obliged me to take, as all other vessels do, a second pilot, as by order of his majesty, no vessel, small or great, can leave his dominions without having on board a first and second pilot. In consequence whereof, in the name of the owners, I have sought for Don Manuel Sagas de Canizares, second pilot of the navigation of Indies, and captain and first pilot in the French navy, as he has proved by his papers exhibited to the said intendant, in whose presence, treating of his wages, after having inquired of several other persons, found it more convenient and cheaper to pay him twenty dollars current money of America per month. And in case the owners think proper to suspend these commissions, they shall bring him back to this port of Havannah, paying him, above his wages, three months besides his passage, as the decency of his office requires it. And in all the ports where the said vessel shall go, he shall receive the half of the daily allowance of a first pilot, which is seven reals and 3-15 current money, and for a second pilot four reals; or in case he does not receive provisions, &c. agreeably to the ordinances of Bilboa and the regulations of the navy; and in case this present agreement should not be complied with, he shall present it to the minister, that he may oblige them to pay what is hereby promised. Two to be written of the same tenor; one for the warranty of Don Juan Joseph de Aguire Perez, to be signed in his name by the captain of his vessel, and another in the same manner to be left, as the original, in the naval office, with the commissary Mr. Domingo Labadores, each having the same strength, as if they had been made and executed before a notary public at Havannah. Forbes v. The Hannah [Id. 4,925]. The first and third of these causes were carried into the high court of errors and appeals, were there again solemnly argued and considered, and, without the intervention of any new testimony to alter the case, the sentences of the admiralty were confirmed on the same, or nearly the same, principles. I can only now repeat the substance of what was then observed. (Here the judge recapitulated the doctrines advanced, and the authorities cited in the three foregoing causes, and then proceeded to say:)

"I shall now state the history of the voyage of this brigantine, as the same may be deduced from the testimony exhibited.[5] It appears, that this vessel was chartered on account of the king of Spain, and was to sail from Philadelphia with a cargo of flour for Carthagena; that the flour was there to be sold, and a cargo of dye-wood purchased and brought back to Philadelphia, or some port of the United States. Such was the designated voyage. But, it seems, the captain, instead of returning to Philadelphia from Carthagena, went to Jamaica with an adventure of his own; to what amount does not appear. That at Jamaica he purchased dry goods fit for the Havannah market, and then sailed with the brig to Havannah, where he disposed of the goods he had bought at Jamaica, on his own account. That at Havannah he borrowed 200 dollars of Cupisono, and executed the instrument called an hypothecation, to engage the vessel and her freight to Cupisono as security for this sum. That part of this money was expended in paying wages to the sailors, and part in supplying them with fresh provisions. That the vessel was refitted at the king's arsenal, and at the expense of the intendant. And that she afterwards sailed for and arrived at the port of Philadelphia. I agree with the counsel for the libellant, that the validity of an hypothecation ought not to depend upon the regularity of the captain's conduct with respect to his owners, previous to the time of her arrival in a foreign port, and of lending money for the relief of the ship's necessities; and will go farther, and say, that neither ought it to be affected by the captain's subsequent conduct, provided the lender was in no ways privy to, or knowingly assistant in, his obliquities.

[5] There was but one deposition produced in this cause, viz. that of the late captain of the brig. It might have been a question, whether his testimony was legally admissible or not, but he was not objected to as a witness by the proctors for either side. His deposition was in these words: "Narisco Sanchez y Serna, a witness produced on the part of the libellant in this cause, on his solemn oath on the holy Evangelists of Almighty God, saith: That he, this deponent, received the 200 dollars mentioned in the libel (he being then captain of the said brigantine at the Havannah) of Cupisono, by the hands of the libellant; which money, or any part thereof, he, the deponent, hath not paid to Cupisono again; and that he employed the said money in paying wages to the crew, and in furnishing fresh provisions, until he should receive money from the intendant. That a survey was ordered upon the vessel, and a report made to the intendant, and he then received a verbal order to take his vessel from the bay to the upper part of the harbour, where the king's warehouses are, there to discharge, and after that to transport his vessel to the king's arsenal, where she was repaired and had a new bottom. That he, the deponent, had no money, nor any person to whom he could apply to obtain the same. That the vessel leaked before he went into the Havannah to such a degree, as to make more than thirty inches of water in an hour. That he never knew Mr. Cupisono; but he had had three or four days' acquaintance with the libellant. That he requested the libellant to borrow him some money, and he took him to Mr. Cupisono's, where the money was paid to him. That the paper marked 'A,' exhibited in this cause and shown to him, is a contract made between the libellant and the deponent. That at the house of Cupisono, the said Cupisono insisted upon the vessel and freight being hypothecated to him, otherwise he would not lend the money. That Cupisono knew that the vessel put in in distress—that every body knew it, and that he, the deponent, had told Cupisono of it.

"Being crossexamined, he saith, that the sailing orders (marked 'B') are the sailing orders he received. That the paper (marked 'C') is the charter-party signed between him and the freighter. That the paper (marked 'D') is the account delivered by the deponent, on his return, to his owners. Being asked how he came to apply to the intendant for money, he saith, that he presented a memorial to him for that purpose. Being asked whether he got any money in consequence of the memorial, he says, that he did not; but he was obliged to present five or six memorials. Being asked, how long after he arrived at the Havannah he presented a memorial, he answers, that he received the money from Cupisono the first Sunday after his arrival. Being asked on what day he arrived at the Havannah, he answers, that he does not remember whether it was on Thursday or Wednesday; that the memorial was presented to the intendant after the money was received from Cupisono. That in the conversation he had with Cupisono, he told him that he expected to receive money from the intendant, as he was chartered on account of the king. That he took on board a passenger at St. Martha, who was to proceed with him to this country. Being asked, whether, being at Jamaica, he did not dispose of an adventure of his own, he answered, he did, but they were not goods of the king's; that he invested the proceeds in dry goods, which he intended to dispose of at the Havannah. That he told Cupisono that he had contraband goods on board which he had brought from Jamaica. That in the course of conversations with Cupisono (for he had several) he does not recollect particulars. That Cupisono did not ask him the nature of his voyage. That Cupisono knew that the vessel was freighted with dye-wood on account of the king, and was designed for some port in the United States. That he had informed. Cupisono that he had received money from the intendant; but that a little while before he sailed he met Cupisono, who asked him how he was off for money? to which the deponent replied, that he should be much straitened, whereupon the agreement (marked 'E,' exhibited in this cause) was made and executed between them. That he was near two months and an half at the Havannah. Being asked, whether the paper (marked 'E') was given on the day it bears date, he answers, that it was not given on the day it bears date, nor does he recollect whether it was the day after, or three or four days after, but that the money was bona fide paid by Cupisono and received by the deponent, and that he does not recollect when the paper (marked 'E' the hypothecation bond) was executed."

It has been urged on the other side, that the law of hypothecation was designed solely for the benefit of the owners, and an inference drawn, that if it can be shewn that the owners of a vessel have not been benefited, but injured, by the captain's conduct and consequent hypothecation, it ought not to be allowed. But this law has for its object the good of commerce in general. And no stranger would lend money on hypothecation, if his lien on the ship was to be invalidated by some future proof that the voyage was irregular, or that the captain had deviated from the orders of his owners and injured their interests, either before or after the hypothecation made. But where shall we find, in the present case, that necessity which should justify the captain's conduct, and be the ground of a genuine hypothecation? This vessel was chartered by the king of Spain or his agent, the cargo on board was on the king's account, and she arrives in a leaky and disabled condition in one of his majesty's ports, where he had an officer stationed. This officer, the intendant, orders the brig to the public warehouse to be discharged, and then round to the king's arsenal to be repaired; all which was done at the king's expense. In truth, I cannot conceive a case of less necessity, or one wherein a more certain and able relief could be depended upon.

But, it is said, there were considerable delays before the intendant interfered, and that the captain was obliged to send in five or six memorials, and in the mean time the mariners were in great want of wages and fresh provisions, and that in this necessity the captain applied to Cupisono for 200 dollars, who refused to lend them unless the vessel should be hypothecated for his security. It appears, however, by the deposition, that the money was lent by Cupisono before the captain had made any application at all to the intendant, and therefore the neglect of the intendant could not have occasioned the necessity of borrowing money from Cupisono. That the captain of a vessel in the king's service, and in one of his majesty's ports, should not have credit for a few days' provisions, until the proper officer could be applied to, is too incredible to be seriously admitted. Still less can it be a sufficient ground for an hypothecation, that the mariners must have wages paid to them, in a place where it does not appear that any wages were due, nor is it probable that any could be due, because this was neither the conclusion of the voyage, nor even a port of delivery. The money ought to have been lent solely on the faith of the hypothecation, and not on any personal credit; but here was a strong and well founded credit, for it is in testimony that Cupisono knew that this brig was chartered for the king's service, and it is expressly said, that the money was borrowed to pay wages and procure fresh provisions until money could be had from the intendant.

Further, in the quotation from Molloy, b. ii. c. 11. s. 11. it is said: "When a master is out of the country, and where he hath no owners, nor any goods of theirs, nor of his own," &c. Now it is confest that the captain had property of his own, and, as it should seem, to a considerable amount, since it was sufficient to induce him to violate his duty to his owners, in taking the brig, contrary to their orders,[6] on a trading voyage to Jamaica for his own benefit; that at Jamaica he bought goods suitable for the Havannah market, and actually sold them at Havannah, though contraband—and that Cupisono, the lender, was privy to these circumstances. So that, instead of the lender's having the brig alone to look to for his security, he had two substantial personal credits to depend upon, viz. the intendant from whom he might expect repayment of moneys advanced for the use of a vessel in the king's employ, and the captain, whose property he might have attached before he left the island, if satisfaction was not made. This circumstance alone, that is to say, Cupisono's knowledge that the captain had property of his own on the spot, sufficient to answer the present exigencies of the vessel, would have invalidated the bond as a maritime hypothecation, inasmuch as it removes that necessity which the law requires.

There is a circumstance in the present case, which, although not in itself conclusive, forms too striking a feature in the transaction to pass unnoticed. A singularity peculiar in a maritime hypothecation is, that the law allows an extraordinary premium or interest to the lender, even to any extent, according to the risk to be run; because, if the ship should be lost, the money lent is lost with her. But here a stranger lends 200 dollars to a captain in distress, without even stipulating for common legal interest for the use of his money. I say, this alone might not be conclusive against the hypothecation, because a stranger may be as [6] Translation of the Sailing Orders.

"Philadelphia, 18th of October, 1787. Don Narisco Sanchez—Dear Sir: You will observe the following orders: When you arrive at Carthagena, you will say that you carry 300 barrels of flour for the king and troops. You will deliver my letter to Don Manuel Garcia del Rio, to whom it is directed. He will sell your venture and remit me the amount to pay your creditors. You must not stay long in these ports, and if you have the good luck to be despatched soon, you will come back with the cargo of dyewood, which you will take at that port. If it is in January and the river is frozen, you will go to New York, where you will deliver your cargo to Don Sabrados de los Monterros, and will write me by post. You will take a particular care of your people, and suffer no disorder. The said Don Garcia will give you the cash you shall want for the provisions of the brig, desiring you to be very saving in all, but let nothing be wanted, and keep good order. In case you should not be despatched soon, you will present a memorial to the viceroy, conforming yourself to the charter-party. May God grant you a good voyage. Juan Joseph de Aguire Perez."

generous as he pleases; but, in connexion with the other circumstances, it gives room for suspicion that the engagement of the brig to Cupisono was not made within the rules and spirit of the maritime law. For the above reasons, I adjudge that the bill in this cause be dismissed, so far as the same hath respect to a claim of 200 dollars, said to have been lent on the credit of the brig Santissima Trinidad.

I am now to consider the libellant's demand of wages for serving as pilot and mariner on board this vessel from Havannah to Philadelphia. The counsel for the libellant hath rested his claim of £87 5s. for wages, on a written contract made at the Havannah, between Narisco Sanchez y Serna, then captain, and Canizares. But it has been contended, on the other side, that as this agreement is in writing, and bears a seal, and is not, according to the terms thereof, in the usual way of agreeing for mariners' wages, it becomes a special contract, and is not properly of admiralty jurisdiction. Its being in writing, however, is no more than a testimony or memorandum of the agreement made, and does not affect the jurisdiction of this court. What is called a seal, appears to be nothing more than a printed stamp, for which a duty is paid to the crown: certainly, it is not the seal of the parties, or of either of them. But, as to the terms of the contract, these are indeed out of the usual course, and deserve further consideration.

One of the reasons for allowing mariners to sue in the admiralty for their wages is, that the debt arises from services performed, or to be performed, at sea; and a lien on the ship is given them for security, because the contract they make is supposed to be on the credit of the ship. Now, although the wages of 20 dollars per month, promised in the present case, appear to be extravagant, yet as the difficulty of getting a person qualified to serve both as a skilful pilot and able mariner might have been great, I think the rate of wages per month ought to be allowed as contracted for. But I cannot, upon any principle, allow, that a captain hath a power to bind his owners and their vessel to the payment of a mariner's wages for three months after his discharge, and after all services at sea or elsewhere have ceased. If he could legally do this for three months, why not for six or for twelve months, or even saddle his owners with an annuity for life to a mariner, for a few weeks' actual service? How far the common law might consider this contract as binding on the captain personally, it is not my business to say; but, as judge of admiralty, I shall be far from doing my part towards establishing a precedent by which captains, in addition to the great power they necessarily have over the property of their employers, may have that of obliging them to the payment of unlimited sums for an unlimited time. The captain might have engaged for his owners, to pay wages per month during the service, or a specific sum for the run, to any amount justifiable by the circumstances and necessities of the case; but to bind the owner to periodical payments to a mariner, after a total discharge from the service, is what I believe no captain of a vessel ever before attempted. For, whether this was to be paid all at once, or at three several times, it matters not; the contract is for three months' wages after discharge.

There is another claim under this contract for 60 dollars, to take the libellant back to the Havannah, on being discharged here. The maritime custom is, that if a master or owner discharge a mariner in a foreign port, before the completion of the voyage for which he is engaged, some reasonable allowance shall be made, over and above the wages due, to enable him to return to his own country, or to go to the port which, by the articles, should have completed the voyage. And this allowance is usually the amount of one month's wages. And it is a reasonable custom, where the mariner is willing to perform articles and finish the voyage, but the master or owner thinks fit to discharge him sooner, for their own convenience, and without just cause of complaint against the mariner. This part of the contract before us is, therefore, consistent with maritime custom, but certainly unreasonable as to the sum promised. Whatever power a captain may have by law to bind his owners by contracts made abroad for the services of the ship, yet he cannot oblige them beyond what is usual and customary, without shewing that the unusual charge arose from the necessity of the case. The present charge is expressly made for conveying the libellant back to the Havannah. I have therefore inquired what is the usual charge for a passage from this port to the Havannah, and find that 40 dollars is an ample and generous allowance.

Fraud and collusion between the captain and Canizares, the libellant, have been suggested, but not proved. Yet, if I had not found that this cause might and ought to be determined on general principles, there are two circumstances in the case which would have induced a more strict inquiry into this captain's conduct. The one, which I have already noticed, is Cupisono's lending money on hypothecation, without securing or even asking for common interest; which, though a possible, is not a usual occurrence. The other, is a contract between the captain and Canizares, which concludes with these remarkable words—"Each," (that is, the original and copy) "having the same strength as if they had been executed before a notary public at Havannah." The question naturally occurs, and why was not this contract made and executed before a notary public at the Havannah? An honest captain, who is reduced to the necessity of binding his owners to hard and unusual terms, would at least take care that nothing should be wanting in point of form and public notoriety to justify his conduct. And, besides, I suspect that this contract, which bears a printed seal, or stamp, could not be legally executed, according to the regulations of the Spanish maritime laws and customs, but in the presence of a notary, or some public officer. But it was not necesary to clear up these appearances, as the cause may be decided on other grounds.

Upon the whole, I adjudge and decree, that Canizares, the libellant, have and receive from Juan Joseph de Aguire Perez, the respondent, the sum of 112 dollars and 60-90ths of a dollar, equal to £42 5s. Pennsylvania currency—that is to say—

For five months and nineteen days' wages, from July 1st to December 19th, at twenty dollars per month..	42	5	0
For his passage to the Havannah..	15	0	0
	57	5	0
There remains.....	42	5	0

With respect to the £5 12s. 6d. added to the account, and charged for a month's boarding, I shall take no further notice of it than to observe, that it is neither mentioned in the libel, nor supported by any vouchers or testimony whatever. Finally, I adjudge, that the libellant pay one half, and that the respondent pay the other half, of the costs and charges of this suit.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April, 1829.

PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

If the legal effect of the instrument be the same, whether the words constituting a variance be inserted or not, the variance is not material.

Debt on a sealed note. Plea, "owe nothing" without oyer, and issue.

Mr. Neale, for defendant, objected to the admission of the sealed note in evidence, because it contained the words "for value received," which were not in the declaration.

Mr. Hodgson, for plaintiff.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent,) overruled the objection, and CRANCH, Chief Judge, referred to the case of Ferguson v. Harwood, 7 Cranch [11 U. CANNON v. The POTOMAC.

[3 Woods, 158.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1878.[2]

COLLISION—DIVISION OF DAMAGES—DEMURRAGE—APPLICATION OF INSURANCE MONEYS.

1. A collision took place between two steamboats caused by the fault of both, but the fault of one was greater than that of the other. Held, that the court could not gauge the demerit of the boats in assessing the damage to be borne by each. If both were in fault, though in different degrees, the damage should be equally divided between them.

2. Demurrage forms a fair subject for the allowance of damage in collision cases.

[See The Baltic, Case No. 824.]

3. Two steamboats had collided with each other by the fault of both, and were adjudged to pay each one-half the damage. One of the boats received insurance money to cover part of her damage. Held, that it was not to be deducted from the share which the other steamer was adjudged to pay, even though the underwriters had voluntarily released her from all claim for her fault in causing the collision.

[2] [Reversed in part, and affirmed in part, in The Potomac v. Cannon, 105 U. S. 630.]

4. In such case, the owners of the insured boat were allowed to apply their insurance money to that portion of their loss for which they had no redress against the other boat.

On appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.

Admiralty appeal. The libel was brought by [John W. Cannon] the owner of the steamboat [Robert E.] Lee against the steamboat Potomac [James A. Batchelor and others, claimants], to recover damages for a collision which took place between the two boats on the Mississippi river, about one mile above Natchez, on the morning of December 21, 1870. Both boats were damaged by the collision, but the injury sustained by the Lee was much the greater.

[The district court found that both vessels were in fault, and, in assessing the damages, decreed that the amount paid by the insurance companies to libellant should be deducted from libellant's damages; and, from this decree, libellant appealed.]

[The Robert E. Lee was insured on two-thirds of the valuation, by valued policies, by which, in case the insurers should pay any loss, the assured agreed to assign to them all right to recover satisfaction from any other person, or to prosecute therefor at the charge and for the account of the insurers, if requested, and that they should be entitled to such proportion of the damages recovered as the amount insured bore to the valuation in the policies. The insurers paid the libellant two-thirds of the damage, and released and assigned to the owners of the Potomac all their right in any damages growing out of the collision.][3]

B. Egan, for libellant.

J. Ad. Rosier, for claimant.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. If I were to believe the evidence of the officers of the two boats which came into collision in this case, I should be forced to the conviction that a collision was utterly impossible. They show most clearly, on the one side and the other, that both vessels had come to an entire standstill, if they were not, in fact, backing, before they met. That both vessels gave signals when they were 800 yards apart, but neither heard that of the other, which I can only account for on the supposition that they were given at the same instant of time. The flat contradictions which we are obliged to encounter in cases of this sort are a melancholy evidence of the effect of self-interest on the memories, if not on the consciences, of men. Some facts, however, seem to be indisputable. Both sides agree that a collision did in fact occur, and that serious damage was inflicted on both vessels. They concur also in the fact that the collision occurred nearer to the Mississippi than to the Louisiana shore, and at no great distance from the former—as near, in fact, as was safe for large steamers to run at that stage of the water—and to the east of the center line of the channel. They concur in the fact that the two vessels did not meet head on, but at an angle of at least forty-five degrees, if not greater than that, the starboard of the Potomac being presented to the larboard of the Lee, in such a manner that the stern of the former was driven almost squarely into the bow of the latter, penetrating to her kelson. A very slight difference in their positions, that is, if the Lee had been a few feet to the larboard of her position, or if the Potomac had been a few feet to the larboard of hers, without any change in their relative angle of direction, the thing would have been reversed, and the Lee would have penetrated the bow of the Potomac in exactly the same manner as the Potomac did that of the Lee. Which of them should be the penetrating vessel was a sheer matter of accident. There is nothing in that circumstance which throws the least light upon the question where the fault lay. That there was fault somewhere must be conceded. Two such manageable boats as these were, could not have come together with so much water-way as they had, and in such a clear and quiet night, without some carelessness or inattention on one side or other, or on both sides. I have stated that it is a conceded fact that the vessels came together at an angle of at least forty-five degrees. The weight of evidence is, that they even struck more squarely than that; that is, that at the time of collision, they were crossing each other's course more directly and squarely than at an angle of forty-five degrees. The officers on each side, respectively, endeavor to throw the blame of this upon the other side. The officers of the Lee say that she was heading straight up the river, and that the Potomac, being further out in the channel, as she approached the Lee, turned around to the larboard, as if she were rounding to at a landing, and struck the Lee nearly squarely upon her bow. On the other hand, the officers of the Potomac say that she was heading straight down the river, following the bend of the Mississippi shore, and that the Lee, being on the Louisiana side of the channel, in the vicinity of the bar there, turned to the starboard and attempted to cross to the Mississippi side, in front of the Potomac, and athwart the course she was properly pursuing. Either of these statements would account for the angle at which the vessels came together; but they are directly opposed as to which vessel was following the line of the channel, and which was crossing it. The angle at which they met we are certain about, but the course of the respective vessels at the moment of meeting, relative to the line of the channel, is disputed by directly contrary averments on each side.

There is a third hypothesis which would bring the vessels together at the angle at which they struck, and which would not require that either of them should have crossed the channel, namely, by supposing that both vessels were pursuing the general line of the channel, on the Mississippi side of it, and approaching each other nearly head on (which, if both are to be believed with regard to their own vessels respectively, must have been the case), and that just before meeting, both vessels, in order to pass each other, turned in the same direction, towards the Mississippi shore, the Lee to her right, and the Potomac to her left, as two men sometimes do on the side-walk, and thus come together. This manoeuvre would cause them to meet at the angle they did, and would be in harmony with all the absolutely certain facts of the case. It would square with the assertion so positively made on both sides, that they were on the Mississippi side of the river, and that they were following the general course of the channel. It would also accord with the facts asserted on each side respectively; by the pilot of the Lee, that he intended to pass the Potomac on the right, and by the pilot of the Potomac, that he intended to pass the Lee on the left. They both say that they signaled respectively to that effect. Is it not possible that as they approached each other, and found that they were in close proximity, each urged his helm in the direction of his thoughts, on the supposition that the other was apprised of his intention, and would pursue the same idea? This supposition would produce exactly the results which actually happened, and would relieve the parties from the imputation of a great deal of gratuitous swearing. To appearance it would be true, that the approaching vessel would seem to be attempting to cross the track of that on which the observer stood. I am disposed to think that this is the true solution of the relative movements of the vessels, and of a great deal of the apparent contradiction in the testimony. The question then arises, which party was to blame for not avoiding this collision? It certainly need never to have occurred if proper diligence had been observed on both sides. Where is the want of diligence to be found? By the rules of navigation on the Mississippi river, it was the duty of each party to signal the other as to the side on which he would pass. It was the duty of the Lee, as the ascending steamer, to do this first, and if she met with no response from the other steamer when they were within eight hundred yards or half a mile of each other, to stop and back until she could succeed in getting some response. The officers of the Lee say that such signal was given by them, viz., one whistle, indicating their intention to pass on the starboard side, and that they did not get any responsive signal from the Potomac; hence it was clearly their duty to proceed no further, but stop and back and wait. On the other hand, the descending boat, the Potomac, had a right to control the mode of passing by signaling her intention; and her officers say that she did give the signal of two whistles, indicating her intention to pass on the larboard side, but that they heard no signal from the Lee. Then it was their duty, when within eight hundred yards of the Lee, to stop and back until a communication could be exchanged. This they say they did. Now, if the statements on both sides be true, it is impossible that a collision could have occurred. Eight hundred yards distance was abundantly sufficient to enable them to check their speed and come at least to an entire stand-still before meeting. It is evident that either one, or both, did not perform that duty; they could not both have commenced stopping and backing at a distance of eight hundred yards from each other. This was their special duty under the circumstances. They both admit that no signal from the other was heard. To stop and back, and to commence to do this at eight hundred yards distance, was the specific duty of the moment. One, or both, certainly failed in performing this duty.

Two specific duties were incumbent upon the managers of the respective vessels: First, to signal at the required distance; and, second, on hearing no signal from the other, to commence stopping and backing at the required distance. Which of them neglected, or did both of them neglect, either of these duties? I have carefully looked over all the material evidence in the case, and have read the elaborate briefs of the counsel, and am forced to the conclusion that there was negligence on both sides. It is apparent from the case that both vessels, after having approached within a distance of eight hundred yards of each other, continued to make headway, and that the collision occurred at an intermediate point not far from that which was due to an equal amount of headway on both sides. In other words, so far as I can gather from the evidence, they met about midway of the distance which separated them when the first signal was given. The place of meeting was lower down than the place where the Potomac alleges that she gave her signal, and was higher up than the place where the Lee alleges that she gave her signal, and the relative movements of position of the vessels respectively seem to have been about the same. The evidence of negligence on the part of the Lee is quite clear. Leaving out the interested testimony of her officers, we have that of several passengers on board of her at the time, who all unite in saying that the captain was not on duty at the time, but was sitting in the social hall, engaged in conversation with the passengers, and that he never left the hall until the collision occurred, and that the Lee kept on her usual rate of speed; that no whistle was sounded; that the bells for reversing the wheels were not rung until the moment preceding the collision, and several of them state that the pilot, before leaving the wharf boat at Natchez, had been drinking with his friends to a considerable extent, and although they seem to speak on that subject with reluctance, they say enough to give the distinct impression that he had taken enough liquor to be somewhat under its influence. Had the captain been at his post and on the lookout, there would have been a better chance of the Potomac's signal being heard on the Lee. On the other hand, laying aside the interested evidence of the officers of the Potomac, and looking to that of those who were free from any such bias, the weight of the evidence seems to be that she did not commence to stop and back until within a short distance of the point of collision—within, at least, the distance of four hundred yards of the Lee.

Mahlon Rush, one of the strikers on board the Potomac, states that he was in the Texas hall and heard the engine bells ring to stop her, and then the two short whistles of the Potomac; he then ran out on the hurricane roof, and as he went out he heard Captain Schunk halloo to the other boat, "stop that boat." He says, "The Lee was about one hundred and fifty yards from us when I heard our bells ring to stop, and she had got within a hundred yards of us before our engines stopped." He corrects this statement afterwards by saying that the boats were about three hundred yards apart, as near as he could judge, when he first went out on the roof. He afterwards says that "the two boats were three hundred yards apart when the engines were stopped, and about two hundred or two hundred and fifty when the starboard engine commenced backing;" and it is conceded that the larboard engine did not back at all. He says also that 'both boats were headed quartering towards the Mississippi shore, right after the collision. John Fink, a passenger on the Potomac, says, "I was sitting by the stove in the hall, engaged in conversation, and about a minute before the collision took place, I heard the Potomac's stopping bell ring; right after that her signal blew; right after that her backing bells rung, and that frightened me, I jumped up and started to the door forward, and I met the bar-keeper coming in at the door, and says he, 'follow me; for God's sake do not go there;' I ran back after him, and about two-thirds of the way towards the stern, when I felt and heard the jar of the collision between the two boats." It is evident from this testimony, and much more could be cited to the same effect, that the stopping and backing of the wheel, the giving of the signal by the whistle, and the collision, all followed one another in rapid succession, and that no sufficient interval of time between these successive events occurred to render it possible that the Potomac commenced the process of stopping and backing at a distance of eight hundred yards from the Lee, or anything like that distance.

I cannot review the evidence in detail. I can only say that after having carefully examined it, I am forced to the conclusion that there was some neglect, at least, on the part of the Potomac in reference to the duty of stopping and backing, and I am by no means satisfied that her signal was given by the whistle at the required distance from the approaching steamer. The rules and regulations adopted for the government of pilots of steamers navigating the rivers flowing into the Gulf of Mexico, are explicit on the subject of the precautions to be observed when steamers are about to meet and pass each other. (The justice here read the first and second rules, which require signals to be exchanged as soon as the vessels are within eight hundred yards of each other, indicating the side on which they will pass each other; and, if not exchanged and understood, requiring them to stop and back.) These directions are so plain and easy to be observed, that no vessel should be regarded as without fault which fails substantially to follow them. In my judgment there was such a failure on both sides in this case, which caused this disaster. I think there is stronger evidence of negligence on the part of the Lee than on the part of the Potomac. If I were permitted to gauge the demerit of the parties, I should be inclined to do so; but the law does not permit this to be done. If both parties are in fault, the damage is to be sustained by them equally. As to the actual damage which was allowed on the one side and on the other, having examined the master's report and the decree, I see no reason for disturbing the result to which the district court came.

A question is made with regard to the allowance of profits to a damaged steamer whilst undergoing repairs. It is well settled by the decisions of the supreme court, and by the general practice in admiralty in this country, that demurrage forms a fair subject for the allowance of damage in such cases. The Granite State, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 310; The Black Prince, Lush. 568. I think there is no error in the decree in this regard. The amount of damage allowed for the time the respective vessels were laid up, seems to have been reached in a proper manner. The average net earnings of the Lee for a certain period of time, embracing that of her detention for repairs caused by this collision, were taken as the basis of ascertaining the amount due to each trip, and the number of trips lost was a subject of very simple calculation. The value of the Potomac's time whilst she was laid up was based upon the evidence and declarations of those concerned in her, and was fixed at $100 a day. From the evidence before the master, I am disposed to think that the allowances were correctly made.

I have more difficulty with regard to a charge made against the Lee for the insurance money which she received from her underwriters. That is ordinarily a matter with which her adversary, in a case of collision, has nothing to do, and it seems to me a little hard on the owners of the Lee that they should not be permitted to apply their insurance to that portion of their damage for which they have no redress against the other vessel.

The result of the decree is to give to the owners of the Potomac the benefit of the insurance money belonging to the Lee, by deducting it from the moiety of the damage sustained by the Lee, for which the Potomac was made liable, instead of deducting it from, or allowing it to go upon, the other moiety for which the owners of the Lee have no recourse against any person. Had the owners of the Potomac refunded this amount to the underwriters upon the claim of the latter to be subrogated to the rights of the Lee against the Potomac, it might have been different, but as I understand the evidence, the underwriters made no claim against the owners of the Potomac, but voluntarily released all demands against them, and assigned to them any supposable rights they may have had. I am not satisfied that this transaction entitles the owners of the Potomac to have the amount of the insurance deducted from the moiety of the damage to the Lee, for which they were responsible. In my judgment, therefore, the decree should be corrected in that respect, and the owners of the Potomac should be made liable to pay one-half of the damage sustained by the Lee, without any such deduction. The decree will be drawn accordingly.

[NOTE. From the decree herein an appeal was taken by the claimants of the Potomac to the supreme court, where the circuit court decree was reversed, in so far as to deduct from the sum of $6,047.37, awarded to the libellant for one-half the excess of damages sustained by the Lee, the sum of $2,476.51, being one-third of the sums paid to him by the insurance companies, and in all other respects the decree was affirmed.

[The court held, in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Gray, that the Lee being engaged in, and peculiarly fitted out for, a particular business, the measure of allowance for the damages caused by her detention by reason of the repairs rendered necessary by the collision might be arrived at by averaging the net profits of her trips for the season, in the absence of any other satisfactory way of ascertaining her charter value, and that as the amount for which the Lee was insured was only two-thirds of her valuation, leaving the owner to stand his own insurer for the remaining third, and as the damages to be recovered were for the injury to his whole interest, and the insurer had no right to more than two-thirds of the damages recovered, the insurers, therefore, within the limit of their policy, were responsible to the assured for the entire damage to his vessel, and not merely for the moiety thereof, which, because of the fault on her part, as well as on the part of the other vessel, was all that he could recover against the latter, and the sum paid to him by the insurers was as equally applicable to the portion of the damages for which he could not recover against the other vessel as for that portion for which he could; consequently, only one-half of two-thirds, or one-third of the sum paid to libellant by the insurers, could be treated as paid on account of the damages, and that third only could be deducted from the damages. CANNON et al. v. VOSE et al.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 554.]

District Court, S. D. New York. May 18, 1857.

CHARTER PARTY — PAYMENT OF CHARTER MONEY.

[In admiralty. Libel by William Cannon against Francis Vose and others. Reference ordered.]

Platt, Gerard & Buckley, for libelants.

Benedict, Burr & Benedict, for respondents.

BETTS, District Judge. This was a libel filed by the owners of the brig Excelsior to recover from the defendants an alleged balance of $550 upon a charter of the brig to them for a voyage to Port au Prince and back for the sum of $1,400, of which one-half was by the charter to be "considered earned and due on discharge of outward cargo, but payable by the charterers in New York, except what might be required for disbursements in Hayti to the amount of $150." The one-half of the charter money was admitted to have been received and $150 of the other half. The respondents set up that the master of the brig allowed her to be seized for debts incurred for her at Port au Prince, and they advanced moneys there to free the vessel to the amount of $511.10, and the balance, $188.90, they paid after suit brought. The question was whether what they had paid at Port au Prince was to be credited upon the charter money beyond the $150 specified in the charter.

Ordered, that it be referred to a commissioner to ascertain whether the sum of money paid by the respondents to the master of the vessel at Port au Prince, or upon his draft at that place, or paid the libelants since the commencement of the suit, satisfies in full the $700 payable on the charter party, together with costs of suit due at the time of payment thereof.

[4. A certificate of incorporation of a railway company, designating its "principal place of business," and setting forth that its principal business would be carried on in certain counties named, in which its line was to be located, is a substantial compliance with Act Colo. 1876, (11th Sess. 41), requiring such a certificate to designate the "principal office," and name of the county, in which the principal business of the corporation is to be carried on.]

[On April 20, 1878, the Canon City & San Juan Railway Company filed its complaint against the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company to enjoin interference with the construction of the line of the former company through the Grand canon. The complaint was filed in the third judicial district of Colorado, and an injunction was granted therein, and on the 22d of April, 1878, the suit was removed to the circuit court.

[The Denver Company filed its complaint against Alling, Locke, and Magrue, incorporators of the Canon City Company, and against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company, on the 27th of April, 1878, to enjoin the defendant the Canon City Company from occupying or attempting to occupy the Grand canon, and a temporary injunction was granted.

[The portions of the act of March 3, 1875, referred to herein granted a "right of way through the public lands of the United States" to any railroad "company duly organized under the laws of any state or territory, * * * which shall have filed with the secretary of the interior, a copy of its articles of incorporation, and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of said road." The 2d section provides: "That any railroad company whose right of way or whose track or road-bed upon such right of way passes through any canon, pass or defile shall not prevent any other railroad company from the use and occupancy of said canon, pass or defile, for the purposes of its road, in common with the road first located, or the crossing of other railroads at grade. * * *" Section 4 declares that any railroad company desiring to secure the benefits of that act shall, "within twelve months after the location of any section of twenty miles of its road, if the same be upon surveyed lands, and if upon unsurveyed lands, within twelve months after the survey thereof by the United States, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located, a profile of its road; and upon the approval thereof by the secretary of the interior, the same shall be noted upon the plats in said office, and thereafter all such lands over which such right of way passes should be disposed of subject to such right of way."] [2]

[1] [Reversed in Denver & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Alling, 99 U. S. 463.]

[2] [From statement by Mr. Justice Harlan, in Denver & R. G. Ry. Co. v. Alling, 99 U. S. 463.]

HALLETT, District Judge. Two companies claim the same right of way for a railroad through the Grand canon of the Arkansas river where there is room for only one road. That remarkable defile is in the public domain, and each company claims under an act of congress. The interpretation and application of these acts present a question under the laws of the United States which may properly be considered in this court pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1875 (18 Stat. 470). The jurisdiction in equity to determine the right and restrain any disturbance of it is not doubted since there is no adequate remedy at law. The first of these suits was brought in the district court of Fremont county, and an injunction was there allowed restraining the defendant company from prosecuting work in the canon. After some days that suit was removed into this court on petition of the defendant therein under the authority of the act of 1875, and the defendant in that suit brought a new suit in this court against the corporators of the first named company and some others to enjoin them from disturbing its right to occupy the canon. The reason for bringing this last suit against the corporators of the San Juan Company and not against the company itself is an irregularity in the organization of the latter company on which the plaintiff relies to impeach its validity. Argument was heard in the last mentioned suit on a motion for injunction, and perceiving that the same matters were involved in both suits and that the right was somewhat doubtful, it was thought best to continue the injunction in the first suit and allow a like writ in the second; in effect to place both parties under restraint until mature consideration of the questions presented could be had. The bill in the first suit was something lame and impotent, and the plaintiff therein was allowed to file an amended bill upon which a writ was issued of the same scope and effect as that allowed in the second suit. As the controversy stands both parties are enjoined from prosecuting the work of a great public improvement where one must be entitled to go on, and therefore the court should not halt between opinions.

Both cases will be taken into view in this discussion and the allegations in each bill, so far as they are not in conflict, will be taken as true. It is believed that enough is admitted in the records of the two cases to determine the right to a preliminary injunction. The Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, defendant in the first suit and plaintiff in the second, has the senior claim, and in ascertaining its right we shall reach the principal question in the case. That corporation was organized in the year 1870, under chapter 18 of the Revised Statutes of the territory (Rev. St. p. 115). The object of the corporation, as expressed in the certificate, was to construct a number of railway and telegraph lines, or perhaps it would be more correct to say a trunk line with numerous branches. The principal line was to be extended from Denver through Colorado and New Mexico to El Paso in the state of Chihuahua, and there were to be seven branches, one of them extending to Salt Lake City in Utah, and the others to various points in Colorado and New Mexico. These lines were defined generally in the certificate as extending from place to place, or lying in the valley of some stream or through some canon or pass in the mountains, but no attempt was made to give courses and distances, or to specify in any other way the exact location of the routes selected. Indeed it seems that the various lines had not been fixed except as to the general direction, and no survey had been made by which they could be definitely located. Referring to the principal line which was more particularly defined than any of the branches, the part which includes the disputed territory is as follows: "Commencing at Denver, Colorado Territory, thence running up the valley of the South Platte river, on the southeast side thereof to a point at or near the mouth of Plum creek; thence up the valley of Plum creek to a point at or near the forks of East Plum creek and West Plum creek; thence up the main east branch of Plum creek valley to the lake in township eleven (11), range sixty-seven (67) west, on the crest of the ridge dividing the waters of Plum creek and Monument creek; thence down the valley of the Monument creek to a point at or near the junction of the valleys of the Monument and Fountain qui Bouille, or to a point in the Fountain valley below the mouth of the Monument, if the detailed survey shall determine the latter to be the most eligible; thence by the valley of the Fountain or across its west tributaries to such a point on the Arkansas river, at or above Pueblo, as may be found upon a detailed survey to be the most eligible for intersecting the same; thence up the valley of the Arkansas river to a point at or near Canon City; thence continuing up the valley of the Arkansas through the Big canon of the same to a point at or near the mouth of the South Arkansas river; thence by the valleys or the adjoining slopes of the South Arkansas river and of the Poncho creek, to the summit of the divide between the waters of the Arkansas and the San Luis park (known as Poncho Pass); thence by the most eligible route in a general southerly direction down the San Luis valley to the valley of the Rio Grande del Norte."

Everyone who is at all acquainted with the geography of the country, will know that the line between the mouth of Monument creek and Canon City, as thus described, embraces a strip of country more than forty miles wide, in which the road might have been located. If it was more restricted in the mountain region beyond Canon City, it was because the valley of the Arkansas was narrower there, and not from any effort of the corporation to describe the line with accuracy. Further on in the San Luis valley, which is many miles wide, it takes the whole valley for its location, and so also down the Rio Grande river through New Mexico. It is to be observed, however, that the act under which the corporation was organized did not require any description of the lines of road to be constructed, or even that the termini of the roads should be stated. But it did require a statement of the objects of the company, and in the case of a railroad perhaps that would be most conveniently done by giving some general description of the road. That was a general act providing for many different corporations, which was probably intended to comply with the direction of congress in 1867, that territorial assemblies should not grant private charters, but could, by general acts, permit the incorporation of persons for mining, manufacturing and other industrial pursuits. 14 Stat. 426. It contained general provisions applicable to all corporations which should be organized under it, and special provisions which were applicable to some; only railroad companies were not of this latter class, but were left to the general provisions of the act, which required no designation of the route or termini of the road further than would be necessary in stating the objects of the company.

Without other authority than was given by this general act of the territory, the company built its road to Pueblo. On the 8th day of June, 1872, congress passed an act granting to the company right of way over the public lands, and confirming the powers given to the company by the territorial law. The act requiring the company to build its main line as far south as Santa Fé, within five years, which period is by a later act extended to ten years. 19 Stat. 405. The material part of the act for present consideration is as follows: "That the right of way over the public domain, one hundred feet in width on each side of the track, together with such public lands adjacent thereto as may be needed for depots, shops, and other buildings for railroad purposes, and for yard room and side tracks, not exceeding twenty acres at any one station, and not more than one station in every ten miles; and the right to take from the public lands adjacent thereto, stone, timber, earth, water, and other material required for the construction and repair of its railway and telegraph line, be, and the same are hereby granted and confirmed unto the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, a corporation created under the incorporation laws of the territory of Colorado, its successors and assigns." 17 Stat. 339.

On behalf of the Rio Grande Company it is contended that this act conferred an exclusive right to occupy the Grand canon of the Arkansas river for railroad purposes; that the certificate of organization is a public record of which congress had notice at the time of passing the act, and as the canon is mentioned in the certificate as a point on the line of the road, the company was authorized and required to build in that place. And certainly it will be conceded that congress was advised of everything that the law required to be stated, and that was in fact stated in the certificate of incorporation. That certificate was evidence of the corporate existence under the territorial law, and congress, in recognizing the company and confirming to it the powers given by the law of the territory, must have acted with reference to it. And so if the act had required the corporators to describe the various lines of road which the company proposed to build, and they had so described them with particularity in the certificate, the effect of the act of congress would not be doubtful. In that case the act of congress would operate as a present grant of the particular way or ways described in the certificate. But the certificate does not in fact locate the different lines of road with such particularity as is required in granting a right of way. Said the supreme court of Massachusetts: "A way ex vi termini imparts a right of passing in a particular line." Jones v. Percival, 5 Pick. 485. And if the line is not described with reasonable certainty it cannot be said that the grant is of a particular way by description. No one will contend that a grant of right of way to a railroad company, either by the government or an individual, must specify the exact line of the road, but at least the track to be traversed by the road must be designated. The description must come within something less than forty miles of the line of location. In this certificate there is nothing like a description of any particular line. The mention of points and places on the various lines was but an indication of the general course and direction of those lines and the statement that the line should be in a certain valley was not more definite. Like the mouth of Monument creek, the Arkansas river, Canon City, and other points on the line, the object of naming the Big canon of the Arkansas river was apparently to give the general course of the road. Certainly it cannot be said that naming these points and places is a sufficient description to charge the public lands along the line with an easement of which purchasers would have notice. If it is claimed that we should separate the big canon from the remainder of the line and accept that portion as sufficiently described because its mighty walls enclose a narrow space, the proposition cannot be entertained. The grant is an entirety as to all public lands lying in the course of the several lines of road, and it would be absurd to say that it was intended to pass this canon by description and nothing more. Congress had already learned the strategical value of passes and defiles in the mountains, and when it was intended to grant such places by description the right of other companies to occupy the same ground was reserved. 17 Stat. 202.

We may say, that this was no grant of a particular way over the public domain, and we have yet to consider its effect as a general authority to appropriate the public lands to the uses of the company. That it is in terms such a grant, no one can deny and we should hesitate to say that it may be void for uncertainty. We may concede the power of congress to charge all the government lands in perpetuity with a floating easement which may be asserted at any time against innocent purchasers who have bought of the public lands in good faith, but we should be slow to believe that such was the intention unless it is plainly declared. If by the act of 1872 the company acquired a present right to appropriate for right of way and stations any lands that were then public lying in the general course of any of its lines farms, villages and towns that have been taken up since that time must yield to such right. It is not to be presumed, however, in the absence of express declaration that such a result was intended by congress. "If A seized of a great waste, grants the moiety of a yard land lying in the waste without ascertaining what part, or the special name of the land, or how bounded, this may be reduced to a certainty by the election of the grantee. But it is otherwise in the case of the king's grant for there can be no election in that case and therefore the grant is void for uncertainty." Bac. Abr. tit. "Grant," H. 3. And so we may say in accordance with the principle that a grant to a corporation shall be strictly construed in favor of the public and against the corporation, that the act of 1872 gave nothing except upon the location and construction of the road. In the general act of 1875 (18 Stat. 482), and in most special acts granting right of way over public lands (16 Stat. 395; 17 Stat. 202, 212, 224, 340, 343, 393, 612; 18 Stat. 130, 274, 306, 309), provision is made for filing a plat of the route selected with the secretary of the interior, and the line of the road is then minuted on the plats of the public surveys in the local office. In this way full notice is given to purchasers and all who may be interested in the subject of the right claimed by the company. Any sale of the lands must be made subject to the easement, and hence the necessity for specifying the lands so to be affected. Under these acts it seems very clear that no right is secured by the company until the plat is filed with the secretary. In the act of 1872, and in some other acts (14 Stat. 211, 237, 240, 290, 294; 16 Stat. 192; 17 Stat. 280), no such provision is found, and the omission suggests that some other method of designating the lands appropriated by the company was intended. That method, in the absence of any other prescribed by law, can only be the use and occupation of the lands for the purpose indicated in the act. As under acts of the first class the company will not acquire any interest in the public lands until the plat shall be filed, so under acts of the second class no interest is acquired until the lands are occupied by the company. Under all acts regulating the sale of public lands the grantee is required to designate the part which he will take in order that it may be segregated from the general mass; it is so under homestead and pre-emption laws and all other laws for disposing of public lands unless the acts of this class shall be regarded as an exception. Certainly there can be no hardship in requiring these companies in accepting the bounty of the government to conform to the general rule. Referring to a similar act the supreme court of California says: "It was doubtless the purpose of the act merely to give a right to enter on the public lands, assuming them to be vacant, and its effect is to relinquish to the plaintiff (the R. R. Co.) any claim for compensation that might belong to the United States, as proprietor under any proceeding under the state law to appropriate the land for public use." Northern R. Co. v. Gould, 21 Cal. 260. So here it may be said that the act of 1872 authorized the company to go upon such of the public lands as should be found vacant and unoccupied, and appropriate them to the uses of their roads. In this sense it was a grant in presenti, but not otherwise, and any rights in the public lands secured by others under existing laws before any occupation or appropriation by the company, must be respected by the latter. In Central Pac. R. Co. v. Dyer, Case No. 2,552, this conclusion was apparently rejected upon grounds which are not stated, but I have not been able to adopt the views of the distinguished judge who delivered the opinion in that case.

Having ascertained that no interest in the lands in controversy passed to the company under the act of 1872 until it should appropriate them to its own use, we have next to inquire whether there was in fact any such appropriation of the Grand canon before the rival company set up a claim to it. On this point the company avers: First. That in the years 1871–2 it surveyed and located its line through the canon, and set substantial stakes upon it. Second. That it did in the same years "in sundry places in and near said canon grade and excavate the bed and line of its said railway." Third. That about the year 1875 it completed its road from Pueblo to Canon City.

If any of these acts afford evidence of occupation and appropriation by the company such as the public were bound to respect, its right was thereby established. That the surveying and staking does not afford evidence of that character is clear enough on reason and authority. Merritt v. Northern R. Co., 12 Barb. 606; Morris & Essex R. Co. v. Blair, 1 Stock [9 N. J. Eq.] 635. As I had occasion to say some years ago in another case which arose under a similar act of congress, the modern practice of surveying several routes in order to induce the people to give lands, bonds or other aid, or give the right of way on favorable terms, in consideration of the building of the road on one or the other of the lines so surveyed, must tend strongly to discredit any such evidence of location. Indeed railroad companies, in this country at all events, are constantly surveying new routes in an experimental way, and no one is disposed to accept anything less than the building of the road itself as evidence of a permanent location. As to the work alleged to have been done "in and near" the canon, it will be observed that the language of the bill is exceedingly vague. If a road-bed was constructed for any considerable distance, which would in itself afford evidence of the character of the improvement, that would be an act of appropriation which no one could deny. But to overturn a few shovelfuls of earth here and there would not leave any intelligible sign of the company's occupation. The charge in the bill is entirely consistent with very little work, and for the present purpose of determining the right to a preliminary injunction it must be regarded as insufficient. If at the hearing it can be shown that substantial work was done there another view may be taken of it. As to building the road from Pueblo to Canon City, if before any adverse occupation of the canon the company had shown a purpose to go on from the latter place, some weight might be given to it. With a line located and in process of construction from place to place no other company would be allowed to interfere, under an act even more vague and indefinite than that of 1872. But the company halted for three years at a town at the base of the mountains, which might be regarded as a permanent terminus. Meanwhile if reference may be had to a fact which is not in the pleadings, but may be taken as belonging to the history of the country, the company reached the San Luis valley by another line, and that is in the course of the line through the Grand canon towards El Paso. These circumstances do not show a purpose to prosecute the work beyond Canon City, but they tend in the opposite direction; and this must also be rejected as failing to show occupation and appropriation by the company.

At the time this controversy arose the land in and along the Grand canon was of the public domain and still subject to occupation and appropriation under the act of 1872, if it had not been previously appropriated by the rival company. That company is known in the pleadings as the Canon City and San Juan Railway Company, and its corporate character is denied upon the ground that its certificate of incorporation is defective. The act of 1876 (11 Sess. 41) provides among other things to be set out in a certificate of incorporation, "the name of the town or the place and the county in which the principal office of the company shall be kept and the name of the county in which the principal business of the company shall be carried on." A substantial compliance with this act was all that was required. Spring Valley Waterworks v. San Francisco, 22 Cal. 434. As to the first clause requiring the office of the company to be designated the corporators of the San Juan Company declared in their certificate "the principal place of business of said company shall be Canon City, in the said county of Fremont." In the case of a railroad company the "principal place of business" is obviously the "principal office." With manufacturing corporations this may not be true, but a railroad company having business all along its line has no principal place of business other than its general or principal office.

As to the second clause of the act above recited, which requires the county in which the principal business will be carried on to be stated, it was sufficiently observed by stating the counties in which the road was located. As before observed, the company will do business wherever the road may run, and its "principal business," if that can be separated from the general office, must be along the whole line of road. If this clause of the act has any application whatever to railroad companies it ought to be sufficient to state the counties through which the road will pass. It would seem idle to state separately after giving the location of the road in the certificate that the principal business of the company would be carried on in the counties of Fremont and Lake, where the road would be built. The certificate is regarded as complying substantially with the act and therefore sufficient.

The act of 1868, on the same subject (Rev. St. p. 118), under which the Rio Grande Company was organized, was quite different. It required "the name of the town and county in which the operations of the said company shall be carried on" to be given; and the corporators of that company designated the principal office, but did not attempt to locate the "operations" of the company in any town or county. If any defect arose out of that omission it was probably cured by the act of congress of 1872. In the bill filed by the Rio Grande Company it is alleged that the defendant never did in fact survey any line through the canon, and this, if true, may be of weight. The latter company, however, in its bill avers that the survey was duly made and the allegation is supported by a copy of the profile of the line which appears to be approved by the secretary of the interior. For the present we must regard the survey and location of that line as having been made according to the act of 1875 (18 Stat. 482), and sufficient to vest in the company the right to occupy and use the canon for railroad purposes as against one claiming under the act of 1872.

That the Rio Grande Company may be admitted to the same right of way if there is room for two roads in the canon seems to be clear, and perhaps that company may be entitled to use the track of the San Juan Company if there is room for but one road. This last question may be passed for the present, and as to the first it is only necessary to say that both companies cannot go on with the work of construction at the same time in a narrow defile, such as the canon is said to be. To permit it would be to perpetuate the conflicts which we were lately asked to suppress. If the San Juan Company must admit its rival to its right of way or to its track, that can only be done after its road has been built. In building its road through the canon, however, due regard must be had to the rights of the other company, and the line must be so located as to admit of the construction of another road, if that be possible. Under the act of 1875 one company cannot appropriate all the available ground in a canon, pass or defile to the exclusion of another, if less than the whole will reasonably answer its purpose. To enforce this provision perhaps the court, upon proper demand therefor, should control the location and building of the first road to such extent as may be necessary to protect the rights of other companies who may wish to use the same canon. This question can be better considered at the term which is near at hand, and the parties may then be heard as to the proper course to be pursued. Until then the San Juan Company will be allowed to proceed with the work of grading the line only which will admit of change and correction without serious loss to the company. That is to say the company may proceed in its own way to grade the road, but we reserve the right to correct the location and grading upon complaint made to us by the Rio Grande Company, if we find that we have power to proceed in that manner.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company has the right to construct its railroad through the Big canon of the Arkansas under the act of congress, June 8, 1872 [17 Stat. 339]. The Canon City and San Juan Railway Company has the like right under the act of congress of March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 482]. The first named company's rights as against the last named company, or any company duly organized, were not complete and exclusive as to any part of the canon until actual location and adoption of its line by corporate acts or action followed by actual use and appropriation. That this was done by the first named company prior to March 3, 1875, does not appear with such certainty in the bill or pleadings, as to afford a basis for a judicial order in its behalf. Assuming, therefore, at this stage of the cause, that there was no consummated exclusive right in the Denver Company at the time when the Canon City Company was organized (Feb. 15th, 1877), we have the case of a concurrent right in the two rival companies to construct their roads through the canon and to use and occupy the canon for that purpose. The second section of the act of March 3, 1875, contains a special provision which in the supposed state of facts applies to these companies. It provides that "any railroad whose right of way or whose track or road bed upon such right of way, passes through any canon, pass, or defile, shall not prevent any other railroad company from the use and occupation of the said canon, pass, or defile, for the purposes of its road in common with the road first located, or the crossing of other railroads at grade." I concur in Judge HALLETT'S opinion that the pleadings as they stand do not show a state of facts which give the Denver Company an exclusive right to the use of the canon. What the proofs may hereafter show cannot of course be anticipated.

The canon is alleged to be only forty-five feet in width at the narrowest portion. It is alleged by the Denver Company that not more than one railway with way of the width in the act of congress granted (100 feet in width on each side of the track) can be constructed through said canon. But it does not appear that it is physically impossible to construct two lines of railway through the canon. The intent of congress is plain that canons and defiles in the public domain shall not be monopolized by one company. If there is room for two lines in this canon, each company, so far as now appears, has the right to use and occupy the canon for the construction of its road. Usually thirty feet in width, and even less, is ample space for two parallel lines of railway track. If each company desires to construct its line through the canon each should be permitted to do so, if it is practicable. If a center line be drawn through the canon, one company should be restricted to the space on one side of that line and the other to the space on the other side of that line, if this will allow of the construction of the two lines of railway in the canon, and no other course is more equitable. If it is uncertain whether the course above suggested is practicable, i. e. whether there is space for the two lines of railway in the canon, a commission of one or more disinterested engineers can be hereafter sent by the court to report the facts to the court for its information. If only one road can be constructed there, on the pleadings and the present status of the case, I think the Denver Company is not entitled to an injunction against the Canon City Company. If both companies are ready to go forward to construct their roads immediately, one company should not be permitted to adopt a route which will prevent the other company from an equal, fair and reasonable use of the canon. "Equality is equity." Such are my general views as to the law of the case as it is now presented.

The precise order that ought to be made at this time is somewhat uncertain, by reason of an allegation by way of an amendment to the bill of the San Juan Company, which the demurrer admits. That amendment is as follows: "Plaintiff further avers that by reason of the narrow and crooked course of said canon through the close or narrow part thereof, not more than one railway can be constructed through the said narrow part, except by laying the track of one of said railways across the track of the other in many places, nor without great and constant hazard of collisions between the trains operated on said two railways." It may be taken sufficiently to appear as the case stands, that both companies cannot go on with the work of construction at the same time. It does not to my mind satisfactorily appear that there may not be room for two lines in all parts of the canon. The San Juan Company as above held on the pleadings, as they now stand, has the prior right of occupation, and it may, if it chooses, go on with the work of grading and construction between this and the term (which occurs in a little more than a month), meanwhile to lay no iron until further orders, and meanwhile the Denver Company to be enjoined. The Denver Company can then show that the San Juan Company are proceeding improperly with a view unfairly to monopolize the entire route and to exclude it if such is the fact. We can then adopt such course and make such orders as may appear to be right and just to each of the companies. Knowing our general views of their respective rights under the two acts of congress, it may not be too much to hope that they may adjust the controversy by agreement. I recommend a temporary order in conformity with these views if Judge HALLETT concurs.

[NOTE. In the action instituted by the Canon City Company the Denver Company filed a cross bill setting up substantially the same facts as in its original bill against Alling and others, and upon the final hearing two decrees were made, August 24, 1878,—one, in the suit of the Canon City Company, recognizing its prior right to proceed in the construction and operation of its road through the Grand canon without interference or obstruction by the Denver Company, with the right to the latter to thereafter exhibit its bill to compel the Canon City Company to so change, locate, and construct its road as to permit the convenient and proper location by the Denver Company of its own road, or to compel the Canon City Company to permit the Denver Company to occupy the track and roadway of the former company if at any point in the canon it should be impracticable to conveniently lay down or safely operate two distinct lines of railway; the other dissolving the preliminary injunction theretofore granted in the suit of the Denver City Company, and dismissing its bill.

[From both of these decrees the Denver City Company appealed to the supreme court, which reversed the same, holding that by the act of June 8, 1872 (17 Stat. 339), the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company was granted a present beneficial easement over the route designated, which, upon actual location and appropriation, made a perfect title, and by relation took effect as of the date of the grant; and that the surveys of such company, followed by an occupancy of the canon in April, 1878, in advance of the Canon City and San Juan Railway Company, for the purpose of constructing the road, was a final appropriation of the way granted; but that the Denver Company, by its acceptance of the benefits of the act of March 3, 1877, extending the time for completing its road, must be held to have assented to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 482), that any other railroad company duly organized under the laws of any state or territory might use and occupy the canon for the purposes of its road in common with the road first located; and that in this case, where it was found impossible in any portion of the canon to lay more than one road-bed and track, the Canon City Company should have the right to use such road-bed and track in common with the Denver Company after its completion. District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1858.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—LIEN—MARITIME SERVICE—LACHES.

1. Persons employed to load, navigate, and unload a vessel plying between Quincy and Boston, principally for the transportation of stone, she being licensed for the coasting trade, and being propelled by sails and the usual apparatus of a coaster, have a maritime lien upon such vessel for their wages.

[Applied in The May Queen, Case No. 9,360. Cited in The Sarah Jane, Id. 12,349; The Norfolk, Id. 10,297. Distinguished in The Sarah E. Kennedy, 29 Fed. 266.]

2. Where the contract of service is for the navigation of tide waters, and laying stone in wharves is merely incidental and subsidiary to the principal business, the whole service may be maritime.

[Cited in The Charles F. Perry, Case No. 2,616; The General Cass, Id. 5,307; Raft of Spars, Id. 11,527; The Artisan, Id. 568; The Champion, Id. 2,584; The Minna, 11 Fed. 760. Distinguished in The Ole Oleson, 20 Fed. 384.]

3. But if the navigation is merely incidental and subsidiary to some other business, which is not maritime, the contract, as a whole, will not be maritime.

4. A vessel's being sailed by the master, on shares, does not affect the lien of the seamen for their wages. Their knowing that she was so sailed, makes no difference.

5. The lien for wages is not lost by delay in enforcing it, where no third person has acquired any right to the vessel, and the owner has not been injured by the delay.

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, for wages earned on board of the sloop Canton, of thirty-five tons, during the summer of 1856. The answer alleged, 1st. That the libellants were not seamen, nor engaged in maritime service, and that no lien existed for their services; that the vessel was employed in freighting and laying stone in and about Boston, and between Quincy and Boston. 2d. That in accordance with the general custom at Quincy, this vessel was hired by the master, on shares, and that he victualled and manned her; that this fact was well known to the libellants when they were hired by him; and that this knowledge, coupled with the fact, that they received pay from time to time, from the master, was evidence that they trusted solely to the master for their pay, and so waived any lien that they might otherwise have had. 3d. That the claim was stale, and no lien could be enforced at this time. And in support of each of these grounds of defence, the claimants relied upon the case of Packard v. The Louisa [Case No. 10,652].

C. P. Curtis, Jr., for libellants.

H. F. Smith, for claimants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This is a libel in rem, for wages. The services are not denied; but the claimants, in the first place, contend that the employment of the libellants was not maritime in its nature; and this defence finds countenance in the case of Packard v. The Louisa [Case No. 10,652], which vessel was similarly employed. The only question actually decided in that case was, whether, after the expiration of three years, during which time the vessel had gone into the hands of bona fide purchasers, without notice of the claim, the lien could be enforced; and it was very clear that it could not. Whatever remarks may have been made upon other points, by the learned judge of the circuit court, were obiter dicta, not necessary to the decision of the case. Indeed, they were scarcely dicta, for the judge merely indicated the inclination of his mind, without expressing any decided conclusion upon the questions. I do not, therefore, regard them as binding authority upon this court.

There is another case, however, of more direct bearing,—Thackarey v. The Farmer [Id. 13,852],—in which Judge Hopkinson refused to issue process for wages against a vessel of forty-two tons, engaged in transporting fuel from Cooper's creek, across the Delaware river, to Philadelphia. The libel in that case alleged the services to have been rendered on the high seas; and that learned judge tried to draw a line of distinction, which should exclude small craft, engaged in local business, such as the transportation of fruit, provision, or fuel, on the Delaware, from admiralty jurisdiction. Some confusion seems to have existed in his mind, touching the necessity for the services being rendered on the high seas, in order to give a lien therefor. But it is clear, that services on tide-waters, or navigable rivers, may create a maritime lien. There are many decisions to this effect, and Judge Hopkinson himself has so held, in the case of a steamer plying between different ports on the Delaware river. Smith v. The Pekin [Case No. 13,090]. Now, this vessel, the Canton, was engaged in navigating tide-waters. She was enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade [which would not have been done had not the service contemplated been maritime in its nature].[2] The actual employment of the libellants was to load the vessel at Quincy, not as quarry-men, but to take the stone on board from a wharf, to navigate the vessel to Boston, and there to unload her. She carried stone principally; but she also carried lumber, and one cargo of lime. She was propelled by sails, and the other usual apparatus of a coaster, and the persons engaged on board of her must have been possessed of some skill in navigation. They must have been able to "hand, reef and steer," the ordinary test of seamanship. These duties the libellants performed. They must also have known the rules of navigation, for the avoidance of collision and had they, from want of skill, run afoul of another vessel, the owners of this sloop would have been responsible for the damage. I cannot hold that the libellants were only landsmen.

It is further urged, that, by the authority of the case of Thackarey v. The Farmer, in order to constitute the service on a river, maritime, and to give jurisdiction in admiralty, the vessel must be engaged in "commerce and trade." Judge Hopkinson does not extend this test to vessels employed on the high seas, and why that requisite should attach to vessels on one part of the water within the admiralty jurisdiction, and not to others, I am unable to perceive. A mere passenger vessel is not engaged in commerce or trade. A whaling voyage is only a hunting expedition. A vessel engaged in the exploration of the North seas, is not employed in commerce or trade, and yet, in each of these cases, the services of the seamen are certainly maritime, and they have a lien therefor on the vessel.

The laying of stone in the building of wharves, it is argued, is not a maritime service. [This is true as an insulated service, but it may be so connected with and subservient to a far greater and more important contract that the whole may be deemed maritime].[2] And such service was performed by the libellants, in the case of Packard v. The Louisa, as well as in the present suit. The general rule, in regard to this, may be thus stated: If the contract is for the navigation of tide-waters, and laying stone in wharves, is merely incidental and subsidiary to the principal business, the whole service may be considered maritime. But if, on the contrary, the navigation is merely incidental and subsidiary to some other business, which is not maritime, of the owner or hirer of the vessel, such, for instance, as the transportation across a river, of the stone to be used by him in the construction of a building, upon which he is engaged, then the contract, as a whole, would not be maritime.

This vessel was engaged in transporting stone, an article of merchandize, on tide-waters. The master says, that eight or nine trips were occupied with freighting wharf stone, and in laying the wall of a wharf, for which the stone was intended, and that upon each of such trips an hour's delay was caused by laying the stone regularly, instead of unloading it, upon a wharf, in the usual manner. The master's book, however, shows but one such trip. But even though there had been nine, this was merely subsidiary to the principal business, and I do not think that such incidental employment for nine hours, in six months' service, can deprive that service of its maritime character. These stones were hoisted out of the vessel in the usual manner, and were lowered into the wall of the wharf. This is equivalent to an agreement by the crew of any other vessel, to pile up the cargo on the wharf, on arrival. It is only a variation of the method of unloading. I am, therefore, of opinion, that these libellants were engaged in a maritime service, and that they are entitled to come into this court to enforce their lien for such service.

2d. The second ground of defence cannot be maintained. Supposing the libellants to be seamen employed in maritime service, they have a lien on the vessel, whether she be sailed on shares or not. Their knowing that she was so sailed, can make no difference. Whoever is the owner, the seamen have the vessel as security, and they are not bound to heed arrangements made with third parties. [They always know that there is some owner, and behind that owner's liability, whether he be the general or special owner, they have the thing to look to for their wages].[2]

3d. There having been no change of ownership in the vessel, the position, that the lien has been lost, by delay in enforcing it, is untenable, as no innocent third party is injured. It has been urged, that a good practical limitation to these claims would be the time of settlement between the master and owners. This cannot be adopted as a [fixed] [2] rule, because such settlement might be had at so early a period, as to give the seaman no reasonable opportunity to enforce his right. But if the seamen, knowing that the vessel had been taken by the master on shares, and that he ought to pay their wages, should permit an unreasonable time to elapse, after the termination of the season, without collecting their wages, or making known to the owners their claim, and the owners lulled into security by such neglect, should make a final settlement with the master, upon the supposition that the wages had been paid, and thereby lose the means of indemnifying themselves against the claim of the seamen, there would be much force in the suggestion. But, in this case, there has been no settlement, and no injustice can be done by the enforcement of the claim, at this time. A decree for the wages must be entered for the libellants. [A motion was made by the counsel for the claimants that the costs of the libellants be taxed according to the Statute of the United States of 1847, c. 55 [9 Stat. 181]; but the court ruled that the Statute of 1853, c. 80 [10 Stat. 161], regulating fees in United States courts, was inconsistent in this respect with the act of 1847].[2]

CHATTEL MORTGAGE — CONTEMPORANEOUS AGREEMENT.

A chattel mortgage was given by C., who was afterwards adjudged a bankrupt. The assignee in bankruptcy having sold the property, the mortgagee petitioned to be paid the proceeds, in satisfaction of the mortgage. It appeared, that an agreement was made, contemporaneous with the mortgage, that the mortgagor should retain possession of the mortgaged property, make sales of it from time to time as he might desire, and receive the proceeds for his own use. The debt for which the mortgage was given was an actual one, and unpaid: Held, that, under the laws of the state of New York, the mortgage was void, and the petition must be denied.

[In bankruptcy. Matter of Samuel Cantrell.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. The question presented for my determination, upon this petition, is, whether the petitioner has a right to claim the proceeds of certain personal property of the bankrupt, taken and sold by the assignee in bankruptcy, because of a chattel mortgage upon the property, held by the petitioner. This mortgage, the assignee insists, is void, for the reason that it has here been shown, by evidence, that an agreement existed between the mortgagor and mortgagee, contemporaneous with the mortgage, that the mortgagor should retain possession of the mortgaged property, deal with and make sales of the same, from time to time, as he might desire, and receive the proceeds for his own use. Upon the evidence, I find that such an agreement existed, and I find further, that the effect of such an agreement is not destroyed by the evidence introduced by the petitioner, which, as I also find, shows an actual loan of the money sought to be secured by the mortgage, and an actual present indebtedness of the amount sought to be recovered, namely, $2,276.25. Under the law of the state of New York, as I understand it, upon such facts, the mortgage should be declared void. Being so found, it gives the holder no right to the proceeds of the property taken and sold by the assignee. The prayer of the petitioner must, therefore, be denied.

[4 Cent. Law J. 127.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. Jan., 1877.

PETITION FOR REMOVAL—TRUST DEED—NECESSARY PARTIES — EFFECT OF ACT OF 1875 —CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT OF 1866.

1. In a suit brought in a state court by the plaintiff corporation to set aside a deed of trust, made by its officers and another corporation of the same state, a removal of the cause to the United States court was sought by the surviving trustee in the deed of trust and one of the bondholders under it. Held that, the latter corporation being a necessary party, and no final or effectual determination of the case made by the bill being possible without its presence, the petitioners could not have the cause removed under the act of 1866 (Rev. St. § 693, cl. 2), as to them.

[Cited in Donohoe v. Mariposa Land Co., Case No. 3,989; Steinkuhl v. York, Id. 13,356.]

2. Per Treat, J.: That part of the act of 1866 embraced in clause 2 of section 639, Rev. St., is repealed by the act of March 3, 1875, or if this be not so, these provisions of the act must be held to be unconstitutional.

Motion to remand to the Cape Girardeau circuit court.

This cause was instituted in the Cape Girardeau circuit court, to declare a mortgage void, so far as the property of the Cape Girardeau and State Line R. R. is concerned, being a road-bed situate in the counties of Cape Girardeau, Bollinger and Stoddard; and to remove the cloud upon the title of said company occasioned by the mortgage. The petition substantially sets out that the president of the Cape Girardeau and State Line R. R., by authority of the directors of the company merely, without any authority therefor conferred either by the charter or the general laws of the state, and without being thereto authorized by a vote of the stockholders of the company, joined with another corporation, namely, the Illinois, Missouri and Texas Railway Company, in the execution of a mortgage to secure $1,500,000 of the first-mortgage bonds of said last-named company, and which had and were to be issued by said last-named company from time to time, and which mortgage was made to said Frederick Winston and one David Hoadley, who has since departed this life. Winston is made a defendant to the bill of the Cape Girardeau and State Line R. R.; so also the Illinois, Missouri and Texas Railway Company; and also William J. Alt, a bondholder of some of the bonds issued by the last-named company, and numerous other known holders of said bonds, as well as all the unknown bondholders. In the Cape Girardeau circuit court, Winston and Alt made a motion to remove this cause to this court, and it has, accordingly, been docketed here. The plaintiff now moves the court to remand the cause to the Cape Girardeau circuit court.

Louis Houck, for motion.

Hitchcock, Lubke & Player, contra.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and TREAT, District Judge.

TREAT, District Judge. This cause was removed into this court by Frederick S. Winston and William J. Alt. Plaintiff brought suit against the Illinois, Missouri and Texas Railway; also the trustees under the deed of trust named (Winston being the surviving trustee), and several corporations and individuals alleged to be holders of bonds secured by a deed of trust executed by the defendant corporation, to-wit: the Illinois and Texas Railway Company, upon the property of the plaintiff, pursuant to the alleged contracts and other writings obligatory in the petition set out and referred to. The said cause was removed by Winston and Alt, on the hypothesis that the act of 1866, that is, the second clause of section 639, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, governed their rights, and that they were within its terms. It is apparent that, if the act of 1866, in the respect named, is still in force, the controversy, so far as it concerns said Winston, who is the trustee, can not be determined without the presence of the grantor in the deed—which deed is sought to be invalidated—nor can the case be determined as to the rights of Alt, who is one of the many bondholders secured by the deed of trust. Therefore, if the motion is to be controlled by the act of 1866, the cause must be remanded. If this be not correct, it becomes necessary to decide whether the act of 1875 (18 Stat. 470) repeals the act of 1866, as reproduced in clause 2, section 639, of the Revised Statutes. Section 10 of the act of 1875, declares that "all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." Section 2 of the act of 1875 declares that "when, in any suit mentioned in this section, there shall be a controversy wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit," etc. If the purpose of this act (1875) was to restore what, obviously, is the constitutional limit of the jurisdiction of United States courts, by confining them to controversies which are wholly between citizens of different states, then the act of 1866 is repealed.

The strange anomaly presented by the act of 1866, whereby suits were "split," leaving one portion to be tried in a United States court, and the other in a state court, it may have been designed by the act of 1875 to remove from the statute-book. It will be observed that section 2 of the act of 1875 contemplates, as does section 1 of the same act, that the controversy must be "wholly" between citizens of different states. Under repeated decisions of the United States supreme court, prior to the act of 1866, all of the parties, plaintiff and defendant, had to fall within the provisions of the act of 1789. If the act of 1866 was constitutional, the strange result followed that, where a United States circuit court had no original jurisdiction, and could have none constitutionally, from the joinder of parties, it could acquire jurisdiction, despite the status of the parties, by removal from a state court. The constitution contemplated, as frequently decided, that the party plaintiff and the party defendant, whether including one or many persons, should be citizens of different states. How, then, consistent with its requirements, could a suit instituted in the state court, which, as there instituted, would be beyond federal jurisdiction, be removable into a United States court by changing the suit, through the splitting process, into two suits? If this were allowable, then fragments of suits would be substituted for entire suits, and, through a strange process, the United States courts would obtain jurisdiction of fragments where they had none of the suit itself. Hence the conclusion is: First, that this case does not fall within the terms even of the act of 1866; second, the act of 1866, in the respects named, is repealed by the act of 1875; third, if neither of the foregoing propositions is correct, those peculiar provisions of the act of 1866 must be held to be unconstitutional and void.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. I concur in the result of the foregoing opinion, for reasons which I proceed briefly to state.

Two only of the many defendants united in the petition to remove the cause. The removal was sought under the act of 1866 (Rev. St. § 639, cl. 2), the petition for the removal being filed at the September term, 1876, of the state court. The petition only sought to remove the cause so far as it related to the two defendants, Winston and Alt, and the state court only ordered the cause as to them to be transferred to this court. As to all the other defendants, it still remains in the state court. Winston, as surviving trustee in the deed of trust, represents all the bondholders, including Alt. A deed of trust was made, purporting to be executed by the plaintiff corporation and one of the defendant corporations, viz.: the Illinois, Missouri and Texas Railway Company, both Missouri corporations, upon property which the plaintiff's bill claims to belong to it, to secure bonds executed by the said Illinois, Missouri and Texas Railway Company. The bill alleges that the said deed of trust, for want of authority in the plaintiff's officers to execute it, and for other reasons, did not bind the plaintiff corporation, and is ineffectual to convey its property or create a lien upon it; and the prayer of the bill is that the deed of trust be declared void, so far as it covers the property of the plaintiff (which would seem to be the main security), and that the bondholders under the deed of trust be declared to have no lien upon the said property, and for general relief.

It seems to be too plain to admit of any doubt that, to the bill to annul the deed of trust, the two companies which executed it as grantors are necessary parties. The Illinois, Missouri and Texas Railway Company executed the bonds, and it appears from the bill that this company, by reason of the contracts and conveyances therein set forth, had, or claimed to have, an interest in the property conveyed by the deed of trust. No effectual decree could be made, such as the bill seeks, without the presence of the Illinois, Missouri and Texas Railway Company. Now, no attempt was made to transfer the cause, so far as it concerned the company last named. The plaintiff corporation has the right to an adjudication of the case made by its bill. The bill was properly constructed, and contained the parties necessary to secure the relief sought. To the determination of the case made by the bill, the Illinois, Missouri and Texas Railway Company was a necessary party, and there can be no final or effectual determination of the case made by the bill without the presence of that company. If the attempted removal of part of the case here were sustained, this court might decree the deed of trust invalid; and the state court, on the part of the case remaining there, might make a decree precisely the other way; and to both decrees the plaintiff would be a party.

I am of opinion that the case made by the petition for the removal is not one which is embraced within the act of 1866, as it is embodied in section 639, cl. 2, of the Revised Statutes. It is not, therefore, necessary for me to give any opinion whether the second clause of section 639 is repealed by the act of March 3, 1875, or, if not thus repealed, whether it is in conflict with the provisions of the federal constitution, which limits the extent of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. The motion to remand must be allowed. Motion sustained.

District Court, D. Delaware.

PARTNERSHIP—FRAUDULENT ACT OF ONE PARTNER.

1. A partner is bound by the act of his copartner within the scope of the business of the firm, even if that act be fraudulent as between the partners.

2. B., a member of the firm of E. H. & Co., obtained from S., the bankrupt, two notes made by S. to the order of E. H. & Co. and for their accommodation, and it was understood that the notes should be paid at maturity by E. H. & Co. The notes were obtained by B. without the knowledge of H., his partner, and were indorsed with the firm name, and discounted at bank, and the proceeds used by B. for his own purposes in fraud of H. H. paid the notes at maturity, and proved them as a claim against the bankrupt estate due to him as an individual. Held, that H. was bound by the knowledge of his partner that no consideration passed to S. for the notes, and by B.'s agreement that the firm would pay notes at maturity, and that the proof must be expunged.

Petition [by George S. Capelle, assignee of Jacob Sinex] to expunge proof of claim by the respondent [Edwin Hall].

Thos. J. Clayton, for respondent.

BRADFORD, District Judge. I am asked to strike off two promissory notes held by Edwin Hall, of the city of Philadelphia, from the list of claims proven, for reasons stated in the petition of George S. Capelle, assignee in bankruptcy of Jacob Sinex. The first note is dated May 21, 1870, at Chester, Pa., and is for the payment, at four months, of the sum of fourteen hundred and eighty-six dollars, to the order of Edwin Hall and Company, and by them indorsed and signed "Jacob Sinex." The second note is dated June 22, 1870, at Chester, Pa., and is for the payment of thirteen hundred and eighty-six dollars, at four months, to the order of E. Hall & Co., and by them indorsed and signed "Jacob Sinex." Edwin Hall claims as indorsee of E. Hall & Co. It is admitted that one E. M. Broomall was at the same time a member of the firm of E. M. Broomall & Co., and also of the firm of E. Hall & Co., and was so at the time of the making of both the above-mentioned notes. It is admitted that E. M. Broomall, as a member of the firm of E. Hall & Co., obtained both the notes in question from Sinex, without the knowledge of Edwin Hall, the other member of that firm. It is also admitted that Sinex gave the notes in question into the hands of E. M. Broomall, with the understanding that he, Sinex, was in no case to be called on for payment of the same, but would be protected from any such liability by the payees of the note, Sinex simply loaning his credit to enable E. Hall & Co. to borrow money on the note. In short, the one gave and the others accepted the notes as accommodation notes. It will be observed, then, that these notes were both made to E. Hall & Co., as the payees thereof, to the same firm, though on one note it is called E. Hall & Co., and on the other "Edwin Hall & Co."

Let us consider the case of the note for fourteen hundred and eighty-six dollars first. The payment of this note is objected to by the assignee on two grounds: First, Edwin Hall being a partner in the firm of "Edwin Hall & Co.," at the time this note was given, must be presumed to have had notice that the note in question was received without any consideration whatever passing from the partnership to him, and as the firm could not sue, so Edwin Hall, as an individual member of the firm affected by this presumed knowledge of the want of consideration, and bound by the act of his partner, though unknown to him at the time, could not sue Sinex; and, secondly, if Edwin Hall ever was the legal owner of this note, he became so by purchasing it after it was dishonored, and took it subject to all equities as between the original parties, viz.: Sinex and "Edwin Hall & Co." As the result of the admissions of counsel and the evidence in this case, I think it is established that this note was presented for discount by E. M. Broomall, on behalf of E. Hall & Co., to a bank in Philadelphia, that it was there discounted, and the funds passed to the credit of Edwin Hall & Co., and were drawn out by E. M. Broomall, as the funds of "Edwin Hall & Co." That on the day this note became due, without the same having gone to protest, but to save the same from protest and protect himself from suit as a member of the firm of Edwin Hall & Co., Edwin Hall did then and there pay the said note, and thus became the owner and possessor of the same, by transfer and delivery of the party who had discounted it. Edwin Hall paid this note with his own individual funds. Did the fact that Edwin Hall was a member of the firm of "Edwin Hall & Co.," at the time of the making and delivery of the note in question to E. M. Broomall, incapacitate him from suing Sinex on said note, in case it should be transferred legally to him as an individual for a valuable consideration. If the affirmative of this proposition is true, it settles the question of liability on these notes. This note was an accommodation note given by Sinex to the firm of Edwin Hall & Co. It was to enable that firm to raise money on the strength of Sinex's name. It is a mistake to suppose it was an accommodation note to E. M. Broomall. Broomall represented the firm of Edwin Hall & Co. in requesting this accommodation, and the —— firm were the payees of the note. The funds to be raised could pass to none but the payees or their order. They were passed to the credit of the firm in point of fact, and the subsequent fraud of Broomall in using the funds for his own private benefit, does not in the least affect the relation in which the payees stood to the accommodation maker. This firm then and there agreed not to call upon Sinex for payment of that note, on the ground distinctly understood between them, that there was no consideration for it. I say this firm then and there agreed, for I consider Mr. Edwin Hall, the claimant, was bound by the act of his partner, E. M. Broomall, in that transaction, and none the less because it was unknown personally to him at the time.

The trust reposed by one partner in another is of the most extensive and serious character; so wide is the range that every honest partner is absolutely in the power of any dishonest one with whom he may have rashly associated himself. But while he may suffer from the wrongful acts of his dishonest partner, he owes it to the business community both in morals and in law that no one doing legitimate business with the concern, still more no one befriending the concern by a loan of credit, should suffer because of the acts and representations of one whom the innocent and honest partner had selected as his agent, and to whose acts and representations he had requested full faith and credit to be given. I take it for granted, in the transaction of the affairs of a general business firm, the taking of accommodation paper and the consequent necessary agreement, growing out of that fact, not to call upon the maker for payment, is fully within the scope of the purposes of such a partnership and of the means proper to effect such purposes, and an act to the consequences of which, therefore, one partner can and does bind the other. The general principle governing such cases is well stated by Chancellor Kent (3 Comm. 41) in these words, viz.: "The act of one partner, though on his private account and contrary to the private arrangement among themselves, will bind all the parties if made without knowledge in the other of the arrangement, and in a matter which, in the usual course of dealing, has reference to business transacted by the firm;" and again on the same page: "In all contracts concerning negotiable paper the act of one partner binds all, and even though he signs his individual name, provided it appears on the face of the paper to be on partnership account, and to be intended to have a joint operation." Does the contract or agreement made by a member of a firm in the name of the firm who are the payees of an accommodation note, and who raise money on the same, not to call upon the maker for payment, bind the other member who was personally ignorant of the transaction? How far is the ignorant partner liable for the acts and declarations of the other? In 7 East, 210 (Swan v. Steele), the court decide the liability of one partner for the act of another on the following facts: A, B, and C traded under the name of A and B in the cotton business (C being a secret partner); A and B traded alone under the same firm name in the business of grocers, and to pay a debt they owed in the grocery business indorsed over a bill belonging to the firm in which C was then partner in the cotton business—and this without the knowledge of C; held, C was liable to be sued on this indorsement, the plaintiff not knowing at the time of the misapplication of the partnership funds.

This case illustrates the liability of one partner for the acts of the other, even when the act is a fraud on the innocent partner. In Jacaud v. French, 12 East, 317, where money had been received by one member of a firm unknown to the other member, for the purpose of paying certain bills, and the former, instead of paying, as was requested, diverted the funds to another purpose, and afterwards when these bills came into the hands of another firm for value, of which the partner ignorant of the reception of the money for the purpose aforesaid was also a member, and the cotton firm brought suit on these bills, the court held that the plaintiffs could not recover, and used these words: "Jacaud, being a partner with Blair, must be considered as having together with Blair (the fraudulent partner of the first firm) received money from the drawees to take up this very bill, how then can he, because he is also a partner with Gordon (the other individual member of the second firm suing on the bills) in another house, be permitted to contravene his own act, and sue upon this bill which has been already satisfied as to him." This case establishes the principle that an act of one partner which amounts to a defense against an action thereafter brought, if it had been performed by all the members of the firm, will, although in fraud of the other innocent and ignorant partner, be a defense not only in an action brought by him individually, but by any other firm of which he was at the time a member. Not only is he prevented from suing separately by reason of being bound by the act of his dishonest partner, but this incapacity disables another firm receiving the said bill for value, of which he was also at that time a member, from suing, inasmuch as he is a necessary party to their suit. In that case one partner (the dishonest one) performed an act which amounted to a valid defense, although unknown to the innocent partner, and that act bound the ignorant and innocent partner. In this case one partner makes a contract to take up accommodation paper lent to the firm of which he is a member, certainly a valid defense in a suit by payees against the maker. And how can the principle be different where the suit is sought to be sustained by one of the individual payees composing the firm making this contract, instead of both? Richmond v. Heapy, 1 Starkie, 202, was an action brought to test the validity of a commission in bankruptcy, and the question was, whether the commission was supported by a good petitioning creditor's debt, and the facts are these, viz.: One of three partners undertook to provide for two bills of exchange drawn by the three partners, and accepted by a fourth person, when they should become due. It was held that the three partners could not prove their claim on the acceptance in bankruptcy, that they were bound by the conduct of the one partner taking the acceptance as an accommodation one, although they were ignorant of the fact, and it was in fraud of their rights.

Now this case would be the same exactly as ours, if the claim in this instance was sought to be proved by "E. Hall & Co." It does establish, however, that this agreement not to sue Sinex, arising out of the acceptance of this paper as accommodation paper for the firm, was the act of the firm, and consequently the act of the individual members of the firm. For in this case the bills were drawn in the names of the three members, as in ours the note was given to and received by all the members of the firm, viz.: E. M. Broomall and Edwin Hall. Now, if the firm (in the case last cited) could not sue because by the act of one of its members it had created a defense, why, in our case, when a complete defense has been made by the joint act of all the individual members, should one of those individual members be permitted to do (that is, sue on this note) that which he has jointly with his partner promised not to do? What has he done that entitles him to bring such suit? He has paid the note in the hands of the holder, and that is just what he, together with his partner, promised to do, and which, if he, or his partner, or both, had not done, and Sinex had been made to pay by the owner of the note, he could have been forced to pay by law to the extent of all his property liable to process. In the case of Sparrow v. Chisman, 9 Barn. & C. 241, where one of several partners in a banking house drew a bill in his own name upon a third party, on the condition that the drawer should provide for the same when due, it was held that all the partners in the banking firm could not recover on the bill. Baily, Justice, in this case, says: "A party to whom an acceptance is given on a condition that he will provide for it when due, and who does not perform that condition, cannot sue the acceptor, and if Peckover, the party making the promise, therefore, could not have sued alone, how can he sue jointly with others? His partners, being bound by his acts, cannot recover through him." May we not ask, in reference to the case before us, if both partners made this promise not to sue, and both are bound by such promise as the act of the firm, how can one of these promisors sue individually? It was the agreement not to hold him responsible for the payment of the notes which induced Sinex to give them; this agreement and undertaking grows necessarily out of the transaction. Edwin Hall, by his authorized agent, was a party to that agreement, and cannot be permitted to contravene it.

This case may be placed in another point of view by applying to it a well-known principle of law applicable to promissory notes. Story on Promissory Notes, on page 517, in discussing the rights of an indorser who takes up or pays a promissory note, says: "If, indeed, any of those parties, either as maker or indorser, be such merely for his accommodation, then his claim is ended; for the payment has already been made by the very party who is ultimately bound to indemnify and reimburse all the others; and the law, to avoid circuity of action, will treat it as a direct extinguishment." In this case, a member of a firm, Edwin Hall, finds a note going to protest on which he, as a member of the firm of Edwin Hall & Co., is liable to be held responsible. Not with a view to speculation, but as he himself says in his evidence in reference to the fourteen hundred and eighty-six dollar note: "As it had been discounted for the firm and bore our indorsement, I paid it;" and in reference to the thirteen hundred and eighty-six dollar note: "It bears our indorsement, and at maturity I paid it." He, as the representative of the firm, discharged a firm liability by paying this note. It is true, he can make his partner, E. M. Broomall, account with him for furnishing funds with which to satisfy a partnership debt; but the debt is no less satisfied as against the partnership, and as Edwin Hall was one of the accommodation payees liable to be sued and made responsible by Sinex, had he been forced to pay the note, it makes no difference whether this payment be considered a payment by the firm, or a payment by a member of the firm on behalf of the firm (if, indeed, such a distinction can be drawn). As the law avoids all circuity of action, the statement of the indisputable fact that Edwin Hall could, as a partner of the firm of Edwin Hall & Co., have been made liable to the extent of all he possessed to Jacob Sinex, the accommodation maker, had he been forced to pay these notes, seems to settle the question of Edwin Hall's right of suit. Authorities have been cited by the claimant's counsel to show that where there was a cross note, there was a consideration, and the cases, which, no doubt, are law, are sought to be applied to the question of the notes under examination.

This line of argument is inconsistent with the express and repeated declaration of counsel on both sides at the hearing, that these two notes were accommodation notes; that is to say, that there was no consideration passing from Edwin Hall & Co. to Sinex for them. Under these circumstances, even were it true in point of fact that Sinex gave a cross note of Edwin Hall & Co. in exchange for one or both of these notes, I could treat such cross note only as a means of indemnity received by Sinex in case he should be made liable on his notes to Edwin Hall & Co.; any other view of the case would be inconsistent with the admissions that these notes were accommodation notes. But there were no cross notes between these parties. The note given as an indemnity was the note of E. M. Broomall and not the note of the firm. Nor was there any specific exchange of securities—each party holding himself and themselves liable on the paper primarily given by themselves as makers. There is no evidence whatever of this. There is no evidence whatever that Sinex desired or took the note of E. M. Broomall with a view of raising money upon it. As, then, they were not cross notes between the same parties, for their mutual accommodation, nor an exchange of securities between the same parties, and as the parties by their counsel admit that these two notes in question were accommodation notes, I am bound to treat them as accommodation notes. The authorities therefore cited by the claimant's counsel in reference to the sufficiency of the consideration of a cross note, though no doubt law, are in no wise applicable to the facts of this case. So, too, the authorities cited going to show that a bona fide holder of accommodation paper can recover against such accommodation maker or indorser although he knew at the time he took such paper that it was for accommodation only, are no doubt good authorities on that point. But the difficulty arises from their having no application to the facts of this case. If the holder, in all other respects, has a right to sue, the fact that he knew the paper to be accommodation, when he took it, does not destroy that right, but in this case Edwin Hall never had a right to sue, for he was one of the accommodation payees, and, having been paid by the parties, or one of the parties, ultimately liable to pay it, it was extinguished and its negotiable quality destroyed.

It is no doubt a hardship that Edwin Hall should be cheated by his partner. That is the result of misplaced confidence (too frequently happening among business men), when a little more care and caution would have avoided all the evil. When Edwin Hall entered into partnership with E. M. Broomall, he gave him a letter of credit to the business world, and he plainly said to Jacob Sinex and all others doing business with the firm, Whatever arrangements you make within the scope of our partnership business I will ratify; and now, when the firm has through one of its partners, E. M. Broomall, accepted a favor, the loan of credit, which they made available and turned into cash, and made the arrangement not to call upon Sinex for the payment of the notes thus loaned, to permit either or both of those partners to sue Sinex would not only be destructive of the fundamental principles on which the liability of the partnership for the act of the individual member is based, but would be unjust and inequitable to Sinex in the highest degree—as he based his conduct on the promise of the partnership, through one of its members, that he would not be called upon for the payment of the notes. And further, Mr. Edwin Hall could not be permitted to contravene by his action now, that which he authorized his partner to do. If Mr. Sinex was deceived as to the wishes and desires of the partnership in giving these notes, Mr. Edwin Hall enabled E. M. Broomall to do so, by giving him the credit arising from this partnership relation with him. If there is hardship in the one case it is of Mr. Edwin Hall's own creation. The hardship in Sinex' case is one which arises not from any fault or negligence of his own, but from his trusting to the declarations of Edwin Hall that E. M. Broomall was a trustworthy man. On no ground of law, nor from any consideration showing any equitable right in the matter, can these claims be sustained. The clerk will therefore enter an order that the claims aforesaid be disallowed and that the claimant pay the costs of the hearing of the rule.

CAPELLE v. TRINITY M. E. CHURCH.

[11 N. B. R. (1875) 536.] [1]

District Court, D. Delaware.

FOLLOWING STATE DECISION — LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—CHURCH SUBSCRIPTION—VALIDITY—CONSIDERATION.

1. The construction given by the state courts to the state act of limitations recognized and enforced by the United States bankrupt court.

2. The bankrupt having been a non-resident at the time the cause of action accrued, and it not appearing by the proof when he became a resident of the state, nor that he had resided more than three years in the state since the cause of action accrued, although the creditor was a corporation of another state, held, that the state act of limitations could not be allowed as a defense to be set up by the assignee.

3. A claim was proved by a church corporation, founded upon a verbal promise by the bankrupt to M., that he (the bankrupt) would pay eight hundred dollars if M. would subscribe a portion of the indebtedness due from the church to M., the promise being subsequently publicly announced by the bankrupt in the church, in the presence of the congregation; it appeared by the proof that expenses had been incurred by the trustees of the church, upon the faith of the subscriptions generally, though not that any definite expenditure was made upon the faith of this particular subscription. Held, that the promise was founded on a good legal consideration, upon two alternative grounds: First, it was one of two mutual promises for the benefit of the church, each being the consideration for the other, and the claim provable by the beneficiary; and, secondly, that as a promise to the church, partly upon the faith of which expenses were incurred, it would sustain an action of assumpsit, and might be proved in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Sturgis v. Colby, Case No. 13,574.]

Petition by [George S. Capelle] assignee [of Jacob Sinex] to have the claim filed [by the Trinity M. E. Church of Chester] expunged.

Geo. H. Bates, for petitioner.

Geo. M. Pardoe, for respondent.

BRADFORD, District Judge. The questions to be decided in this case come up on the hearing of a rule to show cause why a certain claim of the Methodist Church, in the city of Chester, in Pennsylvania, called "The Trinity M. E. Church of Chester," should not be stricken off from the list of claims proven, and declared void. The reasons given are two-fold: First, it is alleged that the debt was barred by the statute of limitations, of this state, and could not be enforced if suit were brought thereon within the jurisdiction of this state; and, secondly, that there was no valid legal consideration for the claim, which would be necessary to be established in an action of assumpsit brought for its recovery.

George E. Capelle, the assignee in bankruptcy of the bankrupt Sinex (adjudged bankrupt on his own petition), moves the court in this matter, by petition, to have this claim stricken off, under the last clause of the 22d section of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 528], which is in these words: "The court may, on the application of the assignee, or of any creditor, or of the bankrupt, or without any application, examine upon oath the bankrupt, or any person tendering, or who has made proof of claims, and may summon any person capable of giving evidence concerning such proof, or concerning the debt sought to be proved, and shall reject all claims not duly proved, or when the proof shows the claim to be founded on fraud, illegality, or mistake." From the evidence in this case it appears that in the month of February, 1867, the bankrupt Sinex had a conversation with the witness David McGinniss, who was then engaged, or about to be engaged, in plastering the vestibule of said church, concerning a subscription of money for the use of the church. That the result of this conference was an agreement and undertaking, by both the witness and the bankrupt, to give certain sums of money, viz.: the sum of eight hundred dollars to be given by the bankrupt, and one-half the amount of a certain bill for plastering, due the witness from the said bankrupt, on account of work done on the said church building, to be given by the said witness, each at the time making the undertaking of the other, the consideration on which his own promise was founded. There was no subscription in writing, nor were the promises reduced to writing, at any time. Sinex was at that time treasurer of the church. The witness then held no official relation to the church. Afterwards, and it must have been very shortly afterwards, although the witness does not state the exact time, Sinex read aloud, before the assembled congregation, of whom the witness was one, the amounts subscribed by himself and the witness, with the subscriptions of others, repeating his own subscription as eight hundred dollars, five hundred dollars of which was to be set down as for himself and three hundred dollars for his wife. The witness proves that Sinex said, on the occasion of the public meeting, that the debt of the church (then amounting to the sum of twelve or thirteen thousand dollars) would have to be paid, and he would give eight hundred dollars towards it. On this occasion three or four thousand dollars were subscribed. It is proven by the witness that this subscription, together with others, were an inducement to the church to go on and finish their work, on the faith of which they did place a certain heater in their main building, and afterwards, on the faith of the said subscription, together with others, they did finish the main audience room. The witness is positive that this subscription of Sinex, among others, was often placed before the board of trustees as a basis of credit on which the heater in question could be procured. The witness also states that three years since he, with one Clara Fricke, went to Sinex for this subscription, and since then —about two years ago next June—made a demand of Sinex for this subscription. It is not stated what was his reply on either of these occasions, except that there was no denial of the claim, but, as I recollect the testimony, a plea of inability to pay at that time. The subscription was in February, 1867. At that time the church was a corporation, incorporated under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania, and the bankrupt was a citizen of the same state, and it does not appear that he was a resident of this state for the period of three years before the cause of action accrued. These are the material facts disclosed by the evidence in reference to the debt or claim sought to be stricken off and declared void.

First. In reference to the operation of the statute of limitations, as applied to such a contract as that proven (supposing it to be such an one as gives a valid cause of action by reason of being founded on a sufficient consideration), I am of opinion that the assignee cannot avail himself of the defense of the statute of limitations to this claim. The United States courts are solicitous to conform to the decisions made by the state courts in construing the laws of the state, and among them the acts of limitation. By the 34th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, "these acts of limitation form a rule of decision in the courts of the United States, and the same effect is given them as is given in the state courts." "We are bound," says Mr. Justice Catron in [Harpending v. Reformed Protestant Dutch Church] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 455, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, "to conform to the decisions of the state courts of the state of New York in the construction of these acts of limitation." Now, the court of errors and appeals of the state of Delaware has given an elaborate judgment on the very point raised in this case; and, as the lex fori governs in all cases in the application of the acts of limitations, this court will be guided by that decision. The case is Wells v. Jones, 2 Houst. 329. It was there held that where the defendants making promissory notes resided out of the state at the time the cause of action accrued, and never became residents of this state, the act of limitations did not run against them, although the plaintiffs themselves always were non-residents. That the statute of limitations does not commence to run against any one residing out of the state at the time of the accruing of the cause of action, and only commences on the entry of such person into the state as a resident. The court gives a construction to the 14th section of chapter 123 of the Revised Code, and particularly to these words, as governing the case before them, i. e.—"If at the time when a cause of action accrues against any person, he shall be out of the state, the action may be commenced within the time hereinafter limited therefor, after such person shall come into the state in such manner that, by reasonable diligence, he may be served with process;" and lays down the position that in no case shall the statute of limitations run against one who was non-resident at the time of the accruing of the cause of action until he comes into the state under the circumstances described in the section cited. As Sinex was a non-resident at the time of the accruing of the cause of action, and it does not appear when he became a resident of this state, and, consequently, as it does not appear that he has resided in this state for a period more than three years since the accruing of the cause of action, his case comes within the exception of this statute, and I must declare that such act of limitation cannot be allowed as a defense by the assignee against this claim.

Second. Was there such a valid consideration as would support an action of assumpsit if one were brought to recover this subscription? It will be noticed—1. That this contract was not reduced to writing. There was no subscription-book or other written entry or promise, but it rested wholly on verbal statement. 2. There was no time fixed for the performance of the contract or the payment of the money. 3. There was no executed consideration from the church to the promisor at the time of making the promise; but the consideration expressed was the agreement between Sinex and McGinniss that each would give money for the use and benefit of the church (a common object of interest to the parties) on the express condition that the other would do the same. And it also appears that McGinniss, before the filing of the claim, has paid his subscription. 4. It is proven abundantly that the church, on the faith of this subscription among others, did incur additional expense and charges, although it is stated by the witness that he does not know that any expense, or undertaking, was encountered or begun on the strength of this subscription alone.

1. I am not aware that there is difficulty in the way of recovery, were this proceeding in the form of an action of assumpsit, from the fact that this contract is not reduced to writing. All parol contracts are of equal dignity, whether reduced to writing or not, and are equally enforceable in courts of law, unless they are made void on some grounds of public policy. The statute of frauds of our state makes void any "agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof." But the proper construction of this statute is that the contract or agreement must expressly show that it was not to be performed within a year from the making thereof; and as there was no allusion to the time when this subscription was to be paid, such a verbal contract is not made void by our statute of frauds. This contract may be looked upon as a parol agreement by Sinex, with McGinniss as the promisee, to pay a certain sum of money to the corporation, or for the use of the corporation; or it may be considered as a direct promise made by Sinex to the corporation (if there were at the time any person or persons authorized to receive such a proposition on behalf of the church) to pay the amount of his subscription to them for their own use and benefit. It is claimed by the assignee that this contract is nudum pactum—that is, absolutely void, by reason of there being no valid consideration for the promise. Undoubtedly, consideration is of the essence of every contract. Where the contract is under seal, consideration will not only be presumed, but cannot be denied by the party to the seal, unless in cases of fraud. Where the contract is in writing, but not under seal, to pay money, consideration will be presumed, but may be rebutted by the party to be charged with the payment. Where the evidence of the contract rests altogether on verbal statements, there the consideration must be affirmatively established by the plaintiff, or there is no proof of the contract, as the consideration constitutes the essence. Treating McGinniss, then, as the promisee, and Sinex as the promisor, what was the consideration for Sinex's promise? Very clearly, and distinctly, and expressly, it was the promise of McGinniss to pay a sum certain as his subscription—a promise for a promise—a consideration executory at that time, but fulfilled and executed long before the filing of this claim. This was, without doubt, a valid promise of Sinex's, and founded on a good consideration. A loss sustained by the plaintiff, or, in such a case as this, by the promisee, as an inducement to the promisor to make the promise, is as good a consideration on which to found a promise as an advantage conferred upon the defendant by the plaintiff or promisee. Addison on Contracts (page 22) says: "But if the contract has been executed by the performance of the act forming the consideration for the promise, then it is no answer to an action to say that the plaintiff was not, by the terms of the original contract, bound to do the act, and that there was consequently no mutuality of obligation."

The right of the party benefited by the promise to the fruits of an action are sustained by numerous authorities, ancient and modern, English and American. "Upon a promise to the father to give so much with his daughter in marriage, the daughter may have the action, for she is the meritorious cause." Com. Dig. p. 206, "Action on the case upon assumpsit," E. "Upon a promise to B. to pay twenty pounds to an infant at his full age, and to educate him in the meantime, the infant shall have the action." Id. "If the heir promise his father, who intended to cut down timber for the portion of his daughter, to pay so much for her portion if he will not cut it, the daughter shall have an assumpsit against the heir." Id. "If a promise be made to A., upon payment of fifty pounds, to reassure land to B., the assumpsit may be by B." Id.; Pigott v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & P. 149, and cases there cited. So in Marchington v. Vernon, 1 Bos. & P. 101, note, Buller, Justice, says: "If one person makes a promise to another for the benefit of a third, that third may maintain an action upon it." Chief Justice Gibson recognizes the principle, but draws the distinction between parol contracts and contracts under seal, and quotes from the ancient authorities. Uhland v. Uhland, 17 Serg. & R. 268. Hind v. Holdship, 2 Watts, 104, is a modern authority directly in point, in which not only is the right to the fruits of an action given to the one having the beneficial interest, but the action is in form brought by him. So in Stewart v. Hamilton College, 2 Denio, 403, Chancellor Walworth holds to the right of action in the party having the beneficial interest. To these might be added a multitude of authorities to show the legal interest a person has who is not the promisee in a simple contract, but who takes the beneficial interest under and by such contract. It is admitted, however, that there is a conflict of authority in England as to who shall appear as plaintiff on the record in a court of law, and Mr. Brown, in his book on "Actions at Law," page 102, says, "It is now undoubted law that an entire stranger to the consideration cannot sue upon a parol contract." Yet the same author, on page 104 of the same work, says, a "servant or agent may sue on a contract entered into by him as such, when he has a beneficial interest in its completion in regard to commissions or otherwise, or a special property or interest in the subject-matter of the agreement." That is, in other words, a person who has no right of action because the contract was not made with him individually but in his representative capacity, may, if he has a beneficial interest in the completion of the contract, or a special property or interest in the subject-matter of the agreement, sue in his own name. Now, this church has the special interest, in the subject-matter, of being entitled to all the money to be paid, and has a beneficial interest in the completion of the contract, to the extent of the amount of the subscription to be paid. It would appear, then, that this case does not come within the class of cases where, by the preponderance of authority, the plaintiff must be the party from whom the consideration flows. Supposing, however, it does, with divided authorities in England, I prefer to follow the decisions of our own country, of Chancellor Walworth and the supreme court of Pennsylvania, for I know of no American decisions to the contrary. And even if all the authorities gave the right of action in a court of law to the promisee in this case, viz., McGinniss, from whom all the considerations flowed, as long as the church is to be considered as the cestui que trust of the fund, and the claim is proved by the properly constituted officer of the church, and the court in bankruptcy deals with these cases upon equitable principles, I should not have the claim stricken off because it had been proven by the treasurer of the church instead of the promisee, Mr. McGinniss.

Viewing this case, therefore, as presenting a contract by Sinex with McGinniss, to pay to the church eight hundred dollars, on the consideration (then executory, but afterwards, before proof of claim, executed) of McGinniss paying the amount of his own subscription, I have come to the conclusion that the contract was a valid one, founded on a legal and sufficient consideration, enforceable in the courts of law, and to be allowed by this court. And here I might rest this opinion, but as there is another ground on which this subscription, in my judgment, may be upheld, and as the case is interesting and important, it may be well to examine the second view (already noticed) which may be taken of this contract, viz., a contract directly with the church, by Sinex, the bankrupt.

The first question which arises is, was any promise made by Sinex to, and accepted by, this corporation? A corporation acts and contracts through its agents. The trustees of this church were legally competent to receive a gift of money for the use of the church. They were equally competent to accept a promise to give money. Was any such promise given to, accepted by, and acted on, by the said trustees? I think the evidence conclusively shows such to have been the case. The promise, after divine service, in full assembly of the members of the church, Sinex reading aloud the amounts of his own with other subscriptions; the prompt action of the trustees of the church in making this subscription the basis of credit in improvements for their building and placing a heater therein; the virtual admission by Sinex of the claim of the church against him for this subscription, in the interviews afterwards had between him and McGinniss, in relation to this matter, all establish the proposition that a promise was made to, accepted by, and acted on, by the trustees of this church. Now, was this promise binding on the promisor? It is claimed by the assignee that it was not, and for the reason that it was without any legal consideration. I think that there was such legal consideration, and consequently that the said promise was binding. A promise made and not revoked (which is an open and continuing promise until revoked), accepted, and acted upon by the promisee to the extent of incurring expense by the promisee, on the faith of the performance of the promise by the promisor, is a valid promise, and sustained by a valid consideration, viz., a loss sustained by the plaintiff, and no authorities need be cited to show that this is as valid a consideration to support the promise as an advantage gained by the defendant as a consideration for this promise. A parol promise, then, made to a church to pay a certain sum of money as a subscription for the use and benefit of the church, accepted and acted on by way of incurring expenses and increasing the liabilities of the church, is a valid promise, and enforceable in the courts of law. This proposition is sustainable by reason and authority. No doubt, a mere subscription standing alone, whether followed by the giving of a promissory note or not, is not binding, there being no consideration for the promise. In Boutell v. Cowdin, 9 Mass. 254, this was the case (a note having been given for the amount of the subscription). In Phillips Limerick Academy v. Davis, 11 Mass. 113, there were subscriptions, but no note given. The court in this case said there was no valid consideration, but also says, "It is a promise to give, connected with a similar promise by others to give to the same appropriation and purpose, but these promises are not mutual among the subscribers, so as to make the promise of one, or the performance of it, a consideration for the promise of another."

So that the inference in this decision is, that there would have been a valid consideration had the promise of one been made the consideration of the promise of the other (an authority sustaining the view treating this contract as one between Sinex, as the promisor, and McGinniss, as the promisee). In Farmington Academy v. Allen, 14 Mass. 172, the subscription is held valid because the defendant recognized or re-acknowledged, his promise by contributing work, and also knew that expenses were incurred by the said corporation, on the faith of the subscriptions on the building; and thus, in the opinion of the court he ought to be considered liable, on the common counts, for money paid and expended, at his request, to the extent of his subscription. In this case there is an element which does not exist in ours, viz., contribution to the work by the defendant as a part payment of his subscription (the necessity for which we shall hereafter consider). But before this last decision, in the case of Holmes v. Dana, 12 Mass. 190, it had been decided "that where sundry persons agreed to lend to the editors of a newspaper the sums set against their respective names, the same to be paid to one of their number as agent, and this agent advanced moneys to the editors on the ground of the subscription, he had a right of action against the subscriber who refused to pay the sum he subscribed." In this case, the court says: "The true ground of the action is that by reason of the contract, Larkin (that is, the agent) was led to confide in the engagement of the defendant so far as to advance his own money for him; and the defendant and the other subscribers having made Larkin the trustee to receive and appropriate the money for objects of importance to them, were bound in equity and good conscience to restore it. The only question which could arise in this case was whether Larkin was induced to advance his money by the subscription and by the confidence placed by him in the subscribers. The jury having so found, the verdict is unquestionably right." There can be no difference in principle, because the money was to be paid in this case to a trustee of the subscribers' own choosing, instead of the cestui que trust,—and the case is directly in point as an authority to show that a promise otherwise voluntary, if accepted and acted on by the plaintiff to his own expense and loss, on the faith of the promise, is a valid promise in law and founded on a good consideration. It will be observed also that in this last cited case, there is nothing said about re-acknowledgment on the part of the subscribers, Bridgewater Academy v. Gilbert, 19 Mass. 578, is an authority against the claimant. Trustees of Amherst Academy v. Cowls, 23 Mass. [6 Pick.] 427, is a case in point, and establishes (after reviewing all the cases) the general proposition that the promisor shall be bound when he stands by and sees a corporation undertake obligations which can be enforced against it on the faith of his promise. In the course of a long opinion Judge Parker says: "If by means of his contribution or his solemn promise to pay, the body to whom he has pledged his word should incur expense, become under legal obligations, or otherwise pursue the purpose and intent of the legislature in granting them the charter, this is a sufficient legal consideration to support such a promise. In this respect the principles of common honesty cannot be at variance with the law of the land; and no case from English or American reports has been cited to warrant so unjust a principle." Now in this case there was a note, and that note expressed on its face that it was for value received, and also recited the subscription made a year before. Yet it was admitted that all this did not prevent the defendant from setting up want of consideration; but the court said: "But it is quite sufficient to create a consideration, that the other party, the payee, should have assumed an obligation in consequence of receiving the note (in our case in consequence of receiving the verbal promise), which he was compellable at law or equity to perform, unless the promisor should be able to show when sued that the payee had refused, or was unable or had unreasonably neglected to perform the engagement on his part, in which case a defense might be raised on the ground of a failure of consideration." In Trustees of Church in Pembroke v. Stetson, 22 Mass. [5 Pick.] 506, it is held distinctly "where members of a religious society, which had a ministerial fund in the hands of an incorporated board of trustees, voluntarily subscribed to increase the fund, and afterwards gave their promissory notes to the trustees for the amount of their respective subscriptions, it was held that the notes were founded on a sufficient consideration." And in this case, Parker, Justice, comments on the case of Boutell v. Cowdin (cited first by the assignee's counsel), and objects to the construction which has been placed upon it, as not having been intended at the time. In Warren v. Stearns, 36 Mass. 80, cited by assignee's counsel, Chief Justice Shaw says, in the course of his opinion, "where a promise has been made to a person or a body capable of suing, and they upon the strength of such promise before it has been revoked, have advanced money or incurred expense, this has been held a good consideration," and quotes Farmington Academy v. Allen, 14 Mass. 172, as sustaining this position, and further says, "this case was decided expressly on the ground that the defendant had become liable as upon an implied promise for money paid, the plaintiff having expended money on the faith of his promise." In Trustees of Williams College v. Danforth, 29 Mass. [12 Pick.] 541, although the case was not similar in the facts to this, Chief Justice Shaw upholds the validity of the subscription and says, "the subscription, in the first instance, was in the nature of a proposal to the College, by its terms not binding until accepted and before acceptance revocable." This doctrine of the promise standing open until revoked, and, when accepted, binding the voluntary promisor, is also referred to in Thompson v. Page, 42 Mass. [2 Metc.] 568.

I think, on the whole, that the result of the authorities in Massachusetts is that a parol promise to the trustees of a church or religious society, not revoked until after the church, on the faith of that promise, has incurred expenses and subjected itself to new liabilities, is a valid promise, and founded on a good and sufficient consideration. I have seen no case reported where the contract to give was not reduced to writing; but, I repeat, where no statute requires such contract to be in writing, it is of equal dignity and of equal binding force, if a consideration is proven, as if it were reduced to writing under seal. In McAuley v. Billenger, 20 Johns. 89, the court sustains the principle that where a subscription is made, and the subscriber permits the trustees of the church, or the persons having the beneficial interest in the promise, to undergo expense on the faith of that promise, such subscription is binding. In Stewart v. Hamilton College, 2 Denio, 403, in the court for the correction of errors, in the state of New York, the following propositions, among others, are established and announced by Chancellor Walworth: "The agreement of a single individual to make a donation of money to a literary or religious institution, without any undertaking on the part of the donee to do anything," is not of binding force. "But when several persons subscribe to raise money for an object in which all feel an interest—e. g., to support a religious or literary institution—the mutual promises of the several subscribers form a valid consideration for the promise of each." And "the party for whose benefit such subscriptions are made may maintain assumpsit against the several subscribers, although such party is not connected with the consideration."

It will be observed that in the case which we are examining the mutual promises were more distinct, as the one was made the express condition of the other, and, further, that the condition has been executed by McGinniss, so that the chancellor's reasoning applies to this case a fortiori. It is also to be observed that it is high American authority for the bringing of an action, and consequently the proof of the claim by the party beneficially interested in the promise, although no consideration springs from him. Mr. Parsons, in his book on Contracts (volume 1, p. 378), adopts this proposition: "Where advances have been made, or expenses or liabilities incurred by others, in consequence of such subscription, before any notice of withdrawal, this should, on general principles, make them obligatory, provided the advances were authorized by a fair and reasonable dependence on the subscriptions; and this rule seems to be well established." Addison, in his excellent work on Contracts (page 22), says: "But in these cases, and in all cases where there is no mutuality of contract and obligation, there is nothing to bind the party to the continuance of his promise so long as nothing has been done upon the faith of it; and the party making the promise or giving the undertaking may, at any time before it has been accepted and acted upon, and any portion of the intended consideration been accomplished, retract such promise or withdraw such undertaking, and place himself in the same situation as if it never had been made." Hind v. Holdship, 2 Watts, 104, cited by counsel for the church, is not the case of a subscription, but is direct authority showing the right of the party beneficially interested in the promise to bring suit, although a stranger to the consideration; and Uhland v. Uhland, 17 Serg. & R. 268, quoted in Watts, is the authority from Chief Justice Gibson for the right of the party beneficially interested in the promise to bring suit, although, not the promisee, and a stranger to the consideration. In Caul v. Gibson, 3 Barr. [3 Pa. St.] 416, Judge Burnside lays down broadly the binding force of these church subscriptions as settled law. In Norton v. Janvier, 5 Harr. [Del.] 346, Judge Booth rules in favor of the binding force of these subscriptions. In this case the subscription was made upon a condition that a certain amount should be raised by subscription or otherwise for the payment of the debt of the church; and the court held that the performance of the condition was a sufficient consideration. I know of no other case in Delaware. There are some cases cited from Vermont and New Hampshire, which I regret not being able to obtain. I think the clear result of the authorities in New York and Pennsylvania is that a promise to give funds to a church for church purposes, or other religious or charitable institutions, not revoked until after the church or other institution, on the faith of the promise, has incurred new expenses and new liabilities for objects and purposes within their proper sphere of action, is a valid promise, and founded on good and sufficient consideration. Standing by and permitting this new expense and liability, incurred on the strength of his promise (if not alone, yet certainly on the strength of his promise aggregated with those of others), he is properly, from a legal position, and certainly equitably, on grounds of good morals and good faith, considered as liable for money paid to and for his use and at his request, which they have a right on the common counts to recover. Now, this reasoning, it will be observed, is on the supposition that this promise was made directly to the church. If, on the other hand, the true view of this contract is that of promise to Mr. McGinniss, founded on McGinniss' mutual promise to subscribe, and that promise was (as is proved) executed, then there is proven full and ample consideration, and all the nice distinctions founded on the sufficiency of consideration which arise in the former view of the case are swept away.

The only question which now remains to be considered is, was there any condition to be performed by the church before they could claim the subscription, or was there the happening of any contingency upon which the right to make the claim was barred? If there was such condition to be performed, and by the fault of the church it was not performed, then there could be no just demand for this subscription, or if the contingency which, by the agreement of the parties, was to bar the claim, happened, then there could be no right of action. On one occasion Sinex said "the church was in debt, and he would give eight hundred dollars towards paying it." This does not appear to have been said on the special occasion of his promise to McGinniss; but it may be assumed, for the sake of the argument, that he desired his subscription, either in whole or in part, to be appropriated to the debt of the church. What then? Has he ever tendered the money to them for this purpose? and have they ever refused to apply it, thus tendered, to such a purpose? There is no evidence whatever of such a state of facts; there is no evidence that the church has paid all its debts; and there is none that, if the money is paid, the church will not apply every dollar to their payment. The subscriber who seeks to avail himself of this defense must show either that there was no debt to which the fund could be applicable according to the intention of the parties at the time of the subscription, or a refusal to apply the subscription money according to the intention of the parties. The evidence does not disclose either of these states of facts, nor is there any proof that anything was to be done by the church other than what was done before demand of the subscription. Supposing Sinex's subscripuon was intended for paying off the church's existing debts, there is no proof that all, or the most of, these subscriptions were for that purpose; and the certain expectation of receiving eight hundred dollars to be applied to existing debt was an inducement and valid reason why necessary expenses should be in the future incurred, if within reasonable and proper bounds. So that, while Sinex's money was to be applied to existing debt, the agreement by him, to pay eight hundred dollars on account of it, operated in the same manner to induce the contracting of new necessary liabilities as if there had been no direction given by him for the application of his subscription.

I therefore allow the claim, and direct that the costs of the proceedings be taken from the funds in the assignee's hands.

SALVAGE—COMPENSATION.

A canal boat, which had been cast off from a tow and was adrift in Long Island Sound, was picked up by a boat's crew of fifteen persons from Northport, and was libelled for salvage. The vessel was appraised and bonded at $400. Held, that such services to such boats in the sound ought to be encouraged; and the salvage was fixed at 50 per cent. of the stipulated value.

In admiralty.

Thomas Young, for libellants.
Benedict, Taft & Benedict, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action for salvage. The services consisted in going out into Long Island Sound from Northport to bring in a canal boat, known to have gone adrift from a tow. It is conceded to be a case of salvage. The only question submitted is as to the amount.

The increasing navigation of the Sound by canal boats towed by tugs involves considerable danger to the canal boats when the tows are caught by heavy weather. The boats are then often cast adrift, and when adrift and abandoned, as they generally are, are in great peril, owing to their inability by reason of their construction to withstand the seas, and their liability to go to pieces if they strike the shore. I consider, therefore, that encouragement should be held out to persons along the Sound to offer prompt and efficient aid to canal boats so situated, in order that these boats, in case of disaster, may as soon as possible be placed beyond the power of the sea. In view of this consideration, and looking at all the circumstances of the present case, including the fact that the value is small and some fifteen persons are to share in the salvage, I consider it a case in which to award fifty per cent. of the value of the boat as proper salvage.

The value of the boat has been fixed by a regular appraisement at $400, and the stipulation for value, which now represents the boat in this court, is for that amount. The decree must therefore be for $200 and costs.

If the salvors do not agree upon the division of this sum between themselves, they may present that question to me, upon a statement of the names of the salvors and the facts material to be stated.

PRIZE—RUNNING BLOCKADE.

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for an attempt to violate the blockade.

In admiralty. The vessel and cargo were taken for the use of the government on appraisal, at the place of capture, in the Gulf of Mexico, and the vessel was afterwards lost at sea. The vessel and cargo were confiscable under the act of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 225).

BETTS, District Judge. This schooner and her cargo were captured as lawful prize on the 12th of January, 1862, in Biloxi river, by the United States steamer New London. The vessel and her cargo, consisting of lumber, were appraised under orders of Flag Officer McKean, of the United States navy, at Ship island, in the Gulf of Mexico, by a board of naval survey, and both were taken to the use and service of the United States, at such appraisal. The papers and documents found on board the vessel, with the official appraisement of the vessel and cargo, were placed before the court on the hearing of the cause. A motion was issued against the vessel and cargo on the 5th of March, and returned duly served on the 18th of March, 1862, and, no person making appearance in the suit, or claiming the prize, the district attorney, upon the papers and preparatory proofs submitted to the court, moved for condemnation of the vessel and cargo as lawful prize. The vessel was enrolled and licensed, under the authority of the Confederate States, at New Orleans, April 27, 1861. She was owned by a naturalized citizen, resident at New Orleans, who left New Orleans in her, under a pass from the rebel authorities, November 30, 1861, and the cargo was laden on board, by the master and owner of the vessel, at Harrodsburg, on the Biloxi river, and near the town of Biloxi, in the state of Mississippi, with intent to be transported thence to Biloxi, on the bay of that name, and Gulf of Mexico. The vessel, after her arrest, was foundered and lost in a gale at or near Ship island, in the Gulf of Mexico. It was, accordingly, physically impossible to have her bodily in this port, to commence proceedings in rem against her as prize. The vessel evaded a blockaded port —New Orleans—to obtain, in another blockaded port, the cargo on board at the time of her capture, and was intercepted in her destination to another part of the same port. Had she been a [neutral] vessel, she would, therefore, not have completed the voyage out from New Orleans, so as to be discharged of the offense thereby committed. The Christiansberg, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 382, and notes.

This case also falls within the terms of the act of congress of July 13, 1864 (12 Stat. 255). The proclamation of the condition of the Rebellion in the states of Louisiana and Mississippi was issued August 16, 1861, and this vessel having proceeded from one of these states to the other, and being there found laden with enemy property, both she and her cargo would come within the provisions of that act, as well as under the general rules of the prize law, for having violated or intending to evade the blockaded ports by a further voyage by sea. See cases referred to in preceding decisions. Judgment of condemnation and forfeiture of the value of the vessel and cargo absolutely to the United States, conformably to the appraisement, is ordered accordingly.

Circuit Court, D. California. March 14, 1867.

REVENUE ACT OF 1866—GOODS IN HANDS OF MANUFACTURER—FORFEITURE—REMEDIES OF CLAIMANT—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.

1. Section 63 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 169), which provides that a person claiming goods which have been seized as forfeited under the internal revenue act, must give bond to the collector for costs and expenses, etc., is not compulsory, and does not prevent the owner of goods which he alleges to have been seized unlawfully, for maintaining an action against the seizing officer for the damages occasioned by the trespass.

2. By section 70 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 173), it is in effect provided that canned goods in the hands of the manufacturer, on and after August 1, 1866, shall pay a duty; and by the same act (Id. 144), it is declared that a retail or other dealer in such goods, for all the purposes of taxation, "shall be deemed the manufacturer thereof;" while in Schedule C (Id. 145) it is provided that such goods when "made, prepared, and sold or offered for sale or removal for consumption in the United States, on or after October 1, 1866," shall be liable to a stamp duty. Held, that a retail or other dealer who offered such goods for sale after August 1, 1866, was to be deemed and held the manufacturer thereof, and that such goods were liable to pay a duty, and if offered for sale without the payment thereof, were forfeited to the United States.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Where the intention of the legislature is in some particular ambiguously expressed, it is the duty of the court so to construe its act so as to make it harmonize in such particular with the general purpose, plainly expressed.

4. When an act (14 Stat. 144) declares that dealers in canned goods, under certain circumstances, "shall be deemed the manufacturers thereof," it is equivalent to declaring that such dealers shall be treated and held liable as if they were manufacturers, notwithstanding they are not such in fact.

This action was tried by the court, without the intervention of a jury. It was brought [by Adolph Cardinel and Augustine Lusulsky] against the defendants [W. C. S. Smith and Jerome B. Walden] for taking and carrying away certain canned meats, fruits, etc., alleged to be the goods of the plaintiffs, in the district court of the state for the seventh judicial district, and by the defendants removed to the United States circuit court, under section 67 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 171). The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court.

W. W. Pendegast, for plaintiffs.
R. F. Morrison, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. In making the seizure and sale complained of, the defendants acted in their official capacity—Smith as collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of California, and Walden as constable of Napa township—and upon the assumption and claim on their parts, that the goods seized were liable to pay a duty as provided in Schedule C of the act aforesaid, and were forfeited to the United States on account of having been exposed to sale by plaintiffs without the duty thereon having been paid by affixing the proper stamps thereon. It is insisted on behalf of the defendants that this action cannot be maintained, even if the seizure was wrongful, because the plaintiffs, it is said, are confined to the remedy provided or allowed by section 63 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 169). This section allows any person, who may claim goods that have been seized as forfeited to the United States, under the internal revenue act to file a bond with the collector for costs and expenses, and thereupon the collector must give notice of his proceedings to the district attorney, who must proceed to have the alleged forfeiture adjudicated in the proper court. But this provision is neither compulsory nor exclusive, and does not prevent the claimant from adopting and pursuing any other existing remedy. Indeed, section 63 aforesaid, is primarily intended to govern the conduct of the collector in the disposition of goods seized as forfeited to the United States, and in no way affects his liability to an action by the party aggrieved in case of an unlawful seizure. At common law any officer, including a sheriff acting under process, who seized goods of another by mistake or otherwise without sufficient authority, was liable to an action of trespass therefor. True, congress, for the purpose of preventing officers of the customs from being harassed by actions for vindictive damages, has provided that where the property seized, has been adjudged to the claimant as not liable to seizure, if the court certifies that there was probable cause for the arrest, no action can be maintained therefor. The claimant is restored to his property by the judgment of the court, but the fact, judicially ascertained, that there was probable cause for the taking and detention, is made a bar to an action for damages for the mere detention of the property. But in regard to these goods, there has been no proceeding in rem to determine their liability to seizure as forfeited to the United States. The plaintiffs' goods have been taken from them by the defendants, and the former, instead of claiming them, giving surety for costs, and thereby taking the case into court upon the naked question of forfeiture, have seen proper to abandon the goods and sue the defendants in trespass for the value thereof. Unless, then, the taking or seizure was lawful, the defendants must respond in damages to the extent of the value of the goods, and look to the government, which has had the benefit of the seizure, to reimburse them. Assuming that the seizure was unlawful as alleged, the plaintiffs have not mistaken their remedy, and may maintain this action.

The only remaining question in the case is, were these goods, at the time they were offered and exposed for sale, liable to pay a duty? If they were, they were forfeited to the United States and the seizure was lawful, otherwise not. Schedule C, as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 145), declares, that such goods as these when "made, prepared and sold or offered for sale, or removed for consumption in the United States, on and after the first day of October, 1866," shall be liable to a stamp duty. The plaintiffs purchased these goods before October 1, 1866, and afterwards offered them for sale. The seizure was made on October 22. This being so, of course they were "made and prepared" before October 1. It is insisted by the plaintiffs that this provision of the act should be read so as to declare that these goods, whether sold or offered for sale, or removed for consumption, etc., after October 1, should also be made and prepared—manufactured after that date. I think this proposition reasonable and grammatical, and so far as this clause of the statute is concerned, settles the question in favor of the plaintiffs. The alternative is only applied to the selling, offering for sale or removing for consumption after October 1, but in either case the goods so sold, offered or removed, to be liable to the duty, must have been "made and prepared" after said date. But this is not all. Said section 9 also provides (14 Stat. 144): "That any person who shall offer or expose for sale any of the articles named in Schedule C, * * * shall be deemed the manufacturer thereof, and subject to all the duties, liabilities, and penalties imposed by law in regard to the sale of domestic articles without the use of the proper stamp or stamps denoting the tax paid thereon." If, when the plaintiffs exposed these goods for sale on October 22, 1866, they were in contemplation of law the manufacturers of them, it was their duty to first affix "thereon the proper stamp," in default of which the goods were forfeited to the United States and liable to seizure. 13 Stat. 296, 482.

By section 70 of the act of 1866 (14 Stat. 173) it is provided that "whenever by the terms of this act a duty is imposed upon any articles, goods, wares or merchandise, manufactured or produced, upon which no duty was imposed by either of said former acts, it shall apply to such as were manufactured or produced, and not removed from the place of manufacture or production on the day when this act takes effect." The same section declares, "that this act shall take effect when not otherwise provided on August 1, 1866." The goods in question fall within this category, as no duty was imposed upon such goods "by either of said former acts." These are the only provisions of the internal revenue acts that bear upon the question.

Taking this legislation together, what was the intention of congress as to taxing these goods? That intention when ascertained it is the duty of the court to give effect to, without regard to any other consideration. For the plaintiff it is contended that congress did not intend to impose a duty upon canned goods made or prepared before October 1, 1866. So far as the language of Schedule C is concerned, it supports the argument. But it is evident from the provision just quoted from section 70, that such was not the intention of congress in regard to all such goods as had not been "removed from the place of manufacture or production" before August 1, 1866; for this section expressly provides that the duties specified in Schedule C should be imposed upon such goods. And if the intent of this provision was uncertain or open to argument, every consideration of just public policy in the imposition of taxes would conduce to this conclusion. To tax canned goods after October 1, and exclude from the operation of the law, all such as were manufactured before that date, would, to that extent, be an unjust discrimination in favor of the owners of the latter class of goods. Congress having thus provided for the taxation of canned goods "not removed from the place of manufacture or production" before August 1, 1866, from this fact, the inference is reasonable that it also intended to tax those which, although removed, had not yet passed into the hands of the consumer. No reason is given, why canned goods in the hands of the manufacturer when the act of 1866 took effect, should be liable to pay a duty, while the same class of goods in the hands of the jobber or retailer, should be exempt. At the same time it is admitted, that if congress has not provided for taxing such goods in the hands of the merchant, as well as the manufacturer, whatever may appear to have been the general purpose of its enactment, the court cannot supply the omission. But if the intention of the legislature in this particular be doubtful, or ambiguously expressed, it is the duty of the court to construe the act, if possible, so as to make it harmonize in such particular, with the general purpose, plainly expressed.

Taking the whole legislation together, I do not think that congress intended to exempt the goods of the plaintiffs from taxation, because they were "made and prepared" before October 1—if exposed for sale after that time. If the question turned upon the language of the provision in Schedule C only, the conclusion might be otherwise. But the law of the case is not found in this provision alone. In fact, these schedules are mere brief indexes of subjects, the general legislation concerning which, is found elsewhere in the body of the acts. The clause of section 9 (14 Stat. 144) above quoted, in my judgment, settles the law of this case against the plaintiffs. Their counsel, apparently conscious that the letter of this section was against them, sought to modify its effect, by endeavoring to show that when it declares that "a person who shall offer or expose for sale, any of the articles named in Schedule C, * * * shall be deemed the manufacturer thereof," it only creates a disputable presumption that such person is "the manufacturer thereof," which, in this case, is overcome by the admitted fact, that the plaintiffs are not the manufacturers, but only the vendors of the articles. The word "deemed" in this connection means "judged," "determined;" and when it is enacted that the vendor of an article shall for any purpose, "be deemed the manufacturer thereof," for such purpose, he is to be absolutely considered such manufacturer. Indeed, it would be of little use for congress to declare that a vendor of canned goods, for the purpose of internal revenue, should be deemed a manufacturer thereof, if such declaration could be overcome and held for naught, by showing that, in fact, he was not such manufacturer. Now, by such declaration, congress does not undertake to destroy the distinction, in fact, between the two persons or occupations, but only that the law applicable to the manufacturer of canned goods, shall also be applicable to the vendor thereof—that in this respect, and for this purpose, they shall be treated alike.

The internal revenue act [14 Stat. 98] is a piece of patch work, and it is sometimes difficult to reconcile its various provisions with each other. Its great length, and the multiplicity of subjects which it embraces, enhances the labor of understanding it. I confess I do not feel the utmost confidence in the present construction and application of it, though I feel well satisfied that it is just and equal in its consequences. As has already been observed, if a tax like this is only imposed upon articles manufactured after it takes effect, it operates as an unjust discrimination against the future manufacturer. And I am free to admit that this consideration has had its influence upon my mind in reaching the conclusion that congress did not intend to tax canned goods in the hands of the manufacturer when the act took effect, and exempt the goods in the hands of the seller, because manufactured before that date.

It appears that the commissioner of internal revenue has decided this question both ways. By a circular from the "Office of Internal Revenue," dated October 3, 1866, it was declared, that "all canned goods, either in the hands of the manufacturer or purchaser, sold or offered for sale on and after the first instant, are required to be stamped as specified in Schedule C of the act of July 13, 1866." By a second circular on the subject, from the same office, dated October 27, 1866, it was declared: "While it is believed that it was the purpose and intent of congress to impose a stamp tax upon the above named articles (canned goods) if sold, or offered for sale, or removed for consumption in the United States, on or after October 1, 1866, regardless of the time of their manufacture or production, that intent is so imperfectly expressed as to render it doubtful whether under a proper construction of the language of the statute such a tax can be collected." It is probable that by the time the second circular reached the revenue offices, nine tenths of the goods in question, such as had passed out of the hands of the manufacturer or producer before October 1, 1866, had paid the duty. It is also to be observed, that the decision of the commissioner appears to have been based upon the language of Schedule C alone, without reference to the other sections of the act above cited. Again, the commissioner, as a matter of public policy, might instruct his subordinates to refrain from enforcing this provision of the act according to this construction, for the reason that it was involved in some doubt, and might lead to unprofitable litigation. In some such light, I read the decision in the second circular. A department ruling made under such circumstances and from such motives, well enough in itself, can have but little weight in a court called upon to determine what the law actually was, as appeared by the acts of the legislature, at the time of this seizure.

There must be judgment for the defendants in bar of the action, and for their costs and disbursements.

MARINE INSURANCE — FORFEITURE FOR NONPAYMENT OF PREMIUM NOTE — STRANDING OF VESSEL—PAYMENT OF NOTE — SUBSEQUENT LOSS OF VESSEL IN GALE.

1. Where a note is given for the premium on an insurance policy containing the provision that if the note is not paid at maturity the policy becomes void while it remains overdue and unpaid, and after the dishonor of the note the vessel insured strands, whereupon the master has the note paid, and afterwards a gale comes up and the vessel is lost, the insurer is not liable.

2. Though the weather was fair at the time of the stranding, and continued so until after the note was actually paid, yet the proximate cause of the loss was the stranding of the vessel, and under these facts the policy was not revived.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a motion to expunge a claim proved by Wm. P. Cardwell against the estate of the bankrupt. There is no dispute as to the material facts. The claimant was the owner of the schooner D. O. Dickinson, and a policy in his favor for the season 1869, for the sum of five thousand dollars, was issued by the bankrupt company on the hull, tackle, apparel, and furniture of said schooner, to expire on the 5th of December, 1869. The insured gave the company a note for the premium on this policy, payable on the 8th day of October, 1869, with a condition in the body of the note and also in the policy, in these words: "And in case this note is not paid at maturity the full amount of premium shall be considered as earned, and the said policy becomes void, while the note remains overdue and unpaid." The note was not paid when due, and on the night of the 7th of October said schooner, laden with a cargo of lumber, left the port of Oconto for the port of Chicago, and about two o'clock on the morning of the 8th she ran aground on what is known as Strawberry reef, a sandbar projecting from Chambers' island, near the outlet of Green bay. No serious damage was done to the schooner by the stranding. Her bows ran hard on to the sand, and although an anchor was at once carried out and efforts made by the crew to work her off, they were unable to move her, owing to the bad holding ground, which was a soft sandy or gravelly bottom. Finding that he could not get her off by his own efforts, the captain, who was the owner, with the most efficient part of his crew, took the yawl boat and proceeded to Menominee, about thirty miles distant, for a tug, where they arrived about eleven o'clock in the morning. From that point the owner telegraphed to his agent in Chicago to pay the premium note, and the same was paid at half-past eleven o'clock in the forenoon on the 8th of October, without any disclosure to the insurance company of the condition in which the vessel then was. The services of a tug were procured, and the captain, with the tug, returned to the schooner about five o'clock in the evening of the 8th. The captain of the tug found the water too shallow in the vicinity of the schooner to enable him to reach her with his lines and decided to go for a lighter, which he did, leaving the schooner still hard aground. During the 8th, and up to about four o'clock of the morning of the 9th, the weather was pleasant and with no sea running, and the vessel appeared to be in no immediate danger; but about four o'clock in the morning of the 9th a gale came on from the southwest, causing a heavy sea, which broke over the stern of the vessel and finally filled her with water, and before the gale subsided she was a total wreck.

The company refused to pay the insurance, and a suit at law was commenced, but before it could be tried the company was adjudged a bankrupt, and this claim for the amount of the policy and salvage services, in all five thousand five hundred and fourteen dollars and twelve cents, was proven up against the estate of the bankrupt, which the assignee now seeks to have expunged. The defense set up by the assignee is, that at the time the loss occurred the policy had become void by the non-payment of the premium note, and, therefore, the company was not liable. In Williams v. Albany City Ins. Co., 19 Mich. 451, this clause was construed to simply suspend the policy while the insurance remained unpaid. And if payment of the premium was made before expiration of the policy, it was revived and became again operative; but if the loss occurred during the interval in which the policy remained suspended, the company was not liable, therefor, on the policy. This construction of the intent and meaning of the contract seems to me sound, and was acquiesced in by the counsel on both sides in this case. The material question is, when did the loss occur within the spirit and meaning of the policy? Was it when the vessel stranded on the sandbar in comparatively mild weather, or when she was actually broken in pieces by the gale? Or, in other words, was the vessel lost within the meaning of the contract when the premium note was paid at half-past eleven o'clock on the forenoon of the 8th of October.

It seems to me that the proximate cause of the wreck of the vessel occurred when she stranded on this sandbar. From that time on she was beyond the control of her crew. She was no longer a vessel afloat and capable of being maneuvred by those in charge of her, but was a helpless and inert mass, incapable of performing the functions of a ship. True, she received no such immediate damage as necessarily involved her destruction, if good weather had continued and help had been obtained; but she was within the jaws of destruction with no power to help herself, and at the mercy of the elements; and when the gale came on it only completed the wreck which had begun with the stranding.

It is conceded by the counsel for the claimant that the policy was suspended and inoperative from the time the note fell due till paid, and, of course, if the loss is to date from the time when she struck on the bar, then the policy was inoperative at the time of the loss.

Claimant's counsel contend that the immediate cause of the loss of the vessel was the gale, which began on the morning of the 9th, insisting that the proof shows that the vessel was not considered in any danger, by her captain or crew, up to that time; and that the gale and not the stranding, on the morning of the 8th, is to be deemed the proximate cause of the wreck, but, as I have already intimated, I cannot agree with that view of the case. The proximate cause of the wreck, in my opinion, was the stranding, which held the vessel helpless while the gale beat her in pieces. But for the stranding she would have been far beyond that place, and probably at or near the end of her voyage, before this gale came on.

The cases cited from 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 194 [Howard Fire Ins. Co. v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co.]; 11 Johns. 13; 12 East, 646; 2 Biss. [Case No. 14,345], as to what was the proximate cause of loss in those cases, respectively, do not seem to me in point. The case from 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] (Howard Fire Ins. Co. v. Transp. Co.), which seems at first glance the most analogous, was that of a fire risk on the hull of a steamer. A collision occurred by which the steamer was injured so as to let in the water, and owing to the influx of the water she took fire and her upper works burned off so that the rest of the hull sank. It was found, as a fact in the case, that but for the fire, which destroyed the buoyant parts of the hull, she would have floated, notwithstanding the injury from the collision, and the court, therefore, held that the fire was the proximate cause of the loss as against the fire insurance company. So in the case of The Union [Case No. 14,345]. The learned judge held that the proximate cause of injury to the libellant was his own negligence in attempting to leap from the tug, and not a collision which had occurred some moments before.

The claim must be expunged.

PATENTS—PROCESS FOR REWORKING VULCANIZED RUBBER—REISSUE TO EXECUTOR—SPECIFICATION—AMENDMENT—CONSTRUCTION—INFRINGEMENT—PRACTICE—DAMAGES—INCREASE BY COURT.

1. Where an original patentee has deceased and his estate is under administration, his executor or administrator may make a surrender and obtain a reissue.

[See Smith v. Mercer, Case No. 13,078.]

2. The commissioner may allow the original specification to be amended in the reissue, and he may permit the applicant for a reissue to redescribe his invention, including in the new description and claims not only what was well described before, but also what was suggested or indicated in the original specification, drawings, or patent-office model.

[Cited in Whitcomb v. Coal Co., 47 Fed. 659.]

[See Tucker v. Tucker Manuf'g Co., Case No. 14,227; Draper v. Potomska Mills Corp., Id. 4,072; Woven-Wire Mattress Co. v. Wire-Web Bed Co., 8 Fed. 87; Telegraph Co. v. Wiley, 17 Fed. 234.]

3. New features, ingredients, or devices, neither described, suggested, or indicated in the original specification or model, cannot be embodied in the new description.

[See Sarven v. Hall, Case No. 12,369.]

4. An inventor described his improvement in his original patent as a process for working over vulcanized rubber and moulding it into any desired shape; and stated that in carrying the process into effect many foreign articles of less cost than rubber could be incorporated so as to produce a substance having all the valuable properties of vulcanized rubber at such reduced cost as to admit of its being applied to many more useful purposes. The description in a reissue stated that the principal features of the process consisted in applying heat by means of steam to rubber mixed with substances commonly used in vulcanizing rubber, or to rubber compound which has once been vulcanized either with or without the addition of fresh rubber, the same, whether the rubber or the compound, is or not pressed into moulds or dies of the desired form, and the steam introduced into steam-chambers or steam-jackets, and thereby conducted around the moulds or dies which come in contact with the compound to be moulded into the desired form. The corresponding passage in the original specification was in effect that the principal features of the new process consisted in applying heat either to rubber in its native state, or to rubber with the substances commonly used in vulcanizing rubber which has once been vulcanized by means of steam. The description further stated that the rubber compound while being heated was pressed into moulds or dies to give it the desired form. Also that the steam was conducted around all portions of the moulds or dies which come in contact with the rubber or compound to be moulded. Also, by this means the process of curing rubber was greatly facilitated, and vulcanized rubber which had before resisted all attempts to remould it was readily pressed into any desired shape. Held, that the substance of the two descriptions in these portions was the same, and that the original one sustained that of the reissue.

5. It is the duty of the court to collect the intention and meaning of the inventor from the whole specification, and, if practicable, to adopt such a construction as will render the patent available for the purpose for which it was granted.

[Cited in La Baw v. Hawkins, Case No. 7,960.]

6. The reissued patent did not embrace the invention of Charles Goodyear, which was for curing the native rubber when combined with or in the presence of sulphur by submitting the same to a high degree of artificial heat, and also for a manufacture called vulcanized India-rubber, being a compound of India-rubber with sulphur chemically altered by a high degree of heat, because that invention was disclaimed in the original specification, and it was stated to be the chief feature of the invention to cure again vulcanized rubber and mould it into any desired shape, and because the reissue also stated that the value of vulcanized rubber ceased when the article made out of it was worn out, and that foreign substances might be mixed with rubber compound so as to form a substance having the properties of vulcanized rubber, but composed of cheaper materials.

7. Where one paragraph in a reissue specification would seem to lead to a construction which would make void the reissue, explanation of its meaning may be sought in a succeeding one.

8. Where the process and purpose are plainly suggested and understood, and the language in an original specification is suggestive of new terms and names used in the reissue, such new names and terms do not show that the reissue is descriptive of an invention different from that set out in the original.

9. The correct practice is, where infringement to any extent is admitted, if the patent is held to be valid, to enter an interlocutory decree for complainant and send the cause to a master to ascertain the amount the complainant is entitled to recover.

10. Under the act of July 8, 1870 [16 Stat. 206], where a decree is entered for complainant, he may recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the respondent, the damages he has sustained, and the court may in its discretion assess the same.

11. Profits are to be accounted for in such case by the respondent wherever the decretal order to that effect is entered, and if the injuries sustained by the complainant from the infringement are greater than the gains and profits realized by the respondent, then the complainant is entitled to recover compensation for the excess of the injuries beyond the amount estimated for profits of the respondent.

[Cited in Buerk v. Imhaeuser, Case No. 2,107.]

[See note to Case No. 2,142.]

12. Actual damages are assessed in the first instance, but the court may in its discretion increase the amount to a sum not exceeding three times the amount estimated and assessed as the actual damages sustained beyond the gains and profits realized by the respondent.

On the 29th of August, 1854, letters-patent [No. 11,608] were granted to Daniel Hayward, since deceased, for certain new and useful improvements in the manufacture and in the process of manufacturing vulcanized rubber, for the term of fourteen years, and on the 28th of August, 1868, the letters-patent were extended in the name of [Caleb Swan] the executor of the patentee for the further term of seven years from the expiration of the original term of the letters-patent. Subsequently to the extension of the patent, —to wit, on the 15th of December in the same year,—the executor of the original patentee, by deed of assignment in due form, conveyed all his right, title, and interest in the letters-patent to the first-named complainant, through whom, by virtue of certain agreements, the other complainants derived their titles. By virtue of that conveyance the legal title to the letters-patent became vested in the assignee, and the record showed that he, on the 6th of July, 1869, surrendered the letters-patent on account of a defective or insufficient specification, and that a new patent was issued to the same party, and, as the complainant alleged, for the same invention. [Reissue No. 3,531.] They also allege that the original patentee was the original and first inventor of the improvement; that they, the complainants, were the owners of the reissued letters-patent, and of the exclusive right to make and use the invention, and vend the same to others to be used, and that they were entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of that exclusive right during the residue of the term for which the reissued letters-patent were granted. Acquiescence by the public in their claim, that the exclusive right to the improvement belonged to them, was also alleged, and that they would have derived large gains and profits from the manufacture of the patented product but for the wrongful doings of the respondents; and they charged that the respondents, ever since the reissued letters-patent were granted, had unlawfully and wrongfully made, used, and sold large quantities of articles composed of the patented product, and manufactured in the manner and by the process patented and secured in their letters-patent, and that they, the respondents, had received great gains and profits from the manufacture and sale of such articles, and from the unlawful use of their invention. Process was issued and duly served, and the respondents appeared and filed an answer. The defences urged were as follows: 1. That the executor of the original patentee was not authorized by law to surrender the original letters-patent and to obtain the reissued letters-patent described in the bill of complaint. 2. That the reissued letters-patent were not granted for the same invention as that described in the specification of the original letters-patent. 3. That the patentee in the original letters-patent was not the original and first inventor of the alleged improvement. 4. That the respondents have not infringed, except to a small extent, the patented invention as alleged in the bill of complaint.

[Defendant demurred to the bill, and the demurrer was overruled. See case No. 2,398, next following.]

Whiting & Russell and J. E. Maynadier, for complainants.

George Gifford and F. A. Brooks, for respondents.

CLIFFORD [Circuit Justice]. Authority to accept the surrender of an original patent in certain cases where the specification is defective or insufficient, and to grant a new patent to the inventor of the improvement, is conferred upon the commissioner of patents, and where he accepts the surrender and grants a new patent, his decision in the premises, in a suit for infringement, is final and conclusive, unless it is apparent upon the face or the reissued patent, as matter of legal construction, that it is not for the same invention as that secured in the original letters-patent. 5 Stat. 122; 16 Stat. 206; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 542.

Controversies of the kind where the original patentee has deceased, and where the reissued letters-patent were in the name of the executor or administrator, have often come before the courts, and the printed arguments for the respondents refer to no decided cases where it is held that the letters-patent are invalid on that account. Goodyear v. Providence Rubber Co. [Case No. 5,583]; 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 788.

Specifications in letters-patent are frequently found to be defective or insufficient, and where the original patentee has deceased and his estate is under administration, it is difficult to see any solid objection to the power of his executor or administrator to make the surrender and obtain the reissue. Patents which are inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, if the error arose by inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, may be surrendered, and the commissioner is authorized, upon the payment of thirty dollars, to cause a new patent to be issued to the inventor for the same invention for the residue of the period then unexpired, for which the original patent was granted, and the repealed patent act, under which the reissued letters-patent were granted in this case, provided that "in case of his death, or any assignment by him made of the original patent, a similar right shall vest in his executors, administrators, or assigns." 5 Stat. 122; 16 Stat. 106.

Reissued letters-patent must, by the express words of the section authorizing the same, be for the same invention, and consequently, where it appears on a comparison of the two instruments as matter of law that the reissued patent is not for the same invention as that secured in the original patent, the reissued patent is invalid, as the commissioner in that state of the case must be held to have exceeded his jurisdiction. Power is unquestionably conferred upon the commissioner to allow the specification to be amended, if the patent is inoperative or invalid, and in that event to issue a new patent in proper form, and he may doubtless under that authority allow the patentee to redescribe his invention, and to include in the description and claims of the patent, not only what was well described before, but whatever else was suggested or substantially indicated in the specification, drawings, or patent-office model, which properly belonged to the invention as actually made or perfected. Interpolations of new features, ingredients, or devices, which were neither described, suggested, nor indicated in the original patent or patent-office model, are not allowed, as it is clear that the commissioner has no jurisdiction to grant a reissue unless it be for the same invention as that

Apply those rules to the case at bar, and it is clear as anything in legal decision can be, that the second defence set up by the respondents cannot be sustained. Certain parts or passages of the specification of the reissued patent are incorporated into the answer of the respondents as showing that the reissued patent describes and claims an invention or certain features of an invention different from that described and secured in the original patent; but the court is of a different opinion, as everything described in the parts or passages of the original specification selected and embodied in the answer as supporting that defence is found either fully set forth or plainly suggested or substantially indicated by the inventor in the specification or drawings of the original patent. He describes his improvement in the original letters-patent, as a process for working over vulcanized rubber and moulding it into any desired shape; and he states that in carrying the process into effect, many foreign articles of less cost than rubber may be incorporated into the rubber so as to produce a substance or compound having all the valuable properties of vulcanized rubber, at such a reduced cost as to admit of its being more extensively used than heretofore, and to be applied to many new and useful purposes. The respondents select as the chief ground of complaint the following parts or passages contained in the specification of the reissued letters-patent. Pressure, says the patentee, in certain cases is necessarily applied in order to give homogeneousness to the material and to free it from blisters and other imperfections, and where rubber goods which were vulcanized by the ordinary process in ovens or steam-boilers, are blistered or imperfectly vulcanized, it is found that that the defects may be cured by placing the material between steam-jackets, and under pressure, and that the blisters and imperfections may be removed by the action of heat and pressure there applied.

Preceding that part of the specification embodied in the answer as the one describing a different invention from that secured in the original patent, the patentee states that in some cases the mere confinement of the compound between the surrounding steam jackets or chambers may be sufficient without the application of any actual pressure before the compound is vulcanized, inasmuch as the material always expands in bulk during the process of vulcanization, which produces a pressure upon the surfaces by which it is surrounded and confined. Vulcanized rubber, the patentee in the reissued letters-patent states, ceases to be of value when the article constructed from it had become worn out, as it is well known that it possesses properties which practically prevent its being used a second time, and he proceeds to represent that the improvement consists in a new process for vulcanizing and moulding any compound of rubber capable of being vulcanized, and that the improvement is applicable also to working over and revulcanizing rubber compound which has already been vulcanized and put to use. He also states that by the process many foreign substances may be intermixed with the ordinary rubber compound, whether already once vulcanized or newly compounded for vulcanization, so as to form a substance having the valuable properties of vulcanized rubber compound although composed in a great part of cheaper materials. Superadded to those representations is the further statement that the principal features of the process consist in applying heat by means of steam to rubber mixed with substances commonly used in vulcanizing rubber, or to rubber compound which has once been vulcanized, either with or without the addition of fresh rubber, the same, whether the rubber or the compound is or not pressed into moulds or dies of the desired form, and the steam introduced into steam-chambers or steam-jackets and thereby conducted around the moulds or dies which come in contact with the compound to be moulded into the desired form. Much reliance is placed upon that passage of the specification of the reissued patent as showing that the specification describes an invention different from that described in the specification of the original patent; but the court is clearly of the opinion that it fails to establish any such proposition within the meaning of the patent law. Some difference undoubtedly exists between the phraseology of that passage and the corresponding passage in the specification of the original patent; but the substance of the two descriptions is the same as clearly appears by comparing that passage with the language employed in the specification of the original patent, in which it is stated that the principal features of the new process consist in applying heat either to rubber in its native state, or to rubber with the substances commonly used in vulcanizing rubber which has once been vulcanized by means of steam. No attempt is made to show that the introductory representation of that passage differs in any essential particular from the corresponding representation in the specification of the reissued patent, but it is insisted that the succeeding portion of the paragraph falls short of sustaining the corresponding feature in the new patent. The court is unable to sustain that proposition, as the patentee states in effect, in continuing the description of his process, that the rubber or compound while thus heated, is pressed into moulds or dies which give it the desired form, "the steam being conducted around all portions of the moulds or dies which come in contact with the rubber or compound to be" moulded into the desired form. "By this means the process of curing rubber is greatly facilitated, and vulcanized rubber, which has hitherto resisted all attempts to remould it, is readily pressed into any desired shape."

Other references to the respective specifications might be made to show that the reissued patent is for the same invention as that embodied in the original patent, but it is not necessary to pursue the subject, as it is quite evident that the new patent does not contain anything which is not fully described or substantially suggested in the specifications or drawings of the surrendered patent. Three varieties of apparatus are described as sufficient to illustrate the application of his improved process to the production of different articles manufactured of rubber and its compounds. He then remarks that the essential feature of the process is not the use of such a form of machine, or of moulds or dies, but that it consists in "so introducing steam to the moulds and dies as to cause it to circulate entirely through and around the same, or substantially so, so that substantially every part of the rubber or compound which bears against the moulds or dies shall come in contact with a surface heated by steam," softening the compound so that it may be moulded into the requisite shape or form by the pressure of the dies. Special reference is made to the fact that the words "uneven surfaces," "blisters," or "smoothing surfaces," or "plating articles" are not mentioned in the specifications of the original patent; but it is a sufficient answer to that suggestion to say that the term "moulding rubber" and its compounds may well include all that is meant by those particular phrases.

Want of novelty is the next defence, and in connection with the general allegation that the original patentee is not the original and first inventor of the improvement, the defence is presented in two or three special forms which will be noticed as a part of the same defence. Proofs were taken on both sides, and the complainants at the final hearing introduced in evidence the reissued letters-patent as described in the bill of complaint. Such evidence, that is, the letters-patent on which the suit is founded when introduced by the complainant, afford a prima facie presumption, if they are in due form, that the patentee is the original and first inventor of what is therein described as his improvement, and the complainants, when the true meaning of the claims of the letters-patent is ascertained, are entitled to the benefit of that presumption. Much difficulty is experienced in determining the true meaning of the specification and claims of the patent, as they contain many expressions tending to support the charge that the patentee of the reissued patent intended to embrace the invention of Charles Goodyear, which was for curing the native rubber when combined with or in the presence of sulphur, by submitting the same to the action of a high degree of artificial heat, and also for the new manufacture called vulcanized India-rubber, being a combination of India-rubber with sulphur chemically altered by the application of a high degree of heat. If so construed as to include that invention, the letters-patent would certainly be invalid, as that patent was of a prior origin, and its validity was sustained in this court, and affirmed in the supreme court. Goodyear v. Providence Rubber Co. [Case No. 5,583]; Id., 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 795.

But the rule ut res magis valeat quam pereat is as applicable to patents as to any other instruments in regard to which it is the duty of the court to adopt a liberal construction in order to give effect to the intention of the parties. Ryan v. Goodwin [Case No. 12,186]; Evans v. Eaton, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 512.

Where doubts arise, it is the duty of the court to collect the intention of the parties from the whole instrument, and, if practicable, to adopt such a construction as will give it effect and render it available for the purpose for which it was granted. Apply that rule to the construction of the letters-patent, and it is quite clear that the specifications and claims of the patent do not embrace what was invented by Charles Goodyear as described in his letters-patent. Express disclaimer of any such pretensions is contained in the original letters-patent, in which the patentee states that he does not claim the curing of India-rubber in its natural state when compounded with sulphur and lead by the use of heat or of steam, nor the compounding of sulphur, white-lead, or coal-tar with India-rubber, and he admits, in terms too explicit to be denied, that "all those have been the subjects of previous patents." Confirmation of that view is also derived from the statement of the patentee in the specification of the original patent, that the leading and most important feature of my improvements is the curing again and reproducing of vulcanized rubber from scraps or fragments which have once been vulcanized. Working over vulcanized rubber and moulding it into any desired shape is, in the opinion of the court, the main feature of the invention as described in the original patent, but it is certain that the patentee also states that many foreign articles may be so incorporated with the India-rubber or caoutchouc, either in its native state or when vulcanized, or otherwise prepared, as to produce a substance which has all the properties of vulcanized rubber. India rubber in the native state may unquestionably be used in a certain proportion as an ingredient of the compound, but the main feature of the invention is to prepare old vulcanized rubber, with or without foreign articles, for a second use by means of moulds or dies. Heat generated by steam is applied, whether the substance is rubber in the native state, or rubber with the substances commonly used in vulcanizing the same; but the patentee in the original patent proceeded to say that the rubber or compound, while thus heated, is pressed into moulds or dies, which give it the desired form, and that the steam is conducted around all portions of the moulds or dies which come in contact with the rubber or compound.

Enough is also found in the specification of the reissued patent to lead to the same conclusion. Prior to the invention, as the patentee in the new patent states, the value of vulcanized rubber ceased when the article as manufactured was worn out, or had served the purpose for which it was prepared, as it could not be worked over or used a second time. Beyond doubt the next succeeding paragraph of the specification gives some support to the indefinite and unlimited construction assumed by the complainants; but it is clear, if that view is adopted, that the reissued patent would be void in having been granted for a different invention from that described in the original specification. Satisfactory explanation to the contrary, however, is found in the latter clause of the same paragraph, in which it is said that many foreign substances may be intermixed with the ordinary rubber compound, whether already once vulcanized or newly compounded for vulcanization; and the succeeding paragraph shows, even more conclusively, what the actual invention is, and that the patentee never pretended to embrace any of the improvements made by the great inventor in this department of the useful arts. Many foreign substances, he says, may be intermixed so as to form an article having the valuable properties of vulcanized rubber compound, although composed in a great part of cheaper materials; and he then proceeds to say, that the principal features of his process consist in applying heat, by means of steam, to rubber mixed with substances commonly used in vulcanizing rubber, or to rubber compound which has once been vulcanized, either with or without the addition of fresh rubber, the rubber or compound while thus heated being pressed into moulds or dies of the desired form, and the steam being introduced into steam chambers or jackets, and thereby conducted around the moulds or dies which come in contact with the compound. Pressure of some sort is doubtless necessary in order that the compound may be forced into all parts of the mould or die, and that the material or manufacture may be made smooth and uniform. Objection is made that the word "blisters" is not used in the original patent; but the objection is without merit, as the process and the purpose are plainly suggested and easily understood. Steam-jackets are not named in the original patent; but the language employed is scarcely less suggestive, and fully justifies the action of the commissioner, in granting the reissued patent. Mention should be made that the patentee describes the respective ingredients to be used in preparing rubber in its natural state, as well as for conducting the process of revulcanization, or for working it over a second time; but it is unnecessary to dwell upon that topic, as the patentee states, in express terms, that he does not claim any peculiar compound, or any particular arrangement of machinery, as that part of the invention does not consist in a new composition of matter, nor in a new machine, and he must abide by that disclaimer. Appended to that is another statement which deserves a passing notice, as the representation, if embodied in a claim, would render the claim void, unless it could be limited to such compounds as those described in the specification. He states that the process is applicable to all compounds by means of suitable apparatus; but it is clear that the original patentee never set up any such claim, and if he had, it could not be sustained, as it may be that other compounds, not now known, may yet be discovered, which will prove to be vulcanizable. Goodyear v. Providence Rubber Co. [supra].

Viewed in the light of those explanations, as the specification must be, it is quite clear that the patentee intends to use the compound for vulcanizing rubber, whether old rubber or native rubber, and whether used with or without foreign articles, together with the application of a high degree of heat as the primary means of vulcanization or revulcanization, and that the compound is composed substantially of the same ingredients and in substantially the same proportions as those described in the specification of the great inventor of that improvement.

Beyond question, the inventor in the case before the court intended to use substantially the same ingredients as the primary means of vulcanization or revulcanization; but he admits that those means are public property, and he does not profess to describe anything of the kind as a part of his invention. Subject to these explanations and qualifications, he proceeds to say that the first part of his invention relates to moulding the compound used, and consists in the use of a mould which is heated by steam before the compound is placed in it, or before the pressure is applied for moulding it, the other portion of the mould or die being also heated by steam and brought into its place with force sufficient to cause the compound, which is softened by the heat, to completely fill the mould, and he states that that part of the invention is especially useful when a compound is used which contains a portion of old vulcanized rubber. Immediately following, and without any intervening explanation, is the equally explicit statement as to the second part of the invention, which the patentee says relates to the application of the heat necessary for curing the compound, and "consists in applying it by means of steam in steam-chambers or steam-jackets, the heat of the steam being conducted by the walls of the steam-chamber or steam-jacket which comes in contact with it." Carefully examined, it will be seen that the second claim of the patentee is for the mode described in applying heat by means of steam in steam-chambers or steam-jackets, and also the mode of conducting it to the compound by the walls of the steam-chamber or steam-jacket. He does not claim to be the discoverer that heat will cure the compound, nor even the ingredients of the compound, as those matters were discovered by an antecedent inventor. External pressure is generally necessary to some extent, and the third part of the invention, as the patentee states, consists in applying the necessary heat to the compound while under pressure, either external or such as is produced by the expansion of the compound when confined in the moulds.

These claims are repeated at the close of the specification; but it is unnecessary to give give them much separate examination, except to say that they must receive the same construction as that given to the claims mentioned in the body of the specification. Suppose that it is so, still the respondents insist that the art of placing such compound or compounds in moulds or between metallic surfaces or dies, and then applying heat and moulding the same into the desired form either in large chambers or ovens, filled with steam of the proper temperature, was well known and used before the invention was made by the original patentee in this case. They also allege in their answer, that the art of smoothing the surfaces of goods by means of steam contained within the walls or chambers formed in rollers or dies, was also known and used before the date of that invention. Remarks respecting the invention of Charles Goodyear are unnecessary, as it has already been shown that the letters-patent in this case, when properly construed, do not describe the invention of the patentee as embracing anything which was patented to the former inventor. Brief reference only need be made to the patent of Thomas Hancock, as it is evident that the invention differs widely from that of the complainants in the case before the court. His moulds were different, as he employed the steam-boiler process, and not the mould surrounded by steam-chambers, as described in the complainant's patent. He formed the article in the mould before he applied heat, and in inner surface of the mould, or to the article order to prevent the compound from adhering to the mould, he employed silicate of magnesia, and applied the same either to the as formed of the compound, and in many cases he removed the article from the mould before it was vulcanized. None of the mechanism employed by the original patentee in this case is described in the specification of the Hancock patent. All that need be said respecting the patent of Samuel Lord and that of John Smith is, that the patent granted to the former was for an improvement in pressing whole pieces of woolen cloth, and that of the latter was for the construction of moulds heated by steam or otherwise for shaping the brims of hats, and that they are not of a character, in the opinion of the court, to supersede the invention secured in the reissued letters-patent of the complainants. Such part of the invention of the complainants described in the letters-patent as consists in the means of constructing the mould, or of modifying the pressure, upon the material while the heat is being applied for the purpose of vulcanization, is substantially admitted to be new and useful within the meaning of the patent law, and the court is of the opinion that each of the three claims, if properly construed and limited as herein described, is valid.

Discussion of the objection taken in argument that the alleged improvement, as described in the specification, is not patentable, may well be omitted, as the remarks of the court already made in defining the invention show that the defence cannot be sustained.

Grant that the construction of the patent adopted by the court is correct, and it follows that the charge of infringement to a certain extent is admitted; and the correct practice where infringement to any extent is admitted, if the patent is held to be valid, is to enter an interlocutory decree for the complainant, and send the cause to a master to ascertain the amount which the complainant is entitled to recover. Such gains and profits only as were made by the respondent in the unlawful use of the invention could be recovered by the complainant in an equity suit, prosecuted under the repealed patent act, as appears by several decisions. Livingston v. Woodworth, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 558; Providence Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 804. Different rules, however, are enacted in the new patent act, which provides that the complainant, when a decree is rendered in a suit in equity for an infringement, shall be entitled to recover, in addition to the profits to be accounted for by the respondent, the damages he has sustained thereby, and the further provision is, that the court shall assess the same or cause the same to be assessed in its discretion, and that the court shall have the same discretionary power to increase the damages as that given by the act where the damages are found by a verdict in an action on the case. 16 Stat. 206.

Profits are to be accounted for by the respondent in every such suit, whenever a decretal order to that effect is rendered against the respondent for an infringement, and if it appears that the injuries which the complainant sustained by the infringement are greater than the gains and profits realized by the respondent in making and using the invention, and vending it to others to be used as estimated and assessed, then the complainant is entitled to recover compensation for the excess of the injuries sustained, beyond the amount estimated and assessed for the gains and profits received by the respondent. Actual damages for the injuries sustained by the complainant beyond the amount estimated and allowed for the gains and profits made by the respondent, must be assessed in the first instance; but the court in its discretion may increase the amount so allowed to any sum according to the circumstances, not exceeding three times the amount estimated and assessed as the actual damages sustained beyond the gains and profits realized by the respondent. Prior acts and parts of acts set forth in the schedule of acts annexed to the last section of the new act are declared by the first clause of that section to be repealed; but the next clause of the same section provides that the repeal enacted shall not affect, impair, or take away any right existing under any of said laws. Pending actions are in terms saved from all the consequences of the repeal; and the further provision is that all actions and causes of action, both in law and in equity, which have arisen under any of said laws "may be commenced and prosecuted to final judgment and execution in the same manner as though this act had not been passed," excepting that the remedial provisions of the act shall be applicable to such causes of action if commenced and prosecuted subsequent to the passage of the new act. 16 Stat. 216. Damages for the infringement of letters-patent, where the wrongful acts were committed by the respondent subsequent to the passage of that act may, in certain cases, be recovered by the complainant in an equity suit, beyond the gains and profits made by the wrong-doer; but it is clear that the case before the court is not of that character, as fully appears by the allegations of the bill of complaint.

Decree for complainants, to be framed in conformity to the opinion of the court.

[NOTE. In respect to the proposition that reissued letters-patent must be for the same invention, and that, where it appears, on a comparison of the two instruments, as matter of law, that the reissued patent is not for the same invention as that secured by the original patent, the reissued patent is invalid, see Knight v. Case No. 2,398.

CAREW et al. v. BOSTON ELASTIC FABRIC CO.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1871.

PATENTS—REISSUE TO EXECUTOR.

Where a patent has by the death of the patentee devolved upon his executor, and has been by him assigned, the assignee may take a reissue in his own name and for his own benefit.

Bill in equity to restrain alleged infringement of reissued letters-patent [No. 11,608], originally granted David Hayward, August 29, 1854, for an improvement in the manufacture of india-rubber, and extended for the further term of seven years; and for an account.

The bill alleged, with other matters not material, the grant of the letters-patent to Hayward; his death, and the appointment of one [Caleb] Swan as his executor before June 3, 1867; the extension if the letters-patent for the further term of seven years, from August 29, 1868, on the application of Swan as executor; an assignment thereof by Swan, as executor, to James S. Carew, one of the complainants, on the 18th of December, 1868; and the surrender of the letters-patent by said Carew, and grant of a reissue to him [No. 3,531] on the 6th of July, 1869.

The defendant demurred to the bill, alleging for cause of demurrer, that Carew, not being the executor or administrator of Hayward, the patentee, nor an assignee of the letters-patent under any assignment by Hayward made, but the assignee of Hayward's executor, was not authorized by law to apply for and obtain a reissue of the letters-patent; and that the reissue was therefore invalid.

W. G. Russell, for complainants.

F. A. Brooks, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The only question raised by the demurrer in this case is, whether, after the decease of a patentee without having made any assignment of his patent, and the patent has thereby devolved upon the executor, and has been by him assigned, the assignee of such executor has, by law, the right of taking out, in his own name and for his own benefit, a reissue of such patent.

The thirteenth section of the act of July, 1836 (5 Stat. 122), provides, that "whenever any patent which has heretofore been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall be inoperative and invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification, as his own invention, more than he had or shall have a right to claim as new; if the error has or shall have arisen by inadvertency, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of such patent and the payment of the further sum of fifteen dollars, to cause a new patent to be issued to the said inventor for the same invention, for the residue of the period then unexpired for which the original patent was granted, in accordance with the patentee's corrected description and specification; and, in case of his death or any assignment by him made of the original patent, a similar right shall vest in his executors, administrators, or assignees.

It is contended, in support of the demurrer, that the sole right to surrender and reissue under section thirteen is given: First, to the patentee, if living without having assigned; second, to his executors and administrators, after his decease without assignment; and, third, to the assignee where there has been an assignment before the death of the patentee; and to no one else. It is claimed that although the assignee of the patentee himself, or any subsequent assignee under him, may take out a reissue, the assignee of the executor cannot do so. This is practically saying, that the right which vests in the administrators or executors in relation to reissue is not a similar right to that of the deceased patentee, but a more limited and restricted one: for, if the position of the respondents is tenable, while the patentee himself could convey to his assignee, and the assigns of such assignee, the right to a reissue, his administrator or executor, by transferring the patent, would deprive the patent of the benefit and advantage of the remedial provisions of the thirteenth section; and no error arising from inadvertence, accident, or mistake could be corrected by a reissue, if the patent had once devolved upon a personal representative of the patentee and been by him transferred, although no such lapse of remedy would occur by reason or in consequence of any number of transfers or assignments through other persons, or their personal representatives or assigns.

The statute provision is remedial, and like all remedial statutes, is to be construed liberally, so as most effectually to meet the beneficial end in view and prevent a failure of the remedy. Giving to remedial statutes a benignant interpretation, the letter of the act will be sometimes enlarged, sometimes restrained, and sometimes a construction made ultra the strict letter; but not, as has been well and wisely said, contra the strict letter. Lord Coke says, "Cases out of the letter of a statute, yet being within the same mischiefe or cause of the making of the same, shall be within the same remedie that the statute provideth; and the reason hereof is, for that the law makers could not possibly set downe all cases in expresse terms." 1 Inst. 24b.

The supreme court of the United States, when dealing with the statute in question, has construed it liberally, having regard to the general intent and object of the patent law. Although the strict phraseology of the statute limits the right to obtain a reissue to the original term of fourteen years, the court has construed it to continue during the term of the extension of the patent. And although in express terms the eighteenth section of the act of 1836 only authorizes the grant of an extension to the patentee himself, the court has sustained the grant of an extension to an executor or administrator. Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646. So the validity of a patent reissued for error in the specification, before the statute authorizing such surrender and reissue, has been affirmed. Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 218; Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 292, 315.

These decisions are founded upon the principle, that the rights conferred by the patent law, being property, have the incidents of property, and are capable of being transmitted by descent or devise, or assigned by grant. If, therefore, the words of the statute were, upon the strictest rule, capable of the narrow construction contended for, it would be the duty of the court, following the analogy of the cases cited, to give such a construction as would carry out the evident intent and object of the law, rather than one which would obviously render valueless the right granted in express terms to the executor and administrator.

But the language of the statute itself is incapable of this narrow construction. Giving to the patentee the right of surrender and reissue, it makes that an assignable right, and then provides that in case of his death a similar right, that is, a right to surrender and reissue with the incident or quality of assignability, shall vest in his executor. The words used in the statute are usual and apt words to denote assignability. The assignee contemplated in the statute is the assignee of the executor as well as the assignee of the patentee.

If the demurrer could be considered as properly raising the question presented in argument whether under the statute it is requisite before a patent can be reissued that the patentee himself should make oath to the amended specification, it would be a sufficient answer to say that the statute does not require this. After the death of the original patentee the executor or administrator may make the amended specification, and it is not readily perceived why there should exist any greater objection to an amended specification filed and sworn to by an assignee under a grant than to one filed and sworn to by an assignee under operation of law. For this purpose, the owner of the patent by assignment may by fair construction be considered the patentee. Washburn v. Gould [Case No. 17,214.]

Demurrer overruled.

CAREY v. ATKINS et al.

[6 Ben. 562.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. June, 1873.

DELIVERY OF CARGO—BILL OF LADING—BREAKAGE.

1. A ship received on board, in Havre, a number of millstones to be carried to New York, under a bill of lading containing the clause "not accountable for breakage." On the delivery of the stones, four were found to be broken, and two others never came to the possession of the consignees, who brought this action against the owners of the ship to recover the value of the six stones: Held, That it was incumbent on the owners of the ship, at least, to show that the two missing stones were discharged upon the wharf and placed with the others in that part of it which had been selected for the deposit of the libellant's goods.

2. As the respondents had not furnished such proof, they were liable for the value of the missing stones.

3. It was not made to appear that there was any negligence in stowing or landing the stones, and, under the bill of lading, the respondents were not liable for breakage not shown to have arisen from negligence.

[See note at end of case.]

[Libel by Samuel Carey against the bark Amelia, Joshua Atkins and Edwin Atkins, claimants.]

James K. Hill, for libellant.

Owen, Nash, & Gray, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action to recover the value of six millstones, part of a shipment made in Havre, upon the bark Amelia, to be delivered to the libellant in New York. Of a number of stones shipped, two never came to the possession of the libellants; and of those which were received, four were broken. As to the two missing stones, the ship must be held liable, there being no satisfactory evidence of their delivery in New York. They may have been landed from the vessel, but the delivery of the cargo was conducted in a very loose and unsatisfactory way, and the persons who conducted it appear to have little knowledge as to what disposition was afterwards made of the cargo. They know nothing of the missing stones. It was incumbent upon the ship, at least, to be able to show that the missing stones were discharged upon the wharf and placed with the others in that part of the wharf selected for the deposit of the libellant's goods. The testimony furnishes no evidence as to how many of the libellant's stones were landed, nor how many stones were set apart for the libellant upon the wharf, but does disclose that the two missing stones were never receipted for or taken by the carman, and never came into the actual possession of the libellant. The ship is, therefore, liable for their value.

As to the broken stones, the case is different. The stowage of the ship is proved to have been good, and there is no evidence of any negligence on the part of the ship in the stowing of the stones or in the landing of them upon the wharf. The bill of lading contains an exemption of liability for breakage; and, upon the proofs, the ship is not liable, upon such a bill of lading, for breakage not shown to have arisen from negligence.

[NOTE. That an exception in the bill of lading from liability for breakage exempts the vessel from loss by breakage not caused by negligence, see Six Hundred and Thirty Casks of Sherry, Case No. 12,918; The Delhi, Id. 3,770; Wilson v. COPYRIGHT—ACT OF 1831—RESIDENT.

[An officer of the British navy,—traveling through the United States, and considering himself a British subject,—during his stay, filed a declaration of intention to become a citizen. It appeared that, at a time when trouble with Canada seemed imminent, he had offered his services to the province. Held, that he was not a resident of the United States, within the meaning of the copyright act of 1831.]

[See Keene v. Wheatley, Case No. 7,644; Boucicault v. Wood, Id. 1,693.]

BETTS, District Judge, presiding. An application was made to the court last week to obtain an injunction to restrain Mr. Collier from selling a cheap edition of Captain Marryatt's new novel, "The Phantom Ship," on the ground that the copyright had been purchased from the author by Carey & Hart. It was contended in favor of the application that Captain Marryatt was, at the time of the sale of the copy-right a resident of the state of Pennsylvania, and therefore had a right, under the law of 1831, to dispose of his works in the same manner as any other American citizen. Against the application it was urged that Captain Marryatt was not a resident of the country, and therefore not entitled to avail himself of the provisions of the law. Captain Marryatt, it was stated, came to this country in the spring of 1837, and traveled over a considerable part of the country. He visited Philadelphia during his stay in the country, and while there, filed a declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States. It appeared that, during the whole of the time he was in this country, he not only considered himself a British subject, but was an officer in the British navy, and that during the trouble in Canada, last year, he offered his services, to be employed as an officer in the provincial army.

The judge said that the only question for the court to decide was whether Captain Marryatt was a resident of the country. The term resident had been decided to mean a permanent inhabitant of the state. It was evident that a man who was a mere transient visitant, whose family, business, intentions and relations were all abroad, could not be considered a resident, and the filing a declaration of an intention to become a citizen, could not make him one. The court therefore decided against the application.

LIABILITY OF OWNERS FOR SEAMEN'S WAGES.

The owners of a vessel are liable for wages if the vessel prove insufficient to pay them.

[See Bronde v. Haven, Case No. 1,924; Skolfield v. Potter, Id. 12,925.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Carey and others against the schooner Kitty and her owners].

No case including this question has been brought before me hitherto. I have fully considered the arguments that have been adduced, and have looked into the precedents of this court; as well as those in Clarke's Praxis, a book of high authority. I find that before, and since the American revolution, suits like the present have always been sustained. The arguments adduced to the contrary do not appear to me sufficient to overset the old practice of the court. I decree, therefore, that the process prayed for against the owners of the Kitty be granted, if the vessel should not prove to be sufficient for payment of seamen's wages.

DEATH OF SEAMAN—RIGHTS OF REPRESENTATIVES TO WAGES—DEDUCTION.

1. If a seaman dies before the stipulated voyage is completed, his representatives shall have his wages up to the time of his death, and not beyond it.

[See note at end of case.]

2. A slave entered on board as a seaman, and escaping from the vessel, shall not occasion a deduction from the wages of the rest, by way of contribution.

[See Knap v. The Eliza and Sarah, Case No. 7,873; Brown v. The Neptune, Id. 2,022; Wilson v. The Belvidere, Id. 17,790; Edwards v. Sherman, Id. 4,298.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Carey and others against the schooner Kitty and her owners.

[For decision as to the liability of the owners see next preceding case, No. 2,401.]

Two questions have been argued on behalf of the libelants in this cause.

1. Whether wages shall be paid for Martin Dear, (who died during the voyage, on the coast of Africa) beyond the time of his death. 2. Whether any and what deduction ought to be made from the wages of the rest of the crew, by way of contribution for the loss of a negro slave belonging to the owners, who ran away from the vessel at Sierra Leone, and remained there.

The first point has never been contended for before me till now; the uniform practice having been to allow wages to the time of the seaman's death, and no longer. This has been acquiesced in till some late decisions in the district court of Pennsylvania, determined by the judge of that district, and confirmed by Judge Washington in the circuit court. See 1 Pet. 155 [Scott v. Greenwich, Case No. 12,531]. Without questioning these authorities at present, it may be sufficient to observe that the courts of one state may be allowed to differ from those of another. In this state, the records of the court of admiralty shew that wages of seamen have never been allowed beyond the time of their death. The marine ordinances, quoted on this occasion, vary. The laws of Oleron, Wisbuy, and the Hanse Towns, allow wages to the end of the voyage: those of France, collected by Valin, only to the time of death. Reasons that existed when those laws were framed, may not be applicable in the present state of commerce. Voyages were then much shorter, seldom extending beyond the Mediterranean, the Baltic, the Adriatic, and the coasts of the Atlantic. Seamen engaged themselves for two or three months, out and home, and, in case of death before they returned, the utmost sum claimable by their representatives, was trifling in comparison of what may be due in these days, when voyages are not infrequently extended to one, or two years. Will it, then, be expected that the wages of a seaman who dies at the end of the first month shall be recoverable for the period of a whole year? I think not. It may also be observed that contracts with seamen are merely personal, no mention being made in them of executors, administrators, or assigns. Even in England, the right of these last to any wages does not seem to be settled; Abbot states it as doubtful. It is much to be desired that some general rule be established by congress, or by the decision of the supreme court of the United States: till then, I see no good reason to depart from the former practice in this court, both before and since the revolution. I decree, therefore, that the wages of Martin Dear be allowed up to the time of his death, which, from the evidence produced, happened nearly three months before the vessel sailed on her return voyage.

As to the second point, the doctrine of contribution is tolerably well settled, that where damage happens to vessel or cargo, mariners must bear their share of the loss. For, freight is the mother of wages, and if embezzlement cause a deduction from the freight, it is reasonable that they who are to be paid from it, should lose in proportion. In the present case, a slave of the owner, who is entered in the ship's articles as one of the seamen, in the station of cook, deserts from the vessel in a foreign port, and obtains his freedom by the laws of that country. For this loss the owner claims a contribution from the wages of the crew. But I do not see how the general principle of contribution can apply to this case. This man was no part of the vessel or cargo; he was shipped as a seaman, and can never be so considered as to authorize the present demand. But it is said that disobedience of orders occasioned the loss; that such neglect of duty amounted to a breach of the contract in the articles, and that, on that score, a deduction should be made. There was, however, no evidence of any orders being given to the crew. The mate, indeed, had directions not to permit any of the crew to go ashore at night; but there is no proof that he gave orders to that effect, and, as he did not return with the ship, he cannot be examined to this point. The discipline on board of this vessel appears to have been very relaxed; there seems to have been no watch appointed for the night when this negro made his escape; if there was, no persons are named as having been upon that watch, and it is possible that the negro himself may have been upon that duty. If so, how can blame attach to the others?

Upon the whole, I see no cause to make any deduction from the wages of the crew on this account; and I decree accordingly.

[NOTE. In Walton v. The Neptune, Case No. 17,135, it was held that, in the event of the death of a seaman, his full wages should be paid to his heirs as if he had served out the whole voyage; the words "his full wages," in the seventh article of the laws of Oleron, being construed to mean his "wages as much as if he had served out the whole voyage." In Scott v. The Greenwich, Id. 12,531, the administrator was allowed wages until the time of the seaman's death, and the balance in dispute lodged in the court until the determination of another case. In Natterstrom v. Hazard, Id. 10,055, it was held that the representatives of a deceased seaman were not entitled to wages beyond the time of his death when the engagement was by the month. But in Sims v. Jackson's Adm'x, Id. 12,890, which was an appeal from the district court, the expression "full wages," in the article of the laws of Oleron referred to, was held to mean "the same wages which the mariner would have been entitled to had he lived, and served out the whole voyage of the vessel;" and that, as the mariner had shipped for the voyage at a certain rate of wages per month, and died before the completion of the voyage, the administratrix was entitled to wages for the entire voyage; and that the monthly rate was no more than a rule to adjust the quantum for the voyage. In The Coriolanus, Id. 7,380, it was held that it was settled law in admiralty that the representatives of a seaman dying on the voyage in the service of the ship were entitled to his wages for the whole voyage. In Writer v. The Richmond, Id. 18,104, the claim of the administrator was rejected because at the time of the shipment as able-bodied the seaman was in fact affected with a severe pulmonic complaint, of which he died on the voyage.]

MUTUAL INSURANCE—PREMIUM NOTES—ACTION ON —DEFENSE OF BANKRUPTCY.

1. By a supplement to its charter, a mutual insurance company was authorized to insure "for a specific rate of premium to be paid in cash, in the same manner as insurance companies" not mutual "are accustomed to do" The object of the supplement was to enable the company to issue two classes of policies, one on the mutual, and the other on the non-mutual plan, the premiums on the latter to be paid in cash. Held, that the company might accept a note for such premium, instead of cash; the taking it being a mere extension of the time of payment, and none the less a payment in cash.

2. The bankruptcy of the company is no defense to an action by the assignee of a note given for the premium on a policy of insurance.

At law. Trial of an action upon a promissory note.

This was an action by the assignee in bankruptcy of the Milwaukee Insurance Co., to recover the amount of a note made by the defendants to the company for a policy [No. 25,502, dated May 28, 1868][2] for two hundred and forty dollars, payable in sums of sixty dollars on the first day of May annually for four years, without interest until due, and in case default should be made in the payment of any of the installments, then the whole to become due. The company was incorporated and did business for several years as a mutual insurance company, issuing policies and taking back notes, such policy holders being members of the company. By the act to amend the act to incorporate the company, it was provided that "the company shall have power in their discretion to make any and all insurance which by law they are or may be authorized to make, to any person or persons with whom they may agree to that effect, for a specific rate of premium to be paid in cash, in the same manner as insurance companies other than mutual insurance companies are accustomed to do. And in all such cases the insured shall not become members of the company, nor in any wise entitled to any share of the profits, premiums, or earnings, nor in any wise liable for the losses, debts, or liabilities of the said company, and all premiums received for such insurance shall be passed to the general credit of the company, and all losses growing out of said special policies shall be paid in like manner as losses under the ordinary policies of the company."

Mann & Cotzhausen, for plaintiff.
Butler & Winkler, for defendant.

MILLER, District Judge. A policy was issued for four years, under the amendment to the charter of the company, upon receipt of the note in suit for the payment of the annual premium. It is contended by the defendant's counsel that the premiums should be paid in cash simultaneously with the delivery of the policy, and that the company could not accept a note payable at a future time. The object of the amendment to the charter was to invest in the company the additional power to issue policies as a stock company for a specific rate of premium to be paid in cash. Insurance under this act may be made in the same manner as by other insurance companies not mutual. Policy holders stand in a different relation to the company from those under the mutual system. The insured under the amended charter are not members of the company, nor entitled to a share of the profits, premiums, or earnings of the company, nor subject to losses. I do not think the act requires premiums to be paid [in cash] [3] simultaneously with delivery and acceptance of policies. The act authorizes the company to make insurance to any person for a specific rate of premium to be paid in cash, in the same manner as stock companies. The company was not prohibited from extending the time of payment of premiums in cash. The company could transact business in this respect, as other companies, and make its agreement with the insured as to the time of payment of premiums in cash. The note was a mere regulation of the time of payment, for the accommodation of the defendants. The premium was to be paid in cash, but the time of payment was extended. There is no statute law prohibiting such extension. The policy issued to these defendants imports a settlement of the premiums to the satisfaction of the company simultaneously with its execution and delivery, and binds the company in case of loss by fire, even if the note had not been given, or if the insured should become insolvent and unable to pay the premium. It is an everyday practice with stock companies to issue policies upon credit, containing exemption from liability on non-payment of the premiums. A provision in a policy duly executed, that no insurance, whether original or continued, should be binding until the actual payment of the premium, and the written acknowledgment thereof, does not invalidate a subsequent contract by parol, to renew such insurance for a premium not paid at the time the risk attaches, but postponed to a future day. Trustees of First Baptist Church v. Brooklyn Fire Ins. Co., 19 N. Y. 305. In New York Firemen Ins. Co. v. Sturges, 2 Cow. 664, notes were received for premiums. See, also, Commercial Mut. Ins. Co. v. Union Mut. Ins. Co., 19 How. [60 U. S.] 318; Furniss v. Gilchrist, 1 Sandf. 53; McIntire v. Preston, 5 Gilman, 48; Hamilton v. Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co., 5 Barr [5 Pa. St.] 339. The contract between the insurer and the insured is mutual, but independent, and failure of one party literally to comply on his part does not exempt the other from liability. I am satisfied that under the amended charter, the company had lawful authority to issue policies, upon a simultaneous payment of the premiums in cash, or upon an extension of the time of payment by taking a note, or even without a note or security.

It is not necessary to consider the question whether the defendants are estopped from making this defense. The note in suit is a portion of the capital of the company for the payment of losses by fire. If defendants' property, covered by the policy, had been damaged or destroyed by fire, the company was bound by its contract of insurance to pay the loss. And in case of distribution of assets among creditors under the bankrupt act, defendants would be entitled to their pro rata share. The note, being accepted by the company in lieu of cash paid at the date of the policy, is recoverable as so much assets, and defendants are in no worse condition by giving the note in lieu of paying the premium. Hone v. Boyd, 1 Sandf. 481; White v. Height, 16 N. Y. 310; Sterling v. Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co., 32 Pa. St. 75; Sands v. Hill, 42 Barb. 651; Huntley v. Beecher, 30 Barb. 580; Alliance Ins. Co. v. Swift, 10 Cush. 433; Huntley v. Merrill, 32 Barb. 626; Clark v. Middleton, 19 Mo. 53. Upon the same principle, the insolvency of a corporation is no ground for restraining collection of subscriptions for stock. Dill v. Wabash Val. R. Co., 21 Ill. 91. And stockholders are liable on their subscription to the stock of an insolvent company. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380. Judgment for plaintiff.

NOTE [from original report in 2 Biss. 244]. That the insolvency of the company is no defense to a premium note, has the weight of the following authority: Lester v. Webb, 5 Allen, 569. Nor does the insolvency of the company entitle the insured to the cancellation of his premium note by surrendering his policy and making a pro rata payment. Hone v. Boyd, 1 Sandf. 481.

Case No. 2,404.

CAREY v. WASHINGTON.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 13.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1836.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—WASHINGTON—POWERS—LICENSES.

1. The corporation of Washington has no power to prohibit free colored persons from selling perfumery.

2. Quaere, whether they have authority to require any person to take a license to sell perfumery.

3. The corporation has no power to restrain or prohibit any person from the full exercise of all his rights, under the general law of the land, unless the power so to restrain or prohibit is expressly given by the charter, or necessarily results from some given express power.

[Cited in Washington v. Casanave, Case No. 17,225.]

Appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace for the county of Washington.

The warrant, dated on the 23d, and returnable on the 24th of November, 1836, was to arrest the defendant, etc. [Isaac N. Carey], to answer to the mayor, board of aldermen and board of common council of the city of Washington in a plea that he render unto them the full sum of fifty dollars which he owes and unjustly detains, "for that he the said Isaac N. Carey, being a free negro, did, on the 22d day of November, 1836, sell perfumery in the city of Washington, without first having obtained a license therefor, contrary to the act or acts of said mayor, etc., on that subject made and provided."

Mr. Dandridge and W. L. Brent for the appellant, and Bradley for the appellees, admitted the following facts:

That the appellant was residing in the city of Washington before the 29th of October, 1836, and had complied with the requisitions of the by-law of 1827, respecting the admission and residence of free colored persons. That he kept and sold perfumery, and paid for a license therefor, previous to the said 29th of October, 1836, and that his said license expired on the first Monday of November, 1836. That he applied to the mayor of Washington for a renewal of his said license on or before that day, who refused to grant such license under the ordinance of the 29th of October, 1836. That he continued to keep and sell perfumery after the expiration of his said license. The justice rendered judgment for a fine of 25 dollars, from which judgment the defendant appealed. This fine was imposed under the by-law of the 28th of October, 1831, entitled "An act providing additional revenues for the corporation," by the first section of which it is enacted that the taxes on certain licenses therein enumerated should be fixed at certain rates, and among others the following: "On each license to sell hardware, medicines, perfumery, jewelry, and watches, twenty dollars." And by the third section it is enacted, "That if any person or persons shall sell, barter or keep, as in the first section of this act enumerated, without first obtaining a license therefor, he, she, or they shall forfeit and pay, for each and every offense, a fine not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars, to be recovered and disposed of as are other fines for violations of the laws of the corporation." The 3d section of the by-law of the 29th of October, 1836, under which the mayor refused to grant a license to the appellant to sell perfumery, is in these words, "It shall not be lawful for the mayor to grant a license, for any purpose whatever, to any free negro or mulatto, except licenses to drive carts, drays, hackney-carriages, or wagons."

W. L. Brent and Mr. Dandridge, for appellant.

Mr. Bradley, for appellees.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the following opinion (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, observing that he concurred only in that part of it which denied the power of the corporation to prohibit free colored persons from selling perfumery):

This action is founded on the by-law of the 28th of October, 1831, entitled, "An act providing additional revenues for the corporation." This by-law is very badly expressed: but we can understand the intention of the corporation to be, to raise a revenue by granting licenses to sell, or by imposing fines for selling, without license, the articles, for the sale of which licenses were to be granted. But it is said that the defendant tendered the price or tax, for a license to sell perfumery, and demanded a license, from the mayor, which he refused to grant, because he was forbidden by the by-law of the 29th of October, 1836, § 3, to grant such a license to a colored person. The defendant's counsel contend that this by-law is void, because the corporation had no power to forbid the mayor to grant the license; nor to discriminate between white and colored persons; nor to forbid any free colored person to carry on the trade of selling perfumery, which was a trade lawful to white persons. The third section of the by-law of the 29th of October, 1836, says, "It shall not be lawful for the mayor to grant a license, for any purpose whatsoever, to any free negro or mulatto, except licenses to drive carts, drays, hackney-carriages, or wagons." This clause, taken in connection with the act of the 28th of October, 1831, requiring a license, and imposing a penalty of from 10 to 50 dollars for selling without license, amounts, in effect, to a prohibition to free colored persons to carry on the business of selling any of the articles, for the sale of which a license is required by the by-law of the 28th of October, 1831. The by-laws must not be repugnant to the general law of the land, further than such by-laws are justified by the express provisions of the charter.

By the general law of the land, free colored persons have a right to exercise any lawful trade or calling which white persons may exercise: a by-law forbidding them to do so, is contrary to the general laws of the land, and void, unless authorized by the charter. The selling of perfumery is a lawful business, or occupation. No express power is given to the corporation, by the charter, to prohibit or restrain it, or to license it, or to require a license to use or pursue it. The exercise of it is not, in itself, a nuisance. The corporation has no authority, under the power "to lay and collect taxes" to require the person exercising it, to obtain a license to do so; for the power, given by the charter, to lay and collect taxes, is only "to lay and collect taxes on real and personal property." The licenses, which the corporation may require, are expressly designated; and are confined to "auctions, retailers, ordinaries and taverns, hackney-carriages, wagons, carts, and drays, pawn-brokers, venders of lottery tickets, money changers, hawkers and peddlers, and theatrical and other shows and amusements." Their express power of restraining and prohibiting, is confined to tippling-houses, lotteries, and all kinds of gaming, and nightly and other disorderly meetings of slaves, free negroes, and mulattoes. They have also an implied power to restrain or prohibit whatever may be inconsistent with such regulations as may be necessary to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases, and for the preservation of the health of the city; whatever may be a common nuisance; whatever may injure the navigation of the Potomac and Anacostia rivers adjoining the city; and, in short, whatever may be inconsistent with the regulations which they have any express power to make. But the right to sell perfumery is not real or personal property which can be taxed as such. It is not within the list of licenses, authorized by the charter, nor is it one of the matters which may be restrained or prohibited by any express provision of the charter; nor can it injure the health of the city, or be in itself a nuisance. I think, therefore, that it cannot be prohibited.

But it is said that colored persons are a distinct class, not entitled to equal rights with the white population, and that they may be prohibited, although the whites may not. Such is not the general law of the land in regard to a right of this kind; the right to get a living by an honest, lawful, and harmless occupation. The corporation cannot make it the law of this city, unless they are authorized to do so by the charter; and I cannot find, in the charter, any such authority. I think, therefore, that neither the act of the 28th of October, 1831, nor the act of the 29th of October, 1836, so far as they prohibit or require a license for the selling of perfumery, is warranted by the charter. But if the by-law of the 28th of October, 1831, should be justified or supported by the clause of the charter authorizing the corporation "to lay and collect taxes upon the real and personal property within the said city," so far as it requires a license to be paid for, as a means of raising a revenue, yet a by-law to prohibit a certain class of citizens from exercising a lawful business or occupation, cannot be justified by the same clause of the charter; for the prohibition is not a means of raising a revenue.

The cases, in which licenses may be required, under the charter have been already enumerated, and are cases in which the public is concerned in the character of the person to be licensed; and therefore a discretion is given to the corporation to grant or refuse the license. The drivers of hackney-carriages, carts, and drays are a kind of public servants, or common carriers, in whose honesty and fidelity the public is interested, as they have the carriage of property to a large amount, and must, in a great measure, be trusted; and they derive a credit and character from their license. In the other enumerated cases the necessity or expedience of giving a discretion to the corporation is sufficiently obvious. But the corporation has no power to prohibit or restrain the exercise of a common right, unless that power be expressly given, or be necessary to the exercise of some expressly given power. But it has been suggested that the corporation derives its power, to tax a person who sells perfumery, from the clause of the charter, which authorizes them "to provide for licensing, taxing, and regulating auctions, retailers, ordinaries, and taverns, hackney-carriages," etc. The person who sells perfumery, it is said, is a "retailer," and therefore liable to be taxed and regulated, and to be prohibited from selling without a license. The word, "retailers," in the charter, as I apprehend, means, exclusively, retailers of "wine, rum, brandy, whiskey, or other distilled spirituous liquor, strong beer, or cider." These were the only retailers known in the Maryland statutes at the time of the separation of this part of the district from that state, to whom a license could be granted. They were always, colloquially, and in various statutes, called "retailers," without designating them as retailers of liquors. The licenses were granted by the county courts, and after the separation they were granted by this court, until 1804, when an amendment to the charter of Washington vested the power of granting them, within the city, exclusively to the corporation. The terms, "retailers," and "retail licenses," were as familiar here as they had been for many years in Maryland, and always applicable to retailers of liquors only.

By the Maryland act of 1784, c. 24, it was enacted, "That no person shall retail any wine, rum, brandy, whiskey, or other distilled spirituous liquor, strong beer or cider, on the western shore, without a license for that purpose obtained; and any person selling any of the articles aforesaid, under the quantity of ten gallons, shall be deemed a retailer." Here we have a clear, statutory definition of the word, "retailer." It means a person selling wine, rum, brandy, whiskey, or other distilled spirituous liquor, under the quantity of ten gallons. After having given this definition of the word "retailer," the statute, and subsequent statutes of Maryland, use the word without the additional words, "of liquors," but always in the sense of the definition given in that statute. Thus in the 26th section of the same statute of 1784, it is enacted, "that if any retailer shall keep a disorderly house," etc., the court "may suppress such retailer." By the 27th section, "that every licensed retailer shall sell only by sealed measures;" "and it shall be lawful for any justice or constable, on complaint, to enter into the house of any retailer," etc. By the 30th section, "that any person not having before had a license to retail, may, at any other than the August court, have license granted," etc. By the 31st section, "that every person applying for a license to retail, shall, at the time of granting the same, enter into recognizance," etc. By the act of 1799, c. 80, § 4, the state's agent is authorized to superintend the collection of all moneys due for "forfeited recognizances, ordinary retailers, and marriage licenses." By the act of 1799, c. 85, § 2, it is enacted, "that the mayor's court of the corporation of Georgetown, shall have the sole and exclusive power of granting ordinary and retailer's licenses within the jurisdiction of the corporation." Such being the exclusive use of the word, "retailers," in Maryland, and in this county, congress, in 1802, granted a charter to the city of Washington, in which, among other powers, they gave the corporation the power "to pass by-laws and ordinances, to provide for licensing and regulating auctions, retailers of liquors, hackney-carriages, wagons, carts and drays, and pawnbrokers within the city." This charter did not give the corporation power to license ordinary-keepers. In February, 1804, the corporation obtained an amendment of the charter, enlarging their powers, and, among others, giving them power "to license and regulate, exclusively, hackney-coaches, ordinary-keepers, retailers and ferries." Under this amended charter, the corporation passed a by-law on the 19th of July, 1804, entitled, "An act requiring annual licenses to be taken by ordinary or tavern keepers, retailers, and hawkers and peddlers." By the 3d section of this by-law it is enacted, "that all retailers of wines or spirituous liquors, other than tavern-keepers, who shall sell the same in smaller quantities than ten gallons, shall take out an annual license therefor, and for which license they shall pay, for the use of the city, the sum of eight dollars, which license shall authorize the selling of any such quantity, not less than one pint; and provided the same is not drank in the house or store of the person having such license." By the 4th section, it is enacted, that every person, so obtaining a retail license, shall give bond, etc. Here the corporation, in the title of the by-law, have used the word, "retailers," as it was used in their new charter, without the words, "of liquors," which was annexed to it in the charter of 1802; and in the body of the by-law they show what they mean by the word, "retailers," namely, those, other than tavern-keepers, who sell wines or spirituous liquors in smaller quantities than ten gallons, and not less than one pint; which is substantially the same definition as that given in the Maryland statute of 1784. And a license to do this the by-law calls "a retail license." The same by-law also authorizes a license for selling liquors in any house, other than a tavern, in smaller quantities than a pint. This is not, in the by-law, called retailing, nor the license a retail license; the word, "retailing," having acquired a technical meaning under the Maryland statute which had appropriaed it to the selling of liquors under ten gallons. This license to sell less than a pint was vulgarly called a license to sell by the small.

In the by-law of October 30, 1810, § 5, it is enacted "that all licenses for hackney-carriages, theatrical, and other public amusements; to ordinary or tavern keepers, retailers, and hawkers, peddlers and auctioneers, shall be paid for and issued, and the taxes on slaves of non-residents, and on dogs, shall be paid and entered as heretofore directed by the several acts respecting the said objects." Here again, the word, "retailers," is applicable only to retailers of wines and other liquors; for no license had ever been granted to any other description of retailers. This was six years after the power given to the corporation to license and regulate "retailers." There is no expression in the by-law limiting it to retailers of liquors. If the corporation had solicited the amendment of the charter, striking out the words, "of liquors," appended to the word "retailers," in the first charter, in order that they might license and regulate retailers of all sorts of merchandise; or if they had supposed that the omission of those words, in the amended charter, had given them that power, it is not to be believed that they would have omitted to exercise it for a period of twenty-two years, namely, from 1804 to 1826, when, for the first time, on the 7th of November, they passed a by-law by the first section of which the mayor is authorized "to issue licenses for the purposes following, on the terms and conditions hereinafter mentioned, to wit: Porter-cellar licenses, to keep a porter-cellar or house to sell in, or barter, porter, ale, strong beer, and cider, and to carry and deliver or sell the same in bottles in this city, on the payment of a tax for each license, at the rate of fifteen dollars per annum; and that any person or persons taking out a license for selling spirituous liquors in quantities not less than a pint, be permitted to sell porter, ale, beer, and cider, by paying annually for a license, in addition to the former license, five dollars, and to sell by wholesale or retail the following descriptions of goods other than the manufacture of the United States; as dry goods, hardware, groceries, wines, liquors, medicines, perfumery, jewelry and watches, a tax for each license at the rate of ten dollars per annum." By the grammatical construction of this section, I should suppose that no license to sell dry goods, hardware, etc., by wholesale or retail, could be granted to any but a person taking out a license for selling spirituous liquors in quantities not less than a pint. But it is probable that the person who drew the bill, intended to authorize separate licenses to be granted for the sale of each of the specified kinds of goods. If so, this was the first attempt to require license for the sale of anything but liquors by a resident of the city. There had been a by-law passed on the 24th of May, 1823, requiring non-residents to obtain license to sell any goods, wares, or merchandise. It may be observed that the by-law of the 7th of November, 1826, imposes no penalty for selling the enumerated articles or any of them, without license; but on the 12th day of December, following, that defect was intended to be remedied by a by-law, enacting, "that if any retailer, or retailers of liquors, or sellers" (not retailers,) "of goods of foreign fabric, as described in the act to which this is a supplement, shall, after the 15th day of the present month of December, carry on the business of a retailer, or seller, as aforesaid, without license as aforesaid, he, she, or they, shall, on conviction of so retailing, or selling, after the said 15th day of December, without such license or licenses, forfeit and pay for each day they may so sell, the sum of twenty dollars." Here it may also be observed that the words, "retailer," and "seller," are used in contradistinction to each other. The word, "retailer," retains its original technical meaning, and is applicable only to retailers of liquors; and the word, "seller," to the seller of foreign fabrics. It is evident also that the by-law of November 7, 1826, so far as it requires a license to sell foreign fabrics, was not framed under the power given by the charter to the corporation, to license, tax, and regulate retailers, for it expressly includes those who should sell by wholesale; and the sellers of such fabrics are nowhere called retailers; nor could a power to license and tax retailers, in the most extensive sense of the word, authorize the corporation to license and tax wholesale dealers.

The by-law of the 28th of July, 1831, "to provide a revenue for the canal fund," declares that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell lumber, firewood, or coal, bricks, porter, ale, or beer, or to keep a livery-stable, or to traffic in slaves, within the limits of the corporation, without first obtaining a license therefor on which certain taxes are imposed. No one can suppose that this by-law is justified by the power to license and tax retailers. No other by-law was passed upon this subject until that of October 28, 1831, which is the by-law upon which this prosecution is founded. It is an act, entitled, "An act providing additional revenues for the corporation," and in the 1st section enacts, "that the taxes on certain licenses hereinafter named, shall be, and the same are hereby increased or fixed at the following rates per annum: For a license to keep a tavern," etc., "of forty rooms, one hundred dollars," etc. "On each license to sell or barter all kinds and quantities of spirituous liquors, wines, cordials, strong beer, and cider, sixty dollars. On each license to retail spirituous liquors and wines, in quantities not less than a pint, and to sell groceries, hardware, dry goods, and china, glass, and crockery ware, twenty dollars. On each license to sell hardware, medicines, perfumery, jewelry and watches, twenty dollars. For a license to keep a confectioner's shop, ten dollars. For a license to keep a confectioner's shop, with privilege to sell cordials, fermented and distilled liquors, sixty dollars. On each license to keep a porter-cellar, etc., twenty dollars. For a license to a non-resident to sell porter," etc., in the city, "fifty dollars. For a license to sell hats, boots and shoes, not manufactured in the city of Washington, twenty-five dollars; and for a license to sell the same, or either of them, in addition to any other license, ten dollars." And by the 3d section it is enacted, "that if any person or persons shall sell, barter, or keep, as in the first section of this act enumerated, without first obtaining a license therefor, he, she, or they, shall forfeit and pay, for each and every offence, a fine, of not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars, to be recovered and disposed of as are other fines for violations of the laws of this corporation." This by law, so far as it may seem to require a license to sell groceries, hardware, hats, boots, etc., does not appear to have been framed under the charter-power, to license, tax, and regulate "retailers;" for it uses the word, "retail," only once, and then only in reference to the sale of spirituous liquors and wines in quantities not less than a pint; and it requires a license to sell all these articles by wholesale.

From a consideration of the whole course of legislation upon this subject, from the year 1784, by the state of Maryland, by congress, and by the corporation of Washington, up to the present time, it seems to me very clear, that the word, "retailer," as used in the laws of Maryland, in the charter of Washington, and in the by-laws of the corporation, means, exclusively, a retailer of liquors, and has been so understood universally. But if it were not so, the defendant in this prosecution is not charged with retailing, nor with being a retailer of perfumery. He is simply charged with selling; and it does not appear that he did not sell by wholesale, in which case he cannot be punished under a power to punish retailers. Upon these grounds, I am clearly of opinion, that the power, given by the charter, to license, tax, and regulate retailers, does not authorize the corporation to license, tax, and regulate the sellers of other articles of merchandise than wine, rum, brandy, whiskey, or other distilled spirituous liquors, strong beer, or cider, or other intoxicating liquors. That under the power "to lay and collect taxes upon the real and personal property within the city;" or the power "to lay taxes on particular wards, parts, or sections of the city, for their particular local improvements;" or the power "to establish and erect hospitals or pest-houses, watch, and work houses, houses of corrrection, penitentiary, and other public buildings, and to lay and collect taxes for the expense thereof; the corporation has no authority to require, from any person, a license to use any lawful and harmless trade, calling or occupation. Whenever the corporation is expressly authorized by the charter to grant a license, it has a discretion to withhold it; but it has no authority to restrain or prohibit any person from the full exercise of all his rights, under the general law of the land, unless the power so to restrain or prohibit is expressly given by the charter, or necessarily results from some given express power. This is a rule applicable to all corporations acting under a charter; and to all bodies politic acting under a constitution. The powers not given are reserved. Although free colored persons have not the same political rights which are enjoyed by free white persons, yet they have the same civil rights, except so far as they are abridged by the general law of the land. Among those civil rights, is the right to exercise any lawful and harmless trade, business, or occupation; and if it be not a trade, business, or occupation, subjected by the charter to the control or discretion of the corporation, I think they have no power to prohibit them from using it.

CARGO, ETC.

[Note. Cases cited under this title will be found arranged in alphabetical order under the names of the vessels.]

Case No. 2,405.

CARGO OF BRIMSTONE.

District Court, E. D. New York. Feb., 1875.

FREIGHT—DELIVERY—LIEN.

A vessel brought a cargo of brimstone from Palermo to New York under a charter which contained no clause binding the goods to the ship and the ship to the goods. On arrival at New York, the cargo was delivered unconditionally, and without any understanding that it should be subject to a lien for the charter-money. But, after such delivery, the owners of the ship filed a libel against the cargo to recover the amount of the charter-money, for which they claimed to have a lien enforceable against the cargo. Held, that the lien of the vessel on the cargo for her freight was lost by the delivery and could not be enforced.

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty.

Thomas E. Stillman, for libellant.

R. D. Benedict and H. T. Wing, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action by Gaspar Monte, owner of the bark Castillo, to enforce a lien upon the cargo of the bark for freight alleged to have been earned under a charter party, made at Palermo, on the 7th day of October, A. D. 1870. The terms of the charter party are not in dispute, and it is admitted that it contains no clause binding the ship to the goods and the goods to the ship for the due performance of the contract. The fact is also undisputed that the cargo here proceeded against was transported in the vessel. But the libellant's right to recover is disputed upon two grounds: First, that, if freight be same due, the lien therefor has been lost by an unqualified delivery of the cargo, without any indication of an intention to claim a lien for freight. Second, that by reason of a failure to perform the stipulations of the charter in respect to the time when the vessel should be ready to receive the cargo, the charterers sustained damages exceeding the freight, which they have the right to set off by way of recoupment against the claim for freight. It is only necessary to consider the first named ground of defense, for the testimony brings the case within the ruling of the supreme court in the case of The Bags of Linseed, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 108. As in that case, so here, the cargo was delivered without any condition or qualification.

There is no evidence of any understanding, or of any local usage of the port from which an understanding can be inferred, that the cargo was delivered subject to freight. In accordance with the ruling of the supreme court, it must accordingly be held that any lien which the libellant may have had for his freight has been lost by unqualified delivery of the cargo. Let the libel be dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. The lien of a carrier for freight arises from the right to retain possession until the freight is paid, and is lost by an unconditional delivery. Sears v. Wills, 1 Black (66 U. CARGO OF SALT.

[4 Blatchf. 224;[1] 40 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 457.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 2, 1858.

CHARTER PARTY—AUTHORITY OF AGENT TO CHANGE—FREIGHT—DEMURRAGE.

1. Where a charter-party for a voyage from New York to Gibraltar and Malaga and back, provided for the carrying of any lawful cargo, and for the payment of one-half of the freight on the discharge of the outward cargo, and of the other half on the discharge of the homeward cargo, and, there being no fruit to load with at Malaga, the vessel took a homeward cargo of salt at Gibraltar, under an arrangement made between the master and the agent of the charterers, at Malaga, that the salt should be discharged at New York in three days' time, the usual time for discharging a cargo of fruit: Held, that the agent at Malaga had no power to change the terms and condition of the charter-party.

2. Held, also, that, as the charter-party contained no provision as to the discharge of the homeward cargo other than that dispatch should be used, and as the usual time for unloading a cargo of salt at New York was fifteen days, Sundays and rainy days excepted, no right of action for the homeward freight, and no claim for demurrage of the vessel, could exist till the expiration of the fifteen days.

[3. Cited in Fourteen Horses, etc., Case No. 4,990, to the point that freight is not due until the discharge of the cargo, for until such discharge the voyage is not completed, nor is the ship's contract fully performed.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

In admiralty. This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, by [Freeman and others] the owners of a vessel, against her cargo of salt, to recover freight and demurrage, on its shipment from Gibraltar to New York, under a charter-party. The charter-party was entered into for a voyage from the port of New York to Gibraltar, or from New York to Gibraltar and Malaga, and back, and the owners engaged "to take and receive on board the said vessel, during the aforesaid voyage, all such lawful goods and merchandize as the said parties of the second part, or their agent, may think proper to ship." Twenty-six hundred dollars freight were to be paid if Gibraltar only was used, and twenty-seven hundred if Malaga was used; one-half to be paid upon the discharge of the outward cargo, and the other half upon the discharge of the homeward cargo. Part of the outward cargo was discharged at Gibraltar, and part at Malaga. No home cargo could be procured at Malaga, and the vessel returned to Gibraltar, and was loaded with a cargo of salt. Malaga is some 50 miles from Gibraltar. The freight on the outward cargo, according to the charter-party, was paid, and the only questions in the case were in respect to the freight at the home port, and a claim for demurrage, a dispute having arisen about the time consumed in discharging the cargo. The district court decreed for the claimants, and the libellants appealed to this court.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It is quite apparent, on looking into the case, that this controversy has grown out of a misapprehension, on the part of the owners, of the import and effect of the charter-party, and that, had it not been for this, no difficulty would have existed in adjusting amicably all matters between the parties, connected with the charter of the vessel. The owners have assumed, from a letter of instructions to the master of the vessel by the charterers, in which a premium is offered if he should arrive in the port of New York with the first fruit, that the charter was a fruit-charter, and that the cargo of salt was substituted by an agreement with the agent of the charterers at Malaga, there being no fruit there with which to load the vessel. The master testified to this arrangement, and that it was agreed that the cargo of salt should be discharged at the port of delivery within the same time within which a cargo of fruit could be, namely, some three days. Hence, on the arrival of the vessel here, the owners claimed that the cargo should be discharged within that time. This was refused by the charterers, they claiming that the charter-party provided for the shipment of any lawful goods, and that they were entitled to the usual and customary time for unloading a cargo of salt, which was fifteen days for a cargo of the present bulk, Sundays and rainy days excepted. The owners proposed a compromise of ten days, which was refused. This dispute occasioned some delay in the vessel's reaching the dock for the discharge of her cargo. She reached the dock, however, in a few days after her arrival in port, and commenced the discharge, the purchaser receiving the salt in lighters and carts, and continued discharging until, as claimed, more than the ten days had expired, when a bill for demurrage of the vessel was presented to the consignees, and payment demanded, which was refused; and thereupon the owners libelled the remaining portion of the cargo for freight and demurrage.

Now, I consider it quite clear that the charterers were not restricted to any kind of cargo; and, also, that the agent at Malaga had no power to change the terms and conditions of the charter-party; and, further, that, according to its terms, the ship was bound to bring back a cargo from either Gibraltar or Malaga, if tendered by the charterers, or their agent; and, hence, that the claim to have the cargo of salt discharged within the time customary for the discharge of a cargo of fruit, was not well founded. According to the charter-party, the home cargo was to be delivered in no other way than "dispatch to be used;" and the better opinion seems to be, upon the proofs, that these terms refer to custom house time, which is fifteen days, Sundays and rainy days excepted. When, therefore, this suit was commenced, this time not having expired, no right of action existed for the balance of the freight, that not being due, by the terms of the charter-party, till the discharge of the cargo at the home port; and there was no ground for a claim for demurrage. I agree that the master had a lien upon the cargo for the balance of the freight, and might have retained enough of it to satisfy the payment; but no right of action to recover it accrued till the owner had fulfilled his part of the contract, namely, the delivery of the goods. CARLETON v. DAVIS.

District Court, D. Maine. April 4, 1844.

PUNISHMENT OF SEAMAN—ACTION BY, FOR ASSAULT—NECESSARY PROOF.

1. The master of a vessel has a right, in cases of necessity, to correct a negligent, disobedient, or mutinous seaman, by corporal punishment. But the punishment must be reasonable, and not inflicted with unlawful instruments.

[Cited in U. S. v. Harriman, Case No. 15,311.]

2. When a seaman prosecutes the master for an assault, and it is proved that he has been guilty of a fault which would justify some punishment, to entitle himself to damages he must show that the punishment was excessive in degree, or unlawful in its kind.

In admiralty. This was a libel for what is technically called, in the admiralty, a cause of damage. The libellant [Thomas Carleton] alleged that he shipped on board the brig Androscoggin, at Baltimore, as cook and steward, in March last, for a voyage to Portland, and that during the whole voyage he faithfully performed his duty; and that on the 17th of March, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock at night, all hands being called on deck, as soon as he heard the call he dressed himself and went up; that when he went on deck he was seized by the captain [William V. Davis], who struck him over the head with a large piece of wood, called a belaying pin, severely wounding him and causing the blood to flow profusely from the wounds; that after striking him about a dozen blows, he called the mate and told him to kill him, the libellant, and throw him overboard; that he then again assaulted the libellant with a rope, giving him, over the head and face, a large number of blows, severely injuring him, and he prays the court to pronounce for the damages he had sustained. The answer denies that the libellant did his duty as a faithful seaman, but avers, on the contrary, that he was negligent, disobedient, and insolent; it denies that the master struck him with a piece of wood, but admits that he did strike him several times with a small rope, and pleads a justification that the libellant refused to do his duty and made the first assault on the master.

Mr. Fox, for libellant.
Mr. Howard, for the master.

WARE, District Judge. The libel, in this case, states a grave and serious injury, and from the marks still remaining on the person of the libellant, it is evident that he actually received in the melee, one or more pretty severe wounds. If they were inflicted in the manner stated in the libel, and with the instrument that has been produced and exhibited in court, it is a case undoubtedly that not only calls for damages, but for exemplary damages. For the instrument is one that, in the hands of a vigorous man, with the exertion of even less than his whole strength, might well effect not only a severe but a fatal injury. Now, admitting the doctrine of the law, as claimed by the counsel for the respondent, that the master has the legal authority to correct and chastise a refractory, disobedient, and mutinous seaman, it is to be recollected that the law has imposed two important restrictions on this right; first, that it must be reasonable and moderate in degree, and secondly, that the punishment shall not be administered with unlawful instruments. Now, it will readily be admitted that a billet of wood eighteen inches long, and nearly as large as a man's arm, is not a proper instrument to be used in punishing a seaman. Nothing short of some personal danger to himself, from the violence of a man, could justify the master in assaulting a seaman with a deadly instrument, and such this undoubtedly would be in the hands of a man of ordinary strength. If, therefore, I was satisfied by the testimony, that the master actually assaulted the libellant with this belaying-pin, which has been brought into court, I should feel no hesitation in giving damages on this ground alone, although the same evidence might show that the seaman was in fault and deserved some correction. For I hold it a wholesome rule to be insisted upon and to be firmly upheld, that the master shall not, in punishing his men, though they may be in fault, use instruments of correction which endanger life or limb, and may produce fatal effects.

The difficulty, in this case, is in ascertaining from the evidence whether this billet of wood was used or not. It is charged by the libel, and denied by the answer. But, as no person was in sight when the affray took place, the case is left, on the conflicting allegations of the parties, each probably, as is usual in such cases, a quick witness in his own favor, very much to the conjecture of the court. Only two witnesses have been examined who could give any account of the affair, one called by the libellant and one by the respondent, and the night being very dark, neitner of them was in a position to see what took place, and from the loud whistling of the wind through the rigging, neither of them near enough to hear but very imperfectly what was said. Antonio Cook, one of the hands, was at the mainmast head, nearly over the spot where the affair took place. He says that the first he heard was the master asking Dunning, the mate, whether the cook had got on deck, and then he sung out for some one to take the helm. The next thing he heard was a number of blows, as of some one striking a man with a piece of iron or stick of wood, and he heard the captain say, 'Take that and go forward.' He heard a number of blows, and the words, 'Go forward to your duty,' several times repeated. He soon after heard Dunning sing out, 'Let go,' and immediately after heard the captain say, 'Kill him and throw him overboard.' The master, he says, spoke very loud, but he did not hear the cook's voice. Dunning, the mate, who was called by the master, says that when all hands were called, he came up and went forward to take in the sails, and that about twenty minutes or half an hour after, the captain called to him and asked whether the cook was on deck, and he answered that he was not. He then called him and again went forward to complete the taking in of the sails. About fifteen minutes after, he heard a scuffle in the after part of the ship, and heard the captain say, 'Go forward to your duty.' He then went aft and found the cook holding the captain pushed backward over a spar by the companion-way. The master called out to him to take him off. He then spoke to the cook and told him to let the captain go, and he not minding, he took hold of him, and, after pulling him three or four times, succeeded in breaking his hold. After he had taken him off, and turned to go forward again to duty, the cook went at the captain a second time, saying, 'Put it on, I want you to flog me,' and seized the master again. The mate again returned and pulled the cook off and threw him down over some hewed timber. The cook then went forward to his duty. and continued to do duty for the remainder of the voyage. This is the material part of the testimony, for though one more witness was examined, he added nothing that materially varied the case. The mate did not observe at the time that the libellant had received any material injury, and he heard no complaint from him. The testimony of Cook, connected with the fact that a severe injury was certainly inflicted on the libellant, if it stood alone and unaffected by any other evidence in the case, would certainly go far to convince one that a rude and violent attack was made upon the libellant by the master. He was not, it is true, in a situation to see the parties, or to hear but imperfectly what was said. But he heard the scuffle and blows given, and heard the captain's voice loud above the wind, telling him to take that and go forward; and the libellant came out of the scuffle a wounded man. But then it is clear that the witness did not hear the whole. He heard nothing until the quarrel became loud and violent, and the beginning of it escaped him. Although, on the whole, the court might be inclined to believe on this evidence alone, that an unjustifiable assault was made by the master, yet it would be a conclusion to which one would come from an imperfect account of the whole affair, and, of course, a conclusion upon which the mind could not rest with entire satisfaction. But then we have the testimony of Dunning, the mate, also, to a part of the affair, which, although not necessarily in contradiction to that of Cook, gives to the case, on the whole, quite a different aspect. Dunning came to the parties while they were engaged in the scuffle, and the libellant then had the master down, and it was with considerable difficulty he succeeded in pulling him off. But it does not necessarily follow that the one who has the better of a fight at the close, is the one who provoked and began it; nor is it to be easily believed that a seaman, without some strong exciting cause, would commence an assault on the master. I do not recollect a single instance, among all the assaults and batteries that have come before me, and they have been pretty numerous, where a seaman gave the master the first blow; nor do I now remember a case where he returned the blow. Indeed, it must be a very peculiar case in which a seaman could be justified in returning a blow. The marine law is very strict on this subject. 'The mariner,' says the Consulate of the Sea, 'is bound to bear with the master if he reproves him in injurious language, and if he makes an assault upon him, he ought to fly to the prow and put himself on the side of the chains, if the master passes them he ought to fly to the other side, and if the master pursues him there, he may call witnesses and stand upon his defense.' Chapter 165. Waiving the minute and studiously exact directions contained in this article of the Consulate, in its general spirit and object it constitutes the maritime law of the present day, and is confirmed by all the most authoritative expositions of the law. Jugemens d'Oleron, art. 12; Cleirac, p. 48; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 26; Ord. de la Marine, liv. 2, tit. 7; Valin, Comm. p. 553; Emerigon, Traité des Assurances, c. 12, § 6.

It is only in very extreme cases that a seaman can be justified in turning upon the master and resisting him with force, and when he can protect himself from a dangerous assault in no other way. Nothing could be more pernicious to the police of the sea, than to admit that a seaman might, as a general rule, resist the master by force, even when inflicting undeserved punishment. It would be sure to lead to numerous scenes of violence and insubordination, and endanger all authority. The duty of a seaman, in such case, is to submit to wrong. The nature of the master's authority, which is of a quasi parental character, and the necessities of the service imperiously require it. On his return to port, he may appeal to the law for redress, and the master will be held to strict responsibility for any abuse of his authority. If he does not do this, but takes jurisdiction of his own wrongs, and seeks redress from his own hands, the courts will be slow in entertaining his complaint, and taking jurisdiction of an appeal from a wager of battle, even if originally he had just grounds of complaint. He may be in danger of impairing a good cause of action by matter ex post facto. Unfortunately, in this case, we get from the testimony but a mutilated account of detached parts of the affair, and have no account of the circumstances with which it commenced. In the absence of proof, the court cannot let itself loose into speculations on probabilities. And the complainant who asks for the interposition of the court, must make out his case. However well founded the cause of the complaint may be, if it cannot be proved, he can have no decree in his favor, for the decree must follow the allegations and the proofs. This is an infirmity that belongs to all the administration of human justice. In jurisprudence, a fact that cannot be proved is the same as a fact that does not exist. Mere probability, founded on general presumptions, however they may incline the private judgment of the man, cannot amount to that judicial proof that is required to satisfy the magistrate. It is a remark of the most profound of all the commentators of the Roman law: Quae non est plena veritas est plena falsitas, non semiveritas. Sic quae non est plena probatio plane nulla probatio est. Cujas,—cited Toull. Droit Civil, vol. 8, No. 8. And this rule, when applied to the whole merits, is certainly sound, however questionable it may be in its application to the doctrine of semi-proofs, admitted in the jurisprudence of some of the continental nations of Europe. Now, though it is sufficiently apparent that the libellant received a pretty severe wound in the scuffle, it does not appear how the wound was made. It might have been by a blow of the captain with a billet of wood, or it might have been received in the fall, when he was thrown down by the mate. But then whatever punishment may have been inflicted by the master, it was preceded by a gross fault on the part of the libellant. When called to duty, in a time of great peril, he had not answered the call, and when called a second time he came tardily. In such a case, some haste and impatience on the part of the master might well be pardoned; and if, in reproving a tardy and unwilling man, there was something of an overcharged manner, and even if the reproof was accompanied with moderate personal chastisement to hasten the movement of a loiterer, a maritime court would certainly feel inclined to look upon it with indulgence. Such is not the time, as has been well observed, when we are to look for gentleness of manner and a measured caution in the appliances resorted to for the purpose of enforcing quick obedience. The necessities of the service demand the greatest promptitude, and the punishment of the moment may be indispensable to hasten a dilatory and unwilling seaman. 1 Boulay Paty, Droit Maritime, tit. 4, "Prolegomenes," p. 374.

Where a seaman complains against the master for an assault, and it is proved that he has been guilty of misconduct which would justify some punishment, he cannot entitle himself to a decree but by showing that the punishment was excessive in degree, or unjustifiable in kind. The master has a right to correct the disobedience of a seaman by corporal punishment, in cases where the necessities of the service call for it, and, though it should be sparingly resorted to, a court will not hold the master amenable, if he does not pass the limit of a reasonable and moderate discretion. However the truth of the fact may have been, the libellant has failed to prove that this limit has been passed.

But there is another fact proved that places the libellant in a very unfavorable light, and that is the insolent and mutinous manner in which he turned upon the master after he was first torn from him by the mate. It is in proof, that the master was at the time in a feeble condition from ill health, and the libellant had already ascertained by trial his own superiority of strength. Now this violent and criminal attack would go far, in the judgment of a maritime court, which is always disposed to uphold the just authority of the master with a steady hand, to impair a good cause of complaint. It exhibits him in the light of a man of unchastened and ungovernable passion. It also throws back some light on the obscurity of the preceding part of the affair, and justifies a suspicion at least, that he was not backward to engage in the fight in the first instance.

I pass over without remark the supposed acknowledgments of the libellant, after his arrival in this port, of the general good treatment he had experienced from the master. Seamen are often artfully surprised into such acknowledgments by the friends of the master, when it is apprehended that some controversy may arise, for the express purpose of using them in evidence. They are always a suspected kind of evidence, and are usually entitled to very little consideration. Libel dismissed.

COLLISION—STEAM AND SAIL—LOOKOUT—SPEED OF STEAMER.

[A schooner while ascending the Elizabeth River, Va., close hauled on the starboard tack, at the rate of four knots an hour, out of the channel, on the easterly side, near the shoals, the wind south and the night dark, was run down by a descending steamer, proceeding at the rate of six knots an hour. When three or four miles apart, the schooner showed a light, which she kept hoisted until the collision. Those on the steamer saw the light, but lost sight of it, and thinking it on the western shore, ported the steamer's helm until the light was again seen, at which time the vessels were about a mile apart. Held, that the steamer was in fault for failing to keep a proper lookout or to slacken her speed or come to anchor after ascertaining the schooner's true position.]

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice.

The libel in this case was filed against the Roanoke to recover damages for a collision happening on the Elizabeth river, in the state of Virginia, on the night of the 17th of October, 1852, by which the schooner Sprightling Sea was run down and sunk. The schooner was ascending the river, close hauled on her starboard tack, on the easterly side, at the rate of some four knots an hour, out of the channel, and close to the shoals. The wind was south; the night dark. The steamer was descending the river with her three lights burning, at the rate of some six knots the hour, and was discerned by those on board the schooner three or four miles off. On discovering her, a hand was ordered to show a light, which was done by hoisting a lantern on the forward part of the schooner, and was held there until the collision. The steamer saw the light for a few moments and lost sight of it; but, as the hands on board of her concur in stating, saw it over the larboard side of the vessel, and on the western shore of the river, and in order to avoid any danger, ported helm, and sheered nearer to the eastern. Soon after this the light was again seen, but too late to avoid the collision. The misfortune was doubtless owing to a mistake of the hands on the steamer as to the position of this light. Instead of being on the western it was on the eastern side of the river. All the hands on the schooner concur in this, and they cannot be mistaken; the vessel had not changed her course from the time the light was exhibited, and she had been running this course some time before.

The only doubt in the case is whether or not the light was exhibited early enough to warn the steamer of her danger. The night was dark, and in the absence of any light on the schooner, there would be great difficulty in charging the steamer with fault. The joint speed of the two vessels was some ten miles the hour,—a mile in six minutes. The shortest time stated by any witness on the schooner, between the showing of the light and the collision, was five or six minutes. The steamer, then, must have been about a mile distant from the schooner, and if a vigilant lookout had been kept, afforded sufficient time to have avoided her. But a stronger ground is that the steamer saw the light early enough to have taken the proper precaution. And although she lost sight of it, she was admonished that a vessel was approaching in an opposite direction; and, considering the darkness of the night, she should have slackened speed, or come to anchor until she ascertained her course or position. It is true she saw the light on the western side of the river, and took the proper steps to avoid any danger. But in this she was mistaken. The light was on the eastern side, and she must be held responsible for the error. Besides, considering the darkness of the night and the narrowness of the channel of the river navigable, she should have had a competent lookout stationed in the forward part of the vessel, whose sole business was to discern vessels approaching and give the earliest warning. It is more than probable that if this precaution had been taken the misfortune would not have occurred.

We think the decree of the court below right, and it should be affirmed.

ENJOINING PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT.

[The sale of mortgaged property under a decree of foreclosure in a state court of concurrent jurisdiction will not be enjoined by a federal court at the instance of prior mortgagees who were not made parties to the proceedings in the state court.]

[In equity. Bill by George Carlisle and others, trustees, to enjoin a sale of mortgaged property directed by a decree of the state court.]

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This bill is filed by George Carlisle, as trustee, who, with others, represents that under the law of Indiana of 1847 and 1848, the Newcastle and Richmond Railroad Company had power to negotiate loans, contract debts, and give liens on all property and effects of the company, and by a subsequent act of Jan., 1851, the company was authorized to borrow money, and issue bonds therefor, and to secure the payment thereof; to mortgage the road, income, and other property of the company, etc. That under the above and other acts of the legislature, the following mortgages were executed: (1) The Newcastle and Richmond R. R. Co., to Carlisle and Varnum, $300,000, on twenty-seven miles of the road, dated Feb. 7, 1852. (2) The Cincinnati, Logansport, and Chicago R. R. Co., to Carlisle, Hamilton and Riggs, 300,000 pounds sterling on the whole road, dated 1st April, 1853. (3) To Bundy and White, for $500,000, by the Cincinnati and Chicago R. R. On the 31st of August, 1854, the Cincinnati, Logansport and Chicago R. R. Company, by an act of the legislature of the state, consolidated with the Cincinnati and Chicago Railroad Company. In April, 1858, Geo. Carlisle filed a bill in this court, alleging that the interest had not been paid on the bonds, secured by the deed of trust to him, Riggs, and Hamilton, praying for a decree for the sale of the road and machinery, etc. In November, 1854, the consolidated company executed a deed of trust to Martin L. Bundy, conveying to him some real estate, and a number of locomotives and cars, for passengers and freight, as a security for the payment of certain debts, which the directors of the company had incurred to stock the road. The debts thus contracted by the company and others, to put the railroad in operation, are alleged to have amounted to eighty thousand dollars. And the trustee Bundy, on a failure to pay the debts as they fell due, by the company, was authorized to sell the property, specified in the deed of trust, "or so much thereof as shall become necessary to pay the debts provided for in the deed of trust."

It is averred that none of the property conveyed to Bundy was owned by the company when the deed of trust was executed to Carlisle, Riggs, and Hamilton. The cars embraced in the Bundy mortgage are alleged to have been in an unfinished state, and in the possession of the manufacturers, and had never been placed upon the road when this deed of trust was executed.

In August, 1857, Bundy commenced a suit in the Wayne circuit court of Indiana, for the purpose of recovering possession of the property conveyed to him by the deed of trust, and which, by the deed, was required to be sold, and this property, he alleged in his bill, to be in the possession of J. W. Wright & Company, who claimed it under a lease from the company, executed in October, 1857, some two years after the deed of trust to him. In this suit, Bundy did not claim a judgment against the railroad company, or against those who claimed the property as lessees, and who had possession of it; but he prayed for a decree that the possession of the property should be given to him, that he might proceed to sell, and apply the proceeds in payment of the debts specified in the deed of trust. J. W. Wright & Company admitted they had the possession of the property, and they set up numerous defences to the suit. But Carlisle, and the other trustees associated with him, were not made parties, and it is alleged that the only point before the Indiana court in that case, in regard to the property, was the right of Bundy under the deed of trust. In their opinion, the Wayne circuit court say this suit is brought by Martin L. Bundy, the trustee, to obtain a foreclosure and order of sale upon a trust mortgage against the Cincinnati and Chicago Railroad Company—the mortgagor and Wright and others, her lessees, having in possession and use the property covered by the trust mortgage. The railroad company made default. In the further progress of the case, the court say: "Subsequently the railroad company—Bundy being one of the directors—leased the trust property mortgaged to Wright and others for five years. Before the expiration of the five years, the claims of the creditors, the beneficiaries of the trust mortgage, became due, were not paid, and the trustees, for their benefit, obtained an order for the sale of the property. The lessees pleaded the act of the trustee in participating in the lease to them as an estoppel in pais of his right to foreclose and sell the property; and the court say, we do not think the estoppel arises upon the facts." And the court in conclusion, say, the "lessees had notice, by the record of the trust mortgage, of the extent of interest possessed by the respective parties, and of the liabilities to which they might be exposed of having the property taken from them, in the contingency that the secured creditors should not be otherwise paid, and should press the collection of their claims," etc. "The result," say the court, "at which we have arrived as to the validity of the plaintiff's claim, under the trust mortgage, renders it unnecessary that we should inquire into the validity of the lease to Wright and others." An elaborate opinion was pronounced in the supreme court, to which the above cause was appealed from the circuit court of Wayne county [Wright v. Bundy, 11 Ind. 398], and on a petition for a rehearing in the supreme court the case was again elaborately considered, and the rehearing was denied [Same v. Same, Id. 409].

The mortgage or deeds of trust were issued to Carlisle & Varnum in 1852, and in 1853 to Carlisle, Hamilton and Riggs. Those issued to Bundy and White, the date is not stated. But the first, second, and third mortgage also, it is presumed, were issued prior to the Bundy mortgage, which is called the fourth mortgage. This was dated in November, 1854. In August, 1857, suit was brought on the Bundy mortgage in the Wayne circuit court. The suit by Carlisle and others on the original trust bonds was commenced in April, 1858. From this it appears that the suit on the Bundy mortgage was brought in the Wayne circuit court of Indiana, some nine months before the commencement of Carlisle's suit in this court. From the record of the Wayne circuit court, there was no appearance by Carlisle or any one else in the Bundy case, except by Wright & Company, as the lessees of the railroad company. That the Wayne circuit court of Indiana is a court of general jurisdiction is admitted, and it appears the suit in that court was prosecuted to a final decision, and that Wright & Company took an appeal to the supreme court of the state, and that on the 25th December, 1858, a final decision was given affirming the decision of the Wayne circuit court [Wright v. Bundy, supra]; and that afterwards, on a petition for a rehearing, the case was again elaborately considered and the motion was overruled [Wright v. Bundy, supra]. And it further appears the validity of the Bundy mortgage was the turning point of the decision in that case, both in the circuit and supreme courts of the state.

There is no principle better settled than that when courts having concurrent jurisdiction, the one which first exercise jurisdiction by a service of notice has possession of the case, and may decide it. It is also a well-settled principle that no court which is not vested with an appellate power can modify or reverse a decision of a court, when jurisdiction has attached. These principles are not controverted, but admitted by the counsel in the case. It is also an admitted principle, that an individual or a corporate body, though interested in a suit, if not made a party, his rights remain unaffected by the procedure. There are cases where a court, having jurisdiction of the person, may coerce him to do certain things which justice requires, though not strictly within its jurisdiction; as where a conveyance of land may be required to be made out of the state, or where an individual acts in different capacities, as representing distinct interests. Bundy, it is alleged, acts as co-trustee with White of the third mortgage; and he is sole trustee of the fourth mortgage, is plaintiff in the Wayne circuit suit, is special commissioner of that court to sell, and is co-defendant with White in the Carlisle suit to foreclose, and in that capacity has answered and filed a cross bill; and that he is defendant in the Carlisle suit to foreclose in his capacity of trustee of the fourth mortgage. In answer to these facts, in regard to the fourth or Bundy mortgage, it is enough to say, that the suit on that instrument having been first commenced in the Wayne circuit court, which exercises a concurrent jurisdiction with this court, its decision must stand on all matters properly adjudicated, unless reviewed and reversed by the appellate court of the state. It is true, in his supplemental bill, Carlisle alleges that Bundy is about to take possession of and sell the machinery embraced in the deed of trust to him; and the same machinery is covered by the deed of trust to Riggs, Hamilton and himself, and that the sale of the property would be an irreparable injury to the road. The decree in the supreme court of Indiana in favor of Bundy is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and requires him, under the deed of trust, to sell the property, and pay the debts specified. We are bound by this decree, and it is difficult to perceive how we can in any manner interfere by an injunction without a direct conflict with the Indiana court. An injunction which shall not restrain the action of that court, will answer no purpose. It is said we may act upon the person of Bundy without interfering with the Indiana court. How this can be done is not perceived. If we say that Bundy shall not sell, and nothing short of that will effect the purpose, we nullify the action of that court. We say that he shall not do the thing which the supreme court of Indiana have commanded him to do.

If judgment at common law had been rendered for money, this court might have protected any property on which there was a prior and specific lien, from execution. But when the decree is entered for the sale of specific property, it remains in the custody of the court, and it cannot be reached by an injunction, or other proceeding, except by a court having an appellate power.

It is said that the question between Carlisle and Bundy, now pending before this court, was never directly or indirectly passed upon by the Wayne circuit court; that it is a new case, and between different parties; and that it is not proposed to disturb a single question settled by that court. And it is alleged that the relative rights of Carlisle and Bundy were not determined by the supreme court of Indiana, and could not be, as Carlisle was not a party in that suit. It must be admitted that the bill filed by Carlisle, and those associated with him, was filed in this court, primarily against the Cincinnati and Chicago Railroad Company, to enforce the payment of interest which had become due and was not paid, and, if need be, to foreclose the mortgage on the road and sell it, including its entire property; and that Carlisle filed a supplemental bill subsequently, in reference to the mortgage set up by Bundy, alleging it to be fraudulent and void. It is not denied that this Bundy mortgage purports to cover the entire property which was brought before the Wayne circuit court of Indiana, and was appealed to the supreme court of the state, which affirmed the decree of the inferior court. And the property embraced in the mortgage was ordered to be sold, by the final decree of the supreme court. And it seems to be admitted that, under the mortgage, the property will not sell for the amount of the indebtment claimed. That a subsequent incumbrancer may be made a party to a suit on a prior mortgage, may be admitted. But the question made is whether a subsequent incumbrancer, as in the case of Bundy, on a mortgage of personal property, in which the items are enumerated, and directed to be sold, by the decree of a state court, can be enjoined by a federal court. I cannot perceive how this can be done. Under the same jurisdiction, there could be no difficulty in staying the proceedings. But by this court no step can be taken which would not bring it directly in conflict with the state court. To issue an injunction against the person of Bundy, without interfering with the decision of the supreme court of Indiana, is impossible. The decree is the final action of that court, through Bundy, its trustee; and should he attempt to prevent or defeat the purposes of the decree, he would be liable to be attached and punished by the state court, and there is no power in this court to protect him. We claim only a concurrent jurisdiction with the state court; and in this case the jurisdiction of the state court attached before Carlisle filed his bill in this court. If, as above remarked, a judgment at law had been entered against the railroad company, and an execution under that judgment had been levied, and property mortgaged, the lien might be asserted in this court. But this would not call in question the validity of the decree of that court, as the levy, being the act of the officer, might be enjoined. But Carlisle, not being made a party in the act of the state court, cannot be materially affected by that decision. If he have prior liens to the Bundy mortgage, they may be enforced against the specific property, into whatsoever hands it may come. There could be no doubt as to the notice from the recorded mortgages, and the suits in this and the state courts.

In the case of Coe v. Hart [Case No. 2,942] this court held, where several passengers and other cars had been constructed and delivered to the railroad company, that the lien on subsequently acquired property attached, under the mortgage; and, again, where a bridge was constructed over the Muskingum, at Zanesville, on the Wilmington road, it was held that the constructor of the bridge might refuse to deliver the bridge to the railroad company, unless security was given on it for the balance due, and that a mortgage so given was valid. This ruling was not founded on a mechanic's lien, or any statutory provision, but on the principle of the common law that the constructor of a bridge, a locomotive, passenger cars, or any other structure for the road, there being no special contract for the payment of the work, the constructor may refuse to deliver it to the railroad company, until it shall be paid for, or the payment satisfactorily secured. But where no special lien is given on the work, and it is delivered to the railroad, the constructor can only be considered as a general creditor of the company I know no other principle on which proper protection can be afforded to these great improvements, which have added a hundred per centum or more to the general products of our country, and to the commercial facilities afforded by them. When a sale of the road shall be indispensable, it should take place under such circumstances as to enable a court to adjust the equities between the respective parties. Mr. Carlisle may stand upon his liens, or he may, at his option, investigate the merits of the Bundy mortgage in the state court. The prayer for an injunction is refused.

CARLISLE v. DAVIS et al.

[9 Ben. 18.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 1877.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE—FAILURE TO RENEW—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGOR'S ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY.

As against a chattel mortgage, the assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor cannot be heard to claim that the mortgage is invalid because it was not renewed under the statute of New York in regard to renewing chattel mortgages as against creditors and purchasers, if it was valid when the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced.

[In equity. Bill by William T. Carlisle, assignee in bankruptcy of Henry Wilson, against Joseph M. Davis and David M. Davis.]

H. B. Philbrick, for plaintiff.

M. Laird, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to establish affirmatively the allegations of the bill. I think the plaintiff fails to show that Joseph M. Davis violated his agreement, and fails to show that he did not transfer the good will of his business to the bankrupt, and fails to show that he caused such good will to be given to other parties, and fails to show that he induced any customer of his not to give his business to the bankrupt, and fails to show that he depreciated the business of the bankrupt, and fails to show that he was or is indebted to the bankrupt or his estate.

The note and mortgage were given May 21st, 1875. The note was due in one year. The bill in this case was filed June 10th, 1876. The point is made, that the mortgage became void because it was not properly renewed under the statute of the state of New York, within one year. But, the petition in bankruptcy was filed on the 19th of January, 1876, and, on the 2d of March, 1876, the assignment to the assignee in bankruptcy was made, conveying to him the estate and property which the bankrupt had on the 19th of January, 1876. The assignee acquired nothing more than the rights which the bankrupt had on that day, except as respects property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors, and except as respects property conveyed in direct contravention of the bankruptcy statute. As regards the subject matter of this suit, the assignee stands in no different position from that which the bankrupt himself would occupy if there had been no bankruptcy. The bankrupt could not be heard to claim that the mortgage is invalid as against him because it was not renewed, and the assignee occupies no better or different position. By section 5046 of the Revised Statutes, the assignee acquires the rights of action which the bankrupt had for property, and the rights which the bankrupt had to redeem property, and the like right to sue for, recover and defend property, which the bankrupt might have had if no assignment had been made. By section 5047 the assignee is given the like remedy to recover the effects of the bankrupt in his own name as the bankrupt might have had but for the assignment and the bankruptcy. In respect to the property covered by the mortgage in this case, all the right which the bankrupt had and which the assignee acquired, on the proofs in this case, was the right to hold the property subject to the mortgage and to redeem the property from the mortgage by paying the amount due on it according to its terms. An assignee in bankruptcy is not a creditor or a purchaser, within the language of the statute of New York in regard to the renewing of chattel mortgages, so as to require that a mortgage which is valid when the proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced, shall, in order to have it continue valid, as against such assignee, be renewed in the manner prescribed by such statute, after the proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced.

The bill must be dismissed, with costs to be paid out of the funds, if any, in the hands of the assignee, other than the proceeds of the mortgaged property, and the injunction heretofore granted must be dissolved.

CARLOCK v. TAPPAN et al.

[Betts, C. C. MS. No. 1.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1843.

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT—PLEADING—DAMAGES.

[1. In an action for damages for the infringement of a patent, the objection that another is interested in the patent jointly with the plaintiff, by virtue of an assignment, must be taken by plea in abatement.]

[2. When the jury have determined the actual damages sustained, the court will not increase them, as authorized by the fourteenth section of the patent act of 1836, except upon satisfactory proof that plaintiff is entitled to further damages by way of protection.]

[At law. Action by Carlock against Tappan & Tappan for damages for infringement of a patent. There was a verdict for plaintiff at November term, 1841; and at April term, 1842, he moved to increase the damages assessed, under Act July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 123), which provides that whenever, in any action for the infringement of a patent, a verdict shall be rendered for the plaintiff, "it shall be in the power of the court to render judgment for any sum above the amount found by such verdict as the actual damages sustained by the plaintiff, not exceeding three times the amount thereof."] The defendants oppose the motion, and also contend that plaintiff is not entitled to judgment.

On the trial it appeared that plaintiff was patentee of a patent for shipping stocks, granted August 9, 1831. He assigned one-half the amount to Arrowsmith, May 18, 1839, and Arrowsmith reassigned to the patentee the same one-half Jan. 30, 1838. The jury, by their verdict, found the damages for violation of the patent previous to the assignment at $120, and between that and the reassignment (1838), $1,241.76, and subsequent to July, 1838, $1,600. The plaintiff claimed he was entitled to one-half of the two first sums, and treble the amount of the total. The defendant insisted that plaintiff could not recover in his separate action for his joint interest, so long as Arrowsmith was part owner, etc.

Staples & Dana, for plaintiff.
Silliman & Mitchell, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. If the defendant intended to object that another was justly interested with the plaintiff in the patent, he should have pleaded in abatement. The rule in England and this state is well settled, that a party having a common interest may sue in a separate action, and recover his individual injuries in actions of tort. 1 Johns. 471; 6 Johns. 108; 8 Johns. 151; 6 Durn. & E. [6 Term R.] 766; 7 Durn. & E. [7 Term R.] 279; 1 Chit. Pl. 76.

On the question as to the construction of the statute of 1836, increasing the damages, THE COURT ruled, that the jury had fixed the actual damages, which could only be varied by the court on satisfactory proofs that the plaintiff ought, by way of protection or smart money, to recover further damages.

Case No. 2,413.

The CARLOTTA.

[9 Ben. 1.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 1877.[2]

CHARTER—BILL OF LADING — DAMAGE BY RATS — PERIL OF THE SEA — DAMAGE BY PETROLEUM—CLEANSING OF VESSEL—SALE OF GOODS TO ARRIVE.

1. The bark C. was chartered at New York by G. & A. to carry a cargo of fruit from certain ports in Spain to New York, it being understood that the vessel was then bound to Barcelona with a cargo of petroleum, and it being provided in the charter that the vessel was to be "cleaned as customary previous to loading homeward cargo." The vessel was fumigated to destroy rats before she took on board any of the return cargo, and had on board a cat and a rat-terrier, and was cleansed after the cargo of petroleum was unloaded. The master gave certain bills of lading for the return cargo, with the usual exceptions as to acts of God and dangers and perils of the sea. These bills of lading were all made to, or assigned to, the charterers. The cargo was sold by the consignees to arrive, and they obtained a full price for it. When the vessel arrived in New York, some of the cargo was found to be damaged by the gnawing of rats, and also to be impregnated with the taste and smell of petroleum. G. & A. sued the vessel under the bills of lading: Held, that where the owner of the vessel, notwithstanding the charter-party, enters into special contracts, through the master, in respect to the carriage and delivery of the goods, the bills of lading must be regarded as the contracts by which the rights of the parties are to be governed, so far as respects the matters provided for therein.

[See Two Hundred and Sixty Hogsheads of Molasses, Case No. 14,296; Lamb v. Parkman, Id. 8,020; Perkins v. Hill, Id. 10,987, affirming Id. 10,986; Carr v. Austin & N. W. R. Co., 14 Fed. 419.]

2. That loss or damage by rats is not an act of God, nor a danger or accident of the sea.

[See note at end of case.]

3. That the fact of damage by rats is sufficient evidence that sufficient care and skill was not exercised to rid the vessel of rats.

4. That the fact of damage by petroleum must be accepted as evidence that the vessel was not cleaned in the customary or proper manner, as required by the charter.

[See The Lizzie W. Virden, 11 Fed. 903.]

5. That where merchandise is sold to arrive, for a price based on undamaged goods, and that price has been paid in full, but it is not shown that the right of property and the right of possession were not in the vendor when the breach of contract or neglect of duty complained of occurred, the vendor can maintain an action against the carrier for damage to the goods; but where there has been a rebate of duties for loss or damage in respect of any goods as to which an allowance shall be found due in favor of the consignees, they must be charged with that sum.

[Disapproved in The Eroe, Case No. 4,521. Distinguished in same case, on appeal, Id. 4,522.]

[2] [Affirmed by Circuit Court. Case No. 2,413a.]

In admiralty.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for Gomez & Arguimbau.

Benedict, Taft & Benedict, for Bliss and the Carlotta.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. William Bliss, as owner of the bark Carlotta, filed a libel on the 13th of February, 1874, against Raphael M. Gomez and Daniel V. Arguimbau, to recover the amount due on a written charter of the bark Carlotta to the respondents. The libel alleges that the vessel performed the charter in all respects and became entitled to receive the charter money therein specified, and that $1,000 or thereabouts still remains due thereon. The charter party, which was made at New York on the 8th of August, 1873, between the agents of the owner of the vessel, then lying at New York, and the respondents, under the co-partnership name of Gomez & Arguimbau, charters the vessel to the respondents "for a voyage from two ports in Spain between Barcelona and Malaga, both inclusive, and including Ivica, to New York—charterers have privilege also of taking part cargo at Barcelona, and then using two ports to load, if required—on the terms following." Among those terms are, that the vessel shall receive on board during the voyage "a full cargo of fruit and other lawful merchandise," and that no merchandise shall be laden otherwise than for the respondents, without their consent, on pain of forfeiture of the amount of freight agreed upon; that on arrival out the captain is to report by telegraph to R. M. Gomez at Malaga, and follow his instructions in reference to the charter; that the respondents are to pay to the owner for the use of said vessel during said voyage, in cash, free of commissions, on delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge, $2,500 in United States currency; and that "it is understood that said vessel is now bound to Barcelona, with a cargo refined petroleum in bbls., whence she shall proceed immediately after discharge of outward cargo to enter upon this charter—vessel to be cleaned as customary previous to loading homeward cargo."

The answer of Gomez & Arguimbau to the libel of Bliss was filed on the 26th of March, 1875. It admits the execution and contents of the charter party, as set forth in the libel, and avers that under said charter party the respondents delivered to the master of the vessel certain merchandise in barrels, bales and bags, to be transported to the port of New York from Spain; that such merchandise was shipped and received on board of said vessel under certain bills of lading which recited that said merchandise was received in good order, and by which the master and owners of the vessel promised to deliver the same to the respondents at the port of New York in the like good order and condition as received, on payment of freight as therein provided; and that the master and employees of said vessel took so little and such bad care, in putting said cargo on board and in storing it and in attending to it while on board and while landing it, that a large part of said cargo was badly stained by petroleum or other such substance, and also impregnated by the smell arising therefrom, and thus rendered unmerchantable; and many of the bags and packages containing said merchandise, and the contents thereof, were badly eaten by rats or other vermin, and in other ways the said cargo was so badly damaged by the negligence of said master and owners that part of said cargo was wholly lost and other parts damaged to the amount altogether of at least $2,000.

On the 17th of February, 1874, Gomez & Arguimbau filed a libel against the bark Carlotta. It alleges that in November, 1873, the said bark then lying in the port of Tarragona, in Spain, Joaquin Ruis shipped on board of her 750 bags of almonds, each weighing 50 kilogrammes, and marked G. A., and 150 bags of filberts, in good order, and well conditioned, to be transported by said vessel to the port of New York, in like good order and well conditioned, and there delivered to order or assigns, he or they paying freight therefor according to charter party; that the master of said vessel gave a bill of lading therefor, dated November 5th, 1873, which was endorsed over to and held by the libellants, who were the consignees of the cargo therein named, and entitled to demand and receive the same; that in the said month of November, the said bark then lying in the port of Iviza, in Spain, Wallis & Co. shipped in good order and well conditioned, on board of her, to be transported to the port of New York, 425 bags of soft-shelled almonds, of the Fila kind, marked F, weighing gross 22,533 kilogrammes, and also 850 half bags of soft-shelled almonds of the Fila kind, weighing gross 22,533 kilogrammes, and marked G, and also 25 barrels of capers in vinegar, marked 1, and also 25 barrels of capers in vinegar, marked 3, to be carried on board of said bark to the port of New York, and there delivered in like good order and well conditioned, (the acts of God, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation of whatever nature and kind excepted,) unto the libellants or their assigns, they paying freight for the said goods as per charter party dated New York, August 8th, 1873; that the master of said vessel gave a bill of lading therefor, dated November 11th, 1873; that, in the month of December, 1873, the said bark then lying in the port of Malaga, R. M. Gomez shipped in good order and well conditioned, on board of her, 50 quarter casks of wine, marked R M. Gomez, 114 half boxes of oranges, marked R. M. Gomez, 324 quarter boxes of lemons, marked R. M. Gomez, 95 boxes of lemons, marked Jose

Perez, 157 bags of almonds, marked R. M. Gomez, and 1200 boxes of raisins and 200 frails of raisins, both marked R. M. Gomez, to be delivered in like good order and well conditioned at the port of New York, the dangers of the seas only excepted, unto the libellants or their assigns, they paying freight therefor as per charter; that the master of said vessel gave a bill of lading therefor, dated December 2d, 1873; that in the month of December, 1873, R. M. Gomez shipped in good order and well conditioned on board of said bark, 100 bags of shelled almonds, marked G. A., to be transported on board of said vessel from Malaga aforesaid to the port of New York, and there delivered in like good order and well conditioned, the dangers of the seas only excepted, unto the libellants or their assigns, they paying freight for the same as per charter; that the master of said vessel gave a bill of lading therefor dated December 4th, 1873; that the said bark arrived in the port of New York and the libellants demanded the delivery of said merchandise to them, but the employees of said bark took so little and such bad care, not only in attention to said vessel, but in putting said cargo on board, and in stowing it, and in the care of it while on board, and in landing it in the port of New York, and in the care of it after it was landed, that a large part of it was badly stained by petroleum or some other such substance and also impregnated by the smell arising therefrom, and the bags and contents in which said cargo was delivered were damaged by being eaten by rats, and a large part of said cargo was wholly lost to the libellants or only delivered in a damaged condition, whereby the libellants were damaged to the amount of $2,000 and upwards; and that the libellants are ready to pay said freight upon the proper delivery of said cargo. The libel prays a decree against said bark for said damages.

The answer of the owner of the bark to the last named libel denies all its allegations as to negligence and damage except the allegation that some of the bags were eaten and damaged by rats, and alleges that the libellants were the charterers of the bark under the written charter before mentioned, and that all of the said goods were put on board under said charter, and that the provisions of said charter and of the bills of lading were in all things complied with on behalf of said bark, and any loss or damage or injury to said cargo was caused by perils excepted and without any negligence or fault on the part of said bark.

1. It is set up in the answer in the in personam suit, that many of the bags and packages containing the merchandise, and the contents thereof, were badly eaten by rats or other vermin, and that such injury was the result of want of care on the part of the master and employees of the vessel. In the libel against the vessel the allegation is only of damage by rats to bags and contents of bags, through want of care on the part of the employees of the vessel. On the evidence, a claim is made for loss by rat damage, by the gnawing by rats of holes in some of the bags containing almonds in the shell, and by the eating of some of such almonds by rats, and by the loss of others of such almonds through holes gnawed in such bags by rats. It is contended on the part of the consignees that the vessel is liable for the damage by rats, because there is no exception in the charter-party or the bill of lading which can relieve the vessel from liability for such damage occurring during the voyage; that such damage is not the act of God or a peril of the sea; and that the vessel is liable in the absence of an excepting clause in the contract. For the vessel, it is contended that a carrier is not responsible for damage from natural causes against which he is unable to guard; that it is the natural tendency of rats to gnaw; that the vessel was fumigated before taking in cargo, and had on board a cat and a rat terrier; that nothing more could have been done; and that the rats were probably brought on board in the cargo.

The charter party provides that the vessel shall be in every way fitted for the voyage, and specifies fruit as a contemplated cargo. It contains no other provisions which refer to damage to cargo and no provision as to the giving of bills of lading. It is signed by both of the parties to it. Three of the four bills of lading cover almonds in the shell in bags. One of them specifies 750 bags of soft almonds in the shell, as received on board in good condition, and the master by it promises and undertakes, "God taking me in safety with the said vessel to the said port, to deliver in the same terms." The second specifies 425 bags and 850 half bags of soft-shell almonds as shipped in good order and well conditioned in and upon the vessel, and states that they are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned, "the acts of God, the king's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, excepted." The third specifies 157 bags of almonds, as shipped in good order and well conditioned on board the vessel, and states that they are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned, "the dangers of the seas only excepted."

In the case of Aymar v. Astor, 6 Cow. 267, the owners of a vessel were sued for damages sustained by the owner of goods shipped on board of it, through the destruction of them by rats. The bill of lading signed by the master stated that the goods were to be delivered in good order and well conditioned, "the dangers of the seas" excepted. At the trial, evidence was given on the question whether the vessel was prudently managed for the avoiding of rats or whether the master had been negligent in that respect, but the court charged the jury that the defendants were common carriers, and liable as such for damage done, unless by the act of God, or the perils of the sea, excepted in the bill of lading, and that damage by rats was not a peril of the sea. On a writ of error the supreme court held that the master of a vessel is not responsible, like a common carrier, for all losses, except they happen by the act of God, or the enemies of the country; and that it ought to have been submitted to the jury, whether the master had used ordinary care and diligence in carrying the goods in question. This exception in favor of a carrier by water is repudiated by the same court in McArthur v. Sears, 21 Wend. 190, and the statement of the exception in Aymar v. Astor is called a "dictum." See, also, Allen v. Sewall, 2 Wend. 327.

In Laveroni v. Drury, 16 Eng. Law & Eq. 510, in 1853, cheese was shipped in a general ship, under bills of lading, whereby the master bound himself to deliver the cheese free from damage, "the act of God, the queen's enemies, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation," etc., "excepted." The cheese was eaten and damaged by rats, on the voyage. The master had two cats on board, and it was contended by the owners of the vessel that it was for the jury to say whether the keeping of the cats relieved the defendants from the charge of negligence. The court, at the trial, held that the question was not one for the jury, and instructed the jury that damage by rats was not within the exception contained in the bills of lading, and that, if the cheese had been eaten and damaged by rats in the course of the voyage, the defendants were liable. On a motion by the defendants for a new trial the court of exchequer said: "We are of opinion that this direction was right. By the law of England, the master and owner of a general ship are common carriers for hire and responsible as such. This, according to the well-known rule, renders them liable for every damage which occurs during the voyage, except that caused by the act of God and the queen's enemies. They, however, almost universally receive goods under bills of lading signed by the master, and, in such case, the liability depends upon and is governed by the terms of the bill of lading, it being the express contract between the parties—the owner of the goods on the one hand and the master and owner of the ship on the other." As to the exception in the bills of lading, the court said: "The true question is, whether damage by rats falls within this exception, and we are clearly of opinion that it does not. The only part of the exception under which it possibly could be contended to fall, is as a danger or accident of the sea and navigation; but this, we think, includes only a danger or accident of the sea or navigation properly so called, namely, one caused by the violence of the winds and waves (a vis major) acting upon a seaworthy and substantial ship, and does not cover damage by rats, which is a kind of destruction not peculiar to the sea or navigation, or arising directly from it, but one to which such a commodity as cheese is equally liable in a warehouse on land as in a ship at sea." The court further said, that the only true rule for ascertaining with accuracy and certainty the liability of the master and owner of a general ship is, "that prima facie he is a common carrier, but that his responsibility may be either enlarged or qualified by the terms of the bill of lading, if there be one, and that the question whether the defendant is liable or not, is to be ascertained by the terms of this document, when it exists."

In the case of The Fame [Case No. 4,632], in this court, in 1861, a vessel was libelled to recover for the damages sustained by the loss of part of a cargo of coffee from Rio Janeiro, by the gnawing of the packages by rats, on the voyage. The coffee was carried under a bill of lading which excepted "the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation." It was set up in defense that the vessel had two cats on board, and that, in view of that fact, the damage by the rats was covered by the exceptions. The court (Shipman, J.) reviewed the authorities and adopted the view that damage by rats was not a peril of the sea, but was damage arising from the negligence of the carrier, and might be prevented by due care, and was within the control of human prudence and sagacity. Independently of that view, the court was of opinion that the master of the vessel had not proved due diligence on his part, because, it being shown that Rio Janeiro was a very bad port for rats, it was not proved that he had fumigated his vessel.

In the case of The Miletus [Case No. 9,545], in the circuit court for this district, in 1866, it was held by Mr. Justice Nelson, "that damages occasioned by vermin, on board of a ship, to a cargo, in the course of a voyage, are not the result of a peril of the sea, or of any of the dangers or accidents of navigation, within an exception to that effect in a bill of lading, but are damages for which the ship and its owner are liable, as insurers of the safe conveyance of the cargo."

In Kay v. Wheeler, L. R. 2 C. P. 302, in 1867, in the exchequer chamber, on error from the common pleas, coffee was shipped under a bill of lading which excepted "the act of God, the queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation, of what nature and kind soever." The bags were gnawed by rats during the voyage and the contents were partly eaten and damaged by them. The vessel had on board during the time she was at the place of shipment, and on leaving that place, two cats and two ferrets, and the vessel had before leaving that place been cleared of rats by a professed rat-killer, and every possible precaution was taken to keep rats out of the vessel after that. It was contended for the defendants that the injury by rats was a peril of navigation, because it was a danger which could not be provided against, as it had been shown that the defendants had used every possible means to prevent the injury to the goods. The court held that the question depended on the contract contained in the bill of lading; that the defendants had thereby bound themselves to deliver the goods in the good order and condition in which they were shipped, except in the four cases therein specified; that damage by rats was not within any one of those exceptions; that the defendants had delivered the goods in a very different condition from that in which they received them, and had, therefore, broken their contract; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

In the recent case of Nugent v. Smith, 1 C. P. Div. 19, it is laid down as the true rule, that "every shipowner or master who carries goods on board his vessel for hire, is, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, subject, by implication, by the common law of England, adopting the law of Rome, by reason of his acceptance of the goods to be carried, to the liability of an insurer, except as against the act of God. or the queen's enemies;" and that "it is not only such shipowners as have made themselves in all senses common carriers who are so liable, but all shipowners who carry goods for hire, whether inland, coastwise, or abroad, outward or inward."

In the present case, the shippers having, notwithstanding the charter party, accepted bills of lading for the goods and brought suit thereon, and the owner of the vessel having, notwithstanding the charter party, entered into special contracts, through the master, by means of the bills of lading, in respect to the carriage and delivery of the goods, the bills of lading must be regarded as the contracts by which the rights of the parties are to be governed, so far as respects the matters provided for therein. There is nothing in the bills of lading, in respect to the carriage and delivery of the cargo covered by them, that is inconsistent with anything in the charter party. As regards a contract in a bill of lading for the carriage and delivery of cargo covered by it, it must be regarded as settled by the case of Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 272, that where a bill of lading admits the shipment of cargo in good order, and binds the carrier to deliver the same in like good order, certain specified damages and accidents excepted, the carrier may be answerable for damage to the goods, although no negligence on his part be shown, unless he brings the case within a damage or accident so excepted; that, in considering whether the carrier is liable for a particular damage, the question is not whether it happened by reason of the negligence of the persons in the employ of the carrier, but whether it was occasioned by any of those causes which, either according to the general rules of law, or the particular stipulations of the parties, afford an excuse for the non-performance of the contract; and that, after damage to the goods has been established, the burden lies on the carrier, in the case of such a bill of lading, to show that such damage was occasioned by one of the perils from which he was exempted by the bill of lading. This principle is also held in Western Transp. Co. v. Downer, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 129. It is the same principle as that decided in Laveroni v. Drury and in Kay v. Wheeler.

In the present case the bills of lading which cover almonds in the shell in bags admit that the goods were received on board in good condition, and undertake that they shall be delivered in like good order. In two of them there are specified exceptions, but loss or damage by rats is not within any of the exceptions specified. It is not an act of God, nor is it a danger or accident of the sea. The definition of the expression "the act of God" is well given in Nugent v. Smith, supra, thus: "The damage or loss in question must have been caused directly and exclusively by such a direct and sudden and violent and irresistible act of nature as the defendant could not, by any amount of ability, foresee would happen, or, if he could foresee that it would happen, could not, by any amount of care and skill, resist, so as to prevent its effect. It lies upon the defendant to show that a damage or loss for which he would otherwise be liable is brought within this exception." It is impossible to say that no human ability could have prevented the presence of rats on the vessel, or could have rid the vessel of rats. It is alleged that the vessel had on board a cat and a rat terrier, and that she was fumigated or smoked in Barcelona before she took on board any cargo. But the cat and the terrier could have been of but little service in catching rats which were down in the hold among the cargo. As to the fumigation, the presence of rats after fumigation must be accepted as evidence that the fumigation was not so thorough and effective as to destroy all rats. The fact that no rats were seen, after the fumigation, until after the vessel left Malaga, and that they were known to be on board after she left Malaga, is not sufficient evidence that they were not on board before the fumigation, or that the fumigation was effective, or that the rats were not on board from Barcelona to Malaga, or that they came on board at Malaga. There is evidence that there were rats on board on the voyage from New York to Barcelona, and there is no evidence that the rats came on board in the cargo of fruit. The fact that the vessel was in the stream when she received her cargo at Barcelona and at Iviza, does not go to show that she was free from rats at Barcelona. In a word, it is not shown that the vessel could not, by any amount of care and skill, have been rid of the rats. As to perils of the sea, the eating of almonds by rats, or the gnawing of holes in bags by rats, is not a thing peculiar to the sea or to navigation, or arising directly from navigation, for rats do those things on land as well as in a vessel at sea. I think there is satisfactory evidence that the rats did damage by gnawing holes in the bags. What was the extent of the loss of and damage to bags and almonds by such gnawing is another question.

2. It is claimed that there was damage to the cargo by its contact with petroleum, and by its being impregnated with the odor of petroleum. Full notice is given in the charter party that the vessel was, at the time of the making of the charter party, bound on a voyage from New York to Barcelona, with a cargo of refined petroleum in barrels, and it is provided in the charter party that the homeward cargo may be fruit, and that the vessel is "to be cleaned as customary previous to loading homeward cargo." It is not to be presumed that Gomez & Arguimbau, persons experienced in the trade in question, would have arranged to bring home a cargo of fruit in a vessel which had carried out a cargo of petroleum in barrels, unless they had understood that a cleaning of the vessel in the customary manner, after the discharge of the cargo of petroleum, would have enabled the vessel to bring home the cargo of fruit in good order, free from stains of, or the odor of, petroleum. The evidence is very distinct that the almonds, more or less of them, were found, on their arrival here, to be impregnated with the taste and smell of petroleum, so as to lessen their value, and that such taste and smell came from the petroleum which was in the vessel. There is not, in any of the bills of lading, any exception as to petroleum damage. But the rights of the parties, so far as petroleum damage is concerned, must be governed by the provisions of the charter party as to petroleum. The effect of the provisions of the charter party is, that, the vessel being about to carry out petroleum in barrels, she shall, if "cleaned as customary" before loading the return cargo of fruit, not be liable for damage by petroleum to such return cargo; and that Gomez & Arguimbau, having notice of such carriage of petroleum, take the risk of damage to such return cargo from the petroleum, if the vessel be cleaned in the customary manner before loading such return cargo. Much testimony has been taken as to the manner in which the vessel was cleaned. But the evidence is very clear that vessels which have carried out petroleum in packages do, after being cleaned in a proper manner, bring back cargoes of such fruit as this vessel had, without the fruit being damaged by having the taste or odor of petroleum. The fact of such damage in the present case must be accepted as evidence that this vessel was not cleaned in the customary or proper manner. The master of this vessel had never carried a cargo of petroleum before, and had never seen a ship cleaned that had carried petroleum, and made inquiries of another master as to the mode of cleaning. It does not alter the case that some or all of the damage may have arisen from the sweat of the hold dropping upon the cargo. The complaint is not that the cargo was damaged by being wet or that it became musty therefrom, but that, whether the water of the sweat was the vehicle or not, the taste and odor of the petroleum were conveyed to and left with the cargo, when that would not have happened if the vessel had been properly cleaned. The sweat and the water thereof would have produced no damage if they had not been conveyers of petroleum taste and odor, and they would not have conveyed such taste and odor if the vessel had been thoroughly cleaned in the proper and customary manner. In Clark v. Barnwell [12 How. (53 U. S.) 272], the damage was mould and mildew caused by the sweat of the hold, a peril of the sea. The libellants in that case failed to show that the damage could have been prevented by the use of proper precautionary measures, or that there had been a neglect of the customary methods of prevention. But in the present case, it is established, I think, that the petroleum damage would not have occurred if the customary and proper mode of cleaning the vessel had been thoroughly used, whether the damage arose from dunnage saturated or impregnated with petroleum, or from the presence of petroleum in the bilge water, or from the conveyance of petroleum or its ingredients by the water of the sweat of the hold.

3. As to all the merchandise that is alleged to have been damaged by rats or petroleum, except the almonds not in the shell, it appears that such merchandise was sold by Gomez & Arguimbau to arrive, for a price based on undamaged goods, and that the purchasers have paid that price in full to Gomez & Arguimbau. The damage alleged in the libel filed by Gomez & Arguimbau is a damage to themselves. It is contended, for the vessel, that they cannot recover any such damage in respect to the merchandise for which they were so paid a sound price, for the reason that they have sustained no damage. While it is true that prima facie the consignee of goods under a bill of lading has the legal title to and a beneficial interest in the goods and may sue the carrier for the non-delivery thereof (Lawrence v. Minturn, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 100; McKinley v. Morrish, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 355), yet such prima facie right of action may be displaced (Grove v. Brien, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 429; Lawrence v. Minturn, supra). In the present case the goods were the property of Gomez & Arguimbau, when shipped. They sold them to arrive, it is true, but it is not shown that the right of property and the right of possession were not in them when the breach of contract, or neglect of duty, complained of, occurred. The contract of the master in the bills of lading was with Gomez & Arguimbau, or their assigns, and it is not shown that the bills of lading were ever formally assigned or endorsed by Gomez & Arguimbau. I am of opinion, therefore, that Gomez & Arguimbau can maintain the action.

4. If any sum of money has been received either by Gomez & Arguimbau or by any purchaser from them, from the government as a rebate of duties for loss or damage in respect of any goods as to which an allowance shall be found due for loss or damage in the suit brought by Gomez & Arguimbau, they must be charged with such sum.

5. A failure on the part of the vessel to deliver some of the cargo is admitted, the cause of the failure not being due to either rats or petroleum. In the suit brought by the owner of the vessel, there will be a reference to ascertain what cargo was not delivered, and its value, and the reference will cover such goods, if any, as were not delivered because of the action of rats or petroleum, as well as those which, for any other reason, were not delivered. Such value, when ascertained, will be deducted from the amount remaining due on the charter party, and there will be a decree for the remainder.

6. In the suit brought by Gomez & Arguimbau, there will be a reference to ascertain the amount of the damage by rats or the taste or odor of petroleum, to such of the cargo as was delivered.

7. The question as to the costs in both suits is reserved.

[NOTE. On the coming of the commissioner's report, exceptions were filed thereto, and thereafter the parties, other than the vessel, appealed to the circuit court, where the conclusion of the district court as to the exceptions was sustained. See Cases Nos. 2,413a and 2,413b.

[Losses by perils of the sea include only such as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from irresistible force or from inevitable accidents, or from some overwhelming power, which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence. The Northern Belle, Case No. 10,319, affirmed in The Northern Belle v. Robson, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 526. Damage to a cargo by rats is not a peril of the sea, or a danger of navigation, within those terms in a bill of lading, unless it be shown that ordinary care and diligence were used to guard against injury by rats; citing Kirkland v. The Fame, Case No. 7,845; The Isabella, Id. 7,099. The CARLOTTA.[1]

GOMEZ v. The CARLOTTA.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. July 31, 1879.

CARRIERS—DAMAGE TO CARGO—BURDEN OF PROOF—NEEDLESS SUIT—COSTS.

[1. Where the owners of goods claim that they were damaged during a voyage by rats and by oil, and the goods have been exclusively under their control or that of their vendees after their discharge from the ship, the burden of proof is on them to show by satisfactory evidence that the goods were actually damaged on the voyage as claimed, as well as the amount of loss or injury; and they cannot complain if, by failing to furnish the evidence, or satisfactorily excuse its omission, their case is looked on to some extent with suspicion.

[2. Costs should not be allowed to parties who have needlessly commenced a suit, instead of litigating the issues raised by them in a suit then pending, and to which they were parties.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.

[In admiralty. Libel by Raphael M. Gomez and Daniel V. Arquinbau against the bark Carlotta to recover damages for injury to cargo by reason of damage by oil and from rats. There was a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the amount of damage by rats or by the oil to such of the cargo as was delivered. See Case No. 2,413. On the coming in of the commissioner's report, exceptions were filed thereto, and thereafter an appeal was taken to the circuit court.]

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for Gomez.

Mr. Benedict, for the Carlotta.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. As the "Carlotta" has not appealed, the only questions presented here are those raised by the libellants in this case on the exceptions to the commissioner's report, and as to those, after a careful examination of all the evidence, I am entirely satisfied with the conclusions reached by the district judge. The burden of proof is on the libellants, and before they can recover they must show by satisfactory evidence that their goods were actually damaged on the voyage by rats or petroleum, and the amount of the loss or injury they have sustained from these causes. After the discharge of the cargo, they, or their vendees, had the goods within their exclusive control. They had in this way the means of securing at the time the very best evidence that could be obtained. If they have failed to produce it, and have not furnished a sufficient excuse for the omission, they cannot complain if their case is looked upon to some extent with suspicion.

There were three separate lots of the almonds, and they will be considered in their order.

1. The "Wiley, Wicks & Wing" lot. This was damaged by rats, holes having been eaten by rats in the bags. The commissioner has allowed only $200, while $325 is claimed. The exact extent of this injury might easily have been ascertained by inspection and count as the bags were put in store, or afterwards. Instead of that, the only evidence on which to fix the amount at $325 is a loose estimate, made by the parties to whom the goods were sold to arrive and who paid the full agreed price for a sound article on delivery. No one seems to have taken the trouble to make an actual count. Such an omission under the circumstances is, to say the least, suspicious, and I cannot but think the commissioner made an ample allowance for all the damage to this lot.

2. The Nordlinger lot. The claim here is for petroleum damage, and it is proper to remark in the outset that the first intimation to the vessel of this injury appears to have been given when the testimony was taken at the trial below, more than two years after the cargo was discharged and this litigation commenced. In the statement of claims made against the ship, under date of February 6, 1874, the only specification of damage to this lot was for 1,790 lbs. "almonds taken out." Petroleum damage was claimed only on the shelled almonds of Gomez & Arquinbau lot. Mention is made of 31 bags stained, but this is shown by the testimony of Willis, the managing clerk of the libellants, not to have reference to the Nordlinger almonds. The cartmen receipted for all that went to Nordlinger as in good order. They had been sold to arrive and paid for as a sound article on delivery, "claims for damages against the custom house and insurance companies" to belong to the purchasers. At this time it is manifest that damages by petroleum could not have been much thought of. The vessel sued to recover on its charter party, February 13, 1874, and this libel was filed for damages to the cargo, February 16th. The custom house appraisement of damages for a rebate of duties was made February 18th, and it nowhere appears from anything which then transpired that any damage by oil was considered or taken into the account. This lot was marked "C.," "F.," and "R. M. G." Only those marked "G. A." appear by the official certificates produced to have been impregnated with petroleum. In every other case where the certificate is produced damage by sea water and sweat of the vessel is noted, and nothing else. The shelled almonds and the Wiley, Wicks & Wing lot were marked "G. A.," or "G. A. The custom house appraisers' certificate as to the Nordlinger lot was not produced. The portwarden's certificate, at the times of the discharge of the cargo, makes no mention of damage by petroleum. All is attributed to sea water and rats. As to the bags marked "C.," "F.," or "R. M. G.," it said they were well stowed and dunnaged, but in one instance, "wet by sea water from leaks in water ways or sweat," and in another "stained by sea water from flowing through the ceiling." The portwarden when on the stand as a witness, testified that he discovered no damage by petroleum when the cargo was coming out.

It also appears that the vessel took out a full cargo of petroleum. On her arrival at Barcelona the cargo was discharged and the hold cleaned and whitewashed. An effort was made also to get the petroleum out from between the timbers. After waiting some days, about thirty tons of ballast was put in and spread upon the bottom, and then part of the cargo of almonds and wine came on board. These almonds constituted the Wiley, Wicks & Wing lot. They were placed next to the ballast and the wine. The vessel then went to * * * when the Nordlinger lot was taken on board with some barrels of capers in vinegar. These were stowed generally on top of the cargo received at Barcelona, and were but little exposed to contact with the ceiling. The vessel then proceeded to Malaga, where the shelled almonds were put on board, and the part of the Nordlinger lot marked "R. M. G." There was besides this received there some oranges, lemons and raisins. These were generally stowed above what was taken on at Barcelona and * * *. It is thus seen that the most of the Nordlinger lot was stowed in such a way as not to be so much exposed to contact with the petroleum mixed with the bilge water, as many of the other parts of the cargo. Neither was it so much exposed to the drip of the sweat in the hold.

Against the force of all these circumstances is brought only the single fact that two fruit merchants or brokers, after this suit was commenced, went to the store of Nordlinger at the request of the libellants, and, after an examination, which I cannot but believe must have been very slight, estimated the damages to the entire lot by petroleum at $450. I am not by any means satisfied that the bags were overhauled to any considerable extent by these appraisers, and one of them in his testimony concedes that while they certified to the number of bags stained and damaged, they took the count as it was given to them by some one else. They do not give the market value of sound almonds when these arrived, neither do they give the value of them as they were found. All they say is, that they estimated the damage in a lump to the whole lot at $450. Nothing can be more unreliable as evidence than mere estimates made in such a way and under such circumstances. Loose ex parte estimates are never entitled to much consideration, and these seem to be even less to be depended on than usual. No one representing the vessel was present at the time the examination was made, and no opportunity has been given to counteract the effect of this testimony by other estimates made by other persons and under different circumstances. Taking all these facts together, I am led irresistably to the conclusion that the petroleum damage to this lot was rather imaginary than real, and that the district judge was right in rejecting this item of claim altogether. This makes it unnecessary to consider the right of the vessel to deduct from any damages that might have been given the amount allowed by the government for a rebate of duties on account of the damaged condition of the cargo.

3. The Gomez and Arquinbau lot. The claim here is for oil damage only. The commissioner allowed one hundred and fifty-five dollars for thirty-one bags at five dollars a bag. This I think is all the evidence shows the parties are entitled to. That was the amount claimed in the bill of damages presented to the vessel on the 6th of February on account of stained bags. The only evidence relied on for an increase of this amount is an estimate of merchants called in by the libellants more than three months after this cargo was delivered, and who made an examination similar to that just considered. This estimate is to my mind more unreliable than the other, and not entitled to any consideration. It would have been as easy to have furnished evidence in the cause which would have been entirely satisfactory if there had been any real damage, that I am led to conclude the only reason for its absence is that no such damage in fact existed.

The result is that the libellants are entitled to an allowance upon their charter money as follows:

1. Wiley, Wicks & Wing lot.....	$200
2. Gomez & Arquinbau lot.....	155
In all	$355

They are not, however, entitled to costs either in this court or below. When they commenced their suit another was pending on behalf of the vessel to recover the charter money due, in which all the questions which are here presented might have been litigated, and in which a balance will be found due after making all the deductions which are here allowed. It is clear to my mind that there would have been no litigation had it not been for the exorbitant demand made of the vessel by the libellants on the 6th of February.

A decree may be prepared finding due the libellants the sum of $355, and directing that it be applied as so much payment on the charter party as of the date the charter money fell due and became payable.

BLISS v. GOMEZ.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. July 31, 1879.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

[In admiralty. The libel was filed by William Bliss, as owner of the bark Carlotta, against Raphael M. Gomez and Daniel V. Arquimbau, to recover the amount due on a charter party. There was a decree for libellant, and a reference to a commissioner to ascertain what sum should be deducted from the charter money due for failure to deliver certain cargo. See Case No. 2,413. On the coming in of the commissioner's report, exceptions were filed thereto, and thereafter an appeal was taken to the circuit court. This case was heard together with Case No. 2,413a, which see.]

WAITE, Circuit Justice. This suit is disposed of by that of Gomez v. The Carlotta [Case No. 2,413a], with which it was heard.

The libellant is entitled to a decree for	$962 41

—With interest from February 13, 1874, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and costs in this court and the court below.

[2 Flip. 330;[1] 8 Cent. Law J. 147.]

District Court, W. D. Tennessee. Jan. 27, 1879.

SALVAGE—COMPENSATION—LOSS BY DEPRECIATION IN VALUE.

1. The court will not allow the whole net proceeds in the registry as compensation to the salvor, even when his actual expenditures exceed the amount of the fund, except in cases where the owner abandons the property and neglects to reclaim it by appearance in the suit.

[See Llewellyn v. Two Anchors & Chains, Case No. 8,428; The Zealand, Id. 18,205.]

2. Where the proof showed that a sunken vessel, after being raised, was worth $1,700, but being sold pendente lite she brought only $792; and that the libellant actually expended $568.95, under circumstances which would ordinarily have justified an allowance of one-half the property, the court allowed only one-half the net proceeds in the registry.

3. A salvor must bear his share of the loss by depreciation in value. He is sub modo a joint owner, and in the absence of an express contract, he cannot recover on any theory of a debt due either by the owner or the property, with a lien to be satisfied, at all hazards, to the full extent of the proceeds in the registry.

[75 U. S.] 448–473; Llewellyn v. Two Anchors & Chains [Case No. 8,428].

HAMMOND, District Judge. The question reserved at the hearing grows out of the following state of facts: The libellant raised the sunken vessel at an actual expenditure, as he testifies, of $568.95, for labor of hands employed by the day, hire of flats, crabs, jacks, and other tools employed in the work, and the compensation of a diver and his assistants. The vessel was not derelict, her owner and captain remaining all the time during the work with the boat. I think there is no doubt that the preponderance of the proof shows that too much time was expended by the libellant in the work, and that it could and should have been accomplished at a much less cost than the libellant incurred, but it is difficult to say from the proof at how much less it could have been done. The estimates made by the witnesses, under the circumstances they detail, are entirely unsatisfactory. It was mere guessing on their part. The proof establishes the fact that the boat, which was a very small steamboat, converted from a barge, was worth, at the time of the disaster, not more than $2,000, and that the repairs put on her after she was raised cost from $200 to $300; that is, the repairs necessary to cover the damage done by the sinking and raising, and not taking notice of the repairs which were in the nature of betterments. This would make her value in the hands of the salvor, after she was raised, not less than $1,700. When we consider the danger of a total loss from the perilous position in which the vessel was placed by the disaster, the difficulties in the use of crude appliances for performing the service which seem to have been the best that were available, the cold weather and running ice during part of the time, and the actual expenditure of money, as above stated, which is found by aggregating from the libellant's account, as he proves it, the sums paid out by him, and leaving out of view the other charges made for his own services and hire of his own tools, I think one-half of the value of the boat, which was comparatively of small value at best, not too much to be allowed as compensation to the libellant. This would be very nearly the exact amount he claims by the account which he tenders as a statement of the expenditures he made and the value of his services as estimated by himself for the purpose of aiding the court in fix'ng the allowance of salvage, if we include the charges for his own services and the use of his own tools, and are to make the allowance on the basis of value as shown by the proof in the case, say on a value of $1,700. But the libellant, having seized the vessel by process in this case, on his application, some ten or fifteen days afterwards, she was sold pendente lite, while almost imbedded in the ice, at an unfavorable time and under unfavorable circumstances, so that she only brought $792, which is the sum in the registry to answer costs and for distribution between the salvor and the owners. It is not certain that if the property had been kept in the control of the marshal until more favorable weather for a sale it would have brought any more. So far as the proof is concerned, it is all speculation, but I think it is fairly inferable from the circumstances shown by the proof that, owing to the inauspicious conditions, the vessel has been sold for much less than otherwise she would have brought.

The libellant claims that his compensation should be fixed on the value as shown by the proof and not the sale, or else that the proportion should be so increased as to give him a larger amount than one-half the net proceeds in the registry, and that, under no circumstances, should he be allowed less than his actual expenditures of money. This would exhaust the whole fund, leave nothing for the owners, and throw all the loss of the unfortunate sale on them.

I do not think the element of time between the raising and selling of the vessel is at all material. It is not probable that she would have sold for any more on the day she was raised than she did fifteen days subsequently, and, therefore, it is merely another mode of claiming on the actual value, as shown by the proof, to argue that a salvor is entitled to recover on the value at the time of the service and not on any subsequent value. For all practical purposes the date of the service and date of the sale are the same in this case.

The question remains whether the court can look beyond the fund in its hands in estimating the value of the property. If the depreciation grows out of the misconduct of the parties in possession, whether it be the owner or the salvor, I have no doubt that misconduct may enter as an element into the judgment of the court in making the allowance; but there is no misconduct here, unless it may be that the action of the libellant in pressing a sale at an unfavorable time may be so considered. There is nothing in the proof to show whether this was bad conduct or not, for it may be the expense of keeping the property, or the danger of losing it by delay, made a speedy sale a necessity. Let this be as it may, I shall treat the case as one without fault on either side in respect of the sale, because the proof does not show otherwise.

Neither do I think it just to treat the disastrous sale as the result of the failure of the owners to bond the property, as it is called. There is nothing to show that they could have given a stipulation for her value, and if there were, it is not a right the libellant has to a bond, but it is entirely optional with the owners whether they give bond or leave the property with the court. In cases where the owner abandons his property to the salvors, makes no claim, or is unreasonably long in asserting his rights, the court may, undoubtedly, decree the whole to the libellant. The Zealand [Case No. 18,205]; Two Anchors & Chains [Id. 8,428].

It is very earnestly insisted that the element of "reward" and not entirely that of compensation, is the rule for allowance of salvage. In meritorious cases on the high seas, and perhaps there may be cases on the rivers, this element is often controling. Here we have a case of a steamboat snagged at her landing in this port, impaled upon a sunken wreck at the shore, and tied by her cables near her usual landing place. The salvor goes to her relief at the request of the captain, and after much hard work and unnecessary delay he succeeds in getting her afloat and pumping her out. It does not seem to me that it is a case calling for anything in the way of reward as understood in the admiralty courts, but if it were, it would be going to an unreasonable length to reward a salvor, however meritorious, with the whole of the property. As was said by the learned judge in The Waterloo [Case No. 17,257], this would be a return to the barbarous practice of giving the finder all he finds. I do not find any case where the court allows all the property to go to the salvor unless the owner is either unknown, or has voluntarily abandoned the claim he has to the property saved.

A salvor, in the view of the maritime law, has an interest in the property; it is called a lien, but it never goes, in the absence of a contract expressly made, upon the idea of a debt due by the owner to the salvor for services rendered, as at common law, but upon the principle that the service creates a property in the thing saved. He is, to all intents and purposes, a joint owner, and if the property is lost he must bear his share like other joint owners.

This is the governing principle here. The libellant and the owners must mutually bear their respective share of the loss in value by the sale. If the libellant has been unfortunate and has spent his time and money in saving a property not worth the expenditure he made, or if, having saved enough to compensate him, it is lost by the uncertainties of a judicial sale for partition, so to speak, it is a misfortune not uncommon to all who seek gain by adventurous speculations in values. The libellant says in his testimony that he relied entirely on his rights as a salvor. This being so he knew the risk he ran and it was his own folly to expend more money in the service than his reasonable share would have been worth under all circumstances and contingencies. He can rely neither on the common law idea of an implied contract to pay for work on and about one's property what the work is reasonably worth with a lien attached by possession for satisfaction, nor upon any notion of an implied maritime contract for the service, with a maritime lien to secure it, as in the case of repairs, or supplies furnished a needy vessel, or the like. In such a case the owner would lose all if the property did not satisfy the debt, when fairly sold. But this doctrine has no place in the maritime law of salvage. It does not proceed upon any theory of an implied obligation, either of the owner or the res, to pay a quantum meruit, nor actual expenses incurred, but rather on that of a reasonable compensation or reward, as the case may be, to one who has rescued the res from danger of total loss. If he gets the whole, the property had as well been lost entirely, so far as the owner is concerned. Smith v. The Joseph Stewart [Case No. 13,070]. I think the public policy of encouragement for such service does not, of itself, furnish sufficient support for a rule which would exclude the owner from all benefit to be derived from the service. The property is saved for him, not the public, and he cannot be said to have impliedly authorized his whole property to be exhausted in saving it, particularly where he has not abandoned it, and it is not derelict.

The property and the owner would generally be at the mercy of the salvor, if such a doctrine be established, and the temptation to so conduct the service as to absorb the whole property, very great.

After the payment of costs let the proceeds in the registry be equally divided between the libellant and the claimants.

I take pleasure in saying that Judge BROWN, of the Eastern District of Michigan, now with us, concurs in this opinion.

[5 Law Rep. 120; 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 292.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—EQUITY JURISDICTION—INJUNCTION.

The district courts of the United States, sitting in bankruptcy, have general equity jurisdiction, and may grant writs of injunction, without previous notice to the adverse party.

[Cited in Re Smith, Case No. 12,994; Re Muller, Id. 9,912; Re Providence & N. Y. Steamship Co., Id. 11,451.]

This was the case of a petition in bankruptcy by Moses Carlton, of Lancaster, and Albert S. Carlton, of Boston, for an injunction. The petition stated that the petitioners were copartners in trade with Charles P. Wilder, of Newton, and Joseph A. Tilden, of Pepperill, under the firm and style of Carlton, Wilder & Co., having their place of business in Boston; that the petitioners, at a former day, had filed their petition for the purpose of having themselves and said firm declared bankrupt; that when the case of the petitioners was called in court, it was continued on motion of their counsel to enable him to submit a motion in relation thereto, but subsequently, without notice to the petitioners, or their counsel, a decree of bankruptcy was declared against the petitioners, and not against said firm; that the petitioners were informed and believed that since their said petition was filed, and known to be filed by said Charles P. and Joseph A., they had obtained possession of portions of the property of said firm and applied them to their own private purposes; that they had endeavored to obtain other portions of the property of the firm for a like purpose; that they had offered to deliver to one John M. Hollingsworth property belonging to the firm, to pay the debt of said Hollingsworth in full; that said Charles P. and Joseph A. held drafts, notes and property of said firm, of great value, which should be appropriated under said bankruptcy, to the use and benefit of the creditors thereof. Wherefore the petitioners prayed for an injunction upon the said Charles P. and Joseph A., from disposing of any part of the property of the said firm, unless under the order of the court; and for general relief. Upon the presentation of this petition to the district judge, he certified the following question to the circuit court, namely: "Whether a writ of injunction can be granted without previous notice to the said Charles P. Wilder and Joseph A. Tilden, or their attorney."

Edward G. Loring, for petitioners.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I do not think that there is any real difficulty in the question certified; and the learned judge certified it to this court rather as a matter of general practice to be settled in cases of this sort, which are growing numerous, so that a uniform rule may prevail, than from any doubts entertained by him. The district court, sitting in bankruptcy, has general equity jurisdiction, and may summarily do whatever a court of equity may do in the ordinary course of its practice and proceedings. Now, nothing is more common than for a court of equity, in its discretion, to grant an injunction ex parte, without notice to the other side, the injunction, however, to continue only until the other party chooses to appear and contest it, and move for its dissolution. This being clearly, upon principle, the right and duty of the court and the necessity of the prompt interference of the court to prevent irreparable mischiefs being of not infrequent occurrence, there is no reason why the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, may not issue an injunction ex parte in fit cases, in its discretion, unless there be some statute provision, which limits the right, or requires a previous notice to the other party. Indeed, in cases of bankruptcy, it would seem peculiarly fit for the court so to act, for it is impossible that many exigencies should not arise, requiring the immediate interposition of the court to prevent irreparable injury or injustice; and, as the court is always open, no injury can occur to the adverse party by reason of delay, as he may forthwith move for the dissolution of the injunction, as soon as it has been served upon him.

Now, there is no statute of the United States, which imposes the slightest limitation upon the exercise of the power to issue injunctions, or requires notice thereof, unless in cases provided for by the act of congress of the 2d of March, 1793, c. 66 (chapter 22 [1 Story's Laws, 310; 1 Stat. 334, c. 22], § 5), and the act of congress of the 13th of February, 1807, c. 68 (chapter 58 [2 Story's Laws, 1043; 2 Stat. 418, c. 13]). But neither of these statutes has any application to cases in bankruptcy in the district courts, nor, indeed, to any cases except those which are pending in the circuit court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction. The former act requires reasonable notice of the application for an injunction to be given to the adverse party, before the injunction is granted in causes pending in the circuit court. The latter act confers authority on the district judges to grant injunctions in like manner, upon notice, in all cases pending in the circuit court. These acts, therefore do not touch the jurisdiction of the district court in the administration of equity in bankrupt cases. And as they do not contemplate the classes of cases created by the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 441], it is obvious that their provisions are inapplicable to it; and leave the jurisdiction to grant injunctions upon the general practice and principles which govern courts of equity. I shall therefore direct a certificate to the district court, that a writ of injunction can be granted by the district court in bankruptcy without previous notice to the adverse party.

CARLWITZ v. GERMANIA FIRE INS CO.

[12 Ins. Law J. 127.]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. 1883.

INSURANCE — SPECIFIC PROPERTY AND AMOUNTS — WILLFUL BURNING — BURDEN AND MEASURE OF PROOF — WAIVER OF PROOF OF LOSS.

[1. Where insurance is effected in specific amounts, on specific kinds of property, the insured is only entitled to indemnity out of the particular fund intended to indemnify the particular property.]

[2. The burden of proof lies with an insurer, who defends on the ground of a willful burning, to establish the defense by the same degree of proof as is required in other civil cases. He is not required to establish the offense charged beyond a reasonable doubt.]

[See note to Case No. 773.]

[3. Where an insurer refuses to pay a loss on the ground that the policy has been canceled, the necessity of giving proof of loss according to the terms of the policy is dispensed with.]

[At law. Action upon a fire insurance policy. The court charged the jury as follows:]

Mr. Leonard, for plaintiff.
Mr. Chetman, for defendant.

NIXON, District Judge. This is an action on a policy of fire insurance, brought to recover the damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff on account of a fire, which occurred in her grocery store on the morning of Oct. 31, 1880. The policy is dated on the 24th of March, 1880, and recites that, in consideration of ten dollars, the defendant company had insured the plaintiff for the amount of two thousand dollars against loss by fire for the period of one year from the date. The following facts seem to be uncontroverted: Early in the spring of 1880 the husband of the plaintiff rented of the owner a grocery store at the corner of First street and Madison, in the city of Hoboken. In addition to the storehouse, he also rented rooms in the story above for the occupancy of his family, consisting of the plaintiff and one child. In March of the same year, after the grocery store was opened, the husband and the bookkeeper of the defendant company, at its branch office in Hoboken, who was paid for soliciting policies, entered into negotiations in regard to an insurance upon the store goods, store fixtures, and the household furniture on the floor above. The terms of the policy were agreed upon, to wit, fifty cents on the one hundred dollars. It was drawn up, signed, countersigned, executed by the company and delivered to the husband on the 24th of March, 1880. He was acting as the agent of his wife, who is alleged to have been the owner of the property. The policy was issued for two thousand dollars, as follows: $1,200 on the stock of groceries in the store, $300 on the store fixtures and furniture, and $500 on the household furniture, wearing apparel and family stores. Where insurances are thus effected in specific amounts on specific kinds of property, the insured, in case of loss, can only look for indemnity to the particular fund which was intended to indemnify the particular property. Thus, I have heard of no proof of loss of household furniture, and hence the $500, which was taken to insure against loss thereon, may be dismissed from your minds in considering your verdict. The evidence also in regard to the loss from the injury to the store fixtures, embracing the counters and shelving, was very vague and unsatisfactory, but I shall refer to that further on, when I come to the question of damages.

To aid you, gentlemen, in making up your verdict, I will now briefly allude to four questions which the case presents for your consideration: The first one has reference to the origin of the fire; the second to the alleged cancellation of the policy by the company; the third to the need and the sufficiency of the proof of loss; and the fourth to the evidence in regard to the damages.

1. What was the origin of the fire? It has not been distinctly charged, but it was half suggested, that there was fraud in its origin. If any fraud existed, which can be traced to the plaintiff, she is not entitled to recover. You heard the testimony of the police officer who first observed the fire. The facts stated by him were of a character to give rise to grave suspicions; but suspicions are not sufficient. The burden of proof here is upon the defendant corporation, and it must submit to you evidence sufficient to convince you that the plaintiff had knowledge, directly or indirectly, of a willful attempt to burn the property. I do not say that you must be satisfied of this beyond a reasonable doubt, because the old doctrine has been exploded that it requires the same measure of proof, in a civil suit, to warrant the jury in finding that the party willfully burnt his property to defraud the insurance company as it did to convict on an indictment charging that offense. It is now considered a question of preponderating proof. On which side is the weight of evidence? Unless clearly against the plaintiff, it is your duty to find that the fire was accidental or its origin unknown.

2. The next question is whether the company had a right on the 24th of September, 1880, to cancel the policy? The defendant claims the right to cancel, on the ground that the annual premium due for the insurance was ten dollars; that the insured paid five dollars, and upon repeated applications rejected or refused to pay more; that he was formally notified that the company would cancel the policy at the end of six months unless the residue of the premium was paid, and that it was, in fact, canceled on the books of the company in the month of September before the fire. The testimony on this point is very conflicting. Carlwitz, the husband of the plaintiff, on the other hand, states that, whilst he was making inquiries in regard to placing an insurance upon the property, he was approached by a Mr. Niewman, the bookkeeper of the branch office of the defendant company at Hoboken, and who was in the habit, in addition to his other business, of soliciting policies for the company, and that after some negotiations, the agent agreed to issue a policy for one year in the sum of two thousand dollars for the premium of ten dollars—one half of which might be paid in cash and the remaining half in groceries from the plaintiff's store; that he paid the cash when the policy was issued, and received a receipt for $10 in full for the premium, with the understanding that he should fill an order for groceries for the value of five dollars whenever requested; that he had unfortunately lost the receipt, but that he had been willing at all times, and had frequently offered, to supply the groceries according to the contract. This statement is denied by the witnesses of the defendant, and their denial, to some extent at least, seems to be corroborated by circumstances. It is for you to determine where the truth lies, and your verdict must be controlled by the result of your deliberations. If you believe the husband of the plaintiff, then no forfeiture or cancellation of the policy was permissible, because the plaintiff complied with her agreement respecting the payment of the premium. But, if you rather give credence to the testimony of the witnesses for the defendant upon this point, the policy was lawfully canceled on account of the nonpayment of the premium, and you must render a verdict for the defendant.

3. If you find that the policy was unlawfully canceled, you will next inquire into the sufficiency of the proof of loss. The policy requires certain formal proofs to be made by the insured after a fire, before the insurer can be called upon to pay the loss. The defendant presents these proofs here, and says they are insufficient. But, under the facts shown in the case, it is not a material question whether such proofs were offered in proper form or not. The defendant is estopped from raising the question here, inasmuch as it was not suggested before the suit was brought. The undisputed evidence is that the agent of the company, on the morning after the fire, when informed of it, refused to pay anything, upon the distinct ground that the policy had been canceled.

4. As to damages. If you hold that the defendant had no right to cancel the policy, you will then have to consider the question, what sum has the plaintiff proved to you that she ought to have for the loss which she has sustained? The burden of proof here is upon her. The amount of the insurance was $300 on the store fixtures and $1,200 on the stock of groceries. These are the maximum sums that can be awarded, however far beyond them the actual loss extended. And you can only give the amount of loss shown to your satisfaction. I have never known a case of this kind tried where the proof as to the extent of the fire and the real damage done has been left in such an unsatisfactory state. The jury cannot guess at damages. There must be evidence to enable you to form a judgment. The plaintiff, knowing very little about the stock on hand or its value, she relies solely upon the testimony of her husband. You heard his statement, and must base your verdict upon your view of its character, scope and meaning.

In this controversy, gentlemen, the plaintiff is a woman and the defendant a corporation. It is difficult for a jury not to be misled by their prejudice in such a case. Jurors are men, and have a chivalric feeling for the gentler sex. They are also apt to have more or less prejudice against corporations. The court room is no place for any such feeling. Corporations are entitled to the same justice, and to the same application of the principles of the law, as individual citizens. Indeed, a corporation is only a modern contrivance, wherein a number of persons unite their capital together for business purposes, and in all controversies respecting their rights the same law must be administered as if the stockholders, as men, were endeavoring to secure their personal rights. You will therefore look at the case impartially, and render the verdict which you would render if the issue was between man and man. This is no place for sympathy. Courts are organized and juries are summoned to mete out equal and exact justice to all, and where they fail to do this they come short of fulfilling the chief object of their organization.

INTEREST OF WITNESS — ACTION BY PARTNERS — NONJOINDER — EXAMINATION ON VOIR DIRE — EVIDENCE.

1. The court will not compel a witness to testify against his interest in a cause in which he is interested.

2. If all the members of a partnership are not named as plaintiffs, the defendant may avail himself of the objection upon non assumpsit.

3. What a witness says on voir dire is not evidence to the jury.

At law. Assumpsit upon a promissory note indorsed by the defendant [Archibald McLane] to the plaintiffs [Carne and Slade]. Mr. Libby objected to being sworn for the defendants, because interested as a partner with the plaintiffs; and swore upon voir dire that he was interested as a partner. The court refused to compel him to swear contrary to his interest.

The defendant's counsel then objected that the plaintiffs could not recover, because Mr. Libby, being a partner of the firm of Carne & Slade, ought to have been named.

The plaintiffs' counsel, said that the declaration of Libby upon voir dire is not evidence to the jury, and the court so decided. The defendant then offered evidence to prove that Libby was a partner, and prayed the court to instruct the jury that, if they should be satisfied, by legal evidence, that he was a partner in the house of Carne & Slade, at the time of the indorsement of the note, the plaintiffs could not recover; which instruction the court gave as prayed.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—MISTAKE IN INVOICE—PENALTY.

1. Where the consignee of a quantity of corks, imported from France, presented, on their entry, an invoice and entry, both of which were erroneous through mistake, and not through fraud, and immediately discovered the error, and notified the collector of it, and sent to France for a correct invoice, and delivered it to the collector, and requested permission to correct the error, which was refused, and the collector imposed duties on the value as stated in the true invoice, and a penalty for undervaluation, without any appraisal of the goods: Held, that the penalty was illegally imposed, and could be recovered back.

2. The case of Howland v. Maxwell [Case No. 6,799] cited and approved.

[Distinguished in Harriman v. Maxwell, Case No. 6,105.]

At law. This was an action against [Hugh Maxwell] the collector of the port of New York, originally brought in the supreme court of New York, and removed into this court by the defendant, to recover back a penalty for undervaluation, paid by the plaintiffs [Nathaniel Carnes and others] upon an importation of corks from Bordeaux, in November, 1850.

John S. McCulloh, for plaintiffs.

J. Prescott Hall, for defendant.

INGERSOLL, District Judge. An invoice of the corks, in this case, was sent to the plaintiffs, who were the consignees, and was by them presented at the custom house. That invoice was an erroneous one. But the error was occasioned by mistake, and not by fraud. The entry was in conformity to the erroneous invoice, and was also erroneous. The plaintiffs immediately discovered the error, notified the officers of the customs of the same, and sent out to France for a correct invoice. A correct invoice was received by them on the 6th of January, 1851. They delivered it at the custom house, and requested permission to correct the error. The duties were imposed and paid upon the value of the corks as stated in the true invoice, and the penalty for undervaluation was demanded and paid under protest. The protest is regular. There was no appraisal on the entry before the correct invoice was produced, and there was no fraudulent undervaluation. The duties were paid, not upon the appraisal of appraisers, but upon the value set down in the correct invoice. The question is, as to the right of the collector, under the facts, to impose the penalty. Upon a similar state of facts, or upon a state of facts in all essential particulars like the facts in this case, this court, in the case of Howland v. Maxwell [Case No. 6,799], decided that the collector had no such right. That decision must govern this case; and it does not require the aid of that decision to determine that the collector had no such right.

There must be a judgment for the plaintiffs, for the amount of the penalty, with interest, to be adjusted at the custom house.

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1819.

INFORMATION FOR FORFEITURE — ENGAGING IN SLAVE TRADE — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE AGAINST.

1. An act of congress declares, that "no person shall build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise prepare, any ship or vessel, &c., within any port of the U. S., nor shall cause any ship, or vessel, to sail from any port of the U. S., for the purpose of carrying on any trade, or traffic in slaves, to any foreign country," and it declares that "if any ship or vessel, shall be so fitted out, as aforesaid, or shall be caused to sail, as aforesaid, such ship or vessel, &c., shall be forfeited to the U. S." And the second section, inflicts a penalty of $2,000, on any person who shall build, fit out, &c. &c., any such ship or vessel, knowing, or intending that the same shall be so employed. Held, that the forfeiture of the vessel is not incurred by the building of the vessel for the illegal purpose aforesaid, but only for the fitting out, or causing her to sail as aforesaid.

2. An information against the vessel, which charges, "that she was built, fitted, equiped, loaded, or otherwise prepared, &c., or caused to sail," &c., is bad for the uncertainty, as to which of the several offences is charged; and on such information, a sentence of forfeiture ought not to be pronounced.

Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Virginia.

An information was filed in the district court, charging the brig Caroline, with violating the acts of congress, made for the suppression of the slave trade. A sentence of forfeiture was pronounced in the district court, and on a writ of error to the circuit court, the following opinion, reversing the sentence of the district court, was pronounced by

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The Caroline was seized, as being forfeited to the United States, for being concerned in the slave trade, in violation of the acts of 1794, and 1807, or of one of them. 1 Story's Laws, 319 [1 Stat. 347]; 2 Story's Laws, 1050 [2 Stat. 426].

The peculiar odium attached to the traffic, in which this vessel is alleged to have engaged, ought not to affect the legal questions which belong to the case.

The information charges, that the Caroline, "after the 22d day of March, 1794, was built, fitted, equipped, loaded, or otherwise prepared, within a port or place of the said United States, by a citizen, &c., for the purpose of carrying on trade, or traffic in slaves, to a foreign country," &c. There are other counts in the information; but as the observations made on this, apply to them also, it is deemed unnecessary to recite them. The charge contained in this information, is understood to be, that the Caroline was either built, fitted, equipped, loaded, or otherwise prepared, within a port or place of the United States, or that she was caused to sail from a port or place of the United States. It is not alleged, that all these acts were performed, but that some one of them, it is uncertain which, was performed. This information will be strictly and literally true, if the Caroline was either built, fitted, equipped, loaded, or otherwise prepared, within a port or place of the United States. In such a case, it is deemed essential to the validity of the judgment, that it should be such as the law will authorize the court to render, on proof of any one of the acts charged in the information. If any one of two or more acts be innocent, and the information charges that one or the other of them has been committed, it would violate the clearest principles of law, to pronounce judgment against the accused. If the law should inflict forfeiture on a vessel which should sail out of port on a certain day, and an information should charge that a vessel did sail on that day, or did not sail on it, all would concur in declaring that no sentence of forfeiture could be pronounced against such a vessel. So, if several acts be prohibited under several penalties, and on one of them, the penalty of forfeiture be inflicted, the information must charge, in explicit terms, that the particular crime to which the law has annexed forfeiture as a penalty, has been committed, or the court cannot adjudge the thing to be forfeited. If, for example, it be forbidden by statute to build, or fit, a vessel for the slave trade, and to building, or fitting, be annexed, a penalty of $2,000, but to fitting, be superadded a forfeiture of the vessel, the information must charge a "fitting" of the vessel, or the court cannot adjudge her to be forfeited. These positions seem to me to be incontestable. If this be correct, it only remains to inquire whether the statute inflicts forfeiture on each of the offences charged in the information.

The act declares that no person "shall build, fit, equip, load, or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel within any port or place of the United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same, for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves to any foreign country." It is perfectly clear that each of these acts is prohibited; but it is equally clear, that if the law had proceeded no farther, the vessel would not have been forfeitable for either of them. To the legislature it belongs, to define punishment as well as crime, and courts would certainly step very far beyond their province, were they to annex forfeiture to offences, to which the legislature had not annexed that penalty. In order to determine whether all, or any of the offences enumerated in the part of the act, which has been recited, be cause of forfeiture, it will be necessary to examine that part of the law which prescribes the punishment.

The law proceeds to say, "and if any ship or vessel shall be fitted out, as aforesaid, or shall be caused to sail, as aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, her tackle, furniture, apparel, and other appurtenances, shall be forfeited to the United States." The penalty of forfeiture is here annexed only to the act of "fitting out as aforesaid," that is, for traffic in slaves; or to the act of sailing, for the purpose of engaging in that traffic. It is unusual for a legislative act, when it has enumerated certain offences, to vary the language by changing the enumeration, when penalties are to be annexed to those offences, if the intention be to punish them all in the same manner. When a form of expression is used, applicable to the enumeration of several distinct offences, and a penalty is afterwards inflicted on one or more of them, leaving others out of the recital, the mind is drawn to the conclusion, that, in the opinion of the legislature, at least, the offences are distinct, and the punishment is to be different. In legislative acts, we are not accustomed to such a parsimony of words as to expect, where several offences are enumerated, that the legislature, if it means to punish them all in the same manner, will drop several of them in that part of the sentence which recites the offences to be punished, merely to avoid that expenditure of words which would be incurred by repeating the enumeration. If, then, the offences were not materially variant, it would seem to be a fair construction of such an act, to presume that the legislature supposed some distinction to exist between them. But in this case, the offences are totally different from each other. To build a vessel, and to fit out a vessel, are two distinct acts, as clearly separable from each other as any acts whatever. The terms are applied to distinct and different operations. To build a vessel, is to construct her; to fit her out, is to prepare her for sea after she has been constructed, They are no more the same act, than to build a house, and to furnish a house, are the same.

I cannot admit, that the legislature ought to be considered as having omitted the word "built," in that part of the act which enumerates the offences which are cause of forfeiture, from an idea, that the word "fitted out" could apply, in this place, to a vessel "built," but not "fitted out." In addition to the well-established meaning of the words, the clause inflicting forfeiture does itself show, that in using the term "fitted out," the legislature had in contemplation, a vessel equipped for her voyage. The words are, "such ship or other vessel, her tackle, furniture, apparel, and other appurtenances, shall be forfeited to the United States." This is obviously the state of a vessel actually fitted out, but a ship may be built without "tackle, furniture, apparel, and other appurtenances." The second section inflicts a penalty of $2,000 on any person who shall build, fit out, equip, load, or otherwise prepare, or send away, any ship or vessel, knowing, or intending, that the same shall be employed in the trade, or business, prohibited by the act. On an information against the builder of a ship, not concerned in fitting her out, would it be a defence to say, that the legislature used the word "building" in the same sense with the words "fitting out?" and as he had not "fitted out," so he had not built, in the sense in which that term is used in the law. I cannot be mistaken, when I say, that no gentleman of the bar would hazard such a defence. And yet, I cannot perceive the difference between saying, that under the second section, no ship can be considered as built, unless she be fitted out, and saying, that under the third section, the words "built" and "fitted out" have the same meaning.

The plain sense of the law appears to me to be this. In the first section, various offences are enumerated, to two of which, "fitting out," and "sailing," forfeiture is annexed. In the second section, the penalty of $2,000 is inflicted on any person, who, knowingly, commits any one of these offences. As this information charges that one of several offences has been committed, and they are not, in law, each of them cause of forfeiture, I should, so far as I can trust my own judgment, be of opinion, that a sentence of forfeiture ought not to have been pronounced.[2]

Sentence of the district court reversed.

[2] Quaere, would this information have been good, if the section of the act of congress, commented on above, instead of annexing the penalty of forfeiture to two only of the offences enumerated in it, had subjected each of them to the same penalty? The offences prohibited by the act are, the building, fitting, equipping, loading, or otherwise preparing any ship, &c., or causing any ship to sail, &c.; and the information, adopting the phraseology of the law, charged that the brig Caroline "was built, fitted, equipped, loaded, or otherwise prepared, &c." As the act in question is of a highly penal character, it is apprehended that the rules of criminal pleading, in all their strictness, are applicable to proceedings under it except where those rules are founded on mere "technical niceties," "unimportant in themselves," "standing only on precedents, of which the reason cannot be discerned." See 1 Brock. 350 [U. S. v. The Little Charles, Case No. 15,612]. Those rules require, that where two or more offences are enumerated in a statute, to the commission of which, or of either of them, any given penalty is annexed, an indictment, or information founded upon the statute, if it charges more than one of those offences, must charge them conjunctively, though the law itself, in its enumeration, may have connected them by the alternative conjunction, or; and although, in point of fact, proof of any one of them will support an indictment or information. Thus, the Virginia statute against unlawful shooting, &c., affixes a penalty, when the act is done with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, or kill, yet the indictment must charge the intents conjunctively; but though all the intents be laid in the indictment, proof of any one supports the indictment. Angel v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 231. See, also, 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 236. The English statute punishes "forging, or causing to be forged." The indictments must say, "forged and caused, &c." Williams' Case, 1 Leach, 529. So the statute says, "cut or deface;" but the indictment must charge them conjunctively. Black Act, Crown Cir. Comp. 82. "Black or otherwise disguise;" "forge, or counterfeit;" "acquittance, or receipt;" "indictment." 2 East, P. C. 923, 934. So in indictments under the Coventry act. 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 787; 1 East, P. District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1867.

MARITIME LIENS AGAINST FREIGHT — ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—GARNISHMENT BY STATE COURT.

1. It is no good defence to a petition that freight may be brought into the admiralty court to answer the exigency of suits for mariners' wages and materials which are a charge on the freight, that the consignee, before the libels were filed, was summoned as trustee or garnishee of the ship-owner in a court of common law.

[See Wall v. The Royal Saxon, Case No. 17,093.]

2. The courts of common law of Massachusetts have no power to adjust maritime liens upon a fund attached under the foreign attachment law of that state, and the consequence of giving priority to such an attachment might be the destruction of the liens. The court of common law would be bound to guard against this consequence by discharging the supposed trustee, or by waiting till the liens were adjusted; and this court may proceed to adjust them, and may order the freight to be brought in for that purpose.

[Cited in Ross v Bourne, 14 Fed. 860.]

3. Such a course involves no conflict of jurisdiction, and is not inconsistent with the decisions in Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583, and Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450.

In admiralty. Three libels were brought against the brig Caroline and her freight, one for wages and two for supplies and materials, and the value of the vessel was shown to be insufficient. The Boston Gas Light Company, owners and consignees of the cargo, being required to show cause, under the 38th admiralty rule of the supreme court, why the freight should not be brought in to answer the exigency of the suit, appeared under protest, and showed that they had been summoned as trustees of the ship-owner, in the superior court of the commonwealth before the filing of the libels.

C. T. Russell, for the freighters. This court has no jurisdiction to make the order prayed for, because the money is already in the custody of a court of the state. By Gen. St. Mass. c. 142, § 21, this process is an attachment, which brings the case within the decisions of Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583, and Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450.

H. W. Muzzey and R. R. Bishop, for the several libellants.

LOWELL, District Judge. The decision in Taylor v. Carryl [supra], as explained in Freeman v. Howe [supra], and in Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 334, does not operate to defeat the paramount maritime liens, but only to delay their enforcement, because the sheriff can sell only the right of the ship-owner, subject to those liens; the practical effect of which I find to be that the sheriff usually waives his possession when libels are filed for maritime liens, because his title becomes of little or no market value. So that we have come back pretty much to the practice which prevailed before the leading case was decided. If that doctrine applies to an attachment of credits, its application in any given case may have the effect to destroy the maritime liens, because after the money has once been paid over by the freighter on due process of law, the remedy of the lien-holders will be very difficult of enforcement, to say the least. Judge Blatchford has refused to extend the rule to such a case as this; and has stated very forcibly the hardship which would follow such an application of it. The Sailor Prince [Case No. 12,218].

I have come to a like conclusion upon a consideration of the nature and effect of our foreign attachment law. By that law it is, indeed, enacted that the credits shall be considered attached, and be held to respond to the final judgment in the same manner as goods or estate when attached by the ordinary process. But in point of fact there is no possession taken by the sheriff, but merely an order served on the trustee to show cause why the judgment, when recovered, should not be satisfied out of the credits of the judgment debtor in his hands. If he answers that the credits are not due to the principal defendant, but to some one else, he must be discharged. And if he pays over to the adverse holder in the mean time, he is not in contempt, but is merely paying at his own risk, and the sheriff has nothing whatever to do about it. It follows that the fund is not really in the custody of the court, or of its officers, and that our trustee process is very different in this respect from the foreign attachment of the ship in the principal case, which was what we call in Massachusetts by the mere name of attachment. Our process does not undertake to impair obligations already existing, and if it appears that there are such obligations sufficient to exhaust the whole fund, the trustee must be discharged. True, there is a provision for permitting claimants of the fund to appear, but this is only for the purpose of protecting the trustee; there is no power to adjust and liquidate the adverse claims, and no process for their payment, but merely a course of proceeding which may bar the adverse claimant thereafter in any suit by by him against the trustee, if his claim should be disallowed. It may be maintained with much plausibility that a credit which is incumbered is not liable to attachment. The general doctrine, in Massachusetts, is that incumbered goods cannot be attached. Badlam v. Tucker, 1 Pick. 399. This rule has been modified by statute, but in a mode which carefully preserves the rights of the holder of any mortgage pledge or lien, and requires payment to be made to him within ten days after notice. Gen. St. c. 123, § 62 et seq. There are no analogous provisions for credits that are pledged or incumbered; and it seems to me that it would be the duty of the court of common law, on proof that a fund was so incumbered, to discharge the trustee. In the case at bar, if the gas company answers to the trustee process, as it is bound to do on notice, that the fund in its possession is not due to the owners but to the master, who has a lien on it for wages and disbursements, the trustee must be discharged, for the master in such a case is like a factor who has made advances on the goods consigned to him, and has a right to collect the price of them. Lewis v. Hancock, 11 Mass. 72; Richardson v. Whiting, 18 Pick. 530; Manter v. Holmes, 10 Metc. [Mass.] 402. And it can make no difference that the master is passive and the persons applying to the court are the sailors themselves, and others through whom the master derives his lien. If it should appear that the amount of the liens on the fund were not sufficient to absorb it entirely, the court of common law would perhaps have the right, if the statute under which the process is brought can be construed to extend to such a case, to charge the trustees to the extent of the surplus, but even that could not be done until the only court that has original jurisdiction of these maritime liens can adjust and liquidate them, so as to ascertain whether any thing will remain liable to the attachment, and this cannot lawfully be done by the court of admiralty until the fund is before it. So that unless the order now prayed for can be passed, each court must forever await the action of the other. The court of admiralty, on the other hand, can adjust and marshal all the liens, including that by the attachment, and can order any surplus to be paid into the superior court, or to be held to abide its action.

Upon the question of a supposed conflict of jurisdiction, an important case in England is very much in point, where to a suit by ship-owner against freighter, for the freight money, it was held by three courts, including the highest, to be a good plea in bar, that, since action brought, the freighter had been required to pay the money into the court of admiralty, and had paid it accordingly. Place v. Potts, 8 Exch. 705, 10 Exch. 370, and 5 H. L. Cas. 383.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—SECURITY FOR COSTS.

Where seamen served a few days on board a vessel in the port of New York, but did not sign shipping articles, and were paid for the time they served and were discharged, and left the vessel without objection, but libelled the vessel to recover damages for the breaking up of a voyage for which, as they alleged, they had been hired, and process was issued in their favor against the vessel without their giving security for costs, and the claimants applied for an order that they file security for costs: Held, that their claim was not a claim for wages, within the meaning of rule 45 of this court, and that, therefore, they must file security for costs.

[See note at end of case.]

In admiralty. This was a motion on behalf of the claimants of the schooner Caroline and Cornelia, that the libellants file security for costs, the process in their favor having issued against the vessel without their having filed such security, on the theory that they were seamen suing an American vessel for their wages. [Motion granted.]

A. Nash, for libellants.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. By rule 44 of this court, no process in rem can be issued unless a stipulation for costs in $250 is first given by the libellant. But, by rule 45, "seamen suing in rem for wages in their own right, and for their own benefit, for services on board American vessels," are not required to give such security in the first instance, although the court may, for adequate cause, on motion, with notice to the libellant, after the arrest of the property, order the usual stipulation to be given in such case, or that the property arrested be discharged.

In the present case the libellants are seamen, and sue in rem an American vessel, but the suit is not one for wages, within the meaning of rule 45. It is a suit for compensation for special damages for the breaking up of a voyage before it began, and for an alleged breach of contract to employ them on a voyage. They never signed shipping articles. They served a few days in the port of New York, on board of the vessel, and were paid in full their wages for those days, and were then discharged, without objection on their part. They did not leave port in the vessel, or enter on any voyage on board of her. The distinction between wages and a claim for compensation for special damages, under circumstances like those in the present case, is well settled (2 Pars. Mar. Law, 573); and rule 45 confines the exception in favor of seamen to those suing in rem for wages for "services on board" an American vessel. Here the seamen were paid in full for all services on board of the vessel, and they sue now for an alleged breach of contract, because they were not allowed to render further services on board. The motion that the libellants enter into the usual stipulation under rule 44, is granted.

[NOTE. Seamen are privileged suitors in admiralty, and should not be required to give security for costs. Wicks v. Ellis, Case No. 17,614. Nonage of a seaman will not change the rule, nor will security be required of his guardian or next friend. Id. The reason for the privilege, however, is not because they are a favored class, but because they are usually unable, for various reasons, to furnish security. Polydore v. Prince, Id. 11,257; The Arctic, Id. 509a. But the security may be required if the ability to give it is proved. Wheatley v. Hotchkiss, Id. 17,483. Where the seaman has been paid off by a United States shipping commissioner, there is a presumption that his just demands have been discharged, and, if he files a libel thereafter, security may be required. The Niveto, Id. 10,279. If a seaman libels the vessel to enforce an agreement extraneous the contract for wages, his position is that of an ordinary suitor, to whom the rule as to security will apply. DEMURRAGE—FREIGHT NOT EARNED—LOSS OF VESSEL.

Under a contract of affreightment containing no provision that the payment of demurrage shall depend upon the earning of freight, demurrage for extra detention at an intermediate port of an entire voyage becomes absolutely due at such port, and it is recoverable though the vessel is lost in the return voyage.

[In admiralty. Libel for demurrage by the owners of the Caroline A. White.]

CADWALADER, District Judge. This is a suit for demurrage, under a charter-party for a voyage from Philadelphia to Cuba, and back to Philadelphia, New York or Boston. As to freight, the stipulations of the charter-party were, for the purposes of the case, the same, in effect, as if a single freight had been payable for the entire voyage. The vessel was to be dispatched as soon as possible, and in no event to be detained beyond fifteen days. For loading and discharging in Cuba, thirty lay days were allowed. The charter-party contained the words "demurrage, if any be incurred, twenty-five dollars per day." The vessel having been detained in Cuba more than thirty lay days, the libellants demand for this extra detention, demurrage at the stipulated rate. On the return voyage the vessel and her cargo were totally lost at sea. Therefore no freight was earned. The libellants insist that the demurrage is nevertheless due. Their demand for it is contested on the ground that the demurrage and freight, together, composed an entire compensation for the use of the vessel for the voyage, and that, as the voyage has not been performed, no part of this compensation has been earned. This objection is not sustainable, if it rests on a simple assumption that the demurrage was only a compensation to the owners of the vessel for their loss of opportunity to earn another freight. In support of the objection, a judicial dictum that "demurrage is only an extended freight," has been cited. See 4 Taunt. 52, 55. But this definition of demurrage is too narrow. Demurrage includes also compensation for the hazard of all such injuries and losses as may be caused by departure, in point of time, from the regular course of the intended voyage. Thus the compensation is not single but twofold. The dictum above mentioned may have been occasionally repeated; but judgments have also been pronounced in contested cases upon the ground that demurrage is not included in the most extended meaning of the simple word "freight." See 4 Taunt. 1; 1 Barn. & Adol. 118, 122; 4 El. & Bl. 945; 5 El. & Bl. 589. The damages for extra detention, which are payable under the name of demurrage, are usually, as in the present case, liquidated at a certain daily rate or sum. Were they not thus liquidated, their legal measure would often be questionable. Whether the extra delay had been the proximate cause, or too remote a cause, of unforeseen losses from political occurrences, from fluctuations of markets, or from periodical changes of climate, or of currents of wind or water, might become questions of almost constant recurrence. One of these questionable effects might sometimes be the loss of the vessel herself, and incidentally that of the freight for the voyage. When the rate of demurrage is liquidated, the character of the damage and of such hazards is nevertheless to be regarded. Their character would be disregarded if the recovery of the sum substituted for them were dependent upon the subsequent performance of the voyage. At a port of primary departure, a liability for demurrage may be incurred before any commencement of navigation. In another case of not unfrequent occurrence, the contract of affreightment requires the intended voyage to commence at a port where the vessel is not, and stipulates that she shall proceed thither for the purpose of performing the voyage. Under such a contract, any demurrage at this port of primary destination resembles demurrage at a port of primary departure. In either case the period of retardment is not a part of the time of navigation. See Poth. Charte Partie, art. 85. In each case the demurrage becomes absolutely due, independently of any question whether freight is afterwards earned. At a port of ultimate destination, a vessel detained with her cargo on board more than the stipulated number of lay days, or, in the absence of a stipulation, delayed beyond a reasonable time, becomes a mere substitute for a warehouse on shore. In such a case, freight is not earned until the demurrage begins to accrue. This was decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in a case in which the vessel and cargo were wholly lost during the lay days. But Chief Justice Tilghman gave no opinion what the law would have been if she had been detained by the hirer beyond the lay days, and the loss had happened while demurrage was accruing. 4 Bin. 299, 308. The proposition that, if detention by the hirer prevented the discharge of the cargo, the freight would have become absolutely due so soon as the demurrage began to accrue, was consistent with the decision, and with all the reasoning in support of it. The decision and reasoning are also consistent with the proposition as to demurrage, that if she had been lost with her lading while the demurrage was accruing, it would have been recoverable to the time of such loss. In the present case, the extra detention was at an intermediate port of an entire voyage. The demurrage in question may, therefore, be regarded as having, in a certain sense, accrued in the course of navigation. In this respect the case may be distinguishable from the others which have been mentioned. But, is the distinction attended with any difference which is material to the question for decision? The definition of demurrage does not essentially require that the extra detention shall have been exclusively in port. Formerly vessels intended for the trade monopolized by the British East India Company, were built under contracts by which the owners engaged to let them to freight to that company for several voyages, upon the terms of their printed charter-parties for vessels employed in their service. Thus an exclusive employment of the vessels in it for many years, was provided for before they were built. Lord Mansfield said of the company's printed charter-party, that it was "an old instrument informal, and, by the introduction of different clauses at different times, inaccurate, and sometimes contradictory;" adding that, "like all mercantile contracts, it ought to have a liberal interpretation." 1 Doug. 277. See 1 Taunt. 463; 3 Doug. 419; 4 Doug. 28; and the forms in the English editions of Montefiore's Precedents, from which those in 4 Chit. Commer. Law, 269–317, are taken. In this instrument, the compensation payable by the company to the shipowner was described, in part as freight, and in part as demurrage, the former being a certain sum per ton for the regular period of the voyage, and the latter a certain sum per day for further detention, with no discrimination, whether the liability for either was incurred from the use or detention of the vessel in port, or at sea. It was expressly provided, that the company should not be liable for any of the sums agreed to be paid for freight, or for demurrage, unless the vessel should return to the Thames, and safely deliver her cargo to the company. This proviso was qualified in the later charter-parties by certain exceptions. Before their introduction a vessel had been chartered by the company, with an option to load her homewards within three months after her arrival in India, or to detain her there for a year longer at certain rates of demurrage. She arrived in India, and remained there in the company's employment for the fifteen months; after which the master notified them that unless they would allow demurrage, according to the rates of the charter-party, be protested against them for all damages, loss of time or other accidents. The company thereupon agreed in writing, that the owner of the vessel should be allowed demurrage, for so long a time as she should be detained in their service in India. She was detained accordingly, and while employed there in the company's service was wholly lost in a storm. In a suit by her owner against the company, the questions were, whether he was entitled to recover by reason of her not having been dispatched or laden homeward, at the expiration of the fifteen months from her arrival outward; and, if not, whether he was entitled to demurrage. After several arguments the company offered, by way of compromise, to pay the demurrage to the time of her loss, "which was accepted; after which Lord Mansfield declared the court was very clear that the plaintiffs were entitled to no more; but declined giving any other opinion." 1 W. Bl. 291. The report of the case is a little obscure. The point in doubt under the second question probably was, whether the proviso in the charter-party, placing demurrage on the same footing with freight, was applicable to demurrage accruing after the period of extra detention, to which the stipulations of the charter party had been applicable. If this was the point on which the court would not express an opinion, it may be inferred that if the charter party had contained no such proviso, there would not have been any difficulty in recovering demurrage to the time of the loss of the vessel. In that case, her loss, though it would have been fatal to the claim for freight, would not have been an obstacle to the claim for demurrage.

The case of an occasional charter party, like the present, when the extra detention has occurred at an intermediate port of an entire voyage, is more simple. The master usually receives the demurrage money there, and applies it to the expenses incurred through such detention. There is no trace, I believe, of an action, or claim, by the hirer of the vessel against her owner for the restoration of such money, on account of a subsequent loss of the vessel and cargo. Such actions have, on the contrary, been maintained where advances have been made in anticipation of freight to be earned. 4 Barn. & Ald. 582. Such advances are distinguished in the cases on the subject from freight payable in advance. The latter is due whether the voyage is afterwards performed or not. 4 Maule & S. 37. This appears to have been understood as the rule in England concerning freight, for nearly two centuries. 2 Show. 283; 3 Barn. & Adol. 450, 451. The words usually contained in the demurrage clause of a formal English charter party, seem to preclude the hirer of a vessel, who has paid the demurrage at an intermediate port from afterwards reclaiming it, if the voyage is not performed. Such demurrage is usually made payable at a certain pecuniary rate per day, for each and every day of the extra detention in port. That these words are expressive of the meaning which would be implied without them, and are not interpretable as creating a special contract, of a peculiar character, appears upon a comparison of these formal charter parties, with what are called in the notarial formularies, memorandums of charter. The memorandum of charter, which is intended to have the same effect as the more formal contract of affreightment, does not contain the words, "for each and every day," but simply ascertains the rate per day. No difference can have been intended to arise from the omission of the former words. Therefore none should be implied. This remark is perhaps important because, in the United States, memorandums of charter are constantly met with in both forms. They sometimes, after ascertaining the number of lay days, provide that "in case the vessel is longer detained," the hirer shall pay to the owner "demurrage at the rate of" so much "per day, day by day, for every day so detained, provided such detention shall happen by default of the hirer or his agent." In other instances, as in the present case, the succinct expression demurrage at so much per day is substituted.

The legal application of a word should always be uniform unless a necessary reason for modifying its application can be shown. A contrary rule would produce uncertainties from which multiplied litigations might ensue. Demurrage understood in the sense of compensation for extra delay in a port of primary departure, incurred, as has already been said, before the commencement of navigation, must be recoverable, though the vessel should be afterwards lost. We have seen that there is no necessary reason that the demurrage, at an intermediate port, should be considered as dependent upon the subsequent earning of the freight. The fair inference from the use of the word demurrage is to the contrary. A different intention, where it exists, may be declared by an express provision of the contract of affreightment, as was done in a recent instance (1 Scott, N. R. 340), and in the charter parties of the East India Company, which have been mentioned.

The decree should therefore be for the libellants.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—OPENING DEFAULT.

[After the majority of a crew had obtained satisfaction of their claims against a vessel, in admiralty, another seaman libeled the vessel, and obtained a decree by default. On motion to confirm the master's report, the claimants moved to set aside the default, and for leave to answer, on the ground that since the filing of the libel they had discovered that libellant had contracted personally with the master, who was navigating the vessel upon "a lay." Held, that the default should be opened, and claimants allowed to be heard upon the merits.]

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for claimants.

W. K. Woodman, for libellant.

BETTS, District Judge. The first of the above causes came to hearing upon an order on the libellant to show cause why the default entered therein should not be set aside, and the claimants be allowed to intervene, and answer the libel filed in the cause. The second case comes up on a motion by the libellant to confirm the report made by a commissioner under an interlocutory order in his favor. The demand of the libellant in the action is for wages earned as cook and steward upon the schooner Caroline Casey on a voyage upon the high seas, between January, 1857, and March, 1858, amounting to the sum of $66.86. The proceedings on his part were carried forward to a default, upon which a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the amount due was had, and a report was rendered finding a balance of $—— due the libellant for those services. Other members of the crew had previously instituted suit against the vessel to recover their wages on the same voyage, had obtained a decree therefor, and satisfaction of their several demands, when, as is now alleged by those interposing as claimants against this demand, it was discovered by them that the master of the vessel had possession of, and navigated her during the voyage upon a "lay," and that the crew, including the libellant, had contracted with him personally for the voyage, knowing that he was bound to pay their wages, and that the vessel and her owners were not responsible for the charge. This fact is strenuously denied by depositions on the part of the libellant, but it is not the habit of the court to dispose of the merits of a case summarily on affidavits alone, when they are in conflict in material allegations; on the contrary, it will, almost as matter of course, in such cases, exact proper issues in pleading between the parties, and the presentation of full proof, with such legal formalities as shall clothe them with the highest solemnity and sanction.

The libellant has chosen to conduct a separate action for the recovery of his wages without availing himself of the opportunity afforded him to unite his claim with that of his shipmates, under prosecutions when his suit was commenced, and the present claimants offer equitable reasons for interposing at this time a defence upon the merits to this claim, thus put forward in a distinct action. It is not charged in the libel that there was any express lien upon the vessel stipulated for by the libellant in his contract in this case. He relies upon the presumption of the maritime law that the debt carried with it the responsibility of the vessel for its satisfaction. The efficiency heretofore accorded that presumption, must perhaps be now deemed to have been greatly diminished, if not in effect abrogated, by the judgment of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22. The decision was made by a court strongly divided upon the great feature of the case,—the operation and effect of presumptive liens, in respect to debts contracted by masters sailing vessels "in lays;" that is, under obligation to the owner, known to the creditor who deals with the master, that the master was to man and furnish the vessel. A doctrine had obtained in some of the common law courts of the states, arising, it is believed, out of principles of local legislation, that such special management in the disposition of a vessel, relieved her actual owner from liability for debts which under the maritime law would become liens upon the vessel, unless the creditor proved that he was ignorant of such special disposition of the vessel, and gave credit in reliance upon the responsibility of her owner. 5 Pick. 422; 16 Mass. 337; 6 Pick. 335; 7 Greenl. (Me.) 261; 26 Me. 185. These authorities seem to have satisfied the judge of the United States circuit court in the Massachusetts district—Webb v. Pierce [Case No. 17,320]—that the principle pervaded the maritime law also, and his opinion was apparently adopted and approved in the circuit court of the second circuit. Mott v. Ruckman [Id. 9,881]. It is difficult to distinguish the case of a seaman claiming a lien for wages from that of material men, as both privileges spring out of a common necessity and supposed policy, and are enforced upon the strength of a mere presumption, and do not require, for support, any specific hypothecation of the vessel. It is important that the rule be considered, and its application to liability in rem, and, if it be identical in regard to ships and owners, then the claimants should be allowed opportunity to demand the judgment of the court whether the libellant has here a legal cause of action against this schooner. The legal liability of the vessel, in such instances, rests upon the same principle, whether the credit was given the master for necessities furnished in equipping the ship or in manning her. In either case the ship owner will relieve her from liability to the debt, by proof that the credit was given to the master personally, although, in respect to the wages of seamen, courts may be more astute and rigorous in demanding unequivocal evidence that the privilege of security upon the vessel was waived, than in the mere sale of merchandise for her use and service. It is not important, on this motion, to discuss minutely the principles of law which enter into the constitution of the rule. It will be time enough to ascertain what are its dubious, and what its unquestionable, ingredients and applications, when the facts appertaining to this contract are placed distinctly before the court. I think the parties in interest in the vessel are not precluded by any laches on their side from being heard on the merits of the proposed defence. I shall therefore order that the default in favor of the libellant, taken in this cause, be set aside, on payment of costs by the claimants, and their entering their appearance in the cause, according to the due course of the court, and filing forthwith their answer, and accepting notice of trial in the cause, for the ensuing term of December. And it is also further ordered that the motion in the second above entitled cause be suspended until the further order of the court therein.

Case No. 2,422.

The CAROLINE E. KELLY.

[2 Abb. (U. S.) 160;[1] 7 Phila. 570; 27 Leg. Int. 212.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. June 13, 1870.

MERCHANT SEAMEN—DESERTION.

1. A seaman, by the consent, and with the assistance of the mate, but unknown to, and without the permission of the master, who was on board, left the vessel. Held, that the seaman was not guilty of desertion, nor liable to the forfeiture of the arrears of his wages.

2. A seaman leaving a vessel under such circumstances is discharged; and if such discharge occurs in a foreign port, he is entitled to three months' extra wages, under section 2 of the act of February 28, 1803 [2 Stat. 203], in addition to the arrears of his stipulated wages.

[Cited in Gove v. Judson, 19 Fed. 524.]

3. When the absence of a seaman from his vessel is set up to affect him prejudicially, the permission of the temporary commanding officer must be taken as giving a sanction which prevents the penalty for desertion from attaching.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.]

This was a libel in rem by Patrick Doherty, a seaman on board of the brig Caroline E. Kelly, against that vessel, to recover arrears of wages, and also three months' extra wages, two-thirds thereof to be paid to himself and the other third to remain for the use of the United States, under the act of February 28, 1803, § 2, which provides that whenever a ship or vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, shall be sold in a foreign country, and her company discharged, or when a seaman or mariner, a citizen of the United States, shall, with his own consent, be discharged in a foreign country, it shall be the duty of the master or commander to produce to the consul, vice-consul, commercial agent, or vice-commercial agent, the list of his ship's company certified as aforesaid; and to pay to such consul, vice-consul, commercial agent, or vice-commercial agent, for every seaman or mariner so discharged, being designated on such list as a citizen of the United States, three months' pay, over and above the wages which may then be due to such mariner or seaman; two-thirds thereof to be paid by such consul or commercial agent, to each seaman or mariner so discharged, upon his engagement on board of any vessel to return to the United States, and the other remaining third to be retained for the purpose of creating a fund for the payment of the passages of seamen or maimed citizens of the United States, who may be desirous of returning to the United States, and for the maintenance of American seamen who may be destitute and may be in such foreign port.

The district court decreed in favor of libelant, whereupon respondent [Rezin A. Robinson] appealed. [Case not reported.]

The facts which governed the decision of the case are sufficiently set forth in the opinion.

Morton P. Henry, for appellant.
George P. Rich, for respondent.[2]

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The decisive question in this case is one of fact, and under the direct and uncontradicted proofs, it is not of difficult solution. On January 18, 1870, the libelant shipped as seaman on the brig Caroline E. Kelly, of which the respondent is master, at the wages of twenty-five dollars per month, for a voyage from Mobile to Matanzas, Cuba, and thence to any port north of Cape Hatteras. The vessel sailed immediately, and duly reached Matanzas. While she was in the harbor of that place, the libelant's finger became painfully sore, so as measurably to unfit him for duty. Difficulties having occurred between him and the master during the voyage, and his finger growing worse, he was told by the first mate, that, by going into cold weather, he might lose his hand, and probably his life, that he ought to go to Havana and get into the hospital, and that if he wished, he, the mate, would give him an opportunity to leave the vessel, and would pay his passage to Havana. Within a day or two afterwards he was called up by the mate at a very early hour in the morning, while the master was in bed, was taken ashore in the ship's boat by the mate, accompanied to the railroad, put on the cars, and his fare paid to Havana. This occurred February 16th, and on the 18th the vessel sailed for the United States. The mate on that day made an entry in the log-book that "Pat, a seaman, had deserted." Under these circumstances, even if a proper entry of libelant's absence had been made in the log-book, it is plain that the crime of desertion is not to be imputed to him, and that the arrears of his wages were not forfeited.

Was he discharged with his own consent within the meaning of the act of congress of February 28, 1803? Although at the time the libelant left the vessel the master was aboard, yet the mate was actually in command, and was, therefore, temporarily invested with the functions of a commanding officer. The care of the ship and the government and management of the crew were necessarily within the scope of his authority, while he was potentially in charge of both. His acts are to be considered as constructively the acts of the master, pro hac vice. Whatever may be the extent of his authority, or of his accountability to his employers for an abuse of it, the seamen are subject to his direction, and his permission of an act to be done by any of them is sufficient to divest it of the character, and rescue it from the punitive consequences of a willful and insubordinate violation of duty. So far, then, as the absence of a seaman from his vessel is set up to affect him prejudicially, the permission of the temporary commanding officer must be taken as giving it an authorized sanction.

Here the libelant left the vessel, not only with the knowledge and consent, but by the distinct advice and procurement, and with the indispensable assistance of the officer in charge at the time, and was sent away to a distant place without the means of returning before the vessel sailed if he had desired to do so. Nor can the effect of these facts be averted by the respondent's alleged ignorance of the libelant's intended withdrawal, especially as he did not manifest any earnest or unequivocal disapproval of the conduct of the mate, but at once proceeded to employ another seaman, and sailed on the return voyage, without taking any steps whatever to reclaim the libelant.

Under all the evidence, in furtherance of the humane object of the act of 1803, we must hold that the libelant was discharged. This having been done in a foreign port, and with his consent, it follows that he is entitled to recover the three months' wages allowed by that act, in addition to the arrears of his stipulated wages, and the whole case was rightly decided by the learned judge of the district court. Decree accordingly.

[And now, June 13th, 1870, this case having been brought into this court by appeal by the respondent from the decree of the district court, and having been heard on the pleadings and proofs, and having been argued by the advocates of the respective parties, and due deliberation being had in the premises, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the libelant, Patrick Doherty, recover from the respondent, Rezin A. Robinson, and his stipulators, for arrears and three months' wages, the sum of eighty dollars (of which sum twenty-five dollars to be paid into the registry of this court) with costs, not exceeding sixty dollars.][3]

E. D. Sohier, for appellant.

Mr. Scudder, contra.

Before CURTIS, Circuit Justice, and SPRAGUE, District Judge.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from a decree of the district court in a cause of collision. [Case unreported.] The facts, as they appear to me upon the proofs, are, that about three o'clock, p. m., on the seventh of December, 1853, the schooner Levant, of the burden of sixty-five tons, left the lower outside berth on the north side of the T wharf in Boston, having her mainsail and jib set and her foresail partly hoisted; and having been swung clear of the wharf, with a range line, was rowed by her sweeps, assisted slightly by a very light draft of air from the westward, in a south-easterly direction; and in the space of about ten minutes had proceeded about three hundred feet from the wharf. The ship Carolus, of the burden of five hundred and eighty-one tons, having a steam tug lashed to her larboard side, left the end of Lewis's wharf, distant five hundred and eighty-seven feet from the T wharf, soon after the Levant left the T wharf, and, towed by the tug, proceeded also in a south-easterly direction, passed inside of a schooner at anchor off the end of Commercial wharf, and in attempting to go outside of the Levant, her main yard caught the leach rope of the Levant's mainsail, slewed the Levant round into collision with the ship, stove her boat, injured her mainsail, and inflicted other damage. The Levant, at the time of the collision, had not such steerage way as to be fairly under command of her helm. The ship had steerage way and could be handled, though not with much rapidity and precision. On this state of facts it could hardly be doubted that the ship was in the wrong. Two vessels, being on the same course, the one ahead dependent on sweeps and sails, in almost a dead calm, and the other coming up with her by the aid of steam, it is clear the latter should seasonably take such measures as to avoid a collision. And the counsel for the claimant, without controverting this position, has endeavored to show that some other facts existed which relieve the ship from the imputation of negligence.

It is pleaded, that when the Carolus left her berth at Lewis's wharf, there was no obstacle in the way, except the schooner which lay at anchor off Commercial wharf; that it was then judicious and proper for the ship to go inside of that schooner; that while doing so, the Levant came suddenly out of the dock, and stood directly across the path of the Carolus; that it was then too late to go outside the schooner at anchor, and there was not depth of water to keep a course as far southerly as the ship was then steering; and that, consequently, the only thing which the Carolus could do, was to go outside of the Levant; and that this would have been successfully accomplished if the crew of the Levant had coöperated in the attempt, by putting her helm to the larboard, and her main boom to starboard, and had hauled away the jib and stopped sweeping. That they did none of these things, and to their neglect, therefore, the collision is attributable. But I am not satisfied of the correctness of these positions. In my judgment the evidence shows, that the Levant came away from the wharf some minutes before the Carolus started; that she was where she ought to have been seen and regarded by the Carolus, when the latter left Lewis's wharf; that the Levant did not come out of the dock suddenly, but in a usual and prudent manner. And I attribute it as a fault on the part of the Carolus, that, either the Levant was not seen till after the course inside the schooner at anchor had been taken, or if seen, that the Carolus attempted a hazardous manoeuvre, which was unsuccessful and caused the damage. Nor do I find, upon the proofs, that the omission of the people of the Levant to coöperate in the movement of the Carolus was negligence. I think they had reason to believe the Carolus would keep her course and go inside of them, until it was too late to do any more than they did. It is true the pilot of the Carolus thought there was not at the moment, (an hour's flood,) depth of water to go inside; but this was not known to those on board the Levant; and has been ascertained now only by careful soundings. I think, therefore, they were not in fault.

It was pleaded in the answer, that the Carolus was under the sole charge and direction of a pilot, duly licensed to act in that capacity by the public authorities of the state of Massachusetts. If the pilot in charge of this ship had not been selected and employed by the owner, but had been received by the master in obedience to a requisition of law, enforced by a penalty, then, under the authority of Carruthers v. Sydebotham, 4 Maule & S. 77, and The Maria, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 95; The Agricola, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 10, the owners would seem not to be liable for the misconduct or mismanagement of the pilot. But in this instance the pilot has testified that he was employed by the owner of the ship; and no such case is made by the answer as would compel an owner to receive a pilot on board under the statute laws of Massachusetts. The case stands, therefore, upon the general rule of the law of the admiralty, unaffected by statute provisions; and this renders the vessel liable for a collision, attributable to the pilot's mismanagement. The case of The Neptune, 1 Dod. 467, is directly in point, and though this decision has been overruled by Sir William Robinson, in the case of The Protector, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 45, it was solely on the ground that the general admiralty laws had been superseded by an act of parliament, which had escaped the notice of Sir William Scott when he decided the case of The Neptune; and it is in terms stated, that the decision correctly declares the law as it stood before that act. The same rule, as held by courts of common law, may be found in Yates v. Brown, 8 Pick. 23, and the cases there cited. And in Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28, it is said to be undoubtedly the law.

The result is, that the decree of the district court must be affirmed, with costs, and damages at the rate of six per centum per annum from its date.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—OBJECTION TO QUANTITY OF WORK DONE AFTER TIME SPECIFIED.

Under the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, the final estimate of the engineer, of the amount and value of the work done by the plaintiff, was to be conclusive, unless objected to within twenty days. The plaintiff, within the twenty days, objected to the estimate of the price, but not of the quantity of the work. He cannot, after the twenty days, object to the estimate of the quantity of the work done. It is conclusive between the parties.

At Law. Assumpsit [by John Carothers against the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company] for work and labor upon the canal.

A final estimate was made by Rodier, an engineer, and objected to by the plaintiff, within the twenty days allowed by the contract; but his objection was only to the price, not to the quantity, of the excavation. The board of directors, according to the terms of the contract, referred the estimate to Cruger, another engineer, who confirmed the estimate of Rodier. The plaintiff now complains that the quantity of excavation allowed is too small, as well as the price, and has brought his action for the difference, which he claims, both as to price and quantity.

Mr. Brent, for the plaintiff, contended that the decision of Cruger is not binding on the plaintiff, because he had not notice to attend the engineer, who was to be considered as an arbitrator, and whose award has been given ex parte.

But THE COURT overruled the objection; being of opinion that the plaintiff is, by his contract, bound by the decision of Cruger. THE COURT was also of opinion that the final estimate was equally conclusive as to extra work.

INSURANCE — EFFECT OF ADJUDICATION IN BANKRUPTCY — MARSHAL'S FEES — DISBURSEMENTS BY ASSIGNEE.

transfer of the policy to the register in charge of the bankruptcy proceedings, until an assignee shall have been appointed, and may also transfer said policy to the assignee when appointed. It is optional with the company to continue the risk by such transfers, or to cancel the same. The title to the property of a bankrupt, by operation of law vests in the register as register, although the property may be in the possession of the United States marshal as messenger, it is still in the possession of the court, and the register is, by the bankrupt law [14 Stat. 519], the court.

2. The United States marshal and assignee are officers of the court, and must obey the orders of the register, and their necessary expenses and disbursements made by them in the protection of the property of the bankrupt's estate, must be taxed by the register and paid out of the estate.

[On certificate of John Fitch, Esq., register in bankruptcy.]

Opinion.

This cause is now pending before me. The said Carow has been duly adjudicated a bankrupt by the district court. The United States marshal, as messenger, has seized, attached, and has in his possession, under the order of this court, three ships, claims of indebtedness to the bankrupt, and other property, claimed by creditors to be the property of the estate of the bankrupt. It is satisfactorily shown to me by creditors and by the said United States marshal, that these ships are estimated to be worth from eighty to one hundred thousand dollars or more, subject to liens and incumbrances. It appears, by the schedules of the said bankrupt, that the said three ships were previously insured in various companies, and that notes of the bankrupt were given in payment of said insurance, which notes have not been paid, and are set out in said schedule as part of the indebtedness of the said bankrupt. I decide as a matter of law that the adjudication of this court, declaring the said Carow a bankrupt, ended the liability of the companies upon their policies, unless they saw fit, at the request of the register in bankruptcy or the United States marshal as messenger, in writing, to consent to continue their liability under said policies by the usual consent and transfer of said policies from the said Carow to the said register or marshal, on account of the creditors of the estate, until an assignee shall have been appointed, and then it would be optional with the companies to continue the risks by transfers to the assignee or to cancel the same. The interest of the assured in a policy ceases with any transfer thereof. An adjudication of bankruptcy by operation of law transfers the interest of the bankrupt in a policy to the register. The policy is not assignable without the consent of the company in writing. The assignment of the policy to the register to be of any benefit to the estate, must be with the consent of the company in writing, and without such consent the policy, after such adjudication, would be void and of no effect, as an assignment without consent of the company avoids the policy. Smith v. Saratoga County Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 1 Hill, 497. It is not necessary that the bankrupt should pro forma assign the policy to the register, as the register takes it by operation of law. The filing of a petition in bankruptcy at once brings the property of the insolvent into the bankruptcy court, and places it in its custody and under its protection as fully as if actually brought into the visible presence of the court. I hold it to be my duty and that I am required by law, to protect the interest of the creditors, or by an order of this court to direct the United States marshal to cause the said ships to be properly insured, in safe and responsible insurance companies, as by the bankrupt law the title of the property and estate of the bankrupt upon the adjudication and order of reference to the register, by operation of law, at once vests in the register as register; and although in the actual possession of the United States marshal as messenger, it is still in the possession of the court, and he will be protected in his obedience to its orders by the court. His expenses, disbursements, and costs are taxed and allowed by the register. Rule 5. The register has the power to order the payment of fees and expenses incurred in the proceedings out of the funds in the hands of the assignee. In re Lane [Case No. 8,042.] He may appoint a watchman to take charge of the property. In re Bogert [Id. 1,599]; In re Shafer [Id. 12,694]. He is authorized and required to receive the surrender of property and keep it safely until it can be turned over to the assignee. In re Hasbrouck [Id. 6,189]. In this case the money necessary to pay for the insurance will have to be advanced by the marshal, and be allowed to the marshal in his bill of costs, with a fair compensation for the use of it, to be allowed and taxed by the register and paid out of the proceeds of the estate. I hold it to be the duty of the register to exercise a sound discretion in regard to the direction to be given in regard to estates in bankruptcy, that all insurable property should be properly insured and properly cared for in every respect; that the register is, as it were, the guardian and protector of the property in the possession of the court, and under its control, and the marshal, as an officer of the court, is also under its control, as it was held in the case of In re Glaser [Id. 5,474], Blatchford, J., that district courts had original jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, and that that jurisdiction extends to all acts, matters, and things to be done under and in virtue of the bankruptcy. The estate surrendered is placed in the custody of the court so sitting in bankruptcy, and the officer (assignee or trustee) appointed to manage it, is accountable to the court appointing him and to that court alone. In re Barrow (In re Loeb, Simon & Co. and In re Winter) [Id. 1,057]; In re Schnepf [Id. 12,471]; In re Bowie, [Id. 1,728]. The commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy at once transfers to the district court the jurisdiction over the bankrupt, his estate, and all parties and questions connected therewith. Jones v. Leach [Id. 7,475]; Pennington v. Sale [Id. 10,939]; In re Kingon [Id. 7,815], and the authorities there cited.

The United States marshal, as messenger, is an officer of the court, and subject to its authority and control, and must obey its orders and directions as well as such officer can, for the interests of the creditors, and also have a care that the interests of the bankrupt shall be protected, and that his property shall be so managed as to realize the largest amount attainable, both for the interest of the creditors, and that the bankrupt may, by such judicious management of his property and effects, come within the provision of the fifty per cent. clause. In order to afford the marshal, as messenger, full protection and guarantee by order of the district court from loss by reason of his advance for premiums upon the policies of insurance, I propose to grant the following order in this cause: "That the United States marshal cause to be insured the three ships now in possession under and by virtue of an order of this court, viz.: Polar Star, Tri Mountain, and Edith; that he cause to be insured the Polar Star at the sum of sixteen thousand dollars, the Tri Mountain at twenty-six thousand dollars, and the Edith at forty-five thousand dollars, or as near those sums as he can procure insurance on them respectively, in safe, solvent, and responsible insurance companies in the state of New York, upon reasonable and proper terms as to rates of insurance for the space of two months," which, as the order of this court, will afford the marshal ample protection, and at the same time secure the creditors the value of the property in case of loss, and also secure the other claimants and all those having prior liens or admiralty liens which may have become vested rights prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy. In any event the policies should be so worded as to cover the interests of all concerned. As this is a question as to the power of the register in involuntary cases to cause proper care to be taken of property, I ask the direction of the district court as to the issue of the order of the United States marshal, as the marshal desires the protection and direction of the court in this matter, there being adverse claimants of the property to be insured, and the attorneys for the bankrupt claim that the bankrupt had neither right, title, nor interest in the ships, and that this court in bankruptcy has not, by any proceedings in this cause, acquired any jurisdiction over the same. I certify the same to the court.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. If the marshal, as messenger, has these ships in his possession and actual custody as the property of the bankrupt, it is proper they should be insured in such sums and for such time as shall seem to the register proper. In that view, and on the certificate of the register, the annexed proposed order is approved.

FAILURE OF BANKRUPT TO ATTEND EXAMINATION —CONTEMPT.

A bankrupt who fails to attend on the adjourned day of his examination before the register, by reason of sickness, cannot be punished for contempt of court.

[Cited in Re Adams, Case No. 39.]

[On certificate of John Fitch, Esq., register in bankruptcy.]

The following case involving a question of contempt was certified to the judge by Register Fitch. The register's certificate is, to say the least, curious, but it is inserted in pursuance of our custom, to make our reports full and complete.

I, John Fitch, the register in charge of this cause, certify to his honor, the district judge: That the bankrupt, Josiah Carpenter, is now under examination as a bankrupt, and has been for some time; that the bankrupt is attended by E. J. McGean and Theodore F. Sanxey, as his counsel; that the creditor is attended by B. F. Sawyer and Henry C. Sawyer; that the attorneys in this cause have evinced a most unpleasant and uncourteous feeling towards each other, and the proceedings are conducted as between each other with a bitterness of feeling not usually indulged in; that the feeling evinced on the part of the attorneys for the creditors towards the bankrupt is of the most unpleasant kind; that the bankrupt has attended in obedience to an order, and been examined to a considerable extent, and much testimony has been taken; that the examination has in part disclosed that the wife of the bankrupt has both real and personal property; that as to the question as to the wife of the bankrupt holding property separate and independent of her husband, which cannot be taken by the assignee under the bankrupt law, in the opinion of the register, neither of the attorneys are ready to present the case to the court in a manner sufficiently plain to bring up the question so that it can be certified to the judge in a clear and concise manner, and the examination is proceeding as to other points; that the last examination was had on the 4th day of February, A. D. 1868, and by consent adjourned to the 7th day of February, A. D. 1868, at eleven o'clock a. m., on account of the petitioner having to have one of his great toe-nails, which was growing into the flesh, cut out by a physician; that on the 7th day of February, 1868, the said petitioner did not attend in person, but one of his attorneys appeared for him, and produced a letter from the said petitioner, stating that he was unable to put his boot on, owing to the condition of his toe; the register adjourned the cause, on motion of petitioner's attorney, one day, to enable the petitioner to procure a certificate from his physician as to the condition of his foot; that Henry C. Sawyer, with a witness, soon after called at the office of the register and said they had been to the house of the said petitioner, and the servant told them Mr. Carpenter was out, had gone down town, or words to that effect; the register told said Sawyer to make an affidavit to that effect, and appear with it on the adjourned day. The register was of the opinion, from the appearance of the petitioner on the 4th day of February, 1868, that he was really suffering; that there must be some mistake about the matter; and that the bankrupt would not intentionally deceive the court. Accordingly, I went to the house of the petitioner, and asked for the said Carpenter. He came limping slowly down stairs. I then examined his foot, and found that the letter as to the condition of his foot was not in the least exaggerated. The nail of his great toe had been mostly cut out; that it was painful to a great degree. I examined the foot carefully, and the said Carpenter, in my opinion, told the truth, and was, in fact, as he had represented. On Saturday, February 8, 1868, at the hour of adjournment, the creditor appeared by H. C. Sawyer, and the petitioner by E. J. McGean. H. C. Sawyer proposed to file the affidavits, and asked for a certificate to the district judge, "asking for a commitment of the bankrupt for contempt." The register explained the impropriety of such an act. The said Sawyer then said he would complete his affidavit, and then left. The register told him he would hold the cause open for him to do so. Soon thereafter B. F. Sawyer, the father of H. C. Sawyer, came in, with his son and another attorney in the cause, who represents another creditor. I explained to B. F. Sawyer the condition of the bankrupt, and that it would be unsafe for him to venture out for a few days, with which statement the said B. F. Sawyer seemed perfectly satisfied; he would himself conduct the examination, in place of his son; agreed to have the cause adjourned to the 14th day of February, 1868, at twelve m., and in future there should be no more unpleasantness between himself and the petitioner's attorneys, and that he would proceed to close up the examination with as little delay as possible. The register certifies to the court, that much of the unpleasantness exhibited as between the attorneys in this cause has been caused by the severe and uncalled for remarks of the attorney (H. C. Sawyer) for the creditor, in relation to the bankrupt; that the register has checked remarks of all the attorneys as far as he could, but not having the power to commit for improper conduct on the part of an attorney, could only resort to moral force, and the examination has proceeded as well as could reasonably be expected, considering the ill-feeling between the parties. The register certifies, that the practice of allowing the petitioner counsel, under the rule in the Patterson Case, is in effect the examination of the counsel, instead of the petitioner; as in this case, the bankrupt has two good lawyers as counsel, who shape and frame nearly all of his material answers, and most tenaciously endeavor to prevent the attorneys for the creditors from obtaining answers to their questions which would show the facts sought to be proved, and hinder and delay the proceedings in the cause by objections, some of which are, but most of them are not material.

The register further certifies, that the bankrupt has shown the utmost respect and obedience to the register—I think, in each instance answering, as advised by counsel, the questions required by the register to be answered—and has attended, on the various times for examination, with all due diligence, and that the register is satisfied that the condition of his foot was a sufficient reason for non-attendance on the 7th of February, 1868, as his counsel was present. The register deems it his duty in this case to certify to the district judge, that the petitioner has been for a long time involved in many lawsuits; that the aforementioned lawyers have brought some of them, and that as between them and the bankrupt there exists an unpleasant feeling—unusually bitter; that up to the 8th day of February, 1868, the examinations have proceeded as fast as the business engagements of four lawyers would admit of; that if the proposition of B. F. Sawyer, to which the counsel for the petitioner assents, can be carried out, namely, that B. F. Sawyer act alone for the creditor, Henry Bow, instead of H. C. Sawyer, assisting him, and the petitioner appearing by one counsel, the examination can proceed harmoniously as between the said B. F. Sawyer and the attorney for the petitioner, and the examination soon be closed.

E. J. McGean and Theodore F. Sanxey, for bankrupt.

B. F. Sawyer and Henry C. Sawyer, for creditor.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I can perceive nothing in this case on which I am called upon to pass, except the question whether the bankrupt has done anything to warrant a proceeding against him for contempt. I decide that he has not.

The clerk will certify this decision to the register, John Fitch, Esq.

Case No. 2,428.

CARPENTER v. AMERICAN INS. CO.

[1 Story, 57.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1839.

INSURANCE—MISREPRESENTATION BY AGENT.

1. A misrepresentation of a material fact, whether it be made through mistake or design, avoids a policy of insurance underwritten on the faith thereof.

2. The knowledge and consent of the principal is not necessary to make such a misrepresentation by an agent fatal to the policy.

At law. This was an action of assumpsit [by Jeremiah Carpenter] on a policy of insurance upon the Glenco Factory and machinery, underwritten by the American Insurance Company at Providence, on the faith of certain representations contained in letters written by Samuel G. Wheeler to the insurance company. At the time that the policy was underwritten, he and his brother Henry M. Wheeler were proprietors of the factory and machinery under the copartnership name of Henry M. Wheeler & Co. The policy bore date on the 12th of December, 1836, and was as follows: "The American Insurance Company &c. do insure Henry M. Wheeler & Co. against loss of damage by fire to the amount of six thousand dollars, to wit: fifteen hundred dollars on the Glenco Cotton Factory, water-wheel and fixed machinery, thirty-five hundred dollars on movable machinery, and one thousand dollars on stock contained therein. Said factory is situated in Livingston, New York. This insurance is made with reference to letters of S. G. Wheeler, dated the 14th November and 6th December, 1836, with knowledge of additional insurance on the same property by the Providence Washington Insurance Company to the amount of fifteen thousand dollars, and with the agreement, that the assured may assign this policy to Epenetus Reed," &c. The whole interest of Samuel G. Wheeler and Henry M. Wheeler was by a subsequent assignment transferred to Jeremiah Carpenter, the present plaintiff, and indorsements thereof were made on the policy, as follows: "1837, Dec. 14th. Samuel G. Wheeler by letter dated this 13th Dec. 1837, certifies, that he has transferred his interest in the Glenco Factory and machinery to Jeremiah Carpenter, and thereupon it is agreed that the within policy shall be for his benefit and not that of said Wheeler. See letter to Jeremiah Carpenter, Dec. 14th, 1837." And subsequently, "1838, May 4th. Assignment by Henry M. Wheeler and Samuel G. Wheeler of their interest in this policy to Jeremiah Carpenter. See letter to Samuel G. Wheeler, May 4th, 1838." The policy was subsequently renewed by Wheeler & Co. on the 18th December, 1837; by which renewal it was to continue in force for one year from the 12th of December, 1837; and again by Jeremiah Carpenter on December 11th, 1838, by which it was to continue in force from December 12th, 1838, to December 12th, 1839.

The letters of Samuel G. Wheeler and answer of the American Insurance Company were as follows:

"Paterson, N. J., 14th Nov., 1836. Gideon Thurston, Esq., Sec. American Ins. Co. Dear Sir,—I wish to insure $10,000 on the Glenco Cotton Factory formerly belonging to Egbert Reed & Co., my brother being the Co. and owning one half. I have recently purchased the Reed half, and my brother and myself are the entire owners. We have $15,000 insured at the Providence Washington office, where you can see a description of the property. My brother lives on the premises, and has the entire charge and superintendence of the whole works. Want the risk, say $2500 on building, water-wheel, and gearing, $6000 on machinery, and $1500 on stock, cloth, and yarns in the mill. If you will insure at the same premium the Providence Washington Co. do you can fill policy, forward it to me, 42 Pine street, New York, and draw at three days' sight for amount of premium. I wish permission given to assign the policy to Epenetus Reed. Please make it in the name of Henry M. Wheeler & Co.; this is the firm under which the business of the mill will be conducted. Your early attention and reply will much oblige your friend, Sam. G. Wheeler."

"Office of the American Ins. Co. Providence, Nov. 17th, 1836. Mr. Samuel G. Wheeler, Sir,—Yours of the 14th inst. was duly received, and at your suggestion the survey of the Glenco Cotton Factory at Providence Washington office was examined, and it was found that the whole establishment there was valued at nineteen thousand dollars, upon fifteen thousand dollars (as much as is deemed proper on such a valuation) being insured, the American Insurance Co. decline the risk which you have proposed. The company will insure on factories in New York, or almost any part of the country, and for you, or your establishment, if there have been additions to its value, or other circumstances that will render further insurance on the same proper in their opinion. Yours respectfully, Gideon Thurston, Sec'y."

"New York, 6th Dec. 1836. G. Thurston, Esq., Sec. American Ins. Co. Dear Sir,—Your favor of the 17th November I duly received. When I applied to you for insurance on the Glenco Factory, it did not occur to me that the whole works had been nearly doubled, both in machinery and buildings, since the insurance was made at Washington office. The addition to the factory building is 35 by 70, 1½ stories high; the lower part occupied as a weave-room in which is 48 looms; the upper part will be occupied as a dressing-room. The building is now geared in the best manner, at an expense of $1500 to $2000. 20 new looms have been added since this building was erected, with all necessary machinery to make gear to keep them in full operation. I have not now the particular items of additional expenditure, but should think it would amount to fully $10,000; all the machinery is new within the last two years. Every part of the works is in perfect order, and many improvements have been made within the last year, which lessen the risk. We consider the whole works worth at least $40,000. We presume this explanation will be sufficient to warrant your office to insure for the $10,000, agreeable to my former letter; if so you will please fill policy, send it to me, and draw at sight for the premium. Respectfully, your friend, Samuel G. Wheeler."

The factory and machinery were afterwards destroyed by fire on the night of April 9th, 1839, and this action was brought to recover the insurance.

Rivers & Whipple, for plaintiff, contended, that there was no intention and misrepresentation of the facts, and that the property, at the time when the insurance was made, was in reality worth as much as was stated in the letter of Samuel G. Wheeler of the 6th of December, 1836, on the faith of which the present policy was underwritten.

Pratt & Atwell, for defendants, contended, that the insurance was obtained upon a false representation of the insured at the time the insurance was effected, and in proof, put in the following papers and documents, viz. The letter from Samuel G. Wheeler to the defendants, dated November 14th, 1836. The proposal of Egbert Reed & Co., made to the Providence Washington Insurance Co., dated in September, 1835. The letter of the defendant to Samuel G. Wheeler, dated November 17th, 1836. The letter of Samuel G. Wheeler to the defendants, dated December 6th, 1836. The insurance was made upon the faith of the representations in this last letter. The counsel for the defendants also referred the court to the particular terms of the policy, the endorsement thereon and the renewals thereof.

It was admitted by the counsel for the plaintiff, that no material addition had been made to the buildings or machinery in December, 1836, at the time this policy was effected, which was not in the proposal and insurance at the Providence Washington office, in September, 1835, and, that only about $700 worth of new or additional machinery had been added, since the insurance was effected at the American office, which the defendant contended had nothing to do with the question.

We are clearly of opinion, that the policy in this case having been obtained upon a misrepresentation of the material facts, is utterly void. The original proposal for the insurance, by the letter of the 14th of November, 1836, referred the defendants to the description of the property at Providence Washington Insurance Company's office, at which it was insured for $15,000, the property being therein valued at $19,000. The defendants, after examining that policy and description, declined, by the letter of the 17th of November, to take the additional sum proposed, upon the very ground, that the sum already insured thereon was as much as was proper to be taken on such a valuation. In order to induce the defendants to take the risk, the letter of the 6th of December, 1836, represented, that since the original insurance was made, additions had been made to the factory, &c. fully equal to $10,000. Upon the faith of this statement the present policy was underwritten. It now turns out that this representation is utterly untrue, (whether by design or by mistake is not material,) and no such additions have been made since the former policy. No one can doubt the materiality of this representation; for it was the very point (the increased value) upon which the policy was underwritten. It seems to us, therefore, that this makes an end of the case; for a false representation of a material fact is, according to well settled principles, sufficient to avoid a policy of insurance underwritten on the faith thereof, whether the false representation be by mistake or by design.

It is suggested, that the misrepresentation was in fact unintentional and without any fraudulent design, and that Epenetus Reed (the mortgagee) for whose benefit the insurance was made, was entirely ignorant of the misrepresentation; and that, under such circumstances, his rights under the policy ought not to be prejudiced thereby. But this suggestion cannot avail for the plaintiff, or for Reed. The misrepresentation, made by an agent in procuring a policy, is equally fatal, whether made with the knowledge or consent of the principal, or not. The ground in each case is the same. The underwriters are deceived. They execute the policy upon the faith of statements, material to the risk, which turn out to be untrue. The mistake is, therefore, fatal to the policy, as it goes to the very essence of the contract.

The plaintiff discontinued his suit, and costs were awarded to the defendants.

CARPENTER v. BUENA VISTA COUNTY.

[5 Dill. 556.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. 1878.

COUNTY BONDS—AUTHORITY TO ISSUE—RECITALS—LEGISLATION OF IOWA—POPULAR VOTE—DEFENCES.

1. Under the legislation of Iowa, counties have the power to issue negotiable securities for borrowed money to aid in specified public improvements therein, or to meet extraordinary expenditures, if previously authorized by a vote of the people, but not otherwise.

2. Bonds, under the seal and signed by the proper officers of the county, payable to bearer, and containing a recital that they are issued pursuant to a vote of the people of the county, are presumptively valid, although the particular purpose for which the bonds were voted is not therein stated.

[See Nauvoo v. Ritter, 97 U. S. 391; Burleigh v. Town of Rochester, 5 Fed. 667; Thayer v. Montgomery Co., Case No. 13,870.]

On demurrer to the petition. The action is brought [by A. C. Carpenter] upon three instruments, substantially as follows: "Bond due in one year. Know all men, etc., that there is due from the county of Buena Vista to Lansing W. Lewis, or bearer, $1,000, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable on, etc., on surrender of annexed coupons. For the performance of all which the faith of the said county of Buena Vista is pledged. Said bond is issued in accordance with a law of the state of Iowa, and authorized by a vote of the commonwealth of the county of Buena Vista, submitted at the general election held October 9th, 1866, all the requirements of law having been complied with, and a special tax authorized by said vote to be levied from year to year for the payment of principal and interest of said bonds." Dated the 16th day of October, 1866, and alleged to be sealed with the seal of the county, signed by the president of the board of supervisors, and attested by the clerk of the county. The other bonds are the same, except one is payable in four and the other in seven years from the date thereof.

The petition alleges that the plaintiff became the owner and holder of these bonds for value and before they became due, and alleges that the county made, executed, and delivered the bonds to the said Lewis, the payee, in accordance with the recital in the bonds, setting forth that recital in haec verba, but not otherwise alleging for what purpose or consideration the same were executed. A copy of the bonds and coupons in suit is annexed to the petition as part thereof.

The county demurs to the petition on the ground that it does not appear that the officers of said county were authorized to issue the bonds, or that they were issued for a purpose authorized by law.

Under the legislation of the state, "the county judge (and since 1860 the county board of supervisors) may submit to the people of the county, at any general election, or at a special one called for that purpose, the question whether money may be borrowed to aid in the erection of public buildings; whether the county will construct or aid to construct any road or bridge which may call for extraordinary expenditure." Code 1851, § 114; Revision 1860, § 250. The next section prescribes the mode of submission. The next section is as follows: "Sec. 252 (116). When a question so submitted involves the borrowing or expenditure of money, the proposition of the question must be accompanied by a provision to levy a tax for the payment thereof, in addition to the usual taxes, and no vote adopting the question proposed will be of effect unless it adopt the tax also." By another section, the county judge (and since 1860 the board of supervisors), on being satisfied that the vote has been adopted, is to enter the proposition and result of the vote of record and to cause notice of its adoption to be published; "and from the time of entering the result of the vote in relation to borrowing or expending money, the vote and the entry thereof in the county records shall have the force and effect of an act of the general assembly." Revision, § 255 (119). Money thus raised constitutes a distinct fund. Id. § 260.

John D. Rivers, for plaintiff.
Galusha Parsons, for county.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The bonds are negotiable in form, and purport to be under the seal of the county, and to be signed by the proper county officials. They are alleged to have been executed and delivered by the defendant, and on the demurrer it must be assumed that they are signed by the proper officers of the county, and are under its official seal. The substantial question presented by the demurrer is, whether, in an action against a county in Iowa, on bonds like those in suit, it is essential that the petition should affirmatively show, either by averment or by the recital in the instrument (which is made part of the petition), that it was issued for a specific purpose authorized by the laws of the state of Iowa, such as to construct public buildings, roads, or bridges. The question is material, because if it be necessary for the plaintiff to allege this, it would be necessary for him to prove it, and the bonds in suit would not, when produced on trial, make out a prima facie case for him.

In Iowa each county is, for specified administrative purposes, a corporation. Its affairs are managed by a board of supervisors. The supervisor system superseded what is termed the county judge system. The powers and duties of the county judge were devolved in 1860 upon the board of supervisors, including the authority, and the checks upon it, to borrow money and to issue obligations therefor. Starr v. Board of Sup'rs (1867) 22 Iowa, 492, 495.

In the statement of the case, the statutes of the state respecting the power of the county authorities to contract debts are given. These statutes have been construed by the supreme court of the state and of the United States, and it is judicially settled by these tribunals that the county has the power to issue negotiable bonds like those in suit for borrowed money or extraordinary expenditures, if thereto authorized by a vote of the people. Hull v. Marshall Co., 12 Iowa, 142; Lynde v. Winnebago Co., 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 6.

These cases, in connection with Police Jury v. Britton, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 566, clearly lead to the conclusion that, while on the one hand there is no general power on the part of counties to issue negotiable paper which shall be free from equities in the hands of bona fide holders for value, yet there is such power in Iowa, when, for the purposes specified in the statute, its exercise is authorized by a vote of the people. The statute empowers the county authorities, on the prior sanction of a popular vote, "to borrow money" for public buildings, roads, and bridges, and this includes the incidental power to issue therefor the bonds of the county. It may be observed in passing that the duty of determining whether the vote has been adopted, and, if so, of entering it upon the records of the county, is one which the statute devolves upon the board of supervisors. Revision 1860, § 255.

The case before us, therefore, is one in which there is power given to the officers who signed and issued the bonds to do so, if thereto authorized by a previous vote, of the result of which they are by the statute made the judges. They have issued the bonds, and these are in the hands of holders for value. Those instruments recite that they "are issued in accordance with a law of the state of Iowa and authorized by a vote of the people of the county, at the general election held October 9th, 1866, all the requirements of law having been complied with, and a tax authorized by said vote to be levied from year to year for the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds." If the facts stated in the recital are true, the officers of the county had the power to issue the bonds in suit, and presumptively the recital must be taken as true. In the well known decisions of the supreme court concerning municipal bonds, the principle is established that where the power exists by legislative authority to issue negotiable securities, and the local officers, who by the statute are invested with the duty to carry out or execute this power, issue the bonds with recitals that the right to issue them exists, or has arisen, and the bonds have passed into the hands of bona fide holders for value, they are not open to the defence of consideration or fraud on the part of the officers, or non-compliance with precedent conditions to the right to exercise the power. Board of Com'rs v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539; Moran v. Miami Co., 2 Black. [67 U. S.] 722, 724, 732; St. Joseph Township v. Rogers, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 644; Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 373; Kenicott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 452; Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 282.

The principle of these decisions it is the duty of this court implicitly to apply to cases which fall within it. It is useless to question the principle they assert, and in this place not fitting to do so. Applying it to the pleading before us, it shows, in connection with the recitals in the bond, a prima facie liability on the part of the county.

But one possible distinction between this case and cases which have been decided by the supreme court occurs to me, and that is, that in those the bonds have usually contained a recital that they were issued under a specified act, or to pay for stock subscribed in a railway company, or, as in Lynde's Case, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 6, to pay for the erection of a county court-house. But the reason why the recital binds is, that it is made by the officers who are invested by the statute with the duty to decide whether the condition has been performed which authorizes the issue of the bonds. The reason applies as well to the case where the recital is in the general form here adopted as where it is more specific. Demurrer overruled.

NOTE [from original report]. After the foregoing decision was made an answer was filed, and, on demurrer thereto, the following points were ruled by Dillon and Love, JJ.: 1. In an action on a bond purporting to be issued by a county in Iowa, a plea of non est factum is a good defence. 2. Under the legislation of Iowa in respect of county bonds, a plea that a bond is invalid simply because it is not under the seal of the county, is demurrable. Ring v. Johnson Co., 6 Iowa, 265. Aliter as to ordinary county warrants. 3. A plea to an action on county bonds, that no proposition to borrow money had ever been submitted to or voted upon by the people of the county, that the board of supervisors of the county never decided that any such proposition had been carried, and never ordered any issue of bonds, and that the bonds were issued by the county clerk on his own motion and without any authority from the board, and without their knowledge, he forging to the bonds the name of the president of the board of supervisors, held, on demurrer, to present a good defence.

CARPENTER v. The EMMA JOHNSON.

[1 Cliff. 633.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1861.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — MARITIME CONTRACT.

Admiralty has jurisdiction over a contract of affreightment between two ports in the same state, where, from the usual course of the voyage, a part of the navigation of the vessel is upon the high seas, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state.

[Cited in The Sarah Jane, Case No. 12,349; The Leonard, Id. 8,256.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Admiralty appeal from a decree in a proceeding in rem by E. W. Carpenter against the schooner Emma Johnson, which was engaged in the transportation of goods between Boston and Chatham. The master undertook to carry a piano from Boston to Chatham, and deliver it there to libellant. The piano was injured on the passage, and the suit was instituted to recover damages therefor. The district court gave a decree in favor of the libellant. [Case No. 4,465.]

When the case came up to this court, the pleadings were amended, on the part of the libellant, setting forth that the schooner, at the time the contract was made, was lying at the port of Boston within the ebb and flow of the tide, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the court; was bound over the high seas to the port of Chatham; and that the master undertook to transport the piano in the usual course of the vessel to that port. The answer alleged that the contract was for the transportation of the piano from Boston, in Massachusetts, to Chatham, in the same state, and was made and to be executed within the state, and so was not a contract within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the court.

H. A. Scudder, for libellant.

The jurisdiction of the admiralty in tort depends upon the locus; in contract, upon the subject-matter. 2 Brown, Adm. 88, 90, 91, 110; Thackarey v. The Farmer [Case No. 13,852]; Menetone v. Gibbons, 3 Term R. 268.

A contract of affreightment, like any other contract for service upon the sea, is a maritime contract, and within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. 2 Brown, Adm. 86; The Spartan [Case No. 4,085]; The Rebecca [Id. 11,619]; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 392; Fland. Shipp. 290.

A merchant shipping freight or merchandise has a maritime lien upon the ship for any damage arising from the fault or neglect of the master or the insufficiency of the vessel, which lien is a subject of admiralty jurisdiction. The several states having parted with all their admiralty and maritime jurisdiction under the constitution of the United States, and having yielded the same to the federal courts, if they have no remedy here, they are barred from their original rights. The Magnolia, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 296; Const. U. S.; 1 Stat. 77.

The cases cited and relied upon by the respondents do not touch the case before the court. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 194, was not a question of admiralty jurisdiction, but of the power of congress to regulate commerce. The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443, and Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 55, simply assert the admiralty jurisdiction over the western lakes and rivers; thus claiming an extension, and not a limitation, of the jurisdiction of the admiralty, as before understood. See Fland. Shipp. 316. Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 244, is a mere judicial consideration and construction of the United States statute of 1845, deciding that said statute limits the admiralty jurisdiction upon the western lakes and rivers to commerce between ports in different states. Maguire v. Card, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 248, was a suit in rem against a domestic ship for supplies, and, aside from the legal defence which existed, was decided upon the authority of Allen v. Newberry [supra], and upon the same principle.

The above cases simply assert that the act of 1845 [5 Stat. 726] is valid, and that by it admiralty jurisdiction on the western lakes and rivers is limited to commerce between ports in different states, and does not touch the jurisdiction of the admiralty upon the tide-water.

C. T. & T. H. Russel, for claimants.

The contract alleged in this case is that the respondents undertook as common carriers to safely carry a piano from Boston, Massachusetts, to Chatham, in the same state. This is a question arising under the internal commerce of Massachusetts, and is not a subject of the admiralty jurisdiction of this court. It is not alleged that the contract was by charter-party or bill of lading, but that respondents were common carriers between these two places in the same state. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 392; Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 244; Jackson v. The Magnolia, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 302; Maguire v. Card, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 248; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, 500, 502, 504, 510, 642.

The contracts between citizens of a state are left to the tribunals of the state, excepting only specified cases. The mere fact of the vessel passing over a part of the high seas, for a short period, did not add anything of a foreign, external, or maritime character to the contract. The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. It is conceded that the usual course of the schooner during a part of her voyage was upon and over the high seas, as alleged in the amended libel, and that she pursued her usual course during the trip when the damage complained of in this case occurred to the piano. But it is insisted by the counsel of the respondents that the question of jurisdiction is unaffected by the fact that the entire navigation of the vessel was not within the waters of the state; that if the contract was made in the state, and the voyage was from a port of the state to another port in the same state, then the question of liability is one arising under the internal commerce of the state, and is not a subject of admiralty jurisdiction. On the part of the libellant the whole of this doctrine is denied, and he insists that admiralty jurisdiction in matters of contract depends entirely upon the subject-matter; that if the contract be maritime, or to be performed upon tide-waters, it is within the admiralty jurisdiction; and that a contract of affreightment, like any other contract for service upon the sea, is a maritime contract, and consequently a suit for the breach of it is within the admiralty jurisdiction. Much must depend in jurisdictional questions upon the decisions of the supreme court; and it may not be amiss to remark that, where the point has been definitively settled by that tribunal, it is the duty of this court to conform its action to their ruling as the established law. Two cases are cited by the counsel of the respondents, and chiefly relied on as showing the want of jurisdiction in this case. Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 244; Maguire v. Card, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 248. Referring to the pleadings in the case first cited, it will be seen that the goods in question were shipped on board the vessel at the port of Two Rivers, in the state of Wisconsin, to be delivered at Milwaukee, in the same state, and the court decided that the act of congress of the 26th of February, 1845, confines the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts upon the lakes to matters of contract and tort arising in, upon, or concerning steamboats and other vessels employed in the business of commerce and navigation between ports and places in different states and territories upon the lakes. It does not extend, therefore, say the court, to a case where there was a shipment of goods from a port in a state to another port in the same state. But it should be observed that the rule laid down is one deduced from the previous proposition, that the act of congress had thus confined the admiralty jurisdiction as to controversies arising upon the lakes. Congress cannot create admiralty jurisdiction, because that jurisdiction is expressly granted to the federal government by the constitution of the United States; but I suppose it to be an admitted doctrine that congress may limit, or even control its exercise, by modifying or repealing existing laws, and enacting others in their place. Such jurisdiction cannot be exercised, except by courts duly constituted, and it is undoubtedly within the competency of congress to confer the power to exercise the jurisdiction upon such courts as it may see fit to establish. Exercising this right, congress has limited the jurisdiction of the federal courts, in controversies growing out of commercial transactions upon the lakes, to matters of contract and tort, arising in, upon, or concerning steamboats and other vessels employed in the business of commerce and navigation between ports and places in different states and territories bordering on those waters; but that act has no relation whatever to admiralty jurisdiction upon the high seas, or in the bays, harbors, and arms of the sea on the Atlantic coast. Dismissing that case, therefore, as one not applicable to the question before the court, I will proceed to a brief examination of the one last cited. It was a suit in rem against a steamer to recover the balance for coal furnished the steamer while lying in the port of Sacramento. She was engaged in the business of navigation and trade in the Sacramento river exclusively, within the state of California, and of course between ports and places of the same state. Granting, for the sake of the argument, that the rule laid down in that case is applicable to the harbors, bays, and arms of the sea, still I am of the opinion that it is not an authority for the proposition maintained by the respondents, as applied to the present case, for the reason stated in the opinion of the court, that the steamer was engaged in the business of navigation and trade on the Sacramento river exclusively, within the state of California. It was a suit for supplies, to enable the steamer to navigate the purely internal waters of the state. Even supposing the rule laid down in that case was intended to be applied to the harbors, bays, and arms of the sea on the Atlantic coast, still, I must hold, until the point is otherwise decided by the supreme court, that the decision in that case has no application to a contract of affreightment, where, from the usual course of the voyage, a part of the navigation of the vessel is upon the high seas, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state; and such, I think, must have been the views of Mr. Justice Nelson, as expressed in the case of Moore v. American Transportation Co., 24 How. [65 U. S.] 39, when he said it was the purely internal commerce and navigation of a state that is exclusively under state regulations. Great mischief would inevitably result from any rule denying admiralty jurisdiction in all cases where the place of the departure of the vessel and the place of her destination are both within the same state, when any part of the voyage is upon the high seas, for every navigator knows that in many such cases nearly the whole voyage is out of the limits of any state; and if parties, under such circumstances, can have no remedy in the admiralty courts, it is difficult to see to what tribunals they can resort for the redress of their grievances. Without pursuing the subject at this time, suffice it to say that I am clearly of the opinion that the plea to the jurisdiction of the court cannot be sustained.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June, 1871.

RIGHTS OF ASSIGNOR FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS —DEALINGS OF ASSIGNEE WITH ESTATE — OPINION EVIDENCE.

1. The assignor of his estate in trust to distribute the proceeds thereof ratably among his creditors, upon release of their claims within a specified time, and pay over to him the balance of proceeds remaining undistributed at the end of that time, may, after expiration of the specified period, by bill in equity in which the assignee and the only unpaid creditor are made parties defendant, compel a full and exact account of the dealings of the assignee with the trust estate.

2. In order to hold a purchaser of trust property from a trustee authorized to sell, liable in equity to account for and pay the proceeds thereof to the cestui que trust, on the ground of fraudulent collusion with the trustee in the purchase, in the absence of other evidence of fraud, such inadequacy of consideration as would of itself be an indication of fraud must be proved beyond question.

[3. Opinions of witnesses who have knowledge of land in controversy, and of sales in its immediate vicinity, are admissible in evidence, although such witnesses may not be, strictly speaking, experts.]

[In equity. Bill by Powell H. Carpenter against Attmore Robinson and J. H. Carpenter, for an accounting.]

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The complainant, on the twentieth day of December, A. D. 1858, executed to Attmore Robinson, one of the defendants, a general assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors. The deed of assignment authorized the assignee to take immediate possession of all the property, and "as soon as conveniently may be, by public or private sale, for the best price that can be obtained, convert all and singular the premises into money," and to collect all debts due the assignor; and, after paying the expenses of making the assignment, and of executing the trust thereby created, and compensation for his services as assignee, to appropriate the proceeds of such sale and collections, first, to reimburse the assignee for advances made to the assignor for the payment of confidential debts; secondly, to the payment, ratably in proportion to their debts, to such creditors of the assignor as should within six months from the date of the assignment execute a release of their claims; thirdly, to pay over to the assignor the shares of such creditors as did not within six months release their claims, and also any balance remaining after the payments aforesaid.

A portion of the assigned estate consisted of about seventy-five acres of land, together with a wharf, buildings, and improvements, comprising, with the exception of six acres owned by the United States, the whole of an island lying in Narragansett bay, betweeen the main-land and Conanicut Island, commonly known as Dutch Island, and forming a part of the town of Jamestown, in the county of Newport, and state of Rhode Island. This estate the complainant had previously, on the first day of April, 1857, mortgaged to James H. Carpenter, one of the defendants, to secure the payment of two notes of seven hundred and fifty dollars each, payable in two and three years from date respectively; and also on the same day had mortgaged to Benjamin W. C. Carpenter, to secure the payment to the said Benjamin of the interest on the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars semi-annually during his life, and the payment to his personal representatives of the principle sum within six months after his decease. Benjamin W. C. Carpenter died in June, 1859, and bequeathed this mortgage and mortgage debt to an infant daughter of J. H. Carpenter, the defendant. On the fifth day of September, 1859, Attmore Robinson, the assignee, conveyed the Dutch Island estate to James H. Carpenter for the nominal consideration of one dollar, the incumbrances at that time amounting to between five and six thousand dollars.

On the seventeenth day of July, 1867, the complainant filed the bill in equity in this case against his assignee Attmore Robinson, and his brother J. H. Carpenter, the purchaser of the Dutch Island estate.

The complainant alleges, that the conveyance of the Dutch Island estate was without any consideration, and was made by collusion between the defendants, with intent to defraud the complainant and his estate, and to deprive him of the benefit and advantage which would have resulted from a proper disposition of the Dutch Island estate; that, as soon as he heard of the conveyance, which was a short time after the same had been executed, he earnestly protested against the same to said defendant Robinson, and he believes that the fact that said protest was made was communicated by said Robinson to said Carpenter. Complainant further states, that he was informed in the early part of the year 1863, or about that time, that negotiations had been entered into with a view to the purchase of said Dutch Island estate by the government of the United States; that, being at that time at a distance from the state of Rhode Island, and in destitute circumstances, he caused, through his friends in Rhode Island, a remonstrance to be forwarded to the authorities of the United States against the purchase; that at the same time a demand was made upon defendant Carpenter for an adjustment and settlement of defendant's claims on the premises, and a demand upon the assignee to furnish an account of his acts and doings as assignee; that Carpenter made no reply, and a written refusal to furnish any statement to complainant's counsel was received from defendant Robinson. By way of excuse for his long delay to assert his claims, he states, that since the assignment he has been in infirm health, and poor and destitute, and therefore unable to bear the expense of litigation. The complainant alleges that Dutch Island was by deed dated July 1, 1864, but not delivered and recorded until Aug. 6. 1866, finally conveyed to the United States, and that the consideration named therein, the sum of twenty-one thousand dollars, was paid to James H. Carpenter, Aug. 7, 1866. The bill alleges that all debts due from the complainant at the time of the assignment have been satisfied and discharged, and offers to pay and discharge any unsatisfied debts, if any such exist.

The prayer of the bill is for an account from the assignee of the property taken possession of by him under the assignment, and of the disposition of the same, and of the debts paid, compromised, and discharged by him, and a transfer to the complainant of any balance remaining in his hands. It further seeks for a decree that Robinson and Carpenter shall account for the rents and profits of the Dutch Island estate, and for the proceeds of the sale to the United States, and a payment to the complainant of all such profits and proceeds, after deducting the sums paid in discharge and satisfaction of the two mortgages, dated April 1, 1857.

The answers of the defendants deny the collusion and fraud charged in the bill. The defendants allege that the price for which the Dutch Island estate was sold, being the amount of the incumbrances upon it, which, they state, amounted with interest and taxes to five thousand six hundred dollars, exceeded the then value of the estate. Both defendants swear that Carpenter, after the conveyance to him, offered to sell the estate for the same price he had paid for it; to wit, one dollar over and above the incumbrances thereon. They deny that the estate cost the complainant eight thousand dollars, as alleged in the bill, but aver, on the contrary, that he paid for the land the sum of two thousand six hundred dollars, and that the improvements he put upon it were not worth more than two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. They aver that Robinson made repeated efforts to sell the estate for the largest sum that could be realized for it; that he applied to persons living in the vicinity of the estate, and acquainted with the estate and its value, and could not find any person who would pay anything for the estate above the incumbrances thereon. The answers deny that the complainant made any protest or objection to said sale until the year 1863, at the time of the negotiations for the sale to the United States.

The assignor, by the terms of the deed of assignment, as well as by the rule of law, being entitled to the residue of the estate after the payment of debts, the complainant is the proper party to come into a court of equity for an account and for relief against any breach of trust on the part of the assignee. After the extinguishment of the debts, the assignor becomes clothed with all the rights and powers of a cestui que trust to the same extent as the creditors before their rights were extinguished. Such a bill in equity in behalf of the assignor against an assignee who had fraudulently and improperly conveyed the trust property to another, not as a means of executing the trust, but as a means of extinguishing the reversionary interest of the assignor, was sustained by Mr. Justice Clifford. In the case of James, Adm'x v. Atlantic De Laine Co. [Case No. 7,177], in the circuit court, Rhode Island district, November term, 1867, not yet reported. Although the objection was made in that case that two debts of the complainant had not been paid, the court replied, that the rights of creditors in such a case would be protected in the decree granting relief. Cases undoubtedly may arise where the fraud of the assignee would operate exclusively to the detriment of the creditors, and where their discharges, given in ignorance of the fraud, would be inoperative. In such cases, the creditors would be necessary parties to the bill. In this case, as the only debts proved to be outstanding and unsettled appear to be due to James H. Carpenter, and he is made a party defendant, there seems to be no objection to the maintenance of this action on the ground of want of parties, as all parties in interest are before the court, and all their rights can, if necessary, be protected in the decree.

The evidence in this case clearly exhibits a want on the part of the assignee of reasonable diligence and prudence in the management of the trust estate. He does not appear to have kept any proper accounts of his doings in the execution of his trust, or to have ever declared or paid any dividend to the creditors otherwise than by compromise of their debts, without regard to their rights to a ratable proportion of the proceeds of the assets. If assignments of the description of this one are to be upheld, the conduct of the assignee in the management of the trust estate should be inspected with the severest scrutiny; and the utmost good faith should be exacted from him, not only in his dealings with the trust estate, but in his communications with the assignor and the creditors. To withhold any information from the creditors or the assignor which is in his possession, and which affects the value of the trust property, is such a fraud as would vitiate any settlement or compromise made by him with the assignor or the creditors, acting in ignorance of facts within the knowledge of their trustee.

The account annexed to the answer of the assignee is not properly stated, and the evidence in the case tends to show that there are many errors and omissions in it which require examination and correction; and there is sufficient evidence of want of reasonable care and diligence in the management of the trust estate to render it evident that there should be a reference of the case to a master, and that the defendant Robinson should be required to account anew before him.

The principal difficulty in the case grows out of the connection of J. H. Carpenter, the defendant, with the purchase from the assignee of the Dutch Island estate. The averment in the bill is, that this conveyance was made without consideration, and was the result of a combination and confederacy between Robinson and Carpenter with the intent to deprive the complainant of any benefit from the estate. Both defendants in their answer specifically deny that there was any collusion or intention to defraud the complainant, and they deny the alleged inadequacy of the consideration paid, averring, on the contrary, that the asignee made repeated efforts to sell the estate, and could not find any one who would pay any thing for it over and above the incumbrances. They aver that the incumbrances on the estate amounted to the sum of $5,600, which was the full value of the estate at the time.

To establish the charge of fraud, and overcome the answers of the defendants, it is manifest that the burden is on the complainant to establish affirmatively beyond question such an inadequacy of consideration as would be of itself an indication of fraud on the part of the assignee.

After the lapse of some years after the sale, the property was again sold to the United States for a site for fortifications, at a vastly enhanced price. But this is no criterion of its value in the market at the time of the conveyance by the assignee. There is no evidence in the case that, at that time, any one contemplated that the property would ever be needed by the government, or available for the purposes to which it was subsequently devoted. The breaking out of a great civil war awakened the government to the defenceless condition of our coasts and harbors; and when this island was selected as a site for one portion of the coast and harbor defences, the owner of it availed himself of the necessities of the case, and the necessity of using this particular site for that special purpose, to extort from the United States a price vastly in excess of any marketable value of the property. The price paid was more than double the value of the property, as estimated according to the opinions of those of the complainant's witnesses who put the highest estimate on its value at the date of the conveyance by the assignee. We must judge the acts and conduct of the parties by the state of things existing and within their knowledge at the time of the transaction in question. The subsequent discovery or development of an element of value in the property, not within the knowledge or contemplation of either of the parties to a sale, does not afford us any aid in determining the true character of the transaction, when the issue is only one of fair value and adequate consideration, depending upon marketable value at the time.

To show the value of the Dutch Island estate, at the time of the conveyance to Carpenter, the defendant, and for the purpose of proving that the agreed consideration was grossly inadequate, the complainant has introduced the evidence of four witnesses. These witnesses testify that in their opinion the property in the year 1859 was worth $10,000. But this opinion does not seem to be based upon that kind of knowledge which would qualify them to testify as expert witnesses, or give any great probative force to their opinions, if admissible. They are farmers, and competent, perhaps, to express an opinion upon the character of the soil and the productiveness of the land for farming purposes. The first one, Howland, says he has not purchased or sold land in that vicinity for himself or as agent for others. The next witness, Wilbur Hazard, says he does not know the price at which land sold in that vicinity in 1859. Cottrell, the next witness, who knows only of one sale of land in the vicinity, is not interrogated as to the market value of the land, but gives his opinion of its value for agricultural purposes. Jeremiah Hazard, being asked, "Are you familiar with the value of land in the vicinity of Dutch Island, and do you know the price at which land in that neighborhood was sold from 1857 to 1860?" answers as follows: "Somewhat so; I don't recollect the price of any land that was conveyed about that time."

The testimony of all these witnesses was objected to, as being an expression of opinions in a matter upon which they did not appear to be qualified to give an opinion. In the case of Howard v. City of Providence, 6 R. I. 514, a witness, who was a dealer in real estate for himself and others, had been acquainted with the value of real estate in the vicinity, had owned real estate near it, and had bought and acted for others in the sale of real estate in thirty or forty instances, was allowed to give his opinion as an expert as to the value of land, and the damage done to it by the location of a street through it. In New York, the evidence of farmers living in the vicinity, and who state that they are acquainted with the value of farming lands in the vicinity of the land in question, is received as to its value. Van Deusen v. Young, 29 Barb. 9; Robertson v. Knapp, 35 N. Y. 91. In Shaw v. City of Charleston, 2 Gray, 109, the court say, "It has become the well-settled law of this commonwealth, that the value of property, real or personal, when in controversy, may be proved by the testimony of witnesses personally acquainted with the subject, and who are sufficiently familiar with it to give an opinion of its value." In Whitman v. Boston & M. R. R. 7 Allen, 313, 316, the supreme court of Massachusetts, reaffirming the decision in Shaw v. City of Charleston, say, that such evidence is admitted from necessity, and is not confined strictly to experts. Wyman v. Lexington & W. C. R., 13 Metc. [Mass.] 316; Haskins v. Hamilton Ins. Co., 5 Gray, 432; Fowler v. County Commissioners, 6 Allen, 92.

The better opinion, perhaps, would not justify the exclusion of this evidence, but would authorize us to receive it, and give the opinions of the several witnesses only such weight as they are respectively entitled to, when we take into consideration their means of knowledge and their opportunities for forming a correct opinion of the market value of this property, not forgetting that the foundation upon which the admissibility of this evidence rests is some supposed superior knowledge or experience of the witness in relation to the subject-matter upon which he is permitted to give an opinion as evidence.

It does not appear that any one of the complainant's witnesses would have been willing to pay any more for the property than Carpenter paid, or that any other person was willing or desirous to pay a higher price, or that property in the vicinity of like description and value sold at that time in the market for a higher price. A large number of witnesses examined on the part of the defendant, apparently with about equal opportunities of forming a correct opinion of the value of the property at the time of the sale, estimate its value at that time at less than the amount of the incumbrances. They testify that the fact that the land was for sale was generally known, and a matter of common repute in the vicinity.

The charge of fraud as against Carpenter cannot be sustained without establishing the fact of the purchase for an inadequate consideration. His purchase cannot be considered fraudulent as against the creditors, or against the complainant, if he in good faith paid what was at the time a fair value for the property.

Both the defendants were well acquainted with the property and its value; and if the assignee sold it to J. H. Carpenter for a price less than could have been obtained for it from others, the intimate relations of the parties would go far to prove such knowledge on the part of Carpenter, as would charge the estate in his hands, and require him to account for the proceeds. But the burden of proof is on the complainant to establish this fact, by evidence sufficient to overcome the effect of the denials in the answer. This he assumes to do by the evidence of opinions as to the value. But we think, after a careful review of all the testimony in the case, that the preponderance of opinion tends to show that the value at the time of the sale did not exceed the amount of the incumbrances. To hold a party guilty of fraud in the purchase from a trustee, in the absence of any direct evidence of fraud or collusion, upon an inference drawn from an alleged inadequacy of price, such inadequacy should be proved beyond question.

Bill dismissed as against the defendant Carpenter, and cause referred to a master for an account as against the defendant Robinson.

[NOTE. Mere inadequacy of price may be so great as to be evidence of fraud, but is not in itself a fraud for which a court will pronounce a deed to be absolutely void. Wright v. Stannard, Case No. 18,094. In Follett's Heirs v. Rose, Id. 4,900, it is said that inadequacy of consideration does not invalidate a contract unless it be so gross as to strike every one with a presumption of fraud; and, to the same effect, see Surget v. Byers, Id. 13,629. The supreme court of the United States in Eyre v. Potter, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 42, in passing upon this question, held that, while inadequacy of consideration was not of itself a distinct principle of equity, yet there may be such an unconscionableness or inadequacy in a bargain as to demonstrate such gross imposition, or some undue influence, as will justify the interference of a court of equity, but it must be such as to shock the conscience, and amount in itself to conclusive and decisive evidence of fraud.]

ALASKA, INDIAN COUNTRY — SECTION 23 OF THE ACT OF 1834 IN FORCE IN ALASKA — DETENTION OF PERSON ARRESTED IN INDIAN COUNTRY BY MILITARY AUTHORITY — ARREST BY MILITARY AUTHORITIES NOT AUTHORIZED EXCEPT UPON PROBABLE CAUSE.

1. Upon the extension of sections 20 and 21 of the Indian intercourse act of 1834 [4 Stat. 732] over the territory of Alaska by force of the act of March 3, 1873 [17 Stat. 530], said territory became, so far as the introduction and disposition of spirituous liquors therein is concerned, what is known in the law as "Indian Country," and, therefore, the military force of the United States may be employed therein for the arrest of persons who violate either of said sections.

[See U. S. v. Stephens, 12 Fed. 52.]

2. Section 23 of said Indian intercourse act which authorizes the president to employ the military force of the United States to make arrests in the Indian country, was in force in Alaska so far as the introduction and disposition of spirituous liquors therein is concerned, from and after the extension of said sections 20 and 21 of said act over said territory.

3. No person arrested by the military authority in the Indian country for the introduction or disposition of spirituous liquors therein, contrary to law, can be lawfully detained by such authorities more than five days after such arrest before removing him for delivery to the civil authorities for trial.

[See Waters v. Campbell, Case No. 17,265.]

4. A military officer in making an arrest under said section 23 acts as an officer of the civil law, and to justify such arrest it must appear upon oath that there is probable cause, as provided in the fourth amendment to the constitution of the United States.

[Habeas corpus. Petition by John A. Carr for a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the cause of his detention by the military authorities of the United States. The petitioner demurred to the return.]

Joseph N. Dolph and Joseph Simon, for petitioner.

Rufus Mallory, for respondent.

DEADY, District Judge. Two questions are made in support of the demurrer to the return: 1. That section 23 of the Indian intercourse act of 1834 has not been extended to Alaska, and therefore the military force cannot be employed in the apprehension of persons who may be found introducing spirituous liquors into Alaska; and, 2. That although the military force might have been employed in arresting the petitioner upon such charge, yet he could only be held in such custody five days before removal to the civil authority authorized to proceed against him according to law.

It appears from the petition and return that the petitioner, being the collector of customs at Fort Wrangel, in Alaska, was arrested by Lieutenant Dyer, of the army, in the latter part of September, 1874, upon the charge of violating section 20 of the Indian intercourse act, by introducing spirituous liquors into the country, in the month of July, without the consent of the war department; and that the petitioner was kept in custody by direction of Captain J. B. Campbell, commanding the district of Alaska, until the service of the writ herein on December 19, when he was sent in custody of Captain Jocelyn to this place, in obedience to the writ.

Section 1 of the Alaska act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 240), having been amended by the act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat. 530), so as to extend over the territory of Alaska, sections 20 and 21 of the intercourse act of 1834, said territory, so far as the introduction and disposition of spirituous liquors is concerned, became what is known as "Indian Country;" and the military force of the United States may be employed by the president for the arrest of persons found therein violating either of said sections. To accomplish this result it was not necessary for congress to extend section 23 of the intercourse act by name over Alaska. By force of its own terms that section applies to any territory of the United States declared by congress, either in terms or effect, to be "Indian Country"—that is, a country in which the intercourse between the whites and Indians is regulated and restrained by special acts of congress. So soon, then, as Alaska was made "Indian Country," so far as the introduction and use of spirituous liquors is concerned, section 23 of the act which authorizes the employment of military force became applicable to it, and in force therein.

The president, by means of the proper officers, has authorized the employment of the military to make arrests in Alaska for the violation of said sections 20 and 21. If, then, there was sufficient cause to arrest the petitioner for said offense, Lieutenant Dyer was authorized to make it. Of course in so doing he was merely acting as a police officer—as a marshal or constable—for the purpose of enforcing an act of congress, and was not authorized to make the arrest unless it appeared upon oath or affirmation that there was probable cause as provided in the fourth amendment to the constitution of the United States. It is a mistake to suppose that the territory of Alaska is under military rule any more than any other part of the country, except as to the introduction of spirituous liquors and the making of arrests for violations of sections 20 and 21 aforesaid, in which case the military really act as civil officers and in subordination to the civil law.

As to the second point the demurrer is well taken. The petitioner having been detained over five days—indeed, nearly ninety—before any attempt was made to remove him for trial by the civil authorities, his detention thereafter became unlawful and unauthorized. The statute is peremptory upon the subject, and with good reason—"Provided, That no person, apprehended by military force as aforesaid, shall be detained longer than five days after the arrest and before the removal." If the removal cannot be commenced in that time the prisoner must be discharged. It was supposed by congress, as this proviso manifests, that these arrests would often be made at remote and out of the way places, where the prisoner would be comparatively helpless, without access to counsel or friends, and if the officer whose custody he was in was to be judge of when he would or conveniently could remove him to the civil authorities for trial, it might sometimes happen that the detention would be continued captiously or maliciously and the imprisonment become grossly oppressive. In Barclay v. Goodale [Case No. 972], this court, after able argument and full consideration of the premises, held that the defendant who had arrested the plaintiff under section 23 and detained him more than five days before removal, because he had no sufficient means wherewith to do otherwise, was liable for false imprisonment.

The petitioner is entitled to be discharged. I have also considered whether, upon the facts in the return, I ought now to commit the petitioner upon a charge of introducing spirituous liquors into Alaska, contrary to section 20 aforesaid. It is not alleged directly in the return that the petitioner was guilty of this offense, but only that he "was arrested for it." The evidence upon which the arrest was made is not stated in or attached to the return. I do not think the statement in the return is sufficient evidence or information to authorize a commitment by me.

The respondent then had leave to amend the return, and annex thereto, among other things, the affidavit of W. P. Wilson, taken before Lieutenant Dyer, on September 24, 1874, stating that in July he paid John A. Carr $100 for the privilege of taking a lot of liquors out of the bonded warehouse at Fort Wrangel to be taken to his own house in Wrangel, while at the same time said Carr made out a clearance of the goods to Glencora landing, British Columbia.

Objection is made that this affidavit was not made before an officer authorized to administer oaths. But it appears to have been duly taken in pursuance of paragraph 1031 of the army regulations of 1861, and upon it I will commit the petitioner to answer the charge, and fix his bail at $2,500.

CARR v. GALE et al.

[1 Curt. 384.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. September Term, 1853.

NEW TRIAL—SURPRISE—ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE—IMPEACHING WITNESS.

1. If a party who is surprised at the trial, allows it to proceed, without making his surprise known and applying for delay, and the verdict is against him, he cannot have a new trial by reason of that surprise.

2. A new trial will not be granted because a witness, who gave a loose estimate of an amount at the trial, has since become satisfied his estimate was too large:

Nor to contradict a witness, as to a fact of no considerable importance, by negative evidence, given nearly ten years after the event testified to:

Nor to impeach a witness, or disprove a statement which did not materially affect the legal aspect of the case.

[At law. Action of trover by Joshua W. Carr, assignee in bankruptcy of Samuel C. Hemmenway, against Samuel C. Hemmenway, Stephen Gale, and others. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and defendants moved for a new trial.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

[For denial of a like motion, based on other grounds, see Cases Nos. 2,444 and 2,445.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This was a motion for a new trial, on account of newly-discovered evidence. A motion, grounded on other causes, was argued before the late Mr. Justice Woodbury and the Honorable Ashur Ware, District Judge, at a former term, and is reported in 3 Woodb. & M. 38 [Case No. 2,435]. That motion was overruled; but the cause assigned in this motion was not then considered, the evidence on which it rested not having been at that time taken in such a form as to be admissible. Owing to the sickness of counsel, and other causes, the motion has lain on file, and was not called up until the present term. The facts and evidence, as they appeared at the trial, are detailed in the report of the case in 3 Woodb. & M. 38 [Case No. 2,435]. Among the witnesses examined at the trial, was Joseph Bryant; and a large part of the newly-discovered evidence relates to testimony given by him. At the trial, he testified, that in 1836, he was one of the assignees of S. C. Hemmenway; and that the latter, after the assignment, in connection with his mother, abstracted some of the goods from the store, and collected some of the assigned debts, first making such entries in the ledger as would induce the assignees to believe the accounts were balanced before the assignment was made.

In cross-examination by the counsel for the defendants, who now move for a new trial, he said the amount of the goods so abstracted was somewhere between $500 and $1,000. The defendants now produce his deposition, in which he says that he did not undertake to state the amount with any precision at the time; that, being much pressed on cross-examination, to fix on some amount, he mentioned the above sums as being in his opinion correct; that he is now satisfied, from an examination of two schedules, and from other circumstances, that he fixed the sum much too high; but the schedules do not give any decisive information, nor can he now fix, with precision, upon the amount. It should be stated, that the evidence of this witness at the trial was material, only as tending with other evidence, to show that Hemmenway was not destitute of property, at the time when he took the benefit of the bankrupt act. In our judgment, this evidence, if it could properly be treated as newly-discovered, and were not open to objection on account of want of due diligence, would fall far short of being sufficient cause for a new trial. The testimony now is, that Hemmenway and his mother did abstract some goods. This general fact was all that the plaintiff gave in evidence by Bryant at the trial. The defendants, instead of leaving the statement thus general, called upon him for sums and particulars. He says he undertook to give nothing but a loose opinion as to the amount, and this may fairly be inferred where he does not appear, by the report, to have said more than "somewhere from $500 to $1,000." He has now modified that opinion. It would be exceedingly dangerous to allow such changes of mere loose estimates, brought out on cross-examinations, to lay a foundation for a new trial. Besides, it does not appear that all the information, which has caused this change of opinion in the mind of the witness, was not then in his own possession, and might not have been evoked at the trial, by proper inquiries as to the elements or data for the opinion expressed by him.

It is urged by the defendants' counsel, that their clients, not having anticipated this charge of abstracting goods, had not instructed them so as to enable them properly to investigate it. This may be true. But when they found the charge was made, and that they were not in a condition to meet it, a suggestion of surprise, backed by proper evidence of the truth of the suggestion, would have obtained delay for all needful preparation. A party cannot be allowed to wait and take his chance of a verdict in his favor, and, when it is against him, allege surprise. It is then too late. I am aware that a different rule has been held in some courts. But the reason is, that by their practice, the remedy could not be had by delaying the trial. In this court, such delay is granted; and the proper remedy here, is to apply for it, and not to wait till after verdict, and then move for a new trial.

Two depositions of the co-assignees of Bryant are also produced, which tend, in some degree, to negative altogether the charge that Hemmenway abstracted any goods, and to show, that though some were taken by his mother, they were all paid for ultimately by her, out of her dividends, under the assignment. But the defendant Hemmenway knew, at the trial, that both these persons were co-assignees with Bryant; that, from their position as such, they would be likely to have information on this subject; and if he believed himself innocent of the charge, and had not then made inquiries of them concerning their knowledge, he had sufficient reason to think they might be able to give evidence concerning it. And it cannot be considered as the use of due diligence, to suffer the trial to proceed, and after a verdict against him, proceed to make the inquiries which he might and ought to have made before. It may be added, that this evidence would be cumulative merely, if produced, and therefore, its discovery is not ground for a new trial.

The defendants have also offered two affidavits of Martin Bates and Thomas P. Cushing, two of the committee of the creditors of Hemmenway, to disprove the statement of Bryant, that he disclosed to the committee the fact that Hemmenway abstracted goods. If the object of this evidence is, as is supposed, to impeach the credibility of Bryant's evidence, it is doubtful, to say the least, whether it is entitled to this effect; because, although according to the report of the case, Bryant does speak generally of the committee, yet Mr. Tappan was a member of the committee, whose testimony is not produced: and the witness may have considered communications made to him, and designed for the committee, as made to all of them. But independent of this consideration, we could not grant a new trial merely on account of the contradiction of a witness, otherwise credible, upon a circumstance of very slight importance in the cause, and especially when that contradiction is by affidavits, taken in his absence. If he had been present, he might have reminded the witnesses of circumstances which would have shown them and not him, to be mistaken as to a fact which he testifies to positively, while they only speak negatively, and in the hurry of business may have forgotten, after the lapse of nearly ten years which intervened, in this case, between the event and their testimony.

We have thus examined, in some detail, the evidence relied on; but we do not think it strictly necessary to have done so, because there is a more general consideration, which would be decisive against granting a new trial; and that is, that if the testimony of Bryant were stricken out of the case, it would not materially vary its legal aspect, under the instructions given to the jury, the correctness of which is not in question. There were, in substance, two inquiries to be made by the jury. The first was, whether Hemmenway had carried on business under cover of Gale's name, but really on his own account, for the purpose of concealing his property from his creditors. None of the newly-discovered evidence bears on this question.

The other question was, whether the property, which was the subject of the suit, was property thus concealed. Upon this question, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to show that every part of it was bought by funds which could be traced as the property of Hemmenway. If the jury were satisfied that, by concert between Gale and Hemmenway, the latter did carry on business in the name of the former, but really on his own account, and that this pretended arrange was made to conceal Hemmenway's property, and that the goods in question were the stock of that trade, they had a right to infer that funds and profits of Hemmenway were invested in those goods; and if some were purchased on the credit of Gale, that the credit was, as between him and Hemmenway, for the sole benefit of the latter, and that, by force of the agreement between them, the goods, when purchased, were really Hemmenway's goods. In this point of view, it was of but slight importance in the cause, whether, at a certain time, and from a certain source, Hemmenway had $500, or only a less sum; and therefore it is, that, under no aspect of this evidence, do we deem it to be such as to justify the court in setting aside the verdict.

We have not observed particularly on the affidavit of Sylvester, respecting the $4,000 of assigned accounts said to have been collected by Hemmenway, because it was, very properly, admitted by the defendants' counsel at the argument, that the facts disclosed in this affidavit were within reach at the time of the trial, or might speedily have been obtained. This is manifestly so; for, so far as the affidavit states facts, they are drawn from the books of Hemmenway, which were in his possession; and whatever they contained, upon this subject, was within his personal knowledge. The motion for a new trial must be overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict.

CARR v. GALE et al.

[2 Ware (Dav. 328) 330.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct., 1847.

BANKRUPTCY — ACTION BY ASSIGNEE — PROOF OF TITLE—JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURT — TROVER — DEMAND — POINTING OUT OBJECTION TO TESTIMONY—PROOF OF FRAUD.

1. In an action of trover against Gale and Hemenway, by the assignee of Hemenway, for the conversion of a store of goods in the possession of Hemenway, claimed by Gale as owner, and by Hemenway as the agent of Gale, and claimed by the plaintiff as part of the assets of Hemenway's bankruptcy, it was held that the circuit court had jurisdiction against Hemenway as well as Gale.

2. The district court has, under the bankrupt law [5 Stat. 445], exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies, between the assignee and the bankrupt, arising out of his bankruptcy, and depending on his quality or status, and involving his rights and immunities as a bankrupt.

3. But when the bankrupt has possession of property claimed by the assignee as part of the assets of the bankruptcy, and the bankrupt claims to hold them, not as a bankrupt but under an independent title as the agent of a third person, he is simply a person claiming an adverse interest, and the circuit court has jurisdiction.

4. The assignee, to maintain his title to sue, need prove only the decree of bankruptcy and his appointment. This is prima facie evidence of his title under the law, without producing the bankrupt's petition to be declared a bankrupt.

5. In trover, it is not necessary to prove a demand of the goods and a refusal, where there has been an actual conversion.

6. When a party objects to the testimony of a witness, part of which is admissible and part inadmissible, he is bound to point out that part to which the objection lies, or the objection will be overruled as covering too much.

7. In a case where fraud is charged, and the fraud is attempted to be proved by circumstantial evidence, facts which have no tendency to prove the frauds charged, but merely tend to create a personal prejudice against the party, are inadmissible; but if the court can see that they have any tendency to prove the fraud, though it be but slight, they are admissible to be submitted to the jury, who are the proper judges of their weight.

At law. This was an action of trover brought by [Joshua W.] Carr as assignee of Samuel C. Hemenway, one of the defendants, against Stephen Gale and Hemenway, for the conversion of a store of goods in Bangor. The plaintiff claimed them as part of the estate of Hemenway, which should have been surrendered to him as his assignee. The defendants claimed them as the proper goods of Gale, in the possession of Hemenway as his agent. The defendants pleaded separately the general issue, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $5,030.45. The defendants filed a motion for setting aside the verdict, and for a new trial.

[See decision of Woodbury, Circuit Justice (Case No. 2,435), which apparently was rendered upon the same motion.]

Deblois & McCrillis, for plaintiff.
Daveis v. Rowe, for defendants.

WARE, District Judge. The first question raised by the defendants' counsel is one as to the jurisdiction of the court. It is denied that this court has jurisdiction over the case, at least as to one of the defendants, Hemenway, and that if any action can be maintained against him, this can be only in the district court. The 6th section of the bankrupt law [5 Stat. 445] gives to the district court jurisdiction over all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy in the most comprehensive terms, and this jurisdiction is declared to extend in all cases and controversies arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors claiming any debt or demand under the bankruptcy, to all cases between such creditor or creditors and the assignee of the estate, and to all cases between such assignee and the bankrupt. By the 8th section, concurrent jurisdiction is given to the circuit court, with the district court, of all suits at law and in equity, which may or shall be brought by any assignee of the bankrupt against any person or persons, claiming an adverse interest, or by such person or persons against the assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to, or vested in, the assignee. The jurisdiction of the court is then free from doubt as to Gale, as he appears claiming an adverse interest. But in carving out a portion of the jurisdiction of the district court to be exercised by the circuit concurrently with the district court, the act omits controversies between the assignee and the bankrupt, and it is therefore said that Hemenway is not bound to answer in this court. It may be admitted that the circuit court has no jurisdiction over controversies between the assignee and the bankrupt, arising out of his quality or status as a bankrupt, and dependent on that. For instance, by the 3d section of the law, all the property and rights of property of the bankrupt are, by virtue of the decree of bankruptcy, declared to be, by mere operation of law, transferred to and vested in the assignee, subject to certain exceptions. The proviso enumerates these exceptions. They are—the wearing apparel of the bankrupt and his family, and such household furniture and other necessary articles as shall be set apart for his use by the assignee subject to the decision of the court. These do not pass to the assignee. A question may arise whether a watch, or articles of personal ornament, for himself, or his wife, or children, fall within the exceptions, as wearing apparel, or other necessary articles. In re Grant [Case No. 5,693]. This would be a matter arising out of the bankruptcy, and involving his rights as a bankrupt under the bankruptcy, and if a controversy arose on the subject, would seem to be exclusively within the jurisdiction of the district court. Again, a bankrupt may acquire property after he has filed his petition, and before a decree of bankruptcy, or before his discharge, by his own industry, or by contract, inheritance, devise, or gift. And a question will arise between the bankrupt and his assignee, whether this passes to the assignee as part of the assets of the bankruptcy, or is an acquisition for the benefit of the bankrupt himself. The solution of this question involves the consideration of his rights and immunities as a bankrupt. In re Williams [Case No. 17,701]. The clause in the 6th section of the law, giving jurisdiction to the district court over cases and controversies between the assignee and the bankrupt, naturally refers to cases of this description, involving the consideration of his personal status and the rights which he may claim in his quality as a bankrupt; and as no similar language is used in the 8th section, it may be that the jurisdiction over this class of cases is exclusive. But in the present suit, Hemenway sets up no claim as a bankrupt; he insists on no right in relation to this property derived from his bankruptcy, or any way connected with it. The goods which he is charged with converting are indeed claimed by his assignee as part of his assets, but he makes no claim to them as such. His defense is that the goods were never his, but belonged to Gale, and were in his possession as the agent of Gale; and the suit is not against him as a bankrupt, but simply as a wrong-doer. I cannot see that he is any more exempted from the jurisdiction of this court than he would be if the property, the conversion of which he is charged with, had belonged to another estate. In this case he is simply a person claiming an interest adverse to the assignee.

Another ground, on which a new trial is demanded, is that the plaintiff has shown no title to claim the property, admitting that the goods belonged to Hemenway before his bankruptcy, and so constituted a part of his assets. The plaintiff, to prove his title, offered in evidence the decree of bankruptcy and his appointment as assignee, but this, it said, is insufficient without offering the petition also. The ground of this objection is, that the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, is a court of limited and special jurisdiction, and that, as such, no presumption can be made in favor of its jurisdiction, but that this must be made to appear affirmatively by spreading before this court the whole proceedings. The decisions under the English bankrupt law and those of our own courts under the former bankrupt law, have been referred to in support of this position. The former bankrupt law was borrowed, with some alterations, from the English system (Lummus v. Fairfield, 5 Mass. 249, 250), and was widely different from the last law. It was far more complicated in its details, and operose in its modes of proceeding. Under the English system, it is necessary for the assignee to prove—1st, the commission,—2d, the petitioning creditor's debt,—3d, the trading,—4th, the act of bankruptcy,—and 5th, the assignment. Eden, Bankr. Law, 252. The 3d section of the late act seems to have been framed with a view to supersede the necessity of proving such facts. It provides that all the property and rights of property of the bankrupt, who has been declared such by a decree of the proper court, shall, by mere operation of law, from the time of such decree, be deemed to be divested out of such bankrupt and without any conveyance shall, by force of the decree, be vested in such assignee as the court shall appoint. It appears to me, from the plain words of this section, that all which is necessary for the assignee to show in the first instance, is the decree and his appointment under it. It obviously was the intention of the statute to simplify the proceedings and dispense with the cumbrous machinery of the former law. The analogies, therefore, derived from the practice under that law, apply with less force. That dispensed, in favor of the assignee, with two of the requisites of the English law, that is, proof of the trading and the act of bankruptcy, which were held to be conclusively proved by the commission. Laws U. S. 1800, c. 19, § 56. The policy of the late act was to render the proceedings still more simple, expeditious, and cheap. The assets, instead of coming to the assignee through a conveyance by commissioners, passed directly, without any form of conveyance, by operation of law. Under the voluntary branch of our law, no one of the five things required to be proved by the English law can be properly said to exist, or at least no one is essential to the proceedings. No commission of bankruptcy is issued; there is no petitioning creditor, and under the English law his petition need not be proved; no trading is necessary, and no act of bankruptcy is required, and no assignment is made. The title deed of the assignee is the decree, and it appears to me that the statute makes this prima facie evidence of the assignee's right to the property. If this title may be impeached for any irregularities in the antecedent proceedings, the burden of impeaching is thrown on the other party.

Another objection to the verdict is, that there was no evidence sufficient to support the action, there having been no proof of a demand of the goods and a refusal to deliver them, before the action was brought. The action is trover, an action of tort, but the tort consists not in the taking but the conversion. If there was an unlawful taking, this was waived by the form of the action, and the defendant is admitted to have obtained the possession lawfully, that is, by finding. A conversion must therefore be proved. If the defendant has done nothing with the goods beyond what he might do as finder, this action cannot be maintained until there has been a demand by the owner and a refusal to deliver them. A refusal is then ordinarily held to be equivalent to a conversion, because it ordinarily amounts to a denial of the owner's right. But if the refusal is justified, or excused, by any reasonable or just cause, as if it be on a fair doubt whether the person who makes the demand be the true owner, the refusal will not be equivalent to a conversion, provided the party acts in good faith, and does not intend to make any appropriation of the goods to the injury of the real owner. 1 Archb. N. P. p. 458; 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 644, 645, and the cases cited. A demand and refusal is only one mode of proving a conversion. But a sale is a conversion, as much as an actual consumption of the goods would be. Featherstonhaugh v. Johnston, 8 Taunt. 237. A demand, then, would have been a useless and unmeaning formality.

Another reason urged for a new trial is, that certain parts of the evidence offered by the plaintiff were irrelevant and improper to be submitted to the jury. This objection relates principally to the deposition of Sylvester and the testimony of Bryant. To understand the bearing and applicability of this evidence, it will be necessary to advert to some antecedent facts. In 1836, Hemenway failed in trade and transferred a large amount of property, being his whole stock in trade, to assignees, for the benefit of such of his creditors as should become parties to the assignment and release him from his debt. Some of his creditors refused to come in under the assignment, so that, after the distribution of the estate, there remained a considerable amount of outstanding claims against him. Hemenway then left Bangor and was absent a considerable time, and returned in 1838, when he again went into business as the agent of Gale, his brother-in-law, residing in Portland. While thus engaged in business, one of his old creditors sued him and summoned Gale as his trustee. Gale was discharged on his disclosure, a copy of which was offered in evidence in this case by the plaintiff. The ground assumed by the plaintiff was, that all this time, from 1838 to 1842, Hemenway was trading on his own capital, was in fact the owner of the goods, and that the title of attorney of Gale was a mere cover, he having no interest in the store. As proof of the good faith of the parties and that the property was in fact Gale's, evidence was offered by the defendants tending to show that Hemenway was poor and utterly destitute of property. The testimony offered by the plaintiff was to show that Hemenway had property of his own, and to overcome the presumption of good faith arising from his apparent poverty. Sylvester testified that he paid Hemenway a bill after he made his assignment, and that Hemenway stated to him that he had drawn off bills to the amount of $4,000, and balanced the accounts in his books before delivering them to his assignees, which were then due and unpaid. Bryant testified that after the books came into his hands, as one of the assignees, several persons called on him and stated that they were indebted to the estate, but that on turning to the ledger he found the accounts balanced. He also testified that after the keys to the store were delivered to him a considerable amount of goods was abstracted from the store, and that Hemenway was concerned in taking them away. From this evidence, the counsel for the plaintiff argued that Hemenway had reserved to himself, from the wreck of his fortune in 1836, a considerable sum, and that it was with this capital that he commenced business in 1838. Connecting this with the disclosure of Gale, who said that he had no interest in the store, and the further fact that, though a large business was carried on under Gale's name, he gave no attention to it, and never visited Bangor from 1838 to 1842, the plaintiff's counsel contended that the title of attorney was a mere blind to enable Hemenway, under Gale's name, to resume business for himself and set his creditors at defiance. There was other evidence besides this, from which the jury might infer that Hemenway had an interest in the store beyond that of a mere agency. If any credit was due to this evidence tending to show that he had an interest in the goods, it could not be considered immaterial to show that Hemenway had property of his own. Whether he had or had not, was a fact to be inferred altogether from circumstantial evidence. Now it is evident that circumstances of this kind may be made to bear with more or less force, according to their connection with other facts admitted or proved in the case. How far they contributed to sustain the plaintiff's case was a question for the consideration of the jury. The question now is whether the jury ought to be allowed to hear such evidence; that is, whether it had any tendency to prove the plaintiff's case. The plaintiff's case stood on the charge of a fraudulent covering of Hemenway's property to screen it from his creditors. Unless this was made out, he failed. It was, therefore, very material to show that he had property to conceal. The evidence in question went to prove this fact, by showing that he had fraudulently abstracted a portion of his assets on the occasion of a former failure in business; and that at a period not so distant but that he might reasonably be supposed to have retained a portion to recommence business in 1838. It was not, therefore, evidence that went merely to create in the minds of the jury a personal prejudice against him, but to a certain extent tended to sustain a material point in the plaintiff's case. It appears to me, therefore, that it was evidence proper to be submitted to the jury. It is said that this matter had before been submitted to arbitration, and it was contended that it was not now open to be re-examined. But that was between Hemenway and the parties to the assignment. The present plaintiff, and the creditors whom he represents, were no parties to that arbitration, and the decision of the arbiter is not binding on them. It is true that fraud is not to be presumed, but it is also true that it may be inferred from circumstances, and often can be proved in no other way.

Another objection was made to a part of the testimony of Bryant. In answer to a question of the plaintiff's counsel he stated, that several persons called on him and said that they were indebted to the store, but on turning to the books he found the accounts balanced. The defendants objected to this testimony without the production of the books. But Bryant did not testify here to the contents of the books. He was not asked who called on him, nor how many, nor what was the amount of the accounts so balanced. The fact, to which he testified, was not one which appeared in the books, but was collateral to them. It was simply that persons called on him and stated that they were indebted to the store, but when he looked into the books he found the accounts balanced. The production of the books could neither confirm nor disprove the statement of the witness. All that they would have shown was, that there were some accounts which were balanced and others which were not; but the material fact, whether there were any persons who called on him as he stated, was a fact known only to the witness himself. There is, however, one fact stated by Bryant, which, perhaps, in strictness, was not admissible without the production of the books. It is that when persons called on him and said that they were indebted to the store he looked at the ledger and found the account balanced, but that in examining the day-book he found no corresponding entries in that. No names of individuals were given and no sums mentioned, but the naked fact alone was stated. Now an inspection of the books might have verified or disproved the fact, and for this purpose perhaps they ought to have been produced. But when the objection was made, this distinction was not noticed. The objection was general and in my opinion covered too much, and so it was properly overruled. The party objecting to the testimony of a witness, part of whose testimony is admissible and part of which is inadmissible, is bound to point out and discriminate the part to which the objection applies. If, however, the discrimination is not made, and objectionable testimony is permitted to go to the jury, the court may undoubtedly in its discretion grant a new trial for this cause. But it ought not to do it, when the testimony is of such a character as probably would not and ought not to have changed the verdict. And such I think this testimony to have been in this case.

The defendants offered the schedule annexed to Hemenway's petition in bankruptcy, to prove the property in Gale. This was objected to and ruled to be inadmissible. The defendants contend that it ought to have been admitted. It is generally true, that, in an action by the assignee, the bankrupt is a competent witness to diminish but not to increase the fund. Eden, Bankr. Law. pp. 361, 366. His interest in the surplus is an obvious reason for excluding his testimony when it goes to increase the fund, but when it goes to diminish it, he is testifying against his own interest. But the evidence here offered was the mere declaration of the bankrupt, under oath it is true, but still only his declaration, without any opportunity of the present plaintiff to cross examine him. And here the bankrupt is a party and of course he cannot give in evidence his own declaration in his own favor. But it is said that it ought to have been admitted in favor of Gale. To determine this, let us look at the posture of the case. The plaintiff proceeds on the ground that there was a fraudulent agreement between the parties to cover the property of Hemenway and keep it from his creditors under the name of Gale. And this evidence is nothing more than the declaration of one of the parties to disprove the fraud. It appears to me on this ground that it is inadmissible.

There was other testimony admitted which was objected to, as irrelevant and as having a tendency to create a prejudice against the defendants. This related to the mode of conducting the business in the store, and the contemporaneous declaration of Hemenway after the sale by Gale to Hersey. Hersey was a connection by marriage both of Hemenway and Gale, they each having married a sister of his, and he had for several months prior to the sale been employed as a clerk in the store. This testimony tended to show that Hemenway claimed and exercised the same control over the business after the sale, when, if it had been in fact what it purported to be, he was a mere clerk in the store, that he had done when carrying on the business as the agent of Gale. Now, the question at issue between the parties was whether, at the time of the sale to Hersey, the property was in Hemenway or Gale. The ground, on which the admission of this testimony was claimed, was that if it satisfied the jury that Hemenway had an interest, that is, was the owner of the goods after the sale, it threw back its light and tended to illustrate the antecedent state of things. Whether it was legally admissible for that purpose is now the question. It appeared to me that it was. In a case where fraud is charged, and the charge is to be made out by circumstantial evidence, it is not easy to draw the precise line separating those circumstances which are fairly admissible to prove the fraud from those which ought to be excluded. Evidence which has no connection with the matters in issue, but merely tending to create a personal prejudice against one of the parties, certainly should be excluded. But if it have a connection, how near that must be to render it admissible, or how remote to exclude it, is not easy to determine by any universal and exact definition. The acts of the parties near the time when the fraud is alleged to have been committed, and connected with it, seem to be properly admissible. The evidence in question was of this description. The jury might infer from it that Hersey, the apparent owner, was not the real owner; that though he was clothed with the ordinary indicia of ownership, this was but a disguise to conceal the real ownership of Hemenway. Now, as the great question is whether the goods belonged to Hemenway before the sale, if it be shown by probable evidence that they belonged to him after, and notwithstanding the sale, this is a fact that would tend, connected with other circumstances, to satisfy the mind that they were his before; and that this sale was but a continuation of that system of disguised ownership which was alleged to exist from 1838 to the time of the sale. It appeared to me at the trial that it was evidence competent to be given and not wholly irrelevant, and how far it tended to support the plaintiff's case was for the consideration of the jury.

Another decision of the court, to which exception is taken, involves rather a rule of practice than strictly of law. Hersey, the purchaser from Gale, was called as a witness by the plaintiff to prove the bill of sale, and nothing further. The defendants then claimed the right to cross-examine him to the whole cause. This was objected to by the plaintiff. It was ruled by the court that the cross-examination must be confined to the subject-matters inquired of in the direct examination; that, if the defendants wanted him as a witness, they must call him after they had opened their case to the jury, and examine him as their own witness. Subsequently he was called by the defendants and examined. The practice of courts in this respect is not uniform. The rule in the English courts is, that if a witness is called and sworn, though he is asked but a single question, the other party has a right to cross-examine him to the whole case as a witness of the adverse party. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 445. And the same practice prevails in some of the courts in this country. In this court the rule has been different. It has been repeatedly laid down by the late Justice Story, in the terms in which the court ruled in the present case, and by the decision in Philadelphia & Trenton Railroad Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 448, it is established as a rule of practice in the courts of the United States.

After the evidence was closed, and the arguments of counsel, the counsel for the defendants asked the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not maintain the action because there was no evidence of a conversion by either of the defendants. The court declined to give that instruction, but instructed the jury that if they were satisfied from the evidence that in 1838, when the letter of attorney was given by Gale to Hemenway, it was given for the purpose of enabling Hemenway to do business on his own capital and for his own benefit, and was so used, the property being in fact and in truth in Hemenway, then, by force of the statute, the property became vested in the assignee of Hemenway, and that the sale by Gale under color of this disguised title was evidence of a conversion by Gale. And secondly, that if the sale was made by an arrangement and contrivance, between Hemenway and Gale, to place the property still further beyond the reach of the assignee, it was evidence of a conversion both by Gale and Hemenway. Under these instructions the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. It is quite certain that the court could not give the direction asked by the defendants, because, if the jury found that the property was in Hemenway, the sale was a conversion. To maintain the action of trover, the plaintiff must prove property and the right of possession. It is not necessary to prove that he has had the actual possession and that it has been disturbed by the defendant. An executor, who has never had the possession of the goods, may maintain trover for a previous conversion of the goods of his testator. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 461.

The last ground, on which the defendants asked for a new trial, is that the verdict is against the weight of evidence. There was evidence on both sides, and it was the province of the jury to determine on which side the balance inclined. By the theory of the common law, they are the exclusive judges of the weight of evidence. But it is also true when the court is satisfied that the jury, from any cause, have fallen into an error and decided against the clear preponderance of the evidence, the verdict will be set aside and the case sent to another jury. If, however, there is contradictory evidence, and the conclusion is dependent on the degree of credit given to the witnesses, or if the facts proved, or admitted, are such that different conclusions may be inferred from them, the court will not disturb the verdict, unless the jury have decided against the clear preponderance of the evidence. In this case there was but little if any conflict in the testimony, that is, the facts, proved by the testimony on one side, were not impugned by contradictory testimony on the other so as to bring them into doubt. The conflict was in the facts themselves. There is one series of facts proved by the defendants which, standing alone, lead directly, if not irresistibly, to one conclusion, but there is another series, part of which are equally well proved and which, if not controlled by any facts tending to a different conclusion, would lead directly to the opposite decision. When the verdict is to be deduced from opposite and conflicting analogies, it belongs exclusively to the jury to determine the force and value of these analogies. All that the court can do is to assist their judgment, by general observations on the nature of the evidence. It is not pretended that there were any such remarks in this case as had a tendency to preoccupy the minds of the jury by any notions adverse to the defendants. It would seem that they were rather of an opposite tendency, for one of the reasons urged for a new trial is that the verdict is against the opinion of the court. But the court has no authority to substitute its own judgment for that of the jury, when they have deliberately considered and decided the case. It is only when they have, from wantonness, or caprice, or negligence and inattention, rendered a verdict palpably erroneous, that the court will interfere. And the court will sometimes infer this want of due attention on the part of the jury, when the verdict is clearly against the weight of evidence. But to do this, when the evidence is nearly balanced, would be an encroachment on the proper province of the jury. On the whole my opinion is that judgment should be entered on the verdict. New trial refused.

[3 Woodb. & M. 38.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. May, 1847.

BANKRUPTCY — ACTION BY ASSIGNEE — JURISDICTION—EVIDENCE OF CONVERSION—DECLARATIONS —NEW TRIAL—BOOKS AND PAPERS — LIABILITY OF BANKRUPT FOR TORT—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. An action of trover by an assignee, for property supposed to have belonged to a bankrupt, lies in the circuit court against another claiming the title, and the bankrupt aiding him.

2. Possession by the bankrupt, when his property was assigned, and a removal and sale of it, in connection with the other defendant, afterwards, is prima facie evidence of conversion.

3. The declarations of the bankrupt are competent evidence against him, in such an action.

4. Explanations and schedules attached to his petition for bankruptcy, are competent evidence for him, as a part of the petition, but should not be allowed weight in his behalf; and if they are excluded, it will be no ground for a new trial.

[Cited in Whetmore v. Murdock, Case No. 17,509.]

5. Nor is it sufficient ground for a new trial if the verdict is against the weight of evidence, provided some existed on both sides, which was contradictory, and it does not clearly appear that the verdict was given by mistake, or any wilful abuse of power.

6. Books and papers produced under a notice, must be brought in and allowed to be used by the other side, unconditionally, else parol evidence of their contents is competent.

7. Actions for property may be brought by an assignee, when it is alleged to have been conveyed fraudulently, which could not have been sustained by the bankrupt.

[Cited in Whetmore v. Murdock, Case No. 17,509.]

8. The want of property by the latter is no defence to an action against him for a tort, and he may be liable for a tort committed on what was his own property when he went into bankruptcy.

9. Property held in trust by a bankrupt passes into the control of the assignee, till another trustee is appointed.

[10. Cited in Payson v. Dietz, Case No. 10,861, to the point that state courts are not deprived of jurisdiction in ordinary common-law and equity suits simply because brought by an assignee in bankruptcy.]

(The following report of the case tried before WARE, J., was drawn up and agreed to by the counsel in the cause.)

At law. This was an action of trover [by Joshua W. Carr, assignee in bankruptcy of Samuel C. Hemmenway, against Samuel C. Hemmenway, Stephen Gale, and others], for a quantity of goods, &c., mentioned in the plaintiff's writ, which writ may be referred to. The plaintiff introduced a copy of the decree of the district court, for Maine district, sitting in bankruptcy, declaring said Hemmenway bankrupt; and also a copy of the decree of said court appointing the plaintiff the assignee, both of which may be referred to and made a part of the case.

The plaintiff then called William S. Warren, who testified that he had been intimately acquainted with the defendant, Hemmenway, for six years past, and knew him before that; that he kept a store where the same kind of goods were kept which Hemmenway kept; that the store in which the witness kept, in 1840, 1841 and 1842, was about ten rods from said Hemmenway's store; that Hemmenway traded in No. 1 Maine street, in Bangor, being the bank building, so called, from 1838 to the fall of 1842, in selling his goods, which consisted of hats, caps, furs, &c.; that during the months of April, May, June and July, he had such goods in his store in Bangor as are named in the plaintiff's writ, or of the kind and value named in the bills which he held in his hand, and which counsel agreed were the same named in the plaintiff's writ. The said bills may be referred to and are a part of the case. That, in the fall of 1842, he moved from No. 1, to No. 19, West Market place, which was the next door; that he was engaged, during the time, in selling said goods, and that he subsequently removed from this No. 19 to the opposite side of the street, and that witness never observed any apparent change in the mode or manner of his doing business. On cross-examination, he stated that Hemmenway's sign over the door, was "S. C. Hemmenway," in large letters, with the word "Agent" put in small, diminutive letters; that the whole word "Agent" was not more than three inches long, and about one half inch in width; that he kept beside the defendant one year before he discovered the word "Agent" on his sign; that he signed his name "S. C. Hemmenway, Agent," in all his business which he knew anything about. He also testified, that after his removal into the store in West Market place, the sign over the door was "Thomas Hersey;" and afterwards, the name of "William H. Hemmenway" was put up upon it. He subsequently, and after the defendant had gone through with his proof, stated that the profits on such goods as kept by Hemmenway, was twenty-five per cent., in the winter, and twenty per cent., in the summer.

John B. Norris was next called by the plaintiff, and interrogated as to the business in the store of Hemmenway & Hersey, in 1844, which was objected to by defendants, but was admitted; and he testified that he went into the store of Hemmenway & Hersey in the spring of 1844;—left about a month since. Can't state the amount of stock. In the fall of 1844, stock was $30,000. Had in their employ, last winter, about thirty men. Can't say what William H. Hemmenway was doing; not in store one-tenth of the time. Sam and Hersey had done all the business. Have seen William sell a very few articles. He bought some furs for the store, last winter. Don't know whether Hemmenway & Hersey, or Richardson, employed the men. Understood that William was a member of the firm —not from any of the partners. For a greater part of a few weeks, last winter, William was making buffalo robes.

George L. Gibson was next called, and testified that he was employed in Laban Hersey's store during the time he was in business in No. 19, about three months, till he sold out, sometime in July or August, 1844, to Jos. Bryant & Son. Groceries came from Ingalls and Hersey's, and about the city; some of the goods came from Hemmenway & Hersey's store. S. C. Hemmenway took some interest in Laban Hersey's sale, as he would in the sale of Hemmenway & Hersey's stock. The witness was here objected to by defendants and stopped.

O. H. Ingalls was next called by the plaintiff, and he stated that Hemmenway had been engaged in trade in Bangor from the year 1838 to September A. D. 1842, when he moved into No. 19 West Market place, it being the next door, and where the witness had kept his store; that during the months of April, May, June and July of 1842, the defendant, Hemmenway, had such goods in his store, and he sold them during that time, as are mentioned in the plaintiff's writ; and witness has never seen any apparent change in his business; that the word "Agent" was upon the sign in small, diminutive letters; and that he, witness, was in the store as clerk in 1842, in September, about 30 days; that those in the store engaged in selling those goods, were Thomas Hersey, S. C. Hemmenway, and himself; that they sold about one hundred dollars a day for cash, and about one-third as many on credit. The goods sold for cash were at a profit of about 20 per cent. Hemmenway was all this time insolvent. On cross examination he stated the sign was Wm. H. Hemmenway & Hersey, in the fall of 1842. On Hemmenway's sign was the word "Agent," in small letters. That he was the agent, selling goods and doing business in that store, so far as witness knew by the word "Agent" on the sign. That the word "Agent" was three inches, and the sign eight feet long. Subsequently, and after the defendants had gone through with their testimony, he was recalled, and testified, (subject to objection,) that as well as he could judge, said Hemmenway, from the year 1835 to July, 1842, sold, on an average, $15,000 of goods per year. He did not see the word "Agent" on the sign until after one year.

The plaintiff then introduced the disclosure of Stephen Gale, as follows, viz.:—

"District Court, Western District, June Term, 1842. Am acquainted with the defendant in this suit. Said defendant is a brother-in-law of mine. Am not in any way connected in business with said Hemmenway. I gave an instrument in writing to said defendant two years ago. What sort of an instrument it was, or what powers I gave him in that instrument I do not remember. I do not know what this was given for, but said Hemmenway thought it necessary for his transactions in business, and I therefore gave him this instrument; and I have no copy of it, and have not seen this instrument since I signed it. Don't know that I gave the instrument any perusal before signing it. Might have given it a cursory reading, but I had great confidence in him, and therefore signed it. There was no consideration given me for signing said instrument, but what I did was from motives of friendship to aid him. Have never made any claim to any of the goods which said Hemmenway has in his possession since I gave the instrument above mentioned. Do not know what those goods are, and have never been in Bangor; and have no interest in, and have never taken any of the profits arising from the sale of goods which said defendant may have sold. Don't know what sales or purchases said defendant may have made; though he may have made some statements to me in relation thereto. Cannot say that he ever showed me any bills of parcels thereof. Said Hemmenway is engaged in the hatting business. I am not at all acquainted with the hatting business. I never bought any goods which he has had for him. The instrument before spoken of was given by me to said Hemmenway at his request. (Signed) Stephen Gale.

"Cumberland, ss. Personally appeared the above Stephen Gale, Esq., and made oath that the facts contained in the above disclosure, by him described, are true. Before me, Oliver G. Fessenden, Justice of the Peace. June 23, 1842."

As trustee in an action, Allen Gilman against S. C. Hemmenway and Stephen Gale, trustees, and also the writ with the record of the court to which the writ was returnable. The record to be copied and made a part of the case. The writ is to be copied and made a part of the case.

Plaintiff then called Thomas Hersey to produce and prove a bill of sale from said Gale to himself; and he was sworn and proved the paper. The defendants then claimed the right to cross-examine the witness to the whole case. The judge ruled that they could not cross-examine the witness except as to the matters to which he had testified on the direct examination, and that if he wished to examine him as a witness, to make out his own case, he must wait till after he had opened his case and call him again. And the court further ruled that the plaintiff having called the witness and examined him, could not discredit him, by any evidence tending to show that he was not a creditable witness; and the bill of sale proved by Hersey, and which may be referred to, was then put in. Plaintiff then stopped, and the counsel for each of the defendants severally moved for a non-suit.

Thomas Hersey was then recalled by the defendants, and stated the goods were in No. 1 Main street, kept by S. C. Hemmenway, as agent, when Gale came to Bangor and took possession, July 22, 1842; the schedule contains all the stock then in the store; the prices in the bill of sale are the true prices—the prices I paid. Most of the goods were taken at cost; very few, some old hats, at less than cost; some put down at more than cost; the cost, by the marks and examining the bills. I took possession and held it from time of bill of sale. Had dealt in such goods four years. I paid full market price for those. Had been in the store then as clerk nine months. The business was conducted in the name of S. C. Hemmenway, agent of Gale; sign, "S. C. Hemmenway, Agent." There was money and accounts due at the time of sale; cash, about $900. Gale made me his agent to close the concerns. I gave Gale four notes for the stock as stated in the bill, for $4719.20. Those notes have been paid by taking up Gale's liabilities. I took possession of all the assets in the store as Gale's agent; cash, $938.52, and bills due, on which I had collected 1399.95. The cash on hand was endorsed on Sarah Shaw's note against Gale, by me, in July 23, 1842. Cash collected on bills was paid on Gale's liabilities. My notes were taken up in the same way; as fast as Gale's liabilities were taken up by me, they were handed him and endorsed on my notes. Here was put in, and sworn to by witness, a written statement of moneys paid by Hersey; the stock, money, &c., amounted to $7057.67; all that I have paid away as before stated, to discharge Gale's liabilities. There are some accounts on hand not good. No other property in my hands. All the assets of the store came into my hands. I know the fact from my position as clerk.

Plaintiff cross-examines. Bill produced is the bill of goods I purchased of Gale; don't know whether copy now shown me as such, is a copy of my deposition. Can't say whether the answer shown me was my answer or not, nor whether I made out a schedule to annex to that deposition. Was before Col. Parks to give deposition. Was questioned concerning my private business and refused to answer. I don't remember of stating that the bill of sale was lost, nor whether deposition was taken in 1842 or 1843. Was not present when S. C. Hemmenway was examined before Parks. Don't remember of stating to Ingalls that S. C. Hemmenway made $2000 per year. Gale was at Bangor, during the time of sale to me, two or three days. I was not employed as clerk by any one in particular. Stopped here (Portland) on my way down to Bangor, and had some talk with Gale about going there; no deduction has been made for my services on my notes; no settlement has been made for those services. I took what I wanted from the store; shall be twenty-five years old next month. Had less than $100 when I went to Bangor.

Defendants resume. Gale, who is an apothecary, and resides in Portland, and S. C. Hemmenway, each married a sister of mine; and Sarah Shaw is the mother of Hemmenway. I was out of business at that time. Stopped here at Portland a week. Talked with Gale. Went to Bangor; stopped eight or nine months; came here; went to Boston; came back; talked with Gale about buying. I went into the store because I was out of business. Lived in S. C. Hemmenway's family. Took from the store what I wanted for expenses; don't know how much. I was twenty-one years old at that time. S. C. Hemmenway said he should like to have me stop, he had not help enough. It was Nov. 1, 1841. I refused to answer before Gorham Parks by advice of M. L. Appleton, my counsel. My deposition was never completed. My deposition was afterwards taken before N. Hatch. Schedule was called for on that deposition. I made it in 1843, from the bill of sale I had. Wm. H. Hemmenway and I constitute the firm of Hemmenway & Hersey. (Articles put in.) Moved this stock from No. 1 Main street to No. 19 West Market square, I think in September; formed copartnership Oct. 12, 1842. I put in the firm this stock I purchased of Gale, and put in $2000 in money which I borrowed of Augustus Hemmenway. All the capital I put in was borrowed. Wm. H. Hemmenway put in, in all, $1000. Hemmenway & Hersey owe about $11,000 for borrowed money. We buy goods sometimes on credit. Our stock averages about $4500. Our stock was at the time stated at $20,000. When I said $4500 I referred to stock in No. 19 West Market square. We now keep in No. 20 Main street. S. C. Hemmenway has no interest in our firm, has put in no capital. Gale has no interest.

Power of attorney, put in by defendants, from Gale to S. C. Hemmenway, dated Oct. 13, 1838, which may be referred to.

Depositions were next made.

Augustus Hemmenway was next called by the defendants, and testified as follows: I am a brother of S. C. Hemmenway. I resided in Chili, Peru and adjoining countries, from 1828 to February, 1838, remaining in the United States nearly the whole of 1838; then went again to Chili and returned to the United States in February or March, 1840. My business residence is in New York, but a large part of my time is spent in Boston and neighborhood. Since my return from Chili I have spent the winters in Cuba. I loaned money to Gale in 1838, in September or October, immediately before I left for Chili, and took a note for the amount. The note now shown me is the same. The date is Oct. 21, 1838, and the amount $1800. It was paid August 21, 1845, with $630 interest. The loan was made at the date of the note, and to Samuel C. Hemmenway, who showed me a power of attorney from Gale to him before I made the loan. The power of attorney now shown me is the same, (the one in the case.) The loan was made as capital to carry on business in Bangor, where my brother was agent. I hold another note, dated soon after my return in 1840. The loan was made in the same way, for the same purpose; and the note for the amount ($600) was signed "S. C. Hemmenway, agent for Stephen Gale," and is now unpaid. The first mentioned note was paid by a note of Hemmenway & Hersey for $1800, and a new note signed by Gale for the interest, $630. In 1838, on my return to the states, I found S. C. Hemmenway destitute; he was a clerk in a hat store in Boston, and separate from his family. His wife and child had gone home to her father's to live. He applied to me for assistance. I gave him money for his immediate necessities; small sums repeatedly during the eight months I was at home; but declined to set him up in business. He solicited me repeatedly to do something for him. I went to see some of his creditors who did not become parties to the assignment, and tried to purchase his debts, but found I could do nothing. I was a creditor myself to the amount of $3000 when S. C. Hemmenway failed in 1836. My agent came into the assignment, and received the dividend, about 50 per cent. I allowed my mother from four or five to eight hundred dollars a year during all the time of my absence; sent sometimes specie and sometimes drafts. I have ever since allowed her as large or larger sums. My mother has no property, to my knowledge, save what I furnished her. Hemmenway & Hersey have a permanent loan of me of $10,000 now. I loaned Hersey $2000, just after he purchased Gale's stock; and Wm. H. Hemmenway $1000, when he went into partnership with Hersey. These loans have been increased, until now it is $10,000. It has been a consideration in these loans, that S. C. Hemmenway should be employed in the store as clerk, and have a living. S. C. Hemmenway is the most competent and active business man. My motive was to secure support for him and his family. On cross-examination he testified that the note shown him, dated in 1835, and signed by S. C. Hemmenway, was for money loaned Hemmenway at that time, and was sent from Cuba in a letter; it is my hand-writing. I was worth not less than $200,000 at the time of the first loan to Gale, and am now worth $400,000. The note for $2000, of Hersey, was not collateral. The money for the $3000 loan was sent to B. Bangs. The money passed through his hands. Direct examination resumed. The first dividend of 40 per cent., and the second of 10 per cent., were paid to B. Bangs for me. Immediately after my return it was stated to me that something more might be coming, a mere trifle; and S. C. Hemmenway requested an order for it. I gave it to him as a gift. I sent a special power of attorney to Bangs when I heard of S. C. Hemmenway's failure, thinking it might be necessary. The dividends were credited by Bangs to me in account current and with account of voyage of ship "Pearl." The account was sent to me at Valparaiso.

The defendants here offered to introduce the original petition of S. C. Hemmenway to be declared a bankrupt, together with the schedule annexed; but the plaintiff objecting, the court observed that schedules were not evidence for defendants, (containing the defendants' account of this business;) that the petition was evidence; and if the plaintiff did not put in the petition, the defendants could ask the opinion of the court, when the evidence was out, or ask instructions to the jury whether the plaintiff had shown any right to sustain the suit. The defendants' counsel also introduced the notes of Mrs. Shaw, which may be referred to and are made a part of this case.

The depositions of the following witnesses were put in by the defendants, for the purpose of showing that the goods furnished the store in Bangor, from 1838 to 1842, were furnished on the credit of Gale, and may be referred to, viz.: Martin Bates, Jr.; S. W. Olney; Edward P. Porter; O. N. Towne; J. M. Sherburne; Charles A. White; Anson Dexter; W. A. Fisher; William Parkman; Isaac Lothrop; N. Carpenter; S. C. Perrin. The plaintiff introduced an execution in favor of Hastings Strickland, and a note dated July 16th, 1836, for $210, signed by S. C. Hemmenway, on which the judgment was founded. Also, a note payable to Arad. Thompson, and endorsed to Allen Gilman, which note may be referred to. S. C. Hemmenway's assignment, dated July 25th, 1836, was next introduced, and is a part of the case. Also, Samuel Sylvester's deposition (under objections), which is made a part of the case. And then called Joseph Bryant, who testified that he was one of the assignees of S. C. Hemmenway. That soon after the assignment, several individuals called upon him, and said that they owed accounts to said Hemmenway; when, on turning to the books, they appeared to be balanced by cash, without any date; and that no corresponding entries could be found on the day-book.

The defendant's counsel objected to this testimony, without the production of the books;—the books being in the defendant's possession.

The counsel for the plaintiff was then proceeding to interrogate him in relation to the abstraction of goods assigned by said Hemmenway, for the benefit of his creditors, when the counsel for the defendant, Gale, objected to the testimony, as being transactions previous to the power of attorney; and the counsel for Hemmenway objected to the testimony, as being immaterial. The counsel for the plaintiff stated his only object in introducing the testimony was to show that Hemmenway had funds of his own, to transact business, in 1838; and to rebut defendant's testimony that he was poor; and said, they did not claim this as testimony against Gale, unless they so connected Gale with Hemmenway, as to make him, by law, responsible for the declarations and acts of Hemmenway, and the court admitted the testimony. And the witness testified, that about ten days after the assignment, he went into the store where the goods assigned were stored, and found Hemmenway and his mother there. They had a large quantity of goods laid out on the counter. That he was trying to find a piece of silk which some one wished to buy; asked Hemmenway where it was; he replied, that his mother had got it; inquired of him how he got into the store, and he replied, that he had a duplicate key. That they took, without his knowledge, several hundred dollars; that Mrs. Shaw became a party to the assignment, for the whole of her alleged claim—being about $2,300; that these goods were never paid for, nor allowed for, in any way; that it was an unpleasant affair; that Hemmenway said his mother had been stripped of all, by his failure. On cross-examination, he stated that he never made any claim on the debtors whose accounts were balanced; nor did he endeavor to compel Hemmenway, or Mrs. Shaw, to pay for the goods. That the reason was, that he had to do with a woman in tears; and that he consulted with a committee of the creditors, under whose direction he acted. That he took away, without his knowledge, from $500 to $1,000. He could now only remember some three or four articles—such as two pieces of Cashmere shawls, and some other things. That he put a new lock on the door immediately. That he made no charge of things so taken. That the amount allowed Mrs. Shaw was $2,336.29; that was allowed by arbitration.

The plaintiff then introduced the deposition of Daniel P. Wood, which was objected to, but was admitted. But no objection was made to the form of taking the deposition, it having been thus taken by agreement of counsel; and the same is made a part of this case.

S. P. Dinsmore, called by plaintiff, stated that he was here as a witness, in May last. Went down in steamer with S. C. Hemmenway; don't recollect any remarks of S. C. Hemmenway. Mr. McCrillis was talking with Smith; S. C. Hemmenway joined in the conversation. In reply to some remarks of McCrillis about Gale, he said, he (Gale,) did not care a d—n for the whole scrape; he would not quit his shop for the whole scrape.

A. S. Richmond was next called, and was objected to by the defendants, but admitted against Hemmenway; and who testified that he sold S. C. Hemmenway, for cash, six or seven years ago; don't recollect that he ever told me he was agent. Moved to Bangor last November; made a sale to Hemmenway & Hersey, last fall, of $2,700, mostly for cash; one note, rest for cash; then I talked of going to Bangor; most of my conversation was with S. C. Hemmenway. I said I hadn't means; they said they would furnish me means. S. C. Hemmenway was the principal man, so far as I was concerned or observed. I found out William was partner, in February. William spent most of his time cutting buffalo coats, till February; since then, little time. Have heard S. C. Hemmenway talk of this suit. We were riding by Allen Gilman's house; said something about Gilman's suit; he said he would fight till he spent $10,000, before he should get anything; he made $4,000 or $5,000 the year before. Cross-examined. Made my contract with Hersey & Hemmenway; considered them to be the other party; supposed S. C. Hemmenway to be a party; last conversation, when contract was closed, was in Hersey & Hemmenway's store; S. C. Hemmenway and Hersey were present. T. G. Sampson came over with me, and came into store at time; can't recollect whether William was present, or not. Hersey & Hemmenway bought the $2,700 last year; the goods were on east side, (of the Kenduskeag;) have no recollection of going with William alone; went with S. C. Hemmenway, and William, together, (to see the goods;) don't recollect that William made any offer. I resided at Winthrop all the time I traded with S. C. Hemmenway; don't know as I have (any) quarrel or difficulty (with S. C. Hemmenway.) I took advice of counsel and left their store. Direct. S. C. Hemmenway asked me what I was summoned here for. I told him that I was here to testify that they had wronged and injured me; but I didn't come here for revenge, or to gratify my feelings. Hemmenway said his situation was such that he could not be a legal partner, and that his case was as straight as a gun. Cross-examination resumed. Signed bills to S. C. Hemmenway, as agent. First, February 12th, 1842. Second, June, 1842. The bills put in may be referred to.

George Gibson was called by the plaintiff, and objected to, but was admitted against Hemmenway. Testified that S. C. Hemmenway had as much to say about sale (of Laban Hersey's stock,) as any one else. Bryant & Son came to buy; were to have it at ten per cent. Hersey & Hemmenway asked twelve. S. C. Hemmenway said it made no difference whether they sold at ten or twelve, if they had a day or two to mark up; and were marked up. S. C. Hemmenway asked me since I came here, if I did not know he acted as agent when he kept in No. 1. I told him I knew he had a tin under-sign lettered so. S. C. Hemmenway said he was not a partner, but confidential clerk (of Hersey & Hemmenway.) I told him I knew William and Hersey were in the firm of Hersey & Hemmenway. Stock of Laban Hersey was part of stock of Wellington—such goods as Hersey & Hemmenway did not keep.

C. A. Richardson testified, under objections, that he was in Hemmenway & Hersey's store five months. Can't say what part of the time William Hemmenway was there; have seen him there; not so often as the others; rather seldom. Also, that he and Hersey had some difficulty about a bench; that said Hemmenway came over to arrange it; and that he asked him if he, Hemmenway, did not sanction what Hersey done in the business of Hemmenway & Hersey. He replied: "Not by a good deal; that he was boss, or master of that concern; that his family, and not Hersey's represented the capital in that concern." This testimony was objected to, but was admitted as against Hemmenway.

John B. Norris testified that he had been a clerk in that store (Hemmenway & Hersey's) about nine months, and until about a month since; that S. C. Hemmenway and Hersey were the principal men in that store; that William H. Hemmenway was not in there more than a tenth part of the time; that when inquiries were made there for him, S. C. Hemmenway told them that they would probably find him at Vinton & Porter's who kept a restaurater.

The defendants resumed, and called William H. Hemmenway, who testified as follows:—Hersey and I are the firm of Hemmenway & Hersey. No other person is in it. S. C. Hemmenway never had any interest in the goods, or capital. I put into the firm $1000, which I borrowed of Augustus. We had no real capital—none but borrowed. We owe, for loans of money, something rising $12,000. I am in the store every day when in town—not constantly—and have taken part in the control and direction, ever since I signed the articles of copartnership. I have no other business. I talked with Richmond, before the purchase of him; went over to see the goods, with him; examined them, and made him an offer, which he finally took. At the same time there was conversation about his coming to Bangor. On Sunday, (the other conversation spoken of,) there were present, S. C. Hemmenway, Hersey, Richmond, Sampson, and myself. I settled Mrs. Shaw's claim on the assignees, and they were allowed $337.82, for goods from the store; no other claim was made for goods so taken. S. C. Hemmenway was the agent of Gale. I was in Bangor then; often in his store. His stock, I think, would hardly average $4000; chiefly hats and caps, and in the winter, buffalo robes. It increased $1500 or $2000, gradually, during the last eighteen months, in furs, boots, &c. On an average, it would be well to sell $10,000 or $12,000 a year, on a stock of $5000. The sign was "S. C. Hemmenway, Agent." The business was conducted as Gale's, so far as I knew. Cross-examined. S. C. Hemmenway bought some furs.

Thomas Hersey re-called by defendants, who testified that since testifying before, he had examined the account, (exhibited by him,) and found an error of $100, in amount collected of O. N. Towne. His account should be $500; and $3.00 collected of Stillman Wilson. Of the money paid by him (to discharge Gale's debts), some was paid into the bank; some sent by S. C. Hemmenway; some by mail. That his sales, when O. H. Ingalls was in his store, a week or two, were not more than $60.00 per day. That the profits in store No. 1 Main Street, under S. C. Hemmenway's direction, were about $1000 or $1200 a year; average profits on sales, twelve and a half to fifteen per cent. The stock would average $4000, or a little more. Cross-examined. He said he had examined the books since his former statements. The mistake was in making up the list of accounts, not in settling.

Oliver Fessenden was called by the defendants, and testified that the disclosure of Gale was written by him from the account of Gale; that it was written in Gale's store, in Portland; that he had no counsel present; that he advised him to call on C. S. Daveis, Esq., his counsel; and he went for him twice, but not finding him, concluded to proceed; that after it was written, he read it to Gale; that Gale took it and read it, and said it was right, and signed it, and swore to it.

The assignment of 1836—the copies of Mrs. Shaw's notes, may be referred to. Also, notes to Augustus Hemmenway. Also, the records of the district court, showing that William H. Hemmenway is a discharged bankrupt. And also, the schedule of accounts referred to by Hersey.

After the testimony was closed, and before argument, Hemmenway's counsel contended to the court, that there was no evidence of conversion by his client, and asked its direction accordingly; and Gale's counsel took a similar position, and made a similar request in regard to his client.

The court instructed the jury, that if they were satisfied, that in 1838, when the power of attorney was given by Gale to Hemmenway, that Gale consented to give it, and Hemmenway to take it, with the intention that Hemmenway was to do business on his own capital, and for his own benefit, and that it was only a blind, set to deceive the public and defraud creditors, and Hemmenway did business on his own capital for himself;—that then it was evidence, and strong evidence, of fraud. Second. That if Gale sold the property to Hersey after it had vested in the assignee by the decree of bankruptcy, it was evidence of a conversion. Third. That if the property was Hemmenway's, and Gale sold it by a contrivance between him and Hemmenway, and at Hemmenway's request, to put it further beyond the reach of his assignee, it was evidence of a conversion by both Hemmenway and Gale.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, for $5,309.10.

The defendants moved for a new trial. First, because the verdict was against the weight of evidence. Second, because the judge who tried the cause made several rulings as to evidence, and gave several directions to the jury which were erroneous. They also filed a motion in arrest of judgment.

Rowe and Chas. S. Daveis, counsel for these motions, in behalf of defendants.

McCrillis and Deblois, for plaintiff, and against these motions.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The questions raised in this case under the motions for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, are numerous; and some of them possess no little difficulty. But having been ably argued, the labor of the court in disposing of them will be much lessened.

The first ground assigned for a new trial, is, because the verdict is supposed to be against the weight of evidence. I have had occasion to examine fully on the last circuit and to deliver an opinion, laying down what seemed to me, after a full consideration, the true guides or limitations as to this ground for a new trial. See Fearing v. De Wolf, R. I. Dist., Jan., 1847 [Case No. 4,711]. See, also, 16 Me. 200; 19 Me. 402; 20 Me. 349. I see nothing in this case which can bring it within the fair exercise of the power of the court over this subject as it has been there defined. There was evidence on both sides to be weighed. Here no great preponderance existed on either side, if we look to the extraordinary disclosure and disclaimer of Gale, under oath in the trustee suit. At all events there does not appear to have been so clear a mis-trial as to evince plain mistake, or an abuse of power on the part of the jury. These are considered by me as the true tests. The cases and reasons are fully presented in Fearing v. De Wolf, to show the propriety of refusing to disturb verdicts when thus situated, merely because the judge who tried the cause may think that he would have decided differently on the matter, had he been in the jury-box, to respond to the facts, instead of being on the bench to respond to the law. But if the weight is so clearly and decidedly in favor of one party as to render it probable that a real mistake has happened, or a wanton abuse of power, it is the duty of the court not to correct the result by deciding the facts differently from a jury, but to let another jury pass upon the facts, and settle the question whether there has been either a mistake or an abuse of power. In this way clear mistakes and clear abuses can be corrected as such should be, but without the court assuming the province of the jury. They merely permit the second jury to revise the doings of the first one.

The next reason assigned for a new trial is the refusal of the judge to nonsuit the plaintiff on motion of the defendant, though against the consent of the plaintiff and after the plaintiff had furnished evidence which he deemed material, and on which he wished the jury to act. A practice has grown up in some states for courts to nonsuit plaintiffs against their consent, and after they have presented testimony which they wish the jury to consider, provided the court entertains opinions on the law unfavorable to the plaintiff. But it is not deemed sound practice in the courts of the United States; and, instead of it, the evidence is there allowed to be passed upon by the jury, whenever once admitted as competent, but under instructions to which the defendant can except if not satisfactory to him, and thus obtain all the benefit to be derived from a nonsuit with an exception made by the other side. The cases are mostly collated on this point in Folger v. The Robert G. Shaw [Case No. 4,899]. See, also, [Crane v. Morris] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 598, and 1 Pet. C. C. 497 [Conn v. Penn, Case No. 3,104]. The verdict, therefore, cannot be set aside on this ground.

Another reason assigned for a new trial, is the admission of improper evidence in Ward's deposition as to declarations made by Hemmenway, one of the defendants, in a quarrel with Gilman, his principal creditor. But it seems to me that those declarations of H. are competent, which tend to make himself liable in this action, where he is a party, like the admission of any other party. In that view they might properly be introduced, when had they been offered as to a remote transaction, in order to strengthen the title of the plaintiff as assignee of Hemmenway, and in a suit where H. himself was not a defendant, they probably would be inadmissible. They would then not be made at the time of the transaction. Broom, Leg. Max. 441, 442, 5 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 512; 6 East, 191; 9 Bing. 352. And hence not a part of the res gestae, and they would be in favor of his own interests as in part represented by his assignee. 9 Ves. 83; Greenl. Ev. §§ 189, 190; Eden, Bankr. Law, 361. When we consider, however, that here he is personally a defendant, attempted to be charged as a joint trespasser in respect to the property in dispute and to the injury of his creditors, the declarations assume a new aspect and are entirely competent against himself and to help render himself liable in the present suit.

The next reason for a new trial is on account of evidence, admitted in respect to alterations in Hemmenway's books, when the books themselves were in court. This objection is defective on two grounds. First. The evidence did not relate to the contents of the books, with a view to prove by parol, charges or credits existing in them in writing. But they related rather to alterations seen in them and accounts entered as balanced, when in fact they had not been, and this done so as to prevent the assignee from collecting them and to enable the bankrupt to obtain them himself of his debtors by their voluntary payment, in fraud of his own creditors. Secondly. The evidence as tending to show receipts of money by H., and means to buy this property, was competent on that ground, as a general principle; and if any of this evidence was objectionable, because relating to what was in writing, that part should have been separated and specifically resisted, and the rest allowed. For example, allowing proof of the mere receipt or collection of money by H., after his first failure, seems unobjectionable. Finally. When this whole evidence was excepted to, and notice given to produce the books, and they were not unconditionally produced, parol evidence of their contents seems of course to be admissible. In this case, the books were in court on a notice to produce them, but were offered only on condition that the plaintiff should use them in evidence. But I am not aware of any right in a party, under a notice to produce books or other writings, to make conditions to their production The rule is absolute to bring them into court for the benefit of the other side, and to offer them so without reserve; and it is for the other side, after obtaining possession of them, to decide whether it seems expedient or not to use them as evidence. This proceeding, however, would have one effect on the other party, imperatively, or at all events, if the books were unconditionally offered. It would prevent the further use of parol evidence by him after written evidence of the same fact is produced and placed in his possession, whether he chooses to use the written or not. Were this objection stronger there is understood to be another answer to it. It seems questionable, on inquiry, whether the judge who tried the case gave any ruling on this point; or if he did, whether any exception to it was then taken, as it must be in order to be available under this motion. [Poole v. Fleeger] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 185–211. It is a little extraordinary, also, that the defendant himself did not use the books as he might, if they contained matter disproving what was testified to on the part of the plaintiff.

Another ruling is objected to, which excluded the defendant, Hemmenway, as a party, from putting in his own explanatory statements as to the title to the property in controversy, and which were contained in the schedule annexed to his petition. It is stated in connection with this, that the petition itself, without the schedule, was allowed to be admitted. I am inclined to think, that the whole record in the proceedings in bankruptcy was competent evidence, including the schedule annexed to the petition. 1 Mass. 67; 2 Mass. 492; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 160; Greenl. Ev. §§ 506, 511; 1 Story, 478 [Bright v. Boyd, Case No. 1,875]; 3 Mer. 667; [Ferguson v. Harwood] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 408. But, at the same time, it seems to me that the bankrupt, when a defendant in a suit, cannot be permitted to use in his favor his own declarations as to the title of property which is disputed; and that the judge ought to charge the Jury not to give weight to any such declarations in a suit like this, when obliged to be let into the case as a part of a documentary exhibit. As this view, then, would lead to the same result in respect to the verdict as the ruling at the trial did, which entirely excluded the schedule, it furnishes no sufficient ground for a new trial. See cases showing that mere technical exceptions are insufficient, if the verdict has probably not been affected by the ruling. Allen v. Blunt [Case No. 217]; Broom, Leg. Max. 156; 12 Adol. & E. 631. De minimis non curat lex. Cro. Eliz. 353.

An objection has been alluded to by some of the counsel, as to the calling of Henesey, one of the witnesses, a second time, and the effect of his cross-examination by opposing counsel, on points not questioned about on the part of the plaintiff. But, as the other counsel waive that, it is not necessary to go into an examination.

Another objection to the verdict grows out of the peculiar situation of the property in controversy, and the alleged want of title or possession, in the plaintiff, sufficient to enable him to sustain trover; the present form of action against any person. But it is to be remembered, that Hemmenway, the bankrupt, was in the actual possession of the property, in June, 1842, the time of the alleged conversion; and, also, in July, 1842, when the goods were, in fact, handed over by him to Gale, the other defendant, and placed in the charge of third persons. This possession was prima facie evidence of title in Hemmenway, as he had bought the goods —had, for some time, controlled them—and had been selling articles out of them, for several months. Standing alone, this possession would have been sufficient to enable the assignee to sustain trover against third persons. But it did not stand alone at the trial; various proofs being offered to show that the possession was had by Hemmenway, as agent for Gale. Nor was the action brought against third persons, but against the agent and principal, who set up the possession to be in behalf of himself, and not the agent; and the title, also, to be in himself. This was a permissible defence; and if it had been made out satisfactorily, would have defeated the action. While, on the contrary, if not so made out, but the jury believed the possession was, in reality, for Hemmenway himself, and the title was in him, so far as regards his creditors, the action by his assignee, was, in these respects, and, under this objection, well maintained.

The great contest before the jury was, therefore, in relation to these points; and they having returned a verdict for the plaintiff, it is conclusive—if no misdirections were given—that due possession and title existed in Hemmenway at the time of the conversion, so as to enable his assignee to protect the property against any wrong-doer. If the court gave any erroneous instructions to the jury, on this matter, they can be pointed out and corrected; but if not, the verdict, while it stands, is decisive against this objection. The instructions are embodied into the report of the case, and are understood to be not excepted to, and hence need not now be re-examined.

Next, it is argued, that H.'s interest in the goods was only as a trustee, and that property, held in trust by a bankrupt, does not pass to an assignee; so that no suit, whatever, can be brought by him. But this is not correct. It passes, though held in trust. Yet, a new trustee will usually be afterwards appointed, and the property conveyed to him by the assignee. See on this, 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 79; 2 Deac. 151; 3 Mont. & A. 487; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 504. Here, however, the jury have found the trust in this case to have been a secret and fraudulent one; and the property really belonging to Hemmenway; and in such case, even in England, the property vests in the assignee, absolutely. So it does there, always, when the property was, by consent of the owner, in the possession and control, and disposition of the bankrupt. See cases under 21 Jas. I. c. 19; Cooper v. De Tastet, 2 Moore & S. 714; 1 Deac. 131, 166; Almy v. Wilbur [Case No. 256]. But this last may not be the true construction of our late bankrupt law; and whether it be or not, this objection must, for the other reasons, fail.

Another exception has been made, that proper evidence of a conversion was not offered. But if the jury was satisfied that the property in the goods was in Hemmenway, as principal owner, before becoming a bankrupt, and the pretence of title in Gale was fraudulent; then the removal of this property to another place, by Gale and Hemmenway, jointly, and doing this as if it belonged to Gale, as principal; and if Hemmenway, as his agent, engaged afterwards in using and selling it as Gale's property, this was a misfeasance and a conversion. If a creditor merely accompany a sheriff's officer to levy on goods, which afterwards prove to belong to another, as here, to the assignees and not to Gale, he is liable in trover, though he took neither the goods into his own custody, nor their proceeds. Menham v. Edmonson, 1 Bos. & P. 369. It is an aiding or abetting in a tort—a co-operation in a removal and use of property, over which no right to do so existed, and that is sufficient to constitute a conversion. See cases cited in Smith v. Smith [Case No. 13,109], Sept. term, 1849, Maine Dist., note.

The chief question remaining, is the motion in arrest of judgment. It resolves itself into two objections. One is, that the assignee cannot sustain proceedings like this, as to the property of the bankrupt, except in the district court sitting in bankruptcy; and the other is, that he cannot, in such a case, or, indeed in any case, sustain an action at law against the bankrupt himself. In respect to the first objection, it is manifest, that by the 6th section of the bankrupt law, the district court has jurisdiction, in a summary way, "in the nature of summary proceedings in equity," over all controversies between an "assignee and the bankrupt." 5 Stat. 440. But it is equally clear, that if the assignee chooses to resort to an action at law, rather than "proceedings in equity," against adverse claimants, the 8th section confers "concurrent jurisdiction" over it, in the circuit court. That section, indeed, goes further, and confers such concurrent jurisdiction in all suits, both "at law and in equity, which may, and shall be brought by any assignee of the bankrupt, against any person or persons claiming an adverse interest." It is not to be questioned, then, that this action well lies in this court, if the assignee elects to come here against Gale. Lucas v. Morris [Case No. 8,587]. He is, manifestly, a person claiming "an adverse interest." If these parties lived in different states, so as to give this court jurisdiction on that ground, this subject-matter might, for aught I see, be settled in it, as it might be in a state court, if the action be first brought there. And the adjudication first had, either in a bankrupt court or another, will bind as to the right of property, or a lien. Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612; Ex parte Christy, Justice Catron dissenting, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292. It is within the language of the bankrupt law to sustain it in action against Hemmenway, also, if claiming "an adverse interest" as to this property, against his assignee. This he does claim, as an agent of Gale. This he attempted to aid Gale to enforce, and this made him a wrong-doer, if Gale was. It comes, then, within the spirit, as well as words, of the act giving this court jurisdiction. He sought to remove this property from the reach of his creditors. He co-operated in trying to secure the adverse claims of third persons; and he ought, therefore, in justice, as well as law, to be jointly answerable with them for damages, when the title of those third persons appears by the result of the trial to be defective.

It is important, in this view, to regard critically the data. Hemmenway was decreed a bankrupt in June, 1842; and by that, ipso facto, all his property, under the express language of the bankrupt law, passed to the assignee. The jury have found this property to have been his; yet the next month after, in July, 1842, he proceeded to aid Gale in removing this property, as belonging to Gale; and in disposing of it as Gale's, rather than the assignee's, and this to the manifest injury of his creditors; and as the jury have found, with a view to defraud them. The remaining objection to his liability is, that whatever may be the legal or equitable considerations, to charge him, when Gale is chargeable, because he acted jointly with Gale in the conversion; yet no cases can be found and no principles exist, which render a bankrupt himself liable to his own assignee in an action at law. It is true that controversies between a bankrupt and his assignee are generally settled in the bankrupt court. But, as already shown, no principle exists which should limit the jurisdiction over them to that court in all instances. As much reason exists for a concurrent jurisdiction here, over suits between them, as for such jurisdiction there, over suits between them and others. Their disputes may be as important in both principle and amount as those in other cases, and hence be as suitable for a court higher than the district court. They may, when as here, third persons are joint defendants, with the bankrupt, be more appropriately prosecuted in the circuit court, as no reason whatever exists for forcing such third persons into the district court exclusively.

Finally, and above all other justifications for sueing here, is the circumstance that H. is not now prosecuted as "a bankrupt," in which capacity alone the district court has any peculiar jurisdiction over him, but as "a person," setting up an "adverse claim" on account of Gale; and is prosecuted here, like any other person, for a tort in his private and individual character. In England chancery often has concurrent jurisdiction with a court of bankruptcy. Meggison v. Foster, 2 Younge & C. Ch. 336. Or rather the lord chancellor has. Ex parte Lund, 6 Ves. 782. Nor is there any lack of precedent or principle to make the bankrupt liable to be prosecuted by the assignee in a court of law in appriate cases, though the instances are not numerous in the books which seem to be directly in point. But suppose the bankrupt should steal the property after it is in the actual possession of his assignee. He would doubtless be indicted in a court of law for the larceny of it as the property of the assignee, in his official capacity, for the use of the creditors. It is his in law (9 Ves. 83), and the bankrupt has no more right to take it away, clandestinely or animo furandi, than he had to do this with any other property. Again, if he seizes and converts such property to his own use, either alone or in conjunction with a third person, no principle seems to interpose to prevent his liability to the assignee in an action of trover. He is liable, personally, like any other wrong doer, and not in his capacity of bankrupt. Some error on this point has been caused by the common expression in the books, that a bankrupt is civiliter mortuus. 5 Mad. 289; 3 Mad. 158; 1 Holt, N. P. 172. But this means dead only as to the control of his old property and contracts. His assignee stands like an administrator in respect to these. But the bankrupt is still alive for other purposes in law as he is in fact. He is alive to acquire new property—alive to do and receive wrong—alive to commit trespasses or crimes—alive to be prosecuted for either, and to prosecute for either when committed on himself. Eden, Bankr. Law, 255; 7 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 391; 1 Bos. & P. 44. The following show suits at law between the assignee and the bankrupt himself in different forms, which generally were sustained, though not in all cases. Semble on leave perhaps; Benfield v. Solomons, 9 Ves. 83; 1 Hen. Bl. 437, note; Coles v. Barrow, 4 Taunt. 755; 1 Cooke, Bankr. Law (3d Ed.) 518; 1 Eden, 156; 6 Bing. 500, was to try the validity of the commission. The furniture of the bankrupt, reserved originally as well as his property acquired since, if trespassed on by the assignee, or others, must be capable of being protected by the bankrupt through ordinary suits of law. See Webb v. Ward, 7 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 296; and cases in Kitchen v. Bartsch, 7 East, 57, note; 1 Barn. & Adol. 574; 1 Esp. 140, 170; 4 Taunt. 754; 2 Rose, 277.

Another objection urged against these actions is, that a bankrupt has no property of his own to respond with in such cases. But poverty is no defence generally to actions for a tort. Beside this, property, such as furniture, &c., to the amount of $300, may be reserved to the bankrupt by the 3d section of the act. And, moreover, all his earnings and acquisitions, since the decree of his bankruptcy, belong to himself, here (Newhall's Case [Case No. 10,159]), though it is otherwise under the language of some other bankrupt laws, allowing him to acquire no property till after his discharge (1 Bos. & P. 44, and Kitchen v. Bartsch, 7 East, 53). The bankrupt is also entitled to the proceeds of his personal labor, and consequently can sue and be sued in the protection of them. 3 Bos. & P. 578. Again, it is urged, that the assignee can bring no action which the bankrupt himself could not bring. This may be true as to voluntary assignees. 7 Johns. 161; 6 Har. & J. 61; 10 Paige, 218. The 3d section of the bankrupt law gives some countenance to this view, by investing him with the power to sue concerning the effects of a bankrupt as fully as a bankrupt himself could at the time of the bankruptcy, and from this, it might be inferred, he could sue in no other case. But that inference is a non sequitur. The assignee is expressly clothed with certain powers, such as the bankrupt had, but beyond that, by force of the law vesting in him, "all the property and rights of property of every name and nature, and whether real, personal, or mixed, of every bankrupt," he may sue fraudulent grantees in order to regain property for the creditor. Though the bankrupt himself would not be allowed in such case to sue and avoid his own conveyances. See cases in Ashby v. Steere [Case No. 576]; and Leland v. The Medora [Case No. 8,237]; Winsor v. Kendall [Id. 17,886]; Wheelwright v. Jackson, 5 Taunt. 109; 1 Doug. 89, 295; 7 East, 544; 4 Burr, 2477; Bayard v. Hoffman, 4 Johns. Ch. 450; 10 Paige, 218; Frothingham v. Hayes, Merch. Mag. May, '46, 458. The assignee here, then, represents the creditors as well as the bankrupt; is an assignee by law and not a voluntary one, and acts for them and in their behalf, as far as the law permits. 2 Ves. 244; 2 Hen. Bl. 135; Eden, Bankr. Law, 213.

Having thus shown, that the bankrupt himself, if joining another person in a trespass on the property in the assignee's hands, is liable in an action at law for the tort by the assignee in behalf of the creditors, it becomes necessary to decide another question, made under this head, that this objection by the respondents comes too late, after a plea of the general issue and a trial on it. See cases on this, 1 Sumn. 578 [Wood v. Mann, Case No. 17,952]; 2 Gall. 325 [Maissonnaire v. Keating, Case No. 8,978]; Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 450; 1 Mass. 159, 483; 3 Pick. 232; 8 Johns. 378; 19 Johns. 300; 3 Fairf. [12 Me.] 384; 16 Me. 231.

Both of these motions are overruled.

[NOTE. See decision of Ware, District Judge (Case No. 2,434), which apparently was rendered on the same motion.

[In equity. Bill by Joshua Wingate Carr, assignee in bankruptcy of William Smith, against Stephen Hilton et al., to reach certain alleged assets of the bankrupt. The defendant demurs to the bill.]

Mr. Stewart, for demurrer.

Allen & Warren, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. J. Wingate Carr, as assignee in bankruptcy of William Smith, has filed his bill in equity, stating that Smith was decreed a bankrupt, and the complainant appointed his assignee, in February, 1843; that the amount of debts sworn to by the bankrupt was large, while the assets disclosed by him were not sufficient to pay the charges of the bankruptcy; that at different dates, between the years 1834 and 1840, inclusive, the bankrupt being insolvent, for the purpose of concealing his property from his creditors, made sundry conveyances thereof to the defendant, and facts are stated showing that the defendant must have participated in this fraudulent intent. The bill further states that the bankrupt exchanged some property for a farm in Newport, in the district of Maine, and instead of taking the title to himself, caused the same to be conveyed to the defendant, and his brother since deceased; that the latter has conveyed his title to Henry Warren, Esquire, a counsellor of this court, who is made a party to the bill, and who is ready to perform all such orders and decrees as the court may make in the premises, such being the purpose for which he holds that title; that the title to the said farm was thus vested in the defendant and his brother, to conceal the property from the creditors of the bankrupt, but the bill does not aver that the defendant was a party to this fraud, or had knowledge that the legal title was vested in him. The bill further states that these frauds of the bankrupt were unknown to the complainant until within two years before the filing of the bill, and it details when and how the frauds were discovered by him.

The defendant has demurred to the bill, and has assigned, orally, four causes of demurrer, which must be separately considered. The first is, that these transactions, being all prior to the passage of the bankrupt act, and there being no averment that either of them was in contemplation of bankruptcy, or of the passage of a bankrupt law, no title passed to the assignee, and he cannot sustain this bill. In passing on this objection, it is necessary to distinguish the case of the Newport farm from the other transactions. The legal title to these lands was never in the bankrupt, but the whole consideration having moved from him, a trust resulted to him by operation of law, and he was the equitable owner of the lands, at the date of the decree in bankruptcy. The third section of the act (5 Stat. 442) enacted that all property and rights of property, of every name and nature, and whether real, personal, or mixed, of every bankrupt, except household furniture, &c., not exceeding in value three hundred dollars, shall, by mere operation of the decree, be devested out of the bankrupt, and vested in the assignee. There can be no doubt that the equitable ownership of lands, by reason of a resulting trust, is a right of property, within the meaning of this clause. But it is argued that the section only provides that the assignee shall have the same rights, titles, powers, and authority to sue for the same that the bankrupt had before, or at the time of his being declared a bankrupt; and that the bankrupt himself could not have had the aid of a court of equity, to enforce a trust created for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. Whether a court of equity would permit the trustee to set up the fraud as a bar to a bill by the cestui que trust, it is not necessary in this case to determine. On the authority of Muckleston v. Brown, 6 Ves. 68; Ottley v. Browne, 1 Ball & B. 360; and Chaplin v. Chaplin, 3 P. Wms. 233,—I should hold the affirmative; this, however, would not rest upon any want of title in the bankrupt, but upon a very different ground, which will be presently stated. But there is a very broad distinction between a bill by the bankrupt, the author of the fraud, and one by the assignee, who seeks to recover the property, for the benefit of the very interest sought to be defrauded. The ground for refusing relief to the author of the fraud is a principle of public policy, which forbids the court to be ancillary to a plan for evading the law and depriving creditors of their just and legal rights. But where the assignee sues, the case is reversed; to grant the relief, is to act in accordance with these rights of creditors, and in opposition to the contemplated fraud, while to refuse it would be to aid in its perpetration. Lord Redesdale, in Joy v. Campbell, 1 Sch. & L. 328, held, that legatees and creditors were entitled to relief, and this distinction between the author of the fraud and one claiming through him, had previously been taken by Lord Eldon, in Muckleston v. Brown. See, also, Fairbanks v. Blackington, 9 Pick. 93; Martin v. Root, 17 Mass. 228; Holland v. Cruft, 20 Pick. 321. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that, as respects these lands in Newport, the assignee may maintain this bill; and as the demurrer is to the whole bill, it follows that so far as respects the objection to the assignee's title, it must be overruled. But as the question concerning his title to the other lands must at some time be determined, and has been fully argued, I think it proper to express my opinion thereon. The argument against the title is, that there are no words in the act sufficient to pass to the assignee, the title to property conveyed by the bankrupt, to defraud his creditors prior to the passage of the bankrupt act. On examining the law, it will be found there are no express words in it passing to the assignee property conveyed by the bankrupt to defraud creditors, at any time, unless made in contemplation of bankruptcy, which is now settled to mean something more than insolvency. Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 150.

The two great objects of the bankrupt law were, the equal distribution of all the property of the debtor among those justly entitled to it, and the relief of honest debtors, who should conform to its provisions, from the burden of their debts. It is a notorious fact that the pecuniary state of the country at the time, was the great and leading inducement to the passage of the law, and that it was expected and intended to operate, as in fact it did operate, upon a vast number of cases of persons who had previously become insolvent. To hold that no property, fraudulently conveyed by any of these persons, before the date of the law, could be distributed under it, would be so much in conflict with one of its great purposes, that I should come very reluctantly to that conclusion. It does not seem to me necessary to do so. A fraudulent conveyance is no effectual conveyance, as against the interest intended to be defrauded. This interest the assignee represents, so far as respects all creditors who prove their claims. They can have no remedy which will reach property fraudulently conveyed, except through the assignee, because they can sustain no suit against the debtor. Their remedies are absorbed in the great and comprehensive remedy under the commission, by virtue of which the assignee is to collect and distribute among them, the property of their debtor to which they are justly and legally entitled. The case of the assignee is, therefore, that the lands in question are the property of the debtor, and that he prays the aid of this court to remove an apparent cloud upon the title, which, though void, interferes with the discharge of his official duty. In this view, the case is within the express terms of the third section of the act, and it is the view taken in Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. 536, especially by Chief Justice Spenser, and Mr. Justice Kent. In my judgment it is a sound view. See, also, Martin v. Root, 17 Mass. 228, and Holland v. Cruft, 20 Pick. 321. But here, also, it is urged, that the subsequent language of this section proves that the words, "all the property and rights of property," &c., were not intended to apply to any property which the bankrupt himself would not have had a title to recover, if he had not been decreed a bankrupt. It is not easily apparent, what was intended by this clause. Its language is, "and the assignee, so appointed, shall be vested with all the rights, titles, powers, and authorities to sell, manage, and dispose of the same, and to sue for and defend the same, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as if the same were vested in, or might be exercised by, such bankrupt, before, or at the time of his bankruptcy, declared as aforesaid." The general idea here conveyed, is, succession to the bankrupt;—though somewhat obscure, this general idea is sufficiently conveyed; but one difficult inquiry is—succession to the rights belonging to the bankrupt, at what time? The answer of the statute is, "before or at the time of his bankruptcy;" that is, at any time before the instant when the rights and powers of the assignee became vested. I must admit the difficulty of discerning the precise meaning and effect of this clause; but I do not see that it is sufficient to control what, I think, is one of the great objects of the law. If the assignee is vested with the same powers which the bankrupt had before, or at the time of his bankruptcy, he has a right to the interposition of this court, in this case; for there was a time before the bankruptcy, when the title of the bankrupt was perfect. Yet it cannot be supposed that in a clause, the general idea of which is succession, the legislature intended to refer to any and all past rights which had at any time existed. What then is the meaning of the clause, "before, or at the time of his bankruptcy," as descriptive of the period of time to which reference is to be had, in considering what rights and powers this clause confers on the assignee? This is a question of great difficulty, and, in my judgment, the only safe means of solving it are found in the general purpose and object of the law. This general purpose requires that property, which belonged to the bankrupt, at the time of the bankruptcy, should be distributed among his creditors who prove their claims; it further requires that property, attempted to be conveyed by him to defraud those creditors, should be treated as his property; if it be treated as the property of the bankrupt, the assignee, by virtue of his title, and as the trustee of the creditors, has a right to the aid of this court in this case. Cases might occur, and may be supposed, in which the possession of the title of the bankrupt might not be, of itself, sufficient. Without more, it would not enable the assignee to sue in his own name, upon any chose in action, not negotiable, nor to maintain a real action upon a disseisin, or for a mere right of the bankrupt. In this view, it may be considered as not designed to limit, or give a construction to the preceding clause, which vests the property, but as superadding thereto some other rights and powers, which would not otherwise have attached to its ownership. This, according to the best opinion I can form, is the real purpose and effect of the clause, and in this aspect it does not interfere with the right of the plaintiff to maintain this bill. In my opinion, the property fraudulently conveyed, is to be deemed property of the bankrupt, and was, by the decree, vested in the assignee. This enables him to maintain the bill. He has no occasion to resort to the subsequent clause, for any enlargement of his powers, and the design of that clause was not to deprive the assignee, of rights which attach to the ownership of the property, in the capacity in which he holds it, but to enlarge his powers and confer rights upon him which, on the ordinary principles of law, do not belong to a mere voluntary assignee.

The next cause of demurrer is the bar, arising from the last clause of the eighth section of the bankrupt act, which is as follows: "No suit at law or in equity shall, in any case, be maintainable by or against such assignee, or by or against any person claiming an adverse interest, touching the property and rights of property aforesaid, in any court whatsoever, unless the same shall be brought within two years after the declaration and decree of bankruptcy, or after the cause of action shall first have accrued." The bill avers that the fraud, which is the present cause of action, was discovered within two years before the filing of the bill. Long before the statute was enacted, the same words, in other statutes of limitations, had received a construction, both in England and America, at law and in equity, and in the courts of the United States as well as in other tribunals. The cases in the English chancery are very numerous, and it is not necessary to detail them. They are collected by Mr. Lewin, in his treatise on trusts (page 616). In this country, also, there are decisions in most of the courts of the last resort, one of the earliest of which is First Massachusetts Turnpike v. Field, 3 Mass. 201, followed by Homer v. Fish, 1 Pick. 435, and Welles v. Fish, 3 Pick. 74. See, also, Sherwood v. Sutton [Case No. 12,782]; Mitchell v. Thompson [Id. 9,669]. The settled statutes of limitation do not run, in cases of fraud while it is secret. Some difference of opinion has existed, respecting the grounds for this rule; but, in my judgment, the most reasonable and sensible ground is, that, substantially, the title to avoid the transaction does not arise until the fraud is known. This is the practical and just view, and to this I assent; and hold that when the cause of action is a fraud, the action does not accrue while its cause is concealed; and this interpretation I must consider to have been within the intention of the legislature, when it used the same language, which had acquired a settled meaning to that effect. It is objected, however, that this bill does not contain any averment that the cause of action was fraudulently concealed. But it does state a case of secret fraud, and it would be difficult to distinguish this from fraudulent concealment. A secret, or what is the same thing, concealed fraud, when it is the cause of action, is a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action.

Another cause of demurrer was, that the repeal of the bankrupt law put an end to the complainant's right to sustain this bill; but it is clear the saving clause in the repealing act covers the case. The demurrer is overruled.

Case No. 2,437.

CARR v. HILTON.

[1 Curt. 390.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept. Term, 1853.

BANKRUPTCY — ACTION BY ASSIGNEE TO INCREASE ESTATE — COMPETENCY OF CREDITOR TO TESTIFY — EVIDENCE — STATEMENT IN PRESENCE OF PARTY — LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — AVOIDANCE OF BAR — NOTICE.

1. A creditor of a bankrupt is not a competent witness for the assignee, in a suit to increase the estate.

2. Evidence that a statement was made to a court by counsel, in the presence of the complainant, who was not a party, is inadmissible.

3. To avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, the complainant must not only allege his ignorance of the fraud, but when and how it was discovered; and must offer satisfactory evidence to prove these averments.

[Cited in Moore v. Greene, Case No. 9,763; Calais Steamboat Co. v. Scudder, 2 Black (67 U. S.) 389; Badger v. Badger, Case No. 718; Martin v. Smith, Id. 9,164; Baldwin v. 4. Information, which makes it the duty of a party to make inquiry, and shows where it may be effectually made, is notice of all facts to which such inquiry might have led. But a party, thus put on inquiry, is to be allowed a reasonable time to make it, before he is affected with notice.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. A demurrer to this bill was argued and overruled at the September term, 1852. It was then determined, that, as the frauds charged in the bill, though alleged to have been committed more than two years before the institution of the suit, were averred in the bill to have been discovered by the complainant within two years, the cause of action had accrued to the complainant within two years, and so was not barred by the eighth section of the bankrupt act. The defendant having answered, denying the frauds charged in the bill, has again set up this statute of limitations as a bar, and accompanied it by a denial of the averments of the bill respecting the discovery of the alleged frauds. And evidence has been offered by each party concerning the time of this discovery. Before considering that evidence, it is material to notice, that, in order to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, the complainant must not only state that the fraud was unknown to him, till within the time allowed by the statute, but he must state when and how it was first discovered. Stearns v. Paige, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 829; Fisher v. Boody [Case No. 4,814].

Some of the evidence in this case, on both sides, is inadmissible. The deposition of Mr. Warren, who is a creditor of the bankrupt, is, for that cause, incompetent. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 392. He is interested to increase the fund, out of which he is entitled to be paid. And on the part of the respondent, those depositions which tend to prove that Mr. Warren, addressing the supreme judicial court of Maine on the hearing of a suit between one Haskell and this respondent, this complainant being then present, stated that he had informed this complainant of the alleged frauds before that suit was instituted, is also inadmissible. To affect a party by evidence that a statement was made in his presence, which he did not deny, the circumstances must be such as naturally called on him for a denial, if the statement was untrue. Otherwise, it cannot fairly be assumed that he acquiesced in the statement. Allen v. McKeen [Case No. 229]; Melen v. Andrews, 1 Moody & M. 336; Com. v. Kenney, 12 Metc. [Mass.] 235; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 197. And when a person, not a party, in a court of justice, hears a statement made by counsel to the court, he not only is not called on to deny it, but ordinarily would be silenced, if he attempted to do so. All the evidence on this subject is therefore laid out of the case, as irrelevant and incompetent. There remains only so much of the deposition of Mr. Stewart, as relates to the interview between himself and the complainant, on the twenty-fourth day of February, 1848. Mr. Stewart deposes, that, on the evening of that day, which was nearly three years before this bill was filed, he called on the complainant, to obtain from him, the office copy of his appointment as assignee in bankruptcy, to file in the suit between Haskell and Hilton. This paper is now produced, and appears to have been filed in the clerk's office on the twenty-fourth day of February, 1848; and there is no reasonable doubt, therefore, that the time of this interview is correctly fixed. He further testifies: "I found Mr. Carr apparently a cautious man, somewhat; and as I was a stranger to him, he seemed indisposed at first to let me have his appointment, without an explanation of the purpose for which I desired it. I thereupon stated to him that purpose, and the reasons for it. I gave him a history of the case from the first; its origin, the motives of the parties, &c. In doing this, I was obliged to, and did state to him the substance of the charges of the bill in that case, which were substantially the same as the charges in the present bill."

He then goes into some particulars concerning his statements, and adds: "I stated to him, distinctly and clearly, that Mr. Warren claimed the whole transaction to have been fraudulent as to Smith's creditors, and that his bill in equity was brought upon that ground; and that one ground relied upon in the defence was, that the suit should have been brought by him as assignee of Smith, in bankruptcy; and that he was the only party who could question the frauds, if any had been committed."

The case, then, stands thus. The complainant has offered no admissible evidence to show when and how he first discovered the alleged frauds; the defendant has offered the above evidence of notice to the complainant. If there was no evidence of notice on the part of the defendant, we should find great, if not insuperable difficulty, in holding that the bar of the statute of limitations was avoided. If it be necessary for the complainant to aver in his bill, when and how he first discovered the fraud, it is certainly incumbent on him to offer some legal evidence in support of those averments. If a communication was made to him, as he alleges in his bill, in June, 1849, he should have proved it, with all its circumstances, and show that his own conduct, in reference thereto, was such as to lead to a reasonable inference that he then first discovered the alleged fraud. But he offers no legal evidence of such a communication, and he did not file this bill until February, 1851, eighteen months after the alleged time of the discovery; and no reason is shown for the delay. But, independent of this, we are of opinion, that the deposition of Mr. Stewart shows such a notice of the alleged frauds, as caused the statute bar to begin to run, more than two years before this bill was filed.

The rule respecting notice is well settled. It is correctly laid down in Kennedy v. Green, 3 Mylne & K. 719, 721, 722: "It is the well-established principle, that whatever is notice enough to excite attention, and put the party upon his guard, and call for inquiry, is notice of every thing, to which such inquiry might have led. When a person has sufficient information to lead him to a fact he shall be deemed conversant of it." In support of this, many cases might be cited. It will be sufficient to refer to a few of them. The Ploughboy [Case No. 11,230]; Hinde v. Vattier [Id. 6,512]; Bowman v. Wathen [Id. 1,740]; Sugd. Vend. 1052, and cases there cited. Now, the complainant was told that a suit had been brought, founded on the facts alleged in this bill; that it had been prosecuted by respectable counsel; that it was then pending; that if any one could make title by reason of those facts, he alone could. This was clear, direct, and specific. It was not only enough to put the complainant on inquiry, but it referred him to the very source from whence this bill came; that is, to Mr. Warren; and informed him where he could find a particular narrative of the charges, and the evidence in support of them. It must be remembered also, that the complainant was acting in a fiduciary capacity, and that a duty was incumbent on him to make inquiry concerning property of the bankrupt, when he had authentic information that a third person was charged with concealing it, to defraud creditors.

It has been argued, that, as Mr. Stewart was the counsel of Hilton, the court ought to presume that he represented his client's case favorably, and gave Mr. Carr an impression that his client was innocent of the frauds. But Mr. Carr knew the fact that Mr. Stewart was Hilton's counsel. And if that fact requires the court to presume that Mr. Stewart's representation would naturally be favorable to his client, it required Mr. Carr to presume the same thing. But in truth, he should have acted not on any mere impressions, but on the specific and substantive facts stated to him; that the frauds had been charged in a bill filed in the supreme judicial court of Maine, by respectable counsel, whom he has now employed in this suit; that the bill was coming to a hearing, and that, in the view of the defendant's counsel, whatever title existed, belonged to him as a trustee for creditors. It was not necessary that he should then believe the frauds existed. It was enough that his attention was called to them, that he was put on his guard, and that he had sufficient information to lead him to the facts. It thus became his duty to know them; and after the lapse of sufficient time to make the necessary inquiries, he must be treated as if he had performed this duty, and did know them. Three years, wanting but twenty-three days, elapsed after this notice, before the bill was filed. Eleven months and upwards, is too much time to allow for making the necessary inquiries, considering that both the complainant and Mr. Warren lived in the city of Bangor, that the suit was pending in the county of Penobscot, and that, by an examination of the bankrupt himself, the whole matter could have been sifted to the bottom, in far less time than eleven months. Our opinion is, that the eighth section of the bankrupt act affords a complete bar in this case; and the bill, for this cause, must be dismissed.

Ejectment for a tract of land in West Greenwich. Plea, the general issue.

At the trial, the plaintiff [Nathan Carr] proved a title to the premises by a deed from Simon Reynolds to him, dated the 18th of July, 1826, the execution of which was established. The defendant [Joseph Hoxie] then set up a title to the premises under a prior deed from the same grantor, dated the 26th of May, 1826. The execution of this deed being disputed, a witness, Jonathan Nichols, was called by the defendant. He testified, in substance, that he was called upon by the parties to write the deed:—that he saw the grantor, Reynolds, sign and seal the same; and that Hoxie at the same time executed a deed of mortgage of the same lands to the grantor. The witness drew both deeds. The parties then had some conversation about the deeds, and about the fulfilment of certain conditions before they should be passed. They finally concluded to leave them both with him. But they did not authorize him to deliver either of them to the other upon the fulfilment of any conditions, nor did they deliver them to him for that purpose. Nor did he consider that he had any authority over the deeds. He made a memorandum at the time of the conversation between the parties, and afterwards gave a copy of it to Hoxie at his request. He supposed, that when the parties had adjusted all the conditions, and they were complied with, they would call on him together for the deeds; but that he had otherwise no authority to deliver them. There was no delivery of them in his presence. This was the whole case for the defendant.

Mr. Tillinghast, for plaintiff.

Bridgham & Whipple, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Upon this evidence, I do not see, how the defence can be maintained. Here, there was no delivery of either instrument to Nichols, as the deed of the party, or as an escrow, to take effect upon the fulfilment of the conditions or agreements stated. Even supposing those conditions or agreements to be fulfilled, still the land will not pass, unless there has been an effectual delivery of the deeds with the assent of the parties respectively. See Degory and Roe's Case, 1 Leon. 152, Moore, 300; Wheelwright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 447, 452; Johnson v. Baker, 4 Barn. & Ald. 440; Perk. Com. §§ 137, 138, 142–144; Bushell v. Pasmore, 6 Mod. 217, 218. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover upon the consummated title to him, subsequently made.

Verdict accordingly.

PATENTS—"BRAN-DUSTER"—VALIDITY.

1. Where, in the patent to Frost and Monroe, of February 27th, 1849, reissued March 13th, 1855, for an "improvement in machinery for separating flour from bran," containing four claims, the third claim was in these words: "The upright stationary bolt, or bolt and scourer combined, with its top or cover, or in combination with claims 1, 2 and 4, or either of them, or their equivalents, to produce like results in the flouring process:" Held, that such claim was bad, for uncertainty.

2. The fourth claim was one for "the use of the revolving, distributing, scouring and blowing cylinder of beaters and fans, by which the material is distributed, scoured, and the flour blown through the meshes of the bolting cloth:" Held, that such claim was one to a legal result, and bad on its face.

This was an action at law, for the infringement of reissued letters patent [No. 302] granted to Issachar Frost and James Monroe, March 13th, 1855, for an "improvement in machinery for separating flour from bran," commonly called a bran-duster. The plaintiff [John M. Carr] was the assignee of the patentees. The original patent [No. 6,148] was granted to them February 27th, 1849. At the trial, the plaintiff had a verdict [Case No. 2,440], and the defendant [John Rice] now moved for a new trial.

Charles M. Keller and George Gifford, for plaintiff.

Charles Tracy, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The plaintiff's machine consists of three essential parts: (1) An exterior cylindrical case; (2) within this, a cylindrical bolt, made of wire bolting cloth; and (3) a revolving cylinder, or scourer. There is also a cover or top to the cylindrical case, and a hole through it for the shaft of the revolving cylinder; also, a bottom on which rest the case, the bolt, and the scourer, with a hole for the other end of the shaft. There are also conductors for the discharge of the flour and bran. The claims of the patentees are: (1) The horizontal bottom, when used in connection with the upright stationary (or revolving) bolt for flouring purposes; (2) the opening for the admission of a counter-current of air, through the bottom and into the bolt, and the bran spout, as described, in combination with the bottom; (3) the upright stationary bolt, or bolt and scourer combined, with its top or cover, or in combination with claims 1, 2 and 4, or either of them, or their equivalents, to produce like results in the flouring process; and (4) the use of the revolving, distributing, scouring, and blowing cylinder of beaters and fans, by which the material is distributed, scoured, and the flour blown through the meshes of the bolting cloth. It will be observed, that the patentees claim none of the component parts of the bran-duster as original or new, but limit their claims to certain combinations of the several parts making up the entire machine or instrument.

The first claim is, in few words, for the combination of the bottom with the bolt, for the use specified. The second is for the combination of the opening in the bottom for the admission of air, and the bran spout, with the bottom itself. The third claim is good for nothing, on account of its uncertainty. Nothing is claimed absolutely, as the whole is in the alternative. The claim is for the upright bolt, or bolt and scourer combined, (which?) with the top, or in combination with claims 1, 2 and 4, or either of them, or their equivalents. The fourth claim is a claim to a legal result—the use of the revolving, &c., cylinder of beaters and fans. Now, if the patentees were the inventors of this cylinder of beaters, they would, as matter of law, be entitled to the exclusive use of it, but not without. This they have not ventured to claim, and it is difficult to see how, with the implied admission that they were not its inventors, they can claim an exclusive right to the use of it.

The first and second claims are, therefore, in my judgment, the only ones that can be upheld, as the others are bad on the face of them; and, as it respects these two claims, the defendant is not chargeable with an infringement. No such combination of parts is found in his bran-duster. The elements of his combination are different. He uses a revolving bolt, and a differently constructed bottom. Both the plaintiff's and the defendant's machines are but improvements upon Ashby's, which was patented in 1846; and the defendant's is as different from the plaintiff's as his is from Ashby's.

A new trial must be granted, with costs to abide the event.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April, 1856.

PATENTS—NATURE OF GRANT—UTILITY—COMBINATION—SPECIFICATION—DESCRIPTION—IDENTITY—INFRINGEMENT.

1. A patent is dealt with by the courts, as a grant by the legislature, in exchange for the equivalent to be received by the public, in the free enjoyment of the patented discovery, after the inventor's exclusive privilege expires.

2. The patent grant is bestowed in consideration of something new and valuable, contributed by the patentee to the public benefit. If the subject of the grant was already open to common use, he renders no equivalent for the privileges he obtains, and fails to fulfill the vital condition upon which he was authorized to enjoy them.

3. It matters not how the thought is acquired or how brought into action, whether by a sudden conjecture, or chance experiment, or by the labors and investigations of a whole life; or, that it proves pre-eminently serviceable and profitable to the industry and enjoyments of life, or only to a very inconsiderable amount.

4. The law secures to the patentee the right to the use of his machine, provided it consists of a new combination, although composed of parts well known, and in common use.

5. If the patentee fails to mention, in his specification, an addition which is indispensable to the use of his machine, it is fatal to the title set up by the plaintiff. But if the machine works well without the addition, or if it be a mechanical means incident to the construction of the machine, to be brought into use in special circumstances, or only for the quickening, or making more profitable, the operation of the machine, it is not to be regarded as an indispensable part of it, and need not be described or claimed in the specification.

[Cited in Dornan v. Keefer, 49 Fed. 463.]

6. Strong resemblances in external appearances, similarity of products or operation, are not, separately, tests of the identity of the plan, or purpose of machines; nor is a superiority in products, or in operation, in one over the other, proof of an essential difference; because the slightest change of a machine, which effects a real improvement in it, may be patentable, while great apparent variations may be only disguises, under which an older discovery is attempted to be employed and appropriated.

[Cited in Rapid Service Store Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 43 Fed. 252.]

7. The defendant can not embody in his machine the patented discoveries held by the plaintiff, nor entitle himself to use them, by adding improvements, or new inventions of his own or of others thereto.

8. A person purchasing property, against the right of another, when the owner was without evidence of his title, can not hold or use it, after the evidence of his superior right is acquired by the real owner. Patent interests are not distinguishable, in this respect, from other kinds of property.

At law. This was an action on the case [by John M. Carr against John Rice] tried before Judge Betts and a jury, to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent [No. 6,148] for "improvements in machinery for separating flour from bran," granted to Issachar Frost and James Monroe, February 27, 1849, and reissued, March 13, 1855 [No. 302].

The claims of the original patent were as follows: "Having thus fully described the construction, arrangement, and operation of the several parts of our machine, we will now add that we do not mean to claim to be the original inventors of a cylinder, nor of a combined punch and reticulated cylinder, nor of a cylinder covered with strips of punched sheet-iron and strips of leather filled with tacks, such as are used in smut machines, nor the arrangement of gearing by which the machine is propelled; but we do claim to be the original and first inventors of the combination and arrangement of the external, upright, stationary, close cylindrical case B, with the internal combined punched and reticulated upright stationary scourer and bolt B^1, B^2, and revolving cylindrical scourer and blower C, constructed, arranged and operated in the manner and for the purpose herein fully set forth, by which the fine flour that usually adheres to the bran, after being subjected to the first bolting operation, is now completely separated from the bran and collected in the annular space between the cylindrical bolt and cylindrical case, from whence it descends through the segmental openings in the horizontal base, upon which the said bolt and case rest, into conducting spouts, as aforesaid, while the bran is blown from the interior of the bolt through a spout leading through the external case, as aforesaid, in the meshes of the bolting-cloth, being kept open by the pressure of air produced inside the combined cylindrical scourer and bolt, by the manner in which the oblique and radical and parallel wings are arranged on the revolving, scouring, and blowing cylinder, as above set forth.

The claims of the reissued patent were as follows: "I claim: 1st. The platform D (always at right angles with the sides of the bolt, when not made conical), or close horizontal bottom, when used in connection with upright, stationary, or revolving bolt for flouring purposes. 2d. The opening at D^5 for the admission of a counter current of air through the bottom and into the bolts and the opening and bran-spout F, as described, in combination with the platform D. 3d. The upright, stationary bolt, or bolt and scourer combined, with its closed-up top, except for air and material; as in combination with first, second, and fourth, or either of them, or their equivalents, to produce like results in the flouring process. 4th. The use of the revolving, distributing, scouring, and blowing cylinder of beaters and fans, by which the material is distributed, scoured, and the flour blown through the meshes of the bolting-cloth."

The machine was for rebolting or dusting bran which had already passed through the bolt, and it was claimed that by its use a saving was effected of from two to three barrels per hundred. On the part of the defense it was contended that the invention was void for want of novelty and utility, and that the defendant did not infringe the patent.

Charles M. Keller, for plaintiff.

Charles Tracy and S. W. Holladay, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. This prosecution rests upon what is termed a patent right. You are aware that, by virtue of acts of congress, individuals can have secured to them, a property in an invention. It is not necessary to examine whether such property rests in natural right, or is derived from the donation of government. It is dealt with by the courts, as a grant by the legislature, in exchange for the equivalent to be received by the public, in the free enjoyment of the patented discovery, after the inventor's exclusive privilege expires.

In the maintenance of rights of this description, and defense of prosecutions upon them, questions arise, for the determination of courts and juries, of a complicated, and oftentimes, embarrassing character. We are brought to consider subjects not familiar to common experience; for few understand the theory and science, or scarcely the practical application of mechanical arts. The points raised in these investigations are complicated and intricate in their nature, and embarrassing, to persons most skilled in them, to understand clearly.

After the maturest study, courts are frequently perplexed in determining the just bearing and effects of the facts, upon which they are to decide in this class of cases, and this embarrassment must necessarily be shared by jurors.

The cardinal principle upon which patent laws rest is, that an individual is only entitled to appropriate to his exclusive control, that which he has, by his original invention, or discovery, first made known, and rendered useful. Accordingly to determine his exclusive title, it is necessary to ascertain what was before known to the public, and whether what he assumes to be his, is really made so, by being distinct from any thing before publicly used in that condition, and applicable to like purposes, and is rendered, by means of his invention, useful.

This always presents questions of great difficulty, both upon the point of utility, and more particularly as to how far public knowledge and experience have already reached, in respect to the discovery claimed.

These points are to be determined by a careful comparison of the description given by the patentees of their discovery, with the proofs of what had been described in books; because the law gives no effect to a patent for things worthless in themselves, or which the community could have used without the aid of the patentees. In this connection, it will be borne in mind, that a patent can not be supported by proof that the invention was new to the patentees themselves, but the evidence must be satisfactory that they were actually the first, and original discoverers, of the thing patented. Their title is in no wise strengthened if their invention be proved to have been made at great expense of time, research, and money, even if they honestly believed it original with themselves, if in the end it is made to appear that others had previously known and used it. However ingenious the contrivance may be, and wonderful the processes performed by it, and puzzling to the mind to comprehend its arrangement, still, if, in the result, it turns out that neither the whole instrument, nor the combination of its parts, nor the results obtained by it, was first devised and adapted to practical purposes by the patentees, their patent can not stand.

Another indispensable prerequisite to the validity of a patent grant is that the patentees draw up and describe what is called a specification of their discovery, and file it in the patent office, setting forth and specifying the particulars of their invention plainly, and clearly; so that mechanics skilled in that branch of business, can construct the patented discovery from that description. The jury will bear in mind that the plaintiff establishes no right of action, unless it appears, upon the whole evidence in the case, that the patentees were really the original and first discoverers of the patented invention; that it is useful by producing some new manufacture, or some benefit by the method of manufacture, covered by the claim. None of these particulars less than the whole will sustain it.

It is manifest that these inquiries demand your judgment upon points exceedingly nice and intricate in their character, upon which, you perceive, witnesses of integrity, skill, and experience, have expressed widely differing opinions.

This action relates to an alleged discovery of a machine for separating flour from bran, after the same has passed through the usual bolting process. The patentees, in their specification, claim a discovery which introduces a valuable improvement into that branch of manufacture. The first question under the issue before you will be, What is the specific invention claimed by the plaintiff, or by the patentees? although the consideration of its utility may well be connected with that point.

The law does not require the patentees to prove their discovery to be useful to any eminent or large degree. It is sufficient if it produces an improved article, at less cost, or with more expedition, than other known methods; that renders the discovery useful, within the meaning of the patent laws.

The machine constructed and patented, and now the subject of this action, is familiarly called a bran-duster, and is represented and claimed by the patentees to be an improvement in "machinery for separating flour from bran." Its purpose and use is, to separate the remaining particles of flour which adhere to the bran, after the same has passed through the ordinary bolting process. The allegation and claim is, that this discovery secures that end more cheaply and perfectly than was before done, and effects a large saving of flour by freeing the flour from the bran, to which it adheres after passing through the ordinary bolts, and which would otherwise pass off with the feed.

The patentees do not claim to have invented a new machine, but to have contrived a new arrangement and combination of known parts of machinery, so as to produce, by its operation, a more beneficial result. The plan of construction and combination is set forth in the specification, and in the claims, with which that concludes.

The most noted parts are, an outer wooden case, which forms the exterior covering of the machine; an interior case of wire-gauze, tin, or other metal, perforated with holes, similar to an ordinary sifter, or sieve, forming a bolting cylinder, with both ends closed up, except for air and material—(in the model, this is stationary, although it is claimed, either stationary, or revolving, when thus used for flouring purposes)—and an upright cylinder of beaters and fans, having a distributing head, or table on its top, within the interior case or bolting cylinder. This cylinder is covered with strips of leather, having tacks, or nails without heads, projecting from the surface outward near to the sifter, and also with little wings of tin, or other substances, and of sufficient strength to bear the pressure of the air, so as to act as fans, when the cylinder is revolving rapidly.

Air is admitted freely through an aperture for the admission of the feed near the hopper, and some is also received through openings at its base, at the center, or at the discharge hole for the bran. The material or offal to be operated upon is received from the bolt (after the ordinary process of bolting is completed), and passed thence on to the head of the solid cylinder, and distributed by its centrifugal action equally around the periphery, and down the sides, and thus thrown out into the body of the case, and against the sifter inclosing it.

The solid cylinder is made to rotate with high speed, and, by aid of its appliances and velocity, a rapid circulation of air is created within the sifting case, and in that manner it is claimed, the flour and bran are suspended, and subjected to the double action of the beating, or whipping of the tacks, or pins attached to the cylinder, and the currents of air—the latter driving the flour against and through the sieve-covering—and the bran, by its gravity, falling to the bottom of the case. Arrangements are also proposed for removing the flour and bran from the machine, where they severally fall, by means of spouts—the bran on the floor of the inside case, and the flour outside of the sifter.

The theory of the plan of operating is, by the combination of the machinery, in swift motion, to loosen the flour which adheres to the bran, when it is delivered out of the ordinary bolt, and to propel the flour through the sifter, by force of the currents of air alone, while the bran drops to the floor and through a hole in the bottom, by its gravity, and by that action to produce a complete separation of the flour and bran, cheaply, expeditiously, and with an important saving of flour.

The features of the plan are thus sufficiently stated, without seeking to be critically exact in all the details of the machine, to enable the jury, on the evidence, to determine whether the contrivance is worked out by a new and useful combination of its parts.

The law secures the patentees the right to the use of their machine, provided it consists of a new combination, although composed of parts well known, and in common use. Indeed, it is not to be expected, in this era of the mechanical arts, that a machine original, in all the instrumentalities it employs, can be produced.

To make their title good, the patentees must describe, fully and clearly, their whole invention, and the method of using it. If anything material, in respect to its construction or working, is omitted in their specification, they lose all claim to the exclusive use of their discovery.

It is admitted, on both sides, that the model, on the table before you, presents a true picture or representation of the discovery claimed by the patentees, in all its essential parts. Its plan and combinations have been substantially pointed out to you already; and it is for you to determine, upon consideration of the whole of the evidence, whether the invention is new and useful.

It is, however, proper to observe that the patentees need not specify the kind of power to be employed, or the method of applying it in working the machine. No particular mechanical means to those ends are claimed in the discovery, and they are accordingly at liberty to use any known to mechanics skilled in machinery of this character, and not requiring invention to prepare or apply them.

It is urged, that the description of the machine is vitally defective, in not pointing out the application of a knocker, or rapper to it, without which it can not be worked to any advantage, and which is, in fact, applied by the patentees to those they use or vend.

The office of the rapper is, from time to time, to strike the upper end of the sifter-cylinder, with force sufficient to jar, or shake off the flour adhering to its outer face—and so clogging the meshes, or perforations, as to prevent its being blown through, by the currents of air within. If the patentees always use that addition, and it is indispensable to the usefulness of the machine, their failing to mention it in their specification, is fatal to the title set up by the plaintiff. There is, however, conflicting evidence on this point, and the facts involved in the objection, are for the jury alone to decide. If the duster works well without that addition, or if it be a mechanical means incident to the construction of a duster, or bolters, to be brought into use in special circumstances, or only for the quickening, or making more profitable, the operation of the machines, it is not to be regarded as an indispensable part of it, and need not be described, and claimed in the specification.

The main point of controversy in the case has been upon the novelty of the invention, claimed by the patent. This is always the ground of difficulty for discoverers to support themselves upon. The invention must be real with them. If it has been previously in public use, or can be found described in substance, in printed publications, it is public property, and the law does not permit it to be appropriated, by means of a patent grant, to individuals. The patentees may be ignorant of such facts; but the law charges them with knowledge of them, and treats their claim to an exclusive property in their discovery as fraudulent and void.

The law rests upon sound principles of equity and honesty in that respect. The patent grant is bestowed in consideration of something new and valuable contributed by the patentees, to the public benefit. If the subject of the grant was already open to common use, they render no equivalent for the privileges they obtain, and fail to fulfill the vital condition upon which they were authorized to enjoy them.

But it is a misapprehension to suppose, there must be proof of high merit in the invention to establish a patent right. The discovery may be the merest casualty. It matters not how the thought is acquired, or how brought into action, whether by a sudden conjecture, or chance experiment, or by the labors and investigations of their whole lives, or that it proves pre-eminently serviceable and profitable to the industry and enjoyments of life, or only to a very inconsiderable amount.

To show that the machine is not new and original with the patentees, a publication has been referred to, which was printed many years previously, in the Repertory of Arts, describing, with drawings, a patent issued to Ashby, in England, for improvements in flour-dressing machines (designed to separate flour from bran as a first bolter). A model, prepared in conformity with that description, has also been brought before you, and proved, by experts, to represent the plan of Ashby's invention.

The question of fact for the jury to decide, upon the evidence, is, whether the plaintiff's machine contained substantially the principle, and the like means for carrying it out, with what is embodied, in Ashby's contrivance. If it does, and nothing more, then this patent is void, whether that machine ever went into use or not. The difference to the eye is palpable and great, and a similarity in substance is only made out on theoretical notions, or the idea of mathematical equivalents—as for instance, that the ends of arms projecting, at equal distances, from a central shaft in Ashby's plan may, in a mathematical sense, be taken for the periphery of a wheel, or the circumference of a cylinder; but if a description of that arrangement, laid before a mechanic skilled in building machines, would not enable him, without invention, to build a cylinder nearly filling a sifting-case, it would not amount to that kind of public notice and knowledge, which could interfere with this after patent. It is submitted to your judgment, upon that proof, whether such a description as Ashby's would instruct these patentees to employ the solid cylinder in their machines, and render their construction a piracy of that plan. But admitting that a shaft, with arms having fans or brushes at their ends, to act as beaters, to create currents of air throught the sifter, in Ashby's plan, would be an equivalent for the solid cylinder used by these patentees, it is to be observed that Ashby's plan has no distributing head or table, for the offal to fall upon, at the top, to be distributed by aid of guides thereon, or by centrifugal action, equally to the inner periphery of the bolting cylinder. This is claimed to be one of the essentials of this patent, and the jury are to judge whether this arrangement is not a new and important invention, in the uses and working of the machine in question.

Other differences in this instrument, from Ashby's, are pointed out by the evidence; particularly that the ends of his bolting cylinder are left entirely open, so that the currents of air produced by the brushes or fans, in rapid motion, can not be controlled, or prevented from escaping end-ways, carrying with them the materials of flour and bran; thus counteracting the purpose, in the plaintiff's machine, which is intended, by its close bottom and top, in connection with the wire-cloth bolt, to form a fan-case, managing the air, and by it, forcing out the flour through the sides of the sifter; while in Ashby's, the brushes in actual contact seem to be the important agency for driving the flour through the sieve-sides, by the act of brushing, instead of blowing. All these particulars, making differences of action, of purpose, or construction, will be considered by the jury in determining whether the plaintiff's machine is substantially borrowed from Ashby's.

A patent granted May 16, 1846, by the U. S. patent office, to Henry Straub, for a smut machine was also put in evidence by the defendant, to prove a want of novelty in the Frost and Monroe patent. You have heard it read, and seen a model, with the drawings representing it fully and in detail. You have also heard the opinions of experts upon both sides, regarding its construction, its purpose, and mode of operation. And whether the Straub patent contains the substantial combinations, or can be so arranged as to perform the same functions (without invention) as the plaintiff's, is a question of fact for the jury, upon the evidence, to decide.

It is often a point of great perplexity to determine the identity or dissimilarity of mechanical contrivances. Inventions are rarely introduced, claiming entire machines. Old and familiar instrumentalities are brought into new combinations, or comparatively small additions are made to what is in common use; and new results or advantages are sought for under the altered structure, by aid of means, often the equivalents of those they are substituted for; so that the identity, or essential differences of patented contrivances, compared with others before in use, are particulars upon which men of experience, skill, and sound judgment, are very likely to hold differing opinions.

Strong resemblances in external appearances, similarity of products or operation, are not, separately, tests of the identity of the plan, construction, or purpose of machines; nor is a superiority in products, or in operation, in one over the other, proof of an essential difference; because the slightest change of a machine, which effects a real improvement in it, may be patentable, while great apparent variations, may be only disguises, under which an older discovery is attempted to be employed and appropriated. The jury will accordingly bear in mind, that the title of the plaintiff does not depend, either upon the degree of improvement in this manufacture, produced by their machine, or in seeming distinctions from others before known, in the form, or dimensions, or positions of its parts, or in the materials of which it is constructed.

The experts who have analyzed Ashby's, Straub's, and the plaintiff's machines, give, in their testimony, strongly conflicting opinions respecting the essential similarity and dissimilarity of the same. It is the province and duty of the jury—although, perhaps, less skilled in the science of mechanics—to weigh that evidence, and determine its reliability and force, according to their understanding and judgment of the subject.

It is not enough for the plaintiff to establish the validity of the patent; he must also prove that the defendant has included some essential part of the discovery in his machine, and is using it in violation of his right, before he can be disturbed by this action.

The defense to the charge of infringement is, that the defendant's machine is a new invention of Benton; and that those parts and combinations in it which resemble the plaintiff's, are common to theirs, to Ashby's, and Straub's machines, before adverted to, and other machines which were used before the discovery of plaintiff's; and that the plaintiff's will not work advantageously without the knockers, which the patentees make and use with it, but do not describe in their specification. It seems furthermore considered by the defendant that he has a right to run his machine, because it is better than the plaintiff's, in the cheapness, expedition, and quality of the work done by it.

The rules of law, applicable to all these grounds of defense, are perfectly plain and indisputable. The plaintiff has no monopoly of the art of separating bran from flour by machinery. This art is open to be exercised by everybody. The defendant can not be molested in the use of his own, or Benton's invention, or of any other machine, out of the plaintiff's patent, employed for that purpose. He is, moreover, entitled to make any useful improvement he may discover, and secure it as his own property, by patent, and add it to machines in public use.

But the limitation to his right is equally plain. He can not embody in such machines the patented discoveries held by the plaintiff, nor entitle himself to use them, by adding improvements, nor new inventions of his own or of others, thereto.

Although the improvement discovered by the defendant or Benton may constitute the main value and desirableness of the plaintiff's machine, he can not claim the enjoyment of it, without the authority of the plaintiff. But the defendant is not guilty of an infringement of the plaintiff's patent, by copying any part of that machine into his own, provided the same thing, under substantially the same combinations, is found in Ashby's machine, or any other one in use previous to the patent in question; nor does he infringe, by taking separate parts of the plaintiff's combinations—when consisting of several particulars—if he takes less than the whole; but variations merely colorable in that respect, will not protect the defendant in such use.

The patentee is bound to describe, in his specification, every part of his discovery, and the whole method of constructing it, which is important to its practical and useful employment as a duster. If a knocker to act with it when in operation, is of that character, and is used and vended by him with the machine, for either of these causes, the present patent will be void, for omitting that claim or notice

So, also, it is contended by the defense that some particulars respecting the discharge of the bran and flour from the table or bottom of the machine, set forth in the machine as part of its new combination, are wholly changed or deviated from, in its working, so as to render the one used essentially different from that described; and this objection, if satisfactorily supported by proof, will defeat the plaintiff's action.

The facts, then, are to be carefully examined, to determine whether either branch of the defense is made out. It is wholly matter of evidence, of which the jury are exclusively judges. Their judgment will be formed upon a close consideration of the testimony of the witnesses on both sides, and by inspection of drawings, models, and descriptions of the various machines, in proof, with a view to the purpose for which they were respectively constructed, and their modes of operation.

You will perceive, from these suggestions, that the main points, touching the validity of the patent, rest on the question, whether the contrivance patented was borrowed from the instructions or suggestions of others to the patentees, or from machines before used for like purposes; or whether it is the invention of the patentees, and is so described that it can be built by a competent machinist, and is useful.

So, also, as to the defendant's machine—whether he has employed in its construction only what was known before the plaintiff's was patented; or whether it includes no more than a portion of the various particulars composing the combination of the plaintiff's.

The testimony of the respectable and intelligent experts who have been examined, is entitled to great consideration, and can not have failed to impart much useful information, in respect to the principles and operations of the two machines before you. The laws of mechanics become a highly essential rule of evidence, and decision, in questions turning upon inquiries into the purpose, action, and effect of mechanical contrivances. They often supply the surest test of the novelty, and utility of machines, and of their coincidence with, or diversity from, one another. It is evidence worthy the careful regard of the jury in this case, especially as it is given with the advantage of being applied to the machines themselves, in presence of the court and jury.

Very little need be said by the court on the subject of damages. The only precise rule furnished by the law is, that the patentees are entitled, when a verdict is given in their favor, to recover the actual damage they have sustained by the infringement of their patent. No legal measure being furnished, by which that amount can be ascertained, the subject is left to the sound sense and judgment of the jury. There can be rarely occasion for vindictive damages; because, almost invariably, the infringement arises out of some colorable claim of right, by the party sued. Computations have been given in evidence of the quantity of flour manufactured by the defendant on his duster, and of the profits saved to him, by the use of what is claimed to be the plaintiff's patent right. This is all a fair subject for consideration; but it is hardly to be relied upon, as fixing, with any certainty, either the quantity of work done, or its value; but it is a particular to be fairly considered by the jury, in fixing the amount of injury sustained by the plaintiff, by any unlawful use of the invention secured to him by the patent.

The point is made in behalf of the defendant—in diminution, if not entire discharge of damages—that when he set up his machine, it was not covered by the plaintiff's patent. This suit is upon a reissue of the patent originally granted. The patentees, finding their specification was not sufficiently explicit to secure them the whole of their invention, surrendered their patent to the patent office, and had granted them a reissue, with an amended specification, embracing their entire discovery. Before that was done, the defendant's machine was put up; and as, at that time, he was not liable to an action, therefore it is insisted, he can not be made so, by a subsequent alteration of the specification and patent, without his consent.

This defense can not prevail, if it be found by the jury that the patentees were the inventors of all that is claimed under the reissued patent, and only failed reaping the benefit of their invention for the want of the perfect description of it, in their first patent, which is now supplied them, in the amended and reissued one. They and their assignees became the owners of the discovery, with a perfect title, and the defendant is answerable for any unlicensed use of the machine since that time. A person purchasing property, against the right of another, when the owner was without evidence of his title, can not hold or use it, after the evidence of his superior right is acquired by the real owner. Patent interests are not distinguishable, in this respect, from other kinds of property.

The jury will observe, from these instructions, that the controlling questions of fact, for their decision in this cause, are: Was the invention claimed in the patent a new and useful one? Were the patentees the first and original discoverers of the thing patented? Have they so described their discovery, in their specification, that a competent machinist can make the patented machine from that description? Did the patentees claim, in their specification, more than they had actually invented? or did they omit to state in it, the whole of their invention, and such parts as are necessary to its usefulness? Does the defendant's machine violate the plaintiff's rights, to his injury?

In determining this last inquiry, the jury are to ascertain whether the defendant's machine is constructed and worked upon substantially the same principles, and to the same results, with that of the plaintiff; or whether its construction, combination, action, or purpose be substantially different; whether the difference in the two machines be only formal, or consist in improvements in the defendant's upon the plaintiff's; or are they the original discovery of Benton or the defendant, and render his machine distinct from the plaintiff's.

The instructions before given will have sufficiently pointed out to the jury the application of the law to the various facts submitted to their inquiry, according to their findings upon these facts.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with $270.06 damages.

CARR v. TWEEDY.

[Hempst. 287.] [1]

Superior Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1835.

CERTIORARI—WHEN WRIT WILL ISSUE.

A writ of certiorari cannot issue from the superior court, for the purpose of bringing up a case from the county court for adjudication, and such case should be determined in the circuit court.

Before JOHNSON and YELL, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This cause is brought here by certiorari, directing the clerk of the county court of Conway to certify to the superior court at the July term, 1835, the record and proceedings in the above cause. At the April term, 1835, of the circuit court, judgment was obtained against James Carr and others, to the amount of $2,458, for failing to settle with the court as executors of the last will and testament of John Tucker, deceased, from which judgment no appeal was prayed, and this certiorari was brought to set aside the judgment and proceedings in the county court. The defendant moves to dismiss this certiorari, because this court has no jurisdiction in the cause. If the act of 1829 (Ter. Dig. 157), organizing the county courts, gives the privilege of appeal, it still must be brought up in the way pointed out by the statute; it would be error to bring an appeal directly from the county court to this court, the circuit courts alone having jurisdiction of appeal from justices of the peace. Ter. Dig. 122, 157. Prior to the act of 1828 (Ter. Dig. 537), this court had concurrent original jurisdiction with the circuit courts in all civil matters. Since the passage of that act, the superior court is made an appellate court alone, with some few exceptions, and this is a case believed not to be within this rule. The act declares, "That the superior court of this territory, in all cases at law and equity, shall be exclusively an appellate court, and shall not have original jurisdiction in any civil cause, unless such as may arise under the laws of the United States." The writ of certiorari is an original writ, and cannot therefore be returned to this court. There is an intermediate jurisdiction clothed with the power to hear and determine all original proceedings, and also vested with appellate power to hear and determine all matters of litigation arising in the inferior courts. That court, then, being vested with both original and appellate jurisdiction, would in any event be the proper tribunal to hear and determine this cause. If an appeal is allowed, then, it should have been returned to the circuit court, and if it be an original writ, that court alone has jurisdiction. It was error to bring it up to this court. Certiorari dismissed.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July, 1877.[2]

CAUSES FOR REMOVAL TO FEDERAL COURTS.

1. In the removal of a cause from a state to a federal court, the whole suit must be removed; a fragment of a suit cannot come to the federal court for trial, because a party interested in that fragment, or some single issue, is a citizen of another state from that of the plaintiff.

2. A removal of a cause from the state to the federal court will only be allowed when the controversy is so completely a controversy between residents or citizens of different states, that its termination will settle the whole suit.

[Cited in Donohoe v. Mariposa Land Co., Case No. 3,989; Thompson v. Dixon, 28 Fed. 6.]

3. It is not enough that citizens of different states are interested in the same issue or controversy, but they must have such an interest that when the question to which they are parties is settled, the suit is thereby determined; otherwise the right of removal is not given.

[Cited in First Presbyterian Soc. v. Goodrich Transp. Co., 7 Fed. 261.]

In equity. This was a motion to remand this suit to the superior court of Cook county, from whence it was removed to this court. This suit was originally brought in the superior court under what is known as the "Burnt Records Act" of this state, for the purpose of perfecting and establishing title to the lands described in the bill. The bill alleges that the complainant is the owner in fee of certain lands described in the bill, and that the defendants Brennan, Forsythe, Asahel Gage, Henry H. Gage and Portia Gage, also claim title in fee under certain deeds therein referred to. Defendants, John Forsythe, H. H. Gage and Asahel Gage, answered the bill, and each claimed title to the land in question as against the complainant, by specific conveyances which they set up, which were in fact tax titles. The defendant, Portia Gage, before answer, appeared and filed her petition, stating that she was a citizen of the state of New Jersey, and that the complainant is and was a citizen of the state of Illinois; and that in said suit there is a controversy which is wholly between said complainant and herself, and which can be fully determined as between them, and prayed a removal of the suit to this court. The superior court ordered the cause to be removed as prayed; and since such removal said Portia Gage has answered the said bill, setting up title to the land under a conveyance from Asahel Gage to herself.

James E. Munroe, for complainant.

A. N. Gage and Beam & Cooke, for petitioner.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The statute under which this suit was brought provides, in substance, that in all counties where the records of land titles have been destroyed, the claimant or owner of lands in fee, or of any interest in them, may file a petition to establish title. The statute requires that all persons owning or claiming an estate in fee, all persons in possession, or all persons to whom the lands shall have been conveyed, and the deed of conveyance recorded after the destruction of the record, shall be made defendants to the suit; and all other persons may be made parties by the name and designation of "whom it may concern." Any person interested may come in and set up his title and have his rights to the land adjudicated the same as if he had been made a party by name; and after the court has entered a decree determining who is the owner under the pleadings and proofs, the decree is final unless appealed from within one year. On the hearing of such case the court is to determine and decree in whom the title to the land is vested, whether in the petitioner or in other parties to the suit; that is to say, the court must upon the issues made in this case, determine and decree whether the petitioner has title to the land as against Forsythe, H. H. Gage, Asahel Gage and Portia Gage; and also whether

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 5 Cent. Law J. 114, and 4 Law & Eq. Rep. 159, contain only partial reports.]

[2] [Affirmed in Gage v. Carraher, 25 U. S. (Lawy. Ed.) 989.]

Forsythe has title as against the petitioner or any other of the parties claiming title; and so the title of each defendant as against the petitioner, and each of the other defendants must be passed upon and determined by the court.

The second section of the act of March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 470], provides for the removal of cases from the state to the federal courts.

By the first clause the right of removal is given when the suit arises under the constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made under its authority, or suits in which the United States is a plaintiff or petitioner, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, or a controversy between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states, or a controversy between citizens of a state and foreign citizens or subjects; and the second clause provides that when in any suit mentioned in this section there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them, then one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy, may remove said suit to the United States court for the proper district.

The only authority for the removal of this case to the federal courts must be found in the last clause, which I have just referred to. The defendant, Portia Gage, alleges in her petition for removal, that there is a controversy in the case wholly between the complainant and herself, which is not strictly true, because the controversy is between herself and the complainant, and all the other defendants; and she does not state that all the other defendants are citizens of a different state from herself.

It was held by this court in City of Chicago v. Gage [Case No. 2,664], and has also been held in Stapleton v. Reynolds [Id. 13,303], by Judge Swing, of the southern Ohio district, that the whole suit must be removed; that a fragment of a suit cannot come to this court for trial, because a party interested in that fragment, or some single issue, is a citizen of another state from that of the plaintiff. And it seems to me that the suit must be wholly between citizens of different states as necessary and material parties in order to give the right of removal. It is not enough that citizens of different states must be interested in the same issue or question, or controversy, which arises in the course of the case; but they must have such an interest that when the question to which they are parties is settled, the suit is thereby determined, or the right of removal is not given.

Is this such a suit? There is a controversy, to be sure, between the plaintiff and Mrs. Gage, who has removed this case to this court; but the determination of that controversy will not determine the suit; the court must still determine her rights as against all the other defendants, and must also determine the title to the property as between all the other defendants, and each other as against the plaintiff.

Suppose we hold that Mrs. Gage has not title, either as against the plaintiff or either of the other defendants, the controversy in this case is not thereby determined, but we have still to settle the title as between the other parties. The scope and purpose of this act of congress, it seems to me, must be to allow simply a removal to the federal courts when the controversy was so completely a controversy between residents or citizens of different states that the determination of that controversy settled the whole suit.

The legislature of this state, in its wisdom, has provided for the bringing of this kind of suit; it is an exceptional and an extraordinary form of action, and only arises in the case of a catastrophe like that which has happened in this county by the destruction of all its land records. Necessarily, almost, there will be parties residing in various states, who may have directly or indirectly some interest in the title which the party seeks to establish; and is this court to assume that every non-resident who happens to be brought in, or to have an interest in a proceeding of this kind, can remove his part of that controversy to the federal court and have it settled there? And if he does, what is the court then to do, when it has settled the controversy as between the parties so removed—the non-resident so removed and the other claimants to the property? It seems to us that congress could not have intended that this result should follow in this class of cases. So, too, in an infinite number of chancery suits which are brought. A party foreclosing a mortgage in the state courts finds upon the record a judgment in favor of a non-resident creditor, he makes that creditor a party; the controversy, as far as that party is concerned, is only between the judgment creditor and the mortgagee, which does not dispose of the whole case, because, after all, the main object of the suit was to foreclose the mortgage, and the controversy initiated by the suit was between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, or the holder of the mortgage. So that it seems to us that there can be no doubt but that, in these cases, where a non-resident is merely incidentally or partially interested, he cannot remove the case, and ought not to be allowed to.

This case is interesting only, because it is the first one of this character which has come before us, and we are of opinion that this case certainly does not make such a case as entitles the party to a removal.

I do not wish to be understood, however, as saying that a case may not be made that would entitle a non-resident to a removal, but what a non-resident may have such an interest as that the determination of his or her interest may determine the whole suit or controversy, in which event the right of a removal would undoubtedly exist. I only intend to say that this case is not made out, and that in a general way we do not think that a mere incidental party who is brought in to contest the title under the burnt records act, is entitled to a removal because he is a non-resident.

The case will be remanded to the superior court.

An appeal was prayed and allowed to the supreme court of the United States.

Petition of Andrew F. Baum for a revocation of the adjudication and a dismissal of the bankruptcy proceedings.

On the 11th day of June, 1874, John Heath, a creditor of the firm of Carrier & Baum, filed a petition in the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, for the adjudication of the said firm of Carrier & Baum in bankruptcy. The petition was regular and properly verified under the act of March 2d, 1867 [14 Stat. 523]. A rule to show cause was issued and duly served, and on the 22d day of June, A. D. 1874, no answer having been filed, the court adjudged said firm bankrupts, according to the prayer of the petition filed on the 11th of June. On the 15th day of May, 1875, Andrew F. Baum presented a petition to the court setting out the passage of the amendment of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 181], and alleging that the requisite proportions of the creditors of the firm had not joined in the petition, as required by the amendment to the bankrupt act, and asking that the adjudication be set aside and the proceedings dismissed. The order of adjudication was made about ten o'clock in the morning of the 22d day of June, 1874. The question discussed by counsel during the argument was, whether the act went into effect from the first hour of the day of its approval, or from the actual time of the signing by the president.

Appeal from the district court of the United States.

The district court had given a judgment in admiralty against the schooner Charles Pitman [case not reported], from which there was an appeal to this court.

Mr. Raybold, for libellant, now moved to take certain testimony on one of the points, upon which the district judge had decided the case; a point, it appeared, which had not been much adverted to by counsel below.

St. G. T. Campbell, on the other side, suggested that the course was irregular; this court taking cognizance of appeals strictly as an appellate court. Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 21 [1 Stat. 83]. Dyott's Case, 2 Watts & S. 564, declares that the duty of such a court is to correct the errour of an inferior tribunal, which being supposed to have examined the case thoroughly, cannot with propriety be said to have erred, when on the evidence given its decision was perfectly right. The court there remark: "We cannot examine the case de novo, without overwhelming the court with business; and in many cases, unless this be done, and the cause be reheard in toto, we run the risk of doing more injustice than we prevent, by determining a cause on an apparent state of facts, which the opposite party has had no opportunity to explain or rebut." The remark applies to this court: and the practice will prove particularly hard in admiralty cases, where a party finding that no case, or an insufficient one, has been made on the other side, dismissed his witnesses who go to sea, and cannot again be found. There ought at least to be shewn a special necessity, and a reason why the testimony was not taken below.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The practice at this bar having been for many years to proceed de novo in the testimony, I hardly feel at liberty now to change it; though I have rather grumbled in one or two cases; where parties finding out from the opinion of the district judge where their case pinched, have taken new testimony here to help them out of their difficulty; and have thus presented so different a case to me, that I have reversed my Brother Kane's decisions, when they were perfectly right, upon the facts presented to him. But under such circumstances I have allowed no costs to the party succeeding, and generally speaking, should think this rule to be but equitable. Rule allowed.

[NOTE. An appeal in the admiralty is in nature of a new trial, in which the court does not enter into the mere consideration of the propriety of the decision of the judge below, upon the evidence before him, but affords an opportunity to the appellant to present his case with the best possible aspect that new allegations or new evidence can afford it. Rose v. Himely, Case No. 12,045; Anonymous, Id. 444; The Boston, Id. 1,673; The Sarah Ann, Id. 12,342. In Anonymous, supra, Mr. Justice Story states that the principle of allowing amendments and new matter upon an appeal in an admiralty cause is well settled, and that the true ground of the practice is that the proceedings are considered de novo in the appellate jurisdiction, but that the new proof should be confined to the new allegations, and no proof allowed to contradict the original testimony upon points in contestation in the court below. The Boston, supra; Cushman v. Ryan, Case No. 3,515. In the case last cited, Mr. Justice Story held that if new evidence is offered, which might fairly have been introduced in the court below, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, it should be treated as being of far less value than it would have been under other circumstances, especially if it goes to the very gist of the matters put in controversy by the libel and answer, since it may be justly imputed to the laches of the party, and is open to the suspicion of being framed to meet the new exigencies of the case. And in Coffin v. Jenkins, Case No. 2,948, the same justice further stated, on this point, that the court ought, in all cases, to be very cautious in admitting any new matters, either of allegation or of defense, where the facts on which they rest are not new, or newly discovered, but were perfectly known at or before the hearing in the district court.]

CARRINGTON v. The ANN C. PRATT.

[10 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 193.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. July Term, 1852.

BOTTOMRY—FRAUD—BOND GOOD IN PART—MATE—QUALIFICATIONS—DEVOLUTION OF COMMAND.

1. A bottomry bond, made for a larger sum than is due, for the purpose of being used to defraud underwriters is void, and no remedy can be had upon it, although no fraud was intended against the owners of the vessel.

[Cited in The Grapeshot v. Wallerstein, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 135.]

2. The rule of the admiralty, which holds that a bond may be good for a part and bad for a part, does not apply to the one made for the purpose of defrauding the insurers. But a fraudulent bond will not necessarily vitiate the consideration so far as it is meritorious. For so much the creditor may recover by process in rem, on the hypothecation implied by law.

3. When the master is separated from the ship by death or other casualty the mate succeeds to the command as heres necessarius. The possibility of this command being devolved on him is a contingency contemplated by his engagement, and he engages for a competent degree of skill in seamanship and navigation for the management of the ship on the happening of this event. He is also entitled to the ordinary presumption in his favor, that he acted with fidelity and ordinary skill until the contrary is proved.

The brig Ann C. Pratt sailed from Frankfort Nov. 7, 1850, on a voyage to the Western Islands, and thence to such foreign port or ports as the master should determine. On her outward passage she encountered heavy gales, squalls, and had fresh breezes during the whole time. She labored badly and leaked from the commencement of the voyage, although she had been overhauled, and was supposed to be thoroughly repaired, so that three days after sailing, it was found necessary to lighten her by throwing over nearly the whole of her deck load. She arrived at Terceira on the 29 of November. Here she discharged part of her cargo and took part of another. From Terceira she sailed for St. Michael, Dec. 30, and made land the next day, but by a continued series of gales, squalls and bad weather, they were prevented from making a harbor till the 11th of January, when the vessel was brought to anchor and moored at Villa Franche, an open roadstead. She lay there till the 13th, when, the captain being ashore, the brig was struck by a heavy squall, which drove her from her moorings, with the loss of all her cables and anchors except part of her best bower chain. The squall struck her from the N. W., but soon veered round to the W. S. W., driving her directly on shore, so that the hands on board, to save themselves from being driven on the rocks were obliged to stand off. On the same day in the afternoon as is stated in the depositions of Airey, and M'Donald, the second mate, there was a consultation of the crew to consider what was best to be done. The crew on board at this time consisted of the second mate, two able seamen, one of whom, Hurris, was sick below, two ordinary seamen, one a Portuguese, who spoke English very imperfectly, and two boys, one only of whom spoke English, and the cook. With the exception of Airey and the second mate, the other members of the ship's company say that they knew of no consultation of the crew. If there was any, it must have been very informal, and though Airey and M'Donald both say that the opinion of the crew was in favor of proceeding to St. Thomas, which was the port that the master had determined to proceed to next, instead of attempting to return to St. Michael or bearing away for an eastern port, it is evident that Airey in doing this, must have been governed by his own opinion in concurrence with that of the second mate. On her passage for three or four days, the brig leaked badly till she took the trade winds, and from that time she made her voyage without difficulty, and arrived at St. Thomas the 6th of February. Here Airey called on the American consul, and had, under his warrant, a survey. In a written report the surveyors stated the repairs that in their opinion were required to make her seaworthy. Three master shipwrights, the only persons in the place who undertook such business, were applied to for proposals or tenders for making the repairs ordered by the surveyors, and the contract was made with Pland, whose offer was the most favorable. The money for making the repairs, and to meet the other necessary charges for supplies while she was under repairs, and for fitting her for her return voyage, beyond what the master had on board and the proceeds of the sale of the cargo, was advanced by the libellant, Nehemiah Carrington, under an agreement with Airey on the security of a bottomry bond; and a bill of exchange drawn for the sum claimed, on the payment of which the bond was to be held satisfied and cancelled. The bill having been protested, this suit was commenced on the bond.

WARE, District Judge. Several objections have been made to the libellant's right to recover in this case. In the first place it is said that it was the duty of Airey when he was blown off by the gale, to have returned to St. Michael's and restored the command of the vessel to the master, and that there was nothing in the state of the weather that rendered this impracticable. But whatever fault may have been committed by Airey in this part of his conduct, whether an error of judgment or a delinquency of a graver character, it cannot affect the libellant. The vessel came into St. Thomas in distress. It is certain that repairs were needed. There was a regular survey by competent surveyors, appointed by the American consul, and there is nothing in the evidence to impeach the fairness and honesty of the surveyors. The libellant knew nothing of the causes which brought her there, without her master and without her papers, except what he could learn from Airey and the crew, and their account sufficiently explained the fact. On the separation of the master from the vessel by death or casualty, the mate succeeds to his authority as heres necessarius; the law imposes on him the duties and responsibilities, and clothes him with the authority of master. This substitution is a contingency that is contemplated by his engagement, which cannot be declined by him but by a default of duty. Arriving at St. Thomas as he did, he had all the authority to order necessary repairs, and to make all contracts for that purpose that he would have had, if he had been originally appointed master. The circumstances under which he arrived, it may be said, ought to suggest caution and prudence, and to awaken the vigilance of those who dealt with him, but his authority was the same as would have been that of the original master. Airey, who was now the acting master, not having the control of means adequate to meet the cost of repairs, and being unable to obtain them on the personal credit of the owners, was authorized to borrow on the credit of the vessel. But it is said that this authority, having its origin in necessity, is limited to the cost of such repairs as are indispensably necessary to enable the ship to proceed on her voyage; that the repairs ordered exceeded that necessity, and that beyond this the master has no authority to charge the owners by a resort to the onerous expedient of a bottomry bond. And it is argued that beyond this there was a want of prudence and a wasteful extravagance in making the repairs that were made.

This argument presents itself with a double aspect—First, as it touches the rights of the lender; and secondly, as it questions the discretion and good faith of the master. As it affects the bottomry creditor, the answer appears to me to be very obvious. All that is required of the lender in such cases, is to be assured that an unprovided necessity exists, and that the means cannot be obtained on the personal credit of the owners. If the money is then advanced in good faith, without collusion with the master for the purpose of fraud, the lender is not bound to see to its application. Emerig. Tracts à la Grosse, c. 4, § 7; Dig. 14, 1, 1, 59; The Jane, 1 Dod. 465. If the sum advanced is somewhat more than is strictly necessary, unless the lender's suspicions are justly awakened by gross and manifest extravagance, his claim under his bond will not be impaired. For when a case of apparent necessity exists, the law does not impose on him the responsibility of determining the extent of repairs required. The lender, says Emerigon, is justified in relying on the honesty of the master; and besides, if he were required to decide on the nature and necessity of repairs, it would be requisite for him to be an expert in the business,—il faut être du métier.

As relates to the master the arguments apply with more force. His authority to borrow money on bottomry is strictly limited to the necessities of the ship; and in order to justify himself to the owners, he must show the extent of the necessity. But then the question will return, what in the sense of the law are necessary repairs? The text-writers on this subject merely use the words necessary repairs, without proceeding to describe, except in very vague and general terms, what they are. In what sense then is the word necessary used in this connection? Is it, in the strict sense, repairs that are indispensable to enable the vessel to proceed on her voyage, or is it, in a more loose sense, such as are proper, fit and suitable under the circumstances? This question was raised and very fully considered by the circuit court, in the case of The Fortitude [Case No. 4,953], and the conclusion to which the court arrived, after a very elaborate examination of the theoretical writers as well as the judicial decisions on the subject, was that the word necessary was used in the latter sense, as including what was proper and suitable under the circumstances. The same doctrine in substance was held by Lord Tenterden, in the case of Webster v. Teekamp, 4 Barn. & Ald. 354.

The proper test to determine what in the sense of the law are necessary repairs, is found by inquiring what a prudent owner, having a proper regard to the safety of the property at risk, and the security of the lives of the crew, would do if he were present. In this case the repairs ordered by the master were only such as were recommended by the surveyors in their report, and this, it appears to me, is sufficient to exonerate the master from any imputation of bad faith.

But the most difficult objection to be overcome is the charge of meditated fraud; not on the owners of the vessel, but on the underwriters. To enable the owners to perpetrate the fraud, two sets of papers and accounts were made up by the libellant, one for the owners, by which the matter was to be settled and the payment made. This account made the whole cost of the repairs to be $4,460.83. Deducting $310.60 for cash received of the master; $216.85, the avails of the sale of the cargo; $250, discounted by Pland, the contractor, who made the repairs, —left $3,683.38 as the amount actually advanced by the libellant; and adding the maritime premium, $193.87, it amounts to $3,877.25. For this sum a bill of exchange was drawn by Airey on Seth Pratt, the father of the master and owner, he having been left at St. Michael, and not expected to return in season to meet the bill. Together with the bill a written agreement was sent, by which the libellants agreed to discount the maritime interest, and to take $3,683.38 in satisfaction of the bond, provided the bill was duly honored and the payment duly made. With these papers another package of accounts and papers was sent, for the use of the owners in adjusting and settling the loss with the underwriters. These accounts showed the cost of the repairs to amount to $4,712.57, and after deducting $216.85, the sum received from the sale of the remains of the cargo, but without any deduction for the cash received of the master or the discount of the contractor, left the amount advanced by Carrington $4,591.42, and for this sum the bond was executed, which, with the addition of the maritime premium, amounts to $5,050.56. The reason given by Carrington, in his letter to Seth Pratt, to whom the papers were sent, for preparing this duplicate set of accounts, is, that it was "done to protect your son's interest; for doubtless you are aware that there are many charges, attending vessels similarly circumstanced as the Ann C. Pratt, which the insurers and underwriters will not admit; consequently owners of vessels have to protect their interests and make up their accounts in such a form as their officers will admit of." After this explanation of the fabricated papers and accounts, he proceeds to say: "The other package of papers relate to the owners and in the account current, which will be there found, the facts and original charges are those set forth, showing the balance due to us to be only $3,877.25, and for which amount Capt. Airey has given us a draft on you, and we have an agreement with him, as we do have with all others, who favor us with their business similarly circumstanced, that we are to relinquish the 10 per cent. maritime premium which persons making advances on vessels exact." The calm self-possession and air of frankness with which all this is disclosed would lead one to suppose that such practices belonged to the ordinary usages and common business habits of the place; and I feel a secret persuasion that I might do injustice to Messrs. Carrington & Co. to impute to them a greater looseness of mercantile morality than is customary in such transactions in that community, or perhaps in other commercial places, under like circumstances. But I feel bound to say that I cannot view such practices, even if sanctioned to some extent by custom, in the same light in which the interested parties appear to contemplate them, and I trust that I shall be doing no disservice to the general interests of commerce by suggesting that they cannot be tolerated in a court of justice. The letter of Carrington shows that the bond was executed for a larger sum than was due, and that false accounts were fabricated to support the bond and to enable the owners to extort from the underwriters a larger sum than by their contract they were bound to pay.

It being apparent that the bond is tainted with fraud can an action be maintained upon it? In the admiralty a bond may be good for a part and bad for a part. If demands are mixed up in it for which the creditor is not entitled to claim maritime interest, as for money which had been previously advanced on the personal credit of the owner, with other advances for which he had stipulated for this security, this will not vitiate the bond in toto. He may recover upon it so much of the consideration as is good, and it will be rejected for the residue. The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; The Hero, 2 Dod. 146; The Packet [Case No. 10,654]. But I am not aware that this equitable indulgence has ever been extended to a fraudulent bond. From the language of Lord Stowell, in the case of The Tartar, 1 Hagg. Adm. 14, I infer the contrary. "This court," he says, "proceeding on principles of general equity, does not hold that a bottomry, bad in part, necessarily vitiates the rest." But he immediately adds, "It may be invalidated by a case of fraud and ill conduct of the party; and if such a charge could be established, then indeed this bond would share the fate of the other unprofitable transactions connected with this vessel." A plain intimation that a bond tainted by fraud is even in the admiralty a totally void instrument. The fraud to which Lord Stowell alludes is undoubtedly a fraud on the owners, and in the present case, as all the facts were disclosed and explained, no fraud was attempted or intended on them. But in its original concoction, it was intended to operate as a fraud on the underwriters, who were ultimately to bear the loss; and in morals it certainly makes no difference, and ought to make none in law, whether the fraud was intended to affect the primary or the ultimate party who was to suffer by the loss. But even if the usurers are to be considered as third persons and strangers to the transaction, a bond is sometimes, even by the rigid rules of the common law, held to be void when it is intended to operate as a fraud on a third person, though it may be perfectly fair and unimpeachable between the parties. Such was the case of Boynton v. Hubbard, 7 Mass. 112. That action was on a post obit bond, and though the jury found that the transaction was fair and free from fraud between the parties, judgment was arrested, and the bond held to be void on principles of public policy applicable to such transactions, because it operated as a fraud on third persons. And it appears to me that such a bond as this, framed with a view of practising a fraud on underwriters, ought to be held void, though as between the immediate parties there is no fraud. It is easy for parties in foreign countries to make up accounts and find vouchers to sustain exaggerated losses, and it is difficult for underwriters to detect the fraud that is concealed under fabricated papers. They are obliged to increase their premiums on fair and honest ship owners to cover risks of this kind. And it seems to me when a bottomry creditor lends himself to a transaction of this kind, though he may not derive any direct profit from it himself, that a proper regard to the best interests of fair and honest trade as well as a due respect for commercial morality requires that the bond should be held to be void, and the creditor left to seek such other remedy for the amount justly due as his case admits. Under these views of the subject, I must pronounce against the bond. If I have come to a wrong conclusion, I am happy that my opinion is open to be reviewed by a higher court. But though the bond be void, this does not of necessity vitiate the consideration for which it was given, so far as it was meritorious. For repairs and supplies furnished the law gives a lien on the vessel without any instrument of hypothecation, which the creditor may enforce by process in rem. The counsel for the libellant has amended his libel by filing an allegation to meet this posture of the case, founded on the consideration, in which he claims the actual amount advanced for the repairs and supplies. This I have no doubt of his right to recover. In the account current which is supported by regular vouchers, this appears to be $3,683.38. But this being awarded on the hypothecation implied by law, does not carry maritime interest.

[NOTE. The claimant, Leonard B. Pratt, appealed to the circuit court, where the decree herein was reversed, and the libel dismissed. See The Ann C. Pratt, Case No. 409. Case No. 2,446.

CARRINGTON et al. v. BRENTS et al.

[1 McLean, 167.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. May Term, 1832.[2]

STATUTE OF FRAUDS — SUIT AGAINST INFANT—NOTICE—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—APPEARANCE.

1. A parol contract in Virginia, in 1787, for land in Kentucky, where the consideration was paid, was not void by the statute of frauds.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The courts of Virginia sanctioned the contract and decreed a conveyance, the vendor being a resident of that state.

[See note at end of case.]

3. In a suit against an infant, a notice should be served on him, and a guardian ad litem appointed by the court.

[Cited in O'Hara v. McConnell, 93 U. S. 152; Woolridge v. McKenna, 8 Fed. 669.]

4. But so far as the proceeding is only considered as having been examined by the party, and afforded notice of the title asserted, it is not important that the proceeding should be strictly regular.

5. That which puts the party on enquiry, is notice; but, in this case the notice is admitted.

[See note at end of case.]

6. A decree in Virginia cannot operate on the title to land in Kentucky. But having jurisdiction of the person, the court may enforce its decree. The statute of frauds in Kentucky, cannot operate on a contract made before the adoption of the statute.

7. A voluntary appearance after the revival of a suit, is a waiver of process. The doctrine of lis pendens applies only where the court has jurisdiction over the thing.

[In equity. Bill by Sarah Carrington and others, heirs of George Carrington, against William Caldwell, Isaac Caldwell and Samuel Brents.]

Mr. Wickliffe, for complainants. Mr. Munroe, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This bill has been filed to obtain a legal title to certain tracts of land claimed by the defendants. The complainants allege that at October term, 1817, in the county court of Halifax county, in the state of Virginia, Sarah Carrington, the complainant, as devisee of her husband, George Carrington, obtained a final decree against John R. Williams, heir at law of John Williams, deceased, for a conveyance of all the interest which was vested in him, as heir at law, to John Williams, for all the military lands held by him in the state of Kentucky. That the following tracts were embraced by this decree, to wit: one survey of a thousand acres in the county of Adair, near the town of Columbia, number 158. Three hundred and fifty acres on Beaver creek, in the county of Warren, No. 155. Five hundred acres situated on the same creek, No. 227. One thousand acres south of the Tennessee river, near the Iron banks, and one other thousand acres adjoining the lands of Gerault. For the title of these tracts of land the complainant states, her testator, in May, 1803, in the same court, obtained a decree against the said John R. Williams, who was then an infant, and that his guardian should make the conveyance. That in virtue of said decree, John B. Scott, as guardian, transferred to her testator the title to said lands. That afterwards, on the 18th March, 1820, John R. Williams having arrived at full age, executed deeds in due form for the above tracts of land. The bill further states, that after Williams had arrived at full age, he took an appeal from the decree above stated, to the superior court of chancery, which affirmed the decree of the inferior court. That with a full knowledge of the complainants' claim, the defendants purchased the lands above described of John R. Williams, and received from him such conveyance as he was able to make for the same; and that for a part of the land the legal title is vested in the defendants, and for a part they hold an apparent equitable title. And the complainants pray that the proper officer may be enjoined from issuing patents for the lands unpatented, and that the court would decree a conveyance of all title to the above lands, both legal and equitable, which may be vested in the defendants, to the complainants.

William Caldwell, in his answer, states that he purchased the thousand acres of land charged in the bill as lying in Adair county, from John R. Williams, for a full consideration, and received an assignment of the plat and certificate, and that on the 12th September, 1816, he obtained a patent for the same. He admits that before he made this purchase, he had been informed of the claim set up by the complainant for the land, but alleged that on enquiry, he believed it was not valid, as the contract existed only in parol, and could not, therefore, be enforced. He states that in the year 1818, he, Samuel Brents and Isaac Caldwell, purchased from John R. Williams the two thousand acre tracts of land named in the bill, west of the Tennessee river, and paid for them or agreed to pay a valuable consideration; and he denies that he had any other notice of the claim of the complainants, except as above stated. And he alleges that the deed from John R. Williams stated in the bill, was obtained by the complainants through fraud and oppression, by imprisoning the said Williams under the decree of the court referred to.

Isaac Caldwell, in his separate answer, admits the purchase of the two thousand acre tracts, in connection with Brents and William Caldwell, for which he paid or agreed to pay a valuable and adequate consideration. That before he made the purchase, he examined the decree against Williams, entered by the county court of Halifax in 1803; and on taking the advice of several counsellors, he was induced to make the purchase, under the full belief that the decree could not operate upon the title, or prevent the defendant, Williams, from making a valid conveyance of his right. He alleges that the deed set up by the complainants, was not made by Williams under the decree obtained against him, but was obtained from him fraudulently, through the procurement of the complainants.

In his answer, Samuel Brents states, that in August, 1815, and 5th January, 1818, he entered into contracts with Williams for eight hundred and fifty acres of the land in controversy, for which he paid a valuable consideration, and of which he is now in possession. He admits that in company with his co-defendants, he purchased the two thousand acres described. That before his purchases he had notice of the claim of Carrington; but as he considered it to be under an illegal and void contract, he did not regard it, nor the proceedings of the Virginia court referred to; as that court could give no decree which could operate on the lands in the state of Kentucky. All the defendants deny that any binding contract was ever made by John Williams, the ancestor of John R. Williams, for the sale of the lands in controversy to Carrington; and also deny that the decrees in Virginia, under the circumstances, embarrass their title; and they set up as a bar to the complainants' claim, the statute of frauds and perjuries.

In support of the bill, several records of the proceedings of the county court of Halifax, and of the superior court of chancery for the Lynchburg district, are read in evidence. The first one contains a proceeding in chancery before the county court of Halifax, in which the testator of the complainants was plaintiff, and John R. Williams, by his guardian was made defendant, and a final decree was entered against the defendant, that he should transfer by his guardian, to the complainant, the right descended to him from his ancestor, to the lands in dispute. The second shows a proceeding in chancery by Sarah Carrington, the devisee of her husband George, deceased, setting forth the original contract against John R. Williams, heir at law of his father, John Williams. In this second bill a reference is made to the first suit and the proceedings therein are made a part of the second suit. To this bill, the defendant having arrived at full age, filed his answer, and at October term, 1817, on a hearing of the bill, answer examinations of witnesses; and also the bill answer examinations of witnesses, in the former cause, a final decree was entered "that the defendant should forthwith assign to the plaintiff, in a proper and legal manner, the survey and other title papers in the original bill mentioned, so as to enable the plaintiff to obtain patents in her own name for the lands in the bill mentioned."

From this decree an appeal was taken to the superior court of chancery for the Lynchburg district, and the 19th May, 1818, the decree of the inferior court. was in all things affirmed. On the 19th October, 1819, the complainant again filed her bill in the superior court of chancery for the Lynchburg district, setting forth that during the pendency of the former suit, the defendant John R. Williams had obtained patents for the land embraced by the decree, and on demand refused to convey the title to the complainant, etc. And at term 1820, the court decreed that the defendant "do by proper deeds, convey to the plaintiff in fee simple, the several tracts of land in the bill mentioned, with warranty against himself and his heirs, and all persons claiming under him." In pursuance of this decree, Williams executed a conveyance the 18th March, 1820.

The contract between Williams and William Caldwell, for one thousand acres in Adair county, is in evidence, and bears date the 30th August, 1815. In this agreement there is the following condition: "And the said Williams agrees that said Caldwell shall not be bound to pay any further part of the consideration aforesaid, except what is this day paid, until he, the said Williams, shall settle the dispute between himself and the heirs and representatives of George Carrington, deceased, concerning the title of said land, and shall procure a clear title to the said land in his own name, and transfer the same to the said Caldwell, as set forth in the agreement." On the same day Williams entered into a written agreement by which he bound himself, whenever called on, if the claim of the said Carrington is not settled and removed from the land, to take such step for the security of the said William Caldwell, as himself and his agent may think best; as it is the fair understanding of the contract, that in case the said land should be taken from the said Caldwell, his heirs, etc., that the purchase money with interest is to be refunded."

The agreement between Williams, William and Isaac Caldwell, and Samuel Brents, bears date the 6th January, 1818; and in which Williams bound himself "to use due diligence in having extinguished and quieted the claims of George Carrington's heirs, etc., and the consideration was to be paid so soon as the above claims should be extinguished, and the said Williams was able to make a good title." In May, 1817, Isaac Caldwell wrote a letter to John R. Williams, from which it appears he had arrived from Virginia a short time before, and that while there he made arrangements for the further prosecution of the suit against Williams, with the view of reversing the decree; and in a postscript he says: "Use all diligence in your power to push the cause to a speedy and successful termination, that you may get your money, and we all rest in peace." On the 7th November following, Caldwell again wrote to Williams, urging him to prosecute an appeal, or writ of error to reverse the decree against him, and expressing a decided opinion that it was erroneous; and he advises Williams by no means to execute the decree. That if he should avoid doing this, he might secure to himself almost a fortune, whereas, if he were to execute the decree he would be answerable for the money he had received.

The will of George Carrington, duly authenticated, is exhibited in evidence, by the complainant, from which it appears that the complainant is his sole devisee. Sarah Carrington, the complainant, died after Isaac Caldwell filed his answer, and he has not answered the bill of revivor, which was filed by her legal representatives. No subpoena seems to have been served upon him, but publication has been made as a substitute for the process. It is objected that this proceeding is irregular and that the bill, as against Isaac Caldwell, must be dismissed. No rule of practice, it is contended, has authorized such a procedure, nor is it authorized by any statute of the state, if such statute could regulate the practice of this court. The object in giving notice to a defendant of the revival of a suit is to procure his appearance. If after the filing of the bill of revivor there be a voluntary appearance, the object is attained; and it would seem not to be essential that process should be served on him to compel him to do that which he has already done. No new facts are alleged in the bill of revivor, as it regards the merits of the controversy, and if in any such case the answer of the defendant be necessary, it can only be so to controvert the right of those in whose name the bill of revivor is filed. In this case the devisees of Sarah Carrington are identified by legal proof, and the defendant Isaac Caldwell appears by his counsel, and the whole merits of the case are investigated. It would seem therefore that the purposes of justice are answered, and by no possibility can any injury result to the defendant by considering his voluntary appearance as a waiver of process under the bill of revivor.

An objection is urged against the right to a decree on this bill, on the ground that the defendants claim under distinct titles and therefore they cannot be united in one suit. This would be a fatal objection if it were not obviated by a statutory provision of this state. Under this statute the complainant may file his bill against several defendants, though they claim under distinct titles, and have no common interest in the land in controversy. The right of the complainants to a decree is mainly rested upon the proceedings in chancery, and the deed which was executed by Williams under those proceedings. No attempt is made to establish the original contract between George Carrington and John Williams, by proof beyond what was before the chancery courts in Virginia, and which is certified in the records used in evidence. By this evidence the original contract was made in 1787 or 1788. Paul Carrington, the father of George, owned a tract of land in the county of Halifax, Virginia, called "Dry Branch," containing five hundred and ninety-six acres; the whole of which, at the close of the revolutionary war he gave to his son George, put him in possession, delivered to him the title papers and directed him to prepare a deed. In 1787 or 1788, Paul Carrington, at the instance of his son George, conveyed the above land to John Williams; in exchange for his military lands in Kentucky. Williams afterwards sold the Dry Branch tract to Camp for four hundred pounds. This was the original contract, as is satisfactorily proved by the evidence. In behalf of the defendants it is contended, that the doctrine of lis pendens has no application in the present case. That although the defendants may have had notice of the pendency and determination of the first suit, brought by Carrington in Halifax county, it can have no effect to prejudice their rights subsequently acquired. This suit, it is alleged, was a nullity, as it was brought against John R. Williams, while he was an infant, and no guardian ad litem was appointed, to defend the suit. That his mother who filed an answer as his guardian was not authorized to defend, not having been appointed for that purpose by the court; and that she was substituted for John B. Scott, who also answered, and against whom the decree was entered. That as it does not appear that he was the guardian of the defendant or authorized to appear for him, by appointment of the court, both the decree which was entered in the case and the consequent transfer by him, of the plats and certificates for the land in controversy are void; and had no effect to prejudice the right of the infant, or to charge the defendants who afterwards purchased, with notice.

It does not appear that in the above suit, process was served on the infant, nor that the guardian ad litem was appointed by the court, and for these omissions or errors in the proceedings the decree might be reversed, by an appellate court; but when the decree is used as matter of evidence, it cannot be disregarded or treated as a nullity. Much may be presumed in favor of the proceedings of a court, regularly constituted and which exercises a general jurisdiction; and especially after the lapse of many years. But this point does not seem to be material in the present enquiry. Whether the proceedings in the first suit were perfectly regular or not; whether they were erroneous or not, cannot be important, as the proceeding and the evidence which were examined by the defendants or might have been examined by them, as they had notice, in fact, of the pendency of the suit, and of the decree, was a sufficient notice of the equity asserted in the suit and sanctioned by the decree.

The doctrine of lis pendens does not apply in the case. To make the pendency of a suit notice, so as to affect the conscience of a purchaser, it is essential that the court have jurisdiction over the thing. 4 Fonbl. b. 2, c. 6, § 3, note n; Sorrell v. Carpenter, 2 P. Wms. 482; Worsley v. Earl of Scarborough, 3 Atk. 392; Bishop of Winchester v. Paine, 11 Ves. 194; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566. But in this case the courts in Virginia could make no order or decree which could operate upon the land in Kentucky. Having jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, they might well investigate the subject matter of the contract, but they could only reach the title to the land through the personal act of the defendant.

That the defendants had notice of the complainants' title is admitted in their answers, and it is also shown by the terms of the contracts for the land. In one purchase the whole of the consideration was reserved, and in another the greater part of it, until the final adjustment of this claim. And John R. Williams binds himself to return, with interest, the part of the purchase money, which he received, provided he should not be able to make a good title. These facts settle the question of notice. It was not only sufficient to put the defendants on enquiry, but they have guarded their interests by withholding the purchase money, and by an express obligation on the part of Williams, he is to refund, with interest, the money received. That part of the consideration paid, must be considered as having been paid, on the personal responsibility of Williams, on his failing to make a good title. The letters of Isaac Caldwell also show this fact.

But the main ground on which the right of the complainants is resisted is, that the contract was not reduced to writing, and it being for the sale of real estate, it is void by the statute of frauds. The statute of frauds of Kentucky, is relied on, but as this contract was made long before the state of Kentucky was organized, it is clear that no statute passed or adopted by Kentucky can operate upon the contract, if valid at the time it was made. That the contract was valid in Virginia is established by the judicial sanction which has been given to it. It has not only been sanctioned by the decree of the county court of Halifax, but by the superior court of chancery for the district; and a deed has been executed by Williams, which conforms to the laws of Kentucky, under the final decree. The original contract on the part of George Carrington was executed, by conveying to the ancestor of John R. Williams, the land in Virginia, which was given in exchange for the land in Kentucky named in the bill, and according to the well established rule in Virginia, took the contract out of the statute of frauds. It was not only in part performed by Carrington, but fully executed; so that it did not come within the statute by the rule established in England or in Virginia. And though a different rule be established in Kentucky, it can only operate on contracts made after the enactment of the Kentucky statute. It is therefore clear, whether the complainants proceed upon the original contract, as proved in the original records from Virginia; or on the decree of the superior court of chancery, in the Lynchburg district, as fixing the right of the complainants, that they are equally entitled to the aid of this court.

The facts of the case, connected with the action of the courts of chancery in Virginia, and the notice to the defendants, present a case for relief clear of all difficulty. The court will, therefore, decree that the defendants convey all their title and interest to the land in controversy, to the complainants.

This case was removed to the supreme court by an appeal, and the above decree was affirmed. 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 86.

[NOTE. Defendants appealed to the supreme court of the United States, which affirmed the decree of the circuit court, upon the grounds, as set forth in the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, that the exchange by John Williams of his military land for the Dry Branch tract was fully established by the testimony; that the complete execution of the contract on the part of George Carrington by conveying the Dry Branch tract to the vendee of John Williams supplied in law the want of a memorandum in writing, and that such construction of the statute of frauds by the courts of Virginia at the time the contract was made, the land then being within that state, formed the law of the contract, and the change of the law afterwards made in Kentucky could not affect the validity of the contract; and, furthermore, that the proof unequivocally showed that defendants had received notice of the contract made by Carrington with John Williams, and that, having, with the exception of Brents, purchased equitable titles, were bound to notice prior equities. REMOVAL—MOTION TO REMAND AFTER ISSUE JOINED.

An action was removed into this court, from a state court, as against two of the defendants, under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306). After the record of removal was filed in this court, the plaintiff pleaded anew, setting up, in his bill, the removal of the cause. After issue, the plaintiff moved to remand the cause to the state court, on the ground that it was not within the act. Held, that it was too late for the plaintiff to ask that the cause be remanded, on motion.

[See Davies v. Lathrop, 13 Fed. 565.]

[In equity. Bill by Daniel N. Carrington against the Florida Railroad Company and Albert A. Drake. The cause was removed from the state court by defendants, and plaintiff now moves to remand the same.]

John L. Hill, for plaintiff.

Edward N. Dickerson, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action was originally commenced in the supreme court of the state of New York, and is now upon the docket of this court, by virtue of proceedings taken to remove it, as against two of the defendants, from the state court to this court, in pursuance of the act of congress of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306). It now comes before the court upon a motion made by the plaintiff to remand the cause to the state court, upon the ground that it is of such a nature as not to be within the scope of the act of 1866, it being, however, admitted, that the defendants are citizens of another state.

It appears to me a sufficient answer to this motion to say, that it is made to appear, that, after the record of removal was filed in this court, the plaintiff pleaded anew in this court, and, in his bill, set up the removal of the cause into this court, as having been effected by the proceedings taken by these defendants, without any suggestion that the case was not removed, and properly so. The case is now at issue in this court, upon the plaintiff's bill filed here, and the answer and demurrer of the defendants; and it is too late now for the plaintiff to ask that the cause be remanded, on motion. The motion to remand is denied.

[NOTE. For the denial of a subsequent motion to dissolve an injunction granted by the state court, see next following case, No. 2,448.]

[9 Blatchf. 468.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. March 5, 1872.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — INJUNCTION PREVIOUSLY GRANTED BY STATE COURT — MOTION TO DISSOLVE.

Before the removal of a cause into this court, from a state court, as against two of the defendants, under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), an injunction was granted in it, by the state court, on a full hearing, on notice, against such defendants. After the removal, they moved, in this court, to dissolve the injunction, on the same papers on which it was granted. Held, that leave to make such motion must be applied for and obtained, before it could be made.

[In equity. Bill by Daniel N. Carrington against the Florida Railroad Company and Albert A. Drake. Defendants move to dissolve an injunction granted by the state court. For denial of prior motion to remand the cause to the state court, see Case No. 2,447, next preceding.]

John L. Hill, for plaintiff.

Edward N. Dickerson, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action was originally commenced in the supreme court of the state of New York. While the cause was before the state court, all the defendants having appeared therein, a motion for an injunction was made on the part of the plaintiff, which was opposed, on affidavits, by the defendants, and, after hearing all parties, the state court granted the injunction asked for by the plaintiff. Shortly after the decision of the state court upon the motion for an injunction, two of the defendants, who are citizens of another state, took proceedings under the act of congress of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), to have the cause, as to such defendants, removed into this court. By virtue of such proceedings, a record of removal was filed in this court, and the appearance of the said two defendants was here entered, whereupon the plaintiff pleaded anew in this court, in order to conform the proceedings to the chancery practice of the court. In this stage of the case, the defendants now move, in this court, to dissolve the injunction granted by the state court, and such motion is made upon the same papers upon which the injunction was granted by the state court.

I entertain no doubt of the power of this court, in a cause duly removed from the state court, to dissolve an injunction granted in the cause while it was in the state court. But I am of the opinion that, where it is desired to make a motion like the present, which is, in effect, an application for a re-argument of the motion made before the state court, leave to make such application should be first applied for and obtained.

The motion to dissolve the injunction is, therefore, denied, upon the ground that no leave to make the same had been previously obtained.

CARRINGTON v. FORD et al.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 231.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1832.

PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE—AMENDMENT—DISCHARGE OF BAIL.

1. A note signed "Ford & Chapman" (they being partners and joint contractors), and payable to the plaintiff, was held not to be admissible evidence to support an averment that the note was made by the defendants, their own handwriting being thereto subscribed (not charging them as partners), and payable to the plaintiff, "or order."

2. Bail will not be discharged, upon leave to amend the declaration, unless the amendment charges a cause of action different from that upon which bail was given.

3. An amendment conforming the declaration to the cause of action upon which bail was given will not authorize a discharge of the bail.

At law. The declaration charged that the defendants, not charging them as partners, made their promissory note, their own proper hand being thereto signed, and thereby, one day after date thereof, promised to pay to the plaintiff, "or order," $74.93 for value received by them. The note produced in evidence was signed "Ford & Chapman," in the handwriting of Chapman only; and was not payable to the plaintiff, "or order," as charged in the declaration.

Mr. Redin, for defendants, objected that the note was not signed by the defendants nor payable to the plaintiff, "or order."

THE COURT thought both objections fatal; but permitted the plaintiff to amend his declaration on payment of the costs of this term.

Mr. Redin then moved the court to exonerate the bail, and cited Wilson's Adm'r v. Berry [Case No. 17,791], in this court at May term, 1826; Hyer & Burdett v. Smith [Id. 6,979], at May term, 1829; 1 Chit. Pl. 246; Kerr v. Sheriff, 2 Bos. & P. 358; and Wilks v. Adcock, 8 Term R. 27.

Without the amendment the plaintiff would be nonsuited and the bail discharged. The note was filed before bail was given.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to discharge the bail.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, said, that the reason for discharging bail, upon amending the declaration, is, that it would be unjust to charge the bail upon a cause of action different from that upon which the bail was originally given; or where the amendment is of a defect existing at the time of entering bail and which would have defeated the plaintiff's action, but for such amendment. In the present case, the amendment prayed is to make the declaration conform to the original cause of action filed in court at the time of ruling bail and before the declaration was filed; not to cause a variance.

DEPOSITIONS—NOTICE OF TAKING—SERVICE ON ADVERSE PARTY.

The judiciary act, § 30 [1 Stat. 88], requires personal service on the adverse party, of the notice of taking a deposition; and service, by leaving a copy at his place of abode, is not sufficient.

[See Buddicum v. Kirk, 3 Cranch (7 U. S.) 293.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

This was an appeal by the libellant from a decree of the district court [case not reported] in a cause of personal damage.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. There is a preliminary question in this case, concerning the admissibility of the deposition of William A. Dahl. The commissioner certifies, that "the adverse party was notified, as appears by the notice hereto appended, but was not present." The notice to the respondent is in the usual form, and the officer's return thereon states that he served the notice "by leaving a copy of the same on board the bark Weybopel, lying at Constitution wharf, in Boston, where I was informed the within-named Stimson lodged." It was objected, that this was not proof of the notice required by law; and I am of that opinion. The deposition was taken under the thirtieth section of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 88), which contains the following proviso: "Provided that a notification from the magistrate before whom the deposition is to be taken, to the adverse party, to be present at the taking of the same, and to put interrogatories, if he think fit, be first made out and served on the adverse party or his attorney, as either may be nearest, if either is within one hundred miles of the place of caption," etc. The authority to take depositions under this act, has always been construed strictly. Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 351; Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 604. It must appear that every requisite has been complied with. One requisite is service of a notice on the adverse party, or his attorney, if either be within one hundred miles. This must be construed to require personal service; no substituted service, by leaving the copy at his dwelling-house or usual place of abode, being authorized by the act. Consequently, the service in this case was insufficient to authorize the taking of the deposition. There is also another objection to this notice, not mentioned at the bar. The notice contains the names of two other persons, but not of the witness whose deposition was taken. I have, therefore, excluded this deposition.

THE COURT then examined the evidence; and upon the same principles stated in the case of Barnett v. Luther [Case No. 1,025], affirmed the decree of the district court.

District Court, S. D. New York. July, 1867.

COLLISION IN CHESAPEAKE BAY — STEAMER AND SCHOONER MEETING—DUTY OF STEAMER — EVIDENCE.

1. Where a steamer and schooner meeting each other in Chesapeake bay, the schooner bound down the bay with a free wind, but, as she claimed, holding her course, and her course being to westward of that of the steamer, and the steamer, as the vessels approached, put her wheel hard aport and stopped and backed, but a collision occurred: Held, that it is the duty of steamers to give way to sailing vessels with a free wind, as well as those close hauled.

2. The vessels having seen each other several miles apart, the collision could only have occurred by gross fault on the part of one or both vessels.

3. The claim of the steamer that she stopped and backed when the schooner was nearly a mile off, bordered on absurdity.

4. Her claim that the schooner when nearly a mile to the westward of the steamer, and nearly abreast of her, suddenly starboarded and went to the eastward to cross the steamer's bows, was also unreasonable. The court was therefore compelled to discard the steamer's theory and accept that of the schooner, which was simple and consistent with one exception.

[Cited in The Excelsior, 12 Fed. 204.]

5. If the schooner was to the westward, and changed her course, as alleged by the steamer, then the order to stop and back the steamer was an error, and that on the other hand, if the schooner was nearly ahead, then the steamer should have starboarded instead of putting her helm hard aport.

6. Very little reliance could be placed upon the testimony of a witness who had contradicted himself on cross-examination, whether the discrepancies arose from forgetfulness, disingenuousness or dulness.

In admiralty. This was a suit by Wesley Egbert, master and part owner of the schooner Elijah Shedden, to recover the damages sustained by her in a collision with the steamer Carroll belonging to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., which occurred on the evening of the 21st of December, 1865. At about half-past seven o'clock that evening, the schooner was bound down Chesapeake bay, before a free wind with her sails wing and wing, at a speed of four or five miles an hour. When off, or a little above the Rappahanoc, she discovered a light which proved to be that of the steamer Carroll, bound up the bay. The vessels were then several miles apart and sailing on nearly opposite and parallel courses. They continued to approach each other until a collision took place, the steamer striking the schooner on her starboard side about twelve feet forward of her taffrail, and the latter sunk in five or six minutes. The weather was clear with a moderately fresh breeze. The steamer also discovered the schooner several miles off.

Three witnesses were examined by the libelants, and they substantially agreed in saying that they first discovered the bright light of the steamer two or two and a half points on their starboard bow, and as it drew nearer they discovered her green light; that the schooner continued her course without change, while the steamer approached, and, when two or three hundred yards from the schooner, suddenly ported her wheel, showing her red light, and struck the schooner as already stated; that the only movement attempted on the schooner was made by her captain after he saw the steamer had changed her course and was coming into the schooner, when he seized the wheel and attempted to throw it astarboard, but that it was too late; that the light of the steamer when first seen was four or five miles off, and that from that time to the collision was twelve or fifteen minutes. These witnesses insisted that from the time they first discovered the Carroll's light, down to the time she changed her course, she was to starboard of the course of the schooner.

On the part of the steamer there were examined, Lennan, her master, Fuller, the second mate, who was on the bridge, Thompson, a seaman, who was with him, and Peters, another seaman. Their claim was, that the schooner's light was seen a little on the steamer's port bow, whereupon the steamer's helm was put aport a little to show her red light; that the vessels then kept on till the schooner was from half a mile to a mile distant when it was discovered that the schooner had changed her course by starboarding her wheel, whereupon the captain of the steamer gave the order at once to put the wheel hard aport, and to stop and back, but the collision was then inevitable. The reason given by the captain of the steamer, for porting and backing at this time was to stop her way, and throw her bow to port, so as to let the schooner cross his bow if she could; that the action of her propeller, backing on a port helm has the effect to throw her bow to port, while backing on a starboard helm brings her bow to starboard.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for libellants.
John H. Platt, for compiainants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. After setting forth the testimony of the witnesses at some length, and saying that as the vessels saw each other when several miles apart, no collision could have occurred without great fault on one or both sides, proceeded as follows:

On one point the testimony of the witness Thompson, is confused and inconsistent. He repeats the statement that the steamer was stopped and backed as soon as the order to hard aport was given, which was when the vessels were a mile apart as near as he can judge. On the cross-examination he distinctly states that the steamer was not stopped and backed until a considerable portion of this mile had been run over, and that they were very close when this order was given. Very little reliance can be placed upon testimony of this character, whether such glaring discrepancies arise from forgetfulness, disingenuousness or dullness.

The impression derived from reading the first part of Peters' testimony is that the first order to port and then steady, was given when the schooner's green light was discovered, when, as he thinks, she was three-quarters of a mile or a mile from the steamer, and that the latter after falling off a point ran some little time before the order to hard a-port was given. But in the subsequent part of his statement he proceeds upon the idea that the first order to port was given when the schooner's light was first discovered, about four miles off. He says, however, that the order to stop and back was given immediately on the order to hard a-port. Captain Lennan, and Fuller, the second mate, confirm him on this point, and the former agrees that at that time the vessels were half or three-quarters of a mile apart; that is, on a diagonal line drawn from one to the other.

None of the witnesses for the claimants charge the schooner with changing her course from the time she was discovered till she had reached this point about three-quarters of a mile off from the steamer, when she showed her green light, and the steamer put her wheel hard a-port, and rang to stop and back.

Assuming, then, that the first change charged on the schooner was made as stated by the claimants' witnesses, let us see what must have been the relative positions of the vessels. They all agree in placing the schooner well to the westward or port of the track of the steamer when the former was discovered. They agree that no change took place till she had approached within about a mile. As they were both sailing on nearly parallel courses then, and the steamer immediately ported a point, and held that course, diverging from the track of the schooner for three or four minutes, it follows that the schooner, when she changed her course, must have been over a mile, or at least a full mile, to the westward of the steamer's course; in other words, she must have been off to the westward at least five points on the steamer's port bow, and drawing down abeam of her. Now if the schooner's helm had been put hard a-starboard at this point, giving her a course at right angles to that of the steamer, and the latter had kept on, it is very doubtful if a collision could have taken place. The Carroll was making greater speed than the schooner, and would in all probability have reached and passed the point of intersection before the schooner reached it. The distance the vessels had to travel was about equal. But it is not necessary to apply this test, for it is clear on the evidence in behalf of the Carroll, that, whatever change she then made, she did not hard a-starboard, thus approaching the steamer's track at right angles. This is plain from the fact insisted on that the steamer, as soon as the schooner changed, reversed her engine, and soon lost headway. Yet the schooner came down and struck the steamer's bows. It follows irresistibly that the schooner, from the point where her alleged change of direction took place, must have sailed on a diagonal line to the steamer's track; and had the latter kept her course, even without any change, she would have clearly passed the point of intersection before the schooner got there. Such a change of the schooner involved no risk of collision. Had the steamer kept on, the schooner would have passed under her stern with safety. On the Carroll's own showing, all she did to avert the collision was, when she saw the schooner coming toward her, to stop in her track and let the latter run down to her, and this she did when the schooner was three-quarters of a mile or a mile off! Viewing the evidence for the Carroll in any light in which I have been able to place it, I fail to see that it furnishes a satisfactory explanation of the collision, or one which either disproves that given by the schooner or vindicates the steamer. The theory of the latter is an impossible one, and the assertion that she stopped and backed when the schooner was nearly a mile off borders on absurdity. Equally unreasonable is the claim that the schooner, when off nearly a mile to the westward of the track of the steamer, and nearly down to her, suddenly starboarded and went to the eastward to cross her bows. The court is therefore compelled to discard the theory offered by the Carroll, and accept that of the schooner, which is simple and consistent, except that part of it which places the course of the steamer considerably to the westward of the track of the schooner.

It is useless to speculate on the subject, but it looks very much, in view of the evidence as a whole, as if these vessels approached each other nearly head and head for several miles, without any apprehension of danger, when the steamer, on discovering the schooner's green light, suddenly put her wheel hard a-port, under some mistake as to the relative positions of the vessels. This view of the courses of the vessels and their relative positions is strengthened by the statement of Thompson, who says that when he first discovered the schooner's red light, she bore nearly north, as he thinks; and by Peters, who states that when he saw the schooner's green light he thinks he saw her red light also. These two statements are consistent with the claim that the schooner made no change in her course. Whether the steamer was misled by some one of the numerous lights, which one of her witnesses says were ahead before she came up near the schooner, or whether the order to hard to port was inadvertently given on suddenly discovering that the schooner was near, it is impossible to say; but it is clear that if the schooner was to the westward, in the position assigned her by the steamer, when the former made her alleged change of course, then the order to hard a-port was correct; but the order to stop and back was an error, for had she kept on hard a-port, she would have cleared the schooner with perfect ease. If, on the other hand, the schooner's green light was nearly ahead, or a little on the Carroll's port bow, then the latter should have starboarded, for, according to the Carroll's own evidence, the schooner was nearly a mile distant, running on a starboard helm. The vessels would have then passed each to the left of the other.

But, as already intimated, the court is compelled to accept the theory of the libellant's witnesses, especially as to the course and management of the schooner; and as she did not, according to their statement, change her course, the steamer must be held in fault. It was her duty to take early measures and clear the schooner. It is now settled by the courts of this country that it is the duty of steamers to give way to sailing vessels with a free wind, as well as those close hauled.

Let a decree be entered for the libellant, with an order of reference to a commissioner to compute the damages.

A sale made by a trustee under a decree of the court will not pass the title of land in the actual adverse possession of a third person at the time of the decree.

At law.

Ejectment [by Richard Roe ex dem. Daniel Carroll, and of the Bank of Washington against Alfred R. Dowson] for lot No. 9, in the square No. 687, in the city of Washington. The plaintiff claimed under a demise from the Bank of Washington, and also from Daniel Carroll, of Duddington. The plaintiff gave in evidence, 1. A certificate of the original division of the square between the public and Mr. Carroll, by which the lot No. 9 was allotted to him. 2. A decree of this court, in the cause of G. Coombe v. D. Carroll, of D., for a sale of the lot, and a sale by the trustee to the Bank of Washington. The defendant showed that he was, at that time, in actual possession of the lot, holding it adversely to Mr. Carroll, who has received the whole purchase money due by the defendant for the lot. There had been no notice to Dawson to quit.

Mr. Marbury, for plaintiff.

Mr. Jones, for defendant.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion, that as the defendant held an actual adverse possession at the time of the decree for a transfer of the legal title from Mr. Carroll to the Bank of Washington, neither the demise by Mr. Carroll, nor that by the bank was a valid demise. The plaintiff became nonsuit.

CARROLL v. FINNAGAN et al.

[1 Cranch. C. C. 234.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1804.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—USE AND OCCUPATION—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

It seems, that in an action for use and occupation, the plaintiff can recover only for the time of the actual occupation, although there be a parol lease for a whole year at a certain rent, and the tenant voluntarily quits the premises during the year. The parol demise is only evidence, in such an action, of the rate at which the defendant is to be charged for the time of actual occupation.

Case, for use and occupation. A parol demise for a year from 1st November, 1802, at six hundred dollars per annum was proved. Defendants [Finnagan and Waters] quitted the house in February, 1803, because the chimneys smoked, so that their lodgers had determined to leave them.

Mason, for plaintiff, contended for the whole year's rent.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) were inclined to be of opinion that under this form of action the defendants were liable only for the time they actually occupied the house; and the statute 11 Geo. II. c. 19, § 14, only made the parol demise admissible as evidence of the rate at which the defendants should be charged for the time of actual occupation: The words of the statute being that: "Where the agreement is not by deed, it shall be lawful for the landlord to recover a reasonable satisfaction for the lands, etc., held or occupied by the defendant in an action on the case, for the use and occupation of what was held or enjoyed. And if in evidence on the trial of such action any parol demise, or any agreement (not being by deed) whereon a certain rent was reserved shall appear, the plaintiff in such action shall not therefore be nonsuited, but may make use thereof as an evidence of the quantum of the damages to be recovered." Verdict for the plaintiff, $290 only.

CARROLL v. GAMBRILL et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Sept. 1858.

PATENTS—CLAIM OF PRIOR INVENTION—ESTOPPEL—PUBLIC POLICY—ABANDONMENT—SALES PRIOR TO APPLICATION.

[1. One who recommends an invention to others, distributes circulars inviting inspection, and disclaims all interest therein or claim thereto, is thereafter precluded, on grounds of public policy, from claiming a priority of invention.]

[2. Such a claim would be likewise barred, within the principles of the patent laws, on the ground of abandonment.]

[3. Ignorance of the patentability of the invention would not aid him if the importance of the improvement was obvious and apparent from observation of its operation.]

[4. Section 7 of the patent act of 1839 (5 Stat. 354), providing that a patent shall be invalid where sales were made more than two years prior to the application therefor, refers to sales by the applicant or those claiming under him, and not to sales made by persons claiming prior invention.]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.]

[On interference. Controversy between David Carroll and H. N. Gambrill and S. F. Burgee as to priority of the invention for which letters patent No. 18,124, for self-stripping cotton cards, were issued to Gambrill and Burgee, September 1, 1857. The commissioner of patents decided against the claim of Carroll, and from that decision he appeals.]

Munn & Co., for appellant.

A. B. Stoughton, for appellees.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The invention claimed in this case, it is conceded, is the same for which a patent issued to the said H. N. Gambrill and S. F. Burgee, dated the 1st of September, 1857 (No. 18,124). The issue in this case involves the question whether the said David Carroll has a right to have a patent therefor by reason of priority. He dates his invention in August, 1856. The appellees show theirs to be in November of the same year; and that in the December next following they filed their caveat in the patent office. The parties took their proof according to the rules of said office, and thereupon (after hearing the parties) the commissioner decided against the claim of the said David Carroll, which decision, with the reasons of appeal, evidence, and all the original papers, has been duly laid before me on this appeal. The said parties appeared; and having laid before me their respective written arguments, the case was submitted; upon a careful examination whereof the ground upon which my opinion will be placed will be the evidence relating to the conduct of the appellant in connection with his own declarations and admissions or confessions. It will be unnecessary, therefore, to take a particular notice of any other parts of the reasons of appeal or of the report of the commissioner.

In November, 1856, the appellees' machine, with the new feature constituting the invention, the subject of controversy in this case, was put up and worked in their mill, situated about the distance of a mile from that of appellant's. During that time, and for some time before, there was a constant intercourse between the parties and their workmen, or some of them. They (the appellees) filed their caveat 22d December, 1856. In the following March they applied for their patent, which was allowed, but not then delivered, but was issued the 1st September, 1857. On the 1st June, 1857, the appellees issued their printed circular, inviting manufacturers to visit the Atlantic Delaine Mills, Providence, Rhode Island, to witness the operation of a section of said appellees' patented self-stripping cotton cards then in operation. In further description, the circular says: "These machines are very simple in their construction, and require much less care to operate them than cards constructed in the ordinary way; they require no labor, except what is necessary to supply them with material; will do as much work and of as good quality as four of the common kind of cards of corresponding width," &c., giving a further description. Some time before the middle of June, Mr. Carroll, having gone on to Providence, Rhode Island, visited said mills (the Atlantic Delaine), where the said card containing said new feature was in operation, (being the same claimed in this case as his invention,) distributed some of the said circulars, and commended the said card in very high terms. Being questioned whether he was interested, declared that he had no interest therein. He laid no claim to it as his invention. And so, in traveling throughout the manufacturing districts of the North, the witnesses prove he distributed the said printed circulars recommending to manufacturers to visit Providence and see Gambrill and Burgee's machines at the delaine mills, assuring them that they would not regret it; and to those who desired to know whether he was interested, constantly declared that he was not, which facts are proven by a number of witnesses, as will appear by reference to the proceedings, but most conclusively so by the letter of Mr. Carroll to H. N. Gambrill, dated 10th June, 1857, in which, among other things, he says he went to Willimantic; there (he says) "I found Jillson," etc. "I gave him your circular, and said all to him I could in favor of your card." From thence he went to Haden's and gave Haden a circular, and told him he (Carroll) was not interested in the card. When at Palmer, he told Mr. Brown that he ought to have "your [meaning Gambrill and Burgee's] card built." And so to Mr. Haden, he called it "your card." This is the very thing now in issue. (See the letter itself, an exhibit in the proceedings.) This conclusion, from these facts, it appears to me, shuts up Mr. Carroll from all claim for a patent for said invention. The rule of law which I take to be applicable is, that in a case like this, where admissions are made to induce others to act upon them, such admissions do not operate merely as presumptive evidence of the actual truth of the facts, which must give way to positive proof of the contrary, but precludes and, as it were, estops the party on grounds of policy. I think it is a bar also upon the principles of patent law, upon the ground of abandonment. This, I understand, would be conceded if the case would not fall within the exception or saving contained in one of the provisions of the act of congress of 1839 [5 Stat. 354], § 7. This exception, I think, would not apply to the case, being intended only for cases where the sale or license, &c., has been made by the applicant for a patent, or those claiming under him. This is not one of that class of cases.

The explanation offered as a defense—namely, ignorance—I do not think sustained. As to the fact of the feature, or the thing forming a part of the card as an important improvement, especially to a man skilled in such devices, it must have been plain and obvious; more especially is it to be reasonably supposed, as he was recommending the card as something new, and the invention said to be a simple one. But if not from the card itself, as stated in the circular, yet surely it must have been apparent to him when he saw it in operation. As to his not knowing whether it was patentable or not, the rule is that ignorance of the law does not excuse, especially in a matter of such little complication.

My opinion is that the decision of the commissioner is correct, and ought to be affirmed.

Case No. 2,455.

CARROLL et al. v. The LEATHERS.

[1 Newb. 432.][1]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. May, 1853.[2]

ADMIRALTY — RELEASE OF LIBELED VESSEL ON STIPULATION—RIGHTS OF SURETY — OF LIENORS —MATERIALS AND SUPPLIES—SUBROGATION.

1. Where a surety on a bond or stipulation given in the admiralty, pays the money in accordance with the decree of the court, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the original libelants; but he cannot be paid by preference out of the proceeds of the boat which has been sold under his execution, while there are liens already existing.

[Cited in The Madgie, 31 Fed. 928; Roberts v. The Huntsville, Case No. 11,904.]

2. The moment the boat was released upon a stipulation, from the custody of the law, she was also released from the lien in favor of the original libelants, and they could only have recourse upon the stipulation. The boat was at liberty to go where she might think proper, and quoad the claim of the original libelants, was at liberty to contract de novo, debts which might operate as liens in admiralty or under the local law.

3. The claimants of a boat libeled for salvage, upon giving a stipulation for her release from the custody of the law, take her cum onere, subject to pre-existing liabilities.

4. The surety on a stipulation who has paid money for his principal, can only be regarded as an ordinary creditor of the principal, upon whose personal credit he relied when he bound himself for the payment of the obligation. His right to be paid out of the proceeds of a boat which has been sold under his execution, must be regarded as subordinate to the claims of the interveners who have established their liens.

5. It is the surety's own fault if he fails to exact of his principal a separate stipulation to indemnify him against loss; and although the rules in admiralty are silent with regard to this form of stipulation, yet as a familiar and well established part of the civil law and general admiralty practice, the court would not hesitate upon the application of the surety to direct it to be given.

6. When supplies are furnished to a vessel in her home port, the validity of the liens must be determined by the local law; but when they have been furnished in a foreign port, or in the port of a state other than the one to which the vessel belongs, the liens are to be regarded as admiralty liens, which are unaffected by any limitations of the local law.

7. If A. hold a lien against a vessel for materials furnished, and the master request B. to pay the account of A., the lien originally held by the latter is not by such payment transferred to B., and he has no right of action in rem in the admiralty.

[In admiralty. Libel by D. R. Carroll, against the steamboat T. P. Leathers, R. W. Adams, and Relf and Villarubia, interveners.]

Durant & Hornor, for libelant Carroll.

Benjamin, Micou & Finney, for Relf and Villarubia, interveners.

McCALEB, District Judge. In the case of Montgomery v. The T. P. Leathers [Case No. 9,736], this court awarded a salvage compensation of $15,000, free from all costs and charges; and for this sum together with costs, making an aggregate amount of $15,334.60, an execution issued against the principal and surety on the bond, which was given by the claimants when they obtained the release of the boat from the custody of the law. The present libelant as surety, was compelled to pay into court the whole sum demanded under the execution, and upon the motion of his proctors was subrogated by an order of court to all the rights of the original libelants. He then applied for and obtained an execution against his co-sureties and the owners of the boat, which was levied upon to satisfy that proportion of the amount awarded to the original libelants, and due from her.

It is proper that I should state that the judgment in favor of the salvors, as it was entered by the clerk, so far as it gives a lien upon the boat, goes further than the law or the practice of the court will authorize. As soon as the stipulation was filed by claimants, and the boat released from custody, the lien in favor of the libelants was discharged. But as that judgment can only conclude those who were parties to the original suit, the clerical error committed in entering it upon the record, cannot be permitted to affect the interests of those engaged in the present controversy. The proper remedy, after the boat was released, was upon the bond or stipulation; and the record shows that this remedy was regularly pursued. Having paid the money as surety, D. R. Carroll could at once claim to be subrogated to the rights of the original libelants. This part of the proceedings, has been strongly attacked by the proctor of one of the intervening parties who asks to be paid in preference to the surety on the bond. It is contended that no such right of subrogation accrued to the surety, and that the sale of the boat under his execution was totally irregular. If this be so, then the intervener is in the act of asserting a claim by preference, to the proceeds of a sale, which he himself contends was made without the authority of law. But the order of subrogation was regular, and fully authorized by the jurisprudence of the admiralty tribunals, which are governed on this subject, not, as the proctor has contended, by the principles and rules which are administered in courts of equity, but by the well recognized doctrines of the civil law code. "The practice of the court," says Judge Ware, in Lane v. Townshend [Case No. 8,054], "is the law of the court, and in the absence of any authoritative decisions showing what that is on a particular point, we must resort to the general rules of admiralty practice, and the principles of that jurisprudence from which it is derived."

By the act of congress of 1789 [1 Stat. 93, § 2], regulating the practice of the courts, the forms and modes of proceeding in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, are directed to be "according to the course of the civil law;" and in that of 1792 [1 Stat. 276, § 2] they are ordered to be "according to the principles, rules and usages of the courts of admiralty as contradistinguished from courts of common law;" subject to such alterations as courts in their discretion should deem it expedient to make. The sections quoted by the learned proctor from 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (section 4996, etc.) show clearly the rules of the chancery courts; but in the same volume, section 500, we have presented to us in language not to be misunderstood, the far more liberal and comprehensive doctrine which pervades the Roman law in reference to this subject. Not only is the surety by that law entitled in such cases to the benefit of all the collateral securities taken by the creditor; but he is also entitled to be substituted as to the very debt itself, to the creditor, by way of cession or assignment. And upon payment of the debt by the surety, the debt is in favor of the surety, treated not so much as paid as sold; not as extinguished, but as transferred with all its obligatory force against the principal. After quoting at length from the Digest of Justinian the provisions of the Roman law, which support this view of the subject, Mr. Justice Story says: "We have here the doctrine distinctly put, the objection to it stated, and the ground upon which its solution depends, affirmed. The reasoning may seem a little artificial; but it has a deep foundation in natural justice. The same doctrine stands in substance approved in all the countries which derive their jurisprudence from the civil law." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 500; Dig. lib. 46, tit. 1, l. 17, 36; Poth. Pand. lib. 46, tit. 1, n. 46; 1 Dom. B. 3, tit. 1, § 3, arts. 6, 7. The Louisiana Code (article 2157) declares that "subrogation takes place of right for the benefit of him who, being bound with others or for others, for the payment of the debt, had an interest in discharging it."

Thus far then I have no hesitation in saying that the proceeding on behalf of the subrogated surety was regular and proper. But the question now to be determined is, can he be paid by preference out of the proceeds of the boat sold under his execution while there are liens already existing? After a very full examination of the questions discussed at the bar, I am of opinion that no such preference can be allowed. The order of subrogation gave him all the rights of the original libelants. But the moment the boat was released upon bond, she was also released from the lien in favor of the salvors, and they could only have recourse upon the bond. The boat was at liberty to go where she might think proper, and quoad the claim for salvage was perfectly free to contract obligations which would subject her de novo to liens in admiralty or to privileges under the laws of the state. Even as to liens existing prior to the filing of the libel for salvage, the claimants, upon giving a stipulation for her release from the custody of the law, received her, cum onere, subject to all such pre-existing liabilities. Conk. Adm. 770, 771; Ben. Adm. §§ 497, 447; 2 Mason, 57 [U. S. v. Sixteen Packages, Case No. 16,303]. The surety, therefore, can only be regarded in the light of an ordinary creditor of his principal, upon whose personal credit he relied, when he bound himself for the payment of the bond. His right to be paid out of the proceeds of the boat which has been sold under his execution, must be regarded as subordinate to the claims of the interveners, who have established their liens. If any injury shall eventually accrue to him in this case, the court can only express regret at its inability to relieve him. It is his own fault if he has failed to exact of his principal a separate stipulation to indemnify him against all loss. And although the rules are silent with regard to this form of stipulation, yet as a familiar and well established part of the civil law and general admiralty practice, the court would not have hesitated, upon his application, to direct it to be given. Conk. Adm. 462, 463. He has the same right to proceed against the boat which has been seized and sold in this case, as against any other property belonging to his principal; but it is the right of an ordinary, and not of a privileged creditor holding a lien.

I shall now proceed to consider the different claims of the intervening libelants. In reference to supplies, it is only necessary to state as a general principle, that where they have been furnished in the home port of the vessel, the validity of the liens must be determined by the local law. But where they have been furnished in a foreign port, or in the port of another state than the one to which the vessel belongs, the liens are to be regarded as admiralty liens which are unaffected by any limitations of the local law. The home port of this boat is Memphis in the state of Tennessee. The local law of that state (St. 1833, c. 35, § 1) gives a lien on steamboats for any debt contracted by the master, owner, agent or consignee, for any work done or materials or articles furnished for or towards the building, repairing, fitting, furnishing or equipping the same, and for wages due to the hands, provided suit shall be commenced therefor within three months from the time the work is finished, or materials, or articles are furnished, or the wages fall due. The supplies furnished in the port of Memphis will be tested by this law. Those furnished in the port of New Orleans, will be regarded as falling within the principles of the general maritime law. The lien they give is unaffected by the limitations of the local law as to the time within which the action is to be brought.

One of the claims asserted by Relf & Co., has been resisted upon the ground that it was for money not actually loaned to the master for the necessities of the vessel, but paid to Filkins and others for materials furnished and repairs done upon her by the authority of the master. The evidence shows that the account of Filkins and others was settled by Relf & Co., at the request of the master; and it is difficult to draw a distinction between a claim for money so paid and one arising from a direct loan to the master for the specific purposes to which the money was really appropriated. In either case, it would seem to be an advance of money for the necessities of the boat, made at the request of the agent legally authorized to contract for the materials and repairs. But the question arises, upon what principle of the maritime law can this court authorize the payment of the claim? It is money advanced for the necessities of a vessel in a foreign port, and the lender has failed to acquire a lien by taking a bottomry bond. The fair presumption then is, that he made the advance upon the personal credit of the master and owners. If the claim be grounded upon the law of the state, it must appear, that the money was lent to the master for the necessities of the boat during the last voyage. There is no evidence to show that the claim falls within the particular provision of the Code (article 3204, No. 7), which must be construed strictly. The court has no authority to substitute Relf & Co., in the place of Filkins and others, to whom the money was paid, so far as to transfer to them the lien which the latter held against the boat. I feel compelled, therefore, to reject this claim, and leave the interveners, Relf & Co., to their remedy against the master and owners. Harper v. New Brig [Case No. 6,090]. The claims will now be referred to Robert M. Lusher as commissioner in admiralty, to be arranged in accordance with this opinion, and to be presented in the form of a report which will serve as the basis of a final decree.

NOTE [from original report]. This decree was, on appeal to the circuit court, affirmed by Mr. Justice Campbell.

Case No. 2,456.

CARROLL v. PERRY et al.

[4 McLean, 25.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1845.

TAXATION — UNPATENTED LANDS — FEDERAL RESTRICTIONS—JURISDICTION AS TO ACTS OF STATE OFFICERS—POWER OF FEDERAL COURTS.

1. Lands purchased of the United States and paid for, though not patented, may be taxed by a state.

[Cited in Pacific Coast Mining & Milling Co. v. Spargo, 16 Fed. 350; Hamilton v. Southern Nev. Gold & Silver Min. Co., 33 Fed. 566.]

[See note at end of case.]

2. Property of every description, under the jurisdiction of a state, is subject to taxation.

3. On the exercise of this power, the federal government can interpose no restriction.

4. Stock of the United States is not taxable, as to tax it would be a tax on the means of the government.

5. The judiciary of the federal government can not, it would seem, exercise a revisory jurisdiction over the state officers, in the performance of their duty. But, if their acts be illegal, there is a remedy in the courts of the Union, as well as in courts of the state.

6. The judiciary, in the investigation of tax titles, can always exercise the necessary power to procure the records of the state, or certified copies therefrom, to show the proceedings in the sale of land for taxes.

[In equity. Bill by Charles H. Carroll against the treasurer of Monroe county.]

Mr. Romeyn, for complainant.

Wing, McClelland & Backus, for defendants

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an application for an injunction, to restrain the treasurer of the county of Monroe, in this state, from granting deeds or other conveyances of the real estate and premises described in the bill, belonging to the complainant, sold by the defendant, Perry, as treasurer of said county, for the taxes of the year 1837, on the ground—1st. That the fee simple in the lands described in the bill was, at the time of the assessment of said taxes, for the year 1837, in the United States, and not subject to taxation. 2d. That the proceedings of the respective officers making said assessment were irregular, defective, oppressive and void. 3d. That the said treasurer denied to the complainant's agent and attorney, access to the books and proceedings of said officers, showing the manner in which the assessments were made.

It is admitted, as insisted on by the complainant, that courts of equity will, in many cases, exercise a concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law; although such courts may adopt equitable principles. [City of Washington v. Pratt] 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 681; 2 Swanst. 580; [Armstrong v. Athens Co.] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 282; 5 Pet. Cond. R. 759, 752. A court of chancery has jurisdiction to set aside a conveyance which is a cloud upon the complainant's title; and may also interpose to prevent the giving of a conveyance, under the pretense of right, which would operate to embarrass the title to real estate. 5 Paige, 501; 2 Paige, 282; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 8-17; 17 Ves. 243. And the principle is also admitted that chancery may interpose by injunction to prevent an irremediable injury to real estate. This does not mean a mischief which shall destroy its value; but one which shall materially affect its value or use, and which, when done, cannot be repaired by an action for damages. Burnet v. Cincinnati, 3 Ohio, 87; 17 Ves. 110; 6 Johns. Ch. 497; 6 Paige, 88.

But what is the ground on which this application for an injunction is founded? It is assumed, that at the time the land was assessed for taxation, the fee was in the United States, and that, consequently, it was not liable to taxation. This position cannot be admitted. It imposes a limitation on state power, which does not come within the delegated powers of the federal government. In the admission of several of the western states into the Union, a compact was entered into, that the lands sold by the United States, within such states, should not be taxed until after the expiration of five years from the time of the sale. But no such compact is applicable to the case before us. The question arises on the point, whether a state has power to tax land, after it has been purchased and paid for by its citizens, before the emanation of the patent from the general government. To say that this has been done by perhaps all the western states, in which such lands have been situated, would not be conclusive, but it would afford strong evidence of what the law is. The taxing power of a state may reach everything within a state, which can be denominated property. It may be made to embrace all equitable credits, of whatever description they may be. No state, however, can tax the stock of the United States, held by its citizens, as that would tax the means of the general government. In the Virginia military lands in Ohio, lying between the Scioto and Little Miami rivers, the state has uniformly taxed entries and surveys, before the patent was issued. And the same thing has been done of lands purchased under the acts of congress.

The act of Michigan authorizes a tax on land not patented, where it has been entered and paid for. As evidence of this, the land offices were required to be examined, and a list made, by the assessor, of lands sold. The language of the act is general, and embraces such land. In law, land purchased and paid for, is considered as real estate, and descends to the heirs, and not to the executors and administrators. The principle contended for by the complainant, would materially affect the revenue of the state of Michigan. From the large amount of land sales, the patents are some years behind the sales; and if the land sold, could not be taxed until the title issued, it would postpone a considerable portion of the revenue of the state, while the owner of the land is in possession of it, and exercising his rights over it. There is also an insuperable objection to the revision by this court, in this form, of the irregularities of the state officers complained of. If the state had no jurisdiction, as in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738, this court might interpose. But in this case the court think the right of the state to tax the land is clear, and the question is, whether in such a case the federal courts can interpose and arrest the proceedings of the state officers in imposing and collecting its revenue. To say the least, such an interposition would be very embarrassing to state action, in a matter vital to its prosperity. But, in addition to this consideration, there is no imperious necessity which calls for such interference. If the law shall be disregarded, in divesting the title of the complainant, the conveyance will be held inoperative by the state as well as the federal tribunals. The question has been well settled, that to convey a good title under a tax sale, the law must be complied with, in all its essential requisites. This, then, will give an adequate remedy to the complainant, should the irregularities stated, have occurred, or be likely to occur.

And as to the third ground taken, "that the treasurer refused to permit an inspection of the books, to ascertain how the assessments had been made," whenever it shall become necessary to investigate such procedure judicially, means will be afforded to bring before the court all the evidence material in the case. Upon the whole, the bill is dismissed at the costs of the complainant.

[NOTE. In Carroll v. Safford, 3 How. (44 U. S.) 441, Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court, on the question of the taxability of unpatented lands for which the purchase price had been paid, said: "When the land was purchased and paid for, it was no longer the property of the United States, but of the purchaser. He held for it a final certificate, which could no more be canceled by the United States than a patent. * * * It is said the fee is not in the purchaser, but in the United States, until the patent shall be issued. This is so, technically, at law, but not in equity. The land in the hands of the purchaser is real estate, descends to his heirs, and does not go to his executors or administrators. In every legal and equitable aspect it is considered as belonging to the realty." And see the opinion by the same justice in Astrom v. Hammond, Case No. 596. In Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Prescott, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 603, Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion, says: "While we recognize the doctrine heretofore laid down by this court that lands sold by the United States may be taxed before they have parted with the legal title by issuing a patent, it is to be understood as applicable to cases where the right to the patent is complete, and the equitable title is fully vested in the party without anything more to be paid, or any act to be done going to the foundation of his right."]

LIEN OF JUDGMENT—EFFECT OF STATE STATUTES.

1. The effect of a judgment of a United States court, as a lien upon the lands of defendant, cannot be restricted by state statutes, or by the construction placed by the state courts upon such statutes.

2. A state statute requiring judgments to be enrolled in the county in which the lands to be affected lie, before they can become liens on real property, has no effect upon the lien of a judgment of a court of the United States. Such judgment becomes a lien on lands throughout the district in which it is recovered.

Hearing upon a bill in equity. This bill was filed by Messrs. Carroll & Hay against Watkins, as assignee in bankruptcy of J. B. Moore and others, to enforce their claim to priority of payment out of the assets in the assignee's hands. Carroll & Hay were commission merchants in New Orleans, and obtained judgment in the circuit court of the United States, sitting in the southern district of Mississippi, against Moore, who was formerly in business as a retail merchant. This judgment was never enrolled in the county in which Moore resided, and in which the property involved in this litigation was situated. After the rendition of this judgment, other creditors of Moore obtained judgments against him in the state court holden within Scott county, the county where Moore's residence and property was; and these judgments were duly enrolled pursuant to a law of the state prescribing that no judgment shall be a lien on lands unless enrolled in the county in which they lie. Soon after these judgments were perfected, Moore filed his petition in bankruptcy, and was declared a bankrupt. The defendant Watkins was appointed his assignee. Lands of Moore lying in Scott county were surrendered to him, and were sold by him under a decree of the district court in bankruptcy. Carroll & Hay then filed this bill or petition against the defendant Watkins, originally, claiming priority in payment out of the proceeds of the lands, on the ground that the judgment of the United States circuit court in their favor was a lien upon the lands in question. By agreement of parties, the other creditors, upon judgments recovered in the state court, applied to be and were admitted defendants. They claimed that the judgment in favor of Carroll & Hay never became a lien, because it was never enrolled in the county; and that their judgments, which were so enrolled, were liens, and were entitled to priority of payment, although junior in date.

William Yerger, for complainants.
A. Y. Harper, for rival creditors.

HILL, District Judge. This is a bill filed by the complainants against Watkins, assignee of Moore, praying that the lands surrendered by Moore shall be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of their judgment against Moore, recovered in the circuit court of the United States for said district. The other defendants filed their petitions, praying to be made parties to this cause; and that said lands be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of their judgments, obtained in the circuit court of this state for the county of Scott. The judgment of complainants was obtained prior to those of the defendants—the creditors in the judgments in Scott circuit court—but was not enrolled in the county of Scott, where the land is situated. The judgments in the Scott circuit court were duly enrolled in said county before Moore filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt.

The only question presented for decision is, whether or not the judgment of complainants, not being enrolled, constituted a lien on the lands described in the pleadings; if so, their judgment, being prior in date, must first be satisfied; and the residue, if any, applied to the payment of the judgments obtained in the Scott circuit court.

This is one of those vexed questions which occasionally arise between the national and state tribunals, and in which each claims the enforcement of rights emanating under the constitution and laws of the power of its own creation. In this state this conflict commenced with the case of Hamer v. Tarpley, 9 Smedes & M. 310, and continued by the case of Bonaffee v. Fisk, 13 Smedes & M. 682, and Brown v. Bacon, 27 Miss. 589; and in the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 760.

Were it conceded that the lien of judgments rendered in the federal courts depends upon the legislation of the state, or the construction given to it by the courts of the state, the controversy would be at an end. The judgment of complainants would have no effect as a lien upon the lands of the bankrupt, there being no evidence that an execution was ever issued and placed in the hands of the marshal to be levied. For in addition to the repeated decisions of the high court of errors and appeals of the state, the legislature, by the provisions of the Code of 1857, p. 525, art. 262, declare in express terms, that no judgment or decree rendered in any court of the United States, shall be a lien upon, or bind any property of the defendants situated out of the county in which said judgment or decree is rendered, until the plaintiff shall file in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of the county in which the property may be situated, an abstract of such judgment or decree, certified by the clerk of the court in which the same was rendered, containing the names of the parties to such judgment or decree, its amount, and the amount appearing to have been paid, if any, &c.

Then in article 263 of the same chapter, and on the same page, it is further provided that no judgment or decree rendered in any court of the United States shall be a lien upon or bind the property of the defendants in the county in which the judgment is rendered, unless the abstract of the judgment is filed and enrolled as provided in article 262. Thus it is seen that so far as the legislative will of the state and the judicial mind of the highest tribunal of the state can settle the quesion, it has been unmistakably done.

The same result would follow if this question were to be governed by section 34 of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 92], which provides that "the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

Having given the statutes and decisions of the courts of the state on this question, the next point of inquiry is to ascertain what is the law of the United States on this question, as settled by the courts thereof.

The only case decided by the supreme court of the United States, arising in this state, is the case of Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 760. In that case the judgment claimed as a lien was obtained in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district, on the first Monday in November, 1839, before the passage of the abstract act, as it was called, of 1841. This act restricted the judgment liens to cases in which an abstract of the judgment should be filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of the county in which the property was situated, and making its provisions apply to all cases in which judgments had already been rendered, unless the abstract should be filed on or before July 1, 1841. The main question decided was, did that act destroy or make void the lien created by the judgment rendered before its passage? The court held that it did not. The judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, states that the lien, if not an effect of the judgment, was inseparably connected with it, whether the lien was created by the execution and judgment or the statute; and in either case where the right has attached in the courts of the United States, a state has no power, by legislation or otherwise, to modify or impair it. It is true that Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the court, does say "that the point certified does not require us to consider whether the law can operate on a judgment being entered subsequent to its date;" but the whole reasoning given in the opinion goes to show that, had the question arisen on a subsequent judgment, the result would have been the same. The judgment lien in that case was held to grow out of the process act of 1828, that that act was not controlled by section 34 of the judiciary act of 1789. The process act of 1828 remains unchanged in the southern district of Mississippi. There has been no act of congress changing it, nor has there been any rule of court changing or in any way modifying it. The act of the legislature of this state, passed in 1834, making all judgments liens from their rendition, was in force when the process act of 1828 was passed by congress.

The opinion of the court further states "that the circuit courts of the United States exercise jurisdiction co-extensive with their respective districts, and it has never been supposed that by the process act of May 19, 1828 [4 Stat. 278],—which adopted the process and modes of proceeding in the state courts,—the jurisdiction of the circuit courts was restricted. The process and modes of proceeding in the state courts were adopted by congress in reference to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, and not with the view of limiting those courts."

In those states where the judgment or the execution of a state court creates a lien only within the county in which the judgment is entered, it has not been doubted that a similar proceeding in the circuit court of the United States would create a lien to the extent of its jurisdiction. This has been the practical construction of the power of the courts of the United States, whether the lien was held to be created by the issuing of process, or by express statute. Any other construction would materially affect, and, in some degree, subvert the judicial power of the Union. It would place suitors in the state courts in a much better condition than those in the federal courts. That the decisions of the supreme court of the United States give to judgments rendered in the federal courts a lien upon the property of the defendant whenever situated in the district in this state without enrollment, is admitted, in the opinion of the court, in the case of Brown v. Bacon, 27 Miss. 589. That the state legislature can pass no law binding on the courts of the United States, or giving effect to, or changing the judgments or decrees rendered therein, was distinctly settled by the supreme court of the United States as early as 1825. In the very able opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1, the chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this strong and pointed language: "That it has not an independent existence in the state legislature is, we think, one of those political axioms, an attempt to demonstrate which would be a waste of argument not to be excused." The proposition has not been advanced by counsel in this case, and will probably never be advanced. Its utter inadmissibility will at once be presented to the mind, if we imagine an act of the state legislature for the direct and sole purpose of regulating proceedings in the courts of the Union, or of their officers, in executing their judgments. No gentleman, we believe, will be so extravagant as to maintain the efficiency of such an act. It seems not much less extravagant to maintain that the practice of the federal courts and the conduct of their officers, can be indirectly regulated by state legislatures by an act professing to regulate the proceedings of the state courts, and the conduct of the officers who execute the process of those courts. It is a general rule that what cannot be done directly from defect of power, cannot be done indirectly."

In the case of Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 51, it is held that the act of the assembly of Kentucky, which prohibits the sale of property taken under executions, for less than three-fourths its appraised value, without the consent of the owner, does not apply to a venditioni exponas issued out of the circuit court of the United States for Kentucky. The question again came before the supreme court in 1862, in the case of Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 430, in which it is held that, under the process act of 1828, a decree of the district court of the United States, sitting in admiralty in the state of Ohio, is a lien upon the lands of the defendants. Justice Clifford, in delivering the opinion of the court, gives the following as the settled rules of that court: "That the states have no authority to control or regulate the proceedings in the courts of the United States, except so far as the state process acts are adopted by congress, or by the courts of the United States, under the authority of congress."

Other decisions made by the supreme court of the United States, bearing upon the question, might be cited, but it would extend this opinion to too great a length.

Almost the identical questions now presented came before the United States circuit court for the district of Indiana, at the May term, 1840. In that case the judgment, which was the foundation of the plaintiff's action of ejectment, was obtained at December term, 1827, of said court; no copy of the judgment was filed with the clerk of the county in which the real estate was situated, as required by the laws of Indiana. The defendant claimed title, under the sheriff's deed, upon a junior judgment in the state court of the county in which the real estate was situated, which, it was admitted, was a lien only as against plaintiff's title from the marshal under his judgment. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the court, held that, by force of the process act of 1828, a lien was created by the defendant's judgment, without any statute directly conferring it. That the act of 1831, of that state, limiting the liens of judgments to those rendered in the county in which the judgment was rendered, or in which a copy of the judgment was filed, could not annul or impair the lien created by the plaintiff's judgment, under and by force of the process act of 1828, and that the jurisdiction of the federal courts is co-extensive with the limits of the state of Indiana, and consequently the liens of its judgments extend throughout the state. From a careful examination of the decisions of the courts of the United States, I am satisfied that the holding is, that judgments or decrees rendered in the courts of the United States become liens on the property of the defendant situated in the district in which the judgment or decree is rendered, subject only to prior liens thereon, from the date of the rendition, without reference to any law of the state not adopted by congress, or the courts of the United States, under congressional authority.

I am further satisfied that such ruling is correct, upon principle, and whether satisfied of the correctness of the principle, or not, it being so settled by the supreme court of the United States, it is my duty to adopt it; and, so holding, must declare the complainants entitled to a prior lien on the lands stated in the bill, which will be sold as other lands under the rules of this court in like cases, and the proceeds, so far as necessary, applied, first, to the payment of complainant's judgment; and then, if any surplus shall remain, to the judgments obtained in the circuit courts of Scott county in their order of priority.

Decree accordingly.

REPLEVIN—GOODS DISTRAINED FOR PUBLIC DUES—MUNICIPAL TAXES.

The act of Maryland, 1785, c. 34, which forbids the replevin of goods distrained for public dues, is not applicable to the corporation taxes of the city of Washington.

At law. Replevin of personal property distrained for taxes due to the city of Washington.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Caldwell and Mr. Key, for defendant, objected that by the act of Maryland, 1785, c. 34, and 1790, c. 53, goods distrained for taxes cannot be replevied, and moved to quash the writ of replevin. The question is whether the law of Maryland is applicable to taxes imposed by the corporation of Washington on its inhabitants. They are within the same reason. In the case of Tayloe v. Varden [Case No. 13,771], at the last term of the court, the law of Maryland respecting sales for taxes was considered by both sides as in force.

Mr. Law and Mr. Jones, contrà. The act of Maryland of 1785, applies only to the state taxes of Maryland, and applies only to collectors of such taxes. It does not apply to county taxes; à fortiori not to corporation taxes. It applies only to collectors of arrearages of state taxes. So also the act of 1790. By the act of 1786, c. 12, the commissioners are to hear complaints of abuse of the power of distress. The act of Maryland did not apply to the corporation taxes of Baltimore or Annapolis.

F. S. Key, in reply. The law does not apply to the city of Annapolis. There never was a state tax in Maryland. The only taxes are county taxes, laid, and the collectors appointed by the levy court. The law applies to county collectors, and with the same reason to the city of Annapolis.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the act of Maryland did not apply to taxes laid by the corporation of Washington; and refused to quash the replevin.

REVENUE OFFICER—PROSECUTION IN STATE COURT FOR ACT DONE UNDER COLOR OF FEDERAL LAWS—PETITION FOR HABEAS CORPUS—SUFFICIENCY.

[1. Section 3 of the act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 633), providing for the removal of suits or prosecutions commenced in a state court against an officer of the United States, is not applicable to criminal indictments.]

[2. Where an internal revenue officer is confined under an indictment in the state courts for an offense alleged by him to have been committed under color of the laws of the United States, a petition by him for a writ of habeas corpus should be under the seventh section of the act authorizing the granting of the writ in such a case.]

[3. The burden of proof is on the petitioner to show justification for the act under the seventh section, and this he must fully and affirmatively do before the court can take jurisdiction to discharge him.]

[A prosecution for murder, in the criminal court of Baltimore city, was commenced against George M. Carson, customs inspector for the Baltimore district; and on November 6, 1873, he filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and for removal of the cause to the circuit court. The petition set forth that he was an officer of the United States, and that the offense with which he stood charged was done under color of the revenue laws of the United States, within the meaning of the act of March 2, 1833, § 3; 4 Stat. 633.

[There was a motion to dismiss the petition and remand the cause for want of jurisdiction.]

A. Stirling, Jr., Dist. Atty., for petitioner.
A. Geo. Knott, for state of Maryland.

BOND, Circuit Judge. We are of the opinion after consideration of the arguments presented in this cause that the third section of the act of congress of 1833, under which this petition is filed, is not applicable to criminal indictments. We are of opinion that the petitioner must file his petition under the seventh section of the act, alleging the fact that the act for which he is prosecuted and indicted was done in his capacity as an officer of the United States, and in pursuance of his duty as such, and in execution of the power with which he was clothed. Upon consideration of such petition, and proof of the facts alleged, the court would discharge the party, and, if satisfied the facts were not proven as alleged, would remand the prisoner to the state court for trial. This petition is not filed under the seventh, but under the third, section of the act of 1833; and, as we are of the opinion that this section applies only to civil causes, it must be dismissed and the cause remanded.

[A second petition, filed January 7, 1874, sought relief under the seventh section of the act of March 2, 1833. A writ of habeas corpus was granted, and on the return thereof the following opinion was delivered:]

BOND, Circuit Judge. From a consideration of the facts and the arguments of counsel in this case, while I am of opinion that the homicide for which this petitioner is in custody was accidental, yet, as the burden of proof in support of the facts alleged in his petition is upon the prisoner to show that justification which is contemplated by the seventh section of the act of 1833, I cannot satisfy myself that he has fully and affirmatively done so. This he must do before I have jurisdiction to discharge him, and I can only therefore now dismiss the petition.

BANKRUPTCY—CREDITOR BROUGHT IN AFTER FIRST MEETING—ASSIGNEE.

Where, after an assignee has been appointed, a creditor is added by an amendment of the bankrupt's schedules, no new meeting of creditors or choice of assignee is necessary. The creditor, when brought in, should be notified of the proceedings, and may petition the court for a removal of the assignee chosen if he has cause to do so.

[On certificate of register in bankruptcy.]

In this case an assignee was chosen on the 3d of March, 1871, and an assignment was executed on the 10th of March. On the 4th of April [James Carson] the bankrupt prayed leave to amend his schedules by adding the name of a creditor. Leave was granted, and on the 19th of April an amended schedule was filed. The register, on request of the bankrupt, certified to the court the question whether it became necessary to have a new meeting of creditors for the choice of an assignee. The register gave it as his opinion that it was not necessary to have a new meeting, or a new choice of assignee; that the creditor should be notified of the proceedings, and notified to prove his claim, if he desired; and that if he proved his claim he would have the right to petition the court for the removal of the assignee, if he desired.

in his deposition hereto annexed; and that in the course of said examination the questions arose which are stated in said examination; which questions are hereby, at the request of the parties, certified to the honorable, the judge of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York for his decision thereon. Isaac Dayton, Register.

Examination of George W. Carson and Melvin G. Hard, the bankrupts above named, taken pursuant to an order made in this bankruptcy court.

Melvin G. Hard, one of the bankrupts, appeared in person and by Mr. Boardman, his counsel.

The examining creditors appeared by Mr. Winslow. The witness, having testified that certain property belonged to his wife, was asked: 40. Q. Have either you or your wife ever talked of selling it? A. I don't know what she has talked about; I have not. 41. Q. Have you ever heard her speak of it? Objected to by counsel for the bankrupt. Answer insisted upon. Bankrupt declines to answer the question. Witness, having further testified as to the transfer of the property, was asked: 67. Q. Did your wife keep a bank account at that time? Objected to. Answer insisted upon. A. I decline to answer that question. The witness, having spoken of a horse and wagon being kept at a certain stable, was asked: 99. Q. Where were the horse and wagon taken to from that stable? Objected to. Answer insisted upon. The bankrupt declines to answer. The witness, having testified about the purchase of some lots, was asked: 229. Q. Did you recommend the purchases? Objected to. The bankrupt declines to answer. Witness, having testified that his brother carried on the paper business, was asked the following questions: 264. Q. How long has he carried on the paper business in Beekman street. Objected to. The bankrupt declines to answer. 265. Q. Is he the successor of Carson & Hard? Objected to. Answer insisted upon. The bankrupt declines to answer. 266. Q. What became of your business when you failed? A. It went into the hands of the assignees, William Binns and Samuel Bates. 267. Q. What did they do with it? Objected to. Answer insisted upon. The bankrupt declines to answer. 268. Q. Did they turn it over to A. P. Hard, and if so, when? Objected to. Answer insisted upon. The bankrupt declines to answer. 269. Q. Who, if any one, is the managing agent for A. P. Hard in New York? A. I act for him. 270. Q. How long have you acted for him? A. I could not say positive; six or seven years. 271. Q. Ever since he has had possession of that store? A. Yes. 272. Q. When was he in New York last? Objected to. Answer insisted upon. The bankrupt declined to answer. 273. Q. How frequently has A. P. Hard been in New York since he has carried on this business? Objected to. Answer insisted upon. The bankrupt declined to answer. 274. Q. State about what is the value of the stock in this business? Objected to. Answer insisted upon. The bankrupt declined to answer.

By Isaac Dayton, Register:

A statement of the opinion of the [register] as to the relevancy of the various questions in respect to which objections were taken, is given in the case of each objection as it arose in the course of the examination. The objection to the 41st question, does not in the judgment of the [register] admit of any discussion. As to the 67th question, the [register] is unable to perceive that it comes within the scope of the examination provided for by the 26th section of the bankrupt act, to inquire whether the "wife of a bankrupt kept a bank account." With respect to the 99th question, the opinion of the [register] is, that there is not anything disclosed by the examination thus far of the bankrupt to make it of any consequence to what place the horse and wagon were taken from the stable mentioned. The 264th question being objected to, nothing having appeared to show that the bankrupt was concerned in the business, carried on by A. P. Hard, it was immaterial how long he had carried on that business. But when by the 265th question, the bankrupt was asked whether A. P. Hard, was the successor of Cardon & Hard, this might relate to "the disposal of his property," by the bankrupt, and in the judgment of the [register] was within the scope of the statute. In the opinion of the [register] the bankrupt having testified that the business went into the hands of the assignees, the bankrupt cannot be called upon to answer what they did with it, or whether they turned it over to A. P. Hard, as inquired of him by questions 267 and 268. On the facts thus far disclosed, there is not in the opinion of the [register] any foundation laid for the inquiries made by questions 272, 273 and 274.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I think that question 41 is improper, and that questions 67, 99, 229, 264, 265, 267, 268, 272, 273 and 274 are proper.

MECHANICS' LIENS—RIGHTS OF LIENORS — EJECTMENT BY EQUITABLE OWNER—GROUND RENT.

1. Ejectment for the recovery of a building which had been purchased by the plaintiff at a sale made by the sheriff, under a lien, entered according to the act of assembly of Pennsylvania securing to mechanics and others the value of materials furnished for the erection of houses, &c.

2. A mechanic who has erected a building on the ground of another, under an agreement with the owner to convey the same on ground rent, becomes the equitable owner of the building, and within the provisions of the act of assembly.

3. A purchaser at a sheriff's sale, under a judgment for the lien, entered according to the law of Pennsylvania, of the equitable ownership, cannot maintain ejectment against the proprietor of the lot of ground on which the building stands.

[Cited in Cooper v. Galbraith, Case No. 3,193.]

The defendant entered into a contract with one Bartlet, for building three houses on lots belonging to the defendant in Philadelphia; during the building of which the defendant was to advance a certain sum. One of the houses was to be the defendant's, and the other two Bartlet's, upon a certain ground rent; and after the buildings were completed, the defendant was to convey to Bartlet. Bartlet purchased a quantity of the iron work used in the building of the houses, from the lessor of the plaintiff; which not having been paid for, the plaintiff obtained a judgment against him for the amount, and sued out an execution, upon which these houses, or one of them, was levied on, and sold to the lessor of the plaintiff, and was regularly conveyed to him by the sheriff. This ejectment was brought to recover possession of this property, under an act of assembly of Pennsylvania, in 1803; which declares, that every house thereafter built in the city of Philadelphia, or the liberties thereof, shall be subject to the payment, of the debts contracted by the owner or owners thereof for or by reason of any work done, or materials found and provided, by any brickmaker, &c., [enumerating the different workmen,] or by any other person employed in furnishing materials for the erecting such house, before any other lien, which originated subsequent to the commencement of said house; but if such house should not sell for a sum sufficient to pay all the demands for work and materials, the same shall be averaged, and the creditors paid in proportion; and it provides that no such debt shall remain a lien longer than two years from the commencement of the building, unless an action for the recovery thereof be instituted, or a claim filed within six months after performing the work, or furnishing the materials, in the office of the prothonotary of the county where the houses lie.

Wallace, for the defendant, moved to nonsuit the plaintiff, upon the ground that Bartlet was not the owner, the legal estate being in defendant; and consequently the materials were not furnished to the owner.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

BY THE COURT. Bartlet was entitled to the equitable estate under the agreement with the defendant, and might be as much the owner as if he had been the legal owner. If not the equitable owner, he was authorized to make the building, and might bind the defendant, who was owner.

To this last observation Wallace replied, that if Bartlet was the agent only, then the suit of the plaintiff to establish his demand should have been brought against defendant, instead of Bartlet.

THE COURT, however, on the first point, refused to nonsuit the plaintiff.

Wallace then moved for a nonsuit upon another point; viz. that Bartlet having only an equitable estate, the plaintiff could buy no other kind of estate under the sheriff's sale; and on such a title he could not maintain ejectment in this court.

BY THE COURT. Upon this ground the plaintiff must be called. Upon the lien alone it is admitted an ejectment will not lie. The plaintiff then must rely on the sheriff's deed. But that deed could convey no other or greater estate than Bartlet had, which was merely an equitable one; and such an estate is not sufficient to maintain an ejectment in this court.

The plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.

CARSON v. GORDEN.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 208;[1] 1 Cooke, 149.]

Circuit Court, D. Tennessee. 1812.

LAND—APPROPRIATION OF—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

An actual settlement and survey is necessary to constitute an appropriation of land.

The plaintiff produced in evidence an entry made upon a military warrant, the 10th day of May, 1809; a survey of the entry made the 9th day of August, 1809, and a grant thereon, dated the 8th day of January, 1811, covering the land in controversy. The defendant's was an occupant-claim, under the law of 1807; to support which, he produced a survey dated the 2d day of September, 1808; an entry made in pursuance of the survey, on the 1st day of December, 1810 [and a grant thereon, dated the 3d day of Dec., 1810].[2] It was admitted that the defendant lived within the bounds of both the claims; and that on the 12th day of September, 1807, he was seated on and in actual possession of the land in dispute.

Upon the trial, two questions were agitated—1. As the entry of the plaintiff was older than either the grant or entry of the defendant, whether the defendant's previous survey and right of occupancy had so appropriated the land that it could not be entered. 2. Whether the legislature of Tennessee had authority to pass the law of 1807, giving a preference to occcupants, as against claims founded upon military warrants.

The land lies within the military reservation.

Mr. Dickinson, for plaintiff.

Mr. Whiteside, for defendant.

M'NAIRY, District Judge (absent TODD, Circuit Justice). For the purpose of showing that the legislature of Tenneesee were unauthorized to pass the occupant law of 1807, the counsel for the lessors of the plaintiff have relied upon the cession act, which contains these words: "The lands laid off, or directed to be laid off, by any act or acts of the general assembly of this state, for the officers and soldiers thereof, their heirs and assigns respectively, shall be and enure to the use and benefit of said officers, their heirs and assigns respectively." Hayw. Rev. 165. It is contended that this clause in the cession act, connected with the compact between this state and North Carolina, prohibited this state from passing the act of 1807. The compact before alluded to authorizes the state of Tennessee to issue grants in such cases only as could have been done by North Carolina under the cession act. The compact also declares that in entering and obtaining titles to lands, no preference shall be given to the citizens of Tennessee over the citizens of any other state, claiming under North Carolina; "nor shall any occupancy or possession give preference in entering and obtaining titles, so as to injure or take away the right of any person claiming by entry, grant, or otherwise, under North Carolina."

The law of 1807 provides, that it shall be lawful for any person, who was seated on any vacant and ungranted land, on the 12th day of September, 1807, to have a preference for the term of two years to enter the same, provided such person caused it to be surveyed within nine months after the passing of the act, which was on the 2d day of December, in that year. I do not believe that the reservation of the land, in this section of country, can be considered alone as an appropriation. The lands still remain vacant, until the application of a warrant to some particular spot. The holder of a warrant has only a floating claim, and cannot be considered as having an appropriation, unless he goes on to designate by survey, etc., the locality of the particular tract he wishes to affix his warrant to. Under this view of the case I cannot but believe that the state of Tennessee had a right to pass the law in question.

The next question which occurs is, whether the survey and right of preference of the defendant so appropriated the land as to render it not liable to be entered by the plaintiff's military warrant. The entry laws, under which the plaintiff's entry was made, only authorize the entering of vacant and unappropriated land. When an actual settlement has been made in pursuance of the act of 1807, and the enterer has gone on to make a survey, I do not consider the land as being vacant, within the true sense and meaning of the entry laws. I am therefore of opinion that although the plaintiff has produced an entry, older in date than the entry of the defendant, yet as the defendant's right of preference existed, and his survey was made when the plaintiff had only a warrant, not located anywhere, the land was from thence no longer vacant, and consequently not subject to be entered by the plaintiff. Whether the entry of the plaintiff, under those circumstances, can be declared void in a court of law is perhaps doubtful. I am inclined to think it cannot. But this is not made a question in the cause. It seems to be admitted that if in any court this would be the result, a verdict at law may pass against him

Verdict for the defendant.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION OF THE DISTRICT COURT —LACHES.

1. The district court of Pennsylvania, exercising admiralty jurisdiction, cannot proceed against a captor, into whose hands the proceeds of the capture have never arrived; the same being in the hands of the officer of another court, in another state.

2. A court of admiralty can only proceed in rem, against the thing itself; or quasi in rem, against the proceeds thereof.

ing the thing, which is ordered to be restored, within its power.

4. The captured, who has omitted to enforce a decree of a superior court, reversing the decree of a court of admiralty; cannot claim, as damages, the loss he may have sustained, by a depreciation of the funds in which the proceeds of the capture may be invested. He should have applied to the court below, to enforce the decree of the court of appeals; and, omitting so to do, the loss will fall upon him.

[Cited in Baker v. Biddle, Case No. 764.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania.]

In admiralty. This was an appeal from the district court of Pennsylvania. A libel was filed in that court, by William Downing Jennings, late owner and proprietor of the sloop George, and her cargo; against Joseph Carson, one of the owners of the privateer, called the Addition. The original and supplemental libels state; that the George, with her cargo, being the property of the libellant, was, some time in August, 1778, on the high seas, captured, as prize, by the Addition, Moses Griffin, commander; was carried into New Jersey, where she was libelled, in the court of admiralty, and condemned; but, upon an appeal to the court of appeals, in prize causes, that sentence was reversed. The libel, in this cause, contains no specific prayer whatever; but Carson was arrested, and a monition was served on Griffin, the commander of the privateer. Carson, after pleading to the jurisdiction of the court, that this is not a prize court; and, that the jurisdiction of all questions of prize, as to vessels captured during the war, and carried into New Jersey, and the execution of all decrees arising therein, belonged to the court of admiralty of that state, and not to this court; and, further, that the other part owners should be made parties; answered: that, by the sentence of the court of admiralty of New Jersey, given 31st October, 1778, the George and her cargo were condemned as prize, and ordered to be sold, and the proceeds thereof paid over to the owners of the privateer; but, that no part of the proceeds ever was received by the owners, but remained, in money, ever since in the hands of the marshal of the court. Carson, after filing his answer, died; and the suit was revived against his executors; who plead to the jurisdiction of the court to hold plea of a tort, supposed to be committed by their testator. The district court overruled the plea to the jurisdiction of the court, objecting to its competency to determine on prize causes; and as to the question of the legality, equity, and propriety of the court's interference in the present suit, and all other questions, save that to the jurisdiction, the court dismissed the libel. [Case No. 7,281.] This decree was affirmed in the circuit court of Pennsylvania [unreported]; but, upon a writ of error, the supreme court reversed those decrees, so far as they decreed, that the district court had not jurisdiction to carry into effect, the decree of the court of appeals; and the cause was remanded to the district court;—the defendant in error being at liberty to contend, as matter of defence, on the merits, or to the form of proceeding, that the libel should first have been filed in the district court of New Jersey; but not to make the decision of the judges, on that point, a ground of exception to the jurisdiction of the district court of Pennsylvania. The cause, afterwards coming on in the district court, a decree was pronounced in favour of the libellants, for 33,910 dollars and 75 cents, and costs; being the amount, in specie, of the moneys paid to the marshal of New Jersey, according to the continental scale of depreciation, as established in that state; and interest thereon from the date of the decree of the court of admiralty, until two months after the reversal, and from the time of commencing this suit in the district court, to the final decree. [Case unreported.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. In the argument of this cause, many points were raised, and debated at considerable length. But, as it may be decided upon its real merits, I shall avoid giving any opinion upon the preliminary points. Whether the district court of this state can, under any circumstances, enforce against the owners of the privateer, residing here, the sentence of the old court of appeals, directed to the court of admiralty of New Jersey; the proceeds of the prize being then, and always afterwards, in the hands of the marshal of that court, under its order; and no part thereof having ever come to the possession of the owners of the privateer; is a great question, which it is not, perhaps, absolutely necessary to decide at this time. But, I shall not conceal the opinion I at present entertain, that the district court of this state cannot, in such a case, grant relief against the person of the owner. Prize causes are always in rem, against the vessel and cargo, or one of them; or quasi in rem against the proceeds, wherever they are. But, when the object of the libel is to execute the decree of the court, the proceedings of the court are limited by the decree, to be enforced against the thing directed to be restored.

I shall now consider the case upon its merits; and the question will be, whether, under the peculiar circumstances attending this, the appellees are entitled to relief against the owners of the privateer. At the threshold, we are at once struck with the antiquity of the demand. The sentence of the court of appeals was pronounced on the 23d of December, 1780, ordering restitution of the George, and her cargo, but without damages; and directing the admiralty court of New Jersey to issue all proper process for executing that sentence. The cause appears to have slept from that period until the year 1790; when it revived, in the form of a libel, for the value of the vessel and cargo; filed in the district court of Pennsylvania, against the owner of the privateer, and afterwards against the present appellants, his executors. The privateer, and her cargo, had been sold under an order of the court of admiralty of New Jersey, in the year 1778, and the proceeds remained in the hands of the marshal; or, at least, they were never called out by any order of that court. It was fairly asked by the appellants' counsel, why this delay had taken place? and, if no substantial injury had resulted to the appellants by the delay; it might have been well answered, that it was unimportant to account for it. But, the counsel for the appellees have endeavored to account for it, in a manner by no means satisfactory to me. They say, that the states of Pennsylvania and New Hampshire, denied the right of the old court of appeals to take cognizance, by way of appeal, of the decrees of the courts of admiralty of these states. Admit the fact; yet, it does not appear that this point was ever controverted by the state of New Jersey. It is true, that the representatives of that state in congress, voted against the exercise of this right, in the case of the sloop Active; but that vote was overruled by a majority of congress; and, I presume, the vote of the majority was submitted to. But, if the objection I am now considering, be attached to the substantial merits of the case, it is incumbent on the party who would repel it, to show, by clear proof, that an attempt had been made, to have the sentence of the court of appeals executed, by the admiralty court of New Jersey; or, that such an attempt would have been ineffectual. This is not stated in the record, and has only been mentioned in argument. I do not notice the objection with a view to a bar of the remedy, from length of time; but does it materially affect the interest and rights of the appellees? What would have been the situation of Carson, if an application had been made to the admiralty court of New Jersey, to execute the sentence of the court of appeals, as soon as it could have been done? Most clearly, the former would have directed the marshal to pay over the proceeds of the vessel and cargo, then remaining in his hands, to the appellees. If the money for which the vessel and cargo had been sold, had, in the meantime, been diminished in value by depreciation, could that court have gone into any calculations to ascertain the loss; and to fix it upon the shoulders of the captors? I think, clearly not. By what rule could they have graduated the scale of depreciation? Congress had established none at that time; nor do I know that the state of New Jersey had. The loss had resulted from the circumstances of the revolution; which it would have been as invidious, as it would have been mischievous and unpatriotic, for a court of justice to have admitted, as the consequences of depreciation. Besides, the duty of the court of admiralty was to execute the sentence of the court of appeals; not to new model, and totally to vary it, by decreeing damages, or, an additional sum, in nature of damages, against the captors; which the court of appeals, knowing of the sale, and consequently of the depreciation, had not thought proper to award.

The loss, then, by depreciation, took place either before the sentence of reversal, or afterwards. If before, it was a loss which the appellees must have borne; if they had, as it was their duty to do, applied to the court of admiralty, to carry the sentence of the court of appeals into execution. If so, can they by any act or omission of their own, shift the loss from their own shoulders to those of the appellants, who had no control over their actions? If the loss by depreciation happened afterwards, then the argument against the appellees is still stronger; because they might have obtained the money, of its then value at least; and it would be monstrous to contend, that they could claim all the subsequent loss from the captors, by neglecting to do what they not only might, but what it was their duty to have prevented. If a loss must be sustained by one of these parties, does it consist with the principles of equity, or even strict justice, that he who has caused it, shall fix it upon another; who neither caused it, nor had it in his power to have prevented it? For, it is to be remarked, that it was in the power of the appellees, at any time after the sentence of the court of appeals, to have compelled the payment of the proceeds of vessel and cargo; but the appellants could exercise no power whatever over the subject. It is therefore of no consequence, at what period the loss by depreciation took place. When I consider the object of this libel, as being to enforce execution of the sentence of the court of appeals; I view it in a light most favorable to the strict right of the appellees. The case is too entirely destitute of equity, to stand upon the ground of an original claim for damages.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that the decree of the district court should be reversed, and the libel dismissed with costs.

NOTE [from original report]. [From this decree libelants appealed, and] in February 1807, this decree was affirmed in the supreme court. [Jennings v. Carson] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 2. The supreme court of the United States determined, in this case; 1. That the district courts of the United States, as courts of admiralty jurisdiction, have authority to enforce a decree of the federal court of appeals. 2. The district courts of the United States, are courts of admiralty; and, as no law has regulated their practice, they proceed according to the general rules of the admiralty.

Case No. 2,465.

CARSON et al. v. MARINE INS. CO.

[2 Wash. C. C. 468.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Jan., 1811.

MARINE INSURANCE—TOTAL LOSS—RULE OF VALUE—OPEN POLICY—VALUED POLICY.

1. In case of a total loss, the insurer loses precisely as much as the property insured was worth at the time and place of shipping it, the expenses of lading included. What the property cost the assured, is not the rule of value, in adjusting the loss; but what it was worth, or would sell for, when shipped.

2. The invoice price is not a proper test of value.

[See note at end of case.]

3. In a valued policy, both the assurers and assured agree; and therefore the assured is excused from proving, at the trial, the amount of loss.

4. The rule for fixing the value of a vessel which has been lost, and which has been insured in an open policy, is to take the sum she was worth at the time of her departure, including certain expenses.

This was an agreed case, in which the only question submitted to the court was, whether, in case of a total loss of goods insured in an open policy, the invoice price, agreeing with the first cost, shall be taken as fixing the value, or, the current market price of similar goods at the time and place of shipping them; the latter being about 25 per cent. lower than the former.

Chauncey, for plaintiffs, relied upon the following cases: 2 Marsh. 620; Parker, 104, 406; 3 Caines, 43, 47; 1 Johns. Cas. 120.

Binney and Hopkinson [for defendants] relied on the case of Snell v. Delaware Ins. Co. [Case No. 13,137], considering, that there is no difference between an insurance on ship and cargo, in this respect; and they argued upon the unreasonableness of the opposite doctrine.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. It being admitted that there is no direct authority or custom in relation to a case precisely like the present it must be decided upon an attentive consideration of the nature of the contract of insurance. What is it? An agreement by the insurer, in consideration of a certain reward, to stand in the shoes of the insured, and to indemnify him for any loss which may happen to the thing insured, from certain perils enumerated in the policy. This is effected by paying him, in money, the value of the property at risk, with the expenses incurred in putting it on board, duties, &c. Suppose the property to be destroyed within an hour after the risk has commenced—and the time makes no difference in the principle—what does the owner lose? Precisely as much as it was worth, or would have commanded in market at the time and place it was shipped, including expenses, and no more. If the property cost him less than it was worth when shipped, he loses as well the first cost as the increased value, for which he is entitled to claim an indemnity from the insurer. If it cost him more, he loses the difference between the first cost and the diminished value when the property was shipped; but for this difference, he can have no claim for indemnity under the contract, because the loss did not result from any of the perils against which an indemnity was stipulated, but from an unprofitable speculation, anterior to, and unconnected with the contract. Those who have contended for the value at the first port of discharge, have had much more reason on their side than the law of insurance, as understood in most countries, has sanctioned; for they have fairly argued, that the owner has lost, by a peril insured against all that would have been gained by a successful termination of the voyage beyond the value of the property at the port where it was shipped. But this test of value is rejected, and perhaps rightly so, for the reasons assigned in the books. But it is impossible that the first cost can ever furnish a just rule of indemnity, where it exceeds or falls short of the actual value of the property when it is put at risk.

The invoice price, which was contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs, is liable to all the objections which exist against the prime cost—and to an additional one, which in the opinion of the court, cannot be surmounted. It furnishes no rule of indemnity, in any case where it exceeds, or is less than the market value of the article; if the former, the insured is more than indemnified, by receiving more than it was worth; if the latter, which it is presumed will seldom, if ever happen, his indemnity would be in part only. But the strong ground of objection to this rule for appreciating the value of the property at risk, is, that it substantially destroys all distinction between valued and open policies, and this too in the face of one of the best established rules of evidence. It makes a private document, created by one party to the contract evidence against the other, as to a fact which it is essential for the former to prove in the ordinary way. In the case of a valued policy, the insured is relieved from the necessity of proving the amount of his loss, because both parties have agreed that the property at risk was worth so much. But, to bind the insurer by the arbitrary value fixed in the invoice, is to subject him to ex parte evidence, furnished by his opponent in the cause, without his agreement, and even without his knowledge of its contents when the contract was entered into. And as it rarely happens, if ever, that an invoice does not accompany the cargo, it would follow, that all policies would in fact be valued; with this difference only, that what has hitherto been understood as valued policies, means nothing more than such as are valued by both parties, whereas open policies would be valued by one of the parties only. If neither the prime cost, nor the invoice price, can furnish a correct rule for estimating the value of the plaintiffs' indemnity, will both together answer the purpose? If they differ, neither can be admitted, if the preceding course of reasoning be right. If they agree, then the contention for a choice is merely a dispute about terms. But if either or both vary from the real value of the property insured, and consequently furnish no just rule of indemnity, then it is impossible that their agreement can furnish any. Marshall has strangely embarrassed this subject, by using as synonymous, terms which are substantially different. "In England," he observes, "the loss is estimated according to the prime cost—that is, the invoice price." If they should happen to be the same, or must always be so, it was unnecessary to multiply words, in order to inform us that either might be taken. If they differ, which they frequently may do, then the two expressions cannot mean the same thing; and he has omitted to state, in such a case, which is to govern. He is much more intelligible, when he states, that "the first price of a thing does not always afford a sure criterion to ascertain its true value, because it might have been bought very dear, or very cheap. The circumstances of time and place cause a continual variation in the price of things." Roccus is express upon the subject: "Where the contract," he observes, "is simply to pay the value of the goods in case of loss, the time of entering into the obligation is to be considered; and according to the then existing value, should the estimate be made. Thus," he adds, "the damage sustained by the assured in case of loss, is not considered a source of profit." The French rule seems to be the same; though in a valued policy, the insured is allowed to add the increased value between the prime cost and the market price. As to the rule of ascertaining the value of a ship, it is agreed on all hands, that the sum she was worth at the time of her departure, including certain expenses, is to govern; and the court can perceive no reason for establishing this rule, which does not apply to the case of goods.

Upon the whole, it is the decided opinion of the court, that judgment in this case must be rendered according to the market price of the property insured, at the time and place of exportation.

[NOTE. Mr. Justice Washington, in Snell v. Delaware Ins. Co., Case No. 13,137, instructed the jury, in substance, as follows: While the prime or invoice cost may in most cases furnish prima facie a very proper criterion of value, it is not conclusive. The actual value which may vary from the invoice or prime cost should be ascertained and determined, and, when so ascertained, will form the measure of damage which the assured is entitled to recover on an open policy.]

Case No. 2,466.

CARSON v. ROBERTSON et al.

[Chase, 475;[1] 2 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 116.]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. Aug., 1869.[2]

NECESSARY PARTIES—WHO ARE — OBJECTION FOR WANT OF, WHEN SHOULD BE TAKEN.

1. The objection of the want of parties may be taken at any time in the progress of a cause, even in the appellate court.

2. It will be disregarded whenever taken, if it appears that the parties are not necessary, or if although convenient and under some circumstances necessary, they can not be made without depriving the court of jurisdiction.

3. On the other hand if it appears that no final decree can be made without material prejudice to the interests of parties not before the court, the court will not proceed without them, even though such parties are beyond the reach of its process, or can not be made without ousting the jurisdiction.

4. In applying these rules, however, the courts of the United States are always careful to see, that no citizen of a state, other than that in which the defendants reside, shall invoke their jurisdiction in vain, unless it is obviously impossible to protect the interests of the absent parties in their decrees.

5. They will strain a point in favor of the constitutional right of citizens of the United States to sue the citizens of the other states in the courts of the United States. It is a right too clear and too important to be lightly disregarded.

6. One of a firm of several partners purchased, with the firm funds, land, substantially for the firm, but the conveyance was taken in his name and that of one of the other members in trust, for whatever use those two, or the survivor of them, might declare, and until then to the use of all the partners. These two made a mortgage upon the land, to secure a sum of money to a third. In a suit to vacate the whole transaction by the parties who owned the land before its sale, held, that the partner who had actively managed the affairs, being one of those to whom the conveyance was made, was the only necessary party, the other parties being non-resident.

In August, 1856, W. A. Carson died in South Carolina, leaving a large amount of property, real and personal, in that state. By his will he appointed the defendants, Alexander Robertson and John F. Blacklock, executors thereof, directed them to sell, with small exceptions, all his property as soon as and upon the terms they deemed judicious, to pay his debts out of the proceeds, to divide the balance of the proceeds into three equal parts, and to hold in trust one-third part for his son, William Carson, another third part for his son, James Petigru Carson; and the remaining third part for his widow [Caroline Carson], the complainant, during her life, and after her death for his two sons. Both executors qualified; about the beginning of 1857 had sold all the property, paid the debts, divided the proceeds into three equal parts, and became the joint holders in trust of one such part for each of the three said legatees. For William Carson they held a bond of E. N. Ball, the defendant, for nine thousand dollars, and one-third of another bond of E. N. Ball for four thousand dollars; for J. P. Carson, a bond of E. N. Ball for nine thousand dollars, and one-third of the said bond of E. N. Ball for four thousand dollars; for the complainant a bond of E. N. Ball for nine thousand dollars, and one-third of the said bond of E. N. Ball for four thousand dollars. The said bonds, executed to the executors, and amounting in the aggregate to thirty-one thousand dollars, were secured by E. N. Ball's mortgage to the two executors, of Dean Hall plantation, which was the testator's property, and had been sold to E. N. Ball for fifty thousand dollars. These bonds and the mortgage were given to the executors to secure the unpaid portion of the purchase money of Dean Hall. Both executors joined in the conveyance to E. N. Ball. The executors also held for each legatee a joint and several bond of E. N. Ball, and the defendant, W. J. Ball, for eleven thousand dollars, each bond being executed to both executors.

Since the early part of 1861, the complainant has resided in New York, and William Carson in Europe or New York. Mr. Blacklock was in Europe during the whole period of the war. In March, 1863, the defendant, McBurney, entered into a treaty with E. N. Ball for the purchase of Dean Hall for one hundred thousand dollars of Confederate treasury notes, and advanced in his own name, or for those he represented, a certain amount of those notes to E. N. Ball, to enable him to get his said bonds and mortgage satisfied by Robertson. Robertson was the only one of the trustees then in the Confederacy. The complainant and William Carson were beyond the limits of the Confederacy, and had no communication with Robertson after the outbreak of the war. William and James P. Carson were both under age. Mr. Blacklock was abroad, and could not be consulted. Mr. Robertson acceded to the proposition of E. N. Ball, and for an amount of the Confederate notes of the nominal value of the bonds and mortgage, surrendered them, and entered satisfaction on the mortgage. The market value of the mortgage bonds was much greater than their nominal value in Confederate notes. These notes could not have been used at the time by either the complainant or William Carson. E. N. Ball, in pursuance of his treaty, subsequently, viz., in April, 1863, conveyed Dean Hall to McBurney and his nominees. McBurney had notice that the bonds and the mortgage of Dean Hall were in the name of both Robertson and Blacklock, and that they held them in a fiduciary character. The complainant always repudiated the transaction. When the sons came of age, they did so. Mr. Blacklock also repudiated it.

The bill alleged the insolvency of Robertson and Blacklock, and the fact was not specially denied in their answers: The defendant McBurney set up by way of defense the following state of facts: In March, 1863, after some negotiations looking to that result, E. N. Ball sold said tract and conveyed it to McBurney and A. L. Gillespie. The land was paid for out of the partnership funds, the firm being composed of McBurney, Gillespie, Hyatt, Hazeltine, and McGhan. The land was conveyed to the first two, and to the survivor, and to the heirs and assigns of such survivor forever, but to and for such uses as those two or the survivor of them should appoint by deed, and until such appointment, to the use of the different members of the firm, naming them. On May 31, Hyatt sold his interest in the firm to the other partners, and took their bond for forty thousand dollars for it, and McBurney and Gillespie executed a deed in the nature of a mortgage upon said tract, to secure it, but before this mortgage was executed Hyatt released all his interest in the land to the other partners. At the time this suit was instituted, Hyatt was a citizen of New York; Hazeltine was resident in England; Gillespie, after the filing of the bill, removed to New York to live, and Ball, before filing the bill, was a non-resident, and had become bankrupt.

Magrath & Lowndes, for complainant.—The complainant relied on the following principles:

I. The courts of the United States are exceptionally liberal in dealing with the question of parties. Hallett v. Hallett, 2 Paige, 17; Mallow v. Hinde, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 198; Eberly v. Moore, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 158.

II. In pursuance of this policy the courts of the United States hold that where a party not before the court is not an inhabitant of or found within the district where the suit is brought, the court will proceed without such party, unless he is an indispensable party, or one whose rights are necessarily affected by the decree.

The sources of this rule are: 1. The act of 1839. 1 Brightly, 15. 2. The 22d and 47th rules in equity. See Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 149, and cases there collected; Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 431.

I. Robertson & Blacklock, being co-trustees, the act of Robertson, who alone satisfied the mortgages, and whose act in so doing has been repudiated by Blacklock, did not discharge the mortgages in equity, even if it did at law, and the cestui que trust is in the same position as if no act affecting the mortgage had been done. It is assumed here (what will be shown later in this argument) that when Robertson entered satisfaction upon Ball's mortgage, Robertson & Blacklock held the mortgage as trustees. The language of the will of W. A. Carson plainly made them joint-trustees. Whether, at law, the act of Robertson discharged the mortgage, is very doubtful. There is no case in South Carolina sustaining such a discharge. In England the legal title would clearly not have passed. Even since the act of 1791 (5 Stat. 169), there has been so far a legal estate in the mortgagee, that he can recover the land after condition broken against any one but the mortgagor in possession (Mitchell v. Bogan, 11 Rich. Law, 688), and that a release to him of the equity of redemption vests in him the legal title (5 Stat. 311). The act of 1791 is to be construed strictly, and not as destroying any of the incidents of the mortgagee's estate, save those in conflict with the purpose of the act. Such is the spirit of the statute just cited. There is no ground for saying that the method of satisfying mortgages is affected by the act of 1791. The interest of the mortgagee is at least of as high a character as the interest of the holders of a chattel real, in which there is an estate, and of which the title can not pass by the act of one of two or more holders. 2 Kent, Comm. (Ed. 1851) 211, note. But whether or not there was a discharge of Ball's mortgage at law, it was not discharged in equity. Both of the joint-trustees must have concurred in the satisfaction entered. "Where the administration of the trust is vested in co-trustees, they all form, as it were, one collective trustee, and, therefore, must execute the duties of the office in their joint capacity." Lewin, Trusts, 297. "Where stock is standing in the name of the several co-trustees, any one may receive the dividends, though all must join in the sale of the coupons; and where they are co-trustees of lands, any one of them may receive the rents, though all must concur in conveyance." Id. 299. "As a general rule, trustees must all join in any sale, lease, or other disposition of the trust property, and also in receipt for money payable to them in respect of their office." Hill, Trustees, 307. "If a trustee refuses to join, it is not competent for the others to proceed without him, but the administration of the trust devolves upon the court." Lewin, Trusts, 298. "Where an account is opened at a banker's, in the name of two or more trustees, it is in their power to require that the checks should be signed by all or any one or more of their number. In strictness it is the duty of trustees to require that the check should bear the joint signature of all the trustees." Hill, Trustees, 308. "Where there is a trust for sale, the receipt must be signed by all the trustees who have undertaken to act. And where a power is given to trustees to discharge the purchaser from seeing to the application of the purchase money, the receipt must be signed even by a trustee who has parted with the estate by a conveyance to his co-trustee, for a transfer of the estate at law carries not along with it the confidence in equity." Lewin, Trusts, 448. "A trustee who has once acted in or accepted a trust, and has not been properly discharged from it, must join with the other trustees in the receipts to purchasers or other persons requiring a discharge for the payment of trust money. And it is immaterial that he has parted with the possession of the legal estate." Hill, Trustees, 307; Sugd. Vend. 50. "If the court is of the opinion that the trust was joint, then the execution is imperfect, and the court will refuse to enforce it." Mayrant v. Guignard, 3 Strob. Eq. 128. Such being the law, what is the state of facts to which it is to be applied? Robertson and Blacklock were named co-executors and co-trustees by Mr. Carson's will. They joined in the conveyance to Ball. Ball's bond and mortgage were to them jointly. In the absence of Mr. Blacklock in Europe, and in a time of war, when intercourse with Europe was precarious, McBurney and E. M. Ball, ignoring Mr. Blacklock entirely, negotiate with Robertson alone, deliver the consideration of the discharge to him alone, and get only his satisfaction on the mortgage. The right which the cestui que trust has to the benefit of the concurrence of two trustees in any act of such importance to her is ignored. Mr. Blacklock does nothing which amounts to acquiescence in the conduct of his co-trustee, and now, before the court, repudiates the transaction. Under these circumstances, the discharge of the mortgages and bonds is not such as equity will respect. The purchaser took with full notice of the trust and the breach of it, and against him equity will enforce the mortgage, either at the suit of the other trustee (Lewin, Trusts, 317) or of the cestui que trust. It is no answer to say that the bonds were paid, and the security is, therefore, discharged as a legal consequence of payment. There is no payment set up, but simply an exchange for Confederate treasury notes. The power given by Mr. Carson's will to one executor was given in the event that only one qualified. Both Robertson and Blacklock having qualified, no question arises under that clause of the will.

II. The act of Robertson was in other respects in breach of his trust, and the purchaser, who not only had full notice of the trust, but assisted in the breach of it, can not hold the estate against the cestui que trust. It is necessary to determine the relation in which Robertson, or Robertson and Blacklock, stood to the estate, and to apply the rules by which equity measures their conduct in that relation.

1. It is submitted that they were trustees; that as such trustees they possessed no special powers, but only the general powers attaching to trustees; that as such trustees it was a breach of trust in them, or either of them, to release the mortgages of Ball without payment of the bonds they secured. Robertson and Blacklock were named in the will of W. A. Carson both executors and trustees. What is the rule to determine the capacity in which they were acting at the time in question? "Where the right of receiving a fund as guardian, and the duty of paying it as trustee unite in the same person, the law presumes a performance of the duty, and without further proof a surety of the person as guardian is liable." Gray v. Brown, 1 Rich. Law, 351. "When the right to receive and the duty to pay absolutely concur, there can be no election." Id. 363. "Where an administrator has in his hands the balance of an estate, and is afterwards appointed the guardian of infants entitled to the estate, he will be chargeable as guardian." O'Neall v. Herbert, McMul. Eq. 495. "A debt due by an administrator to his intestate's estate is assets in his hands; and if the administrator of an estate becomes also the administrator of one of the distributees, his liability for the distributive share of the latter in the estate of the former attaches upon his second administration." Schnell v. Schroder, Bailey, Eq. 328. See, also, Taylor v. Deblois [Case No. 13,790]. When a fund is given to a person upon certain trusts and he is appointed executor, as soon as he has severed the legacy from the general assets and appropriated it to the specific purpose, he dismisses the character of executor and assumes that of trustee. Phillipo v. Munnings, 2 Mylne & C. 309; Byrchall v. Bradford, 6 Madd. 13, 235; Ex parte Dover, 5 Sim. 500; Hill, Trustees, 237, 364; Lewin, Trusts, 246.

Robertson and Blacklock had, at the time of the sale to McBurney, and long before, performed all their duties as executors of Mr. Carson's will, and the legal presumption that they had transferred the assets to themselves, as trustees, attached. Mr. Robertson says, in his answer, that towards the close of the year 1856 and the beginning of 1857, the executors sold out the entire estate of W. A. Carson, and paid the debts due by him, and held the balance in trust for the purposes of the will. Again, he states in his answer that they held distinct portions of the balance for the several legatees. Mr. Blacklock confirms this statement. In the ordinary's account, filed with the bill, they name themselves trustees. Those accounts show that the estate had been completely settled. It will be difficult for the defendants to show any purpose for which the estate of the executors should be held to have existed in 1863. The onus of rebutting the presumption of law as to the extinguishment of that estate lies upon the defendant. In all the cases cited, the presumption was upheld against third parties. But it is not necessary to resort in this case to the presumption of law; the testator indicates the event that is to mark the termination of the office of executor; he directs the residue of the purchase money to be divided into three parts and held in trust. Robertson says the division into three parts had taken place about the beginning of 1857. As such trustees, no special powers were given to them by the will of Mr. Carson, the language of which is, "I order and direct my executors to sell," &c. "I authorize and empower my executors or qualified executor to invest and re-invest," &c. The power of sale was exhausted on the sale to Ball, through which the defendants make their title. Why is the expression "qualified" used in giving the power to the executor, if he was meant to use it in his character of trustee? Robertson and Blacklock being then trustees without special powers, what was their authority? The bond of Ball was a contract to pay money, either as interest or principal, and the trustees had no other power in respect to it but to receive money by way of interest and principal whenever either was due. They could exercise no proprietary power over the bond (Lewin, Trusts, 512), e. g., they could not accept something else than money in accord and satisfaction of it. A court might have given them such authority, but Mr. Robertson did not seek its aid. In the case of trustees for sale, there can be no conveyance without the payment of the money. Id. 431. "A trustee will not be allowed to exercise his legal powers to the prejudice of his cestui que trust, and a release by the trustee without any consideration would, unquestionably, be set aside in equity, although the party released had no notice of the trust. And the case for relief would, of course, be still stronger, if the party released had actual notice of the trust." Hill, Trustees, 503. The Confederate treasury notes delivered to Robertson by Ball were not money, and Ball's act was not payment of the bond. It is not necessary to trouble the court with many authorities on that point. The securities which are the subject of this suit are dated January 8, 1857, and March 2, 1857, and are for the payment of dollars. "It is quite clear that a contract to pay dollars, made between citizens of any state of the Union which maintains its constitutional relations with the national government, is a contract to pay lawful money of the United States, and cannot be modified or explained by parol evidence." Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 13. "Prior to February 25, 1862, all contracts for the payment of money, not expressly stipulating otherwise, were, in legal effect and universal understanding, contracts for the payment of coin; and, under the constitution, the parties to such contract are respectively entitled to demand and bound to pay the sum due, according to their terms in coin." Hepburn v. Griswold, Id. 604. See, also, the decisions of the courts of South Carolina since the war that Confederate treasury notes are not money. Austin v. Kinsman, 13 Rich. Eq. 259; Mayer v. Mordecai [1 S. C. (N. S.) 383].

2. But assuming that the powers in respect to investment, given by the will of

Mr. Carson, belonged to Robertson and Blacklock in their character of trustees, they exercised those powers in breach of their trust—first, in calling in Ball's mortgage; second, in exchanging it for Confederate treasury notes. The acceptance of these notes by Robertson, in lieu of money, was, as we have shown, a purely voluntary act, and was, therefore, equivalent to a calling in of the mortgage. Money outstanding upon good mortgage security, an executor is not called upon to realize until it be wanted in the course of administration. Orr v. Newton, 2 Cox, 274; Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. p. 444, note. It is not the duty of trustees to call in money invested on good real security where no risk is apparent. Hill, Trustees, 381; Sadler v. Turner, 8 Ves. 621. It has been decided that even an express power to vary the securities does not authorize changes made without any apparent object or any prospect of benefiting the trust estate. Brice v. Stokes, 11 Ves. 324. Our case of Mayer v. Mordecai [supra], seems to rule the same principle. In these cases, except the last, it was held a breach of trust to receive payment of securities. A fortiori an exchange of one security for another would be bad in like circumstances. It is doubtful whether the trustees had any power in equity to exchange one security for another. The language of the will is, "I authorize and empower my executors, or qualified executor, to invest and re-invest the purchase money of my estate, so as aforesaid to be held in trust by them, in such public or private securities or stocks as they may deem best." The words "invest" and "re-invest," have reference only to money, and the testator here uses them in connection with the word money. He means to authorize his trustees to change money, coming into their hands from time to time during the continuance of their trust, into other kinds of property. But such was not Robertson's act; he did not get the money due upon his security and invest it; if he had, the purchasers of the trust property would not have been made parties to this suit, but in excess of his authority he made an exchange of his security for another. But if the act of Robertson was a breach of trust because premature, and because in excess of his authority, it was likewise such because of the character of the security, viz., Confederate treasury notes, he received in satisfaction of Ball's mortgage. It is proposed to show: a. That discretionary powers of investment by trustees are subject in equity to certain restrictions. b. That on general principles they do not extend to investments in such securities as Confederate treasury notes. c. That the precise point is "res judicata."

(a.) "If there be a trust to invest at discretion on 'some good or sufficient' security, or 'at discretion,' the court will not allow the trustees to exercise any discretion as to the nature of the security, but will decide upon the goodness or sufficiency of the security by its own rules." Hill, Trustees, 495. "A power of sale, or of varying trust securities, though to a certain extent discretionary, must not be exercised in an arbitrary or mischievous manner." Id. A trust to invest, at the trustee's discretion, will not authorize a loan of trust money on personal security. Pocock v. Reddington, 5 Ves. 794. Where trustees are empowered to lend "on such securities as they should approve," they are bound to make inquiries, and exercise a sound discretion whether the securities are of sufficient value. Stretton v. Ashmall, 3 Drew. 10. Where money is to be converted "into government funds or other good securities," neither South sea stock nor bank stock will be good investment. Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 444. In Spear v. Spear, 9 Rich. Eq. 184, it is said that a more strict rule is applied to trustees by appointment than such as give bond. And in this case, the great rule laid down is to place the property in a state of security. In it the court also intimates what are proper securities. 1. Public; 2. Bonds, secured by liens on real estate; 3. Bonds of third persons, with proper sureties.

(b.) Confederate treasury notes are clearly not within the principle of these cases. By the very terms of the contract of which they are the evidence, their payment depends upon a contingency. The doubtful character of the contracts of an unrecognized government, had been the subject of frequent comment in the courts of England and of this country. Thompson v. Powles, 2 Sim. 194; Taylor v. Barclay, Id. 214; Bire v. Thompson, cited Id. 222; Jones v. Garcia Del Rio, 1 Turn. & R. 297; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 303; Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 241. The supreme court of the United States, through Chief Justice Chase, described their character accurately in Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 11: "As contracts in themselves, except in the contingency of successful revolution, these notes were nullities: for except in that event there could be no payer. They bore this character upon their face, for they were made payable only 'after the ratification of a treaty of peace between the Confederate States and the United States of America.'" In the last case on this subject, the supreme court of this state says: "The bond was secured by a mortgage of real estate, according to the testimony, in May, 1862. When the first payment in Confederate money was accepted, such property was worth, in that currency, about fifty per cent. more than it would have brought in gold before the war, and in May, 1863, it was worth three times as much." Mayer v. Mordecai [supra]. The sale of Dean Hall, to the defendant McBurney, for one hundred thousand dollars in Confederate treasury notes, is itself sufficient proof of the appreciation in the value of the mortgage.

(c.) It has been expressly held that the receipt of Confederate treasury notes, by a trustee, is a breach of trust. See Mayer v. Mordecai [supra]; Fitzsimons v. Fitzsimons [1 S. C. (N. S.) 400]; Sanders v. Rogers [Id. 452]; Dunn v. Dunn [Id. 350].

(3.) It remains to consider the liability of the purchasers in this case from the trustees. We have shown that the trustees committed a breach of trust in parting with the mortgage. It is admitted by the answers that the purchasers had full notice of the trust, and that the defendant McBurney advanced to Elias N. Ball the Confederate treasury notes to enable him, in breach of his trust, to satisfy the mortgage held by the trustees and to convey Dean Hall. "Where a party purchases trust property, knowing it to be such, from the trustee, in violation of the objects of the trust, courts of equity force the trust upon the conscience of the guilty party and compel him to perform it." "An abuse of trust can confer no rights on the party abusing it, or on those who claim in privity with him." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (Ed. 1861) 487, 489. "The doctrine . . is strictly applicable to every purchaser whose title comes into his hands affected with such notice." Id. 390. "If a purchaser have notice of any claim or incumbrance, his conscience is affected, and a court will then not only refuse to interfere in his favor, but will assist the claimant or incumbrancer in establishing his claims against him: his having given a consideration will not avail him; for, as Lord Hardwicke observes, he throws away his money voluntarily and of his own free will. And it may be laid down as a general rule that a purchaser with notice is bound in equity to the same extent, and in the same manner as the person was of whom he purchased. . . . If he buy with notice of the trust, although for a valuable consideration, he must convey the estate to the uses of the settlement." 3 Sugd. Vend. c. 22, § 2. "If the alienee be a purchaser of the estate (i. e. of an estate subject to a trust) at its full value, then if he take, with notice of the trust, he is (subject to the protection afforded by the statute of limitations) bound to the same extent, and in the same manner as the person of whom he purchased; . . . and the rule applies not only to the case of a trust properly so called, but to purchasers with notice of any equitable incumbrance as of a covenant or agreement affecting the estate or a lien for purchase money. . . . A purchaser without notice, from a purchaser with, is not liable for his own bona fides is a good defense in itself and the mala fides of the vendor ought not to invalidate it." Lewin, Trusts, 725. "A purchaser from a trustee, though for a valuable consideration, will be bound by the trust in the same manner, and to the same extent, as the trustee, if the purchase be made with notice of the trust." Hill, Trustees, 509. "Where a purchaser with notice from a trustee conveys, for valuable consideration, to another person who has no notice of the trust, the estate will not be affected with notice in the hands of the second purchaser." Id. 516. "A purchase for valuable consideration without notice will not be a complete defense in a court of equity, unless the purchaser has clothed himself with the legal estate." Id. 517. See, also, 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 192. The principles cited from the text-books, are sustained by a mass of authority both in England and in this country. Wigg v. Wigg, 1 Atk. 382; Mead v. Lord Orrery, 3 Atk. 238; Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 350; Willoughby v. Willoughby, 1 Term R. 771; Bovey v. Smith, 1 Vern. 149; Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 249. "It is a clearly established principle in equity jurisprudence that whenever the trustee has been guilty of a breach of the trust, and has transferred the property, by sale or otherwise, to any third person, the cestui que trust has the full right to follow such property into the hands of such third person, unless he stands in the predicament of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice. . . . The right or option of the cestui que trust is one which positively and exclusively belongs to him." Oliver v. Pratt, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 333. "Wherever the purchaser is affected with notice of the facts which in law constitute the breach of trust, the sale is void as to him; and a mere general denial of all knowledge of fraud will not avail him if the transaction is such as a court of equity will not sanction." Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 421. In this case, the equity was enforced against the purchaser from the trustee's vendee; and relief was sought and granted both against the trustee and the purchaser. In the case of Caldwell v. Carrington, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 86, the same equity was enforced against purchasers for valuable consideration. In that case, the person from whom the purchase was made, and who committed the breach of trust, was not a party to the suit, "because not an inhabitant of the state" (i. e. where the suit was brought). In Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 212, the doctrine is explicitly stated. The rule has been recognized, and constantly enforced by the courts of South Carolina. "One purchasing land, to which another has an equitable title, with notice of the equity, takes subject to the equity, and is bound to convey in like manner as the person from whom he purchased." Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill, Eq. 421; James v. Bremar, 2 Desaus. Eq. 560; Moragne v. Du Cercueil, 4 Desaus. Eq. 256; Williams v. Hollingsworth, 1 Strob. Eq. 103; Bush v. Bush, 3 Strob. Eq. 131. A purchaser, for valuable consideration, with notice, will not be protected. O'Neal v. Cothran, 4 Desaus. Eq. 553; Blake v. Jones, Bailey, Eq. 141. The doctrine is recognized in Cummings v. Coleman, 7 Rich. Eq. 509; in Ellis v. Woods, 9 Rich. Eq. 19; in Fretwell v. Neal (1859) 11 Rich. Eq. 559.

These cases show that the principle has always been enforced by the courts of South Carolina without question. Where the application of the rule was resisted, it was because of the facts of the particular case. As to the wisdom of this acknowledged principle of equity jurisdiction, there can be but one opinion. It is beyond question the most important rule which equity enforces for the protection of cestuis que trustent. Indeed, it may be said that equity could not adequately protect them in the absence of the doctrine. If the trustee's sense of duty, and his personal responsibility, were the sole guarantees which cestuis que trustent possessed for the proper preservation of their property, an equitable estate would be a precarious species of property. It is to protect them at once against the trustee's misconduct, and his inability to make indemnity, that equity has given them a two-fold remedy, viz., against the trustee and against his vendee. Nor is it hard upon the latter that, with full notice of the fact that he is dealing with a trustee, he should be held to take nothing by any act of the latter which is a breach of his duty. Without the rule, to deal with an unworthy trustee would become profitable. This case is a fair illustration of the wisdom of the rule, for, in view of the insolvency of the trustees, the complainant will be deprived of her property, and will be practically without remedy, unless she has it against the purchaser. The principle that a purchaser for value of a non-negotiable chose in action, is affected with equities of which he has no notice, and of which by no amount of care, he could obtain knowledge, is harsh in comparison with that now contended for; yet it is enforced without question. The defendants, McBurney, E. N. Ball and W. J. Ball, claim, through the will of W. A. Carson, and have, therefore, in law, notice of that will and its contents. "The purchaser is supposed to have knowledge of the instrument under which the party with whom he contracts as executor, trustee, or appointee, derives his powers." Story, Eq. Jur. § 400. "If a person should purchase an estate from the owner, knowing it to be in the possession of tenants, he is bound to inquire into the estate which these tenants have, and therefore he is affected with notice of all the facts as to their estates." Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. Jr. 440; Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 249; Smith v. Low, 1 Atk. 489. Registration of a conveyance, required by law to be registered, is notice to all the world. Story, Eq. Jur. § 403. Wills and executors' accounts are, by law, required to be registered in South Carolina. 11 Stat. 48.

The defendants, McBurney and W. J. Ball, admit by their answers, actual notice of the fact that Robertson and Blacklock were dealing in the character of executors. In respect to W. J. Ball, it is to be observed that he is not in the position of a purchaser for value at all, no consideration having moved from him for the discharge of his bond. He is discharged only if the act of E. N. Ball discharges him, and he can be in no better position than E. N. Ball. It is difficult to suggest any argument against the liability of the latter. The peculiar circumstances of this case strengthens the equity against the purchaser. A state of war existed. The only adult cestui que trust and one of the infant cestuis que trustent were in that part of the United States loyal to the government. The trustee, the purchaser, and an infant cestui que trust were in the Confederacy. One effect of the war was to render intercourse between the trustee and two cestuis que trustent, at least extremely difficult and precarious. It moreover made that intercourse criminal. Chancellor Kent, Griswold v. Waddington, 16 Johns. 483. The Confederate treasury notes were not only useless to the two absent cestuis que trustent, but it was unlawful for them to deal with them at all. The state of the country in which the purchaser resided enhanced, as a trust security, the value of the mortgage, which has, at all times been a favorite security of courts of equity. It is submitted that all these facts were equivalent to an actual, positive notice to the purchaser that the absent cestuis que trustent disproved of the action of the trustee, and affect his conscience in equity. It is hardly matter of doubt that if the complainant's demand were made against a citizen of a state which did not form part of the late Confederacy, and were made in a court of that state, it would be sustained. A purchaser from a trustee in a state not of the Confederacy, making his purchase with Confederate treasury notes, would scarcely be protected. To hold that on the same facts the complainant cannot recover against a citizen of South Carolina, is to establish a strange discrimination in favor of the citizens of states which formed part of the Confederacy.

In Texas v. White [7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 700], the supreme court of the United States held expressly that the laws of the United States were in force throughout the Confederacy during the war. But in Mayer v. Mordecai [supra], lately decided by the supreme court of South Carolina, a very different rule from that contended for was laid down. "Although the trustee is not discharged from liability to account for the three bonds, yet the mortgages as against the original debtors can not be set up as of force. The legal title to the bonds was in them, and with the investment of the proceeds they had no concern. If, according to the ruling in this state, the vendee is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money (Lining v. Peyton, 2 Desaus. Eq. 375; Laurens v. Lucas, 6 Rich. Eq. 222), or a mortgagee under the order of the court that the money is appropriated to the purpose for which the mortgage was taken (Spencer v. Bank of the State, Bailey, Eq. 468); much less can a debtor who makes satisfaction to the creditor, in a manner acceptable and agreed by him, in the form of actual payment, be held to such requisition." Mr. Justice Inglis, in Austin v. Kinsman, 13 Rich. Eq. 265, says, "a creditor, though entitled to demand payment in lawful money, may waive his right and accept any substitute he pleases, and his voluntary acceptance of such substitute as payment makes it so." "If the satisfaction of the bonds was the result of a fraud between the creditors and the trustee, or produced by an improper combination, to the prejudice of the cestui que trust, or if the debtor knew of the intended misapplication of the proceeds by the trustee, and, in any way, wrongfully facilitated the accomplishment of that design, the instruments would be set up as existing and binding, but no such proof has been made in this case. On the contrary, as to the two principal bonds, the trustee required the payment. There was no medium of circulation but Confederate currency. But so far from doing so he sought payment in it. There is no testimony showing any willful combination on the part of White, Kerr & Goldsmith, with the trustee, which would justify an interference to hold them responsible for the act for which alone he should respond." The present case can be clearly distinguished from that just cited: First. In the latter case, there was one trustee, and "the legal title was in him." It is, to say the least, extremely doubtful whether in this case the legal title was passed by the act of the single trustee of law. Second. The authorities before cited put beyond a doubt that in equity there was an imperfect release of the mortgage in this case, a fact which does not appear at all in Mayer v. Mordecai, and which is of great importance. Third. In Mayer v. Mordecai the trustee made a demand for payment; in this case he did not. The statement of McBurney is, that he and the mortgagor made a treaty for the purchase of Dean Hall, and made an advance to him of Confederate treasury notes to enable him to satisfy the mortgage. Was this not "a wrongful facilitating," or improper combination in the sense of the ruling in Mayer v. Mordecai. Fourth. So much of the reasoning in Mayer v. Mordecai as is derived from the principle, that in this state the purchaser from a trustee is not bound to see to the proper disposition of the purchase money, has no application to this case. The equity which does bind the purchaser in that respect, is a much harder rule in favor of cestuis que trustent, than the one now under consideration. If there had been payment of money to Robertson, the complainant would have no case. The contention is that there was no payment. The ruling in Mayer v. Mordecai, that a creditor may accept in satisfaction of his debt something else than money, is not denied. While that proposition is perfectly true at law, the court entirely ignores what it had demonstrated and ruled in the previous part of the opinion, viz., that in equity such acceptance was a breach of trust. There was in that case an actual decree against the trustee for the breach of trust. To say that the purchaser has only to look to the legal title, is to destroy the jurisdiction of equity as between cestuis que trustent and third parties. Under such a ruling, a trustee to sell with consent of a cestui que trust, may without that consent make a good title to a purchaser who has full notice of the limitation of his power. The ruling was moreover entirely unnecessary for the protection of the purchaser from the trustee in that case, inasmuch as it was held that he would not be liable unless there was a fraud on his part or improper combination with the trustee to the prejudice of the cestui que trust. It is difficult to see how the conduct of the purchaser in this case can be held to be other than a fraud in the sense of a court of equity, and an "improper combination" with the trustee "to the prejudice of the cestui que trust," within the language of the rule as laid down in Mayer v. Mordecai. That the court did not apply its own rule in Mayer v. Mordecai, is no reason against its application now. It is obvious that the rule is itself in conflict with the whole current of decisions in the courts of England, of the United States, and of South Carolina, in all of which not the fraud of the purchaser, but his knowledge of the trust has been the ground of relief against him, granted to the injured cestui que trust. In the cases where purchases, for valuable consideration, have been set aside, there could be no question of actual fraud, nor does that question arise in the cases before suggested, where a sale by a trustee to sell with consent is set aside if the sale is made without consent, although the complete legal title passed by the sale. How far, then, is this decision of the state court, denying to a suitor a measure of relief thoroughly recognized in all courts of equity, to bind this court?

The 34th section, Act 1789, provides "that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States where they apply." The act of May, 1792 (1 Stat. 92), provides that the modes of proceeding in suits at equity shall be "according to the principles, rules, and usages which belong to courts of equity as contradistinguished from courts of common law." Under these statutes it has been uniformly held, since the establishment of the government, that the courts of the United States administer equity according to the general principles of English equity jurisprudence. "As the courts of the Union have a chancery jurisdiction in every state, and the judiciary act confers the same chancery powers on all, and gives the same rule of decision, its jurisdiction must be the same in Massachusetts as in other states." Per Marshall, C. J., U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 116; also, Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 222. The settled doctrine of this court is, that the remedies in equity are to be administered, not according to the state practice, but according to the practice of courts of equity in the parent country, as contradistinguished from courts of law." Per Story, J., Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 658; also, Livingston v. Story, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 632. "The language of this section (section 34, Act 1789), can not, upon any fair construction, be extended beyond civil cases at common law, as contradistinguished from suits in equity." Per Taney, C. J., U. S. v. Reid, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 363. "This court, and other courts of the United States, had repeatedly decided that the equity jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is independent of the local law of any state, and is the same in nature and extent as the equity jurisdiction of England, from which it is derived." Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 347. "The equity jurisdiction of the federal courts is the same in all the courts. . . . It is the same in nature and extent as the jurisdiction of England." Barber v. Barber, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 592. "The equity jurisdiction and remedies conferred by the constitution and statutes of the United States can not be limited or restrained by state legislation, and are uniform throughout the states of the Union. Hence the circuit court, for any district embracing a particular state, will have jurisdiction of an equity proceeding against an administrator (if, according to the received principles of equity, a case for equitable relief is stated), notwithstanding that by a peculiar structure of the state probate system, such a proceeding could not be maintained in any court of the state." [Payne v. Hook] Dec., 1868, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 425. "It is very clear that no law of a state can force an alien or a citizen of another state, to forego a remedy which would otherwise exist in equity, under the constitution and laws of the United States." Cropper v. Coburn [Case No. 3,416]. See, also, Fletcher v. Morey [Id. 4,864]; Gordon v. Hobart [Id. 5,609]; Sawyer v. Oakman [Id. 12,402]. It is to be observed that Mayer v. Mordecai was decided since the filing of the bill in this case, at which time the equity now denied was plainly a part of the equity system in South Carolina. In the case of Livingstone v. Jordan [Id. 8,415]; tried in this court, June term, 1868, before Chase, Ch. J. and Bryan, J., the plaintiff was allowed to recover lands held by the defendant, under a conveyance made by the order of the court of equity of the state of South Carolina in 1862. It is submitted that the parties whose non-joinder is here objected are not indispensable.

III. Where the joinder of a party would oust the jurisdiction of the court, a court of the United States would be particularly disposed to construe the rules of practice so as to dispense with such party. West v. Randall [Case No. 17,424]; Shields v. Barrow, supra; Payne v. Hook, supra.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. In this case the only question is as to parties, and we are called upon to meet it at the threshold. The objection of the want of parties may be taken at any time in the progress of a cause, and even in the appellate court. The objection will be disregarded whenever taken, if it appears that the parties are not necessary, or if, although convenient and under some circumstances necessary, they can not be made without depriving the court of jurisdiction. On the other hand, when it appears that no final decree can be made without material prejudice to the interests of parties not before the court; the court will not proceed without them, even though such parties are beyond the reach of its process, or can not be made without ousting the jurisdiction. These are general rules, and they apply to courts of the United States as fully as to the courts of the states. In administering these rules, however, the courts of the United States are always careful to see that no citizen of a state, other than that in which the defendants reside, shall invoke their jurisdiction in vain, unless it is obviously impossible to protect the interest of the absent parties in their decrees. The only question here, is whether there is any such obvious impossibility in this case. It is objected, in the first place, that the partners of the defendant, McBurney, are indispensable parties. But it is plain upon the bill and answer that in all the transactions which form the subject of litigation, Mr. McBurney represented the firm, and we perceive no good reason why he may not be held to represent them in this suit. Most of these partners can come in and become parties to the bill, if they desire to do so. If they do not, it will be because they think their interests already adequately represented.

The court will not regard the absence of parties where interests are competently represented as an obstacle to doing justice by a decree between the parties actually before it.

The other objection is, that Elias N. Ball, though named as a party in the bill, has not been served with process. It is the same objection as the others, namely, want of an indispensable party. This gentleman, it seems, bought the property in litigation of the executors of Wm. A. Carson. He gave his bond, secured by mortgage upon the property, for the purchase money; subsequently, during the war, he sold to McBurney, and by arrangement between himself, McBurney, and the executors, McBurney paid the amount due the executors upon the bond in Confederate notes, and they thereupon surrendered the bond and discharged the mortgages. Subsequently, and since the war, Ball, it seems, has gone into bankruptcy. Under these circumstances we do not perceive that Ball is a necessary party. It does not appear that either he or his assignee in bankruptcy have any interests which will be prejudiced by a decree. At all events, as it seems to us, a decree may be made so as to do complete justice between parties before the court, and at the same time protect any rights which he or his assignee may appear to have. We can not regard him, therefore, as a necessary party.

We do not express this opinion without some hesitation, but our best judgment is, that it will receive the highest sanction, should the case go to the supreme court.

Whether this be so or not, it would be a positive wrong in this court to turn from its doors a suitor from another state seeking a remedy against citizens in this state, and thus deny to her a right secured by the constitution, upon a doubtful question in reference to parties. We would follow rather the example of Judge Story, that great light of equity jurisprudence, and strain a point in favor of the constitutional right of citizens of the several states to sue the citizens of other states in the courts of the United States. It is a right too clear and too important to be lightly disregarded.

We shall therefore overrule the objection on account of want of parties, and continue the case for answer. It is no small satisfaction to know that any error we may now fall into will be corrected by a higher court.

[NOTE. Defendant appealed to the supreme court, which reversed the decree of the circuit court, assigning as grounds for such reversal (Mr. Justice Swayne delivering the opinion) that E. N. Ball was a necessary and indispensable party, and should have been brought in, inasmuch as the bill failed to aver his insolvency, or to show any reason why he should not or could not be brought before the court, and also because W. J. Ball, his surety, had objected to his absence, and alleged that he represented the debt to be paid, and therefore was entitled to have him present to assist in maintaining this defense, or, in the event of failure of the defense, to assist in taking an account that the decree might conclusively fix the liability of E. N. to W. J., should the latter be compelled to pay the debt. Furthermore, the court held that as the bill charged fraud and conspiracy, and that E. N. was a party thereto, his vendees were entitled to his aid to make their defense; and the court further assigned as a ground for reversal that Gillespie, as one of the grantees of E. N. Ball, who had not, so far as it appeared, parted with the legal title acquired by him, was an indispensable party to the determination of the case. Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 94.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 10, 1875.

PATENTS—"TAKE-UP MECHANISM FOR LOOMS"—VALIDITY—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The first and third claims of reissued letters patent granted to Hugo Carstaedt, November 19th, 1872, for an "improvement in take-up mechanism for looms for weaving irregular fabrics," the original patent having been granted to him March 30th, 1869, namely, "(1.) The two rolls B and C, continuously rotating at a suitable distance apart, and the series of sectional rollers or wheels D, mounted and operated so as to be pressed wedgewise between them when the take-up is to act, all substantially as and for the purpose herein set forth; (3.) A series of needles, k, k, in combination with a take-up composed of rollers or wheels D, arranged to take up at intervals on parts of the work, and to liberate other parts, substantially as and for the purpose herein specified," are not infringed by a mechanism in which the take-up is not effected by rollers divided in sections, and in which, although the effect of the take-up is sectional, such effect is due not to the sectional action of the take-up but to the action of the lay.

2. The second claim of said patent, namely, "(2.) The needles or points, k, k, fixed on a stationary bar K, and arranged, as specified, so that the fabric, being drawn by the take-up proper, is continuously carried across the needles, to be received by their points and to be arrested when a reverse movement of any part of said fabric is commenced, substantially as herein set forth," is not limited to the sectional take-up described in the patent, nor does it extend to every take-up, regular or irregular, but it embraces the combination of the needle-bar with any take-up mechanism for weaving irregular fabrics. Thus construed, said second claim is not void for want of novelty. A change of position of the needle-bar, as involving invention, considered.

[In equity. Bill by Hugo Carstaedt against the United States Corset Company to enjoin infringement of letters patent No. 88,365 (reissue No. 5,150).]

John Van Santvoord, for plaintiff.
George Gifford, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The patent which is alleged to have been infringed by the defendants was granted to the complainant on March 30th, 1869, for an "improvement in take-up mechanism for looms for weaving irregular fabrics," and was reissued on November 19th, 1872. The patented machine was designed especially for the weaving of corsets. In weaving articles of irregular size, it is necessary to give greater fullness to one side or portion of the woven article, than is given to another portion. The cloth, notwithstanding this irregularity, is woven in one piece, so that "sometimes the weaving proceeds regularly across the whole width of the fabric," and sometimes irregularly across an increasing part of the width. The mechanism which "takes up" or carries along the woven cloth must be so constructed that the irregularly woven cloth shall be taken up, while the remainder of the cloth shall be kept stationary, and the edge of the entire width be kept in a straight line. One practical difficulty in accomplishing this result by the mechanism which was in use prior to the complainant's invention, arose from the fact that the cloth, having been beaten up by the reed, and taken up by the rollers, slipped out of them again when the lay was receding, because, in consequence of the fullness of a part of the cloth, the tension of the take-up upon the fabric was irregular, and the take-up mechanism "drew" unevenly. The complainant's improvement consisted, in the language of his specification, of a "sectional take-up, composed of two rolls, continuously rotating at a suitable distance apart, and a series of sectional rollers mounted and operated so as to be pressed, wedgewise, between the two first-named rolls, when the take-up is to act; also, in a series of needles, or points, arranged upon a stationary bar, in such relation to the take-up rollers that the fabric is continually carried across said needles, to be received by their points, and to be arrested when a reverse motion of any part of the fabric is commenced; further, in the combination of a series of needles with a take-up composed of rollers or wheels D, arranged to take up, at intervals, on parts of the work, and to liberate other parts, so that, as the fabric, or any part thereof, is carried in by the take-up, it is withdrawn from the needles, but the needles prevent the fabric, or any part thereof, from moving back." The mechanism is clearly described in the specification, as follows: "B and C are rollers, continuously but slowly rotated by gearing, as indicated. The woven fabric, represented by m, is led under each of these, and between them and short rollers or wheels, which are peculiarly mounted below. The cloth is taken up or drawn forward by being pinched between the wheels D and the rollers B, C, and the former are pressed up, so as to take hold of the cloth firmly, or are let down so as to liberate it, according as the work requires. When all the wheels D are pressed up, the woven fabric is taken up uniformly over its whole breadth. When the rollers D, on one side of the cloth, are pressed up, and the rollers D, on the other side, are allowed to remain depressed, the cloth will be taken up only on the side where the cloth is pinched. * * * K is a cross-bar, immediately behind the roller C, and provided with a series of needles k, in its lower edge, which catch in the goods, and prevent its being drawn back under any circumstances when the take-up mechanism releases it." The claims of the patent are as follows: "(1) The two rollers, B and C, continuously rotating at a suitable distance apart, and the series of sectional rollers or wheels D, mounted and operated so as to be pressed wedgewise between them when the take-up is to act, all substantially as and for the purpose herein set forth; (2) the needles or points k, k, fixed on a stationary bar K, and arranged, as specified, so that the fabric, being drawn by the take-up proper, is continuously carried across the needles, to be received by their points, and to be arrested when a reverse movement of any part of said fabric is commenced, substantially as herein set forth; (3) a series of needles, k, k, in combination with a take-up composed of rollers or wheels, D, arranged to take up at intervals on parts of the work, and to liberate other parts, substantially as and for the purpose herein specified." The fourth claim has no relation to the present suit.

The defendants' mechanism is also a take-up mechanism which is adapted to irregular fabrics, but is not "sectional" in its character. A sectional take-up is one which takes up the cloth "only on some parts of the fabric, while the rest remains unmoved; that is, the rolls which are used to take up the cloth are divided in sections, and can be used independently of each other." The defendants' take-up consists of an endless sheet or sheets of rubber pressing the fabric against a roller. The pressure is regulated by set screws. All parts of the roller at all times bear with equal pressure against the whole width of the fabric. The effect of the take-up is sectional, but that effect is due not to the sectional action of the take-up, but to the action of the lay. The needle-bar of the defendants, in its construction and mode of operation, and in the effect which it produces, is substantially like the complainant's needle-bar. It has the same position in the loom with relation to the take-up, and is designed to accomplish, and does accomplish, the same result.

From this description of the two machines, it is obvious that the defendants' mechanism does not infringe the first or third claims of this patent. The defendants' take-up is materially unlike the corresponding part of the plaintiff's machine, and their needle-bar is not in combination with the sectional rollers or wheels which are described in the plaintiff's patent.

The material question in this case is, whether the defendants' needle-bar is an infringement of the second claim, and the answer to this question depends upon the construction which shall be given to that claim. If the "take-up proper" is the patented take-up, then the second claim is not infringed. On the other hand, if the claim is to be construed as a claim for a combination of the needle-bar with any mechanism for taking up woven fabrics, whether regular or irregular, then, if the claim is not void for uncertainty and vagueness, it is void for want of novelty; for, as will be remarked more particularly hereafter, needle-bars in combination with take-ups upon looms for weaving regular fabrics have long been known. It will be observed, that, while the patentee describes his take-up as sectional in its character, and claims that the particular device which he has invented is a patentable improvement, yet, it is manifest that he did not intend to limit his second claim to a combination of his needle-bar with his improved take-up, or with a sectional take-up. After describing the needle-bar, he states that "the working part of the loom, as well as the take-up, may be of any approved character," and, also, "for the purpose of operating the take-up, if a sectional take-up is used, I prefer the mechanism represented." These portions of the specification forbid a construction which should confide the patentee to a combination of the needle-bar with his own take-up. Such a construction would make the second and third claims identical, and would prevent the patentee from reaping the benefit of a part of the invention which he actually made, for his invention originally consisted of a needle-bar in combination with the take-up which was in use at the time of his experiments.

The claim should also be considered in connection with the subject-matter of the invention. The improvement did not consist in a take-up upon every kind of looms, but in mechanism which was especially adapted to the weaving of irregular fabrics. To that kind of weaving and to such improvements therein that irregular fabrics might be woven mechanically, it is evident that the attention of the inventor was exclusively directed. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the take-up which is mentioned in the second claim does not mean every kind of take-up, or the take-up in every kind of looms, but refers only to take-ups which are designed or adapted to the weaving of irregular fabrics.

The remaining question is, whether or not the second claim of the patent, as thus considered, covers what was well known at the time of the invention by the patentee. A needle-bar is an old device, and has long been used upon hand corset looms. When so used, the needles hold the woven cloth, which is lifted by the weaver as the cloth is woven, is straightened by hand, and replaced upon the needles. This simple device is merely to hold the cloth firmly in its place while the new cloth is being woven, and does not anticipate a needle-bar working automatically, in connection with an automatic take-up. The device which is described in the patent of August 2d, 1853, to Joseph A. Scofield, and which is called "a spur jaw temple." is, in fact, a stationary needle-bar for holding the ends of regularly woven cloth, so as to present an even width to the lay. The pins or needles were so inclined "as to allow the cloth to be drawn over the tops of said pins as the lay beats up, and, from their inclination, preventing the cloth from receding during the backward movement of the lay." The unpatented devices which are described by the witnesses James Leggett, William H. Lord and A. J. Crossley were stationary needle-bars made of card clothing, or of brass pins, and were designed to hold the edge of the cloth even throughout its whole width, and to prevent the cloth from receding towards the lay, and from contracting in width. These devices were used in regular weaving only. No irregular weaving was ever attempted to be done by their aid, and it is not shown that, if the attempt had been made, it would probably have been successful.

A needle-bar in combination with a take-up, upon a loom for the weaving of irregular fabrics, performs the same general office which a needle-bar performs in a loom for regular weaving, that is, the fabric is received and arrested by the needle-bar when a reverse movement of the fabric has commenced; but, in the weaving of irregular fabrics, a difficulty is to be overcome in addition to the one which is experienced in regular weaving, and which additional difficulty requires that the needle-bar should be placed in a certain relation or position with reference to the take-up. If the take-up mechanism is not near to the place where the weaving is performed, the cloth being more full in some parts of the fabric than in others, and the take-up not having a firm hold upon the cloth, "the cloth wrinkles and doubles itself towards the centre," and is taken up irregularly. This difficulty is not experienced to the same extent in the weaving of regular fabrics, which are of the same width throughout, and upon which there is an even tension of the take-up throughout the entire width of the cloth. In order to obviate this fault, the take-up must be placed as close as possible to the needle-bar, which must also be placed as near as may be to the fell of the cloth. The complainant's needle-bar is placed in this relation to the cloth and to the take-up, and, by means of such position, it is enabled to accomplish a result which had previously been unattained in corset weaving, viz., the arresting of the fabric when it is released from the tension of the take-up, and so holding the cloth that it is prevented from doubling up in the centre, and, by this result, the mechanical weaving of irregular fabrics is now successfully practiced. The combination which produces this new and useful result is not simply a combination of the old needle-bar and the take-up, but the position of the needle-bar and its relation to the take-up and to the edge of the cloth has been so changed, that a new combination of devices has been, in fact, created, and the new combination has accomplished a new and useful result, which was "not attained by the action of the old devices," as they were arranged with relation to each other prior to the date of the plaintiff's invention. Hailes v. Van Wormer [Case No. 5,904]; Marsh v. Dodge & Stevenson Manuf'g Co. [Id. 9,115].

It is said that this change of position of the needle-bar required no inventive skill, but could have been made by any person conversant with loom mechanism. It is noticeable, that, while the complainant's patent and the patent to James Lyall for the devices which the defendants are using, both attribute importance to the position of the take-up mechanism with reference to the place where the weaving is done, the latter patent stating that "it is important that the point of tension from the take-up device should be as near to the reeds, at the extreme movement, as possible," yet, prior to the plaintiff's invention, corset weaving was not successfully practiced upon the looms which were then in use, and favorable results were only obtained after the complainant's needle-bar was applied to the existing looms. [See, also, Knox v. Murtha Case No. 7,911].[2] In view of the previous state of the art, it can hardly be doubted that the retaining device has materially assisted in overcoming the obstacles which interfered with the success of irregular weaving, and that the accomplishment of this result is due to the labor and skill of the complainant.

It is strongly contended by the defendants that the complainant's needle-bar is antedated by the needle-bar which is described in the French patent, dated October 2d, 1846, to Messrs. Bender, Baudier and Madame Gobert. The devices mentioned in the patent, and exhibited in the drawings, are somewhat complicated, but the needle-bar, which, in one part of the specification, is styled a rotary bar, seems to have been either a rotary bar, or a fixed bar attached to a movable traction box or traction slide, and not, in any proper sense of the word, a stationary bar. It did not, therefore, anticipate the bar of the complainant's patent.

As the patent of William P. Brown and his knowledge and use of the plaintiff's invention were not set up or referred to in the answer, the testimony in regard to the Brown take-up was not considered.

Let there be a decree for an injunction against the use of the needle-bar, and for an account, with costs.

[NOTE. For proceedings to punish an officer of defendant for violation of the injunction granted in accordance with the decree herein, see next following case, No. 2,468.]

CARSTAEDT v. UNITED STATES CORSET CO.

[13 Blatchf. 371;[1] 2 Ban. & A. 331; 10 O. G. 3.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 6, 1876.

PATENTS — "TAKE-UP MECHANISM FOR LOOMS"—INFRINGEMENT—VIOLATION OF INJUNCTION.

1. The second claim of reissued letters patent granted to Hugo Carsteadt, November 19th, 1872, for an "improvement in take-up mechanism for looms for weaving irregular fabrics," namely: "The needles or points k, k, fixed in a stationary bar, and arranged as specified, so that the fabric, being drawn by the take-up proper, is continually carried across the needles, to be received by their points, and to be arrested when a reverse movement of any part of said fabric is commenced, substantially as herein set forth," is infringed by a mechanism wherein, instead of needles fixed in a stationary bar, there are small independent needle rollers, mounted on a fixed shaft, each roller rotating in the direction of the cloth when the cloth moves forward, but being prevented from moving backward when the tension of the take-up is relaxed, and then becoming stationary, and arresting the fabric and preventing it from being drawn back. Although the new arrangement may be better, and may perform an additional service, it yet performs the same office as the patented device, by the same mechanical means.

2. Where a party was convicted of a contempt in violating an injunction, but it appeared that he acted under competent advice, and had no intention of disobeying the order of the court, no fine was imposed, but he was ordered to pay the costs of the application and of the affidavits.

[In equity. Bill by Hugo Carstaedt to restrain infringement of letters patent No. 88,365, reissued and numbered 5,150. An injunction was granted (see Case No. 2,467); and plaintiff now moves to attach James Lyall, one of the officers of the defendant company, as for a contempt in violating said injunction.]

John Van Santvoord, for plaintiff.

George Gifford, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This court passed a decree on September 10th, 1875 [Case No. 2,467], enjoining the United States Corset Company from further infringement of the second claim of re-issued letters patent granted to the plaintiff on November 19th, 1872, for an "improvement in take-up mechanism for looms for weaving irregular fabrics." The plaintiff has now brought a motion for an attachment against James Lyall, one of the officers of said company, for violating the injunction which was issued upon said decree.

The portion of the patented improvement which is referred to in the second claim consists, as stated in the specification, "in a series of needles or points arranged upon a stationary bar, in such relation to the take-up rollers, that the fabric is continually carried across said needles, to be received by their points, and to be arrested when a reverse motion of any part of the fabric is commenced." The mechanism is thus described: "K is a cross-bar immediately behind the roller C, and provided with a series of needles, k, k, in its lower edge, which catch in the goods and prevent its being drawn backwards under any circumstances, when the take-up mechanism releases it." The second claim is for "the needles or points k, k, fixed in a stationary bar, K, and arranged as specified, so that the fabric, being drawn by the take-up proper, is continually carried across the needles, to be received by their points, and to be arrested when a reverse movement of any part of said fabric is commenced, substantially as herein set forth." The result of this improvement, which it is said in the opinion of the court upon the final hearing, was "the arresting of the fabric when it is released from the tension of the take-up, and so holding the cloth that it is prevented from doubling up in the centre," was previously unattained in corset weaving.

The defendants have modified their needle-bar, since the injunction was issued, so that it now consists of a number of small independent needle rollers, mounted upon a fixed shaft, which runs across the width of the cloth, in the same position and relation to the take-up which the shaft had before. Each of these rollers rotates forward towards the take-up, or in the direction of the cloth, when the cloth is being moved forward and taken up by the take-up mechanism, but the rollers are prevented from moving backward, when the reed recedes and the tension of the take-up is relaxed, by a ratchet and pawl applied to each roller. Each roller then becomes stationary, arrests the fabric when a reverse movement has commenced, and prevents the cloth from being drawn back when the take-up mechanism has released it. When the reed moves forward and delivers its blow, the cloth is easily pulled over the rotating rollers by the take-up; when the reed goes backward, the rollers are fastened by the ratchet and pawl, become stationary, catch the cloth upon the needle points, and hold it so that it will not double up. It is contended, that such a needle-bar is not a stationary bar and, therefore, is not embraced within the second claim of the patent. It is a rotating bar when a stationary bar is not needed, but, when one is needed, it is the same stationary bar which was previously upon both plaintiff's and defendants' machines, and accomplishes the same practical result, that of arresting and holding the cloth. The needle points of the former needle-bar were inclined towards the take-up, so that, when the cloth was moving forward, it was carried across the needles, and, when it was released from the take-up, the cloth was arrested upon the needle points. The new roller of the defendants, when it is rotating in one direction, permits the cloth to go forward without detention, but, when a reverse action commences, the roller immediately becomes stationary, and the needle points catch and hold the cloth precisely as the old stationary bar accomplished the result. Neither bar assists the take-up mechanism in pulling forward or taking up the cloth, in any material degree, and the roller of the defendants becomes a stationary bar whenever stability is required.

The rotating character of the new needle-bar is said to be an improvement upon the plaintiff's fixed bar. I think that this is true, and that the revolution of the roller with the forward movement of the cloth avoids any danger of the cloth being caught upon the needle points, as it is drawn forward. But, the fact that the new bar is a better one than the plaintiff's, or even performs a service which the plaintiff's bar does not perform, does not prevent the new device from being an infringement; it performs the same office which the old device performed, by the same mechanical means. An infringing device is not protected by the fact that, although the device "was an equivalent of the patented device, in all its functions, and in its construction and mode of operation, yet, by other or additional features, it possessed other and further useful functions. Such a device would, perhaps, be an improvement upon the patented device, but must be, nevertheless, deemed an appropriation of the former." Sarven v. Hall [Case No. 12,369].

My conclusion is, that the new needle-bar is an ingenious attempt to escape from the second claim of the patent, and that the motion of the plaintiff must be granted. As the defendant acted under competent advice, and had no intention of disobeying the order of the court, no fine is imposed, but he is ordered to pay the costs of the application and of the affidavits.

FEES OF REGISTER IN BANKRUPTCY.

to a register, except such as are provided for by general order No. 30, even for services rendered before such general order was adopted.

Isaiah T. Williams, the register, in pro. per.

Thomas H. Barowsky (H. G. Atwater, of counsel), opposed.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. This case is brought here by Register Williams, to review a decision of the district court in regard to his fees and compensation and other charges in this case, of which he was in charge as register. The services in question were rendered before the adoption by the supreme court of the United States of the general orders in bankruptcy, adopted April 12th, 1875. The district judge held that general order No. 30 left him no discretionary power to allow anything but the charges provided for in that order; and, as those in question were not thus provided for, he excluded them. In so deciding he followed his own determination in Re Johnston [Case No. 7,421], where the various provisions of the statutes bearing upon the question are collected and considered. That case related to the fees of the marshal, but there is no substantial distinction in this respect between the marshal and the register. In re Gies [Id. 5,407] arose in the eastern district of Michigan, and related to the fees of attorneys. Judge Brown held that he must be governed by the new general orders, in the allowance or disallowance of fees for services rendered before those orders were adopted. In my opinion, general order No. 30 requires that construction. In regard to the register the provision is: "The following and no other fees shall be allowed to the register." Then follows the detail of allowable charges, which does not include those in question in this case. The last clause of this general order provides for the taxation of the bills of the clerk, marshal and register. Each of them is to file a statement of fees, including prospective fees for final distribution, which must exhibit by items each service and the fee charged for it. The clerk must tax each fee bill, allowing none but such as are provided for by those rules, which taxation is conclusive, unless altered by the court. There is no foundation for the idea that the court can make any other taxation than such as the clerk ought to have made. There was, therefore, no legal right to award to the register the amounts which have been disallowed by the district court.

The order of the district court must be affirmed, but without costs against the register, in this court.

District Court, D. Indiana. March, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—SUSPENDING PAYMENT OF COMMERCIAL PAPER.

When a man enters the commercial community he assumes all the responsibilities attaching to his calling, and is bound to take care of his commercial paper, whether made before or after he commenced business, and whether given in connection with his business or not. Therefore, if his commercial paper, given before, but falling due after he engaged in business, is allowed to remain unpaid for fourteen days after maturity, he can be adjudged a bankrupt.

In bankruptcy. This was a petition in bankruptcy filed by the Hydraulic Woolen Mill Company, of Columbus, Indiana, against William Carter, of the same place, alleging three distinct acts of bankruptcy: First—That Carter sold and delivered to David Aiken personal property to the value of six hundred dollars, receiving a credit for that amount upon a debt due from him to Aiken, he, Carter, being at the time insolvent, and intending by the payment to give Aiken a preference. Second—That Carter, being insolvent, and intending to give Francis J. Crump an unlawful preference, transferred to him, in payment of a debt, the promissory note of Harvey Daily for one thousand dollars. Third—That Carter, being a merchant, trader and manufacturer, suspended payment of his commercial paper, and had not resumed payment within a period of fourteen days; the said paper being Carter's promissory note for seven hundred dollars, made at Columbus, Indiana, on the 17th day of June, 1870, payable in one hundred and eighty days, to the order of the Hydraulic Woolen Mill Co., at the bank of McEwen & Sons, in the said city of Columbus.

McDonald, Butler & McDonald, for creditor.

Porter, Harrison & Hines, for bankrupt.

GRESHAM, District Judge. I think the testimony shows that at the time of the sale and delivery of the personal property to Aiken, and of the transfer of the Daily note to Crump, Carter was insolvent; but it is not so clear that in these acts he intended preferences in favor of Aiken and Crump. The question is embarrassing, and I shall not undertake to dispose of it. It ceases to be important, inasmuch as Carter must be adjudged a bankrupt on the third ground specified in the petition.

Promissory notes payable to order or bearer, in a bank in this state, are by the statutes of Indiana placed on the footing of inland bills of exchange. The note described in the third ground of bankruptcy in the petition and put in evidence, is therefore Carter's commercial paper. At the time the note was executed he was not in business; he was neither merchant, trader, nor manufacturer, but at the time the note fell due, and the obligation to redeem his promise to pay matured, he was the owner of a large flouring mill, and engaged in buying wheat, and in manufacturing and selling flour. The precise question thus presented has never been passed upon by the courts, and is one of great importance to the commercial community.

It is argued with much force and earnestness by counsel for respondent, that the note is not commercial paper within the meaning of clause nine, section thirty-nine of the bankrupt act, because, when executed, Carter did not belong to any of the classes designated in that clause, and did not therefore pledge himself to commercial promptness in its payment. I am referred to the cases In re Nickodemus [Case No. 10,254]; In re McDermott, Patent Bolt Manuf'g Co. [Id. 8,750]; Davis v. Armstrong [Id. 3,624]; Innes v. Carpenter [Id. 7,049]; and In re Lowenstein [Id. 8,574],—in support of the position that the statute, in naming commercial paper, means paper given by a merchant, trader, manufacturer, etc., in the direct course of his business. The authorities upon this point are not uniform, and I am left therefore free to follow those which seem best supported by reason.

The language of the statute is: "Who being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, etc., * * * has stopped or suspended, and has not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days."

The phrase, "commercial paper," as here employed, was intended, it seems to me, to embrace all paper which by usage or statute, is brought within the custom of merchants. I think with Lowell, J., in Re Chandler [Case No. 2,591], that in saying that any person belonging to one of certain designated classes should be deemed a bankrupt if he failed to pay his commercial paper, congress simply referred to a well known and conclusive test of insolvency.

The language of the act above quoted is a legislative declaration of insolvency applied to the particular classes named on account of their relation to the commercial world.

In Davis v. Armstrong, above cited, Hall, J., held that the statute extended to one who at the time he made the note was a merchant, but had gone out of business before it became payable. Such a construction, however, would not warrant the conclusion that one who is within the letter is not also within the meaning of the act. To embrace the first class, the statute must be so extended as to include persons not within its language; while to exclude the second class, is to adopt a construction which rejects those who are expressly within its terms.

If the construction for which the respondent's counsel contend is the true one, it becomes necessary to inquire into the origin of the debt, in proof of which a note or bill is offered; and a merchant, trader, or manufacturer, may suspend payment of all his commercial paper, except such as he has executed in connection with his particular trade or business, and yet maintain his standing for solvency in the commercial world. The dishonor of the paper of a merchant, trader, or manufacturer, given when not engaged in business, or, if he were in business, given in some transaction not immediately connected with his business, is not less damaging to his commercial reputation than the dishonor of commercial paper given in the usual course of his business. One affords no better test of insolvency than the other.

When a man enters the commercial community as a merchant, trader, banker, or otherwise, he assumes all the responsibilities which attach to his calling. One of these is the obligation to take care of all of his commercial paper, whether made before or after he commenced business, and whether given by him as the result of his particular business, or as the result of some transaction not directly within the scope of that business.

The respondent is adjudged bankrupt, and the proper decree will be entered.

TRUST DEED—INTEREST—FORECLOSURE—RATE OF INTEREST ON PURCHASE MONEY — EFFECT OF WAR UPON INTEREST.

1. If the trustees, in a deed given to secure the payment of a debt bearing a larger rate of interest, in selling to foreclose, allow time on the purchase-money at a reasonable rate of interest, not by direction of the cestui que trust, the debt secured by the deed continues to bear the larger interest.

2. Interest during the period of the late war allowed to be abated.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of John R. Carter.] On exceptions to the report of Register Chilton taken by H. W. Sheffey, counsel for a lien creditor.

HUGHES, District Judge. The bond of Carter to Gurnee was for five thousand dollars and interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually on the 1st days of May and November in each year, the interest commencing to run on the 4th day of July, 1870. On default of the payment of any semi-annual instalment of interest the whole debt was to fall due, otherwise the debt was to mature for payment on the 1st May, 1875. Deed of trust was given upon certain land to secure the debt. Default was made on the 1st November, 1873, and the trustees sold the land upon which the debt was secured on the 14th December, 1874. The sale was required by the trust deed to be made for cash, but for some reason, which is not disclosed by the papers before me, the trustees made the sale on the terms of $2,173 in cash, and three notes, for $1,954 each, respectively, on one, two, and three years' credit, with interest, from date of sale till paid, at the rate of six per cent. interest.

As no evidence is before me, or is reported by the register as having been before him, showing expressly for what object the trustees allowed time on part of the purchase-money, no evidence to show that this allowance of time was the act of the beneficiary in the deed, I think the court ought to presume that credit was given by the trustees in the interest of the sale, in order to enlarge the number of bidders and secure a higher price for the land. I see no evidence of such acts as would amount to a novation of the debt on the part of Gurnee, the creditor. There could have been no novation unless by positive and express act of the beneficiary. If that be so, then the creditor has a right to the payment of his debt, with 12 per cent. interest until paid. The act of the trustees in giving time on part of the purchase-money, at 6 per cent. interest, cannot per se affect the rights of Gurnee. The bond was given at a time when 12 per cent. interest was legal. It was a valid contract, and I see nothing to justify the court in cutting the rate of interest down from 12 to 6 per cent. The exceptions taken by the counsel for Gurnee to the register's report on that subject are therefore sustained.

The report of the register in respect to the claim of Josephus Carr, trustee for Hortensia Coe, disallowing war interest, is approved, and the exceptions of Carr thereto overruled.

INFRINGEMENT OF PATENT—CHANGE IN FORM NOT NECESSARILY A CHANGE IN SUBSTANCE—COMBINATION—MECHANICAL SUBSTITUTE—DEFINITION—EVIDENCE—EXPERTS—MODELS AND MACHINES—IMPROVED MACHINE—GREATER USEFULNESS—MAKING MACHINE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—DAMAGES, HOW ASCERTAINED—PROFITS—CONFUSION OF RIGHTS—BURDEN OF PROOF—STOCK CARRIED OVER—TWO PATENTS—DAMAGES APPORTIONED—OTHER MACHINES—PROFITS ON ENTIRE MACHINE.

1. Whenever a party avails himself of the invention of a prior patentee, without such variation as will constitute a new discovery, there is an infringement of such prior patent.

2. An infringement involves substantial identity. If the invention of the patentee is a machine, or an improvement on a machine, the patent will be infringed by a machine which incorporates in its structure and operation the substance of the invention; that is, by an arrangement of its mechanism, which performs the same service or produces the same effect, in the same, or substantially the same, way.

[Cited in Fisher v. Craig, Case No. 4,817; Pacific Cable Ry. Co. v. Butte City St. Ry. Co., 55 Fed. 762.]

3. The form or mechanical construction of a machine may be different from a prior machine, and the two still be, substantially, identical. The inquiry for the jury must, therefore, be, whether the defendant's device is, in substance and effect, a new and different thing, or a mere colorable evasion of the plaintiff's contrivance.

4. Where the patent is for a combination of several parts before known and used in machinery, it is no infringement to use any of the parts, where the combination is not used, or any combination of some of the parts with another, or others, substantially different from the omitted parts.

5. But if a well known mechanical substitute for the omitted part has been used in combination with the other parts, there is an infringement; for such mechanical substitute for a thing, must be regarded as the thing itself.

[Cited in King v. Louisville Cement Co., Case No. 7,798; Coolidge v. McCone, Id. 3,186; Fisher v. Craig, Id. 4,817.]

6. Where, in mechanics, one device does a particular thing, or accomplishes a particular result, every other known device which skillful workmen know will do the same thing, or produce the same result, is a known mechanical substitute.

[Cited in Norton v. Jensen, 1 C. C. A. 452, 49 Fed. 868; Wilt v. Grier, 5 Fed. 453.]

7. The testimony of experts is to be considered like any other testimony; is to be tried by the same tests, and receive just so much weight and credit as the jury may deem it entitled to, when viewed in connection with all the circumstances.

8. Rightly understood furnish very persuasive evidence on questions of improvement and infringement.

9. Although a machine may embrace a patentable improvement on a prior patented machine, yet if it embodies such prior machine, or the patented portion thereof, there is an infringement, and the patentee of the improvement cannot lawfully appropriate the prior invention, even though his own improvement is useless without such appropriation.

[Cited in American Nicholson Pavement Co. v. Elizabeth, Case No. 309.]

10. Greater usefulness is a circumstance to be considered by the jury on questions of infringement, but it is not conclusive. The point must be determined upon the whole evidence.

11. The mere making or selling, of a patented machine, is an infringement which entitles the plaintiff to maintain an action.

[Cited in Butz Thermo Electric Regulator Co. v. Jacobs Electric Co., 36 Fed. 197.]

12. The actual damages sustained, directly resulting from the infringement, is the amount to be recovered.

13. The damages must be found from the evidence; not from mere conjecture without regard to evidence.

14. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the profits realized by the wrong-doer from the infringement, as a part of the damages.

15. If the party infringing has improved the machine, and a part of the profits are due to his improvement, the portion of the profits due to such improvement do not belong to the owner of the prior patent; but the burden of proof rests on the infringer to show what portion of the profits are due to his improvement.

16. The actual damages may be more than the actual profits realized by the infringer, as the infringer may have sold at a much lower price than the patentee would have been able, and entitled, to sell. If so, this circumstance should be considered, and the whole profits which the plaintiff would have realized, should be given.

17. So, also, the patentee may have been unable to sell machines manufactured, in consequence of the sales of the infringing party, and have, consequently, been compelled to carry them over. If so, the interest on the capital invested in the machines so carried over, is a proper element of damages to be considered.

18. Where the plaintiff, who patents a machine, and afterwards an improvement on the same machine—his machine put upon the market embodying both inventions—sues for an infringement of the first patent only, he is not entitled to recover, as damages, that part of the enhanced price of the machine, which is due to his second patent; and the burden of proof rests upon him to show how much of the price, or profits, are due to the patent infringed.

19. Plaintiff is not entitled to recover, as a part of his damages, any loss sustained in consequence of an infringement of his patent by reason of his inability to sell other machines, than those embodying the infringed patent. The profits recovered must be the direct and legitimate fruits of the patent infringed.

20. The plaintiff selected certain elements and combined them into a plow which he patented. The plow could only be used as an entirety—as one machine. He had the exclusive right to make, use and vend the machine as a whole: Held, that he is entitled to recover of an infringer the profits on the whole machine.

M. A. Wheaton, for plaintiffs.

Estee & McLaurin and A. Rix, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge, charged the jury as follows:

Gentlemen of the Jury: As you have already been informed, this is an action for an infringement of a patent in gang-plows. The plaintiffs claim that their assignor, Huie, invented a new and useful improvement in the implement named, which was not known or used by others, at the time of his invention, and which was not, at the time of his application for a patent, in public use, or on sale, with his consent or allowance.

The improvement claimed to have been made consists in the arrangement and combination of the several simple and separate parts, described in the specifications and drawings annexed to the patent, to wit: the axletree, arm E, slotted oval, spring, slide and lever, in connection with the other parts of a gang-plow, and in the application of them in the arrangement and combination indicated, to the purpose of producing the two effects, or results named; that is to say, firstly, to elevate or depress one wheel of the plow, so that the two wheels shall run upon different planes, as one upon the unplowed land, and the other on a lower plane in the bottom of the furrow, in such a manner, that, by means of the contrivance, the body of the machine, including the driver's seat, and the plows, shall still maintain a level, or horizontal, position; and, secondly, to enable the driver, from his seat, at will, and without delay or change of position, to depress or elevate the plow to the required depth in the ground, or elevate it entirely above the ground, and fix it in the required position.

The claim, and the patent, are for an arrangement, or combination of elements and devices, before known and separately used, into one improvement in the plow, by which, it is claimed, that the two results sought are more readily, expeditiously, conveniently, and better accomplished.

Your first inquiry, gentlemen of the jury, will be, whether the plaintiff's assignor first made the combination as claimed, and whether, when made, it constituted a new and useful improvement in gang-plows. Upon this point, the patent itself is prima facie evidence in favor of the plaintiffs. But the question is to be determined upon all the evidence in the case; and, from an inspection and comparison of the model of the plow, and its mode of operation, with those of plows before in use, and the testimony of witnesses introduced on both sides, I apprehend you will have little difficulty in coming to a correct conclusion on this head.

If you find for the plaintiffs on this point, your next inquiry will be, whether there has been an infringement on the part of the defendants. In the language of another, "An infringement takes place whenever a party avails himself of the invention of the patentee, without such variation as will constitute a new discovery. * * * An infringement involves substantial identity, whether that identity is described by the terms 'the same principle,' 'same modus operandi,' or any other. It is a copy of the thing described in the specifications of the patentee, either without variation, or with only such variations as are consistent with its being in substance the same thing." No certain, definite rule can be stated by which to determine unerringly, in every case, what will amount to substantial identity. The jury, guided by general principles, must determine each case upon its own circumstances. If, however, "the invention of the patentee be a machine, or an improvement on a machine, it will be infringed by a machine which incorporates in its structure and operation the substance of the invention; that is, by an arrangement of its mechanism, which performs the same service, or produces the same effect, in the same, or substantially the same, way."

The question is, whether the given effect is produced, substantially, by the same mode of operation, and the same combination of powers and devices in both machines; mere colorable, or evasive, differences cannot defeat the right of the original inventor. The inquiry, therefore, should be, whether the defendant's device is in substance and effect a colorable evasion of the plaintiff's contrivance, or whether it is really a new and substantially different thing. If the defendants have taken the same general plan, and applied it to the same purpose, and produced the same effect, in substantially the same mode, although they have varied the form of construction merely, it will still be substantially, in contemplation of the patent law, the same thing; otherwise, it will not. Whether or not one machine is an infringement of another, therefore, does not, necessarily, depend upon whether the mechanical constructions are different. But the question is, whether (whatever be the mechanical construction), the later machine contains the means or combination found in the previous machine; whether, taking the structure as you find it, you see the new idea completely embodied in it. In this case, the plaintiff's patent is, substantially, for a combination of parts before separately known, and used in machinery, and, since this is so, it is no infringement to use any of the parts, where the combination itself is not used, or any combination of some of its parts with another substantially different from a third element, or part, described in the specifications of plaintiff's patent. But, if the defendants have only varied their combination, by employing well known mechanical substitutes for some one or more material elements, or parts, of the plaintiff's combination, then there is an infringement, for a mere known mechanical substitute for a thing, for the purpose of determining the question in issue, must be regarded as the thing itself.

It must be apparent to you, gentlemen, that counsel regard the question of mechanical substitutes as having an important relation to this case, even if it does not present the point upon which the principal strain in the decision of the whole case is, ultimately, to come. I, therefore, invite your special attention to that aspect of the controversy, and to the definition of these terms, which I shall now give, and as stated in other portions of the charge and instructions submitted to you.

When in mechanics, one device does a particular thing, or accomplishes a particular result, every other device known and used in mechanics, which skillful and experienced workmen know will produce the same result, or do the same particular thing, is a known mechanical substitute for the first device mentioned for doing that thing, or accomplishing that result, although the first device may never before have been detached from its work, and the second one put in its place. It is sufficient to constitute known mechanical substitutes, that, when a skillful mechanic sees one device doing a particular thing, he knows the other devices, whose uses he is acquainted with, will do the same thing.

To apply these general principles to the machines in question, let us examine them for a moment. In this, the Huie machine (illustrating by the machine), we have the crank axletree, which is one of the parts in the combination and arrangement claimed in the patent, and consists of this whole implement, extending from the end of the spindle outside the wheel, to the outer end of the other spindle outside the wheel. This axletree is again composed of several parts, a shaft in the middle, here, these two arms which form the cranks, and these spindles connected with the arms, upon which the wheels revolve. That is one of the parts of the machine, composed of the several elements named. One of the elements, this arm of the axletree, is composed of different parts, also, one of which is this slotted oval, and the other, this movable arm, called E, in the specifications, lying by the side of the slotted oval.

Another element in this combination constituting the improvement, is the lever, with the spring and slide, or catch, and the segment, which is notched, and into which the slide or catch drops for the purpose of holding the plows in their position at the desired level.

The two results effected by the combination and arrangement of these elements and parts, are, as you have already seen, firstly, by the movement of this lever backward or forward, to elevate or depress the plows to the desired level, and there fix them by the spring and slide: and secondly, by a combination of the slotted oval and movable arm, called E, to form a single adjustable arm, which can be fixed when the plow is in use, by means of which, the party using the plow, is enabled to raise or depress one wheel above or below the other, so that they shall run upon different planes, as one upon the unplowed land and the other in the furrow below, or on a side hill, without affecting the level of the body of the machine, or the plows. Those are the two results to be accomplished. It will be perceived that this arm called E is not, of itself, fixed to the shaft of the axletree, but revolves upon the shaft like a swivel. For the purpose of elevating the plow, a fixed arm, composed of a single straight piece of iron welded, or otherwise permanently attached to the shaft, like the other arm of the axletree, is all that is necessary, if no other result was contemplated by the combination.

But another result is contemplated to be performed, in part, by the same arm of the axletree, as that used in raising the plow, and for the purpose of that other result, only, in the combination adopted, the arm is not permanently fixed to the shaft. A fixed arm, however, is necessary to effect the result of raising the plows, and the fixed arm is obtained by tightening a nut on the end of a bolt projecting from the movable arm called E, and passing through the slot in the slotted oval. Thus, the arm E and slotted oval, held together by the tightening of the nut, together constitute a single fixed arm—the two together constituting one of the two fixed arms of the crank axletree.

In the Sursa plow, instead of employing the combined arm of two pieces united in the machine, as just shown in the Huie plow, a segment arm—a single piece of iron, the outer end being in the form of a segment—is used for performing the same functions, but the segment arm acts as a single fixed arm for the purpose of effecting the result of raising the plow, and for that purpose might, also, as well be a simple, straight piece of iron.

You will perceive that the arms of these two plows are in the same relative positions, and in the Sursa plow the segment arm is substituted for the combined arm, composed of the arm called E and the slotted oval in the Huie plow. In both machines, the operation of raising the plows, then, is essentially performed by an axletree with a crank at each end in the same position relatively to the rest of the plow, the arms of which are fixed, and for that purpose, might as well be a simple straight piece of iron, like the other arm in the Huie axle moved by a lever attached to the axletree. But the arm of the Huie plow is, in fact, composed of two pieces combined, while the corresponding arm in the Sursa plow consists of a single piece of peculiar shape, the difference in the mechanical construction, and fixing of these arms, being made for the purpose of another result, and having no reference to the operation of raising the plows.

We will now consider the arrangement with reference to the other result to be attained, viz.: the elevation, or depression of one wheel above, or below, the other, so that the two wheels may run upon different planes, as one in the furrow, and the other on the unplowed land, or in plowing upon a side-hill, without affecting the level position of the plows and body of the machine. It is to accomplish this result, that the arm of the Huie plow is composed of two pieces, the slotted oval, and the arm, called E. This is accomplished by loosening the nut on the end of the bolt projecting from this arm, E, through the slot, and sliding the bolt along through this slot the required distance, and fixing it again by tightening the nut at another point on the slotted oval. The effect of this change, you will perceive, is, to set this arm at a different angle from the shaft from that which it occupied before relatively to the fixed arm at the other end of the axletree, and thereby elevating one wheel with reference to the other, and changing the planes upon which they respectively run.

This same result is effected in the Sursa plow by the segment arm, by taking out the spindle from one of these holes in the segment of the arm, and inserting it in another hole, at a different part of the segment, corresponding to the different point at which it is fixed in the slot of the slotted oval in the Huie machine. You will observe that the segment arm, and the slotted oval, are both segments in the same relative portions of the corresponding arms of the respective plows, and that the change is made by moving the spindle along the segment of similar circles similarly situated. If the intervening space between the two holes in the segment arm should be cut out on a circle, there would be a slot similar to that in the slotted oval. In one, the end of the bolt passes through the intervening space, in the slot, and is fixed at the required point, and in the other, the spindle is taken out of the hole and passed over the corresponding space to the other hole, and inserted again. The result in both is to change the spindle from one point in the arm to another. The means of making these rigid are different, one being tightened by a screw, and the other fixed by means of a square hole with the spindle made square to fit it, so that it cannot turn or move. Now what is the mechanical operation by which the result of changing the planes of the wheels is accomplished in both machines?

Stated in the simplest form, I think you will find it to be this in both. It is simply changing the spindle, upon which one wheel revolves to a different point in the arm forming one of the cranks in the axletree. To effect this purpose, both machines have a crank axletree in the same general position and form—both have an arm in the same position with which the spindle is connected. The outer end, or part, of the arm in both, is spread out into the segment of a circle, in order to give room for changing the position of the spindle in the end of the arm from one point to another.

In one, there is a slot in the form of a segment, through which the bolt passes in making the change; in the other, there are holes at different points on a similar segment of a circle, and the spindle is changed from one to the other, and thus the spindle is changed in both from one point in the arm to the other. This is essentially the operation performed, and the result, when the change of position is made, seems precisely the same in both machines.

The only difference is, in the construction of the arm itself, and the consequent difference in making the change, and fixing the arm after it is made.

As we have seen, the arm in one is composed of two parts, in the other of one, as already described, and I think it will be manifest to you, upon inspection of the machines, that the arm on the Sursa machine may be taken off and substituted in the Huie machine for the combined arm of that machine, and fixed by ordinary known means by an ordinary mechanic, so as to perform its functions in that machine.

But of this, you yourselves are to judge upon inspection and evidence. It is your province, not mine, to determine that fact. There is, undoubtedly, a manifest difference in the mechanical construction of these two arms, and the question for you to determine in this connection, is, whether the segment arm in the Sursa plow can be regarded as a known mechanical substitute for the slotted oval in analogous, or similar combinations, in machinery, as, for instance, for changing a spindle in a machine, from one point to another, and which a mechanic skilled in his art, from a knowledge of his art, and of these devices, as used in machinery, could from that knowledge, simply, upon looking at the machine, substitute the segment arm in the Sursa plow for the combined arm in the Huie plow; that is to say, are the segment arm used in the Sursa plow, and the slotted oval in the Huie plow, devices known to mechanics, as devices used in machinery, for performing similar offices, and used as substitutes one for the other—the devices, and the uses of which, mechanics skilled in their business, know, or ought to know; and could a mechanic, skilled in his trade, from a knowledge, merely, of the devices, and their uses, upon looking at the Huie machine, and seeing the slotted oval, and arm E, combined to form an arm adjustable for the purpose of changing the spindle from one point of the arm to another, substitute the segment arm for the same purpose.

Could a skilled mechanic, after the inspection of the Huie machine, and seeing the desired result and mode of accomplishment, so far as the arm is concerned—that is to say, by changing the spindle from one point in the arm to another—from his knowledge of the devices themselves, as used in other machines, and the cases in which one is a substitute for the other, from that knowledge, merely, pass from one to the other, and substitute the segment arm of the Sursa plow for the combined arm in the Huie plow? If so, then the former is but a known mechanical substitute for the latter, and is substantially the same thing, within the meaning of the law applicable to patent rights, and the substitution of it in the Sursa plow, for the other in the Huie plow, does not constitute a new invention, or discovery, or prevent its being an infringement of the Huie patent.

I will here remark that the segment arm, as a device in this combination for effecting the change in the planes of the wheels, is not claimed as new, or the invention of Sursa, in the Sursa patent. It is, therefore, for this purpose, although used, treated as though it was old. Yet for the other purpose of elevating the plow, unconnected with the purpose of changing the planes of the wheels, the device is not needed; for, we have seen, that a simple straight arm is sufficient for that result.

As to the other portions of the machine, by which the plows are brought to the desired elevation, and fixed in the position—this lever, spring and slide, and this segment of a circle. The lever in both machines, you perceive, is placed near the seat of the driver, on his right, so that he can operate it from his seat without change of position. Both are connected with the crank axletree. By moving the lever backward and forward, the drivers in both elevate the crank axletree upon which the plow is rested, and thus the plows, in both machines, are elevated in the same manner.

In the Huie plow, there are notches at different points along the periphery, or upper edge of the segment. Attached to the lever here, is a spring and slide, or catch. As the lever is moved back and forth by the driver to the required position, the spring presses the slide, or catch, into the notch, on the segment, thus holding the lever in the place, and maintaining the plow at the desired elevation.

Upon the Sursa plow, also, there is in the combination a segment notched on the side, instead of on the top, as in the Huie plow. The lever, also, has a spring attached, and a catch on the side of the lever, to fit into the notch, but the catch is fixed, and the spring, instead of pressing a movable slide vertically into the notch, presses laterally upon the side of the lever, as it moves back and forth, and, in that mode, forces the catch upon the lever into the notch on the side of the segment, thus, also, holding the plows at the required elevation. Each plow then has a spring, catch, and notches in the segment, to perform the same office of holding the lever in the proper position for maintaining the plows at the desired elevation. But there is a difference, also, in the mechanical construction of these devices for performing this function in the two machines, and this is the other principal point upon which the contest hinges. The question here for you to determine, also, is, whether these different forms of construction of these devices are, or not, well known substitutes in machines for the other corresponding forms or devices used in the Huie plow.

Is the form adopted in the Sursa plow, a well-known device in mechanics for securing a lever, or for analogous purposes, as, for instance, securing the lever that operates the brake upon a wagon, and holding it in its position, so that a mechanic, well skilled in his trade, would or ought to know the device, and its uses, and by looking at the Huie machine, from his mere knowledge of his art, of the device and the uses to which it is applied in mechanics, be able to pass from.

the one to the other, and substitute it for that in the Huie machine, without exercising the faculty of invention, or discovery of something new, or without experimenting upon it, to ascertain whether the device would work, or not, to produce the same result. If so, then, it is but using a known mechanical substitute for one of the parts in the combination, and it is, substantially, the same thing as that part, and will not protect the defendants from the charge of infringement.

But if, on the other hand, this is not a device known in mechanics, for accomplishing similar results in machinery, and would require the discovery of something new, the invention of something not before known, or before used in machinery for any similar, or analogous purpose, then its contrivance and application to the purpose indicated, is not the mere substitution of a known mechanical substitute, and is not an infringement.

Gentlemen of the jury, we have, then, two plows, of about the same dimensions, of the same general construction and appearance, both carried on two wheels. Each has a bent axletree located in the same general position, which axletree, when considered with reference to the result of raising the plow, with both wheels running on the same plane, is composed of a shaft, two fixed arms of equal length at right angles with the shaft, and parallel with each other, and a spindle, fixed in each arm, upon which the wheel revolves. The revolution of this shaft, by means of a lever, operates in both precisely the same way, to raise and depress the plows. With reference to the other result, of changing the planes of the wheels, this is effected, in both, by changing the spindles upon which the corresponding wheels in the two machines revolve, from one point to another, and fixing them there, in the corresponding crank-arms in the two axletrees.

When the spindles are thus changed and fixed, the two effects of changing the planes of the wheels, and raising or lowering the plows, are performed by both machines in precisely the same way. The arms of the axles, in both machines, used for effecting the changes in the planes of the wheels, as arms only, are in the same position, and perform all their functions with reference to both results, as simple arms, exactly alike.

The arms, as simple, single arms, are similar in shape, both of them spreading out, like a fan, into a segment of a circle at the outer end, so as to give room for a change of the position of the spindle from one point to the other, for the purpose before indicated.

But the mechanical construction of the arms is different, one being composed of two parts combined to form a single fixed arm, and the other of one; and the modes of changing the spindles from one point to another, and fixing them, are different. The levers and the plows are fixed in the desired positions by means of a notched segment, catch, and spring, in both plows, but of different mechanical construction.

These, when the machines are analyzed, I apprehend, will be found to constitute the only differences between these plows, so far as the questions for you to determine are concerned; and it is for you to determine, whether these differences are substantial, or are only formal, and evasive, arising from employing in the Sursa plow, in the place of those specific parts, or devices, of Huie's combination, other known mechanical substitutes therefor. If substantial, then there is no infringement; but, if merely formal and evasive, and not substantial, there is an infringement.

These are the questions, gentlemen of the jury, for you to determine from the evidence. The testimony of the experts which has been introduced, you are to consider like any other evidence. You are to try it by the same tests that you apply to the evidence of other witnesses, and give it just such credit and weight as you deem it entitled to, from all the circumstances, and no more. You have the models of the various machines before you. These, I think, are readily comprehended, and rightly comprehended, they afford very persuasive evidence.

If, from the whole evidence, you are satisfied that the differences between the Sursa and Huie plows are mere changes of forms, accomplished by substituting, in some of the parts of the combination, mere well-known mechanical substitutes, without any substantial alteration in their real structure, then the plaintiffs are entitled to a verdict on this point. If, on the contrary, they are substantially different combinations of mechanical parts to effect the same purpose, then you must find for the defendants as to these points. It rests with you, gentlemen, to determine these questions of fact, from the entire evidence before you. The law you will take from the court; the facts you will determine yourselves.

I will add that it does not necessarily follow, because a subsequent machine is better than or an improvement on a prior patented machine, that it is not an infringement. It may, or may not, be an infringement, depending upon whether the better or improved machine embodies the old machine. It may contain the whole substance of the first machine, and something more, or be constructed of an improved material, which renders it better and more useful, and makes it the subject of a patent in these particulars. Yet, if it embodies the prior machine, or combination, or improvement, or the patented portion of it, there is an infringement, and the inventor of the improved machine cannot appropriate the prior invention without being liable for infringement, even though his own improvement is useless without such appropriation of the prior patented machine, or patented part of the machine.

The greater usefulness of a machine, the jury is entitled to consider, as a circumstance tending to show a different construction, but not conclusive, and whether the new machine is substantially different from the old, must be determined upon all the evidence bearing upon the point.

These are the only points, except on the question of damages, upon which I deem it necessary to give you any special instructions. Upon the other points in controversy, not specially referred to, if any there be, I think you will find no difficulty in reaching a correct conclusion.

I have not designed to express, or intimate, my own opinion upon controverted facts, although it would not be improper for me to do so with proper caution. But if you should imagine that you perceive any intimation of my opinion upon the disputed questions of fact in issue, whether you do or not, you are not to be controlled by such intimation; but you are to determine all disputed facts for yourselves from all the evidence in the case. The ascertainment of the facts is the exclusive province of the jury.

If you find for the plaintiffs on the question of the validity and infringement of their patent, it will be necessary for you to find the amount of damages sustained. On this point the verdict should be for the actual damages, which the evidence shows the plaintiffs to have sustained in consequence of the infringement of their patent by defendants—the damages directly resulting from the infringement. That will be the rule of damages. You will ascertain the amount, as near as you can, from the evidence before you. The damages must be found from the evidence, not from mere conjecture independent of the evidence.

The mere making of a machine, or the selling of a machine to others to use, or the use of a patented machine, is an infringement of the patent. Of course, for the mere making, without selling, or using the machine, the damage would be nominal; but still it is an infringement, and if nothing else was done, the holder of the patent would be entitled to recover nominal damages. But, in this case, large sales are shown to have been made by defendants, since the plaintiffs became the owners of the patent, and the damages alleged are large; and if there is an infringement, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the whole amount of damages proved to have been sustained, be it large or small.

Evidence of the amount of damages has been given by the plaintiffs, and from the evidence you must determine the damages sustained. The profits made by the defendants in selling the machines are proper to be given, as a part of the damages; for the right to make and vend the patented machine, being the plaintiff's property, the profits resulting from the sale of it, ought to belong to them. But as mere profits, the plaintiffs are only entitled to the profits of the sale of their machine, as patented. If the defendants have improved their machine, and if any of the profits are properly credited to defendants' improvement, they do not belong to the plaintiffs; but as the defendants have wrongfully connected the plaintiffs' improvement with their own, and they caused the confusion of rights, if any portion of the profits are properly to be credited to the defendants' improvements, the burden rests upon them to show affirmatively that fact, and how much of those profits ought to be credited to this improvement and deducted from the profits of the sale of the whole machine as improved.

You are also entitled to take into consideration the fact that the plaintiffs, by the infringement, may have sustained other damages beyond the profits actually received by the defendants.

The plaintiffs may have chosen to sell at a higher rate, and they were entitled to sell at a higher price, if they were able to get their plows off in the market at higher prices. But, with reference to this question, the jury should, also, take into consideration the probabilities, as developed by the evidence, as to whether, if the defendants had not infringed the patent, the plaintiffs would have been able to sell as many machines at a higher price, or as many at any price, as have been sold by both plaintiffs and defendants together.

So, also, if the plaintiffs have manufactured machines under the infringed patent, which they could have sold but for the acts of defendants in unlawfully selling the same machine, and which in consequence of such unlawful acts of defendants, they were unable to sell, and were compelled to carry over, they would also be damaged to the extent of the value of the use of the capital invested in such manufactured machines, during the time they were compelled to carry them in consequence of such unlawful acts of the defendants.

If further improvements have been made in the plaintiffs' machines, and subsequently patented, and if the plaintiffs, during the time of the alleged infringement, manufactured and put upon the market plows embodying the first patent, and, also, the improvement covered by the second patent, they are not entitled to recover, as damages, that portion of the price which they might have obtained that is due to the greater value of the machine occasioned by combining the last improvement with the first.

The plaintiffs have sued only, for infringement of the first Huie patent, and their recovery must be limited to the damages arising from the infringement of that patent alone, and the part of the price for which they could have sold due to that patent alone, is all that the jury can take into consideration on this branch of the damages. And I will further add, that if the plows claimed to have been carried over by plaintiffs, in consequence of the infringement by defendants, did not embody in their construction, the patent infringed, then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, as a part of their damages, for the use of the capital invested in their construction, nor in any event are they entitled to recover for the use of so much of the additional cost of the plow, if any there be, due to introducing the further improvement made under the second Huie patent. The plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, as a part of the damages, any loss sustained by reason of their inability to sell the Pfiel plows, or any other plows than those made under or embodying the patent infringed. Their profits must be the direct and legitimate fruits of that patent. They may have sustained damages from this source, but they are too remote. It rarely happens, that all the damages, incidental and remote, resulting from a wrongful act, are permitted to be recovered by the law. Only those damages which directly and immediately flow from the wrongful act, can be considered. Remote consequential damages must be discarded.

I instruct you, therefore, that you will not include damages resulting from the dealing of the plaintiffs in other machines than those embodying the patent infringed—the first Huie patent. And whether these machines carried over by plaintiff embodied that patent, and, to what extent the loss sustained by carrying them over, is due to that patent, and what to the additional cost of improvements introduced under the second patent, are for you to determine, so far as you can, from the evidence.

The burden of showing the extent of the damage, if any, arising under this, as under other heads, is on the plaintiff. Defendants insist that, as the plaintiff's grantor only patented the improvement of a plow, they are, therefore, only entitled to recover the profits due to the particular improvement, and not the profits on the whole plow.

But, gentlemen, the patent is not for an improvement on any one specific, or particular plow. It does not appear that any particular plow was selected, and an improvement made on that plow.

But the patentee, so far as appears from the evidence, selected certain elements before known, and combined them and applied them to other parts of a plow constructed after his own fashion, and made the plow in question as a whole. The plow as constructed is his machine. It does not appear, that that particular plow could be employed for any useful purpose without his improvement connected with it. Beyond the mere profits of manufacturing the machine, the profits in the plow must almost necessarily be all due to the patent for the improvement. It is that which fixes the price beyond the expense of manufacturing. At all events, the holder of the patent, alone, is entitled to make, use and vend the machine as a whole, and he must, therefore, necessarily, be allowed the profits on the whole machine.

In my judgment, from the attention I have been able to give this point since it was raised, if there is an infringement, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the profits made upon the entire plow, and not merely on the part constituting the improvement. If I am wrong, the error, as well as any other errors I may commit, will be corrected elsewhere.

Gentlemen, I do not know that I can say anything further to aid you in arriving at the proper amount of damages. You must take the evidence as you find it, and consider it in the light of the principles I have just stated, and fix the amount from the evidence, according to the best of your ability, remembering that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, if at all, the full amount sustained resulting directly and immediately from the infringement, and no more.

You will find the damages for two periods: Firstly, from the fifth of January, 1869, to the twenty-seventh of September, 1869; and, secondly, from the fifth of January, 1869, to the present time. The latter will, of course, be arrived at by adding to the damages for the first period, the amount accruing since September 27, 1869. If you find for the plaintiffs, your verdict will be: We, the jury, find for plaintiffs, and assess the damages from January 5, 1869, to September 27, 1869, at —— dollars, and the damages from January 5, 1869, to the present time, at —— dollars. If you find for defendants, you will simply say: We find for defendants.

NOTE [from original report in 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 404]. The jury found a verdict for the defendants.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.]

In admiralty. This was an admiralty appeal. The schooner Byzantium, owned by parties residing in the state of Maine, arrived at Norfolk, Virginia, in need of repairs and supplies in order to enable her to proceed in safety to her port of destination. At the request of the master, the libellant [David Carter] furnished the necessary supplies and materials and paid for the repairs. When the vessel was refitted, the master drew two bills of exchange on one of the owners in Maine, in favor of the libellant, for the amount then due him, which bills were accepted by the drawee, but were afterwards dishonored. Suit was commenced on the bills, but was never entered in court. It was in evidence that the taking of such bills of exchange, in the absence of a special agreement, was not considered, according to the custom of merchants at Norfolk, as a waiver of the maritime lien on the vessel for repairs, materials, and supplies. In the libellant's account with the schooner, she was credited with the drafts, and appended to the description of them was a recital in the nature of a receipt, as follows,—"Which when paid will be in full of account." Upon the arrival of the vessel in Maine, a libel in rem was filed, claiming to recover on the original account, and the drafts were produced at the trial, and offered to be surrendered. After a hearing, the district judge decreed that the libellant recover the full amount of his account with interest [unreported]. From this decree the claimants [True W. Townsend and others] appealed.

Deblois & Jackson, for libellant.

John Rand, for claimant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. It is insisted by the respondent that the bills of exchange were received by the libellant in payment of the debt contracted for the repairs and supplies, and that the effect of the transaction, under the law of Maine, was to extinguish the original debt, and of course to discharge the maritime lien upon the vessel. The proposition assumes that the transaction is governed by the law of Maine, where the bills were accepted, and not by the law of Virginia, where they were drawn and received by the libellant. When a party, bound to a simple contract debt, gives his own negotiable security for it, whether a bill of exchange or promissory note, the law of Maine, as expounded in the decisions of her courts, presumes as a matter of fact, in the absence of any circumstances to indicate a contrary intention of the parties, that the bill or note was given and received in satisfaction and discharge of the pre-existing debt. That rule was adopted in Massachusetts before Maine was admitted as an independent state, and has since been followed by the tribunals of both states in repeated decisions. Thacher v. Dinsmore, 5 Mass. 302; Varner v. Nobleborough, 2 Greenl. 121. Very little embarrassment results from the rule, when its application is kept, as it should be, within the bounds of the principle which the rule itself announces. It is merely a presumption of fact, and may be controlled by circumstances indicating a contrary intention. No such presumption arises at common law, or in Virginia, where the bills were drawn and received. One of the principal reasons assigned for the rule by the courts of Maine and Massachusetts is, that if an action may be maintained for the original debt, the debtor may also be sued by an innocent indorsee of the bill or note, and thus be compelled to pay the debt a second time. That difficulty is obviated at common law, and in all the other states where the common-law rule prevails, by requiring the bill or note to be produced at the trial, so that it may be cancelled when the judgment is rendered on the original contract.

None of the decisions in Maine or Massachusetts go further than to hold that the bill or note is a presumption of payment; and all admit that the presumption is merely one of fact, and may be controlled by circumstances; in which case the bill or note, as at common law, must be produced, if in existence, to be cancelled. Where the rule prevails, the new security is merely the substitution of the second promise for the first; and the reasons assigned for it show that it ought not to be adopted except when the remedy upon the former is as effectual as upon the latter. Accordingly, where one of the joint owners of a vessel purchased supplies for her, and gave therefor a negotiable promissory note in their joint names, but without authority from the other owners, it was held that the note was not an extinguishment of the original cause of action, and that the plaintiff might recover on the original promise. Wilkins v. Reed, 6 Me. 220. To the same effect, also, is the case of Descadellas v. Harris, 8 Me. 298, where it was expressly held, that a negotiable security given in a foreign country is not to be regarded in the courts of Maine as an extinguishment of a simple contract debt created abroad, unless it is so considered by the laws of the country where the contract was made. That case is also a direct authority to the point that the giving of such security is only presumptive evidence of the intent to extinguish the prior simple contract debt, and that, like all other presumptions of fact, it is liable to be repelled by the circumstances. Some of the circumstances which will repel that presumption were considered by the court in that case, and others have been considered in still later cases.

In Fowler v. Ludwig, 34 Me. 455, Shepley, C. J., said, if the negotiable paper was accepted in ignorance of the facts, or under a misapprehension of the rights of the parties, it has been held that the presumption might be considered as rebutted. French v. Price, 24 Pick. 13. So if the paper accepted is not binding upon all the parties previously liable; or if the paper of a third person be received, not expressly in payment, the presumption may be considered as repelled. Melledge v. Boston Iron Co., 5 Cush. 158. Any fraud or undue advantage practised by the debtor in procuring the acceptance of the new security will have the effect to defeat that presumption; and in such case the creditor may resort to the original promise to recover his debt. Hervey v. Harvey, 15 Me. 357.

In determining the question whether the creditor intended to extinguish the original promise, the fact that he held collateral security for the performance of the contract is a material circumstance, and has so been considered in courts where it is held that the unexplained reception of the new security afforded a prima facie presumption that it was received in payment; and the courts of Maine and of Massachusetts have nowhere held that it is not sufficient of itself to rebut the presumption that the creditor intended to accept the negotiable note as a substitute for the original promise, so as to deprive him of his collateral security. On the contrary, the case of Butts v. Dean, 2 Metc. [Mass.] 76, affords strong ground to conclude that the supreme court of Massachusetts is inclined to hold that it would be sufficient. See, also, Fowler v. Bush, 21 Pick. 230; Huse v. Alexander, 2 Metc. [Mass.] 157; Page v. Hubbard [Case No. 10,663]. Judge Sprague held in the case last named that the doctrine of the courts of Massachusetts does not go further than to consider the taking of a negotiable instrument as a substitute for a pre-existing debt, where that would not impair any security or right of the creditor, and accordingly determined in the case before him that the lien was not displaced or impaired by the subsequent taking of negotiable promissory notes. Without laying down any general rule as applicable to all cases, but confining the decision to the question under consideration, I am of opinion, on the facts of this case, that the bills of exchange were not received in payment of the repairs and supplies, and consequently that the lien was not displaced by that transaction. They were made and furnished in the port of a state other than the one to which the vessel belonged, and the bills of exchange were drawn and received by the libellant under the law of Virginia, where the taking of a negotiable security for a pre-existing debt is not presumed to be payment. The Chusan [Id. 2,717]. Those bills were accepted by one only of the owners of the vessel who were liable for the original debt; and there is much reason to conclude from the evidence, that when he accepted them, it was with the intent to defraud the libellant out of his debt. For these reasons, as well as for the one already mentioned, that the account current shows that it was not the intention of the parties that the account should be considered as extinguished until the last bill of exchange was paid, I hold that the lien in this case is not displaced; and as the bills of exchange were produced at the hearing, and remain on the files of the court to be cancelled, the libellant is entitled to recover in this suit. The decree of the district court is therefore affirmed with costs.

[NOTE. By the local laws of Maine and Massachusetts, the acceptance of the debtor's negotiable paper for a pre-existing debt by simple contract is a payment and extinguishment of the debt. The Betsy and Rhoda, Case No. 1,366; Palmer v. Elliott, Id. 10 690; Baker v. Draper, Id. 766; Kimball v. The Anna Kimball, Id. 7,772; Hudson v. Bradley, Id. 6,833. The reason of this departure from the principles of the common law is that the debtor might be inconvenienced and possibly obliged to pay the debt twice, as he could not defend against an innocent indorsee. The Betsy and Rhoda, supra. The law presumes that the creditor who has taken the security has renounced his right of action on the original contract. But this presumption may be rebutted by circumstances showing that the intention was otherwise, or that the paper accepted was not binding on all the parties previously liable, or that there was fraud, concealment, or the like. The Betsy and Rhoda, supra; Palmer v. Elliott, supra; Baker v. Draper, supra; Kimball v. The Anna Kimball, supra; Hudson v. Bradley, supra. The rule should be cautiously applied where the remedy on the new security is not as good and effectual as upon the one for which it was substituted. Baker v. Draper, supra.]

[1 Hayw. & H. 246.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 21, 1846.

DISSOLUTION OF INJUNCTION ON BILL AND ANSWER.

Upon a motion to dissolve an injunction upon bill and answer, the charges in the bill being fully met and denied by answer but denial partly upon information and belief, and the court upon inquiry concludes that there are such facts and circumstances appearing upon the face of the plaintiff's bill, which when taken in connection with the answer upon the points denied upon belief only as are equivalent to the testimony of a witness upon such points, then this injunction should be dissolved.

[In equity. Bill by Henry Carter against J. M. Carlisle, J. B. Gardiner & Co., Franklin Gardiner, and R. C. Washington, to set aside a deed of trust, and for other relief. Complainant obtained a preliminary injunction, which defendants now move to dissolve.]

It appears that Mr. Washington was engaged in this city in 1845 in the dry goods business, and had some of his paper remaining out in September in the same year, at which time he and Mr. Carter became partners in the same business; that they continued as partners till January, 1846. During the partnership all Mr. Washington's paper was retired, and the partnership paper substituted to an amount upon which the parties differ; that the terms of dissolution were that Mr. C. should take goods to the amount he invested in the partnership, and make a further purchase of $3,000 of goods from Washington, and that Washington should pay all the debts, and that he would indemnify Carter and hold him harmless. Mr. C. charges that Washington, Gardiner & Co. and F. Gardiner, after the dissolution, by false and fraudulent representation, induced the other creditors of the firm to extend the partnership paper; and by the same means induced them to sell Washington a large stock of goods on credit, and under the assurance that no lien existed or should be given upon any of the stock. Yet (he charges) three days after the goods were received in Washington he (W.), in pursuance of a fraudulent agreement with Gardiner & Co. and F. Gardiner, made a deed of all he possessed to J. M. Carlisle, in trust for the benefit of said G. & Co. and F. G. Mr. C. prays upon these grounds, insomuch as he is bound upon the partnership paper outstanding, and not upon Washington's individual debts, and all Washington's assets are conveyed to the use of said Gardiner & Co. and F. Gardiner, that the deed be set aside, and a receiver appointed for the benefit of all the creditors. Under the deed mentioned above, Mr. Carlisle, as trustee, took possession of the goods, and was about to sell them when Mr. Carter filed this bill (June 22, 1846) and obtained an injunction restraining him from so doing. The defendants answered the bill, and denied every allegation of fraud, confederacy and false representation charged therein, as well as many of the statements of fact.

Jos. H. Bradley, for plaintiff.
Lenox and Jas. M. Carlisle, for defendants.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, after reviewing the facts in the bill and answer, and remarking that the charges in the bill carefully met and denied by the answer, as far as charges against these defendants, proceeds to inquire whether there are such circumstances appearing upon the complainants' case as would be equivalent to the testimony of a witness in support of the answer upon these points denied by belief only, and, after detailing them, concludes that these facts and circumstances appear to me to be entirely inconsistent with the supposition that there was any lien or trust on the stock of goods conveyed by the deed, as claimed by the complainant, Carter, and that these circumstances, taken in connection with the answer, which expressly denies all notice of such lien, are sufficient to overcome the allegations in the bill. If there even were such an agreement as stated in the bill, I think it must be considered as personal, and that the complainant trusted to the personal security and personal contract of Washington, of which contract the defendants have had no notice. The fact that Carter still enjoys the benefit of the part of the agreement which gave him possession of so great a part of the goods, thereby affirming the agreement, as before alluded to, his silence again during a period of time long enough to have made himself more fully acquainted with all the circumstances he complains of without warning the public thereof, and the other circumstances before stated, are sufficient in my mind to show that there is no truth in the charge. I think the condition also sufficiently proved, and on the whole think the injunction ought to be dissolved.

Case No. 2,475.

CARTER et al. v. CARTER et al.

[1 MacA. Pat. Cas. 388.]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June, 1855.

PATENTS —"NUT-MAKING MACHINE" — INTERFERENCE—NEW PARTY— SUPPLEMENTARY EVIDENCE — APPEAL FROM COMMISSIONER'S DECISION — PRIOR INVENTIONS.

[1. A decision of the commissioner denying a patent to either party on interference is appealable, although there is no decision as to which of the applicants is the prior inventor.]

[2. The right to appeal from a commissioner's decision exists, although no time is limited within which to take the appeal.]

[See In re Janney, Case No. 7,209.]

[3. The addition of another party to an interference does not change its nature, so as to make it entirely a new case, where the subsequent proceedings show it to be a rehearing or new trial as to the original parties, as well as to the issues to which the new applicant is to be considered a party.]

[4. Where a new party is allowed to come in on rehearing or new trial of an interference, he comes in subject to the testimony as to priority of invention previously taken in the case.]

[5. The first person who conceives the idea of a process of manufacture, and contrives the means of giving effect to that idea, is the prior inventor.]

[6. Where testimony fails to satisfactorily show that the machine of a person claiming prior invention possessed in the course and order of its operation the necessary and essential feature of the invention claimed, and he admits that there never was any product or attempted production by his machine prior to an examination of the machine of another devised for the same purpose, and that he received explanations as to its mechanism, and at that time did not say or pretend that he had ever invented a machine on substantially the same principles, but, on the contrary, advised an application for a patent for the other machine, he cannot be considered the prior inventor.]

[7. Supplementary testimony as to occurrences of almost 20 years prior, to supply deficiencies in testimony given in a former proceeding, should be cautiously received, especially where a nice point of invention is sought to be established.]

[See Wellman v. Blood, Case No. 17,385.]

[8. The invention of Isaac H. Steer for a machine for making nuts for bolts (for which a patent numbered 13,118 was subsequently granted to Henry Carter) is entitled to priority as against the invention of William Kenyon, for which patent No. 8,427 was granted to Joseph P. Haigh and others.]

[9. Henry Carter and James Rees are entitled to a reissue of letters patent No. 8,322, for improvements made upon the Steer machine, to adapt it to working by power.]

[Appeal from the commissioner of patents.

[On interference. Applications of Henry Carter, assignee of Isaac H. Steer, for a machine for making nuts for bolts; of Henry Carter and James Rees for a reissue of letters patent No. 8,322, granted August 26, 1851, for a like machine; and of Joseph P. Haigh, Andrew Hartupee, and Joseph Morrow, assignees of William Kenyon, for a reissue of letters patent No. 8,427, granted October 14, 1851. From a decision of the commissioner of patents denying the applications, the applicants Henry Carter, assignee, and Carter and Rees, appeal.]

P. H. Watson, for appellants.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. Carter and Rees, in stating their claim in their specification, say: "We are aware that Isaac H. Steers, on about the year 1840, proposed to make nuts by the process we have here described, but never completed a machine which would do this automatically; therefore we do not claim the process in itself and irrespective of machinery; but being the first to construct a machine capable of making nuts by this process, without any other or further manipulation than is required for feeding in the bar of iron, we claim as our invention, and desire to secure by letters-patent, the machine substantially as herein described for making nuts, by cutting the blank from a heated bar of iron, punching its eye in a closed die-box, pressing it into shape while in the die-box and on the punch, and then discharging it as specified." In describing the operation of compression, they say: "The punching and compressing of the blank is effected as above described while the latter is within the die-box. It is therefore supported at its sides by the sides of the die-box, which prevent the enlargement or straining of the nut under the action of the eye-punch, and is compressed between the cutting and counter-dies while the nut is on the eye-punch and within the die-box." According to the principles of the specification, they produced their model before the commissioner in this case; and the commissioner, in assigning the reasons for the conclusion to which he came, says: "William Kenyon, the inventor, is also introduced as a witness, who states that the principle upon which his machine operates was precisely like that of the machine now sought to be patented by the present contestants. He refers also to the model marked 'D,' which he says operated in the same way as his original machine." The commissioner then says: "The working of this model is in accordance with the claims now placed in interference (meaning model 'D'); so that if this testimony is to be credited, the case is fully made out." From which it is to be inferred, in favor of said Carter and Rees, that the patentability of their invention, as shown by the said model, was admitted as showing the true invention. Their application was filed on the 14th of March, 1854, stating that they had obtained letters-patent for improvements in machines for forming the nuts for bolts and other articles of similar form, which letters-patent were dated on the 26th of August, 1851 (No. 8,322); that they then believed the same were inoperative and invalid, by reason of a defective specification, which defect had arisen from inadvertence and mistake; they therefore desired and offered to surrender the same, and prayed new letters to be granted, according to the aforesaid amended specification.

The appellees say: "What is claimed as the invention of William Kenyon, and is desired to be secured by letters-patent, is cutting a nut or washer from a heated bar, punching a hole therein for the screw, and compressing the said nut or washer into the desired shape at a single operation; also the compressing and discharging the nut or washer by means of the follower or hollow piston, the bracket, the cross-head, and the moving die-box, constructed and operating substantially as described." The principle and mode of operation of the machine is particularly described. It will only be necessary, however, here to state the latter part of it: "The mandrel P, being prevented from receding by the bracket Q, prevents the bar from tilting, whilst the die as it advances cuts off the end of the bar; as the shoving-head advances further by the turning of the shaft B it strikes against the bracket Q, and causes the said bracket to carry forward the mandrel P against the nut in the die M with such force as to give it the desired shape, by pressing the nut into the die and causing it to conform to the shape of the cavity therein. By the time that the shoving-head is half way on its stroke and the bar is half cut through, the heel of the interior cam H urges the round-punch forward through the nut, and returns with a quick motion, to prevent its exposure to the action of the heat of the nut, cuts a round bur out of its centre, forming a circular hole for the screw, and deposits the bur in the hole U in the centre of the square punch T." This application was filed the 10th of August, 1853. They also state that as assignees of William Kenyon they did obtain letters-patent for a new and improved machine for cutting and perforating iron nuts and washers at one operation, which letters-patent were dated the 14th day of October, 1851 (No. 8,427); that they believed the same was inoperative and invalid, by reason of a defective specification, &c. They therefore prayed that they might be allowed to surrender the same and amend, and that letters might be granted according to the aforegoing specification.

The claim of Carter, assignee of Steer, appears from the specification to be—First, making a nut at a single operation from a heated bar or plate of metal, by cutting off the blank from the bar, punching a hole or eye through it, and swaging it into shape, substantially as set forth in the specification; second, punching the eye of the nut in a die or press-box, by which it is surrounded and firmly supported, and thus prevented from straining or bursting during the operation, substantially as set forth; third, shaping nuts by subjecting them, while hot, to powerful and sudden compression on the punch and in the punching-die, substantially as therein set forth, whereby they are finished with such a degree of smoothness and regularity and precision that they are fit to use in the construction of most kinds of machinery, and are sounder and stronger than unpressed nuts made by machinery. This appears to be dated 13th August, 1852. In the original proceeding there were other parties and claims; but none are now before me other than those I have stated; on the issues and evidence in which cases the commissioner, on the 21st of October, 1854, decided priority of invention, and awarded the same to Kenyon, assignor of Haigh, Hartupee, and Morrow, and limited the appeal to the fourth Monday of November then next. In the reasons for his opinion he states, in substance, that the subject-matter of the then interference was before the office, in February then last, when it was held that the proof as then presented did not show either of the contestants to have been the first inventor of that which they claimed; that Carter and Rees have since become parties, new testimony has been taken, and a new investigation became necessary; that by special agreement a portion of the testimony taken in the former case had been transferred to this. As far as that agreement extends, such testimony would be received and considered; but beyond that, no regard would be paid to the testimony filed in the previous case for any purpose whatever; that the invention then in interference was the making of nuts of hot iron by the several contestants in the manner severally described by them; that it does not consist in the mere making and punching the nuts, but in compressing them into shape and punching them while so compressed. The person who first conceived the idea of doing this, and contrived the means of giving effect to that idea, should be deemed the prior inventor. That Kenyon claimed to have done this in 1835. If he really did this, there will be no further cause of controversy, as none of the competitors attempt to fix a date so early by several years. On the previous trial it was held that though Kenyon doubtless had at that time contrived some sort of a machine for making nuts or washers, there was no sufficient evidence that it either did or was intended to work upon the principle we have above stated. The commissioner asks: "Has the defect in the testimony been now remedied?" He then proceeds to review the testimony, which consisted principally of a re-examination on the part of the appellants of the same witnesses, and on the same subjects as on the former occasion, and says if this testimony is to be credited the case is fully made out; that he should have no hesitation in coming to such conclusion but for the cross-examination of P. H. Watson detailing the statements of Bradbury, when called upon by the counsel for the assignees of Kenyon for the statements of Bradbury. The witness says, among other things: "He stated that if he should testify, his evidence would be fatal to Kenyon's claim as the inventor of the machine. He said, also, that Kenyon never invented a machine that would make nuts."

The commissioner considers these statements as evidence in the case, and as such must have their weight, but thought that there were circumstances in the case which impaired their weight, and says: "Upon a general view of all the testimony in this case, I am induced (though with some hesitation) to come to the conclusion that Kenyon had really in 1835 or 1836 made the invention for which he is now an applicant for a patent, and that he is therefore the first inventor thereof." As an appeal is supposed to be taken from the first decision of the commissioner on the subject of this case (alluded to by him in the foregoing opinion) on the 6th of February, 1854, it may be proper to notice the grounds of that opinion. The subject-matter of the interference and decision was the same. The commissioner distinguishes between what is a requisite degree of compression to sustain an invention for making and punching nuts of considerable thickness before the punch is withdrawn, in order that they may be swaged into uniform shape and regular thickness, having the hole perpendicular to the upper and lower faces of the nut, as in the present application, and the case where thin pieces of metal are to be perforated, when nothing of the kind is necessary. He further says: "But the proof does not satisfy me that Kenyon ever invented the subject-matter of the present interference;" and he proceeds to state the particular deficiencies. As to that of Cochrane's, he says: "He does not seem to have a clear conception of the chief point of the invention, as he states that he cannot say whether they were pressed before or after they were punched." So, as to Kenyon, he says: "Even Kenyon himself does not set forth the working of his machine in such a way as to show that it effected the objects aimed at in the patents now applied for; that is to say, punching the nuts while under pressure, or an equivalent thereof." It is true that Cochrane and Kenyon both state that the machine invented by the latter was like that produced in evidence; but this is a very loose way of describing a machine in a case where a nice point is sought to be established. So with respect to Vivian's testimony. He says "that witness says this (the model produced as Kenyon's on that examination) was very unlike that brought to him in 1850 by Kenyon and Hartupee as Kenyon's invention, and from which he made drawings, and would necessarily, therefore, have noticed the peculiarities of the machine." The commissioner notices, also, the laches and neglect on the part of Kenyon in applying for a patent, being nearly twenty years from the time he dates his invention, and his carelessness in suffering it to be thrown about and at length destroyed, instead of putting it into practical use. He says: "It is not unreasonable to presume that but for the discoveries of others this machine would never again have been heard from." Finally he says that Kenyon was proved to have visited and inspected the nut machine in operation in Carter and Rees' shop. There is no doubt that he saw and examined the machine. And it is shown by disinterested testimony that he had more difficulty in understanding its operation than would be likely to be felt by one who had invented substantially the same thing. Up to that time his machine had never been used for this purpose. "I feel bound, therefore, to conclude that Kenyon derived his first knowledge of the true nut machine from the machine which he saw in Carter and Rees' establishment, and which is shown by Barret's testimony possessed the properties described in the claim now placed in interference."

The commissioner then proceeds to consider the pretensions of Steer to the invention; says that it is admitted that he had a machine in operation in 1841 on which he made nuts from heated iron; but nothing would warrant the conclusion that he ever entertained the idea which is at the bottom of this invention. The mere punching of a hole through a nut is not that idea. The punching of that hole while the nut is inclosed in the die-box does not reach the point. The nut must be compressed, either at the moment of being punched or after it is so punched, and before the punch is withdrawn, in order to reach the point of patentability; and, as before intimated, the commissioner concludes this opinion by saying: "The only decision, therefore, which can now be made is to deny a patent to either, which is accordingly done." The appellees object that the judge has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal from this last-mentioned decision, because the law allows an appeal only in the case where the commissioner decides which of the applicants is the prior inventor; and the commissioner has not awarded priority to either, and does not decide the question at all as between the parties. That may be true; but he does deny a patent to either; and it is from the decision that refuses to grant the patent to him as applied for that the law allows the appeal. And as no time was limited within which he was to take his appeal, no sufficient reason, it is supposed, existed against the right; but if this were not so, it will be hereafter shown that, notwithstanding the fact of another party's being added, that does not so change its nature as to make it entirely a new case; and the subsequent proceedings show it to be a rehearing or new trial as to the original parties, as well as the issues in which the new applicant is to be considered a party. The cases, therefore, will be considered together.

The first and second reasons for the appeal in the first case are general—for having refused the patent to the appellants and for granting it to the appellees. The third and fourth for error in the effect given to the testimony of the witness Cochrane. The fifth because of error in the speculative views of the commissioner as to the practical working of iron in the manufacture of nuts, and the value of the appearance of the products of a nut machine as a test of the modus operandi of said machine. The sixth and seventh are as to the effect given to Daft's testimony, and that of William Kenyon. The eighth for refusing to permit the appellants to use the depositions of Kenyon, Corcoran, and Daft, taken by and on behalf of William Kenyon, assignees on the former trial, and given in evidence on said trial by said assignees before the commissioner, and now remaining on the files in said case, for the purpose of showing variances and discrepancies between them and the depositions of said witnesses taken and used in the present trial by said appellants on the same subject-matter. In the other case the first is a general reason for denying a patent, &c. The second is that Steer's machine, which was constructed in 1841, would allow of no compression of the nut while on the eye punch, and that the original invention did not contemplate such compression. Third. By deciding that the eye punch in Steer's machine of 1841 was made largest at the outer end, according to one of the forms suggested in his specification filed in the patent office in that year, and that if the nut were compressed around the punch thus formed it could not have been removed. The others are in substance the same with those in the first case.

The first reason which will be considered is the eighth, upon the subject of the refusal to permit the first set of depositions to be used in evidence by the appellants for the purpose therein stated. I pursue this course because it will be then ascertained what evidence is or is not deemed to be in the case; as to which refusal the commissioner says: "By special agreement a portion of the testimony taken in the former case has been transferred to this. As far as that agreement extends, such testimony will be received and considered; but beyond that, no regard will now be paid to the testimony filed in the previous case for any purpose whatsoever." The commissioner assigns no reason for the refusal, but the counsel for the appellees protested against the right to use the testimony taken in the former case to discredit the witnesses on that trial because—First, that inasmuch as the first interference case was declared between different parties, different questions might arise. When the testimony referred to was taken, Carter and Rees had not made their application. Steer's implement for making nuts was very different from the machine of Carter and Rees, and therefore a different kind and degree of testimony and proof was requisite in the two cases. Second. Haigh, Hartupee, and Morrow, assignees of Kenyon, did not know, until the opinion given, the ground on which the interference was supposed by the commissioner to consist, and therefore did not fully examine the witnesses on the first occasion. It would be wrong, therefore, to endeavor to force testimony into the present case which had not been taken for that purpose. Third. If apparent discrepancies exist in the testimony of the same witnesses in the two cases they could have been satisfactorily explained if due notice had been given. "They ought to have pointed out to the witnesses on the cross-examination the supposed discrepancies. To ascertain the correct principles on this point, it may be proper to advert briefly to the historical facts pertaining to this particular matter. The subject-matter or invention on both trials was precisely the same. The original interferences declared were between Carter, assignee of Steer, and Haigh, Hartupee and Morrow, assignees of Kenyon, David Howell, and Lauriston Town. The specifications were the same. The testimony or depositions of these same witnesses were again taken by the appellees, and used by them on the trial of the issues in this case, with additions to them. The only material difference since the first trial and opinion as to the parties and subject-matter worthy of notice was a new application by Carter and Rees for their invention, and a further interference declared in consequence thereof.

The opinion, as has been already stated, was given in February, 1854, which was that neither of the parties were entitled to a patent for the reasons stated. At that stage of the cause an application was made by counsel on behalf of the appellees for a reconsideration of the decision, and a learned argument was addressed to the commissioner, dated the 16th May, 1854, on the subject; in concluding which argument he says: "Finally, we hope the commissioner will reconsider the matter, either upon the testimony already taken and the question of law arising on them, or upon further testimony to be taken, when we have no doubt of showing from himself that Mr. Vivian's statement was certainly misunderstood." Shortly after this, leave was given to said original parties and to the said Carter and Rees to take testimony for the purpose of being used, as stated in the notices of this reissue or new trial before the commissioner, on the day stated in said notices, under which authority the present depositions of Cochrane, Daft, Kenyon, Vivian, and others were re-examined on the same points, and the additions to their depositions made, on which examination cross-interrogatories were propounded suited to call their attention to what they had stated in their original depositions, and to the variances between those and the present; and furthermore, notice was subsequently given by the appellants to the appellees of their intention to use said depositions for said purpose on this trial. If this trial could have been confined to the original parties only, according to well-settled principles of law, I suppose no doubt could have been entertained that the appellants would have been permitted to use the old depositions for the purposes they wished to use them for on this occasion. What difference, then, does the coming in of the new parties make in the principle? The general rule certainly is, that where the parties are not the same, either identical or in privity, the evidence is not admissible, because there is no mutuality, and the new parties would not have had an opportunity of cross-examination. But from the nature of this peculiar proceeding, where new parties, applicants for the same invention, may be allowed to come in and have a proceeding adapted to the new condition of things, the rule of evidence which will be applicable resembles more a proceeding in chancery than otherwise. He will be received only on the terms of being subject to the testimony which either of the parties have previously taken in the case. To which effect the rule is laid down in 1 Greenl. Ev. § 553: "We have seen that in regard to the admissibility of a former judgment in evidence, it is generally necessary that there be a perfect mutuality between the parties, neither being concluded unless both are alike bound. But" (speaking of a proceeding in chancery) "with respect to depositions, though this rule is admitted in its general principle, yet it is applied with more latitude of discretion, and complete mutuality or identity is not required. It is generally deemed sufficient if the matters in issue were the same in both cases, and the party against whom the deposition is offered had full power to cross-examine the witness." I think, therefore, the appellants ought to have been permitted to use the said depositions in the trial of said issue, and that they may be considered as a part of the evidence now to be acted upon.

My purpose is next to consider the reasons relating to the effect of the testimony as it tends to support the issue on the part of the appellees. The commissioner gives a description of the invention of which that issue is formed, by saying that it consists of "the punching of holes in nuts of hot iron of considerable thickness, while their sides are sustained laterally by the corresponding sides of a die-box, and also while they are firmly compressed above and below, (or at least such compression should be exerted upon them before the punch is withdrawn,) in order that they may be swaged into uniform shape and regular thickness, having the hole perpendicular to the upper and lower faces of the nut;" that it is a nice point sought to be established, and should be satisfactorily made out by the proof. He states, also, certain tests in the attainment thereof; that "the mere punching of the hole through a nut is not that idea; the punching of that hole while the nut is inclosed in a die-box does not reach the point; the nut must be compressed either at the moment of being punched or after it is so punched, and before the punch is withdrawn, in order to reach the point of patentability," as before stated. This, then, is the standard which the proof must show the first and original invention to have arrived at or been matured by him.

The commissioner's view and reflections, as expressed in his first opinion, on the effect of the proof on the part of the appellees, are, I think, perfectly correct and just, and such as I shall adopt. On that occasion the proof did not satisfy him that Kenyon ever invented the subject-matter of the then interference, and which interference, so far as it respects that matter, is now the same. The question, then, as stated by himself, is, "Have the objections which then existed been removed by the additional testimony?" The question, however, is not as he considered it, with the exclusion of the testimony originally taken, but I think in connection with it. Under any circumstances, the great lapse of time—almost twenty years—which had taken place before the witnesses were called on to state the facts relating to a case where so nice a point is sought to be established, must, in the nature of things, make it very difficult to get at the real truth of the facts as they existed, unless where reduced to writing, and much more so under the circumstances existing at the time when and for the purpose this re-examination was made. That testimony was obtained from the same witnesses, on the same subject, after an apparent full previous examination, with the assistance of very able counsel, and after the decision by the commissioner stating particularly the points in which the former proof was deemed by him deficient, and particularly what it was thought certain features in the invention still required proof of, which opinion was made known to one, if not more, of the witnesses by the assignees before or on their re-examination—can it be doubted that this was calculated unduly to lead the minds of the witnesses to the further proof which the party wished them to make? Under the fairest aspect under which it can be looked at, it would be surely quite, if not more objectionable than would be leading interrogatories, answers to which, according to the settled principles of evidence, would be inadmissible in evidence. What may have been the full extent of its influence on this occasion it is not for me to determine. There certainly are strange and unaccountable inconsistencies and discrepancies between their testimony on the former occasion and that on this. I wish to be understood as not intending to impute any intentional misconduct to any one.

To begin with Mr. Vivian: He says that in 1850 Kenyon and Hartupee brought to him a model, (which it is presumed was that of Kenyon's invention,) from which he made drawings (and would probably note the peculiarities of the machine). This, he says, was very unlike that produced in evidence, both in its principle and combinations. On his examination for the present occasion, in his answer to an interrogatory put on the part of the appellants' counsel—whether he was asked to correct his testimony to meet the objections of the commissioner, having before stated that the opinion had been shown to him by Haigh—he said: "I was not asked to do so; but on reading the opinion of the commissioner, and finding that on my previous testimony no question had been asked on the question of pressure of the nut, or its being sustained laterally in the die-box during the operation of punching, I was prepared at the next examination to give testimony on those particulars." Corcoran's testimony seems to be relied on by the commissioner as unquestionably true in his statements respecting Kenyon's machine of 1836. In the operation of compressing the nuts, (being a fact, as he says, in regard to which he would be less likely to be mistaken than he was in relation to the principle upon which the two machines operated,) the witness says the actual compression would be a tangible fact, evinced by the appearance of the nut itself. Let his testimony about other facts equally tangible be examined, and by comparison of himself with himself it will be found that this is a mistaken confidence. On the former examination he described the nuts to be a quarter of an inch in thickness; since which time the commissioner in his opinion has said the nuts must be of considerable thickness. On his last examination, as if to meet this objection, he says the nuts were three-quarters of an inch thick. On his first examination he stated the machine to be three feet high; on the next, two feet four inches; on the first, two feet wide; on this, three feet six inches; on the first, four feet long; on the second, four and a half feet long; on the first, that Kenyon said he was going to try the hot iron; on the second, he said that he saw iron nuts three-quarters by a quarter, which Kenyon told him he had made by the machine; but Kenyon swears he never made an iron nut, nor had any experience in making hot-pressed nuts by machinery. With respect to the arrangement and order of operation of the machine on the former occasion, he said the bar was forced into the die by the square punch. In his last examination he says that the box moved up by a stroke of the cam towards the stationary punch, cut off the bar, and pressed it into the box; while pressed, the round punch moved up. In his first examination he cannot say whether the nut was pressed before or after the hole was punched. In his last he says they were pressed before and at the time they were punched; and there are still several other inconsistencies and discrepancies in material matters. What, then, is the rule of law which ought to be applied? If it has been from design, then the rule is falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus; if from ignorance or a careless inadvertence, still all confidence in the truth of what he has said must be lost.

Next, as to Kenyon's testimony. The commissioner, in the remarks contained in his first opinion on this part of the testimony, says Kenyon himself does not set forth the working of his machine in such a way as to show that it effected the objects aimed at in the patents now applied for; that is to say, punching the nuts while under pressure, or an equivalent thereof. In alluding to the model "D," then before him, and deemed insufficient as respected the order of its operation, he says: "But even if intended to work in the precise manner required for the purposes of this case, it is by no means certain that Kenyon's machine was like it in this particular." On this examination Kenyon says that the model "D" (Reinhart) was exactly like his machine of 1835, except in size; also that there was a difference in the course of the operation between the round punch of the model there identified and the one at Washington, but that it operates for the same purpose for both, and was intended to do the same kind of work. This difference in the order of the operations having been considered essentially defective, on the examinations for the present issue, to supply the defects, Kenyon testifies, in substance, that the machine of 1835, in its order of operation of the round punch and other operative parts, was the same as the model at Washington, upon which the application is based; that the combination of dies, punches, and swedges are just alike in the mode of operation, by which it is supposed he intended to convey the idea that the order and course of operation were the same. If so, it is very apparent that he has contradicted himself in a very material point. Again, if the description he has given of the size of his machine be correct, can it be true, as he has stated, that he made the nuts of the stated thickness and breadth by operating the machine himself, and without any assistance? It was utterly impossible. The same rule of law laid down as applicable to the testimony of Corcoran must apply to this. Again, Richardson, who was applied to by Kenyon in the spring of 1845 to make drawings for him of his machine, says, as it respects the operation, that the nut was in the first place cut off, then pressed, and then punched—the pressing and punching being two distinct operations. In this, also, there is a material difference. Kenyon says it was all done by one operation.

The testimony of Bradbury, although it might be considered somewhat lessened in its credit by the circumstance stated by the commissioner, cannot be said to be without some measure of weight. He said that his evidence would be fatal to Kenyon's claim as the inventor of the machine; that Kenyon never invented a machine that would make nuts. This witness had the most amply opportunity of knowing.

Daft, on his first examination, says he does not remember whether or not the nuts were pressed in a closed die box, nor can he say whether they were pressed before or after they were punched; and though he had some of the nuts in his hand, he could not tell of what kind of metal they were made. He thought at the time they were of iron. On his second examination he says the operation was in his presence; and he is then brought to say it formed iron nuts and pressed them, and they appeared to be smooth. He betrays too much ignorance and inconsistency to entitle his testimony to much weight. There is proof in the case that Kenyon visited the shop of Carter and Rees in August, 1850, to examine their nut machine, on which occasion, in the course of half an hour or more, at his request, explanations were made to him how Carter and Rees' machine worked. He was shown the die box, how the nut was pressed and punched, and how it was discharged. He could not understand how the bottom die worked on the punch, &c. He on that occasion does not say or pretend that he had ever invented a machine substantially on the same principles. On the contrary, advises the application for a patent at once. Let this be connected with what Kenyon himself admits, that he never made or tried to make hot nuts on his machine previous to seeing that of Carter and Rees' machines, and also with the absence of sufficient proof on the part of the appellees to show satisfactorily that the machine of 1835 or 1836 possessed in the course and order of its operations those essential features of the invention, as before stated in the opinion of the commissioner to be necessary. With the commissioner, I feel myself bound to conclude that Kenyon derived his first knowledge of the true nut machine, now the subject of interference, from the machine which he saw in Carter and Rees' establishment; and upon the whole, that he was not the original inventor, as claimed on the present issue; and that the priority of invention ought not to have been so awarded. I will next consider the case of Carter, assignee of Steer. The reasons of appeal are the same with those in the case just considered, except the first three. The only special ones are the second and third. The second relates to the compression of the nut while on the eye punch, which the commissioner decided Steer's invention did not contemplate. The third is intended to cover his objection that the eye punch was made largest at the outer end. With respect to the description of the eye punch being largest at the outer end, as stated in the original specification, and intended thereby only to show one of the forms in which the invention might be executed, this is omitted in the present specification, nor does it appear to have been adopted in the model filed in the office. It is therefore unnecessary to decide whether the inference drawn by the commissioner from that circumstance was correct or not. I have with great care examined the model just alluded to—on one occasion with a very skillful expert, mutually agreed on by the parties, and in their presence and alone several times subsequently—and am entirely satisfied that it possesses the important peculiar feature in the operation of the machine of effecting perfect compression of the nut whilst the punch continues in it, by an additional after-pressure, so as to weld up the fissures and obliterate the defects produced by punching the eye. But the views I have already taken will make its application to the model of the appellees before the commissioner unnecessary. I think the following is a correct description of Steer's model: The die box was placed below with a punch in it, both stationary. The swage constituted the bottom of the box. The square punch was placed above and opposite the open side of the box. When this square punch was withdrawn, the end of the bar of heated iron was laid upon the mouth of the box; when the square punch was suddenly and forcibly thrust forward, it separated the piece of metal of which a nut was to be made, carried it into the box upon the eye punch which made the perforations, and, carrying the piece thus punched still forward against the swage or bottom of the box, powerfully compressed it between the square punch and the swage and around the eye punch, which was still in the perforation, thus giving perfect form and compression to the nut, and rewelding and compressing the parts in the eye which had been disturbed, torn, rent, and displaced. The whole is done by a single forward motion of the square punch. The swage was then thrown up, the box and eye punch remaining stationary, and the nut thereby discharged. Now, if this is sustained by the proof, all the conditions stated in the commissioner's opinion will have been gratified. First. It is admitted "that a machine constructed according to the plan represented in the annexed drawing marked 'D' was in use by said Steer for the purpose of experiment in 1841, and that he made sound nuts of iron of uniform and symmetrical form. By means of said machine the same nuts were made champered or beveled at the edges of one side by the powerful compression to which they were subjected in the die-box; that three or more nuts were cut off a heated bar, and properly formed without reheating the bar; and that no practical difficulty was found in the operation of the machine." The drawing "D" is an exact copy, on a reduced scale, of the drawing attached to Carter's application as Steer's assignee, and is an exact copy of the drawing attached to Steer's original application in 1841, and is an exact representation of the machine described in both specifications. Secondly. In addition to this is the testimony of John Fenton, who says he had formerly been a manufacturer of woollen goods by machinery; that in 1841 Steer made a working machine, which was like the model machine deposited by said Steer in the patent office, and which the witness has seen there, and which remained there at the time of giving his testimony. Said model is like the said machine in all essential respects. He had frequently examined said machine. He saw it in operation in 1841. It was operated by Isaac H. Steer in person, with the assistance of Joel Lupton. He went there after the machine was constructed and in the shop, and they took some hot iron to show the witness the operation of the machine, and cut some nuts. The machine made several nuts at one heat of the bar; he can't say how many exactly. They were well made, smooth, and greatly superior to the hand-made nuts, being perfectly smooth and compressed, so much so that he carried some of them to be exhibited to the neighbors. All of the nuts were pressed into the same die and punched by the same punch, and were consequently—that is, all from the same bar of metal—exactly alike. By their general appearance and by their use (upon witness' own tools and wagons, they being in constant use) he knew that they were perfect in strength. The compression of the nut was perfect on all sides. The nuts were made as fast as a man could swing a sledge, as every stroke of the sledge made a nut. There was no difficulty in clearing the punchings or in throwing out the nut when it was completed. If there had been, they could not have gone on with the operation. The compression of the nut took place while the punch was in the eye of the nut and while the eye was being punched. He considered it a great labor-saving machine, and so he does now, and of great utility. The nuts which he saw made on the machine in question were of the usual proportions of wagon nuts and nuts for machinery, and they were of full thickness. The top of the nut was beveled at the corners, showing the powerful operation of the punch while in the die box. The nut took precisely the reverse form of the die. This proof appears to me to be very full and conclusive to show that in the year 1841 Steer had invented the nut machine according to all the tests stated by the commissioner in his opinion, and that therefore his assignee, Carter, is entitled to a patent therefor as prayed. And it has also been satisfactorily proved that Carter and Rees are entitled to a patent for the improvements they have made upon Steer's machine to adapt it to working by power.

[NOTE. Patent No. 13,118 was thereafter issued to Henry Carter, June 19, 1855, and a reissue patent (No. 313) was granted to Carter and Rees on the same day.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1812.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—CHANGE OF VENUE.

An issue, sent by the orphans' court to this court, to try the validity of a will, cannot be removed to the other county, under the act of congress of the 24th of June, 1812, § 8.

[See note at end of case.]

[Petition by the heirs of Sally Carter to revoke the probate of her will, devising her estate to Sally C. Cutting, wife of J. B. Cutting.]

An issue was sent by the orphans' court of this county, to this court, to try the question devisavit vel non.

R. J. Taylor, for the defendant, made a motion to change the venue to Washington county, founded upon the defendant's affidavit of partiality and general prejudice in this county. This motion was made under the act of congress (2 Stat. 757) of the 24th of June, 1812, § 8, "to amend the laws within the District of Columbia."

THE COURT, however (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), was of opinion that it was not a case which could be transferred to another county under that act.

See, also, Alexander v. Wise, May term, 1844 [unreported].

[NOTE. Petitioners applied to the orphans' court of Alexandria county to revoke the probate of the will. Without issuing a summons, that court dismissed the petition, whereupon petitioners appealed to the circuit court of the District of Columbia, which affirmed the action of the orphans' court. Petitioners then appealed to the supreme court of the United States, where the decree of the circuit court was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to proceed to a hearing upon the merits. SALES—CONTINUOUS DEALING—NOTICE OF CHANGE OF TERMS.

1. Where a party deals with another on terms of credit, it is his duty to notify his customer that his terms are cash, before making up the goods for said customer.

[2. Where a tailor has dealt with a customer on credit, he should notify the latter of his change to cash dealings before making up goods.]

At law. Appeal from justice of the peace.

The suit was brought before B. K. Morsell, justice of the peace. The appellees [Charles H. Lane and William Tucker], trading under the firm name of Lane & Tucker, made a pair of pantaloons for the appellant [Bernard F.] Carter, and sent them home ordering the boy not to deliver the pantaloons unless they were paid for. The appellant became offended and refused to take them, whereupon the appellees brought suit. The magistrate gave them judgment for the value of the pantaloons. From which judgment the defendant in the court below appealed.

Barton Key, for appellant.

Jos. H. Bradley, for appellees.

In the trial of the case, the appellees produced two advertisements published in the National Intelligencer, that stated in one, that the firm of Lane & Tucker had received direct from Paris a general assortment of goods, all of which they will sell cheap for cash, or to punctual customers on a short credit, and in the other that they are now prepared to make spring and summer wear cheap for cash.

THE COURT decided, after hearing the testimony of the witnesses, and the arguments of counsel, that inasmuch as the gentleman had before dealt with the appellees on terms of credit, it was their duty to have notified him before they made the pantaloons, that they had changed their terms to cash.

The circuit court reversed the judgment of the magistrate.

PATENTS—"SLIDES FOR EXTENSION TABLES"—CONSTRUCTION—PATENTABILITY—VALIDITY.

1. The claims of the reissued letters patent granted to Merrill E. Carter and Elisha Metz, April 4th, 1871, for "improved slides for extension tables," the original patent having been granted to them September 6th, 1864, namely, "1. A metallic connecting slide, D, with flanges to be inserted in the grooves, E, E, of the wooden bars, A, B, C, when constructed, arranged, and operating in the manner and for the purpose specified," and "2. A metallic connecting slide, D, for the bars of extension tables, having the flanges on one side cast thicker than upon the other, so as to hold fast in the groove of one bar, and slide free in the groove of the other, as herein described," and "3. The pin h, and notches or holes, g, when combined with, and used to hold, a metallic connecting slide, D, in its proper position in the groove, E, of the bars of an extension table, as herein specified," so far as the slide is concerned, embrace only a slide which combines in one a double T slide and a double-wedged or dove-tailed slide, and do not embrace a slide which is simply a double T slide, or a slide which is simply a double-wedged or dove-tailed slide.

2. As to the second claim, making the flange on one side thicker than on the other was not new, and was not a matter of invention, and it was not invention to so construct a metallic slide when a wooden slide had been so constructed before.

3. A wooden double T slide being old, and a wooden double-wedged or dove-tailed slide being old, it was no patentable invention to make either form of slide of metal instead of wood.

4. Fastening one piece of wood to another, or one piece of metal to another, or a piece of metal to one of wood, by the use of nails, bolts, or screws, being old it was not a patentable invention to fasten a metallic slide in the groove of the slide bar, by passing a nail or bolt through both.

[In equity. Bill by Merrill E. Carter against Austin E. Messinger for alleged infringement of letters patent.]

N. B. Smith, for plaintiff.

E. Charlton Sprague, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The bill of complaint alleges an infringement of a patent [No. 44,073] granted, September 6th, 1864, to the complainant and Elisha Metz, for "improved slides for extension tables," reissued April 4th, 1871 [No. 4,317]. The answer, among other things, (which, under the conclusions I have reached, it will not be necessary to discuss,) denies any infringement of the rights secured by the patent, alleges that the patentees were not the first and original inventors of the device patented, denies the novelty of the invention, and avers that the reissue of the patent is invalid, because it seeks to enlarge the scope of the alleged original invention, as shown in the original patent, and embraces what was not embraced in such original patent, or the record thereof. To the correct understanding of the subject, in reference to each branch of these defences, it will be useful to refer to the original patent. This will be useful, not merely for the purpose of enquiring whether the reissue is valid, but it may furnish, as matter of evidence, some aid to the questions—what is, in truth, the invention claimed in the reissue itself, and whether the defendant is an infringer.

In their original specification, the patentees, at the outset, declare, that their invention "consists in the peculiar form and construction of the slides that connect or hold together the extension bars, and the manner of securing them in place in the groove." The grooved bars being then described, the specification proceeds: "These slides are of suitable length for the purpose designed, and constitute, in outline, a double T and double wedge or dove-tailed form." Then, describing the slide, its projections forming the double T, which fit in corresponding channels in the bars, and the dove-tail, or wedge, form, growing thinner to the centre, as shown in the drawings, it adds: "This double wedging form of the central portion of the slide forms a corresponding bevel with the sides of the groove" in the bars. The drawings make the form of the slide thus described quite plain, by exhibiting a cross section thereof as inserted in the grooves of two parallel bars. The patentees then state, that they "prefer to cast it of skeleton form, with the hollows or depressions, f, f, in the sides, but, if desirable, the double T at each side may be cast plain and solid." To secure the slides firmly, they make the tongues on one side of the slide a little thicker transversely than they are on the opposite side, so that they will drive closely into the end of the groove in which they are designed to remain stationary. Each slide is also formed with a vertical notch on one side, in which rests a pin passing through the bar. The advantage of this is stated to be the avoiding, and saving the expense, of the drilling of screw holes in the slide, as in the ordinary mode of securing them in place, and of the employment of screws. The specification enlarges on the advantages of what it calls "our combined double T and dove-tail slide," illustrating them by showing a simple double T form, and a simple double wedge or dove-tail form, in the drawings, showing the tendency of the simple double T, by the flanges or tongues, to tear or split out the lips or sides of the groove, and the same tendency added to a tendency to bind in the groove, when the simple double dove-tail is used. These difficulties are stated to be overcome by the patentees, because, while the tongues prevent the wedges or dove-tail from binding, the wedging shape of the dove-tail prevents the lips of the groove from being torn off, by presenting a beveled surface as a bearing, thus strengthening the lips against lateral action, and forming a fulcrum on one side and a resistance on the other, best adapted to resist the strain that is brought to bear. The specification thereupon adds: "We do not claim either simply a double T form, or a double wedging, or dove-tailed form or slide, but, what we claim as our invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is a slide, D, combining the double T and double wedge or dove-tailed form, the same consisting of the tongues, a, a, and centre, e, arranged in combination with the groove, E, and bars, A, B, C, substantially as herein set forth." "In combination with the slide, D, arranged as above described, provided with the notch, g, and with the groove, E, and bars, A, B, C, we also claim the pin, h, arranged and operating substantially as herein set forth."

Here is a clear and intelligible description of the invention of the patentees, and of what is shown in their drawings, and of just what they claimed; and no one can read it intelligently, without perceiving, that it consists, simply and only, of a slide combining in one the double T slide and the dovetailed slide, and then, further, the mode of fastening them in the grooved bars—first, by making one arm or side of the slide larger than the other, that it may be driven in and be held firmly by the sides of the groove; and, second, by a pin driven laterally through the bar, so as to press the slide in a notch formed on its inner edge. This construction of the specification and claim is rendered certain, not only by the disclaimer of the patentees, which, although not conclusive as an estoppel, is, nevertheless, useful, as evidence of their own consciousness of the fact, but, especially, by the proofs in this cause, that double T slides and double wedged or dovetailed slides were in common and public use theretofore.

I have not been able to discover any imperfection or mistake in this original patent calling for a reissue; nor, in truth, can I discover that, assuming the alleged invention to be patentable, the original patent did not secure to the patentees all that they could claim to have invented.

But, so far as the merits of this case are concerned, the reissued patent does not, in its specification, describe any other or different device as the invention of the patentees, unless, perhaps, the intimation that the slides referred to in the patent are made of some metal, is more distinct. In the original specification, there is no word of declaration that they are to be of metal of any kind. Wood, as the material, will satisfy all the terms of the description, save that, in one line, it is said: "We prefer to cast it of skeleton form," &c. It would be difficult to say, that this declaration of preference precluded the patentees from claiming the slide they described, if patentable, whether made of wood or metal; still less, that they had thereby secured an exclusive right to the use of a metal slide, in contradistinction from a slide made of wood. In the reissued patent, it is said: "A hollow space, or depression, is left in each head, which not only reduces the metal, but leaves less friction," &c.; and this is the only word in the description of the invention in the reissued specification, which suggests that the patentees contemplated the use of metal for their slides. It is in the claims annexed to such reissue that this is made a restriction upon the otherwise broad scope of their description. But, in respect of the device invented, the specification in the reissued patent does not greatly differ from the original. In that, it is also stated, that the "invention consists in the form and construction of the slide, and the means for connecting the same with the extension bars." What, then, is that form and construction, which, in their view, constituted their invention, or, as very specifically afterwards stated, their "peculiar construction and form?" They state it thus: "The central or core portion is made double-wedging or dovetailed, the narrowest point being in the centre, which is the junction or joint between the two bars. The dove-tailed or thickened sides thus rest in the correspondingly-shaped grooves * * * made in the sides of the bars. The outer portions of the slide are formed into two extending or branching tongues * * * which are of T form, and fit in corresponding channels * * * of the groove. This construction makes the bearings * * * broad and separated, which is of much importance to give a firm hold and steadiness of action. A hollow space or depression is left in each head, which not only reduces the metal, but leaves less friction on the contact surfaces, and produces an improved form of the slide, at the same time forming a large bearing." In this last clause, the patentees seem to narrow their invention, by excluding the option which was reserved in the original, to make the head solid, as above explained. They then declare: "We claim a novelty, in the improved form of the slide as above described. A simple double T form of slide was in common use before our invention. Simple dove-tailed slides, without the T flanges, have also been in common use. These separate features we do not claim; but, in their combined form, we obviate many difficulties, such as binding in the groove and the splitting out of the tongues of wood. The broad bearing produced by the separated flanges * * * insures a more perfect action than is attained by the ordinary T form." Each one of the claims which follow refers to the flange thus described, and, of course, excludes the ordinary double T flange, of whatever material it may be made.

1. Language could hardly have been chosen which would have made it more plain, that, in respect to the form and construction of the slide, the patentees claimed, in the reissue, as in the original, a slide combining the double T and the dove-tail, and nothing else. The use of the dove-tail caused a bearing upon that, holding the bars together, and resisting strain tending to tear or split the groove, and, at the same time, spreading more widely the arms of the T, and so preserving their strength, as well as giving them a broader bearing, and, as they say, "a more perfect action." This not only excludes the double T slide, of whatever material composed, but that is, in terms, declared to be in common use, without any discrimination as to material; and that it had been in use, made of wood, for many years, is also, proved by the testimony. The slide so described, and declared to be new, and to be claimed by the patentees, the defendant has not used. He employs the double T slide, and that only.

Upon this branch of the case, it is clear, that the defendant has not infringed the complainant's patent, if it be conceded that that patent is valid. The patentees expressly confine themselves to a slide of a special form and construction, combining the dovetail and the T, and sedulously disclaim, in both the original and the reissue, the use of either alone; so that, on the face of the patents, and waiving all question of the novelty of the invention, and of the validity of the original or the reissued patent, they have, on this score, no ground of complaint of the defendant, who uses the T form only. The claims annexed to the reissued specification are: "1. A metallic connecting slide, D, with flanges to be inserted in the grooves, E, E, of the wooden bars, A, B, C, when constructed, arranged and operating in the manner and for the purpose specified." This claim, in very terms, confines the patentee to the combined form, with so much definiteness described in the specification itself.

2. The complainant insists, that, in another respect, there is an infringement. The reissued patent, as well as the original, describe the slide of the patentees as having the tongues or flanges, a, a, a little thicker on one side than on the other, so that they will drive closely into the groove in which they are designed to remain stationary; and, further, as having a notch on the side which is driven into the groove, in which a pin rests, which passes through the bar, and, by its presence in such notch, prevents any longitudinal movement of the slide, after it has been driven into the groove and the pin is inserted. The two other claims are framed to cover these features, thus: "2. A metallic connecting slide. D, for the bars of extension tables, having the flanges on one side cast thicker than upon the other, so as to hold fast in the groove of one bar, and slide free in the groove of the other, as herein described." "3. The pin, h, and notches or holes, g, when combined with, and used to hold, a metallic connecting slide, D, in its proper position in the groove, E, of the bars of an extension table, as herein specified."

It is well settled, that, in order to learn the true meaning and construction of the claims in a patent, the whole specification may be consulted; and, where the claim itself incorporates in it, by reference, several features of. the invention, this becomes essential. In this view, neither of these claims can be construed without including the specific form of the slide, D, as therein described; and that, as already shown, the defendant has not used.

But, if that be not the true construction of these claims, and they are to be taken to claim broadly any slide firmly driven into the groove on one side, other considerations are equally fatal to the complainant. As to the second claim, 1st, it is distinctly proved that making one side of the slide thicker or larger than the other, so as to be driven firmly into the groove on one side, was not new. 2d. It being palpable that the grooves in the bars are of the same size, it was equally palpable, that the side of any slide that was to be held fast in the groove of one bar must be larger than that side which was to move or slide freely in the groove of the other. This was not matter of invention. It rises hardly to the dignity of mechanical judgment. Common sense, or even obvious necessity, suggest it so plainly, that one must be greatly deficient not to see it. 3d. If it be said that it is not shown that this was ever before employed to hold metallic slides, but wooden slides only, it must suffice to say, that transferring a mode of constructing wooden slides, in this respect, to metallic slides, is not invention. It operates in precisely the same way in both. Indeed, although it were conceded that that form of construction was, of itself, not sufficient, when applied to a wooden slide, without glue, and is effectual when applied to a metallic slide supplemented by the pin, still, the operation is identical in kind, and, if there be any difference whatever, it is in the degree of effectiveness. If screws had been used to bind parts of a wooden frame together, it would not be invention to put parts of an iron frame together with screws, when the mode of application was identical. On this ground, therefore, if the second claim is not to be construed as including the specific form of the plaintiff's slide, D, the complainant must fail.

As to the making of the notch and the insertion of the pin. In the original patent, the notch and the notch and pin only are described as the means of holding the slide against longitudinal motion; and, in that, and in the proofs taken herein, the advantages of the notch are made prominent, in this, that, being further removed from the face of the grooves, there was more strength in the intermediate portion of the wood of the bar. In the reissue the patentees have attempted to enlarge their claim. They describe this part of the fastening as a "notch or hole," and, in the claim, they say "notches or holes." This is claimed, with much force, to render the claim void; and, if it do in fact claim what is not shown or suggested in the original, and is not a mere equivalent, then the claim of the defendant on this point is correct. But, there is another view of the subject. If the claim can be construed, (without including the complainant's special slide,) as a broad claim to holding any slide, or any metallic slide, in position by a pin or bolt run through it, then the claim cannot be sustained at all. For, be it observed, the defendant does not use the notch. He inserts his slide in the groove, and secures it there by bolting it in, the bolt or nail passing through the bar and the hole in the slide. This mode of securing one piece of wood to another, or one piece of iron to another, is so ancient, that its date can hardly be found. Bolting a tenon in a mortice, whether of wood, or metal, or of both, as well as hundreds of other every-day instances, of securing, by nails, or bolts, or pins, inserted in holes made for the purpose, preclude any claim that the defendant may not, if he please, secure his slide in that manner. As already shown, he is at liberty to use the double T slide, and, using that, he may fasten it in place by bolts, pins, nails, or screws, or any old well-known manner of effecting a like result. It follows, that the defendant is in no fault, and the complainant's bill cannot be sustained.

On the hearing, much was said upon an assumption that the complainant's slide was patented strictly as a metallic slide, instead of a wooden slide. The views above expressed seem to me to render it unnecessary to rest any conclusion upon either view of the patent in that respect, for, as it is confined, in respect to form, to the specific slide described, the defendant does not infringe it by his slides, whether of wood or metal. At the same time, if the complainant's patent be not confined to the specific form of combined slide which he describes, but can be construed broadly to include any metal double T or dove-tailed slide, I should be of opinion, that, as each of those, made of wood, were in common use, the substitution of metal was not patentable, even if it was better, for it required no new device or mode of application to make it available. Hotchkiss v. Greenwood, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 248.

Neither is it necessary for me to consider the argument, that the reissue is void because it embraces more than is shown in the original. No opinion is necessary on that point, since my conclusion is, that, conceding its validity as limited by the preceding discussion, the defendant does not infringe any exclusive right which can be legally claimed under it. The bill of complaint must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

CARTER v. SWIFT et al.

[1 Lowell, 398.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. 1869.

MONEY—GOLD AND CURRENCY—TENDER—COSTS.

1. Part of the proceeds of a whaling voyage were received in gold, and part in currency, and some advances were made to the libellant in gold. The account of the voyage was made up wholly in currency, the owners allowing and charging the premium on gold. Held, it was properly made up.

2. The libellant was to have a lay of one forty-second part of the catchings. If the account was so made up that he received this share, it was rightly made up, whether in one currency or another.

3. The libellant could not require that the gold dollars paid him at San Francisco should be charged at their face only, if the result would be to give him more than one forty-second part of the actual net returns.

4. The respondents having offered a certain sum before suit, based upon the mode of accounting adopted by the court, and no question of the sufficiency of the tender, in point of form, being made, the libellant was refused costs, unless it should turn out that the respondents had made a mistake in their computation, as to which the libellant had leave to go to an assessor.

In admiralty. The libellant [W. C. Carter] was entitled to a lay of one forty-second part of the net proceeds of the whaling voyage of the bark Camilla, for the time that he served on board the vessel, as compared to the whole voyage, after deducting the advances already made him, and the only question raised in the case was, whether the respondents [Jireh S. Swift, Jr., and others] could charge him with a premium on the gold coin paid him at San Francisco. The owners of the vessel made sale of a part of their cargo for gold, at San Francisco, and of a part for gold at home, according to the custom of the trade, and of the greater part for paper, and rendered their account wholly on a paper basis, allowing and charging the premium on all specie received and paid.

F. L. Porter, for libellant.

W. W. Crapo, for respondents.

LOWELL, District Judge. The voyage appears to have been properly made up. If the owners were obliged to account only for the number of dollars received without regard to currency, it would be in their power to sell the whole cargo for gold, and account for it in paper. This a court of admiralty could not permit, if it were possible legally to avoid it. If the account is to be reformed, it must be reformed on both sides, and this might work great injustice to those of the crew who had not received large advances, though it might happen to be favorable to this libellant. The contract of the libellant was for one forty-second part of the proceeds; and in whatever currency the account is made up, if he receives payment in the same currency, he receives his fair share. I agree that in the naked case of a payment of so much money, the contract being silent as to the currency, if the debtor chooses to pay it in specie he cannot ordinarily ask for a credit for more than the number of dollars which he has paid. But here the question is of a fair settlement of proportions. An admiralty court will look at the fact, and if the libellant asks to have the account so adjusted as to give him more than one forty-second part of the actual net returns, it will refuse his request If he had been put in possession of one forty-second part of the oil and bone, worth in gold dollars at San Francisco a much less proportion of what the whole cargo would have brought at New York or New Bedford, in paper, as shown by what the remainder did bring, it is clear he could not now recover more; and, so far as that payment goes, this is substantially what he received. A certain part of the cargo was disposed of at San Francisco, for gold, and the libellant got a share of the gold; reckoning the price of the whole cargo, wherever sold, in paper, and reckoning his payment in the same, he is now entitled to only what the respondents are admitted to have offered him, unless there has been a mistake in computation. The case more nearly resembles Tufts v. Plymouth Gold Mining Co., 14 Allen, 407, than Bush v. Baldrey, 11 Allen, 367, which was relied on in argument.

The libellant is to recover the sum offered him, and interest. It was agreed that the computation might be revised by an assessor if the libellant desired it, and if it should turn out that he was not offered enough, he will have costs; otherwise not.

Decree accordingly.

Case No. 2,480.

CARTER v. TREADWELL et al.

[3 Story, 25.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. Oct. Term, 1843.

EQUITY JURISDICTION — SUIT BY FOREIGN ADMINISTRATOR—CITIZENSHIP — PLEADING — BILL TO CANCEL AGREEMENT — MULTIFARIOUSNESS—PARTIES.

1. Where a bill was brought by the plaintiff as administrator, and the defendant pleaded, that he was not administrator, inasmuch as he had not taken out administration in New Hampshire before filing this bill—it was held, that the plea was sufficient on general principles, and also that the statute of New Hampshire in relation to actions commenced by persons acting as administrators did not govern the rule of this court in equity, but was confined to suits at law, and was addressed only to the state courts.

[Cited in Pulliam v. Pulliam, 10 Fed. 30.]

2. Held, also, that the plaintiff might maintain a suit in the circuit court as a citizen of Maine, in his character of administrator, if he took out letters of administration in New Hampshire.

3. Certain timber land was purchased by A. of X. and Z., A. agreeing to pay therefor at the rate of one dollar per thousand feet for all the good pine timber, to be ascertained by certain persons appointed by all parties, who were accordingly appointed, and made the estimate. A. subsequently conveyed a portion to D., D. agreeing with X. and Z. to pay therefor one fourth of the price in money and the remainder in notes, and they giving a bond to convey to him the land on full payment of the notes. D. died insolvent, and A. became his administrator, and agreed with X. and Z. in his behalf to surrender the bond for the notes, which was done. The present bill was afterward brought by A. as administrator of D., and charged that there was a gross error in the original appraisement, unknown to him, (A.), by which D. had been induced to make the said bargain, and prayed that the bargain should be set aside, and the purchase money paid by D. should be refunded. But A. made no personal claim for relief. It was held, 1st, that the bill was objectionable for multifariousness in mixing up the independent claims which A. had personally and which he had as administrator. 2d, that it set forth no case for cancelling the original agreement. 3d, that even if it had, it was too defective and loose to support such a claim, in not bringing the proper parties before the court, and in alleging a mere mistake, without fraud, as a ground of relief, which, under the circumstances, was not sufficient.

This was a bill in equity in the following terms:

"Ezra Carter, Junior, of Portland, in the county of Cumberland, state of Maine, and a citizen of the state of Maine, for himself and also in his capacity of administrator of the goods, chattels, and estate of Seth R. Adams, late of Portland, aforesaid, and at the time of his decease a citizen of said state of Maine—to which capacity of administrator, your orator was duly appointed on the twenty-first day of November, A. D. 1837, and thereafterwards was duly qualified to act accordingly, brings this his bill against Daniel H. Treadwell of Portsmouth, in the county of Rockingham, state of New Hampshire, merchant, and a citizen of the state of New Hampshire, and Alfred W. Haven, of said Portsmouth, merchant, and a citizen of the state of New Hampshire. And thereupon your orator, complaining, says that on the tenth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, said Treadwell, and Haven, and one Henry L. Wiggin, were the owners, or claimed to be the owners, of seventeen thirty-second parts of township numbered four in the sixth range of townships west of the Kennebec river, in the million acres, so called, in the state of Maine, excepting lands reserved for the public uses—in the following proportions, to wit, the said Treadwell and Wiggin of seven thirty-second parts each, and the said Haven of three thirty-second parts,—and being such owners, or claiming to be, the said Treadwell, Haven and Wiggin, on the same tenth day of June, executed an indenture of agreement between themselves of the one part, and said Ezra Carter, Jr., of the other part, which said indenture was also executed by the said Carter, and was in the words and figures following, to wit: 'This indenture, made June 10, 1835, between Daniel H. Treadwell, Alfred W. Haven, and Henry L. Wiggin, on the one part, and Ezra Carter, Jr. witnesseth—that said parties of the first part, have agreed to sell to said Carter part of township No. four, in the sixth range, west of the Kennebec river, in the million acres, excepting public lands, viz. the said Treadwell to convey seven thirty-second parts, and the said Haven three thirty-second parts, and the said Wiggin seven thirty-second parts, and to procure a sufficient deed from the owners of the remainder, at the rate of one dollar per thousand feet, for all the good merchantable pine timber thereon, to be ascertained by the report of five good judges, to be agreed upon by the parties; or if they cannot agree, to be appointed by Daniel Eastman, Jr. and Phineas Eastman, of Lovell, who in that case are to be two of the judges, if they will agree to it. Said judges to be appointed within two weeks, to go on as soon as may be convenient, and estimate the amount of timber and make their report; and the parties of the first part agree that upon failure to convey each the part owned by him upon performance of the conditions to be performed by said Carter, they will each, so failing, forfeit and pay to said Carter such proportion of fifty-five thousand dollars as his part is of the whole of said tract. And if they shall not within a month produce good bonds from the owners of the remainder as above, they will forfeit and pay to said Carter one thousand dollars jointly. And the said Carter agrees to pay to the parties of the first part so much as said tract shall amount to, according to the report of said judges, viz.—Five thousand dollars down, and enough with said five thousand dollars to make up one fourth part of the whole within six months, and the remainder in three equal annual payments, with interest annually thereafter; interest to commence in two weeks after said Carter shall receive a copy of the report of said judges; and said Carter is within six months to procure and deliver to said parties of the first part, good notes for the three last payments, with a mortgage of the premises, or other satisfactory security; and the said Carter agrees that he will, within one week, procure and deliver at the Cumberland House in Portland, or at said Treadwell's house in Portsmouth, a bond with good sureties to make the abovementioned payments in the above described manner, and deliver the notes and security as above. The obligors to forfeit and pay to the obligees fifty-five thousand dollars on failure to perform the conditions thereof. And the said Carter is to forfeit the five thousand dollars, if he shall not procure and deliver said bond, as above. The expense of exploring and estimating the timber, to be paid equally by the parties of each part. The deeds to be given by the parties to be warrantee deeds. It is agreed to extend the time for appointing the appraisers to one month. If the said obligors shall upon failure of performance pay the fifty-five thousand dollars, the parties of the first part are to pay back to said Carter, the five thousand dollars paid by him. D. H. Treadwell, A. W. Haven, Henry L. Wiggin, Ezra Carter, Jr.'

"And on the same day the said Treadwell, by writing on the back of said bond, acknowledged the receipt of the five thousand dollars therein contemplated, in part execution of said indenture, in the words and figures following, viz.—'June 19, 1835. Received five thousand dollars, the first payment abovementioned. D. H. Treadwell.'

"And afterwards, to wit, on the seventeenth day of June, A. D. 1835, in furtherance of said indenture of agreement, a bond was executed and delivered to the said Treadwell, Haven and Wiggin, agreeably to the provisions of said indenture, signed, as your orator now recollects, is informed, and verily believes, and executed, by said Carter, Ebenezer H. Scribner, Asa Hanson, Joseph Spaulding, George Pierce, Seth R. Adams, above named, and Nathaniel S. Littlefield, all citizens of said state of Maine; and the receipt of said bond was acknowledged in writing by said Treadwell, according to the recollection, information, and belief of your orator, on said indenture, in the words and figures following, to wit,—'Portland, June 17, 1835. Received a bond agreeable to the import of the foregoing obligation. D. H. Treadwell.'

"And on the same seventeenth day of June, A. D. 1835, your orator, acting for himself, by his writing, under his hand and seal, either upon said indenture or a copy thereof, as your orator now recollects, is informed and believes, made and executed a transfer and assignment of a part of his interest therein, as follows, viz. 'Know all men by these presents, that I, Ezra Carter, Junior, mentioned in the foregoing contract, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, and a valuable sum of money to me paid by Ebenezer H. Scribner, and Asa Hanson of Portland aforesaid, Joseph Spaulding of Caritunk in the county of Somerset, George Pierce of Harrison, Seth R. Adams of Windham, and Nathaniel S. Littlefield of Bridgton, in the county of Cumberland, do hereby bargain, sell, transfer, and assign unto them eleven sixteenth parts of the foregoing contract, subject to the performance of the same proportions of the conditions thereof. To have and to hold the same, with all the privileges thereof, and appurtenances to the same belonging, and subject to all the terms, conditions, and agreements therein contained, in the following proportions, viz. Two sixteenths each to said Scribner, Spaulding, Pierce, Hanson, and Littlefield, and one sixteenth to said Adams. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this seventeenth day of June, A. D. 1835. Ezra Carter, Jr.'

"And by his further writing on the same, your orator acknowledged as follows, viz.—'June 17, 1835. I acknowledge to have received of the several persons mentioned in the above assignment, their several proportions of the foregoing sum of five thousand dollars, paid by me to the said Treadwell, Haven and Wiggin. Ezra Carter, Jr.'

"And afterwards, to wit, on the twentieth day of said June, the original parties to said indenture, in further and proper execution of the intentions and requirements thereof, made this agreement and signed the same, in writing, on the back of said indenture, or a copy thereof, as follows, to wit,—'We the above named Daniel H. Treadwell, Alfred W. Haven, Henry L. Wiggin, and Ezra Carter, Jr. do hereby appoint Phineas Eastman, and Daniel Eastman, Jr. of Lovell, David Bradley, of Fryeburg, and George W. King, of Portland, and Winthrop Smart, of Ossipee, in the state of New Hampshire, the foregoing named judges, and in case of the refusal or inability of either of said persons to perform the duties assigned them, then we agree that said Phineas Eastman and Daniel Eastman, Jr. shall fill all vacancies; and that said judges shall make duplicate reports to each of the parties as soon as convenient. And a report of the majority shall be final and conclusive upon both parties. Dated June 20, 1835. D. H. Treadwell, A. W. Haven, Henry L. Wiggin, Ezra Carter, Jr.'

"That said Haven and Treadwell did thereafter transmit a copy of said indenture and agreement last above cited, to said Phineas and Daniel, in a letter by them, said Treadwell and Haven, respectively signed, requesting and enjoining upon said Phineas and Daniel the performance of said trust, in the words and figures following, to wit: 'Portsmouth, July 6, 1835. Messrs. Phineas and Daniel Eastman, Jr.: Gentlemen,—You will perceive by the above copy of a contract made with Mr. Ezra Carter, Jr., of Portland, that you are appointed to be two of the judges of the timber on No. 4. We hope that you will accept the appointment, and we wish you to notify Messrs. King, Bradley and Smart of their appointment immediately. We are desirous to have you commence on the duty as soon as may be convenient to you. Respectfully yours, D. H. Treadwell, A. W. Haven.'

"That said Daniel Eastman, Junior, Phineas Eastman, and George W. King, thereafter declined acting as judges, pursuant to said indenture, and thereupon said Daniel Eastman, Jr., and Phineas Eastman, by the authority vested in them as aforesaid for that purpose, appointed to fill said vacancies Andrew Killgore, Thomas Farrington, and James Eastman. And the said judges, in the months of July and August of the year last aforesaid, proceeded to examine said land and to estimate the amount of timber thereon, and a majority of said judges, to wit, the said Killgore, Farrington, and James Eastman, agreed to report, and did report in the words and figures following, viz. 'We, David Bradley, Winthrop Smart, James Eastman, Thomas Farrington, and Andrew Killgore, the judges agreed upon and appointed to appraise, judge, fix and ascertain the number of feet of all the good merchantable pine timber on township numbered four, in the sixth range in the million acres, on the west side of the Kennebec river, in the county of Somerset, and state of Maine, and within named, exclusive of public lands, and having taken upon ourselves the burthen of said appointment, and having all given the within named Daniel H. Treadwell, Alfred W. Haven, Henry L. Wiggin, and Ezra Carter, Jr. due notice of the time and place of hearing and of proceeding to ascertain said amount of said timber, and all having heard said parties within named, and having all personally, carefully and attentively examined, explored, considered, estimated and ascertained all the good merchantable pine timber on said township, exclusive of public lands, we do award, order, report, adjudge, determine, and have ascertained there is on said township, exclusive of public lands, one hundred and ninety-five millions, eight hundred and fifty thousand feet of good merchantable pine timber. And we do further award, order, report, adjudge and determine that the expense of exploring and ascertaining said timber as aforesaid, is one thousand two hundred and seventy-four dollars and sixty-nine cents. Given under our hands this twenty-eighth day of August, A. D. 1835. Andrew Killgore, Thomas Farrington, James Eastman.'

"And your orator further complaining says, that after said report was made, Ebenezer Scribner, as your orator has been informed and believes, went to Portsmouth to see said Treadwell and Haven and Wiggin, with a view of settling, or endeavoring to settle said concern; and immediately afterwards came to Portland, or Windham, or wherever said Adams, then living, was found, and then and there represented to said Adams, that he, said Scribner, was authorized by said Treadwell and Haven to offer said Adams that he might have the one-sixteenth of said township, in which he, said Adams, had become interested as aforesaid, at the rate of seven dollars and fifty cents per acre, on condition that he would pay said Treadwell and Haven one quarter thereof in cash, in advance, instead of paying the quarter in six months, as provided in said indenture; and would give his notes for the other three quarters, as provided and agreed. And said Adams, supposing and believing that he was in law bound and obliged to purchase said land according to the report of said appraisers, and fully believing that said report was correct and true, and that said land did actually contain the amount of timber specified in said report, and also believing that said Scribner was acting in good faith, and was to purchase of said Treadwell and Haven on the same terms, then and there concluded to purchase said one-sixteenth on the terms aforesaid, and to pay therefor the sum of seven dollars and fifty cents per acre, one fourth in money, and the residue in three equal annual instalments, or payments, as aforesaid, and in fulfilment of your orator's aforesaid indenture and agreement with said Haven, Treadwell, and Wiggin. That having come to the determination aforesaid, the said Adams raised and furnished his proportion aforesaid of said purchase money, including his proportion in the five thousand dollars above named, paid to said Haven and Treadwell as aforesaid, and amounting in all to the sum of two thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, and at the same time made his three several notes for the sum of twenty-five hundred and fifty dollars each, payable to said Treadwell and Haven, in one, two, and three years, with interest annually, bearing date September 12, 1835; or gave two such notes, payable in one and two years with interest, and a note for seven hundred seventy-eight dollars and fifty cents, payable in three years with interest; and for the remainder of said third annual payment gave said Haven and Treadwell other notes or securities, as this complainant is informed and believes, amounting in all to the sum of twenty-five hundred and fifty dollars for said last annual payment, including said note of seven hundred and seventy-eight dollars and fifty cents; and all of said payments and notes were delivered to and received by said Haven and Treadwell in Portland aforesaid, on said twelfth day of September, as the complainant is informed and believes, and said Haven and Treadwell then and there gave said Adams, according to the information and belief of this complainant, an obligation executed by them in writing, in the words or substance as follows, viz. 'Know all men by these presents, that I, Daniel A. Treadwell, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in consideration of the sum of ten thousand two hundred dollars, have agreed to sell and convey unto Seth R. Adams, of Windham, Maine, one-sixteenth of township No. 4, sixth range west of Kennebec river, in the Bingham purchase, except public lands, being in the million acres, lying in the county of Somerset and state of Maine, according to the survey and plan of E. Coburn, Esq. by good and sufficient warrantee deed in fee, on payment of said conditions as follows, viz.—The consideration is paid and secured as follows, viz.—One quarter part in cash, in advance, the other three quarters in one, two, and three years from the twelfth day of September, A. D. 1835, secured by certain notes signed by said Adams, with interest annually. Now on the full and complete payment of the amount aforesaid, with interest, in the proportions aforesaid, the said notes are to be void and delivered up, and this agreement to be faithfully performed, otherwise to be void and of no effect. D. H. Treadwell.'

"That the said Treadwell and Haven were jointly interested in said obligation, given to the said Adams as aforesaid, by whomsoever signed and however written, concerning all of which your orator prays that said Haven and Treadwell may be required specially to answer, and annex a copy of said obligation to their answer.

"And your orator further complaining says, that after said writings were executed, the said Adams, during his life time, paid divers large sums of money to said Treadwell and Haven, in extinguishment of said notes, still believing said land to be timbered as said judges had reported, and that he was bound in law to complete the purchase of the same accordingly—being ignorant of any mistake or error in the estimate by them made—and advanced sundry other sums of money in conducting operations on said land, the whole proceeds of which were, during the life time of said Adams and after his decease, received and appropriated by said Haven and Treadwell in further extinguishment of said notes, amounting in all, as this orator is informed and believes, including said advance payments, to seven thousand two hundred and twenty-three dollars twenty-one cents, exclusive of interest on such payments, since the same were respectively made; from which payments your orator believes should in equity, and assents to be deducted so much of the payments derived from said operations on said land, as were conducted by said Adams, over and above the actual advances in money therefor made by said Adams, of which sums your orator prays that the said Haven and Treadwell may be required specifically to answer.

"And your orator further complaining saith, that some time after the decease of said Adams, to wit, in the winter of 1840, as your orator is informed and believes, said Treadwell and Haven, together with other parties interested in said lands, and without the participation, concurrence, or knowledge of your orator, or of said Adams, or of any person acting in behalf of or representing said Adams, or his estate, he being then deceased, had certain proceedings for partitioning the several parts of said land held in common by said Treadwell and Haven and others; and caused the same to be examined, explored and surveyed anew by commissioners duly authorized for that purpose, and by others, which occasioned the suspicion and belief that there had been a gross mistake and error on the part of the judges before named, in their estimate and report of the quantity of timber on said township, and that all parties had acted under a mutual mistake in the bargain and purchase predicated upon said estimate and report. That said suspicion and belief led to a subsequent careful inquiry and examination of the fact thus suspected and believed by purchasers of parts of said township under the indenture and bargain aforesaid, as this complainant has been informed and believes, who charged upon and notified said Treadwell and Haven of said gross error and mistake on the part of said judges, committed as aforesaid, and that said Treadwell and Haven did thereafter become satisfied and convinced of the same, and upon certain proceedings instituted in this honorable court by said other purchasers under said indenture, did subsequently consent to, and did in fact rescind said bargain and purchase, and refunded the money and other property received by and paid to them, by such other purchasers, for their respective portions of said township, to the satisfaction of said other purchasers. And your orator distinctly charges upon said Treadwell and Haven, upon the information and belief of this complainant, that there was a gross error and mistake on the part of said judges, in their estimate and report of the amount of timber on said township; that in said estimate and report, said judges included, either through design or accident, a vast quantity of timber that was neither good nor merchantable, and did not come within the meaning of the indenture aforesaid; and also a vast amount of timber that did not belong to, nor stand upon said township; that there never was, in fact upon said township, and was not at the time of the appraisement, estimate and report aforesaid, any thing like the amount of nine thousand feet of timber to the acre, of all kinds; nor so much as one half that amount of good merchantable timber; nor, in fact, more than two thousand feet of such timber to the acre;—that the purchase by said Adams under your orator's aforesaid indenture with said Treadwell and Haven, was predicated entirely upon said estimate and report of said judges, said Adams having no other means of learning any thing of the amount of timber on said land; —that the whole purchase was founded on an entire mistake and misapprehension of your orator and of said Adams, and also of said Haven and Treadwell, as your orator distinctly avers, if said Treadwell and Haven did not know the truth respecting the amount of timber then actually upon said township, or have reason to suspect and believe that said estimate and report of said judges were entirely wrong, and much beyond the truth, which your orator prays may be distinctly answered by said Treadwell and Haven;—that said one-sixteenth part of said township, purchased as aforesaid by said Adams, was never worth one half of the amount said Adams paid for the same, per acre; that said Adams was most grossly and grievously deceived and led astray by said estimate and report of said judges, founded as it was on a wrong mode of estimating the amount of timber, and on an entire mistake and misapprehension of all parties to it, and of his obligation to purchase the same under your orator.

"And your orator further charges that, as he is informed and believes, said Adams was grossly deceived and misled by said Scribner in the representations made by him as to the rate at which said Treadwell and Haven were willing to sell their interest in said township;—your orator believes that in fact said Treadwell and Haven were willing, proposed and agreed, to sell their said interest at the rate of seven dollars per acre, and did in fact sell a portion of said township to said Scribner, at that rate, while the said Adams supposed that said Scribner was purchasing at the same rate with himself and the other purchasers who signed the bond of purchase as aforesaid;—and your orator charges, that said Treadwell and Haven were purposely combining and confederating with said Scribner in the premises, to conceal from said Adams the true terms and conditions upon which said Treadwell and Haven were selling said land to said Scribner, under the indenture aforesaid, and to defraud said Adams by inducing the belief aforesaid, or afterwards knew and assented thereto. And your orator is informed and believes the truth to be, that the whole of said parts of said township, specified in the indenture and obligations aforesaid, were sold for seven dollars per acre, and that the amount received of said Adams, and of said other purchasers, over that sum, on the parts by them purchased respectively, went, or was to go, to said Scribner's benefit in some way; and that to this end said Scribner, and said Treadwell and Haven were confederating together, and were mutual agents of each other, or that said Scribner was the agent of said Treadwell and Haven to induce said Adams to purchase at the rate of seven dollars fifty cents per acre, and as a compensation for his, said Scribner's services, in deceiving said Adams with said other purchasers, received his own proportion of said land at a less rate, or that said Treadwell and Haven were knowing at the time said Adams purchased of them, and paid them money and notes as aforesaid, that said Scribner had deceived said Adams in the purchase, or had good reason to suspect and believe that said Adams was deceived by said Scribner, as to the amount paid or to be paid by said Scribner for the number of acres he purchased.

"And your orator further shows and complains unto this honorable court, that after said Adams' decease, said Treadwell and Haven preferred and presented their demands and notes against said Adams for payment, to your orator as administrator of the estate of said Adams, and the same were examined and allowed for payment by the commissioners of insolvency duly appointed to hear and examine said demands and all other claims upon said estate presented by creditors—although said Treadwell and Haven still retained absolute title to said land. And that your orator did, in ignorance of the mistake, misapprehension, and error hereinbefore set forth in relation to the amount of timber on said township, and in total ignorance of the error, made as aforesaid, by said judges of said timber, and without the means of knowing or suspecting the same, or the combination or confederacy of the said Treadwell and Haven with the said Scribner as herein before set forth, to mislead and deceive said Adams respecting the terms upon which said parts of said township were being sold by said Haven and Treadwell, and that the same were being sold in part to said Scribner at a less price than seven dollars and a half per acre; and being ignorant of the information and knowledge which the other part purchasers of said township had obtained in partitioning the same, respecting the error, mistake and misapprehension aforesaid, and that not one half of the timber reputed by said judges to be on said township was to be found in fact thereon; and being ignorant of said Haven and Treadwell's discovery and knowledge of said error, mistake and misapprehension, and that in good faith and justice, said purchase, made as aforesaid by said Adams of said Treadwell and Haven, was void, and ought not to be enforced, and the notes by him given ought to be surrendered and cancelled; and knowing the inability of said Adams' estate to pay the remaining unpaid amount of said notes and consummate said purchase, your orator did, in his capacity aforesaid, as administrator of said Adams' estate, at the desire and request of said Treadwell and Haven, surrender to them through their attorney, the aforesaid bond, given by them to said Adams as aforesaid, for a conveyance of the land aforesaid, in consideration that the surrender of the notes held as aforesaid by said Treadwell and Haven against the estate of said Adams should be made by said Treadwell and Haven, which surrender was made accordingly, and all of said Treadwell and Haven's demand aforesaid was transferred and made over by an order or assignment in favor of the widow of said Adams. And your orator further avers, that the only claim which was then known to your orator as existing in favor of said Adams' estate, and embraced in and by said settlement, against said Treadwell and Haven, was supposed and understood only to be a claim at common law upon the bond aforesaid, conditioned upon the payment of the notes aforesaid, and the same was in that manner adjusted, surrendered and cancelled, to wit, at Portland aforesaid, on the eighth day of August, A. D. 1840—and a written discharge executed accordingly by your orator, to said Treadwell and Haven, a copy of which your orator prays may be annexed to said Treadwell and Haven's answer to this bill.

"That after said settlement last aforesaid, by this complainant, with said Haven and Treadwell, to wit, within the year next ensuing, your orator was for the first time informed and persuaded of the error, mistake, and misapprehension herein before described, respecting the report of said judges of the amount of timber on said land, and of said Treadwell and Haven, and of said Adams, and of the fraudulent acts and collusion towards said Adams by said Scribner and said Treadwell and Haven, as herein before set forth, and believing, as he now distinctly charges upon said Treadwell and Haven, that, at the time of the settlement aforesaid, and the surrender of said bond to said Treadwell and Haven by this complainant, and the assignment of said notes, the said Treadwell and Haven well knew, and believed, and improperly and against good faith and fair dealing designedly concealed from your orator, to induce and effect said settlement, all the aforesaid facts and circumstances of the error and mistake committed by the said judges in their aforesaid report respecting the amount of timber on said township, and upon which said Adams' purchase and bond and notes and payment of money, aforesaid, had been made; that they also well knew, and believed, and improperly concealed from this complainant, that said Adams had been misled and deceived by the same; and that he had been misled and deceived as herein before stated, by the said Scribner, and that it was wrong, and improper, and against good faith and fair dealing, for this complainant, acting in his aforesaid capacity of administrator of said Adams' estate, to surrender said bond, and cancel the claim incident thereto, and founded in the circumstances in which said bond originated, in favor of said estate, and lawful creditors and representatives of the said Adams, against said Treadwell and Haven, and that this complainant never could have been justified in so doing, had he been possessed of the knowledge of said error, mistake, collusion and deception aforesaid; and that this complainant, as administrator aforesaid, was ignorant of the equity of the claim of said estate against said Treadwell and Haven; and that said Treadwell and Haven did, in said settlement, and acting upon their knowledge of the error, mistake and worthlessness of the land aforesaid, and upon this complainant's ignorance of the discoveries which had been made by said Treadwell and Haven and the other part-purchasers of said land with said Adams, in relation thereto, practice an undue, unwarrantable and unconscionable advantage upon this complainant, and as administrator, in said settlement, and that the same ought to be re-opened, and re-adjusted, which he prays may be done. And your orator, in view of all the facts herein before stated, being advised that said purchase made by the said Adams as aforesaid, ought not to have been enforced, but that the same should have been rescinded—and that the settlement of the above described bond and notes, made by this complainant as aforesaid with said Treadwell and Haven on the 8th day of August, A. D. 1840, ought to be rescinded and nullified, and said parties be restored to their respective rights as the same existed prior to and at the time of said settlement, have requested the said Treadwell and Haven to rescind the same, and to pay back to your orator all the money so as aforesaid paid by said Adams to said Treadwell and Haven for said land, and that said notes be restored and cancelled, and that the estate of said Adams be indemnified by said Treadwell and Haven for the use or interest of the money paid them as aforesaid from the times of the payment thereof. And your orator well hoped that said defendants would have complied with such reasonable request, but they have refused so to do."

The bill, after putting several interrogatories, concluded with a prayer that, "upon a full and perfect hearing and discovery, and understanding of all matters aforesaid, all the cash so aforesaid paid by the said Adams may be refunded, with interest, and that the notes aforesaid may be given up to be cancelled, and that your orator may be repaid the expenses and damages which he and said Adams may have suffered by reason of the premises, and that your orator, for himself, and in his said capacity of administrator, may have such other and further relief in the premises as the circumstances of the case may require, and to your honors may seem meet."

The defendants put in a plea to that part of the bill which respected the claim as administrator of Adams, and a demurrer to the residue of the bill. The plea was as follows: "And now the said defendants by protestation, not confessing all or any of the matters and things in the said complainant's bill contained to be true, in manner and form as the same are therein and thereby alleged and set forth, and denying all, and all manner of fraud, fraudulent combination and conspiracy, contrivance and concealment, as therein charged, to the matter therein contained, and to so much thereof as sets forth, that said Ezra Carter, Junior, is the administrator of the estate of said Seth R. Adams, and to so much thereof as relates to any contract of purchase between said Adams and these defendants and seeks to have such contract rescinded, and prays for relief in the premises, and that these defendants may be required to refund to said Carter all the money paid by said Adams upon the said purchase, and that the notes given in payment therefor, may be given up to be cancelled, and that the complainant may be repaid all damages and expenses which said Adams may have suffered by reason of the premises, do thereunto plead, and for plea say, that said Carter is not administrator in the bill mentioned, or the legal representative of said Seth R. Adams, duly appointed and qualified to act as therein set forth. All which matters and things these defendants aver to be true, and plead the same to so much of said bill as aforesaid, and pray the judgment of this honorable court whether they ought to be required to make any other or further answer thereunto."

The demurrer was as follows: "These defendants by protestation, not confessing all or any of the matters and things in the said complainant's bill contained, to be true, in such manner and form as the same are therein set forth and alleged, and denying all, and all manner of fraud, fraudulent combination and confederacy therein charged, and in no sort waiving the benefit of their plea filed herewith, but wholly relying and insisting thereon to so much of said bill as therein set forth, do demur to the residue of said bill, and for cause of demurrer show that the complainant has not thereby made such a case as entitles him, in a court of equity, to any discovery from these defendants, or either of them, or any relief against them, as to the matters contained in said bill; and that any discovery which can be made by these defendants, or either of them, cannot be of any avail to the said complainant for any of the purposes for which a discovery is sought against these defendants by the said bill, nor entitle the complainant to any relief in this court touching any of the matters therein complained of. Wherefore, and for divers other good causes of demurrer appearing in said bill, these defendants do demur to so much thereof as aforesaid, and pray the judgment of this honorable court whether they shall be required to make any other or further answer to the said bill, and pray to be hence dismissed with their reasonable costs in this behalf sustained."

The case being set down for argument, was now argued upon the plea and demurrer by C. S. Davies for defendants, and by W. H. Y. Hackett for plaintiff.

Hackett, for plaintiff, said:

The plaintiff's counsel contend, that the demurrer is insufficient to oust this court of the jurisdiction claimed by the bill, because Carter sues as well in his private, as his official capacity of administrator. The language of the bill is "for himself and also in his capacity of administrator, &c." Whether the facts upon which the case depends will or will not substantiate an equitable interest, as well for himself as for his intestate, is a question, which cannot be entered upon, much less settled upon the defendant's demurrer. But this failure of the bill is a conclusive answer to the demurrer. But the facts set out in the bill show Carter to be personally as well as officially interested. He bought the interest in the land in question under a mistake of respondents. Upon the same mistake he sold to his intestate. If that mistake be such as vitiates this sale either as between Carter and the respondents, or as between Adams and the respondents, Carter is alike interested; for he is interested upon his liability over to the estate of Adams for the amount paid to him by Adams, and is interested again in his own right to recover back of respondents the amount paid by him to them. The facts, as laid, then, are sufficient, if sustained by proof, to warrant the proceeding by Carter against respondents, as well in his individual as in his official capacity. He proceeds in both capacities, and he is to recover in either or both, as the equity of the case shall dictate upon proof of all the facts. Carter complains that he personally acted under a mistake in what he transacted with the respondents touching the land while acting in his individual capacity, and that he acted under a like mistake in what he did with them in his official capacity; and that the respondents acted either fraudulently or mistakenly in either instance, so that all of both transactions were void. Such is the nature of the allegations of the bill. Equity alone can remedy these mistakes. Carter is a citizen of a different state from that of which the respondents are citizens. If, as administrator, neither by virtue of the original powers of this court, nor by the local legislature of New Hampshire, this court cannot hold jurisdiction of the case, it will take cognizance of his individual rights and liabilities growing out of this transaction with the defendants, and retain jurisdiction of the bill. It is admitted that Carter is administrator of Adams in the state of Maine. The jurisdiction of this court is derived from the amount in dispute and the citizenship of the parties. Does the capacity in which the plaintiff sues affect the jurisdiction of this court? Does not citizenship confer a privilege independent of local or state legislation, and draw after it as an incident, the capacity in which he may claim to act? If it be not so, how would this case stand on principle, if the plaintiff were administrator of Adams in New Hampshire? He would then be so far naturalized in New Hampshire as to be enabled to sue in their state courts. Looking at the principles and objects on which the jurisdiction of this court rests would there be any violence in holding that he was quoad hoc a citizen of New Hampshire, and therefore under an incapacity to sue in this court? The plaintiff is the legal representative of the intestate, and according to the letter and spirit of the act conferring and defining the jurisdiction of this court, has a right to sue here. But be this as it may, this demurrer is at least premature, for by the statute of New Hampshire (Rev. St. 320) it is provided, that "any person interested in the estate of any person, deceased, may commence an action as administrator thereof, which shall not be abated on the attachment, but by reason that such person is not administrator thereof, nor by his decease, if the administrator then or afterwards appointed shall, at the first or second term of the court, endorse the writ and prosecute the same as plaintiff;" and at the second term of the pendency of this suit there may be such an administrator of Adams as the court will recognize as such. 2 N. Stat. 380.

Davies, for defendants, in reply, said:

The complainant has undertaken to bring this suit in his own behalf, and also in capacity of administrator of Adams. These claims are entirely distinct; and a distinct objection is presented to each by these pleadings. To the claim of the complainant in his own right the defendants have demurred, as exhibiting no case for the equitable interposition of this court. To the claim set up as administrator of Adams the defendants have by plea properly denied that he is administrator. These objections (which were briefly opened before the court, at May, in Portsmouth) are to be separately considered and disposed of.

To follow the order of plaintiff's argument —first, (in regard to the complainant's own alleged right,) on the demurrer.

1. No contract or transaction between the complainant in his right and the defendants, is set forth in the bill, other than the mere purchase of the bond, on June 10th, 1835, for the sum of $5000. In this there was no mutuality on the part of the complainant; he did not engage to purchase the land; he only gave that price for the privilege. That sum was to be allowed towards the payment for the land, if he had purchased under the bond: otherwise it was payment for the bond itself, and for the right of pre-emption, given by it. The complainant sold out eleven sixteenths of his interest to sundry persons, as set forth by him. And a story is carried on in the bill of dealings and negotiations of some of them, or their assigns, with the defendants, with which the complainant, in his own character, has nothing to do. You look in vain for any thing further in regard to him in his own right, or to any remainder, throughout the bill. He shows himself to have had no further concern in the business on his own behalf; is nowise connected with any of the parties in any subsequent proceedings; did not become purchaser of any part of the lands, and ceased to have any interest in the subject. It is not pretended that any mistake or fraud existed in the transaction with Carter, or at that period. Among those persons was Adams. And it is suggested in argument, that the bill may be maintained on account of the complainant's liability to the estate of Adams. No liability is shown. No pretence is made of any mistake then; (the pretended mistake arose afterwards, in the doings of the appraisers or judges.) The complainant may wait till he is called to account, and until the transaction between himself and Adams is rescinded, if it ever could be.

Secondly, as to the plea, "Ne urques administrator."

2. The defendants have pleaded to so much of the bill as relates to the claim of the complainant as administrator of Seth R. Adams, that he is not administrator. By setting down and presenting this plea for argument the allegation is of course admitted; and it is immaterial whether administration has or has not been taken out in another state, as surmised in the argument. Since the complainant has not taken out administration in New Hampshire, he cannot sue there as administrator in the courts of the United States. To this point Story on Conflict of Laws (section 513) and the cases bearing upon it collected, have been already cited. As to the statute provision of New Hampshire referred to, it is not necessary to consider how it would affect the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, as the complainant has not shown, that he has any such interest in the estate of Adams, as that provision contemplates; or that any construction has been given to it, or can be, that would go to the extent. In short, it is submitted, that the complainant has shown no right or interest, in any respect, upon either point, to maintain the present bill, and that it ought therefore to be dismissed.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The case presented by this voluminous bill may be thus briefly stated. Carter purchased of the defendants and one Henry L. Wiggin seventeen thirty-second parts of a certain township of land, in Maine, viz. seven thirty-second parts of Treadwell, three thirty-second parts of Haven, and seven thirty-second parts of Wiggin; and the vendors covenanted to procure a conveyance of the remaining fifteen thirty-second parts from the other owners to Carter, and who was to pay therefor at the rate of one dollar per thousand feet for all the good merchantable pine timber on the township, to be ascertained by the report of certain persons to be appointed by the vendors, and Carter was to pay in cash a part of the consideration money, and give a bond for the due fulfilment of the other terms of the sale; and the vendors covenanted to perform their part of the agreement, or to pay Carter $55,000. The bond was accordingly executed. The appraisers were appointed and duly made their report, estimating the amount of the timber at 195,850,000 feet of good merchantable pine timber. Carter conveyed to certain persons eleven sixteenth parts of his purchase, and among others to Seth R. Adams, the intestate, one sixteenth thereof; the parties to whom the same were conveyed being the sureties upon his (Carter's) bond. Adams afterwards entered into an agreement with Treadwell and Haven, by which he agreed to pay them for his one sixteenth part of the township at the rate of seven and a half dollars per acre, one fourth part in money, and the residue in three equal annual instalments, and give his notes therefor. This was accordingly done; and Treadwell gave Adams a bond to convey the one sixteenth part of the township upon the full payment of all the instalments. Adams afterwards paid large sums of money to Treadwell and Haven on his notes. Adams afterwards died, leaving his estate insolvent; Carter took administration upon his estate and made a settlement with Treadwell and Haven of their demand, by which he agreed to surrender up to them their bond, and they agreed to surrender to him the notes then held by them against Adams' estate, and their demands were accordingly assigned in favor of Adams' widow.

The bill alleges, that, in point of fact, there was a gross error and mistake in the appraisers in their estimate of the pine timber in the township, there not being half that quantity thereon; that Adams in making and completing his bargain with Treadwell and Haven was not aware of the mistake and error, and, in fact, was induced to make that bargain by the gross deception and misrepresentations of one Scribner, who was acting in confederacy with Treadwell and Haven. The bill further alleges, that Carter, at the time of his settlement with Treadwell and Haven, was not aware of the mistake and error of the appraisers, or of the deception and misrepresentations of Scribner; and it insists that the bargain of Adams, and his own settlement with Treadwell and Haven, ought on these accounts to be set aside and rescinded, and the money paid by Adams recovered back by him as administrator. The bill does not state any case for relief to Carter himself upon his original bargain and purchase. It is under these circumstances, that the plea and demurrer have been put in to the bill. And first as to the plea. It asserts that Carter is not administrator of Adams, as alleged in the bill. In point of fact, Carter has been appointed administrator of Adams, who was a citizen of Maine at his death, by the proper court in Maine; but at the time of filing his bill he had not taken out administration in New Hampshire, where the defendants live, and where the bill is brought, although administration has, since the pendency of the bill, been duly obtained by him in New Hampshire.

The first question then is, whether the plea is good; and it having been set down for argument by the plaintiff, he thereby admits it to be true in point of fact, and the only remaining ground for consideration is, whether it is valid in point of law. Upon general principles, there is no doubt that it is valid, unless there is something in the laws of New Hampshire which varies the known rule, that to entitle a party to recover a debt or assert a claim as administrator against a person resident in another state than that where the intestate was domiciled at his death, it is essential that he should have obtained letters of administration in the state where he seeks to recover the debt or to assert the claim. In the present case, there is no difficulty in Carter's maintaining a suit in the circuit court as a citizen of Maine, in his character of administrator of Adams, if he should take letters of administration in New Hampshire. This has been supposed to be fully established ever since the case of Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 306; and therefore one inconvenience supposed in the argument at the bar is removed. But it is said that by a recent statute of New Hampshire (Rev. St. N. H. 320) a different rule is prescribed. That statute provides, "that any person interested in the estate of any person deceased, may commence an action as administrator thereof, which shall not be abated, nor the attachment lost by reason, that such person is not administrator thereof, nor by his decease, if the administrator then or afterwards appointed, shall at the first or second term of the court endorse the writ, and prosecute the same as plaintiff." Rev. St. N. H. 1842, p. 320, tit. 19, c. 161, § 10. It is plain from the language of this statute, that it is solely applicable to suits at law, and not applicable to suits in equity. It is as plain, that it is addressed to the state courts, and to the state courts only, and can in no respect be admitted to govern the practice or proceedings in the courts of the United States even in suits at law, unless specially adopted in practice by those courts; and a fortiori it can have no bearing upon the practice and proceedings thereon in suits in equity. It might furnish an analogy by which, possibly, the courts of the United States might seek in a fit case to regulate their own discretion; but it can furnish no rule to govern them. The statute, therefore, does not avoid or surmount the difficulty; and the plea remains, with all its original relevancy and force, as a bar to the suit under existing circumstances.

As to the demurrer to the residue of the bill, viz. that, which respects Carter's claim in his own individual and personal right, it seems to me that it is fully sustained. There are various objections to it, which seem to me strong and decisive. In the first place it seems to me, that the bill is open to the objection of multifariousness in mixing up an independent claim of Carter in his own right with the transactions of Adams with the defendants, with which he had nothing to do, except in his capacity as administrator. What has Carter, individually and personally, to do with the negotiation and arrangement by which as administrator of Adams he surrendered up the bond and cancelled the notes given by Adams to the defendants? The very groundwork of his bill, to which his prayer for relief is directly applied, is to recover and receive back from the defendants the monies paid to them by Adams, which monies, of course, must be recoverable and receivable only in autre droit, as the administrator of Adams. Carter can have no right to mix up his own personal claims on the defendants, if any, in the original purchase of the township with that of Adams under other contracts, and arrangements, subsequently made without any co-operation or connexion with Carter. In the next place, the bill states no case whatsoever for setting aside or cancelling the original contract of purchase with the defendants and Wiggin; and if it did, it would be fatally defective, unless Wiggin were made a party thereto, (which he is not,) or a sufficient ground were shown why he was not or could not be made a party; if indeed in such a case it were practicable to proceed without making him a party; upon which I give no opinion. In the next place, to such a bill, seeking to set aside and cancel the original contract, Scribner and Hanson, and Spaulding, and Pierce, and Littlefield, if not the widow, or heirs of Adams, seem to be necessary parties, and ought not to be dispensed with. In the next place, the bill, for such a purpose, is far too loose and defective, and general in its averments, to make out a case to set aside the original purchase or cancel it. No fraud or intentional misrepresentation is positively or directly alleged on the part of the vendors, or of the appraisers of the pine timber. It is simply and nakedly stated, that the appraisers acted under a mistake of the real amount of the pine timber in the township. But how this mistake occurred, whether it was any thing more than an over estimate made in the exercise of a fair and sound judgment, or whether it was by fraud or circumvention, or imposition or design, is not pointedly put in the bill. The court is left to grope its way in the dark on this, the very gist of the bill, and involving all its merits. Surely it will not be contended, that any mistake, however small, or accidental, or honest on the part of the appraisers, the chosen judges selected by the parties themselves for this very purpose, would justify the court in rescinding the original purchase. That would be to defeat the very object and intent of the parties in selecting the "good judges" to make the appraisement. For these reasons, and others might be added, it appears to me that the demurrer ought to be allowed.

But the plaintiff asks, in the event that the court should sustain the plea and demurrer, that he may be allowed to amend his bill. From what has been already suggested, it appears to me, that the truest and best course is to have the bill dismissed without prejudice, instead of attempting to amend it in such a manner as to make it efficient. Indeed, two bills will be necessary, if Carter persists in his own individual claim, one for that claim, and one in his capacity as administrator, for the claim of Adams. I think, therefore, that the present bill ought to be dismissed, with costs, but without prejudice to any other bill or bills, which the plaintiff may be advised to bring in this court.

CARTRIGHT v. BOSTWICK.

[1 Betts, C. C. MS. 55.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 11, 1842.

SUBSTITUTION OF PAROL AGREEMENT FOR BOND—CONSIDERATION.

[A bond under seal is not superseded by a subsequent parol agreement of exactly like terms and effect, which rests upon no mutuality, and as to which the promisee parts with nothing, nor assumes any responsibility.]

[At law. Action by N. G. Cartright against W. C. Bostwick upon an agreement.]

Demurrer to declaration for want of consideration in contract, and because a sealed contract is in force between the parties in relation to same subject matter.

PER CURIAM. The agreement on the part of the defendant discloses no consideration adequate to support it. The declaration shows that it is intended to supersede a previous sealed contract in relation to the same matter; and for aught shown by the pleadings, the stipulations are precisely correspondent to those in the bond. We find no case sanctioning the doctrine that a parol agreement of exactly like terms and effect will rescind or displace a specialty. 21 Wend. 628, and 13 Wend. 75, rest upon a different doctrine. But if this point is not conclusive the other is, that no consideration is exhibited here. The new agreement rests upon no mutuality, nor does the party to whom the promise is made part with any right or incur any responsibility, as the occasion of the engagement. The only consideration supposed by the plaintiff is, that the new agreement operates as an extinguishment of the bond, and by means of that prejudice, he acquires a right to enforce this promise. The authorities do not support the position, and upon general principles we think the plaintiff should seek his remedy upon his more specific and formal contract. Judgment in favor of the claimant.

CARTWELL et al. v. The JOHN TAYLOR.

[Newb. 341.][1]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. Nov., 1842.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—SHIPWRECK—SALVAGE BY CREW—BY OTHERS—COMPENSATION.

1. The crew of a wrecked vessel, who have by meritorious exertions saved the tackle, apparel and furniture of that vessel, have a claim for compensation in the nature of salvage upon the property so saved.

[See note at end of case.]

2. It is the general doctrine of the English maritime law, from which ours is derived, that the payment of wages is dependent upon the earning of freight. If no freight be earned, no wages are due, for freight is the mother of wages; but in cases of shipwreck where the seamen cannot earn wages and yet perform a meritorious service, they are entitled to a salvage compensation for their labor and services in preserving the wreck of the ship and cargo, or either.

[See Rev. St. § 4524, cited in note at end of case.]

3. Where salvage is allowed to seamen for services performed in preserving the wreck of their own vessel and her cargo, the amount of wages they were receiving at the time of the disaster, is a safe and proper criterion to be adopted by the court in fixing the quantum of salvage they are to receive.

4. Compensation in such a case allowed to seamen, must be paid out of the proceeds of the property saved.

5. In awarding a salvage compensation at the rate of fifty per cent., in accordance with the stipulations of a written contract between the United States consul at Havana of the one part, acting for the master, owners and underwriters of the wrecked ship, and the master of the schooner Warrior of the other part, in pursuance of which the said schooner came to the relief of the wrecked vessel, the court will not give the whole compensation to the master and owners and leave the seamen to look to the other moiety for their reward. The contract is not a rule that binds the court to grant so large a percentage on the value of the property saved to the master and owner only, as ostensible parties to the agreement, when it is shown that the dangers and toils incident to the enterprise, have been shared by the seamen, who were doubtless induced to embark in the undertaking by the very fact that such a contract was entered into by the master.

In admiralty.

Mr. Cohen, for libelant.

Mr. Moise, for the master and owner of the Warrior.

Mr. Schmidt, for intervener Grant.

[1] [Reported by John S. Newberry, Esq.]

McCALEB, District Judge. This is a libel in rem against the tackle, apparel, furniture, and a portion of the materials lately belonging to the ship John Taylor, which was wrecked near Cape Antonio, on the south coast of the island of Cuba, on the 18th of October last, while pursuing her voyage from Liverpool to the port of New Orleans. The original libel was filed by four of the crew of said ship, claiming a lien on the said tackle, apparel, etc., for the satisfaction of their wages, and also for additional compensation in the nature of salvage, for having saved the said tackle, apparel, &c., from the wreck of the said ship. Intervening libels were afterwards filed by twenty-one more of the crew of the wrecked vessel, claiming wages and compensation also in the nature of salvage, as set forth in the original libel. Then followed the intervening libel of Edward Griffith, master of the schooner Warrior, intervening for himself and for James Chapman, owner of said schooner, and William Saunders, mate, Joseph Lovell, John Noyes, John Robinson, Benjamin Mitchell and Charles H. Corbin, seamen on board said schooner, and Nicholas P. Trist, the American consul at the port of Havana. Lastly the libel of intervention of T. A. Grant was filed, claiming compensation in the nature of salvage for services in traveling by land across the island from Cape Antonio to the city of Havana for the purpose of procuring aid for the wrecked vessel, her crew and passengers.

I shall first consider the claim of the crew of the John Taylor. It has been most satisfactorily proved that they worked with energy and fidelity: that their services in saving the tackle, apparel, &c., of the wrecked vessel, were of the most meritorious character. The strictest subordination prevailed among them, and they manifested the most perfect willingness to do their duty, and displayed the utmost promptitude in executing the orders of the master. Through their aid, in conjunction with that of the officers and crew of the schooner Warrior, almost all the tackle, materials, &c., of the John Taylor were saved. The first question that arises is: Have they a right to claim wages for the services they had rendered, and if not, in what manner are they to be compensated? I have examined the authorities on this subject with the strictest care and attention, and although it must be admitted that the ablest admiralty tribunals have differed somewhat in opinion, I am inclined to think that the view taken by Mr. Justice Story in the case of The Two Catherines [Case No. 14,288], is not only sustained by the greatest weight of authority both in England and in this country, but presents the whole subject in a light which reason must at once adopt and the immutable principles of justice forever sanction. I shall quote his remarks at some length. "It is laid down as a general doctrine of the English maritime law, from which ours is derived, that the payment of wages is dependent upon the earning of freight. If no freight is earned in the voyage, no wages are due; for, in the expressive phraseology of the ancient law, freight is the mother of wages. Hence, if the ship be lost during the voyage, so that no freight is earned, the mariners lose their wages. And by parity of reason, if by inevitable accident the freight is partly lost, it seems that the seamen lose a proportion of their wages. The ground of this doctrine is said to be, that 'if the seamen should have their wages, in such cases they would not use their endeavors nor hazard their lives to save the ship.' Sid. 179. And the argument now is that the reason of the rule shows that it does not apply to a case of shipwreck like the present, where the whole freight is lost; for if the seamen are not entitled to wages for salvage from the wreck, they can have no motive to remain by and use their exertions to save it. And it is earnestly contended that all the cases in which it has been held that no wages are due to the seamen, are cases, not of shipwreck, but where the ship perished at sea, so that there was a total loss of ship and freight. It appears to me that upon the established doctrines of our law, where the freight is lost by inevitable accident, the seamen cannot recover wages, as such, from the ship owner. And it is perfectly immaterial in such cases whether the ship be lost or be in good safety. Nor does the case of shipwreck, strictly speaking, form an exception to the generality of this rule. It more properly introduces another principle, that of allowing salvage to the crew when they cannot earn wages and yet perform a meritorious service." After commenting at length upon the different opinions entertained by different authors, he thus proceeds: "But whatever may be the true doctrine on this subject in respect to wages, I am clear that upon principle, the seamen are entitled to salvage for their labor and services in preserving the wreck of the ship and cargo or either. It is a claim founded in natural justice and sustained by the most obvious motives of public policy and interest."

The opinion of Mr. Justice Story is but a re-assertion of the same doctrine maintained by Judge Peters in the case of Taylor v. The Cato [Case No. 13,786]. "The claim of the sailor," said he, "is not under his contract for wages out of freight; but in a new character as a salvor, he regains a rightful claim to wages, restored by rescuing the articles (whether parts of the ship or cargo) from the perils and loss to which the wreck had exposed them." The reasoning of these eminent judges I am inclined to adopt as my own rule of decision. The right which these seamen have to claim a reward, cannot be doubted; and it is immaterial whether this reward be granted as wages, or as salvage strictly so called, since the loss of wages consequent upon a loss of freight, is supplied by a compensation in the light of salvage for their meritorious services in saving from the wreck the tackle and materials, upon which the law secures them a lien. Following the high precedents to which I have referred, I think it fair and equitable to take the amount of the wages[2] which these seamen were receiving as my guide in awarding the quantum of salvage, and shall therefore allow them a continuance of those wages on the homeward voyage, at the same rate per month, to the day when the tackle, furniture and materials were taken into custody by the marshal of this court.

And now, in regard to the party upon whom this charge is to fall, I should probably feel some doubt, were I not happily furnished with a precedent by which I can be satisfactorily guided, to be found in the decision of Judge Story in the case of The Two Catherines [Case No. 14,288]. "It is not," says he, "like the ordinary charge of seamen's wages, which are a charge upon the ship owner, and are to be borne by the freight; but it is in the saving of the materials of the ship for the benefit of those who are to receive it cum onere. The case of Frothingham v. Prince, 3 Mass. 563, is also directly in point." The charge, then, will be paid out of that portion of the proceeds of the property saved which may fall to the underwriters, to whom, as I have learned, the property has been abandoned. It is my next duty to consider the claim of the owner, master and crew of the schooner Warrior, which went from the port of Havana to the relief of the John Taylor. This she did under a special contract entered into by Capt. Griffith, her master, and N. P. Trist, the American consul at Havana, "acting for and on behalf of the master, owner and underwriters of the ship John Taylor." I have examined with attention the contract under which the salvage at the rate of fifty per cent. is claimed, as well as all the facts and circumstances under which the services were rendered; and I can see no good reason for changing the rule of decision adopted in the case of The Clarion [Case No. 2,795], decided in this court a few days since. As to the merit of the services rendered, there can be no doubt. The evidence shows that the Warrior remained near the wreck almost a month: that she was frequently in great danger, and was on one occasion compelled to slip her cables and put to sea, as her anchors dragged among the rocks and she ran the risk of being thrown ashore. During the time she remained near the wreck her crew were busily employed in transporting the salt from the John Taylor on board their own vessel, and in stripping the former of such parts of her as were sufficiently valuable to be saved. In a word, the Warrior and her crew did all that human agency could accomplish in affecting the object they had in view when they left the port of Havana. Yet, in awarding the very liberal salvage of fifty per cent. as stipulated in the contract, I know no principle either in law or equity which would justify the court in giving the whole amount to the master and owner, and compelling the crew to look to the other moiety for their share of the salvage. I cannot recognize the agreement as a rule that binds the court to grant so large a per centage on the value of the property saved to the ostensible parties to the agreement, when the dangers and toils incident to the enterprise have been shared in equally by others, who doubtless were induced cheerfully to embark in the undertaking in consequence of this very agreement. To the view of the master and owner of the Warrior it may be very proper thus to subject to a mere contingency the hopes of their gallant crew. But in the eye of the court, it becomes a matter of great importance to protect the rights of the latter as well as the former; and if a particular indulgence is to be extended to either side, the seamen should reap the benefit of that indulgence; and for the obvious reason, that they are not always possessed of the capacity to protect their own rights.

But the ingenious proctor for the master and owner, as well as of the crew of the Warrior, has contended that the latter do not seek to avail themselves of the written contract, but wish to assert their claim against the whole amount of property saved. This position is equally objectionable, since it directly interferes with the rights of another set of salvors, whose claims, though asserted upon a different principle, imperatively demand the protection of the court. And it is quite apparent that when these claims have been satisfied, there will be but a pittance remaining for the underwriters. With due respect for the zeal displayed in the argument of this case, the court would respectfully suggest, that however meritorious may be the services of salvors, there is such a thing as overstepping the bounds of reason and moderation in the demands which are usually made for compensation for those services. This was a case which peculiarly called for the exercise of disinterested heroism and self-devotion, a case in which the appeals in favor of humanity were loud and irresistible. Let us hope that in such a case the meritorious exertions and the deeds of gallantry, which in fact have not been magnified beyond the deserts of those who performed them, were prompted in some small degree by the influence of the golden precept, "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you;" and not solely by the instigations of avarice or rapacity. Let it not be said, that bold and hardy adventurers in the cause of human suffering, after accomplishing the meritorious object they had in view, now seek to swallow up all that was left by the mercy of the winds and the waves.

I proceed now to establish the mode of distribution, and leave the precise quantum of salvage allowed to be hereafter ascertained. The proceeds of the property saved from the wreck of the John Taylor amounts to $4,800; of this sum fifty per cent. is awarded to the owners, master and crew of the schooner Warrior, after deducting the costs of court and all expenses, and the two and a half per cent. due the consul in Havana. In allowing this last amount, I have deviated from the decision given in the case of The Clarion [supra]. In that case no proof was given of the right of the consul to make the charge. In the present case it was clearly shown. Besides, in the case of The Clarion, the amount allowed to the owners, master, &c., was sufficiently large to justify the course therein pursued. From the whole proceeds must be also deducted the $29 still due to Mr. Grant for traveling across the island to Havana. I award him no more, because it has been proved by the master of the John Taylor, that this sum, in addition to the $100 he has already received, is a fair compensation for his services; and because he was at one time willing to receive it as satisfaction in full. I see no good reason why he should have subsequently demanded a higher compensation, the opinion of the attorney whom he consulted, to the contrary notwithstanding. When these deductions shall have been made from the whole amount of the proceeds, fifty per cent. of the remainder is to be divided among the owner, master, mate, and five seamen in the following manner: To the owner I award one-third of the fifty per cent; and the other two-thirds I divide into sixteen shares of $100 each. Of these shares I award the captain or master seven shares, the mate four shares, and each seaman one share. From the other moiety must be deducted the sum of $161, the value of a small boat, a cable, and an anchor, which were lost by the master of the Warrior, and for which he shall be indemnified. The clerk will be furnished with an abstract of this decree, and ordered to pay over the money in accordance with the mode of distribution above prescribed, after the payment of the costs of court.

[NOTE. One of the earliest cases in this country to allow salvage to a seaman for services to his own ship was that of The Blaireau, 2 Cranch (6 U. S.) 240. There the master and other members of the crew deserted the vessel, leaving one seaman alone upon her. With the assistance of other salvors, she was brought into port. The court laid special stress upon the fact that, by abandoning the seaman to his fate, the captain had absolved him from further duty under his contract. In the later cases this idea is still more strongly emphasized, and the right of a seaman to salvage in his own vessel is made to depend upon whether, before rendering the services, his contract has been put an end to, either voluntarily by the master, or by vis major. Thus, in the case of The Triumph, Case No. 14,183, it is said: "The vital question is, had the contract with the seaman been dissolved? that is, was he bound to render the service for which he claims salvage compensation, or had he been previously discharged from all obligation under his contract?" The same principle is laid down by Judge Lowell in The Olive Branch, Id. 10,490. In that case the ship had stranded. The master was absent, and there was no mate. The crew, however, got the vessel off, with some difficulty and danger. Salvage was denied on the ground that the voyage was not ended, nor the contract in any way annulled or dissolved. See, also, The Antelope, Id. 484; The Niphon, Id. 10,277; The Akbar, 5 Fed. 456; and the very recent case of The C. P. Minch, 61 Fed. 511. In this case salvage was denied because, although the master and part of the crew had left the ship, it did not certainly appear that he intended to abandon her, and the voyage was in fact completed, and wages paid to the crew. In the case of The Dawn, Case No. 3,666, Judge Ware seemed to be of opinion that, in case of wreck, the seamen might have two distinct claims, one for wages and another for salvage; the wages to be paid exclusively from the proceeds of any materials belonging to the ship, and the salvage to be a charge against the general mass of the property saved.

[The act of June 7, 1872 (17 Stat. 268, § 30; Rev. St. § 4524), provides that the right to wages shall not be dependent on the earning of freight, "but in all cases of wreck or loss of vessel, proof that any seaman or apprentice has not exerted himself to the utmost to save the vessel, cargo, and stores, shall bar his claim."]

ARREST OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY — BOTTOMRY BOND—VESSEL CHARTERED TO THE GOVERNMENT —MOTION TO VACATE PROCESS.

1. Where a vessel under charter to the United States, whose owners were to victual and man her, took on board a load of property captured by the army of the United States to bring it to New York, and meeting with disaster on the voyage, her master took up money on a bottomry of the vessel and cargo, and on her arrival in New York a libel was filed to enforce the bottomry bond, and the vessel and cargo were seized by the marshal under the process, and no appearance being entered for either vessel or cargo, the district attorney of the United States, before the return of the process, applied on affidavit for an order directing the release of the property and vacating the process, on the ground that government property was not subject to the process of the court, —Held, that whether the vessel could be considered as government property under the charter was doubtful, and that such a question should not be disposed of before appearance, and on motion.

[Cited in Lands v. Cargo of 227 Tons of Coal, 4 Fed. 479.]

2. That though the cargo was government property, it had been put by the government into the custody of the master of the vessel, and it was doubtful whether granting the order would put the government into possession of it.

[2] [Affirmed as to the cargo, and reversed as to the vessel, in Case No. 10,611.]

3. That the law of the case ought to be determined upon a hearing on issues properly and formally framed, instead of upon motion.

[In admiralty. Libel by David G. Cartwright and Frederick H. Harrison against the schooner Othello and cargo.]

This was a motion to vacate the process issued in the cause. It appeared from the papers read upon the motion that the schooner Othello was chartered by her owners to the government of the United States, at the rate of fifty dollars per day, for an indefinite period of time, the owners to victual, man, and navigate the vessel, and transport therein such property as might be tendered by the quartermaster of the United States army. According to the terms of the charter party, the vessel was to be kept fit for service by her owners, and all sea risks to be borne by them. Under this charter, and while under the command and in the possession of the master not an officer in the service of the United States, but appointed and paid by the owners, she set sail from Wilmington for New York, laden with a cargo of property which had been captured by the army of the United States. In the prosecution of her voyage, she met with disaster at sea, and was compelled to put into St. Thomas for repairs. While there, the master, in order to raise money necessary to repair and enable him to prosecute his voyage, executed a bottomry bond in the usual form upon both vessel and cargo, to secure the sum of $15,535, alleged to have been borrowed by him for the purposes aforesaid. The vessel thereafter proceeded upon her voyage, and arrived in this port, when the bond not being discharged, a libel was filed in this court to enforce it, and the vessel and cargo taken into custody by the marshal under the admiralty process issued according to the prayer of the libel. Before any appearance or claim for either vessel or cargo had been entered, the district attorney, on behalf of the United States, before the return day of the process, moved, upon affidavits, for an order directing the discharge of the property from custody, and vacating the process, on the ground that the cargo was conceded to be the property of the United States, and that by virtue of the peculiar provisions of the charter party referred to, the vessel also was, in law, government property, and as such not subject to the process of the court.

B. D. Silliman, Dist. Atty., for the United States. J. J. Ridgway, for libellants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. According to my present impression, the view taken by the district attorney in regard to the vessel can hardly be maintained. But however that may be, I am clearly of the opinion that such a question as is raised by the facts above narrated should not be finally disposed of before appearance and upon a motion. It does not yet appear that the owners of the vessel, who are the parties responsible for that portion of the advances chargeable to the ship, will not come forward on the return of the process and claim their property, while the interest of the government in the controversy, so far as regards the vessel herself, is certainly very slight, for it appears that the hire of the vessel had been suspended by the quartermaster before the seizure of the vessel, because of a refusal of the master to deliver the cargo.

As to the cargo, the facts are somewhat different, for that is conceded to be the property of the United States. It is property, however, in no way connected with any active operations of either army or navy. It was committed to the custody of the master of this vessel, to be transported by him to this port. While in the prosecution of the voyage, the master, by reason of disaster at sea, has been compelled, in a foreign port, to pledge the cargo to these libellants, by way of bottomry; and upon the termination of the voyage, before any delivery of the property to any officer of the government, and while it still remained in the custody of the master, it was seized by the marshal, by virtue of process issued out of the court of admiralty, in an action brought to enforce payment of the bottomry loan; now, inasmuch as it appears that previous to the seizure by the marshal, the government had failed to obtain possession of the property from the master of the vessel, the order applied for here would not necessarily have the effect to put the government in possession. If such would be the effect of an order releasing the property from the custody of the marshal, because of the great hardship of thus, by an interlocutory order, made on motion, without the interposition of claim or answer, depriving the libellants of any opportunity to derive any advantage from their bottomry bond, and possibly of any opportunity to secure the opinion of an appellate court, I should feel very unwilling to grant the application, unless I felt satisfied that the law of the case was free from all doubt. What the law of the case is, should, I think, be determined in this case, as has been done in other cases where property of the United States has been seized by the marshal, in private suits, (The Thomas A. Scott [Case No. 13,920], Shipman, J.,) upon a hearing upon issues properly and formally framed. The application must, therefore, be denied, both as to vessel and cargo.

[NOTE. The libellants appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the decree entered herein as to the cargo, and dismissed the libel as to the same, but without costs in either court, but reversed the decree as to the vessel, and directed that the case as to the vessel be heard on the merits. See Case No. 10,611.]

CARUANA v. BRITISH & N. A. ROYAL MAIL STEAM-PACKET CO.

[6 Ben. 517.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1873.

BILL OF LADING—DELIVERY OF CARGO — NOTICE TO CONSIGNEE WHEN VESSEL IS NOT NAMED IN THE BILL OF LADING.

1. A bill of lading was executed at Malta, on January 2, 1872, acknowledging the receipt there, in good condition, of eighty-five boxes of oranges for shipment to Liverpool, "to be there reshipped on board a Cunard steamer or steamers bound for New York, via Queenstown and (or) Boston," to be there delivered in like good order and well conditioned, on payment of certain freight. It also contained a clause that the goods were "to be taken from alongside by the consignee, immediately the vessel is ready to discharge," or they would be landed and deposited in a warehouse or sent to public store. On the 2d, 3d, or 5th of February, 1872, the consignee named in the bill of lading sent his agent with the bill of lading to the office of the Cunard Steamship Company in New York. He showed the bill of lading to the clerk having charge of the department of inward freight, and asked if the goods named in it had arrived. He was told that they would probably arrive by the Russia, which was to sail from Liverpool on February 3d, and that, on the arrival of any steamer, a list of the cargo and consignees of goods on board of her was published in the Journal of Commerce. The consignee inspected that list on the arrival of the Russia, and not finding his name, sent again to the office, and was told that the goods had not come by the Russia, but, if they were coming, would come by the next steamer. On the arrival of that steamer, his goods were not on her, and he sent again to the company's office, and was then told that the goods had arrived by the China, which came on the 1st of February. Her cargo list had been published on the 3d of February, and on the 5th of February the goods had been sent to the public store under a general order. Before the consignee learned these facts and applied for his goods, they had been sold to pay storage. The consignee filed a libel against the company to recover their value: Held, that the publication of the cargo list of the China was not such a notice to the consignee as is requisite to discharge a ship owner from liability under a bill of lading.

[Cited in Unnevehr v. The Hindoo, 1 Fed. 630; The Boskenna Bay, 22 Fed. 665.]

2. That, under such a bill of lading as this, which mentioned no vessel, and on such inquiry as the consignee made, it was the duty of the ship owners to have seen to it that he was advised truly as to the arrival of his goods.

3. That the ship owners were therefore liable, on the bill of lading, for the value of the goods.

[In admiralty. Libel by Carmello F. Caruana against the British & North American Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company.]

Charles Donohue, for libellant.

Daniel D. Lord, for respondents.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought to recover the value of eighty-five boxes of oranges, shipped at Malta, under a bill of lading given by the respondents, the proprietors of a line of steamers running between Liverpool and New York, and known as the "Cunard Line," and consigned to the libellant, at New York. The bill of lading is dated at Malta, January 2d, 1872. It reads thus: "Received, in good order and condition, from Dr. L. Ullo, for shipment to Liverpool, to be there reshipped on board a Cunard steamer or steamers bound for New York, via Queenstown and (or) Boston, eighty-five boxes oranges, being marked and numbered as in the margin," eighty-five boxes, C. F. C., "and are to be delivered, in the like good order and well conditioned, at Jersey City, being within the jurisdiction of the custom house of the aforesaid port of New York, * * * unto C. F. Caruana, Esq., or to his assigns, freight for the said goods being paid on delivery, as per margin," £18 14. * * * "The goods to be taken from alongside by the consignee, immediately the vessel is ready to discharge, or otherwise they will be landed by the master, and deposited at the expense of the consignee, and at his risk of fire, loss or injury, in the warehouse provided for that purpose on the steamship wharf at Jersey City, or elsewhere, or sent to the public store, as the collector of the port of New York shall direct, and, when deposited in the warehouse, to be subject to storage, the collector for the port being hereby authorized to grant a general order for discharge immediately after entry of the ship."

The libel alleges the shipment of the goods under the bill of lading, and avers that they arrived in New York, but the respondents did not deliver them to the libellant, and they became wholly lost to him.

The answer avers that the goods were taken to Liverpool, and there shipped in a Cunard steamer for New York; that, by the usage of trade, notice of the arrival of goods and of readiness to discharge is given by publication in a daily newspaper, notice of the day when the vessel will be ready to discharge being also posted in a conspicuous place in the New York custom house, of which usage the libellant had notice; that the notice of arrival of the goods and of readiness to discharge was duly given in the manner described, and thereupon it became the duty of the libellant to procure a permit for the delivery of the said goods, and to take them from alongside of the vessel when landed; that the goods were landed on the respondents' wharf at Jersey City; that the libellant was not ready to take them, and did not obtain a permit therefor, whereupon they were sent to the public store, under a general order granted by the collector of the port of New York; that, after deposit in the said warehouse, and in consequence of the libellant's neglect to take the same, as he was bound to do by the terms of his contract, the goods became liable to decay and were sold to pay storage, such sale being in conformity with the usage and custom of trade; and that the respondents are not responsible for the loss on the goods.

The name of the steamer by which the goods were to be sent from Liverpool to New York, is not given in the bill of lading, nor is the day on which they would leave Liverpool stated therein. The days of sailing of steamers of the Cunard line from Liverpool for New York, in January and February, 1872, were as follows: the Java, January 6th; the Calabria, January 13th; the China, January 20th; the Abyssinia, January 27th; the Russia, February 3d; and the Algeria, February 10th. The libellant had no information as to what steamer would bring the goods. On the 2d, 3d or 5th of February (the 4th falling on Sunday), the libellant's son and agent, on his behalf (no information that the goods had arrived having been received by the libellant), went to the office of the respondents, in New York, having the bill of lading with him, and placed it in the hands of a clerk of the respondents in such office, who had charge of the department of inward freight, and asked him if the goods named in it had arrived. The clerk inspected the bill of lading and informed the libellant's son, that the goods would probably arrive by the Russia, which was assigned to sail from Liverpool February 3d. He also then gave to the libellant's son a printed list, as above, of the names of the vessels and the days of their sailing from Liverpool, and informed him that a list of the names of the consignees, and of the number of packages consigned to them respectively, by the vessels of the line, was on their arrival, generally published in a daily newspaper published in New York, called the Journal of Commerce. The libellant was a subscriber to that paper. He watched for the arrival of the Russia, and, when she arrived, examined her cargo list as published in the Journal of Commerce, but it did not contain his goods. They did not come by the Russia. The libellant's son thereupon went to the respondent's office, and saw the same clerk, and asked him if the goods had arrived by the Russia, and was answered that they had not, and was also told by the same clerk, that, if they were coming at all, they would come by the Algeria. The libellant then watched for the arrival of the Algeria, and, when she arrived, examined her cargo list in the same newspaper, but did not find his goods in it. The libellant's son thereupon went to the office of the respondents, and was told by the same clerk, that the goods had not arrived by the Algeria, but had come by the China, which, he said, had arrived about the 3d of February. He demanded the goods, but they were not delivered to him. The China did bring the goods. She arrived on the 1st of February, and was entered at the custom house on the 2d. Her cargo list, containing a statement that she had arrived, and had brought 85 packages of merchandise for the libellant, was published in the Journal of Commerce on the morning of the 3d of February. The 85 boxes were sent to the public store, under a general order, after 10 o'clock a. m., on the 5th of February, the libellant not having obtained any permit for them, or entered them at the custom house, because he did not know of their arrival.

At the time of the first visit of the libellant's son, the clerk had not seen a manifest of the China's cargo, even if such manifest was in the office. The latest manifest he had seen was that of the Java's cargo. The clerk acknowledges, in his testimony, that the reason he told the libellant's son that he thought the goods would arrive by the Russia was, that he did not think they would reach Liverpool in time to come by either the Calabria, the China or the Abyssinia. The manifests of the cargoes of the various steamers, as they arrived, were taken to, and kept in, the office of the respondents. They were there for reference. On the second visit of the libellant's son, after the arrival of the Russia, and which must have been after the 15th of February, and when the attention of the clerk was called to the goods a second time, the manifest of the China's cargo must have been in the office, showing that the libellant's goods came by her. Yet the clerk did not consult it, nor did he tell the libellant's son that the goods had come by the China. The publication of the cargo lists in the newspaper is not shown to be the act of the respondents, as a notice emanating from them in fulfilment of any duty to give a notice. The answer avers, that, by the usage of trade, notice of the arrival of goods and of readiness to discharge is given by publication in a daily newspaper, and that notice of the day when the vessel will be ready to discharge is also posted in a conspicuous place in the New York custom house, and that the libellant had notice of such usage, and that notice of the arrival of these goods and of readiness to discharge was duly given in the manner described. No such usage is proved. Nor is it shown that the respondents gave any such notice as is averred. Whatever notice the publication of the cargo list of the China was, it is not shown to have emanated from the respondents, nor was there any publication of any notice of readiness to discharge. The libellant had no knowledge or information as to the vessel which was to bring his goods. He sent his bill of lading in abundant season to the office of the respondents, and spread before them all the information he had, which was the date of the bill in Malta. It was their duty, under such a bill of lading, and on such inquiry as the libellant made, to have seen to it that he was advised truly as to his goods. Instead of that, the respondents misled him. They substantially told him that his goods could not arrive sooner than by the Russia, knowing as they did the date of their delivery in Malta. He could know nothing on that subject. They were bound to know everything. They, in effect, told him that his goods had not arrived by the China, when his son went there after the arrival of the Russia. He cannot be held responsible for not having examined the cargo list of the China, as published in the newspaper of February 3d.

The provision in the bill of lading, that the consignee is to take the goods from alongside as soon as the vessel is ready to discharge, must have a sensible construction. What vessel? None is named in the bill of lading. It is to be "a Cunard steamer or steamers." The respondents could divide the shipment, and send it in parts, by several steamers. The steamer or steamers were to be "bound for New York via Queenstown and (or) Boston." The respondents could send the goods all by way of Boston, or could send some by way of Boston and some direct to New York, and could divide the goods among several steamers. If sent by way of Boston, their ultimate destination being the respondents' wharf at Jersey City, they must reach that wharf by a conveyance other than that in which they left Liverpool. Under such a contract, the consignee is entitled to a notice of the arrival of his goods, and is not obliged to watch for the arrival of a nameless vessel, or for the appearance on the wharf of goods which may come from Boston by one of many means of transport; and, if he does what this consignee did, he does all that is incumbent upon him to entitle himself to receive actual notice of the arrival of the goods, when they do arrive and their arrival is known to the carrier.

There must be a decree for the libellant, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the amount of the damages sustained by the libellant.

PATENTS — REISSUE — "COTTON GIN" — CONSTRUCTION — INTERPRETATION — QUESTION FOR JURY — MASSACHUSETTS MANUFACTURING CORPORATION ACT — "DEBTS CONTRACTED."

1. The patent act of 1836, c. 357, § 13 [5 Stat. 122], and the act of 1837, c. 45, § 8 [5 Stat. 193], authorizing the re-issue of a patent, because of a defective or redundant specification or description, without fraud or for the purpose of adding thereto an improvement, do not require the patentee to claim, in his renewed patent, all things which were claimed in his original patent, but gives him the privilege of retaining whatever he deems proper.

2. Where the plaintiff, in a patent for "a new and useful improvement in the ribs of the cotton-gin," claimed, as a part of his invention, the increasing the space between the upper and lower surface of the rib, either by making the ribs thicker at that part, or by a fork, or by any other variation of the particular form; it was held, that the claim was sufficiently accurate as a matter of law, and that it was not necessary that he should describe all possible modes by which the rib might be varied, but only the most important, and that mere formal variations therefrom would be violations of the patent.

3. Objections, that a patented invention is old; or that the specification in a patent does not clearly describe the mode of making the machine; or that the original and the renewed patent are not for the same invention; or that either were obtained with a fraudulent intent; all involve matters of fact, and are for the jury, upon the evidence, to decide.

4. Where the original patent was for "a new and useful improvement in the ribs of saw gins for ginning cotton," and the renewed patent was for "a new and useful invention in the manner of forming the ribs of saw gins for ginning cotton," and in the renewed patent was claimed, in addition to the thickness of the rib, the sloping up of it so as to leave no shoulder; it was held, that the claim in the renewed patent, was not for two distinct improvements, but for additional parts of the same improvement, and that the same thing was patented in both patents.

5. Patents are to be interpreted by a consideration of the whole instrument, and it is to be thereby determined what thing is intended to be patented.

6. The statute of Massachusetts of 1821, c. 28, relating to the individual liabilities of members of manufacturing corporations, is to be construed as a remedial statute, and the phrase "debts contracted," as employed therein, means not only debts in the strict sense of the term, but any liabilities incurred by the corporation. If the liability be for unliquidated damages arising from contract or tort, it relates to the time of its origin, and not of its liquidation; and, therefore, it was held, that the testimony of Edson, who was a member of the corporation at the time when the liability asserted in the present suit arose, must be rejected, although he had since sold out all his interest.

Case [by Eleazer Carver against the Braintree Manufacturing Company] for infringement of a patent, dated the 16th of November, 1839 [and numbered 17], for "a new and useful improvement in the ribs of the cotton gin." The present patent was a renewed patent, granted upon the surrender of the original patent [No. 777], dated the 12th of June, 1838, which was cancelled on account of a defective specification. The specification annexed to the original patent was as follows: "To all whom it may concern: Be it know that I, Eleazer Carver, of Bridgewater, in the county of Plymouth, and state of Massachusetts, have invented a certain improvement in the manner of forming the ribs of saw gins, for the ginning of cotton, and I do hereby declare, that the following is a full and exact description thereof: In the cotton gin, as heretofore known and used, the fibers of the cotton are drawn by the teeth of circular saws through a grating formed of a number of parallel bars or ribs, having spaces between them sufficient to allow the saws to pass, carrying the fibres of the cotton with them (which are then brushed off by a revolving brush), but not wide enough to let the seeds and other foreign substances pass through. Above the saws, the ribs come in close contact, thus forming a shoulder at the top of the space between them. Various forms have been given to the bars or ribs, with a view to procure a free passage for the cotton, but the cotton-gin, as heretofore made, has been always subject to the inconvenience of the grate becoming choked by hard masses of cotton, and motes, or false seeds, collecting in the upper part of the spaces between the ribs, and impeding the action of the saws, and also preventing the mass of cotton, which is drawn by the saws up to the top of the spaces, but not drawn through them, from rolling back freely, so as to pass again over the saws, as it should do. My improvement, which I am about to describe, is intended to obviate these difficulties, and it consists in giving a new form to the ribs composing the grate. Instead of making the ribs of a bar of iron of equal thickness throughout, so that the upper and under surfaces shall be parallel, I so form the rib that at the part where the saws pass through, carrying the cotton with them, the space or depth between the upper or outer surface, and the lower or inner surface, shall be greater than the thickness of the rib in other parts has heretofore been, or needs to be, and so great as to be equal to the length of the fibre of the cotton to be ginned, so that the fibre shall be kept extended between the ribs for about its full length, while it is drawn through them by the saws. This will, of course, require either that the rib should be as thick at that part as the length of the fibre, or that the rib should be forked or divided about that part, so that the upper or outer surface and the under or inner surface shall diverge to that distance from each other, instead of being parallel, as formerly, when the rib was made of one bar of uniform thickness. This under or inner surface then takes a new direction upwards, and slopes toward the upper or outward surface, until the two surfaces meet above the periphery of the saw. This last described part of the under surface is fastened against the frame-work of the gin. The operation of this improvement is, that those fibres of the cotton, which are so firmly caught by the teeth of the saws as to be disengaged from the mass of the cotton to be ginned, are drawn out to their full length, and pass clear through the grate, and are then brushed off by the revolving brush, while the fibres that are drawn into the grate, but are not caught by the teeth of the saws firmly enough to be carried quite through, are disengaged, and pass up to the point, where the under surface meets the upper surface above the saws, and finding no obstruction there, pass back out of the grate without choking it, and roll down again with the mass of the unginned cotton, and are then caught below by the saws and carried up again, and so on, until all the fibres are drawn through. Having thus described my improved rib, and its advantages, I now claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, the increasing the depth or space between the upper or outer surface of the rib and the lower or inner surface of it, at the part where the cotton is drawn through the grate, so that it shall be equal to the length of the fibre of the cotton to be ginned (whether this be done by making the ribs thicker at that part, or by a fork or division of the rib, or by any other variation of the particular form), and I also claim, as part of the same improvement, the sloping up of the lower or inner surface of the rib, so as to meet the upper or outer surface above the saws, leaving, when the rib is inserted into the frame, no break or shoulder between the two surfaces, but a smooth and uninterrupted passage upwards between the ribs as above described." The defendant pleaded the general issue, and also filed special matters of defence.

Willard Phillips and Fletcher, for the defendants, at the trial made several points of defence, which, however, are sufficiently referred to in the opinion of the court.

Franklin Dexter, for the plaintiff, denied the validity of all the objections. As the matters of objection were afterwards fully considered in the arguments for a new trial, they are here also admitted.

At the trial, one Edson, who was a member of the corporation (the defendants) at the time of the supposed infringement, but had since sold out his interest, was offered as a witness for the corporation. But upon an objection by the plaintiff, his testimony was rejected, as being inadmissible, as he still had an interest in the event of the suit. THE COURT, however, ruled out the testimony, hesitanter, expressing a desire to re-examine it, if the verdict should be for the plaintiff.

A great deal of evidence was introduced on each side; but the questions on which the cause seemed principally to rest, were questions of law, and were accordingly argued by the counsel in the course of the trial.

STORY, Circuit Justice, upon the close of the arguments, said: So far as the questions of fact are concerned, I shall leave them for the consideration of the jury, if upon the whole evidence the counsel desire it. But the questions of law are those upon which I am ready to express my present opinion, subject to re-examination, if the counsel shall wish any of them to be more deliberately considered. The first objection is, that the specification has not sufficiently described the mode of making the improvement, or in such full, clear, and exact terms as to enable a skilful mechanic, skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make or construct it. This is certainly a matter mainly of fact. It is true, that the plaintiff, in his specification, in describing the thickness of the rib in his machine, declares, that it should be so thick, that the distance or depth between the upper and the lower surface should be "so great as to be equal to the length of the fibre to be ginned," which, it is said, is too ambiguous and indefinite a description to enable a mechanic to make it, because it is notorious, that not only the fibres of different kinds of cotton are of different lengths, long staple, and short staple; but that the different fibres in the same kind of cotton are of unequal lengths. And it is asked, what then is to be the distance or depth or thickness of the rib? Whether a skilful mechanic could from this description make a proper rib for any particular kind of cotton, is a matter of fact, which those only, who are acquainted with the structure of cotton gins, can properly answer. If they could, then the description is sufficient, although it may require some niceties in adjusting the different thicknesses to the different kinds of cotton. If they could not, then the specification is obviously defective. But I should suppose, that the inequalities of the different fibres of the same kind of cotton would not necessarily present an insurmountable difficulty. It may be, that the adjustment should be made, according to the average length of the fibres, or varied in some other way. But this is for a practical mechanic to say, and not for the court. What I mean, therefore, to say on this point is, that, as a matter of law, I cannot say, that this description is so ambiguous, that the patent is upon its face void. It may be less perfect and complete, than would be desirable; but still it may be sufficient to enable a skilful mechanic to attain the end. In point of fact, is it not actually attained by the mechanics employed by Carver, without the application of any new inventive power, or experiments? If so, then the objection could be answered as a matter of fact or a practical result.

The next objection is, that the patentee has omitted some things in his renewed patent, which he claimed in his original patent as a part of his invention, viz., the knob, the ridge, and the flaring of the lateral surface of the rib above the saw, and that he claims in his renewed patent the combination of the thickness and the slope of the front and back surfaces of the rib. Now, by the thirteenth section of the patent act of 1836, c. 357, it is provided, that whenever any patent, which is granted "shall be inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient description, or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification as his own invention more than he had or shall have a right to claim as new, if the error has or shall have arisen by inadvertency, mistake, or accident, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of such patent, and the payment of the further sum of fifteen dollars, to cause a new patent to be issued to the inventor for the same invention, for the residue of the period then unexpired for which the original patent was granted in accordance with the patentee's corrected description and specification." And it is afterwards added, that "whenever the original patentee shall be desirous of adding the description of any new improvement of the original invention or discovery, which shall have been invented or discovered by him subsequent to the date of his patent, he may, like proceedings being had in all respects as in the case of original applications, and on the payment of fifteen dollars, as hereinbefore provided, have the same annexed to the original description and specification." The act of 1837, c. 45, § 8, further provides, "that whenever any application shall be made to the commissioner for any addition, or a newly discovered improvement, to be made to an existing patent, or whenever a patent shall be returned for correction and reissue, the specification annexed to every such patent shall be subject to revision and restriction, in the same manner as original applications for patents; the commissioner shall not add any such improvement to the patent in the one case, nor grant the reissue in the other case, until the applicant shall have entered a disclaimer, or altered his specification of claim, in accordance with the decision of the commissioner." See Act 1836, c. 357, § 7.

Now, I see nothing in these provisions which upon a reissue of a patent requires the patentee to claim all things in the renewed patent, which were claimed as his original invention, or part of his invention in his original patent. On the contrary, if his original patent claimed too much, or if the commissioner deemed it right to restrict the specification, and the patentee acquiesced therein, it seems to be, that, in each case, the renewed patent, if it claimed less than the original, would be equally valid. A specification may be defective and unmaintainable under the patent act, as well by an excess of claim, as by a defect in the mode of stating it. How can the court in this case judicially know, whether the patentee left out the knob, and ridge, and flaring of the lateral surface of the rib, in the renewed patent, because he thought, that they might have a tendency to mislead the public by introducing what, upon further reflection, he deemed immaterial or unessential, and that the patent would thus contain more than was necessary to produce the described effect, and be open to an objection, which might be fatal to his right, if it was done to deceive the public? Act 1836, c. 357, § 15. Or, how can the court judicially know, that the commissioner did not positively require this very omission? It is certain, that he might have given it his sanction. But I incline very strongly to hold a much broader opinion; and that is, that an inventor is always at liberty in a renewed patent to omit a part of his original invention, if he deems it expedient, and to retain that part only of his original invention, which he deems it fit to retain. No harm is done to the public by giving up a part of what he has actually invented; for the public may then use it; and there is nothing in the policy or terms of the patent act, which prohibits such a restriction. The other part of the objection seems to me equally untenable. If the description of the combination of the thickness and the slope of the front and back surfaces of the rib, were a part of the plaintiff's original invention, (as the objection itself supposes,) and were not fully stated in the original specification, that is exactly such a defect as the patent acts allow to be remedied. A specification may be defective, not only in omitting to give a full description of the mode of constructing a machine, but also in omitting to describe fully in the claim the nature, and extent, and character of the invention itself. Indeed, this latter is the common defect, for which most renewed patents are granted.

Another objection is, that the plaintiff, in his claim, has stated that the desired distance or space between the upper and the lower surfaces of the rib, whether it "be done by making the ribs thicker at that part, or by a fork or division of the rib, or by any other variation of the particular form," is a part of his invention. It is said that the modes of forking and dividing are not specified, nor the variations of the particular form given. This is true; but then the patent act requires the patentee to specify the several modes, "in which he has contemplated the application of the distinguishing principle or character of his invention." Act 1836, c. 357, § 6. Now, we all know that a mere difference of form will not entitle a party to a patent. What the patentee here says in effect is: One important part of my invention consists in the space or distance between the upper and lower surfaces of the ribs, and whether this is obtained by making the rib solid, or by a fork, or division of the rib, or by any other variation of the form of the rib, I equally claim it as my invention. The end to be obtained is the space or distance equal to the fibre of the cotton to be ginned; and you may make the rib solid, or fork it, or divide it, or vary its form in any other manner, so as that the purpose is obtained. The patentee, therefore, guards himself against the suggestion, that his invention consists solely in a particular form, solid, or forked, or divided; and claims the invention to be his, whether the exact form is preserved, or not, if its proportions are kept so as to be adapted to the fibre of the cotton which is to be ginned. In all this I can perceive no want of accuracy or sufficiency of description, at least so far as it is a matter of law, nor any claim, broader than the invention, which is either so vague or so comprehensive, as, in point of law, not to be patentable. It was not incumbent upon the patentee to suggest all the possible modes by which the rib might be varied, and yet the effect be produced. It is sufficient for him to state the modes which he contemplates to be best, and to add, that other mere formal variations from these modes he does not deem to be unprotected by his patent.

Another objection is, that the patentee has not sufficiently described the slopes between his ribs, so as to make the description intelligible, or to enable a skilful mechanic to construct them. Whether this be so, or not, is not a matter of law upon the face of the patent, but a matter of fact for the jury, if there be any serious doubt about it.

Some other objections have been taken, such as, that the invention is not new, that the original patent and the renewed patent are not identical for the same invention, and that the patent was obtained with a fraudulent intent, for the purpose of covering the invention of Copeland, which has been patented and sustained in this court against the claim of the plaintiff. But these all involve matters of fact, which belong to the province of the jury, upon the evidence, with which I do not intermeddle, and upon which the parties are at liberty to take the opinion of the jury.

I have thus stated summarily, according to the suggestions of the counsel for the defendants, my own views of the patent, and of the objections taken thereto. I have stated them in my own language, and with a view to make my own meaning clear. I cannot admit that I am bound to respond to the very terms in which the objections are taken, or to give instruction to the jury, affirming or denying them, without qualification or explanation. If the counsel for the defendants wish for a more deliberate examination of the points of law, after the trial is over, they can be brought again before this court, upon a motion for a new trial; or, if a verdict is given to the plaintiff to an amount which will justify an appeal, the opinion of the supreme court may be taken upon the matters of law.

Upon these statements of the court, the defendants' counsel elected not to go to the jury, and a verdict was by consent taken for the plaintiff, for $960.50, subject to the opinion of the court upon the matters of law; and also to the ruling of the court as to the inadmissibility of one Edson, who was at the time of the supposed infringement, a member of the corporation, and had since sold out his interest; and whom the court rejected as a witness for the corporation.

In the trial of this case the following rulings were excepted to by the defendants: The defendants understand the following points to have been ruled by the court, viz., "That the describing and claiming the increasing of the distance from where the cotton goes in, to where it comes out from between the grates, to be equal to the length of the fibres of cotton to be ginned, is a sufficiently accurate, specific, and definite description and claim. That the patentee had a right to drop the things patented in his original patent, viz. the knob, the ridge, and the flaring of the lateral surface of the rib above the saw, and patent in his renewal, the combination of the thickness and the slope of the front and back surfaces of the rib. That the claiming of the increasing of the distance from where the cotton enters to where it comes out from between the ribs, by forking, division, or any variation of the particular form, is not claiming too much. That the patentee had a right to claim, and patent, the knob or projection F, in his renewal, of the same width as the rib, notwithstanding he had described and patented the same in his original as narrower than the rib. That the patentee was not bound to specify the modes of forking and division, and variations of the particular form claimed and patented by him. That the original was invalid and inoperative, within the provisions of the patent law for a renewal. That the patentee, by specifying the distance, which the cotton is carried between the ribs, and not claiming the same, as an element of his patent, did not thereby abandon the same. That the patentee, by distance, which the cotton was so carried to be equal to the 'full' length of the fibre in the original, was not thereby precluded from claiming and patenting that distance, caused by thickness of the rib or otherwise, equal to the average length of the fibres on one seed, in his renewal. That the patent describes, and claims with sufficient clearness, and exactness, a slope between the ribs. That the specification states sufficient elements for a patent for a combination, and adequately specifies, points out, and claims a combination. That John Edson was interested in the event of the suit, and by reason of such interest was incompetent as a witness. It was, as the counsel for the defendants understood the case, established by the testimony and not disputed, that the thickness of the grate, or distance that the cotton passed between the grates, and the obliquity or slope of the shoulder, as specified by the plaintiff, were neither of them new."

Phillips and Fletcher, for defendant, now moved for a new trial.

Franklin Dexter, for plaintiff.

STORY, Circuit Justice. To many of the objections stated in the motion for a new trial, to the supposed rulings of the court, a very brief answer may be given. In the first place, I cannot admit that they are in terms the actual rulings of the court, upon the points in controversy at the trial; and since they have been furnished to me, I have drawn out at large the views, which I then suggested upon the points in controversy at the trial; so that my actual meaning should be accurately understood. Upon further reflection, I do not feel it necessary to add to the views there suggested. They were as follows: (Here the judge recapitulated the remarks already cited as made at the trial.) I see no reason to be dissatisfied with what was then said; and if the observations then made were correct, it seems to me that they dispose of the principal objections, at least, so far as my own judgment is concerned. They might be elaborated, but they contain the substance of all that I desire to say on these points.

One point is, however, now brought out upon the argument for a new trial, which was not so fully suggested at the trial, and, indeed, which arose so incidentally, that it was scarcely a matter calling for any very positive expression of the opinion of the court. It is now said, that the plaintiff's claim is, in fact, for a new combination of a rib of a particular thickness, with the particular sloping up of his rib, as described in the specification; and that it is not the thing which is patented. It appears to me, that there is more of refinement in the form of this objection, than there is of difficulty in resolving it. The renewed patent is, in terms, a patent for "a new and useful improvement in the ribs of saw gins for ginning cotton." The original patent is substantially like it in the descriptive words. It is for "a new and useful improvement in the manner of forming the ribs of saw gins for ginning cotton." The language of the specification annexed to the renewed patent is, for "an improvement in the manner of forming the ribs of saw gins for ginning cotton." So that in substance we may clearly see, that the same improvement is designed to be included in the descriptive words. In the summing up of his claim in this last specification the patentee says: "I now claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, the increasing the depth or space between the upper or outer surface of the rib, and the lower or inner surface of it, at the part where the cotton is drawn through the grate, so that it shall be equal to the length of the fibre of the cotton to be ginned (whether this is done by making the ribs thicker in that part, or by a fork, or division, or by any other variation of the particular form); and I also claim as a part of the same improvement the sloping up of the lower or inner surface of the rib, so as to meet the upper or outer surface above the saws, leaving, when the rib is inserted into the frame, no break, or shoulder between the two surfaces, but a smooth and uninterrupted passage upwards between the ribs, as above described." The drawings annexed to the specification are designed to make the description more palpable and clear. And it is not without significance in the case to remark that, as the patent is for an improvement upon the common cotton-gins, it presupposes, on the part of those interested in the matter, a full knowledge of the machinery and structure of the common gins. Now, to me it is perfectly clear, that the present patent is founded upon a claim for one entire thing, that is, for an improved rib, or a specified improvement upon the common rib of cotton-gins. It is not a claim for two distinct and independent improvements, each susceptible of a distinct operation, or each claimed as a distinct invention; but both are claimed as parts and parcels of the same improvement, and necessary thereto. I do not say, whether each of the specified things, going to make up the entire improvement, might not have been separately claimed as several inventions. That is not a necessary point in the present case. What I mean to say is, that they are not so summed up in the claim; but they are summed up as making an entirety. They go to make up the improved rib, which is patented. That rib is the thing claimed, and not the thickness or depth or space of the rib alone, or the sloping up of the surfaces thereof alone. Both are claimed as parts of the same improvement, but neither alone as constituting it. I see no objection to its being called a combination of particular forms and arrangements of structure to complete the improved rib. In a just sense, that is a combination which requires different things or different contrivances or different arrangements to be brought together, to accomplish the given end. But it is far from following from this, that the combination is not and may not be treated as an entirety.

There is no magic in words; and above all, in patents, the court looks through the whole patent and specification, in order to ascertain what the thing claimed and patented is; whether it is for an entirety, or for various distinct improvements, capable of a distinct operation, and independent use in the same machine, or for both; or whether it is for a combination of two or more things in a particular machine, to produce a given result, or for a simple or single improvement in a particular machine; or whether it is for any one or more of them. There is no artificial or universal rule of interpretation of such instrument beyond that which common sense furnishes, which is to construe the instrument as a whole, and to extract from the descriptive words and the claim, what the invention is, which is intended to be patented, and how far it is capable of exact ascertainment, and how far it is maintainable in point of law, supposing it clear from all ambiguity. Now, looking at the present patent, it seems to me impossible to entertain any real doubt as to its true interpretation. It is, as the words of the claim state it to be, for a single thing—"an improved rib." The improvement is upon the existing rib in the cotton gin, and consists in two things, neither of which (as has been already suggested) is claimed separately, but both together, as constituting one conjoint improvement. It appears to me, that the claim sufficiently expresses the real nature, extent, and character of the improvement, and is in perfect compliance with the sixth section of the patent act of 1836, c. 357. I should not have thought it necessary to consider this objection so far, if it had not been for the zeal and ingenuity, with which it has been pressed upon the court. Call the improvement an entirety, or a combination, as we may please, it is still a patent for "an improved rib," and nothing more.

The remaining objection is to the rejection of the testimony of Edson. And here it is, that I have entertained some doubt, upon which I was desirous of hearing the further argument, which has now been had. The defendants were created a corporation by the statute of Massachusetts of the 14th of June, 1823, and were, of course, made subject to all the liabilities and requirements of the general statute of 1821, c. 28 [Laws Mass. 600], respecting the liabilities of manufacturing corporations. That statute provides "that every person, who shall become a member of any manufacturing corporation which may be hereafter established in this commonwealth, shall be liable in his individual capacity for all debts contracted during the time of his continuing a member of such corporation." The question turns, therefore, upon the meaning of the words "debts contracted," in the statute. Do they mean literally and strictly such debts as are due and payable in money, ex contractu, by the positive or implied engagements of the corporation, and resolve themselves into liquidated or determinate sums of money, due as debts (see 2 Bl. Comm. 464; 3 Bl. Comm. 154), or do they extend to all legal liabilities incurred by the corporation, and which, when fixed by a judgment, or award, or otherwise, are debts of the corporation? And if the latter be the true meaning, then, does the statute liability exist only from the time when it becomes an ascertained debt of the corporation, or does it relate back to the origin of the liability, and bind the corporators from that time?

If the words "debts contracted," in the statute, are to receive the limited construction, that they are applicable only to debts in the strict sense of the term, that is, contracts of the party for the payment of money, and nothing else, it is obvious, that the purposes of the statute, which although, in some sense, it may be deemed penal, is also in another sense remedial, would be comparatively of little value. Suppose the case of a contract by the corporation to do work, or to manufacture goods of a particular quality or character, or to furnish materials, or to buy cotton or wool undelivered, or to build houses, or to employ workmen; and the contract should be entirely unperformed, and broken, and refused to be performed, so that the right of the other party would be, not to money, but to unliquidated damages for the non-performance or refusal to perform; if these, which are by no means uncommon contracts, should be without the purview of the statute, it would have a very narrow and inadequate range and operation. Yet such cases sound merely in damages. Suppose a manufacturing corporation to obstruct its neighbor's mill-privilege, or stop his mill works, by back flowage, if such acts be not within the protection of the statute, we see, at once, that an insolvent corporation might do irreparable mischief without any just redress to the other party. Suppose such an insolvent corporation should unlawfully, under an unfounded claim of right, convert 100 or 1000 bales of cotton belonging to a third person, we see, that the mischief could be redressed only by an action of trover for unliquidated damages; and if the individual corporators were not liable therefor, after an unsatisfied judgment, the statute would be little more than a delusion. If, on the other hand, we should construe the statute broadly as a remedial statute, and give to the word "debts," a meaning, not unusual, as equivalent to "dues," and to the word "contracted," a meaning, which, though more remote, is still legitimate, as equivalent to "incurred," so that the phrase, "debts contracted," in this sense would be equivalent to "dues owing," or "liabilities incurred," the statute would attain all the objects for which it seems designed. The supreme court of Massachusetts, in Mill Dam Foundery v. Hovey, 21 Pick. 455, held, under the statute of 1829, c. 53, § 6 [3 Metc. Laws Mass. 297], which makes the stockholders liable for the debts of the corporation, that the term "debts" included a claim for unliquidated damages. That was a case arising ex contractu; but the language certainly extends the term "debts" beyond its close and literal meaning. And if it covers cases of unliquidated damages, ex contractu, it is difficult to say, why it should stop there, and not go further and cover cases of unliquidated damages arising from torts to property. In each case there is no debt until the damages are ascertained and liquidated; and then the debt seems to relate back to its origin. Blackstone says, "A debt of record is a sum which appears to be due by the evidence of a court of record; thus, when any specific sum is adjudged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff in an action or suit at law, this is a contract of the highest nature, being established by the sentence of a court of judicature." 2 Bl. Comm. 464; 3 Bl. Comm. 160. Here Blackstone manifestly included all sorts of actions or suits, where the judgment is for a sum certain, whatever may be its nature or origin. 2 Bl. Comm. 464; 3 Bl. Comm. 160, 161; Com. Dig. "Debt," A. 2.

I agree that it is no part of the duty or functions of courts of justice, to supply the deficiencies of legislation, or to correct mischiefs which they have left unprovided for. That is not the question here. But the question is, whether, if the words of a statute admit of two interpretations, one of which makes the legislation incomplete for its apparent object, and the other of which will cover and redress all the mischiefs, that should be adopted, in a statute confessedly remedial, which is the most narrow, rather than that which is the most comprehensive, for the reason only, that the latter will create an obligation or duty, beyond what is imposed by the common law? It seems clear, that in common parlance, as well as in law, the term is in an enlarged sense sometimes used to denote any kind of a just demand. See Com. v. Keeper of Philadelphia Jail, 4 Serg. & R. 506; Gray v. Bennett, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 522, 526. And in the Roman law it had sometimes the like enlarged signification. "Sed utrum ex delicto an ex contractu debitor sit, nihil refert," says the Digest. Dig. lib. 5, tit. 3, l. 14; Pothier, Pand. lib. 50, tit. 16, note 69. Upon this subject I confess that with all the lights which have been thrown upon the question by the able arguments at the bar, I am not without some lurking doubts. But having reflected much upon the subject, and being in the same predicament, which Lord Eldon is said to have suggested as having sometimes occurred to himself, that he felt doubts, but was unable to solve them to his own entire satisfaction, I have at length come to the conclusion that the rejection of the witness as an interested witness was right. I follow out the doctrine of the case of Mill Dam Foundery v. Hovey, 21 Pick. 455, which, as far as it goes, disclaims the interpretation of the word, "debt" as limited to contracts for the payment of determinate sums of money. Passing that line, it does not seem to me easy to say, that if cases of unliquidated damages may be treated as debts, because they end in the ascertainment of a fixed sum of money, that we are at liberty to say, that the doctrine is not equally applicable to all cases of unliquidated damages, whether arising ex contractu or ex delicto. If ultimately it ends in a debt, as a judgment for damages does, that case asserts, that its character as a debt relates back to its origin. Besides, it seems to me upon principle to be reasonable, if not absolutely justified by authority, to hold, that if the transaction occurs while a person is a member of the corporation, and he would, if he remained a member, be liable for the ultimate debt adjudged, it may well be treated as an inchoate debt consummated by the judgment. Since the argument was had, my attention has been called to the case of Gray v. Bennett, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 522, 530, 531, which, in several respects, confirms the reasoning, which I had previously adopted, in relation to the meaning of the word "debt," and the construction which it ought to receive in a remedial statute. If I had seen that case at an earlier period, it would have somewhat abridged my own researches on the same subject. The result is, that the motion for a new trial is over-ruled, and judgment must pass for the plaintiff.

AFFREIGHTMENT—RIGHTS OF SHIPPER—LIABILITIES OF OWNERS.

1. In every contract of affreightment, whether by charter-party or bill of lading, the ship is, by the marine law, hypothecated to the shipper for any damage his goods may sustain from the insufficiency of the vessel, or the fault of the master or crew.

[1] [Reported by Edward H. Daveis, Esq.]

In admiralty. This was a libel on a charter-party. The master of the brig Casco chartered her to the libellant for a voyage to Porto Rico, to carry a cargo of lumber, and from thence to her port of discharge in the United States, touching at Turk's Island for a cargo of salt, if required by the charterer. The voyage was performed to Porto Rico and the cargo delivered. From that place she went to Turk's Island and took a cargo of salt. On her return from Turk's Island she was found to leak so badly that a large part of the salt was lost. Of 5,676 bushels laden, only 3,132 bushels were delivered at Portland, the deficiency amounting to 2,544 bushels. This libel was brought by the charterer against the vessel to recover damages for the loss. The questions of law which arose and were discussed in the case, together with the substance of the testimony, appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Rand, for libellant.

T. A. Deblois, for respondents.

WARE, District Judge. The first question, which was raised and discussed at the bar, was whether, under this charter-party, the vessel in specie is liable for any loss, which the charterer may have sustained from damage to the cargo. It is contended on behalf of the respondents, that there was a demise of the vessel herself to the charterer, by which the possession was transferred to him; that he, under the charter-party, became owner for the voyage, and thus his own carrier, and consequently, if any damages have been sustained from the fault of the master or crew, his remedy is solely against the master, and not against the vessel. This is a question which must be determined by the terms of the instrument itself.

The charter-party is in its form somewhat special and peculiar. It sets forth that it is made and concluded between Allen G. York, the master, who is also part-owner, and John B. Brown, the libellant; and the master, in consideration of the covenants and agreements of the libellant, does covenant and agree on the freighting and chartering of said vessel to the said party of the second part (the libellant), for a voyage from the port of Portland, 'to one port in the island of Porto Rico, and from thence to her port of discharge in the United States, touching at Turk's Island for a cargo of salt, if required by the party of the second part.' The charter-party then proceeds to state the covenants on the part of the master; first, that the vessel shall be kept, during the voyage, tight, staunch, and well fitted, tackled with every requisite, and with men and provisions necessary for such a voyage; secondly, that the whole vessel, with the exception of the cabin and the necessary room for the crew, and the sails, cables, and provisions, shall be at the disposal of the charterer; and thirdly, he engages to receive on board all such lawful goods and merchandise as the charterer or his agents may think proper to ship. The libellant, on his part, agrees to furnish cargoes for the vessel at Portland and Porto Rico, or Turk's Island, and to pay, for the charter of the vessel, 1,175 dollars, one half to be considered as earned at her port of discharge, and so much to be paid as may be required for the vessel's disbursements, and the balance on the delivery of the cargo in the United States, and also to pay all the expenses of loading at Portland. It seems very clear from these covenants that the possession of the vessel was intended to be in the master. He is to victual and man her, he agrees to receive on board such goods as the charterer shall choose to ship. The charterer agrees to furnish the cargoes, to pay the expenses of loading at Portland, and to advance, at her outward port of delivery, so much of the freight as may be required for the vessel's disbursements. Why should these covenants be inserted if the possession of the vessel was to be transferred to the hirer, and to be navigated by him? It is quite evident that this charter-party was a contract of affreightment for the transportation of goods, and not a demise of the vessel; that the owners retained possession under their master, and must be considered, therefore, as carriers.

There is, in the common form of charter-parties, a clause by which the ship and freight are specifically bound for the performance of the covenants in the charter-party. There is none such in this, but this is a condition which, by the marine law, is tacitly annexed to every contract entered into by the master for the transportation of goods, whether by bill of lading or charter-party. The ship is, by operation of law, hypothecated to the shippers for any loss she may sustain from the insufficiency of the vessel or the fault or the master or crew. There is another peculiarity in this instrument. It is usual, in charter-parties of affreightment, as well as in bills of lading, to insert a clause specially exempting the master and owners from losses occasioned by the dangers of the seas. This instrument contains no such exception, but, this, as was justly contended in the argument for the respondents, is an exception, which the law itself silently supplies without its being formally expressed. It is a general rule of law, founded upon the plainest and most obvious principles of natural justice, that no man shall be held responsible for fortuitous events and accidents of major force, such as human sagacity cannot foresee, nor human prudence provide against, unless he expressly agrees to take these risks upon himself. "Casus fortuitous nemo praestat." Pothier, Des Obligations, No. 142. 6 Toullier, Droit Civil, Nos. 227, 228; Dig. 50, 17, 23; Story, Bailm. § 25. There is an exception to this rule, that is entirely consistent with the principle of the rule itself. It is, when the party to be charged has been guilty of some fault, without which the loss would not have happened. The liabilities of the owners, in this case, are precisely the same, and no more extensive than they would have been if the usual exception of the dangers of the seas had been inserted in the charter-party.

Having disposed of these preliminary matters, we come to the questions which have been principally discussed at the bar. They are partly questions of law, and partly fact. In the first place, there does not appear to be any sufficient reason for questioning the seaworthiness of the vessel, when she sailed from Portland. She was carefully examined by Mr. Fickett, a calker, before she was loaded, and he states that, with very slight repairs which were made by him, she was in perfect order for the voyage. And, in point of fact, on her outward passage, and till after she left Turk's Island, she did not leak more than vessels which are considered tight ordinarily do. On the 7th day after sailing on her return voyage, she was found to have sprung a leak. The weather was not at the time, and had not been, tempestuous or unusually bad. There had been, part of the time, a heavy head-beat sea, and the ship at times labored badly. Occasionally there were fresh winds, but not amounting to a gale. On the 7th of November, at 8 o'clock a. m., it was found that the vessel leaked badly. The entry in the log is, that the day commenced with fresh breezes and cloudy weather, with a heavy cross-head-beat sea; at 6 o'clock p. m., took in foretop-gallant-sail, the brig laboring heavily; tried the pump every half hour; middle part of the day, high winds and heavy head-beat sea; tried the pump every quarter of an hour. At 8 o'clock a. m., commenced leaking badly; double-reefed the mainsail, and single-reefed the foretopsail; two hands at the pumps. For the whole 24 hours she kept on her course N. W. with the wind N. N. E. The testimony of the witnesses substantially agrees with the account given in the log. There was a fresh wind with a heavy swell of the sea. The vessel also had a cargo which tried her strength, but all these causes do not seem to have been sufficient materially to injure a strong and staunch vessel. There can, however, be no doubt that she was strained at that time, and her seams were opened so as to admit a considerable quantity of water. During the remainder of the voyage the weather was variable, but the vessel encountered none of unusual severity, until her arrival off Cape Cod. There she met a heavy gale, and was obliged to carry a press of sail to keep off a lee-shore. After it was discovered that the brig leaked, fruitless attempts were made to discover where the leak was, and she continued to leak more or less until her arrival at Portland on the 23d of November. The master then made a protest and called a survey of the vessel.

After the cargo was discharged, the vessel was examined and repaired by the same calker who examined her before the voyage. He stated that he found openings in her seams, which appeared evidently to be recent, and showed that she had been strained during the voyage. There was a leak about a foot in length in the garboard streak. The butts and wood ends were a little slack, and wanted some calking;—there was a small leak under the forecastle, the seams were a little open at the break of the deck, and the water-ways were considerably open. The vessel, on the whole, bore evident marks of having been strained, but the injury could not have been great, as the calker used but thirty pounds of oakum in putting her in good order for another voyage, and the whole expense of repairs did not exceed fourteen dollars. It appears also that the ship was easily kept free of water, during the whole voyage, by one pump, except for a short time when the leak was first discovered.

If the injury to the vessel was so inconsiderable, the question presents itself, how happened it that so large a part of the cargo was lost? All the witnesses, who examined the vessel before the cargo was discharged, agree in ascribing the loss to two causes; first, the limber holes (which are small holes made in the under part of the floor timbers next the keelson, making a passage for the water to flow from the forward part of the vessel back into the well), it appears, were choked up so as to prevent the flow of the water. A considerable quantity of water, which should have found a passage back into the well, was thus constantly kept forward, between the ceiling or skin of the vessel and the outside planks. The second was the want of sufficient dunnage at the bilge, between the first and second thick streaks, in the forward part of the vessel. All the witnesses agree that there was sufficient dunnage on the floor, and also on the sides of the vessel in the after part. But at the bilge, between the two thick streaks, from the mainmast forward, there was on the starboard side about eighty square feet, and on the larboard side about forty square feet uncovered with dunnage. On examining the ceiling here, the seams were found to be open. On the starboard side, one seam was open for five or six feet, to the width of five-eighths of an inch, and on the larboard side there was a seam open as wide, for fifteen or sixteen feet; and generally the ceiling was not sufficiently tight to prevent the water from being forced through by the motion of the vessel. The vessel having a flat floor, when she was sailing with the wind on her beam and thrown down on the opposite side, the water, which was prevented from passing through the limbers into the well, was washed down to her bilge, and by the motion of the ship blown up through the open seams of her ceiling directly upon the salt. Nearly all the witnesses agree that it was in this way that the salt was lost. And in point of fact the whole extraordinary wastage was [on the sides] [2] in the forward part of the vessel; the loss in the after part was not more than what is usual. The evidence also is, that the salt melted most in the larboard wing, though that was better supplied with dunnage than the other side. But then it appears from the log, that the vessel, during the greater part of the passage, was sailing on her larboard tack, and this would naturally occasion the most waste there, if it was produced by the blowing of the water through the seams of the ceiling. On a view of the whole evidence, it may, I think, safely be taken as an established fact, that the loss of the salt arose from the two causes that have been mentioned.

The whole case, then, seems to be reduced to this, whether the neglect of the owners to provide means for clearing the limber holes, and the neglect of the master to place sufficient dunnage on the wings of the forward part of the vessel to protect the salt from the water, are faults of such a character as to render the parties legally responsible for a loss occasioned by these very deficiencies. If no fault can be imputed to the master or owners on this ground, the loss must be ascribed solely to the dangers of the seas, and be borne by the shipper; for though these dangers were not, by the terms of the charter-party, in terms excepted from the responsibilities of the master, the exception is made by the law. A person is never presumed to take upon himself the risk of inevitable casualties, which the common law somewhat irreverently calls the acts of God, unless he expressly agrees so to do. The law never requires impossibilities. "Impossibilium nulla obligatio est." Dig. 50, 17, 25. But when a party is chargeable with a neglect or fault, without which the loss would not have happened, he will then be held responsible for a loss by inevitable accident, or an accident of major force. It is not that the casualty is imputed to him, but his own neglect or fault which is the occasion of the accident proving fatal. Some vessels have movable boards or plank placed over the limbers, called limber boards, so that they may be taken up to clear the limbers when they become choked; some have a rope or small chain rove through these limber holes to clear them when necessary. This vessel had neither. The board over the limbers was fastened down, and no examination was made to ascertain whether the limbers were free or not. Now, if the importance of providing a passage for the water is such that grooves are cut in the timbers for that express purpose, it certainly would seem to be a want of proper care on the part of the owners to provide no means for keeping them clear; especially as they are liable to become stopped. If this passage had been kept clear, so as to admit the flow of water from the forward to the after part of the vessel, it is certain that the pump would have easily kept her clear. The accumulation of the water forward would easily have been prevented, and of course the salt would not have been dissolved. And, in the second place, with respect to the dunnage. Upon this point, a number of witnesses of extensive experience in navigation, either as ship-owners or ship-masters, were examined. Some were of opinion that the dunnage in this case was sufficient for a tight vessel; others thought that the dunnage, whether the vessel was tight or not, for a cargo of salt ought to be carried higher up upon the wings. But all agreed that it was insufficient if the vessel was not tight. It must be admitted upon the evidence that the vessel was tight when she received her cargo, and that the leaks were produced by straining with a heavy cargo and a heavy swell of the sea. But, admitting the vessel to be tight, it is still true that some water will find its way into a tight vessel; and it is certain that the ceiling, or what in the language of the sea is called the skin of the vessel, was far from being tight. The seams were open to such a width that in the rolling of the vessel the water, if it did not find its way into the well through the limbers, would be freely blown through them upon the salt.

Did, then, the master or the owner take all the precautions for the safety of the cargo, which were required by the nature of their engagement? The duty of the owners, under a contract of affreightment by a charter-party is to provide a vessel tight and staunch, and every way fit and prepared for the particular service for which she is hired. The seaworthiness of the vessel, and her fitness for the particular voyage, is a term of the contract implied by law. The common law holds the owner to a warranty in this particular, and though the vessel may have been examined before sailing by skillful shipwrights and pronounced by them every way fit for the voyage, yet, if the goods of a shipper are injured from some latent defect of the vessel, the better opinion is that the owner will be responsible. 3 Kent, Comm. 205, 213; Curt. Merch. Seam. 202; Lyon v. Mells, 5 East, 428. And this warranty against latent defects is held by Pothier to result from the nature of the contract. In every contract of letting and hiring, the letter undertakes that the thing let is fit for the purpose for which it is hired. Pothier, Contrat Charte Partie, No. 30; Contract de Louage, Nos. 110, 112. And then with respect to the stowage of the goods, the master is held to the most exact care and diligence, and it is particularly his duty to provide proper dunnage to prevent the goods from being injured by the leakage. Abb. Shipp. pt. 4, p. 346, c. 5, § 1. The degree of care will of course depend on the nature of the cargo, some goods being more liable to injury by exposure to wet than others. My opinion upon the whole is, that the neglect upon the part of the owners to provide means by which the limbers might be kept open so as to leave a free passage for the water from the forward part of the vessel to the well, and the omission on the part of the master to provide proper dunnage for the wings of the forward part of the vessel, are such neglects as render them legally responsible for a loss that may be ascribed directly to those deficiencies.

[1 Woods, 125.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. June 15, 1871.[2]

PARTNERSHIP DEBTS—FOLLOWING PARTNERSHIP PROPERTY—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. The rule that trust property may be followed into whosesoever hands it comes, with notice of the trust, does not apply to a case where an officer of a bank, being a member of a partnership, without due security, lends to his firm money of the bank, which becomes mingled with the other property of the partnership.

[Cited in Case v. New Orleans & C. R. Co., Case No. 2,493; Merchants' & Farmers' Bank v. Austin, 48 Fed. 27.]

2. Although it is generally true that partnership creditors are to be preferred in the distribution of the property of the partnership, and may follow it, if necessary, when one of the partners attempts to appropriate it to the payment of his individual debts; yet a mere simple contract creditor cannot maintain a suit for this purpose unless the partnership has in some manner gone into liquidation, or its property has been subjected to a trust for payment of debts—as where an assignment has been made in fact or in law.

3. Partnership creditors, merely as such, have no lien on the partnership property before obtaining judgment and execution; but can only be subrogated to the lien of the partners, and are therefore without remedy where such lien has been waived by them.

Ex parte Ruffin, 6 Ves. 119; Story, Eq. § 1259.

W. W. King, for Fourth National Bank of New York.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. On the 13th of May, 1867, the First National Bank of New Orleans was closed, and upon an examination of its affairs, was found largely insolvent, and the plaintiff was appointed its receiver, under the 50th section of the national banking act. Amongst the assets were found a note of "G. T. Beauregard, Lessee," for $40,000, dated Sept. 14, 1866, payable on demand, and a draft of T. P. May on A. C. Graham, of New York, for $125,000, dated March 19, 1867, but not accepted. These documents had been credited to the bank account of "G. T. Beauregard, Lessee," which was, nevertheless, overdrawn $72,000, and without these credits, would stand overdrawn $237,000. T. P. May and A. C. Graham were largely interested in the bank, and had been its principal managers, Graham being president from July, 1865, to July, 1866, and May being president from the latter date to the failure of the bank. "G. T. Beauregard, Lessee," was a partnership firm consisting of G. T. Beauregard and the said T. P. May and A. C. Graham, the partnership being lessees, in the name of Beauregard, of the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad (a horse-car railroad in the city). The lease was taken in April, 1866, and Beauregard was to manage the business, and May and Graham were to put in $150,000 capital each. Their bank account, up to the time the bank failed, had credits, other than the note and bill above mentioned, to the amount of $295,000, and debits to the amount of $532,000. The credits were made up of deposits of the daily receipts of the road, and several cash payments of $20,000 each, made by Graham. Of the debits, about $35,000 was paid for real estate for the road, $130,000 for reconstruction, $155,000 for current expenses, $85,000 for stables, car sheds, houses for employees, etc. The residue was for horses, cars, and other incidents to the railroad business. The rents and current expenses exceeded the receipts of the road.

It further appeared, that on the 8th of May, 1867, Graham assigned all his interest in the Carrollton Railroad and firm of G. T. Beauregard, Lessee, to the Fourth National Bank of New York, to secure the payment of a claim of over $50,000 against the First National Bank of New Orleans, for which Graham had become responsible. This assignment appears to have been made in good faith, and was recorded on the 15th of May. On the 14th of May, 1867, May being a defaulter to the government as assistant treasurer, for over a million of dollars, assigned to the United States, as security for his indebtedness, a large amount of property, including all his interest in the Carrollton Railroad; and on the 16th he assigned Graham's interest also, pretending to own Graham's share, and to have a sufficient power of attorney for that purpose. But the weight of evidence is against this pretension, and the prior assignment of this share by Graham himself took the precedence. On the 21st of August, 1867, the United States, by its agent, assigned all its interest in the Carrollton Railroad and partnership of G. T. Beauregard, Lessee, to Bonneval, Hernandez & Binder, defendants in the cause. The assignment purported to be for two-thirds interest, and was guarantied clear of all debts except the indebtedness of May and Graham as lessees and copartners in the firm. Bonneval and his associates, supposing themselves to be owners of two-thirds, and Beauregard retaining his one-third of the leased property, they together surrendered the old lease and all the partnership property to the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad Company, and received therefor 4,000 shares, being an equal amount of capital stock of the said company to that which was then outstanding; thus becoming one-half owners of the whole property of the company, including the property by them put into the concern. The company assumed the debts of the firm of G. T. Beauregard, Lessee. This arrangement as to the issue of new stock was sanctioned by an act of the legislature. The stock thus obtained by Beauregard, Bonneval and their associates has all been disposed of to other persons.

In view of these facts, the receiver of the bank contends, 1. That he is entitled to follow the property of G. T. Beauregard, Lessee, and subject it to a trust in favor of the bank, on the ground of its being the product of the money of the bank, wrongfully taken by the partners; 2. That, as a creditor of the partnership, he has a right to have the partnership property applied to the payment of the debts of the firm; and charges the defendants, namely, the present railroad company as newly organized, and Bonneval, Beauregard and their associates, as intermeddling with and taking possession of said property with full knowledge of the equities with which it is affected.

1. The first ground of relief, namely, that the property belongs to the bank, or is held in trust for the bank, because purchased with the money of the bank, is clearly untenable. Beauregard & Co. were engaged in business which required a considerable amount of funds, and became large borrowers of the bank. With the money thus obtained, and with other money derived from the proceeds of their business and other sources, they paid expenses, made repairs, bought cars, horses and other property, and found themselves at the end of the year largely behind. The bank is their creditor, and considering May's peculiar relations, it has cause to make a charge of official misconduct against him; but how does that entitle the bank to claim the property of the firm as its own?

The identity of the property purchased or procured with the money of the bank cannot be ascertained. It was mingled with the other money of the firm, and the whole mass was used indiscriminately for all the purposes of the company. Can the receiver point to a single car or horse or lot of ground, and say, "This was purchased with the money of the bank?" Other creditors of the firm have become interested, and nothing but inextricable confusion would ensue if any such claim were allowed to prevail. Where trust property is converted, and the proceeds can be identified, it may undoubtedly be followed by the cestui que trusts, and brought back to be appropriated to its original purposes. Money of a bank embezzled or misappropriated by its officers may undoubtedly be followed up in the same way, if the money itself, or its proceeds, can be identified, and no innocent person is injured by its recovery. But supposing the money now in question could be regarded as thus misappropriated, the impossibility of identifying it, and of doing justice to third parties, renders the application of the principle impracticable.

2. The position that May's assignment to the government was void as against the bank, on the ground of its being an assignment of partnership property to pay an individual debt, is equally untenable. The assignment was only of May's interest, which interest was individual property which he had a right to assign if his partners did not object. They had an equity to have the property subjected to the payment of the partnership debts, and to this equity the partnership creditors might be subrogated, unless the partners themselves waived it. The creditors, as such, had no lien on the property. They could only operate through the lien of the partners, and if this was given up, they were without remedy unless they could show fraud. No fraud is attempted to be shown in this assignment. It was made subject to the payment of the firm's debts, and with this condition the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad Company received it, agreeing to discharge the debts of the firm, except such as had been assumed by Bonneval and his associates. Graham did not object to the assignment, except so far as it covered his own share, which he himself assigned to a creditor of the bank itself. Beauregard did not object —for he joined with the assignees of May's assignees in assigning the whole property of the firm to the Carrollton Railroad Company, with a stipulation that said company should pay all the debts of the firm. The case then amounts simply to this—a partnership firm assign their interest in the partnership property, subject to a stipulation for the payment of the partnership debts; and a creditor of the partnership files a bill against the assignees to obtain a direct appropriation of that property to the payment of the said debts. Such a bill certainly cannot be sustained, even at the suit of a judgment and execution creditor, unless it be shown that the assignment was intended to defraud the creditors of the firm. This cannot be pretended here, where the assignment itself contains a stipulation that the partnership creditors shall be paid.

But an insurmountable difficulty in the complainant's case is, that he is only a simple contract creditor, without any judgment, execution or specific lien to stand upon; and the partnership has not gone into liquidation. It is not enough for a person simply to allege that he is a creditor of another to enable him to pursue his debtor's property into the hands of others claiming to have purchased it; he must have a judgment and execution, or some lien upon it, or it must be subjected to a trust for creditors, or placed in a course of liquidation. If a statute subjects a particular fund to a particular class of claims, it may be regarded as imposing a trust thereon; or if the debtor makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors; or if the law makes an assignment for him, as in case of bankruptcy; in all such cases the creditors for whose benefit, as cestui qui trusts, the fund is held in trust, may come into court without a judgment and ask for its administration in accordance with the trust. But without some such constituted trust or lien, a creditor has only the right to prosecute his claim in the ordinary courts of law and have it first adjudicated before he can pursue the property of his debtor by a direct proceeding. The propriety of such a preliminary adjudication in this case is apparent from the fact that one of the controversies in the case is, whether the bank, of which the complainant is receiver, was a creditor of the firm to the amount claimed. The defendants allege that the amount of the bill of exchange, namely, $125,000, at least, was the debt of May, and not the debt of the firm, being a portion of the capital which he was bound to put in, and being procured from the bank by him personally, and placed to the credit of the firm on his own account.

The bill must be dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. Complainant appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the decree of the circuit court, on the grounds, as assigned by Mr. Justice Story, who delivered the opinion, that the assignments by Graham to the New York bank, by May to the United States, by the United States to Bonneval, Hermandez & Binder, and the act of fusion by which the rights of all the parties became vested in the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad Company, had the effect to convert the partnership property into property held in severalty, or at least to terminate the equity of any partner to the payment of the joint debts, and therefore, unless the assignments and the act of fusion were fraudulent, the bank, of which complainant was receiver, had no claim upon the property held by the railroad company, arising out of the fact of its relation of creditor to the partnership; also that there was nothing in the case to impeach the bona fides of the transaction by which the property became vested in the railroad company, and that the provisions of the Louisiana Code, art. 2823, providing that "partnership property is liable to the creditors of the partnership in preference to those of the individual partner," created no specific lien upon the property which continued after it had ceased to belong to the partnership. The court further held that, in the absence of satisfactory evidence that the property was purchased with the bank's money, it did not, in equity, belong to, nor was it clothed with a trust for, the bank; and therefore the bank had no specific claim on the property, nor a trust which a court of equity could enforce. Case v. Beauregard, 99 U. S. 119.

[Complainant subsequently recovered judgment against the defendants Beauregard, May, and Graham for the sum of $237,008.89 (see case on error, Beauregard v. Case, 91 U. S. 134), and filed his bill against the same defendants as herein to have the transfers of the partnership property declared void, and to compel the defendant railway company to pay to him as receiver the amount of such judgment, and there was a decree for defendants, dismissing the bill. See Case No. 2,493.]

Case No. 2,488.

CASE v. BROWN.

[1 Biss. 382;[1] 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 268.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. June, 1862.[2]

PATENTS—"SEED PLANTER"—PATENTEE NOT CONFINED TO PRECISE FORM OF HIS COMBINATIONS—PRIOR DESCRIPTION, WITHOUT PATENT—A RESULT OR AN EFFECT CANNOT BE PATENTED—DAMAGES FOR INFRINGEMENT.

1. The claim of Case for the combination of the valve in the seed tube, the valve in the seed hopper, and the lever with its arrangement for re-adjusting the valves as described, construed.

2. Any person who takes the substance, although the form may be changed, violates the patent.

3. If a prior invention be described in an application made to the patent office for a patent, it can make no difference whether it was actually patented or not.

4. A result or an effect cannot be patented, —only the particular mode which the patentee has devised. In this case the patentee can only claim the double dropping by his particular mode.

[Cited in Brown v. Selby, Case No. 2,030.]

5. Where the patentee devised, not the various parts, but the whole combination, it is not an infringement to use a part of the combination.

[Cited in Brown v. Selby, Case No. 2,030.]

[See note at end of case.]

6. A clear and simple rule of damages is to ascertain what pecuniary profits or benefits the defendant has derived from the use of the invention of the plaintiff.

At law. This was an action on the case tried by Judge Drummond and a jury, to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent [No. 12,231] granted to plaintiff [Jarvis Case] January 17, 1855, and reissued November 16, 1858 [No. 623], for an "improvement in seed planters." The claim of the patent was as follows: "In combination with a corn planting machine that is constantly moved over the ground, and drops the grain intermittently, the so combining of two slides, one of which is at or near the seed hopper, and the other at or near the ground, or their equivalents, with a lever as that the operator, or attendant on the machine, can open said slides at the proper time to deposit the seed, and prepare a new charge by the double dropping herein specified." The device used by the defendant [George W. Brown] was covered by letters patent, granted to him May 8, 1855, and reissued December 11, 1860. The claim of the defendant's re-issue was as follows: "So combining with a lever by which both may be operated, a valve or slide in the seed hopper, and a valve in the seed tube, as that a half motion of the lever by the operator riding on the machine, by which they are operated, shall both open and close the seed passages at regular periods and pass measured quantities only, substantially as described." The difference claimed by the defendant between the two machines was that the plaintiff attained the result of double dropping of corn in planting by a backward and forward motion of a hand lever, the backward motion being obtained by a weight and recoil spring, acting automatically, while the defendant attained the result by contriving a double seed tube, with the valve hung therein upon a central pivot, whereby but one motion, or a half motion of the lever was required.

The defendant in reference to the construction of the plaintiff's patent, and the originality and novelty of his claim, offered in evidence a machine invented and used in 1852, by Charles Finn, and described in an application filed by him in the patent office. The defendant insisted that the plaintiff's machine was identical with the Finn machine in every respect, both requiring two motions of the lever to produce the result, except that the return motion, in the Finn machine attained by hand, was, in the plaintiff's machine, attained by the recoil spring connected with and forming a part of the lever; and that, in order to uphold the plaintiff's patent, the claim should be construed to cover only such a lever as he described with its recoil and automatic return; and that upon this construction it should be submitted to the jury whether the device of the defendant (he not using the recoil spring) attained the result in a substantially different manner from either the plaintiff or Finn, or whether the plaintiff's claim was not void for want of novelty.

The counsel for the plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury: "That the plaintiff, in and by his patent, claims any mode of combining a valve in the seed tube, and a valve in the seed hopper, or their equivalents, with a lever, so that the operator may, by one operation or the application of one muscular force, carry a charge of corn from the seed hopper into the seed tube, and arrest it at the lower valve and by the same operation or muscular force let out from the lower valve and drop into the furrow a charge of corn, previously dropped and lying at the lower valve. That the plaintiff by his patent is not confined to the peculiar means of returning the seed slides which he has adopted in his said model, which is called by the witnesses the automatic element. That it appears from the patent that he did not intend to confine his combination to a machine where the operator walked after the machine, drawn by one horse, which he drives, but that he intended to employ it in a machine where he also rode and another drove, if you please. That his claim covers any arrangement to operate the valves and lever in a machine of different shape from his model, which will produce the result in substantially the same way, although he may not in the other machine employ the rock shaft and weighted lever, or any automatic element; he may employ some substitute for the automatic element so that he by one operation, or the application of a single muscular force applied to the lever, drops from the lower valve and supplies a new charge to take its place by the same operation or muscular force, as aforesaid, applied to the lever combined with the valve at the seed tube or their equivalents." The court declined to give the instructions requested, but charged the jury as set forth.

James H. Roberts, S. B. Gookins, and J. O. Felton, for plaintff.

L. Douglas, E. C. Larned, and S. A. Goodwin, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge (charging jury). The allegation of the plaintiff is that the defendant has violated a combination in machines for planting corn by what is called a double drop, secured by letters patent. The plaintiff claims that he invented the combination in February, 1853, for which an application for a patent was subsequently made and a patent granted, which was afterwards surrendered and a re-issue taken in 1858. It is this last patent that governs the rights of the plaintiff, although the re-issued patent must stand upon the invention as originally set forth in the first letters patent. The construction of the patent is for the court.

The claim of the plaintiff is combining a seed hopper and seed tube and lever, so that by a slide or valve in the hopper and at the end of the tube, the corn by one operation can pass from the hopper into the tube, and from the tube to the ground, at one instant of time. The corn being placed in the hopper, and the slide opened, a hill of corn is deposited at the end of the seed tube. The machine is then ready to perform its office as it is drawn over the ground, viz.: to plant in what are called check rows. The operator or attendant, by means of a mere pressure of the thumb or hand upon the lever, opens the valves in the hopper and in the tube at once, and the corn goes from the tube to the ground, to be immediately replaced by corn from the hopper. The slides or valves are instantly re-adjusted by a spring and weight attached to the lever, and this completes the operation.

So that the claim of the plaintiff consists of the combination of the valve in the seed tube, the valve in the seed hopper, and the lever with its arrangement for re-adjusting the valves as described. In this, the patentee is not confined to the precise form of the combination. Any person who shall take what is the substance of the combination, although the form may be changed, would still violate the patent of the plaintiff. And the question in all cases of this kind is, whether by mere change of form the substantial, the essential, part of the combination is retained. Perhaps no better criterion can be adopted than to determine whether in the change that is made there is an exercise of mere mechanical skill or inventive power. If the former merely, then it may with confidence be declared that the substantial, the essential, part of the combination is not changed; if the latter, then the principle is not the same.

Having ascertained the nature and character of the invention which is secured to the plaintiff by letters patent, the first inquiry is, was the plaintiff the original inventor of the combination which is set forth in his specifications? The law declares that when a patent has been issued to a party, he shall be presumed to be the first inventor, because certain prerequisites are required before the patent shall issue. But it also declares that a party may contest the right of the patentee by showing that the thing patented has been known or used before. As it is only for some unknown combination or machine that the patent can issue, the defendant has in this case contested the novelty of the invention by the plaintiff, and has alleged that the combination has been known and used before. He has introduced evidence which, he alleges, tends to establish that fact. It is therefore a question to be determined by the jury, upon the evidence, whether the patentee is the first and original inventor of the combination which he claims. If he is not, his patent must fall, and he can not recover damages in this case. It is alleged on the part of the defendant, in the first place, that there was a machine constructed by Charles Finn, of Laporte, Indiana, in 1852, which had substantially the same combination. Whether the machine of Finn, which has been introduced in evidence, is substantially the same as that of the plaintiff, is a question of fact to be found by the jury. Finn's machine was not patented, but an application was made to the patent office for a patent, and it was described, and if it was substantially the same thing as the plaintiff's, it can make no difference whether it was patented or not. But the machine of Finn must have been a practical machine, capable of performing the object of the maker. It has been asserted that there were various differences between the machine of Finn and that of the plaintiff. It is said that in the latter, there is the application of but one force to produce the double dropping referred to, while in the former there are two forces. It is for the jury to say whether the means which the plaintiff adopts to re-adjust the slides are substantially the same as the force which is applied to the lever in Finn's machine, to re-adjust the slides there. It is admitted that by the application of one force there is not a double dropping produced in Finn's machine, as in the plaintiff's machine, but there must be an application of another force. In the one instance this force readjusts the slides; in the other they are re-adjusted automatically, as it is termed—that is to say, without the aid of the operator or attendant, but simply by the weight and spring attached to the lever. The material point as to Finn's machine, consists in the fact, as alleged by the defendant, that Finn's machine and Brown's are identical in the manner in which the re-adjustment takes place, and that if the plaintiff's machine and Brown's are identical in this respect, then the plaintiff's is also identical with Finn's. How this may be, is a question of fact to be found by the jury. In order to constitute an infringement of a combination, the whole combination must be used. For instance, the combination of the plaintiff, as already stated, consists of a valve at the end of the seed tube, the valve in the hopper and the lever.

Now admitting that the plaintiff was the first inventor of this combination, and that it is secured to him by letters patent, still any one can use the whole combination except the valve at the end of the seed tube, or the whole except the valve in the hopper, or all except the lever as described, and still not infringe the claims of the plaintiff. In order to constitute an infringement the whole combination must be used, because he claims not the various parts, but the whole combination together. The plaintiff cannot claim double dropping of corn; that is a result, or an effect. He can only claim the double dropping by the particular mode which he has devised. Any one can produce the same results by other and different modes, and still not violate the claim of the plaintiff. In order to constitute a violation, there must be a use of the same method substantially as that adopted by the plaintiff.

As for example, Morse invented a method of writing by means of electricity evolved by the galvanic battery, but it has been decided that any one else can produce the same results by different means. And although he claimed the result, the supreme court of the United States held that that was a void claim, and all that he could claim was simply the means by which he produced the result. The claim of the plaintiff has been stated. It will be observed that he claims that he has so adjusted the valves in the seed hopper, in the seed tube and the hopper, and the tube and the lever, as to produce what he terms the double dropping; that a charge of corn shall leave the hopper and the bottom of the seed tube simultaneously. He does not claim in language, what has been termed by the counsel on both sides, the automatic return of the lever, but he claims the kind of lever connected with the hopper, the seed tube and the slides, which has been described in the specifications, and we cannot separate the specifications from "the claim," and we must take the lever as he has described it, and its mode of operation just as though he had distinctly set it forth in "the claim." The court has already stated that the invention of the plaintiff is the so combining these parts as to produce a new and useful result. His invention, then, is not in having discovered a new thing, but a new combination of things, and it consists of the whole combination; so that in order to constitute a violation of the patent, it is necessary that a party use the whole combination, that is to say, the tube, valves and lever combined in substantially the same way as Mr. Case has combined them. If any one of the elements which is necessary to constitute the entire combination is left out, then there is no infringement.

For example: if you take out what is called the flipper at the bottom of the seed tube, or the valve in the seed tube, or the lever, and use the rest without one of these, you would not infringe, because Mr. Case claims the entire combination. So that in order to constitute an infringement of the letters patent, there must be used, by the defendant, the valve at the end of the seed tube, the valve in the hopper and the lever, all of these combined and operating substantially in the same way as they do in Mr. Case's machine.

But a mere change of form—for example, in the lever and its mode of operation, the adoption of some equivalent, suggested by mere mechanical skill—would not prevent it from being an infringement; otherwise, if the change were one of substance, and requiring the exercise of inventive power. The only remaining question is as to the damages which the plaintiff may have sustained if the defendant has infringed.

And the court thinks that the clear and simple rule to guide the jury in this case is —if they shall believe from the evidence the defendant has infringed the patent of the plaintiff—to ascertain what pecuniary profits or benefits the defendant has derived from the use of the invention of the plaintiff.

That would be any profits which he may have derived on a machine constructed between the time of the re-issued patent in November, 1858, and the commencement of the suit in September, 1860. Considerable evidence has been introduced tending to show that the lower valve, or flipper, as it is called, does not add anything materially to the value of the defendant's machine. If that shall be so, and if it is also true that the defendant has by the use of that valve violated the plaintiff's letters patent, still it is the duty of the jury to give the plaintiff nominal damages.

The jury found for the defendant.

This decision was affirmed by the supreme court. [Case v. Brown] 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 320.

[NOTE. Complainant brought error, and the supreme court, in affirming the opinion, held, Mr. Justice Grier delivering the opinion, that the court below correctly charged the jury as to what constituted infringement, and that there was no error in refusing to charge, in substance, that plaintiff had a right to claim any mode of combining the various mechanical devices in the improved machine which would produce the same effect or result, as mere equivalents for those described in his patent. Case No. 2,489.

CASE v. CITIZENS' BANK OF LOUISIANA.

[2 Woods, 23;[1] 1 Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 276.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1873.

NATIONAL BANKS—TRANSFERS IN CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY—DEFINITION OF "INSOLVENCY."

1. The word "insolvency," as used in the 52d section of the currency act of 1864 (13 Stat. 115; Rev. St. § 5242), is synonymous with the same word as used in the bankrupt act.

[Cited in Roberts v. Hill, 23 Fed. 311.]

2. To make transfers, assignments, deposits and payments void under said section, it is only necessary that the insolvency should be in the contemplation of the bank making the transfers, etc., and not that it should also be known to or contemplated by the party to whom they are made.

[Cited in National Security Bank v. Price, 22 Fed. 698; Roberts v. Hill, 23 Fed. 311. Criticised in Roberts v. Hill, 24 Fed. 574, 576.]

This is a bill in equity [by Charles Case, receiver, against the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana], and was submitted for final hearing and decree upon the pleadings, evidence, and arguments of counsel.

John A. Campbell, Thomas Allen Clarke, J. D. Rouse, and F. F. Case, for complainant.

Armand Pitot and M. M. Cohen, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The 52d section of the "currency act" (13 Stat. 115) declares that "all transfers of the notes, bonds, bills of exchange, or other evidences of debt owing to any association, or of deposits to its credit; all assignment of mortgages, sureties on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor; all deposits of money, bullion, or other valuable thing for its use or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors, and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this act, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." Relying upon these provisions of the statute, the complainant, Charles Case, the receiver of the Crescent City National Bank, files this bill against the Citizens' Bank of Louisiana.

The bill, after averring the appointment of the complainant as receiver, alleges, in substance, that between the 1st day of December, 1872, and the 6th of February, 1873, the Crescent City Bank drew bills of exchange on F. de Lizardi & Co., of London, amounting in the aggregate to £26,501 5s. 7d., each being payable in sixty days after sight, and sold the same to the defendant, the Citizens' Bank. That afterwards, about the 26th of February, 1873, the said Lizardi & Co. having, after the acceptance by them and before the maturity of the bills, failed, the defendant demanded from the Crescent City Bank indemnity against loss on said bills, and for the purpose of such indemnity the Crescent City Bank transferred to the defendant promissory notes, bills and evidences of debt amounting to $150,000, which were then and there the property of the Crescent City Bank. That at the time of the transfer, the Crescent City Bank had drawn and had negotiated for value bills of exchange on Lizardi & Co. to an amount largely exceeding its capital stock; that the bank had provided Lizardi & Co. with funds to meet the same at maturity; that by the failure of Lizardi & Co. the bills would be dishonored and the bank held liable therefor, and that the funds provided for the payment of said bills had been then lost to the bank by reason of the failure of Lizardi & Co., and that by reason thereof and of other losses the bank was then insolvent; that its insolvency was known to itself and the defendant; that said notes, bills, and evidences of debt were transferred to the defendant in contemplation of the insolvency of the Crescent City Bank, and with a view to give a preference to the defendant over other creditors. The bill prays that the transfer of said assets be declared void, and that defendant may be compelled to account for them to the complainant.

The answer of the defendant, the Citizens' Bank, which is given under the common seal of the corporation, denies all the material averments of the bill, except that the Crescent City Bank had provided Lizardi & Co. with funds to meet the bills drawn on them; that by the failure of Lizardi & Co., the said bills would be dishonored and the bank held liable therefor, and that the funds provided had been lost to the bank at the time of the transfer to the defendant of said assets. The complainant files the general replication.

In passing upon the case, it is material to consider what it is necessary for the complainant to establish in order to render void the transfer of the notes, bills, etc., to the Citizens' Bank. The transfer must have been made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation of insolvency, and with a view to give a preference to one creditor over another, or with a view to prevent the application of the assets of the bank in the manner prescribed by the currency act. I know of no reason why a different meaning should be given to the word "insolvency" as applied to banks in the currency act, from the meaning given the same word in the bankrupt act as applied to traders.

"Insolvency, as used in the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 534], when applied to traders, does not mean an absolute inability of the debtor to pay his debts at some future time, upon a settlement and winding up of his affairs, but a present inability to pay in the ordinary course of his business; or in other words, that a trader is insolvent when he cannot pay his debts in the ordinary course of his business, as men in trade usually do, and such must be the conclusion even though his inability be not so great as to compel him to stop business." Wager v. Hall, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 599. This definition of insolvency, in my judgment, is the meaning of the word in the currency act. It is only necessary that the insolvency should be in the contemplation of the bank making the transfer. The party to whom the transfer is made need not know of or contemplate the insolvency of the bank which makes the transfer. Thus it was held by Mr. Justice Story, under the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 442], that to constitute a conveyance "in contemplation of bankruptcy," it was not necessary that the professed creditor should know of the debtor's insolvency, or should co-operate with him to obtain a priority of payment. Peckham v. Burroughs [Case No. 10,897].

The facts clearly established by the evidence, and about which there seems to be no dispute, are as follows: Between December 2, 1872, and February 6, 1873, the Crescent City Bank had drawn bills on F. de Lizardi & Co., of London, which had been sold by the bank, and which were held as follows:

By the Citizens' Bank.....	£19,400
By the Canal Bank of New Orleans..	5,500
By the State Nat. Bank of New Orleans	5,000
By Eugene Kelly & Co.....	35,000
By Edward C. Palmer.....	10,000
By Mr. A. Carriere.....	4,000
By Duncan, Sherman & Co.....	5,000

—And other bills held by other persons. So that at the time of the failure of the house of Lizardi & Co., there were bills outstanding drawn by the Crescent City Bank on Lizardi & Co., to the amount of £111,000. The failure of the house of Lizardi & Co., the drawees and accepters of these bills, took place on February 14, 1873, before the maturity of any of the bills, and was positively known to Summers, the president of the Crescent City Bank, on the 16th inst. By the transfer of notes, bills, and other evidences of debt, on February 26th, by the Crescent City Bank to the Citizens' Bank, the latter was fully secured, for the bills held by it, drawn on Lizardi & Co. by the Crescent City Bank, to the amount of £19,400. On March 13th, in consequence of the failure of Lizardi & Co., the circulation of the Crescent City Bank went to protest, and the bank has since been put in liquidation. The Citizens' Bank lost nothing by the failure of the Crescent City Bank, having been fully secured for the bills held by it on Lizardi. The Canal Bank, Eugene Kelly & Co., Palmer & Carriere, received no security on or payment of the bills held by them, amounting to £54,500. The capital stock of the Crescent City Bank was $500,000.

These facts show the commission of an act of insolvency by the Crescent City Bank, the insolvency of the bank, the transfer of notes, bonds, etc., and the preference of one creditor to another. These facts alone do not, however, make the transfer void. It is necessary to the complainant's case to establish two additional facts: 1. That the transfer was made in contemplation of the insolvency of the Crescent City Bank, and 2. That it was made with a view to give a preference to the Citizens' Bank over other creditors, and to prevent the application of said assets in the manner provided by the currency act. If the complainant has established these facts in addition to those already stated, he has made out the case averred in his bill.

In passing upon the first point, it is pertinent to inquire, was the Crescent City Bank really insolvent at the time of the transfer of the notes, bills, etc., to the Citizens' Bank, on the 26th of February, 1873? We have in evidence a report of the condition of the bank on the 14th of February, 1873, the very day that Lizardi & Co., of London, failed. On that day the resources are stated at $1,545,854.51, in which is included an item of $561,958.01, under the head of "Other Cash Assets." This item is shown by the testimony of John Davis, the bookkeeper of the bank, "to consist of a class of bonds, stocks, etc., which bonds amount to 90 per cent. of the capital, which is $564,000. The bonds are $500,000. So that on account of $564,000, there were $500,000 bonds." It is evident from this statement that this item of $561,958.01 consisted mainly of the bonds of the United States to secure the circulation of the bank, with the premium thereon. It was not therefore a cash item, it was not available for the payment of the liabilities of the bank. The exhibit in which this item occurs, and the same item is found in the exhibits made on February 24th, February 28th and March 7th, was not a fair statement of the condition of the bank. This is made apparent by the fact that among the liabilities of the bank, the capital stock is not set down as a liability to offset the bonds deposited to secure circulation, with the premium thereon. The item, therefore, of $561,958.01, should be stricken from the statement of the resources of the bank. This leaves the resources at $983,896.50, on February 14th. On the same day, the liabilities of the bank are stated at $973,303.12, showing an excess of resources over liabilities of $10,593.38 only. But on the 14th of February, Lizardi & Co., of London, failed. On that day, as shown by the evidence of Davis, the exchange clerk of the Crescent City Bank, the amount of the bills outstanding drawn by the Crescent City Bank on Lizardi & Co., of London, was £111,000, which, reduced to dollars at the current rate of exchange at that time, would be about $604,000. The bank had sent forward about $606,000 to cover these drafts; these remittances were misappropriated by Lizardi & Co., and none of the $604,000 of exchange drawn by the Crescent City Bank on Lizardi & Co. was paid by them.

Here then is a bank which on February 14th shows resources over liabilities to the amount of only $10,593, and on that day, by the failure of Lizardi & Co., has withdrawn from its available resources, for an indefinite period, the sum of $606,000, with the prospect of losing in the end a large portion thereof. This statement makes perfectly clear the "inability" of the Crescent City Bank "to pay its debts in the ordinary course of business;" in other words, makes clear its insolvency. This loss or suspension of assets by the failure of Lizardi & Co. was greater than the available resources of the bank, added to its capital stock, by more than $95,000. Summers, the president of the Crescent City Bank, must have known of this condition of affairs before the 26th of February. In fact he must have known it; it is impossible he should not have known it as soon as he heard of the failure of Lizardi & Co. Reynes testifies that "on the 15th of February, he received a dispatch from Eugene Kelly, of New York, who held bills of the Crescent City Bank on Lizardi & Co. to the amount of £35,000, that the acceptances were due that day, and that they were unpaid, and that such dishonor was virtually the failure of the bank, and that he expected no preferred payments. Reynes showed the telegram to Summers, the president of the Crescent City Bank, and insisted on his acting according to it." Faurie, the cashier of the Crescent City Bank, testifies that the remittances sent by the bank to Lizardi & Co., of London, to pay those bills, were misappropriated and therefore the bills came back. "When we found the remittances were misappropriated, we thought it would break the bank." "Some of the directors thought that if the remittances had been properly appropriated, they would come out all right; but if they had not been properly appropriated, they knew the bank had gone under. They said so. As soon as we were advised of the misappropriation of the remittances made by Lizardi & Co., of London, every officer of the bank knew that it was broken." Geo. Jonas, the president of the Canal Bank, testifies, that as soon as it was known that the house of Lizardi & Co., of London, had failed, the credit of the Crescent City Bank was materially impaired, its business was diminished, there was urgency and anxiety among its creditors to obtain security. As soon as it was known that Lizardi & Co. had failed, every creditor wanted security if he could get it. He (Jonas) went to see Summers, the president, several times, to get security. Summers made an appointment to meet him on February 23d, and said he would bring bills receivable of a sufficient amount to cover the bills held by the Canal Bank. He failed to keep the appointment, but sent Jonas word the next day that his board determined to make no further preferences, and declined to give any security whatever." He further testified, that upon the failure of Lizardi & Co., the stock of the Crescent City Bank ran down rapidly, and he heard of parties who were anxious to get rid of it for nothing, on account of their liability as stockholders in case of a failure. Edward C. Palmer testifies, that he was in commercial business in New Orleans, and was director in a national bank at the time of the failure of Lizardi & Co. He says that upon that event there was but one opinion expressed, that it could not do anything else but ultimately break the Crescent City Bank. This was a general opinion among financial men that he talked with. L. F. Generes, who had often been director of banks in New Orleans, testifies that immediately on the failure of Lizardi & Co., of London, there was great anxiety here about the Crescent City Bank from its relations with Lizardi & Co. It manifested itself some days after the failure was known. At first there was no anxiety, but still it grew up and became very urgent.

The result of this evidence is that upon the failure of Lizardi & Co., of London, the Crescent City Bank was insolvent. As soon as it was known that Lizardi & Co. had misappropriated the funds sent to pay the bills drawn on them by the bank, the insolvency of the bank was known to its cashier and directors, and was currently rumored and suspected by the interested public. The board of directors, as early as February 22d, had "determined to make no further preferences." Here is the official act of the board of directors, which, in effect, implies the insolvency of the bank. Is it possible that Summers, a member of and president of the board of directors, and who himself reported this action of the board to Jonas, did not know of the insolvency of the bank?

The "contemplation of insolvency" is in my judgment clearly established.

It remains to inquire whether the transfer of notes, etc., made on the 26th of February to the Citizens' Bank, in contemplation of insolvency, was made with a view to the preference of one creditor to another. The fact is beyond dispute that the Citizens' Bank was preferred, because it was paid in full, while other creditors, similarly situated, were not paid any part of their claims. Did Summers, in making the transfer of notes, etc., do it with a view to a preference? The law presumes he had in view the natural result of his acts. But defendant claims to have shown that the transfer was made to provide means to pay the bills drawn by the Crescent City Bank in London, and thus save the credit of the bank. Why then were not all the holders of the bills applied to to discount paper from the portfolio of the bank, and thus furnish the means, each to take care of his own bills. This arrangement was made with a part, but not with all. It was made with the Citizens' Bank and others. They were secured, and the bills held by them paid. The bills held by others were left unsecured, and were protested. How was the credit of the bank to be maintained by such a course? E. C. Palmer, who held £10,000 of the bills of the Crescent City Bank, drawn on Lizardi & Co., heard of the failure of the drawers on February 15th, and within two hours went around to the bank. He saw Faurie, the cashier, who told him to go in and see Summers, the president of the bank. He found him talking with three or four of the directors. No offer was made to Palmer to transfer to him assets from the portfolio of the bank, in order to secure him. Doubtless he would have been willing to take care of the £10,000 of bills of exchange which he held, drawn by the Crescent City Bank on Lizardi & Co., if he could have been made secure out of the portfolio of the bank. So would the Canal Bank, and Eugene Kelly & Co., and Carriere. But no such opportunity was afforded them. These favors were reserved by Summers for the Citizens' Bank and others.

The truth is, as is evident by the testimony, that one at least of the purposes of the transfer of assets to the Citizens' Bank by the Crescent City Bank was to secure the Citizens' Bank on the bills which it had purchased from the Crescent City Bank on Lizardi & Co. The pretense that this transfer was to sustain the credit of the Crescent City Bank is too transparent to deceive any one. I am of opinion, therefore, after a review of all the evidence in the case, that the transfer by the Crescent City Bank to the Citizens' Bank, of the notes, bills etc. mentioned in the bill of complaint, was made in contemplation of insolvency, with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, and is therefore utterly null and void. Let a decree be entered as prayed in the bill.

CASE v. CLARKE.

[5 Mason, 70.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term. 1828.

CITIZENSHIP—DOMICILE—INTENTION.

1. To constitute a person a citizen of a state, so as to sue in the courts of the United States, he must have a domicil in such state.

[Cited in Burnham v. Rangeley, Case No. 2,176; Prentiss v. Brennan, Id. 11,385; Poppenhauser v. India-Rubber Comb Co., 14 Fed. 708; Ward v. Blake Manuf'g Co., 5 C. C. A. 538, 56 Fed. 440.]

2. If he removes into a state animo manendi, that is sufficient, whatever may be his motive for removal. But a mere temporary change of place, without any intention of permanent residence, constitutes no change of domicil.

[Cited in Cheever v. Wilson, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 123; Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 328, 9 Sup. Ct. 293.]

Case for defamation. The writ averred the plaintiff [Benjamin W. Case] to be a citizen of Massachusetts, and the defendant [Joshua Clarke] to be a citizen of Rhode Island. Plea to the jurisdiction, that the plaintiff is a citizen of Rhode Island, and not a citizen of Massachusetts, as alleged in the writ, and issue thereon. At the trial it appeared, that the writ was dated on the 29th of September, 1827, and was served on the 30th of the same month. The plaintiff was a physician, resident in Newport, Rhode Island, having his home there, and practising his profession. About the 28th of September, 1827, he went with his wife to Troy, Massachusetts, and took lodgings in a house there at board, avowedly for a few days only, and said, that his stay was uncertain. He remained there only two days, and then returned to Newport with his wife, saying, that he must visit his patients in Rhode Island. This was the whole evidence of citizenship.

Turner and Pearce, for plaintiff.

Mr. Searle, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. It appears to me very clear, that there is no sufficient proof, that the plaintiff is a citizen of Massachusetts. To effect that purpose it should be established, that there was a bona fide change of domicil. I do not say, that we can inquire into the motives for the change, or the reasons, which influence a man to remove from one state to another. Be these motives or reasons what they may, there must still be a bona-fide intention of removal, and a real change of domicil. If a person, wishing to commence suits in the courts of the United States, instead of the state courts, chooses to remove into another state, and executes such intention bona fide, he may thereby change his citizenship. But his removal must be a real one, animo manendi, and not merely ostensible. Now in the present case, no person can wink so hard as not to see, that the plaintiff never had any intention to change his domicil. He went to Troy upon a mere temporary visit, for a transient purpose, and apparently for the sole purpose of suing out and serving the present process. He returned as soon as the service was completed; and resumed his business as usual. How can such acts, construing them most favourably for him, demonstrate any intentional change of his common domicil? As well might a man passing into another state in the progress of a journey of business or pleasure claim to be a citizen of such state. There must be some plain overt acts establishing a real removal of domicil. The return here followed too soon upon the removal not to demonstrate, that it was merely an ostensible, and not a real change of domicil. I, for one, feel no desire to encourage attempts of this nature; and am willing, that the state courts should retain all the jurisdiction over causes originating between the citizens of the same state.

Verdict for the defendant.

CASE et al. v. DOUGLAS et al.

[1 Dill. 299.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1870.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—ACT OF MARCH 2, 1867.

Under the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558), where the suit in the state court is brought by copartners on a firm demand, the defendants are not entitled to have the same removed to the federal court on filing a petition and affidavit showing that a part of the plaintiffs are citizens of the state in which the suit is brought and the defendants are citizens of another state; in such case, in order to authorize the removal, all of the plaintiffs should be shown to be citizens of the state in which the suit was brought.

[Cited in Grover & Baker S. M. Co. v. Florence S. M. Co., 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 587; Petterson v. Chapman, Case No. 11,042.]

This is an action by D. W. Case, R. B. Beals, and H. H. Denton, partners, under the name of Case, Denton & Co., against the defendants, copartners, under the name of Douglas, Brown & Co., to recover for work and labor performed by the plaintiffs' firm for the defendants.

The action was commenced in 1869, in one of the state courts of Nebraska. After answer, the defendants filed, under the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558), their petition to remove the action to this court.

The petition for removal sets forth, inter alia, "that the plaintiffs, or at least the said D. W. Case, who is the active manager of said suit in behalf of said plaintiffs, and the said R. B. Beals are citizens of the state of Nebraska, and that the defendants are citizens of the state of Iowa; that the matter in dispute exceeds, etc., and that by reason of prejudice and local influence, the defendants will not be able to obtain justice in the district court of the state," etc.

The state court ordered a removal of the cause as prayed, and in this court the plaintiffs now move to remand the same "because the petition and affidavit do not show that the federal court has jurisdiction,' inasmuch as all the parties plaintiffs do not appear to be citizens of the state of Nebraska."

George W. Doane and John Carrigan, for the motion.

Isaac Cook, contra.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The motion to remand must be granted. The application for removal was based upon the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558). This act provides, under certain circumstances, for such removal where "there is a controversy between the citizen of the state in which the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state."

This language is taken from the judiciary act, and, so far as respects the question now presented, its meaning had been judicially determined long before the act of March 2, 1867, was passed. In adopting that language in the later act, congress must be taken to have adopted also its settled construction, which is that where the interest is joint each of the parties concerned therein must be competent to sue in the federal courts, and this competency must appear on the record. Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 267; Corporation of New Orleans v. Winter, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 91; Moffat v. Soley [Case No. 9,688]; Commercial & Railroad Bank v. Slocomb, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 60; Irvine v. Lowry, Id. 293; Bank of Cumberland v. Willis [Case No. 885]; Allin v. Robinson [Id. 249]; Susquehanna & W. V. Railroad & Coal Co. v. Blatchford, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 172; Sands v. Smith [Case No. 12,305.]

Applying these principles to the present case, it is obvious that the removal was improperly ordered, since it does not appear that all of the plaintiffs were citizens of Nebraska. For aught that is shown one of them may be a citizen of the same state as the defendants.

The case is distinguishable from that of Sands v. Smith [supra], where the right of removal given by the judiciary act was held to be affected by the act of February 28, 1839 [5 Stat. 321], and of July 27, 1866 [14 Stat. 306], in relation to defendants. Motion granted.

NOTE [from second edition of original report]. Removal to federal court on ground of citizenship authorized only when all plaintiffs are competent to sue all defendants in federal court. Cited: Petterson v. Chapman [Case No. 11,042]; Florence S. M. Co. v. Grover & Baker S. M. Co., 110 Mass. 80.

CASE v. NEW ORLEANS & C. R. CO. et al.

[2 Woods, 236.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1876.[2]

RES JUDICATA.

A creditor's bill which sought to follow as trust money, funds of a bank invested by its officers in a railroad company, was dismissed, on the ground among others that the identity of the property purchased with the money of the bank could not be ascertained: Held, that such decree was a bar to a new bill brought for the same purpose, and substantially the same as the first except that it contained an averment which was not in the first bill, to the effect that the complainant had reduced to judgment his claim against the officers of the bank for the misappropriated funds.

[See note at end of case.]

In equity. This cause was submitted on the bill, pleas, replication and evidence. The bill alleged in substance that G. T. Beauregard, Thomas P. May and A. C. Graham formed, about the 18th of April, 1866, a partnership under the name of G. T. Beauregard, Lessee; that said partnership leased from the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad Company, for a term of twenty-five years, its railroad and other property appurtenant thereto, and spent large sums of money in repairing and rebuilding said railroad, and in purchasing real estate for the use of said road, which real estate is described in the bill. It is further alleged that all or nearly all the money paid out by Beauregard, Graham and May, for the purchase of said lease and expended in making improvements on and equipping said road, and in conducting its business, was obtained from the First National Bank [of New Orleans]; that the partnership opened an account with the bank in the name of "G. T. Beauregard, Lessee," and became indebted to the bank for money advanced in the sum of $237,008. The bill further stated that the complainant [Frank F. Case], in his capacity of receiver of said bank, brought suit on the law side of this court against said partners Beauregard, Graham and May, on their said indebtedness; and that on the 26th of February, 1873, he recovered a judgment against Beauregard and May for $79,002 each, that being their respective virile shares of said debt as ordinary partners, but that Graham, not having been found, no judgment was or could be rendered against him. Executions were issued on said judgments and returned nulla bona. [See Beauregard v. Case, 91 U. S. 134.] The bill further averred that the bank had a lien and privilege upon all the property of the partnership, and had a right to be paid out of the same in preference to creditors of the individual partners. The bill further alleged that Graham and May had conveyed their interest in said property; that the partnership assets came into the possession and ownership of Beauregard and certain other persons, to wit, Bonneval, Binder and Hernandez; that in consideration that said railroad company would assume all the debts of said partnership of "Beauregard, Lessee," and give to said Beauregard, Bonneval, Binder and Hernandez, 4,000 shares of the capital stock of the company, they transferred to the said company the said lease and all the other property belonging to said partnership of Beauregard, Lessee. The bill charged that these transfers to Bonneval, Binder and Hernandez, and from them and Beauregard to the railroad company, were made with a full knowledge on the part of the transferees of the rights of the bank in the property transferred. The prayer of the bill was that the court would decree that there was due the complainant, as receiver as aforesaid, from the partnership of Beauregard, Lessee, the said sum of $237,008 with interest, and by each of the partners one third of said sum; that the New Orleans & Carrollton Railroad Company might be condemned to pay to him the sum so due, as aforesaid, from said partnership, and that all transfers and conveyances of said partnership property might be declared void. The plea in bar filed by the defendants to this bill was to the effect that on the 4th of June, 1870, the said complainant had filed his bill in this court against the same corporation and the same natural persons as are defendants in this bill, setting forth substantially the same cause of action and praying the same relief as is sought in this suit; that defendants had answered said bill and the complainant had filed a replication to the said answer, and testimony was taken by both parties, and on the 14th of June, 1871, the cause was submitted to this court, which on the 15th of June, 1871, rendered a decree dismissing the complainant's bill with costs. To this plea the complainant filed his replication, and the cause was submitted upon the issue thus formed.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The evidence submitted to sustain the plea, to wit, the record and decree of the court which is pleaded as a bar to this suit, shows that the bill in the former case made substantially the same averments with a single exception, to be hereafter noticed, and prayed the same relief as the present bill. The averments in the present bill not contained in the former one are those to the effect, that the complainant had recovered judgments against Beauregard and May, in an action at law each for his virile share of said indebtedness; that execution had issued and been returned nulla bona; that May had gone into bankruptcy, and that Graham was out of the jurisdiction of the court. The first bill, however, averred that Beauregard, Graham and May were all insolvent.

It is evident that the substantial difference between the two cases lies in this, that the first bill lacked the averment which the present bill contains, that the claim of the complainant against the partnership of "Beauregard, Lessee," had been sued to judgment as against Beauregard and May, and that execution had been issued thereon and returned unsatisfied. The answer to the first bill insisted that the various transfers by which the railroad company acquired title to the property of the partnership of Beauregard, Lessee, were valid, and the title of the company indefeasible, denied that the complainant or the bank ever had any lien or privilege thereon, or that said property was in any manner bound for the indebtedness of said partnership, or that the railroad company ever assumed or bound itself for the same, and denied all the allegations of the bill charging said company or said property acquired by it with any liability whatever to complainant or the bank of which he was receiver.

The original case was tried at the April term, 1871, of this court, by Mr. Circuit Justice Bradley, by whom it was decided in a written opinion to be found in 1 Woods, 125 [Case v. Beauregard, Case No. 2,487]. One of the grounds upon which the court decided against the complainant and dismissed his bill is stated, as shown by the report, as follows: "The first ground of relief, namely, that the property belongs to the bank, or is held in trust for the bank, because purchased with the money of the bank, is clearly untenable. Beauregard & Co. were engaged in business which required a considerable amount of funds, and became large borrowers of the bank. With the money thus obtained, and with other money derived from the proceeds of their business and other sources, they paid expenses, made repairs, bought cars, horses, and other property, and found themselves at the end of the year largely behind. The bank is their creditor, and considering May's peculiar relations, it has cause to make a charge of official misconduct against him; but how can that entitle the bank to claim the property of the firm as its own? The identity of the property purchased or procured with the money of the bank cannot be ascertained. It was mingled with the other money of the firm, and the whole mass was indiscriminately used for all the purposes of the company. Can the receiver point to a single car, or horse, or lot of ground, and say, this was purchased with the money of the bank? Other creditors of the firm have become interested, and nothing but inextricable confusion would ensue if any such claim were allowed to prevail. Where trust property is converted and the proceeds can be identified, it may undoubtedly be followed by the cestuis que trust, and brought back to be appropriated to its original purposes. Money of a bank misappropriated or embezzled by its officers may undoubtedly be followed up in the same way, if the money itself or its proceeds can be identified, and no innocent person is injured by its recovery. But supposing the money now in question could be regarded as thus misappropriated, the impossibility of identifying it and of doing justice to third parties, renders the application of the principle impracticable." See Case v. Beauregard [supra]. This ground, upon which, among others, the bill was dismissed, is entirely independent of the fact, whether the claim of the complainant had been reduced to judgment or not. The court, in effect, has decided, that with or without a judgment, the relief prayed by the bill cannot be granted. The case, in every shape it may assume, has been decided against the complainant and the bill dismissed. He cannot relieve himself of the effect of the decree of dismissal by putting his claim in judgment. That would be simply to add an entirely immaterial fact to the case he had made by his first bill.

The present bill, as already stated, differs from the bill which was dismissed in the single fact, that it avers that the debt due to complainant had been reduced to judgment. The court is, therefore, asked to decide, whether this fact changes the title of the complainant to the relief he prays. The court has, in the first case, decided that precise question, and held that it does not. The questions presented by this bill have been decided by this court. They cannot be raised again by adding an immaterial fact to the record. In my judgment, the plea is sustained by the proof, and there must be a finding and decree for defendants, and the bill must be dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. Complainant appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the decree below dismissing the bill, and held that the decree on the former hearing (Case No. 2,487) determined the equities of the case, whether the reasons for dismissal were sound or not, and that that decree, having been affirmed by the supreme court on the merits, was an adjudication upon complainant's equity to be paid out of the property in the hands of the railroad company, and a bar to the complainant's present claim; and, further, that the court would not reconsider the question or determine as to whether the bank has a lien on the property sought to be charged, or whether there had been a trust in its favor. Case v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688.]

ASSIGNMENT OF PATENT RIGHT—RECORDING—NOTICE—ASSIGNEE'S RIGHT IN RENEWAL — ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT—DECLARATION.

1. It is not essential to the validity of an assignment of a patent right between the parties, or as against strangers, that it should be recorded in the patent office.

[Cited in Perry v. Corning, Case No. 11,004.]

2. The record is notice to purchasers.

[Cited in Perry v. Corning, Case No. 11,004.]

3. An ordinary assignment will not convey to the assignee an interest in the renewed patent.

[Cited in Hodge v. Hudson River R. Co., Case No. 6,559; Jenkins v. Nicolson Pavement Co., Id. 7,273.]

4. The renewal is for the benefit of the inventor, and an interest in it before the renewal must be especially assigned.

5. The individual who holds the original right patented, and also an improvement on that right, must assert his entire right in an action for an infringement.

In equity.

Smith & White, for plaintiffs.

Judah & McGaughey, for defendants.

HUNTINGTON, District Judge. The plaintiff claims to be the assignee of the patent right granted to Zebulon and Austin Parker, on the 19th October, 1829, for the term of fourteen years, for the invention of "a percussion and reaction water wheel for mills," etc. And he alleges that on the 27th of June, 1840, the said patentees having invented a new and useful improvement on the above right, a patent [No. 1,658] for the improvement was issued to Zebulon Parker and Robert McKelvey, administrator of Austin Parker, deceased, in trust for his heirs at law, for fourteen years. On the 31st July, 1841, McKelvey, for the consideration of twenty-five hundred dollars, assigned to Zebulon Parker, "all the right, title and interest which said heirs had in said invention and improvement, as secured to them by said letters patent, for the whole of the United States, with certain exceptions, and for the use and behoof of his legal representatives, for which letters patent were or may be granted for said improvements, as fully and entirely as the same would have been held and enjoyed by said heirs had that assignment and sale not been made." Other assignments were made down to the right asserted by the plaintiff. And the plaintiff avers that the defendants have infringed his right, as stated under the patent.

The defendant demurs to the declaration, and assigns, as causes of demurrer, the following: 1. "That the declaration does not show that any assignment was ever made by the administrator of Austin Parker, deceased, of the extension of the original patent granted to Zebulon and Austin Parker, nor does it show any right in the present plaintiff in but one-half of the present patent." 2. "The declaration is double and multifarious in this, that the plaintiff sues for the invasion in each count, of two separate and distinct rights growing out of separate and distinct patents, that is to say, for the invasion of the original patent granted October 19th, 1829, and also for an invasion of the patent for an improvement granted 27th June, 1840." 3. "The declaration does not set forth in what or by what means, the defendants violated the patents set forth."

There is also a demurrer to the last count in the declaration, which sets out the assignments, but does not aver that they are recorded in the patent office. The assignments are set out in the declaration originally filed, and they are stated to have been recorded in the office; but this can not obviate the objection made by the demurrer to the last count. By the law of congress, the assignments are required to be recorded; but the effect of an omission to have them recorded is not declared. It has been held by Mr. Justice Story, that a failure to record an assignment was not essential to its validity as between the parties and against strangers, and was only necessary by way of notice to purchasers. The same construction has been given to the statute by several circuit courts of the United States, and we think it is the true one. The demurrer to the last count in the declaration is therefore overruled.

In regard to the objection first made on the special demurrer, that there has been no assignment of the interest in the heirs of Austin Parker, in the extended patent, it must be admitted that there has been no assignment of it since the patent was extended; and if there was no assignment of this interest before the extension, the truth of the fact is established, whatever may be its legal effect. In the case of Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646, it was held, that the extension of the patent was given for the benefit of the original inventor or his representatives to compensate him for his expenditures, labor and ingenuity in the invention, and in perfecting it; and that an ordinary assignment of the right in the patentee would not convey any right in the extended patent. But, that such an interest, when intended to be assigned, must be expressed. The original patent of the Parkers was extended for seven years, on the 4th of October, 1843. And, since the extension, there has been no assignment by the heirs of Austin Parker. But the plaintiff relies upon the assignment of McKelvey to Zebulon Parker, on the 31st July, 1841, as transferring the interest of the above heirs in the renewal patent. And it would seem from the language of that assignment this construction of it is sustainable. It appears at the time of this transfer the original patent had but little more than two years to run. And, although one-half of the improvement on the original patent was included in the assignment, yet the improvement without the original invention could not be used, and would be of little value. The sum of twenty-five hundred dollars was the consideration named in the assignment. From this it would be reasonable to infer that the entire interest in the heirs, present and future, in the invention, was intended to be conveyed; so large a sum would not have been paid for one-half of the improvement on the original right, and a moiety of the original patent which would expire in two years. The operative words of the assignment show the intention of the parties. They are, "all the right, title and interest which said heirs had in said invention and improvement as secured to them by said letters patent, for the whole of the United States, with certain exceptions, and for the use and behoof of his (Zebulon Parker's) representatives, for which letters patent were or may be granted for said improvements, as fully and entirely as the same would have been held and enjoyed by said heirs had that assignment not been made." Here is not only a present but a future interest assigned. An interest secured by the present letters patent, or by patents which may (hereafter) be granted for said improvements. This was intended to transfer the right under a renewal of the patent. No other construction can be given to the words used. They can not be made to apply to any correction of a supposed error in the specifications or claims of the patent. Under the law when this assignment was made, the patent was not void for claiming more than was invented. And it is not pretended that there is any want of precision in the specifications. Under the act of 4th of July, 1836 [5 Stat. 124], § 18, for the extension of a patent, it may have been supposed that a new grant would be issued. But a much shorter mode has been adopted by an indorsement on the original patent.

The second ground of objection in the special demurrer that "the declaration is double and multifarious," is not sustainable. The wrong complained of is for an infringement on the improved patent, not for a violation of the original patent or of the improvement upon the original grant, but of the entire right, united in the plaintiff, by the different patents and assignments. The right set up is an entirety, and being united in the same individual is not susceptible of a division. Had he divided his cause of action, claiming damages in one case for the infringement of the original patent, and in another for an infringement of the improvement, the actions could not have been sustained. As well might different actions be brought for trespass, upon a close, on the ground that the land was held under distinct titles. The injury done was to the entire close, and that constitutes the ground of the action. It may be admitted that two defendants can not be united in the same action, where each has infringed distinct patents: for in that case there could be no joint defense. There would be no right common to the defendants, and consequently both would be subjected to additional costs and delays by the joinder of the two. But where the original patent and the improvement on it are united in the same person, they constitute a whole, an entire right, and must be asserted as such in an action for an infringement.

The other ground of demurrer, as to the violation of the plaintiff's right is answered by the declaration. The wrong done is alleged in the usual form, that the defendant "made, constructed, used and vended to sundry persons," etc., the said invention. The special demurrer is overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Jan. 18, 1873.

PRACTICE IN BANKRUPTCY—REVIEW—APPEAL—FINAL DECREE—SUMMARY PROCEEDING.

1. The review, by the circuit court, of an order made by the district court, in the exercise of its summary jurisdiction in bankruptcy, under the 1st section of the bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 517), cannot be had by means of an appeal, taken under the 8th section of said act.

2. The practice in general use, in the second circuit, for the review of such an order, is by a petition to the circuit court, setting forth so much of the proceeding in the district court as is necessary to show the order complained of, and the facts on which it was based, or the evidence, where the facts are in dispute, pointing out specifically the supposed error or errors, and asking a review and reversal, or modification, of the order complained of.

3. A mere notice of appeal is not "proper process," for invoking a review of such an order.

4. Semble, that the review of such an order may be applied for at any time before the supposed erroneous order is carried into execution.

5. A summary proceeding, by order to show cause, based upon a petition in the district court, in bankruptcy, asking that the assignee in bankruptcy be directed to pay the mortgage debt out of the estate, and that, in default of payment, the assignee and a subsequent mortgagee be foreclosed of all equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises, cannot, for the purposes of an appeal from an order made thereon, directing that a decree of foreclosure be made in favor of the petitioner upon one mortgage, and in favor of such subsequent mortgagee on another, and ordering a reference, to ascertain the amount due on those mortgages, and dismissing the petition as to a third mortgage, but not settling the terms, or conditions, or times, when the foreclosure shall become operative, be regarded as a suit, so as to sustain an appeal taken from such order, under the 8th section of said act.

6. Such an order, if regarded as made in a suit, is not a final decree therein.

7. The appeal provided for by the said 8th section can be taken only from a final decree.

8. Jurisdiction to foreclose a mortgage on the estate of a bankrupt, at the instance of the mortgagee or holder, is not included in the powers to be exercised summarily under the 1st section of said act.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Vermont.]

In bankruptcy.

John Prout, for petitioner.

John W. Stewart and E. J. Ormsbee, for assignee.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. Isaac Alden, claiming to be the owner, by assignment, of certain two mortgages upon real estate of the bankrupt, presented his petition to the district court, setting out a mortgage dated June 19th, 1841, made by a former owner of the premises, to one Austin, afterwards assigned to the petitioner, and another mortgage, dated August 7th, 1855, made by the bankrupt to Mary A. Newman, which was afterwards, as he states, delivered to him, and which, he states, he now owns, with the promissory notes thereby secured. The petitioner also states, that, on the 10th of November, 1865, the bankrupt executed another mortgage, upon the same premises, to Nathan T. Sprague. He further states, that the amounts of the several mortgages are due and unpaid, with the exception of certain payments on account thereof, which it is not material here to specify; and he asks, that the bankrupt and the assignee of his estate in bankruptcy, Thurman Brokins, and the holder of the said third mortgage, Nathan T. Sprague, show cause why the court should not order the assignee to pay the first two mortgages out of the funds of the estate of the bankrupt, if any he has, or, in default of a payment thereof by them, or some one of them, that they and each of them be foreclosed of all equity of redemption in said premises, or why the petitioner should not have such other order or relief as to the court should seem equitable, &c. The bankrupt, apparently, paid no attention to this petition. The assignee and the third mortgagee showed cause. The former sets up the existence of various alleged defences to the mortgages described in the petition as held by the petitioner, and alleges that various payments have been made thereon which are not credited; that the notes secured by the mortgage given to Newman are barred by the statute of limitations; that the petitioner has no title, legal or equitable, to the mortgage given to Newman, or the notes secured thereby; that, when the said Newman conveyed the real estate to the bankrupt, for the consideration, in whole or in part, expressed in the said mortgage given to her for the price, she covenanted that the premises were free and clear of all other incumbrances, whereas, in fact, the prior mortgage to Austin was then an incumbrance thereon; that the amount of such prior mortgage ought, in equity, to be allowed to the estate of the bankrupt, in abatement of the sum secured by the mortgage to her; that the mortgagee Newman has never assigned the mortgage which was executed and delivered to her; that, in respect to the notes which the petitioner claims to have purchased, they have never been endorsed by her, and she denies his title thereto; that, in respect to others of said notes, (being about one-half of the amount mentioned in the said mortgage,) they are held by, and belong to, the wife of the petitioner, as her separate property; and, finally, that, on the 22d of March, 1870, the petitioner and his wife released to the bankrupt the mortgaged premises. The mortgagee Sprague alleges the validity of his own mortgage, and, upon information and belief, states that payments have been made on the other mortgages, and, also, that, except upon recent information, he has no knowledge of the existence of such mortgages.

Proofs were taken upon the facts alleged, and the district court made an order, "that a decree of foreclosure be made in favor of the petitioner, upon the mortgage described in the petition as executed on the 19th of June, 1841, * * * to Gustavus A. Austin, and also on the mortgage described in said petition as executed on the 11th of November, 1865, * * * to Nathan T. Sprague, and that the case be referred to the clerk of said court, to ascertain the sums due on said mortgages respectively," and dismissing the petition, with costs, as to the notes and mortgages alleged to have been executed in 1855 to Mary A. Newman. From this order the petitioner appealed in the form and manner prescribed in the eighth section of the bankrupt law, which regulates appeals to this court from the district court in cases in equity, under the jurisdiction created by that act. The assignee in bankruptcy moves to dismiss the appeal, and, subject to that motion, the propriety of the order has been discussed.

The appeals provided for in the eighth section are appeals in that class of cases mentioned in the third paragraph of the second section of the act, which gives to the circuit and district courts concurrent jurisdiction of suits, at law or in equity, which may be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property, or rights of property, of said bankrupt, transferable to or vested in such assignee. The cases in equity mentioned in the eighth section, are suits in equity, whereof the district court obtained jurisdiction by the paragraph last referred to. The appeal in such cases is not the application for a review of the summary orders or proceedings of the district court in the ordinary course of proceedings in bankuptcy, or upon petition therein. The summary jurisdiction given by the first section of the bankrupt law may be exercised upon the ordinary processes, orders to show cause, notices of motion, &c., therein, or upon petition, where special aid or relief is sought in any matter embraced in that jurisdiction. The review of orders made thereupon is not by appeal under the eighth section, but by bill, petition, or other proper process, of any party aggrieved. The precise form of invoking the general superintendence and jurisdiction of this court, to review such orders, is not fixed by the statute, but, the practice in this circuit, in general use, is for the party desiring such review to present to this court a petition, setting forth so much of the proceeding in the district court as is necessary to show the order complained of, and the main facts upon which it was based, or the evidence, when the facts are in dispute, pointing out specifically the supposed error or errors, and asking a review and reversal, or modification, of the order complained of.

I have heretofore, in this district, in Re Clark [Case No. 2,802], expressed my disapproval of an attempt to bring into this court the proceedings of the district court for review, upon the vague and general allegation, even in a petition, that there is error therein. The law contemplates, that, whether the superintendence and jurisdiction of this court be exercised by bill, petition, or other proper process, the matter be brought before the court in some form in which the errors alleged shall be presented for examination, and not that this court shall be called upon to rove through the entire proceedings, on a general allegation that there is somewhere error therein. If, therefore, in the absence of specific statute provision, it were claimed, that, irrespective of the eighth section, a notice of appeal would be "proper process," for invoking such review of summary proceedings in the district court, I should be constrained to hold that such a notice is not sufficient.

In this matter, the proceeding in the district court was not a suit. It was an application to the summary jurisdiction of the court, sought to be exercised by an order upon the assignee and others to show cause as upon motion, and, on showing cause, an order thereupon was made. If it appeared that the form of a notice of appeal had been adopted under the belief that this court would treat that as "proper process," under the first clause of the second section, the suggestion would be obvious, that such a notice would not, per se, bring before this court the proceedings of the district court, nor any part of them. There is no statute, nor any rule, which gives such a notice effect to bring those proceedings into this court. Whether such a notice would operate even to warrant this court to make any order by which the proceedings of the district court should be certified to this court, is not clear; and, whether this court could make an order based upon such notice, permitting the party supposing himself aggrieved to amend his proceeding, by filing a petition or specification of errors, nunc pro tunc, it is not necessary now to consider, for reasons which will be suggested. Such an order does not seem to be necessary. I find no specific limitation of the time within which a review of summary proceedings may be sought; and it would seem, therefore, that such review may be applied for at any time before the supposed erroneous order is carried into execution.

It was urged, by the counsel for the petitioner, that, although the proceeding was not so in form, yet it was, in substance, a suit in equity to foreclose mortgages held by the petitioner, heard upon bill, answers, and proofs, and that mere form ought to be disregarded, and the appeal sustained under the eighth section of the bankrupt act. I cannot concede that the proceedings may, with any propriety, be deemed and treated as a suit. But, if I could, then I should certainly be compelled to dismiss the present appeal, for, the order sought to be reviewed is not a final decree in such a suit. The order, as an order in a foreclosure suit, is interlocutory merely. It determines, preliminarily to a decree in foreclosure, as to which of the three mortgages a decree of foreclosure shall hereafter be entered, and, with a view to such decree, directs the ascertainment of the amounts due; but, what are to be the terms and conditions of the foreclosure of the equity of redemption, nor at what time such foreclosure shall be final and operative, as a bar to the right of redemption, is not settled, nor is the order, in any sense, ripe for final execution. This court has heretofore held, that the appeals given to the circuit court, in suits in equity, by the eighth section of the bankrupt act, are from final decrees of the district court, and not from orders, or interlocutory decrees, not settling all the rights in controversy. Clark v. Iselin [Case No. 2,824].

I have discussed these questions at some length, because the views of this court in relation to the practice under the bankrupt law do not seem to have been fully understood in this district; and I might dispose of this proceeding here, by directing that the appeal be dismissed, but, I foresee that the petitioner may feel some embarrassment and uncertainty respecting the course which is open to him. It is, therefore, not altogether impertinent, in view of a possible renewal of the application to review the order made in the district court, by the filing of a petition of review, or otherwise, to say, that the proceeding was a mistaken one, in the first instance. Jurisdiction to foreclose mortgages upon the estate of the bankrupt is not included in the powers to be exercised summarily under the first section of the bankrupt act. Jurisdiction to order such foreclosure, in favor of an alleged mortgagee claiming adversely to the assignee, and adversely to another mortgagee or mortgagees, where the title of the applicant is disputed, the amount claimed is denied to be due, and where it is insisted that he has already released the lien, if any existed, is, most clearly, not embraced in that first section. Controversies like the present must be conducted by a suit, to which all persons claiming adversely to the complainant are made parties, and in which each will have the right of appeal given by the law, and, when the amount is sufficient, to the supreme court of the United States.

I forbear expressing an opinion upon the facts in this case; but, it is not obvious, that, if a part of the notes secured by the mortgage to Mrs. Newman are owned by the wife of the petitioner, as her separate estate, a foreclosure can be had in a suit in equity to which she is not a party; nor, if Mrs. Newman claims the other notes adversely to the petitioner, and that is known to the other parties interested, is it clear that she is not to be made a party to any proceeding by the petitioner, in equity, to enforce them as a lien. Upon what ground this mortgage to Mrs. Newman was deemed invalid, or was excluded by the order made by the district court, was not suggested on the argument. It may have been because the real parties interested therein were not before the court. Obviously, the claims in this respect were not very fully exhibited. Whatever may be said of defect of parties, it is, at least, doubtful, whether the petitioner did not acquire some interest in the mortgage debt by his purchase from the holders of the notes in Virginia; and, if the decision proceeded upon the ground that the petitioner and his wife had released the mortgage debt, then the proofs tending to show that there was no such intention, that there was no consideration for such a release, and that the execution of the instrument claimed to have such an effect was under a total mistake, which a court of equity ought to correct, all show the importance of having the matter before the court by regular suit, invoking the power of the court to reform the instrument, or otherwise relieve the parties from the technical legal effect of it, as, also, to present the other facts with all proper parties, so that the decree may be effective and be reviewable in appropriate form. For the present, the duty of the court is to dismiss the appeal.

CASEY v. LA SOCIETE DE CREDIT MOBILIER et al.

[2 Woods, 77;[1] 1 Thomp. Nat. Bank Cas. 285; 7 Chi. Leg. News, 313; 21 Int. Rev. Rec. 219.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1874.[2]

NATIONAL BANKS — PLEDGE OF SECURITIES BY — VALIDITY—PREFERENCE TO CREDITOR — RIGHTS OF RECEIVER.

1. The preference of one creditor to another by a national bank, mentioned in section 5242, Rev. St., is a preference given to the creditor to secure or pay a pre-existing debt.

2. When a national bank (being embarrassed and in need of assistance, receives a loan of money or other valuable material aid, from a person who knows its embarrassed state, on condition that the party making the loan or giving the aid shall be secured therefor, and the security is accordingly given by pledging a part of the assets of the bank, this is not giving him a preference over other creditors, within the meaning of section 5242, Rev. St.

[Cited in Armstrong v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 41 Fed. 239.]

3. The legislature of Louisiana has left it in doubt whether indorsement as well as delivery is essential to the pledge of a negotiable instrument.

4. The receiver of an insolvent national bank holds only the estate and title of the bank in its assets, and he has no greater rights in enforcing their collection than the bank itself would have had.

5. Neither the bank nor its receiver could recover possession of negotiable securities pledged by the bank for advances to it, on the ground that the pledge was ineffectual for want of indorsement of the securities, while at the same time holding on to the assets to secure repayment of which the pledge was given.

6. When a national bank agreed to deposit with a certain commercial firm in pledge a portion of its assets to secure a loan to be made to itself, and the loan was received by the bank, it was held, that there was no legal obstacle to the depositing of the assets according to the contract, arising from the fact that the president of the bank was a member of the firm with which the deposit was to be made.

[2] [Reversed in Casey v. Cavaroc, 96 U. S. 467.]

7. A national bank which makes a contract not authorized by its charter cannot repudiate the contract, and at the same time retain its fruits.

8. When a national bank pledged a portion of its assets to secure a loan to itself, and the notes pledged were changed from time to time as they fell due, and others substituted in their stead, and this was according to the contract between the bank and the pledgee: Held, that the pledge of such substituted notes was not void.

[See note at end of case.]

The case as presented by the pleadings and proofs was substantially as follows: On the 12th of July, 1873, the New Orleans National Banking Association, a corporate body organized under the national banking act June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. 99), was engaged in the banking business in the city of New Orleans, and continued to carry on business until the 4th day of October, 1873, when it suspended payment. On the said 12th day of July, 1873, the defendant, "Société de Credit Mobilier," of Paris, entered into an arrangement with the said banking association through Charles Cavaroc Sr., its president, whereby the "société" agreed on its part to accept bills of exchange to be drawn by the banking association, payable ninety days after sight, to the amount of one million francs, and the association agreed to place with the société ten days before the maturity of said bills the amount thereof. The banking association further agreed to deposit securities in the hands of the commercial firm of C. Cavaroc & Son, of which said Charles Cavaroc Sr., was a member, for the purpose of securing the société against loss from the failure of the association to place the amount required to meet said bills at maturity. The said firm of C. Cavaroc & Son was constituted by the société its agent to receive and hold said securities. In pursuance of this arrangement, on or about the 12th of July, 1873, bills of exchange were drawn upon the société by the banking association at ninety days' sight to the amount of one million francs, and the same were sold by the banking association, and the proceeds, amounting to $218,450.34, were appropriated by the banking association—were credited on its books to the société, and the bills were accepted by the société. On the day of the date of the drafts, or the day following, a list was made out of notes due the association, amounting to $220,021.43, and the notes named in the list were put in an envelope and handed to C. Cavaroc & Son, by direction of C. Cavaroc Sr., the president of the association, to be held as security for the société, to protect it from loss by reason of its acceptance of the drafts. It was subsequently stipulated by C. Cavaroc Sr., on behalf of the association, that as soon as any of said notes matured, they should be replaced by others of like amount. Some time subsequent to the 12th of July, C. Cavaroc Sr., fearing that the notes already set apart would not be sufficient to secure the société for its acceptance of said bills, caused another list of notes, amounting to about $100,000, to be made out, and the notes to be deposited with C. Cavaroc & Son, as additional security. As notes matured and were paid or renewed, they were replaced by others, in pursuance of the agreement above stated. The evidence showed that on the 12th of July the association was embarrassed, and that long before its suspension, on the 4th of October, it was insolvent. When the banking association suspended payment, C. Cavaroc & Son claimed to hold all of said notes then in their hands, amounting to $325,011.26, to secure the société for its acceptance of said bills. After the suspension of the bank it was placed by the order of the comptroller of the currency, in the custody of John Cockrem, as receiver. Cockrem having resigned, the present complainant was appointed receiver in his stead. The bill asks the court to adjudge and decree that all of the said notes held by C. Cavaroc & Son belong to and are the property of said banking association, and that the same, and all the proceeds thereof be placed in the hands of complainant as receiver, to be administered and applied to the payment of the claims of the creditors of said association. The bill is based upon the 52d section of the national currency act (Rev. St. § 5242), which declares as follows: "That all transfers of the notes, bonds, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt to any association, or of deposits to its credit, all assignments of mortgages, securities on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor, all deposits of money, bullion, or other valuable thing for its use or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors, and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this act, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void."

J. D. Rouse and J. R. Beckwith, for complainant.

Thomas Allen Clarke, Thomas L. Bayne, and Henry Renshaw, Jr., for La Société de Credit Mobilier of Paris and for Nat. Park Bank of New York.

Edward C. Billings, for Charles Cavaroc & Son and for F. Schuchardt & Sons.

John Finney and H. C. Miller, for various other defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The claim of the complainant is that the alleged transfer of the notes and assets of the banking association to C. Cavaroc & Son, to secure the société for its acceptance of the bills of the association, was a transfer thereof in contemplation of insolvency, with a view to prevent the application of the assets in the manner prescribed by the national currency act, and with a view to the preference of one creditor to another; that such transfer is therefore null and void, and that said notes are still the property of the association, and applicable to the payment of its debts.

It has been held by this court that to make "transfers, assignments, deposits and payments" void under the 52d section of the currency act, it is only necessary that the insolvency should be in the contemplation of the bank making the transfer, and not that it should be known to or contemplated by the party to whom they are made. Case v. Citizens' Bank [Case No. 2,489]; Peckham v. Burrougns [Id. 10,897].

The evidence in the case satisfies my mind that the banking association, at the time it made the arrangement already recited with the societé, to wit: on the 12th of July, 1873, was in an exceedingly embarrassed condition, if not actually insolvent. Although C. Cavaroc Sr., its president, testifies that he did not at that time think that the bank was insolvent, he had abundant reason to know soon after that date that it was embarrassed and in a critical situation. This is evidenced by his application for assistance to other banks of the city of New Orleans. In my judgment the evidence shows so much clearly, but it does not show more.

But conceding that C. Cavaroc Sr., the president of the bank, at the time he transferred the notes to C. Cavaroc & Son, for the security of the societé, knew that the association was insolvent, will that fact render the transfer made under the circumstances recited void? That alone is not sufficient. One of two alternatives must exist: (1) It must be with a view to prevent the application of the assets in the manner prescribed by the currency act, or (2) with a view to the preference of one creditor to another. Is it the meaning of the section of the currency act on which the bill is based, that after a national bank is in contemplation of insolvency, no person could do business with it except at the risk of having any means he may put under the control of the bank, no matter under what solemn contract for security, confiscated for the use of the general creditors of the bank? If this is the construction to be given to the 52d section of the currency act, then the moment a bank becomes embarrassed, it must give up and suspend payment, for all who come to its assistance must do so without security. In my judgment, the preference of one creditor to another, mentioned in the 52d section, is a preference given to an existing creditor for a pre-existing debt. If a customer or friend of a bank, knowing it to be embarrassed and in need of assistance, proffers it, for instance, a loan of $50,000 in cash, on receiving security for the amount by a transfer of a part of its portfolio, that cannot be fairly construed as giving him a preference over other creditors. Other creditors are not injured by such a transaction, for the securities that such a creditor takes out, he leaves an equivalent in cash. He becomes a creditor solely on condition of receiving security.

The policy of the law is plain, namely: to prevent preference among creditors holding pre-existing debts. It clearly was not the purpose of the act to forbid the bank from giving security to its friends for means to be advanced on the spot or in the future. The general creditors are not injured by such an arrangement; they may be greatly benefited by it.

Take the case in hand. Suppose the association were actually insolvent on the 12th of July. The societé in effect puts one million of francs into the possession of the bank, and takes security for it. Is the general creditor any worse off? The bank had nothing when the securities were transferred. It gets dollar for dollar for what it transfers. Can that be called giving a preference to one creditor over another? As claimed by counsel for defense, it is in effect an exchange of values rather than the giving of a preference to a creditor. It seems to me to be established, beyond all controversy, by the evidence in this case, that the pledge of the notes of the association complained of was not made in contemplation of insolvency, but it was a struggle on the part of the officers of the bank to avoid insolvency; it was not made to give preference of one creditor over another, but it was a plan adopted by the bank to secure means to carry on its business with a view to be able to pay all its creditors. The construction claimed by complainant for the 52d section of the currency act would make the banks a trap in which the means of their friends, furnished on the pledge of securities, would be drawn in and applied to the payment of the general creditors.

In my judgment the construction placed on the 35th section of the bankrupt act is applicable also to the 52d section of the currency act. That section of the bankrupt act declares that any sale or other disposition of property made by a person insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within six months before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, by or against him, by any person who has reasonable cause to believe him insolvent, such sale being made with a view to prevent the property coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, etc., shall be void. Under this section it has been held that a sale made in good faith, for the honest purpose of discharging a debt, and in the confident expectation that by so doing the person could continue business, will be upheld. Tiffany v. Lucas, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 410. So in Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 332, it was held that an exchange of values may be made at any time, though one of the parties to the transaction may be insolvent; that there is nothing in the bankrupt act that prevents an insolvent from dealing with his property, selling or exchanging it for other property, at any time before proceedings in bankruptcy are taken by or against him, provided such dealings be conducted without any purpose to delay or defraud his creditors or give a preference to any one, and does not impair the value of his estate. And in Tiffany v. Boatman's Sav. Inst., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 376, it was held that a man really insolvent, but not having yet openly failed, and hoping to overcome his difficulties and to carry on his business, violates no provision of the bankrupt act by pledging his property for money lent, this money being lent at the time when the pledge was made. See, also, Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 360. On the strength of these authorities, construing a provision of the bankrupt act similar to the 52d section of the currency act, and upon my own independent judgment of what is the purpose and intent of said section, I am of opinion that the original transfer made by the banking association to the société of the assets mentioned was not void.

But the complainant insists that the transfer was void, because not made in compliance with the Code of Louisiana. It is claimed that the Code requires that when a negotiable instrument is pledged by a debtor it must not only be delivered to the creditor to whom it is transferred, but must be indorsed (Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3123), and as it was conceded there was no indorsement of the notes in question, the attempted transfer was ineffectual to carry title.

There has been some confusion in the legislation of Louisiana upon this subject, so that it is not by any means clear whether an indorsement as well as delivery of a negotiable instrument is necessary in order to complete an act of pledge. The act approved March 15, 1855, entitled "An act relative to pledges" (see Fuqua's Civ. Code, 421, note), appears to have been a re-enactment of the act of 1852 (see Acts 1852, p. 15). The first section of this act declares that when a debtor wishes to pawn promissory notes, bills of exchange, etc., he shall deliver to the creditors the notes, bills of exchange, etc., so pawned; and such pawn so made, without further formalities, shall be valid as well against third persons as against the pledgers thereof, if made in good faith. There can, it seems to me, be no doubt that the purpose of this section was to make the delivery of a promissory note without indorsement sufficient as an act of pledge. But in a subsequent revision of the statute law of the state, the provision requiring indorsement was allowed to remain; so that we have in the same statute book an article declaring that indorsement as well as delivery is necessary to the pledge of a promissory note, and another article in effect declaring that indorsement is not necessary. In my judgment it is not necessary to determine in this cause whether indorsement is or is not essential. The receiver holds only the estate and title of the bank in its assets. His title is the same as that of an assignee in bankruptcy. It will not be pretended that the bank could recover back the assets which it had pledged and delivered to the agents of the société because they were not indorsed, and at the same time hold on to the proceeds of the drafts, for the acceptance of which the assets were pledged, unless there was fraud; and there was no fraud in this case.

An assignment in bankruptcy, like any other assignment, by operation of law, passes the rights of the bankrupt precisely in the same plight and condition as he possessed them, subject to all equities. Mildord v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 100; Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 248; Campbell v. Slidell, 5 La. Ann. 274; Mitchell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673]; Ex parte Dalby [Id. 3,540]. There seems to be no reason why the position of receiver of an insolvent bank under the currency act is any better than that of an assignee in bankruptcy. If the receiver holds the same title to the assets of the bank that the bank itself held, he cannot avoid a pledge which the bank could not avoid. He is not a third person, in the sense of the Civil Code. In the case of Matthews v. Rutherford, 7 La. Ann. 225, it was held that a notarial act of pledge, or a written act registered in a notary's office, is a formality which is necessary to protect the payee against third parties, but its omission is unimportant as between pledger and pledgee. I am of opinion, therefore, that the failure to indorse the notes pledged by the bank is a defect of formalities in making the pledge of which neither the bank nor the receiver can take advantage.

It is further claimed by the complainant that C. Cavaroc Sr., the president of the association, could not at the same time act as president and agent of the association and as the agent of the société. It is true that the same person cannot sell as the agent of one and at the same time buy as the agent of another, and a contract made by one who acts as the agent of both parties may be avoided by either principal. See Story, Ag. § 211, and note. Such a contract, made by a person acting as agent for two principals, involves an absurdity. But in this case the contract was made between the "société" and the "association," the latter acting through its president. But it seems to me clear that there was no legal obstacle, the contract having been made and being in force, to the turning over by the association, acting through Cavaroc, its president, of the assets in pledge to be held by the commercial firm of C. Cavaroc & Son. In fact, C. Cavaroc & Son were mere depositaries or stakeholders, and all stakeholders are agents for both parties.

It is further claimed by complainant that Cavaroc, the president of the banking association, could only act by authority of the charter or by vote of the directors in making the pledge of the assets of the association, and that no such authority is found in the charter or minutes of the board of directors. The minutes of the board of directors are evidence, however, that they knew what arrangement had been made between their bank and the "societé," and they approved it by voting a compliment to C. Cavaroc Jr., by whose agency the arrangement had been made. The books of the bank showed that it had received a million of francs as the result of this arrangement. It is impossible that the directors should have been ignorant of these facts—they never repudiated the contract nor returned to the societé the fruits of it. This is a ratification. The acts of a corporation, evidenced by a vote written or unwritten, are as completely binding upon it, and as full authority to its agents, as the most solemn acts done under the corporate seal, and promises and engagements may as well be implied from its acts and the acts of its agents as if it were an individual. Abb. Dig. Corp. 579, and cases there cited. A corporation which has received the benefit of a loan cannot avoid liability on a mortgage to secure its payment by denying the authority of those who contracted the loan on its behalf. [Ottawa Plank Road v. Murray, 15 Ill. 337];[3] Bissell v. Michigan, S. & N. I. R. Co., 22 N. Y. 258; [Pine Grove Tp. v. Talcott, 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 678];[3] Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 70, 71.

It is claimed, lastly, by the complainant, that the contract between the banking association and the societé was not legitimate banking business and could not be lawfully carried out. We are not cited to any clause in the national currency act forbidding such a contract, and can see no reason why the association might not lawfully make it. But conceding that the currency act, which is the charter of the association, did not authorize such a contract, it does not follow that the association can repudiate the contract and keep its fruits. Corporations have no right to violate their charters, but they have capacity to do so and to be bound by their acts when a repudiation of such acts would result in manifest wrong to innocent parties. Bissell v. Michigan, S. & N. I. R. Co., 22 N. Y. 258. When it is a simple question of capacity to contract arising either on a question of regularity of organization or of powers conferred by the charter, a party who has had the benefit of the contract cannot be permitted in an action founded upon it to question its validity. Steam Nav. Co. v. Weed, 17 Barb. 378. See, also, Despatch Line v. Bellamy Manuf'g Co., 12 N. H. 205; Moss v. Mining Co., 5 Hill, 137. I am of opinion, therefore, that even admitting that the business carried on under the contract between the association and the societé was irregular and not within the limits of legitimate banking, that having made the contract and enjoyed its fruits, neither the association nor its receiver can demand to keep the money of the societé, which was received by virtue of the contract, and require the societé to deliver up the assets that were transferred to it in consideration of the contract.

Complainant further insists that the notes pledged by the association were changed, from time to time, as they fell due, and others substituted in their stead, and that this renders void the pledge, at least so far as such substituted notes are concerned. The evidence leaves no doubt on my mind that such substitution was made. In fact, it is admitted by defendant. But has the substitution the effect claimed by complainant? The case of Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 360, is a pointed authority to sustain the negative of this proposition, and settles this objection to the title of defendant conclusively against complainant.

I have gone over the grounds relied upon by complainant, to avoid the pledge and transfer of the assets of the New Orleans Banking Association to the Societé de Credit Mobilier. I am unable to find that any of the grounds are tenable. In my judgment the pledge of these assets was a good one to secure the societé against loss by the failure of the association to comply with its contract, and the receiver is not entitled to the pledged notes, or their proceeds, until the societé has been made whole. The bill must therefore be dismissed, and the injunction heretofore allowed dissolved.

[NOTE. The plaintiff appealed to the supreme court, which reversed the decree of the circuit court, and remanded the cause, with directions to enter a decree for complainant. The ground of the reversal, as stated by Mr. Justice Bradley, who delivered the opinion, was that the pledgee, the Credit Mobilier, had never had possession of the securities, nor were they ever in the possession of a third person agreed upon by the parties, but that the actual possession and control was in the pledgor, the bank, and that, therefore, the defendant, the Credit Mobilier, had no privilege as to third persons, within the Louisiana law. a subsequent oath to the same effect made in November, 1867, and the answer set up that he had been compelled to appear in the cause by an attachment of the vessel as his property, but the defendant, on the trial, testified that he never had any interest in the vessel whatever: Held, that if the recorded owner of a vessel, who has sworn that he is her owner, may be allowed to take the position that he has no interest in her, it is not unreasonable to require that such position should be sustained by some other proof than the declaration of the party himself.

Benedict & Benedict, for libellant.

Beebe, Donohue & Cook, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought against the defendant, as owner of the steamer Saragossa, to recover the amount of a bill of supplies furnished that vessel in this port, during the months of September, October, November, and December, 1867. No question is made as to the fact that the articles sued for were furnished the vessel and were necessary; but it is insisted that the defendant was not the owner of the vessel nor interested therein. To prove the defendant's ownership, the libellants have put in evidence a bill of sale of the steamer from George Leary to the defendant, executed and recorded on the 1st of November, 1865, together with an owner's oath made by the defendant on the same day, in which he declares "I am a citizen of the United States and the true and only owner of the said vessel." A similar oath made by the defendant in November, 1867, is also put in evidence. And it also appears from the testimony of the defendant that he was engaged in the shipping business and transacted some of the business of this vessel at his place of business in New York. The evidence for the defence consists of the testimony of the defendant, who now swears, that he never was an owner of or interested in the vessel—that she was never sailed for his account or benefit—that his brother, Arthur Leary, was the agent of the vessel, and whatever business of the vessel was transacted by the defendant was done by him in the capacity of agent of his brother Arthur, and by his direction. The defendant further testifies that he does not know for whom the vessel was being run, and that he can give only an impression as to who did own her. That he took the title and made the first oath at the request of his brother, but cannot recollect how he came to make the second one in 1867. No other testimony is produced to explain the defendant's relation to the vessel, and, upon this evidence, I am asked to adjudge that the defendant had no interest in the vessel, and therefore is not liable for these repairs. I cannot so adjudge upon the unsupported statement of the defendant, as made in court, in contradiction of his oaths at the custom-house. The vessel was conveyed to the defendant by an absolute bill of sale; he then took a solemn oath, declaring himself to be the true and only owner of the vessel. This oath he repeated in 1867, and it seems to me to be asking much when the court is urged to disregard these oaths, and believe only the oath now made in court, to the effect that the former oaths were untrue. The question here, it should be noticed, is not whether the relation of the defendant to this vessel was that of a mortgagee or an owner, but whether he had any interest whatever. He does not claim to have held the title by way of security, but declares that he never was in any way interested in the vessel. This declaration, made in court, is in conflict with his two former declarations made at the custom-house, and he has no right to complain if the court—compelled to elect which oath to believe—rejects the one which is made to avoid a pressing demand. Furthermore, the defendant, although he held the title to this valuable vessel, claims to be unable to say for whose benefit he held it, or who did own her. His brother, Arthur Leary, was the agent of the vessel, but he is not called to say by whom he was employed; nor is George Leary, who executed an absolute bill of sale of the vessel to the defendant, called to explain it, or to confirm the defendant in his present statement. If it be conceded that, notwithstanding the recording act of 1850, a party procuring himself to be recorded as owner of a vessel, and making oath that he is such owner, is at the liberty to take the position that he has no interest whatever therein—a question unnecessary to be considered here—it is certainly not unreasonable to require that the position when taken, should be supported by other evidence than the declaration of the party, contradictory of his oath at the custom-house, when such evidence is within his power. Again, the defendant, although declaring upon the stand that he never had any interest in the vessel, in his answer sets up that his appearance in the action was compelled by a seizure of her, and it is in evidence that the action was commenced by an attachment of this very vessel as the property of defendant, and that he thereupon appeared and procured her release by giving security. If he had no interest in the vessel, it is not easy to understand why he paid any attention to the seizure, nor to see how the attachment of another man's property compelled this man to appear. The fact that when the vessel was seized as the property of the defendant, no person but the defendant appears to have been affected by the seizure; that no person asked for her release; that he did so ask and sets up in defence that her seizure compelled him to appear, are significant circumstances, and it has not been made to appear how they can be reconciled with the position which the defendant has undertaken to maintain in this action. Upon the question of fact which the case presents, I feel bound therefore, upon the evidence as it stands, to hold against the defendant. A point of law as to the jurisdiction of the court, arising out of the fact that the defendant did not reside, and was not served with process, within this district, has been taken in this cause but not argued, this court having pronounced upon the point in a previous case. The decision in the case referred to—Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co. [Case No. 600]—I have no desire to modify or retract, and it must stand as the law of this court until reversed by an appellate court. Let a decree be entered in favor of the libellant for the sum of $827.78, with interest and costs.

CONSORTSHIP — PROOF OF CHARACTER OF AGREEMENT—NATURE OF THE RELATION—TERMINATION —ACTION TO ENFORCE.

[1. Agreements of consortship by masters of vessels engaged in the business of fishing, freighting, wrecking, or the like, unless limited by special understandings when made, are taken to be general, and to extend to all earnings by either vessel.]

[2. The burden of proving the restricted character of the agreement rests upon the party alleging it.]

[3. The special intention or understanding of either party as to the character of the agreement will not control its operation, unless expressed when the agreement is made.]

[4. Such an agreement is for and on account of the vessels, although made by the masters thereof.]

[5. In the absence of a stipulation as to the determination of such an agreement, it can only be terminated by voluntary dissolution and notice.]

[6. While, by the character of the vessel or the agreement, its interest in the consortship may be small, this will never be presumed, but the general principle that the interests of the vessel control will govern.]

[7. The change of owners, master, or crew of one vessel without notice to the other parties cannot affect the consortship.]

[8. Persons joining or becoming interested in a vessel during an agreement of consortship enter upon the relation, and assume the risk of profit or loss.]

[9. On libel to enforce an agreement of consortship, the question being one of considerable interest to the community, and the court being unable to say that respondent's refusal to pay, thus compelling a resort to the court, was wrong under the circumstances, he should not be charged with the costs, but the same should be ordered paid from the fund in controversy.]

[In admiralty. Libel by W. D. Cash and others against $1,277.05, and F. J. Moreno.]

W. C. Maloney, Jr., for libellant.

G. Browne Patterson and L. W. Bethel, for respondent.

LOCKE, District Judge. This is a cause to enforce the division of an amount earned and received by the schooner Florida for services rendered the Spanish steamer Garcia, under an alleged agreement of consortship made and entered into by the master of that vessel with the master of the schooner California in December last, for an equal division of the earnings of those two vessels. Such agreements are frequent in this district, and are generally intended to relate more particularly to the business of wrecking, but at other times, where no limits are expressed in making the agreement, extend to all earnings from whatever source. In this case the consortship was general, as money earned by the California from fishing, freight, and passage money had been divided with the Florida; and it is admitted that it was such as would include earnings from salvage service. It was also indefinite and undetermined in time. Such agreements of consortship, unless limited by special understandings when made, are taken to be general, and extend to all such amounts as may be earned by either vessel. They may be restricted as closely as the parties making may desire and express at the time, but the burden of proving such restricted character of the agreement rests upon him alleging it; and, unless it is shown that such restriction is expressed at the time of making, any special attention or understanding of either party cannot be accepted as controlling or influencing its operation. Such a consortship is for and on account of the vessels, although made by the masters. In all maritime matters, agreements of affreightment, charter parties, contracts for insurance, supplies or repairs or other maritime nature, they are presumed to be made for and on account of the vessel and those connected with her, and not on account of master or crew. The vessel is the object, and all relations existing between the parties are through her.

The supreme court, in Andrews v. Wall, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 568, in speaking of a consortship of this nature, says: "Although made by the master of the vessel, it must be deemed to be made on behalf of the owners and crews, and to be obligatory on both sides until formally dissolved by the owners. The mere change of masters would not dissolve it, since it is not a contract for the personal benefit of themselves, or for any particular service. It falls precisely within the same rule, as to its obligative force, as the contract of the master of a ship for seaman's wages, which, if within the scope of his authority, binds the owner, and is not dissolved by the death or removal of the master. Besides, the agreement or stipulation for consortship was for an indefinite period, and consequently could not be broken up or dissolved, only upon due notice to the adverse party; and the mere removal of the master of one of the vessels, by the owner thereof, for his own benefit, or at his own option, could in no manner operate without such notice, to the injury of the others." This, then, is the general controlling principle in such consortships, namely, that it is through the vessels that the interests are united, and through them alone, and unless it has been stipulated and agreed between the parties that some other circumstances shall terminate the contract, voluntary dissolution and notice, alone, can. It may be true that frequently the character of the vessel, or the agreement with master and crew, is such that her interest in the consortship is but small when compared with theirs; but this can never be presumed, and the general principle that the interests of the vessel control still governs. The change of owners cannot injuriously affect the interest of seamen, nor can a change of master or crew affect a contract of affreightment or charter party made on account of the vessel, unless it has been particularly specified that it should. The change of owners of one vessel without notice to the other parties could not affect the consortship, nor could the change of master or crew. The supreme court says plainly that the removal of a master could not, and, if not the master, certainly not the crew. Whoever joins a vessel, or becomes in any way interested in her, during the existence of a contract consortship, enters upon such relation with the burden of such agreement, and takes the risk, whether he makes or loses. If not so, neither party could be certain of his relations with his consort, and his movements are liable to be interfered with, and loss incurred. These being the principles upon which such contracts can alone exist in equity to those engaged or interested in them, let us apply them to the cause under consideration; for, in applying principles, neither questions of amount nor persons can be considered.

The first point of defense is that the consortship was made with Roberts, the former master of the California, and not with Albury, who was master at the time of earning the money in question; nor on account of her owner; and that the entire crew had been changed, and none of them had been the parties consorted with, or that the present crew shipped with the understanding that they were consorted. This point is answered by the decision of the supreme court, and embodies only question of law, namely, the construction to be placed upon such contract, and does not depend at all upon the opinion of the party making, as it does not appear that there was any material expression of opinion varying the general construction. The new crew, it appears, were informed of the consortship, but their opinion whether they were bound by it or not could have been taken in their favor, had the suit been against them for a share in the earnings of their vessel, and it would not be fair to consider them in the present case. They joined the vessel under the circumstances of the consortship, of which they were aware, and are bound by the legal construction of it. Demerritt, the respondent, states that he would not have consorted with Albury, but did consort with Roberts, on account of his skill and knowledge of fishing. There was no expression of this idea at the time of making the agreement, and no stipulation that it should be terminated by a change of masters. Demerritt could have protected himself and his owners by such an understanding at the time of the contract, the same as an insurer can stipulate against a change of masters without notice and consent; but where such a matter is not mentioned it can have no force.

In further defence, it is urged that the understanding was that both vessels should fish up the reef until they met at Cape Florida, when one vessel should take all of the fish, and proceed to Havana, but that the California, instead of following this course, went on a salvage cruise in search of floating cotton which was reported adrift in the Gulf Stream. Now, were it shown that this was a condition precedent, or a part of the agreement of consortship, and that at the time both parties understood it so, it would have much force; but I do not find that to have been the case. It nowhere appears that it was understood to be a part of the contract of consortship that they should fish, if more profitable business offered, but that this was an understanding outside of, and separate from, the original agreement, and subservient to circumstances which might offer opportunities for profit or gain. Now, was there any misconduct or bad faith in the owner, master, or crew of the California in discharging their first crew, or going on a wrecking voyage, which should prevent them in justice from claiming in this matter, although the contract might have been virtually terminated? If it had been shown that the crew of the California had been discharged, and she left any length of time doing nothing, but looking to her consort for earnings, the matter might well be urged; but that does not appear to have been the case. Before Roberts left, he had engaged Albury as master, a crew was shipped, and she went to sea very soon. A temporary delay in the change of crews could cause no more injury to respondent than would the vessel's lying idle a few hours, the same length of time, with crew on shore. In regard to the California's going for cotton, had all parties interested been consulted at the time, I am satisfied the consort would have been unanimous, as under the circumstances such a voyage promised a greater profit than would one for purpose of fishing alone, and therefore I do not consider her voyage improper. Had she fallen in with a large amount of cotton, the Florida would certainly have been entitled to a portion of the salvage. Demerritt had an opportunity, when the vessels met at Roderiquez, to terminate the consortship, and in not doing so assumed the risk of meeting a vessel in distress himself, or sharing with Albury if he fell in with one. The question has been asked, to whom should the money go, if awarded? We may also ask from whom would money have been claimed had the California, instead of the Florida, fallen in with the Garcia. Not from those individually with whom the consort was made, but those who had accepted the relation previously occupied by them, and taken the chances either to share their earnings with the Florida and her crew, or take a share from them. This is a question which is of considerable interest to this community, and I cannot say that I consider the respondents so far in the wrong in refusing the payment, and compelling a resort to the courts for a judicial decision, as to justify charging the entire costs to them.

It is therefore ordered that the costs be paid from the total amount, and the libellants receive one-half the net residue.

Case No. 2,499.

CASHAU v. NORTHWESTERN NAT. INS. CO.

[5 Biss. 476.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct. Term, 1873.

INSURANCE—NOTICE AND PROOFS OF LOSS—SERVICE OF COPY — PROOF OF LOSS — LIABILITY OF RE-INSURER.

1. The condition in a policy of re-insurance, that all persons having a claim in case of loss shall proceed at once to give immediate notice and render a particular account of the loss, etc., means that the notice and schedule must be served in a reasonable time under the circumstances.

2. The service of copies of proofs of loss and of notice, etc., upon the re-insurer is sufficient if not objected to at the time.

3. The condition in a policy of re-insurance, that in case of loss the re-insurer shall pay pro rata at and in the time and manner as the re-insured, means that the re-insurer shall have all the advantages of the time and manner of payment specified in the policy of the re-insured. It has no reference to the insolvency of the re-insured.

The Fulton Fire Insurance Company of New York, insured Simpson, Norwell & Co. against loss or damage by fire, to the amount of $5,000, on a stock of goods in their store in Chicago, for the term of one year from the 21st of October, 1870; and the defendant company on the same day re-insured the Fulton Fire Insurance Company in the same amount. The conditions of the policy issued by the defendant company were, "That the loss be paid immediately after due notice and satisfactory proof of the same, and in no event shall this company be liable for a sum greater than such portion hereby insured bears to the whole sum insured by the company re-insured. And in case of loss this company shall pay pro rata at and in the same time and manner as the company re-insured. And all persons having a claim under this policy shall proceed at once to put the property in the best order, and give immediate notice and render a particular account thereof in writing under oath, stating the time, origin and circumstances of the fire." On the 9th of October, 1871, and while the policy was in force, the insured goods were destroyed by fire. The Fulton Company was made insolvent by that fire, and a receiver was appointed and qualified on the 16th of October. Proof of loss was made November 9th, with schedule of adjustment, showing loss at $4,689.66, and was served on the receiver of the Fulton Company December 8th. January 22d, 1872, the receiver of the Fulton Company addressed a note to the defendant company, enclosing proofs of loss, the receipt of which was acknowledged by the secretary of defendant, January 27, 1872, without objection. December 29, 1871, notice of service of proofs on the Fulton Company, and that the defendant is held liable, were served on Alexander Mitchell, the president of the defendant company, and their receipt was acknowledged by the secretary, January 4, 1872. The Fulton Company had paid the insured twenty per cent. on the loss. No objection had been made to the service of copies of the proofs and adjustment. The jury under instructions from the court found a verdict for the plaintiff [John Cashau], who sued as assignee of the receiver of the Fulton Company, for the amount at which the loss had been adjusted, with interest. The defendant's counsel moved for a new trial.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for plaintiff.
Palmer & Hooker, for defendant.

MILLER, District Judge. The motion for a new trial is founded upon three points:

1. The notice and proof were not given in time, and are not such as the defendant's policy calls for.

2. They do not purport to be originals, but are copies.

3. The defendant is not liable to pay the whole amount adjusted, but only a pro rata.

The receiver of the Fulton Company, gave the defendant the copies of the notice and proofs which he had received from the agent in Chicago. The secretary of the defendant company acknowledges the receipt of the copies without making objections as to the time or manner of the service, and not making demand for the originals. I think, that under the delay necessarily arising out of and connected with the insolvency of the Fulton Company, the service of copies of notice and proofs of the loss—particularly in the absence of objections on the part of the defendant—should be adjudged to have been given in time, and to be a substantial compliance with the condition of the defendant's policy. New York Bowery Fire Ins. Co. v. New York Fire Ins. Co., 17 Wend. 357; O'Neil v. Buffalo Fire Ins. Co., 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 122. Due good faith requires that objections to proof, etc., be pointed out. Aetna Fire Ins. Co. v. Tyler, 16 Wend. 385; Fland. Ins. 563–566, and cases there cited. The word "immediate" must mean a reasonable time under the circumstances.

The contract of re-insurance is one of indemnity between the insurer and the re-insurer. It has no connection with the insured, except in the nature of a surety in equity. The re-insurer may discharge its liability by paying the amount of the policy to the insured, as owner of the property insured, or to the re-insured. The financial condition of the re-insured is not to be taken into account in the computation of the amount to be paid on the policy of re-insurance. The insolvency of the original insurer is no defense, in whole or in part, to a suit against the re-insurer. It is claimed on the part of the defendant that the condition in its policy is an exception to this position of the law. The amount of per centage paid by the receiver of the Fulton Company to the original insured has no relation to or connection with the defendant's liability under the policy of re-insurance. The condition in that policy, that "in case of loss the company shall pay pro rata at and in the same time and manner as the re-insured," cannot mean that in case of the insolvency of the Fulton Company the defendant shall only be obliged to pay the pro rata of the dividends of the assets of said company, upon the claim of the first insured. It cannot have such application. The condition means that the defendant shall pay at and in the same time and manner as the re-insured company shall pay or be bound to pay according to its policy, and that the defendant shall have all the advantages of the time and manner of payment specified in the policy of the Fulton Company—otherwise the defendant's policy would not be the contract of indemnity intended, and endless litigation might ensue. CASKIE v. WEBSTER.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April, 1851.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—COMITY BETWEEN THE STATES.

1. A general voluntary assignment, valid by the laws of one of the United States—though assumed to be void if it had been made in another—will carry property in that other against an attaching creditor there.

2. The case of Ingraham v. Geyer [13 Mass. 146], decided A. D. 1816, in which an opposite doctrine was held, is not law.

Martin, of Virginia, made an assignment, valid by the laws of that state, of all his property to Caskie, of that same state, for the benefit of such of his creditors as should assent to certain terms set forth in it, and which are not allowed by the laws of Pennsylvania. Several creditors, chiefly of Virginia, assented. One item of his property was a debt due by a resident of Pennsylvania; and before Caskie could get the money from this debtor, Webster, a Pennsylvania creditor, who had refused his assent, attached it for a debt, which was due to him. Assuming such an assignment as Martin made, to be void if it had been made in Pennsylvania—which, however, the court thought it was not—one question in the case was, whether this debt passed to the general assignee in Virginia, or was held by the attaching creditor in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Porter and Mr. Webster, for the Pennsylvania creditor. There is no doubt, that in England the law is as we contend. In Le Chevalier v. Lynch, 1 Doug. 170, an attaching creditor was protected against the assignees of the bankrupt in England; although the plantation in which the foreign attachment was instituted, was within the same dominion, where the bankrupt law was enacted. But the exact point now before the court has been decided in this country. Ingraham v. Geyer [13 Mass. 146], in the supreme court of Massachusetts, is this case with a change of names only;—Massachusetts for Pennsylvania, and Pennsylvania for Virginia. On facts like those before us,—a voluntary assignment,—Parker, C. J., gives the opinion of the court: "To give effect to this assignment so as to intercept the lien obtained by a creditor here, under the laws of our own state, when by the effect of that assignment, he would be deprived of all opportunity of participating with the creditors in Pennsylvania in the proceeds of the debtor's effects, would be an undue partiality to foreign creditors, not warranted by the principles of justice, nor required by the comity of nations."

T. I. Wharton and Henry Wharton, on the other side.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. A debt is a mere incorporeal right. It has no situs, and follows the person of the creditor. A voluntary assignment of it by the creditor, which is valid by the law of his domicil, whether such assignment be called legal or equitable, will operate as a transfer of the debt, which should be regarded in all places.

In America, bankrupt or involuntary assignments by operation of law, have not been considered as subject to this rule. But I know of no other established exception to the general rule, that a transfer of personal property, valid by the law of the owner's domicil, is valid everywhere. I know there are some cases to be found, in which the courts of some states of this Union have decided that a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, valid by the law of the creditor's domicil, will be disregarded, where it is prejudicial to the interests of attaching creditors in other states, or invalid by the laws of the state, where the debt or property is attached. Such is Ingraham v. Geyer, cited at the bar. But these decisions are not binding as authority beyond the states, in which they were made, and the counsel have not brought to our notice any case, controlling us, where the doctrine of them has been affirmed. Sitting here as a court of the United States, we do not think that the different states of this Union are to be regarded as a general thing in the relation of states foreign to each other. Especially ought they not to be so regarded, in regard to questions relating to the commerce of the country; which is coextensive with our whole land, and belongs, not to the states, but to the Union.

CASSEDY v. WILLIAMS.

[Hayw. & H. 151.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Aug. 28, 1843.

PAYMENT—SPURIOUS BANK NOTES.

Where notes of a bank were given in payment of a negro boy, and the party paying the same knew that the said notes were issued without the authority of the corporation, by individuals using the name of such bank or corporation, for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding the public, the passing of said notes was no payment for the purchase of said boy.

At law. The defendant [William H. Williams] purchased, on the 9th of October, 1840, a negro boy, of the plaintiff [William H. Cassedy], at Leesburg, Va., for $600, and paid for the boy the amount in "Millington" money. A few days after the sale the Millington Bank failed, and its paper became utterly worthless. The plaintiff sued for the amount.

Jos. H. Bradley, for plaintiff.

Brent & Brent, for defendant.

Counsel for plaintiff contended that the bank originated in the grossest fraud; that the defendant had good reason to know of the insolvency of the bank at the time of the payment of the money. On the part of defendant it was contended that the money circulated as current money for several days subsequent to the day of sale, and that he was ignorant of the condition of the bank and paid the money in good faith.

The points of law raised will appear in the following prayers:

"If the jury shall find from the evidence that the plaintiff at the time of selling said negro boy received in payment therefor the sum of $600 in the notes of the Commercial Bank of Millington, then, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, the jury must be satisfied that the plaintiff tendered said notes before suit brought, to defendant or his agent, or at the residence or place of business of defendant or his agent." Refused.

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff sold the negro boy and received in payment therefor $600 in the notes of said bank, and that said notes were genuine notes of said corporation, then the defendant was not responsible for the payment of said notes, unless he acted in bad faith, and there is no evidence in this cause that defendant did act in bad faith." Refused.

"If the jury find from the evidence that the defendant had no superior means of knowing the worthlessness of the paper of said bank than the plaintiff might have had by the exercise of due diligence and reasonable inquiries, then there was no bad faith on the part of defendant in passing said paper, even if the jury find that defendant, through his agent, did pass such paper, knowing it to be worthless, and did not disclose his knowledge to the plaintiff." Refused.

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff sold the negro boy and received in payment therefor the said notes, and that the plaintiff did pass away any part of said amount, then the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, although he may have tendered the residue of said money to defendant before suit, or may have produced it in court as stated in the evidence." Refused.

"If the jury find from the evidence that there were acts of user under the act of the legislature of Maryland incorporating the said Commercial Bank of Millington, and that the notes paid to plaintiff were genuine notes, signed by the acting cashier and president of the Commercial Bank of Millington, and that said notes were of value in the market at the time of passing them to the plaintiff, and that the Bank of Millington did redeem its notes until October 13, 1840, then the defendant, by passing said notes, cannot be liable, although he might have apprehended insolvency in said bank, and might have believed that it would sooner or later fail." Refused.

"Notwithstanding the jury may be satisfied from the evidence that the said notes, passed by the defendant to the plaintiff, would not have been paid at the bank if presented at the time they were passed, the defendant is not responsible for the non-payment by the bank, and only undertook that the said notes were as they purported to be, genuine notes of the said bank, unless it be proved by satisfactory evidence that at the time the said notes were passed the defendant knew that the same would not be paid." Refused.

"If the jury shall find from the evidence that the plaintiff received in payment for his negro boy the sum of $600 in notes of the Commercial Bank of Millington, and that said notes were passed in good faith to plaintiff, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, notwithstanding the jury shall find that the defendant purchased said slave by his agent, and notwithstanding the said notes were in fact utterly worthless and were of no value to plaintiff, if such worthlessness was not known to the defendant at the time of such purchase." Granted, and excepted to by counsel for plaintiff.

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the witness, agent for said defendant, paid for the negro boy purchased from plaintiff out of his own money and for his own benefit, and that the defendant never received any benefit from said purchase, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, notwithstanding the jury shall believe that said witness was general agent for defendant to purchase negroes in the fall of 1840, and notwithstanding the money paid to plaintiff was utterly worthless and notwithstanding the defendant and said witness knew said paper to be worthless." Granted, and excepted to by counsel for the plaintiff.

"Should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant paid the plaintiff $600, the amount claimed, in notes of said bank as the consideration for the purchase of the said negro boy, and that the same were accepted without objection by the plaintiff, and that the said notes were current at the place of payment, previous to and upon the day of sale when said payment was made, and that said bank did not stop payment until four days thereafter, and that said notes were current at the Chesapeake Bank in Baltimore, Maryland, and not dishonored or discredited there until the day after said sale, or thereafter, and that said payment was made bona fide, and that the plaintiff has failed to prove by satisfactory evidence that the defendant knew or had good reason to believe at the time of said payment that the said bank was in failing circumstances, and would not redeem the said notes, and that the plaintiff has also failed to prove by satisfactory evidence that the said defendant was connected with the bank in fraudulently circulating the said notes, then the said payment in said notes was a valid one, and the said negro was paid for by the defendant and the plaintiff cannot recover in this action, and the defendant is entitled to a verdict in his favor." Granted, and excepted to by counsel for the plaintiff. Judge Thruston absent.

"Should the jury be satisfied from the evidence that the defendant was the holder of the bank notes passed to the plaintiff in payment of the negro boy, the law presumes the defendant to be a bona fide holder of the same for a valuable consideration, unless the contrary be proven." Granted, and excepted to by counsel for the plaintiff. Judge Thruston absent.

"That the defendant is not liable by reason of the non-payment of the said supposed Millington Bank, although they would not have been paid by said supposed bank if they had been presented for payment on the day on which they were paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, unless the defendant then knew, or had good reason to believe that they would not be paid when presented, and did not disclose such knowledge and reason to the plaintiff." Granted, and excepted to by counsel for the plaintiff.

"If the jury find from the evidence that the bank notes were issued and circulated by persons exercising powers under the acts of Maryland incorporating the said Commercial Bank of Millington, then it is not competent for the plaintiff to deny the existence of said corporation." Granted, and excepted to by counsel for the plaintiff.

"But if from the evidence the jury shall be of opinion that the said notes were issued by certain individuals using the name of the Commercial Bank of Millington, without the authority of said corporation, and for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding the public, then it is competent for the jury to find such fraud, and if from the said evidence, they shall be further of opinion that the said defendant knew or had reasonable cause to believe the existence of said fraud before the said notes were so passed to said plaintiff, then the passing of the said notes if passed by the agent of said defendant was no payment for the purchase of said negro boy." Granted, nem. con.

Verdict was for the plaintiff for $575, with interest from October 9, 1840.

The defendant moved in arrest of judgment. After argument by the counsel, and after due consideration, the court overruled the motion, and judgment was entered on the verdict.

CASSEL v. DOWS et al.

[1 Blatchf. 335; 1 Liv. Law Mag. 193.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1848.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—ACTION BY HOLDER—STRIKING OUT ENDORSEMENTS—ACCEPTANCE — PROMISE TO ACCEPT.

1. Where the endorsements on a bill of exchange, subsequent to that of the payee, were made for the purpose of transmitting and collecting the paper, they may be stricken out at the trial, in a suit by an endorsee.

2. Even if the endorsements were made for value, yet the suit may properly be brought in the name of the party who is the owner of the paper at the time of bringing the suit, whether the endorsements be stricken out at the trial or not.

3. A bill was protested for non-acceptance, and also for non-payment; a qualified acceptance was written on the bill at the date of the latter protest, to the amount of the proceeds of certain property against which the bill was drawn; the proceeds were afterwards paid and receipted on the bill: Held, that they were not accepted in satisfaction but only as far as they would go.

4. A letter written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is a virtual acceptance, binding on the person who makes the promise, if the bill be taken on the credit of the letter by a person to whom it is shown.

5. Where, however, the letter has no reference to the particular bills to be drawn, but is a general authority to draw at any time and to any amount, against property to be shipped, the party writing it cannot be held as acceptor of a bill drawn under it.

6. The letter may however be regarded as a promise to accept the bill, and the writer of it may be sued on such promise by any person who may have taken the bill on the credit of the promise.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 1 Liv. Law Mag. 193, contains only a partial report.]

At law. This was an action [by James W. Cassel against David Dows and Ira B. Cary] on the following bill of exchange:

"St. Louis, Mo. March 10th, 1846. J. W. C. Ninety days after date of this my original bill of exchange, (duplicate of same tenor and date unpaid,) pay to the order of Andrew Huston, five thousand dollars, value received, and charge the same to account of your obt. se't. Andrew Huston. To Messrs. Dows & Cary, New-York.

(Endorsed.)

"Pay W. G. W. Gano, Cashier, or order,
"Andrew Huston.
"W. B. Taylor, Jr." (Erased.)
"Pay C. J. Stedman, Esq., or order,
"W. G. W. Gano, Cas." (Erased.)

On the face of the bill was written the following acceptance: "We accept the within draft, for so much of the amount therein mentioned, ($5000,) as the nett proceeds of one hundred and eighty-five casks of hams, against which it was drawn, shall amount to, after deducting commissions and all charges, and for no more, payable when the nett proceeds shall be received by us in cash, and the amount of such nett proceeds ascertained. New-York, June 11, 1846. Dows & Cary." On the back of the bill was the following receipt: "Received, New-York, October 13th, 1846, from Dows & Cary, their check for thirty-eight hundred and sixty-two 51-100 dollars, being in full for the nett proceeds of the within named 185 casks of hams, for which this draft was accepted by said Dows & Cary, as per their account of sales rendered. For C. J. Stedman, J. B. Varnum."

The plaintiff was a citizen of Ohio, and the defendants were citizens of New York, composing the firm of Dows & Cary. The declaration contained a count against the defendants as acceptors, two counts on their promise to accept drafts drawn against consignments of western produce to them by the owner, and the usual money counts. The defendants pleaded the general issue and payment, and gave notice of set-off. The cause was tried at New-York before Mr. Justice Nelson, in May, 1848.

It appeared on the trial that, before and at the time of the drawing of the bill, one Benjamin F. Smith was the agent of the defendants at St. Louis, Missouri, to obtain consignments of produce to them and make advances for them upon the same. He was specially advised by them by letters under date of December 12th, 1845, and February 2d, 1846, that in case he could find any good safe lots of pork, lard or flour, for consignment, the drafts of the owner would be duly honored, on the property being put in safe condition for shipment, at $4 1-2 to $4 3-4 per barrel on flour, $5 1-2 per barrel on prime pork, $7 1-2 per barrel on mess pork, 5 cents per pound on lard, and 4 1-2 cents per pound on hams. Previously to the receipt of those letters Smith had acted as the agent of the defendants, under a verbal authority from them to procure consignments and make advances, and, in order to obtain funds for such advances, he was authorized by them to draw or cause drafts to be drawn on them at New-York.

The bill in question was drawn by Huston under the authority and in pursuance of the direction of Smith, on a consignment of hams to the defendants. It was negotiated to the plaintiff on the same day on which it was drawn, (March 10th, 1846,) and he advanced in money the face of it less the interest. Before he consented to take the draft he made particular inquiries of Smith as to the authority of Huston to draw it, and was assured by Smith that Huston drew it by his, (Smith's) direction, against a consignment of property to the defendants, and that he, (Smith,) was fully authorized to make the arrangement. The letters of December 12th, 1845, and February 2d, 1846, were also shown to the plaintiff by Smith, before he purchased the draft, and, upon the faith of the letters and of Smith's assurances, he consented to advance the money. The defendants were immediately advised, both by Smith and by Huston, of the consignment, and of the draft drawn against it, the receipt of which advices they acknowledged in a letter to Smith dated March 20th. In that letter they complained that a draft at 90 days was too short, and requested that any further advances should be made on longer time, but did not intimate that there was any want of authority to draw, or that the paper would not be accepted. The draft was presented to the defendants on the 21st of March, acceptance of it was refused, and it was protested for non-acceptance. In a letter written by the defendants to Smith on that day they assigned as a reason for the non-acceptance that the advance of 4 cents per pound on hams was too much as the market then stood, but they afterwards wrote to Smith that the paper would have been accepted had it not come through a house in New-York which would sell their acceptances for the first offer, to the injury of their credit.

Warehouse receipts for the hams were given by Huston to Smith when the draft was drawn and the money advanced, and the property, which was at Quincy and at Bardstown, Illinois, was shipped to the defendants on the 27th of March and the 22d of April. It was received by them, and on the 12th of October they rendered an account of the sale of it, by which the nett balance amounted to $3,862 51.

On the trial, a member of the firm in New-York through which the draft was sent, testified that W. B. Taylor, Jr., whose name had been on the back of the bill, but was stricken out, was a clerk of his, and had put his name on the draft for security in its transmission, and had no interest in it; that the initials J. W. C. was a mark of his house, and indicated that the paper was received from the plaintiff. The bill was presented for payment on the 11th of June, 1846, but payment was refused, and it was duly protested for non-payment, at the request of C. J. Stedman, of New-York. Gano, whose name was on the bill, was cashier of a bank in Cincinnati. He endorsed the bill to Stedman, and his endorsement was stricken out after the receipt of October 13th, 1846, on the bill, was given. The original bill was received for collection from the plaintiff by his attorney, before the commencement of the suit, and was then in its present state as to endorsements and erasures. It was admitted that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendants in the sum of $410 35, with interest from the 1st of February, 1844. The court charged the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of the bill, after deducting the payment receipted on it and the set-off. The defendants excepted to the charge, and, a verdict having been found against them for $859 46, they now moved for a new trial, on a case.

George C. Goddard, for plaintiff.
Cornelius Van Santvoord, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I. The case of Dugan v. U. S., 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 172, is an authority in favor of the right of the plaintiff to sustain this suit in his own name, notwithstanding the endorsements upon the bill subsequent to that of Huston. The proof shows with reasonable certainty, that those endorsements were made for the purpose of transmitting and collecting the paper. They, therefore, might have been stricken out at the trial. But, if otherwise, and if they had been made for value, in the usual course of business, inasmuch as it appears that the plaintiff was the holder and owner of the paper at the time the suit was brought, it was properly brought in his name; and this, whether the endorsements were stricken out at the trial or not. On the plaintiff's becoming revested with the title to and interest in the bill, the endorsements, whether for value or transmission, became matters of form, and were properly disregarded.

II. The bill was presented for acceptance on the 21st of March, acceptance was refused, and it was duly protested. Afterwards, on the 11th of June, it was protested for non-payment. A qualified acceptance by the defendants appears on the bill under the latter date, to the amount of the proceeds of the hams against which it was drawn, and it is insisted that this is conclusive upon the plaintiff, as he must be presumed to have taken the conditional acceptance, and to have waived the benefit of the previous refusal.

There is no positive proof in explanation of the circumstances under which this conditional acceptance was written on the bill. The fact, however, that Stedman, who presented the bill for payment at that time, caused it to be protested on the same day for non-payment, affords ground for the conclusion, that he did not assent to the qualified acceptance, but, on the contrary, regarded it as a refusal of payment, and as dishonoring the paper. The subsequent receipt from the defendants of the avails of the hams, when taken in connection with the previous facts and circumstances, must be deemed to have been an application of the proceeds, only as far as they would go towards payment, and not an acceptance of them in satisfaction. The receipt does not purport to be in full, and the protest which Stedman caused to be made, at the time of the conditional acceptance, is altogether irreconcilable with the idea, that he intended to assent to that acceptance and take the proceeds in satisfaction. The conclusiveness of the receipt of the proceeds depends upon the conclusiveness of the conditional acceptance. If the latter fails, the former must also.

III. The main question in the case is, whether or not the plaintiff can maintain the suit in his own name, under the counts charging the defendants with a promise to accept drafts drawn against consignment of western produce to him by the owner. The draft in question having been drawn by Huston in pursuance of authority communicated by the defendants to Smith their agent, there can be no doubt that Huston could have maintained the action in his own name. It is insisted, however, that the plaintiff cannot, on the ground of a want of privity between him and the defendants, and that the promise, if made at all, was made to the owner and shipper of the produce, and not to any third person who might choose to advance money upon the draft.

The cases of Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 66, and of Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 111, are direct authorities to show, that the defendants in this case are not chargeable as acceptors of the bill. To make them liable in that capacity, the letters authorizing Huston to draw should have described the bill to be accepted, with reasonable certainty, so that its identity could not be mistaken by the party who should take it upon the faith of such authority. In Coolidge v. Payson the letters specified the particular bill to be drawn, and the endorsee, who had taken it on the faith of such authority, recovered against the defendants as acceptors. The court came to the conclusion, after a review of all the cases, that a letter written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, was a virtual acceptance, binding on the person who made the promise, if the bill was taken on the credit of the letter by a person to whom it was shown. In Boyce v. Edwards the plaintiff failed to recover against the defendants as acceptors, the authority to draw having been general, as it was in the case before us. The defendants were merchants in Charleston, who gave a general letter of credit to one Anderson of Georgia, to buy and ship cotton to them, and, on sending the bill of lading, to draw upon them for the price. The bills in question had been drawn in pursuance of this authority, and negotiated to the plaintiff, who took them on the faith of the letter of credit. In the court below the plaintiff was allowed to recover against the defendants as acceptors. The supreme court, after referring to the case of Coolidge v. Payson, and other cases affirming the same doctrine, held, that the judgment of the court below was erroneous, on the ground, principally, that the letter had no reference to the particular bills to be drawn, but was a general authority to draw at any time and to any amount, upon lots of cotton shipped, and that it did not describe any particular bills in terms not to be mistaken, which was indispensable in order to make the defendants liable as acceptors. The court further remarked, that the distinction between an action on a bill as an accepted bill, and one founded on a breach of a promise to accept, seemed not to have been adverted to, but that the evidence necessary to support the one or the other was materially different; that to maintain the former, the promise must be applied to the particular bill alleged in the declaration to have been accepted, while in the case of the latter, the evidence might be of a more general character, and the authority to draw be collected from circumstances and extended to all bills coming fairly within the scope of the promise. The court also observed, that, as respected the rights and remedies of the immediate parties to the promise to accept, and of all others who might take bills upon the credit of such promise, they were as secure and as attainable by an action on the breach of the promise to accept, as they could be by an action on the bill itself; and that the action might have been sustained, as the evidence stood, if the declaration had contained a count, properly framed, on a breach of the promise to accept.

The same doctrine was asserted and applied in the case of Russell v. Wiggin [Case No. 12,165]. There the defendants gave to one Breed a letter of credit, authorizing one Endicott to value on them at London, at six months sight, at any place in India, for account of Breed, for any sums not exceeding in all fifteen thousand pounds sterling, engaging that the bills should be duly honored when presented, if drawn within twelve months from the date of the letter. The plaintiffs, to whom the letter was exhibited, took the bills in question for value, relying on the commercial standing of the defendants, and on their promise in the letter. The declaration contained a count on a promise to accept. Judge Story, after an elaborate examination of the question, both on principle and authority, came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. He referred to the case of Boyce v. Edwards, as affirming the same doctrine, and observed that in that case the court held, that if, because the bill to be drawn was not definitely described in the manner limited by the case of Coolidge v. Payson, the promise to accept would not operate as an acceptance in favor of the party receiving the bill, still it would operate as a promise to him to accept the bill when drawn, and thus be equally available. See, also, Adams v. Jones, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 207.

Upon the foregoing view of the authorities, therefore, this suit was properly instituted in the name of the plaintiff, and may be sustained on the promise to accept, as laid in the third and fourth counts of the declaration. New trial denied.

CASSELS v. VERNON.

[5 Mason, 332.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1829.

MARRIED WOMAN — ADMINISTRATION TO HUSBAND WITH WILL ANNEXED — JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT — CONCLUSIVENESS — ACCOUNTING — INTEREST AGAINST TRUSTEE.

1. The grant of administration to a husband on his wife's estate with the will annexed, by a probate court, is conclusive to establish her right to make the will, for the general jurisdiction includes the right to inquire into this fact.

2. Interest will not be allowed against a trustee holding a fund, when he had made no interest, if there be no laches or neglect, or use of the money, on his part.

Bill in equity for an account. The cause was set down by consent of parties upon the bill, answers, exhibits, and admissions of the parties, and was argued by Samuel A. Crapo and Philip Crapo for the plaintiff, and by Searle for the defendant [William Vernon].

STORY, Circuit Justice. The present bill is brought by John Cassels, as administrator with the will annexed of his late wife, Jane Cassels, deceased, against the defendant as executor of Samuel Brown, deceased, for an account and decree of payment of a certain trust fund belonging to her estate, entrusted during her lifetime to the defendant's testator for her use. Mrs. Cassels died in England, where her will was duly proved in the prerogative court of Canterbury, and administration thereon granted to the plaintiff in 1828; and he has since presented the same to the proper probate court of Rhode Island, by which administration has been granted to him in like manner. The will of Mrs. Cassels purports to have been made in virtue of a power reserved to her by a certain bond, executed before her marriage by the plaintiff to a Mr. Champlin of Newport, the object of which was to secure to her the absolute disposal of her whole estate. Her will purports to dispose of her real and personal estate, first, to her husband for life, with a power to him afterwards to appoint and distribute the same among their children; and in default of such appointment, an equal distribution among their children, who should survive him, and if none survived, then to his own use in fee. There is no dispute between the parties as to the sum now due to Mrs. Cassel's estate; and the defendant makes no objection to paying it, provided he can be secure in so doing. It will be necessary, therefore, only to consider, whether either of the objections taken at the argument furnishes any solid ground for a denial of relief.

The first objection is, that the plaintiff has united in his bill a claim for the money as administrator of Mrs. Cassels, and also a claim for the same in his individual capacity, meaning, probably, though not so stated in the bill, as husband of the deceased. It is very properly stated, that these claims are inconsistent with each other, and that an admission of the one necessarily supersedes the other. The allegation, however, of a right in his individual capacity, is sustained by no facts alleged in the bill, and indeed is a mere naked assertion in the introductory part of the bill, in which, after stating his representative character, the bill adds, "and also in his private and individual capacity." The bill is certainly incorrect in this union of inconsistent claims; and if the objection had been taken upon demurrer, it would have overthrown the bill, unless an amendment was allowed. Courts of equity will not permit distinct and independent titles to be set up in the same bill, for that would be to allow multifariousness; much less will it permit inconsistent titles, or alternative titles, for that might tend to very inconvenient consequences in point of evidence. It is the duty of the party, who seeks the assistance of the court, to state his own title directly, without any alternatives, and not to put the court upon the duty to select, out of many, any one, which it may ultimately think, upon the evidence, can be supported. See Salvidge v. Hyde, Jac. 151; Edwards v. Edwards, Id. 335; Mole v. Smith, 1 Jac. & W. 665. This difficulty, however, could have been gotten rid of by an amendment; and coming on after a full answer, and a hearing by consent of parties, the shortest course will be to dismiss the bill as to all claims, except that made in the representative character. I do not say, that this is quite regular; but upon a mere slip, not affecting the rights of the parties, and where I should certainly allow an amendment, it seems hardly worth while to put the parties to the expense of a new bill. Unless some material objection occurs to this course, beyond what has been already stated, I shall venture to follow it, not meaning, that it shall be drawn into precedent.

Taking the bill then to be solely in the representative character, the defendant insists, that the plaintiff is bound to establish all the material facts, asserted in his bill, in order to found a decree. He must show, that there was a marriage, that the wife had authority to make the will, and that there has been a sufficient probate of the will to entitle the plaintiff to institute the suit. I agree, that all these facts are in some sort before the court, and require proof. But my opinion also is, that they are sufficiently proved by the proper legal evidence. The courts of probate of Rhode Island have exclusive jurisdiction to grant administrations upon the estates of deceased persons within the state, and for this purpose to allow probates of the wills of persons dying testate abroad, as well as at home. See St. R. I. (Dig. 1822) pp. 211, 221. The jurisdiction applies as well to the wills of married women, as of those, who are sole. This point has been already disposed of in the case of Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,133]. If the jurisdiction attaches, all the incidents attach, and among others the incidental right of inquiry, whether the person was at the time competent to make the will. The decision of the probate court, being a court not only of competent but exclusive jurisdiction, establishing the will, and granting administration with the will annexed, is conclusive upon the very points now in controversy, and cannot be gainsaid. The proper remedy, if any, was by appeal. See Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 157. It is not for this court to re-examine, whether the probate court had before it sufficient evidence to justify its decree. For us, it is sufficient, that such a decree was made, and that a valid administration now subsists under it. Even, if the decree were erroneous, as the probate of a will, it would still be good as a grant of administration; and such as would protect any payment made to the administrator.

No other objection has been made to the plaintiff's right of recovery. And my opinion, therefore, is, that he is entitled to a decree for the principal sum, admitted on all sides to be due, viz. $5205.70. A claim has been made for interest in behalf of the plaintiff. But I can perceive no sufficient foundation for it. Mrs. Cassels died as long ago as 1804, and no administration was taken out on her estate until 1828. No interest is proved to have been made by Mr. Brown; and for twenty years Mr. Cassels seems to have left Mr. Brown without any knowledge of his residence, and without any instructions what to do with the dividends of principal and interest as they were made on the stock, from 1801 to the time of the final redemption in 1819. Under such circumstances of neglect on the part of Mr. Cassels, there is no reason to give interest, which must operate as a penalty.

[Bee, 29.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. March 18, 1794.

CAPTURE BY PROSCRIBED PRIVATEER—SUBSEQUENT CAPTURE BY DULY-COMMISSIONED PRIVATEER—OUSTER OF JURISDICTION.

1. Jurisdiction of the court is ousted in case of capture on the high seas, by a privateer lawfully commissioned, of the property of an enemy to the sovereign issuing the commission.

2. The case is not altered though the capture should have been originally made by a proscribed privateer.

In admiralty.

The libel states that Castello was owner and commander of the brigantine St. Joseph, which was loaded in the port of Carthagena by himself and other subjects of Spain, which is in amity with the United States. That on the 22d of September last, in his way to Cadiz, he was captured on the high seas by the sloop Fair Margaret, commanded by F. H. Hervieux, and carried into Cape Fear river in North Carolina. That two days after their arrival within the bar of Wilmington, the said sloop and brigantine suddenly weighed anchor and proceeded to sea. This is said to have been in consequence of directions from the president of the United States to the governor of North Carolina to take possession of the brigantine and deliver her up to the libellant.

The libel further states that Hervieux then proceeded to Charleston, where, upon some agreement between him and the defendant Bouteille, the latter went to sea in the Sans-Pareille, and, at some distance from the bar of Charleston, took possession of the brigantine, landed the Spanish crew in Georgia, and brought the vessel into Charleston. Hervieux and his people had previously quitted her.

The libel also states some proceedings respecting the brigantine and cargo in consequence of directions from the president of the United States to the governors of North and South Carolina, the latter of whom declined all interference. And the collector of Charleston, not thinking himself authorized to detain the vessel, she was finally left in the hands of Bouteille. Whereupon, by a decree of the consul of France, the said vessel and cargo were advertised and sold, except fifty bales of cotton, which were taken into the custody of the marshal of this court by warrant issued therefrom. The libel concludes by praying restitution of vessel and cargo, and compensation for the detention of the same.

The jurisdiction of the court is denied by a plea which states, that the Sans-Pareille was a private vessel of war, duly commissioned by France to capture and make prize of all vessels, goods and merchandize found on the high seas, and belonging to the king of Spain or any of his subjects. That by virtue of this commission Bouteille captured this vessel and cargo on the high seas, and without the limits and authority of the United States. That by the 17th article of the treaty with France, this court is precluded from investigating the lawfulness of the capture and making any decree thereon. Plea concludes with a prayer that the suit may be dismissed with costs.

In support of the plea it was insisted that a neutral tribunal cannot determine the validity of prizes made by two belligerent powers from each other. That the 17th article of the treaty with France is conclusive as to the present question. That the 5th article of the convention with the United Netherlands compared with the 2d article of the treaty with France, to which it refers, is also conclusive. That this question has already been decided in the district courts of Pennsylvania and New-York, against the jurisdiction, in cases not so strong as that before this court. That on the face of the libel it appears that the question of prize or no prize is involved in this case. That this court having no power to condemn, of course cannot restore. Lee, Capt. 77, 78, 81, 220, 221; Bynk. 191, 194; 2 Vatt. Law Nat. 263–265. That this court, not being authorized to decide the question of prize, cannot determine whether the first or second capture was legal, or whether either of the privateers was proscribed. That the president, knowing this, referred the inquiry to the governor, and not to this court, as a matter properly cognizable by the executive, and not by the judiciary. That the opinion of individuals ought not to operate with the court, the treaty being plain and conclusive. That the jurisdiction of this court is defined by the 9th section of the act for establishing judicial proceedings, and does not extend to cases of captures. The advocates for the libellant contend that this is a case of a peculiar nature, and must be determined on its own grounds, as it differs from any case in the books. That the St. Joseph having been captured by a proscribed privateer, must be restored, into whatever port of the United States she may go. That if the doctrine contended for on the other side should obtain, a neutral vessel may be cut out of our harbours or from our wharves, without redress. That the president of the United States having already settled the principle, this court must restore if the present case comes up to that principle. The opinions of the secretary of state, and solicitor-general of Virginia were produced, in which those gentlemen recommended an application to the judiciary. Beaw. Lex Merc. 206, was quoted to support the jurisdiction of this court. It was said that the question was not whether the treaty should be fulfilled; but whether this case comes within the treaty. That if this court is deprived of jurisdiction in all cases of prize, it could not give redress for a breach of neutrality in our own harbours. That the article of the treaty with Holland extended merely to matters of trade and navigation, and did not apply here.

From these pleadings and arguments, it appears to me that the court must decide three points. 1st. Whether the St. Joseph was the property of Spanish subjects, or not. 2d. Whether the capture was made by the citizens of France on the high seas, beyond our limits of jurisdiction. 3d. Whether this court has any jurisdiction, if the two preceding points should be determined in the affirmative. As the libel states expressly the Spanish character of this vessel and cargo, it is unnecessary to say a word upon that part of the subject.

It is not contended by the libellant that the privateer was owned by other than French citizens, or that there is any defect in her commission. But it is said that the original seizure was made by a proscribed privateer; and much stress is laid upon the subsequent interference of the president of the United States. The court cannot notice this. The constitution has wisely separated the judicial and executive departments, and we must not infringe the barriers. At any rate the Sans-Pareille was not within the president's censure; and if the Fair Margaret was improperly fitted out in our ports, and proscribed on that account, complaint must be made to the executive, who will proceed by negotiation to obtain the due redress.

Arguments are drawn from a comparison of the 5th article of the convention with Holland to the 2d of the treaty with France. Neither of them seems to me to apply to this case. The treaty with France is of a general nature, and intended to be permanent under all circumstances of war and peace with other nations. The convention with Holland is distinct from our treaty with that power, and relates expressly to recaptured vessels, and to prizes made by either party on their common enemy. As to vessels cut away from a wharf, or captured in our harbours, such acts would amount to felony or piracy and the court would not hesitate to exercise jurisdiction, independently of any treaty in existence. The citizens or subjects of foreign nations receive protection, and owe a corresponding allegiance; and what would be criminal in one of our own citizens would be equally so in them, while this state of things lasted.

The cases of the ship William, and brigantine Catharine, decided in the district courts of Philadelphia and New-York, though differing materially from the present, have been adduced to illustrate the point of jurisdiction. I have read both decisions with pleasure; they are ably drawn up, and are, I presume, correct, as no appeal from either has taken place. As to their being the opinions of individuals, I see no reason why that circumstance should deprive them of all right to consideration. Respectable character for legal knowledge, supported by sound argument and clear deduction, will always command respect as well in the case of a judge of the United States as in those of Vattel, Bynkershoek, Puffendorf, or Beawes. But these opinions are confirmed by the language and conduct of the president of the United States, as contained and evinced in the letter from Secretary Jefferson to Mr. Morris, our minister in Paris. This proceeding of the executive has been submitted to both branches of the legislature, and has met with their decided approbation. This, it is true, wants the forms of law, and is not, therefore, binding upon a judge. If, however, his own opinion concurs, as mine does in the present case, much satisfaction must be derived from the coincidence of sentiment with the men so dignified by their wisdom and patriotism.

Upon the whole, I am clear that the plea in this case is relevant; that the libel must be dismissed; and that the fifty bales of cotton must be delivered up.

CASTER v. WOOD.

[Baldw. 289.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1831.

ANSWER—AMENDMENT—SUPPLEMENTAL ANSWER.

1. Where a defendant had answered generally to a matter, of which he had no particular knowledge, he was allowed to file a supplemental answer on the same subject, after he had acquired particular information concerning it. He may introduce into such answer, new matter which has come to his knowledge since filing the original answer on furnishing the opposite party with the names of the witnesses by whom he expects to prove it.

[Cited in Reed v. Crowley, Case No. 11,644.]

2. Applications to amend an answer are in the discretion of the court.

The defendant had filed his answer on the 19th of March, 1831; on the 21st of April, Mr. Brashears moved for leave to file an additional answer, as an amendment to the one filed. This motion was founded on an affidavit of the defendant, stating that at the time of filing his answer, he had only a general knowledge of the facts referred to in the first part of the amended answer now offered; that from ignorance of the particulars, he was obliged to answer generally, and he did not obtain possession of the papers and documents, which were necessary to give him information, which would enable him to answer with any particularity till the 19th of April; that at the time of filing his answer, he was entirely ignorant that Edward Livingston had filed a bill in the equity side of the circuit court of the district of New York, against the complainant in this case, concerning the title to the lands embraced in the contract between him and the defendant, which is the subject matter of the present suit. But that such bill has been filed by said Livingston, the knowledge of which did not come to defendant till about the 1st of April, and that the said bill is referred to and annexed to the amended answer now offered.

In support of the motion, Messrs. Brashears and Sergeant referred to 2 Madd. 375, 376, and 4 Madd. 21, 27, for the general principles on which answers are permitted to be amended.

Mr. Budd and Mr. Binney opposed the motion, on the authority of the cases in 10 Ves. 401; 2 Mer. 57; and 2 Ves. & B. 256.

BY THE COURT. Applications to amend an answer are not grantable of course, but depend on the discretion of the court. They are viewed more favourably when made to reform an answer, than when made to take it off the file and substitute a different one; the former is allowed in many cases, the latter only in special cases, where the conscience of the court is satisfied that the purposes of justice require it. 4 Madd. 28; 4 Johns. Ch. 375, 376.

As a general rule, the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of all the admissions of the defendant on oath, and it must be a clear case where the answer will be permitted to be taken from the file. But the present motion is merely to amend and explain matter not fully stated in the answer, on account of the partial information then possessed by the defendant, and the introduction of new matter since come to his knowledge, deemed material to the case. We think it comes within the established rules of courts of equity, and therefore allow the amendment, imposing on the defendant the condition of furnishing the opposite party with the names of the witnesses whose depositions he intends to take.

CASTLE v. LEE.

[11 N. B. R. (1875) 80.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota.

BANKRUPTCY—SETTING ASIDE PREFERENCE:

To set aside a preference made by an insolvent debtor, not only the fact of preference must be shown, but also that the creditor receiving it had reasonable cause to believe a fraud on the bankrupt act was intended.

[Action by Henry A. Castle, assignee in bankruptcy of J. B. Perrin, against William Lee.] Perrin, the bankrupt, engaged in the lumber business, and owning a saw-mill and conducting a country store, became embarrassed and sold out his business, including a stock of goods, December 1, 1873, to Evans & Bass. According to his testimony he expected to become a partner with the former and one Smythe, and to retain one quarter interest in the concern. This statement he made to the defendant, one of his creditors, who, at the request of Thompson, president of the First National Bank of St. Paul, also a creditor, and a personal friend of the bankrupt, induced the other creditors to take the bankable paper of Bass on six months' time for the amount due them from the bankrupt. The names of the creditors were given Lee, the defendant, by the bankrupt, and upon ascertaining the aggregate amount of indebtedness, it largely exceeded the gross amount in the notes to be given by Bass upon the purchase. The president withdrew the bank claim and consented to permit the bankrupt to apply the notes received from Bass in satisfaction of his indebtedness to the other creditors. It was discovered that in the list of debts given Lee by the bankrupt, the amount due Braden, a creditor, had been omitted, and when his attention was called to it, he said "he could take care of that amount, as he was to have one-fourth interest in the business," which would be remunerative with the new partners and the additional capital put in. The trade was consummated with Evans & Bass, with the consent of the creditors upon the list referred to, and the notes of Bass taken. Afterwards it was ascertained that Perrin had omitted to inform Lee in regard to a large amount of his indebtedness; and having been adjudged a bankrupt the assignee brings this suit to recover from Lee the amount of the Bass note which he took in payment of his debt, alleging that it was a preference, secured in fraud of the bankrupt act. There was some conflict in the testimony, but the above is the statement of facts upon which the court decided the case. The case was tried by the court without a jury.

Gilfillan & Williams, for plaintiff.
Gilman & Clough, for defendant.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

NELSON, District Judge. There can be no doubt about the insolvency of Perrin, within the meaning of the bankrupt law, at the time Bass & Co. made an arrangement with him which would cancel a certain amount of indebtedness. He could not meet his obligations as they matured, and in the language of a witness in the case, "I considered from his statement to me, that he would have to close up his business unless he procured some assistance outside." Lee, the creditor and defendant in this suit, at the instigation of the president of the First National Bank of St. Paul, undertook to aid the latter in relieving the bankrupt, and was instrumental in influencing other creditors to consent to take the notes on six months' time of Bass, one of the persons who was negotiating to get possession of the bankrupt's property or business. It is immaterial in this controversy, in the view taken by the court, to consider the motives that induced Lee or any of the creditors to consent to the arrangement, and it may be conceded that they believed that by consenting thereto their claims would be more secure. The assignee brings this action to recover from Lee, on account of a fraudulent preference, and in order to establish his asserted right must prove, not only the fact of insolvency on the part of the bankrupt, and a preference to the creditor by the transaction, having reasonable cause to believe the insolvency of the debtor, but also must show that the creditor had reasonable cause to believe the transaction was in fraud of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 534].

An examination of the evidence will fail to show an intention to defraud any one. It is undisputed that the amount of the indebtedness exceeded the money to be advanced, or the notes to be given by Bass in case the negotiations succeeded; but the president of the bank who was acting as the friend of the bankrupt, when it was discovered that there might possibly be a failure, agreed to withdraw the claim of the bank, and consent that the other creditors should have the benefit of the arrangement with Bass & Co. There is nothing in the testimony to impeach the transaction, and it is apparent that the utmost good faith characterized all of the negotiations. The statement made by the bankrupt to Lee, according to his testimony, was that "he was getting into a copartnership with Evans & Bass, by which he could fix everything up." There was an apparent conflict between the testimony of the bankrupt and Lee in regard to the amount of the indebtedness; but when the list of creditors, who were settled with, is presented to the bankrupt, he states "that there must have been other names furnished him, but he can't swear that there was."

The list which Lee states was given him by the bankrupt footed up five thousand five hundred and eighty-one dollars and ninety-two cents. The latter thought it would foot up seven thousand dollars; but inasmuch as he admits that there was quite a large indebtedness owing to other persons residing outside of St. Paul, which he states he never alluded to in any of his conversations with Lee, I am forced to the conclusion, in the face of the positive testimony of Lee, showing that the list of the creditors presented was furnished by the bankrupt, and he (Lee) had no knowledge of any other debts except a small one which was owing to Braden, that more creditors were omitted from the list than those outside of St. Paul. It is but justice to say, however, that no intention to deceive on the part of the bankrupt is deducible from the testimony. His evident desire to bring about a partnership by which he would be enabled to "fix up," led him to suppose that his success for the future was assured, and he could alone "fix up" all the creditors whose names were not on the list furnished, including the Braden claim, which, it was discovered, had been omitted also.

I think that a fraud on the act is not to be inferred, from the fact that Lee accepted payment of his debt under the circumstances, although he knew that the Braden claim of less than one hundred dollars was outstanding and unsettled. He was justified in believing, as did the bankrupt, that the arrangement was of benefit to him, and would secure his success in the future. Judgment must be rendered for the defendant.

Case No. 2,507.

CASTOR v. MITCHEL.

[4 Wash. C. C. 191.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1821.

JURISDICTION — DOMICIL — BREACH OF CONTRACT FOR SALE OF LAND—RIGHTS OF VENDEE.

1. As to change of domicil, as respects jurisdiction.

2. If upon a contract of sale, the purchaser pay a part of the purchase money, and give his bond for the balance, and agree to give a mortgage upon the property purchased to secure the payment of the bond, but fails to give it, and the vendor afterwards conveys the property to another person: the court will decree the repayment of the sum paid, and that the bond be delivered up cancelled.

[Cited in Dudley v. Hayward, 11 Fed. 546.]

In equity. The bill states that on the 2d of December, 1816, the defendant, William Mitchel, entered into articles of agreement with the plaintiff [David Castor] and his brother Daniel Castor; by which he bound himself to sell and convey to them, in fee simple, a tract of land in the state of New Jersey, belonging to the estate of his testator, John Mason, deceased, for the sum of $10,900; payable, $2,000 on the 1st of April following; $1,000 on the 1st of April, 1818, and the residue in three equal annual instalments, for which a mortgage was to be given on the premises; and a conveyance to be made, and possession to be delivered, on payment of the $2,000. That the plaintiff and the said Daniel Castor gave their bonds to the defendant, for the two sums of $2,000 and $1,000. That on the 10th of April, 1817, the plaintiff paid off the bond for $2,000, out of his own funds, and that a suit is now depending in the state court on the other bond. That the plaintiff was ready and willing to receive a conveyance of the land according to the articles of agreement, and to execute a mortgage for securing the payment of the residue of the purchase money; but that the defendant did not execute a conveyance for the said land, or tender the same. That the defendant, sometime in the autumn of the year 1818, executed a deed for the said land to the aforesaid Daniel Castor, excluding the plaintiff, and took a mortgage upon the same from the said Daniel Castor, to secure the payment of the sum of $7,900, being the balance of the purchase money. That the plaintiff of the said Daniel Castor took possession of the land under the articles of agreement, and that the plaintiff continued to hold the possession jointly with his brother, until the separate conveyance to his brother above mentioned, when he left the premises. The prayer of the bill is, that the defendant do repay the said $2,000, to the plaintiff, and also deliver up the bond for $1,000 to be cancelled.

The answer admits all the charges in the bill, except that the payment of the $2,000 was in separate money of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff and the said Daniel Castor were ready to receive a conveyance for the land, and to execute a mortgage for securing the balance of the purchase money. As to the first, the answer states that the money was paid under the contract, and in discharge of the joint bond, and calls upon the plaintiff to prove the fact he asserts; if it be material, as to the second matter not admitted, the answer denies that the plaintiff and his brother were ready in April, 1817, or afterwards, to receive a deed, and to give the mortgage; but on the contrary, they evaded the same, though often urged. That in consequence of this neglect, the defendant conveyed the land to Daniel Castor, as stated in the bill. The defendant put in a plea to the jurisdiction, asserting that the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania. The plea was argued at the last term, and witnesses then examined upon the point, when the court overruled the plea, but without prejudice to the question of jurisdiction being considered upon the evidence then given at the hearing. The plaintiff gave no evidence that was deemed satisfactory to prove that the $2,000 paid by the plaintiff were from his separate funds.

It was contended for the defendant, 1. That the removal of the plaintiff from Pennsylvania, whereof from his birth he was a citizen, to the state of New Jersey, was not a bona fide change of domicil; but that he still continued a citizen of this state in relation to the question of jurisdiction. 2. That the plaintiff having altogether failed to perform his part of the agreement by being ready to accept a conveyance, and to execute a mortgage for securing the balance of the purchase money, he has no equity to claim repayment of the $2,000, even if he had proved that it was his separate money, or to call upon the plaintiff to deliver up the bond for the $1,000 to be cancelled.

Mr. Peters, for plaintiff.
C. J. Ingersoll, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Upon the question of jurisdiction, we have no doubt but that the plaintiff removed to the state of New Jersey, with the bona fide intention of changing his domicil, and making that state the place of his permanent residence. Apparently he had no other motive at the time he removed to that state; and as he could not then have anticipated this controversy, it is not to be presumed that he contemplated a fraud upon the jurisdiction of this court. On the contrary, the evidence in the cause furnishes reasons for his removal which are entirely consistent with the reality of a bona fide change of domicil. In December, 1816, he, together with his brother, purchased a farm in New Jersey, and in the month of March following, as soon as the season would well permit, they both removed to it, and continued jointly to occupy and to cultivate the land, until the separate conveyance made by the defendant to Daniel Castor in the autumn of 1818; when the plaintiff, being a single man, removed to the house of Mr. Denny, in Gloucester county, where he remained as a boarder until the latter end of November, 1819, after this suit was brought, when he returned to Philadelphia. During his abode with Denny, he occasionally visited his friends in this state, but his room was always reserved for him. So far as any inference can be made from his declarations to the witnesses, during his residence in New Jersey, he considered himself to be a citizen of that state. We are of opinion, upon the whole, that the objection to the jurisdiction is not supported by the proofs in the cause.

As to the relief, there is no doubt. Taking it as granted, that the plaintiff was not ready to complete the contract, and that he even refused to do so, there is no principle of law, or equity, upon which the plaintiff could found a claim to retain the money paid him by the purchasers, together with the evidence of a further sum to be paid as the consideration of the purchase, and also to hold the land, otherwise than as a security for the residue of the purchase, and still less to sell it to a third person. The defendant had clearly a right to compel the purchasers to perform their contract, by paying the balance of the purchase money; and his lien upon the land was quite as strong as if the mortgage deed had been executed. But, if he chose to put an end to the contract, if under all the circumstances of the case he could do so; the purchasers were surely entitled to be placed in the situation they would have been in if the contract had not been made. Had the defendant sued the purchasers in equity for a specific performance, it would have been an essential part of his case to show that he had made a conveyance, or was ready to do so; and the court would decree a conveyance as the condition of the payment of the residue of the purchase money.

These principles being premised, it follows, that, since the defendant has conveyed the land to Daniel Castor, and thus disqualified himself to perform his part of the contract, the plaintiff ought not to be exposed to the payment of the bond for $1,000, which was given in part consideration for the land. The decree of this court cannot affect the jurisdiction of the court where the suit upon that bond is depending. But it may operate in personam upon the defendant. As to the $2,000 paid by the plaintiff, there is no proof that it was the separate money of the plaintiff. It might as well have been the money of Daniel Castor, or of the joint purchasers, and the presumption is in favour of the latter. This being the case, and Daniel Castor not being a party to this suit, the court cannot decree this sum to be repaid to the plaintiff. We shall therefore decree the bond for $1,000 to be delivered to the plaintiff, cancelled; and shall dismiss the bill as to the $2,000, but without prejudice.

CONFIRMATION OF MEXICAN LAND GRANT.

Entitled to confirmation under the decision of this court in case number eighty-eight [U. S. v. Rodriguez, Case No. 16,184.]

Claim for one league of land in Santa Cruz county, rejected by the board, and appealed by claimant.

Jeremiah Clark, for appellant.
S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty., for appellees.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Ogden Hoffman, District Judge.]

[Before HOFFMAN, District Judge.]

The claimant in this case derives his title from a grant made to Antonio Buelna, on the second of May, 1839. This grant was also the foundation of the title claimed in case number eighty-eight, already decided by this court. The claim in that case was made in the name of the widow and heir of the original grantee, and was for a part of the land originally granted. The remainder, which is the subject of the present claim, had been sold to Castro, the claimant in this case, by the widow of Buelna. The conveyances to him are duly produced and proved. Both of these claims were rejected by the board, on the ground that there was no proof that the Maria Concepcion Valencia Rodriguez, the claimant in case number eighty-eight, was the grantor of the claimant in this case, and the widow and heir of the original grantee. Case number eighty-eight has already been decided by this court; the original grant has been found to be valid, and the claim of Maria Concepcion Valencia Rodriguez, formerly Buelna, has been confirmed to that portion of the land still retained by her. The only question, then, that remains is whether the grantor of the claimant in this case is the same person. This fact is admitted by the district attorney in a stipulation on file in this court. The original grant having thus been declared to be valid, and the right of the grantor of the claimant, as heir of the original grantee, having been also judicially recognized, no objection can now be taken to the confirmation of the present claim—the validity of the conveyances by the widow Buelna to the present claimant not being disputed. A decree of confirmation must therefore be entered for the land as described and bounded in the conveyances to the claimant, or to so much thereof as is comprised within the limits of the original grant.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—DESERTION—ENTRY IN LOG-BOOK.

1. Where a seaman shipped in New York for a voyage to Tampico and back, and, on the voyage back, the vessel put in at Key West for repairs, and, when she was ready to sail, he was not to be found, having gone ashore, without leave, to get some articles belonging to the vessel, which he had previously taken ashore to be washed, and the master shipped another man in his place and sailed without him, and he afterwards came to New York, brought the articles to the vessel, and demanded his wages: Held, that, on the facts, the libellant had no intention of deserting the vessel, and did not desert, so as to incur a forfeiture of his wages under the twenty-fifth section of the act of August 18th, 1856.

2. That, as neither the name of the seaman, nor the fact that he was absent without leave, were entered in the log-book, the libellant had not forfeited his wages under the fifth section of the act of July 20th, 1790.

In admiralty. This was a libel for seaman's wages. The libellant shipped by the name of Albert Wright, on the shipping-articles, as cook and steward, for a voyage from New York to Tampico, Mexico, and back to a port of discharge in the United States, on the 3d of July, 1867. He went in the vessel to Tampico, and thence to Key West, where the vessel put in in distress for repairs, and where she was detained for some time. On the 31st of October, 1867, when the vessel was ready to leave Key West for New York, the libellant could not be found, he having gone ashore, without permission, for the purpose of getting some articles belonging to the vessel, which he had previously taken on shore to be washed. It does not appear that he had the consent of the proper officers of the vessel to have the articles in question washed on shore, or that they knew of the fact. The libellant was advised that the vessel was to sail, and went on shore without leave, and without notifying any officer of the vessel of his intention, probably expecting to return before the vessel should leave. He was sought for on shore, but could not be found, and the master was obliged to ship another man in his place at Key West, and the vessel left without him, and he subsequently found his way to New York by another vessel. He brought with him the washed articles and restored them to the vessel, and demanded his wages.

A. Nash, for libellant.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I think that the facts all go to show that, though the libellant went on shore without leave, and was left behind, he had no intention of deserting the vessel, and did not desert her in any such sense as to make him incur a forfeiture of his wages under the twenty-fifth section of the act of August 18, 1856 (11 Stat. 62). Nor, if he did desert, was the desertion noted on the list of the crew and officially authenticated, as required by that act, so as to make the forfeiture of wages operative.

The particular defence set up in the answer is, that the libellant left the vessel without permission, and remained away for the space of more than forty-eight hours, and that an entry of this was duly made in the log-book of the vessel on the day on which he absented himself, and that he thereby forfeited his wages. The forfeiture thus set up is claimed under the fifth section of the act of July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 133). But the defence is not made out. The statute must be strictly complied with, in order to make the forfeiture operative. The entry in the log-book must state the fact and date of absence, and the name of the seaman, and must show that his absence was without leave. The entry in the log-book, in this case, does not state the name of the seaman, or the fact that he was absent without leave.

The libellant is entitled to a decree for his wages, at thirty dollars per month, from the time his service on board commenced, until the 31st of October, 1867, less the payments and credits thereon to which the vessel is entitled. It is impossible for me to decide, from the evidence, what such payments and credits are, and, unless the parties agree, there must be a reference to a commissioner to ascertain them.

COLLISION BETWEEN SAILING VESSELS — RULES OF NAVIGATION—LOOKOUT — LESSENING EFFECT OF COLLISION.

1. A vessel sailing with a free wind is bound to get out of the way, or steer clear of one close-hauled.

2. The neglect to have a "lookout" stationed exclusively for the performance of that duty, and leaving the helm unattended, are reprehensible and serious faults.

3. The vessel having the privilege of keeping her course has the right to expect that the other will be steered clear of her.

4. When the vessel bound to give way does not to do so in time, the other may be so navigated as to avoid or lessen the effects of the apprehended collision.

In admiralty.

D. D. Field and J. S. Sluyter, for libellants.
Cochrane & Donahue, for claimants.

INGERSOLL, District Judge. On the evening of the 21st day of April, in the year 1852, at a little after 8 o'clock the schooner San Louis, of Haddam, in the district of Connecticut, and owned by the libellants, loaded with a cargo of stone, and bound to Philadelphia, at a place about twenty-five miles south of Sandy Hook, on the high seas, was run into by the schooner Catharine and Martha, Collins, master, bound from a port in South America to New York, by which the vessel of the libellants and her cargo, were lost and destroyed. And the question is, which of these vessels, if either of them has been in fault? And that question depends upon the rules of navigation which should have been observed by them, respectively, at the time of the collision, and upon the evidence as given in the case.

The rules of navigation applicable to the case under consideration are well settled. They were considered by the supreme court of the United States in the case of St. John v. Paine, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 557, and were then established and settled, so as to be now free from doubt. Among these rules thus established are the following: 1. A vessel that has the wind free, or sailing before or with the wind, must get out of the way of the vessel that is close-hauled, and sailing by or against it. 2. The vessel on the starboard tack has a right to keep her course, and the one on the larboard tack must give way or be answerable for the consequences. 3. When two vessels are approaching each other, both having the wind free, and consequently the power of readily controlling their movements, the vessel on the larboard tack must give way, and each pass to the right. 4. The same rule governs vessels sailing on the wind, and approaching each other, when it is doubtful which is to the windward. And it was remarked by the court that no one can look through the reports in admiralty in England without being struck with the steadiness and rigor with which these general nautical rules have been enforced in cases of collision, under the advice of the Trinity masters of that court, or fail to be impressed with the justice and propriety of such application, and the salutary results flowing from it. These rules have been often sustained and established by various courts of high authority in different states in the United States. The court in the case in Howard also say, that a competent and vigilant lookout, stationed at the forward part of the vessel, and in a position best adapted to descry vessels approaching at the earliest moment, was indispensable to exempt the colliding vessel from blame, in case of accident in the night-time, while navigating waters on which it is accustomed to meet other water craft. Bearing these rules in mind, and applying them to the facts as found in the present case, there is no difficulty in determining what the decree should be.

The San Louis, as appears in evidence, was a schooner of about one hundred and eleven tons burthen, properly manned, and on her voyage, bound to Philadelphia, started from Jersey City on the 21st day of April, in the year 1852, at about two or three o'clock in the afternoon. The collision took place at a little after eight o'clock in the evening, at about twenty or twenty-five miles south of Sandy Hook, where vessels are accustomed to meet. The wind at the time was about south-west by west. It was not blowing heavy, but there was a good sailing breeze. She was close-hauled to the wind, on her starboard tack, and was and had been steering between south and south by west, along the shore, and was at the time about four or five miles distant from the same. It had been raining, but at the time it was starlight, with some flying clouds, and vessels could be seen from three-quarters of a mile to a mile distant. She had a man on the look-out forward, but no light, and the mate was at the wheel. The Catharine was heading in an opposite direction to that of the San Louis, with a fair wind on her larboard tack, bound to the port of New York, with no one on her lookout forward, but with a light. No one on board the Catharine saw or noticed the San Louis until the San Louis was just under her bows, and a moment before the collision took place. A short time before the collision, and when the San Louis could have been seen if there had been a lookout forward, there was no one on the lookout forward, and no one at the wheel. When the Catharine was so without a lookout, and without any one at the wheel, the crew were reefing her mainsail. The captain, who left the wheel, was not so engaged. But before the collision he returned to the wheel. When the Catharine was first discovered by those on board the San Louis, she was about half a mile off, heading a little east of north, in an opposite direction of the San Louis, from one to two points to the leeward, on her lee bow. The San Louis kept her course, close-hauled to the wind, until just before the collision, when, discovering that the Catharine had luffed, and that a collision would take place, in order to avoid it if possible, or to lessen the effects of it, the San Louis luffed, and the Catharine struck her on the larboard side, head on, about opposite the hatch, abaft the fore rigging, by which the San Louis was cut down below the water line, in consequence of which it was not safe to remain on board of her, and she was abandoned by the crew and lost. The San Louis, if she had not luffed, would have been struck by the Catharine.

Applying the rules of navigation, as established by the supreme court, to the facts as above found, there is no difficulty in determining what decree should be passed. The San Louis was close-hauled to the wind, on her starboard tack, with a lookout forward, and, judging from the whole testimony, was a little to the windward of the Catharine. The Catharine had a free wind, she was on her larboard tack, with no lookout forward, and was a little to the leeward of the San Louis. Both vessels were sailing in nearly opposite directions. Under these circumstances, according to the rules of navigation, as established by admiralty courts, it was the duty of the Catharine to have avoided the collision, and, as she did not, she must be answerable for the consequences. No fault is discovered on the part of those who were navigating the San Louis. The fault which occasioned the injury, is entirely attributable to the negligence of those who were navigating the Catharine. The nautical rules, as recognized by the supreme court, and applied by all admiralty courts, are salutary, and ought to be strictly observed. The injury complained of was occasioned by the Catharine's not regarding these rules. Several decisions in the district have also noticed and condemned emphatically the faults on board this delinquent vessel, and justified the navigation of the San Louis. Poole v. The Washington [Case No. 11,271]; The Emily [Id. 4,452]; Morgan v. The De Peyster [Id. 9,805].

The decree therefore is, that the libellants recover their damages sustained by the collision, and that it be referred to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amount of damages sustained by the libellants.

[At law. Assumpsit by Hugh Catherwood and others against Loton Gapete and others.]

Fiske, for the petition.

English, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an action of assumpsit founded on two promissory notes, drawn by the defendants who are citizens of Massachusetts, payable to their own order, and indorsed by them to the plaintiffs, who are citizens of Pennsylvania. The defendants having been defaulted have filed a petition in writing, setting forth that they have been discharged under the insolvent laws of Massachusetts, and praying that any execution which may be issued on the judgment, may be so framed as not to run against the bodies of the defendants. It is admitted by the plaintiffs that the defendants have received a discharge under the insolvent laws of the state, but they deny that it protects the defendants from final process against their persons, issuing out of this court. In support of their petition the defendants rely on the act of February 28, 1839, (5 Stat. 321,) which is as follows: "That no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any State, on process issuing out of a court of the United States, where, by the laws of such state, imprisonment for debt has been abolished; and where, by the law of a state, imprisonment for debt shall be allowed under certain conditions and restrictions, the same conditions and restrictions shall be applicable to the process issuing out of the courts of the United States, and the same proceedings shall be had therein as are adopted in the courts of such state."

The first part of this act, which relates to states where imprisonment for debt has been abolished, has no application here, for it has not been abolished in Massachusetts. The question is, whether the seventh section of the insolvent law of Massachusetts (Stat. 1838, c. 183), is a law allowing imprisonment for debt under certain conditions and restrictions, within the meaning of this act of congress. That section provides, that a discharge granted to a debtor shall release him from certain contracts therein mentioned, and shall exempt him from imprisonment on any process, on account of any debt which might have been proved against his estate. The object of the act is, not to allow imprisonment for debt under certain conditions and restrictions, but to prohibit it in certain cases. It does not come therefore within the terms employed by congress, to describe the state laws intended to be referred to. Laws of prohibition of imprisonment are embraced under the first clause of the act of congress; but to come under it, those state laws must entirely abolish imprisonment for debt. If they permit it to take place in some cases and prohibit it in others, they do not abolish it, and the first clause of the act of congress does not apply. On the other hand the second clause assumes that it is still allowed, but conditions and restrictions imposed on its exercise, such as requiring an affidavit before an arrest, and restricting the duration of the imprisonment. And the purpose of congress was to ingraft such restrictions and conditions upon the process of the courts of the United States. But in a case where the state law prohibits imprisonment, it is plain the courts of the United States cannot find in that state law, any conditions or restrictions which they can impose on the exercise of the right. If they obey the state law, they must refuse altogether to allaw process of imprisonment, not restrict it, or impose conditions on it.

It is true the state of Massachusetts has power to abolish imprisonment for debt altogether, or in certain cases, and that such laws do not impair the obligation of the contract. But it is also true, that such laws of the state cannot, proprio vigore, affect the process of the courts of the United States. Beers v. Houghton, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 359.

It is necessary to find some act of congress, or some rule of this court, or the supreme court, adopted under the authority of an act of congress, adopting and giving efficacy to such state law. The process act of May 19, 1828 (4 Stat. 281, § 3), assimilates the process of the courts of the United States to the proceedings then used in the courts of the several states. But it was only state laws then existing, which were adopted, and the insolvent law of Massachusetts was enacted after 1828. There has been no rule of this court altering its final process to conform to the provisions of the insolvent law of the state, nor any such rule of the supreme court, applicable to final process in actions at law. It is necessary, therefore, to fall back on the act of congress of February 28, 1839; and as that, in my opinion, does not reach the case, the petition must be denied and the execution issue in the usual form.

Case No. 2,514.

CATLETT v. COLUMBIAN INS. CO.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 192.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1827.

MARINE INSURANCE—ADJUSTMENT OF LOSS.

In adjusting a loss upon a policy for $10,000 on a cargo from Alexandria, D. C. to St. Thomas and two other ports in the West Indies, and back to the U. S., the value of the cargo is to be ascertained at the port from which the vessel last sailed before the loss, and if freight has there been earned and not paid, and is not chargeable upon the salvage, it is an addition to the value of the original cargo, upon which the loss is to be adjusted.

At law. This was an action upon a policy of insurance, dated February 16, 1826, whereby the defendants [the Columbian Insurance Company] insured the plaintiff [C. J. Catlett] $10,000, lost or not lost, at and from Alexandria to St. Thomas and two other ports in the West Indies, and back to her port of discharge in the U. S., upon all kinds of lawful goods and merchandise, laden or to be laden on board the ship Commerce, until the same should be safely landed at St. Thomas, &c. and the United States. The goods and merchandise to be valued as interest might appear. At the trial, a verdict was found, by consent, for the plaintiff, for $10.000, subject to the opinion of the court, upon a demurrer to the evidence. And it was further agreed, that if it should be the opinion of the court that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the full amount of the insurance, but was entitled to an average loss, a reference should be made to an auditor to ascertain the average, and the verdict should be modified accordingly, subject to exceptions, &c. The reference was made and the report, among other things, charged the freight from Alexandria to St. Thomas upon the salvage; the freight being $2,041.25. It appeared from the demurrer to the evidence, that the ship sailed from Alexandria, on the 14th of February, 1822, having on board a cargo of 2,297½ barrels of flour, of the invoice price of $15,841.24. The ship and cargo were both owned by the plaintiff. She arrived safe at St. Thomas on the 21st of March, where she continued until the 30th of May, for the purpose of selling her cargo. During this period, the master, who was also consignee, sold by retail 509½ barrels. Being limited by his instructions, to $8 a barrel, and not being able to procure that price for the residue of the cargo, he sailed on the 31st of May, for Cape Haytien, with it, and 30 doubloons, amounting to $480, part of the proceeds of his sales at St. Thomas. The 509½ barrels of flour sold at St. Thomas according to the invoice price, amounted to $3,512.99, leaving the value of the cargo on board, exclusive of the doubloons, at the time of sailing from that port, according to the invoice, at $12,328.25. On the 6th of June, the ship was wrecked off Cape Haytien, and 155 barrels of flour were totally lost; 1,633 were landed; the greater part damaged, and the whole was sold. The gross amount of sales at Cape Haytien, was $9,391.34. The expenses of salvage, including commissions on sales, were $4,124.72. The proportion of the captain's expenses attaching on the cargo was $285.78. Of the proceeds of the sales at Cape Haytien, the sum of $4,953.89 was invested in coffee, which was shipped to Baltimore, where it produced only $3,517.40. Upon the auditor's report, the circuit court rendered judgment for the plaintiff, for $7,656.57, with interest from October 14, 1822. The defendants carried the cause to the supreme court of the United States, by writ of error, where the judgment was affirmed as to every point, except the charging the freight from Alexandria to St. Thomas against the goods saved, (a point not raised in the court below;) upon which point the judgment was reversed. Mr. Justice Johnson, strongly dissenting. [Columbian Ins. Co. v. Catlett, 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 383.] After the opinion of the supreme court was pronounced, it was discovered that the auditor's report was incorrect in some other particulars, and required a different adjustment, and the following additional opinion was subsequently delivered by the court.

"Mr. Justice Story. In consequence of the former opinion delivered in this cause, the parties have found it necessary to readjust the auditor's report in several particulars not suggested at the former argument. Indeed, upon that argument the parties assumed that the report was perfectly correct, except as to the item of freight. We have examined the report, and are satisfied that the original plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of $6,626.18, with interest from the 14th of October, 1822, which is the residue of the sum of $10,000 insured by the company, deducting the premium note, and the proportion of salvage belonging to the underwriters, which has been received by the original plaintiff; and the judgment of the circuit court is to be reformed accordingly."

The judgment of the supreme court was as follows:

"This cause came on, &c. On consideration whereof, it is ordered and adjudged by the court, that there is error in so much of the judgment, as allowed to the said Catlett, as freight to be deducted from the salvage, the sum of $2,041.25. And it is further ordered and adjudged, that upon reformation of the auditor's report, required by the disallowance of the freight aforesaid, and otherwise, there is now due and payable to the said Catlett, the sum of $6,626.18, together with interest thereon, from the 14th of October, 1822, the said sum being the balance of the sum of $10,000 insured, after deducting the amount of the premium due on the policy, viz. $376, and also the proportion of the salvage belonging to the said Columbian Insurance Company, viz. $2,997.82, received by the said Catlett; and that the judgment of the circuit court, to the amount of the said sum of $6,626.18, and interest thereon from the 14th of October, 1822, be and hereby is affirmed; and as to the residue of the said judgment, be and is hereby reversed; and the cause is to be remanded to the said circuit court, with directions to enter judgment for the said Catlett accordingly; the parties in the court below to be at liberty to open the auditor's report, so far as respects the item for $480, the proceeds of the doubloons; and the item for $719.37, paid over to Captain McKnight; and the judgment to be varied by the circuit court, as these items may be found for either party; execution, however, to be granted immediately for the balance of the judgment, deducting the said sum of $719.37."

A mandate was issued accordingly, and the cause was again brought before this court, when

CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the following opinion of the court:

The mandate, in this case, is understood, in effect, to require this court to render judgment in favor of Mr. Catlett, for $6,626.18, with stay of execution as to $719.37, part thereof; and that the auditor's report shall be opened, as to the item for thirty doubloons, equal to $480, and the item for $719.37, "paid over to Captain McKnight;" "and the judgment to be varied" by this court, "as these items may be found for either party." It appears, by the mandate, that the supreme court, in adjusting the loss, have charged Mr. Catlett $2,997.82, for the underwriter's share of the net proceeds of two hundred bags of coffee sold in Baltimore, and of the $480 for the thirty doubloons. The net proceeds of the coffee were $3,151.30, and the doubloons were $480; = $3,631.30. As $12,808.25, the whole risk, is to $3,631.30, the whole amount saved and received by Mr. Catlett, so is $10,000, the underwriters' share of the risk, to $2,835.13, the underwriters' share of the amount saved.

The supreme court did not take into the adjustment the balance of the net proceeds of the cargo, paid over by Thompson and Creed to Captain McKnight, at Cape Haytien, namely, $75.02 and $719.37; = $794.39. That sum ought to have been brought into the account, whether it was received by the underwriters or by Mr. Catlett. If received by Mr. Catlett, he ought to have been charged with the underwriters' share of it; if received by them, they ought to credit Mr. Catlett with his share of them. By the auditor's report Mr. Catlett was charged with that sum, as well as with the doubloons; the supreme court have only charged him with the latter. Yet they both stand on the same ground; they were both paid over to Captain McKnight. The auditor's report was acquiesced in by Mr. Catlett, in this court, and he seemed to be satisfied with the judgment which this court gave, confirming that report. But the auditor's report has been opened again, and we are now requested to disallow the charge against Mr. Catlett for the doubloons, because, it is said, they were stolen from Captain McKnight at Cape Haytien. Captain McKnight has been reëxamined upon that point. He says he expended part of the doubloons in paying the seamen's wages, and in disbursements and expenses concerning the ship; and that the residue, amounting to about $351, was stolen from him at the cape. If they were stolen, are the underwriters responsible? As Captain McKnight was the master of Mr. Catlett's ship, and the supercargo and consignee of Mr. Catlett's cargo, and as Mr. Catlett had accounts to settle with him for wages and compensation, as master, supercargo, and consignee, and as it is the general practice for the insured to receive the salvage in cases of abandonment, it is natural to suppose that Captain McKnight received not only the doubloons, but the balance of the proceeds of the cargo, as agent for Mr. Catlett. I think, therefore, that Mr. Catlett is answerable for whatever proceeds of the cargo were paid over to Captain McKnight. I think, also, that the twenty bags of coffee, purchased by Captain McKnight out of the proceeds of the cargo, and remitted to Baltimore with the two hundred bags, are to be considered as a remittance made on account of the underwriters; and that, as the proceeds came to the hands of Mr. Catlett, he is answerable for the net proceeds only, and not for the prime cost. But, with regard to these two points, the other judge, who heard the cause, has doubts; but they will not affect the judgment which we shall render. In order to adjust this loss, it is necessary to ascertain the value of the cargo when the ship sailed from St. Thomas for Cape Haytien. Upon the arrival of the cargo at St. Thomas, freight was earned to the amount of $1.25 per barrel.

The supreme court has decided, that the freight thus earned was not a lien upon the salvage of the cargo in the hands of the underwriters. When, therefore, the ship sailed from St. Thomas for Cape Haytien, the value of the cargo was enhanced by the whole value of the freight. This would not have been the case, if the freight had continued to be a lien upon the salvage of the cargo; for then the salvage would have been indebted to the exact amount of the benefit; but this cargo had received the benefit, and was relieved from the debt. So that it was really more valuable to the amount of the freight, as if the freight had been paid at St. Thomas, and added to the cargo. For the purpose of adjusting this loss, the voyage must be considered as commencing at St. Thomas. If half of the cargo had been sold at that island at a profit of one hundred per cent., and the proceeds invested in goods and laden on board the ship, and she had sailed with that cargo for Cape Haytien, and been lost, the value of the cargo must have been ascertained, at the time of her sailing from St. Thomas, in the usual mode; by adding to the invoice price all duties and expenses, and the premium of insurance, as well upon the new cargo taken in, as upon the remnant of the old cargo. One of the expenses allowed, in such cases, is the expense of transportation from the place where the prime cost was ascertained, or where the goods were purchased, to the place where the voyage is to commence. Marsh. Ins. 621, 622; Stev. Av. 53. Stevens says: "When the average is adjusted at the port of loading, and the freight has been paid there, the practice is to add it to the value of the cargo, in the same manner as any other charge incurred on the goods before putting them on board the ship; for the merchant has then an interest in the freight, by its being converted into a charge on the goods."

Mr. Catlett, therefore, had a fair right, in settling this loss, to add to the invoice price of the 1,788 barrels of flour on board, when the ship sailed from St. Thomas for Cape Haytien, $1.25 on each barrel, for freight from Alexandria. The flour, under the opinion of the supreme court, not being liable in the hands of the underwriters for that freight, was really worth so much more; and Mr. Catlett had as good a right, under the circumstances of this case, to charge it, as if he had paid it at St. Thomas.

Upon this principle, Mr. Catlett's interest in the cargo will stand thus:

1,788 barrels flour, according to invoice price		$12,328 25
Freight on 1,788 barrels, earned at St. Thomas, at $1.25		2,235 00
Thirty doubloons		480 00
		$15,043 25
At the risk of the underwriters	$10,000 00
" " Mr. Catlett	5,043 25
		15,043 25

The amount saved is as follows:

Net proceeds of 220 bags of coffee		$3,517 40
Thirty doubloons	$480 00
Amount overpaid, by Thompson and Creed, on the ship	75 02
Balance paid by them to Captain McKnight	719 37
	$1,274 39
Deduct prime cost of 20 bags coffee	$481 66
Captain McK.'s expenses on cargo	285 78
	767 44
		506 95
Whole amount saved		$4,024 35

Then, as $15,043.25, the whole risk, is to $4,024.35, the whole salvage, so is $10,000, the underwriters' share of the risk, to $2,675.19, the underwriters' share of the salvage; leaving $1,349.16 for Mr. Catlett's share.

If, therefore, we were at liberty to vary the judgment for $6,626.18, which we were ordered by the mandate to enter, we should render judgment in favor of Mr. Catlett for $6,948.81, instead of $6,626.18, with directions to enter a credit of $5,907.81, with interest thereon from October 14, 1822, for which execution has already been ordered under the mandate, and should order execution now for the balance, being $1,041, with interest thereon from the 14th of October, 1822, till paid. But as the mandate seems to limit the judgment to the sum of $6,626.18, and execution has been ordered for $5,907.81, we can only order execution to be issued for the balance of the judgment already rendered, namely, $719.37, and interest thereon from the 14th of October, 1822, till paid. If the court is wrong, in adding the freight earned at St. Thomas to the invoice price of the cargo, the only difference in the above statement will be, that Mr. Catlett must have credit for his share of the salvage, $882.35, instead of $1,349.16. The difference is, $466.81, which, deducted from $1,041, leaves a balance still due to Mr. Catlett of $574.19.

CATLETT v. COOKE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 9.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1810.

JUDGMENT BY CONFESSION—FIERI FACIAS—DEATH OF PLAINTIFF.

In Virginia a judgment on confession is equal to a release of errors, and this court will not grant a writ of error coram vobis upon a suggestion of the death of the plaintiff, where the justice of the case does not seem to require it; nor will they quash a fieri facias issued in favor of the plaintiff's administrator upon a suggestion of the death of the administrator after the award of execution.

Motion by Mr. Swann, for the defendant [Leonard T. Cooke], for writ of error coram vobis, on the ground that the plaintiff died before judgment.

The judgment was confessed, and there had been a forthcoming bond, and an execution thereon by the administrator of Catlett, and a writ of error thereupon to the supreme court, where the judgment was affirmed, and the cause remanded by mandate.

This court refused to grant the writ of error (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, contra.) The confession of judgment by the act of assembly of Virginia of the 19th December, 1792, p. 113, § 43, is equal to a release of errors. It is not necessary for the justice of the case that the writ should be granted.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Swann then moved to quash a fieri facias issued by Manning, the administrator of Catlett, because Manning died after the award of execution.

THE COURT refused to quash it. (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, contra.)

CATLETT et ux. v. FAIRFAX.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 99.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1814.

EQUITY PRACTICE—ENFORCING DECREE AGAINST EXECUTOR.

In Alexandria, an execution de bonis propriis, is the proper process against an executor, upon a decree in equity for the balance of his administration account.

This was a motion to quash an execution against the defendant, de bonis propriis, on a decree in equity against him as executor of the will of Lord Fairfax, for the balance due upon the settlement of his administration account, to the plaintiff's wife, daughter of the testator.

E. J. Lee, for the plaintiff, stated that the execution in this form was according to the practice in the court of chancery in Virginia, and produced a certificate, to that effect, from Mr. Henning, the register of that court.

Motion overruled. (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.)

Case No. 2,517.

CATLETT et al. v. PACIFIC INS. CO.

[1 Paine, 594.] [2]

Circuit Court, D. New York. Oct. Term, 1826.

CIRCUIT COURTS — JURISDICTION — CITIZENSHIP — PLEADING AND PROOF — RESIDENCE TO ACQUIRE RIGHT TO SUE—EVIDENCE — SHIP'S REGISTER—RECORD OF CONDEMNATION—MARINE INSURANCE — THE POLICY — CONSTRUCTION — EXTRINSIC PROOF—JOINT AND SEVERAL INTERESTS—WAIVER OF ABANDONMENT.

1. The averment of the citizenship of the parties, to give jurisdiction to a circuit court, is a necessary averment, and must be proved under the general issue. It is not necessary that a citizen, removing from a territory of the United States, or a state, into another state, should acquire all the rights of a citizen of the state into which he removes, by the laws of such state. It is sufficient if he acquire a domicil there. Yet the declaration must aver that he is a citizen of the state: not sufficient to aver that he is a resident. Difficulty in understanding the term citizen, as used in the constitution.

[Cited in Burnham v. Rangeley, Case No. 2,176; Prentiss v. Brennan, Id. 11,385; Smith v. Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co., Id. 13,005.]

2. If one make such removal with the avowed object of acquiring a right to sue in the circuit courts, but with the intention of a permanent residence, and not to return, it is not a fraud upon the law.

[Cited in The Garland, 16 Fed. 288.]

3. The register of a vessel is the only document which need be on board during a period of universal peace, in compliance with the warranty of national character.

4. It is the original register which is required by law to be transmitted, on the loss of a vessel, to the register of the treasury to be cancelled: And as it is the practice not to destroy the register after it is cancelled, it is a document required by law to be deposited in the register's office; and a duly certified copy is legal evidence.

[Cited in The Missouri, Case No. 9,653.]

5. The record of condemnation of a vessel, in a court of vice-admiralty, is not evidence per se. The seal does not prove itself, but must be proved by a witness who knows it; or the handwriting of the judge or clerk must be proved; or that it is an examined copy. The certificate of the American consul is not sufficient to authenticate it.

6. The testimony of the captain, that a survey was held on the vessel, and that the surveyors reported that she could not be repaired but at too great an expense, and that she was thereupon condemned on his application; although not evidence of these proceedings, was held to be evidence that he coincided with the surveyors in opinion.

7. An averment that the plaintiffs have an entire interest in themselves in the subject insured, cannot be supported by evidence of a joint interest with others.

[Cited in Howard Fire Ins. Co. v. Chase, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 511.]

8. Nor can an averment of a joint interest with others, be supported by proof of a sole interest.

9. The plaintiffs purchased, separately, each a moiety of the cargo, which was specie, and instructed their agent to get it insured on their joint account. The agent effected the insurance, but the policy was expressed to be on account of owners: afterwards, one of the plaintiffs transferred half his share to the person who was to go in the vessel as supercargo. Held, that the term "owners," was descriptive of the persons intended to be insured, and referring to matters out of the policy, was open to explanation by extrinsic proof.

10. As the underwriters understood, when they made the insurance, that it was on account of the plaintiffs only, it was held, that they could not set up that the supercargo became an owner before the commencement of the risk.

11. The bill of lading, on its face, and the other papers, showed that the interest of the three owners, after shipment, was joint: but there was an endorsement on the bill of lading, stating that one half the cargo was the property of one of the plaintiffs, and the other half, the property of the other plaintiff and the supercargo: Held, that the endorsement was intended only to show the extent of each owner's interest; and that the separate purchase of the cargo, together with the endorsement, did not prove that their interests were several.

12. Before the end of the voyage, it was broken up, and the insured abandoned on learning the fact. The instructions to the master and supercargo, showed that the rights and duties of the latter, as supercargo, were not to commence until the end of the voyage. On the loss of the voyage, the master delivered the specie to the agent of the supercargo, and it was invested in cotton. Held, that as the supercargo was not interested in the policy, his acts did not bind the other joint owners; and that his capacity of supercargo suspended whatever powers he might have had as a partner, and that the investment by him of the specie, was as agent for the underwriters, and did not constitute an act of ownership, so as to waive the abandonment.

At law. This was an action of assumpsit [by Charles I. Catlett and James Keith, Jr., against the Pacific Insurance Company of New York], on a policy of insurance, on the cargo of the brig Sphinx. The questions decided arose on a motion for a nonsuit. The policy, which was in the common form, and dated on the 2d of February, 1818, purported to be effected by Le Roy, Bayard & Co., on account of the owners, upon all kinds of lawful goods and merchandises, laden or to be laden, on board the good American brig called the Sphinx, at and from Alexandria, Columbia, to Canton, and at and from thence back to Alexandria; beginning the adventure on said goods from and immediately following the loading thereof on board the said vessel at Alexandria, &c. The amount insured was 30,000 dollars. The declaration contained two special counts, the first of which, after setting out the policy, averred an undertaking of the company to insure the plaintiffs; and that 30,000 Spanish milled dollars were shipped at Alexandria on board the Sphinx; and an interest in the plaintiffs: That said vessel, on the 31st of March, 1818, sailed on her said voyage, in the course of which, she was, with the said goods, wholly lost. The averment of loss in the second count, was as follows: That the vessel having been disabled by the perils of the seas, was obliged to seek a port; and on the 31st of July, 1818, having reached the isle of France, a survey was held upon her, and the surveyors reported that she could not be repaired but at a cost of 20,000 dollars; whereupon the vessel was sold by a decree of the court of vice-admiralty, and the voyage broken up, and the plaintiffs abandoned to the defendants the part of the cargo insured by them.

The court having decided that the preliminary proof was sufficient, the plaintiffs introduced the following evidence, subject to exceptions: The policy, and invoice of the cargo. A copy of the register of the vessel, certified by Joseph Nourse, register of the treasury of the United States, to be a true copy of the original register on file, in the registry-office, which certificate was duly authenticated by the secretary of the treasury. The deposition of Peyton R. Page, the master of the vessel, taken under the act of congress. He testified that the cargo of the vessel, when she sailed from Alexandria, on the 31st of March, 1818, consisted of twenty-two kegs and seventeen boxes, containing 90,000 Spanish milled dollars, and of twenty-four barrels of ginseng. That on the 5th of April, the brig met with an injury in the Potomac, which it took until the 11th of April to repair. Proceeding on her voyage, she had bad weather, which caused the vessel to labour and strain very much, and the oakum worked out of her seams next the copper, in consequence of which she leaked considerably, and it was thought advisable to bear away for Madeira to repair. There she was calked, and on the 16th of May, proceeded on her voyage. From the 20th of June to the 16th of July, they had very heavy weather, and rough seas, the vessel labouring and leaking badly. On the 16th day of July, she encountered one of the heaviest gales of wind the deponent ever knew, and was so much strained, that the next day she made three feet water in fifteen minutes, and all the pumps kept her free with difficulty. The seams on the larboard side were open abreast and abaft the mainmast, the length of five feet. The stone ballast, guns, and spare spars were thrown overboard. The vessel worked in a frightful degree, so that the decks and beams were constantly in motion. The weather moderating on the 21st, the crew covered the seams with canvass, which diminished the leak, but the brig continued to work as if going to pieces. All hands were unanimous for making for the first port, and on the 29th of July, they arrived at the isle of France. A survey was held on the 31st of July, and the cargo having been landed by order of the surveyors, they again went on board on the 14th of August, and had the brig opened in various places, when it was found, deponent being present and seeing it, that eight of her puttocks were broken on her larboard side, and two or three on her starboard side. And the said surveyors reported, that the said brig could be repaired, but that it would cost to repair her there, as much as 20,000 dollars; upon which report, and upon the request of deponent, the court of vice-admiralty, in the isle of France, ordered the said brig to be sold, and she was sold accordingly. There was no opportunity to send on the cargo to Canton. Annexed to Page's deposition were the bill of lading, his letter of instructions, and the letter of instructions to Thomas R. Keith, the supercargo.

The bill of lading purported that 90,000 Spanish milled dollars, marked and numbered in the margin, 22 kegs, 17 boxes, were shipped on board the Sphinx, by Charles I. Catlett, James Keith, Jr., and Thomas R. Keith; to be delivered at Canton, to Thomas R. Keith, supercargo, on board, or his assigns. On the bill was the following endorsement:

45,000—say forty-five thousand dollars, the property of James Keith, Jr., and Thomas R. Keith.
45,000—say forty-five thousand dollars, the property of Charles I. Catlett.

$90,000

The letter of instructions to Captain Page, which contained all his instructions, was as follows: "Alexandria, March 28, 1818. Capt. Peyton R. Page, Dear Sir—You will please take command of the brig Sphinx, and proceed from hence to Canton, in China, where you will deliver your cargo to Mr. Thomas R. Keith, supercargo on board. Mr. Keith will furnish you with a return cargo, with which you will please proceed from Canton, with all possible despatch, direct to this port, guarding against any deviation that might affect our insurance; and we wish you to be very particular to conform to the laws and customs of China.—Wishing you a pleasant voyage, we remain your friends and servants, Charles I. Catlett, James Keith, Jr."

The letter of instructions to Thomas R. Keith, the supercargo, was as follows: "Alexandria, March 26, 1818. Mr. Thomas R. Keith, Dear Sir—We have shipped on board brig Sphinx, Peyton R. Page, master, ninety thousand Spanish dollars, to your address, which we wish you to invest on your arrival at Canton, in the articles named in the annexed memorandum. If our money should not be sufficient to load the brig back, you are at liberty to negotiate a credit in Canton, for a sum not exceeding thirty thousand dollars; and for this object we hand you a power of attorney, and letters from our highly respectable friends, Messrs. James and Thomas H. Perkins, of Boston, and Le Roy, Bayard & Co., of New-York, which, we trust, will enable you to obtain a credit on the most favourable terms. As a compensation for your services, we agree to allow you three per cent. commission. Relying upon your best exertions to promote our interest, and wishing you a pleasant voyage, we remain your friends and servants, Charles I. Catlett, James Keith, Jr. P. S.—March, 28th, 1818.—If you cannot obtain freight, and find it necessary to fill up the brig, and can obtain credit upon such terms as you think favourable, you are at liberty to take a credit of sixty thousand dollars, instead of thirty thousand. Be careful to be placed upon the most favourable footing, as we shall be very careful to promptly comply with your engagements. Yours truly, Charles I. Catlett, James Keith, Jr."

The plaintiffs also gave Thomas R. Keith the following letter of attorney: "Know all men by these presents, that we, Charles I. Catlett and James Keith, Jr., of Alexandria, District of Columbia, have nominated and appointed, and by these presents, do nominate and appoint Thomas R. Keith, our agent and attorney, to transact our business in Canton. Also, to negotiate a loan, or purchase merchandise on a credit, hereby binding ourselves and our heirs to comply with all contracts made for our account in Canton, by said agent and attorney. Given under our hands and seals, the 28th day of March, 1818. Charles I. Catlett, James Keith, Jr. Sealed, &c. in the presence of A. Moore."

It appeared from this deposition, that after the vessel was condemned, Captain Page delivered the dollars to Mr. Bickham, the American consul at the isle of France, and the agent of Thomas R. Keith. He was selected by Page and Keith as the safest person they could get to take charge of it. Captain Page considering Keith as a part owner, thought himself justified in delivering the same to his agent, believing it to be the best course he could pursue for those who might be interested in the cargo. Not wishing to create any expense to the owners, in relation to himself, he engaged as a mate on board a ship, and left the isle of France. What became of the dollars he did not know, but had understood that they were laid out in cotton at that place. A copy of the proceedings, and condemnation of the vessel, in the court of vice-admiralty, at the isle of France, with a certificate of the American consul to authenticate it, was offered in evidence, without any other proof of its authenticity. The impression on the seal of the court was effaced.

The plaintiffs offered the following evidence, (besides the invoice, bill of lading and endorsement,) in relation to their interest in the policy: Charles I. Catlett and James Keith, Jr., each furnished a moiety of the 90,000 dollars, separately. After it was shipped, and between the 20th and last of February, James Keith, Jr., declared in the presence of Page and Catlett, that he had given to his brother, Thomas R. Keith, one-third of his interest in the shipment, and that he was to have one-third of the profits. James Keith, Jr., observed, that he presumed it would be an insurable interest, and Catlett agreeing with him said, that as they were short insured, he would write to Thomas H. Perkins, of Boston, to effect further insurance, and that Thomas R. Keith's interest should be insured in the Boston policy. Page believed that Thomas R. Keith had no interest in the shipment until about the time of this conversation. On the 4th of February, Perit & Cabot, of Philadelphia, gave Thomas R. Keith a letter to Messrs. Perkins & Co., introducing him as the supercargo of the Sphinx, belonging to the plaintiffs.

The letters to Le Roy, Bayard & Co., and to Thomas H. Perkins, directing the insurance to be made, were as follows:

"Alexandria, January 29, 1818. Messrs. Le Roy, Bayard & Co. Gentlemen—Will you have the goodness to effect insurance on joint account of Mr. James Keith, Jr., and myself, upon brig Sphinx, Captain Peyton R. Page, from Alexandria to Canton, and back to Alexandria, against all risks? Say on vessel 10,000 dollars, valued at this sum—On specie 70,000 dollars, provided it can be done in an office of unquestionable solidity, at or under six and a half per cent. The balance of the specie we can get insured here at that rate. The brig is in complete order, and will probably sale by the middle of February. Very respectfully your most obedient servant, Charles I. Catlett."

"Alexandria, March 5, 1818. Colonel Thomas H. Perkins. Dear Sir—If perfectly convenient, you may, if you please, effect insurance on specie out, and merchandise home, at and from Alexandria, to, at, and from Canton, back to Alexandria, with the usual privileges for trade and refreshments; say 26,000 dollars, per brig Sphinx, Peyton R. Page, master, for account of James Keith, Jr., Thomas R. Keith, and Charles I. Catlett, if to be done at six per cent. Mr. James Keith, Jr., and myself, have already had insurance effected on 80,000 dollars. With esteem and respect, your most obedient servant, Charles I. Catlett."

William Bayard, Jun. of the house of Le Roy, Bayard & Co., testified that he went with his father to the office of the defendants to get the insurance effected; that his father went into the office with Catlett's letter, directing the insurance to be made, and that it was their practice to show such letters to the underwriters.

A letter was introduced from Catlett to Le Roy, Bayard & Co., dated the 7th of February, acknowledging the receipt of a letter advising James Keith, Jun. and Catlett of the insurance on the Sphinx and cargo. Thomas H. Perkins & Co. effected the insurance in Boston, agreeably to the directions of Catlett, at the office of the Suffolk Insurance Company, who subsequently paid the loss. John Wheelwright, who was called to prove the residence of the plaintiffs, testified, that James Keith, Jun. was a resident of Virginia. In December, 1824, Catlett removed to Virginia, and still resides there. About the time of his removal, he informed witness that, as a resident in the District of Columbia, he could not sue in the United States courts, and that he meant to procure a residence elsewhere, to enable him to sue. He said he intended to leave Alexandria, and not return, and to reside permanently in Virginia. On his removal he took a lease of a house in Virginia for one year.

On this evidence the plaintiffs rested their case; and,

T. A. Emmet and G. Griffen for the defendants, moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds:

1. That Catlett, as a citizen of the District of Columbia, could not sue in this court, and that he had not acquired the right by his residence in Virginia. In support of this position it was contended, that Catlett, having removed to Virginia with the avowed object of acquiring a residence so as to enable him to sue in the circuit court, it was an act in fraudem legis, and the right to sue in such court could not be acquired by it. It stood on precisely the same ground as the assignment of a chose in action for the same purpose, which had been decided not to give the court jurisdiction. And it was held to be immaterial that the assignment of the chose in action was for a valuable consideration; the decision was on the ground that it was an attempt to deprive the state courts of their jurisdiction. What varies this case from that in principle? They are neither of them cases contemplated by the constitution.

2. That the plaintiffs had not proved the warranty that the Sphinx was an American vessel. The warranty of national character implies, that the vessel shall have the necessary papers on board to show such character. Phil. Ins. 127; 14 Johns. 314; 1 Condy, Marsh, Ins. 406. But no evidence has been offered to show that any such papers were on board during the voyage; and the vessel is not even proved to have been American. The transcript from the treasury department is but a copy of a copy, and as such cannot be evidence. It is not the original register which is sent to the treasury department when the vessel is lost. That remains with the collector.

3. That the loss of the property insured was not proved. The loss is not pretended to have been an actual total loss, and the plaintiffs have not made out such a technical total loss as the law considers equivalent to an actual one. There is no proof that the Sphinx could not have been repaired at the isle of France. What the captain says of the proceedings of the surveyors and court of admiralty is not evidence. He should have given his own opinion as to her being reparable, and at what expense. This he has not done; he only says that some of her puttocks were broken. Why was he not called upon to prove the report of the surveyors, and the other proceedings of the court at Mauritius? Why were not the surveyors themselves examined?—for even a copy of their report, if established in proof, would not be evidence of the facts contained in it. [Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 206, 219. The record of a court of vice-admiralty is only evidence of the fact of condemnation; but in this case there is no survey proved and no condemnation. The proceedings of the court of vice-admiralty are not evidence per se; and no proof has been offered of the seal, which is effaced, of handwriting, nor any thing else. It was not a court acting under the law of nations, but a municipal court of the country. The condemnation binds the rights of no one, but is a mere justification of the acts of the master. The question whether the voyage was properly broken up, is a question of law for the court to determine. King v. Delaware Ins. Co., 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 71.

4. That there was a non-joinder of parties, Thomas R. Keith, one of the owners insured, not having been made a plaintiff. All the owners should have been joined. 16 Johns. 34. The policy is on account of owners. It is immaterial who were the owners when the policy was made. The question is, who were the owners when the policy attached; that is, on shipment of the goods? The bill of lading shows that at this time Thomas R. Keith was an owner. And the evidence of Page does not prove that he was not an owner even before the insurance was effected; and what he says, is of a conversation of the plaintiffs in the absence of the defendants, and not evidence. The letters from Catlett to Bayard & Co. and to Perkins are not evidence. It does not appear that the defendants knew when they insured that it was for the plaintiffs only. The letter from Catlett to Bayard is not proved to have been shown to them; and if it had been, parol evidence could not be admitted to alter the legal construction of the policy. All previous contracts and explanations are merged in the policy, and a court of equity—[Graves v. Boston Marine Ins. Co.] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 419—alone can rectify it. What is the legal construction? That all the owners at the time of shipment were intended to be insured. The insurance is on goods laden or to be laden on board, and the risk is to commence from the lading. Probably there was no interest in any one when the insurance was effected. If partnership property is insured, it is on account of all the partners, unless it clearly appear to be for account of only some of them.

5. That there was a variance between the declaration and proof: The declaration averred a joint interest in Catlett and James Keith, Jun. and the evidence showed that their interests were several. [Graves v. Boston Marine Ins. Co.] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 419; 3 Starkie, 1159; 5 Taunt. 208; 16 East, 141.

6. That the plaintiffs had exercised acts of ownership over the property insured after abandonment, by investing the specie in cotton. Thomas R. Keith was one of the insured, and a partner with the plaintiffs in the specie, and his acts at the isle of France are binding upon them. He received the property as owner. Phil. Ins. 453; [Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark] 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 272. And this view of the case is the most agreeable to justice. The investment of the specie in cotton was a speculation made by him for their joint benefit, and because it proved to be a losing one, the loss ought not to be thrown upon the defendants; they did not undertake to insure against the fluctuations in the market. This was such an act of ownership as waived the abandonment. 10 Johns. 177.

D. B. Ogden and J. Duer for the plaintiffs, insisted—

1. That the defendants could not avail themselves of the objection, that Catlett was not a citizen of Virginia under the general issue; they should have pleaded it in abatement. But he has been proved to be a citizen of Virginia, and the court cannot inquire into his reasons for becoming so. He has brought himself within the constitution and laws, and is by their provisions entitled to sue in this court; and what power have the court to say that his case forms an exception? The case of a chose in action is not analogous; in that case congress were obliged to pass an act specially providing against a fraudulent assignment; and if they had not expressly interfered by law, this court must have entertained a suit where the consignment had been made merely to give the court jurisdiction. And this is the strongest argument against this position of the defendant's counsel. In the case of the chose in action, cited from Dallas, the assignment was considered by the court as collusive and without consideration, and no interest passed by it. Here there has been a real bona fide removal. The motive was not merely to give the court jurisdiction; it was a permanent removal.

2. The only document necessary to prove the national character of the vessel, was her register. 14 Johns. 314. The voyage was in a time of general peace, and the documents required during war could not be wanted. Evidence of American ownership is enough prima facie (2 Serg. & R. 133) to prove this warranty.

3. The proof of loss is sufficient. At any rate there is enough to go to the jury. The testimony of Page shows the injuries the vessel had sustained, and it is a reasonable inference from his conduct, and what he says of the report of the surveyors, that his opinion coincided with theirs. If the proceedings of the court which condemned her are not themselves in evidence, the captain does prove the facts that a report of unseaworthiness was made by the surveyors, and that the vessel was condemned and the voyage broken up.

4. It is true that all the parties interested in the policy must be joined. But Thomas R. Keith, although interested in the shipment, had no interest in the insurance. The construction of the policy is not necessarily that it was for all the owners. "Owners" does necessarily mean sole owners. There can be no doubt that the plaintiffs had a right to insure their separate interest; and the only question is, for whom was the insurance made? It was effected by Le Roy, Bayard & Co. as agents. Agents for whom? Certainly for their employers, who were the plaintiffs. They paid the premium, and were the only parties to the contract. Thomas R. Keith had nothing to do with it, and can have no interest in it. Even if Thomas R. Keith had been an owner at the time the policy was effected, which he was not, it would have made no difference, so long as those who effected the insurance were agents for the plaintiffs alone.

5. The averment of joint interest in the plaintiffs is proved. Why, if their interests were separate, are there no marks upon the boxes? Suppose a loss, who would have borne it? There is nothing by which each could know his own property. The memorandum on the back of the bill of lading was only to show their shares in interest; and is this to be received to disprove a partnership positively made out?

6. The fact of the investment of the specie in cotton is not made out. But suppose it were: The specie was to be delivered to Thomas R. Keith at Canton, and not before; and until it reached Canton, he had no right to interfere with it as joint owner, supercargo, or in any other capacity, for the owners. The master was the sole and exclusive agent for the owners during the voyage, and the only person whose acts could affect their rights. No one in case of loss had any right to interfere with the cargo except the master. And the abandonment constituted him an agent for the underwriters. If a speculation was made it was for their benefit. It is immaterial that Thomas R. Keith made the investment. He could have no right to act for the owners; and if he had any agency, it was as a sub-agent for the underwriters through the captain. The captain by his letter of instructions could not deliver the specie to Thomas R. Keith until their arrival at Canton. It is a mere inference, that Thomas R. Keith did make the investment for the benefit of the owners; there is no proof of the fact. It is also an assumption that he acted in the capacity of joint owner. Suppose the master a joint owner. Would his duty to act for the insurers be taken away because he was owner as well as master? It is said, that it is to be inferred from the nature of the act that it was done by Keith as joint owner, and for the benefit of the owners. But why? It was necessary to transport the specie from the isle of France—it could not remain there; and the cotton, for aught that appears, could be as easily transported. That the investment was a judicious one is no evidence that he acted for the owners and not for the underwriters. If he was acting for the benefit of the latter, it is to be presumed he would have acted judiciously. And the investment was such an act as if made for them would have been good. 1 Marsh. Ins. 170; 1 Term R. 621n. But if the act was conclusive against himself it did not bind his copartners, if they were such. If there was a copartnership, the abandonment dissolved it.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. I regret that the counsel have not thought proper to adopt the course I suggested, of putting this cause into the shape of a special verdict, or a case subject to the opinion of the court, so as to afford me an opportunity of giving a more deliberate consideration to the several points that have been raised on the motion for a nonsuit, than is practicable in the hurry of a trial. But as this course has not been deemed expedient, I must proceed and dispose of these questions according to first impressions.

1. It has been objected in the first place, that the plaintiffs have not shown themselves entitled, under the constitution and laws of the United States, to bring their action in this court. There can be no doubt but that under the present pleadings it is necessary for the plaintiffs to prove that they are citizens of Virginia, and that the defendants are citizens of New-York. It has been said on the part of the plaintiffs that the question cannot arise upon the plea of the general issue, but must be raised by a plea in abatement. This proposition I think cannot be sustained. The citizenship of the parties is a necessary averment in the declaration, and the want of it is error for which the judgment would be reversed. And by the plea of the general issue, the proof of all necessary averments is thrown upon the plaintiff.

The question for consideration then is, whether, in the present case, this averment has been proved. There is some difficulty in understanding, precisely, the sense in which the term citizen is used in reference to this question. A citizen of the United States is, to many purposes, a citizen of each state; and I am not aware that it has ever been held, that where there is a permanent change of residence by a citizen from one state to another, the party so removing must acquire all the rights and privileges of a citizen of the state to which he removes, according to the state laws, before he can come into the circuit court of the United States. It has been held, however, that it is not enough for the party to aver, that he is a resident or inhabitant of the state, but there must be an averment in the language of the law and constitution, that he is a citizen. This presents some difficulty then, as to the proof that will sustain such averment. But I am inclined to think it is sustained by proof of a permanent and fixed residence, under such circumstances that it may be said, that he has his domicil there. A mere temporary residence for some special purpose might not be sufficient. In the present case there is no question with respect to Keith, one of the plaintiffs. The objection only goes to Catlett, the other plaintiff. And with respect to him, the proof is substantially, that he removed from Alexandria into Virginia in December, 1824, avowing that one of the objects of his removal was to enable him to prosecute this suit in the courts of the United States, at the same time declaring, that it was a permanent removal, never intending to return again to reside in Alexandria—that he leased a house in Virginia, and had lived there ever since his removal with his family. It has been said that his declaration, that one object he had in view by the removal, was to enable him to bring this suit, makes it a fraud upon the law. I do not think it can be considered in this light. If he had avowed that his sole object was to place himself in a situation to bring this suit, with an intention of returning to his former residence when it was ended, it might have been considered a fraud upon the law. But if he deemed the privilege of bringing a suit in the courts of the United States of sufficient consequence to justify a bona fide change of residence, he cannot be charged with a fraudulent evasion of the law, so as to make the act void. Whether it was a bona fide, or mere colourable removal, is a question for the jury. It is incumbent also on the plaintiffs to show, that the defendants were citizens of New-York; as a corporation there can be no citizenship. Their liability to be sued in this court must depend upon the citizenship of the individual members. The proof, with respect to them, is not very satisfactory; but as they are a company incorporated by a law of this state, and transacting their business in this city, it may be enough prima facie, to warrant the jury in finding that they are citizens of this state.

2. The next inquiry is, whether the assured have shown a compliance with the implied warranty in the policy, that the Sphinx was an American vessel. That she was American built, and owned by American citizens, is fully proved, so far as parol proof may be admissible to establish the fact, that the vessel was American property. The testimony of the captain is full on this subject. But it is said that this warranty not only implies, that the vessel was American property, but that she was duly documented as such, so as to show her national character. It was intimated by one of the counsel, that other documents than the register were necessary for this purpose, but it was not distinctly pointed out what those documents were; and the objection to this extent has not been urged by the other counsel. And I understand it, therefore, to be conceded, that an American register, if on board, would have been a compliance with this warranty; and I am not aware of any other document that could have been required. There being a state of universal peace, and no treaty provisions applicable to the voyage, the register was all that could be necessary to show the national character of the Sphinx. No question of neutral or belligerent rights could arise. This objection, however, under the testimony that has been offered, divides itself into two branches: (1) Whether the register has been sufficiently proved? (2) Whether it was on board the vessel? The proof of the register consists of the official certificate of Joseph Nourse, register of the treasury of the United States, that the document produced in evidence is a true copy of the original register on file in his office, together with a certificate of the secretary of the treasury, under the seal of the department, that Joseph Nourse is the register, and that the document is duly authenticated. It is said, however, that this is at best but a copy of a copy, and therefore not evidence. If the fact were so, the objection might be well founded. But, according to the provisions of the registry act, as I understand it, this is a copy of the original. The register is a document issued from the office of the register of the treasury, signed by the secretary of the treasury, and under the seal of the department. It is sent in blank in many parts to the collector of the port where it is to be used, and by him filled up as occasion may require; of which he is required to keep a copy in a record for that purpose provided, and also to transmit a copy of the same to the register of the treasury to be recorded; and when any vessel is lost, as in the present case, it is made the duty of the master to send the original register to the register of the treasury to be cancelled. And the document now produced is a copy of the original so returned. No further provision is made by the act for the disposition of the register after it is cancelled; but I believe it is the practical construction given to the act, not to destroy the register so returned, but to keep it on file in the office. It may, therefore, be well considered a document required by law to be deposited in the register's office, there to remain; and if so, a copy thereof was admissible, and was duly authenticated. The proof that the register was on board the vessel, is not very satisfactory. There are, however, some circumstances affording such a presumption, and this is matter for the jury.

3. The next objection is, that there is not sufficient evidence of the loss of the vessel. The proof offered to show the loss, consists of the vice-admiralty proceedings, on the survey and condemnation of the vessel at the isle of France, and the deposition of the captain. These admiralty proceedings were not offered in evidence until after the motion for a nonsuit had been made, and were admitted subject to objection, without any opinion having been expressed by the court as to their admissibility. These proceedings purported to be under the seal of the court, certified by the register, and accompanied by a certificate of the American consul, under his seal of office, that he was such register. These proceedings I think are not so authenticated as to entitle them to be read in evidence. The seal does not prove itself. There is no impression from which any conclusion can be drawn, that it is the seal of that or any other court: And some proof aliunde is always required, either that it is the seal of the court by a witness who knows the fact, or by proof of the handwriting of the judge or the clerk, or by an examined copy, compared with the original in the proper office, or some other evidence of a similar character. They do not alone, unaided by extrinsic evidence, carry with them that verity as to make them evidence in foreign courts. I attach no credit to the consular certificate. It has been said that he is an officer recognized by the law of nations, and entitled to credit. The law of nations recognizes him only in commercial transactions, but not as clothed with any authority to authenticate judicial proceedings. These proceedings must, therefore, be laid out of view. There is evidence, however, in the deposition of the captain tending to show the loss, and which must be submitted to the jury for that purpose. He describes the injury which made it necessary to put into the isle of France to repair, and swears that no other vessel could be obtained to carry on the cargo, which affords a strong inference that the Sphinx could not be repaired at that place, so as to prosecute the voyage at a less expense than that estimated by the surveyors. I do not mean to intimate that his testimony proves, or is admissible to prove, the proceedings of the surveyor, any further than will warrant the conclusion, that he coincided with them in opinion; he making the report of the surveyors the basis of his application for a condemnation of the vessel as unseaworthy: All which affords a pretty strong inference that, in the judgment of the captain, the vessel could not be repaired at that place at a less expense than twenty thousand dollars. At any rate, this is testimony proper to be submitted to the consideration of the jury, and the court cannot say there is no evidence of loss.

4. The next objection is, that the averments in the declaration are not supported by the proofs in the cause—that the averment is, a joint interest in the plaintiffs in this cause, and that the proof shows that Thomas R. Keith was either jointly interested with them in the specie insured, or that there was no joint interest in the three, but a separate interest in one moiety in Catlett, and a joint interest in the other moiety in the two Keiths, and that in neither case does the evidence support the averment. This necessarily calls for the inquiry, in the first place, for whom was this policy effected, and whose interest does it cover? The policy is in the name of Le Roy, Bayard & Co. and on account of owners. And it is said on the part of the defendants, that this is on account of the owners at the commencement of the voyage, and when the policy attaches, and not the owners when the policy is effected. This perhaps would be the legal construction, in the absence of all proof, explanatory of the term owners as used in the policy. It is very well established by the evidence, that Thomas R. Keith had no interest in this specie when this policy was underwritten; and that in point of fact, the only interest intended to be insured, was that of the plaintiffs in this cause. There can be no question but that one or more joint owners may insure their interest in joint property. The only question to be determined is, whether it has been done in this instance. It is equally clear, that if the insured aver an entire interest in themselves, in the subject insured, such averment cannot be supported by evidence of a joint interest with others. Nor can an averment of a joint interest with others, be supported by proof of a sole interest. As I understand the declaration in this cause, it only avers a joint interest in Catlett and James Keith, Jr., to the extent of thirty thousand dollars, and not an exclusive interest in the entire cargo. Will the policy then admit of the construction, that the insurance is for the benefit of Catlett and James Keith, Jr., and not for the benefit of Thomas R. Keith? It must be borne in mind, that application for insurance was not made by the plaintiffs themselves, but through their agents, pursuant to instructions; and the policy was filled up in the name of the agents for account of owners. The term "owners," is only descriptive of the persons intended to be insured, and they cannot sue on the policy without bringing themselves within that description. It is equally important and necessary, that they should show for what owners the agent acted, or who were intended to be insured under that description. Owners may include all concerned in interest, but such a construction is not necessarily to be given to the instrument. It is a proper subject for explanation. It does not contradict the policy to show who were the owners intended to be insured. The term "owners," as here used, necessarily refers to matter out of the policy, and cannot be explained by any thing appearing on the face of the instrument. It must, of course, be open to explanation by extrinsic evidence.

It certainly does appear from the facts, that no property was intended to be covered but the property of Catlett and James Keith, Jr. Whatever may have been the interest of Thomas R. Keith, it is manifest that Catlett, in instructing his agent to insure, did not mean that he should insure Thomas R. Keith's interest, but only his own and James Keith, Jr.'s, for Thomas R. Keith had not, at that time, any interest in the specie. If the underwriters understood when they underwrote the policy, that it was the agent's intention to insure only for Catlett and James Keith, Jr., and not for Thomas R. Keith, they cannot now set up that he was one of the insured, because he afterwards became part owner; for they never undertook to insure his interest. Their contract was with Catlett and James Keith, Jr., and no one else. That such was the understanding of the underwriters, is very satisfactorily made out. It is objected, that under this policy Thomas R. Keith might recover as one of the insured. But, I think, that the letter of instructions to Le Roy, Bayard & Co. would always be an insuperable obstacle to any such recovery.

The next question is, whether the evidence shows a joint property in Catlett and James Keith, Jr., conformably to the averment in the declaration. No circumstance has appeared from which it has been attempted to infer that their interests were separate, except the endorsements on the bill of lading. The bill of lading, on its face, the invoice, and all the papers which bear on this question, show that their interest was joint. And I consider the endorsements as made merely for the purpose of showing the extent of the interest of each owner, and not to contradict the bill of lading on its face. But it is said they furnished their proportions separately: It is certain that each purchased a moiety separately; but this proves only that they were separate owners before the specie was shipped; but it proves no more. When it was put on board. their joint interest commenced. The object was not to purchase it jointly, but to ship it jointly; and a joint ownership, after it was shipped, is sufficient. Besides this, there is no evidence of separate interests. There were no marks on the bill of lading to show that the plaintiffs intended to be separate owners, or to enable any one to identify the property of each. I disregard entirely the marks on the manifest, contained in the admiralty proceedings, as they have been entirely excluded, as not having been properly authenticated.

5. The only remaining objection that has been urged in support of this motion is, that on the breaking up of the voyage, at the isle of France, the specie was delivered by the captain to Thomas R. Keith, one of the part owners, and by him invested in cotton. This, it is said, exonerates the underwriters from all responsibility. The legal effect and operation of this act must depend upon the character in which Thomas R. Keith is to be considered as acting. If the view which I have taken of this case, under the last objection, be correct, he is not a party to this policy, and his interest in the cargo is in no manner covered or protected by it. And if the plaintiffs are to be bound or prejudiced by his acts, it must be by reason of their connexion as part owners. In all the cases which have been referred to, where the acts and interference of the owners, have been held to take away the right of abandonment. or to waive it, if made—they were the assured. In such case it is just and reasonable that the acceptance of the cargo, at any intermediate port, should discharge the underwriters. The master of the vessel, in whose possession the cargo is placed, is their agent, and they may revoke his authority, and take the cargo into their own hands. They are the only parties interested in the policy, and have the right to discharge it: But it by no means follows, that such authority is vested in one of the joint owners who has no interest in the policy. It has been said that the joint owners were partners, and that the law applicable to the rights of partners, must govern this case; and that the act of one, in judgment of law, is the act of all. There is no doubt, but in partnership transactions, all the partners are bound by the acts of each which fall within the scope of the partnership. But I cannot consider this such a case. The rights and authority of partners, whatever they might have been, were suspended and modified by the special arrangement between them, under which this property was shipped. One of the joint owners, who had no interest in this policy, was constituted supercargo, and as such, became the agent of the plaintiffs, so far as their interest was concerned. His rights and powers as partner, were suspended, and merged in his new character of supercargo; and he thereby parted with the possession and control of the property in transitu. His functions, as supercargo, did not commence until the arrival of the vessel at Canton. Upon the voyage the cargo was in the possession, and under the management and control of the master: He was the agent of the owners, and responsible to them under his bill of lading. It cannot be pretended that Thomas R. Keith, as part owner, would have had a right to demand of the master this specie, and to have invested it in cotton, or any thing else, if the voyage had not been broken up. A delivery of it to him would not have exonerated the master from his liability on the bill of lading; and if not, I am unable to see why the breaking up of the voyage should give to Thomas R. Keith any greater rights. The captain. thereupon, became the agent of the underwriters, and bound to them for the faithful discharge of his duty as such; and they became responsible for his acts. And the same rule applies to the supercargo; he becomes the agent of the underwriters. And the assured are not bound by his acts where there is a right to abandon. I do not, therefore, think that the plaintiffs' claim upon the underwriters is taken away by the acts of Thomas R. Keith, at the isle of France.

I have thus briefly noticed the several grounds which have been urged in support of the motion for a nonsuit, some of which are by no means free from difficulty; and I am not prepared to say, that I do not entertain doubts upon some of the questions that have been raised and discussed. From what has fallen from the bar, however, there is little reason to think that either party will be satisfied with the result of the trial here, but that the cause must ultimately go to the supreme court of the United States. Under such circumstances, I deem it most prudent and discreet, and best calculated to advance the ends of justice with as little expense and delay as practicable, to proceed in the cause, and have the whole merits of the case disclosed. And this course I should think advisable, even if I entertained stronger doubts than I do upon the questions which I have been called upon to decide. The motion for a nonsuit is accordingly overruled.

The defendants then proceeded with their defence, which was, that some of the stockholders of the Pacific Insurance Company were not citizens of New York. Having proved that three stockholders resided in other states. the court ordered the plaintiffs to be nonsuited.

CATLETT (SMITH v.). See Case No. 13,021.

Case No. 2,518.

CATLIN v. CURRIER.

[1 Sawy. 7.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Jan. 17, 1870.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE—WHEN VOID—FORECLOSURE—RIGHTS OF THIRD PERSONS.

1. A mortgage of personal property, accompanied by an oral agreement or understanding between the parties thereto, that the property should remain in the possession of the mortgagor, and be disposed of by him in the course of his business, and the proceeds thereof applied to his own use, is a conveyance or assignment of such property in trust for the person making the same, and, therefore, void as against the creditors existing or subsequent of such mortgagor. Code Or. 655.

[Cited in Re Morrill, Case No. 9,821.]

2. A decree foreclosing a chattel mortgage does not affect the rights of third persons in the goods mentioned therein.

At law. This action was brought [by John Catlin, assignee of John A. Daly] to recover damages for the conversion by the defendant [William Currier], to his own use, of a stock of hats and hatter's tools, alleged to have belonged to the estate of Daly.

On the trial, the court, sitting without a jury, found the following facts:

1. That about the month of November, 1866, the defendant being then and ever since engaged in the business of a merchant tailor and clothier at number 103 Front street, Portland, formed a partnership with John A. Daly, a hatter, to carry on the hat business under the firm name of John A. Daly & Co., at the defendant's place of business aforesaid; and that the defendant, at the commencement of said partnership, advanced said firm the sum of $1,500 in gold coin; and on March 12, 1867, indorsed the note of the firm for the sum of $1,000 in gold coin, which he afterwards paid with interest to Ladd & Tilton, bankers, at Portland.

2. That Daly expended the $1,500 aforesaid, in the purchase of stock for the firm, and at the same time obtained about $2,500 worth of stock on credit, and that on December 24, 1867, said firm, by agreement of the parties thereto, was dissolved, and the stock of goods and fixtures on hand were turned over to Daly, who was to continue the business on his own account at the same place.

3. That the business of Daly & Co. yielded no profits, nor did the defendant receive any money from it as profits or otherwise, but that Daly during the existence of the firm drew out of the business from $50 to $75 per month for his support. That at the date of the dissolution aforesaid Daly & Co. were owing the defendant the sum of $2,546 in gold coin, for money advanced and paid by the defendant as aforesaid, for which sum Daly then gave his promissory note, payable on demand to the defendant or order, with interest at one per centum per month, to secure the payment of which note, Daly at the same time executed a mortgage to the defendant upon the stock and fixtures of the hat business aforesaid, then being and to remain at 103 Front street aforesaid, with condition that the same should be void upon the payment of $2,546 in gold coin, on or before December 24, 1868, with interest at the rate of one per centum per month; that the mortgage further provided that if default should be made in the payment of the principal sum, or any installment of the interest thereon, then the mortgagee was empowered to take the goods into his possession and sell the same by due process of law, or by agreement of the parties, and out of the money arising therefrom to pay the debt, interest, charges, etc., and until default be made as aforesaid, the mortgagor, or his assignees, were to remain in the possession of the goods and in the full and free use and enjoyment of the same.

4. That the mortgage aforesaid was duly filed in the county clerk's office of the proper county on December 27, 1867, but no affidavit was ever made or filed by the mortgagee, therein setting forth his interest in the mortgaged property. That Daly made default and failed to pay the principal sum mentioned in such mortgage and the installments of interest thereon, or any part thereof, although requested so to do, whereupon the defendant on or about November 25, 1868, took possession of all the stock and fixtures then in the possession of Daly, at number 103 Front street aforesaid.

5. That at the execution of the mortgage aforesaid it was orally agreed and understood between the parties thereto, that, notwithstanding said mortgage, Daly might dispose of the stock of goods in the course of his business, and that any new or additional stock which Daly might purchase to supply the place of that so sold, should be bound by and included within the terms and operation of said mortgage, and that in pursuance of such oral agreement, Daly sold from the original stock and added thereto by purchase; that when the stock was turned over to Currier as aforesaid, there was remaining on hand of the goods mentioned in the mortgage what was equal in value to $700 in gold coin, and of the fixtures so mentioned, what was equal in value to $100 in gold coin, and of goods that had been added by Daly to the original mortgaged stock what was equal in value to $975 in gold coin.

6. That on December 19, 1868, Daly was, by the district court for the district aforesaid, duly adjudged a bankrupt upon the petition of his creditors, and that on January 13, 1869, the plaintiff, being then duly qualified as assignee of the estate of the said Daly, duly demanded of the defendant the property above mentioned, whereupon the defendant delivered to the plaintiff all that part of the goods in his possession which had been purchased by Daly since the execution of the mortgage; but as to the goods and fixtures then in his possession, and included and mentioned in said mortgage, the same being of the value of $800 in gold coin, the defendant refused to deliver the same to the plaintiff, but retained the same as his own property, under and by virtue of the mortgage, and the default of Daly in not performing the conditions therein.

7. That the defendant withdrew from the firm of Daly & Co. and transferred his interest in the stock and fixtures thereof, and received the mortgage as aforesaid, without any fraudulent intent, and without any intent to hinder, delay or defraud the creditors of him, the said Daly, but for the purpose of protecting his own interest and securing his debt.

8. That on December 1, 1868, defendant commenced a suit in the circuit court, for the county of Multnomah, to foreclose the mortgage aforesaid, and that on January 2, 1869, for want of an answer by the only defendant in said suit, the said Daly, said circuit court adjudged and decreed among other things, that the lien of said mortgage be foreclosed, and that the property mentioned therein be sold as by law provided, to satisfy the debt aforesaid, due from said Daly to said Currier, but that no sale appears to have been made of such property or any part thereof, by virtue of or in pursuance of such decree or otherwise.

9. That the decree aforesaid recites that the summons and copy of the complaint in such suit had been duly served upon the defendant therein, and that the time for answering such complaint had expired, whereas it appears from the original summons in such suit that the same was served by a person specially appointed by the proper sheriff to serve the same; but that the return of such person as to making such service is not proven by his affidavit, or otherwise than by his mere certificate.

And the court being then unadvised as to what conclusion of law should be drawn from the premises, directed the matter to be argued by counsel, after which the following conclusions of law were found:

1. That the writing executed by Daly on December 24, 1867, purporting to be a mortgage of a certain stock of goods and fixtures to the defendant herein, taken in connection with the contemporaneous oral agreement of said Daly and defendant as set forth in the findings of fact aforesaid, was and is a valid mortgage of said fixtures, but was and is not a mortgage of said stock of goods, but a conveyance or assignment by said Daly of the same to said defendant, in trust for the use and benefit of said Daly, and therefore was and is void and of no effect, as to said stock of goods, as against the plaintiff herein.

2. That the goods and fixtures aforesaid never having been seized or sold under the decree purporting to foreclose the mortgage thereon, the title thereto nor the rights of the parties to this action, therein, were and are in no way affected thereby, and therefore it is immaterial whether such decree was given before or after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy against Daly, or whether or not the same is void for want of a sufficient proof of the service of the summons upon said Daly, or whether or not the same was obtained after the demand of the plaintiff herein for the possession of the property.

3. That the defendant herein, wrongfully converted to his own use the goods aforesaid of the value of $700, aforesaid, by refusing to deliver the same to the plaintiff herein when duly demanded thereto, wherefore the plaintiff is entitled to recover of and from said defendant the value of said goods so converted to his own use as aforesaid.

DEADY, District Judge. The material question in this case is involved in the first conclusion of law stated in the findings of the court. Is the writing executed by Daly to the defendant, purporting to mortgage to the latter certain goods, when taken in connection with the contemporaneous oral agreement and understanding of the parties, a simple mortgage or a conveyance or transfer of the property in question, in trust, for the use and benefit of Daly, and therefore void as against creditors?

This question does not arise under any provision of the bankrupt act. While there is some reason for supposing that Daly was insolvent when he executed the so-called mortgage to the defendant, yet there is nothing in the case to show that he owed any other debts than the one due the defendant. Under these circumstances, even if Daly was insolvent, it could not be said that the writing was either executed or received, with an intention to give or receive a preference, or to hinder or delay existing creditors, or to evade or defeat any provisions of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 534].

The question therefore turns upon the statute of the state and the general principles of law applicable to such a transaction. By the former it is declared that a mortgage of personal property unaccompanied by immediate possession creates a disputable presumption of fraud as against the creditors of the mortgagor, unless the same is duly filed or recorded as provided by law (Code Or. 339); and also that all conveyances and transfers of goods and chattels, in trust for the person making the same, shall be void as against the creditors, existing or subsequent, of such person (Id. 655).

A chattel mortgage is a pledge of personal property as a security for the performance of some act—such as the payment of an existing debt. The law allows the property pledged to remain in the possession of the mortgagor if the mortgage is put on record as notice to the world. But if the mortgage be also coupled with a condition or agreement that the mortgagor may treat the goods as if he were the owner of them—may sell them at his option and receive the proceeds to his own use—such condition or agreement avoids the mortgage. The two cannot stand together. Such use of the mortgaged property by the mortgagor is utterly inconsistent with the idea of giving a pledge or security to the mortgagee. In legal effect it is a sham, a nullity—a mere shadow of a mortgage, only calculated to ward off other creditors—a conveyance in trust for the benefit of the person making it, and therefore void as against creditors.

In this case, it is shown by the finding of the court (and the testimony of the defendant was clear and unequivocal upon that point) that by the understanding between the defendant and Daly, the latter was to continue, not only in the possession of the goods, but to sell and dispose of them in the course of his business, at his option, and take the proceeds to his own use—and so he did with the knowledge and consent of the defendant until the defendant took possession near the close of the year 1868. As against the other creditors of the bankrupt, the defendant cannot claim anything in this property by such a transaction. In re Manly [Case No. 9,031], decided by Mr. Justice Leavitt of the southern district of Ohio, is a case on all fours with the one under consideration, and there the mortgage was held void as to creditors.

The case of Godchaux v. Mulford, 26 Cal. 316, cited by counsel for defendant, is not in point. In that case it was held, that in all mortgages of goods and chattels, whether accompanied by possession or not, there is a trust created in favor of the mortgagor, as to the surplus, if any, and that the statute of frauds which declares all transfers of goods made in trust for the party making the same, to be void as to creditors, does not apply to such a trust. That the trust as to the surplus is not the object of the transfer, but a mere incident, and does not bring the transaction within the purview of the statute. But in the case at bar, the trust created was something more than a mere legal implication that the surplus, if any, after paying the debt of the defendant, should be held by him for the benefit of Daly. As has been shown, it was an express agreement that notwithstanding the mortgage to the defendant, Daly might proceed to dispose of the goods as his own and receive the proceeds to his own use. This was an express trust in favor of Daly, as to all the mortgaged goods, which rendered the mortgage itself totally inoperative, so long as the goods were allowed to remain in Daly's possession. As the mortgage became forfeited within a month from its execution, for the want of payment of the first installment of interest on the debt, it was in the power of the defendant to have terminated this trust at any time thereafter, by taking the goods into his own possession. But he saw proper to leave them with Daly, with the power to use and dispose of them as his own, and now the law and good morals agree that the defendant should not be preferred to other creditors, who, it may be, trusted Daly upon the faith of this unqualified possession and apparent absolute ownership.

But it is said by the counsel for defendant, that the question of "fraudulent intent" under the statute is a question of fact (Code Or. 637), and that, as the court has found as a matter of fact that the defendant acted in the premises without any intent to defraud any one, the only conclusion of law proper to be drawn from the facts is in favor of the validity of the mortgage.

This argument, it seems to me, is based upon two erroneous assumptions. First, that the fraudulent intent of which the statute speaks as sufficient to avoid a mortgage is, in any case, the intent of the mortgagee; and, second, that the question of "fraudulent intent" is involved in this case at all.

The "fradulent intent" which by section 52 of the chapter on conveyances (Code Or. 637) is made a question of fact in all cases arising under titles 2, 3, and 4 of that chapter, is the intent of the grantor or vendor, and not that of the grantee or vendee. It is not found in this case whether Daly, the alleged mortgagor, acted in good faith or not. It is possible that he acted in bad faith, notwithstanding the defendant acted in good faith. But the fact is not material. Nor does section 52 of the chapter on conveyances include the provision of the statute (Code Or. 339) which furnishes the special rule as to when a sale or assignment or mortgage of personal property is to be deemed fraudulent and void as to creditors, because not accompanied by an immediate delivery and a continued change of possession.

As to the second error of the argument under consideration, it is sufficient to say, that such a mortgage or conveyance as this—a conveyance in trust for the party making it—is declared void as to creditors, as a matter of public policy, without reference to the intent of the parties thereto. The law assumes absolutely, and beyond doubt correctly, that in no circumstances can such a transaction be upheld in justice to creditors. That is this case, and whatever may have been the intention of the parties, the law for the protection of the general creditors of the debtor, declares the so-called mortgage void, because made in trust for Daly.

As to the second conclusion of law, the matter seems too plain for argument. The decree foreclosing the mortgage, at most only extinguished the right of redemption as between Daly and the defendant. There was no seizure or sale of the goods under the decree, and beyond extinguishing the right of redemption, as stated, it had no effect upon the property in the goods, even between the mortgagor and mortgagee. But more than that, the plaintiff was not a party to this decree and the writing upon which it is based, however valid between the parties to it, is void as to the general creditors whom he represents.

There must be a judgment for the plaintiff for the value of the goods.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Feb. 14, 1870.

BANKRUPT, EMPLOYMENT OF BY BAILEE — BAILEE ENTITLED TO CREDIT FOR SERVICES — MUTUAL DEBTS OR CREDITS — ORDER EXPUNGING CLAIM WILL NOT PREVENT ITS BEING PLEADED AS SET-OFF — CONDITIONS PRECEDENT TO ACTION BY CREDITOR.

1. Where a bailee of an insolvent debtor's goods, prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against such debtor, employed him to assist in the sale and management of such goods: Held, that such employment was not illegal and that the bailee, as against the assignee in bankruptcy, was entitled to a credit for the amount paid therefor.

2. Where a bailee of an insolvent debtor's goods bestowed labor upon and about them, with a knowledge that such debtor had committed an act of bankruptcy in making such bailment, he is entitled to a credit for the value of such services as against the claim of the assignee in bankruptcy for such goods or their value.

4. An order expunging a claim against the estate of a bankrupt, is not such an adjudication thereof as prevents the creditor from pleading it as a set-off in an action by the assignee for a claim due such estate.

5. Semble, that the proof of a debt before the register and the rejection thereof by the district court, and the appeal therefrom to the circuit court, are conditions precedent to the creditor's right to maintain an action against the assignee for the recovery of his debt, but do not constitute or have the effect of an adjudication upon or against such claim.

David Friedenrich, for plaintiff.

David Logan, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action was commenced July 26, 1869. The complaint states that on January 30, 1869, proceedings were commenced in the district court for this district, wherein said Randall & Sunderland were duly adjudged bankrupts, and that plaintiff is the assignee of their estate; and that the defendant from January 9th to the 30th aforesaid, had the possession of all the goods and chattels of said bankrupts, and that during said period said defendant sold and disposed of parcels of said goods and received sums of money due said bankrupts, in all to the amount of $1,525.74 in gold coin, and paid out of said moneys on account of said bankrupts the sum of $926.99, retaining in his possession $597.74 of said moneys; and that afterward, on July 7, 1869, the plaintiff, as assignee aforesaid, demanded the same of the defendant, and that defendant refused to deliver said moneys or any part thereof to the plaintiff and still detains the same: Wherefore the plaintiff prays judgment for the delivery of said money with interest in coin for the use thereof at the rate of ten per centum per annum since April 9, 1869.

The answer of the defendant admits the allegations in the complaint, except that it denies that the defendant received any greater sum than $1,514.73, and avers that he paid out $979.49, and denies that he retained or still retains any greater sum than $535.24, received by him for goods sold or debts collected, belonging to said bankrupts.

The answer also contains two counterclaims which the defendant offers to set off against the demand of the plaintiff. The first for the sum of $250, which the defendant's attorneys demand of him for legal services rendered the defendant while conducting and settling the business of Randall & Sunderland. The second is also for the sum of $250 for and on account of the services of defendant in and about the management of the business of said Randall & Sunderland.

On motion, the first of these counter-claims was stricken out, as it did not appear that the defendant had ever paid the amount to the attorneys, but only that they claimed that he was liable for it.

To the second claim the plaintiff replied—denying knowledge of defendant's services and that they were worth $250.

Also, that on January 9, 1869, Randall and Sunderland made an assignment to the defendant of all their goods and effects, under which assignment the defendant took possession of all the property of said bankrupts; that said assignment was made in fraud of the bankrupt act and was the act of bankruptcy upon which said Randall & Sunderland were adjudged bankrupts; and that defendant colluded and conspired with said bankrupts in said fraudulent act, and in fraud of the bankrupt act managed the business of the bankrupts until enjoined therefrom by the proceedings in bankruptcy on January 30, 1869.

Also, that on April 1, 1869, the defendant filed a claim against the estate of the bankrupts for the same services; that afterwards certain creditors of said estate filed objections to said claim and such proceedings were had thereupon, before the register on default of the defendant, that an order of this court was made expunging said claim from the lists of claims upon the assignees' record, which order still remains in full force.

In pursuance of the stipulation of the parties, the cause was tried without the intervention of a jury on January 25th, and reserved for decision.

On the trial the defendant was called as a witness by the plaintiff. The only other evidence introduced was the assignment and the papers and proceedings in the bankruptcy case.

The evidence of the defendant supported his answer as to the amount of money received and paid out by him on account of the bankrupts, during his possession of the goods, and as nothing was shown or appears to the contrary, the fact must be found accordingly.

Of the money so paid out, as it appears from the account stated by the defendant, which is a part of his testimony, there was paid to Sunderland, one of the bankrupts, on January 30, the sums of $31.50 and $21. On account of these payments being made to the bankrupt, the plaintiff objects to their being treated and considered as payments on account of the estate.

According to the testimony of the defendant the payments were made under these circumstances. The business of the bankrupts consisted of a retail boot and shoe shop, and some manufacturing up-stairs, with a stock of about $14,000. The defendant had the general superintendence of the business and employed Sunderland to oversee the manufacturing at $75 per month. Paid him sums on tag from time to time, amounting in all to the sum of the two payments, which were afterwards charged on January 30, and that such wages were less than a person not interested could be obtained for.

The fact of the payments, is in effect, denied in the pleadings, but on the trial, the objection insisted upon was the illegality of paying money to one of the bankrupts. But I do not perceive that the employment of Sunderland on fair terms to do what was necessary and convenient to be done about the business, is in any way contrary to law or good morals. Indeed, I suppose the defendant might have returned to R. & S., at any time prior to the injunction, all the property he received from them under the void assignment. Much more, it seems to me, might he pay S. reasonable wages for work and labor performed about the business and property while under his charge. In any view of the matter, the defendant is only liable to the plaintiff for what came into his hands from or through the bankrupts, and was not returned to them or their representative—the assignee in bankruptcy. The question is, was the payment or delivery of the $52.50 actually made to S. prior to the service of the injunction upon the defendant on January 30th, or not. If made after the service of the injunction—being in such case made in violation of it—I suppose it would be wrongful and the defendant would still be liable for the amount.

But, as has been suggested, the fact of the payments having been made as alleged, was not seriously contested on the trial. The testimony of the defendant is direct and positive to that effect, and it must be considered proven. This shows that the defendant has only $532.24 in his hands belonging to the estate of R. & S.

Is he entitled to set off his claim for services against a like amount of this sum?

The plaintiff's objection to the allowance of this set-off has been stated in his replication. From the evidence it appears that the defendant went into possession and control of the goods and business of R. & S. on January 10, 1869, under an assignment to himself, which was afterward, namely, on February 27th, adjudged void by this court, as being a fraud upon the bankrupt act, and an act of bankruptcy, and that he continued in such possession and control, and managed and conducted said property and business under said assignment, until enjoined by this court, on January 30, thereafter.

As to the alleged conspiracy and collusion between the defendant and R. and S., there is no direct proof. But from the circumstances shown the inference is reasonable that the defendant accepted the assignment and went into possession under it with a knowledge of the facts which, in contemplation of law, made such assignment fraudulent and an act of bankruptcy—namely, that R. and S. were insolvent and were by that means attempting to dispose of their property with intent to defeat and delay the operation of the bankrupt act.

On account of this knowledge the plaintiff claims that the defendant is not entitled to anything for his services under this illegal assignment; and that if he is, he should be required to prove his debt and take his pro rata with the other creditors, and not receive his pay in full by being allowed it as a set-off against the money of the estate in his hands.

The questions made by the objection of the plaintiff are not free from doubt.

By section 20 of the bankrupt act it is provided: "That in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated and one debt set off against the other and the balance only shall be allowed or paid, but no set-off shall be allowed of a claim in its nature not provable against the estate; provided, that no set-off shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the bankrupt of a claim purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition."

This is the only provision in the bankrupt act touching the subject of set-off, and it is substantially the same as that contained in 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 50; but the English act further provides that such set-off may be made "notwithstanding any prior act of bankruptcy committed by the bankrupt before the credit given or debt contracted by him. * * * ; provided, that the person claiming the benefit of such set-off, had not, when such credit was given, notice of an act of bankruptcy by such bankrupt committed."

But for this proviso, it seems to have been holden in the English courts, that a debtor to a bankrupt could only be called upon to pay the balance after deducting what the bankrupt owed him, whether the credit was given to such bankrupt after notice of an act of bankruptcy committed by him or not. 1 Bac. Abr. 647.

This proviso not being in our act, nor any equivalent of it in legal effect, I conclude upon this authority, and indeed upon general principles, that although the defendant had notice of the act of bankruptcy committed by R. and S. when he rendered the service, he is entitled to set off the value of the same against what he owes them or their assignee, provided, the transaction amounts to a case of mutual credit between the parties, and the defendant's "claim in its nature is provable against the estate."

The term "mutual credits" in the bankrupt acts is more comprehensive than the term "mutual debts" in the statutes of set-off. The term "credit" is synonymous with "trust," and the trust or credit need not be of money on both sides, but if one party entrusts the other with goods or value it will be a case of mutual credit. 7 Bac. Abr. 170.

By section 42 of the bankrupt act of April 4, 1800 [2 Stat. 33], when a mutual credit was given before a party became bankrupt a set-off was allowed between the parties. Under this act it was decided that where the acceptor of a bill of exchange paid it after bankruptcy of the drawer, he might set off the amount of the same in an action by the assignee of the drawer for the value of certain goods consigned to the acceptor after the acceptance, and by him converted into money before the bankruptcy. This was held to be a case of mutual credit before the bankruptcy, although the defendant did not pay the debt set off until after the bankruptcy; and although under that act the debts, for that reason, could not have been proved against the estate. Marks v. Barker [Case No. 9,096].

In the case of Rose v. Hart, 8 Taunt. 499, cited 7 Bac. Abr. 650, it was ruled that where cloth was deposited with a fuller to dress by a party who afterwards became bankrupt, that there was a case of mutual credit to the value of the services for dressing the cloth, but not for a general balance due from the bankrupt; and in that case the general rule was laid down that the credits intended by the act were only such "as must in their very nature terminate in cross debts; as where a debt is due from one party and credit given by him on the other, for a sum of money payable at a future day and which will then become a debt; or when there is a debt on one side and a delivery of property with directions to turn it into money on the other; but where there is a mere deposit of property, without authority to turn it into money, no debt can ever arise out of it, and therefore it is not a credit within the meaning of the statute."

Within the rule laid down by these authorities there can be no doubt but that this was a case of mutual credit—at least to the value of the defendant's services. The defendant received the goods and accounts and undertook in the course of the business to convert them into money. His skill and labor in this respect have some value. R. & S. credited—trusted—him with the property and with the money he might realize from it, and the defendant credited them for his services—yet to be rendered. Therefore the credits were mutual—and were also such credits as must result in cross debts.

The debt of the defendant is also provable under the act. Section 9 provides: "That all debts due and payable from the bankrupt, at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy, and all debts then existing but not payable until a future day, a rebate of interest being made when no interest was payable by the terms of the contract, may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt."

In the case under consideration the adjudication was made on February 27th, and on January 30th, the debt due the defendant for his services was both due and payable; and if it had then only existed, but been payable at a future day, would still have been provable.

What is the value of the services? In his answer the defendant claims that they are worth $250 in coin. On April 1, 1869, he swore to the proof of debt before the register for these same services, in which he stated that R. & S. were justly indebted to him on that account "in the sum of $125 * * * for labor and services * * * from January 9th, 1869 to January 30th, at the rate of $200 per month in legal tender." At that time $125 in currency was about equal to $100 in coin. On the trial the defendant being asked by his counsel if $250 in coin was a reasonable compensation for his services, did not answer yea or nay, but said—"I don't think it very extravagant."

The service was a general superintendence of a retail boot and shoe shop for twenty days, with the assistance of Sunderland, one of the former proprietors and assignors.

I think $5 per day in coin a fair compensation. That is what the defendant estimated the value of his services at, in his proof of debt before the register last April, and no reason is shown for the increase of 150 per centum since that time.

Allowing the defendant a set-off of $100 in coin and deducting that sum from the debt due the plaintiff, leaves the sum of $423.24. Add to this interest on the same since July 7—seven months—makes $458.88—which is the sum due the plaintiff in coin.

But the plaintiff also objects to the allowance of this set-off, on the ground of an adverse prior adjudication as set forth in his replication.

The facts concerning the matter are these: On April 1, 1869, the defendant proved a debt for these services of the sum of $125 in legal tender. On objection by some of the creditors, and a motion to expunge the claim from the list of proven debts, the matter was referred by the court to the register. In the meantime, it may be presumed that the defendant, acting upon the advice of his counsel, concluded not to press his claim to payment by the assignee, but to rely upon having it allowed in full as a set-off against the sum then in his hands belonging to the estate—at least he did not appear before the register, but allowed the matter to go by default. Thereupon the register reported as a conclusion of fact that said claim was for services rendered under a fraudulent and void deed of assignment to the defendant, and as a conclusion of law that it ought not to be allowed. Upon motion, and without argument, there being no opposition, on August 16, this court confirmed this report and made an order expunging the claim from the list of debts. There the matter rested until the plaintiff brought this action, when the defendant pleaded the claim as a set-off.

Before proceeding to consider whether that order amounts to a final judgment against the claim of the defendant, it is proper to state, that the conclusion of the register against the legality of the claim was predicated upon the case of Leavitt v. Yates, 4 Edw. Ch. 205, cited in 5 Abb. Dig. 273, as deciding: That where a trust deed is pronounced void, as being contrary to law, the trustee cannot be allowed any compensation for services under it. Upon the strength of this authority, this court made the order of August 16, rejecting the claim. I now think that order was erroneous, and upon examination of the original report of the case of Leavitt v. Yates, I find that it does not decide any such thing as stated in the digest. The vice chancellor refused to allow the trustees the salary provided in the void trust deed, but did allow the necessary expense of taking care of and managing the property, while in the hands of the trustees.

These services were rendered by the defendant at the request of R. & S., before the petition filed in bankruptcy, and unless there is some established rule of law or positive statute prohibiting the payment or allowance of such a claim, I cannot now see upon what ground the right to have it allowed as a set-off is to be denied. If the defendant had notice of the act of bankruptcy—as I presume he had—under the bankrupt act of 6 Geo. IV., the claim could neither have been proved against the estate nor allowed as a set-off in an action by the assignee; but there is no such provision in the American act, and the court must administer the law as it finds it.

I have come to the conclusion, that the order rejecting the claim of the defendant, is not such an adjudication as prevents the defendant from pleading it as a set-off in this action. The provisions of the bankrupt act bearing upon the question, are substantially as follows:

Section 22 [14 Stat. 527] provides for each creditor's making proof of his debt; and presenting the same to the assignee; it also gives the district court power "to reject all claims not duly proved, or where the proof shows the claim to have been founded in fraud, illegality, or mistake." Section 8 gives the right of appeal from the district to the circuit court, to "any supposed creditor whose claim is wholly or in part rejected." Section 24 enacts in effect that such supposed creditor, upon entering such appeal in the circuit court, shall file a pleading as plaintiff in an action at law containing a statement of his claim, and thereafter the controversy shall proceed to determination as an ordinary action at law.

Taken together, these provisions of the act amount to this, and nothing more:

A creditor cannot demand payment of his debt until he makes and presents to the assignee, the proper proof thereof. This provision is analogous in purpose, and proceeding to the probate of debts against the estate of a decedent, before being presented to, or allowed by the administrator. When this is done, parties interested may object to the claim, and the court—the district judge, without a jury, in a summary manner—may reject the claim, as not being duly proved, or as being founded in fraud, illegality, or mistake. Then, and not before, the supposed creditor may bring an action in the circuit court against the assignee, and have his right to payment regularly tried. But this action can only be maintained by the creditor first taking an appeal from the order rejecting his claim. This appeal must be taken within a limited time, in a particular manner, and to a particular court. The right to sue the assignee is postponed and limited to the happening and performance of these precedent circumstances and conditions. But they are not adjudications, but only proceedings preliminary to adjudication. But suppose the assignee to bring an action upon a demand due the bankrupt, cannot the defendant plead a set-off to more or less of such demand, although the same has not been proved and presented to the assignee, and rejected by the judge, and appeal taken to the circuit court? It seems to me that he can. The cross-demand of the defendant in such case is proved on the trial, or it will not be allowed.

The case of Marks v. Barker, supra, is an instance in point where a party was entitled under the bankrupt act of 1800, to be allowed a claim as a set-off, which, for a technical reason, he could not have maintained an action to recover.

In this case, the defendant not having brought his action in the circuit court within the term prescribed after the rejection of his claim, has lost his right to maintain a suit upon it: but, notwithstanding this, I think the better conclusion is that he may still plead it as a set-off, by way of defense to an action by the assignee. On the other hand, it may be said that a party who elects to prove and obtain his demand in the mode prescribed in sections 22, 24 and 8, must pursue that mode to the end, and if he fails or neglects to do so, cannot afterwards have the same demand allowed as a set-off. Not that the order of rejection is an adjudication between the parties in any proper sense of that term, but that the party having elected to obtain his demand in that way, is precluded from litigating it in any other. There is force in this argument. On this point I am not confident that my conclusion is the proper one, and the question may be considered an open one in this court, if parties wish to be heard upon it in any case that may arise hereafter.

The set-off of the defendant to the amount of $100 in coin will be allowed, and the plaintiff must have judgment for $458.88 in coin, with costs and expenses of the action.

CATLIN v. GLADDING.

[4 Mason, 308.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1826.

CIRCUIT COURTS—JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP.

A native citizen of Rhode Island, whose father was dead, but whose mother lived on the family estate in Rhode Island, went to New York to reside as a merchant, and there failed, and afterwards returned to his mother's family, and resided there, being unmarried. At the time when the suit was brought he was in a store in Connecticut, acting as a clerk there for his brother. He was sued as a citizen of Rhode Island. There being no proof, that he intended a permanent residence in Connecticut, it was held by the court, upon these facts, that he was a citizen of Rhode Island.

[Cited in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 481.]

At law. Assumpsit [by John M. Catlin against Samuel Gladding] on a promissory note. Plea to the jurisdiction, that defendant is not a citizen of Rhode Island, as set forth in the writ, and issue thereon. [Judgment for plaintiff.]

At the trial it appeared in evidence, that the defendant was a native citizen of Rhode Island; and that his mother (his father being dead) still resided in Providence, in that state, on the family estate. The defendant is a young, unmarried man, and was in partnership in New York, for some time. His commercial house in New York failed in June last; and upon that failure he returned and resided with his mother at Providence. At the time of the service of the writ, he was engaged as a clerk in the store of his brother in the state of Connecticut. But he made frequent visits to his mother in Providence; and no acts appeared to show any intention of a permanent domicil in Connecticut.

Mr. Searle, for plaintiff.

Richard W. Greene, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The opinion of the court is, that the defendant is a citizen of Rhode Island, and that the plea is not maintained. His birth was in that state; the family estate is there, and his mother remains on it. The defendant is unmarried. While he was resident at New York in business, he may be deemed to have acquired a cititizenship there, as he probably intended a permanent domicil. But when the house failed, he gave up his residence in New York, and returned to his mother's family. Under such circumstances he must be presumed to have regained the family domicil, and to have returned to his native allegiance. The native character and domicil easily reverts; and fewer circumstances are necessary to establish it, than that of a foreign domicil. Upon his return from New York, he re-acquired his native citizenship. What evidence is there, that he has since changed it? It does not appear, that he had any intention of becoming a citizen of Connecticut. For aught in the case, his engagement may be merely temporary, until he can get other business, and without any intention of changing his domicil. The case might have been different, if he had had a family, and removed with them into Connecticut. Such an act would afford prima facie evidence of a change of permanent domicil. The judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff. Judgment accordingly.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Jan. 5, 1874.

CONVEYANCE BY INSOLVENT DEBTOR — JUDGMENT AGAINST INSOLVENT DEBTOR—NOTICE OF ACT OF BANKRUPTCY — JUDGMENT AND LIEN WITH IMPLIED CONSENT OF DEBTOR — PREFERENCE PRESUMED TO HAVE BEEN INTENDED.

1. A conveyance by an insolvent debtor to his creditor of property, upon which said creditor has a lien to a greater amount than the value thereof, is not void, as being within the purview of the first clause of section 35 of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 534].

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 21 Pittsb. Leg. J. 159, contains only a partial report.]

2. Section 35 of the bankrupt act does not declare void a judgment obtained against an insolvent debtor under any circumstances; and the same, if obtained without fraud or collusion with the debtor, is as conclusive evidence of the claim and its amount, as if given against a solvent debtor.

3. Notice to creditor of an act of bankruptcy does not affect a transfer to him, otherwise than as it tends to show that he had reason to believe that such transfer was made in fraud of the bankrupt act.

4. Where a judgment is obtained, for want of an answer, against an insolvent debtor, and such judgment is docketed in the lien docket so as to become a lien upon the real property of such debtor: Held, that such lien being created with the implied consent of the debtor, it was in effect a transfer by him to the creditor, and void under the first clause of section 35 of the bankrupt act.

[Cited in U. S. v. Griswold, 8 Fed. 502.]

5. A transfer of property which necessarily gives a preference to one creditor over another, is presumed to have been made with a view to such preference, and in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act.

[In bankruptcy. Suit by John Catlin, assignee in bankruptcy, against Mark Hoffman, to set aside a conveyance as an unlawful preference.]

John W. Whalley and M. W. Fechheimer, for plaintiff.

Richard Williams, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit is brought to set aside a certain conveyance made by the bankrupt, F. Stadler, to the defendant, of a parcel of land at Cornelius, in Washington county, Oregon, because the same was made and received contrary to the bankrupt act, and is a cloud upon the assignee's title.

The following facts are admitted or satisfactorily established by the evidence:

I. On January 13, 1873, a petition in bankruptcy was filed in the district court against said Stadler, upon which, on January 24, he was duly adjudged a bankrupt; and on February 11 the plaintiff was duly appointed assignee of said bankrupt's estate, and received a deed of assignment thereof from the register.

II. On March, 1872, said Stadler purchased of one Philips the property in question, the same being one acre and twenty-two rods in quantity, for the sum of $106, of which sum $6 was paid down and a mortgage given on the premises to secure the remainder; and in October, 1872, said mortgage was duly foreclosed and a decree given against Stadler and in favor of Philips for the sum of $123.45.

III. On October 21, 1872, the defendant obtained a judgment in the circuit court for the county aforesaid, for want of an answer, against Stadler, for the sum of $625, with costs of action, one half of which sum was for building materials furnished Stadler, to use on the premises, and the other for goods sold and cash loaned Stadler; and that prior to obtaining such judgment the defendant caused the said premises to be attached as the property of Stadler, upon the allegation that he was about to dispose of his property, with intent to delay and defraud his creditors.

IV. On December 14, 1872, Stadler being the owner of the premises, and being indebted to the defendant in a sum exceeding $700, to wit: the judgment aforesaid and the decree in favor of Philips, then assigned to defendant, the latter took from Stadler and wife a conveyance thereof, in payment of said indebtedness, and for the sum of $60 cash; and that at the date of said attachment, judgment and conveyance Stadler was insolvent, and without other property or assets, all of which was known to the defendant.

The defendant controverts the plaintiff's right to the relief asked upon the ground that at the date of the conveyance in question, by means of the judgment and decree aforesaid, he had a lien upon the property for more than it was worth, and therefore the conveyance, although taken with knowledge of the insolvency of Stadler, worked no preference to the defendant or hindrance or injury to any one, or any fraud upon the provisions of the bankrupt act.

Upon the question of the value of the property at the time of the conveyance, the evidence is conflicting, but taking the mean of the statements of the witnesses, it was not worth to exceed $700.

No case directly in point was cited on the argument, but I do not think that a conveyance by an insolvent debtor to his creditor of property, upon which said creditor already has a lien to a greater amount than the value thereof, is within the purview of the first clause of section 35 of the bankrupt act, and therefore void.

In such a case two of the four things necessary to bring it within said clause, as laid down by Mr. Justice Field in Toof v. Martin, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 46, do not exist: namely, 1. Intent to give a preference; and, 2. That the conveyance was made in fraud of the provisions of the act.

No preference is given by such a conveyance, and no other creditor is deferred or injured thereby. Unless some creditor is deferred or defrauded by such conveyance, no one can be preferred by it. The effect of the transaction is merely to pass the dry legal title to the property to the creditor who already has the beneficial interest therein and extinguish the right of redemption under the statute, which in such a case is valueless.

But in the case at bar it appears that the creditor paid $60 in money for the conveyance, in addition to the release of the debts due him. It may be said, that so far, this was a sale of the property under circumstances forbidden by the second clause of section 35 aforesaid, and therefore void. But the debts being greater in amount than the value of the property, the more reasonable inference is that the money was paid to obtain the conveyance rather than as a consideration for the property. The evidence is very meagre upon this point, and only shows the fact of the payment at the time of the conveyance. What was the particular inducement for it is left to inference. The defendant may have thought it cheaper and more convenient to pay Stadler for this conveyance than to obtain one by sale of the property on execution, or he may have paid for it, to induce the wife of the bankrupt to join in it, and thereby bar her right of dower in the premises.

If the special relief prayed for in the complaint—that this conveyance be set aside as fraudulent and void—is denied upon the ground that the defendant's lien upon the property at the time of such conveyance amounted to more than its value, then the plaintiffs make the further point that the judgment and decree aforesaid are invalid, and therefore insufficient to support such conveyance, because the same were taken within four months of the filing of the petition against Stadler, with knowledge of his insolvency, and in fraud of the provisions of the act, and with intent on the part of Stadler to prefer the defendant.

The first clause of section 35, under which this case falls, does not specify a judgment as one of the prohibited means of giving a preference. The language of the clause is: "If any person being insolvent, etc., within four months before the filing of the petition by or against him, with a view to give a preference to any creditor or person having a claim against him, etc., procures any part of his property to be attached, sequestered or seized on execution, or makes any payment, pledge, assignment, transfer or conveyance of any part of his property, either directly or indirectly, absolutely or conditionally, the person receiving such payment, pledge, assignment, transfer or conveyance, or to be benefitted thereby, or by such attachment, having reasonable cause to believe such person is insolvent, and that such attachment, payment, pledge, assignment or conveyance is made in fraud of the provisions of this act, the same shall be void," etc. There is nothing in this language which expressly or impliedly prohibits the taking or obtaining a mere judgment against an insolvent debtor. The judgment alone only serves to establish the claim of the creditor and fix its amount; and if obtained without fraud or collusion with the debtor is as conclusive evidence of those facts as if the debtor had been solvent.

I know the authorities often speak of a judgment being an illegal preference, or attempt to get one. But upon examination, I believe it will be found in every instance, that there was also a lien acquired upon the property of the debtor by means of the judgment, and that the illegal preference consisted in this lien, and not in the mere judgment itself.

But it is argued that this Hoffman judgment is void because taken by defendant with notice that Stadler had committed an act of bankruptcy; namely, the suffering of his property to be attached by the defendant. Doubtless this was a suffering "his property to be taken on legal process," and therefore an act of bankruptcy as defined in section thirty-nine of the bankrupt act. But if I am correct in the conclusion that the mere taking of a judgment against an insolvent debtor is not prohibited under any circumstances, then it matters not whether the defendant had this notice or not.

The fact that a creditor receiving a payment, pledge, assignment, transfer, etc., from an insolvent debtor, did so with notice of the commission of an act of bankruptcy by him, may be evidence that he received the same in fraud of the provisions of the act, but such notice does not itself render such transaction void, under the act of 1867, as it did under the bankrupt act of 1841, where it was held to be "the test of the mala fides which vitiates the transaction." Shawhan v. Wheritt, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 645.

By a law of this state judgment is not a lien upon personal property at all, nor upon real property until it is docketed in the judgment lien docket in the county where the property is situated. Code Or. 206. The judgment, as such, is complete without being docketed, and may be enforced by execution as soon as entered. Id. 208. The docketing is simply a means provided by statute by which the judgment creditor may, at his option, acquire a lien upon the judgment debtor's real property for the security of his judgment, without resorting at once to the extreme measure of an execution and levy.

The above cited clause of section 35 of the act, declares void, under the limitations there mentioned, any transfer of property directly or indirectly by an insolvent debtor. The lien of a judgment upon real property binds it for the payment of the claim for which it is given as effectually as a mortgage made by the debtor for that purpose would. Indirectly it works, causes or makes a transfer of the property upon which it operates from the judgment debtor to the judgment creditor. It may be said, however, that although the effect of the lien may be to transfer the property to the judgment creditor, still it is not a transfer made by the debtor, when, as in this case, he does not procure the judgment, but remains passive, and therefore is not within the act.

When a judgment is taken under the Code for want of an answer, as in this case, the debtor, by implication, distinctly consents to it. The summons contains a notice that if the defendant does not answer the complaint, the plaintiff will take judgment against him for a given sum. Under the circumstances this amounts to a proposition to confess judgment for the sum named, and a failure to answer is an implied acceptance of such proposition, and a consent that the judgment be given, and at the option of the creditor, docketed, and become a lien upon his real property, and be thereby transferred to the judgment creditor. The lien of this judgment being in effect, a transfer of so much of the property of the insolvent debtor to a creditor with knowledge of such insolvency, it is void, if it was also made or acquired with an intent to prefer such creditor, and in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act.

Upon these points the supreme court in Toof v. Martin, supra, says: 1. "It is a general principle that every one must be presumed to intend the necessary consequences of his acts. The transfer, in any case, by a debtor, of a large portion of his property, while he is insolvent, to one creditor, without making provision for an equal distribution of its proceeds to all his creditors, necessarily operates as a preference to him, and must be taken as conclusive evidence that a preference was intended, unless the debtor can show that he was at the time ignorant of his insolvency, and that his affairs were such that he could reasonably expect to pay all his debts. The burden of proof is upon him in such case, and not upon the assignee or contestant in bankruptcy." 2. "The act of congress was designed to secure an equal distribution of the property of an insolvent debtor among his creditors, and any transfer made with a view to secure the property, or any part of it, to one, and thus prevent such equal distribution, is a transfer in fraud of the act." Upon the first point, see, also, In re Sutherland [Case No. 13,638]; In re Randall [Id. 11,551].

It follows necessarily from the facts stated and the rule laid down in Toof v. Martin, that this transfer was made with a view to give Hoffman a preference, and that Hoffman had reasonable ground to believe that it was made in fraud of the bankrupt act, because such was the necessary consequence of the transaction. Although, as far as appears, this judgment is valid, the lien of it having been acquired in contravention of the act, is void. In re Mallory [Id. 8,991].

The lien of the decree is valid, it being in effect, merely a continuation of the lien of the mortgage for the purchase money, the latter being merged in the former. It follows that the deed of December 14, 1872, in so far as the consideration therefor was the Hoffman judgment, was made in violation of the first clause of section 35 of the bankrupt act, and is therefore void. A decree will be entered declaring the lien of the judgment and the conveyance void, as against the assignee and setting them aside, and that the defendant prove his claim as he may be advised.

Case No. 2,522.

CATLIN v. SPRINGFIELD FIRE INS. CO.

[1 Sumn. 434.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1833.

INSURANCE — CONDITIONS IN POLICY — CONSTRUCTION — NOTICE OF LOSS — SUFFICIENCY — WARRANTY AND REPRESENTATION — LEGAL DESIGN — WHEN IMPUTABLE — SEASONABLE OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.

1. Among the conditions which were printed on the same sheet with a policy of insurance against fire, was one requiring, that "all persons insured, and sustaining loss or damage by fire, should forthwith give notice thereof to the company, and as soon after as possible deliver in a particular account of such loss or damage, signed with their own hands, and verified with their oath or affirmation, and also, if required, by their books of account and other proper vouchers." Held, that the particular account required by the above condition is a particular account of the articles lost or damaged, and does not refer to the manner and cause of the loss. See 2 Phil. Ins. 519.

[Cited in Perry v. Phoenix Assur. Co., 8 Fed. 646; Gauché v. London & L. Ins. Co., 10 Fed. 353.]

2. In stating a loss, it is sufficient to show it to have been occasioned by a peril within the policy, without negativing the exceptions of losses from design, invasion, public enemies, riots, &c., which are properly matters of defence. See 1 Phil. Ins. 634.

3. Conditions are to be construed strictly against those for whose benefit they are introduced, when they impose burdens on other parties.

[Cited in Ward v. New England Screw Co., Case No. 17,157; James v. Lycoming Ins. Co., Id. 7,182.]

4. The words in a policy against fire described the house, as "at present occupied as a dwelling-house, but to be occupied hereafter as a tavern, and privileged as such." Held, that this is not a warranty, that the house should, during the continuance of the risk, be constantly occupied as a tavern; but that it is, at farthest, a mere representation of the intention to occupy it as such, and a license or privilege granted by the underwriters, that it might be so occupied.

5. Where no objection was taken at the trial to the absence of evidence, which it might have been in the power of the party to supply, it is too late after the verdict to take it.

[Cited in Gauché v. London & L. Ins. Co., 10 Fed. 354.]

6. Where underwriters agree to make good any loss or damage "by fire originating in any cause, except design in the insured, invasion," &c., held, that the exception of losses by design admits all losses not by design; that, therefore, where the plaintiff negligently left the premises insured derelict, and intruders came and burnt them, without any co-operation or knowledge on the part of the plaintiff, it is a loss within the policy.

[Cited in Levi v. New Orleans Mut. Ins. Ass'n, Case No. 8,290.]

7. Legal design is imputable, where the consequences naturally flow from the act, and not merely follow it. They must be connected with it, as a cause, and not as an occasion.

At law. Assumpsit on a policy of insurance. Plea, the general issue. By the policy in the present case, dated on the 30th of

[1] [Reported by Hon. Charles Sumner.]

May, 1825, the defendants insured the plaintiff [Guy Catlin] for the space of six years from that date, "against loss or damage by fire to the amount of nine hundred dollars, on a dwelling-house, barn, and shed, situate, &c. in the town of Burlington, (Vermont,) owned by Lemuel Hayden and Harvey Hobart, of Burlington aforesaid, at present occupied by one Joel Rodgers, as a dwelling-house; but to be occupied hereafter as a tavern, and is privileged as such. Said buildings are made of wood, and are mortgaged to the said Guy Catlin to secure the payment of his debt, against the said Hayden and Hobart, of $1,146.20, and are more particularly described in a survey, dated May 30th, 1825, containing proposals of the insured, by him subscribed. On the dwelling-house $750, on the shed $100, and on the barn $50." And by the terms of the policy, the defendants agreed "to make good unto the assured any loss or damage, not exceeding in amount the sum insured, which shall or may happen to the property insured by fire originating in any cause, except design in the assured, invasion, public enemies, riots, civil commotion, or military or usurped power." And certain conditions and proposals annexed to the policy are agreed to be referred to, to explain the rights and obligations of the parties. The conditions and proposals thus alluded to are printed on the same sheet with the policy. They contain, among other things, the classification of certain risks, and rates of premium therefor; and a statement of the classification of goods into those not hazardous, those hazardous, and those extra-hazardous. And among those whose trades and occupations are deemed hazardous, are enumerated tavern-keepers. Among the conditions one (the eighth) is, that "all persons insured, and sustaining loss or damage by fire, are forthwith to give notice thereof to the company, and as soon after as possible to deliver in a particular account of such loss or damage, signed with their own hands, and verified with their oath or affirmation, and also, if required, by their books of account and other proper vouchers;" and also to "procure a certificate under the hand of a magistrate, notary public, or clergyman, most contiguous to the place of fire, and not concerned in the loss, or related to the insured or sufferers, that they are acquainted with the character and circumstances of the person or persons insured; and do know and verily believe he, she, or they really and by misfortune, and without fraud or evil practice, hath or have sustained by such fire loss and damage to the amount therein mentioned. And until such proofs, declarations, and certificates are produced, the loss shall not be deemed payable; also, if there be any fraud or false swearing, the claimant shall forfeit all claim by virtue of this policy."

The dwelling-house so insured was burnt down and totally destroyed on the evening of the 22d of February, 1830; and, on the 24th of the same month, the plaintiff addressed a letter to the defendants, informing them of the loss, which was duly received. The letter stated, that "the house was burned on the evening of the 22d instant, and totally destroyed." And it also contained a declaration, that the plaintiff had no other insurance, and had "sustained a loss full equal to the amount insured on the house. The shed and barn were not destroyed." And the plaintiff at the bottom of the letter, took a solemn oath before a justice of the peace, "that the statements therein made were true." The other preliminary proof of a certificate was furnished to the defendants, who declined paying the loss; and by a letter, dated on the 30th of March, 1830, in reply to that of the plaintiff, stated as a reason, that "the building was insured to be occupied. When burnt it had been a long time vacant, often deserted, derelict; and was destroyed by foul means. Had the house been occupied, as when insured, it is very clear the loss could not have occurred from the cause which destroyed it." No objection whatever was stated to the preliminary proofs of loss. At the trial the plaintiff had a verdict for $604.83.

C. G. Loring and Fay for the defendants, now moved for a new trial, which was opposed by Fletcher for the plaintiff.

STORY, Circuit Justice. A motion has been made and argued for a new trial upon various grounds. In the first place, that the court instructed the jury, that the letter of the plaintiff to the defendants, giving notice of the loss, was a sufficient compliance with the eighth condition above stated, requiring "a particular account of the loss or damage." The argument is, that the particular account here referred to should contain not only a statement of the amount of the loss, but of the manner and cause of the loss, verified by the oath of the party, so that it should appear, that it did not fall within any of the exceptions of the policy. But it seems to me very clear, that this is not the true interpretation or object of the clause. If we look at the policy, it will be seen, that the insurance company contemplate not only insurance upon houses, but upon goods and machinery. In cases of insurance upon goods, and in partial losses of all sorts, the particulars of the nature, quality and quantity of the goods, and of the damage or loss sustained, are most important to enable the company to decide on, and ascertain the damage or loss; and as these particulars are generally and almost exclusively within the knowledge of the assured, his oath or affirmation thereto, is required as preliminary proof. The underwriters rely on, and address the interrogatory to his conscience. But it surely could not have been expected, that the assured should, in all cases, swear as to the mode and cause of the loss; for in many cases it would be impossible for him so to do, from the want of due knowledge or means of knowledge. He might know the fact of the loss by fire; but as to the precise mode in which the fire was kindled, he might be and ordinarily would be wholly ignorant. Surely, it could not have been required, that any person should swear to facts or causes of loss, which he could not know; and thus put his conscience in jeopardy, or lose his insurance, although the whole was a case of sheer misfortune, without the slightest suspicion of fraud.

But, if we examine the context, it seems to me that every doubt must vanish; for it may be truly said, in such a case, "noscitur a sociis." The "particular account" is to be verified by the oath or affirmation of the assured, and "also, if required, by their books of account, and other proper vouchers." Now, this is all very natural, if the meaning be, as the court suppose it to be, a particular account of the articles lost or damaged; but it is wholly without meaning, if applied to the mode or cause of the loss or damage. No person could suppose, that the books of account of the party, or other proper vouchers, could or would furnish the slightest proof of such facts. And yet the argument is just as strong, applied to the case of such books and vouchers, as it is to the requisites of the oath or affirmation; for in each case they are required ad idem. And I cannot but think, that the company understood this clause, as the court does. For in their reply they placed their defence upon an entirely different ground, not suggesting this, as in all fairness they ought, if they meant to insist upon it. And then, again, as has been well observed at the bar, the oath of the party is not required, as an expurgatory oath, negativing fraud or design on the part of the assured. For these reliance is positively placed upon a more disinterested source, upon the certificate of some magistrate, notary, or clergyman, that the loss was real, and by misfortune, and without fraud or evil practice. As to negativing by oath the exceptions in the policy, it is nowhere required by any express stipulation in the conditions; nor can it be inferred from any reasonable presumption of intent. It is true, that it is said, that "if there be any fraud or false swearing, (in the alternative,) the claimant shall forfeit all claim by virtue of this policy." But this is mere matter of defence by the company, and constitutes no part of the preliminary proofs of the plaintiff. And, as to the exceptions of losses from design, invasion, public enemies, riots, &c., they constitute matter of defence, and are referrible to the trial, and are not to be negatived on oath in the preliminary proofs; because the plaintiff must at the trial prove a case prima facie not within them. It might as well be contended, that the plaintiff was bound to state under oath every other fact, upon which his recovery should depend. The true answer to all these suggestions is, that the stipulation is not in the contract; and no court is authorized to add a single term to conditions in their own nature sufficiently onerous. Conditions are to be construed strictly against those, for whose benefit they are reserved, when they impose burdens on other parties. The language of the clause is, that the party is to "deliver a particular account of such loss or damage," in the alternative. He is to state an account of the loss, that is, of the thing or value lost; or of the damage, that is, of the amount of the injury sustained. But he is not required to state, how the loss happened, or the cause or occasion of it. It is also said, that the notice and statement of the loss must show it to be a loss within the risk of the policy; and that it is always so done in marine policies. Certainly, the loss must be shown by the notice to be by a risk within the policy; and it is so shown here, for the loss is stated to be by fire. But in the notice of a loss under a marine policy, no one ever supposed that it was necessary to state more than a loss by a peril insured against. Must the plaintiff go on, and negative all exceptions, express or implied by law, which constitute the defence of the other side? Must he state, that a loss by perils of the seas has been without any fraud, negligence, deviation, or non-compliance with warranties? Practically speaking, I have entire confidence that allegations of this sort have never hitherto been deemed essential or pertinent.

The next objection is, that the court instructed the jury, that the words in the policy, "at present occupied as a dwelling-house, but to be occupied hereafter as a tavern, and privileged as such," did not import on the part of the plaintiff a warranty, that they should be so occupied during the continuance of the risk. What the court did say to the jury on this point was, that these words did not constitute a warranty, that the house should, during the continuance of the risk be constantly occupied as a tavern; but that the language was, at farthest, a mere representation of the intention to occupy it as a tavern, and to secure for it the privileges of the policy as such. And I am, upon farther reflection, clearly of opinion, that the direction was right. We must interpret these instruments in a reasonable manner, from the nature and objects of the parties. Here the assured was the mortgagee of the house; and he is so described in the policy. In the ordinary course of things, he could not be presumed, as mortgagee, to intend to take possession of the property and occupy it as a tavern; and of course, if occupied as a tavern, it must be by or under the mortgagers. In point of fact, as the survey, made by the company's own agent, and on which the policy itself was underwritten, states, it "was to be occupied, in the course of two or three days by the said Hayden and Hobart for the purpose of keeping a tavern." In the mouth of the mortgagee, then, if the language were to be treated as his, it could fairly be understood to import no more than a representation, that it was to be occupied as a tavern. And if so, then, as taverns are enumerated in the conditions of the company as among the hazardous risks, for which an extra premium is to be paid, it would follow, that the policy would be void for a fraudulent concealment, unless the fact were disclosed, and the house privileged as a tavern. But the language cannot in strictness be treated as the language of the mortgagee. It occurs in an instrument executed by the company, and purporting therefore to contain their engagement. It occurs in the descriptive part of that instrument. Of the property insured, the company say, that they insure the house now occupied "as a dwelling-house, and to be hereafter occupied as a tavern, and privileged as such." Privileged by whom? Clearly by the company,—to be used as a tavern. The company agree to take this hazardous risk, and permit the policy to attach, notwithstanding the house may be changed from a common dwelling-house to a tavern. They could have no motive for insisting, that the house should always be, as it is classed by the survey, in the sixth class of hazards. If it had continued to be occupied as a common dwelling-house, the risk would have been far less, while the premium would have remained the same. It was not, then, a warranty of the assured, that it should be at all times during the risk occupied as a tavern; but a license or privilege granted by the company, that it might be so occupied. The case is entirely different from that of a policy on a vessel to be engaged in the whale fisheries; for there the nature of the voyage ascertains and limits the language of the policy. Unless the vessel sails on a whaling voyage, the policy does not attach; and, if she engages during the voyage in other traffic, it is a deviation from the voyage. But, suppose a policy were on a coasting vessel generally for a twelvemonth, with liberty to engage in the whale fisheries; would that amount to a warranty, and tie up the policy to an employment solely in that trade? Or, suppose a policy on a vessel from Boston to Leghorn, and back, with the privilege of cruising as a letter of marque; would that amount to a warranty that she should so cruise? Certainly not in either case. The construction would be, not that the words restrained, but that they enlarged the general words of the policy. Let me put another case. Suppose a policy against fire, underwritten on the house of A in Boston, described as a dwelling-house, or as occupied as a dwelling-house; would the policy be void, if the house should cease for a time to have a tenant? Such a doctrine has never to my knowledge been asserted; nor should I deem it maintainable.

The interpretation put by the court upon the words of the policy, "privileged as such," seems now admitted by the counsel for the defendants to be the true one, although at the trial it was contended, that the meaning was, that the house was licensed by the municipal authorities, as a tavern; and it constituted one of the grounds in support of the motion for a new trial. That point is now abandoned.

Another objection is, that there was no evidence, that there ever was any intention to occupy the house as a tavern. It may have been so; but no objection was then taken to the absence of such evidence; and it is quite too late after a verdict to take it, when the deficiency might have been within the power of the party to supply. But in fact, if the ground of defence was misrepresentation, the onus probandi was on the defendants. The plaintiff was not bound to prove the representation, if any was made, to be true; but the defendants were to show, that it was false, and false in a point material to the risk.

The last objection is to a supposed instruction of the court on the point, what constitutes a loss by design within the meaning of the policy. I state it in this form, because the written motion does not accurately present the instruction of the court, or the language of the court, although it doubtless intended so to do. The line of argument in the defence at the trial did not impute to the plaintiff any direct or positive co-operation in the actual setting fire to the house, or any knowledge or connexion with the parties who did it. But it was to this effect, that if the plaintiff, by his negligence, and by leaving the house derelict, thereby exposed it to such destruction by mere trespassers, and was not unwilling, that it should be so destroyed, that such negligence and laches avoided the policy, and constituted a loss by design within the meaning of the policy. The court in commenting on this part of the case, said, that the case was as clear, and lay in as narrow a compass on this point, as any which had ever come before it. The language of the policy is, that the company will make good any loss or damage "by fire, originating in any cause, except design in the assured, invasion," &c. So that the company make themselves liable for losses by negligence, as well as by accident; for the exception of losses by design admits all losses not by design. I do not say, that the defendants would be liable for every loss occasioned by the gross personal negligence of the plaintiff; for it might under circumstances amount to a fraudulent loss. But the English decisions clearly are, that on policies against fire generally, losses by the negligence of tenants are within the risks taken. And it is still more clear, that losses by the negligence of tenants, or by the criminal wantonness, or misconduct of mere trespassers, or intruders, or felons, are within the common policies against fire. But in the present policy there is no room for doubt on this point. The losses excepted are, not losses by design generally, but "losses by design of the assured." The case, then, is reduced to the consideration of what constitutes a loss by design in the assured, within the meaning of the policy. I say, that it is not a loss by the mere negligence or laches of the party, where he has left the property exposed to the peril, but has not co-operated directly or indirectly with those, who produced the loss. Design imports plan, scheme, intention, carried into effect. The loss, to be by design of the assured, in the sense of the policy, must be by incitement, connivance, or co-operation of the assured, directly or indirectly, with the persons, who were the agents in the act. It is not sufficient, that he is negligent in leaving the premises derelict, and thus exposing them to the wanton or criminal acts of intruders. Negligence is not design. We are here, as in other cases of insurance, to look, not to the remote cause, but to the proximate cause of the loss; "causa proxima, non remota spectatur." How can it be truly said, that the negligence of the plaintiff in this case was, in any just sense, the proximate cause of the loss, if he had no co-operation, knowledge, or part in the act? Unless, then, the jury can from the evidence clearly see, that the plaintiff was, not merely negligent, but was directly or indirectly connected with the act, I am of opinion, that it cannot be correctly deemed to be a loss by design of the assured. The defendants do not themselves impute to the plaintiff active co-operation, or connexion with the persons, who set the house on fire. On the contrary the argument supposes, that it was set on fire by mere transgressors or felons, who were utter strangers to him, and of whose designs he was ignorant. It imputes to him only negligence, and wishes or motives for the event, and undue exposure to the perils.

Such was in substance the direction to the jury. And now upon the farther argument, which has been had, I deliberately adhere to it. It appears to me, that the doctrine contended for in the defence is untenable and dangerous, and would take away all security under policies of this sort. It in reality attempts to engraft upon the words of the policy a new term, and to exempt the underwriters from all losses, which can be traced, however remotely, to the neglect or laches of the assured. If the latter were to leave open the front door of his house by night by gross negligence, and felons should enter and set it on fire, I do not perceive, how the loss upon the argument could be recoverable. It might then be said, as it is now said, that he had his motives, wishes, and expectations, though he was wholly ignorant of the design of the felons. I cannot but think, that under such circumstances policies of this sort would hold out false lights and false securities to the assured; and would seduce them into the false confidence, that design meant something widely different, and contradistinguished, from negligence.

Legal design, it is said, is to be imputed to a party where the consequences naturally flow from the act. That is true; but then they must naturally flow from it, not merely follow it. They must be connected with it, as a cause, and not as an occasion. The act and the negligence must be knit together by an indissoluble bond. The law properly holds, that every man is presumed to intend, what are the natural consequences of his act. But it does not presume, that he intends every thing, which may possibly follow from his negligence, or be remotely occasioned thereby. The case of The Squib (Scott v. Shepherd), 2 W. Bl. 892, stands upon the very verge of the law, upon a sort of metaphysical subtilty; and, whether rightly or wrongly decided, it was decided, not upon mere negligence, but upon a direct and positive act, which gave rise to an action of trespass, as a mediate, if not an immediate act of force. In Percival v. Hickey, 18 Johns. 257, there was a direct and immediate act of force by running down the vessel of the party; and so the case of Guille v. Swan, 19 Johns. 381, was treated by the court.

But it is said, that the court did not leave the question to the jury, whether there was fraud on the part of the plaintiff, or such gross negligence as was presumptive of fraud. No such ground is suggested in the written motion for a new trial; and of course it cannot, according to the rules of this court, be now taken notice of. But I may say, that, if not put to the jury, it was because the point was not distinctly put by the defence for the consideration of the jury. The court certainly is not to be expected to supply matters of defence, which the counsel do not choose to insist upon at the trial. Upon the whole, my judgment is, that the motion for a new trial ought to be overruled; and it is accordingly overruled.

EVIDENCE—COPY OF RECORD—AUTHENTICATION.

1. To make a sworn copy evidence, the witness must state that he compared the copy with the original.

2. A surrogate acts as a clerk in certifying his proceedings, and as he also acts in the capacity of judge, he must certify as to the authentication under the act of congress.

[At law. Action by the executor of Lynde Catlin upon promissory notes.]

Mr. O'Neal, for plaintiff.
Mr. Yandees, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This case is brought before the court, by consent of the parties, to submit certain questions on the admissibility of evidence.

Charleston Farris being sworn, says, that the annexed exhibit A contains the letters testamentary, the copy of the will, the certificate of the surrogate and the proofs thereon, and a certified copy of the oath taken by the witness upon taking out said letters testamentary. Witness states that he has acted as such executor ever since he was so qualified, and still continues to act. This, it was contended, proved the will and other papers as sworn copies. But the witness does not swear that he compared the copies with the record; and, therefore, they can not be received as sworn copies. The surrogate before whom the will was proved, and who granted the letters testamentary, certified under his official seal, to a copy of the will, letters, etc., and proof of the will. But there was no certificate of the presiding judge, that the attestation was in due form, and for this defect the copies are objected to. The surrogate acts as his own clerk, and certifies under his seal, but he also acts in the capacity of judge, and, consequently, had a right to certify. He keeps a record, and the court held that copies must be authenticated in the form required, to make them evidence.

The act of congress of 1790 provides, "that the records and judicial proceedings of one state shall be proved or admitted in any other court within the United States, by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with the certificate of the judge, chief justice or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form." The papers offered, not having the required authentication, can not be admitted in evidence.

SURVIVORSHIP — ADJUSTMENT WITH EXECUTOR OF JOINT CREDITOR.

1. Where a debt is due to two individuals, both of whom die before the amount was adjusted, and the settlement was made after the death of both, with the executor of one, and two notes were given to him for the balance, it may be recovered in his name.

2. The doctrine of survivorship, does not apply to a single transaction of this character.

3. It is not doubted, however, that had only one of the parties died, the survivor might have sustained his action for the amount due.

[At law. Action by the executor of Lynde Catlin upon promissory notes.

[For disposition of a question as to the admissibility of certain evidence, which apparently arose in this case, see the next preceding case, No. 2,523.]

Mr. O'Neal, for plaintiff.
Mr. Yandes, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought on two notes, each for two hundred and eighty dollars, thirty-five cents, dated 29th September, 1843, one payable in one year, and the other in two years, with interest. The case was submitted to the court on the following facts: Elijah Farris and Lynde Catlin, loaned the defendant one thousand dollars. This was before Catlin's death, who died in 1833, and the plaintiff was appointed his executor. Elijah Farris died in 1842, and Charleston Farris was made his executor. Payments had been made on the loan, but the account was not closed until 1843, when the above notes were executed. Both of the principals being dead, the adjustment was made with the executor of Lynde Catlin. The notes were given for the balance due, and two notes were given that one might be handed to the estate of Elijah Farris. As both notes were given payable to the executor of Catlin, he refused to deliver one of the notes to Charleston Farris' demand, on the alleged ground that the estate of Farris had received its full share of the loan.

This is not the case of an ordinary copartnership. It was a loan made jointly to the defendant by Catlin and Farris. It was a single transaction, and no presumption of debts can arise, as in a case of ordinary copartnership, where the survivor is held responsible. From the nature of the transaction, it is impossible that the doctrine of survivorship can apply. No debts were contracted by the parties, jointly or separately, in making the loan. The reason, therefore, which applies to a partnership, can have no application to this joint contract. In making the adjustment, therefore, with the executor of Catlin, no principle was violated nor was any interest or policy disregarded.

In [Wallace v. Fitzsimmons] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 248, it is said, that a payment to an executor or administrator can be no satisfaction to a surviving partner, who has the sole right of suing for and of receiving the money due to the company. The law makes the surviving partner liable for the joint debts, consequently he has the exclusive control over the partnership effects; and every action founded on a joint transaction, must be brought in his name. It is therefore contended that this action can not be maintained. At the time the balance due was ascertained, and the notes were given, both of the principals were dead. That there was fraud or unfairness in the act of adjustment, is not pretended. Two notes were given that each executor might have one half of the balance, but as both notes were payable to the executor of Catlin, and suit became necessary, it would seem to be better that the notes should be payable to one executor, so that one suit only would be necessary. The executor of Catlin will be responsible to the other, should it be found that he did not receive his share of the loan.

Where a promise is made to pay two persons, and one of them dies, there can be no doubt that the survivor may maintain an action on the promise. And it is proper that the action should be in his name. But when both principals are dead, and there can be no liability growing out of the transaction, and notes have been given to the executor of the individual who first died, we think the action may be maintained in his name, because the reason on which the rights and responsibilities of a surviving partner do not apply. In such a case, it is unnecessary to inquire which of the individuals died first. Judgment for plaintiff.

DISTRIBUTION—PRIOR ADJUDICATION OF STATE COURT.

To a bill filed by the next of kin of a deceased person, against his administrator, for distribution of his estate, the administrator pleaded, in bar of the suit, the adjudication of a surrogate's court, determining that the administrator was the next of kin of the deceased, the adjudication being made on a contest between the administrator and the plaintiff, as to the grant of letters of administration: Held, that such adjudication was not conclusive on the question of distribution, and that the plea was bad.

[See note at end of case.]

In equity. The bill in this case was filed by the plaintiffs [Benoit Julien Caujolle and others], who claimed to be the next of kin of Jeanne Du Lux, deceased, against her administrators [John P. Ferrié and Cyrus Curtiss], for distribution of her estate. The defendants pleaded, in bar of the suit, the adjudication of the surrogate's court of the city and county of New York, determining that Ferrié, one of the defendants, was the next of kin of the deceased. The adjudication was made on a contest between Ferrié and the plaintiffs, as to the grant of letters of administration.

[The estate is large, some $70,000, which is principally invested in bonds and mortgages upon property in this state.][2]

[Previous proceedings had in this case are reported in 4 Bradf. 28, where the decision of the surrogate, referred to below, is stated. That decision was affirmed on appeal in 26 Barb. 177, and again in 23 N. Y. 90.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. No cases have been referred to, nor am I aware of any in this state, or, indeed, in any of our sister states, adjudging the point in question. Different opinions seem to be entertained, by eminent judges in England, as to the conclusiveness of the decision of the ecclesiastical court, on a question of administration, upon a court of equity, in a suit for distribution, as may be seen from the case of Barrs v. Jackson, decided by Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, in 1842 (1 Younge & C. Ch. 585), and the same case on appeal (1 Phil. Ch. 582). The opinion of Lord Lyndhurst on the appeal may, perhaps, be regarded as settling the question in England, in favor of the conclusiveness of the adjudication of the ecclesiastical court, though that may be doubted. It is not material, however, to go into this inquiry, for, admitting it to be so, the decision could not be allowed to control the question as presented under our system of administration. We regard the question of next of kin, under our system, as preliminary and incidental, before the surrogate, and simply with a view to ascertain the proper person, as prescribed by the statute, to be admitted to take letters of administration. This is the sole purpose and object of the inquiry; and it is made without any reference to, or consideration of, the question of distribution. The question of the admission to take letters of administration is of much less importance, and an error in the proceedings is much less prejudicial in its consequences, than the question involving the distribution of the estate. If a competent person is appointed, in the former case, to administer upon the assets, though he may not be the right person, the interests of all concerned may be safe. But, in the latter, the right of property in the assets is concluded. Hence, the right to letters of administration is not usually severely contested. It may be added, also, that the surrogate is not concluded by his own adjudication in the matter. He may revoke the appointment, for imposition or fraud, or displace the administrator for cause and appoint another. The plea in this case must, therefore, be overruled, and the defendants have leave to answer.

[NOTE. The defendants answered. There was a reply, and a decision for the defendants upon the merits. Case unreported. Complainants appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the circuit court decree, but held, per Mr. Justice Davis, that the judgment in the suit for administration in New York was pleadable in bar, and that on that ground alone the bill should have been dismissed. CAUSEY v. The SHARK.

[New York Times, May 4, 1862.]

District Court, N. D. New York.

COLLISION—DARK NIGHT—SPEED—BOTH VESSELS IN FAULT.

[Where a collision between two schooners was caused by the failure of both to maintain such lookouts as the darkness of the night, the locality, and the speed of the vessels required, the resulting damage should be apportioned between them.]

In admiralty. This was a libel filed by [Peter F. Causey and others] the owners of the schooner Ship Carpenters, to recover the loss occasioned by her being sunk in a collision with the Shark, on the night of Dec. 1, 1860. The Ship Carpenters was bound up the coast from the Capes of Delaware, and the Shark was bound down the coast from New York. The testimony was very contradictory as to the facts of the collision. The Ship Carpenters was on the larboard tack. The witnesses differed as to the direction of the wind, but the court came to the conclusion, on the evidence, that it was W. N. W. to N. W. by W., and that the course of the Ship Carpenters was N. by E., thus making her close-hauled, while the Shark had the wind about three points free. The Shark was running about seven to eight knots an hour, and the Ship Carpenters five or six, and perhaps seven knots. The night was so dark and thick as to require unusual care in a locality where vessels are constantly meeting. On board the Ship Carpenters only the mate and the man at the wheel were on deck. The mate testified that he was forward of the foremast on the lookout; that he saw light ahead which he supposed was three points off their starboard bow; that he could not then see the hulk or sails of the vessel; that he immediately went aft and asked the man at the wheel how he was steering and was told north by east; that he looked at the compass and found it was so, and said to the wheelman, "You see that light?" and he said he did; that immediately after this, and while he was yet aft, he made out the sails of the vessel, which was then about four lengths or 320 feet off. The mate of the Shark testified that he looked at the compass about three minutes before the collision; that he then went forward on the lee side as far as the mainmast, and paused there and looked out; saw nothing at first, and then all at once a light came in sight, and he sung out, and the lookout forward sung out at the same time; that he went forward pretty quick, as far as the foremast, when he made the vessel's sails standing across his bow, and about fifty feet off. A good deal of other testimony was given as to this lookout on the Shark.

Platt, Gerard & Buckley, for libelants.

Benedict & Beebe, for claimants.

HALL, District Judge, held that the evidence of the mate of the Ship Carpenters is enough to show that no proper lookout, such as was required by the darkness of the night, the speed of the vessel, and the number of vessels known to be in that neighborhood, was kept on board the Ship Carpenters. That she was not, therefore, free from fault. That as to the Shark, the testimony showed that the collision occurred very soon after the watch was changed; that for a short time before and during and after the change of watch, no very careful lookout was kept; that when the light of the Ship Carpenters was seen, it was seen almost simultaneously by the mate, who was nearly amidships, and by the lookout, who was near the jib; that it came suddenly upon the vision of both, and that they saw the sails almost at the same instant, and when the vessel was but a very short distance off, so short that nothing could then be done to avoid the collision. That all this is inconsistent with the keeping of such a lookout on board the Shark as her speed, the darkness of the night, and the locality required. That the Shark, therefore, was also in fault in this respect. That the speed of both vessels, if not entirely unjustifiable, was such as to require the most extraordinary vigilance of the most effective and constant lookout. The Pepperill, 1 Swab. 12; Union S. S. Co. v. New York & V. S. S. Co., 24 How. [65 U. S.] 307, 314. That both vessels being in fault in this case, the damages must be apportioned between them, without costs to either party.

BANKRUPTCY—CONDITIONAL COMPOSITION—RECORDING.

1. Mere delay in obtaining the requisite number of signatures to a composition, unaccompanied by laches, will not justify a refusal to record the composition.

2. A resolution proposing a composition of seventy cents, to be paid within thirty days after recording the resolution, upon condition that all the property of the bankrupts be surrendered to them, and all pending suits discontinued, is not improper.

Upon objections to the recording of a resolution of composition of the creditors.

Don M. Dickinson, for objecting creditors.
William H. Wells, for composition.

BROWN, District Judge. Three objections were interposed to the recording of the composition in this case.

First. That the proceedings have been unreasonably delayed. In evidence of this, it appears that the resolution was passed and adopted at a meeting of the creditors, on the 22d day of May, 1878; but that the signatures of the requisite number of creditors were not all obtained, nor the required notice given for the objecting creditors to come in and oppose a confirmation, until December. It further appears, however, that on the 9th day of March certain creditors of the bankrupts began suits against them, and caused writs of garnishment to be issued against certain insurance companies which were largely indebted to the bankrupts; that, subsequent to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, which was in April, application was made on behalf of the bankrupts to the attorneys of these creditors, to discontinue such suits, in order that the expense and delay of appointing an assignee in bankruptcy, who could move for their dismissal, might be avoided; that some correspondence was had with these attorneys and with other persons, which was continued until about the 17th day of July, to which date the meeting of the creditors for the election of an assignee had been from time to time adjourned, and upon which day an assignee was finally chosen, and on the 26th of July an assignment was made to him by the register; that shortly prior to this the judge of the court left the city, and did not return until late in September; that, within a few days after his return, application was made to the court for a dismissal of these suits, which was granted, and, from that time, proper diligence was used in collecting the amounts due the bankrupts' estate from the insurance companies, and in the prosecution of the composition proceeding. I do not think that mere delay, unaccompanied by laches, is any ground for refusing to record this composition. I think the delay in this case is excusable, and that I ought not to refuse to record the composition upon that ground.

Second. That the composition is conditioned upon contingencies beyond the control of the creditors, and which are unreasonable and unlawful. The resolution submitted to the creditors proposed a composition of seventy cents, to be paid within thirty days after the recording of the resolution, "upon the condition that all the property of the said bankrupts be surrendered to them, and all pending suits be discontinued." Postponement of payment for thirty days is obviously no objection. These resolutions frequently provide for payment in installments at different periods, and such provisos have been uniformly sustained. The condition that all the property of the bankrupts be surrendered to them is no more than the law would imply if the resolution had been silent upon this point. In re Reiman [Case No. 11,673]. In any event it is mere surplusage, and may be disregarded. In re Van Auken [Id. 16,828]. The learned judge held, in that case, that such a condition bound no one, neither the creditors nor the court, and that, upon the application of any creditor, a warrant of seizure might issue, notwithstanding the terms of the composition as to the retention by the debtors of their assets. The condition that all pending suits be discontinued was solely for the benefit of the bankrupts. If the tender of the seventy per cent. was made within the thirty days, the creditor would not be at liberty to refuse it because pending suits were not discontinued, as he would get no more than the seventy per cent. if they had been discontinued. It was a condition with which he had practically nothing to do. If the tender were not made within the thirty days, the composition would fall through, and cease to be operative. The bankrupts could not compel their creditors to receive the dividend, nor could the creditors compel the bankrupts to pay it. There would be no want of mutuality, since the composition would cease to exist at the expiration of thirty days. Until the expiration of the time limited by the resolution, the composition is regarded as still pending. In re Hinsdale [Id. 6,526]. After the expiration of the thirty days, the proceedings become a nullity, and the assignee may proceed to settle the estate.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed by the circuit court (case unreported).]

Third. That a confirmation of the resolution by the signatures of the creditors was secured by the purchase of claims, and not by a free and full expression of the wishes of the creditors. The only evidence of that is contained in the affidavit of one Jones, the agent of one of the creditors, who says that, some time during 1878, he visited Houghton, and was there informed by Cavan that he had purchased the claims of other creditors against them, at a less price than their face, affiant believing that such claims were voted in favor of the composition contrary to law. In rebuttal of this, it appears that all claims against the estate were proved by the creditors in person, who made the usual oaths that they were the bona fide owners of the claims, and that no agreement had been made or entered into on their behalf to dispose of the claim, or to receive any consideration whereby their vote should be in any way affected, influenced, or controlled. It further appears that, on the 10th of December, 1878, the bankrupts appeared before a notary public at Houghton, and answered certain interrogatories propounded by the register, in which they declared that they had not paid, or offered to pay, or promised to pay any creditor any sum other than that specified in their proposed compromise, in order to induce the creditor to accept it; that they had never entrusted to any attorney, or other agent, any money or property for the purpose of being employed to induce any creditor to accept the composition; and that they had never authorized any attorney or agent to promise any money or property to induce any creditor to accept the composition. It seems to me this objection is not made out. I think the composition should be recorded, but that the bankrupts' estate should not be surrendered to them until the expiration of the thirty days.

On appeal to the circuit court (Judge Baxter) this decision was affirmed.

Case No. 2,529.

CAVAROC v. COLLECTOR.

[1 Woods, 172.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1871.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—"WINE IN BOTTLES"—ASSESSMENT.

Under section 16 of the act (16 Stat. 262), C. imported a lot of wine in bottles, each bottle containing more than a pint and less than quart; held, that the rate of duty was controlled by the actual cost of the wine and not by its cost estimated on the supposition that each bottle contained an entire quart.

This was an action brought to recover of defendant, James F. Casey, who was collector of customs at the port of New Orleans, the sum of $532, duties alleged to have been illegally imposed and collected by him from plaintiff. A jury was waived and the cause submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, which sufficiently appears in the opinion of the court.

Charles Case and J. D. Rouse, for plaintiff.

J. R. Beckwith, U. S. Atty., for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The law controlling the case is found in 16 Stat. 262, § 21, and is as follows: "There shall be levied, collected and paid, the following rates of duties, that is to say, on all wines imported in casks, containing not more than twenty-two per centum of alcohol and valued at not exceeding forty cents per gallon, twenty-five cents per gallon; valued at over forty cents and not exceeding one dollar, sixty cents. * * * On wines of all kinds imported in bottles, and not otherwise herein provided for, the same rate per gallon as wines imported in casks; but all bottles containing one quart or less than one quart shall be held to contain one quart, and all bottles containing one pint or less than one pint shall be held to contain one pint and shall pay in addition three cents per bottle." The plaintiffs imported 507 cases of white wine in bottles, each bottle containing more than a pint and less than a quart. The wines were entered at the custom house at the quantity of three gallons per case. The cost of the wine was one dollar, fourteen cents and eight mills per case, commissions included. If the cost per case be divided by three, the number of gallons per case as entered, then the cost per gallon is less than forty cents and the duty imposed by law thereon is twenty-five cents per gallon and three cents per bottle. But the collector ascertained by measurement the quantity contained in each bottle to be one-fifth of a gallon or two gallons and two-fifths of a gallon per case, and if the cost per case be divided by the latter number, the actual quantity, then the cost per case exceeds forty cents per gallon, and the duty is sixty cents per gallon and three cents per bottle. The defendant decided that this was the lawful method of estimating the cost and imposed duties at the latter rate upon the wine, estimating the quantity to be one quart per bottle or three gallons per case. The plaintiffs claim that by this method of deciding upon the rate of duty the collector has imposed duties to the amount of $532.35 over and above what the law authorized.

The question presented for decision is, therefore, was the collector right in the method adopted for estimating the value of the wine; in other words, was he or not bound, in estimating the value of the wine, to hold that each bottle contained a quart? We think the method adopted by the collector was the correct one. The law is express that wines valued at not exceeding forty cents per gallon shall pay twenty-five cents, and valued at over forty cents and not over one dollar per gallon, sixty cents per gallon. There is no dispute that this wine actually cost over forty cents per gallon. It is, therefore, liable to pay a duty of sixty cents, unless the collector is bound, in estimating the value, to consider each bottle as holding an entire quart. To adopt the rule claimed as correct by plaintiffs, would be to allow the importer and not the law to fix the rate of duty. For by changing the size of his bottles he could reduce the duty from sixty to twenty-five cents per gallon without any change in the quality or cost of the wine. The provision, that each bottle containing more than a pint and less than a quart, shall be held to contain a quart, is intended only to fix the quantity on which the duty is to be imposed; the value of the wine is intended to be its actual and not a fictitious or arbitrary value.

The policy of the law is to impose the same uniform duty on the same article, and not to leave the duty to be regulated by the importer. It was not the purpose of the law to impose sixty cents on wine put up in bottles holding a quart, and twenty-five cents on the same wine put up in bottles of a smaller size. Any hardship resulting from the application of this rule may be avoided by the importer by the simple process of importing his wines in pint and quart bottles. He cannot be allowed to escape a part of the duties by changing the size of his bottles. Let a judgment be entered for defendant.

CAVENDER v. GROVE.

[4 Biss. 269.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Oct., 1868.

JUDGMENT — HOW ASSIGNABLE — PAYMENT TO ASSIGNEE — SATISFACTION — DEFENSE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. In Indiana, judgments are assignable by indorsement on the records of them, attested by the clerk.

2. Judgment may be assigned otherwise than of record. But in such case any payment or satisfaction of the judgment made to the assignor before the defendant has notice of the assignment, is valid.

3. No agreement for the full satisfaction of a judgment, made in consideration of the payment of a less sum than the amount of the judgment, is a full satisfaction of it.

4. On a motion to enter satisfaction of a judgment, nothing can be heard in support of it which might have been set up as a defense to the action in which the judgment was rendered. But if such defense is omitted to be pleaded to the action, and if it might be the subject of a cross action against the party recovering the judgment, the matter of such defense may, by agreement of the parties, furnish sufficient consideration for a contract between them to satisfy the judgment.

5. When a judgment creditor executes a written acknowledgment of the satisfaction of his judgment, and this is duly shown in evidence on a motion for satisfaction to be entered, the burden of proving that such acknowledgment is void for want of consideration or otherwise devolves on the creditor; and if he fails to make such proof, satisfaction of the judgment will be entered.

Hanna & Knefler, for the motion.

Charles E. Marsh, contra.

McDONALD, District Judge. In a proceeding in admiralty in this court, on the 28th of February, 1868, Stephen Grove obtained a judgment by default against Anthony J. Cavender for four hundred and fifty-nine dollars and twenty-five cents. Execution has been issued upon this judgment, and levied on Cavender's property. Cavender now moves for an entry of satisfaction of this judgment.

Among other things, Cavender, in support of his motion, produced a paper signed by Grove, dated June 26, 1868, acknowledging full satisfaction of the judgment, and directing the marshal to return the execution. Cavender also showed in evidence the clerk's receipt in full for one hundred and thirty-eight dollars and fifty-seven cents, including all costs in the case, dated July 17, 1868.

There was evidence in support of said acknowledgment of satisfaction by Grove, to the effect that Cavender had complained, after the judgment was rendered, that it was given for a far larger sum than was due; that deductions by way of payment, or set-off, or counter-claim, should have been credited on the claim, and were not; and that in the making of the settlement, at the time when the acknowledgment of satisfaction was executed, these deductions were taken into the calculation and allowed by Grove, as well as certain payments made by Cavender after the rendition of the judgment. And I think these facts are sufficiently established. It is certain that at no time after the judgment was rendered did Cavender pay on the judgment anything like the amount of it.

In opposition to the motion, it was proved that, in consideration of five dollars, Grove, on the 5th of March, 1868, and before his acknowledgment of satisfaction, assigned the judgment to David D. Doughty. This assignment was not made on the record of the case as required by the statute of Indiana, but on a separate paper which was filed among the papers of the case July 1, 1868. Doughty, as well as Grove, appears by counsel and resists the motion.

The evidence further shows that Cavender, soon after this assignment, heard a rumor of it, and applied to Doughty and to the attorney of Grove for information on the subject; and that they told him it was assigned, but would not tell him to whom the assignment was made, because, as they allege, they did not want to be pestered by him about it. The attorney, however, informed him that if he would make arrangements to pay a part of it, he would tell him who was the assignee. All this happened before the date of the acknowledgment of satisfaction. Other evidence was given on both sides, on the question whether at the time of execution of the acknowledgment of satisfaction, Cavender had notice of the assignment. I think that such notice is not established by the evidence; and I think that, under all the circumstances, the failure of Doughty to inform Cavender that he, Doughty, was the assignee, estops him from now alleging that Cavender had notice. Fair dealing required that when Cavender asked Doughty for information touching this assignment, he should have told him the whole truth. It might indeed have been otherwise, if Cavender had, from any other source, had satisfactory information of the assignment before the settlement with Grove. But, though there was some evidence leading to that conclusion, it was too vague to establish it. Upon the whole, therefore, I conclude that Cavender, when he took the acknowledgment of satisfaction, had no legal or equitable notice that Doughty was assignee of the judgment.

Since, then, Doughty did not procure the assignment of record, as required by the statute; and since Cavender, when he settled the judgment with Grove, was not aware that Doughty was the owner of it, Doughty must be considered as holding it subject to all equities. Robeson v. Roberts, 20 Ind. 155. And I thus conclude the more readily and willingly, when I consider that he gave only five dollars for it—less than one-ninetieth of the face of it. I cannot think that a purchaser under such circumstances is entitled to the favorable consideration of any court. And, upon the whole, I think that I ought to regard the claim of Doughty as entirely out of the question in considering the present motion.

Then, the only point for inquiry is, whether as between Grove and Cavender this judgment ought to be deemed satisfied. The written acknowledgment of satisfaction shown in evidence is certainly sufficient prima facie proof. It has been attempted, however, to overthrow the prima facie case thus made by other evidence showing clearly enough that but a small portion of the judgment has been paid since its rendition. As already stated, it appears by the evidence that after the judgment by default was rendered, Cavender complained that the judgment was for too large a sum; and that Grove ought to have credited his claim with divers items, and only taken judgment for a small balance; whereas, he took it for the whole claim without these credits. And it appears further by the evidence, that in the negotiation which resulted in the execution of the acknowledgment of satisfaction, these credits were insisted upon by Cavender, and probably allowed by Grove. Though in relation to this whole matter, the evidence is very vague and unsatisfactory.

It is certain that the payment of a sum less than the amount due on a judgment or other debt cannot operate as a full satisfaction thereof, even though it is agreed between the parties, at the time of such payment, that it shall so operate. And it is equally clear that, on a motion to enter satisfaction of a judgment, nothing can be heard in support of it which might have been set up as a defense to the action on which the judgment was rendered. But I deem it equally clear that if such a defense is omitted to be pleaded to the action, and if it might be the subject of a cross action against the party recovering the judgment, the matter of such defense may very well, by agreement of the parties, furnish a sufficient consideration for a contract between them to satisfy the judgment. Such, I think, was the case. Cavender paid some money to Grove after the judgment was rendered. He had a claim against Grove in relation to the subject matter of the action before the judgment was rendered. This claim Grove afterward recognized as valid and subsisting, and the settlement of which he seems to have taken as a part of the consideration upon which he executed the acknowledgment of satisfaction of the judgment. I think that this was all right; and that I ought to hold him to his bargain.

It has been urged, indeed, in opposition to the view above expressed, that the facts from which the conclusion is deduced are not well proved. It must be admitted that the evidence of these facts is by no means satisfactory. But it should be remembered that Cavender, by the production in evidence of the written acknowledgment of satisfaction of the judgment, prima facie established all that was necessary to sustain his motion. The burden then devolves on Grove to overthrow the prima facie case thus made. It did not devolve on Cavender to prove that the acknowledgment of satisfaction was founded on a sufficient consideration; but it devolved on Grove to prove that the consideration on which the acknowledgment was founded was insufficient. On this point arises the uncertainty of the evidence. It was for him to remove that uncertainty; and I think he has not done it. On the contrary, I am inclined to think that I may safely deduce from the evidence, vague though it be, the facts which I have above stated.

It follows that the judgment must be entered satisfied.

CAWOOD v. NICHOLS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 180.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1804.

ACTION BY EXECUTOR—PLEADING ISSUANCE OF LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

The declaration need not state by whom the letters testamentary were granted.

[At law. Action by Cawood, executor of Blacklock, against Edward Nichols.]

Demurrer to the declaration, because it does not state by whom letters testamentary were granted. Cur. ad. vult. See Chiberton v. Trudgeon, Cro. Jac. 556, which seems in support of the demurrer. Quaere, whether there is not a difference between letters testamentary and letters of administration. See Graysbrook v. Fox, Plow. 279; Temple v. Temple, Cro. Eliz. 791; Morgan v. Williams, Id. 431; and Gidley v. Williams, 1 Salk. 38; which is strong in support of the demurrer as to letters of administration. Executors are by will, not by the ordinary. None of the forms of declarations by executors state by whom the letters testamentary were granted; but all the forms by administrators state by whom they were granted. "The right of action is in him before probate, for that gives him no interest; but the right he hath is by virtue of the will." Swinb. Wills, 434, cites Russel's Case, 5 Rep. 27, and 1 Inst. 292. "He cannot have an action unless he prove the will before he declares. If the action be brought before probate; if he concludes his declaration with a profert hic in curia literas testamentarias, it is well enough." Id.; cites Duncomb v. Walter, 1 Vent. 370; Raym. 479, 3 Lev. 57. "If a man have goods in divers dioceses or provinces, and makes his executor of his goods in one of the provinces, and dies intestate as to his other goods: if the ordinary commit administration of the goods, which are in the other province, to the said executor, then is he both executor and administrator, and the party died both testate and intestate." Swinb. Wills, 440, 441; 35 Hen. VI. fol. 36.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, after mentioning the above authorities, said, "Upon the whole and upon examination of precedents, I am of opinion that the declaration is sufficient."

THE COURT, at December term, being of the same opinion, advised the defendant to withdraw the demurrer, which he did, and confessed judgment.

The CAYENNE.

[2 Abb. (U. S.) 42.] [1]

District Court, D. Delaware. Oct. Term, 1870.[2]

SALVAGE—CASES OF DERELICT.

The true rule for awarding salvage in cases of derelict is this: Divide the proceeds which remain over all costs and disbursements of the salvage suit equally between the salvors and the owners of the rescued property, giving to each of these two interests a moiety.

[See note at end of case.]

Libel in admiralty in a cause of salvage. The libel in this case was filed by John W. Hall and others against the bark Cayenne, of Bordeaux.

HALL, District Judge. I have no difficulty in this case concerning matters of fact. According to my view, there need be no controversy in this respect. The captain and crew of the sloop Joseph P. Comegys, returning from Boston to her port in Delaware, and being on Sunday, September 17, near the capes of the Delaware, observed the bark, the subject of this libel, in a place in the ocean where, to use the captain's words, it ought not to be. He, in consequence, approached it, to learn the cause. On coming near, it was hailed, and, returning no answer, the mate and one of the crew boarded it, and found it abandoned; no person on board. Its sails were set, the bowsprit broken off near to the hull, and with the sail hanging down over the prow, and the vessel drifting at the rate, as supposed, of two miles and a half an hour, by tide and wind, toward shoals distant about eight miles. It was young flood; and the captain believed it would be thrown by that tide upon the shoals unless prevented. I make no scrutiny of the grounds of this belief. If the captain and crew of the Comegys had not taken possession of this bark, Captain Marshall of the pilot boat might, and if the bark had not been taken by either of them, it might not have gone upon the shoals that tide. But this is needless conjecturing. If it had not been taken up by some salvor, it must have been lost. As respects the claimants, it is a saving by a salvor in a case of total abandonment; they doing nothing, attempting nothing, to save it; and, left in that condition, destruction was certain and soon; it might have been delayed a short time. I enter into no consideration of hardship or exposure on the part of the salvors. They have taken this abandoned bark and brought it into safe port, turning aside from their proper business, and incurring some inconvenience, exposure, and trouble.

This brings me to the question of allowance. The question has given me anxiety in every case of the kind before me, and I have decided it with distrust. I may add that the most satisfactory judgment I ever formed, I mean most satisfactory to myself, and which I trusted might be a precedent against extravagance preying upon the hard earnings of useful industry in misfortune, was reversed, and the allowance enhanced three-fold. It was the case of Virden v. The Caroline [Case No. 16,956]. She was a coaster from Maine. On February 1, 1857, she was lying within the Delaware breakwater. It had been a hard winter; the ice was breaking up in the river; the water was covered with floating ice. On February 1, one of the crew of the Caroline discovered a small leak in the starboard lumber port hole; it was found on examination that the shutter of this port hole had been injured, and it was believed necessary for the safety of the brig to repair this to secure it from being staved in by the ice. But the port hole was under water, and to repair it the lading of the brig must be shifted so as to raise this port hole above water. The flood tide had just begun. While it was running up there was no danger to the brig, but when running down it might drive the ice against this port hole, and the shutter could not stand heavy blows. The repair must be done during the running up of that tide, or soon after, before it became strong, running down. The crew of the brig could not shift the lading so as to raise the port hole above water in that time. They signaled a vessel near for help. She could not afford it. The steam tug America was lying near. She had been there several days, having gone there for employment in aiding vessels in need, and making profit by charges for assistance rendered. They signaled this tug for assistance, and she was alongside the brig in fifteen minutes. The day was pleasant; the water calm and smooth, and covered with floating ice. The crews of the tug and of the brig went to work to arrange the lading so as to raise this port hole above water; they threw heavy hogsheads of bone-dust into the water; removed some goods, value one thousand nine hundred and thirty-two dollars, on board the tug; they very soon perceived that they could easily raise the port hole above water in the necessary time. The tug had two calls during the day from vessels for assistance; these were attended to, the tug going to them, giving the required relief, and returning to the Caroline. About the middle of the afternoon the port hole was raised, one of the brig's crew repaired it, and the tug returned to her anchorage. There was no hurry, exposure, difficult work, nor any manner of danger, the working as comfortable as on a house floor—on the deck of a stationary vessel.

The first question on the facts was, whether this was salvage service, or common work in kind of service, which the tug had gone to the breakwater to render, and was profitably employed in rendering, as the reason why she was there and why she stayed there; the work being done under no present danger, but merely to guard against an evil which would happen unless prevented, and to prevent which this work was done in harbor, in fair, pleasant weather, on calm, smooth water. I came to the conclusion it was a salvage service, but of little merit, and I allowed six hundred and fifty dollars as compensation, more than three times the worth of the work and service. The decree was reversed, and about eighteen hundred dollars allowed.

This case, as all those cited, shows how judges differ, when they have no guide but their sound discretion, bringing vividly to mind the eloquent exclamation of Lord Camden: "The discretion of a judge is the law of tyrants." It is very important to have some rule to guide the judgment. It is not safe to be left at large to utter at random ten or twenty, as the words happen to come up.

There is certainly force in the reasoning of the counsel of the libelants, upon service rendered in the way of business, setting themselves apart to find employment in such service. This may have led to what is said to be the abrogation of the rule of allowing a moiety in cases of abandonment; but I do not feel it necessary to enter into any special discussion of this point. There may be cases of abandonment, in which much less than a moiety should be allowed.

Salvage involves various considerations and principles indicating the allowance in the particular case. In that of the brig Caroline, at the breakwater, the service was mere work and labor in shifting the lading to raise a port hole above water, for repairs; requiring no exposure, hardship, or skill, but elevated to salvage by this repair being necessary for the safety of the vessel; mere work in the line of employment of those doing it, without exposure or danger.

Another class of cases is of vessels in peril, where life must be periled to succor them. I have had such a case before me. A vessel driven without a person on board out of the Delaware bay, into the ocean, toward shore, in a frightful state of waves, under a tempest. A boat of pilots boarded her and saved her in those circumstances. The allowance was to remunerate exposure and boldness, and to encourage like service.

In no case is salvage a compensation for service on the principle of its value, quantum meruit. The case of the brig Caroline came the nearest to that rule. I allowed three-fold the value of the actual service, and the chief justice of the United States increased the allowance from six hundred and fifty dollars to eighteen hundred dollars.

In the case before me, the governing element is the abandonment of the bark, in connection with the fact that it was taken up and brought safely into port by the libellants; turning aside from their proper business certainly, with inconvenience and exposure, and more or less hardship,—the service being fairly and honestly rendered, and the bark and cargo saved. I make no estimate of the danger to the bark from her drifting toward the shoals. It has very little bearing in the case, nor has the probability that she must be taken up. Captain Marshall of the pilot boat would have taken her if the Comegys had not; and if neither had taken her, it is very probable some other salvor would. I cannot see any effect on the determination of this case from such considerations. The claimants, or any one interested in the vessel or cargo, would not have recovered the property; they were not seeking it; so far as they are in the case, the bark and cargo would have been a total loss, if some salvor had not saved it. It was a total abandonment, and in that abandonment there would have been a total loss, if some salvor had not interposed; it is of no concern who that salvor may be; what the claimants receive will be as clear a gain to them as what the salvors receive will be to them; the claimants, what, so far as they were concerned, was abandoned to destruction; the salvors, their portion for saving the whole. This view indicates the principle of allowance: divide what remains over all costs and disbursements equally between the parties—to each a moiety. I think this is satisfactory to common sense and feeling of propriety.

It is argued, that principle of allowance has been overruled. I do not assert it as applicable to every case of abandonment, but as proper in this case—property abandoned to certain loss if not rescued by a salvor. Judges most highly respected have applied it. But Post v. Jones, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 150, is cited for this clause of the opinion of the court delivered by Judge Grier: "We agree with Dr. Lushington, that the reward in derelict cases should be governed by the same principles as other salvage cases, namely, danger to property, value, risk of life, skill, labor, and the duration of the service;" "and that no valid reason can be assigned for fixing a reward for salving derelict property at a moiety or any given proportion; and that the true principle is adequate reward according to the circumstances of the case." To show how vague such rules are, I consider the principle on which I decide the amount precisely that of Dr. Lushington; I relying upon the circumstance, that this property was abandoned to total loss which, but for a salvor, must have occurred a governing circumstance. But when it is said "danger to property, value, risk of life, skill, labor, and the duration of the service," are governing considerations as in all salvage cases, let us look at this case of Post v. Jones. The ship Richmond, with a very valuable cargo of whale oil, the fruit of nearly three years' privation, exposure, and toil, was stranded on an uninhabited shore; the cargo must be lost unless three other vessels would take it home, distant twenty-seven thousand miles. These vessels, instead of generosity to distress, force a mock auction sale, where there was not a buyer but themselves, and purchase this cargo of oil, take it on board, bring it home, and insist on keeping it at their auction price. The court set aside this auction sale, declare the three vessels that took and brought home the oil salvors, allow a moiety for salvage, and also freight for bringing home the moiety of the Richmond. Who does not see that the principle of allowance was the loss of the Richmond's cargo in the condition it was, and saving it by the other vessels, when otherwise it would have been a total loss. The transferring of the oil to those vessels, and then transporting it home, was without danger, and required neither labor of any amount nor skill in any degree, and although there was a long distance, they must go home, and the taking of this oil accelerated their departure and diminished their exposure and danger, while freight on the Richmond's moiety was a source of clear profit. The conduct of the salvors, always of weight, was oppressive. The decision approves itself to our sense of justice; but it certainly does not overrule any decision of our judges. If I mistake not, it countenances the principle which I rest upon for the allowance I make. I add, I regard the decision of our judges upon their elaborate investigations worthy of deference, and to be followed in cases in this country in preference to the authority of a British court of admiralty. Decree accordingly.

[NOTE. The claimants appealed to the circuit court, which modified the decree herein by reducing the award to the salvors to $2,000. See Case No. 5,941.]

[NOTE. Even as early as 1806, it was said by Judge Peters that the old rule allowing one-half as salvage, in cases of derelict, without regard to the character and circumstances of the service, "has been long since exploded." Taylor v. Goods Saved from The Cato, Case No. 13,786. The rule has gradually given way, in this country as well as in England, to the practice of awarding a fair compensation, in view of all the circumstances, as in other cases of salvage. Post v. Jones, 19 How. (60 U. S.) 150; 210 Barrels of Oil, Case No. 14,297; The Ida L. Howard, Id. 6,999; The Georgiana, Id. 5,355; The Lovetand, 5 Fed. 105; The B. C. Terry, 9 Fed. 920; The Edwards, 12 Fed. 508; The Annie Henderson, 15 Fed. 550; The Sybil, Case No. 4,824. In 1818, however, Judge Story was of opinion that the old rule "ought still to be considered as a subsisting, but flexible, rule, and that prima facie the salvors were entitled to a moiety; and that it was incumbent on the claimant to establish that, under the special circumstances of the case, a different measure ought to be applied." Rowe v. The Brig, Id. 12,093. In this statement of the rule he was followed by Judge Benedict as late as 1865. The Charles Henry, Id. 2,617. It is doubtful, however, whether even this doctrine would be acquiesced in at the present day; for the courts now seem to exercise a sound discretion, with little regard to the moiety rule in any form. See The Anna, Case No. 398; The George Nicholaus, Id. 13,578; The Hyderabad, 11 Fed. 749; The Fairfield, 30 Fed. 700; The Flower City, 16 Fed. 866; The Agnes Manning, 59 Fed. 481; Cargo from Wreck of The Edwards, 12 Fed. 508; The William Smith, 59 Fed. 615. The salvage is not limited to one-half, and in the two cases last cited 70 per cent. was allowed. See, also, Sprague v. 140 Barrels of Flour, Case No. 13,253. The fact that the derelict is in a position where she would probably have been rescued by other vessels, had she not been saved by the salvors, is to be considered in fixing the amount of salvage. Hall v. Paquet Bot De Cayenne, Case No. 5,941; The Ida L. Howard, Id. 6,999; The Georgiana, Id. 5,355; The Lovett Peacock, Id. 8,555; Hilmer v. The Boweer, Id. 7,322.]

BANKRUPTCY—MUTUAL CREDITS—EVIDENCE OF FORMER DEALINGS TO VARY CONTRACT.

1. It seems, that the rule laid down in Rose v. Hart, 8 Taunt. 499, that a deposit of goods by a contract which will result in a debt, brings the case within the mutual credit clause of the bankrupt act, so that the bailee can set off his debt against the value of the goods, is the true rule under our bankrupt law.

2. Where a bailee of goods had been the original vendor of them, and supposed that he had a lien and an immediate right of sale, and agreed with the bailor to hold the goods for six months longer, and not to sell within that time, except for a certain price, but that afterwards he might sell and reimburse himself, held, this was a valid contract whether there were an antecedent lien or not, and after bankruptcy the bailee could have the goods sold and apply the proceeds towards the payment of his debt and prove for the deficiency.

3. A former course of dealing between A. and a broker, cannot be given in evidence to vary or explain a contract between A. and B., made through the same broker, if unknown to B. and not founded on a general usage of trade.

Bankruptcy. The bankrupt [C. L. Holbrook] was a clerk who had sometimes speculated in merchandise through the agency of his friends R. H. Green and Sons, merchandise brokers, of New York. On the 29th July, 1868, Messrs. Green bought for his account from Caylus, De Ruyter, & Company, importers, of New York, one hundred casks of French madder of a particular brand, to be thereafter shipped from France in the December and January following, to be delivered on the dock in New York in good order, and of prime quality, for fifteen cents per pound in gold, payable in thirty days after delivery. The bought and sold note disclosed Holbrook as the principal. The madder arrived early in 1869, and was delivered to the brokers, but was not paid for in thirty days, and had not been paid for at the date of the bankruptcy, June 28, 1870. It was then in the hands of the petitioners, Caylus, De Ruyter, & Co., the original vendors, having been consigned to them for sale in December, 1869, as presently to be stated; and since the appointment of the assignee the madder has been sold by order of court on consent of the parties, who now submitted the question whether the proceeds of sale which are less than the original price, belong to the assignee, or may be applied by the petitioners towards the payment of their debt, with leave to them to prove for the deficiency. The correspondence of the parties, and the oral evidence in the case tended to show that the goods had been delivered to Green & Co. on their arrival in New York. The petitioners offered to prove that by the course of dealing between them and the brokers, the latter were to hold the goods as agents for both parties, and to apply the proceeds of sale to the payment of their account.

LOWELL, District Judge. I cannot admit a course of dealing between other parties, even if they were represented by the same brokers, to qualify the delivery which the contract calls for, unless it amounts to a general usage of trade, or is in some way brought home to Mr. Holbrook.

After the madder had been delivered, it was pledged by the brokers to a trust company, and the money thus raised was advanced to the petitioners, but not in payment of their account for the madder; and they afterwards advanced the money to Green to repay the trust company, and took the pledged goods into their own possession. Soon after this, they wrote to Holbrook, December 2, 1869, reminding him that the bills for the madder had been rendered more than eight months before, and offering if he would pay the interest and expenses and consign the goods to them for sale at a commission of two and a half per cent, to "carry" the goods for his account and risk for ninety days. They wrote that in this way they could get advances on them, &c., and closed thus: "We think this arrangement the best for all concerned, as putting this long pending matter in the way of settlement, and carrying the goods over to a time when sales may reasonably be expected to be made, and avoiding the necessity which would otherwise occur of realizing on the goods at an unfavorable moment." Upon receipt of this letter, which came through Messrs. Green & Co., as usual, Mr. Holbrook referred the matter to them, and an agreement was arrived at as appears by a letter of 31 December, 1869, from Holbrook to the petitioners, and their answer, January 3, 1870, by which the petitioners in consideration of the payment of the interest, storage, expenses, and insurance, to 31 December, and of the goods being consigned to them for sale, agreed not to sell for six months without Holbrook's consent, unless they could obtain sixteen cents a pound in gold. The letter of the petitioners accepting the terms, says that after six months they are to sell at the best price they can obtain for Holbrook's account. To this letter there was no reply. As the six months were about to expire, some negotiations were had looking to a further extension, but nothing was arranged, and a few days before the time was out Holbrook filed his petition in bankruptcy.

G. O. Shattuck & W. A. Munroe, for petitioners.

The petitioners never lost their lien as vendors; or if they did, it revived when they again obtained possession of the goods. Bing. Sales, 580; Stephens v. Wilkinson, 2 Barn. & Adol. 320; Gillard v. Brittan, 8 Mees. & W. 575. The goods having been consigned to the petitioners for sale, they have a right of set-off under the mutual credit clause of the bankrupt act, even if they had no lien. Rose v. Hart, 8 Taunt. 499; Naoroji v. Bank of India, L. R. 3 C. P. 444; Murray v. Riggs, 15 Johns. 591; Demmon v. Boylston Bank, 5 Cush. 194.

H. D. Hyde, for assignees.

A factor has a lien only for his advances or for general balance of account as factor, and not for what may be due him in some other capacity. Houghton v. Matthews, 3 Bos. & P. 485; 2 Kent, Comm. 645; Smith, Merc. Law. 516. If Holbrook had chosen to revoke the agency, the petitioners could not have objected, and as the bankruptcy occurred before sale had been made of the goods, the assignee may revoke, and take them for the general creditors.

LOWELL, District Judge. Our bankrupt law has adopted the language which had been used in former statutes for a long time, in reference to cross-demands between the assignee of a bankrupt and a creditor of the estate, that "in all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid." After some diversity of opinion, the leading case of Rose v. Hart, 8 Taunt. 499, appears to have been accepted as settling the law of England, that where a creditor has goods or choses in action of the bankrupt put into his hands before bankruptcy by a valid contract, by the terms of which the deposit will result in a debt, as if they are deposited for sale or collection, the case of mutual credit has arisen within the meaning of the bankrupt act; but where there is a deposit for some other purpose, as in the leading case itself, where goods were left with a fuller to be dressed, he can claim nothing beyond such lien as the common law gives him. See Rose v. Hart, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 172, and the American notes which cite cases in this country quite as liberal in favor of an equitable set-off, even when the statute is silent.

Under this rule the petitioners would have a right to set off the price of these goods against the demand of the assignee for the value of the goods, by virtue of the consignment of December, 1869, independently of any question of the revival of their lien as vendors, or of the intermediate pledge by the brokers. But this inquiry I do not pursue beyond the mere statement of a rule which seems to be indisputable, because the facts establish a right to hold the goods by the very terms of the contract. Whether the petitioners had a lien or not, it is plain that both parties thought they had one, and that the last agreement between them was made on that basis, the petitioners undertaking for a valuable consideration, to "carry" the madder for six months, and at the end of that time to be at liberty to sell it for the best price they could obtain, and reimburse themselves. This was accepted as a concession on their part, and to save a sacrifice; and throughout the correspondence, the talk is of "margins," and of "carrying" the goods for the benefit of Mr. Holbrook, all of which imports a right in the merchants to insist on a sale, and a holding of the goods as security for the purchase-money. I find, therefore, that the evidence clearly shows a lien by contract, whatever may have been its supposed origin, and a lien on which the parties have so acted and dealt with each other that the bankrupt and his assignee cannot now deny it. It was founded on the valuable consideration of a forbearance to sue.

Order that the petitioners have leave to apply the proceeds of sale of the madder towards the payment of their debt, and to prove for the deficiency.

DAMAGES IN COLLISION CASES—FERRY-BOAT—DEMURRAGE—SUPERINTENDING REPAIRS.

1. Where a ferry-boat was injured in a collision, and was withdrawn for repairs, her place being supplied by a boat taken off from another ferry belonging to the libellants, whose place was in its turn supplied by a spare boat, but it was not shown that the injured boat could have been chartered for any sum for the time she was so laid up, but proof was given of the value of her use, based on her receipts while running on the ferry: Held, that the use of the ferry-boat was valuable;

[Approved in The Favorita, Case No. 4,694. Cited in the Mary Steele, Case No. 9,226.]

2. The case of Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 112, holding that the market value of a vessel is the criterion of her value in collision cases, does not apply where it appears that no such thing as a market price exists.

3. There being no market price, a judgment as to her value, given by men having experience upon the ferries, founded upon their knowledge of the business, is the natural way to ascertain the loss.

[Cited in The Transit, Case No. 14,138.]

4. Where the owners of a ferry-boat repaired her themselves, and charged, in addition to the pay of the laborers, an addition of twenty-five cents a day, which was proved to be usually charged for the use of the tools and yard, &c., and also made a charge for the services of two men in superintending the repairs: Held, that these items were recoverable as part of the damages.

[Cited in The May Flower, Case No. 9,345; The Alaska, 44 Fed. 500.]

In admiralty. This was a libel for collision filed by the Hoboken Land and Improvement Company, owners of the ferry-boat [James Watt], to recover damages for a collision between her and the Cayuga. The court held the Cayuga in fault. [See Case No. 2,536.] On the reference to ascertain the damages, it appeared that the libellants themselves repaired the boat. Exceptions were taken to the report of the commissioner. The questions raised on the exceptions sufficiently appear in the opinion.

W. J. A. Fuller, for libellants.

C. Van Santvoord, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before me upon exceptions to the commissioner's report of the damages caused by the collision in the pleadings mentioned. The main exception is to the allowance by the commissioner of demurrage at the rate of seventy-five dollars per day for the time the injured vessel was undergoing repairs. This exception is based upon the ground, that there is no evidence that the vessel could have been chartered for that or any sum per day, at the time in question. The evidence showed that the vessel was a ferry-boat, at the time of the injury engaged in making the regular trips of the Hoboken ferry; that she was necessarily withdrawn from the ferry during the repairs, and her place there supplied by another ferry-boat belonging to the same company, which was taken off from the Christopher street ferry for that purpose, the place of the latter being in turn supplied by a spare boat.

For the use of vessels of this class there is no such thing as a market price fixed by various transactions between various persons. Ferry-boats are not general ships, up for charter or hire in open market, and it is impossible to refer to any such market to show the value of the use of such a vessel at the time in question. But it is said that the supreme court, in Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 112, have laid down the rule that the only criterion by which this value can be ascertained is a market price. I do not so understand the decision of that court. The rule there laid down can only be intended to be applied in cases where there is such a market to refer to, but not in a case where it is made to appear that no such thing as a market price exists. In the absence of a market price to refer to, some other evidence must be allowable in a case like this, for the use of the injured vessel was clearly valuable. She was, when injured, in constant, permanent employment, engaged in making regular but short voyages, transporting almost the same number of passengers each day, all for a fixed price, and all for cash, and her owners had a monopoly of the route. It would seem, then, that the actual value of her use for seventeen days could be ascertained more nearly than that of most other classes of vessels. Two witnesses of large experience upon the ferries were called to prove this value, and they testify to the amount which the commissioner has reported. This it seems to me is one way, and, when the witnesses are in a position to know the actual result of the employment of a ferry-boat for any given period, not an unsatisfactory way to prove the damages arising from the detention of such a vessel.

In the absence of a market price, the judgment of such persons, founded upon knowledge of the business, is the natural way to ascertain the loss occasioned by such an interruption. It was competent to show the inaccuracy of the estimate by proof of the actual receipts and expenses of a ferry-boat upon such a ferry, or by counter estimate. In the absence of any such opposing evidence, the estimate of the witnesses must be deemed an accurate statement of the value of the use of the vessel in question, and as such was properly allowed. Exception is also taken to the item of $43.75, which is an addition of twenty-five cents per day made to the wages actually paid to the laborers engaged in the repairs, for the use of tools, rent of yards, &c. The item I think properly allowed upon the evidence, as forming part of the actual cost of the repairs. As a profit it could not be allowed, but the evidence shows that the use of tools, yard, &c., when furnished, is by usage estimated at that sum, and compensated for in that way. Another item objected to is a charge for the services of two persons who superintended the repairs. These persons performed the service, and I see no reason for refusing a proper compensation for it, notwithstanding the proof that they were in the employ of libellants upon a salary. The libellants, by reason of the collision, lost the use of the services of these two men for the period they were engaged on the repairs, and should be allowed a proper sum to compensate for such loss. No fair objection is raised upon the evidence to any other items of the report, and it must accordingly be confirmed.

[NOTE. The Hudson River Steamboat Company, claimant, appealed to the circuit court, which affirmed the district court decree (see Case No. 2,537), and the decree of the circuit court was affirmed in The Cayuga v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 270.]

COLLISION IN HUDSON RIVER — FERRY BOAT AND STEAMBOAT—VESSELS CROSSING.

1. Where a steamboat was coming down the Hudson river, and approached the track of a ferry boat which was crossing from Hoboken to New York, and stopped her engine, but started it up again when the ferry boat was directly ahead of and close to her, and struck the ferry boat on her port quarter, and the pilot of the steamboat testified that he made no attempt to swing his bow to starboard, although a swing of ten or fifteen feet would have carried him clear, and excused his doing nothing by saying he had not time to do anything, while other witnesses testified that he did shift his wheel and was swinging to west at the time of the blow. Held, that the ferry boat, upon seeing the steamboat stop her engine, was entitled to consider that she intended to allow the ferry boat to pass her bows, and to act accordingly. The ferry boat was therefore free from fault in keeping on.

2. The starting of the steamboat's engine again in such circumstances, was a fault on her part.

3. If the pilot's excuse for not sheering be held good, it shows the vessels in such close proximity as to make clearly manifest the impropriety of his starting the engine. If it is not held good, then he was in fault in not attempting to sheer; and if, as stated by other witnesses, he did sheer, his statement, on which the claimant chiefly relies, is discredited.

In admiralty.

W. A. Fuller, for libellants.

C. Van Santvoord, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a case of collision. The libellants are the owners of the Hoboken ferry boat, James Watt, and proceed against the Hudson river towboat Cayuga, to recover for injuries received by the ferry boat on the 13th of June, 1866.

The place of the collision was near the middle of the Hudson river, about opposite Robinson street. The tide was ebb. The weather was clear, and the time was about four o'clock in the afternoon. The course of the Cayuga had been from her berth at the foot of Desbrosses street on the New York side down to Hubert street, when she rounded up the river, expecting to pick up a boat there, but the boat being unable to get out, the Cayuga again rounded out and down the river on her way to the Battery, to make up her tow. Shortly after heading down, she came in contact with the ferry boat, which was proceeding upon one of her regular trips from Hoboken to New York, striking the larboard quarter of the ferry boat some ten or fifteen feet from the stern.

The claim on the part of the Cayuga is, that when she rounded out and down from Hubert street, the ferry boat was further up the river and going at a greater speed than the Cayuga; that the ferry boat came down upon the Cayuga's starboard quarter, and then straightened down upon a course parallel with that of the Cayuga, and about two lengths outside of her; that this course was held by the ferry boat until her stern was even with the Cayuga's bow, when she sheered sharp to east across the course of the latter, and so close that there was not time for the Cayuga to reverse her engine or swing to west, and consequently the vessels came in contact.

On the part of the ferry boat it is claimed that the two vessels were approaching upon converging lines, the ferry boat crossing from Hoboken and the Cayuga heading for the Jersey side just below Jersey City; that the ferry boat was at the outset farther down the river than the Cayuga, but that the latter was going the faster of the two; that the ferry boat held a straight course, headed for about the foot of Liberty street, and as she was outside of and upon the starboard hand of the Cayuga, it was the duty of the latter to avoid her; that the Cayuga accordingly did stop her engine when the boats were at such distance apart as would have enabled the ferry boat to pass, but started it again before the ferry boat was out of the way, and so ran into her.

The voluminous, and in many aspects contradictory, testimony introduced in support of these respective theories has been examined with care, but as I view the case it is necessary to consider only a single feature of it. I consider it to have been satisfactorily shown that after the Cayuga had rounded out and down the river from Hubert street, and when the ferry boat was in plain sight crossing the river upon a regular and known trip from Hoboken to New York, the engine of the Cayuga was stopped and again started when the ferry boat was directly ahead of and close to her.

Now, whether the courses and speed of the two vessels up to this point had been as contended for by the libellant or the claimant, the ferry boat being, as she was, a ferry boat and in plain sight, upon seeing the Cayuga stop her engine, became entitled to consider that the Cayuga intended to allow her to pass upon her trip, and to act accordingly. There was therefore no fault on the part of the ferry boat in keeping on and passing the bows of the Cayuga. Such a course was to have been expected when the Cayuga stopped, and it would have entailed no danger of a collision had not the Cayuga started her engine again before the ferry boat had fairly passed. This starting up of the Cayuga when she did, brought the two into close proximity, and it was manifest when the Cayuga thus started up, that at the best she must shave the ferry boat very closely. The two vessels were by this movement brought into dangerous proximity, and the boat attempting the manoeuvre must be held responsible for the failure to successfully accomplish it. Furthermore, the statement of the pilot of the Cayuga is, that he made no effort at all to swing his bow to west when the danger of collision became imminent, although the ferry boat was moving past his bow, and although a swing of ten or fifteen feet would have carried him clear. The excuse of the pilot for this inaction is, that it would have required two full turns of the wheel to swing the bow of the Cayuga ten feet, and that there was not time to make these turns. If such be the fact with regard to this boat, it makes clearly manifest the impropriety of starting her engine when within such a short distance of a vessel ahead. If such be not the fact, it was an additional fault in the pilot not to attempt to shift his wheel, while, if, as is stated by some of the witnesses, he did shift his wheel, and was swinging to west at the blow, the positive denial of the fact by the pilot casts doubt upon the claimant's theory of the case, resting so largely as it does upon his testimony.

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 2,537.]

My conclusion therefore is that the collision in question was caused by the fault of the Cayuga, and that the libellants are entitled to recover of her the amount of their loss. Let a decree be entered accordingly, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount.

[NOTE. For decision overruling the commissioner's report as to damages, see Case No. 2,535. The Hudson River Steamboat Company, claimant, appealed to the circuit court, where the final decree of the district court was affirmed. See Case No. 2,537. From the decree of the circuit court the claimant appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the decision of the circuit court. The Cayuga v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 270.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. June 18, 1870.[2]

COLLISION BETWEEN STEAM VESSELS — CROSSING COURSES — FOURTEENTH SAILING RULE — DAMAGES—USE OF INJURED VESSEL—EVIDENCE.

1. The 14th rule of the act of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 60), which requires, that, if two ships under steam are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other, and the 18th rule of the same act, which requires that, where one of the two ships is, by the 14th rule, to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, applied.

[See note at end of case.]

2. A ferry-boat was disabled by a collision with another vessel, through the fault of the latter. To guard against interruption of the public use of the ferry from such or like causes, the owners of the ferry kept always ready for service a spare boat, which was idle except when some other boat was disabled, and which immediately took the place of the disabled boat. There was, by reason of the special character of the business of ferriage and of the boats used therein, no general demand in the market for such boats, but witnesses experienced in such business stated the value of the use of a boat such as the one that was injured: Held, (1.) That the owners were entitled to recover the fair value of the use of the injured boat during the period required for her repair, notwithstanding her place was supplied by such spare boat, which might otherwise have been idle; (2.) That it was not erroneous to estimate the value of such use at the rate or amount stated by witnesses experienced in the special business of ferriage in the waters about the city of New York, where the disabled boat was employed.

[In admiralty. Libel by the Hoboken Land & Improvement Company, owner of the steam ferry-boat James Watt, against the steamer Cayuga to recover damages caused by collision. William J. A. Fuller, for libellants.

There is some conflict of testimony in regard to the precise heading of the Cayuga, as she proceeded down the river. I think the preponderance of the testimony is, that she was headed in the direction of the docks of the Central Railroad Company, on the west side of the river, below Jersey City—a direction across the river. though less oblique thereto than the course of the James

[2] [Affirming Case No. 2,536. Decree of circuit court affirmed in The Cayuga v. Hoboken Land & Imp. Co., 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 270.]

Watt, crossing from the west side. I do not, however, deem this conflict of testimony very important, because, whether the Cayuga's course was a little more or a little less inclined to the westward, it was perfectly certain that the courses of the two vessels were inclined to each other, and must and did cross each other. Each vessel was seen from the other at about the same time; and the fact that their respective courses crossed each other, was necessarily obvious to any intelligent observer. The Cayuga had the James Watt on her starboard side, and the 14th of the rules of navigation (Act April 29, 1864; 13 Stat. 60) is explicit. that, "if two ships under steam are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other;" and the 18th rule requires, that, when one of the two ships is, by the above rule, to keep out of the way, the other "shall keep her course." If the situation and courses of the two vessels were such as to bring them within these two rules, then it was the clear duty of the Cayuga to keep out of the way of the James Watt, and permit her to keep her course, which, on the other hand, it was the duty of the latter to do.

(1) They were crossing. Neither could proceed to her destination down the river without crossing. Both knew that their courses were crossing. The Cayuga knew that the James Watt was a ferry-boat running on the Hoboken ferry, obliquely across the river, from Hoboken to Barclay street. She, therefore, knew that she could not pass down, whether in the line of the current or obliquely to the westward, without crossing the track of the ferry-boat; and the James Watt knew, with like certainty, that she could not go to Barclay street without crossing the course of the Cayuga.

(2) Was there risk of collision? It was perfectly certain that, if each kept its course, one of three things must happen—the Cayuga must cross the bow of the James Watt; or the James Watt must cross the bow of the Cayuga; or that must happen, which, in fact, did happen, namely, the boats must collide. Whichever of the two boats was moving with the greater speed, whether the Watt, when first seen from the Cayuga, was a little farther up stream than she was or not, it is, I think abundantly established by the testimony of the witnesses, that, from the time the vessels had approached within three hundred yards of each other, there was obvious risk of collision, if neither changed her course. Not such risk that there was instant peril, nor a danger which might not have been avoided, but just that risk which the 14th rule contemplates, and which brought that rule to bear upon both vessels, making it the duty of the Cayuga to keep out of the way of the Watt, and not merely permitting, but requiring the Watt to keep her course.

The proof in the district court was deemed to warrant the conclusion, that, when nearing the point of intersection, the Cayuga stopped, and then, and after she had misled the Watt into the belief that there was no further danger, started ahead and ran into the Watt. It is claimed, that the additional proofs taken in this court on behalf of the Cayuga show that no such stopping and then starting ahead took place after the Cayuga left the docks opposite Hubert street. I do not deem it necessary to settle that disputed point, although the testimony that such stopping did take place at a time when, if it had continued but for less than a minute longer, no collision could have occurred, is very strong and explicit. But, taking the statement of the Cayuga's witness, it only places the Cayuga in a category hardly less desirable, namely—she did absolutely nothing to keep out of the way—she kept her course—she completely reversed the rule, expecting, as her witnesses say, that the Watt, which they allege was moving at the greater speed and was already ahead of her, measuring by a line at right angles across the river, would give way, slow, and go under her stern. This is precisely what the Cayuga's witnesses say they expected, and what some of them say the Watt ought to have done; and yet some of them testify that the Watt was moving faster than themselves and that her position was in advance of the Cayuga, if judged by a line drawn directly across the river.

I do not deem it important to determine which of these boats was moving at the greater speed. Great stress is laid by the counsel for the Cayuga on the testimony that her speed was less than that of the Watt. I think the balance of evidence is the other way. But the rule of navigation above referred to is not dependent on that question. It has no such qualification as that the vessel having the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other, provided such other is moving at a less speed than herself. Indeed, if the Cayuga saw the Watt approaching on a track that crossed her own, as above stated, as she certainly did, and also thought, as her witnesses now testify, that the speed of the Watt was greater than her own, the stronger and more conclusive was the reason why she should not attempt to cross the bow of the Watt, and the greater, also, was the propriety and urgency of the rule mentioned and the more obvious its application.

But it is earnestly insisted that the Watt, in pursuing her way down, had come into a course parallel with that of the Cayuga, in which position there was no danger, and that, in such circumstances, the Watt, having, also, the greater speed, is to be regarded as a vessel overtaking another, to which another and opposite rule (rule 17th) applies, and that, under this rule, it was the duty of the Watt, the overtaking vessel, to keep out of the way of the other. I am constrained to say, after a pains-taking examination of the proofs, that the balance of testimony is against the facts upon which this theory rests; and that the Watt can, in no just sense, be regarded as overtaking the Cayuga. It is quite possible that, in turning an entire circle, as the Cayuga did at or near Hubert street, the Watt was at one time in view over her starboard quarter. So, it is quite possible, that, afterwards, as the Cayuga proceeded obliquely down the river, the Watt appeared to be relatively in advance. But the evidence satisfactorily shows, that the Watt at no time had the Cayuga ahead of her, in view of any of the persons on board the Watt, so as to be herself either following or overtaking the Cayuga; and I think it fully proved that the Watt did not change her course. She did undoubtedly cross the bow of the Cayuga; and great stress is laid on that by the counsel for the claimants. But this was because her course crossed that of the Cayuga, and it was her duty to keep her course, so that she might not mislead the other, but leave her to keep out of the way, as the law required.

The testimony is very voluminous, and the case for both parties has been argued with great ability and zeal. The counsel for the claimants has exhibited unusual ingenuity and skill in presenting the best possible excuse for the Cayuga in setting the rules of navigation at defiance, and relying on an expectation that the Watt would give way and pass under the Cayuga's stern; but, in my judgment, the situation and course of the two vessels was plainly within the 14th rule, and the collision was solely due to a neglect of its observance by the claimants' vessel.

On the question of damages, the only exception argued on the appeal is, whether the allowance of $75 per day, for the loss of the use of the ferry-boat during the period required for repairing her, was properly allowed. There is no demand, in the general market for ferry-boats. They are built for a special use, and generally adapted, in some degree, to the particular ferry upon which they are intended to run. The libellants did not hire, and possibly might have been unable to hire, another ferry-boat to take her place on the ferry. These very reasons have compelled the libellants to build and keep another boat, which they can use when accident or other cause disables one which they have in daily use.

It is quite obvious, that there is neither justice nor equity in allowing to a tort-feasor the benefit of this large outlay made by the libellants to enable them to serve the public and run their ferry without interruption; and yet that is the effect of yielding to the argument that, because such spare boat was already in the libellants' possession, and was used, therefore the libellants sustained no pecuniary loss by the delay. If it be conceded that a just allowance for the necessary cost of another boat, hired at its fair value to perform the service, would be necessary to the indemnity of the libellants, there is no sound reason, I think, for withholding such allowance when the libellants furnish the substituted boat themselves. True, the libellants have chosen to submit to the loss of the use of their substituted boat during that portion of the year when their other boats are not disabled; but that is not and ought not to be made a premium to tort-feasors whose wrongful acts compel the libellants to incur such loss in order to the satisfactory conduct of their business. In the case of The Rhode Island [Case No. 11,744], an allowance of a sum which would have enabled the libellant to supply the place of an injured vessel, was affirmed by Mr. Justice Nelson, although, in fact, the place of the injured vessel was not supplied at all. The principle of indemnity is uniformly recognized as just, and its measure must be the same, whether a substitute is furnished by the libellant or procured from another. The difficulty in this particular case arises from the peculiarity of the business and the want of demand for such boats; and, in such case, I am not satisfied that the view of the subject taken by the judge of the district court is erroneous. My sense of justice wholly approves it. To withhold compensation is, to my mind, obvious injustice. Where the proof of what such a boat could have been let for upon hire or charter is practicable, as in the cases relied upon by the claimants, that is a just measure. The whole subject has been much debated, and no rule which is adapted to every supposable case can be deemed established. It is not true that the use of this boat has, in fact or in law, no value. The testimony of witnesses conversant with the subject, and of long experience, proves the contrary. The case is special and peculiar, and I think the allowance just and reasonable. The decree must be affirmed, with costs. 1 Ben. 171, and 2 Ben. 125 [Cases No. 2,536 and 2,535].

[NOTE. The Hudson River Steamboat Company, claimants of the Cayuga, appealed to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed, Mr. Justice Clifford delivering the opinion. The ground of the affirmation is stated to be that even if the Cayuga did nothing to mislead the Watt, as claimed by libellants, yet it was clear that she did not keep out of the way, as required by the 14th sailing rule, which provides that, "if two ships under steam are coming so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other;" that the circuit judge was correct in deciding that under all the circumstances the rule was applicable in this case, and that, consequently, the fault of the collision lay with the Cayuga. Furthermore, the court held that the exceptions to the commissioner's report were properly overruled, and that the allowance of $75 per day while the Watt was undergoing repairs was properly made. [3 Wash. C. C. 298.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1814.

GENERAL AVERAGE—CONTRIBUTION—LOSS OF VESSEL.

1. The schooner Julia, on her voyage from France to Philadelphia, being chased by a British frigate, and her capture being deemed inevitable by the captain, he, with the advice of the officers and crew, ran her on shore at Long Branch, in New-Jersey; and before the enemy could board her, a large part of the cargo was saved; after which she was burnt. The master claimed to retain the goods saved, as subject to freight, general average, and expenses.

[Cited in Barnard v. Adams, 10 How. (51 U. S.) 302; The Congress, Case No. 3,099; Shoe v. Low Moore Iron Co., 46 Fed. 128.]

2. The Rhodian law de jactu, is the parent of the law of maritime contribution. The principle to be deduced from the Rhodian law, and from the general maritime law of nations, is, that if the cargo or ship, or any part of either, be voluntarily sacrificed, or exposed to danger, for the common safety, the part saved shall contribute to repair the loss sustained, provided the object for which the sacrifice was made be attained.

[Cited in Mutual Safety Ins. Co. v. The George, Cases Nos. 9,981, 9,982; Patten v. Darling, Case No. 10,812; The Star of Hope v. Annan, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 232; Sonsmith v. The J. P. Donaldson, 21 Fed. 674.]

3. An intention to consign to inevitable loss goods thrown overboard, forms no part of the reason assigned by the Rhodian law for contribution; and is not necessary to authorize the claim.

[Cited in Barnard v. Adams, 10 How. (51 U. S.) 304.]

4. The object always is, to incur a partial loss, and to risk a minor or contingent danger, to avoid the more probable or certain loss of the whole.

5. It is sufficient to justify a claim to contribution, if the danger sought to be avoided be so imminent, that the measure adopted may be beneficial to all.

6. If the exposure of the vessel be made for the common safety, and be successful in relation to a part of the cargo, it is immaterial whether her total loss was produced immediately by the stranding, or consequentially, by placing her in a situation which effected her destruction.

[Cited in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 13 Pet. (38 U. S.) 343.]

7. If the ship be lost, there can be no contribution, because the object for which the jettison was made was not attained. In case of a general shipwreck, there can be no contribution, because it was not voluntary.

At law. This was a replevin, to recover a quantity of goods saved from the wreck of the Julia. The following case was agreed to stand for a special verdict. The schooner Julia, owned by the defendant, and laden with a cargo of merchandise, departed from Bordeaux on the 23d of February, 1813, bound for Philadelphia. On the 8th of April in the same year, while proceeding up Delaware bay, she was chased by a frigate of the enemy, then forming the blockade of that bay and river, and was compelled to bear away for New-York. The chase continued in the direction of New-York until the 9th of April, when a seventy-four of the enemy endeavored to cut the schooner from off the land, and not succeeding, joined the chase; but having gone so far on her course as Long Branch, in New-Jersey, the schooner was headed by another frigate of the enemy. The master then deliberated, and consulted with his officers and crew, and by their advice, for the purpose of avoiding capture, and for the common benefit of all concerned, voluntarily ran the schooner on shore at Long Branch aforesaid. After saving sundry cases and packages of merchandise, and part of the furniture and rigging of the vessel, the enemy compelled the master, officers, and crew, of the schooner, to leave her; and then boarded, set fire to her, and left her. On the 10th of April, the schooner having burned to the water's edge, the master and officers, with the assistance of sundry fishermen, succeeded in saving other parts of the cargo, together with several spars, anchors, and other parts of the vessel's furniture and rigging; but so much of the hulk as was not burned, was washed upon the shore and lost. The merchandise saved, consisted of such dry goods as lay near at hand, and could be gotten out before the enemy boarded; and such wines, brandies, and other articles not liable to injury, as were in the bottom of the schooner. The gross value of the schooner at the time of said stranding, was 10,000 dollars. The gross value of her entire cargo, at the same time, including duties and freight, amounted to 101,193 dollars. The duties would have been 19,950 dollars. The gross freight of the whole cargo was 12,745 dollars. The value of the tackle and furniture of the vessel saved, amounted in gross, to 752 dollars. Expenses of saving, 262 dollars. The value of goods saved, gross, was 51,468 dollars, including duties, 8,622 dollars. Other expenses 1,504 dollars, and freight. Value of freight saved, 4,736 dollars. The plaintiffs' goods saved, amounted, gross, to 10,727 dollars, on which the duties were 1,531 dollars; freight, 367 dollars; and expenses of saving, 187 dollars. The defendant, as owner of the vessel, detained the plaintiffs' goods for freight, general average, and expenses, after the plaintiffs had tendered a sufficient sum to cover freight and expenses, but not general average. He afterwards, at the request of the plaintiffs, sold them at public auction; and delivered over the proceeds, after retaining 4,300 dollars, a sum deemed sufficient to cover the general average.

The questions submitted to the court are —1. Whether the goods of the plaintiffs, which were saved, as above, are bound to contribute to the loss of the schooner by way of general average? 2. Whether they are bound to contribute to the goods and freight lost, or either of them, by way of general average? If the court shall be of opinion, upon either of these points, in the affirmative, judgment to be entered for the defendant; and the parties to abide by an adjustment of the general average, made by such person, and on such principles, as the court shall direct. If the opinion should be in the negative on both points, judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs; and the amount due by the defendant to the plaintiffs, if any thing, to be settled by referees to be appointed by the court.

The first question only was argued.

Duponceau, for plaintiffs, cited the following cases, to prove that where the ship is lost, it is not a case of general average: Park. 170, 171; 1 East, 120; Weynsteen, 218; Rhod. Law; 3 Law J. 14–19; Bynk. 424; 1 Magen, Ins. 52, 53, 64; Sea Laws, 326; 2 Vatt. To prove that the Sea Laws contain a spurious statement of the Rhodian law, de jactu, and that the only true statement of it is in the digest, as set forth in 3 Am. Law J. 14 et seq., he cited 2 Bynk. 89, c. 8; 1 Azuni, Mar. Law, 282.

Binney and Chauncey, for defendant, cited the following cases: Abb. Adm. 331, 333, 335 [The Indiana, Case No. 7,020]; Sea Laws, 93, 104, 107, 110, 135; 2 Magen, Ins. 15, 200; Voetius, 690; 2 Brown, Civ. Law, 199; 1 Emerig. Ins. 602, 612, 408; Roc. N. 60, 99; 2 Marsh. The second question was not argued, and of course no opinion was given on it.

Mr. Rawle, for defendant.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court.

It seems to be universally admitted, that the Rhodian law, de jactu, was the parent of maritime contribution. That law, however, provides only for certain cases, in which contribution is to be allowed, and does not lay down any general rule. But it recognizes, in relation to maritime contribution, a great and striking principle, within the equity of which, every possible case of contribution may by fair deduction be brought. This law declares, "that if goods be thrown overboard, for the sake of lightening the vessel, as it is done for the good of all, all must come into contribution for the same." The principle of this rule is, that where a common benefit is received, by the voluntary sacrifice of a part, the loss sustained should be borne by the property saved. And although no other case is provided for, but the jettison of goods, and partial injuries to the vessel, yet the principle being a voluntary sacrifice for the common safety, contribution to repair the loss sustained, is equally within the equity of the law. The ordinances of other countries, having the Rhodian law for their basis, and the construction given to that law, by learned jurists, have extended the principle of it to so many cases of contribution, that it could scarcely have been supposed that one could arise, which had not been provided for. Thus, if the ship and cargo be ransomed from pirates, by a sacrifice of part of the cargo, or by a ransom bond—if, in the act of making a jettison, the ship, or other parts of the cargo receive injury—if the goods are not consigned to apparent destruction, but are put into lighters, for the relief of the ship, and the lighters perish—if the ship be damaged, by cutting the cable and masts, whereby she incurs a loss for the common good—or, if the deck or sides be cut, in order to facilitate a necessary jettison—these, and many other cases, which might be enumerated, are considered as cases of contribution, by all the maritime countries of the world. But to constitute a claim to contribution, the jettison must be designedly made, with a view to the common safety, and must be successful, at least in part; for if the ship be lost, by the peril which the sacrifice was intended to avert, there is no contribution due. The principle fairly to be extracted from the general maritime law of nations, upon the subject of contribution, is, that if the cargo or ship, or any part of either, be voluntarily sacrificed, or exposed to danger, for the common safety, the part saved shall contribute to repair the loss sustained, provided the object for which the sacrifice was made was obtained. This principle is not inconsistent with the rule contended for, by the plaintiffs' counsel, that if a jettison be made, and the ship saved, there shall be contribution; but if the ship be lost, there shall be none. That rule is correct in all its parts, when applied to a mere case of jettison. But the principle of it is equally applicable to a loss voluntarily incurred by the ship, for the common safety, if safety be thereby attained.

Let us now examine the correctness of the principle—1st, by the reason of it; and 2d, by authorities:

1st. The reason assigned in the Rhodian law, why contribution should be made, in case of a jettison of goods, is so entirely applicable to that of loss, or injury incurred by the vessel, under the same circumstances, that it becomes those who would distinguish them, to point out the difference. That reason is, that all should contribute to a loss, occasioned by the jettison, for the sake of lightening the vessel, because it was done for the benefit of all. If so, and the ship expose herself to loss, for the sake of obtaining safety for all, and in consequence of such voluntary exposure, she is lost, why should not all contribute to repair the loss?

The reasons assigned by the plaintiffs' counsel, are, that the loss of the vessel was not contemplated, as the consequence of the stranding; that the act of stranding, exposes the common interest equally to destruction; that it cannot be certainly ascertained, that the loss of the ship resulted from the stranding; and, lastly, that the principle of contribution, the safety and prosecution of the voyage, cannot be effected, if the vessel be totally lost. Let these reasons be examined in detail: The loss of the vessel was not intended. An intention to consign the goods thrown overboard, to inevitable destruction, forms no part of the reason assigned by the Rhodian law for contribution; and was not considered to be deducible from it, by those jurists who undertook to apply that law to other cases of contribution; otherwise, goods put into lighters, could never be entitled to contribution. As to these, the probability is, that they will be saved. The plaintiffs' counsel contends, that this is an excepted case; but he has not shown it to be so, and it is clearly within the reason of the general principle. So, injury sustained by the fall of a mast, is contingent, and not foreseen or intended. Even goods thrown overboard may be saved—and if saved, they belong to the owner at the time of the jettison—if not saved, the loss is to be repaired by contribution. The truth is, that it is the motive for the act, in relation to the rest of the property, and not the intention of the jettison in relation to the fate of the thing sacrificed or exposed to danger, which gives rise to the law of contribution.

2d. The stranding exposes the cargo, as well as the vessel, to the risk of loss. If this reason were sound, then, a vessel stranded with a view to the common safety, would not be entitled to contribution, even for the purpose of repairing and floating her, if her situation admitted it; and yet it is clear, that by the universal maritime law, the expenses incurred for these purposes, are a subject of general average. But if this reason were admitted, it might produce very unsatisfactory results; for, it cannot be said, with any degree of confidence, that the loss of the anchor by the cutting of the cable, or the loss of the masts, may not expose the whole to danger. But the object is to incur a partial loss, and to risk a minor or contingent danger, to avoid the more certain loss of all. And this applies strictly to the voluntary stranding of the ship. Injury to her is certain—a total loss probable. The escape of the persons on board from the dangers of the storm or of an enemy, and the safety of the cargo, if not certain, are considered to be more so than by continuing at sea; and with this calculation the measure is adopted. A certain injury, therefore, with a probable total loss, is voluntarily incurred by the ship for the common safety; and consequently, she is entitled to contribution.

3d. It cannot be certainly ascertained, whether the loss of the ship resulted from the stranding, or from some other cause. Neither can it be certainly ascertained, that the loss resulted from that cause, in case the damage sustained should be short of a total loss; in which case it is throughout admitted, that such damage must be repaired by a general average. It is sufficient, if the danger sought to be avoided, be so imminent that the measure adopted may be beneficial to all. Besides, the difficulty of proving that the immediate loss resulted from the stranding, would afford an insurmountable objection to the reason here assigned. For, although she may be burned, as she was in this case by the enemy, or may lie on the strand exposed to subsequent tempests, still, it would be impossible to say, whether her loss was not irremediable independent of these new causes. If the exposure of the vessel be made for the common safety, and be successful in relation to a part of the cargo, it is of no consequence whether her total loss was produced, immediately, by the stranding; or consequentially, by placing her in a situation by which her destruction was effected.

4th. It is contended, in the last place, that the principle upon which contribution is allowed, is the safety and prosecution of the voyage; which cannot be effected if the vessel be totally lost. This reason appears to be entirely fanciful; it has no authority of any kind to rest upon, and is inconsistent with other cases where the vessel is lost, and yet contribution is allowed. It can scarcely be denied, that in cases of such imminent danger as to justify the desperate remedy of stranding the vessel, the great object of all the parties who advise the measure, must be, first, the preservation of the lives or the liberty of those on board; and in the next place, the safety of the cargo, and possibly of the vessel. All hope of the further prosecution of the voyage, must in general be abandoned; although there is a possibility that it may be resumed. But, if this reason be a sound one, what will be said in a case where a jettison is made of the whole of the cargo, or so great a part of it as to render the further prosecution of the voyage not worth pursuing? The voyage would be lost to all the parties concerned; and nothing would remain for any of them, but a compensation by way of general average, which might as well be adjusted at the nearest port, without the formality of proceeding unnecessarily to the original port of destination. And what seems to be conclusive is, that if the ship survive the danger which the jettison was made to avert, and is totally lost even the next day, the goods saved shall contribute to the loss of the part thrown overboard, notwithstanding the entire destruction of the voyage. The owner of the goods saved, might, with equal propriety, in that case, as in this, complain that he should be called to contribution, when, by the loss of the vessel, the voyage is terminated, and the object for which the sacrifice was made eventually defeated.

Second. We now proceed to examine the authorities, premising that they ought to be strong and uniform, to bear down the reasons upon which the equity of contribution is founded, in a case like the present. The ordinance of Louis XIV. (2 Valin, Comm. 168, 205, 207, 209) enumerates, in the 6th article, five distinct cases of contribution; amongst which, is the expense of lightening and getting the ship afloat; and the 18th article declares, that if the ship be opened in order to draw out the goods, those goods shall contribute to the repairs of the damage thus occasioned to the ship. It is to be remarked, that this ordinance does not, in any part of it, notice the case of a voluntary stranding of the ship. But Valin, in his commentary, states, that if to avoid a total loss by shipwreck or capture, the master runs his vessel ashore, the damage which he shall suffer, on that occasion, and the charge of putting her afloat again, are general average; all having been done for the common safety. The argument founded upon this ordinance, and upon the comments of Valin, is, that as the expenses incurred for repairing the vessel and putting her afloat, are alone provided for; and since all the foreign ordinances agree in this, that unless the ship be saved, there shall be no contribution; it follows, that if the vessel, in consequence of a voluntary stranding, be totally lost, the law of contribution ceases; the rule "save who save can," or in other words, "every man for himself," applies. Now, this conclusion is altogether inadmissible. The enumeration of certain cases, to which a general principle is applied, can never exclude any other case which may fairly be brought within the same principle. On the contrary, the rule is, that where there is the same reason, there is the same law. If the damage which a vessel sustains by a voluntary stranding for the common advantage, although that damage should be nearly equal to the value of the vessel, is declared to be a case of contribution; the reason which dictates such a law, will command the extension of it to the case of a total loss of the vessel. As to the rule contended for, that there can be no contribution where the vessel is lost, it is totally misapplied in this argument. It relates altogether to an ineffectual jettison, and to a general or involuntary shipwreck. In the first case, if the ship and the remainder of the cargo, for the preservation of which the jettison was made, be lost, and the goods thrown overboard, or put into lighters, be saved, there can be no ground for contribution; because the jettison was made, not for the sake of those goods, but for the safety of the ship and the rest of the cargo. But, if the object of the jettison be attained by the safety of a ship, at the expense of the goods thrown overboard; then, the law of contribution applies to repair the loss sustained by the owner of the goods thus sacrificed for the common good. Neither is it a case of contribution, if the ship being lost in the same storm in which the jettison was made, a part of the cargo is saved; because the purpose for which the sacrifice of the goods thrown overboard was made, has not been attained. See 2 Valin, Comm. 205; Weytzen, p. 237; Guidon, 133. In the case of a general shipwreck, the essential principle of contribution is wanting, there being no act voluntarily done for the common safety of the whole. Consequently, every man must take care of what belongs to him, and must depend upon his own exertions to save it. Ord. Louis XIV. art. 17; Valin, Comm. 209, 237. It is unnecessary to notice particularly, those parts of the marine ordinances of Bilboa, Wisbuy, Rotterdam, Copenhagen, the Code Napoleon, and the modern Prussian Code, promulgated in 1791 and 1794; which were quoted and relied on by the plaintiffs' counsel, because they apply either to an involuntary shipwreck, or to a jettison, or to damages sustained by a voluntary stranding, and not to a total loss of the ship; and are all susceptible of the same explanations which we have just given, of the ordinance of Louis XIV., which they resemble. It is admitted, that neither the Rhodian law, nor any of these ordinances, have noticed the case of a voluntary stranding, for the common safety, followed by the total loss of the ship.

We meet with but two decisions, which have ever been given upon the very point presented to the consideration of this court. The first was made by the maritime judges of Amsterdam, in the year 1661, and is reported by Bynkershoek (2 Bynk. 1, 4, c. 24, p. 424). They decided, "that if a cable is cut in a storm in order to save the ship, whereby the anchor is lost, the cargo is not bound to contribute, because there was no voluntary jettison." These judges then add, "for the same reason, if a vessel be voluntarily run ashore, the goods unladen from her while she is lying aground, are not to contribute any thing; also, because no contribution is due, unless the ship is saved;" and the Rhodian law, 4, is cited. Now, if this case be truly reported, which may well be doubted, it is, upon the face of it, too absurd to merit the least respect. The reason assigned, why, if the cable be cut in a storm in order to save the ship, contribution shall not be made to repair the loss of the anchor, is, that the jettison was not voluntary; and yet the case supposes, that the anchor was voluntarily sacrificed to save the ship. Neither can there be any doubt, but that the law is different from what this case states it to be, in relation to the loss of the anchor. Abb. Adm. 219 [The Joshua Barker, Case No. 7,547]. In like manner, one of the reasons assigned by the judges in this case, why, if the vessel be stranded and lost, there shall be no contribution, is, that the stranding was not voluntary; and yet the case states, that the vessel is voluntarily run ashore. The other reason assigned is, that there is no contribution, unless the vessel be saved; and this reason is founded on the Rhodian law, 4, which relates to goods put into a lighter to save the ship, but without effect; in which case it is truly said, that there can be no contribution, except where the vessel is saved by the jettison. In the one case, the goods are ineffectually lost or exposed, in order to save the ship; and therefore, the object not being attained, there is no contribution. In the other, the ship is effectually exposed and sacrificed to save the cargo. The converse, therefore, of the rule, applies. With these observations, we shall leave this case to the merited censures of Bynkershoek, who condemns and exposes it throughout. We approach, with infinitely more respect, the case decided in the supreme court of New York, cited from 9 Johns. 9. It is that case alone, which has produced any hesitation in our mind. The great law learning of that court, is respected by none more highly than ourselves; and we should upon all occasions see the propriety of examining very thoroughly, any opinion which we might form, differing from a decision of that court, before we should feel ourselves safe in entertaining or expressing it. This we have faithfully done in the present instance; and we can only add, that the course of reasoning which our mind has suggested, forcing us to a different conclusion, we must follow where it leads.

We come now to the consideration of the opinions of foreign jurists, relied upon by the plaintiffs' counsel, to show that this is not a case of general average. Vinnius, 262, commenting on the Rhodian law, 5, says, that in case of shipwreck, (alluding obviously to an involuntary shipwreck, as do the Basilicks to which he refers,) there shall be no contribution; but he adds, that the damage suffered by a sacrifice made for the good of all, to avoid a common danger, is to be made good by the contribution of all. Now, this is the precise doctrine which we adopt, and is the basis on which our opinion is formed. The whole of the quotation from this author proves, that he considered the question of contribution, as turning upon the fact of voluntary shipwreck for the good of all concerned, or involuntary, and not upon that of the partial or total loss of the ship. The damage for which contribution is to be made, is stated by this author without limitation; and whether it be to the whole amount of the vessel, or to a half, or a greater or smaller proportion of her value, forms no part of the principle upon which his opinion is formed. Weytzen, 237; Locc. De Jure Mar. 1006; Kuricke, 781; Marquardus, 393; and Pothier, 106,—all speak upon this subject in reference to an ineffectual jettison, or of an involuntary shipwreck, and lay down the same doctrine as Vinnius.

Emerig. (Ins. 408, 614, 616) is the only writer upon the subject of average, who intimates an opinion, that in the case of a voluntary stranding, followed by the total loss of the vessel, there shall be no contribution. "If," says he, "the stranding was done voluntarily for the common safety, it would be general average, provided always that the ship be again set afloat; for, if the stranding be followed by shipwreck, then it is, save who can." There is no writer upon maritime law, whose opinions are more to be respected, in general, than those of Emerigon. But, after all, it is only an opinion in this case; in support of which, he quotes no law, ordinance, or decision, and does not even condescend to assign a single reason. Immediately after the opinion just cited, he refers to what he afterwards says, in respect to a jettison which does not save the ship; as if he intended to illustrate, by this latter case, the opinion he had given in the case of a voluntary stranding and loss of the ship. Now, it is most obvious, that no two cases can be more unlike in principle. In the one, an ineffectual sacrifice of goods is made to save the ship. And in the other, an effectual sacrifice of the ship is made to save the cargo. In the former, the property demanding contribution, has no merit, and is therefore entitled to no compensation. In the latter, the converse holds good throughout. Nevertheless, we should be greatly embarrassed by this naked opinion of Emerigon, if it stood uncontradicted by other writers, equally respectable. The opinions of these jurists, we shall now proceed to state.

Voet. B. 14, tit. 2, § 5, in his Commentary on the Digest, says, "if the ship lies aground without the fault of the master, and he, having made jettison in order to save the ship, has thought it most prudent to save the goods by means of lighters, and if the greatest part of the goods being saved, a storm shall arise and the ship be broken, this damage being incurred for the sake of averting the common danger, shall be suffered in common; for, the goods do not appear to have been put into the lighters, for the sake of lightening the ship in order to save her and the goods remaining on board; but rather the ship itself has been exposed to accident, that the goods should be saved by means of the lighters;—analogous to this, is the following case—If, by the common advice of the best informed men on board, the ship has been wilfully run ashore, and thus has perished, the goods being saved." Here the writer assigns the reason of his opinion, and founds it upon the distinction between an ineffectual jettison where there is no merit, and an effectual sacrifice of the ship where there is; and denies contribution in the former, and allows it in the latter, upon the reason of that distinction. 2 Bynk. p. 424, in his criticism upon the decision of the Dutch judges, before alluded to, condemns that opinion throughout; and assigns unanswerable reasons, in our opinion, for his censure. "It is one thing," he says, "if the tempest alone drives the ship ashore, and there breaking the armament of the ship, the masts, &c., in which case the ship owner is like the smith, who, while he is performing his duty, breaks his anvil or hammer. It is another thing, if by the advice of a majority of the crew, that the lives and the goods may be saved, the vessel is run ashore; or by their advice, the mast is cut away, or the cables and anchors are cut. Therefore, theirs is the best opinion, who answer, that if the masts or cables are cut, that the vessel and goods may be saved from the storm, there shall be contribution; and surely the same, of a vessel voluntarily run ashore, as of any of her instruments cast overboard on account of danger, is clearly ordained." Here it is obvious, that Bynkershoek is speaking of a vessel run ashore and totally lost; because he is commenting upon the opinion of the Dutch judges, which is given upon that case; and because he resembles the case of the mast or cable cut and lost, to that of the stranded vessel. His opinion, therefore, is given upon the very question now under consideration.

To these authorities, we add, with great confidence, the opinion of a distinguished judge of the supreme court of the United States, intimated in one of his notes upon Abbott, a work in itself of great merit, and which is rendered still more valuable by the labours of the learned editor.

We shall conclude this opinion, by stating, that the ordinance of Koenigsberg, the only one which provides, in express terms, for the case of a loss by the stranding of the ship for common safety; declares, that in such a case, the goods saved shall contribute. 2 Magens, Ins. 200. Upon the whole, therefore, we are of opinion, that the law is in favour of the defendant.

CAZENOVE v. DARREL et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 444.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1823.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—REDUCTION OF CLAIM TO CONFER JURISDICTION.

A creditor has no right to give a false credit upon a note so as to reduce it to the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace.

[Cited in Maddox v. Stewart, Case No. 8,934.]

Appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace.

The note was for $56.84. The warrant was for $50. Cazenove at the trial admitted payment of $6.84. The defendants Darrel and Groverman refused to accept the credit, and pleaded to the jurisdiction; but the magistrate overruled the plea, and gave judgment for $50 and costs, from which judgment the defendants appealed.

Mr. Wise and Mr. Swann, for the defendants, contended that they had a right to have the case tried, originally, in this court, and that it was not in the power of the plaintiff to deprive them of that right, by giving a fictitious credit without their consent. It requires the same authority to discharge as to bind. There must be mutual consent. In England, "if a contract be for four pounds, and a plaintiff, to give an inferior court jurisdiction, will split it into several actions, a prohibition shall go." Catchmade's Case, 6 Mod. 90.

Mr. Fendall, contra, contended that a creditor has a right to throw away his debt, or to extinguish it. No man has a right to the law's delay; it is no part of the contract. It was the practice in Virginia, under the petition law, to throw away part of the claim, and have a summary remedy for the residue. This practice must have been known to the legislature, and not having provided against it, they have sanctioned it. The matter in dispute is the criterion of jurisdiction; here $50 only were in dispute. U. S. v. McDowell, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 316; Wise v. Columbian Turnpike Co., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 276.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. Can consent give jurisdiction? If, in order to give original jurisdiction to this court, the parties should agree that the debt was 56 dollars, when the real debt was less than 50 dollars, could the jurisdiction of this court be supported?

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said they still considered the real debt, in this case, to be $56.84, and that the judgment must be reversed, and judgment of nonsuit entered with costs.

INDEBTEDNESS OF BANKRUPT IN A FIDUCIARY CAPACITY.

Where it appeared, that a petitioner to be decreed a bankrupt was owing debts in a fiduciary capacity, it was held, that the petition must be dismissed, although he was owing other debts, which had not been so contracted in a fiduciary capacity.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Hezekiah B. Cease.]

PENNYBACKER, District Judge. On the fifteenth of February last, Hezekiah B. Cease, of the town of Staunton, in the county of Augusta, filed his petition, praying to be declared a bankrupt. It appears that the petitioner is owing debts, some of which were created while acting in a fiduciary capacity, and others not. The old act was before the legislature when the new one was passed. Seeing that so important a provision as the latter clause of the sixty-second section of the old act was left out of the new one, it is fair to presume, that the new act was intended to have a correspondingly different effect. If, then, the debts due the government, and to the persons who, by the laws of the United States, might have a preference, in consequence of having paid money as the sureties of the bankrupts, and the wages of the laborer, in the service of the bankrupts, which are, unquestionably, the debts the most favored by the act, would not be excepted from the effect of the discharge, whether those debts should be proved or not, it is hard to conceive why other debts of a less favored nature should have been intended to be excepted from the operation of the act; and if this be so, it would seem to be conclusive, that the words "owing debts," &c., were not intended to be descriptive of debts which should be excepted from the operation of the act, but only of persons who might, or might not, become voluntary bankrupts. Here the investigation may close, and the question may be asked, is the petitioner described by the statute? Is he a person owing debts which have not been created while acting in any fiduciary capacity? The answer cannot be in the affirmative. All that can be said upon the subject, is what the petitioner has himself said in his petition: that he is owing debts, some of which were created while acting in a fiduciary capacity, and others not. But this is not a full answer to the question; and as he must answer that question fully, before he comes within the description of the statute, his petition must, for that reason, be dismissed. To say, that because he comes partly within the description of the act, and partly not, he is yet entitled to the benefit of the act, would be pretty much the same with saying, that a part is equal to the whole, which is absurd.

District Court, D. Wisconsin. Sept. Term, 1851.

MARITIME LIENS—DOMESTIC VESSELS—EFFECT OF STATE STATUTE—SEIZURE UNDER STATE LAW—JURISDICTION EXCLUSIVE.

1. The statute of the state of Wisconsin for the collection of demands against domestic boats and vessels, confers no lien.

2. The district court in admiralty has, therefore, no jurisdiction in rem against a domestic vessel at the suit of a domestic creditor.

3. A vessel may be seized under the state law, and from that time the state court and its officers have exclusive jurisdiction and control. A creditor can not in this court obtain any control of the property, or share in the proceeds.

4. The doctrine is well settled that when a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question arising in the case, and its judgment, until reversed, is binding upon every other tribunal.

5. When the jurisdiction of one court has attached, other creditors must submit their claims to its consideration, or await its disposition of the case.

6. Numerous cases cited and commented upon.

In admiralty. This vessel was attached by the marshal, in pursuance of process issued from this court, upon the libel herein filed, praying a condemnation and sale, to satisfy the demand of this libellant, for materials furnished and work done, in necessary repairs at the port of Racine within this district. The sheriff of Racine county, without submitting himself to the jurisdiction of this court, filed his petition in the form of an answer, setting forth, that previous to the service of the process in this case by the marshal, he had attached and reduced into his possession this vessel, by virtue of an attachment or warrant issued from a court of this state in the county of Racine, at the suit of one Thomas W. Secor in pursuance of a law of this state for the collection of debts and demands against boats and vessels navigating the waters thereof; that the several demands of said

Secor and of this libellant were contracted within this state; and that both these persons are citizens of this state; and that this vessel was built and is owned within this state. He therefore prayed that the vessel be surrendered into his possession. These facts were conceded by the parties at the trial.

Bush & Sanders, for libellant.
J. R. Doolittle, for respondent.

MILLER, District Judge. The question, whether the law of this state, for the collection of demands against boats and vessels, confers a lien for the debts or demands therein specified, is here properly presented to this court. A similar question has been mooted in this court, and in the courts of other districts, in regard to this law, and similar laws of other states. In the states of New York, Pennsylvania and Maine, local laws exist, creating a lien in favor of material-men and mechanics, upon domestic vessels. In the statutes of New York and Maine the lien is expressly conferred; by the Pennsylvania statute vessels are made liable and chargeable, for materials and work in their construction, until they sail or leave port; and these demands must be first paid. Davis v. New Brig [Case No. 3,643]; Harper v. New Brig [Id. 6,090]. The statute of this state provides that "every boat or vessel, used in navigating the waters of the state, shall be liable for all debts contracted by the master, owner, agent or consignee thereof, on account of supplies furnished for the use of such boat or vessel; or on account of work done or services rendered on such boat or vessel; or on account of labor done or materials furnished by mechanics, tradesmen or others in and for building, repairing, fitting out, furnishing or equipping such boat or vessel; for all sums due for wharfage or anchorage of such boat or vessel within the state; for all demands or damages accruing from the non-performance or mal-performance of any contract of affreightment; or any contract touching the transportation of persons or property entered into by the master, owner, agent or consignee of the boat or vessel on which such contract is to be performed; and for all injuries done to persons or property by such boat or vessel."—"Any person having a demand as aforesaid, instead of proceeding for the recovery thereof against the master, owner, agent or consignee of a boat or vessel, may, at his option, institute suit against such boat or vessel by name;" by filing in the clerk's office a complaint against such boat or vessel by name, and obtaining therefrom a warrant commanding the sheriff to seize the boat or vessel mentioned. Justices of the peace are also authorized to administer this law in cases within their jurisdiction. This law creates a liability on the part of boats and vessels navigating the waters of the state, to suits for the demands therein stated, and limits those suits to one year after the cause of action shall have accrued.—Neither the term lien, nor a term of like import, as chargeable, occurs in the statute. The laws of the states referred to create a lien for supplies, but this law extends to demands for damages accruing from the non-performance or mal-performance of contracts of affreightment, and contracts touching the transportation of persons and property, and injuries done to persons or property by a boat or vessel. If the demands of the material-man and mechanic were alone provided for, as in these other state laws, it would be right and proper to construe this statute as favorably as possible for their protection; but their demands are in the same category with all the other causes of liability.

It has always been the policy of the courts of this country to discourage secret or uncertain liens, as prejudicial to the transfer of property, and to the interests of trade and commerce. Laws creating liens, either upon real estate or personal property, provide for their record, so that the world may be notified of them. There can be no doubt but the design of this statute was to provide additional means for the recovery of the several debts or demands therein specified; but before I should go further and declare all such debts to be liens, I must be thoroughly satisfied, both as to the statute itself, and that the legislature had the power to enact such a statute.

The state laws before alluded to limit the liens to the sailing of the boat or vessel, or to twelve days thereafter; this law limits the commencement of suit to one year after the cause of action shall have accrued. These laws are correct in policy, and can be administered without prejudice to any one. They are confined to domestic vessels, and domestic creditors, and to contracts on shore. Furnishing materials and doing work on domestic vessels are as notorious as the furnishing materials and performing work in the erection of a building. This law does not stop here, but includes all boats and vessels used in navigating the waters of the state, as well foreign as domestic; and also damages arising upon contracts of affreightment, and for injuries done by such boats or vessels to persons or property without regard to locality. Now, neither the policy of this law, nor of the laws of the country, nor the understanding of the people, nor the interests of trade and commerce, favor a secret or unknown lien upon a boat or vessel for uncertain or unliquidated damages. A foreign boat or vessel may be used in navigating the waters of this state; but can the legislature of the state create a lien on such boat or vessel before she enters a port of the state?—This statute does not provide for bringing into court any lien-creditors; nor that any such creditors may intervene for their interests; nor for any notice of the attachment; nor for the sale of the boat or vessel, so as to vest in the purchaser an unincumbered and indefeasible title thereto. It authorizes an order to sell the boat or vessel; which order should be executed and returned in the same manner as executions. And it further provides that "whenever an order of sale shall be made for the sale of a boat or vessel, with its tackle, apparel, and furniture, the sheriff or constable shall have power to sell such part thereof, or such interest therein, as shall be necessary to satisfy the amount of the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and all the costs that may accrue." It is questionable whether the officer is authorized to sell more than an interest in, or part of, the boat or vessel, under this statute. It would be preposterous to allege, that under the statute, an officer could sell a boat or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, worth thousands, upon an order of sale for a comparatively inconsiderable sum; and that such purchaser should hold such boat or vessel clear of all liens. A lien given by the maritime law is preferred to a bona fide purchaser without notice, and is even preferred to a claim of forfeiture on the part of the government of the United States. The Chusan [Case No. 2,717]; The St. Jago De Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409. In the admiralty, all persons having demands against boats or vessels, or interested therein, are permitted to intervene and are presumed to have notice of the proceeding; for this reason a sale in pursuance of a decree in the admiralty confers upon the purchaser an indefeasible title against the world, discharged of all liens whatsoever. Not so under this statute. A purchaser of a boat or vessel or of a part of, or of an interest in, a boat or vessel, under this statute, is in no better condition in regard to liens given by the maritime law, than the original owner. The sale of a part, or of an interest in the boat or vessel is inconsistent with a lien on an entire boat or vessel. A lien enforced in the admiralty requires the sale of the entire vessel, not of a part, or of an interest therein.

As liens on vessels cannot be created by the laws of a state in cases of contract or tort, without the territorial limits, the exigencies of commerce required the summary process of the admiralty, in cases of steamboats and vessels afloat, or employed in business of commerce and navigation on the lakes. For this reason congress passed an act, extending the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States to certain cases upon the lakes or navigable waters connecting the same. This act was passed February 26, 1845 [5 Stat. 726], and confers quasi admiralty jurisdiction upon the federal courts of contracts and torts arising in, upon, or concerning steamboats and vessels employed in business of commerce and navigation on the lakes. This act was passed in pursuance of the power vested in congress by section 8 of the constitution of the United States, to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states. The statute of this state, providing for the collection of debts against boats and vessels, was enacted in the year 1838; and was transferred into the present Revised Statutes. As congress had not conferred upon the federal courts the jurisdiction contemplated by the constitution, until the enactment of February, 1845, and as this was a territory, the statute may have been proper until that time, or even until the admission of this state into the Union; but whether it is now operative, or to what extent, under the saving clause of the act of congress of 1845, in regard to foreign vessels navigating the lakes, or demands arising out of the state, is not to be determined at this time, this case not requiring a decision. I merely advert to the point to avoid any misunderstanding of this opinion. I shall merely remark that, generally, where the constitution of the United States confers power of legislation upon congress, state laws become inoperative upon the legislation of congress on the same subject. And state laws have not extra-territorial operation or effect. The case under consideration is in regard to a domestic vessel and domestic creditors, which are proper subjects of state legislation. It is the duty of the state legislature to enact statutes for the control of property belonging to the state, and for the protection of the interests of citizens of the state. From the examination here given of the present statute, I am well satisfied, that it is entirely insufficient for these great purposes. The statute itself does not create "a lien upon boats and vessels, used in navigating the waters of this state;" but the first lien or security created or allowed is upon the service of the attachment. Such is the decision, in the district court of the United States for the northern district of New York, upon a similar statute of the state of Ohio. The Globe [Case No. 5,484].

It is clear that the state court had jurisdiction, full and complete, of the proceeding referred to, and that this vessel was rightfully and legally attached by the sheriff of Racine county before the filing of the libel or the service of the monition in this case. If, as has been shown, the state law had created a lien, whereby this court can acquire jurisdiction by admiralty process in rem, then there would be concurrent jurisdiction in both courts; and in that case the right to maintain the jurisdiction must attach to that tribunal which first exercises it and takes possession of the thing in litigation. In order to avoid a clashing of jurisdiction, this course is indispensable, and has been enforced in the national courts, in numerous instances. The authority of the sheriff to attach, and right to hold, this vessel, by virtue of the process in his hands, can not be questioned. This vessel was in the custody of the law, and the marshal had no right to remove it from the possession of the sheriff. In such cases the marshal or sheriff should either retain the process until the first case is disposed of, or should return it not served on account of a previous attachment or levy, so as to avoid conflict of jurisdiction. The proceeding in the state court is in the nature of a suit in rem, and the necessary result of such proceeding or suit, is, that the thing in litigation is in the custody of the law. It must necessarily be in the possession or under the control of the court, and the court has a right to order it to be taken into the custody of the law. The Robert Fulton [Id. 11,890]; Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 2; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612. This is not applicable, however, to the case of the paramount right of a libellant to enforce a maritime lien, in preference to an attachment or execution against the owner of a vessel for a simple debt.

The attachment of property, by an officer, presupposes a right to take the possession and custody of that property, and to make such possession and custody exclusive. If the officer attaches upon mesne process, he has a right to hold the possession to answer the exigency of the process. If he levies under an execution, he is bound to sell according to the command of the writ. In Hagan v. Lucas, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 400, the sheriff had levied an execution on personal property, which was subsequently levied on by the marshal. Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the court says: "The first levy, whether it were made under the federal or state authority, withdraws the property from the reach of the process of the other. Under the state jurisdiction, a sheriff, having executions in his hands, may levy on the same goods; and, where there is no priority, on the sale of the goods, the proceeds should be applied in proportion to the sums named in the executions. And where a sheriff has made a levy, and afterwards receives executions against the same defendant, he may appropriate any surplus that shall remain after satisfying the first levy, by the order of the court. But the same rule does not govern, where the executions, as in the present case, issue from different jurisdictions. The marshal may apply moneys, collected under several executions, the same as the sheriff. But this cannot be done as between the marshal and the sheriff. A most injurious conflict of jurisdiction would be likely, often, to arise between the federal and the state courts, if the final process of the one could be levied on property which had been taken by the process of the other. The marshal or the sheriff, as the case may be, by a levy, acquires a special property in the goods, and may maintain an action for them. But if the same goods may be taken in execution at the same time by the marshal and the sheriff, does this special property vest in the one, or the other, or both of them? No such case can exist; property once levied on remains in the custody of the law, and it is not liable to be taken by another execution in the hands of a different officer, and especially by an officer acting under a different jurisdiction." This opinion is reiterated in Brown v. Clarke, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 4. In Knox v. Smith, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 298, the property levied on by the marshal was taken from his possession by the sheriff, upon an injunction and process from a state court, similar in effect to a writ of replevin, at the suit of a third person claiming under a deed of trust. A bill filed in the United States court, on the chancery side, to set aside the sheriff's levy, was not sustained because there existed a plain remedy at law. The marshal might have brought trespass against the sheriff, or applied to the United States court for an attachment. In Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612, an attachment was issued from the state court and served, which, according to the laws and practice of the state of New Hampshire, was a lien on the goods attached. The defendants in the attachment afterwards obtained a discharge under the bankrupt law, and their assignee claimed the goods previously attached. Mr. Justice Grier, in the opinion, says: "It is a doctrine of law too long established to require a citation of authorities, that where a court has jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause, and, whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, till reversed, is regarded as binding in every other court; and, that where the jurisdiction of a court and the right of a plaintiff to prosecute his suit in it have once attached, that right can not be arrested or taken away by proceedings in another court. These rules have their foundation not merely in comity but in necessity. For if one may enjoin, the other may retort by injunction, and thus the parties be without remedy; being liable to a process for contempt in one if they dare to proceed in the other. Neither can one take property from the custody of the other by replevin or any other process, for this would produce a conflict extremely embarrassing to the administration of justice. In the case of Kennedy v. Earl of Cassillis, 2 Swanst. 313, Lord Eldon at one time granted an injunction to restrain a party from proceeding in a suit pending in the court of sessions, in Scotland, which, on more mature reflection, he dissolved; because it was admitted, if the court of chancery could in that way restrain proceedings in an independent foreign tribunal, the court of sessions might equally enjoin the parties from proceeding in chancery, and thus they would be unable to proceed in either court. The fact, therefore, that an injunction issues only to the parties before the court and not to the court, is no evasion of the difficulties that are the necessary result of an attempt to exercise that power over a party who is a litigant in another and independent forum." The district court was not permitted to oust the state court of its jurisdiction and custody of the property attached. In the case of Slocum v. Mayberry, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 1, replevin was sustained in the state court against a revenue officer, by the owner of goods that were seized without process, and were not such goods as were authorized by law to be seized; as the common law tribunals of the United States were closed by law against such remedies, they being cognizable alone in the admiralty. But in this case and in Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246, it is determined that an action will not lie against the seizing officer in any common law tribunal until a final decree is pronounced in the admiralty upon the proceeding in rem. In the former case, Marshall, C. J., remarks that—"The judiciary act gives to the federal courts, exclusive cognizance of all seizures made on land or water. Any intervention of a state authority, which, by taking the thing seized out of the possession of the officer of the United States, might obstruct the exercise of this jurisdiction, would unquestionably be a violation of the act; and the federal court having cognizance of the seizure might enforce a re-delivery of the thing, by attachment or other summary process against the parties who should divest such a possession. The party supposing himself aggrieved by a seizure, can not, because he considers it tortious, replevy the property out of the custody of the seizing officer, or of the court having cognizance of the cause." "This, however, being an action which takes the thing itself out of the possession of the officer, could not certainly be maintained in a state court, if, by the act of congress, it was seized for the purpose of being proceeded against in the federal court." Goods or vessels attached or levied on, in pursuance of process issued from a court of competent jurisdiction, are thereby reduced into the custody of the court for the purpose of being proceeded against in satisfaction of the process, or of the debt or demand of the plaintiff or libellant, and can not be taken from the possession of the officer making such attachment or levy, upon process emanating from another and different tribunal.

In all cases of concurrent jurisdiction, the court which first has possession of the subject must determine it conclusively. Smith v. McIver, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 532. The party at whose suit property is attached has a constitutional and legal right to the law of the court issuing the process. If, according to the law of the court issuing the process, the property attached is found to belong to the defendant, the plaintiff claims from that court, through its officer, satisfaction of his demand, out of that property. A court of another government and different jurisdiction can not interpose between that plaintiff and the property attached, and transfer the legal possession, or vest the legal title in a third person, or assume the exclusive custody or disposition of the property. When a party issues his process and attaches property, he is presumed to know his right to do so, according to the law of the court in which he becomes a suitor; and that court is bound to dispose of his cause according to its law. But to compel a suitor in one court to follow the property attached into the forum of a different government, and there contend for satisfaction of his demand according to its law and rulings, would be a grievance and an abuse not to be tolerated; would create a serious conflict of jurisdiction, which should always be avoided by well-regulated courts and all good citizens. Goods and chattels in the possession of a defendant are liable to attachment or levy; and when attached or levied, they are in custody of the law, and control of the court; and must there remain, either in substance or by the substitution of a bond or security according to the law and practice of the court, until the subject be conclusively determined.

A court may allow subsequent and additional attachments and levies on the same property by its own officer; and may permit goods attached or levied on by one officer to be replevied by another officer, for it still retains control of the several writs, and the custody of the goods, either in kind or by the substitution of a bond in replevin, upon the service of the writ. But this can not be done by different and independent courts. Either one or the other must have custody of the goods,—both courts can not have it; nor can the officers of both have the possession of them. It is altogether a mistake to suppose that a party may claim goods in the custody of the law, and transfer them into the custody of another court, on the plea that he has a demand against them, or that they have been wrongfully taken from him. He must submit his case to the consideration of the court having custody of the goods, or wait until a final disposition be made of them, as in the case of conflicting executions. In D'Wolf v. Harris [Case No. 4,221], replevin was maintained, in the circuit court of the United States against the marshal, for goods seized by him.

A state court has no authority to enjoin a judgment or execution, or restrain a party in a court of the United States; neither can the United States courts interfere with proceedings or suitors in the state courts. McKim v. Voorhies, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 279; 3 Story, Const. §§ 1751, 1752; U. S. v. Peters, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 115; McClung v. Silliman, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 598; Ex parte Dorr, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 103; Diggs v. Wolcott, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 179; Ex parte Cabrera [Case No. 2,278], and many other authorities. Injunctions being specially granted, on consideration of a bill, upon notice and hearing, are not so likely to prejudice a party or embarrass a judicial proceeding, as an attachment, execution or replevin, which are issuable by the clerk upon an affidavit or praecipe. Nor may it work so much injustice by merely restraining the action of a party for a time, as the other writs, which in their nature sweep from him his secured lien. Upon the writ of attachment the officer attaches goods and retains them in possession to satisfy the plaintiff's demand, or delivers them to the defendant on his bond. Upon an execution the officer makes sale—upon replevin he delivers the goods to the plaintiff on his giving bond for a return, or the value, with damages, without any judgment of a court on the question of title or any inquisition by the officer, or writ de proprietate probanda. The party or person obtaining possession by process of law has the legal possession. The possession of the party served with the process is transferred to him, and the security of the original plaintiff in the goods is gone. Lowry v. Hall, 2 Watts & S. 129; Morris v. De Witt, 5 Wend. 71.

The pendency of a replevin in a state court, to settle the right of property in a vessel, is a bar to a libel in the admiralty, to settle the same right between the same parties; not technically a bar as a plea of lis pendens, but effectively so to prevent conflict of jurisdiction. Taylor v. The Royal Saxon [Case No. 13,803]. And an attachment for the debt by the process of a state court, after the commencement of the suit for the recovery of that debt in a court of the United States cannot affect the right of the plaintiff to recover in the suit. Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 136; Campbell v. Emerson [Case No. 2,357].

The governments of the United States and of the several states are sovereign and independent within their respective limits as prescribed in their several constitutions. Equally so are the courts of the respective governments independent of each other. One court has no power to supervise, or enjoin, or interfere with the proceedings in the other, excepting where authorized in pursuance of provisions contained in the constitution of the United States; in cases of decisions in state courts against the constitution, or a treaty, or law, or authority, or officer of the United States; and in the removal of causes to the circuit courts, or district courts having circuit court powers, by aliens or non-resident defendants; and where citizens of the same state claim lands under a grant from another state.

I have investigated this case sufficiently to satisfy my mind that this court has no jurisdiction in admiralty; and that, if it had, this vessel, being previously attached by the sheriff of Racine county and in the custody of the law, could not be subsequently attached by the marshal. It is thereupon ordered, that this libel be dismissed, and that the marshal return this vessel to the possession of the sheriff of Racine county.

NOTE [from original report]. Later rulings of the supreme court maintain the jurisdiction in rem under state laws in certain cases. The St. Lawrence, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 522, and cases there cited. It is there ruled that the change in the 12th rule in admiralty, meant merely that various considerations made it advisable not to permit that particular form of process to be used by persons who might claim it on the sole ground that the state law gave them a lien, where none was given by the maritime code. Where the lien is claimed as arising out of private contract with the owner, it will be enforced against a domestic vessel. The Kalorama, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 204. Or where there is a possessory lien at common law. The Marion [Case No. 9,087]. That the state law of Kentucky creating liens on domestic vessels does not confer jurisdiction on the courts of the United States was decided in Roach v. Chapman, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 129, citing People's Ferry Co. v. Beers, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 393. For the proper rules in cases where conflicting claims are set up under state and federal jurisdiction, see the following cases, elaborately argued and decided: Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450. Where a vessel had been seized under process from a state court, proceedings under a libel are irregular. A seizure by the marshal when the vessel was in the actual and legal possession of the sheriff, does not give jurisdiction in rem. The admiralty jurisdiction of the United States courts, though exclusive on some subjects, is concurrent on others. Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583; see also The John Richards [Case No. 7,361]. But the possession of the sheriff does not defeat the operation of the revenue laws. U. S. v. The Reindeer [Id. 16,144]. As to effect of state statute, see opinions of Sherman, J., in Re Dwight Scott [Id. 12,517]; also of Longyear, J., in Moir v. The Du Buque [Id. 9,696]. That liens on domestic ships given by a state statute, in cases maritime in their nature may be enforced in admiralty, is declared in The Richard Busteed [Id. 11,764]. See, also, Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324. The district court, however, exercises the jurisdiction, thus acquired, according to the mode of proceeding in admiralty, not according to the state law. Davis v. New Brig [Case No. 3,643]. See, also, Boon v. The Hornet [Id. 1,640]; Tree v. The Indiana [Id. 14,165].

Contra. A court of admiralty has no jurisdiction in rem to recover for work, labor, and materials furnished in building a ship, even though the state law gives a lien upon the vessel. The Norway [Case No. 10,359]. In the American Law Review (volume 5, p. 581) will be found an able and elaborate article by R. H. Dana, Jr., reviewing the whole subject of admiralty jurisdiction and the successive decisions on the question. The statute of California, declaring vessels subject to liens for materials or supplies, is valid and operative even in its application to a vessel supplied in her home port, so far as to entitle the claimant to payment out of surplus remaining in the registry after the satisfaction of maritime liens in preference to a mortgagee of the vessel. Francis v. The Harrison [Case No. 5,038], where the successive decisions of the supreme court concerning the enforcement of such liens by proceedings in rem are reviewed and explained. The supreme court of Indiana holds that the statute of that state, for the enforcement of liens upon domestic craft is, under the rulings in The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 555, void; that, the jurisdiction of the federal courts being exclusive, the state courts can entertain no jurisdiction. Ballard v. Wiltshire, 28 Ind. 341; Vaughan v. McCullough, Id. 359; Claycomb v. Cohn, Id. 483. In each of these cases, the court directed the case to be dismissed.

Case No. 2,542.

The CELLA.

[3 Ben. 168.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1869.

COLLISION OFF LONG ISLAND — STEAMER AND SCHOONER — PORTING HELM — DAMAGES BY STRANDING AFTER COLLISION.

1. A schooner, heading about east southeast, on her starboard tack, with the wind from the south, on a bright starlight night, discovered a steamer's lights about two points on her port bow, and kept her course till a collision between the vessels was inevitable, when her helm was put to port. The steamer discovered the two colored lights of the schooner at from one and a half to two miles' distance, half a point on her starboard bow, and her helm was at once ported. The port bow of the steamer struck the port bow of the schooner, and carried away all the rigging on that side, so that she could not be brought up into the wind, for fear of losing her masts, and she was anchored, and the next morning went ashore on Long Island: Held, that, as the schooner did not change her course till the collision was inevitable, she was free from fault, and, no excuse having been shown by the steamer for not having avoided the schooner, the steamer must be held liable;

2. The manoeuvre of the steamer, in porting her helm, was faulty. Under the circumstances, she should have starboarded;

3. The steamer was liable for the damages, including those consequent upon the stranding of the schooner.

In admiralty.

Scudder & Carter, for libellants.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel filed by the owners of the schooner Nellie Bowen, to recover for the damages caused to that vessel, and her cargo, by a collision between her and the steamship Cella, which occurred about midnight, on the 3d of December, 1866, some seven miles or more to the southward of Fire Island light, on the coast of Long Island. The schooner was on a voyage from Boston, Massachusetts, to Richmond, Virginia, with a cargo of ice, fish, furniture, &c. She had her proper lights set, and a proper lookout. The wind was fresh from the south, and she was beating against the wind, and was on her starboard tack, heading about east southeast, thus lying within about six points of the wind. She discovered the lights of the Cella, about two points on her port bow, a long distance off. The Cella was on a voyage from London to New York. The steamer came on, and, when she had approached so near to the schooner that, to the view of those on board of the schooner, a collision was inevitable, the helm of the schooner was put to port, for the purpose of luffing, but it does not appear that her sails shook at all. The port bow of the steamer struck the port bow of the schooner, about at the cathead, and the steamer, raking aft, carried away all the fore rigging and main rigging of the schooner on her port side, and did other damage, and thus rendered her perfectly helpless, with great danger that her masts, thus left without support on one side, would snap. The crew of the schooner made all proper effort to secure her masts, and to put up temporary rigging. To do this, it was necessary to keep the vessel before the wind till she could anchor with safety, for the wind kept increasing so much that it was deemed imprudent, for the safety of her masts, to bring her to anchor, which would require, in the operation, the bringing her head to the sea and the wind. Efforts were made to bring her head to the wind, but, having fallen off, at the time of the collision, she could not, in her shattered condition, be brought around, through the trough of the sea, to the wind, without danger of her masts going overboard, and they were heard to crack, in the attempts that were made. She drifted on, until, by steadying her masts, and getting down her sails, she was anchored and brought up. But she struck adrift, as the wind increased, and was brought up by a second anchor. Then temporary rigging was set up, and, after sunrise the next morning, an effort was made to get her under way, but her anchors could not be got up, and she dragged them, and struck the bottom, and was then headed on shore, and went on the beach, opposite Hempstead.

The answer admits, that the night was a clear, bright starlight one, and that the Cella saw the two colored lights of the schooner at from one and a half to two miles' distance. The only defence set up in the answer is the stereotyped one, that the schooner changed her course. There is not a particle of proof to sustain this defence. On the contrary, the testimony of the witnesses for the claimants, as well as of those for the libellants, shows that the schooner kept her course, as it was her duty to do, until just at the moment of the collision, when, to ease the impending blow, she ported her helm. This movement of the schooner, in the moment of danger, is not imputable as a fault. The pilot of the Cella (for she had a Sandy Hook pilot on board) says, that he first saw a light on the schooner half a point on the starboard bow of the Cella, and judged it to be a mile and a half or two miles off; that he then ported his wheel, and kept the light in sight till it got to bear two or three points on his port bow; that he had scarcely altered the position of the Cella, before he saw the two lights of the schooner; and that they remained in view until a second before the collision, when the green light was hid, and the red light alone remained in view. This testimony corroborates the evidence of those on board of the schooner, that she kept her course until almost the moment of collision, and then ported to luff, which would have thrown her green light out of view. So, also, the master of the Cella says, that he first saw the lights of the schooner ten minutes before the collision, when they were half a mile off, and at that time saw her green light and her red light from one and a half to two points on the port bow of the Cella, the wheel of the Cella being then hard a-port; that the green light of the schooner was hid a moment before the two vessels struck each other; that up to that time both of the lights of the schooner were in sight from the Cella; and that he saw no luffing on the part of the schooner from the time her lights were made until the collision. It appears, by the testimony of the witnesses from the Cella, that the red light alone of the schooner was first made on the Cella, a point on the starboard bow of the Cella by the compass, and that the helm of the Cella was at once put hard a-port, but that, notwithstanding that, the bearing of the lights of the schooner kept closing in on the Cella all the time till the collision, an interval of nearly ten minutes. Perry, a seaman on the Cella, who assisted in putting her wheel to port, and who saw the two lights of the schooner just as the steamer's wheel was put to port, says that he kept his eyes on the two lights of the schooner up to the time the vessel struck, and that a very short time, not many seconds, before the contact, the schooner hid her green light. The protest of the Cella, made on the 6th of December, 1866, and signed and sworn to by the master, the first mate, the carpenter and two of the seamen of the Cella, and by her pilot, states that the schooner was steering, according to their best observation, east by south, or east southeast, and that, from the appearance of her lights, from the time she was first seen from the Cella, until the collision, she had not changed her helm.

There having been no fault on the part of the schooner, and it having been the duty of the Cella to avoid her, it follows that, as no excuse is established by the Cella, she must be held liable. Under these circumstances, it is of no consequence to account for the collision, or to speculate as to how it could have happened. And yet, on the evidence, it is quite manifest where the particular fault of the Cella was. She made two colored lights on her starboard bow, which, with the wind south, and the Cella heading west half north, clearly indicated that the lights belonged to a sailing vessel which was sailing on the wind. The Cella at once ported her helm. This seems to be the universal practice of a steamer, in meeting a sailing vessel, whether it be the proper manoeuvre or not to enable the steamer to fulfil the duty, imposed upon her by law, of keeping out of the way of the sailing vessel. In this case, the manoeuvre was faulty. The Cella ought to have starboarded her helm, and there would have been no collision. In the first place, she made no allowance for the leeway which the schooner would make in sailing on the wind, with the wind as it was. In the second place, the testimony of the master of the Cella shows, that, with the wind fresh from the south, as it was, and the Cella down by the head, as she was, the wind catches her stern and keeps her head to the wind, that is to port, as she was then heading, and tends to counteract the usual effect of porting the wheel, and that, if her engines had been stopped, she would, even with a port helm, have come around with her head to the wind, that is, to port. This manifestly shows that her mistake was in porting, instead of starboarding. That, with the leeway of the schooner, brought the vessels together. If the Cella had starboarded, her helm, with the effect of the wind on her stern, would have brought her head around rapidly to port, even though her machinery had not been stopped, and, with the leeway of the schooner, each vessel would have passed a wide distance on the starboard side of the other.

The steamer is responsible for all the damages which ensued, from the collision, to the schooner and her cargo, including those consequent upon the running in shore and the stranding of the schooner. There must be a decree for the libellants, for such damages, with the costs of the suit, the damages to be ascertained by a reference.

CELLULOID MANUF'G CO. v. GOODYEAR DENTAL VULCANITE CO.

[13 Blatchf. 375;[1] 2 Ban. & A. 334; 10 O. G. 41.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 7, 1876.

PATENTS — SALE OF INVENTION — RIGHTS OF PATENTEE — SUIT TO LIMIT PATENT OR HAVE ITS EXTENT DETERMINED — SUIT FOR INFRINGEMENT — PARTIES DEFENDANT — ENJOINING LIBEL OF BUSINESS.

1. The owner of a useful invention has the right to sell it to all who will purchase, subject only to restraint from some party having a conflicting patent. He holds the right from the general law of the land, and needs no act of congress to enable him to make or vend his article, and obtains no such right from congress. He obtains from the patent laws only the power to restrain another from unlawfully making, using or vending his invention.

[Cited in Rein v. Clayton, 37 Fed. 356. Applied in Strait v. National Harrow Co., 51 Fed. 820.]

2. Injuries to the trade or profits or business of a manufacturer do not fall within the preventive scope of the patent laws, but only injuries to the right of the patentee to exclude others from the manufacture, use, or sale of the article for which he has a patent.

[Cited in Flint v. Hutchinson Smoke-Burner Co., 38 Fed. 547.]

3. A junior private patentee, who alleges that his patent does not conflict with a prior patent, and asks the court so to adjudge, cannot sustain a bill asking the court to decide that the plaintiff and his licensees are not infringers of the defendant's patent.

4. A suit in effect to limit a patent, or to declare that it does not extend to a certain class of cases, and, pro tanto, to have it adjudged void, can only be sustained by the attorney general, in behalf of the United States.

5. A patentee has the right to sue any one of several alleged infringers of the patent, and to omit others, in his discretion. He cannot be compelled to enforce his right, against his wish.

6. A junior patentee or an alleged infringer cannot reverse this position, and, by making the elder patentee a defendant, compel him to assert his rights as against him.

7. A bill to prevent the publication of a libel injurious to the plaintiff's business can be sustained only when it appears that the statement is malicious as well as false. If made to advance the party's own sales, and upon the reasonable claim that he has the right which he asserts, the action must fail.

In equity. The allegations of the bill were, in substance, as follows:

(1.) On the 7th of June, 1864, letters patent were issued to John A. Cummings for "an improvement in artificial gums and palates." Such letters were reissued on the 10th of January, 1865, and again on the 21st of March, 1865, and, by assignment, the same are now the property of the defendant.

(2.) After becoming such owner, the defendant commenced a great number of suits against dentists, in the various courts of the United States, for alleged infringement of the said letters patent, and which suits are still pending and undetermined in the circuit courts of the United States.

(3.) On the 12th of June, 1870, letters patent No. 105,338 were issued to John W. and Isaiah S. Hyatt, for an "improvement in treating and moulding pyroxyline." The same were surrendered and reissued June 23d, 1874, as No. 5,928.

(4.) This substance is useful, among other purposes, as a holder for sets of artificial teeth.

(5.) On the 28th of March, 1871, letters patent 113,055 were issued to the Albany Dental Plate Company, as assignees of Hyatts and Perkins, an "improvement in dental plates from pyroxyline."

(6.) The plaintiff is the holder, by assignment, of said letters Nos. 5,928 and 113,055.

(8.) The plaintiff is largely engaged in manufacturing blanks, to be used as holders for teeth, under said patents. The substance produced under the patents the plaintiff denominates "celluloid," and the plaintiff is selling large quantities of such holders throughout the United States, together with licenses to use the same.

(9.) The said rights were of great advantage to the plaintiff until interfered with and infringed by the defendant; and its rights have been acquiesced in and recognized by the public generally, and the plaintiff has invested a large amount of capital in the business, which will become valueless unless its exclusive character can be sustained.

(10.) Of the great number of suits brought as aforesaid by the defendant, for alleged infringement of its patent, the great majority have not been defended; but the defendants therein have allowed decrees pro confesso to be taken against them, and the same are still pending before masters, under the usual order of reference.

(11.) In none of said suits has the defendant averred in its bills that the use of celluloid, as a substitute for a vulcanite plate, is an infringement of the Cummings letters patent, nor, except in two instances, have the defendants in such suits ever pleaded that the use of celluloid was not such infringement; nor has such fact, or the question of law involved therein, ever been presented for legal decision, except as hereinafter stated.

(12.) In a suit against one Wolf, commenced in 1872, in an affidavit and answer filed in opposition to a motion for an injunction, Wolf alleged that he used metal or celluloid bases, and that the same were not an infringement of the plaintiff's patent. The court made an order that the defendant be restrained from the use of vulcanite artificial gums and palates, and that the plaintiff have leave to amend its bill. No amendment was ever made, but, as unamended, the bill was, on the 13th of July, 1875, taken as confessed.

(13.) In July, 1875, the defendant and one Josiah Bacon commenced an action against one Eben M. Flagg, upon a printed bill in substance like that in the suit against Wolf and the other suits referred to, containing no allegation that the use of celluloid blanks was an infringement of the Cummings patent. Annexed to the bill was a copy of the specification of 113,055, various affidavits, and a copy of the deposition of Henry J. Fisk, given in a suit of Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Preterre [Case No. 5,595], and sets of celluloid teeth and of vulcanite teeth. There was, also, upon all of these papers, a notice of motion for preliminary injunction. Flagg had purchased his celluloid blanks of the plaintiff, and was using them in his business. The plaintiff assumed the defence of Flagg's suit, to the knowledge of the defendant. The motion was heard upon the issue presented by the letters patent of the plaintiff and defendant in this suit, and, on the 7th of December, 1875, Judge Blatchford made an order denying the motion, on the ground that it was not sufficiently clear that the defendant's process was embraced in the plaintiff's claim, to warrant the granting of an injunction, until one should be granted as the result of a final hearing of the case. Certain allegations were made by the present defendant on the application, that proofs in a suit against

William H. Dwinelle were on file, and that they were identical with the proofs taken in a suit against Daniel H. Smith, and that the record against Smith constituted a part of the proofs on that motion, and that the question of the conflict between the patents now in question would thus be presented as a question of law, and plaintiff supposed the suit against Flagg would be proceeded in, and the question now at issue would thus be presented for decision, but, on the 23d of December, 1875, the plaintiff in that suit discontinued it by an order, reciting as reasons, that Flagg had demurred to the bill on account of the misjoinder of Bacon as a plaintiff therein, and also the great pressure of business and delay of hearing in this circuit court.

(14.) Such discontinuance was not made for the reasons mentioned, but was illusory, and to prevent the entry of an order on Judge Blatchford's decision, to prevent a final hearing, and to enable the defendant to initiate a new means of harassing the dentists who purchased under the plaintiff's patent, and to restrict and impair the plaintiff's income therefrom.

(15.) Since Judge Blatchford's decision, the defendant has caused notice to be given to the dentists using the celluloid blanks, not to use the same; that such use was an infringement of the Cummings patent; and that, if persisted in, such persons would be prosecuted as infringers. Such notice was given to dentists residing in various states and circuits, who communicated the same to the plaintiff, asking protection against such claim, and this plaintiff has agreed to afford such protection. To do this would involve the plaintiff in a multitude of suits in various circuits, would subject it to great expense and annoyance, and would practically involve such enormous costs as would render the plaintiff's patents valueless.

(16.) Since Judge Blatchford's decision, the defendants have moved in the circuit courts in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Michigan, for references to masters, and commenced the taking of accounts in suits in which the defendants have suffered the bill to be taken pro confesso. Such defendants are not of sufficient ability to defend such suits, but yield a ready assent to any request that may be made of them, the infringement being ostensibly proved and admissions procured in evidence of the Preterre suit and also of the Smith suit in Massachusetts. In a suit brought by defendant and Bacon against Jared Kibbee, the master made his report, which contains, among other things, an admission of the printed record in the Preterre case referred to, and reports damages to the amount of $220. The plaintiff had no knowledge of the Kibbee suit. Kibbee was not represented by counsel, was ignorant of his rights, and the evidence by the said records, and also of the celluloid blanks which he had used, was illegal and incompetent. The only question referred to the master was, whether Kibbee had sold vulcanite dental plates in infringement of the Cummings patent, and the question whether the use of celluloid blanks was an infringement of the Cummings patent was not passed upon prior to the order of reference, and was not referred to the master; and whether the use of celluloid did constitute such infringement, could only be passed upon at the final hearing in a suit brought for that purpose.

(17.) In another suit, brought by the same parties against one Hoopes, in Maryland, he allowed a decree to go against him for the use of vulcanite dental plates. He had been, and, so far as plaintiff knows, was, at the time of instituting said suit, an agent of the defendant, and a stockholder in its company. Hoopes was summoned to appear before the master. The plaintiff's counsel attended at the day appointed, and found that Hoopes had, on the previous day, consented to the admission of the records in the Preterre and Smith cases. Plaintiff's counsel then stated to the master the position of the case, whereupon the said Bacon, who was present, stated that they would make no claim against the defendant for the use of celluloid blanks, and an entry to that effect was made in the proceedings.

(18.) The Preterre suit was commenced in December, 1874, for his having manufactured, used, and sold vulcanite dental plates. Preterre was defended by counsel not of plaintiff's employment, who were not acquainted with its rights, nor with the facts in relation to celluloid, as hereinbefore stated, and who made defence solely on the ground of the invalidity of the Cummings patent; and they did not bring in issue the question between celluloid plates and vulcanite plates. Fisk was examined as a witness. Preterre endeavored to establish that the plates he used, which were testified to be vulcanite, were in truth celluloid, and on this point Fisk was examined as a witness. Preterre afterwards abandoned his attempt to prove a similarity between the two substances, and, in June, 1875, he requested Hyatt to appear as a witness in his behalf. Renwick was afterwards examined as a witness against Preterre, and this plaintiff requested its counsel, Mr. Baldwin, to appear and cross-examine him; and this plaintiff made no other appearance in that case than that one of its counsel conducted such cross-examination. Preterre did not assume to present the right under this plaintiff's letters patent, nor the state of the art. The defendant's counsel in that case was also induced to admit in evidence the record in the Smith case.

(19.) The production of the Preterre record before the master is for the purpose of establishing an identity between the vulcanite and the celluloid plates, and the introduction of the same under the pretence that this plaintiff was a privy to the same, is a fraud and an attempt to create a belief that that record is a full presentation of this plaintiff's case, and an attempt to gain an unjust advantage.

(20.) This defendant caused the record in the Kibbee case, after Kibbee had consented as aforesaid, to be printed continuously with the Preterre case, and to be served upon Mr. Baldwin, this plaintiff's counsel, for the purpose of binding this plaintiff thereby; and similar proceedings have been taken in other cases.

(21.) The legal rights of the plaintiff, as herein averred, have not been properly presented to any tribunal, save in the Flagg case, and an attempt to create the impression that they have been before the court is unfounded. This plaintiff has offered to waive the misjoinder of Flagg, and has requested this defendant to proceed in that suit, which it refuses to do.

(22.) By other suits plaintiff is needlessly subjected to great loss in conducting the same, and in loss of revenue; and, by reason thereof, many dentists are deterred from purchasing celluloid blanks, and thereby this defendant obstructs and retards the plaintiff in the legal use of its exclusive privilege.

(23.) The defendant claims that the celluloid blanks are an infringement of its patent, and that it has a legal right to arrest the manufacture of the same. The plaintiff avers and insists that such claim is unfounded.

(24.) The plaintiff is lawfully engaged in prosecuting the said business, and its right is invaded and infringed by the written and verbal threats of the defendant to prosecute those who make purchase of said blanks, and by its illegal prosecution of such multiplicity of suits, and by giving notice of its intention to hold responsible those who use the celluloid blanks, by reason whereof the plaintiff is injured in its business.

(25.) The Cummings patent is void for the various reasons set forth.

(26.) The rights of the parties are solely under the patents referred to, and depend upon whether the Cummings patent is valid, and, if so, whether the same interferes with the letters patent of the plaintiff; and such questions should properly be decided in a suit between the owners of the respective patents.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays: 1. That this court will entertain jurisdiction of this suit, to determine whether the Cummings patent is valid, and, if it is, whether the defendant is entitled to interfere with the celluloid dental blanks, as an infringement thereof; 2. that, in case it shall be held that celluloid is not an infringement of the Cummings patent, a final decree be entered, enjoining the defendant from commencing or prosecuting any actions against this plaintiff, or any dentists purchasing celluloid blanks from it; 3. that, in the event of such decree, an account may be taken of the profits it has made by such obstruction and interference with the plaintiff's business, and of the profits it has made by the sale of vulcanite plates to those who had theretofore been the customers of the plaintiff in the use of celluloid blanks, and of the profits which the defendant has made and the plaintiff has lost by means of the acts aforesaid; 4. that a preliminary injunction may issue restraining the defendant and its agents, during the pendency of this suit, from making threats of prosecution for using celluloid blanks, or sending letters or circulars cautioning against the use of celluloid blanks, and from proceeding in any suit now pending for the use of celluloid; 5. for costs and such other or different relief as to the court may seem meet; 6. for a subpoena in the usual form, and for a preliminary injunction during the pendency of this action, as hereinbefore prayed for. The defendant demurred to the jurisdiction of the court, setting forth the following causes: 1. The bill is filed by a citizen of New York against a citizen of the same state; 2. the United States are not parties plaintiff, or petitioners; 3. the suit does not arise under the constitution or laws of the United States; 4. the bill is not brought in the name of the United States, or its attorney general; 5. the bill contains no equity whereon relief can be given; 6. the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, if the facts stated in the bill constitute any cause of action.

William D. Shipman, Clarence A. Seward, and E. Luther Hamilton, for plaintiff.

Edward N. Dickerson and Benjamin F. Lee, for defendant.

HUNT, Circuit Justice. This case comes before the court in a double aspect. It is presented, first, in the form of a motion for a preliminary injunction, which is based upon the bill of complaint, and upon affidavits and documents furnished by the respective parties. It is presented, secondly, upon a demurrer to the bill of complaint. The question upon the equity of the bill has been fully argued, as has also the propriety of issuing a preliminary injunction, upon the case made by the additional evidence. The question that presents itself first, in the natural order of things, is upon the sufficiency of the bill; in other words, is the demurrer well taken?

The plaintiff alleges itself to be the owner of a useful invention, in the manufacture of plates for holding artificial teeth. By the general laws of the land, state as well as national, it has the right to sell that improvement to all who think it of sufficient value to induce them to purchase it, subject only to restraint from some party having a conflicting patent. So far as its own use or manufacture is concerned, it needs no act of congress to enable it to make, use and vend the article, and it obtains no such right from congress. The benefit of the patent laws is, that the plaintiff may prevent others from making, using or vending its invention. To itself, to its own right to make, use or vend, no right or authority is added by those statutes. When a stranger shall thus make, use or vend its manufacture, the patent laws enable it to restrain such use, and to recover damages therefor. Do the subjects of complaint in the bill set forth fall within this right of action given by the patent laws? Are not the injuries complained of injuries to the trade, the profits and the business of the plaintiff, as carried on by itself, for which it has and needs no patent authority, rather than injuries to the right of the patentee to exclude others from such sale or manufacture? It is to this latter class only that the patent laws apply, and for injury to those rights only that actions under the patent laws can be sustained. See Hawks v. Swett, 4 Hun, 149, 150, where this principle is fully set forth.

The bill contains a prayer that the defendant's patent may be adjudged to be void and of no effect. On the argument it was, however, conceded, that, for the purpose of the present proceedings, that patent must be held to be valid. It has been adjudged to be valid, in numerous cases in the circuit courts, tried before different judges, and, until held otherwise by the supreme court, must be taken to be a valid patent.

The plaintiff is the owner of certain other patents issued to the Hyatts and to Perkins, for an "improvement in dental plates from pyroxyline." These are commonly called celluloid plates. In the 24th section of the bill of complaint it is averred that the defendant claims that the use of the celluloid blanks is an infringement of the Cummings letters patent. This claim, it is alleged, has no lawful foundation, and it is averred that the true construction of the Cummings patent does not support the same, or give to the defendant any right to interfere with or arrest proceedings under it. Notwithstanding this allegation, the plaintiff insists, and such is the object of its bill, that the court shall decide whether, if the plaintiff or those who hold its licenses shall make or vend its articles patented, it would amount to an infringement of the defendant's patent. In my judgment, such an action cannot be sustained. No case has been cited to me, nor do I think any can be found, sustaining an action by a junior private patentee, who alleges that his patent does not conflict with the prior patent, and who asks the court so to adjudge. It is, in substance, a suit to limit the effect of a patent, to declare that it does not extend to a certain class of cases, and, pro tanto, to have it adjudged to be void and of no force. Such an action can only be sustained by the attorney general, in the name and on behalf of the United States. Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 434.

To allow the action is to reverse the proper position of the parties. Whoever receives letters patent from the United States receives thereby a prima facie right to maintain an action against every infringer of the right given by such letters. While it is true that such right is prima facie only, and that the holder must be prepared to maintain it in the courts when attacked, it is still a right on his part to sue such alleged violators. The present action would convert the right to sue into a liability to be sued, which is quite a different thing. The defendant holds the Cummings patent. It finds that the patent is infringed and its rights injured by A., B. and C., in the state of New York, and E., D. and F., in the state of New Jersey, and so on through the alphabet. The defendant has a right of action against each one of these individuals. It has a right to sue the whole of them. It has the right to sue any one of them, and to allow the others to go undisturbed. While it would not be a high-minded theory, I know of no principle that, as matter of law, would prevent its seeking the feeblest of them all, the one least able to defend himself, and to make a victim of him. If that individual shall appear to have infringed upon this defendant's patent, he is liable to the damages, although he may be poor, unable to defend himself, although others have offended in a greater degree, and although we may condemn the spirit which selected him as the particular defendant. On principle, this cannot be doubted. But, the plaintiff seeks to reverse this action, by making the elder patentee a defendant, at the suit of a particular offender, and to compel him, whether he chooses or does not choose, to assert his rights as against him.

Again, such a suit gives no practical result in the settlement of the question. Suppose it to be decided in this suit, that the celluloid preparation is not an infringement of the Cummings patent. Nothing is settled except as between the two parties present as litigants. If the defendant should afterwards sue a dentist in Michigan for infringing its patent, the judgment in the present case would be no evidence against it, to show that there was no infringement. It would be inter alios acta and not competent; and so, if the judgment should be the other way, the defendant could not have the benefit of the decision, as against another alleged infringer. Each plaintiff and each defendant can litigate his own case, and is not bound by decisions in other cases, to which he was not a party, and which he had no opportunity to litigate. Such is the rule of law, and its necessity, to avoid collusive judgments and fraudulent combinations, is too obvious to need defence.

13 Eq. Cas. 355, give countenance to the suggestion that the bill in this case may be sustained, to prevent the publication of libels injurious to the plaintiff's business. The case of Prudential Assur. Co. v. Knott, 10 Ch. App. 143, is a subsequent case, and is to the contrary. It is to be said further, in answer to these cases: 1st. They were based upon the theory that the defendants made their claim and published their injurious circulars, but refused to bring suits to sustain them. The record here shows that numerous suits have been brought, and that at least four suits, to wit, those against Silliman, Kibbee, Hoopes and Greene, are specifically proved by the evidence, in the first two of which the defendant has obtained decrees that the celluloid is an infringement of the Cummings patent, and in the other two the proceedings are still pending before the masters. 2d. No such action at law or in equity can be maintained unless it is established that the publication is malicious and for the purpose of injuring the other party. If made to advance the publisher's own sales, and upon a reasonable claim that he has the right which he asserts, the action must fail. Wren v. Weild, L. R. 4 Q. B. 730.

Upon the same point is the case of Hovey v. Rubber-Tip Pencil Co., 57 N. Y. 119, which was an action to restrain the defendant from publishing notices injurious to the plaintiff's business. It was a case of alleged conflicting patents, in which the defendant cautioned all persons against using the plaintiff's invention, alleging his intention to prosecute all infringements. The court held: 1st. That the questions presented arose directly upon the patent laws of the United States, and hence were not within the jurisdiction of the state courts; citing Dudley v. Mayhew, 3 N. Y. 9, and Middlebrook v. Broadbent, 47 N. Y. 443; considering, also, Gibson v. Woodworth, 8 Paige, 132, and Burrall v. Jewett, 2 Paige, 134. 2d. That, to justify the action as a slander of title, the proceedings must appear to have been unfounded not only, and the statements false, but malicious. If the defendant believed its statements to be correct, it merely discharged a moral obligation and satisfied the demands of fair dealing, in making the publication.

It is contended, also, that ground for filing the bill is found in section 4918 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to interfering patents. That section is as follows: "Whenever there are interfering patents, any person interested in any one of them, or in the working of the invention claimed under either of them, may have relief against the interfering patentee, and all parties interested under him, by suit in equity against the owners of the interfering patent; and the court, on notice to adverse parties, and other due proceedings had according to the course of equity, may adjudge and declare either of the patents void in whole or in part, or inoperative, or invalid in any particular part of the United States, according to the interest of the parties in the patent or the invention patented. But no such judgment or adjudication shall affect the right of any person except the parties to the suit, and those deriving title under them subsequent to the rendition of such judgment." The sixteenth section of the act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 123], and the act of July 8, 1870 [16 Stat. 207], make corresponding provisions on this subject. To give the plaintiff the benefit of this statute, it must abandon the allegation of its bill, that the celluloid is not an infringement of, or interference with, the Cummings patent. It must assume the ground there imputed to the defendant, that these two patents do conflict and interfere, and there unqualifiedly denied by the plaintiff, and must assume the position there imputed to the defendant, of the identity of celluloid or collodion dental plates with the subject of the defendant's patent. The argument of the defendant is, that celluloid or collodion was a well known agent when the plaintiff's patent was obtained, known as an equivalent for vulcanite in the manufacture of dental plates, and that there could, therefore, be no patent lawfully issued for the application of collodion to dental plates. The Cummings patent is upheld upon the theory that the vulcanite possessed qualities not found in any other material used for that purpose, and that the mode of manufacture was different from that in which any other artificial set of teeth had been made. The Hyatt dental patent, it is argued, exhibits no novelty in the quality of the result produced or in the mode of manufacture. Until the plaintiff shall be prepared to assert that the two patents are substantially for the same invention, that its patentee is the real discoverer of the invention therein set forth, and that the defendant has wrongfully and improperly appropriated the fruits of his invention, I do not see how the statute respecting interfering patents can be invoked. See Curt. Pat., last chapter.

In reaching this conclusion, I do not assume either that the plaintiff's patent is void, or that it is an infringement of the Cummings patent. No opinion is intended to be intimated upon those points. Under this branch of the case, the suggestion is, simply, that a case of interference is not presented, where the plaintiff avers that there is no interference. An averment that the defendant claims an interference, and a denial of such claim by the plaintiff, cannot authorize the plaintiff to ask a settlement as for an interference. The prayers and the relief to be afforded to the plaintiff must be upon the facts as it claims them to exist, not as the defendant claims and which the plaintiff denies.

It is said, lastly, that jurisdiction to sustain the present controversy is found in section 1 of the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470), which provides as follows: "The circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, or in which the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners, or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states, or a controversy between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states, or a controversy between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens, or subjects." The jurisdiction of the federal courts, under the constitution and laws of the United States, depends upon two points—First, as arising from the subject-matter of the controversy; and, second, as dependent upon the character of the parties. Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 378. See Matthews v. McStea, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 646; Littlefield v. Perry, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 222. The act of 1789 made the jurisdiction of the circuit courts dependent upon the character of the parties. The act of 1875 has altered this rule, and gives to that court jurisdiction in all cases in law and equity arising under the laws and constitution of the United States. It cannot be doubted that controversies arising upon conflicting claims to or under patents issued under the laws of the United States are cases arising under the laws of the United States. It is upon this theory that the circuit courts have, from the foundation of the government, entertained jurisdiction of patent cases. This principle has been assumed in the previous parts of this opinion, and its existence does not relieve from the difficulty now pressing upon us. The objection is not, that, in its subject-matter, the case does not present one of federal jurisdiction, to wit, the adjustment of conflicting claims under the patent laws of the United States, or the awarding of damages for an infringement of such patents, but the question is, whether, in the form in which the facts are presented, the plaintiff can sustain his bill or is entitled to an injunction. The act of 1875 does not touch this point.

Upon the principles already laid down, I am of the opinion that this action cannot be sustained, and that the demurrer must be upheld. It follows, that the motion for the injunction must be denied. A preliminary injunction cannot be granted when it is conceded that the plaintiff must finally fail in his action.

Case No. 2,544.

The CEMENT ROCK and The VENTURE.

[8 Ben. 443.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1876.

COLLISION IN THE KILLS—TUG AND TOW—VESSEL AT ANCHOR.

1. A schooner lying at anchor in the Kills was struck by a barge which was being towed by a propeller. The tide, which was flood, gave the barge a set towards the schooner. The propeller, in defence, set up that the barge was not properly steered after the propeller, which passed the schooner at a proper distance. The barge, in defence, set up that she followed the propeller, which went close by the schooner, and that the schooner took a sheer in the tide and ran into the barge: Held, that the allegation of the barge, that the schooner sheered, was not proved.

2. The allegation of the propeller, that the barge was not steered after the propeller, was not proved.

3. As the tide set the barge towards the schooner, the propeller should have taken great care not to go so near the schooner that a sheer of the barge might carry her into the schooner.

4. The propeller was in fault in going too close to the schooner, and in not keeping a proper lookout astern, and was solely liable for the collision.

In admiralty.

D. McMahon, for libellants.

Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, for propeller.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for barge.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This libel is filed by the owners of the schooner J. B. Bleecker, against the steam propeller Cement Rock and the barge Venture, to recover for the damages caused to the schooner through a collision which took place between the barge and the schooner, on the morning of the 5th of October, 1873, after sunrise. The schooner was lying at anchor in the Kills, off Port Johnson, in a proper place, on the north side of the channel, and with abundant room between her and the south side of the channel for passing vessels to go by her in safety. The propeller was going to the westward with the barge in tow on a hawser. The barge was heavily laden with railroad iron. She struck the starboard bow of the schooner, as she was being towed past by the propeller.

The libel alleges that the schooner had her head to the east; that the tide was flood; and that the collision was caused as well by the carelessness, negligence and want of seamanship on the part of those having charge of the propeller, in approaching too near with her tow to the northerly side of the channel, where the schooner lay at anchor, and in not properly looking out ahead, and in not slowing and stopping in time, but in going at too great a speed and taking a sudden sheer, as by the negligent acts of those on the barge, in not watching or minding their helm, and was not caused or contributed to by those in charge of the schooner.

The answer of the propeller alleges that the propeller passed the schooner at a distance of about 220 feet; that, after the propeller had passed the schooner, the barge struck the schooner; that the propeller was going in a straight course towards the northwest, at the time, the schooner being headed to the southward; that the tide was flood and had a set in towards the land in the direction of the schooner, which caused the barge to sheer in towards her in passing, unless prevented by the helm, which was not done; and that the collision was occasioned solely by the fault of those in charge of the barge, in not having a hand stationed at the helm to prevent the barge from sheering, and was not owing to any negligence or want of skill on the part of those in charge of the propeller.

The answer of the barge alleges that the captain of the barge took charge of her wheel, and steered her in the wake of the propeller; that the propeller passed the schooner in close proximity to her, on her starboard side, the barge following carefully in the wake of the propeller; that, when the barge had reached a point about abreast of the schooner, there being at the time no one either at the wheel or on the deck of the schooner, the tide being flood, the schooner took a sudden sheer ahead and out of the course on which she had been heading, and came in contact with the barge, and thus caused the damage; that, if any fault is chargeable on the propeller, it is that she did not take the barge alongside of her, and did not give the schooner a wider berth in passing her; and that the schooner was in fault in not having a man on deck and at the wheel to break the sheer of the schooner.

There is no evidence that the schooner took any sheer or was at all in fault. Therefore, the fault was with both or one of the other vessels. It is shown that the flood tide, at the place of this collision, sets over towards the place where the schooner was at anchor; and, as the barge was heavily laden, and was being towed astern, great care and watchfulness were required on the part of the propeller, to see that the barge was towed by, so far off from the schooner as not to be liable, on taking a sheer with the tide, to hit the schooner. There was abundance of room to the southward, and I am satisfied, from the evidence, that the propeller went too near to the schooner. Although she herself cleared the schooner, she dragged the barge so near, that the tide, sheering the barge, sent the barge against the schooner, before the sheer was stopped. Moreover, the persons in charge of the propeller were bound to know the set of the tide and the liability of the barge to sheer with it, and to keep a proper lookout astern. But they kept no lookout astern, and only noticed the sheer of the barge when the barge had nearly reached the schooner.

The remaining question is as to whether the barge also was in fault. The testimony of two witnesses who were on board of the propeller is to the effect that the man on the barge had left his wheel and did not return to it until after the barge had taken the sheer and had got very near to the schooner, and when it was too late to break the sheer. On the other hand, the man on the barge, who, in giving his evidence, impressed me as being a truthful witness, and as telling an honest and straight story, testifies that he never left his wheel for a moment, and that, as soon as he noticed the schooner, and at a time when the propeller was just about abreast of the barge, he put his wheel hard-a-starboard, and kept it so till after the collision. I regard this evidence as the more reliable. The witnesses from the propeller are evidently mistaken in saying that the wheel of the barge was forward of her cabin and not aft of it. They place it in a position where they could the more easily see it. As it was not in that position, the more proper conclusion from the evidence is, that the witnesses from the propeller are mistaken in saying that they saw the man on the barge away from the wheel at the time in question.

There must be a decree for the libellants against the propeller, with costs, with a reference to ascertain the damage caused to the libellants by the collision, and the libel must be dismissed, with costs, as against the barge.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION OF 1876—APPROPRIATION BY THE UNITED STATES—REPAYMENT.

The act of congress of February 16, 1876 [19 Stat. 4], appropriating $1,500,000 to the Centennial Exhibition, does not provide that the said sum shall be repaid to the United States before the stockholders of the said exhibition shall be repaid the amount subscribed for their stock. It only provides that it shall be repaid before any dividend or percentage of profits is paid to the stockholders.

STRONG, Circuit Justice. This is a bill for an interpleader. The complainants have in hand the sum of about $2,000,000, of which they are trustees for distribution, and to which there are conflicting claims. The state of New Jersey, the International Exhibition Company, Joseph Patterson, and numerous other private persons, are stockholders of the corporation created by the act of congress of June 1, 1872 [17 Stat. 203], under the name of the "Centennial Board of Finance," and they claim that the whole fund should be distributed among the stockholders. On the other hand, the United States, represented by the assistant treasurer, claim that, before any payment to the stockholders, the sum of $1,500,000 should be paid into the United States treasury. The case is a proper one for the adjudication of this court. The parties litigant are before us, and they have answered the bill, asserting their claims. Though all the stockholders are not parties of record, they are all represented, and the United States has submitted the matter in dispute to our determination.
