A new trial is also asked for, on the ground that the court erred in refusing to make, on the request of the defendants, a special finding of facts in the case. The reasons which governed the court, in so refusing, were those which are set forth in the opinion in the case of Clement v. Phoenix Ins. Co. [Case No. 2,882]. I understand the views which I there took of the effect of the provisions of the 4th section of the act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 501), to be sustained by the supreme court, in the case of Norris v. Jackson, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 125. The court which, after the waiver of a trial by jury, tries a case without a jury, is not required to make a special finding upon the facts. It may make a general finding, and it may rightfully decline to make a special finding. There is nothing in the case of Generes v. Campbell, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 193, or in any other decision of the supreme court, inconsistent with this view. In this case, I think it was a proper exercise of the discretion of the court, not to make a special finding, and that a new trial ought not to be granted because of the refusal of the court to make a special finding.

In regard to the objection, that the policy does not contain the words "lost or not lost," and that the vessel had, in fact, been lost before the policy was issued, I fully considered the question, in my opinion given on deciding the cause, and adhere to the views then expressed.

The motion for a new trial is denied.

[NOTE. On writ of error sued out by the defendant, the judgment of the circuit court in this case, which was for the plaintiff (Case No. 4,902), was duly affirmed, Mr. Justice Clifford delivering the opinion. It was held there was no error in the refusal of the circuit court to admit as evidence the application for insurance when tendered by the defendants in support of the defense of concealment, inasmuch as the instrument contained no statement in respect to any one of those matters; and, as its terms were exactly the same as those of the policy, the contents were immaterial to the issue, as they could have no tendency to show that the plaintiff, when he made the application, did not communicate to the defendants all the material facts and circumstances within his knowledge. The opinions of the circuit court (Case No. 4,902), and on motion for new trial, as given in the principal case, were specially referred to and approved by the supreme court. Insurance Co. v. FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—SERVICE OF PROCESS UPON AGENTS.

A resolution of a foreign corporation, filed pursuant to a state statute, authorizing its agent "to acknowledge service of process for and in behalf of such company, and consenting that service of process upon any agent shall be taken and held to be as valid as if served upon the company or association," amounts to an agreement for a constructive presence within such state; and a federal court may obtain jurisdiction over such corporation by service upon its agent.

At law. On motion to set aside the summons, upon the ground that defendant was a foreign corporation organized under the laws of the province of Ontario, and, therefore, not suable in this court.

C. E. Warner, for motion.

H. E. Windsor, contra.

BROWN, District Judge. This is an action brought by a writ of summons, in which the defendant is described "as a body corporate, organized and existing under the laws of Ontario, in the dominion of Canada, and an alien and a subject of the queen of Great Britain and Ireland." The motion raises the question of the jurisdiction of this court over the defendant, and is based upon the fact that it is not an inhabitant of, or found within this district.

The first section of the act of 1875, following in this respect the language of the judiciary act, provides "that no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against any person, by any original process or proceeding, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of the serving of such process, or of commencing such proceeding, except as hereinafter provided." A series of decisions of the supreme court has settled the law that a corporation is only a citizen of the state by which it is created; that it is a mere creature of local law, and has not even an absolute right of recognition in other states, but depends for that, and for the enforcements of its contracts, upon the assent of those states, which may be given upon such terms as they please. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519; Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 168; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black. [66 U. S.] 286; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 81. Accordingly, it has always been held that a foreign corporation was not an inhabitant of any district except that within which it was incorporated, and that service upon its officers in another district was not a finding of the corporation in that district, within the meaning of the judiciary act. Day v. Newark India Rubber Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 3,685]; Main v. Second Nat. Bank [Id. 8,976].

If the service of the summons in this case is supported at all, it must be by virtue of the statute of this state, which provides that every foreign insurance company shall file with the secretary of state a resolution, authorizing any agent, duly appointed by resolution, under the seal of the company, to acknowledge service of process for, and in behalf of such company, "consenting that service of process upon any agent shall be taken and held to be as valid as if served upon the company or association, according to the laws of this state or any other state, and waiving all claim of error by reason of such service." That such service is valid and regular, has not only been repeatedly recognized by the supreme court of this state, but was held to be valid as applied to process from the state courts in the case of Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 404. It is true the question was not discussed whether such service would be valid as applied to process of the federal court, but there is no intimation that it would not be so considered. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 81, the supreme court observed in speaking of a foreign corporation: "It can not migrate, but may exercise its authority in a foreign territory, upon such conditions as may be prescribed by the laws of the place. One of these conditions may be that it shall consent to be sued there. If it do business there it will be presumed to have assented, and will be bound accordingly." The question at issue here, however, was not directly passed upon in that case. In Pomeroy v. New York & N. H. R. Co. [Case No. 11,261], it was held that the provision in the judiciary act above quoted could not be altered or modified by any state law, and that the law of New York in regard to a Connecticut corporation, declaring it liable to be sued in the same manner as corporations created by the laws of New York, and that process might be served on the officers or agent of the corporation, would not have the effect to give the federal court jurisdiction of a suit against such corporation by service within the district on an officer or agent.

I am better satisfied, however, with the opinion in the case of Knott v. Southern Life Ins. Co. [Id. 7,894], in which jurisdiction in a similar case was sustained. It seems to me the very object of the state law was to provide that no insurance company should do business within the state that was not capable of being sued there, and that the constructive presence of a corporation in the person of its agent should be recognized as well by us as by the state courts. The cases holding that a corporation is a citizen only of the state in which it is organized, are quite as applicable to state courts as to federal courts, and would be as effectual to prevent a foreign corporation being sued in the state courts of another state as in the federal courts. Now, if statutes like this may be held to constitute a constructive presence of the corporation in another state for the purpose of the service of process from the state court, I see no reason why it should not operate equally in favor of process from this court. And if a foreign corporation may appear after the issuing of process and defend a suit, (of which no doubt was ever entertained) it is difficult to see why it may not agree beforehand that it will accept service of all process that may be served upon it. In this particular the case of Day v. Newark India Rubber Co., above cited, differs from the one under consideration—there was no express agreement on the part of the corporation to accept service—the jurisdiction could only be sustained upon the theory that the acceptance of the franchise implied an agreement to be bound by the conditions of the statute. With deference to conflicting opinions, the reasoning of Judge Woods in the case cited from his reports seems to me unanswerable, and for the present I shall act upon it as the law in these cases.

ACTION OF DEBT—BOND PAYABLE IN INSTALMENTS—PENALTY—COVENANT.

1. On a bond, payable by instalments, debt cannot be sustained until they shall all become due.

2. But if the payment be secured by a penalty, debt may be brought.

3. Where there is no penalty covenant is the proper action for the instalments on a bond; or assumpsit, if the instalments be due by a simple contract.

[This was an action at law by Andrew Fontaine, assignee, against Francis Aresta.]

Mr. Logan, for plaintiff.

Mr. Thomas, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action of debt was brought on an instrument, under seal, for the payment of a certain sum, as principal, not yet due; and the payment of the interest annually. The defendant filed a special demurrer, which raises the question, whether an action of debt for the interest can be sustained before the principal becomes due. The rule seems to be well settled that debt will not lie for money, payable by instalments, until they shall all become due, unless the payment be secured by a penalty. 1 Chit. Pl. 129; Rudder v. Price, 1 H. Bl. 547; 2 Saund. 303, note 6; 3 Coke, 22a; Selw. N. P. 531, note; Bac. Abr. 669; 3 Black. 168. Where a sum of money is payable by instalments, and the payment is secured by a penalty, debt may be brought for the penalty. Bac. Abr. 699, "Debt" B.; Com. Dig. F. In 1 Bin. 152, the court held, that where the condition of a bond was for the payment of interest annually, and the principal at a distant day, the interest might be recovered, before the principal was due, by an action of debt on the bond. In this case the payment of the principal and interest was secured by a penalty. Where there is no penalty in the bond, payable by instalments, covenant is the proper action to recover the instalments as they shall become due. If the instalment be due on a simple contract, assumpsit is the proper action. This is a technical rule, as applied to the action of debt, but it seems to be too well established to be disregarded. The demurrer must be sustained.

APPROPRIATION OF FUND—SUBROGATION—JOINT AND SEPARATE ESTATE.

1. F., one of the firm of F. D. & Co., endorsed paper of the firm to raise money for the firm, and pledged securities belonging to himself, as security for its payment. The firm afterwards became bankrupt. After the adjudication in bankruptcy, the holders of the paper sold the securities then pledged, and realized on the sale $18,281, being $104 more than the amount due on the notes. The individual estate of F. proved insufficient to pay his individual debts, and the individual creditors insisted that the amount realized from the securities thus sold should be appropriated from the fund belonging to the joint estate, to that of the separate estate: Held, that, where there are two classes of creditors having a common debtor, who has several funds, and one class of creditors can resort to all of them, while the other can resort to only part of them, the former shall take payment out of the fund to which they can resort exclusively, so that both classes may be protected; and if the former resort to the fund common to both classes, to the loss of the latter, the latter are entitled to be substituted in place of the former, to the extent of the deprivation to which they have been subjected.

2. Under this principle, the holders of the notes in question might have surrendered the securities and resorted to either the joint estate or the separate estate.

3. The rights of the parties were not changed, because the holders of the notes satisfied them by a sale of the securities instead of resorting to the joint estate in bankruptcy; and the separate creditors were to be substituted to the right of the holders of the notes, to enforce payment from the joint estate.

4. Payment will not be permitted in equity to operate as an extinguishment, as against those equitably entitled to substitution in place of the party receiving payment.

5. The assignee, therefore, must appropriate to the separate estate of F. the $104 of surplus moneys arising on the sale of the securities, and such further sum as might arise from the dividends of the joint estate, as upon a debt proved against the joint estate of $18,177, the amount of the notes, accruing as of the date of the sale of the securities.

In bankruptcy.

W. & J. D. Kernan, for petitioners.
Dennison & Everett, for assignee.

WALLACE, District Judge. For the purpose of raising money for the firm of Foot, Doud & Co., the above named bankrupts, [Norman B.] Foot, one of the firm, endorsed their paper, and pledged securities belonging to himself individually as collateral for payment of the paper. After the adjudication of bankruptcy herein, the holders of the notes sold the securities thus pledged, and realized upon the sale the sum of $18,281, being $104 in excess of the amount due upon the notes. The separate creditors of Foot now represent that his separate estate is insufficient to pay his individual debts, and insist that the amount realized from the securities thus sold, be appropriated from the fund belonging to the joint estate to that of the separate estate of Foot. They maintain, that it was the duty of the assignee in bankruptcy to have exonerated the separate estate from the lien of the pledgees out of the funds of the joint estate; and they urge that, in any event, Foot, as surety for the firm, when the notes were paid by the sale of his property, became subrogated to the claims of the holders of the notes, and entitled to prove the amount of the notes against the joint estate; and that this demand enures to the benefit of his separate estate, which should be credited by the assignee with ratable dividends on the amount.

There are technical difficulties in the way of obtaining relief upon either of these theories. The assignee would not have been justified in applying the moneys of the joint estate to discharge a lien upon the property of the separate estate, even where the lien was created for the benefit of the firm; and if Foot as surety became subrogated to the rights of the holders of the notes, and therefore entitled to prove their amount, the rule which precludes a partner from proving his individual debt in competition with the joint creditors, would defeat the separate estate from deriving any benefit through the claim of Foot. But it seems clear, that the equities of the separate creditors can be worked out upon familiar principles, and a result attained, which, in view of the condition of the two estates, is highly desirable.

Where there are two classes of creditors, having a common debtor who has several funds, and one class of the creditors can resort to all the funds, while the other can resort only to part of them, the former shall take payment out of the fund to which they can resort exclusively, so that both classes may be protected; and if the former resort to the fund common to both classes, to the loss of the latter, the latter are entitled to be substituted to the extent of the deprivation to which they have been subjected, in the place of the former. This principle has been frequently applied where specific liens exist in favor of different creditors upon property of the same debtor; and the rule is the same, where the parties are creditors of different debtors, where, as between the debtors, equity demands that one of them should discharge the debt in exoneration of the other. Dorr v. Shaw, 4 Johns. Ch. 17; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 642, 643; Ex parte Kendall, 17 Ves. 521; Neff v. Miller, 8 Barr. [8 Pa. St.] 347; Sterling v. Brightbill, 5 Watts, 229. The doctrine applies in all cases of marshalling equitable assets; and its application to assets in bankruptcy, which are to be administered upon equitable principles, is peculiarly appropriate.

In the present case, after the adjudication of bankruptcy, the holders of the notes might have surrendered the collaterals, and resorted to either of two funds to obtain payment; as creditors of the firm, they could have proved against, and shared in, the joint estate; and as creditors of Foot, they could have proved against, and shared in, his separate estate; and, if they had surrendered, the collaterals would have enured to the benefit of the separate estate, because the firm were the primary debtors and Foot was a surety. The holders of the notes could not have been compelled to elect as to which fund they should pursue;—the rule in England, which requires creditors of both the joint and separate estate in bankruptcy to elect, not obtaining here. Ex parte Farnum [Case No. 4,674]; Meade v. National Bank of Fayetteville [Id. 9,366]; Emery v. Canal Nat. Bank [Id. 4,446]. The joint creditors, therefore, could not have been heard to complain if the holders of the notes had chosen to obtain satisfaction out of the joint estate; and no equities exist on their part, to countervail those of the separate creditors of Foot. On the other hand, if the nolders of the notes had surrendered their collaterals, and resorted to the separate estate of Foot by proving their claims in bankruptcy, the creditors of his separate estate would have been entitled to be substituted in the place of the holders of the notes, and allowed to prove the notes against the joint estate.

The rights of the parties are not changed because the holders of the notes satisfied them by a sale of the securities, instead of resorting to the joint estate in bankruptcy. By the course taken, the separate estate has been diminished to the extent that satisfaction might have been obtained from the joint estate; and to that extent the separate creditors have been deprived of a fund, in which they were entitled to equitable priority as against a class of creditors who had resort to another fund, which, as between the debtors, was the primary fund for payment. Upon the principles referred to, the separate creditors are to be substituted to the rights of the holders of the notes to enforce payment from the joint estate in bankruptcy. The technical satisfaction of the notes by the proceeds of the securities, does not stand in the way; for payment will not be permitted in equity to operate as an extinguishment as against those equitably entitled to substitution in the place of the party receiving payment. Eddy v. Traver, 6 Paige, 521; Morris v. Oakford, 9 Barr [9 Pa. St.] 498; Richardson v. Washington Bank, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 536.

Applying these principles to the present case, a result is reached which does no injustice to either class of creditors; and which affords a signal illustration of the benign vigor of the rules of equity. The assets of the primary debtors will be appropriated to the ratable payment of all their creditors, and those of the separate partner to his creditors; while the holders of the notes, protected in the exercise of their rights, will have so enforced them as not needlessly to prejudice the rights of other creditors.

A decree is ordered that the assignee appropriate to the separate estate of Foot the surplus arising upon the sales of the securities, and such further sum as may arise from the dividends of the joint estate, as upon a debt proved against such joint estate of $18,177, accruing as of the date of the sale of the securities.

SALE—STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU—BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBT.

1. A. sold goods to B. for cash, to be paid on the receipt by B. of the invoice for the goods. They were placed on board of a canal-boat, to be transported to B., and the invoice was sent to B. The goods were not paid for, and B. became insolvent. The canal-boat was stopped by ice. The master landed the goods, and placed them in warehouse. B. gave to the warehouseman authority to sell the goods if he could obtain a specified price for them. Afterwards B. gave to A. an order for the goods, and A. took possession of all of them, except some which the warehouseman had sold, and gave credit therefor, at the sale price to B., in extinguishment of an equal amount of B.'s indebtedness to A. in general account. B. being adjudged a bankrupt, A. made proof of a debt against B., for the balance of such general account. It was objected by the assignee in bankruptcy, that A. had received an illegal preference, in payment, in part, of such account, by receiving the salt on the order of B., when B. was insolvent, and when A. had reasonable cause to believe that B. was insolvent, that such preference was a fraud on the bankruptcy act, and that A. must be excluded from a share in the distribution of the assets of B.: Held, that the goods had not come to the possession of B., or of his agent, for disposal, so as to cut off the right of A. to stop them in transitu.

2. The non-payment of the price of the goods warranted a rescission of the sale.

3. A. had a right to appropriate the goods, on crediting the same, so as practically to extinguish the charge of the price of the sale to that extent.

4. The proof of debt must stand.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the northern district of New York.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Norman B. Foot and others.]

Scott Lord, for assignee in bankruptcy.
George F. Comstock, for creditor.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The assignee of the bankrupts appeals from a decision of the district court in bankruptcy [case unreported], allowing, or refusing to strike out, the proof of debt against the bankrupts' estate, made by the Onondaga Salt Company, for a balance of account. The ground of objection to the allowance of such debt is, that the salt company have received an illegal preference, in payment, in part, of their account, which excludes them from any participation in the distribution of the assets. The salt company had, from time to time, sold to the bankrupts salt, on credit; but the proof here sufficiently shows that their last sales were upon the express terms of payment in cash on the receipt of the invoice by the bankrupts, to whom the salt was forwarded by canal, by the company. On the sale, the goods were placed on board a canal-boat, for transportation, and the invoice or bill thereof was forwarded to the bankrupts. The bankrupts did not remit the money in payment for the salt; on the contrary, the purchasers failed and became insolvent. But, the canal-boat containing the salt was stopped by ice on the canal, which interrupted navigation for the season, and the master of the canal-boat landed the salt and placed it in warehouse, and the warehouseman notified the purchasers of that fact, whereupon the purchasers gave to the warehouseman a conditional authority to sell the salt, i. e., if he could obtain a price which was specified. After the failure and insolvency of the purchasers, an interview was had by one of them with the officers or agents of the company, and he suggested the propriety of a resumption of the possession and ownership of the salt by the company, and, they acquiescing, he gave to the company an order therefor. The company then took possession of the salt, (excepting about fifty bushels thereof, which the warehouseman had in some manner disposed of,) and gave a credit therefor, at the price of the original sale, in extinguishment of an equal amount of charge in the general account, though without any other or special application of the payment. This resumption of possession and credit of the price, and the order given by the purchasers of the salt, in a state of insolvency, and when the company had reasonable cause to believe the purchasers were insolvent, is insisted upon as a giving and receiving part payment, in general account, by way of illegal preference, in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt law, which bars the company from any share in the assets of the bankrupts. The district court held otherwise, and, I think, correctly.

Although the purchasers had given authority to the warehouseman to sell, that order was conditional only. It had not changed his relation to the goods, except conditionally. He was not their general agent to receive and dispose of the salt. The salt was in course of transmission to the buyers, and so remained until it should, perchance, happen that another purchaser was found to whom, under the conditional authority, the warehouseman might make a sale. The general purpose was to forward the salt to the buyers. A special and subordinate intent arose from the unexpected detention of the goods, which gave rise to a conditional authority to sell the salt. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the goods had not come to the possession of the purchasers, or their agent, for disposal, so as to cut off the right of stoppage in transitu. See the subject largely discussed, and cases cited, in Harris v. Hart, 6 Duer, 606, affirmed 17 N. Y. 249. The salt company had the right, therefore, to stop the goods. This right they could exercise, and the assent of the purchasers to their resumption of the possession gave them no greater right in that respect. If such resumption of possession operated to give them an advantage over other creditors, it was vested in them by law, and independently of the consent of the purchasers. The voluntary assent of the purchasers did not make their taking possession illegal under the bankrupt law, because, however, in form, they acted under the order, they had, in fact and in law, all the right of preference, in this respect, independently of such assent. It is not giving a preference to a creditor, when a debtor, peaceably and for convenience, assents to the doing by the creditor of what the creditor, if objection and collision arose, could lawfully do in spite of objection.

Again, the non-payment of the price warranted a rescission of the sale; and, as to that, like observations are pertinent. The company, therefore, on the stoppage of the goods, and on obtaining possession thereof, had a right to appropriate the salt, on crediting the same, so as practically to extinguish the charge of the price of the sale to that extent. While the bankrupt law should be enforced so to give effect to its provisions as fairly and fully to effect its beneficial design and purpose, the court should not be astute to discover technical grounds on which to defeat the just and equitable rights of one creditor, in order to benefit the rest, by enlarging the fund for equal distribution, or by inequitably cutting off the one from a participation therein.

The order must be affirmed.

Case No. 4,908.

FOOT et al. v. EDWARDS.

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Sept., 1855.

JURISDICTION—DIVERSION OF A WATER COURSE—WHERE THE CAUSE OF ACTION ARISES.

Where A. diverted, in Connecticut, a stream of water which had its rise in Connecticut, and flowed into Massachusetts, so that it ceased to flow to B.'s mill, situated on the same stream in Massachusetts: Held, that the circuit court of the United States for Connecticut had jurisdiction of an action by B. against A., for the damage caused by the diversion.

[Cited in Mannville Co. v. Worcester, 138 Mass. 90.]

This was an action for damages for an injury to the mill property of the plaintiffs [Foot & Gilbert], situate in Massachusetts, by the diversion of the stream of water upon which the same stood, the act which caused the diversion having been committed in Connecticut. The defendant [Arnold Edwards] demurred to the declaration.

Thomas C. Perkins and C. W. Philleo, for plaintiffs.

William Hungerford and William D. Shipman, for defendant.

INGERSOLL, District Judge. It appears, by the plaintiffs' declaration, that they are the owners of mill property in the state of Massachusetts, situate not far from the dividing line between that state and the state of Connecticut, on a stream of water which is accustomed to flow from, and has its rise in, the latter state; that, in Connecticut, the defendant diverted the water of the stream, by which diversion it ceased to flow to the plaintiffs' mill; and that, in consequence thereof, the value of the plaintiffs' mill, so situate in Massachusetts, was greatly impaired.

The right of recovery depends upon establishing three facts. These three facts are—the right of the plaintiffs to have the water of the stream flow to their mill—the diversion of that water by the defendant—and damage to the plaintiffs' mill in consequence of such diversion. The plaintiffs' mill was in Massachusetts. Their right to have the water of the river flow to it was in that state. They have been deprived of that right by the act of the defendant. The damage which they have sustained was to their mill in Massachusetts. But the act committed by the defendant, by which the plaintiffs have been deprived of that right, and by which their mill in Massachusetts has been damaged, was committed by the defendant in Connecticut; and that act was the diversion in Connecticut, above the plaintiffs' mill, of the water of the stream on which that mill stood. For this damage, from such a cause, it is insisted by the defendant, that no remedy can be had in this court, and that no court can afford any remedy except a court in Massachusetts.

The defendant claims that, as the damage which the plaintiffs seek to recover was to their real estate situate in Massachusetts, no court can give them redress therefor, except a state court in the county, or a federal court in the state and district, where the real estate is situate. If this claim is well founded, the plaintiffs may have no redress for the injury complained of, as, when the wrong act complained of, which produced the injury, was committed, the defendant was in Connecticut, and he may never be in Massachusetts, to be served with process.

The rule is well settled, that an action on the case for diverting a water course must be tried, if the cause is brought before a state court, in the county where the cause of action arose. Watts v. Kinney, 23 Wend. 485; Id., 6 Hill, 82. If the action is brought in the federal court, it must be tried in the state and district where the cause of action arose. Usually, in actions brought to recover damages to real estate by the diversion of a stream of water, the act which causes the injury is committed in the county where the real estate damaged is situated. In such a case, it is very clear, where the action is brought before a state court, that there is only one county where the suit can be maintained; and that county is the county in which the land is situated which received the injury, and in which the act which produced it was committed. In such a case, it is very clear, also, that the cause of action arose entirely in the county where the land is situate, and that no court out of such county can take jurisdiction of the case. Where land situated in one district is injured by a tortious act committed in the same district, it is very clear that the action for the recovery of the damage to such land, if brought before a federal court, must be brought before the court of the district in which the land is situate, and in which the act which caused the damage was committed. In such a case, the cause of action arose entirely in the district where the land is situate, and no federal court of any other district can take jurisdiction of the action. Livingston v. Jefferson [Case No. 8,411]. If real estate situate in one county is injured by the diverting of a stream of water in another county, and the suit is brought before a state court, such suit is properly brought, if brought in a court in the county where such real estate is situate. Thompson v. Crocker, 9 Pick. 59; Barden v. Crocker, 10 Pick. 383. If a mill situate in one state is injured by the diversion, in another state, of the stream upon which it is situate, and a suit for such diversion should be brought before the federal court in the state where the mill is situate, such suit would be properly brought, and such court would have jurisdiction of the case. Per Woodbury, J., in Stillman v. White Rock Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 13,446]. But it is denied by the defendant that a state court in the county where the diversion took place, the land injured not being in such county, or that a federal court in the state where the diversion took place, the land injured not being in such state, can take jurisdiction of such a case.

It being well settled that, in a case of this kind, the suit must be brought where the cause of action arose, it becomes essential, in order to determine whether this suit has been brought before the proper court, to determine what is the cause of action. An action is "the lawful demand of one's right." The cause of this lawful demand, or the reason why the plaintiff can make such demand, is some wrong act committed by the defendant, and some damage sustained by the plaintiff in consequence thereof. The commission or omission of an act by the defendant, and damage to the plaintiff in consequence thereof, must unite to give him a good cause of action. No one of these facts by itself is a cause of action against the defendant. The wrongful diversion, then, of the water of the stream, in Connecticut, by the defendant, and the consequent damage which the plaintiffs' mill in Massachusetts has sustained, constitute the cause of action. A part of that which is essential to the plaintiffs' right to recover took place in Connecticut. Without the commision of the act of diversion in Connecticut, there would have been no good cause of action. With it, there is a sufficient cause of action. The act of diversion, which arose in Connecticut, and the other facts existing, give to the plaintiffs a cause of action. That which is essential, therefore, to the plaintiffs' right of recovery against any one, or their cause of action, arose where the suit has been brought.

This conclusion from the principle stated would be quite satisfactory without the authority of adjudged cases to support it. Where two material facts are necessary to give a good cause of action, and they take place in different counties, the cause of action may be said to arise in either county. Various authorities state the rule as follows: "When an action is founded upon two things in different counties, both material to the maintenance of the action, it may be brought in the one county or the other." Com. Dig. "Action," N., 11. "Where an injury has been committed in one county to real property situate in another, or wherever the action is founded upon two or more material facts, which took place in different counties, the venue may be laid in either." 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 413. In the case of Scott v. Brest, 2 Term R. 238, Ashurst, J., in speaking on this subject, says: "Supposing the foundation of the action to have arisen in two counties, I think that, where there are two facts which are necessary to constitute the offence, the plaintiff may, ex necessitate, lay the venue in either." In Bulwer's Case, 7 Coke, 1, it is thus laid down: "When matter in one county is depending upon the matter in the other county, there the plaintiff may choose in which county he will bring his action;" and: "If a man doth not repair a wall in Essex which he ought to repair, whereby my land in Middlesex is drowned, I may bring my action in Essex, for there is the default; or I may bring it in Middlesex, for there I have the damage." In this case, the default was in Connecticut.

In the case of Thompson v. Crocker, 9 Pick. 59, which was an action brought in the county of Plymouth, to recover damages to mills situate in that county, caused by the diversion of water in the county of Bristol, Judge Parker, upon exceptions taken to the jurisdiction, remarked, in giving the opinion of the court in favor of the jurisdiction: "The place where the injury was done, to wit, at the mills, gives the locality to the action, and not the source from which the mischief came." But, in the case of Barden v. Crocker, 10 Pick. 383, which was a case of the like kind, where the damage was in one county, and the diversion which caused it was in another, and where the action was brought in the county where the property was damaged, the court repudiated the limited doctrine on the subject of jurisdiction, laid down by Judge Parker in Thompson v. Crocker, and expressed the opinion that the action could be maintained in either county. This subject was discussed in the case of Stillman v. White Rock Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 13,446]. The plaintiff in that case was the owner of a mill in Connecticut, on the stream of water which is the dividing line between Connecticut and Rhode Island. The defendant, on the opposite side of the stream, in Rhode Island, dug a trench, by which the water of the stream was diverted from the plaintiff's mill. The plaintiff brought his bill of complaint, in the circuit court in Rhode Island, to restrain the defendant from thus diverting the water of the stream. The injunction was granted. Judge Woodbury decided that case upon a principle not involved in this one. But, in giving his opinion, he says: "If this view," (the view which he took), "of the rights of the parties were not shown to be entirely sound, it might be reasonable, in a case like this, to hold a wrong-doer liable, either where the direct act is done, or where the consequential injury is felt." And the cases which he puts clearly show that he so considered the law to be.

The doctrine contended for by the defendant is, that where the plaintiff has been damaged in his real estate, and in that only, the suit must be brought where the real estate is situated. A plaintiff may suffer damage to his real estate by various wrong acts committed by a defendant. In this case, the wrong act complained of is the diversion of the water of the stream. A plaintiff may suffer damage to his real estate by a slander of his title. And if, in this case, a court in Connecticut, where the wrong act was committed, has no right to give redress to the plaintiffs for the injury which their real estate in Massachusetts has sustained, in consequence of such wrong act, then, if the plaintiffs had owned a dwelling-house in Massachusetts, which they were accustomed to rent, and the defendant, in Connecticut, had published a malicious libel in regard to such dwelling-house, in consequence of which it had been greatly impaired in value, the plaintiffs would have no redress for such injury in Connecticut, where the publication of the libel was made, and would be without redress, unless they could find the defendant in Massachusetts, so that he could be served with process.

With this view of the case, this court has jurisdiction, and the plaintiffs' declaration must be adjudged to be sufficient.

FOOTE et al. v. BROWN et al.

[2 McLean, 369.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1841.

BILLS AND NOTES — NOTICE OF DEMAND TO CHARGE GUARANTOR—DILIGENCE OF TRANSFEREE TO ENFORCE COLLECTION.

1. To charge the guarantor of a note or bill, he must have notice of demand and nonpayment. And this, whether the name of the guarantor be upon the bill or not.

2. Where his name is on the bill strict notice is required, but where it is not, reasonable notice is sufficient.

3. Where a note is received, the proceeds to be collected and applied by the creditor to the discharge of his debt, he is bound to use due diligence to collect the note, and to give notice of nonpayment.

[See Allen v. King, Case No. 226.]

[At law. Action by Foote and Bowler against E. and O. Brown and others.]

Fletcher, Butler & Yandis, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Price, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought on a guaranty by the defendants, of a note given to the plaintiffs, by Daniel Brown. The declaration contained three counts: First: On a promissory note. Second: On an agreement to pay on condition. Third: A general count for money had and received, &c. To the first and third counts nonassumpsit was pleaded. To the second the defendants demurred, on the ground that it contains no allegation of notice to defendants of demand and nonpayment of the note by Daniel Brown. The defendants, also, filed two pleas of setoff in the form of "special payments," under the practice act of Indiana, of 1838. The pleas were, that certain drafts for money had been given defendants, on a house in New Orleans; that defendants left the same with H. and H.,

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

of that city, for collection, and took their receipt for them. That afterwards defendants assigned the receipt to the plaintiffs, who receipted for it, agreeing to collect and apply the money to defendants' account. That the plaintiffs had given no notice that the house, who held the drafts, had refused to deliver them to the plaintiffs, or, that the drafts had not been paid, &c. Demurrers were filed to these pleas.

On the part of the plaintiffs it is contended that, as the names of the defendants were not on the note guarantied, they were not entitled to notice. That to avoid their guaranty they must show that they have sustained damage for want of notice. That the principal had property when the note became due, so that they could have secured themselves from loss, if notice had been given. Mr. Chitty, in his Treatise on Bills (page 324), says: "In these cases of collateral guaranties, where the parties' names are not on the bill, they are not entitled to the strict and immediate notice of dishonor, as a party is who has drawn and indorsed the bill, and unless he has really sustained loss by the want of notice, he continues liable on his guaranty." Warrantington v. Furbor, 8 East, 242; 6 Esp. 89; Chit. Bills, 365: "A person who has guarantied the due payment of a bill, may, in some cases, be released from the responsibility by the neglect of the holder duly to present it for payment, if he can show that he was thereby prejudiced." And, again, page 441: "In general, if the bill or note be given as a collateral security, and the party delivering it were no party to it, either by indorsing or transferring it by delivery, when payable to bearer, but merely cause it to be drawn or indorsed, or, delivered over by a third person as a security, or, has guarantied the payment, it has been considered that he is not, within the custom of merchants, an indorser or party to it, so as to be absolutely entitled to strict regular notice, nor discharged from his liability by the neglect of the holder to give him such notice, unless he can show, by express evidence, or by inference, that he has actually sustained loss or damage by the omission." Philips v. Astling, 2 Taunt. 206; Swinyard v. Bowes, 5 Maule & S. 62; Holbrow v. Wilkins, 1 Barn. & C. 10; 2 Dowl. & R. 59; Van Wart v. Woolley, 3 Barn. & C. 439. These authorities are somewhat questioned in the case of Camidge v. Allenby, 6 Barn. & C. 373. 9 Dowl. & R. 391. In page 497, Mr. Chitty says: "It is expedient, though not in general absolutely necessary, to give notice to a person who has guarantied the payment of the bill." Whatever doubt may exist in England, under their decisions, whether notice is necessary to charge a guarantor, whose name does not appear on the note, there can be none under the decisions of the supreme court. In the case of Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 126, the doctrine is clearly laid down. That was a continuing guaranty to Reynolds & Co., as indorser, &c., for one Haring. And the court say: "The fourth instruction insists that a demand of payment should have been made of Haring, and in case of nonpayment by him, that notice of such demand and nonpayment should have been given in a reasonable time to the defendants, otherwise the defendants would be discharged from their guaranty." "And we are of opinion that this instruction ought to have been given. By the very terms of this guaranty, as well as by the general principles of the law, the guarantors are only collaterally liable on the failure of the principal debtor to pay the debt. A demand upon him, and a failure on his part, to perform his engagements, are indispensable to constitute a casus foederis." This notice need not be given with as much strictness as to charge a party whose name is on the bill, but it must be given in a reasonable time. See the case of Lewis v. Brewster [Case No. 8,318]. The principle may be laid down as generally applicable to commercial paper, that where the undertaking is collateral to pay the debt of another, on his default, a notice of demand and nonpayment is necessary. And this whether the name of the party be on the dishonored note or not. The only difference in principle seems to be that where the individual is a party to the note strict notice is required, but where he is not a party reasonable notice is sufficient. This view is decisive of this case, as there is in the declaration no averment of a demand of payment and notice to the defendants; but a remark or two may be made on the pleas which are demurred to.

These pleas are filed under a special statute of Indiana. Where negotiable paper is given as conditional payment, the proceeds to be collected by the holder, and applied in payment of the debt, it is incumbent on the holder to use due diligence in collecting the money, by making a demand when it becomes due, and in giving notice of nonpayment to those whose names are on the paper. If, in this respect, the holder is guilty of laches, so as to release the parties on the bill, he makes the paper his own, and must sustain the loss. In Camidge v. Allenby, 6 Barn. & C. 373, above cited, where, in payment for goods sold, certain notes on a country bank were delivered, which bank, unknown to the parties, had stopped payment at an earlier hour on the same day, and no notice for one week was given to the person who paid the notes, it was held that there were laches which released him from responsibility. Mr. Justice Bailey remarked: "The rule as to all negotiable instruments is, that if they are taken in payment of a pre-existing debt, they operate as a discharge of that debt, unless the party who holds the instrument does all that the law requires to be done, in order to obtain payment of them." An agent to save himself from responsibility must observe the usual course of transacting the business in which he is engaged. If he procure an insurance, and neglect to have inserted in the policy the common and usual clauses in the like policies, and a loss should occur, which would have been covered by such clauses, the agent would be responsible for the loss. Mallough v. Barber, 4 Camp. 150; 6 Taunt. 495. If the agent deposit the money of the principal in his own name, and on his own account, and the bank fail, the agent would be responsible. Massey v. Banner, 1 Jac. & W. 245, 248. And so if an agent sell the goods of his principal on credit contrary to usage, or fail to demand the money when the credit had expired; or, if he should sell to persons of doubtful credit, or actually insolvent, he is responsible. Story, Ag. 189. And if he give time for payment after the money became due, or should omit to use the common diligence to collect it, the loss would be his own. Caffrey v. Darby, 6 Ves. 494, 495.

In the case under consideration, if the plaintiffs, having possession of the drafts, neglected to make the proper demand when they became due, or to give notice, so as to hold liable the parties to the drafts, in case of nonpayment, through which the recourse of the defendants was cut off, the loss must fall on the plaintiffs. Under the circumstances the plaintiffs were bound to do what the law required, to collect the money on the drafts, and, in case of failure, to notify all persons concerned. But, as the case turns upon the demurrer to the second count, the question arising on the pleas need not be decided. Demurrer to the second count is sustained. The plaintiffs abandoned their claim under the other counts.

FOOTE v. FROST et al.

[3 Ban. & A. 607; [1] 14 O. G. 860.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. 9, 1878.

OFFICE AND OFFICERS — PATENT TO EX-COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS FOR INVENTION MADE WHILE IN OFFICE — ANTICIPATION — VALIDITY.

1. The law does not disqualify a commissioner of patents from obtaining a patent after his term of office has expired, for an invention made by him while holding such office, and in such case the invention will date back to the time when it was actually made, although he could not then have obtained a patent for it.

2. Where the complainant's patent was for a wire bag fastener, and a prior patent was for a device of a similar structural plan, but made of a slotted metal plate instead of wire, and was intended as a fastener for the lacings of shoes and corsets, and there was no evidence that the prior invention would answer the purpose for which it was intended: Held, that under the circumstances, it would not be an anticipation of the complainant's invention.

[Cited in Foote v. Stein, 35 Fed. 205.]

3. Letters patent No. 135,899, granted to Elisha Foote, February 18th, 1873, for a bag tie, held valid.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[This was a bill in equity by Elisha Foote against George Frost and others for the alleged infringement of complainant's patent.]

Elisha Foote, pro se.

James E. Maynadier, for defendants.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

LOWELL, District Judge. The complainant holds a patent, No. 135,899, for an "improvement in grain-bands, bag-ties," etc. The claim is for a holder substantially as described in the specification, which is a piece of annealed iron wire, bent into the shape shown in the drawings; the upper part is oblong, and makes a loop to which the band or cord is permanently attached; the free end of the cord is then passed round the grain-bag or other thing to be held, and brought between the straight or converging sides of the lower end of the holder, where it is held by the strain, which tends to tighten the wire, but can be at once released by a pull on the free end of the cord.

The patent is dated in 1873, but the evidence is clear and uncontradicted that the invention was made in 1867, or early in 1868. At the time the complainant was commissioner of patents, and the respondent argues that he was prohibited by law from taking out a patent, after his commission had expired, for an invention that he made while he was in office. The words of the statute and its intent alike prove that the prohibition upon the commissioner was not intended to fetter his inventive faculties, or deprive him of the fruits of his skill or ingenuity, but merely to prevent bias and interest in his public capacity; when that ceases, the interdict is removed. The law in 1867 was, that the commissioner should be disqualified and interdicted from acquiring or taking, except by inheritance, during the period for which he should hold his appointment, any right or interest, directly or indirectly, in any patent "which has been," that is, before the date of the statute, "or may hereafter be granted." St. July 4, 1836; 5 Stat. 118. This provision is now found in Rev. St. § 480, somewhat simplified, but with the same meaning, that the commissioner shall not voluntarily acquire any interest in any patent during his term; but, he no more loses his right to take out a patent after he becomes a private citizen, than he forfeits one which he already held before his appointment; and there is no more objection to giving his invention its true date, in his case, than in any other.

The only question of fact which has been made is, whether either of the four patents exhibited by the defendants anticipates the plaintiff's invention. Two of them are dated in 1870, after the time at which, as is now admitted, the plaintiff had completed his discovery. The third, that of Cook, is for a device entirely different in its mode of operation from that of the complainant, and is not much relied on by the defendants. The fourth is that of Butterfield, No. 57,247, granted in August, 1866, for an improved fastening for shoe-lacings, which the inventor says will hold the lacings of a shoe, corset, or other article, so as to prevent the lacing from working loose in the eyelets. It describes a thin plate of metal, to be inserted in the upper part of the shoe where the lacing ends; it is to be of elliptical or other suitable form, with a slot with converging sides, and an eye through which the lacing may enter, and the patentee says, that, as the lacing is drawn toward the point or angle of the slot, it becomes pinched by the opposite converging sides, so as effectually to hold the lacing. He says in another passage, that the friction of the sides of the slot will suffice to hold the lacing firmly, and prevent it from getting loose. Here is, undoubtedly, a device very closely resembling the plaintiff's holder. The doubt insisted on by the plaintiff in his argument seems to us to have much force. It is that, though the patentee is described as living in Boston, no evidence is produced that his mode of fastening proved to be practicable, as applied to the lacing of a shoe, and that the absence of such evidence, in a place where the trade in shoes is so largely carried on, is noticeable. Upon inspection of Butterfield's specification and drawings, and of a specimen shoe introduced in argument, we are led to doubt whether this mode of fastening would answer the purpose. The strain is quite differently applied in a shoe from what it is in a grain bag, and it is not clear to us that the friction of the sides of the slot would hold the lacing firmly. It may be that the difficulty, if it be a real one, arises from the plate being made of sheet metal instead of wire. If the result is attained by the plate, a mere change of material would be unimportant; but, when the question is: Who first completed a working device?—a change of material by which the result is for the first time obtained is very important.

The point is a narrow one, but on the whole we think it well taken, and that the defendant has failed to prove that Butterfield's invention did, in fact, anticipate the holder of the plaintiff in the sense of the patent law.

Interlocutory decree for the complainant.

Case No. 4,911.

FOOTE v. HANCOCK.

[15 Blatchf. 343.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Nov. 12, 1878.

RAILROAD AID BONDS — AUTHORITY OF COMMISSIONERS TO ISSUE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—DELIVERY TO CONTRACTOR FOR WORK DONE — RECITALS—ACTION ON COUPONS BY PURCHASERS.

1. In this case it was held, that the commissioners who issued the bonds of a town, in aid of the building of a railroad, were the officers to determine whether the conditions precedent to the exercise of their authority had been fulfilled; that they did so decide by issuing the bonds; and that the recital in the bonds, that they were issued by virtue of the several acts mentioned, was a declaration of their decision, which entitled a bona fide purchaser of the bonds to recover, without proving that the precedent conditions had been, in fact, fulfilled.

2. A person who has succeeded to the title of a bona fide purchaser of the bonds, is entitled to stand on such title, though not a bona fide holder of them himself.

[Cited in McCall v. Hancock, 10 Fed. 8.]

3. The delivery of the bonds by the commissioners to a contractor for building the railroad, in payment for work thereon, made such contractor a purchaser of the bonds for value, though he took them for an antecedent debt, if he took them bona fide.

4. Such delivery of the bonds to the contractor, in payment for work on the road, and the crediting of the bonds on the subscription of the town to the stock of the railroad company, was proper.

5. It is not the duty of a purchaser of the bonds to look behind the recitals in the bonds, where the bonds, on their face, do not put him on inquiry, by the nature of their recitals.

6. A person can recover on coupons on the bonds, although his sole purpose, in buying them, was to bring suit on them in this court.

7. In such suit, the defendant was not allowed to show that the application on which the county judge appointed the commissioners was not made by twelve freeholders and residents of the town, as required by statute, because the order of the county judge recited that the application was so made.

[This was an action at law by J. Crocker Foote against the town of Hancock to recover the value of certain coupons attached to bonds issued by the defendant.]

E. B. Thomas and Isaac S. Newton, for plaintiff.

A. Taylor and William Gleason, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. Upon the authority of Town of Venice v. Murdock, 92 U. S. 494, it must be held, that the commissioners who issued the bonds in question were the officers to determine whether the conditions precedent to the exercise of their authority had been fulfilled; that they did so decide by issuing the bonds; and that the recital in the bonds, that they were issued by virtue of the several acts mentioned, was a declaration of their decision, which entitles a bona fide purchaser of the bonds to recover, without proving that the precedent conditions had been, in fact, fulfilled. It follows, that the plaintiff in this action should recover, if he has succeeded to the title of a bona fide purchaser, because, even if the plaintiff were not a bona fide holder of the coupons, he is entitled to stand upon the title of any predecessor who was such a holder. Cromwell v. Sac Co., 96 U. S., 51.

The whole issue of bonds, $100 000 in all, was delivered to Delos E. Culver, by the commissioners. Culver was one of the contractors with the railroad company, for building the road, and the bonds were delivered to him upon the direction of the railroad company, towards payment for work in building the road. Culver was, therefore, a purchaser for value (Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1), even though he received the bonds in payment of an antecedent debt. He was, also, a purchaser bona fide. It is not shown that he had ever been informed of any infirmity in the origin of the bonds. It is not shown, even, that he was aware that any question had been raised by any one respecting the validity of the bonds. It does appear, that a body of the inhabitants of the town were opposed to the issuing of the bonds, and it may be inferred that they questioned the right of the commissioners to issue them; while it also appears that another body of the inhabitants entertained the contrary view. It may well be conjectured that Culver was aware of this state of local opinion. It is not shown that any definite omission of duty on the part of the commissioners, or any definite non-compliance with the conditions prerequisite to issuing the bonds, was pointed out by any person. This is the whole case, so far as it bears on the question of the bona fides of Culver when he took the bonds. The commissioners were men of respectability and intelligence, and believed themselves justified in issuing the bonds. Upon such a state of facts, it would be unwarrantable to say that Culver was a purchaser mala fide. Such a conclusion cannot be reached upon conjecture. Suspicion, or the knowledge of circumstances which would excite suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or gross negligence on his part, will not suffice to impugn his position as a bona fide purchaser. Actual bad faith must be shown. Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 110, 121; Cromwell v. Sac Co., 96 U. S. 51.

It is urged, that the bonds were delivered to the railroad company in payment for the stock subscribed for by the commissioners; that this was unauthorized by the statute under which the commissioners derived their authority; and that Culver must have known of this, and, for that reason, was not a bona fide purchaser of the bonds. The answer to this argument is, that the commissioners did just what the statute required. They were authorized to dispose of the bonds on such terms as they might deem most advantageous to the town, and invest the money in the stock of the railroad company, and they were required to see that the money derived from the bonds was applied and used in the construction of the road. While they did not sell the bonds and pay over the money to the railroad company, and see that the company applied it to the payment of the contractors, they did what was equivalent—they delivered bonds at par, as money, directly to the contractors, in payment for work; they saw to the proper application of the bonds, and, by an arrangement with the railroad company, were credited with the amount of the bonds upon the subscription for stock. This was entirely in conformity with the act of April 5, 1866 (Laws N. Y. 1866, p. 874, c. 398), but, if any question could be seriously debated, as to the proper exercise of the authority of the commissioners under that act, it is set at rest by section 7 of the act of May 15, 1867 (Laws N. Y. 1867, p. 2290, c. 917).

If it were necessary for a purchaser to look behind the recitals in the bonds, to ascertain whether or not the commissioners were acting in conformity with the conditions precedent to the exercise of their authority in issuing the bonds, serious questions would be presented in this case. It is, however, no longer open to discussion, in this court; that such is not the duty of a purchaser, where the bonds, upon their face, do not put him upon inquiry, by the nature of their recitals. Miller v. Town of Berlin [Case No. 9,562].

As to the other matters of defence sought to be maintained, it is sufficient to say, that the plaintiff is the owner of the coupons, and is, therefore, entitled to maintain this suit, although his sole purpose, in buying them, was to bring an action and collect them in this court. McDonald v. Smalley, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 620; Osborne v. Brooklyn City R. Co. [Case No. 10,597]; Barney v. Baltimore City, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 280, 288.

Upon the trial, evidence was offered by the defendant to show that the application upon which the county judge appointed the commissioners, was not made by twelve freeholders and residents of the town, as the statute requires, because some of the petitioners were not residents or freeholders. This evidence was excluded, for the reason that the recital in the order of the county judge, that the appointment was made upon the petition of twelve freeholders and residents of the town, cannot be contradicted in a collateral proceeding. Whether or not the petitioners were freeholders and residents were matters in pais, to be ascertained by the county judge, and his order was an adjudication, which can only be assailed in a direct proceeding for its review. Betts v. Bagley, 12 Pick. 572; Porter v. Purdy, 29 N. Y. 106.

The plaintiff is entitled to recover, and judgment is ordered in his favor, accordingly.

MUNICIPAL BONDS—MISSOURI TOWNSHIP RAILROAD AID ACT— CONFLICTING DECISIONS OF STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS.

1. The supreme court of the United States having held the "Township Railroad Aid Act" of Missouri constitutional (Cass Co. v. Johnson

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[95 U. S. 373]), it is the duty of the circuit court to follow that judgment, notwithstanding the later decision of the supreme court of Missouri in State v. Brassfield [81 Mo. 151].

2. Where negotiable commercial securities are issued and negotiated before there is any decision by the courts of the state against the validity of the act authorizing their issue, the supreme court of the United States does not consider itself bound to follow a subsequent decision of the local courts invalidating such securities, but will decide for itself whether, under the constitution and laws of the state, such securities are valid or void.

[Followed in Westermann v. Cape Girardeau Co., Case No. 17,432.]

This is an action [by Elisha Foote] against the county of Johnson upon bonds of the county, dated February 1st, 1871, issued in the name of the county, in behalf of Warrensburg township, under the "Township Aid Act" of March 23, 1868 (Laws 1868, p. 92; Wag. St. p. 313). The defendant demurs to the petition on the ground that the said act is unconstitutional, null, and void.

Thomas C. Reynolds, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This is an action against the county on what are known as "township bonds," issued under the "Township Aid Act" of March 23, 1868. A demurrer to the petition presents the question whether that act is in conflict with section 14, art. 11, of the state constitution of 1865.

The ground of alleged conflict is that the act authorizes the issue of bonds in aid of a railroad when the proposition is sanctioned by "two-thirds of the qualified voters of the township voting at the election," whereas the constitution requires such a proposition to be assented to by "two-thirds of the qualified voters of the township."

In Harshman v. Bates Co., 92 U. S. 569, Same Case below [Case No. 6,148], the supreme court of the United States held that the act was in conflict with the constitution, on the ground above mentioned. But, subsequently, after a thorough argument and the most deliberate consideration, the supreme court of the United States, in Cass Co. v. Johnson [95 U. S. 373], overruled its judgment in Harshman v. Bates Co., on the point in question, and, upon a full examination of all the decisions of the supreme court of Missouri touching the township aid act, declared, in respect of bonds already issued, that those decisions settled the question of the constitutionality of that act in favor of its validity. Particular stress was laid upon the Linn Co. Case (A. D. 1869) 44 Mo. 504, in which the supreme court of Missouri, by mandamus, compelled a reluctant and opposing county court to issue bonds upon a subscription made pursuant to a vote under the very statute here in question. Mr. Chief Justice Waite, after referring to the Missouri decisions, says: "It is true that the objection now made to the law was in no case presented or considered (by the supreme court of Missouri), but this is sufficiently explained by the fact that in other cases a construction had been given to language similar to that employed in the constitutional prohibition adverse to such a position;" and the chief justice refers to State v. Winkelmeier (1864) 35 Mo. 103; State v. City of St. Joseph (1866) 37 Mo. 270; State v. Binder (1866) 38 Mo. 450; and State v. Sutterfield, 54 Mo. 391.

This line of decisions in Missouri, in our judgment, fully justifies the chief justice in stating that they sufficiently explain why the specific objection now urged to the act of 1868 was not presented in any court until it was presented to the supreme court of the United States in the Harshman Case, at the October term, 1875. The report shows that it was not made in the circuit court. Harshman v. Bates Co. [Case No. 6,148].

Suits in great numbers on these township bonds have been brought in the circuit court of the United States for this district, and they have been defended by the ablest lawyers in the state, upon every ground that they conceived open to them. Jordan v. Cass Co. [Id. 7,517]. But this difference between the phraseology of the constitution and the act, so patent that it could not escape attention, was never presented or urged in any case, so far as either of us recollect, as invalidating the act. The only explanation for this silence on the point in the state and federal courts is to be found in the Missouri decisions referred to by the chief justice.

But it is urged that whatever doubt there might heretofore have been touching the validity of the township bond act, the question of its unconstitutionality is now settled adversely to the act by the case of State v. Brassfield [81 Mo. 151], decided by the supreme court of Missouri on the 16th day of the present month (April, 1878).

We have been furnished with the opinions of the judges in the case referred to, and have read them with attention. Only three judges took part in the decision. Two of them (Henry and Sherwood, JJ.) hold the act unconstitutional, and one (Hough, J.) was of the opinion that the objectionable words, "voting at such election," could be eliminated from the act, and thus relieve it of the constitutional objection. Napton, J., though not sitting in the case, filed a brief opinion, stating his concurrence in the opinion of Chief Justice Waite in the case of Cass Co. v. Johnson [supra]. Norton, J., having been of counsel, did not sit.

There is, therefore, no judgment of the majority of the judges of that learned court that the act of 1868 is unconstitutional. It is the duty of this court, then, to follow the judgment of the supreme court of the United States. But even if the supreme court of Missouri had, in its recent judgment, for the first time pronounced the act of 1868 unconstitutional, it is our judgment that in this class of cases the supreme court of the United States, as to bonds antecedently issued, would not, under the circumstances, feel itself bound to change its decision to conform to the decision of the supreme court of the state.

The supreme court of the United States considers questions arising upon negotiable municipal bonds issued under state authority to relate to commercial securities, and not to present questions of mere local law; and where such securities have been issued before any decision of the state tribunals denying the validity of the act authorizing the issue, the supreme court has declared that in protecting the constitutional rights of creditors it will decide for itself whether, under the constitution and laws of the state, such securities are valid or void. Pine Grove v. Talcott, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 666; Olcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 678. The cases last cited related to bonds which had been issued under acts which had been declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of Michigan in the one case, and by the supreme court of Wisconsin in the other, after the bonds in question had been issued. The duty of the supreme court of the United States to follow the judgment of the supreme court of the state was strongly urged by counsel. But the supreme court was of a different opinion, and in the case first cited Mr. Justice Swayne expresses the views of the court on the subject in language so emphatic and decisive as not to be mistaken. He says: "The question before us belongs to the domain of general jurisprudence. In this class of cases this court is not bound by the judgment of the courts of the states where the cases arise. It must hear and determine for itself. Here commercial securities are involved. When the bonds were issued there had been no authoritative intimation from any quarter that such statutes were invalid. The legislature affirmed their validity in every act by an implication equivalent in effect to an express declaration; and during the period covered by their enactment neither of the other departments of the government of the state lifted its voice against them. The acquiescence was universal. The general understanding of the legal profession throughout the country is believed to have been that they were valid. The national constitution forbids the states to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts. In cases properly brought before us, that end can be accomplished unwarrantably no more by judicial decisions than by legislation. Were we to yield in cases like this to the authority of the decisions of the courts of the respective states, we should abdicate the performance of one of the most important duties with which this tribunal is charged, and disappoint the wise and salutary policy of the framers of the constitution in providing for the creation of an independent federal judiciary. The exercise of our appellate jurisdiction would be but a solemn mockery." See, also, Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 175, 205, 206; Butz v. Muscatine, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 575.

This court must, therefore, hold the act of March 23, 1868, to be constitutional, in conformity to the opinion of the supreme court of the United States. The demurrer to the petition is accordingly overruled.

Judgment accordingly.

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1853.

EQUITY—STOCKHOLDER'S BILL TO ENJOIN COLLECTION OF BANK TAX—CITIZENSHIP OF PARTIES—ACTION AT LAW—INJUNCTION — DEMURRER TO BILL.

1. An injunction was granted against the collection of a tax from the trust company, alleged to be unconstitutional.

2. This was done, on the application of a stockholder, a citizen of Connecticut, who filed a bill against the auditor of state, and the trust company.

3. In such a case, the parties being before the court, it can give the same relief, as if the trustees of the company were complainants.

4. The court will give relief to parties on the record, as their respective rights may require.

5. A suit at law is not necessary to authorize the injunction, where the mischief complained of, would be irremediable at law.

6. The allegations of the bill were admitted by the demurrer.

[This was a bill in equity by Samuel E. Foote against Morgan Linck and the trustees of the Life Insurance & Trust Company.]

Worthington & Stanbery, for plaintiff.

Atty. Gen. Pugh, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. During the late term a bill was filed by the complainant, a citizen of Connecticut, against the defendants, in which was set out the charter of the trust company, showing that there was a provision in it declaring, that the capital stock should be taxed no higher than the stock of other banks of the state. Also, that a proposition being made by the legislature to the banks of the state, if they should cease to circulate notes of a less denomination than five dollars, they should not be taxed more than at the rate of 5 per cent. on their dividends. That the trust company bank accepted the proposition, called in its small notes, and filed the evidence of the fact in the auditor's office, as required by the act; and that for many years the tax was on the dividends as proposed; that by a late law the tax was imposed more than ten times greater than the tax before assessed on the capital of the company; that under the law for the collection of such tax on banks, the auditor was required to appoint a commissioner for the collection of such tax, to whom he issued his warrant as the law authorizes, requiring him to make a demand of the tax, which, if not paid in five days, the commissioner is authorized to enter the bank by force, open its vault, and take therefrom the amount of the tax and penalties, in gold and silver, &c. The tax demanded by the commissioner under the above act for the years 1851 and 1852, with the penalties thereon, amounting to the sum of ninety-six thousand dollars, to which was to be added five per cent. for poundage to the commissioner, and an additional penalty of five per cent.

The complainant alleges that he holds fifty shares of stock in said company, which is now at par or above it; that the said law impairs the obligations of the contracts before stated, and is consequently void under the constitution of the United States; that he has applied to the trustees of the bank, who have taken no step to arrest the collection of the tax above stated; and represents that if the money shall be collected and paid over to the state treasury, the injury to himself and the bank will be irremediable, and he prays an injunction against the commissioner, the auditor of state, and the trustees of the company. Notice having been given to the commissioner, that an application would be made to the circuit court at its late term, at Columbus, for an injunction, which application being made, in pursuance of the notice, there being no opposition, the circuit court, on the face of the bill, ordered the injunction to issue, but, at the same time, the court said, a motion would be heard to dissolve the injunction during the term. A motion to dissolve being made, it was agreed that it should be argued before the circuit judge at Cincinnati, at chambers. On the 18th day of November, at Cincinnati, the above motion came up for argument. And it was argued by the attorney general for the state, Mr. Pugh, in favor of the motion, and by Messrs. Worthington and Stanbery for the complainants.

The attorney general distinguished this case from that of Osborne v. Bank of U. S. [9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 738]. The tax in that case was one hundred thousand dollars, when the whole amount of the capital in both the branches of the United States Bank, in this state, amounted only to the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The tax, therefore, it was said by the supreme court, would be destructive of the branch of the bank in Ohio. And this was one of the grounds on which the opinion of the supreme court was founded. It was also an interference with one of the fiscal agents of the government, and was not within the taxing power of the state. It was also objected that all the directors were not made parties. The attorney general mainly contended, that the complainant, as a stockholder, could not sue the directors; that the bill was filed for himself, and not in behalf of others; that it might be the wish of the trustees to pay the tax; that the bill asked the court to take the power from the trustees, as given to them by the charter, which would, in effect, wind up the concerns of the bank, and a number of authorities were cited as sustaining the positions taken. The attorney general also contended that the tax was not ruinous to the bank, and that if the money were collected, provision was made for the re-payment of it, should the law under which it was assessed, be decided by the supreme court of the United States, to be unconstitutional.

The above is a very general statement of the argument of Mr. Pugh—nothing more than an outline of it is attempted to be given. Mr. Worthington opposed the positions of Mr. Pugh, observing that he appeared as well for the trustees as for the complainant. Mr. Stanbery also considered the argument of the attorney general, and submitted his views as to the merits of the case.

It cannot be considered as any disparagement to the state court, that a citizen of another state sues in the federal court. The constitution and the act of congress, give him this right. In the exercise of it, he does no more than every suitor in the state court, who brings his action in one of the courts of the state, which may be a matter of choice or accident. No reason is ever assigned by a citizen of another state, that he cannot obtain justice in the state courts. Such a suggestion would not be tolerated, and the bill would be dismissed for impertinence, if the objectionable part were not stricken out.

The complainant being a citizen of Connecticut, has a right to sue in this court, if he has made a case for the exercise of jurisdiction by the circuit court. He has stated an interest in the trust company, which the law will protect, against the threatened injury complained of, if that injury be irremediable, and the mode of relief be within the powers of a court of chancery. It does not follow that the right asserted, is hostile to the powers of the trustees, because they are made defendants. From the facts stated in the bill, it appears the right of the claimant and the relief asked, in no respect interfere with the powers of the trustees. It is true, the complainant asks that the trustees may be enjoined from paying over the tax to the state; but there is enough on the face of the bill to show, that the suit of the complainant was brought to protect the rights of the trust company, and consequently the rights of the trustees. That this may be done, is a familiar principle of chancery.

The court will decree as between the parties on the record, whether they be complainants or defendants. The court having jurisdiction under the bill filed by the complainant, can protect the rights of the trustees, though defendants, the same as if they were complainants. And chancery often, in such a case, decrees between conflicting rights of defendants. This doctrine is laid down in both the volumes of Story's Equity. It has been often acted upon by the supreme court. In the case of Piatt v. Oliver [Case No. 11,115], and a great many other defendants who were citizens of Ohio, and therefore could not be made complainants in the case, but their interest was the same as that asserted by the complainant, the court gave relief to the defendants, the same as the plaintiff, according to their respective rights. This case was appealed to the supreme court, and the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. Id. [3 How. (44 U. S.) 333]. The case of Chiles v. Boon, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 177, is to the same effect. The trustees being citizens of Ohio, could not be made complainants, but being made defendants, they are before the court, and the court having jurisdiction from the citizenship of the complainant, can act upon the right, and for the protection of the parties, the same as if the trustees were complainants.

The injunction was allowed upon the face of the bill; the demurrer now filed, admits the statements of the bill, as far as they are correctly pleaded. If no contract has been impaired, the demurrer filed raises the question for the decision of the court. That question has not been argued, and I am glad that it has not. The principal reliance seems to be a want of jurisdiction in the court, in the form in which the suit has been brought. The supreme court of the state has decided that the tax has been imposed under a constitutional law, and that the mode of collecting it is legal. But this decision, I understand, has been taken to the supreme court of the United States, by a writ of error. A case thus situated, cannot be considered as one of authority, as it is still pending in the supreme court, and may be reversed. If the supreme court shall affirm the judgment of the state court, it being the same question as involved in this case, the circuit court will, as a matter of course, dissolve this injunction without argument. I can entertain no doubt of the jurisdiction on the points made. It is fit that the supreme court should act upon this great question; and, as it is before the court, and will be acted on in the course of two or three months, I deem it, therefore, inexpedient to dissolve the present injunction. It has been argued that until the right be established at law, an injunction should not be granted. The lord chancellor,—if my memory serves me,—Eldon, once decided, so I think, in an application for an injunction on a patent right. But his lordship was mistaken, as is shown by the action of a court of chancery, before and since his decision. In this country, an injunction has been usually granted against a threatened wrong, for which, if done, the law can give no adequate redress. In answer to this, it is said, a remedy by mandamus is provided for by law, where a tax is illegally assessed and collected. But it might become a question, whether the circuit court, under the state law, could issue the mandamus provided for; and if it could, it would be in the power of the legislature to repeal the law giving the remedy. The money collected being paid over into the state treasury, could not be recovered by suit, as the state cannot be sued. The remedy against the auditor and the commissioner might be attended with insurmountable difficulties. The poundage at five per cent., amounting to five thousand dollars, which the commissioner will receive as his compensation for the service, could not be recovered from the state.

The attorney general moved that the money be brought into court, which the judge refused, as, in his judgment, there could be no safer depository than that of the vaults of the trust company. Complaint being made of the insufficiency of the security given by the complainant, the judge observed that he supposed there could be no objection to any amount of security which, in reason, might be required; he, therefore, ordered that a bond in two hundred thousand dollars be given, conditioned to pay the whole amount of tax claimed by the state, if this bill shall be dismissed, and the injunction be dissolved. If, however, the injunction shall be dissolved, the auditor and commissioner may proceed in the summary mode authorized by the statute, to enter the bank and seize the money, if it shall not be paid within the five days after demanded. The bond has been given, as required, and has been transmitted to the clerk of the circuit court.

FOOTE v. MT. PLEASANT.

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. Oct., 1878.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION — CORPORATE BONDS — FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE UPON A RAILROAD — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER — DECISIONS OF HIGHEST STATE COURT AS TO VALIDITY OF MUNICIPAL BONDS.

1. Where a city has power to subscribe to the stock of a railroad company and to issue bonds in payment of the subscription, the proceeds of such bonds in all cases to be expended within the limits of the county in which such city is situate, held, that as between the city and the railroad company, or its assignee with notice, such bonds cannot be enforced where no part of the proceeds of the subscription has been expended in the county, and no part of the railroad subscribed to has been constructed therein.

2. The owner of certain first mortgage bonds upon the K., Mt. P. & M. Railroad, including all its "property, real and personal, and all rights and interests therein now owned or hereafter to be acquired," proceeded to foreclose the mortgage, and obtained decree under which he purchased the property. The mortgage provided that the bonds secured by it should in no case be issued or disposed of except at the rate of $8,500 for every mile of road as completed. Held, that as to the bonds issued by the city of Mt. Pleasant, under the circumstances named above, the purchaser at sale under the decree did not become a bona fide holder, with right to sue and recover.

3. The supreme court of the United States has held that bonds issued while a decision of the supreme court of Iowa holding in favor of the power of the corporation to issue the same, remained in force, will be upheld as valid, notwithstanding a later decision the other way; but as to bonds issued after the promulgation of the later decision, the supreme court of the United States will accept and follow the decision of the supreme court of this state.

At Law.

H. Scott Howell and J. G. Anderson, for plaintiff.

Woolson & Babb, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This is an action by Chas. B. Foote against the city of Mt. Pleasant, involving the validity of $50,000 of bonds issued by the defendant city to what was known as the Keokuk, Mt. Pleasant and Muscatine Railroad Company, and the right of the plaintiff to recover on these bonds. The defenses to the suit are fourfold: First. Denying that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of the coupons sued upon, or any part of the same, or that he has any interest therein. Second. That the bonds were issued without authority of law and are illegal and void. Third. That the bonds were issued upon the express condition that the proceeds should be used solely for work on the railroad to be done in Henry county, Iowa, and that the plaintiff had full knowledge of that fact; and that they were never so issued as to entitle the plaintiff to the rights of an innocent holder of the bonds or coupons for value; and if he ever held the same, he has parted with all interest therein. Fourth. That the said bonds and coupons have been fully settled and satisfied by the defendant city, and have been paid and cancelled.

The case is submitted on an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears briefly as follows: In 1857, under a provision in the charter of the city of Mt. Pleasant, the question was submitted to the legal voters, whether they would authorize a subscription by the city of Mt. Pleasant of $50,000 to the capital stock of the Keokuk, Mt. Pleasant and Muscatine Railroad Company. This submission was pursuant to section 28 of the charter, which is as follows: "The said city shall have power to subscribe to the capital stock in any railroad company, and may pay the same with the bonds of the city, and shall be empowered and required to levy and collect all the necessary taxes to pay the principle and interest on such bonds; provided such subscription shall be authorized by a majority of the legal voters of said city cast at an election ordered for that purpose." At the time when this vote was taken, in August, 1857, the general law of the state had authorized counties, cities and incorporated towns to aid railroad companies by subscription to their stock, and to issue bonds. This act contained a provision as follows: "And the proceeds of such bonds shall in all cases be expended within the limits of the county in which the said city may be situated." In the proposition submitted to the voters was this provision: "Such bonds shall be issued only on the guaranty that the money shall be expended in the county of Henry, in the construction of said road." So that the general law of the state, and the specific submission to the voters, alike provided that the proceeds of the bonds were to be expended in the construction of the road in Henry county. That vote was taken in August, 1857, and it resulted in favor of the proposition. in November, 1857, the city council authorized the issue of the bonds of the city, pursuant to that vote, for the sum of $50,000, to aid this railroad company, on receiving the guaranty of the railroad company that they would expend the money (the proceeds of these bonds) in Henry county. The city accepted the unsecured obligation of the railroad company that they would do so. The city bonds were accordingly issued and delivered to the railroad company. In September, 1860, the railroad company resolved on the execution of a deed of trust or mortgage of the railway (a mortgage, in short, we may call it), on their entire line of road and property, present and future, to secure a large amount of bonds of two classes, one called the "First Mortgage Sinking Fund Bonds," and the other the "First Mortgage Bonds." The mortgage contained this provision, which it is important to notice, viz.: That in no case shall the bonds of the first class (that is, the first mortgage sinking fund bonds) be issued and disposed of except at the rate of $8,500 for every mile of road as completed, nor the bonds of the second class, except at the rate of $7,000 per mile of road as completed.

Now, the plaintiff's claim to the ownership of city bonds rests on two fundamental propositions. One is, that they were embraced in this mortgage. The other is, that being so embraced in the mortgage, they passed to him by virtue of the subsequent decree of foreclosure of the mortgage, and that he thereby has obtained title to them. This mortgage was made in 1860, and the language in respect to what it covers is in this wise: "Locomotives, tenders, rolling-stock, fuel, machinery," etc., and it proceeds thus: "and all other property, real and personal, and all rights and interests therein now owned or hereafter to be acquired by the said parties," etc.; and it concluded with this reservation, among others: "and reserving also to the said railroad company full power to sell, convert and dispose of any city, county or other bonds or securities received in the payment of stock, or donated to the construction of the said railroad, and to collect subscription of stock: provided no default shall occur in the payment of interest on said bonds and to the sinking fund herein provided and required," etc. That mortgage was recorded, as it appears, only in the county of Lee, in the records of land mortgages. Afterwards the company went on and built eighteen miles of road in Lee county, and had completed only that amount of road at the time the war of the Rebellion broke out, at which time the company ceased its operations and became insolvent. The county of Henry had voted $100,000 of their bonds, concerning which the stipulation reads as follows: "Said company (the railroad company) has also received a subscription from Henry county of $100,000 in bonds, and it had agreed with Henry county to expend that amount in Henry county, which said bonds had been sold by the company." It is agreed that no road was ever built in Henry county; that only eighteen miles was completed in Lee county; and that the railroad company had done work in Henry county only to the amount of $34,000. In other words, very much less than the amount of work which they were required to do, in respect to the $100,000 of bonds which they had received from the county of Henry; so that we may say that no part of the $50,000 here in controversy was ever expended in Henry county, as required by the law of the state and by the specific vote that was taken. This $50,000 of bonds were delivered to the railroad company prior to the execution of the mortgage, and after the mortgage they were left in the possession of the railroad company, which afterwards delivered these bonds to Mr. J. Edgar Thompson, one of the trustees in the mortgage; but it is stipulated that Thompson received these bonds not in his capacity as trustee, but as a bailee of the railroad company; so that, in short, these bonds remained always with the railroad company, as well after the mortgage as before.

I have stated that the railroad ceased to do work and became insolvent in 1861, and this was the condition of affairs: The city had these bonds for $50,000 outstanding and in the hands of the railroad company; the company was insolvent, and all work had been suspended; there was no road completed in Henry county, and no prospect of any being completed. In 1862 the supreme court of the state of Iowa decided, in the case of State v. Wapello Co., 13 Iowa, 388, which was followed in the next year by the cases of Myers v. County of Johnston, 14 Iowa, 49; McMillan v. Boyles, Id. 107; Ten Eyck v. Mayor of Keokuk, 15 Iowa, 486; and Smith v. Henry Co., Id. 385,—that under the constitution of the state it was beyond legislative competency to authorize municipalities to aid railroad companies by subscription to their stock and the issuing of bonds, and that was accepted in the state of Iowa as the settled law on that subject. In 1865 the city of Mt. Pleasant instituted a suit in one of the local courts, making the railroad company, Mr. Foote, the plaintiff here, and others defendants, and praying that the bonds be ordered to be surrendered to the city and cancelled. That was in September, 1865. In October, 1865, a new element was introduced: A Mr. Lash, who had been vice president of the railroad company, went before the city council and made the proposition that if they would appoint him as agent, he would take up and procure to be surrendered to the city the $50,000 of bonds, which, with interest, then amounted to about $70,000; and they appointed him agent for that purpose. Here comes the controversy between Lash and the city, as to his relations to the city and to the railroad company, and the supreme court of the state decided that Lash was the agent of the city to procure these bonds. The city issued to Lash warrants to the amount of $6,000, with which he was to pay $1,000 of the old debts of the railroad company, and was to use the others in forwarding the affairs of the railroad company. The supreme court decided that Lash was the agent of the city to procure these bonds. He had procured them in October, 1865, and brought them into the city council and surrendered them, whereupon (and which is, I think, the most sensible thing I have seen in the whole controversy) some gentleman moved that having got the wolf they ought to kill him on the spot, and the council proceeded to burn the bonds.

In the following April, 1866, Mr Foote, the plaintiff in this suit, having and being the owner of 244 of the first mortgage sinking bonds, and 202 of the first mortgage bonds, which it is stipulated were issued as this road was built mile by mile for the eighteen miles completed in Lee county, brought his bill to foreclose this railway mortgage, making defendant to that bill, the trustees, Mr. Thompson and Mr. Hooper, and all the other bondholders; and such proceedings were had as that Foote obtained a decree in his favor for $318,000, in May, 1866, and the other bondholders for $38,000, and Edward Kilbourn, the lessee of the company, a decree for $364,000; and one question is, whether under that decree the bonds of the city are included in the property ordered to be sold. I will read the decree so far as it relates to the description of the property ordered to be sold. (The city of Mt. Pleasant, I may remark, was not a party to that foreclosure.) "The superstructure, iron rails, water tanks, rolling stock, fuel, material, track, and all franchises, rights and privileges, and all rights of way over lands belonging to the said railroad company;" and the following clause is the one on which the plaintiff relies for title: "or in any of which things said railroad (or said railroad company) have any interest or claim, and in all other property of the said railroad company, whether real, personal or mixed, or in which they have any interest or claim, being as well for the payment of the bonds issued by the said railroad company, and the other claims against the said property." Under that decree there was a statutory appraisement of the specific property, locomotives, cars, etc., owned by the railroad company, amounting to $91,000, and an omnibus valuation of the railroad track, and all other property, real, personal and mixed, in which the company had any claim, amounting to $459,000. In other words, the bonds here in controversy, issued by the city of Mt. Pleasant, are not mentioned in terms as being conveyed by the mortgage, nor are they mentioned in the decree, or in the appraisement, or in the deed, but they are claimed to be covered by the general language, "any and all other property, real, personal or mixed, belonging to the corporation."

Now the question is whether on this state of facts, Mr. Foote has a claim to these bonds, as a bona fide holder thereof without notice of the rights and equities of the city. We are of opinion that he is not such a holder, for several reasons. In the first place, it would be very improbable that a railroad company, having received bonds issued by a municipality for the express purpose of sale and negotiation by it, to aid it in the construction of its road, would embrace those bonds in a railway mortgage, and thus sink that much of the ready means intended to enable them to build the road, by putting them in an omnibus mortgage of this kind. The most natural course would be that these bonds should be sold. They were made for that purpose—made to be negotiated in the usual way. There ought, therefore, to be very clear language to justify a court in holding that the railway company intended to include these bonds in a mortgage. The language here is general, and in one view it is broad enough to cover these bonds. In a more narrow view these bonds would not be held not to be embraced in it. What is best to guide the court as to the intention of the parties, for that should govern. To guide us, let us look at the practical construction the parties put upon this transaction. Now, if the bonds were intended to be included in the mortgage, it would seem to be very natural that they should be delivered to the trustee, but they were not. On the contrary, as I have stated, they always remained in the possession of the railroad company. Not only so, but the trustee, Mr. Thompson, an experienced business man, undoubtedly faithful to his trust, and, in 1865, when the president of the railroad company sent an order, on him, to surrender these bonds to the city, he set up no claim to them. He did not say that these bonds belonged to this trust property, but he surrendered them to the agent of the city, thereby recognizing the fact, as he understood it, that they were not embraced in the mortgage.

Then again, here is a property which at the time of this foreclosure amounted to seventy or seventy-five thousand dollars, and while the decree mentions everything else, down to "spikes," in infinite detail, these bonds are never mentioned anywhere in the proceedings.

But the plaintiff relies upon an implication arising out of the reservation in the deed of trust that the city might sell these bonds until default in the payment of interest. Now whatever effect that might have, one thing is manifest, namely, that it appears from that very reservation that there was no intention here to pass to the mortgagees, or to the trustee representing the bondholders in this mortgage, an absolute and full title to these bonds. That is not the negotiation of a security in a commercial sense, so as to cut off any equity, leaving it in the possession of the owner with power to sell; so that, in our judgment, Mr. Foote never obtained any title to these bonds in a commercial sense, so as to defeat defenses, even admitting the language of the mortgage is broad enough to embrace them. That is one ground on which we think the suit must fail, but there are others that seem to our mind equally conclusive.

We have already adverted to the fact that the statute required the proceeds of these bonds to be expended in the county of Henry, and not only so, but the specific proposition submitted to the people of the city of Mt. Pleasant was that these bonds should be thus expended; and the railroad company executed its obligation agreeing to thus expend them; so that we have the statute of the state, and the specific proposition voted on by the people of the city, and also the obligation of the railroad company, all concurring that the money arising from the sale of these bonds, "the proceeds of these bonds," in the language of the law, should be expended in Henry county. Now what does this contemplate? It contemplates the negotiation of these bonds in the ordinary and usual way, and the keeping of the proceeds separate from the other assets of the company, and that the proceeds when obtained shall be expended in the county of Henry. Fundamentally this was the inducement to make the vote. What did the railroad company do? They received these bonds (and on the plaintiff's theory, for I am now discussing it in the view that he may be right and that this broad language is sufficient to include these bonds in the mortgage), and commenced their work in Lee county. They make a mortgage, and include these city bonds in it to raise money in gross. If that transaction can be sustained, then it is very evident you can never tell how much money was obtained specifically on these bonds. It is very evident that the mortgagee made no specific advance on the faith of this security; and therefore to allow a recovery here would be to subvert the law, and the obvious intention of the law, and the express contract of these parties. The utmost effect, it seems to us, that can be given, would be that the right of the mortgagees would be dependent on the railroad company getting a perfect and complete title to these bonds. If the railroad should expend any amount of money equal to this amount of bonds specifically in Henry county, perhaps there would then be an equity on their part to hold these bonds and recover on them; and if they, before that time, had pledged them to the mortgagees, when the railroad company's right became perfect, the pledge would enure to the benefit of the mortgagee. But in that view of it, the mortgagees have taken them subject to all the equities of the city and railroad company. It is obvious that the railroad company never obtained any rights to these bonds, because the money was never expended in the county of Henry, or any part of it.

But suppose we are mistaken in this view, there is another ground which seems to us equally fatal to plaintiff's right. The language of this decree, ordering the sale, is in presenti. It did not include these bonds, for the reason that at that time the bonds had been surrendered to the city, and were no longer in existence. They had been destroyed. It cannot be held, under a sweeping provision of the mortgage, mortgaging all property, real, personal and mixed, not in possession, and thereafter to be acquired, that seven or eight years afterwards, when the railroad company has parted with a large amount of personal property under a jus disponendi reserved to it, that this decree in presenti, ordering the sale of all the personal property of the railroad, can relate back and divest titles acquired under the railroad company when they had the power of sale and disposition. Our judgment is, this decree is not broad enough to cover these bonds, they being no longer in existence at the time the decree passed, and it being known to the plaintiff that such was the fact; for Mr. Kilbourn concurred in the surrender of these city bonds, and he, as the agent of Foote, obtained a foreclosure, and knew that the bonds had been surrendered. He made no effort to impeach that transaction at the time of the foreclosure.

But suppose we are mistaken in this view, there is another equally fatal to the plaintiff's right, namely: That under the circumstances of this case, the surrender of these bonds is binding on all parties. How does the case stand? The city had made a subscription of $50,000 to this railroad in violation of the law of the state, as expounded by the supreme court of the state. The bonds had never been executed to the railroad. The city had subscribed to the stock in the books of the company, but the city still held the stock of the company. The company still held the bonds of the city, and the railroad company had become insolvent; had ceased to do any work. Seeing they were unable to carry out their contract to expend the proceeds of those bonds in the county, the city filed its bill to cancel this subscription and to have the bonds returned to it. It is plain that the city was entitled to have that done. Mr. Howell in his argument mistakes the decision of the supreme court of the United States. He says: "It is unnecessary to argue to this court that these subscriptions to railroad corporations are valid," etc. Such is not the effect of the decisions. The supreme court of the United States simply hold that since the supreme court of the state of Iowa had, in 4 G. Greene, decided that such bonds might be constitutionally issued while such decision remained in force, they would be sustained in the hands of bona fide holders, but as to bonds issued, after that decision was overruled, the supreme court of the United States will accept the decision of the supreme court of the state on that subject. Now, there were no bona fide holders of these bonds at the time the surrender was made. The railroad company was not such. The city held the stock, and the supreme court of the state meanwhile had decided such bonds to be unconstitutional, and it is stipulated that these bonds were considered to be valueless. Under those circumstances, the transaction whereby the bonds were surrendered was valid. There can be no doubt about that. It is a misconception to suppose that the supreme court of the United States hold that the railroad subscription, as a subscription, is valid, contrary to adjudication of the state supreme court. All it holds is that commercial securities in the hands of bona fide holders must be protected. Hence the argument here made by Mr. Howell, that the surrender of the stock was a fraud upon the company's creditors, has no application. The city's liability as a stockholder could not be enforced. That is not a commercial security. Here is the decision of the supreme court of the state that the city had no right to become a stockholder, and the obligation of a stockholder cannot be enforced against it. So I say, it is clear that the surrender of these bonds was effectual and binding upon the city and the railroad company. The result is, that upon all these grounds Mr. Foote, as it appears to us, has no case. Judgment for defendant.

Circuit Court. District of Columbia. March Term, 1838.

EXECUTORS—ACTION ON NOTE—PARTIES.

If a sealed note be given to R. H. F., one of the executors of Thomas Whittington, it is not necessary that all the executors should join in the action.

Debt on a sealed note for $60, payable to R. H. Foote, one of the executors of Thomas Whittington.

R. J. Brent, for defendant [William Noland], contended that it is to be presumed from the face of the note, that the money belonged to the estate of the testator; and that there were other executors who ought to be joined as plaintiffs; and prayed the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiffs alone cannot recover; but that all the executors ought to join whether they proved the will or not.

Mr. Bradley, contra, cited Biddle v. Wilkins, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 686, 692.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), refused.

Verdict for plaintiff. New trial granted, because the verdict was against the evidence.

FOOTE v. SILSBY et al.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1849.[2]

PATENTS—DISCLAIMER—EVIDENCE—ACT OF MARCH 3, 1837 — SCIENTIFIC WORKS AS EVIDENCE OF WANT OF NOVELTY—JURY—NONSUIT—COMBINATION.

1. While the plaintiff's counsel in a civil action was opening the case to the jury, one of the jurymen empannelled was taken ill, so as to be unable to serve: Held, that it was proper for the court to discharge him, and to direct another juryman to be drawn from the panel in his stead.

[See note at end of case.]

2. On the trial of a patent suit, the patent on which the action was founded had endorsed upon it what purported to be a disclaimer under section 7 of the act of March 3, 1837 (5 Stat. 193). The plaintiff, after putting the patent in evidence, offered a certified copy of the disclaimer, which was excluded on the ground that the patentee did not state in the disclaimer the extent of his interest in the patent, as required by section 7. Afterwards, the defendant offered in evidence the disclaimer endorsed on the patent, (it being, however, only a copy, not in the patentee's hand-writing,) not as a disclaimer, but as a confession by the patentee, of the want of novelty of a part of what he had claimed: Held, that the paper was inadmissible, for want of proof that it had been executed by the patentee, and that, if admitted at all, the full effect of a disclaimer must be given to it.

[See note at end of case.]

3. The sufficiency of the disclaimer, as to whether or not the patentee stated in it "the extent of his interest" in the patent, as required by section 7, considered.

4. A disclaimer must be properly proved, before it can be admitted in evidence, either as an original paper or by a certified copy.

5. On the trial of a cause before a jury, this court has no power to grant a non-suit against the will of the plaintiff.

[See note at end of case.]

6. A notice of defence in a patent suit, under section 15 of the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 123), specified as a public work to be given in evidence, "Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines." The book contained 1334 pages, and its subjects were arranged alphabetically. The notice did not specify any particular page or heading in the work: Held, that no part of the book could be read in evidence.

[See note at end of case.]

7. Nor is the book admissible under a notice stating that the patentee's invention was previously known to Dr. Ure.

8. In the case of such a defective notice, it is not competent, with a view to read in evidence parts of the "Dictionary," to prove by scientific mechanics or experts, that they could without difficulty, if seeking information concerning the subject matter of the plaintiff's patent, find in the "Dictionary" named, certain parts relating to that subject matter, without having any specific reference to them.

[See note at end of case.]

9. A public work cannot be read in evidence on the trial of a patent suit, with a view of showing a want of novelty in the patentee's invention, where the only notice given of it was in a special plea, which had, before the trial, been stricken out by the court.

10. On the trial of a patent suit, a juror will not be withdrawn on the defendant's motion, on the ground of surprise, arising out of the exclusion by the court of evidence offered by him under a defective notice of special matter. The granting of such a motion, under any circumstances, is a matter of discretion.

11. The application of a well-known principle to a new and useful purpose, such as the application of the principle of the expansion and contraction of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to the regulation of the heat of a common cast or sheet-iron stove, is the subject of a patent.

12. Although the principle has before been applied to the regulation of heat, and although the idea of applying it to the regulation of the heat of a stove has before been suggested, the person who first practically applies it, by mechanical contrivances, to that purpose, is entitled to a patent for the application.

13. Where the question as to what constituted a combination as patented was, at the trial, treated by the defendant as a question of fact, and was submitted as such by the court to the jury, the defendant cannot afterwards insist that the court should have determined the extent of the combination, as matter of law, upon the specification.

14. When the effect and operation of mechanical contrivances enter into the question of the extent of a patented combination, it is a mixed question of law and fact, and, therefore, a proper one for the jury to determine under the instruction of the court.

15. Proper instructions to the jury on the questions of infringement and of damages, considered.

16. Reasons for denying a motion for a new trial on the grounds of surprise and newly discovered evidence.

17. Facts stated which warrant a jury in giving liberal damages in a patent suit, within the rule of the statute as to actual damages.

This was an action on the case for the infringement of a patent, tried before Conkling, District Judge, at Canandaigua, in June, 1848. [Case unreported.] The letters patent [No. 2,636] were granted to the plaintiff, [Elisha Foote], May 26th, 1842, "for an improvement in regulating the draft of stoves."[3]

On the letters patent were endorsed what purported to be a disclaimer and memorandum, as follows:

"To the Commissioner of Patents: The petition of Elisha Foote, of Seneca Falls, in the county of Seneca, and state of New-York, respectfully represents, that your petitioner obtained letters patent of the United States for an improvement in regulating the draft of stoves, which letters patent are dated on 26th day of May, 1842; that he has reason to believe that, through inadvertence and mistake, the claim made in the specification of said letters patent, in the following words, to wit: 'What I claim as my invention and desire to secure by letters patent, is the application of the expansive and contracting

[3] The specification was as follows:

"To all whom it may concern: Be it known, that I, Elisha Foote, Jun'r, of Seneca Falls, in the county of Seneca, and state of New-York, have invented a new and useful mode of regulating the heat of stoves and other structures for fires, and I do hereby declare that the following is a full and exact description.

"My plan makes the stove or other structure in which it may be used, regulate its own heat, and this is effected by applying the expansive and contracting power of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to the damper of a stove, by which the admission of air thereto is governed; so that, when the heat shall rise above any required degree the expansion shall close such damper, and when it shall fall below such degree, the contraction shall open it, and thus keep a uniform heat of the requisite intensity.

"Considerable variety may exist in the mode of application, and it may be varied to suit particular circumstances. I have constructed two stoves, and applied the regulator as follows.

"Figure 5 represents a common box stove, the front side of which is supposed to be removed. A B is a brass rod, attached firmly, at A, to the front of the stove by a shoulder on the inside, and a nut and screw on the outside. It is not necessarily of brass, but the use of that metal will probably be found the most practicable. It is best made by rolling sheet brass into a rod, so that it shall have two or three thicknesses, and be from one to three inches in diameter. The end at B is made flat, and rivetted to the short arm of the lever B C, so as to make a close joint therewith. B. C. is made of iron, and of sufficient strength to be inflexible. It turns on its fulcrum at D, which is made fast to the back of the stove by a nut and screw, and rivetted to B C. C L is another brass rod, similar in its construction to A B, and attached to the long arm of B C in the same manner. The end at L projects through the front of the stove, and is attached by a rivet to another lever E F. G K is the damper by which the admission of air to the stove is governed. It is bent so that the hinge at G may stand out a little in front of the stove, and give room for the play of the stem F G. The hinge is made in the common form, and the stem is merely a projection or extension of the damper. The end of the stem at F is made round, and fits into a hole made in the lever E F, so as to move easily therein. The lever E F should be of sufficient size and strength to be inflexible, and is attached to its fulcrum at E by a rivet, so as to make a joint therewith. H E is an iron rod. It is attached at H to the stove in any manner that will make it firm, and should either have a joint at H, or should be flexible at that point, so that the end E which constitutes the fulcrum to E F may be raised or depressed. At I is a screw, the head of which is made fast to, but turns in the front plate of the stove; the thread of the screw passes through the rod H E, and, by turning the screw, the end of the rod E may be raised or depressed at pleasure. It is manifest that the expansion of the brass rods, pressing against the lever E F, will close the damper, and their contraction will open it. If the fulcrum E be raised, it will require a greater degree of expansion, or in other words a higher degree of heat, to close the damper. If it be depressed, a lower degree will close it. A pointer, I O, is made fast to the head of the screw, so as to turn when the screw turns, and show how much the fulcrum E has been raised or depressed in a half revolution of the screw. And, it having been found by experiment, with a common thermometer, how much the heat of the stove is raised or depressed by moving the pointer a given distance, a scale is made and marked upon the front plate of the stove, as at X O Z, with as many different degrees of heat as it may be desired to vary the temperature of the stove, and the pointer being placed at any particular degree of heat, the stove will maintain the same with great accuracy; for, should the heat arise above the point, the expansion of the brass rods will close the damper and check it, or, should it fall below the point, their contraction will open the damper and let in the full draft of air. It is desirable to make the stove as nearly air-tight as possible, and the door and damper should both closely fit. I usually put into the stove more fuel than would be necessary in an open stove, and have the same constantly held in check by the damper.

"The other and more perfect, although more expensive mode of applying the regulator, is represented by figure 4, which is an external view of the stove, showing the face or scale on which the different degrees of heat are marked, and the pointer at A, and the damper at B, and the door at C. Figures 1, 2 and 3 are different views of the machinery, in which the same letters represent the same parts in each. Fig. 1 is a sectional view, made through the front of the stove. Fig. 2 is a perspective view from the back, and fig. 3 a perspective view from the front of the stove. A B C D E is a frame of cast iron, made to support the brass rods and other machinery, and to which they are attached. This stove is made of sheet iron, and a more substantial support than that would make for the rods becomes necessary In a cast iron stove the frame could probably be dispensed with, suitable projections being cast upon the plate to which to attach the machinery. The frame is made fast to the inside of the top of the stove, by screws passing through the top of the stove and entering the frame. The part A B, figs. 2 and 3, is attached to the back part of the stove, immediately under the flue, B C at one of the ends and C D at the front, the whole of sufficient strength to be inflexible. At A a little projection or extra thickness is made, to which the brass rod F G is firmly rivetted; at K another projection is made, which constitutes the fulcrum to the lever G H. A hole is made or left in the projection through which the lever passes, and is held by a rivet, so as power of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to open and close a damper which governs the admission of air into a stove or other structure in which it may be used, by which a more perfect control over the heat is obtained than can be by a damper in the flue,' is too broad, including that of which your petitioner was not the first inventor. Your petitioner, therefore, hereby enters his disclaimer to so much of said claim as extends the application of the expansive and contracting power of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to any other use or purpose than that of regulating the heat of a stove, in which such rod shall be acted upon directly by the heat of the stove or the fire which it contains; such disclaimer is to operate to the extent of the interest in said letters patent vested in your petitioner, who has paid ten dollars into the treasury of the United States, agreeably to the requirements of the act of congress in that case made and provided. Elisha Foote. Witnesses, Morris Newton, Edwin L. Buttrick. (Endorsed on back of patent, the 9th March, 1847.)"

After the letters patent and specification had been read in evidence, the plaintiff's counsel proposed to read in evidence a duly certified copy from the patent office, of the alleged disclaimer and memorandum, to which the defendants' counsel objected, on the ground that the disclaimer was void as a disclaimer, because the patentee did not state in it the extent of his interest in the patent, as required by section 7 of the act of March 3, 1837 (5 Stat. 193). The court sustained the objection, and excluded the disclaimer. Afterwards, and after the plaintiff had gone through with his evidence and rested his case, the defendants [Horace C. Silsby and others], offered to read in evidence the alleged disclaimer so endorsed on the patent, not as a disclaimer, but as a to turn easily and yet be perfectly firm. D E, figs. 1, 2 and 3, is a projection of the frame, extending down within one or two inches of the front of the rtove. It is bored at L^2, and holds one end of the shaft L N^1 2, the other of which passes through and is held by the front of the stove, as seen in fig. 1. On L N, and at about the middle of it, is a projection I P, fig. 1, from one to three inches in length, with two prongs at the top, within which the brass rod I H is held by a pivot, so as to make a close joint with it. The brass rods and the lever G H are made in the same way, and are attached to each other in the same manner as is described in the stove first mentioned. The effect of the expansion and contraction of the brass rods is to move the shaft L N back and forth, by operating on the projection I P, and the ends in which it rests in the frame and in front of the stove are turned, so as to permit it to move easily therein. Attached to the shaft on the outside of the stove is the face Q R, on which the different degrees of heat are marked, seen also in fig. 4 at A. It is made solid with the shaft, or is firmly attached to and turns with it. The shaft is made or bored hollow, as represented in fig. 1, so as to admit to pass through the centre of it the pivot O S, which is turned and made to fit and move easily within the shaft. At the end S is firmly attached the pointer T U, and at the end O is firmly attached the rod O a, which, passing down the front side of the stove and within the same, moves the damper when variations of heat change the lengths of the brass rods. The face may be made of brass or other material to suit the taste of the maker. It is usually made circular, having on the upper side the different degrees of heat found and marked as first described; and on the lower, corresponding with the different degrees, small holes, into which a pin on the pointer at U may be inserted and connect the two. The pointer may be made of steel and polished. Passing through the lower end is a screw at U in fig. 1, on the end of which is the small pin fitted to enter the holes on the face. On the other end of the screw is a knob, which serves as a handle to turn the pointer or to unscrew and detach the pointer from the face. If attached, the brass rods affect and move the damper below; if detached, they have no effect upon it.

"The damper is made in the common form of two plates moving one upon the other, with orifices in each, so that in one position both shall be closed and in another both opened. The inside plate is represented by b c, seen wholly in fig. 2, and partly in fig. 3. It is made thicker near the centre, and is bored through, as is represented in fig. 1, to admit and hold the stem to the outside plate; d e represents the outside plate, seen wholly in fig. 3, partly closed. At f g is its stem, attached to its centre and passing through the inside plate. The faces to both should be ground or turned, as well as the stem, so as to move easily and closely one on the other. On the end of the stem, at g, is made or firmly attached the projection g a, which ends in two prongs, as is shown in fig. 2. The end of the rod O a terminates, as is seen at a in figs. 1 and 2, in a circular plate of from one to two inches in diameter, and fitted to move easily and closely within the two prongs to the stem of the damper. The object of this arrangement is, that if for instance the closing of the damper should fail to check the heat, the rod would be disconnected from the damper and pass on without injury to the machinery, and when it returns it would catch the upper prong, and connect itself again with the damper; or, should a high heat be desired, the damper may be set open, and the rod at some distance from it, so that it shall require a great degree of expansion before the rod would reach the damper to close it; or, should it be desired to change from a high to a low degree of heat, the damper may be closed, and the rod set so that a great contraction will have to take place before it will reach the damper to open it. The rod O a should have sufficient width and strength to be inflexible. The stove governs its heat the same as the one first described.

"What I claim as my invention, and desire to secure by letters patent, is the application of the expansive and contracting power of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to open and close a damper which governs the admission of air into a stove or other structure in which it may be used, by which a more perfect control over the heat is obtained than can be by a damper in the flue.

"I also claim as my invention the mode above described of setting the heat of a stove at any requisite degree, by which different degrees of expansion are requisite to open or close the damper.

"I also claim the combination above described by which the regulation of the heat of a stove or other structure in which it may be used is effected.

"And I also claim as my invention the mode above described of connecting the action of the metallic rods with the damper, so that the same may be disconnected when the damper shall have closed and the heat shall continue to rise, &c."

confession that the plaintiff's invention was not new, and that he was not the original inventor of all that was claimed in his specification. The plaintiff's counsel objected to this, on the grounds that the defendants had caused the alleged disclaimer to be rejected when offered as evidence on the part of the plaintiff, that it must be read as a valid disclaimer if read at all, and that it purported to be only a copy, not in the patentee's handwriting, and was not proved to have been executed by him. The court refused to admit the paper in evidence.

After the plaintiff had concluded his evidence, the defendants moved for a nonsuit on various grounds, but, the plaintiff not consenting, the court overruled the motion.

The defendants had given a notice of special matter in the action, under section 15 of the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 123), the material parts of which that came in question on the trial were as follows: "That the patentee was not the original inventor or discoverer of the thing patented; that he was not the original and first inventor or discoverer of a substantial and material part thereof claimed as new; that it had been described in a public work called 'Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures and Mines,' anterior to the supposed discovery thereof by the patentee, and also had been in public use and known before that time, and used by Andrew Ure of London." In the course of the trial, the defendants offered to read in evidence two articles, one headed "Heat-Regulator,"[4] on page 643, and the other headed "Thermostat,"[4] on page 1237, from a public work entitled "A Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, &c., by Andrew Ure, M. D., &c., London, &c.. 1840," and labelled on the back "Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, &c." The plaintiff objected to the reading of any part of the volume, on the ground that its title was not correctly indicated in the notice of defence, but the court decided that the notice was sufficient in that respect. The plaintiff further objected to the reading of any part of the volume, because the notice of defence did not specify on what page, or under what title or head in the dictionary, the material part of the invention was described, and did not specify what part was described. The court decided that the notice was insufficient, and excluded the volume. They then offered to read the same articles in evidence from the same book, under that part of the notice of defence which stated that a material part of the invention was known to Andrew Ure, of London. but, under the plaintiff's objection, the court excluded the evidence. They then offered to prove by scientific mechanics and by experts in mechanical science and art, that they knew the terms "heat-regulator," and "thermostat," that they were terms in common use among mechanics and experts in mechanical science and art, and that they could, without difficulty, if seeking information concerning heat-regulators, find in the said dictionary the portions so proposed to be read, without having any specific reference to them. This evidence was offered by the defendants for the purpose of renewing their motion to read the said articles in evidence,

[4] These articles were as follows:

"Heat-Regulator. The name given by M. Bonnemain to an ingenious apparatus for regulating the temperature of his incubating stove rooms. (See 'Incubation, Artificial,' for the manner of applying the heat-regulator.)

"The construction of the regulator is founded upon the unequal dilatation of different metals by the same degree of heat. A rod of iron x, fig. 549, is tapped at its lower end into a brass nut y, enclosed in a leaden box or tube, terminated above by a brass collet z. This tube is plunged into the water of the boiler, alongside of the smokepipe. (Fig. 549* is a bird's-eye view of the dial, &c.) The expansion of the lead being more than the iron for a like degree of temperature, and the rod enclosed within the tube being less easily warmed, whenever the heat rises to the desired pitch, the elongation of the tube puts the collet z, in contact with the heel a, of the bent lever a, b, d; thence the slightest increase of heat lengthens the tube anew, and the collet lifting the heel of the lever depresses its other end d through a much greater space, on account of the relative length of its legs. This movement operates near the axis of a balance-bar e, sinks one end of this, and thereby increases the extent of the movement which is transmitted directly to the iron skewer y. This pushing down a swing register diminishes or cuts off the access of air to the fireplace. The combustion is thereby obstructed, and the temperature falling by degrees, the tube shrinks and disengages the heel of the lever. The counterpoise g, fixed to the balance beam e, raises the other extremity of this beam, by raising the end d of the lever as much as is necessary to make the heel bear upon the collet of the tube. The swing register acted upon by this means, presents a greater section to the passage of the air; whence the combustion is increased. To counterbalance the effect of atmospheric changes, the iron stem which supports the regulator is terminated by a dial disc, round the shaft of the needle above h, fig. 549*; on turning this needle the stem below it turns, as well as a screw at its under end, which raises or lowers the leaden tube. In the first case, the heel falls, and opens the swing register, whence a higher temperature is required to shut it, by the expansion of the tube. We may thus obtain a regularly higher temperature. If, on the contrary, we raise the tube by turning the needle in the other direction, the register presents a smaller opening, and shuts at a lower temperature; in this case, we obtain a regularly lower temperature. It is therefore easy, says M. Bonnemain, to determine a priori the degree of temperature to be given to the water circulating in the stove pipes. In order to facilitate the regulation of the apparatus, he graduated the disc dial, and inscribed upon its top and bottom the words, Strong and Weak heat. See 'Thermostat,' for another heat-regulator." Pages 643 and 644.

"Thermostat, is the name of an apparatus for regulating temperature, in vaporization, distillation, heating baths or hot-houses, and ventilating apartments, &c.; for which I obtained a patent in the year 1831. It operates upon the physical principle, that when two thin metallic bars of different expansibilities are riveted or soldered facewise together, any change of temperature in them will cause a sensible movement of flexure in the compound bar, to one side or other; which movement may be made to operate, by the intervention of levers, &c., in any desired degree, upon valves, stop-cocks, but the court excluded the evidence. The defendants then offered to read in evidence several articles from pages 93, 130, 283, and 406 of "The Journal of the Franklin Institute, vol. IX, for 1832," insisting that they were entitled to do so, on the ground that notice thereof had been given in a special plea which was put in in the action, but had been stricken out by the court on the plaintiff's motion. The plea averred, that the plaintiff's invention was not new at the date of the patent, but "substantial parts thereof" had been known and used in divers places, naming them, "and were described in divers public works, to wit, 'The Journal of the Franklin Institute,' &c." The plaintiff objected to the evidence, and the court excluded it, on the ground that no sufficient legal notice of it had been given.

The defendants then offered to read in evidence an affidavit, to be made by themselves, by their attorney, and by the only counsel who had charge of their case, showing that they had confidingly relied on the said notice of matters to be given in evidence, as a fulfillment of the law, and sufficient in all respects to entitle the defendants to read the said portions of said "Dictionary" and of said "Journal" in evidence, that they were taken by surprise, and that the said evidence was material to their defence, and without it they could not safely proceed in the trial of the cause; and, on that state of facts, they moved the court to withdraw a juror, and offered to pay the costs of the trial, and go to trial at the next term. The plaintiff waived the necessity of the affidavits, but insisted that, assuming them to be made to the extent offered, the motion ought not to be granted. It being consented that the motion should be considered as if the affidavits proposed were actually submitted, the court examined the portions proposed to be read from the volumes in question, and refused to grant the motion on the grounds, that if such a power could be exercised by the court at all at the instance of a defendant, it would only be done where it was clear that he must otherwise suffer gross injustice, and that, even if the portions of the volumes offered to be read in evidence were read, it was by no means clear they would constitute a defence.

The stove-regulator manufactured and sold by the defendants, and claimed to be an infringement, was known as "Race's Regulator," and was alleged to be embraced in the claim of letters patent granted to Washburn Race, April 4th, 1846, for an "improvement in registers for stoves." It was attached, in a perpendicular position, to the outside of the stove, but in contact with it or so near to it as to be readily affected by its heat. An iron sustaining plate, in length equal to the height of the stove, was enlarged in width at the bottom, so as to surround the air-hole of the stove, by a curb, on which the register, when closed, rested. This plate was about an inch and a half wide and a quarter of an inch thick. In the side of this plate next the stove was a longitudinal groove, extending down from within about a quarter of an inch from the top of the sustaining plate to the upper end of a vertical lever. In this groove an expansion slip or rod of brass was sus-stove-registers, air-ventilators, &c.; so as to regulate the temperature of the media in which the said compound bars are placed. Two long rulers, one of steel, and one of hard hammered brass, rivetted together, answer very well; the object being not simply to indicate, but to control or modify temperature. The following diagrams will illustrate a few out of the numerous applications of this instrument.

"Fig. 1130, a b, is a single thermostatic bar, consisting of two or more bars or rulers of differently expansible solids (of which, in certain cases, wood may be one): these bars or rulers are firmly riveted or soldered together, face to face. One end of the compound bar is fixed by bolts at a, to the interior of the containing cistern, boiler, or apartment, a, l, m, b, whereof the temperature has to be regulated, and the other end of the compound bar at b, is left free to move down towards c, by the flexure which will take place when its temperature is raised.

"The end b, is connected by a link, b, d, with a lever d, e, which is moved by the flexure into the dotted position b, g, causing the turning-valve, air-ventilator, or register, o, n, to revolve with a corresponding angular motion, whereby the lever will raise the equiposed slide-damper k, i, which is suspended by a link from the end e, of the lever e, d, into the position k, h. Thus a hot-house or a water-bath may have its temperature regulated by the contemporaneous admission of warm, and discharge of cold air, or water.

"Fig. 1131, a, b, c, is a thermostatic hoop, immersed horizontally beneath the surface of the water-bath of a still. The hoop is fixed at a, and the two ends b, c, are connected by two links b, d, c, d, with a straight sliding rod d, h, to which the hoop will give an endwise motion, when its temperature is altered; e, is an adjusting screw-nut on the rod d, h, for setting the lever f, g, which is fixed on the axis of the turning-valve or cock f, at any desired position, so that the valve may be opened or shut at any desired temperature, corresponding to the widening of the points b, c, and the consentaneous retraction of the point d, towards the circumference a, b, c, of the hoop. g, h, is an arc graduated by a thermometer, after the screw piece e has been adjusted. Through a hole at h, the guide-rod passes. i, is the cold-water cistern; i, f, k, the pipe to admit cold water; l, the overflow pipe, at which the excess of hot water runs off.

"Fig. 1132 shows a pair of thermostatic bars, bolted fast together at the ends a. The free ends b, c, are of unequal length, so as to act by the cross links d, f, on the stop-cock e. The links are jointed to the handle of the turning plug of the cock, on opposite sides of its centre; whereby that plug will be turned round in proportion to the widening of the points b, c. h, g, is the pipe communicating with the stop-cock.

"Suppose that, for certain purposes in pharmacy, dyeing or any other chemical art, a water bath is required to be maintained steadily at a temperature of 150° F.; let the combined thermostatic bars hinged together at e f, fig. 1133, be placed in the bath, between the outer and the inner vessels a, b, c, d, being bolted fast to the inner vessel at g, and have their sliding rod k, connected by a link with a lever fixed upon the turning plug of the stop-cock i, which introduces cold water from a cistern m, through a pipe m i n, into the bottom part of the bath. The length of the link must be so adjusted that the flexure of the bars, when they are at a temperature of 150°, will open pended by a regulating screw, which passed through the upper end of the sustaining plate into the groove, and was tapped into the upper end of the brass rod, the head of the screw resting on the top of the sustaining plate. To the lower end of the expansion rod was firmly fastened a piece of iron, about an inch and a half long and half an inch wide and thick, near the lower end of which, on the front side, a sharp hook or barb was made, pointing outward and upward, and falling into the bottom of a niche cut in the upper end of a vertical lever about two inches long, the bottom of the niche being about one-eighth of an inch wide from the fulcrum of the lever, and in a line horizontal with the fulcrum, which was a small pin passing through the lever and through two ears on the sustaining plate. The lever was in effect a lever bent at right angles, the longer end being vertical and the shorter end horizontal, and the fulcrum being in the angle. The lever moved in a slot made through the sustaining plate. The register was a piece of metal made plane and smooth on its lower surface, and when it closed it laid at an angle sufficiently inclined to make it close by its own weight. From the upper part of the register a tail-piece or short lever projected upwards, and behind the lower end of the vertical lever. In the back side of this tail-piece, a niche was cut, which fitted on an edge formed at the lower end of the slot before mentioned, so that the register was sustained by the edge, and turned on it as a fulcrum. A small projection on the inner side of the vertical lever, near its lower end, struck the tail-piece about one-eighth of an inch above the edge, so that when the expansion rod was contracted by cooling, the vertical lever pressed on the tail-piece of the register and opened it, and, when the rod became dilated by heat, the vertical lever permitted the register to close more or less by its own weight, according to the degree of heat. To the screw in the upper end of the sustaining plate was attached an index, under which, and attached to the stove, was a circular plate, marked with numbers, so that, by turning the screw, the register might be caused to open and close at any desired temperature. The sustaining plate had an opening in it along nearly the whole length of the expansion rod, thus exposing the

the said stop-cock, and admit cold water to pass into the bottom of the bath through the pipe i n, whereby hot water will be displaced at the top of the bath through an open overflow pipe at q. An oil bath may be regulated on the same plan, the hot oil overflowing from q into a refrigeratory worm, from which it may be restored to the cistern m. When a water bath is heated by the distribution of a tortuous steam pipe through it, as i n o p, it will be necessary to connect the link of the thermostatic bars with the lever of the turning plug of the steam-cock or of the throttle valve i, in order that the bars by their flexure may shut or open the steam passage more or less, according as the temperature of the water in the bath shall tend more or less to deviate from the pitch to which the apparatus has been adjusted. The water of the condensed steam will pass off from the sloping winding pipe i n o p, through the sloping orifice p. A saline, acid or alkaline bath has a boiling temperature proportional to its degree of concentration, and may, therefore, have its heat regulated by immersing a thermostat in it, and connecting the working part of the instrument with a stop-cock i, which will admit water to dilute the bath, whenever by evaporation it has become concentrated and has acquired a higher boiling point. The space for the bath between the outer and inner pans should communicate by one pipe with the water cistern m, and by another pipe with a safety cistern r, into which the bath may be allowed to overflow during any sudden excess of ebullition.

"Fig. 1136 is a thermostatic apparatus, composed of three pairs of bars d d d, which are represented in a state of flexure by heat, but they become nearly straight and parallel when cold; a b c is a guide rod, fixed at one end, by an adjusting screw e, in the strong frame f e, having deep guide grooves at the sides. f g is the working rod, which moves endways, when the bars d d d operate by heat or cold. A square register plate h g, may be affixed to the rod f g, so as to be moved backwards and forwards thereby, according to the variations of temperature; or, the rod f g may cause the circular turning air register i to revolve by rack and wheel-work, or by a chain and pulley. The register plate h g, or turning register i, is situated at the ceiling or upper part of the chamber, and serves to let out hot air; k is a pulley, over which a cord runs, to raise or lower a hot air register l, which may be situated near the floor of the apartment or hot house, to admit hot air into the room; c is a milled head for adjusting the thermostat by means of the screw at e, in order that it may regulate the temperature to any degree.

"Fig. 1137 represents a chimney, furnished with a pyrostat a b c, acting by the links b d, e c, on a damper f h g. The more expansible metal is in the present example supposed to be on the outside. The plane of the damper-plate will in this case be turned more directly into the passage of the draught through the chimney by increase of temperature.

"Fig. 1135 represents a circular turning register, such as is used for a stove or stove grate, or for ventilating apartments; it is furnished with a series of spiral thermostatic bars, each bar being fixed fast at the circumference of the circle b c of the fixed plate of the air register, and all the bars act in concert at the centre a of the twining part of the register, by their ends being inserted between the teeth of a small pinion, or by being jointed to the centre part of the turning plate by small pins.

"Fig. 1134 represents another arrangement of my thermostatic apparatus, applied to a circular turning register, like the preceding, for ventilating apartments. Two pairs of compound bars are applied, so as to act in concert, by means of the links a c, b c, on the opposite ends of a short lever, which is fixed in the central part of the turning plate of the air register. The two pairs of compound bars a, b, are fastened to the circumference of the fixed plate of the turning register, by two sliding rods, a d, b e, which are furnished with adjusting screws. Their motion or flexure is transmitted by the links a c and b c to the turning plate, about its centre, for the purpose of shutting or opening the ventilating sectorial apertures more or less, according to the temperature of the air which surrounds the thermostatic turning register. By adjusting the screws a d and b c, the turning register is made to close all its apertures at any desired degree of temperature; but, whenever the air is above that temperature, the flexure of the compound bars will open the apertures." rod to the air in the room. The whole apparatus was fastened to the stove, so that the air-hole in the sustaining plate coincided with a similar hole in the stove.

After the evidence of the trial had closed, the defendants prayed the court to charge the jury: (1) That the plaintiff's patent was for a combination only, and that, if the defendants did not use all the constituent parts of the combination, the plaintiff could not recover. (2) That it was erroneous to consider as constituent parts of that combination, only those parts which were requisite to the operation of opening or closing the damper of a stove, but that the jury must consider as constituent parts, all the parts of the machine, as described in the specification, by which the regulation of the heat of a stove was effected. (3) That the index was a constituent part of the combination. (4) That the mode of detaching the pendulum, or rod O a, from the damper, was a constituent part. (5) That the pendulum was a constituent part. (6) That, as it was admitted that the defendants did not use the index, they were entitled to a verdict. (7) That, as it was admitted they did not use the mode of detaching the pendulum from the damper, they were entitled to a verdict. (8) That if the defendants' apparatus was different in its mechanical action, producing its results in a different way from the plaintiff's, that was a difference in principle, which entitled the defendants to a verdict. (9) That the use by them of self-detaching levers, instead of fixed levers, was a difference in mechanical principle. (10) That the use by them of an elastic slip of brass, which operated upon the damper only by contraction, instead of a rigid rod of brass, which operated by pushing and pulling, was a difference in mechanical principle. (11) That the difference in the modes of setting the two regulators was a difference in mechanical principle. (12) That the placing by the defendants of their regulator, and especially of its expanding rod, outside of the stove, made it different in principle from the apparatus of the plaintiff, which was inside of the stove. (13) That the damages which the plaintiff could recover were only so much as he had lost by the action of the defendants.

The court charged the jury, that the claim set forth by the plaintiff in the first article of the summary at the close of his specification, being for the application of a natural property of metals to the purpose therein mentioned, was not the fit subject of a patent. As to the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th of the instructions prayed, the court charged that it was true that the third article of the summary of the specification, on which alone the plaintiff was entitled to recover, if at all, was for a combination, and that, unless it appeared by the evidence that the defendants had used all the parts of the plaintiff's stove embraced in such combination, he was not entitled to recover; that the combination claimed in said third article was of such parts of the mechanism described in the specification as were necessary to regulate the heat of the stove, and that, unless it appeared by the evidence that some parts of the mechanism not shown to have been used by the defendants were necessary to perform that office, or that, according to the just construction of the specification, such parts were intended to be claimed by the plaintiff as a part of such combination, they were not to be considered as embraced within it; that, inasmuch as, by the fourth article of the plaintiff's summary, he made a distinct and separate claim to what had been called the detaching apparatus, there seemed to be good reason to infer that it was not his intention to claim that in the third article, as a part of the combination therein mentioned; that the question relative to the extent of that combination had been treated by the defendants as a question of fact, and the court had no disposition to withdraw it from the consideration of the jury, and therefore submitted it to them to decide from the evidence, whether the parts of the mechanism described in the specification, which were not shown to have been used by the defendants, were necessary to regulate the heat of the stove, and instructed the jury, that if they should so find, the defendants would be entitled to a verdict. As to the 6th and 7th propositions of the defendants, the court refused to charge any otherwise than as they had charged in regard to the 1st proposition. As to the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th of the instructions prayed, the court charged that it was a question for the jury to decide upon the evidence, whether the machinery used by the defendants for their regulator was the same in principle as that of the plaintiff; that a mere difference in form or size was not a difference in principle, but that a new application of known mechanical power was, in regard to invention, a new principle. As to the 13th of the instructions prayed, the court charged substantially as therein requested, and instructed the jury that the question of damages was exclusively with them, and that, if they were of opinion that the defendants had unlawfully infringed the plaintiff's patent, they ought to award him such sum as, in their judgment founded upon the evidence, would fully indemnify him for the actual damages he had suffered by reason of such infringement, beyond the taxable costs.

The jury found a verdict of $1500 for the plaintiff, and the defendants now moved for a new trial, on a case, and also on affidavits, on the grounds of surprise and newly discovered evidence. The surprise alleged was the exclusion of the said articles in "Ure's Dictionary," when so offered in evidence. The newly discovered evidence consisted of the said articles in the "Journal of the Franklin Institute," (whose existence was stated not to have been known by the defendants until within thirty days prior to the said trial, and after their notice of special matter in this action was given,) and of articles in the London Journal of Arts and Sciences for 1832, page 307, and for 1837, pages 94 and 133, and in the London Repertory of Arts for 1803, page 279, whose existence was averred to have become known to them after said trial. These several articles showed the application, by machinery, of the principle of the unequal expansion and contraction of two different metals under the same given degree of heat, to various purposes, such as, in Dr. Ure's "thermostat," regulating the temperature of an apartment, or of a hot-house, or of a water, oil, acid or alkaline bath, by the contemporaneous admission of warm and discharge of cold air or fluid, effected through the action of the regulator, placed in the medium whose temperature was to be regulated; or as, in Bonnemain's "heat regulator," regulating the temperature of rooms in which eggs were artificially hatched, and in Cadwallader Evans' steam boiler apparatus, regulating the opening of the safety valve, by governing the admission of air to the fire which heated the water of the boiler in which the regulating apparatus was placed; or as, in Ward's ventilator, regulating the ventilation of a room, by governing the admission of air into it.

Samuel Stevens, for plaintiff.

William H. Seward and Samuel Blatchford, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This is an action for the infringement of a patent for an improvement in regulating the draft of stoves, in which a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for $1500. A motion is now made by the defendants for a new trial.

I. One of the jurymen empannelled was taken ill, while the counsel for the plaintiff was opening the case, so as to be unable further to serve upon the jury, whereupon the court discharged him, and directed another juryman to be drawn from the panel, in his stead, which was done. This direction of the court was proper and unexceptionable. The propriety of it is too obvious to require remark.

II. The disclaimer endorsed on the back of the patent was properly rejected, when offered in evidence by the defendants, for want of proof that it had been executed by the patentee. And besides, if it had been admitted, the court would have been bound to give to it the full effect of a disclaimer under the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1837 (5 Stat. 193), upon which view of the effect of the instrument the defendants did not propose or desire to give it in evidence. I am also inclined to think the court erred in excluding the disclaimer when it was offered in evidence by the plaintiff, as it fairly enough imported on its face, as it seems to me, that the patentee was the owner of the entire interest in the patent, and, if so, there was a substantial compliance with the statute in this respect. This error, however, being against the plaintiff, is of no importance in the case. The rejection of the paper, when it was offered by the defendants, raises the only material question, and as to that I think the court was correct for the reason stated. The disclaimer should have been properly proved before it could be admitted in evidence either as an original paper or by a certified copy.

III. It is a sufficient answer to the objection that the motion for a nonsuit was erroneously refused, that the court had no power to grant it.[5]

IV. Dr. Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, &c., was properly rejected for the reasons given at the trial. The book contains 1334 pages, and treats of a great variety of subjects extending through the alphabet. The reference to the work, as given in the notice, was too general and indefinite, within a reasonable construction of the act of congress (5 Stat. 123, § 15). The notice should have specified the page or heading in the public work in which the invention had been previously described, so as to enable the patentee to turn to the article without searching through the entire volume. There can be no difficuly in giving a particular reference to the part of the book intended to be relied on, as the defendant is presumed to have examined the article, and to be familiar with it and with the page or heading where it may be found. A general reference to the work is calculated to mislead and embarrass the party, and ought not to be sanctioned, especially as there can be no difficulty in giving a more specific one. These remarks apply also to the offer to read passages in the work, for the purpose of showing that the invention was previously known to Dr. Ure, if there were no other ground for its rejection. The offer to prove, by experts and scientific men, that the terms "thermostat" and "heat-regulator" were well known in mechanical science, with a view to show that the notice was sufficiently explicit and specific, was properly rejected. The question was one for the court; and, besides, the notice should have pointed to the page or heading of the article. The rejection of the volume of "The Journal of the Franklin Institute," which was offered in evidence under the idea that notice of it was contained in a special plea which had been previously stricken out by the court, is so obviously correct as to require no remark.

V. The proposition on the part of the defendants to withdraw a juror, on the ground of surprise arising out of the rulings of the court in respect to the notice and the evidence offered under it, was properly overruled. The defective notice afforded no foundation for such a proceeding on the part of the defendants; and, under any circumstances, it was a matter resting altogether in the discretion of the court.

[5] The courts of the United States have no authority to order a peremptory nonsuit against the will of the plaintiff, on the trial of a cause before a jury. Doe v. Grymes, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 469; D'Wolf v. Rabaud, Id. 476; Crane v. Morris, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 598.

VI. The invention of the plaintiff, as stated in his patent, is "a new and useful improvement in regulating the draft of stoves;" and, after particularly describing in his specification the mechanical contrivances, and the application of the same to stoves in common use, he sets forth what is claimed as his discovery and not before known, or in public use:

(1) "The application of the expansive and contracting power of a metallic rod, by different degrees of heat, to open and close a damper which governs the admission of air into a stove or other structure in which it may be used, by which a more perfect control over the heat is obtained than can be by a damper in the flue."

(2) "The mode above described," (in the specification,) "of setting the heat of a stove at any requisite degree, by which different degrees of expansion are requisite, to open or close the damper."

(3) "The combination above described, by which the regulation of the heat of a stove or other structure in which it may be used is effected."

(4) "The mode above described, of connect ing the action of the metallic rods with the damper, so that the same may be disconnected when the damper shall have closed, and the heat shall continue to rise, &c."

The substance of the discovery, as claimed by the plaintiff and secured to him by the patent. is the application of the principle of the contraction and expansion of a metallic rod, by the use of certain mechanical contrivances particularly described and set forth, to the cast or sheet-iron stove in common use, by which means he produces a self-regulating power over the heat of the same, at any given degree of heat that may be desired within the capacity of the stove. This is the thing invented. It is, in a word, the application of a well known principle to a new and useful purpose, and the question is, whether or not the patentee was the first and original inventor, or whether it was before known and in public use. Now, although it is shown, (assuming for the present that we may look into the books not in evidence,) that the principle had before been applied to the regulation of heat, as in the instance of Dr. Ure's "thermostat." and Bonnemain's "heat-regulator," and some others, yet, for aught that appears from the testimony or from any book that has been produced, the plaintiff was the first person who applied the principle to the regulation of the heat of stoves; and for this he was entitled to a patent, and to be protected in its enjoyment. Phil. Pat. p. 101, c. 7, § 6. It is not a new use of the principle as previously applied to the regulation of heat, which would not be patentable; but a new application of it, by new mechanical contrivances and apparatus, by means of which a new and beneficial result is produced in the use of the article to which it has been thus applied, namely, the common cast or sheet-iron stove. It is true, that the idea of an application of the principle to the regulation of stoves had been before suggested, but no such application had ever been made prior to that of the patentee; and the person who first reduces the idea to practical application and use is entitled to the patent. Looking, then, at the claim of the plaintiff to a discovery in the regulation of the heat of stoves, in the light of the views above stated, I can perceive no well founded objection to the charge of the court under which the verdict was given.

The charge in respect to the first claim was more favorable to the defendants than in my judgment was warranted. The claim is not for a discovery of a natural property of the metallic rod, which, of itself, is not a patentable subject. but for a new application of it by means of mechanical contrivances, which is one of the commonest subjects of a patent. The only criticism to which the claim is liable is that it is too broad, inasmuch as there is an attempt to extend the improvement to other structures besides stoves. This has been corrected by a disclaimer, and properly so, from abundant caution, though I entertain no doubt that the claim beyond the stove, in the summary, is too general and indefinite to be valid or effectual, and should have been regarded as surplusage.

The court further charged, that the third claim, on which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, if at all, was for a combination, and that unless it appeared by the evidence that the defendants had used all the parts of the plaintiff's stove embraced in the combination. the verdict must be for the defendants. This instruction covered a great many points made by the defendants at the trial, and very unnecessarily multiplied, by breaking a single proposition, embodying a general principle, into numerous subdivisions, which tended only to embarrassment and confusion. It virtually covered the first seven points, and all of them, so far as any principle of law was involved, were ruled in favor of the defendants. As to the facts, they were questions for the jury.

The court also charged, that unless it appeared by the evidence that some parts of the mechanism not shown to have been used by the defendants were necessary to perform the office of regulating the heat of the stove, or that, according to the proper construction of the specification, such parts were intended to be claimed by the plaintiff as a part of the combination. they were not to be considered as embraced within it; and the court further remarked, that the question as to the extent of the combination had been treated by the counsel for the defendants as a question of fact, and the court had no disposition to withdraw it from the consideration of the jury. If the court conceded too much to the jury in the view thus submitted, and should have taken upon itself to determine the combination, upon an interpretation of the claim in the summary as matter of law, it is not for the defendants to complain, as their counsel chose to carry the question to the jury. They should have asked the court to settle the combination upon a construction of the specification, and have tried their case upon that assumption, instead of putting the question to the jury. They cannot take advantage of their own error, even conceding that the court acquiesced in it. Besides, the extent of the combination was perhaps, in one aspect, a mixed question of law and fact; the effect and operation of the mechanical contrivances, which were matters of skill, and to be determined by experts, entering into the question. It does not follow as matter of law, that every part of the machinery used constitutes an element of the combination. This may depend on the use and effect of it, and the purpose for which it is employed in the plan devised to complete the improvement.

The instruction as to the similarity or substantial identity of the two contrivances or machinery for regulating the heat, was obviously too correct to require any observation, and so was the instruction in respect to the damages. If the defendants desired any further instruction upon the latter point, they should have called the attention of the court to the subject. As far as given, the ruling was unexceptionable, and conformed to the statute.

VII. As respects the motion for a new trial on the grounds of surprise and newly discovered evidence, the views already presented concerning the improvement and discovery of the plaintiff, afford a complete answer. If all the evidence had been admitted, that was offered under the notice, or that has since been discovered, it would not, in my judgment, have constituted a defence or varied the result. It fell entirely short of proof that the plaintiff was not the first and original inventor of the improvement claimed by him, or that it was before known and in public use. Notwithstanding all the evidence offered at the trial, and all produced before me on this motion, from books or otherwise, the plaintiff was the first person who applied the expanding and contracting property of the metallic rod to the regulation of heat in the use of the stove, by means of mechanical contrivances. It was his invention and discovery, and was first brought by him into practical use, producing, as it respects the stove, a new and useful result.

The jury have found that the contrivances of the defendants in the construction of their regulator, are substantially the same as those of the plaintiff, and that they have, therefore, been guilty of an infringement. I am not sure that the plaintiff was bound to go to this length in making out a case of infringement. There is some ground for the position that the new application of the principle, by means of mechanical contrivances, constitutes, of itself, a part of his invention; and that any different or improved mode of application is but an improvement upon his discovery, and not available without his consent. It is not, however, necessary to determine this question, as it is not material to the decision of the motion.

It was suggested that the damages in the case were excessive, and that a new trial should be granted on that ground. I think not. The jury were warranted in giving liberal damages, within the limit laid down by the court. The defendants do not stand in a position to entitle themselves to a very favorable consideration, as they entered upon the violation of the plaintiff's patent, after having been warned of the consequences, and went on, with their eyes open, disregarding the claims of the patentee, and showing a willingness to avail themselves of the profits of his discovery, and to deprive him of the fruits of his genius, time, and expense, in striking out and bringing to perfection a new and most valuable improvement in the use of an article of the first necessity for the ordinary purposes of life. In my judgment the damages were not excessive or unreasonable.

New trial denied.

[NOTE. For subsequent proceedings, see Foote v. Silsby, Cases Nos. 4,917–4,920; Id., 14 How. (55 U. S.) 218, 20 How. (61 U. S.) 290, 378.

[On writ of error this case was taken to the supreme court, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed, Mr. Justice Curtis delivering the opinion. It was held:

[1. Upon a trial in New York a juror became ill, and was discharged before any evidence was given, and before the plaintiff's counsel had concluded his opening address. The court ordered another juror to be sworn, and proceeded with the trial. The defendant cannot object to this. It is the practice in New York, and the circuit court had a right to follow it.

[2. The court having erroneously refused to allow the plaintiff to offer a paper in evidence as a disclaimer of part of a patent, afterwards refused to allow the defendants to offer the same paper in evidence for the purpose of prejudicing the plaintiff's rights. This last refusal was correct. The reason given was erroneous, but this is not a sufficient cause for reversing the judgment.

[3. The courts of the United States have not the power to order a nonsuit against the wishes of the plaintiff.

[4. Under a notice given by the defendant that the invention claimed by the plaintiff was described in Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures and Mines, and had been used by Andrew Ure, of London, it was not competent to give in evidence a very large book. The place in the book should have been specified.

[5. Nor, under the notice, was the book competent evidence that Andrew Ure, of London, had a prior knowledge of the thing patented. The notice does not state the place where the same was used.

[6. One of the specifications of the patent being for a combination of certain parts of mechanism necessary to produce the desired result, it was proper for the court to instruct the jury that the defendants had not infringed the patent, unless they had used all the parts embraced in the plaintiff's combination; and the jury were to find what those parts were, and whether the defendants had used them.

[7. When a claim does not point out and designate the particular elements which compose a combination, but only declares, as it properly may, that the combination is made up of so much of the described machinery as effects a particular result, it is a question of fact which of the described parts are essential to produce that result; and to this extent, not the construction of the claim, strictly speaking, "but the application of the claim, should be left to the jury."

FOOTE v. SILSBY et al.

[1 Blatchf. 542;[1] 1 Fish. Pat. Rep. 391.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June Term, 1850.

WRIT OF ERROR—ALLOWANCE BY JUDGE AT CHAMBERS—ACT OF JULY 4, 1836.

1. A judge of this court sitting at chambers has power to allow a writ of error under section 17 of the patent act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 124), which declares that in patent cases writs of error shall lie as in other cases and "in all other cases in which the court shall deem it reasonable to allow the same."

2. There might be some ground for saying that in allowing such writ the judge must be sitting at a stated term of the court, if a court at chambers and one at a stated term fixed by statute were held by a different body.

3. On the allowance of such a writ of error, an order was made by the judge at chambers giving the party suing out the writ leave to make a bill of exceptions. He had made a case after the trial, which took place two years before, and had moved on the case for a new trial, which was denied. The case contained no stipulation that it might be turned into a bill of exceptions. On a motion to set aside the order: Held, that as the case was made, instead of a bill, by direction of the judge before whom the trial was had, and without prejudice to the right of the party to make up a bill with a view to a writ of error, and, as it appeared that the points were made and the exceptions taken at the trial in the required form to entitle the party to the benefit of them on a writ of error, the order must stand.

[Cited in Re Kaine, Case No. 7,598.]

After the decision in this case, refusing a new trial,—Foote v. Silsby [Case No. 4,916],—the plaintiff [Elisha Foote] having perfected judgment for less than $2,000, the defendants [Horace C. Silsby and others] sued out a writ of error from the supreme court, which was allowed specially under the 17th section of the patent act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 124), by Mr. Justice Nelson, at chambers, ex parte, on the 15th of June, 1850. He at the same time made an order giving leave to the defendants to make up a proposed bill of exceptions and serve a copy of it, with a view to the settlement of a bill to be attached to and carried up with the record. The plaintiff now moved to set aside the writ of error, and the order allowing it, and also the order for leave to make a bill of exceptions. It appeared that no bill of exceptions had been settled in form before the allowance of the writ of error, but that a case had been made and settled after the trial, on which the motion for a new trial was made. The case contained no reservation of a right to turn the same into a bill of exceptions; but it appeared that it had been at first drawn up in the form of a bill of exceptions, and was changed into a case by direction of Judge Conkling before whom the case was tried, on the ground that the defendants would not be entitled to a writ of error as of course, and that it would be time enough for them to make a bill of exceptions when a writ of error should be specially allowed. The trial was in June, 1848. [Case unreported.]

Samuel Stevens, for plaintiff, contended that the allowance of the writ of error was irregular and ought to be set aside, it having been made not by "the court," as the law required, but by a judge out of court; and that the defendants, having made a case, without reserving a right to turn it into a bill of exceptions, could not now have leave to do so. Stewart v. Hawley, 22 Wend. 561.

Samuel Blatchford, for defendants, insisted: 1. That a judge of this court at chambers was "the court," within the meaning of the patent act; that one judge was a quorum of the circuit court for this district by express statute (Act March 3, 1837, § 3; 5 Stat. 177), and that a judge, who alone composed a court, was a court whenever he transacted judicial business. U. S. v. The Little Charles [Case No. 15,613]. 2. That the practice pursued in this case as to the bill of exceptions was the same pursued in Hogg v. Emerson, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 437, 447, 457, a case in all respects analogous to this; that a case could not be made in this court with a stipulation to turn the same into a bill of exceptions (Conk. Tr. 273–275), and that, under the facts shown, the defendants were entitled now to put their bill of exceptions into form, if their writ of error was allowed to stand, as their exceptions were taken in proper form at the trial.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The allowance of the writ of error in this case was granted by me at chambers, and the question is, whether or not a judge at chambers has the power to allow the writ, under the seventeenth section of the patent act of 1836, where the judgment is under the sum of $2000.

That section provides for writs of error and appeals from judgments and decrees in patent cases, the same as in other cases in the federal courts, and adds, that they shall also lie "in all other cases in which the court shall deem it reasonable to allow the same."

This applies to the case of a judgment for the plaintiff for less than $2000, which is the amount required to authorize a writ of error or appeal under the general law on the subject.

The argument on the part of the plaintiff is, that the judge must be sitting at a stated term of the court, and not at chambers, to satisfy the language of the act providing for this special writ of error. There might be some reason for this distinction in a case where a court at chambers and one at a stated term fixed by statute were held by a different body. But when they are held by the same individual, as in this case, I doubt if the distinction is well founded. The nature of the subject here seems to indicate chamber business, and the matter may as well be attended to at chambers, as in court in term time. A judge sitting at chambers is a court, in the proper and usual sense of the term, and in a sense which may satisfy the words as well as the import of the statute. Although there may be some doubt in the matter I am inclined to hold that the writ was properly allowed.

As to the order in regard to a bill of exceptions, there is no doubt that the points must be made and the exceptions taken in the usual way at the trial, in order to entitle the party to the benefit of them on the writ of error. And, as well as I recollect this case when it was before me, the points in it were taken in the required form, although the paper book itself, on which the motion for a new trial was made, was in the form of a case. That fact is explained, however, in the opposing affidavit, and the paper appears to have taken that particular form under the direction of the judge before whom the trial took place, without prejudice to the right of the defendants to make up a bill of exceptions with a view ultimately to a writ of error.

Upon the whole, I think the motion must be denied in both aspects in which it is presented.

Motion denied, without costs.

FOOTE v. SILSBY et al.

[1 Blatchf. 545;[1] 1 Fish. Pat. Rep. 357.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June Term, 1850.

EQUITY—FEIGNED ISSUE.

1. An action at law for the infringement of a patent was tried and a verdict found for the plaintiff, and a motion for a new trial, on the grounds of errors in law at the trial, and of surprise in the exclusion of evidence, and of newly discovered evidence, was made and denied. After the verdict the plaintiff filed a bill against the defendants for a perpetual injunction, founded on the verdict. An answer was put in, setting up in defence the matters urged as grounds for a new trial. After the refusal of a new trial in the action at law, and after replication in the suit in equity, the defendants moved in the latter suit for a feigned issue, on the ground that they had just discovered new evidence which went to show a want of novelty in the plaintiff's invention, and was of a different character from any before presented: Held, that it was a proper case for a feigned issue.

2. The defendants were entitled to amend their answer, on payment of costs, by inserting the newly discovered matter.

In equity. After the verdict for the plaintiff [Elisha Foote] in Foote v. Silsby [Case No. 4,916], a bill in equity was filed by the plaintiff against the defendants [Horace C. Silsby and others], founded upon the verdict, and praying for a perpetual injunction, and an account of profits since the commencement of the suit at law. The defendants answered the bill, setting up the pendency of the motion for a new trial in the suit at law, and the alleged errors in the trial at law, and also all the evidence excluded on the trial, and the matters which were urged as reasons for a new trial on the grounds of surprise and newly discovered evidence. There was a replication to the answer. The defendants now moved, in the equity suit, for leave to amend their answer, or to file a supplemental answer, on the ground that they had just discovered important testimony tending to show that the principle of the unequal dilatation of different metals under a given degree of heat had been actually applied to the regulation of the heat of stoves prior to the plaintiff's invention. The substance of this testimony was set forth in affidavits, and in extracts from books. They also moved on the same papers, for a feigned issue to try the question of the novelty of the plaintiff's invention. It appeared that on the trial in the suit at law the only question litigated was that of infringement, the question of novelty resting on the plaintiff's patent alone.

Samuel Blatchford, for defendants.

1. The defendants are entitled to amend their answer, or to file a supplemental answer. They have brought themselves within the rules and practice on that subject. Rule 60 in Equity; 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 164, 165; Wells v. Wood, 10 Ves. 401; Alpha v. Payman, Dick. 33; Patterson v. Slaughter, Id. 285, Amb. 292:. Jackson v. Parish, 1 Sim. 505; Tidswell v. Bowyer, 7 Sim. 64; Wharton v. Wharton, 2 Atk. 294; Smith v. Babcock [Case No. 13,008].

2. There ought to be a trial by jury on the important question of the novelty of the plaintiff's invention. That has never been tried, and, as the evidence just discovered goes to that very point, even under the ruling heretofore made in the case, it is proper a jury should pass upon the question. Orr v. Merrill [Id. 10,591]; Allen v. Blunt, [Id. 216].

Samuel Stevens, for plaintiff.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The case has heretofore been before me on a motion on the part of the defendants in the action at law for a new trial. The grounds on which a new trial was asked were, errors in law committed at the trial, surprise, and newly discovered evidence. On a full consideration of the case I came to the conclusion that no error was committed in point of law; and that, under all the circumstances presented upon the questions of surprise and newly discovered evidence, a case was not made out entitling the defendants to a new trial on those grounds.

In coming to that conclusion on the latter branch of the case I was somewhat influenced by the consideration, that the defendants would have an opportunity to present any new grounds of defence, whether omitted, or excluded on account of defective pleadings, in the case then pending in equity, either upon the hearing on pleadings and proofs, by a feigned issue, or by ordering a suit at law. This consideration afforded an answer to the equitable ground urged in favor of the new trial; as the defendants would have an opportunity to supply any omissions or oversights that occurred in the preparation of the suit at law for trial, or to produce any newly discovered evidence material to the issues, and at the same time the verdict, to which I thought the plaintiff entitled upon the case as presented, would be left undisturbed.

There can be no doubt that the newly discovered evidence, as now disclosed in the affidavits, and which is in addition to that shown on the motion for a new trial, may become very material on the question of the originality of the plaintiff's improvements; and that the defendants should have an opportunity to avail themselves of it in their defence to this suit in equity. It is claimed that this evidence will show that the application of the principle of the contraction and expansion of the metallic rod to the regulation of the heat of stoves, as used by the plaintiff, was not new, but on the contrary had been in successful use long before, both in England and in this country.

If the case stood now on the same footing as on the motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence or of the exclusion of evidence from defect of pleadings, though I should still have clearly thought that the defendants ought to have an opportunity for a full defence in the equity case, before the granting of an injunction, yet I might have doubted as to the propriety of granting a feigned issue, or of ordering a trial at law; for, as the case then stood, upon all the evidence, whether received at the trial or furnished on the motion, it appeared that the plaintiff's improvement was the first that applied the principle above stated to the regulation of the heat of stoves. That being so, and no error in law having been committed at the trial, although the defendants were taken by surprise by the exclusion of their evidence, that evidence did not seem so material as to justify any interference with the verdict, especially as they would have an opportunity to produce it and discuss it more at large, if deemed material, in the equity case.

But the case now made is different. It is now denied that the improvement is original in the plaintiff, but on the contrary has been long known and in use; and a feigned issue is asked to try this question. I think it should be granted, and therefore direct a rule to be entered allowing a feigned issue to be made up between the parties to try the question of the originality of the plaintiff's improvement.

As to the other branch of this motion, namely, to amend the answer, I think the defendants have brought themselves within the usual practice of the court, and that the motion should be granted; but this must be on payment of the costs of opposing the motion.

Case No. 4,919.

FOOTE v. SILSBY et al.

[2 Blatchf. 260.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. July 10, 1851.

PATENTS—PATENTABILITY—NEW AND USEFUL RESULT—HEAT REGULATOR FOR STOVES—NOVELTY—EXPANSION AND CONTRACTION OF METALLIC ROD—COMBINATION.

1. In Foote's patent for an "improvement in regulating the draft of stoves," the first claim, being a claim to "the application of the expansive and contracting power of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to open and close a damper which governs the admission of air into a stove in which it may be used, by which a more perfect control over the heat is obtained than can be by a damper in the flue," is a claim independent of any particular arrangement or combination of machinery or contrivance for the purpose of applying the principle to the regulation of the heat of stoves.

2. Where a party has discovered a new application of some property in nature, never before known or in use, by which he has produced a new and useful result, the discovery is the subject of a patent, independently of any peculiar or new arrangement of machinery for the purpose of applying the new property.

3. Hence, the inventor has a right to use any means, old or new, in the application of the new property to produce the new and useful result, to the exclusion of all other means. The case of Neilson v. Harford, Webst. Pat. Cas. 295, cited and approved.

[Cited in Bridge v. Brown, Case No. 1,857; Andrews v. Carman, Id. 371; Mitchell v. Tilghman, 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 287.]

4. A mere abstract conception cannot be the subject of a patent; but, when it is reduced to practice, by any means, old or new, resulting usefully, it is the subject of a patent, independently of the machinery by which the application is made.

5. In the case of such a patent, although old means be used by the patentee for giving application to the new conception, yet the patent excludes all persons other than the patentee from the use of those means, and of all other means, in a similar application.

6. The novelty of the invention covered by said first claim, can be defeated only by showing the prior application of the principle of the expansion and contraction of the metallic rod to regulate the heat of a stove, by means of the heat produced by the stove itself. It is not defeated by showing a prior application of the expansion and contraction of a metallic rod to open and close a damper, where the metallic rod was heated indirectly by the heat of a furnace, by being immersed in hot water.

7. But the prior application, in order to defeat the novelty of the said first claim, need not have been made by the very best apparatus that could be devised. The question does not depend upon the degree of usefulness, but upon the practically useful and successful prior application of the principle.

8. Where, prior to the plaintiff's invention of the application covered by the said first claim, the principle of the expansion and contraction of a metallic rod heated by the stove itself, had been applied to regulate its heat, the rod being, however, a compound rod, composed of a slip of brass and a slip of iron, firmly fastened together, and the motion of the damper being produced through a deflection of the rod resulting from its curvature, caused by the unequal dilatation, under a given degree of heat, of the two metals composing it, that of brass being greater than that of iron, whereas, in the plaintiff's invention, the motion was produced by the direct linear expansion of a brass rod used in connection with an iron stove: Held, that the principle of the application of the expansion and contraction of the metallic rod to regulate the damper, by causing it to open and close according to the degrees of heat in the stove itself, as covered by the said first claim, was the same in the two applications.

9. The said first claim does not involve any mode or method of application, or any question of difference in degree—as that an apparatus having the linear expansion as distinguished from curvature, possesses greater power or can perform what the other cannot.

10. The third claim of the patent, being a claim to "the combination, above described, by which the regulation of the heat of a stove in which it may be used is effected," held to be a claim for a combination, consisting of four parts, specifically defined.

11. Though the parts separately may all be old, yet, if the plaintiff was the first to combine all four of them, for the particular purpose of regulating the heat of a stove by means of its own heat, he is entitled to be protected in that improvement.

12. The novelty of the said third claim is not defeated by showing a prior combination of the same four parts, in which the expansion and contraction of the metallic rod were produced by its immersion in hot water, and not directly by the heat of the stove itself whose heat was to be regulated.

13. The prior combination, to defeat the novelty of said third claim, must have been an apparatus of practical utility, and must have embraced all the elements embraced in the plaintiff's combination.

In equity. This was the trial, before Mr. Justice Nelson, of a feigned issue ordered in this case,—Foote v. Silsby [Case No. 4,918],—to try the questions, whether the plaintiff [Elisha Foote] was the original and first inventor of the first and third improvements claimed in letters patent granted to him May 26th, 1842, for an "improvement in regulating the draft of stoves." The specification of the plaintiff's patent, and, also, descriptions of the apparatus of Dr. Ure and of the egg-hatcher of Bonnemain, put in evidence by the defendants [Horace C. Silsby and others], and referred to in the charge of the court, are set forth at length in Id. [Case No. 4,916]. All other facts necessary to an understanding of the case sufficiently appear in the charge of the court.

Samuel Stevens and Henry B. Stanton, for plaintiff.

Alvah Worden, Charles M. Keller, and Samuel Blatchford, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The patentee in this case describes particularly, and with great fulness, two modes of applying the improvement which he claims to have made. They differ, I believe, only in one respect, and that consists in the method of detaching the connecting-rod, which is operated by the brass rods, from the damper, so as to prevent all difficulty in extreme heat, and give to the brass rods full operation in any degree of heat that may be applied to them. After giving these two descriptions of the machinery used to carry out the improvement, the patentee then specifies the several improvements which he claims to have invented, as follows: (The judge here read the four claims in the specification.)

The second claim, which is the adjusting process, and the fourth claim, which is the detaching process, are not in controversy between the parties to this suit, as individual claims, and may be laid out of view; leaving the first and the third as improvements claimed by the plaintiff which are controverted by the defendants, and which present the two questions for your examination and decision. These questions are presented in the form of a feigned issue sent from a court of equity to be tried in a court of law before a jury, and it will, therefore, be necessary for you to take them up separately, and examine them, and return a special verdict on each issue, expressing either affirmatively or negatively your answer to each of the questions.

The first question arises on the first claim set forth in the patent of the plaintiff. You are to examine the evidence which has been furnished by the respective parties, subject to the rules of law which will be given to you, and to determine whether or not the plaintiff was the first and original inventor of the improvement covered by the first claim. If he was, you will respond in the affirmative. If he was not, you will respond in the negative.

There has been some difference of opinion between the counsel for the respective parties, as regards the true construction to be given to the first claim, and it will, therefore, be necessary for the court to call your attention particularly to this branch of the case. It will be seen that the patentee, after he has set forth, in general terms, that he has made a new and useful improvement in regulating the heat of stoves, has set forth, with great particularity, two modes by which he adapts this improvement to use, through the arrangement of various machinery; and that then, in this first claim, he claims the application of the expansive and contracting power of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to open and close a damper which governs the admission of air into a stove in which it may be used, by which a more perfect control over the heat is obtained than can be by a damper in the flue. Now, it is the application of the expansive and contracting power of the metallic rod to regulate the heat of the stove by opening and closing the damper, the whole being self-acting in the admission or exclusion of air, that is specifically claimed in this part of the patent; and, according to the construction that I give to it and have always given to it, it is a claim independent of any particular arrangement or combination of machinery or contrivance for the purpose of applying the principle to the regulation of the heat of stoves. I have always supposed, therefore, that the peculiar arrangement or construction of the machinery used did not enter into this branch of the claim. Where a party has discovered a new application of some property in nature, never before known or in use, by which he has produced a new and useful result, the discovery is the subject of a patent, independently of any peculiar or new arrangement of machinery for the purpose of applying the new property in nature; and, hence, the inventor has a right to use any means, old or new, in the application of the new property to produce the new and useful result, to the exclusion of all other means. Otherwise, a patent would afford no protection to an inventor in cases of this description; because, if the means used by him for applying his new idea must necessarily be new, then, in all such cases, the novelty of the arrangement used for the purpose of effecting the application would be involved in every instance of infringement, and the patentee would be bound to make out, not only the novelty in the new application, but also the novelty in the machinery employed by him in making the application.

To illustrate my view, I will call your attention to a decision upon this point. It is a principle established in the case of Neilson v. Harford, Webst. Pat. Cas. 295, 310, 328, and is quoted in Curtis on Patents (section 80): "Where the invention consisted in the application of heated air as a blast for fires, forges and furnaces, but the patentee claimed no particular form of apparatus for heating the air, but described an apparatus by which it might be heated, and the defendant had employed an apparatus confessedly superior in its effects to that described in the plaintiff's specification, and such an improvement as would have supported a patent; but, as it involved the principle of the plaintiff's invention, it was held an infringement." Although the defendant in that case had got up an apparatus which was superior to the apparatus of the patentee, yet, inasmuch as, in his apparatus, he was applying heated air as a blast for furnaces, he was an infringer, because he availed himself of the new idea of the patentee. In section 81 it is further laid down: "In cases of this class, where the most important part and merit of the invention consists in the conception of the original idea, rather than in the manner in which it is to be carried out or applied in practice, it is clear that a principle carried into practice by some means constitutes the subject-matter of the patent. Inventions of this class may have a character totally independent of the particular means by which they are applied, although the patentee must have applied the invention by some means; and, when he has done so, the imitating that character may be a piracy of that invention, although the means may be very different, and such as in themselves might constitute a distinct or substantial invention. The machinery employed is not of the essence of the invention, but incidental to it."

Now, in this case, as I understand the claim of the patentee, he claims the application of the principle of expansion and contraction in a metallic rod to the purpose of regulating the heat of a stove. That is the new conception which he claims to have struck out; and, although the mere abstract conception would not have constituted the subject-matter of a patent, yet, when it is reduced to practice by any means, old or new, resulting usefully, it is the subject of a patent, independently of the machinery by which the application is made. I think, therefore, that in examining the first question presented to you, you may lay altogether out of view the contrivance by which the application of the principle is made, and confine yourselves to the original conception of the idea carried into practice by some means; but, whether the means be old or new is immaterial, for, although old means be used for giving application to the new conception, yet the patent excludes all persons other than the patentee from the use of those means and of all other means in a similar application.

The question, then, is whether, anterior to the patent of the plaintiff, any person had discovered the application of the principle in question to regulate the heat of a stove, and applied it by some apparatus which operated usefully to effect that object. On this branch of the case you have the description of the use of this principle by Dr. Ure, for regulating heat in a stove or furnace. Two illustrations and descriptions of Ure's apparatus are furnished by the defendants. You have also the description and model of the application of the principle by Bonnemain, called the "egg-hatcher"; also the description of the application by Ward, in his ventilator; and the description and model of Evans' contrivance to regulate the admission of cold water into a boiler, with a view to regulate the temperature of the water. You have also the Saxton stove, made in 1838, and produced in court, and the description of Dr. Arnott's stove improved, and the various models of it furnished by the respective parties. In all these cases, the principle of the contraction and expansion of a metallic rod has been adapted to the regulation of heat for what is claimed to have been a beneficial purpose.

As respects the various contrivances of Ure, Bonnemain and Evans, it does not appear that any one of those persons ever applied the principle of the expansion and contraction of the metallic rod to regulate the heat of a stove, by means of the heat produced by the stove itself, thereby producing a self-regulator; and it is, therefore, quite obvious that no one of them had reached the idea. In all these contrivances, with the exception of Ward's, the metallic rod used to produce the motion by which the damper was opened and closed, was not heated by the air of the furnace, but was heated indirectly by the heat of the furnace, by being immersed in hot water. They all, therefore, fell short of the whole idea embraced in the first claim of the patent. Ward's application was applied to the ventilation of a room, and, so far as regards the conception of the idea of regulating the heat of a stove by the use of an expanding and contracting metal, was altogether different from the plaintiff's. It was a use of the principle to regulate a damper, but it was not adapted to regulate the heated air of a stove, which is the application in question here. In this respect, therefore, it was the same as Ure's, Bonnemain's and Evans'.

But, in the Saxton stove, you have the application of the principle in question directly to the regulation of the heated air of the stove, by the opening and closing of a damper to admit or exclude the air for the supply of combustion, by the use of a metallic rod heated by the heated air of the stove itself. The same remark may be made in relation to Dr. Arnott's stove improved, if the counsel for the defendants are right in their version of the description of that stove, and if the model they have produced of it be correct. It is of no great moment, however, on this branch of the case, whether they be right or wrong, as the question will turn on the Saxton stove, made in 1838.

Now, it is insisted by the counsel for the plaintiff, that although there is in the Saxton stove an application of the principle of the expansion and contraction of a metallic rod heated by the stove itself, to regulate its heat, yet the rod is a compound rod, composed of a slip of brass and a slip of iron, firmly fastened together, and the motion of the damper is produced through a deflection of the rod resulting from its curvature, caused by the unequal dilatation, under a given degree of heat, of the two metals composing it, that of brass being greater than that of iron; that such an application is distinguishable from an application of the principle made by the direct linear expansion of a brass rod used in connection with an iron stove; and that, in that respect, the improvement of the plaintiff is distinguishable from the principle or conception applied in the Saxton stove. I lay entirely out of view the machinery, and speak only of the idea of applying the principle to regulate the heat of stoves. Such is the distinction relied on to take the plaintiff's improvement specified in his first claim out of the conception found in the application of the metallic rod in the Saxton stove.

It must be remembered, however, that in the patent the broad claim is made to "the application of the expansive and contracting power of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to open and close a damper which governs the admission of air into a stove in which it may be used, by which a more perfect control over the heat is obtained than can be by a damper in the flue." And one thing must be admitted, that in the Saxton stove the principle of the expansion and contraction of the metallic rod was applied in the regulation of the damper, by causing it to open and close according to the degrees of heat in the stove itself. The means by which Saxton produced this adaptation were indeed different from the means used by the plaintiff, but the principle was the same. This is obvious from the testimony, and so say all the witnesses who have been examined on the question. Saxton's conception of the idea was anterior to that of the plaintiff. He applied the principle by means of a double bar, which produced a curvature. Still, that curvature was produced by the expansion and contraction of the brass rod, which, being greater under the same temperature than the expansion and contraction of the iron rod, resulted in the curvature, giving a motion which was applied to the regulation of the damper.

The plaintiff is presumed, in judgment of law, although I suppose the fact was otherwise, to have had a knowledge of the Saxton stove, and of the application of the metallic rod to regulate its heat, when he applied the rod to the regulation of the stove described in his patent, and he there saw the principle applied by means of the deflection produced by the two compound bars, and of the motion resulting from the curvature.

The difficulty in this branch of the case, on the part of the plaintiff, lies in his claim to the original conception of the adaptation of the principle to the purpose. Saxton's stove having been anterior in time to the plaintiff's, the principle existed there, and was only applied by the plaintiff in a different mode to the same object. The plaintiff used the direct action of expansion and contraction to regulate the stove, whereas the combination of the iron rod with the brass rod had been before used. That would seem to be a different mode of applying the principle, rather than an original conception of the idea of adapting the expansion and contraction of the rod to the regulation of a stove. The idea had been before conceived and applied in the Saxton stove.

I have very little more to say on this branch of the case. All that I desire is, to impress your minds distinctly with the thing that is claimed by the patentee, so that you may not confound with something else the actual claim that is made in the first clause of the patent. That claim is not for any mode or method of applying the expansion and contraction of the metallic rod to regulate the heat of the stove, but it is for the conception of the idea itself. It is for you, bearing that in mind, and weighing the evidence in the case, to say, whether the plaintiff was the original discoverer of this conception or not. If he was not, you will answer the first question in the negative. If he was, you will answer it in the affirmative.

I will now call your attention very briefly to the second question. It arises on the third claim, which is in these words: "I also claim the combination, above described, by which the regulation of the heat of a stove in which it may be used is effected." This claim applies to the apparatus used by the patentee in applying the principle. He has given two descriptions of his mode of application. He claims that he is the inventor of the apparatus thus described, and the claim embraces the whole of the apparatus he has set forth in his first description, and also the whole of the apparatus in his second description, the latter differing from the former only in including the detaching process as a part of the combination. This combination consists of—First, the brass rod, which is used, as it expands and contracts from the action of the heat of the stove, to give the power to open and close the valve; second, the apparatus by which the motion obtained by the expansion of the rod is increased, in order to operate more effectually, which is a combination of levers; third, the adjusting screw, which is used to set the brass rod, with the combination of levers and the connecting rod attached to the damper, at a given degree of temperature, by which different degrees of heat are obtained in the operation of the stove; thus, if, when the stove is cold, you were to set the brass rod with its connections so that the damper should be but just open, a very slight degree of heat would close it; consequently, the stove and the room it was designed to heat would be kept at a low temperature; but, if the apparatus was set with the damper wide open, it would require an extreme degree of heat to produce a sufficient expansion of the metallic rod to close it; fourth, the detaching process, by which the connecting rod is made to act or cease acting on the damper. In the apparatus of the plaintiff, the connecting rod operates directly and positively both to open and close the damper. The damper is not closed by its own gravity, by being released at the extreme of expansion.

This is the combination. There are four elements in it, which I have named. The claim is for the combination of all of them, not for any one of them. It is immaterial whether or not the plaintiff was the inventor of any one or two of them, or of any less than the combination of the whole. They may all be old; and yet, if the plaintiff was the first to combine all four of them, for the particular purpose of regulating the heat of a stove by means of its own heat, he is entitled to be protected in that improvement.

Now, I am inclined to think, although the question has embarrassed me, and I may possibly after all have fallen into an error in regard to it, that the combinations of Dr. Ure in the two instances before alluded to, and the models of which have been produced on the trial, the egg-hatcher of Bonnemain and the contrivances of Evans and of Ward, do not come up to the idea of the combination described and claimed by the patentee and embraced in this second question. I mean, aside from the parts composing the apparatus used by these different persons. As I have before said, when speaking of the first question submitted to you, the contrivances devised by those persons were not constructed to regulate the damper of a stove to be operated on by the heat of the stove. In all the cases mentioned, except that of Ward, the metallic rod was heated, so as to produce the contraction and expansion, by immersion in hot water. The apparatus was made with a view to the heating of the metallic rods in hot water, and not by the heat of the stove, except through the medium of the water which was heated by the stove or furnace. It is quite obvious, that an apparatus to be operated on by the application of hot water, is necessarily different from an apparatus to be acted on by the heat of the stove itself, which is often an extreme heat. This is a view altogether independent of the peculiar arrangement of the apparatus.

It is your duty, however, to look into the arrangement of the machinery used by Ure, Bonnemain, Evans and Ward, to see whether all the elements composing the combination of the plaintiff are found in either of those contrivances—that is, whether you find, in either of them, the brass rod operated on by the heated air of the stove, with a system of leverage to increase motion, the adjusting screw to set the apparatus at a given degree of temperature, and the detaching apparatus constructed in the mode described by the patentee. It is necessary that you should find all these; not only the parts in their peculiar arrangement, but the combination of all the parts of the same peculiar arrangement in one or another of these prior contrivances, in order to make out, in judgment of law, the identity essential to overthrow the claim of novelty involved in the second question.

In addition to those other contrivances, you have again the apparatus used in Saxton's stove. There, there is a direct application of the principle to the regulation of the heat of a stove, and so there is, also, in the case of Dr. Arnott's stove improved, provided you are satisfied with the description of it, and with the accuracy of the model furnished by the defendants. You will, therefore, examine the machinery used in Saxton's stove, which was made in 1838, and see whether the arrangement and combination are or are not substantially the same with those described in the plaintiff's patent.

There is one consideration which it is proper you should take into view, because it may have some weight on this branch of the case, as respects the comparison of the apparatus in Saxton's stove with the apparatus described by the plaintiff. It is this: In the Saxton stove, the compound-bar is used, and the motion is obtained from the curvature which results from the difference of expansion between the brass rod and the iron rod. In the plaintiff's stove, the motion is produced by the direct linear expansion of the rod. It is, therefore, proper for you to keep this in view, when you are examining the means used by each for the purpose of giving application to this expansive and contracting principle of metals, to see whether the means are the same or not, and whether the principle can be adapted and used by the same apparatus when the metal is acting by curvature and when it is acting longitudinally. This is a question of fact, and it has been so long before you and so frequently referred to and explained by the witnesses and by the learned counsel, in the course of the trial and in summing up, that it is unnecessary for me to call your attention more particularly to this branch of the subject. All that I desire is, to present the point so that you may comprehend it. The question is, whether the combination of the different parts of the machinery used by the patentee for regulating the heat of a stove by means of this principle of the expansion and contraction of a metallic rod was new and not before known, or whether the whole of it is to be found in any of the models, stoves or descriptions which have been given in evidence on the trial. If the combination was new with the patentee, then, so far as regards the second question, your response ought to be in the affirmative. If it was not new but was known before, either in a full description or in any of the models or stoves which have been produced, your response should be in the negative.

Mr. Stevens, for the plaintiff, requested the court to charge as follows: 1st. In regard to the first branch of the case, that if an apparatus having the linear expansion, as distinguished from curvature, possessed greater power, and if Saxton's stove was incapable of performing what could be performed by the plaintiff's, then the application of the principle in the plaintiff's stove was a new application.

In reply to this request the court remarked: The objection to that proposition is, that it involves a method or mode of application and the question of a difference in degree, which is not an ingredient in and does not belong to the first question.

Mr. Stevens, for the plaintiff, further requested the court to charge as follows: 2d. That if the apparatus by which Saxton applied the principle contained within itself the elements of its own destruction, it could not interfere with the plaintiff's rights under his third claim.

In reply to this request the court remarked: Although the person who first conceived the idea of applying the principle to the regulation of the heat of a stove by the action of its own heat, is entitled to the merit, yet, if that application was made in a way that was useless, and if it was a failure, it is no impediment in the way of the claim of the patentee; because, as I before stated, a person, in order to entitle himself to a patent for a new application of a property of nature to a useful purpose in the business affairs of life, must not only have conceived the idea, but must by some means have successfully given application to the new property. In other words, the person who first conceived of the application of the expansion and contraction of a metallic rod acted on by the heat of a stove, to regulate the heat of that stove, must, in order to have entitled himself to a patent, have applied the principle usefully by some apparatus or machinery. But then it is not necessary, in any improvement, that the application to the new and useful purpose should be made by the very best apparatus that can be devised. The question does not depend on the degree of usefulness. If the application that was made of the principle operated successfully, so as to be practically useful, although it might not have been the very best, yet it was not a failure.

The jury went out at 12 m. At 6 p. m. the jury came into court, and put to the court the following question in writing: "Shall the jury consider the greater utility of either apparatus, in making up their verdict?"

In reply to this question, the court remarked: The degree of utility is not involved in the issues. There must have been some practical utility in the apparatus set up by the defendants as previously known, to show a want of novelty in the plaintiff's apparatus, but the degree of utility is not in question. One may be better than the other, but that fact is not to be taken into account. The one that is alleged to be prior must, however, have been an apparatus of some practical utility; but, whether it was better or inferior in degree is not a question.

The jury then retired again. But the court immediately sent for them again, and, on their coming into court, the court remarked: I have sent for you, again, gentlemen, for fear that the answer I gave to the question you propounded might lead to confusion as respects the two issues. I want to inquire if the question you put was put with reference to the first issue or the second issue. Foreman: The second issue. We have agreed as to the first issue.

The court then remarked: The second issue turns on the combination and apparatus of the plaintiff to regulate the heat of the stove, that is, the claim of the plaintiff for a combination of four elements. He alleges that that combination was new with him. In order to overthrow the claim involved in the second issue, you must be satisfied that the arrangement set up by the defendants, tending to disprove the novelty of the plaintiff's combination, was an apparatus of practical utility. No matter whether it was superior or inferior to the plaintiff's. It must have been an apparatus of practical utility, and must have embraced in its combination all the elements embraced in the plaintiff's combination; in other words, you must find that it contained an identity of combination.

At 12 m. the next day, the jury rendered a verdict in the negative on both issues.

NOTE. Afterwards, on a final hearing on pleadings and proofs, the court entered an interlocutory decree for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the verdict on the feigned issues. The case went to a master, who took an account. On exceptions, his report was modified, and a final decree was entered for the plaintiff. [Case No. 4,920.] The defendants appealed to the supreme court, where the case is reported as Silsby v. Foote, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 378. That court modified the decree below in some particulars.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Aug. 28, 1856.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY — EXAMINATION OF DEFENDANT IN HIS OWN BEHALF BEFORE MASTER.

1. On a reference to a master, in an equity suit for the infringement of a patent, to take an account, a defendant cannot be examined as a witness in his own favor, if objection be made by the plaintiff.

2. Nor can a defendant be so examined, on his own behalf, by his own counsel, even though he was first called and examined as a party by the plaintiff, or was sworn by the master upon the plaintiff's application.

3. The practice of courts of equity as to the examination of parties on a reference to a master, stated.

This was a bill in equity, praying for an injunction and account for the infringement of letters patent [No. 2,636] issued to the plaintiff [May 26, 1842]. An interlocutory decree was entered in the cause in August, 1853, by which it was adjudged and decreed that the defendants had infringed the plaintiff's patent, and by which it was referred to the clerk of the court, as master, to take the account. The master made his report, and both parties excepted to it on various grounds. One of the exceptions taken by the plaintiff was to the action of the master in permitting some of the defendants to testify as witnesses in their own behalf on the reference, after objection thereto by the plaintiff.

Elisha Foote, plaintiff, in person.

William H. Seward, Samuel Blatchford, and William A. Sackett, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and HALL, District Judge.

HALL, District Judge. One of the exceptions taken by the plaintiff relates to the examination of some of the defendants as witnesses in their own behalf, after an objection made thereto by the plaintiff. In my opinion, the exception is well taken.

Under the 77th rule prescribed by the supreme court for the observance of the circuit courts in equity cases, the plaintiff had a right, without special order, to call and examine the defendants, and each of them, as parties, and to obtain from them, in that mode, evidence in support of the claims made by the plaintiff upon the reference. The object of the rule was to obviate the necessity of providing specially, in each case, by the order of reference, for the examination of the parties before the master, upon the application of the adverse party. It was under this rule that some of the defendants were called and examined by the plaintiff, and it was under this rule that the defendants insisted that they had a right to examine each other as general witnesses upon the reference, after the defendant proposed to be examined in behalf of himself and his co-defendants had been called and examined as a party by the plaintiff, or had been sworn by the master upon the plaintiff's application.

I cannot think that the defendants had the right claimed, and which was allowed by the master. It certainly could not have been intended, by the general language of the rule referred to, to give to defendants a right to be sworn and examined as witnesses in the cause, upon their own application, and to give testimony in their own behalf, against the objections of the opposing party; nor could it have been intended to give to the master an unlimited discretion to make parties witnesses in their own favor, unless such right and discretion had previously existed in the cases in which similar language had been used in the special orders of the court directing similar references. If it had been intended to change the settled practice of courts of equity in respect to a question of great importance, and of such frequent occurrence, it may be safely assumed that the intention to make such change would have been distinctly and explicitly declared.

It is, therefore, proper, if not necessary, to ascertain the practice of courts of equity in cases where this right to examine parties was expressly given by the order under which the reference proceeded in the particular case in which the question was raised. It is, I think, entirely clear that, under such an order of reference, the right to examine the parties to the proceeding is given for the purpose of enabling a party to obtain the admissions and evidence of an adverse party in the cause, or to authorize the master to obtain such evidence and admissions in favor of parties having adverse interests, and who are prevented from attending before him upon the reference by reason of absence from the country, or other cause, the examination of the party being allowed for the purpose of compelling him to make admissions, or give testimony, against his own interest. It was intended thereby to probe the conscience of the defendant, in the exercise of the right to discovery by the oath of the adverse party, which is conceded to suitors in equity, and which right of discovery is one of the original and essential heads of equity jurisdiction. And, although the exhibition of interrogatories duly settled was the original, and, perhaps, in the early judicial history of this state, the most usual form of such examination before the master, the practice gradually became less formal and stringent, and oral examinations have been frequent, if they have not most generally prevailed. It was declared by Chancellor Kent, as early as 1817, that this change was one of convenience merely, and involved no principle of policy or of right. The same view was taken of this question by Chancellor Walworth, in 1828; and he declared, that when a party is examined before a master in relation to his rights in the cause, the examination is in the nature of a bill of discovery. There can be no cross-examination by his own counsel, and he cannot give testimony in his own favor, except so far as his answers may be responsive to the questions put by the opposite party. Remsen v. Remsen, 2 Johns. Ch. 495, 499; Hart v. Ten Eyck, Id. 513; Benson v. Le Roy, 1 Paige, 122; Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1367, 1368; 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 492. The 105th rule of the court of chancery of this state, which took effect January 1st, 1830, declared that the master should be at liberty to examine any party, creditor, or other person coming in to claim before him, either upon interrogatories, or viva voce, or in both modes; and this provision was continued in force until the court of chancery was abolished. But I have been unable to find any case in which it was ever held that, under this rule, a party could be called by the master for the purpose of giving testimony in his own behalf, or could volunteer testimony in his own behalf when called by the opposing party. It is unnecessary to discuss the question of fact, whether the defendant Henion, or the other defendants, were called by their own counsel, or by the master. If by the latter, they testified in their own behalf, on an examination by their own counsel, notwithstanding the objections of the plaintiff; and this is quite as objectionable as an examination under the call of their own counsel, without the intervention of the master. Even if properly called as a witness against another party in the cause, and liable to be cross-examined by the party against whom he is called, a defendant cannot give testimony to be used in his own favor. Benson v. Le Roy, ubi supra. And, in every possible view of this case, the testimony of the defendants, volunteered in their own favor, and elicited by questions put by their own counsel, was improperly admitted. The exception must, therefore, be allowed.[2] nee Indians, which have never been conveyed with the approval of the secretary of the interior.

This was an application to the district judge of the United States for the district of Kansas, for the discharge, from the custody of the sheriff of Wyandotte county, of the abovenamed petitioners [Forbes and Pucket]. A writ was allowed, directing the persons named to be brought before him, which was returned with the bodies of the relators. The material facts are these: In November, 1854, a treaty was made between the Shawnee Indians and the United States, wherein it was stipulated that two hundred acres of the "Shawnee reservation" of lands, should be allotted to each member of the tribe; and where the allottees were minors, the shares of such minors were to be patented to the head of the family, for their benefit. The treaty also provided that the patents should be issued with such restrictions, for the benefit of the Indians, as congress might provide. In pursuance of this provision, in 1859, congress enacted that the restriction referred to should be such as might be prescribed by the secretary of the interior; and, as such restriction, that officer directed that the patents should contain a clause providing that the Indians or their heirs should never alienate lands so allotted and patented to them, without the consent of the secretary of the interior. Under this treaty, certain of said Shawnee lands were allotted to Mary McLane, and patented to Sophia McLane, as the head of the family of which said Mary was a member. The petitioners were in possession of portions of said lands, under supposed conveyances from said Mary, which were executed in the presence of the agent of the United States for the Shawnees, and were paid for to his satisfaction. The conveyances were forwarded to the secretary of the interior for his approval, but it does not appear that they ever have been approved by that officer. One of the heirs of Sophia McLane, claiming to own an undivided half of the lands patented to her, commenced a proceeding in the district court of Wyandotte county, for the partition thereof, denying that the petitioners herein had any rights therein, and alleging that the petitioners were committing waste thereon. Upon that petition the said court made an order restraining the petitioners herein from committing waste upon said lands, pending the suit for partition. For an alleged violation of that order, the petitioners were, by order of that court, committed to the custody of the sheriff of Wyandotte county, as for contempt; which is the imprisonment from which they seek to be discharged.

Glick & Todd, for petitioners.

Scroggs & Sharp, opposed.

DELAHAY, District Judge. If it were necessary to a decision in this proceeding, that the jurisdiction of the state court of the subject matter in controversy, in the proceedings before it, should be inquired into, it would be sufficient, in my opinion, to refer to the case of the Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 737, in which the supreme court of the United States, speaking of the Shawnees, says: "As long as the United States recognize their national character, they are under the protection of treaties and the laws of congress, and their property is withdrawn from the operation of state laws." There can be no question of the applicability of this language to the suit in Wyandotte county, as it is made clearly to appear that the Shawnees still maintain their tribal relation to the United States, and are still recognized by the government as an Indian tribe or nation; and that the secretary of the interior never has approved the conveyances under which the petitioners claim. The deeds are entirely void until approved by that officer; and, until they are so approved, the lands of the Shawnees are as wholly beyond the jurisdiction of the state courts as if they were situated without its geographical limits, as will be seen by reference to the peculiar provisions of the act admitting Kansas as a state. See, also, U. S. v. Ward [Case No. 16,639].

But that is not a question to be inquired into in this proceeding. The first question that it is necessary to consider, is whether a judge of a federal court has jurisdiction in the premises; and the legislation of congress, happily, has left no room for doubt upon that subject. The judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 81, § 14) gave the general power to issue the writ, but, in a proviso, declared "that it in no case shall extend to prisoners in jail, unless when they are in custody under, or by color of, the authority of the United States; or are committed for trial before some court of the same; or are necessary to be brought into court to testify." The act of 1833 (4 Stat. 634, § 7) provides that the federal judges shall have the power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases of a prisoner or prisoners in jail or confinement, where he or they shall be committed or confined, on or by any authority or law, for any act done or omitted to be done, in pursuance of a law of the United States, or any order, process or decree of any judge or court thereof. The act of 1842 (5 Stat. 539) extended the power to courts where aliens were confined, under state authority. The act of February 5, 1867 (14 Stat. 385), gave power to grant the writ "in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States."

To be unmistakably explicit, it will be observed that congress did not stop with providing in what cases the writ might be issued by federal courts and magistrates. Certain cases are mentioned in which it shall not be allowed, conspicuous among which is the case where the applicant is in confinement under the laws of a state, by order of a court thereof. If he be confined contrary to the constitution and laws of the United States, the federal authorities may issue the writ. But the proofs in this case show distinctly and clearly that the petitioners were not in that category. They are in confinement, illegally perhaps, under the order of a state court, in a matter, it may be, over which it had no jurisdiction; but that does not necessarily give them access to the federal judiciary, since they can administer no relief unless the case is provided for by federal legislation. Very manifestly, this case is not such an one; I am, therefore, obliged to set aside the writ heretofore allowed, and leave the petitioners in the custody of the sheriff of Wyandotte county.

Ordered accordingly.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE—WHEN VOID—POSSESSION—A BILL OF SALE—PROOF OF DEBT—PRACTICE.

1. A chattel mortgage authorizing the mortgagor to sell the property mortgaged is void as against creditors, and delay on the part of the mortgagee in taking possession after maturity is fatal to his rights as against creditors or purchasers. The same rules apply as against the assignee in bankruptcy.

2. When the mortgagee took possession some time after the maturity of his mortgage, and sold part of the goods mortgaged, he has no right to apply the proceeds on his indebtedness, but if he has not acted in bad faith he may be allowed to retain sufficient to cover his actual expenses in making the sales.

3. A bill of sale made after possession so taken is a preference, and cannot be used to help out the defects in the mortgage.

4. If, before the maturity of the mortgage, the mortgagor had taken in a partner, the mortgagee can only prove against the estate of the mortgagor—not against the partnership.

5. On motion to expunge a proof of debt and claim to establish a set-off, personal judgment cannot be rendered against the creditor for money in his hands—that must be by suit against him.

Dent & Black, for mortgagee.

BLODGETT, District Judge. A question is raised in this case by way of appeal from the finding of J. A. Crain, register, in regard to a claim made by Joseph A. Hodges. It appears from the proof in the case that on the 2d of December, 1871, said bankrupt, William D. Forbes, was engaged in business as a merchant in Lee county, in this state, having in his store a small stock of goods; that he borrowed of one Little $1,000, for which he gave his note, due in 90 days, with said Hodges as security. And to indemnify him against loss on said note, Forbes gave Hodges a chattel mortgage on his said stock of goods, said mortgage containing the following clause: "Provided, also, that said William D. Forbes may retain the possession of and have the use of said goods and chattels until the day of payment aforesaid, rendering a true account of all sales, having the privilege of continuing the trade and sales and applying the proceeds to payment of said note according to the direction of said party of the second part and understanding of the parties hereto." And Forbes continued to sell goods from his said stock and purchasing others until about the 15th of March, 1872, when Anderson became a partner to the extent of a quarter interest in said business with Forbes, after which Forbes and Anderson purchased goods, used in their said business, for which they contracted debts to an amount exceeding $3,300, which were unpaid at the time they were adjudicated bankrupts. Default was made by Forbes in the payment of the note to Little, and on the 23d of May, 1872, Hodges paid said note, and on that or the next day he took possession of the stock of goods in the store of Forbes & Anderson by virtue, as he claimed, of his said chattel mortgage. Within a day or two after so taking possession, Forbes & Anderson gave to Hodges and Hiram Anderson a bill of sale of said stock of goods with the agreement that they were to sell the same and out of the net proceeds pay the debt due from Forbes to Hodges and a debt of about the same amount due from Andrew J. Anderson to said Hiram Anderson. In pursuance of said agreement Hodges proceeded to keep open the store and sell said goods in the due course of business until about the time the bankruptcy proceedings were commenced against Forbes & Anderson, when he closed the store and subsequently delivered the unsold goods to the assignee of Forbes & Anderson. The money received by Hodges for goods sold by him and outstanding accounts collected amounted to $723.72, and he sold goods on credit to the amount of $119.73, which is still due and unpaid to him. Hodges claims that his expenses in making said sales amounted to $283.50, leaving in his hands $440.23, and yet to be collected $119.73. He now seeks to prove his debt against the estate of Forbes & Anderson for the amount paid on the Little note, and offers to set off and apply the amount so received for the goods sold by him. And the question is, can he be permitted to do so?

Chattel mortgages containing clauses authorizing the mortgagor to sell the property mortgaged have been held void by the supreme court of this state in numerous cases.

Davis v. Ranson, 18 Ill. 396; Barnet v. Fergus, 51 Ill. 352.

So, too, it has been repeatedly held that delay on the part of the mortgagee in taking possession after condition broken is fatal to his rights as against creditors or purchasers. Reed v. Eames, 19 Ill. 594; Buckley v. Lampett, 24 Ill. 604; Barbour v. White, 37 Ill. 164.

The note which Hodges signed fell due on the 2d of March, 1872, and no attempt was made to take possession under the mortgage until about the 23d of May, although the condition was that the mortgagor should pay it at maturity.

This chattel mortgage was then void as against the creditors of Forbes & Anderson for the two reasons above assigned at the time Hodges took possession, and he can claim no rights under it as against the creditors of the firm. The goods mortgaged cannot be identified or separated from the goods of the firm, and the large indebtedness of the firm has been contracted upon the credit given by the possession of these goods. The bill of sale given to Hodges and Hiram Anderson, after Hodges took possession of the stock, cannot be held to supplement or help out the defects of the mortgage because it was manifestly fraudulent as against the creditors of the firm, it being clearly an attempt to prefer Hodges and Hiram Anderson, who were creditors of the individual members of the firm.

The register refused to allow the claim of Hodges as a debt against the firm and also refused to allow the retention of the $440.23 by Hodges.

I think the register was clearly right on both points; and the order of the court should be that the claim of Hodges against the estate of the firm should be expunged, and leave given him to prove it against the individual estate of Forbes.

So far as the money in his hands is concerned it is sufficient to say that this court can render no judgment or decree directing its payment to the assignee, but such payment must be enforced by suit if not paid voluntarily.

As the parties may, however, wish some instruction from the court as to the basis of a settlement of this claim, I will say that I think the assignee may properly allow a reasonable sum to Hodges for the care and selling of said goods, to be determined by inquiring into the facts. So far there is no allegation of bad faith against Hodges in the management of the goods or any charge that he failed to account for those he did not sell. Some expenditures by some one would be necessary to sell the goods, and if those charged by Hodges are reasonable they should be allowed if he has properly accounted for all the goods had by him.

NOTE. See further that chattel mortgages, providing that the mortgagor may retain possession, sell and replenish the mortgaged property, are void as against creditors. In re Manly [Case No. 9,031]; Steinart v. Deuster, 23 Wis. 136; In re Kahley [Case No. 7,593]; Harvey v. Crane [Id. 6,178].

But the mortgage is only invalidated as to the portion of goods permitted to be sold. Barnet v. Fergus, 51 Ill. 352. A clause in the mortgage allowing the mortgagors to retain possession and sell the goods for the mortgagee as their agents, and to account to them for the proceeds, is valid. Hawkins v. Hastings Bank [Case No. 6,244].

Independent of any statute a mortgage is void as to creditors if the mortgagor is allowed to retain possession and sell the property as his own, and a mortgage fraudulent and void as to creditors is equally so as to the assignee in bankruptcy. In re Morrill [Case No. 9,821].

Case No. 4,923.

FORBES et al. v. BARSTOW STOVE CO.

[2 Cliff. 379.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1864.

PATENTS—SURRENDER—WITHDRAWAL—REISSUE—ANTICIPATION—COFFINS—INFRINGEMENT—IMPROVEMENT AS A DEFENSE—SPECIFICATION.

1. Although a surrender of an original patent is the act of the party making the application, still the application may be withdrawn, under leave of the commissioner, for good cause shown, at any time before the proceedings are fully completed and duly recorded.

[Cited in Burrell v. Hackley, 35 Fed. 834.]

2. Reissued letters-patent supersede the original, but a pending application for the purpose of reissue, does not have that effect, no matter how nearly the proceedings may have approached a consummation, so long as they are not fully completed.

3. Prior to the issue of the new patent, the surrender, so called, is nothing but a preliminary offer, which is a necessary means of obtaining a reissue, and may be so treated by the commissioner, at the request of the party applying for the reissue, in the absence of fraud.

4. In this case it was held that the evidence showed the application to have been withdrawn and the duty refunded for good and sufficient reasons.

5. The patent in this case was for an air-tight coffin, corresponding nearly with the human form, composed of two parts, or shells, united by a flanch, each shell being made of cast or raised metal, so as to resist great external pressure, and require less weight of metal than ordinary metal coffins, and each forming a part of the receptacle for the body, and having the line of their juncture nearly at the line of the greatest diameter of the body; held, that the subject of the patent was not the same as the ancient mummy cases of Egypt, and that those mummy cases were not of a character to supersede the invention because they are of wood; they are not impervious to air; they are not composed of two shells united at the line of the greatest diameter of the body; only one of their parts was employed as the enclosure of the body; the two parts were not united by a flanch, and did not both conform to the shape of the human body.

6. Where a defendant did not set out in his answer to a bill for the infringement of a patent, an invention upon which a caveat had been filed, and when subsequently, with leave of court, testimony concerning the invention was taken and filed in the case, but no corresponding amendment was made in the answer, doubts are entertained whether the testimony was properly in the case.

7. A caveat describing a cast-iron case, without any bottom, to let down over an ordinary coffin, after the latter was deposited in the grave, to serve for a covering and protection thereto, was held not to be of a nature to supersede the invention patented, in this case, although the caveator had specified that the metal case might be used for a coffin.

8. Such expression must, in construing the caveat, be taken in connection with the statement that the invention was intended to supply the place of a rough coffin, or a brick or stone vault, and to contain and enclose a common coffin.

9. The patent granted to Amos C. Barstow, April 19, 1859, was held to be an infringement of the reissued patent on which the suit in this case was founded.

10. Where the patentee is the original and first inventor of that which is described in his patent as his invention, he has a right to treat as infringers all who make and sell substantially the same thing, even though the infringing machine or structure may be an improvement on the patented one.

11. Whenever it is set up in defence, that the respondent has substantially departed from an existing patented machine or structure, he must show, or it must appear, that the departure or difference is such as involves inventive genius, and that the change is not within the scope of mere mechanical skill.

12. Improvement of a patented invention is not in general an answer to the charge of infringement; and the defence that the article produced by the respondent is not as good as that of the complainant, is untenable and inadmissible, especially if it is shown to embody all the characteristics which distinguish the article alleged to be infringed.

13. The prima facie presumption is, that a reissued patent has been properly surrendered and reissued; and that presumption will prevail in the absence of any controlling evidence to the contrary.

14. Non-joinder of licensees in a bill for an infringement of a patent, constitutes no defence after the cause has been set down for final hearing.

15. The two principal purposes of the specification of a patent are, to enable the public to know of what the patentee claims to be the inventor, and to enable the public to practise the invention when the patent has expired.

16. The patentee in his specification, does not address himself to the uninformed, but to persons of skill in the art to which the invention appertains, and he is only required to use such full, clear, and exact terms in his description as will enable persons of this class to produce the thing he describes.

[Cited in Flint v. Roberts, Case No. 4,875.]

This was a bill in equity [by John G. Forbes, Robert Squiers, William M. Raymond, William H. Forbes, and Burnett Forbes], praying for an account and for an injunction against the corporation respondents, for an alleged infringement of certain letters-patent belonging to the complainants. Letters-patent were granted to one Almond D. Fish, of New York, for a new and useful improvement in coffins. Title to the patent was subsequently acquired by John G. Forbes and Robert Squires, as assignees, and on the 6th of March, 1860, the same was surrendered and reissued to them as such assignees, for the term of fourteen years from the date of the original patent. The patentees were parties to the bill of complaint, and the other parties were made such because they claimed to hold certain local rights to make and vend the thing patented, either as assignees or exclusive licensees, under the reissued patent. The answer denied, in the first place, that the assignor of the last patentees was the original and first inventor of the improvement; and, secondly, that the respondents were in any way guilty of any infringement of the supposed invention. Several other defences were also set up by the respondents, which it becomes necessary to mention, as appertaining to the merits of the controversy. They contended that the original patent was not lawfully surrendered, and therefore that the reissued patent was illegal and void; also that the surrender of the original patent was made, and the reissue procured, by the false and fraudulent representations of the last patentees; also that the commissioner of patents, under the circumstances disclosed in the pleadings and evidence, exceeded his authority in granting the reissue, because, as defendants contended, it appeared that all of the assignees did not apply for the same; and also because it appeared on the face of the patent, that the reissue was not for the same invention as the original. It was also insisted that the description of the invention was not in such full, clear, and exact terms as would enable any person skilled in the art to which it appertained to construct the patented article. Pending the suit, on the 17th of November, 1862, the defendants filed a motion that the bill of complaint should be dismissed, alleging for cause, that the letters-patent on which the suit was founded had been surrendered since the suit was commenced. The bill of complaint was filed on the 1st of October, 1860; and the allegation of the motion was, that the complainants, on the 13th of November, 1862, surrendered the reissued patent described in the bill of complaint, and that the same was under that date again reissued. Leave was accordingly granted to both parties to take further testimony, not only as to the alleged surrender of the patent as specified in the motion to dismiss, but also in respect to the questions growing out of the prior surrender and reissue; and also in respect to the novelty of the invention. The motion to dismiss was argued at the same time with the merits of the controversy, but inasmuch as the question involved in it was preliminary in its nature, it was first considered by the court.

The claims of complainants' patent were as follows:—

1st. The manufacturing of coffins of cast or raised metal, when made substantially in the form and manner above described, that is to say, corresponding nearly with the human form, and making the coffin in two parts, or shells, united by a flanch, substantially as above set forth.

2d. The manufacture of coffins of raised or cast metal, in two shells, each formed with recesses of greater or less depth, which shall respectively constitute a portion of the receptacle of the corpse, thus approximating the coffin more nearly in shape to that of the human body than could otherwise be done.

The respondents claimed the right to manufacture under a patent of which the following is a portion of the description of the specification and the claims:—

"The object of the present invention is to obtain all the advantages of a metallic burial-case, without the objections of excessive weight, or expense, and at the same time combine the desiderata of beauty of form and additional strength. I effect these results by forming the burial-case at its ends, i. e. at the ends corresponding to the head and feet of the corpse, in ogee forms, or nearly so, and the main body, or lower portion thereof, with overlapping ribs, for giving additional strength, by which means, as the ogee terminates, in its widest point, at the place occupied by the shoulders, the most room is obtained where the most room is required, without adding to the weight of the casket, or its expense, and this taken in connection with the strength imparted by the overlapping ribs, diminishes the weight at least twenty-five per cent from the square metallic burial-cases now commonly used."

"A. A. in the drawing, represents the main body, or lower portion of the burial-case, with overlapping ribs b. b., &c., as clearly shown in figure 3; by which construction it will be evident that both lightness and strength are secured. Both ends of the burial-case are constructed in ogee or cyma reversa curves cc-cc, the ogee terminating at its widest point where the shoulders demand the most room."

"What I claim in my invention, and desire to have secured to me by letters-patent, is, constructing a metallic burial-case with the ogee-shaped ends as described, whereby great reduction in weight, and economy in the manufacture is secured, and at the same time all the space required, afforded."

"Second, I also claim forming the metallic case, with the overlapping strengthening ribs, as described."

This patent was granted to one A. C. Barstow, April 19, 1859.

T. A. Jenckes, for complainants.

The fact that the reissued patent of March, 1860, is now in the possession of the complainants, and produced in court, is conclusive against the assertion that any surrender and further reissue of it was made during the pendency of this suit. The presumption in favor of the regularity of the manner of procuring the original and reissued patents, is sufficient to sustain them in the absence of proof against them. As to the legality of the surrender the reissued patent is sufficient evidence. Stimpson v. West Chester R. Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 380; Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74. The questions in this case are novelty of the invention and infringement. Except in mere external resemblance, the mummy cases have no similarity whatever to the Fisk burial-case. The body is entirely in the part which corresponds to the common coffin; and the carved work representing a relief of the human body is entirely upon the lid. They are not made in two shells, but as a box with a lid, or rather with two lids or coverings. They are of wood, and not of metal. They are in many pieces, and not in two. They are pervious to air. They are affected by heat and moisture. They furnish no suggestion of the mode of manufacturing a metallic coffin. The Fahnestock caveat cannot be set up against an independent original inventor, who perfected his invention and obtained his patent, while his unsuccessful experiments were being made. Curt. Pat. §§ 44, 45; Jones v. Pearse, Webst. Pat. Cas. 124; Galloway v. Bleaden, Id. 521-526; Gayler v. Wilder, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 477. Besides, the idea of Fahnestock did not conflict with Fisk's invention.

W. Hayes and B. T. Eames, for respondents.

A patent in order to be the foundation of a judgment in an action at law, or of a decree in a suit in equity, must be in existence at the time of such judgment or decree. Moffitt v. Garr, 1 Black. [66 U. S.] 273. The surrender of a patent pursuant to the act of congress of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 122], is, in judgment of law, a legal cancellation of the patent. Moffitt v. Garr, 1 Black. [66 U. S.] 273. The complainants, Raymond & Co., have no interest in the patent of March 6, 1860; the original patent of November 14, 1848, having been surrendered with their consent. Gibson v. Richards [Case No. 5,399]. The effect of a surrender of a patent is not dependent upon the fact of a subsequent reissue of the patent. The act of congress authorizes a reissue only upon a surrender. The surrender must precede in point of time the reissue. Act Cong. July 4, 1836, § 13 [5 Stat. 122]. There was nothing new in the idea of coffins being made of metal. This is admitted in the original and reissued patent. The substitution of one material for another is not the subject of a patent. Hotchkiss v. Greenwood, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 248. There was nothing new in dividing the coffin horizontally, in such a way that each part or shell should hold a portion of the human body. Coffins were so made by the Egyptians. A coffin of curvilinear form, having the least possible weight of metal (which must correspond in shape to the human form), could not be used if divided elsewhere than in the widest diameter. In other words, a human body could not be put in a case having an opening smaller than the body. But it is a practical necessity of the art of moulding, and practised as long as the art itself, to divide curvilinear cast, or raised metallic bodies, longitudinally, in the widest part, or diameter. A patent cannot be granted merely for a change of form. Sargent v. Larned [Case No. 12,364]; Winans v. Denmead, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 341. Nor is there anything new in the combination or manufacture consisting of a cast or raised air-tight metallic case having a flanged joint in a plane, and having the least amount of metal requisite to contain the thing enclosed. Defendants' invention is not an infringement of complainants' patent. The Barstow casket cannot be made by following the specifications, claim, and drawings of the reissued patent, nor can the Fisk coffin be made by following the specifications, claim, and drawings of the Barstow patent.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The evidence disclosed in the record does not show that the patent on which the suit was founded ever was surrendered and reissued after the bill of complaint was filed in the case. On the contrary, the proofs are full to the point that the application for surrender and reissue, bearing date on the 13th of November, 1862, never was carried into full effect, but that the application was duly cancelled, and the papers relating to the same were accordingly returned to the applicants. The application for surrender and reissue was unquestionably made by the patentees at the time alleged in the motion; and it is also fully proved that the application was favorably received by the proper officers of the bureau, but it is equally clear that the proceedings were never entirely completed. Authority is given to the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of a patent, by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification, as his own invention, more than he had or shall have a right to claim as new, to cause a new patent to be issued to the inventor, if the error arose by inadvertence or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention. [Act July 4, 1836]; 5 Stat. 122.

The surrender is, undoubtedly, as is contended by the respondents, the act of the party making the application; but it is a mistake to suppose that the application may not be withdrawn, under leave of the commissioner, for good cause shown, at any time before the proceedings are fully completed and duly recorded. The reissued letters-patent, as a general rule, have the effect to supersede the original patent, but a pending application for that purpose cannot receive any such construction, no matter how nearly the proceedings may have approached to a consummation, so long as they are not finally completed. Prior to the issuing of the new patent, what is called a surrender in the case, is in general nothing more than a preliminary offer to that effect, as the necessary means of obtaining a reissue; and even when not so intended in the outset, it may be subsequently so treated by the commissioner, at the request of the party applying for the reissue. Where bad faith is shown as an element of the case, a different conclusion would doubtless follow; but the withdrawal of the application may be allowed by the commissioner for any reasonable cause, where there is no fraud practised to procure it, and where there is no prejudicial interference with the rights of third persons. Nothing of the kind appears in this case; but the proofs are full and satisfactory that the application was withdrawn and the surrender cancelled, and the money paid as duty, refunded, for good and sufficient reasons, and with the knowledge and consent of the commissioner. The result is, that the motion to dismiss must be overruled.

The record shows that the complainants introduced the reissued letters-patent on which the suit is founded; and the universal rule is, that the letters-patent when in regular form are prima facie evidence that the person therein designated as the inventer was the original and first inventor of what is there described as his invention. The statement of the specification is, that metallic coffins have heretofore been made of shapes corresponding to those which are usually constructed of wood, and the representation is, that in consequence of their great weight, and the difficulty of rendering them air-tight, and other objections, they have not been generally used. The principal purpose of the present invention, it is said, is to obviate those objections. The structure of the coffin, as represented in the specification, is made to conform, as nearly as may be, to that of the human body. The preferred mode of accomplishing this object is by constructing the coffin of two shells, an upper and a lower one, of nearly the same depth, which are joined together in a horizontal line at or near the middle point in the height of the coffin. The intimation is given, however, that the place of juncture may be varied to suit the views of the manufacturer, but it is evident that no very considerable departure from the centre line can be made, without making it necessary to enlarge the the size, and consequently to increase the weight of the structure, which, instead of promoting, would defeat one of the purposes of the inventor, as represented in the specification. The object of the inventor in that behalf is to dispense with all unnecessary weight of metal. His statement is, that the two shells are more or less curvilinear in all their parts, and that they may be made as thin as the running of the metal will allow, and still leave them sufficient strength to resist any pressure to which they may be subjected.

Granting that to be so, still, unless the two shells are of nearly equal depth, the receptacle must be larger than the corpse, else there will be difficulty either in depositing the body in the lower shell, or in joining the two shells together, as the one or the other contains the greater portion of the depth. Some variation undoubtedly may be made without any departure from the other conditions of the specification, but the better opinion is that the juncture was, as represented, intended to be substantially at or near the middle line of the structure. The claims of the patent are two, and their true construction leads to the same conclusion in regard to the form and structure of the patented invention. (Here the court recited the claims above given.)

The upper as well as lower shell constitutes a portion of the receptacle, and in that manner the coffin is approximated more nearly to the human body than could otherwise be done, which also shows that the juncture of the two shells must not vary so much from the centre line of the structure as to render it inconvenient to place the corpse in the intended receptacle, or to create the necessity for enlarging the structure.

The complainants having introduced the reissued patent, the burden of proof is upon the respondents to show that the assignor of the complainants was not the original and first inventor of the improvement. Stimpson v. West Chester R. Co., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 380; Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74. The respondents admit that the burden is upon them, on this branch of the case, and refer to the evidence in the record to overcome the prima facie case of the complainants. They refer to the mummy-cases in evidence, proved to have come from the catacombs of Egypt, and insist that those models, if such they may be called, are of a character to supersede the invention described in the bill of complaint. But it is manifest that the proposition cannot be sustained for several reasons, some of which will be mentioned and briefly explained.

First, the structure is of sycamore wood, and not of cast or raised metal, as described in the complainants' patent.

Secondly, the testimony clearly shows that the ancient structure, although it has two parts, corresponds much more nearly to the ordinary wood coffin of the present day than to the patented invention under consideration. The lower part is obviously the receptacle for the corpse, and the upper part is nothing more than an elaborately carved lid or cover. The depth of the lower part is nine or ten inches, whereas the depth of the upper part, even including the carved or raised work, is at most not more than four inches, and at some points is much less. Although the structure has an upper and a lower part, still it is hardly correct to say that it is formed of two shells, for the reason that the lid or cover is in several parts; and also for the reason already given, that the upper part is much more fitly designated as a carved lid or cover than as a shell, to which it bears little or no resemblance. All of the carved work is upon the upper part, which is made to represent a relief of the human body, and it is quite evident that the unusual depth of the part was designed as the foundation for the carved work which it contains, and not as having any necessary connection with the ordinary purpose of a burial-case beyond that of a lid or cover of usual depth. The burial-case exhibited as a sample of those taken from the catacombs is not only made of wood, and not of metal, but it is not in two parts only, as is the invention of the complainants, but in many parts, and unlike that of the complainants, is pervious to air, and is liable to be affected both by heat and moisture. The characteristics of the invention of the complainants are widely different. They may be stated as follows: First, that the structure is composed of two shells, which, when joined together in the manner described, form a receptacle for the human body; second, that each of the shells encloses a part of the body; third, that the shells are united by a flange and screws, making the seam air-tight the whole length; fourth, that the two shells as a whole approximate to the form of the human body, and that the line of their juncture is nearly at the line of the greatest diameter of the body; fifth, that the structure will have sufficient strength to resist any pressure to which it may be subjected, and yet require less weight of metal than metallic coffins heretofore known and used; sixth, that it is perfectly air-tight, and not affected by changes of heat or moisture, and consequently is capable of preserving the human body from decomposition for a long time. Such are the principal characteristics claimed for the invention; and if it be true that they are not all fully realized by it, still it may well be affirmed that, when properly constructed, the invention tends strongly to their accomplishment.

The caveat and application for a patent of A. K. Fahnestock, offered in evidence by the respondents, were not set up in the answer as corresponding inventions to supersede the patent of complainants; but on the 24th of November, 1862, leave was granted by the court to take testimony upon that subject. Doubts are entertained whether the evidence is properly in the case, as no corresponding amendment has been made in the answer; but it is unnecessary to place the decision upon that ground, as it is clear that that evidence, if admissible, is wholly insufficient to establish any such defence, because it shows that the caveator and applicant never made any such invention. He, in fact, made no invention, and what he attempted to make was substantially unlike that of the complainants. What he attempted to make was a cast-iron case without any bottom, to be let down over an ordinary coffin after the latter was deposited in the grave. Stress is laid upon the fact that the caveator said that it might be used for a common coffin; but that expression must be taken in connection with the statement that it was to contain and enclose a common coffin, and to supply the place of a rough coffin, and become a substitute for a brick or stone vault. The applicant himself states in his deposition, that the invention was to take the place of a rough coffin or brick vault, for the preservation of the remains of human bodies; and although there are some statements in the deposition indicating an intention to give the supposed invention a wider range, still it is evident that it cannot in any point of view be regarded as of a character to support this branch of the defence.

A particular examination of the other device introduced by the respondents, as evidence to supersede the patent of the complainants is unnecessary, as it is quite obvious that it cannot have any such effect. The conclusion is, that the assignor of the complainants is the original and first inventor of the improvement described in the reissued patent.

The next issue in the pleadings is that of infringement; and upon that question the burden of proof is upon the complainants. The respondents admit, that they have been and are manufacturing and selling burial-caskets, constructed according to letters-patent granted to Amos C. Barstow, bearing date on the 19th of April, 1859; but they deny that the burial-caskets so manufactured and sold by them constitute any infringement of the reissued patent of the complainants, which is one of the most important questions in the case. The opinion is expressed by experts of skill and experience, that the structure of the respondents is substantially the same manufacture as that described and claimed in the reissued patent on which the suit is founded. The reasons assigned for this opinion are in substance and effect as follows: that the one as much as the other is made of metal; that in both the coffin is composed of two shells, an upper and a lower one, which meet at a longitudinal point; that in the one as well as in the other the respective shells constitute a portion of the receptacle of the body which is or is to be contained partly in one shell and partly in the other, and that in both, the adjacent edges or rims of the respective shells have flanges upon them, which are connected together by screws, so that a tight joint can be made at the seam. They also testify, that in both the structures, the two shells are smaller as they recede from their line of juncture, and that they are rounded at the angles, so as to approximate more or less to the form of the cross-section of the body they are designed to contain, and are also made smaller at the ends than towards the middle, so as also to approximate more or less to the longitudinal form of the body, and to be of less weight than they would be without such approximation. The witnesses show, undoubtedly, that the coffin particularly described and represented in the reissued patent of the complainants, approximates more nearly to the form of the human body than the structure manufactured and sold by the respondents, but the weight of the testimony clearly shows that the difference between the two in that behalf is not a substantial one, but only a matter of degree. Where the patentee is the original inventor of that which is described in his patent as his invention, he has the right to treat as infringers all who make and sell substantially the same thing, even though the infringing machine or structure may be an improvement on the one patented. McCormick v. Talcott, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 405. Whenever the defence set up is that respondent has substantially departed from an existing machine or structure, so as to avoid the consequences of an infringement, he must show or it must appear that the departure is such as involves invention, and not mere mechanical skill. There must be mind and inventive genius involved in it, and not the mere skill of the workman. An improvement of the patented invention of another is not in general a sufficient answer to such a charge; and the defence that the article produced is not as good as the patented article is equally untenable and inadmissible, especially if it appear that it embodies all the peculiarities or characteristics which distinguish the article alleged to be infringed. The article manufactured and sold by the respondents, it is said, is stronger, more spacious, more cumbrous, and more expensive than that produced by the complainants; but the weight of the evidence shows that it embraces all of the principal characteristics claimed in the complainants' patent, and is, therefore, an infringement. The attempt is also made by the respondents to maintain the proposition that the original patent was improperly surrendered, and that the reissued patent on which the suit is founded was procured by the false and fraudulent representations of the present patentees; but the proposition is not supported by the evidence, and therefore cannot be sustained. The prima facie presumption is against the proposition, and of course that presumption must prevail in the absence of any controlling evidence in the case.

The validity of the reissued patent is also assailed upon the ground that the commissioner exceeded his jurisdiction in accepting the surrender and granting the reissue. The suggestions in support of the proposition are, that all of the assignees did not apply for the new patent, and that it appears on the face of the specification and claim that it is not for the same invention as that described in the original patent. The first suggestion is entitled to no weight, as the whole title, as shown in the pleadings, was in the applicants. Nonjoinder of licensees constitutes no defence for an infringer at this stage of the litigation. The assignees may tender a surrender and apply for a reissue of the patent; and there is nothing in the pleadings in this case to show that there was any irregularity in the proceedings.

The second suggestion is also untenable, because wholly unfounded in law and fact. The reissued patent is for the same invention as that described in the original specification. An extended examination of this proposition is unnecessary, as it appears, upon a comparison of the specifications in question, that the essential parts of the description in each are substantially in the same language.

The remaining objection is that the description of the invention is not set forth in the patent, in such full, clear, and exact terms, as to enable any one skilled in the art to which it appertains, to construct the patented invention. The settled rule of construction in this country is, that the patent and specification are to be construed together in order to ascertain the subject-matter of the invention. Curt. Pat. §§ 121, 155; Whittemore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,600]; Hogg v. Emerson, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 479. The drawings also annexed to a specification, in compliance with the statute, are held to form a part of it, and are in like manner to be regarded in the construction of the whole instrument. Earle v. Sawyer [Case No. 4,247].

The specifications are required for two principal purposes: First, to inform the public what the thing is, of which the patentee claims to be the inventor; and, secondly, to enable the public, after the expiration of the patent, to practise the invention from the specification, as therein described. Whether the patentee has described the subject-matter, or what he claims to have invented, so as to enable the public to know what his claim is, is in general a question of law for the court on the construction of the patent. Curt. Pat. § 130, p. 130.

But whether he has described the invention in such full, clear and exact terms as to enable the public to practise it from the specification, is in general a question of fact to be determined in common-law cases by a jury. The act of congress does not require the patentee to address himself to the uninformed upon the particular subject, but allows him to speak to persons of competent skill in the art; and it only requires him to use such full, clear, and exact terms, as will enable that class of persons to reproduce the thing described, from the description given in the specification. Testing the case by that rule, it is clear that the objection under consideration cannot be sustained, and it is accordingly overruled.

The complainants are entitled to an account.

FORBES v. GRACEY et al.

[Trans. Rec. U. S. Sup. Ct. Oct. Term, 1876, p. 11,967.]

Circuit Court, D. Nevada. April 26, 1877.[1]

TAXATION — RIGHT OF STATE TO TAX ORES EXTRACTED FROM MINING CLAIMS—INJUNCTION BY STOCKHOLDER IN CORPORATION—PARTIES.

[1. One stockholder in a corporation can maintain a suit, for the benefit of all, to enjoin the collection of illegal taxes, when the board of trustees refuse to do so.]

[2. It is unnecessary, in such a suit, to make all the stockholders, or even the directors, parties. It is proper, however, to join as defendants, with the taxing officers, the superintendents of the corporation, who, it is alleged, will pay the tax unless restrained.]

[3. The stockholder has no adequate remedy at law in such a case for, although the corporation itself might maintain an action to recover the tax after it is paid, or to replevin property distrained by the tax collector, the stockholder has no such title as would enable him to do so, and the very gist of his complaint is that the corporation refuses to use its legal remedies.]

[4. Ores extracted from mining claims immediately become subject to state taxation, for, although the legal title to the land is still in the United States, the property in the ore is in the miner, and the tax is in no sense a tax upon property of the United States.]

[See note at end of case.]

[5. Ores extracted from mines within a state, and there reduced, have a situs in the state for the purpose of taxation, although they are mined by a corporation of another state; and where the rate of annual taxation is fixed, and the tax levied at the beginning of the fiscal year, it is immaterial that, under the tax laws (Act Nev. Feb. 1871), the assessment or valuation for taxation of the ores mined in each quarter is made at the end of the quarter, and after the proceeds of the ore have been carried out of the state.]

[See note at end of case.]

HILLYER, District Judge. This is a motion made on behalf of the complainant [Charles Forbes] for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendant [Thomas] Gracey from collecting and the other defendants [the California Mining Company, John W. Mackay, and James G. Fair] from paying the tax laid upon the proceeds of the California mine for the quarter ending June 30, 1876. The motion was made upon the bill, and the defendant Gracey shows cause against it by a demurrer and an affidavit touching the equities of the bill. The bill alleges that the complainant is an alien and a stockholder in the California Company; that that company is a corporation organized under the laws of California, and that Mackay and Fair are citizens of Nevada; that said corporation is in possession of the "California Mine," but has never purchased it, and the title is still in the United States. It then refers to the compact in the Nevada enabling act not to tax or interfere with the disposition of the public lands, and quotes at length the law of Nevada taxing the net proceeds of mines. It states that the defendant Gracey is assessor of Storey county, and has assessed the ores taken from said mine against the said company for the second quarter of 1876 and a tax upon them of $72,852.03; that he has demanded and still is demanding from the defendants, Mackay & Fair, superintendents of said company and its agents at Virginia City, the said tax, and that said Gracey "has" threatened and still threatens and is about and will, unless restrained, seize property of said company and sell it to satisfy the tax; that the tax is one collected every three months, and is a continuing grievance; that the defendant Gracey is irresponsible for the amount of any one quarterly tax, and his bond is for only $40,000; that the Nevada tax law unjustly discriminates against the mines; that the tax and assessment are invalid and illegal, because at the time the assessment was made the yield of the mine had not then become "proceeds" and because the yield for that quarter, at the time the assessment was made was not within the state of Nevada, but had been exported therefrom; that Mackay and Fair are about to and will pay the said tax unless restrained. The bill next alleges the notice given by complainant to the corporation of his interest as a stockholder of the tax and its illegality, and his demand that the corporation institute suit to test its validity, and his protest against the payment of the tax, and the refusal of the corporation to comply; that he sues for other stockholders who shall, in due time, come in, and he is entirely remediless, except in a court of equity.

The demurrer is upon several grounds; those urged being that the complainant has a complete and adequate remedy at law, and there is a total want of equity in the bill; that there is a nonjoinder of necessary parties plaintiff, because all the stockholders should have been joined; that there is a defect of parties defendant, because the directors should have been made defendants and Mackay and Fair should not have been.

Upon the argument the point was made that a stockholder cannot maintain a suit of this kind, although the rights of the corporation are involved and the board of trustees refuse or decline to take the proper steps to assert them. But this point is settled authoritatively in favor of the right of the stockholder to sue, under the circumstances mentioned, by our supreme court. Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 331; Davenport v. Dows, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 626. And see Huntington v. Central Pac. R. Co. [Case No. 6,911]. And, while the corporation must be made a party to the bill, it is held unnecessary to make the directors parties in such suit when no relief is prayed against them. Heath v. Erie Ry. Co. [Id. 6,306], and cases there cited; Davenport v. Dows, supra. So it seems equally well settled that the suit can be maintained without making all the other stockholders parties, at least if the suit is brought by one for the benefit of all. It is no longer doubted, says our supreme court, in Dodge v. Woolsey, "either in England or the United States, that courts of equity have a jurisdiction over corporations at the instance of one or more of their members." Winch v. Birkenhead, L. & C. J. Ry. Co., 13 Eng. Law & Eq. 506. Mackay and Fair are alleged to be the agents of the corporation of whom payment of the tax has been demanded, and about to pay the alleged illegal tax, unless restrained. Under these circumstances they seem to me to be proper, though, perhaps, not indispensable parties to the bill. I consider none of the objections made to the parties in the bill well taken.

The next point raised by the demurrer is that the complainant has an adequate remedy at law, and that there is no fact stated in the bill authorizing the interposition of a court of equity. It is admitted that the illegality of the tax and the threatened sale of property for its payment constitute, of themselves alone, no ground for such interposition. The rule is that "there must be some special circumstances attending a threatened injury of this kind distinguishing it from a common trespass, and bringing the case under some recognized head of equity jurisdiction before the preventive remedy of injunction can be invoked." Dows v. Chicago, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 108. The "special circumstances," which give a court of equity jurisdiction, may be such as require the aid of the court by injunction to prevent or remove a cloud on complainant's title, to prevent a multiplicity of suits, "or to prevent any injurious act by a public officer for which the law gives no adequate redress." Carroll v. Safford, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 459; Dow v. Chicago, supra; Huntington v. Central Pac. R. Co., supra. Does the law furnish this complainant with adequate redress for the injury which he sets out in his bill? As this case is now presented upon bill and demurrer, it appears, for the purposes of a decision on this point, that the defendant corporation is about to pay, and will pay unless restrained, an illegal tax, and that the corporation refuses to bring any suit or take any steps to test the validity of the tax or resist its collection. It may, then, be granted that the corporation itself, in case it saw fit to proceed, would have complete legal redress, either by paying the tax under protest and suing to recover it, or by an action of trespass or replevin against the officer seizing property to satisfy it without granting that this complainant has any such legal redress within his reach. For the very gist of his complaint and the main ground upon which he stands in a court of equity is that the corporation is about to pay the illegal tax, and refuses to use its legal remedies; and nothing can be clearer than that the stockholder has no such direct legal interest in or right to the property of his corporation as enables him to sue in a court of law for an injury to that property. The legal right to the property taxed is in the corporation, and according to all legal rules an action for an injury to that right must be brought by the corporation. Where, then, is the stockholder's legal redress? He himself cannot sue to enforce the rights of the corporation without making it a party defendant, so that it may be bound by the judgment. Davenport v. Dows, supra. So, too, ordinarily in a suit like this, all the other stockholders must be made defendants, or the suit be brought, as in this case, for their benefit. The case is one of equitable cognizance in every aspect. It has been held that where the state laws made no provision for suit against the state, and a portion of the tax, when collected, was paid into the state treasury, the plaintiff was left without any adequate relief at law, and might enjoin the illegal tax. First Nat. Bank v. Douglas Co. [Case No. 4,799]. The state of Nevada has no law authorizing suits against it, and its portion of the taxes when collected is paid into the county treasury for the use and benefit of the state, and is paid over to the state treasurer whenever that officer and the comptroller order it to be done. 2 Comp. Laws Nev. pp. 209, 218, 219. If it should be admitted that the stockholder can sue either the trustees or the corporation at law for the misappropriation of the corporate funds to the payment of an illegal tax, then every other stockholder can sue, and this leads directly to a multiplicity of suits.

Upon this question I am of opinion that the bill in this case does state the special circumstances which bring the complainant's case within the recognized heads of equity jurisdiction, taking it for granted that the tax is illegal, as the bill states.

The remaining points are to the merits of the case made by the bill. The first one is, whether the tax upon the proceeds of the mine—the mine being a part of the public domain—is a tax upon the mine itself, so far as to be a violation of the compact contained in section 4 of the Nevada enabling act, "that no taxes shall be imposed by said state on lands or property therein belonging to the United States," or an interference with the power of congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. Numerous authorities were cited by the complainants, establishing beyond all question that congress has the entire control of the public lands; that it may sell or give them away; that so long as the United States remains the owner they cannot be taxed by the state; that when the lands have been sold or donated, and the certificate of entry of the land officer has been given, the government holds the naked legal fee in trust for the purchaser, who then has the equitable title, and the lands are then, and not before, subject to state taxation, although the patent has not issued. Witherspoon v. Duncan, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 210. A very forcible argument has been made by complainant's counsel against the power of a state to tax—as is done in California and Nevada—the value of improvements on or of possessory rights to the public lands within the state. In the view I have taken of this case, however, I do not find it necessary to decide that question. The tax complained of in this case is not nominally a tax on the improvements or possessory right, but a tax on the proceeds of the mine, or, in the language of the statute, "on the ores and mineral-bearing material of whatever character" extracted from the mine. These ores are assessed quarterly, in the mode provided by statute. Such a tax, it is agreed, is in effect a tax on the mine, which is the property of the United States, just as a license tax on the importer was held to be a tax on imports. Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 419. Courts, it is said, should and will look through names and forms to the substance and reality; and hence, if this burden does really fall upon the mine, it is none the less illegal because levied in the name of a tax on the ores extracted. All this must be conceded. But the state is only prohibited from taxing the lands or other property of the United States, so that if it be found that the United States has in fact parted with all its interest in the ores taxed, this case is taken out of the rule laid down in Brown v. Maryland.

The policy of congress touching the public mineral lands as found in its legislation, is, in some important respects, different from that touching other public lands, and to my mind has an important bearing on the main questions involved in this case. This difference in policy springs from the diversity in the two species of property. The beneficial occupation and enjoyment of mineral land requires the destruction of the estate—the taking away of all there is in it of value. Agricultural land, on the contrary, in the course of proper husbandry, increases in value with time and its profitable use and enjoyment. A moment's inspection of the mining laws will show that congress, while retaining the naked legal title in the United States, has in fact parted with all that is valuable in the mines. By section 2322 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it is provided that "the locators of all mining locations * * * on any mineral vein, lode, or ledge situated on the public domain, their heirs and assigns, * * * so long as they comply with the laws of the United States, and with state, territorial, and local regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States governing their possessory title, shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their location, and of all veins, lodes, and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines," etc. And by section 2324, upon the failure of any one of several co-owners to contribute his proportion of the required expenditures, after notice published, "his interest in the claim shall become the property of his co-owners." And in section 2332, liens which have attached to a placer claim before patent are not to be impaired by the issue of the patent. The practical effect of this legislation is to confer on the mining locator and his assigns something more than a pre-emption right. The locator acquires under it an exclusive right of possession, which he can transmit to his heirs and assigns, and this possession continues so long as the laws are complied with. His "possessory title" is recognized, and the state laws regulating it also, if not in conflict with the laws of the United States. In short, under this law the locator has a valuable possession of and property in the mine, and may lawfully take out and appropriate all the valuable ores and mineral therein; that is to say, all there is of value in the estate. What more would a patent secure to him? Practically nothing. Indeed, it is common knowledge in this state that the right secured by the locator under this law is regarded as of about equal dignity with a patent, and, in some instances, as the preferable title to a mine. It seems to me indubitable that the ore extracted by a locator or his assigns is his property, as absolutely as if the government had clothed him with a perfect legal title to the mine; and it is impossible for me to see how a tax on this ore so granted to the miner is a tax on the lands or property of the United States. In McCullough v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 415–436, the supreme court, while holding a tax on the operations of the bank unconstitutional, said that the opinion did "not extend to a tax paid by the real property of the bank in common with the other real property within the state, nor to a tax imposed on the interest which the citizens of Maryland held in the institution." I cannot perceive that a tax upon the real property of the bank would not as nearly be a tax on its operations as a tax on the proceeds of a mine. The proceeds, being the property of the miner, is a tax on the mine. So in the Railway Tax Cases, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 232, although it was held that a tax of so much per ton on freight carried from one state to another was a tax upon transportation, and therefore a regulation of commerce forbidden by the constitution, yet it was laid down "that the gross receipts of railroad or canal companies, after they have reached the treasury of the carriers, though they may have been derived in part from the transportation of freight between states," had become subject to legitimate taxation. It was submitted, too, that this tax would ultimately increase the cost of transportation. Is this tax on the proceeds of the mine any more a tax on the mine than a tax on a railroad car or on the gross receipts is a tax on transportation? I think not. Yet both, in some degree, perhaps, approach taxation admitted to be unlawful. If, then, I have rightly conceived the import and effect of the mining law, and it does operate as a virtual transfer to the locator of the entire property in the ores extracted, it must follow that a tax on those ores is neither a tax on the property or lands of the United States nor any interference unwarrantably with the disposition of the public lands, and that the complainant's objection to it is not a valid one.

It is next to be determined whether the property taxed was within the jurisdiction of the state when it was taxed. The bill states "that at the time said tax assessment was made, the yield of said California mine for the said second tax quarter of the year 1876 was not within the state of Nevada, but had been exported therefrom, nor was the owner of such yield, to wit, the California Mining Company, then within the state of Nevada, or then or ever a citizen thereof, or a resident therein. This is not denied, but the answer to it is that the property taxed, though out of the state at the time of the assessment, was within it when the tax was levied. The course of taxation of this species of property is as follows: By the general revenue law an annual ad valorem tax of 125 cents upon each 100 dollars value of taxable property is levied for state purposes upon the "assessed value" of all "taxable property in this state," including the proceeds of mines and mining claims. 2 Comp. Laws, § 3125. The manner of assessing the proceeds of mines is as follows: It is the duty of county assessors to compare and complete quarterly, on or before the second Monday in February, May, August, and November in each year, a tax list or assessment roll of the proceeds of mines "in their respective counties for the preceding quarter." The assessment is made upon ores extracted and reduced or sold during the quarter preceding the assessment. The value of the ore is ascertained by deducting from the gross yield or value of the total number of tons extracted and reduced or sold during the quarter the cost of extracting, transporting, and reducing or selling the ore. Act Feb., 1871; 2 Comp. Laws, p. 225. By section 6 of this act of 1871, it is provided that "every tax levied under the authority of the act shall be a lien on the mine from which the ores are extracted, which shall attach on the first days of January, April, July, and October of each year. The facts may be stated thus: During the quarter ending June 30, 1876, as shown by its own statement, the net yield or value of the ores extracted by the California Mining Company for that quarter was $3,736,000.46. The assessment was made upon this valuation, but made after the expiration of the quarter, and after the bullion obtained by the reduction of the ores had been exported beyond the state.

The ores taxed are taken out and reduced in this state during the quarter. The California Mining Company is a non-resident.

Under these circumstances, is the tax on the proceeds legal? Was the property taxed so, within the jurisdiction of the state during the fiscal year, as to be a proper subject of taxation? For if it was, the power of the state as to mode, form, and extent of taxation is unlimited unless restrained by provisions of the constitution of the United States. State Tax on Foreign-Held Bonds, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 300. State taxation may touch property within its jurisdiction in every shape—in its natural condition, in its manufactured form, and in its various transmutations. Id. "The protection of the government," says Mr. Cooley, "being the consideration for which taxes are demanded, all parties who receive or are entitled to that protection may be called upon to render the equivalent. But a personal tax cannot be assessed against a non-resident, neither can the property of a non-resident be taxed unless it has an actual situs within the state, so as to be under the protection of its laws." Cooley, Tax'n, 14. For some purposes personal property is said to have no situs, and, in the absence of positive law in the place of its location, its transfer is regulated by the law of the domicil of the owner. Story, Confl. Laws, § 383. But for the purpose of taxation it may have an actual situs district from the domicil of the owner. People v. Commissioners of Taxes, 23 N. Y. 224. In the case of ores extracted by the California Company it seems to me clear that there is a time during the quarter for which they are taxed when they have an actual situs in this state for the purpose of taxation. That is during the time, after they are taken out of the mine, that they are undergoing the process of reduction, and until, at least, the bullion produced by such reduction is carried out of the state. As a subject for taxation they have no other situation. During that period they are protected in Nevada, and may be taxed and regulated by that state. This being so, is it indispensable that the bullion obtained from the ores taxed should be within the state at the time the assessment roll was made up? The complainant insists that it is, but the defendant Gracey says that it is sufficient if the property taxed is within the jurisdiction of the state at the time of the levy of the tax. By the revenue law of Nevada it is provided that an annual tax "is hereby levied and directed to be collected and paid." Boards of county commissioners are authorized to levy a tax for county purposes each year. As the word is used in this revenue law, the levy of a tax seems to be nothing more than a declaration by the legislature or the board of commissioners of the amount of tax which shall be assessed and collected for a given year. Strictly, however, a levy is the raising of a tax, and includes its assessment, collection, and paying over. If the levy of the tax does bind property, it is immaterial, for the purposes of this case, whether it takes effect on the first day of January, which is the first day of the fiscal year, or on the first day of April, as seems to be the judgment of the supreme court of Nevada, because that is the day when the lien for taxes attaches each year (State v. Eastabrook, 3 Nev. 173), or on the first day of each quarter, as to the proceeds of mines; for, in either case, the levy of the tax now in question, in the sense of the Nevada revenue law, was made before the property taxed was removed from the state and county. But be this as it may, I am constrained to uphold the validity of the tax and of its assessment for the following among other considerations: The provision of the legislature levying and fixing the rate of the tax, the assessment of property on which the tax is imposed, its collection and payment over to the treasurer, are all a part of one thing, directed to the accomplishment of one object—which is raising revenue for each fiscal year. The property taxed must be within the jurisdiction of the state during the fiscal year, it is true; but it is not, it seems to me, essential that it should be so situate at every stage of raising the tax. The property once where the state has a right to tax it for any given year or quarter, I cannot see that the power of the state to tax necessarily depends upon the length of time it remains there. The right to tax having attached, the state must be the judge of the mode to be employed for its taxation; with that the courts have nothing to do. "It is not for us," says the supreme court of the United States, "to suggest in any case that a more equitable mode of assessment or rate of taxation might be adopted than the one prescribed by the legislature of the state; our only concern is with the validity of the tax; all else lies beyond the domain of our jurisdiction." Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 206–231.

The objections to this assessment seem to me to be to the mode rather than to the right of assessing. Whether the assessor shall attend each day at the mine and assess the ores as they reach the surface, or follow them to the reduction works and there assess their value, or shall wait, as prescribed by the existing law, until the expiration of the quarter, and then assess the value from sworn returns made to him by the officers of the company having the necessary knowledge of the facts, are but different modes of ascertaining the value of the property subject to taxation during the quarter for which it is so assessed. If the assessment were laying the tax it would be difficult, indeed, to sustain the present tax. But it is not so. The word assessment as used in the Nevada revenue law means determining the value of property subject to taxation, and is made after the tax is laid and the rate of it fixed. It being true, as I think it is, that there was a time during the second quarter of this fiscal year when the state had jurisdiction to tax the proceeds of the California mine by reason of their actual situs here, it may take any mode consistent with its constitution for assessing the value and collecting the tax. The mode pursued in this case has been held by the supreme court of Nevada to be both "uniform" and "equal" in the sense of those words as used in the constitution of Nevada. This decision I am bound to accept as conclusive. The same is to be said of the uniformity and equality of the rate of the tax. State v. Kruttschnitt, 4 Nev. 178. The limitation on the power of the state to tax beyond that found in its constitution and laws is that the property shall be within its jurisdiction, and this I have found to be the fact here. The rule to show cause is discharged, and the temporary restraining order is dissolved.

The case of this same complainant against the Consolidated Virginia Mining Company, Thomas Gracey, John Mackey, and James G. Fair, is one involving the same questions as the foregoing, and was argued at the same time. A like order is to be entered in that case.

[NOTE. It seems the circuit court rendered a decree dismissing the bill of complaint on the demurrer. From this decree, complainant took an appeal to the supreme court where it was duly affirmed, Mr. Justice Miller delivering the opinion. It was held that, the moment ore becomes detached from the soil in which it is imbedded, it becomes personal property, the ownership of which is in the man whose labor, capital, and skill have discovered and developed the mine and extracted the ore or other mineral product. It is then free from any lien, claim, or title of the United States, and is rightfully subject to taxation by the state, as any other personal property is.

[In reference to section 6 of the statute which makes the tax a lien on mines or mining claims, it was held that the words "mines or mining claims" were evidently intended to distinguish between the cases in which the miner is the owner of the soil, and therefore has perfect title to the mine; the act giving a lien for the tax only upon a mine when owned by the miner, or upon his claim thereto when the title is in the United States, mining claims being property, and the subject of bargain and sale. Forbes v. Gracey, 94 U. S. 762.]

HOPKINSON, District Judge.

Judgment. Edward Forbes of Dublin, in Ireland, has libelled against the brig Hannah for the amount of certain bonds of bottomry, which Francis Lewis, then captain and principal owner of the vessel, gave as security for moneys advanced by Forbes, in the port of Dublin, for necessaries, as it is said, for the said brig, and to enable her to complete her voyage. The circumstances of this case appear, from the testimony, to be as follows: Francis Lewis, principal owner of the brig Hannah, had chartered her to one Varlo, for a voyage from America to Dublin. Varlo himself went passenger, with his goods, and Lewis was captain for the voyage. After their arrival at Dublin, Lewis borrowed money of Forbes at three several times; for which he gave three bonds of bottomry on his vessel, amounting, with premium and charges, to £214. 0s. 8d. sterling money of Great Britain. Forbes then put a cargo on board the brig, in which it seems that Lewis was concerned; as he was to have one half of the net profits of the adventure, exclusive of freight, and to be answerable for one half of the loss, if any there should be, on the sales. Lewis left Dublin with this cargo, bound for the city of Boston, in America. But it does not appear by the exhibits, whether he ever arrived at Boston, or what he did with the cargo. It appears, however, that in April last he was with this brig in the port of Philadelphia, at which time his mariners sued in this court for wages due, and the brig was thereupon attached and condemned for payment of wages, amounting to £29., Lewis making no plea or defence against the libel. In consequence of this sentence, a writ issued to the marshal, in the usual form, directing him to sell the brig Hannah, with her tackle, apparel and furniture, or such parts thereof, as might be necessary to satisfy the decree in favour of the mariners, together with the costs and charges of suit. But Lewis requested the marshal to sell the whole of the vessel, with her tackle, &c. under the decree, and even indorsed this request upon the writ of sale: and to prove that he was the sole owner of the brig at that time, he exhibited to and lodged with the marshal, an assignment, or bill of sale, from one Simpson, who had been a part owner, of all his interest in the brig to Lewis. Andrew Hodge, the respondent in the present cause, purchased this vessel at the marshal's sale, and paid down the full consideration money, out of which the marshal deducted the mariner's wages and costs of suit, and paid the balance to Lewis, as sole owner. After this, Lewis went off without saying any thing of the bottomry bonds he had given to Forbes in Dublin. And now these bonds have come over, and Forbes has attached the brig in the hands of Hodge, the purchaser.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

From these circumstances, two questions have arisen, viz. 1st. Whether these bottomry bonds have hypothecated the vessel, according to the rules of maritime law, so as to bring the cause within admiralty jurisdiction? 2d. Supposing it to be so, whether the sale and purchase, under the authority of this court, have not vested the property in the respondent, exonerated of all prior engagements?

To determine the first point, it will be necessary to consider the characteristic marks which distinguish an hypothecation according to the maritime law, from a common bottomry bond or mortgage on a ship, according to the custom of merchants, and cognizable by the common law. By the maritime law, "a master of a ship hath no power to take up money by bottomry, in places where his owners dwell: but when he is out of the country, and where he hath no owners, or any goods of theirs or his own, and cannot find means to take up by exchange or otherwise, and that for want of money the voyage might be retarded or overthrown, moneys may be taken up upon bottomry." Molloy, bk. 2, c. 11, § 11. From this it appears, that the true grounds of a maritime hypothecation are, the necessities of the case, and the want of personal credit. Wherever this doctrine occurs in the books, these two circumstances are strongly pointed out. Thus, in 3 Mod. 244., "The reason of the civil law, which allows the pawning of a ship for necessaries upon the high sea, seems to be plain; because there may be an extraordinary and invincible necessity, to which the admiralty jurisdiction is limited; for, if the law should be otherwise, the master might take as much money as he will." And so the court, in that case, ordered a trial on the necessity. So also in Bridgeman's Case, Hob. 12., a prohibition was granted, because the impawning was not shewn to be occasioned by necessity. In 1 Magens, there is a report of an admiralty suit on a bottomry bond: At the conclusion (page 329), the author says, "Persons living in seaports may learn from this case, not to believe or trust too easily a captain they do not know; and when they propose benefiting themselves by lending money to bottomry, to such whose distresses oblige them to seek it: the lenders, for their own satisfaction and security, ought to have proofs given that there was a necessity for such an advance, and that the money had actually been employed for the purposes alleged."

Further, the impawning must be in foreign parts; that is, where neither the owner, nor master, hath any personal credit. For, this constitutes an essential part of the necessity. "The master can have no credit abroad, but by hypothecation." Salk. 35. "Where a ship in distress is forced into any port where her owners have no correspondents to supply the master with the money necessary to enable him to prosecute his voyage, he may take it on bottomry from those who will advance it on the easiest terms." 1 Mag. 27. The reason is, the maritime law requires that the moneys should be lent solely on the credit of the ship; and that the security of the lender should depend altogether on her safety; and, therefore, if the ship be well engaged, that is, according to the principles stated, she shall be for ever obliged till redemption. Molloy, bk. 2, c. 2, § 15. And, therefore, also, because of the hazard, an unusual interest or premium is allowed on the moneys advanced.

Such are the principles which designate a maritime hypothecation within admiralty jurisdiction. But bottomry bonds may be given by owners for security of mercantile or other debts; and these may be executed either in the places where the owners dwell, or in foreign parts by their order. They may be formed under a variety of circumstances, and depend on many contingencies, according to the conditions or terms of the deed or contract. It should seem, by the necessity so frequently urged as the ground of a maritime hypothecation, that the ship should be driven by distress into some other port than that of her destination; or, at least, that some extraordinary casualty should occasion an unforeseen and inevitable expense in the port of her voyage. Because, it is hardly to be supposed that an owner would send his ship, much less that he would take her himself, to a place where he could not command either money or credit for ordinary repairs and supplies.

In the present case, it does not appear, nor has it ever been suggested, that any extraordinary circumstances occasioned an unforeseen necessity. The captain, Lewis, who was also principal owner, arrives after a prosperous voyage, at the port of destination, with his freighter on board. Here the voyage is completed, and it may be presumed that he then received his freight. If so, he could not be without money sufficient to refit his vessel for a new voyage. And that he was not without personal credit is manifest; because Forbes entrusted him with a new cargo, and agreed to allow him 35s., Irish money, per ton for freight, on all the goods he should deliver; and also, one half of the net profits arising from the sale of the cargo, he to run one half of the risk of loss. This mercantile connexion shews, at least, that Lewis was in some credit with Forbes. Besides, if we look into the accounts, we shall find that the first article charged is for £32. 5s. 6d. sterling paid to Mr. Varlo by Lewis's order, to take up and cancel a former bottomry bond. It seems strange that Lewis, after navigating Varlo and his goods across the sea, should fall in his debt. This circumstance is not at all accounted for; but, be it as it may, Forbes should certainly have forwarded this former bottomry bond, with an account of the occasion and expenditures for which it was given, that a judgment might have been formed whether it was a proper hypothecation or not; or have shown that the brig was under condemnation of the admiralty at Dublin on account of that bond, and that the £32. 5s. 6d. was paid for her redemption. Upon a view of the circumstances of the present case, I do not find them such as the maritime law requires, to constitute a genuine hypothecation, within admiralty jurisdiction. This point being conclusive, it is unnecessary to determine on the second general question. I adjudge that the bill in this cause be dismissed, and that the libellants pay the costs of suit.

There was an appeal from this decree; but the high court of errors and appeals confirmed the sentence.

Case No. 4,926.

FORBES et al. v. MEMPHIS, E. P. & P. R. CO. et al.

[2 Woods, 323.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Texas. May, 1872.

CORPORATIONS—RIGHTS OF STOCKHOLDERS—REMEDIES FOR INJURIES—SUIT IN EQUITY — REFERENCE—DECREE PRO CONFESSO—INTERVENTION.

1. A commercial or other business corporation is constituted so as to do business in a corporate name, and in a capacity totally distinct from that of any or all of its members considered as individuals.

2. Such a corporation is a person; its property is not the property of its stockholders, nor are its rights their rights.

3. The rights of a stockholder in such a corporation are to attend stockholders' meetings, to participate in the profits of the business, and to require that the corporate property and funds shall not be diverted from their original purposes, and if the company becomes insolvent, to have its property applied to the payment of its debts.

4. For the invasion of these rights by the officers of the company, a stockholder may sue at law or in equity, according to the nature of the case.

[Cited in Belmont Nail Co. v. Columbia Iron & Steel Co., 46 Fed. 337.]

5. All remedies for injuries to the property or rights of such a corporate body must be prosecuted in the name of the company; all demands against the company must be prosecuted against it by name.

6. But where the officers and managers of a company, by fraud and collusion with third persons, are sacrificing, or are about to betray or sacrifice the interests of the corporation, a stockholder may, for such breach of trust and conspiracy, call the guilty parties to an account in a court of equity.

7. After a decree pro confesso, taken in a cause in equity, it is often proper for the court to inform itself through its own officers, as by the report of a master, or by deposition, or other inquest or proceeding, more particularly as to the exact facts of the case.

8. Where a suit in equity was properly instituted against a railroad company by a stockholder, a bondholder, and the trustees for the bondholders named in the land grant mortgages of the company, in behalf of themselves as well as all other stockholders, creditors or bondholders who might desire, and be entitled to intervene, and the bill charged that the officers, agents and directors of the company were squandering and embezzling its property, and the purpose of the suit was that the assets of the company might be preserved and administered, and the relief prayed was proper to be granted, and a decree pro confesso had been regularly entered, a receiver properly appointed, an authentic report of the facts made to the court, and its judgment passed thereon; individual stockholders were not permitted to intervene in the suit as defendants, and file a cross bill on a general charge of fraud and collusion on the part of the receiver, and erroneous judgment on the part of the court in making the order referred to.

9. In such a suit, in which such proceedings had been taken, it is not the proper practice to allow individual stockholders to intervene to set aside the proceedings, or to interpose obstacles to the progress of the suit. Such stockholders may come in to take the benefit of the proceedings and decree, but not to oppose and nullify them.

10. In such a suit, rival creditors, by proceedings before the master, may fix the priority of their respective liens, and creditors or stockholders may contest the validity of the claims of other creditors and stockholders, but all in subordination to the general object and purpose of the suit, to obtain an administration of the company's assets and property.

11. In such a suit, persons will not be allowed to intervene as general defendants and contestants, unless they show that they have an interest in the results as stockholders or otherwise, and are also able to show fraud and collusion between the plaintiffs in the suit and the officers of the company having charge of its interests.

[This was a bill in equity by Paul S. Forbes and others against the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company.] Heard upon motion to vacate an order allowing certain persons to intervene as defendants, and file answers and cross bills.

Courtlandt Parker, for complainants.
Gray & Davenport, for receiver.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The bill in this case was filed against the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation of Texas, by a stockholder, a bondholder and the trustees for the bondholders, under the land grant mortgages of said company, on behalf of themselves and all other stockholders, creditors and bondholders thereof, alleging various gross acts of fraudulent management and fraudulent contrivance and misrepresentation on the part of the directors, officers and agents of the company, whereby the said bondholders, mostly citizens of France, had been induced to purchase its land grant bonds to the amount of over $5,000,000, under a representation and pledge that the money should be devoted to the construction of the road, so as to secure the grant of the lands which formed the basis of the mortgages and the only security for the payment of the bonds. The bill charges that the money thus procured constituted the only pecuniary means and resources of the company, and this money, instead of being used for the purpose to which it was pledged, was being utterly squandered, wasted and embezzled by the said officers and agents, with the assent and connivance of the directors, and that the bondholders, as well as the bona fide stockholders, were in danger of losing every cent of their money by the said fraud and embezzlement; that the company had been rendered utterly insolvent thereby, and that the lands would be entirely forfeited by nonperformance of the required conditions, and that there was no means of saving anything from the wreck for the bondholders and other creditors, unless the officers were prohibited from further meddling with the concerns of the company, and a receiver were appointed to take what property and rights remained, and either go on and construct the road, or sell the franchises and property, subject to the mortgages and debts, to some company or association that would go on and complete the work, and thus secure the benefits which formed the entire value and security of the bonds and obligations of the company. The bill prayed for an adjudication of the matters charged, for relief, and for an injunction and receiver.

If the allegations of the bill are true (and their truth seems to be strongly sustained by all the evidence which has been presented), the corporation, through its officers, directors and agents, and by means of pretended contracts, has carried on a vast scheme of fraud, by which millions of dollars have been abstracted from an unsuspecting community, reposing confidence in the character of American institutions and securities.

The interest and reputation of the country, as well as the direct injury sustained by the complainants, require that an adequate remedy, if such a remedy exists in our system of legal procedure, should be promptly and firmly applied to the case.

The bill, with the proper verifications and with due notice to the company, was presented to the court in July, 1870.

The injunction prayed for was granted, and a receiver was appointed to take charge of and administer all the assets, property and franchises of the company. The proper process being served, and no defense or appearance tendered, a decree pro confesso was entered, as of course, at the November rules, 1870.

On January 24, 1871, the receiver, by a memorial or petition duly verified by oath, reported his proceedings, and the state of facts which he found to exist, with reference to the company's affairs, fully sustaining all the allegations of the bill, and exhibiting in detail the various operations of the company, its condition and resources, the disposition that had been made of its stock, property and funds, and the liabilities which it had incurred, showing that it was hopelessly insolvent, that its property and assets, to a considerable amount, had been in part sequestered in Paris, in part attached in New York, and in part detained for duties in New Orleans; that its offices were closed, that it had done comparatively nothing towards the accomplishment of its objects, and that its operations had been entirely suspended for more than a year.

From this report it appeared, amongst other things, that prior to the late civil war, the company had surveyed a route from the eastern boundary of Texas to El Paso, and had made return of the same to the general land office of Texas, and that the commissioner of said office had officially recognized the said line, and that thereby the limits of the reservation of lands for the company's benefit had become defined; and it further appeared, that before the breaking out of the war, the company had graded about sixty-five miles of its road, and that what was done so far was by virtue of a contract with one Thomas C. Bates; it further appeared that, to secure the fulfillment of that contract on the company's part, it had, in 1860, executed bonds to the amount of $350,000, and a trust deed or mortgage to secure the same upon all the lands and property of the company, or any lands or property that might thereafter be acquired by it; it further appeared that none of these bonds or any interest thereon had ever been paid, but that they remained on deposit in a New Orleans bank, and that Bates was engaged in litigation with the company in regard to his claims for construction or upon his contract.

This appeared to be the result of all that was done prior to the war.

Since the war, about twenty or twenty-five miles of road had been graded, about three miles of track had been laid down, and loose rails had been dropped along the line for a few miles further. Ten locomotives, purchased in France, together with a lot of about one hundred and twenty tons of railroad iron, had been detained at New Orleans for nonpayment of duties, which, in the case of the locomotives, exceeded their value. The other railroad iron had been sold or attached in New York for claims against the company. This, from the report of the receiver, seemed to have been the whole extent of the real operations of the company in the construction of its vast work across the whole northern portion of Texas, an extent of nearly a thousand miles, and in the accomplishment of this result, or at least so much of it as had been performed since the close of the war, there had been issued forty millions of stock and about thirteen millions of bonds and land certificates.

Nothing else remained, as the result of this vast issue of securities, which the receiver could lay his hands on, except a few thousand shares of stock in the Memphis & Little Rock Railroad Company and in the San Diego & Gila Railroad Company, and a residuum of less than three hundred thousand dollars of cash assets accruing from the land grant bonds sold in France. A more utterly fraudulent concern, a more empty bubble of speculation, is rarely to be met with in this highly speculating and fraudulent age.

And yet, as appeared from the report, there are franchises and rights to grants of land belonging to the organization, which, in the hands of an honest and energetic association, backed by sufficient capital, could probably be made available to pay off most of the real indebtedness of the company, and relieve it and the country of the odium which the present concern has brought upon both. In the struggle of capitalists for the establishment of rival trans-continental lines between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the franchises of this company might be rendered available to supply a valuable link in one of them.

The disposal of these franchises, and the remnants of property left, to an association organized with sufficient capital and influence to accomplish such a purpose, the receiver thought, and so reported to the court, was the only means left of realizing from the property and franchises of the company the slightest security or hope of meeting its just obligations. In this view of the case the court was decidedly disposed to agree with the receiver.

It is true that such an arrangement would have the effect of leaving the entire stockholding interest without anything to show for their stock; but that result, if the company was really insolvent and really a bubble company, seemed to be inevitable in any event.

The course proposed might save the claims of honest creditors, and would really be the only means of doing so, whilst it could do no real injury to the stockholders.

A disposition of the franchises and property of the company, in the manner and on the basis suggested, the receiver reported, could be made. A company had been incorporated by the legislature of Texas, in July, 1870, entitled the Southern Trans-Continental Railroad Company, the capital stock of which had been subscribed by some of the most wealthy and responsible capitalists of New York City, and which was empowered to construct a railroad on or near the route of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, and to purchase the property and rights of said company, such charter being undoubtedly obtained in view of the insolvency and failure of the latter company. The receiver reported an agreement which could be effected with said new company, which would have the effect of securing the ultimate payment of the debts and obligations of record of the defendant company. The trustees of the two land grant mortgages (all of whom except James M. Pollock, a trustee in the second mortgage, are complainants in the suit) filed a petition at the same time with the receiver, concurring generally in the plan proposed, but insisting that such proceeds of the land grant bonds as had not been dissipated and yet remained should be held by him as a trust fund or guaranty for the construction of the road, according to the solemn pledges originally given, and should not be delivered to the purchasers until that object should be accomplished and the grants of land, on the basis of which the mortgages rested, should be finally secured and rendered complete.

The proposition thus made, after being taken under consideration by the court, and modified so as to require the purchasing company to take the property and franchises, subject to any balance which might remain due upon every valid debt of the defendant company, was approved, and the receiver was authorized to carry it out by the execution of the contracts, so modified, and the sale of the franchises and property of the defendants to the new company. Thus it will be seen that provision was made in the arrangement which was effected, for the ultimate payment of every valid debt of the company.

At this stage of the proceedings, after the passing of the last-mentioned order, and in the latter part of April, 1871, the present interveners appeared and desired to be allowed to become parties to the suit, and to intervene for their respective interests. Having, as the court thought, presented a prima facie case, orders were made in accordance with their request, and the order authorizing the receiver to effect the proposed sale was suspended until the interveners could formally present their case by petition or cross-bill, and be heard in reference thereto.

As soon as the counsel for the complainants and the receiver were informed of these orders for leave to intervene, they applied for a rule to show cause why such orders should not be vacated and set aside; and a rule to show cause was accordingly granted in such case.

The present argument is upon these rules to show cause, and the question to be decided is whether the applicants should have been allowed to intervene or not. The parties thus seeking to intervene are, first, James T. Sanford and John Van Nest, of New York, who allege that they are directors and stockholders of the defendant company, and they seek to intervene for the protection of their own interest and that of the other stockholders and creditors, on the ground, as alleged in their petition, that in May, 1870, the parties to the suit (except the company) entered into a conspiracy to dispose of the property of the company and convert it to their own use, and that this suit is part of the means used to effect their object, in which they have procured counsel to represent the company; that they have procured a large quantity of the company's mortgage bonds at a small price, which they intend to use for the same purpose; and that the receiver is in collusion with them, and acting collusively for his own interest; that the proceedings in the suit were secretly managed, and the petitioners never heard of the receiver's appointment until long after it was made.

The other parties seeking to intervene are George W. Gerrish, Rogers Fowler and Abraham Rex. Gerrish is the assignee of Thomas C. McDowell, of his share in a certain contract for constructing the company's road, which was made on the 8th of August, 1866, between the company and said McDowell, Fowler and Rex. The petitioners claim that under that contract they are entitled to a large amount of the company's stock which was transferred to and subscribed by them; that they fully performed the agreement on their part, furnished and paid the sum of fifty thousand dollars guaranty or earnest money, as therein provided, and did proceed to and did build a portion of the railroad as required, and hence became entitled to their respective interests. They therefore claim to intervene, as stockholders, for their interest involved in the suit, on the grounds, as stated in their petition, that certain leading officers of the company (who, they admit, have received and converted to their own use, immense sums of money, as stated in the bill of complaint) have fraudulently combined with the receiver to dispose of the property of the company and convert it to their own use; that the suit is employed as part of the said scheme, including the other allegations in reference thereto, made by Sanford and Van Nest, and that the proposed sale to the new company will result in irretrievable loss to the creditors and stockholders, and is intended for the personal advantage of the confederates. Neither of the petitioners questions the main allegations of the bill, unless it be the company's insolvency, but on the contrary, corroborates them.

Testimony has been taken by the respective parties.

In order properly to understand the questions thus raised, it will be necessary to examine the general character of suits and proceedings in equity against corporations in their relation to the interests of the stockholders, and the general right of the latter to intervene therein, pro interesse suo.

A commercial, or other business corporation, is constituted for the specific purpose of suing and being sued, granting and receiving, buying and selling, and doing other business in a corporate name and capacity, totally distinct from that of any or all of its members considered as individuals. A corporation is a person. Its property is not the property of its stockholders. Its rights are not their rights. They have only an indirect interest therein. The rights of a stockholder are to meet at stockholders' meetings, to participate in the profits of the business, and to require that the corporate property and funds shall not be diverted from their original purpose. If the company become insolvent, it is the right of the stockholders to have the property applied to the payment of its debts. I do not know of any other rights except incidental ones, subsidiary or auxiliary to these. Of course, a stockholder has ordinarily a right to a certificate for his stock, to transfer it on the company's books, and to inspect these books. For the invasion of these rights by the officers of the company, he may sue at law or in equity, according to the nature of the case.

But all remedies for injuries to the property or rights of the company must be prosecuted in the name of the company, and all demands against the company must be prosecuted against the company, by name, unless its officers or agents, by fraud and misrepresentation, have rendered themselves personally liable. A stockholder, in his character of stockholder, cannot sue, nor, unless specially made liable by the charter, can he be sued for any of the company's transactions. There is one case, and one only, in which he can interpose, and that is where the officers and managers of the company, by fraud and collusion with third persons, are sacrificing, or are about to sacrifice and betray the interests of the corporation. For such breach of trust and conspiracy, he can call the guilty parties to an account in a court of equity.

In the case before the court, the complainants might possibly have held the officers and agents of the company personally liable for the frauds and misrepresentations charged against them. But the said officers and agents were clothed with all the authority and power of the corporation, and negotiated and operated in its name, and issued its obligations upon its corporate credit, and in every official way involved and pledged its corporate liability, and being the legal representatives of the corporation, placed before the world as such by the corporation, the parties injured had a perfect right to proceed against the corporation for redress. It cannot be, and is not seriously pretended, that the principal complainants in the case, the trustees of the land grant mortgages and bondholders, are acting in collusion with the officers of the company, or that they have any other object in view than the protection and security of the bondholders, who, it is admitted, have been most outrageously defrauded out of their money.

Here, then, we have a suit brought by grossly injured parties, against the proper defendant, for relief, which, according to the view of the court, it is competent to give. The petitioners were not proper parties, and could not have been made parties without rendering the bill obnoxious to a demurrer.

It is not alleged that the complainants are colluding with the officers of the company, or that they are guilty of any improper conduct. On the contrary, the institution of the suit and its general objects appear to be approved by the petitioners. They admit all the most serious charges made by the bill.

Nor can it be pretended that the suit was not properly instituted; process was served or duly acknowledged by the president of the company. The justice who granted the original injunction and appointed the receiver declined to proceed until that officer had been personally notified of the proceedings, and had waived all objections to a hearing of the motion out of the circuit limits. Besides this personal notice and waiver, the counsel of the company, who had been recognized as such in various proceedings in other courts, appeared and made no objection to the hearing, but acquiesced therein.

Service of process and notice upon an insolvent corporation, which has ceased to carry on business, and is fast undergoing the process of disintegration, is not always an easy matter; but it is believed that not only the president, but all the principal officers of the defendant corporation were apprised of the institution of the suit, and of the proceedings thereon.

Sanford and Van Nest, who claim to be directors, allege that they were not made aware of them until some time after the receiver had been appointed. But it was not essential that they should be notified, and it is not pretended that it was by reason of any fault or neglect of the plaintiffs that they were not notified.

It seems to me that the suit was regularly instituted against the proper party, and that there was no collusion or fraud in the institution thereof; so far, then, as the plaintiffs are concerned, the petitioners are not entitled to intervene in the suit, or to interpose any obstacle to its termination.

The receiver appointed by the court entered upon a vigorous prosecution of his duties, took possession of all assets of the company which he could find, inquired and examined into all its transactions, and ascertained, as near as possible, the exact state of its affairs, and amount of its stock and outstanding obligations. All this was duly reported to the court in the memorial before referred to, and went to establish and confirm all the allegations of the bill which had been taken pro confesso against the defendant corporation in regular course. After a decree pro confesso, it is often proper for a court to inform itself through its own officers, as by report of a master, or by deposition, or other inquest or proceeding, more particularly as to the exact facts of the case.

The report of the receiver in this case was regarded as a proper presentation and authentication of the facts upon which to base further proceedings.

An order was thereupon made in general accordance with the receiver's recommendation, but also in accordance with the best judgment of the court. The objection of the petitioners seems to be more particularly directed against this order, whereby the receiver was authorized to dispose of the assets, property and rights of the corporation defendant, upon the terms stated in the order and the contract referred to therein.

They made charges of fraud against the receiver; they say that he is in collusion with the officers of the company who were guilty of the frauds charged in the bill, and that he is combining with them to dispose of the property of the company and convert it to his and their own use.

The question, then, as a legal one, is reduced to this: The suit being properly instituted, the relief prayed being proper to grant, a receiver being properly appointed, a decree pro confesso being regularly entered, an authentic report of the facts being made to the court, and its judgment being passed thereon, can individual stockholders be now permitted to intervene in the suit and file a cross-bill in the cause on a general charge of fraud and collusion on the part of the receiver, and erroneous judgment on the part of the court in making the order referred to? It seems to me that this would be carrying the practice of intervention too far.

It is true that the complainants filed the bill in this case on behalf of themselves and of all others being stockholders, creditors or bondholders of the corporation defendant, who might desire or be entitled to intervene. But it was never contemplated, nor is it the proper practice, that the persons embraced in that category should intervene to set aside the proceedings, or to interpose obstacles to the progress of the suit. The complainants, by suing as representatives, open the door to all other parties named to come in and take the benefit of the proceedings and decree, not to oppose and nullify them. In a suit so instituted, parties may come in and prove their claims or status, and participate in all the dividends and benefits to be derived from the suit.

Rival creditors, by proceedings before a master, may control the priority of their respective liens, and creditors or stockholders may contest the validity of the claims of other creditors and stockholders, but all in subordination to the general object and purpose of the suit, to obtain an administration of the company's assets and property.

To be allowed to intervene as general defendants and contestants is another and different thing. This can be admitted only upon the ground before referred to, to wit: having an interest in the results as a stockholder or otherwise, and being able to show fraud and collusion between the plaintiffs in the suit and the officers of the company having charge of its interests. A suggestion, in the progress of the suit, that an officer of the court is disposed to act fraudulently, or that the court has made an injudicious or erroneous order, will not be a sufficient ground to allow such a party to intervene. Indeed, it is questionable whether, in any case where a suit is properly instituted against a corporation, a stockholder of that corporation can, even on a suggestion of fraud on the part of its officers, come in by way of intervention as party to that suit, and seek to defend or control the proceedings. An original bill would rather seem to be the proper mode of proceeding.

In this case, however, the complainants deny that the petitioners are stockholders of the company, and to this question much of the evidence on both sides has been directed: An examination of this evidence convinces me that the right of the petitioners to any stock of the company is very doubtful. At all events, I see nothing in the case that should entitle them to interfere with the judicial administration of its assets for the security of its deceived and defrauded creditors.

The petitioners, if entitled to be regarded as stockholders, became such under circumstances that should have put them on their guard as to the irregularities and frauds of the company.

And it is in the discretion of the court, whether or not to permit a stockholder to become a party defendant in any case where he is not made such by the bill. And as it is held to be an extreme remedy, to be admitted by the court with hesitation and caution, I think I ought not to have allowed it in this case, and ought now to vacate the order for such allowance. "Generally speaking," says Calvert, "a stranger can take no part at all, and cannot even be heard by counsel in a claim of interest in the suit except by the consent of all parties." Calv. Parties, 58. Deviations from the rule are occasionally allowed in order to obviate delay and expense when there is no question as to the rights of the parties; but, on the whole, I do not deem it necessary to depart from the general rule in this case, when the interests of all parties, and especially of the bona fide creditors of the corporation in question, are so obviously coincident with the objects of the suit and the orders and arrangements which have been made.

From a careful examination of the whole testimony, I am also satisfied that the charges of fraud and conspiracy made against the receiver are entirely groundless. It is unnecessary for me to examine and comment upon it in detail.

The orders for leave to intervene and file answers or cross bills will be vacated, and the sale and agreement made by the receiver will be confirmed, subject to the following modification, to wit: that no sale of the property or franchises shall be made by the said receiver to any other party or company than the said Southern Trans-Continental Railroad Company, without the approval and confirmation of this court, and subject to the same obligations to pay all valid debts of the defendant corporation which were to be assumed by said Southern Trans-Continental Railroad Company, which obligation shall be a lien on the said property and franchises for the fulfillment thereof; and the said receiver is to discontinue any actions or proceedings against the said Sanford and Van Nest for the amount of stock claimed by them.

Case No. 4,927.

FORBES et al. v. The MERRIMAC.

[1 Ben. 68.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. July, 1866.

SALVAGE—PRACTICE—PLEADING — SUIT PENDING IN ANOTHER DISTRICT NO BAR TO SUIT HERE FOR SEPARATE SALVAGE SERVICES — LACHES — STALENESS—EXCESSIVE BAIL.

1. Where a libel was filed by passengers on the Merrimac, to recover for alleged salvage services, while on a voyage from New Orleans, to which port the vessel returned; and the answer set up that a suit was commenced in New Orleans against the steamship in behalf of another steamer, which towed her up to the bar, to recover a salvage compensation for such services, and that the claimants had bonded the vessel in New Orleans, and the suit was still pending; and the answer claimed that the libellants should have joined in that suit, or filed their libel in New Orleans. On exceptions by the libellants to this part of the answer, held, that the pendency of one action for salvage is no bar to another suit by other salvors, for other services during the same voyage; that the suit in behalf of the Morgan is no bar to this suit by the passengers.

2. The libellants cannot be held to have lost their claim by failing to file their libel in New Orleans, under the circumstances alleged in the answer. The practice of bringing such suits even for different services, in different courts, is disapproved.

3. As to the hardship of compelling the claimants to bond here, after they have bonded her in New Orleans, their remedy is by motion. The court will, on application, always reduce bail to such an amount as shall be reasonable security for the claim.

This case came before the court upon exceptions to the tenth article of the answer. The libel was for salvage, and it averred that in November, 1865, while the steamship Merrimac was on a voyage from New Orleans to this port, and when some two hundred miles out, she sprung a leak, and made water so fast as to extinguish her fires, and rendered it necessary to resort to bailing as the only means of saving the ship; that accordingly, a colored regiment of United States soldiers, which was being transported in the steamer, having been divided into companies for the purpose, undertook to keep the ship free, and by constant bailing from the 11th until the 14th of November, enabled the vessel to return to a place of safety off the port of New Orleans. For this service the libellants [Joseph Forbes and others] who are officers of the colored regiment, in behalf of themselves and all others interested, claim salvage. The answer, in the article objected to, set forth the following facts: That the steamship, after being brought to the place of anchorage, was towed up to the bar by the steamship Morgan, and was thereupon arrested by virtue of process issued out of the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of Louisiana, upon a libel filed in that court by Charles Morgan, in behalf of himself and all other persons interested in the steamship Morgan, to recover of the Merrimac salvage for services performed by the Morgan, in lying by her on the night of the 14th of November, and afterward towing her up to the bar; that in said action, the claimants appeared and bonded their vessel, and said action is now pending, undetermined, in the said district court, of all which it is averred the libellants in this action had notice, being then present in New Orleans. These facts were pleaded in this article of the answer as a defense to the action, and it was claimed that the libellants were bound to have made themselves parties to the action brought in New Orleans, or to have filed their libel there, and that the pendency of that suit was a bar to their action commenced here after the release upon bail of the vessel in New Orleans.

Benedict and Emerson, Goodrich & Knowlton, for libellants.

Spencer, Hooes & Metcalf, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The pendency of another action for salvage has never, to my knowledge, been held to bar a subsequent action by other salvors against the same vessel to recover salvage for other services performed during the same voyage; on the contrary, two, and sometimes more such actions have been maintained in the same court, where the circumstances warranted it. Such was the case of The Henry Ewbank [Case No. 6,376]. Such the late case of The Philadelphia, 1 Brown. & L. 28.

When there are several sets of salvors claiming to have performed separate and distinct services, and especially where the interests of the various salvors are somewhat antagonistic, as is often the case, it is not only proper but sometimes necessary that several libels be filed. In the present case, the libel filed by Charles Morgan was filed not for the benefit of all persons claiming to have been salvors of the Merrimac, but solely for the benefit of the owners and crew of the Morgan, and it set forth only the services performed by the Morgan after the termination of the principal labors by the libellants in this action. The pendency of such an action can be no ground for dismissing a second action in behalf of the passengers of the Merrimac, setting forth and claiming salvage for services performed in bailing the ship up to the time of her arrival at the bar. Neither can it be held upon the facts set forth in this article of the answer, that these libellants have lost their right of action, by failure to file their libel in New Orleans while the steamer was there. Cases undoubtedly arise where the omission to take proceedings to obtain an adjudication upon a claim for salvage at the time and place where other similar claims are being determined, would be held to amount to a waiver of the claim, and a subsequent libel would be dismissed upon the ground of staleness or laches. But the facts set out in the tenth article of the answer do not necessarily make this such a case. It cannot be certain that the hearing will not disclose circumstances perfectly consistent with all the facts set forth in the article, which will excuse the delay in prosecuting this action. Nor does it appear from the facts set out in this answer, that it is necessary in order to accomplish substantial justice, that the two claims for salvage should be presented to and passed on, by one and the same court. The services performed by the Morgan were apparently distinct from the service claimed to have been performed by the libellants, and it does not necessarily follow from the facts disclosed in the answer that the award to the libellants, if any, would be affected by the award made to the owners and crew of the Morgan. It is not intended, however, to approve of the practice of bringing such actions in different courts; on the contrary, such course is disapproved, and nothing more is intended to be decided here than that the facts set out in the tenth article of this answer are not sufficient to require a dismissal of the libel. The effect of the omission to file in New Orleans upon the question of costs, or upon the question of the amount to be awarded to the libellants, if any be awarded, as well as the question of laches and staleness, are matters left to be disposed of upon the hearing, when all the facts of the case are before the court. Upon the argument of the exceptions, the hardship of compelling the claimant to give bonds in $100,000 here, after they had bonded their steamer in the action in New Orleans, was greatly insisted on. But the way of relief from this inconvenience is by motion. This court will always promptly reduce the stipulation for value required in any case, to such sum as shall seem to be reasonable security for the claim as presented in the libel; and if excessive bail has been demanded in New Orleans, like relief can there be obtained. The decree must accordingly be that the exception to the tenth article of the answer be allowed without costs, and with leave to reform the answer in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

FORBES et al. v. MURRAY et al.

[3 Ben. 497.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1869.

FREIGHT PAYABLE IN STERLING MONEY.

On a bill of lading, executed in Whampoa, for the transportation of cargo to New York, the freight in which was specified to be payable in sterling money: Held, that the shipowners were entitled to recover what it could be shown by evidence that the specified amount of British coin was worth in New York, in gold and silver coin of the United States, the recovery to be expressed in the decree to be in gold and silver coin of the United States.

[This was a suit by Paul S. Forbes and others against Ellen M. Murray, executrix, etc., and others.]

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for libellants.

H. W. Robinson, for respondents.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel in personam, filed to recover the amount of freight money claimed to be due for the transportation of one hundred and ninety cases of fans from Whampoa to New York, by the ship Resolute. The contract of transportation is expressed in a bill of lading given by the vessel, dated February 12th, 1864, and the amount of freight money specified therein as to be paid for the service is one hundred and sixty-three pounds, four shillings, and four pence, sterling. The only question presented in the case is, as to what amount, in money of the United States, the libellants are entitled to recover for the one hundred and sixty-three pounds, four shillings, and four pence, sterling, as being payable in New York, June 21st, 1864. It is not averred in the libel, in what money the amount specified in the bill of lading is expressed, nor is there any evidence in the case as to what was intended by the number of pounds, shillings, and pence, sterling, thus specified. Assuming that it can be proved, or will be stipulated, that the contract was for the payment of so many pounds, shillings, and pence, in the sterling money of Great Britain and Ireland, in coin, in New York, on the delivery of the property there, June 21st, 1864, the libellants are entitled to recover what it can be shown by evidence that the specified amount of British coin was worth in New York, in gold and silver coined money of the United States, on the 21st of June, 1864. For that amount, in such coined money of the United States, with interest thereon, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, the libellants will be entitled to a decree, the recovery to be expressed to be in the gold and silver coin of the United States. [4 Hughes, 441.]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. Jan. 1881.

EQUITY—LACHES—PLEADING—BILL OF DISCOVERY.

[A bill, which in its main features was a bill of discovery, was filed by an assignee of a deceased bankrupt 10 to 12 years after the transactions complained of, alleging that the bankrupt, with defendants' aid, fraudulently concealed his assets, and soon after his discharge invested large sums in land in a distant state, that defendants successfully concealed the fraud, and that the fact of these investments only came to complainant's knowledge "within the past year," and prayed a discovery of the particulars thereof. Held that, on the facts alleged, complainant was not guilty of laches, nor was the bill defective in not setting forth more specifically the impediments to an earlier prosecution of the claim, and how he came to be so long ignorant of his rights, and what means were used to keep him in ignorance. Badger v. Badger, 2 Wall. (69 U. S.) 87, and Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135, distinguished.]

[See Badger v. Badger, Case No. 718.]

In equity.

H. L. Lee, for complainant.

W. H. Mann and Thos. G. Watkins, for defendants.

HUGHES, District Judge. The bill here is brought by [P. A. Forbes] an assignee in bankruptcy of the late Robert Rash against Rash's heirs and distributees and administrator, charging fraud by Rash, and conspiracy in it by the defendants, and praying a discovery and full disclosure of all the facts of the alleged fraud. Rash, who was a citizen of Lunenburg county, Va., filed his petition on the bankruptcy side of this court in March, 1868; got his discharge in February, 1869; bought land in Kentucky with money charged to have been fraudulently concealed assets in bankruptcy, in December, 1870; and died in May, 1875. This bill was brought in May, 1880. Rash surrendered no assets in bankruptcy except a meagre outfit of clothing and house furniture worth $20; and certain choses in action thought then to be worthless, but which, several years subsequently, realized a net aggregate sum to the assignee in bankruptcy of probably $1,000. The principal debt proved against Rash was a bond on which he was surety for one Thomas Jefferson (who also became a bankrupt), the amount of which is $3,154.11 due 1st January, 1861, with interest, some portion of which has been paid. This bond is held by one

W. T. Blackwell, for whose benefit this suit is brought. Rash owed no individual debts. The bill charges that about a year before filing his petition in bankruptcy, Rash sold his farm in Lunenburg county, and other interests in real estate, for $4,600; and that he had the greater portion of this money in hand or under control, at the time of filing the petition; but that he did not enter it in his schedules in bankruptcy; that he swore falsely in his schedules; and that he fraudulently concealed and secreted this money. It charges that he was a money lender among his neighbors, and owed no debts of his own at the time of filing the petition. It charges that this bankrupt, in conspiracy with his family, and his present administrator, concealed and secreted his estate from the complainant and the said Blackwell, who had no knowledge of the disposition which he made of it "until within the past year," and that up to the present time they have been unable to obtain information as to Rash's disposition of large portions of the moneys received from the said sales. It charges that "within the past year" complainant and said Blackwell have been informed that soon after obtaining his discharge in bankruptcy the said Rash went to Kentucky with some $4,000 which he had concealed and secreted from his creditors in bankruptcy, and which he there invested in land; that he went there for that purpose and returned as soon as the land was purchased, and lived in Lunenburg county, Va., until his death, intestate. The bill charges that Robert Rash was old and paralyzed when he went into bankruptcy, and remained so until he died, aged about 70 years; and that he could not have earned any money after his bankruptcy. It charges that he could not have had money with which to make the Kentucky purchase except money concealed from his creditors in bankruptcy, and that the said purchase was made with money thus concealed. The bill calls upon the defendants J. W. Overby, administrator of Robert Rash, and the various members of his family which it names, to make full discovery of all facts connected with this purchase of land in Kentucky, and with the charges of the bill.

The answer of the defendants sets out the particulars of the purchase in Kentucky, giving date, amounts of purchase money, deed, and locality, and makes definite the facts which were unknown to the complainant and of which the bill called for a discovery. Since the hearing in November, affidavits have been filed showing receipts by Robert Rash of two sums of money in the year 1868, after the filing of his bill in bankruptcy in March of that year, one of them dated the 29th April, 1868, showing that one R. B. Brydie had on April 29th, 1868, paid him $400 on a bond for $1,000 due to Rash; the other dated the 21st day of July, 1868, showing that Rash had received $284.69, the balance due on a bond for $1,060 from the said Brydie; neither of which bonds was scheduled in the bankruptcy papers filed and sworn to in March, 1868. There was also filed, a few days after the hearing in November of the motion to dissolve the injunction, a letter dated November 3rd, 1880, received by the assignee from counsel of the Rash's in Kentucky, indicating a variety of transactions of Robert Rash, deceased, and his children, which, if proved, were fraudulent, and which show that the answer of defendants in this cause is not full or true, but is evasive and false. As already indicated, there was a motion for an injunction to restrain all persons and parties having legal rights in the property in bankruptcy from interfering with or disposing of same; which was granted ex parte. The first hearing of the case was on motion to dissolve this injunction. In support of this motion to dissolve, the defendants maintain that the bill is insufficient in form and substance and ought to be dismissed—First, because of complainant's laches in bringing his suit: and, second, because it fails to set forth specifically what were the impediments to an earlier prosecution of the complainant's claim; how he came to be so long ignorant of his rights, and of the means used by the defendants to fraudulently keep complainant in ignorance; and how and when complainant first came to a knowledge of the matters charged in the bill. Defendants rely chiefly on the cases of Badger v. Badger, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 87, and Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135, in support of their objections to the bill.

There have been a great variety of decisions by the courts on the question of the lapse of time which should bar such cases as this; and it is a general rule that each case must be governed by its own peculiar circumstances. In Badger v. Badger [supra] suit was not brought until 39 years after the qualification of the administrator, and 22 years after the youngest distributee came of age. Certainly the rules of evidence and of pleading in such a case can furnish no just precedent for the present one, where the concealment of the fraud charged continued until the defendants filed their answer to the discovery sought by the bill. The complainant charges the fraud in general terms because he had no particular knowledge of it; he alleges a discovery of the leading fact within the past year, but gives no date, nor the county in which the land charged to have been fraudulently purchased lies, because ignorant of both, and calls upon defendants to disclose the particulars. A court will not compel a complainant who is ignorant of the particulars of a fraud to set them out in a bill which, as to these particulars, is a bill calling for a disclosure of them. The case of Wood v. Carpenter [supra] is no authority for so vain and impossible a requirement. That case was an action at law, and turned chiefly upon an Indiana statute which in terms barred all suits and actions for fraud after six years from its perpetration; but contains a provision that if fraud is concealed, then the suit or action must be commenced within six years from the time it was discovered. Hence it was necessary for the complainant's pleading to aver a particular time for the discovery, in order to be good on demurrer; and this the more as the case was an action at law and not a proceeding in equity. The bill here is, in its main features, a bill of discovery. It charges a fraud, the particulars of which are unknown to the complainant, and one even yet not fully developed. It charges that the defendants were in conspiracy with the bankrupt to perpetrate fraud. It gives all the particulars which are known to the complainant, alleges that the fraud was successfully concealed from them until within a year past, having gone to a remote state and laid out money there in land, and immediately returned to his home and remained there until his death; and upon the basis of this general knowledge, which is all that he has been able to discover, he calls upon the defendants to answer and to disclose the particular facts in connection with the Kentucky purchase. This being in its principal features a bill for discovery, I think it includes, in substance, all the requirements decided by the court in the case of Badger v. Badger [supra], the bill in which case was not a bill of discovery. It was certainly very widely distinguished in this respect from Wood v. Carpenter [supra], which was an action at law wherein all the facts were known, before suit was brought, by plaintiff, and ought to have been properly charged in the declaration. The case must proceed, with leave to complainant to amend after obtaining the discovery he seeks, and with leave to all parties to take testimony in Kentucky. There is so much of allegation in the arguments of counsel, and so little proof in the pleadings and evidence, that I prefer to continue the case for a rehearing upon such additional proofs as parties may choose to put in at the April term.

The foregoing is a true copy of the opinion of the court filed in the above cause January, 1881.

FORBES v. PARSONS.

[Crabbe, 283.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 4, 1839.

SEAMEN—INABILITY TO PERFORM DUTY—OBSTINACY—PUNISHMENT—WEAPONS.

1. Where a person ships as cook and steward, he thereby undertakes that he has experience and skill to enable him to perform the duties of those positions.

2. Where a party ships for a particular employment, and either will not or cannot perform its duties, if his deficiencies arise from wilfulness or obstinacy, he is a fit object for punishment; if from incapacity, he is entitled to no particular favor from the court.

3. The law which governs the deportment of men to each other on shore, cannot be applied to their habits and intercourse on board of a ship.

[Cited in The George Kingman, Case No. 5,335.]

4. A seaman is, in general, entitled to recover damages for an assault and battery from the officer of a ship—First, where personal violence is inflicted, not excessively, but wantonly and without provocation or cause; second, where there was provocation or cause, but the punishment was cruel or excessive; third, usually, when the punishment is inflicted with a deadly, or dangerous, weapon.

[Cited in Gabrielson v. Waydell, 135 N. Y. 13, 31 N. E. 969.]

5. A rope is the proper instrument of punishment on board of a ship.

6. A party who shipped as cook, and was unwilling or unable to do his duty, and who kept the galley in a filthy condition, was a fit subject for punishment.

7. A blow with a dirty frying-pan, or wiping a dirty knife on the face of the person whose duty it was to keep those articles clean, is not a very aggravated or cruel assault.

[Cited in The Guiding Star, 1 Fed. 349.]

This was a libel [against Stephen Parsons, master of the ship Suffolk] for assault and battery, with an additional article for wages. It appeared that the libellant [William Forbes] shipped on board the Suffolk, at Shields, on the 6th August, 1839, as cook and steward; that he could not, or did not, discharge his duty in a proper manner; and that he was several times chastised by the respondent, on that account.

Mr. Brooke, for libellant.
Mr. Bulkley, for respondent.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The libel in this case, with the amendment added to it, contains two grounds of complaint. The first charges several acts of personal violence, committed by the respondent upon the libellant, at different times, for which damages are claimed. The second is a demand for wages alleged to be due to the libellant for his services as cook and steward on board the Suffolk, on her late voyage from the port of Shields, in the kingdom of Great Britain, to Philadelphia.

The former charge will be first considered. By the shipping articles it appears that the libellant shipped as cook and steward. Evidence has been given on the part of the respondent to show that when the libellant offered himself to the ship, as her cook, he represented himself to be well qualified to perform the duties of that service; that he said he was a good cook, and had been in that capacity on board another vessel for nine months. Some attempt was made to contradict this testimony, but I am inclined to believe it, because it is natural that an inquiry would be made of his capability to perform the duties he was to be hired for, and that he would answer affirmatively. It is not, however, of importance whether the libellant did or did not make this direct allegation of his fitness for the place he offered himself to fill; it must be presumed and implied from his contract. He was engaged as the cook and steward of the ship; he was hired and paid for his services in that capacity; and he thereby undertook that he had experience and skill to enable him to perform these services, at least reasonably well.

That the respondent chastised the libellant, on several occasions, is not denied, but it is alleged that it was not severe or unreasonable, and was justified by the discovery, soon after the vessel got to sea, that the libellant was unable to perform the duties he had undertaken; and that, from carelessness or obstinacy, he did not even do as well as he could; that the victuals were so badly cooked as to be unfit for food; and that his galley, and cooking utensils, were kept in a state of disgusting dirt and filthiness. It cannot be doubted that his cooking was exceedingly bad, either from want of skill or wilful neglect; and the evidence is satisfactory to show that his galley and pans were kept in a very dirty condition. The bad cooking is proved by the crew, his own witnesses, as well as by the officers of the ship. Complaints were made of it by the crew, to the captain; so that it was not only the table of the cabin, or the taste of the officers, that was offended, but the appetites of the sailors could not encounter the libellant's cooking. The captain and mate were frequently obliged to cook, not only for themselves, but for the crew. The men once went, in a body, to the captain, with the complaint that the victuals were so badly cooked that they could not eat them. The fault was not in the ship's provisions, which, it is admitted, were good. The libellant has endeavored to excuse himself for this fault, by charging it on the inconvenient smallness of the galley, and the insufficiency of his cooking utensils. He has certainly failed in this. Not only the officers of the ship, but competent disinterested witnesses, who have examined the galley and utensils, testify that both are as good, and, indeed better, than are usually found in a vessel of the same size. It is also proved by the witnesses of both parties that the ship had the same galley, and fewer pans, on her voyage from Boston to Havana, and thence to London and Shields, than on her return, but that no complaint was made, by the former cook, of any deficiency in his conveniences for cooking, nor was there any complaint of his cooking by officers or men.

So stands the case of the libellant, on the question of his performance of his duties as cook and steward of the ship. If his deficiencies were the result of carelessness or obstinacy, he was, doubtless, a fit object of punishment, and if he was really ignorant and incapable of the duties of the place he had assumed, he was guilty of a fraud and deception in undertaking to perform them, and comes here entitled to no particular favor. However this may be as to his cooking, it can hardly be denied that, with ordinary care and industry, he might have kept his galley and pans clean. Upon the subject of his ignorance and incapacity, we cannot avoid to remark that it was of very serious importance to the officers and crew of a ship. To have before them a long voyage, with the disheartening prospect of having their food set before them in a condition hardly fit to be put into their mouths, was indeed a trial of patience and temper that few men would pass through and maintain their good humor. The defects of an ordinary seaman may be supplied by his comrades, but the cook stands by himself, and if he fails, no substitute, unless by an accident, can be found. To have a good dinner spoiled by the cook, is only next to having no dinner. The stomach has a wonderful control over the man and his passions, and a good-natured man, disappointed of his dinner, may become very cross. It is further in evidence that, when the cook was spoken to, by the officers, for his bad cooking, he would make rude and insolent replies. All the witnesses, however, on his part, testify that he never was insolent or disobedient to any order given him.

Having thus stated the cause and provocation given by the libellant, for the injuries he complains of, we must look to the conduct of the other party, and see whether he has exceeded the bounds of moderation, in punishing the offences of the libellant; for it must not be understood that this, or any other provocation, will justify cruel and immoderate chastisements. Libels in this court, for assaults and batteries, committed on the high seas, are becoming so frequent, and have sometimes been for such trivial injuries, that it is well that the principles which govern me in deciding them, should be distinctly explained. The expedition with which such suits are disposed of in this court, being generally terminated in a few days, naturally brings the complaints here, as the necessary delays of the common law courts, unless in cases of extraordinary aggravation, make it impossible to obtain redress there. Neither the parties nor their witnesses can be detained until the trial can be had in the course of the business of the court. If, therefore, the doors of this court were not open to such complaints, much oppression, and many grievous injuries, might be suffered, without redress. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the speed and facilities of trial here, with the moderate costs attending it, offer a temptation to seamen, under bad advisers,—generally their landlords,—to try experiments in bringing suits on false and frivolous pretences, to take their chance of getting, by trial or compromise, something from the master. If unsuccessful, they are unable to pay the costs of suit; and, in truth, the attempt is made with some prospect of gain, and no apprehension of loss in any event. While, therefore, I have been prompt to give a reasonable compensation for real wrongs, I have endeavored to check and discourage frivolous suits and vexatious litigation.

Nobody will believe that the law which governs the deportment of men on shore to each other, can be applied to their habits and conduct on board of a ship. That which would be an assault, or an assault and battery, in a drawing-room, or in the streets of our city, and punishable by indictment or a civil suit, cannot be so considered among the rough inmates of a ship at sea. The code of manners is entirely different, as is the situation and character of the men. If striking at a man, without touching him, or pointing an offensive weapon to him, or holding up the fist, were to be considered as good ground for a suit; if any rude or angry touching of the person, however lightly, is to be adjudged an assault and battery, for which damages may be recovered; no vessel could arrive without a plentiful crop of actions, equally injurious to the plaintiff and defendant. This cannot be the law of the sea practically, whatever it may be in theory. In questions of this kind, between the officers and the seamen of a ship, my desire has been to maintain a safe and proper discipline, preserving, on the one hand, a necessary and salutary obedience on the part of the seamen, and on the other, protecting him from all cruelty and undue violence, and from any severity not required for the support of the proper authority of the officer, giving a liberal consideration to the exigencies of the occasion. The officer may not, under the pretence of discipline, take advantage of some trifling fault to indulge ferocious passions, or some particular ill will against the offender.

Generally speaking, I should consider a seaman entitled to recover damages for an assault and battery from the officer of a ship —First, where personal violence was inflicted upon him, although not excessively, wantonly and without any provocation or cause; second, where provocation and cause were given by the seaman, but the punishment was cruel and excessive, having no reasonable proportion to the provocation or fault for which it was inflicted; third, I have always looked with a severe eye to the instrument used in punishing. It should be that which is the ordinary instrument for such occasions. To employ a deadly, or dangerous weapon; to strike a man down with a handspike, or bludgeon; to cut him with a sword, or stamp upon him, when prostrated, endangering his health and life, I have always deemed unlawful modes of punishment, although the injury received from them may not have been very severe. But if a seaman has given cause for punishment, by disobedience, or neglect of duty, by insolence and insubordination to the officers and their lawful authority, and the officer, in a moment of irritation, should strike him with his fist (although I do not approve of such blows, a rope being the proper instrument of punishment), or shall correct him with a rope, I cannot institute a very nice and scrupulous comparison between the offence of the sailor and the number or violence of the blows inflicted upon him for it. It will be incumbent on him to show that they were cruel and excessive.

Having these principles in view we will examine the circumstances of the case now to be decided. First, as to the provocation or cause given by the libellant for punishment, I have already stated it. In his libel, as a material part of his case, he has averred that "during the whole time he was on board of the said ship he did well and truly perform his duty." We have seen how far he has been from sustaining this averment. The question is, whether his delinquency was a fit subject of punishment; and if so, whether the punishment inflicted was excessive, and so disproportionate to the offence, so marked with cruelty and oppression, as to entitle him to damages for the wrong. Thinking that his offence justified punishment, I shall confine my inquiry to the question of excess. The first assault and battery complained of in the libel, is that which is spoken of by the witnesses as having happened two or three days after the ship got to sea. She sailed on the seventh of August, and the libel lays the assault on the tenth. None of the witnesses (indeed but one of them testifies to this transaction) give such an exaggerated account of it as is presented in the libel. Was the wrong proved such an one as supports the claim for damages?

Joseph Torente, the first witness examined, knew nothing of this beating. He began his testimony by saying he knew of libellant being flogged once, which was when they had been twenty days out. The second charge laid in the libel is for an assault and battery on the twenty-ninth of August, which in point of time corresponds very nearly with that mentioned by Torente, but they differ materially in their circumstances. The libel asserts that the assault was made with a table knife, with which the respondent struck the libellant a violent blow across his mouth, cutting his lips; that the respondent seized him by the throat, and struck him violently with a frying-pan and kicked him. The statement given by the witness is very different. The affair of the knife and frying-pan was spoken of by other witnesses, and we shall see what they say about it, hereafter. Torente's account of the flogging when they were twenty days out, is that the libellant was flogged with a large piece of rope. He saw nothing of the knife, nor of the frying-pan, nor of seizing him by the throat. He says that it was about a pan which the captain said was not clean. When the captain had given some blows, the cook asked the crew if they would stand by and see him abused. This is all he said of that transaction. He afterwards said that he recollected another beating, with a piece of rope five or six feet long, and an inch and a half in diameter; that the captain gave the libellant five or six blows, not very heavy, the captain saying he would not hurt him. It was about burning some coffee. He then added that he saw the libellant's mouth cut after both these beatings; that his lips were bleeding, but not much; that he does not know whether they were cut or not. After these beatings libellant went immediately to his duty. This witness testifies to the general humane conduct of the captain to the crew; indeed, with the exception of the cook, none complained of the treatment, or had any reason to do so. The next witness was George Owens. The first beating he saw was after they had been twenty days out. Of course he gives no support to the first assault charged in the libel. He says that the first beating was about a frying-pan that was dirty. The captain gave him about six lashes, and the rope gave out, that is, it unravelled, and he then tied a knot in it, and struck the libellant violently. The witness was more than half the ship distant from them. He does not mention, as Torente did, that the cook called out to the crew, but, like Torente, he knew nothing of the blows with the knife, the seizing by the throat, &c., as set forth in the libel to have happened at this time. As to the knife, he testifies that, after the affair just related, which took place when they were twenty lays out, the pan had some rust in it; that the captain took a knife and began to scrape it, and then daubed it in the cook's face. It cut his face, and the blood came out. This, I presume, is the explanation of the assault and striking made with a knife. This witness saw the captain pull the cook out of the galley several times, and strike him on the head with his fist. This witness somewhat impaired my confidence in his testimony by saying, in conclusion, that the captain behaved middling to the crew, no great things, but that he would not sail with him again for five hundred dollars a month. John Collins was a steerage passenger in the ship. He saw the captain beat the libellant with a rope's end. It was about the cooking. He says the cook showed him his body; it was very bad, it looked black. At another time he saw the cook come up from the cabin with his mouth cut and bleeding; but he did not know how it happened, or who did it. George Appel saw the captain give the cook about fourteen blows; they were not heavy, but middling; saw him strike him with a frying-pan, and kick him on the cheek. He struck him with the pan because it was not clean. George Wilson, the cabin boy, about ten years of age, but smart and intelligent, is the only witness who speaks of the beating laid in the libel to have been about the tenth of August; but he gives no details such as are set forth in the libel. He says it was about three days after they were at sea; that it was about the pans being dirty; that the captain got some dirt out of the pan, with a knife, and wiped it across the cook's face. The boy saw the captain strike one blow on the cook's body with his fist; that he struck him for dirtiness; that the pans, cups, and towels were dirty; and that complaints were made that the victuals were not well cooked.

Here the libellant closed his evidence, and it must be seen that he has not made out a strong case by his proof, and that it falls far short of the allegations of his libel. No serious injury appears ever to have been done to him, at any time; he went to his work, as usual, immediately after every beating, and none of the witnesses speak of the beatings as being severe, much less disabling. The instrument used was a rope, about the size of which there is a difference between the witnesses of the libellant, and those produced on the part of the respondent.. The wiping a dirty knife across his face, and the blow with a dirty frying pan, can not be considered as very aggravated or cruel assaults, nor were they followed by any serious consequences. If the articles in question were as dirty as they have been represented, we can hardly be surprised that they should suddenly have been used as the means of punishment.

The two officers of the ship, the first and second mates, were produced on behalf of the respondent; none others were left for him, as the libellant had called all the crew that remained in this city. Elihu Arnold testified, as some of the other witnesses had done, that when the libellant came on board to get employment, he said he was a good cook and steward; that he made good pies, &c.; that fault was found with him the first day; the victuals were not half cooked; the utensils were very dirty; that he was often spoken to, but did not amend; nothing was done better. This witness testified to the good accommodations of the galley, and the sufficiency of cooking utensils. He says that breakfast, which ought to have been ready at eight o'clock, was sometimes as late as ten o'clock. That the captain spoke to him in a mild manner, but the libellant would not give a direct answer, nor any cause for his conduct. He saw the captain scrape dirt out of one of the pans. He described the rope used by the captain as much smaller than was said by the libellant's witnesses; that the captain gave him four blows when he called out to the crew to assist him, upon which account the captain gave him four or five blows more, after which the libellant went immediately to his duty. Both the witness and the captain had to cook for the cabin and the people. The galley was kept filthy and dirty. John Clifford, the second mate, gave substantially the same testimony with Elihu Arnold. Two respectable masters of vessels testified that they had examined the galley and cooking utensils of the Suffolk; that they were as good, and, in some respects better, than is usual for vessels of her size.

To apply the general principles I have stated to this case:

1. The chastisement inflicted on the libellant was, certainly, not without fault and provocation on his part. He had undertaken duties, important to the health and comfort of all the persons on board of the ship, and he either could not or would not perform them. His cooking was so bad as not only to call for repeated remonstrances from the cabin, but to cause a formal complaint, to the captain from the crew, who, we may presume, were not very dainty in their diet. The provisions were good and wholesome, but spoiled by the great want of skill or the carelessness in preparing them for the table. No one will say that it was not a more than ordinary provocation to be obliged to eat such meals for weeks together; nor that some efforts might not reasonably have been made to correct the evil. The cause of complaint was greatly aggravated by the libellant's habitual dirtiness, which he might have corrected by care and labor.

2. As to the instruments used in correcting him. The beatings were inflicted with a rope, the usual and proper instrument. There is a difference in the testimony about the size of the rope; but a rope was used. No blow was struck with a knife; if his lip was cut, it was but slightly, and was done by drawing the knife across his face, or mouth, to wipe the dirt from it which had been scraped from the pan.

3. There was no extraordinary severity in the chastisements inflicted upon him. There was no tying up, or stripping, nor anything to show a deliberate design to punish the libellant painfully or severely. The blows were given on the instant of the provocation; they were not numerous or heavily laid on, as the libellant's witnesses testify. He was never disabled, but went immediately to his work.

I cannot say that this is a case for damages. The libellant stands with the fault upon him, the origin and cause of all his maltreatment, of having hired himself for services he could not perform, and thereby imposed himself upon the captain and crew, who were daily suffering the penalty of his deception. It is worse for him if he was able to do the duties of his station, and, from carelessness, laziness, or obstinacy, would not. I should not omit to mention, that it was discovered, after they got to sea, that the cook was blind of one eye, and saw imperfectly with the other. These defects, certainly, in a measure disqualified him for the performance of his duties in a proper manner, at least so far as to require from him an increased attention and labor, which he would not bestow. When he was told of these defects, and his concealment of them,—for they did not appear on a cursory inspection,—he replied that his blindness was a misfortune, not a fault; he was answered, that is certainly so, but it was a fault to pass yourself upon us, as an able and competent cook, if, from any cause, you were unable to do the duties of one. He replied, that he must get a living somehow. He said he had come out of the hospital a short time before he came on board.

Upon this part of the case, if there were no other cause of action in the libel, it would be my duty simply to dismiss it, with or without costs, as I might think the circumstances required. The libel, however, claims a balance of wages due to the libellant, and wages are due to him, but at a rate not quite half of that he claims in his libel. In support of his demand at the rate of five pounds a month, he refers to the shipping articles, and prays that they may be produced. They have been produced, and it there appears, under his own signature, well and distinctly made, that his contract was for two pounds a month, which is but little below the wages of the rest of the crew. No attempt has been made to prove that any fraud or imposition was practiced upon him, or that he did not fully understand the contract he had made.

The account will stand thus:

Wages, from 6th August to 22d September	£3 0 0
Less amount received	2 0 0
Balance due	£1 0 0

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that as to those counts or articles in the libel which charge the respondent with sundry trespasses, and assaults and batteries, upon the person of the libellant, judgment be entered for the respondent; and that, as to the counts or articles which claim and demand wages to be due to the libellant, judgment be entered for him for the sum of $4.84, with costs of suit. But no costs or charges are allowed for the attendance of the witnesses of the libellant, as their evidence related entirely to the counts or articles for the assaults and batteries, upon which the decree is in favor of the respondent.

PATENTS—INJUNCTION—CONDITIONS—INFRINGEMENT.

3. Where there has been a trial at law, and a bill of exceptions taken, the court is bound to exercise its own judgment upon the questions involved in the bill of exceptions, with a view to see whether the litigation that remains, presents such serious doubts concerning the title, as ought to influence its judgment in granting or withholding the injunction.

This was an application [by Merrill A. Forbush and George Crompton] for a provisional injunction [against Shadrack S. Bradford and Royal C. Taft] to restrain the infringement of letters patent [No. 491, granted to W. Crompton, November 24, 1837, and reissued September 13, 1853 (No. 247)] which had already been the subject of an action at law between the same parties, in which the plaintiffs had a verdict. The facts involved in the decision of the motion are stated in the opinion.

Causten Browne, for complainants.

T. A. Jenckes and A. Payne, for defendants.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. In acting on applications for temporary injunctions to restrain the infringement of letters patent, there is much latitude for discretion. The application may be granted or refused unconditionally, or terms may be imposed on either of the parties as conditions for making or refusing the order. And the state of the litigation, where the plaintiffs' title is denied, the nature of the improvement, the character and extent of the infringement complained of, and the comparative inconvenience which will be occasioned to the respective parties, by allowing or denying the motion, must all be considered in determining whether it should be allowed or refused; and if at all, whether absolutely or upon some and what conditions. In this case, the thing patented is an improvement on a loom. The loom itself is not claimed; but only a particular modification of a loom previously in use.

The defendants in these cases do not make and sell looms having the patented improvement; they only use in their mills certain numbers of such looms. The complainants are makers of looms, but do not use them. So that this particular mode of infringement by the use of the thing patented, though it is a violation of the exclusive right claimed by the complainants, does not deprive them of a monopoly which they desire to retain in their own hands, because practically, it deprives them only of what they would be entitled to receive for a license to use the thing patented. Nor does it, like the manufacture and sale of the thing patented, constantly widen the field of litigation, and render it more and more difficult for the complainants to vindicate their rights.

On the other hand, the defendants can not be prohibited from using the thing patented without being at the same time deprived of the use of the entire loom. For though it is possible to alter their looms, and work them without the patented improvement, it is shown that in the present state of the business, and while the litigation is pending, no prudent man would do this. The practical effect of an injunction would therefore be to stop all these looms, and thus deprive the defendants of the use of a large amount of capital lawfully invested, and which they have the right to the benefit of; and it would also throw out of employment a large number of operatives who are now engaged in running the looms, and in the processes of manufacture which depend upon their use. All this would not prevent the court from granting an injunction, if the right had been finally established at law. But a bill of exceptions has been taken, upon points which involve the validity of the patent. This, again, does not present an insuperable objection to a temporary injunction. This court is bound to exercise its own judgment upon the questions involved in the bill of exceptions, with a view to see whether the litigation that remains, presents such serious doubts concerning the title as ought to influence its judgment in granting or withholding the injunction. I can conceive of many cases in which a temporary injunction ought to issue, where there has been a trial at law, and a bill of exceptions taken, even though serious questions are raised, upon which the court of errors may reverse the judgment. See Bridson v. Benecke, 12 Beav. 1. And a fortiori when the court that tried the cause, and is applied to for an injunction, is fully satisfied of the correctness of its judgment. But even in such a case, when the bill of exceptions is not merely frivolous, as the litigation is not in fact terminated, and its result may be adverse to the complainants' title, it is necessary for the court to contemplate that as a possible result, and look at the consequences, in that event, of allowing or refusing the injunction. See Bridson v. McAlpine, 8 Beav. 229.

Upon the particular facts of these cases I am of opinion an injunction should issue, unless within ten days after notice of the order, the defendants shall give a bond with sufficient surety, to be judged of by the clerk of this court, conditioned to keep an account of the quantity of cloth made on each of the looms in question, and to file such account under oath, once in three months, in the clerk's office of this court, and to pay the amount of any final decree in the cause. And also, that neglecting for the space of ten days to file such account, an injunction should issue.

It has been suggested that, as it appears this manufacture is not at present carried on to any profit, the complainants will receive no compensation for the use which may be made of their invention. But I apprehend that the account to which the complainants may be entitled, will not be of the general profits of the business, but of the profit made by using the patented improvement, in place of some other method of manufacture not patented. And if they shall so elect, they may waive an account of profits, and bring their action at law for damages.

PATENTS—ANTICIPATION—ELEMENTS OF COMBINATION.

1. The defendant, in a patent cause, may show that the thing patented, or some substantial part thereof, existed in a foreign country, and was known to the patentee before his application for a patent, and may have put to the jury the question whether the patentee believed himself to be the original inventor, though such foreign invention had not previously been patented or described in any printed publication.

2. To make a valid claim for a combination, it is not necessary that the several elementary parts of the combination should act simultaneously.

[Cited in Herring v. Nelson, Case No. 6,424; Hoe v. Cottrell, 1 Fed. 600; Hoffman v. Young, 2 Fed. 77; Holmes Burglar Alarm Tel. Co. v. Domestic Tel. & Tel. Co., 42 Fed. 227; National Progress Bunching-Mach. Co. v. John R. Williams Co., 44 Fed. 192; Brickill v. Mayor of City of Baltimore, 50 Fed. 275.]

3. Nor is it requisite to include in the claim for a combination, as elements thereof, all parts of the machine which are necessary to its action, save as they may be understood as entering into the mode of combining and arranging the elements of the combination.

[Cited in Parham v. American Buttonhole Over-Seaming & S. M. Co., Case No. 10,713; M'Millan v. Rees, 1 Fed. 725; Hancock Inspirator Co. v. Jenks, 21 Fed. 916.]

4. If the patentee first made a new and useful combination, he is entitled to a patent for it, though each one of its elements were known before, and two out of three of them had actually been combined in a prior machine.

[Cited in Hoe v. Cottrell, 1 Fed. 603; Haffcke v. Clark, 50 Fed. 535.]

5. It is decisive evidence that a new mode of operation has been introduced, if the practical effect of the new combination is either a new effect, or a materially better effect, or as good an effect more economically attained. And, in such case, it is not material how much study, thought, time, expense, or experiment was required to make the change.

[Cited in Celluloid Manuf'g Co. v. Comstock & Cheney Co., 27 Fed. 360; Ligowski Clay-Pigeon Co. v. American Clay-Bird Co., 34 Fed. 332.]

This was an action on the case [by Merrill A. Forbush and others against Willis Cook and others], tried before Mr. Justice CURTIS and a jury, to recover damages for an infringement of letters patent [No. 491] for an "improvement in power looms for weaving figured fabrics," granted to William Crompton November 24, 1837, extended for seven years from November 24, 1851, assigned to plaintiffs and surrendered by and reissued to them September 13, 1853 [No. 247]. The particular claim which was alleged to have been infringed by the defendants, was for a combination of a pattern cylinder, with double-hooked jacks, and a lifter and depressor, which were described as so constructed and arranged that the pattern cylinder, in the act of revolving and presenting a section of the pattern, pressed by its projections, which corresponded with the section of the pattern, upon such of the jacks as were required to be raised, and pushed these jacks into a position to have one set of their hooks caught by the elevator, the other jacks not thus acted on remaining in a position to have the other set of their hooks caught by the depressor; the elevator and depressor rising and sinking, and carrying with them the required jacks thus disposed to receive their action; the shed of the warp being thus opened both ways simultaneously, and the threads necessary to form the figure being disposed in the upper part of the shed.

The defendants insisted that a valid claim for combining these three elements, namely, the pattern cylinder, the double-hooked jacks, and the lifter and depressor, could not be made—First, because the office of the pattern cylinder was fully performed, and the cylinder was at rest when the jacks, and lifter, and depressor began to act, and so they did not act in combination, but separately; and, second, because the shed could not be formed without the assistance of a fourth part, namely, certain inclined wires, whose office it was to hold in position the jacks not acted on by the pattern cylinder, so that the depressor would catch their hooks in sinking, and that it was necessary to embrace this fourth element in the claim for a combination.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 423, contains only a partial report.]

Causten Browne, C. M. Keller, and Rufus Choate, for plaintiffs.

E. F. Hodges and T. A. Jenckes, for defendants.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice, (charging jury): To make a valid claim for a combination, it is not necessary that the several elementary parts of the combination should act simultaneously. If those elementary parts are so arranged that the successive action of each contributes to produce some one practical result, which result, when attained, is the product of the simultaneous or successive action of all the elementary parts, viewed as one entire whole, a valid claim for thus combining those elementary parts may be made. Nor is it requisite to include in the claim for a combination, as elements thereof, all parts of the machine which are necessary to its action, save as they may be understood as entering into the mode of combining and arranging the elements of the combination. If inclined wires are necessary to the action of the combination specified, so are many other parts of the machine, and all parts necessary to the action and combination specified might be said to enter into the mode of combining and arranging the elements of the combination, but need not be and ought not to be included in the combination claimed.

The defendants have offered evidence to prove that two looms, models of which were produced, existed in England long before William Crompton made the thing patented, and were well known to him there. One called the Jones and Milldun loom contains the double-hooked jacks combined with the lifter and depressor, and a pattern cylinder and chain; but the pattern cylinder and chain differ from Crompton's in this: The cylinder revolved so as to present toward the jacks the protuberances corresponding with one section of the pattern, and then stopped; by another combination of mechanism it is then moved horizontally against the jacks, which are thus pushed out into position to have their hooks caught by the elevator. The pattern cylinder is then restored to its former position

This machine was patented in England, and described in a printed publication before Crompton's alleged invention was made. There is evidence tending to prove that those two movements of the cylinder, when compared with the mode of operation of Crompton's cylinder, are more complex, involve greater cost of construction and repair, and require more time; and that for these reasons Crompton's has a decided practical advantage over Jones and Milldun's.

The other loom relied on is what is called the Witch loom. It has a pattern cylinder like Crompton's, but only single-hooked jack, and opens the shed but one way. It is conceded that to open the shed but one way strains the warp, and is an imperfect mode of operation. This loom has not been patented, nor described in any printed publication.

But the defendants insist that Crompton, having knowledge both of the Witch loom and the Jones and Milldun loom, it required no invention to combine the pattern cylinder of the former with the double jacks, and lifter and depressor of the latter, and therefore that he has made no invention.

The act of congress of July 4, 1836, § 15 [5 Stat. 123], has provided that when it shall satisfactorily appear that the patentee, at the time of his making his application for a patent, believed himself to be the first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, the same shall not be held to be void on account of the invention or discovery, or any part thereof, having been before known or used in any foreign country, it not appearing that the same, or any substantial part thereof, had before been patented or described in any printed publication. If you find that when Crompton made application for the patent, he believed himself to be the first inventor of the thing patented therein, his patent is not invalidated by the prior existence of the Witch loom in England. But in considering whether he did believe himself to be the original inventor of what was patented to him, it is material to determine whether he was, in fact, the original inventor thereof. If he was, there is an end to all inquiry on this subject. If he was not, still he may have believed himself to be so.

It has not been denied that in point of fact he first combined the pattern cylinder of the Witch loom with the double-hooked jacks, and elevator and depressor of the Jones and Milldun loom; but some witnesses have testified that in their opinion it did not require invention to devise this combination. Other witnesses have expressed the opposite opinion. The true inquiries for you to make in this connection are, whether the combination made by Crompton was new and useful? If it was a new and useful combination within the meaning of the patent law, it was the subject-matter of a patent, and is not important whether it required much or little thought, study, or experiment to make it, or whether it cost much or little time or expense to devise and execute it. If it was a new and useful combination of parts, and he was the first to make the combination, he is an inventor, and may have a valid patent. When I say it must be new, I do not refer to the materials out of which the parts are made, nor merely to the form or workmanship of the parts, or the use of one known equivalent for another. These may all be such as never existed before in such a combination, and yet the combination may not be new, in the sense of the patent law. To be new in that sense, some new mode of operation must be introduced. And it is decisive evidence, though not the only evidence, that a new mode of operation has been introduced, if the practical effect of the new combination is either a new effect, or a materially better effect, or as good an effect more economically attained by means of the change made in the combinations of the patentee. A new or improved, or more economical effect, attributable to the change made by the patentee in the mode of operation of existing machinery, proves that the change has introduced a new mode of operation, which is the subject-matter of a patent; and when this is ascertained, it is not a legitimate subject of inquiry, at what cost to the patentee it was made, nor does the validity of the patent depend on an opinion formed after the event, respecting the ease or difficulty of attaining it. Witnesses have described to you the practical advantages of Crompton's loom over any other loom for the weaving of fancy fabrics, previously known, and have pointed out the cause of these practical advantages. They attribute them to the modification made by Crompton in the Jones and Milldun loom, changing the double action of the cylinder to a single rotary motion. If this is so, if he first made this modification, and thus made a combination not only new in fact, but which produced the practical advantages described, he was entitled to a patent for that combination, though each one of its elements were known before, and two out of three of those elements had actually been combined in the Jones and Milldun loom. When he introduced the third element, which had not previously been combined with the others, and thereby made a better loom, he made an invention within the meaning of the patent law.

The judge then summed up the evidence respecting Crompton's belief that he was the first inventor, and also on the question of infringement.

The jury found for the plaintiff.

In re FORD et al.

[18 N. B. R. 426.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 18, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—PROVABLE DEBTS—ARBITRATION OF CREDITORS' CLAIMS—NOTES SUBJECT TO SET-OFF.

1. It is not competent for a creditor and the bankrupt to submit to arbitration the question of the amount due to the creditor from the bankrupt's estate.

2. The Code of New York has no application to bankruptcy proceedings.

3. A submission of a claim by stipulation to the register to hear and determine is not in the nature of an arbitration or a reference under the New York Code, and the decision of the register in such case is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the review of the court.

4. The holder and owner of a claim can alone make the proof.

5. A note which is subject to an offset for a larger amount is not a provable debt.

6. The claim of one of the creditors, J. W., was upon two notes, which, with others, had been given by the bankrupts to the firm, W. & H., for a debt due to the firm, secured by a pledge of stock. The firm afterwards surrendered to the bankrupts a large number of notes, and signed an agreement to take up and surrender others, including the ones in question, and received from the bankrupts a cash payment, which, it was agreed, with the stock held by them, should be taken in satisfaction of the debt. The claimant became the indorsee of the notes after their maturity and dishonor. Held, that the notes were paid.

[In the matter of John B. Ford & Co.]

T. Saunders, for bankrupts.

E. F. Brown, for creditors.

CHOATE, District Judge. This case comes up on the certificate of the register of proceedings taken before him for the re-examination of claims of two alleged creditors of the bankrupts, and has been argued as a motion to expunge the proofs of debts, which were allowed by the register. The application for re-examination was made by the bankrupts pending proceedings for a composition. The case is not therefore strictly within general order No. 34, which regulates re-examinations of claims on motion of an assignee or a creditor. After the testimony was taken before the register, the attorneys for the bankrupts and the alleged creditors whose claims were in dispute, entered into a stipulation in writing referring the matter to the register to hear and determine. As originally drawn the stipulation contained the word "finally," but at the suggestion of the bankrupt's attorney the word "finally" was stricken out. It is now claimed by the creditors that the decision of the register is final and conclusive, either on the ground that the submission was in the nature of an arbitration or on the ground that it was a reference under the New York Code to hear and determine, and that the decision of the referee is final because exceptions have not been filed within the time limited by the Code.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

Neither position is well taken. It is not competent for a creditor and the bankrupt to submit to arbitration the question of the amount due to the creditor from the estate of the bankrupt. That is not one of the methods appointed by the bankrupt law for ascertaining the claims upon the estate. Such an agreement would seriously affect the rights of other creditors, and they have a right to have all creditors' claims determined in the mode appointed by law. Nor does the stipulation purport to be a submission to arbitration. It seems to have been resorted to as a convenient mode of declaring the testimony closed, and of submitting the questions arising on the testimony to the register, and there is nothing to show that either party intended that in passing on those questions the register should exercise any other than his ordinary powers in similar cases. The Code of New York has no application to bankruptcy proceedings, and there is nothing in the stipulation to show that the parties intended to make its provisions applicable to this case, even if it was competent for them to do so. The decision of the register is therefore subject to the review of this court.

The claim of one of the creditors, Joseph Warren, is on two promissory notes given by the bankrupts to Warren & Howard for value, and Joseph Warren became the indorsee thereof after their maturity and dishonor. They are therefore subject to the same defences as if held by Warren & Howard. In July, 1875, the bankrupts were indebted to the firm of Warren & Howard, mainly for goods sold and delivered, in about fourteen thousand five hundred dollars, for which Warren & Howard held the bankrupt's notes, in all about twelve thousand dollars, including the two notes now held by Joseph Warren —the balance of the debt was due on open account. As security for this debt, the bankrupts transferred to Warren & Howard thirteen shares of the capital stock of the Christian Union Publishing Co. On the 4th of January, 1876, Warren & Howard surrendered to the bankrupts a large number of the notes held by them, and signed an agreement to take up and surrender others, including the two now in question. On the same day they received the bankrupts' checks for eleven hundred and fifty dollars.

There is some conflict of testimony as to the consideration for this agreement, but, upon all the evidence, I am satisfied that it was then agreed between the parties that the stock held by the creditors should be taken, together with the cash payment then made, in satisfaction of the debt. This view of what took place, testified to by Mr. Ford, is far more consonant with the written evidence, and a far more probable account of the transaction than that given by Mr. Warren, according to which the stock still remained as security. Upon his statement of the matter I can see no occasion whatever for the surrender of the notes or the giving of the agreement of January 4, 1876. The notes held by Warren, therefore, must be treated as paid, and his claim must be expunged.

The claim of Warren & Howard is on three notes, one for one thousand six hundred and thirty dollars and forty-nine cents, and two for one thousand two hundred and ninety dollars and forty-three cents each. As to the last named, it was shown by the testimony, and not disputed, that they belonged to another party to whom Warren & Howard had transferred them, and that there is an agreement between Warren & Howard and the holder that Warren & Howard should prove the debt and receive the dividend, and pay it to the holder. The claimant must, in his deposition of proof, swear that the amount of his claim is justly due from the bankrupt to him. Section 5077. It is obvious, therefore, that the holder and owner of the note can alone make the proof. And the proof made on these notes must be expunged. As to the note of one thousand six hundred and thirty dollars and forty-nine cents, which appears not to have been included within the release of notes affected on the 4th of January, it is subject to an offset for a larger amout due to the bankrupts by the failure of Warren & Howard to take up and surrender other notes mentioned in the agreement of that date, and therefore the proof of this claim should also be expunged. Ordered accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY—JUDGMENT AND EXECUTION ON COGNOVIT.

[Taking judgment on a cognovit, and levying execution on the bankrupt's property, by his sufferance or permission, before the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy, is a fraud upon the act, although the cognovit is dated more than six months before the filing of the petition.]

[This was a proceeding by Ford, assignee in bankruptcy, against Keys.]

Hutchins & Ingersoll, for assignee.

Grannis & Henderson, for defendant.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge, held: That where judgment had been taken by confession on a cognovit, and execution levied upon the property of a bankrupt by the sufferance or permission of the bankrupt before proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted, it was a fraud upon the act, notwithstanding the cognovit may have been dated more than six months prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. That in such cases the date of the cognovit was entirely immaterial. Holding the law on that subject to be in accordance with the late cases, referring to Hood v. Karper [Case No. 6,664]; Haughey v. Albin [Id. 6,222]; In re Hafer [Id. 5,897]; and some ten or twelve other concurring decisions. Remanded for amendment and further proceedings.

CONTRACTS — FRAUD — RIGHTS OF THE PARTIES — CORPORATIONS — PURCHASE OF PROPERTY WITH STOCK — OVERVALUATION — BONA FIDE PURCHASER OF STOCK — LIABILITY OF THOSE CONNECTED WITH THE CORPORATION.

1. Fraud does not render a contract void, only at the option of the party defrauded, whether the fraud was committed by one of the contracting parties upon the other, or by both upon persons not parties to the transaction. Where fraud was committed by one of the parties upon the other, the contract remains operative, and in force, until it is disapproved by the injured party.

2. A mining corporation bought certain mineral lands, and paid for the same in shares of the stock, which were issued to the directors as paid-up stock. The lands were greatly overvalued, and were not worth the amount at which they were valued. The corporation went into bankruptcy, and suits were brought by the assignee to recover the difference between the real value of the lands and the par of the stock. Held, the complainant could not, without disaffirming the contract of purchase, set up the theory that the property taken in payment of the shares was less than their estimated value, nor seek redress against a bona fide purchaser of the stock in the open market.

[Cited in Coffin v. Ransdell, 110 Ind. 423, 11 N. E. 20.]

3. So far as an innocent purchaser of the stock in open market is concerned, the shares were paid-up stock, as shown by the books of the corporation.

[Distinguished in Flinn v. Bagley, 7 Fed. 789.]

[Cited in Erskine v. Löwenstein, 82 Mo. 303.]

4. Notice of any fraud upon the respondents was not alleged. But the mere fact that a person has become a shareholder, pursuant to a scheme in which he was a party, and which is ultra vires, will not relieve him from liability as a contributory, if the shares he has taken can be considered as legally existing.

[Cited in Skrainka v. Allen, 76 Mo. 392.]

5. Power to issue stock was possessed by the company, and therefore the rule that the holder takes nothing where the power is entirely wanting does not apply.

6. Every person connected with a company which issues certificates of stock for paid-up stock, when the money or value has not been paid, is guilty of a personal wrong towards the company, and may be made answerable for it in the same way, and to the same extent, as if the money had been taken out of the coffers of the company to pay up shares.

[Cited in Doty v. Johnson, 6 Fed. 482.]

The complainant [William C. Foreman] was the assignee in bankruptcy of the Central Coal Mining Company, and the respondents [Henry Bigelow and others] were the owners of certain shares in the capital stock of that company. Attempt was made by the bill of complaint to compel the respondents holding such shares to pay certain sums alleged to be due for the non-payment in full of the amount of the capital of the company represented by such shares. From the bill of complaint it also appeared that the corporation was organized with a capital of $400,000, divided into shares of $100.00 each, and that certain persons named, five in number, none of whom were made respondents in the case, became the corporators and directors of the company; and that the whole amount of the original stock was issued to those five persons, of which $353,790 in amount was issued in consideration of the conveyance to the corporation, by the directors, of certain coal lands, fraudulently valued at that sum, as between themselves, though in fact the lands were worth only twenty or thirty per cent of that amount, and that the remaining $46,210 of the stock was issued to the directors without consideration. Corporate authority was subsequently given to the directors to issue the bonds of the company, secured by mortgage in the sum of $100,000, and to increase the capital stock in that amount. New stock for $100,000 was accordingly issued, and given, under a vote of the company, such persons as purchased said bonds at ninety per cent, without other consideration, that the directors, pursuant to that vote, did increase the capital stock of the company $100,000, and did issue certificates of shares for the same, and gave them away without consideration. Shares of the capital stock of the company in due form were held by the respondents in the amounts specified in the bill of complaint. Debts to a large amount were contracted by the corporation, and on the 4th of May, 1874, the corporation was adjudged bankrupt. Nor was it questioned that the complainant was the lawful assignee of the bankrupt's estate, having duly succeeded the person who was first appointed to that place. As such assignee, he, on the 26th of April, 1877, petitioned the proper bankrupt court for a call and assessment upon the capital stock of the company to pay the debts of the corporation. Hearing was had, and the court decreed that $200,000 of the original stock remained unpaid, and that nothing had been paid on the increased capital stock; that the amount required to be raised was $281,120. Pursuant to that finding the court ordered a call and assessment on the whole capital stock, original and increased, of one hundred per cent, less any sum or sums that might have been paid thereon. Due and proper notice was given of that adjudication at the time it was made. The bill of complaint prayed for an account of the stock of each of the three issues held by each respondent,—how, and in what manner, and to what extent the same had been paid for,—and that the respondents might be decreed to pay the par value of the same severally held by the respondents, less any amounts they might have paid for the same. Respondents demurred, and set up two grounds of defence: 1. The statute of limitations; 2. That they were not liable to the assessment set up in the bill of complaint.

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 7 Reporter, 137, and 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 128, contain only partial reports.]

Dryden & Dryden and McComas & McKeighan, for complainants.

The liability of the stockholders to pay the assignees, who represent the creditors, such portion of the unpaid stock as may be necessary to liquidate the bankrupt's indebtedness cannot be seriously questioned after the numerous decisions by the supreme court of the United States. The capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts, publicly pledged to all who deal with it. Ogilvie v. Insurance Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 387. It is a trust fund to be managed for the benefit of its shareholders during its life, and for the benefit of its creditors in the event of its dissolution. This duty is a sacred one, and cannot be disregarded. Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 47. The capital stock is a substitute for the personal liability which subsists in private partnerships. Sanger v. Upton, Id. 57. No subscription or express promise to pay is necessary; the taking and holding the stock raises an implied promise to pay. Webster v. Upton, Id. 65, and cases before cited. A corporation cannot give away its stock and issue paid-up certificates. Such action is ultra vires, at least as to those who deal with the corporation. Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 153; Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 610; Tuckerman v. Brown, 33 N. Y. 297; Ogilvie v. Insurance Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380; Osgood v Laytin, 3 Keys [*42 N. Y.] 521. The purchaser of shares from original holder stands in his shoes. He succeeds to all his rights and all his obligations. Upton v. Hansbrough [Case No. 16,801]; Seymour v. Sturgiss, 26 N. Y. 134; Sagory v. Dubois, 3 Sandf. Ch. 466; Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Boorman, 12 Conn. 530; Armstrong v. Wheeler, 9 Cow. 88. Stock certificates are assignable, but not commercial paper. The assignee may have paid full value for it, and relied upon the representations of the assignor and the officers of the company that the shares were fully paid for, yet, if the shares were not paid for, the assignee is liable to creditors. Myers v. Seeley [Case No. 9,994]; also, cases cited in 91 U. S. This must be so as to creditors. The assignor of stock may estop himself by his representations; the company may, perhaps, estop itself by its representations on the certificate, or otherwise, but, the capital stock being a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, which is known to all the world, this trust cannot be destroyed by the representations of the company. Even certificates to stockholders made payable to bearer are not negotiable or commercial paper, and purchasers of the same are held to all the responsibilities of original holders, although, in fact, innocent of the trust resting on original owner. Railroad Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 415; Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382; Mechanics' Bank v. New York & N. H. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 599. The payment of stock in any thing but money will not be regarded as a payment of any thing, except to the extent of the true value of the property. Osgood v. King, 42 Iowa, 483; Burnham v. North Western Ins. Co., 36 Iowa, 632; Nathan v. Whitlock, 3 Edw. Ch. 215. An executory contract to pay in any thing but money will not be enforced as against creditors, and trustees of a corporation cannot be both vendors and vendees. Henry v. Vermillion & A. R. Co., 17 Ohio, 187; Goodin v. Cincinnati & W. Canal Co., 18 Ohio St. 169.

Does the plea of the two years' statute of limitations of the bankrupt act constitute a good defence to their action? Two questions must be passed on:—1st. Does the statute apply at all to recover debts or enforce a mere money liability on a contract? 2d. Did the specific right of action to recover the assessments here sued on accrue to the assignees at the date of the deed of assignment, or when the assessments were made and payment refused?

Reference is here made to section 2 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 518)], as it stood before the adoption of the Revised Statutes. The first part of this section is jurisdictional, giving—First, a superintending and supervisory control to the circuit courts over district courts, and from the action of which no appeal or writ of error lies to the supreme court; and, secondly, concurrent plenary jurisdiction, in a distinct and accurately described class of cases, to the circuit courts. It will be conceded that the latter part of the section operates as a limitation only in the cases to which concurrent jurisdiction is given. As to what cases the circuit courts had jurisdiction of by this section, there have been several decisions by circuit courts, which all concur in denying jurisdiction to actions necessary to recover debts or money due on contracts, and confining the jurisdiction to actions wherein the defendant's claim, whether assignee or claimant, was adverse as to some interest in dispute. The language employed clearly indicates that the action must relate to something the existence of which is not the subject of the controversy, but which is adversely claimed. This is not so in an action to recover money on a debt. The defendants here do not claim the debt alleged, or any interest in it, adversely to the assignee. The controversy is not, In whom is the right of property in the debt? but, Is there a debt? If it is decided that there is no right of property, the defendants will not succeed as having an adverse and superior right to the debt, or any interest therein. The language of the act is: "Which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by 'such person' against such assignee." The "such person" referred to is the same person before described as an adverse claimant,—in one case plaintiff, in the other defendant. This could not be true as to creditor and debtor. The defendants here could not, in the nature of things, have any action to recover any portion of the assessment from the assignees. The bankrupt act, in section 1, had conferred on the district courts jurisdiction for "the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt." The studied use of different language, not pertinent to the mere collection of debts, in two sections, one immediately following the other, shows that congress meant to distinguish between different subjects of controversy, having reference more particularly, in section 2, to disputes arising under section 35 of the act of 1867. The following decisions construe section 2 as it stood in the act of 1867, before the Revision: Bachman v. Packard [Case No. 709]; Sedgwick v. Casey [Id. 12,610]; Davis v. Anderson [Id. 3,623]; Smith v. Crawford [Id. 13,030]; Stevens v. Hauser, 39 N. Y. 302; Union Canal Co. v. Woodside, 11 Pa. St. 176.

The act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 178], amended section 2 by inserting in the place of the word "same," in line 12, the word "any," and after the words "claiming an adverse interest," the words "or owing any debt to such bankrupt." If the circuit court had jurisdiction to recover debts before the amendment, the amendment performs no office. It will be claimed, however, that since the amendment the limitation clause of section 2 has been enlarged by the increased jurisdiction given to circuit courts by two things: First, by the intimate connection between the different parts of the section, and by the phrase in the limitation clause "touching the property and rights of property aforesaid." Even if section 2, at the date of the amendment, was in force as section 2, it would be more plausible than sound to say that the phrase quoted would refer to debts which were only brought into the jurisdictional clause by the amendment. If the decisions cited are correct, then the limitation clause did not apply to debts. The amendment does not profess to amend the limitation clause. It is left untouched. Statutes, like contracts, are to be construed with reference to the objects sought to be attained, and the state of things existing at the time of their adoption. Congress, with the same ease and in the same amendment, could have inserted in the limitation clause, after the phrase "touching any property or rights of property," the words "or any debt owed to the bankrupt." It did not see fit to do it, but left the limitation clause to refer to what it did before.

But the defendants are not entitled to the apparent advantage given them by considering section 2 still in force. The amendment of June 22, 1874, never did take effect as an amendment to section 2 as it stood before the adoption of the Revised Statutes. The Revision went into effect on the same day of the amendment, June 22, 1874. Rev. St. 1091, 1092. All acts of congress passed prior to Dec. 1, 1873, any portion of which was embraced in any section of the Revision, were repealed by express language. See same pages. The bankrupt act of 1867 was, of course, passed prior to Dec. 1, 1873, and the Revision embraced section 2. Without, therefore, the aid of another section of the Revised Statutes, the amendment of June 22 would fall to the ground. And the same result follows, whether the amendment is considered as going into effect before, at the same instant, or after the repeal. By the Revision the different parts of section 2 were sent into independent and unconnected sections, uncorrupted by each other. The jurisdiction clause reappeared in section 4979, the limitation in section 5057. This (section 5057) is the only statute of limitations in force in the bankrupt act, and from it is stricken the word "aforesaid," and the language of the section made more emphatic,—that it bars only suits "between the assignee and a person claiming an adverse interest." It cannot be claimed that section 5057 has been amended, nor would section 4979 be affected by the amendment of June 22, 1874, were it not for section 5601, p. 1092, of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows: "Sec. 5601. The enactment of said Revision is not to affect or repeal any act of congress passed since the first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, and all acts passed since that date are to have full effect, as if passed after the enactment of this Revision, and, so far as such acts vary from, or conflict in, said Revision, they are to have effect as subsequent statutes, and as repealing any portion of the revision inconsistent therewith." By the terms of this section it is plain that the act of June 22, 1874, can only apply to, and amend, section 4979. Said section, so amended, and as it appears in recent editions of Bump, is as follows: "Sec. 4979. The several circuit courts shall have, within each district, concurrent jurisdiction with the district court of any district, whether the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court have been conferred on such district court or not, of all suits, at law or in equity, brought by an assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest, or owing any debt to such bankrupt, or by any such person against an assignee, touching any property or rights of the bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee." It would seem that every pretence is taken away, by the Revision, for contending that the amendment enlarging the jurisdiction also enlarges the limitation section. On the contrary, the views we have insisted on are strengthened by the consideration that section 4979, as it now stands, divides the suits over which circuit courts have jurisdiction into two classes, one class being where the claims of the assignee and claimant are adverse as to the subject-matter of the controversy, and the other class being actions to recover debts owed to the bankrupt. Section 5057 applies, by using the same language, only to the first class of actions. There may be reasons here for legislation, and there may not, but there is no ground for judicial intervention.

The eighth section of the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 446] was as follows: "Sec. 8. The circuit court shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of all suits, in law or equity, which may and shall be brought by an assignee in bankruptcy against any person claiming an adverse interest or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt transferable to or vested in such assignee; and no suit, at law or in equity, shall, in any case, be maintainable by or against any person claiming an adverse interest, touching the property and rights of property aforesaid, in any court whatsoever, unless the same shall be brought within two years after the declaration and decree in bankruptcy, or after the cause of suit shall first have accrued." This is, in effect, the same as section 2 of 1867. In the cases of Clark v. Clark, 17 How. [58 U S.] 315; Stevens v. Hauser, 39 N. Y. 302; Union Canal Co. v. Woodside, 11 Pa. St. 176; Carr v. Lord, 29 Me. 54; and In re Conant [Case No. 3,086],—it was decided that section 8 of the act of 1841, both as to jurisdiction and limitation, applied only to actions where the interest in the subject-matter was adverse. Against cases cited, construing section 8, will be produced only two cases: Mitchell v. Great Works Milling Co. [Case No. 9,662]; Pritchard v. Chandler [Id. 11,436]; Walker v. Towner [Id. 17,089]. The last case merely follows the first. We can afford to offset against these cases the cases cited, and the powerful criticisms of Judge Blatchford and Judge Deady, in Smith v. Crawford [Id. 13,030], and Bachman v. Packard, already cited. We will be referred to the opinion of Judge Miller, in Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 345, in which the strong language of the judge is supposed to favor the construction of the defendants. That decision, however, must be taken in connection with the case itself, which was a suit brought to set aside a conveyance to a fraudulent grantee. Manifestly the defendant was an adverse claimant, although his counsel, being in extreme peril, contended he was not. In that case the assignee was allowed to maintain his action, although begun more than two years from his appointment, the court holding that the statute did not run until the fraud was discovered by the assignee. In Clark v. Clark, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 315, in which the statute of limitations was pleaded, the supreme court said: "The interest adversely claimed, and which the statute protects, is an interest in a claimant other than the bankrupt."

The second question for the court to decide is when the right to recover the specific amount of money sued for accrued to the assignees. We claim that, when the deed of assignment was made to the assignees, their right of action against the stockholders depended upon a contingency; viz., whether the other assets of the company would be sufficient to pay its debts; and the amount which they would have a right to sue depended upon what the difference between the assets and liabilities should turn out to be. The assignees, representing the creditors only in these suits, have no other legal or equitable right than that of recovering such assessment as the bankrupt court may determine necessary to discharge the company's indebtedness. Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Manuf'g Co., 13 Wis. 63; Myers v. Seeley [Case No. 9,994]; [Kennedy v. Gibson] 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 505. The liability of the stockholders depends upon the necessity for funds, in addition to the other assets, to pay the bankrupt's debts; and this necessity must first be determined by the court which makes the call, or authorizes the assignees to do it. The assignees represent the creditors; the unpaid stock is a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors, to the amount necessary to satisfy their claims. This trust may not be, and is not in this case equal to the whole amount of the unpaid stock. When the debts are paid, the trust resting upon the unpaid stock and the stockholders who owe it is discharged, so far as the creditors or the assignees are concerned. This was held by Judge Treat in Myers v. Seeley [supra], and also in Chandler v. Keith, 42 Iowa, 99, and Payson v. Stoever [Case No. 10,863]. In both the first two cases the assignee and receiver brought suit with an assessment, and their bills were dismissed, and they remanded to proceedings for an assessment. In both cases the reasons for the necessity of an assessment are ably given, and no court has held otherwise. It cannot be held that the statute runs against a mere delay to obtain a cause of action, however negligent the assignee may have been. In this case, however, the assignees were constantly engaged for two years in trying to realize something out of the lands and leases of the company, and in fighting and defeating nearly $100,000 of fraudulent claims presented for allowance, mostly founded upon contracts made during the last days of the corporation by the officers and agents of the company. The justice or injustice of these claims had to be determined, and the lands and leases disposed of, before the assignee could represent, or the court determine, how much of the trust fund was necessary to call in. A cause of action does not accrue until the existence of such a state of things as will enable a person having the proper relations to the property or persons concerned to bring the action. Whitcher v. Hall, 5 Barn. & C. 269; Mayor, etc., Bristol v. Visger, 8 Dowl. & R. 346. It will be claimed that the right of action of the assignees is like a note payable on demand, on which suit may be brought at once, the suit being held a sufficient demand. There is no analogy. Such is not the stockholder's liability. There is more analogy in the case of a note payable at a certain time after demand, in which case a demand is necessary before suit. Little v. Blunt, 9 Pick. 488; Wenman v. Mohawk Ins. Co., 13 Wend. 267. The bankrupt statute of limitations could not run until this assessment was made, and the stockholders had failed to pay as required. Even as against a corporation, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until a call or assessment is made. Gibson v. Columbia & N. R. T. & B. Co., 18 Ohio St. 396; Bigelow v. Libby, 117 Mass. 359; and 42 Iowa, already cited. See Howland v. Edmonds, 24 N. Y. 307.

We also claim that the plea of the statute of limitations is not good because these suits are brought to enforce a trust. The statute does not run against an express trust until after the trustee has been called upon to execute his trust, and he has refused or disavowed the trust. The trustee does not hold adversely to the cestui que trust until this refusal or disavowal. Ball. Lim. 369; Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 481. In 3 Swanst. 585, Lord Nottingham defines an express trust as a "trust raised or created by the acts of the parties, which are declared either by word or writing, and these declarations are established either by direct and manifest proof or violent and necessary presumption." Tested by this rule there is no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the defendants, as members of the corporation, are trustees of an express trust, and they did not hold adversely until after the call was made and they refused to pay. In Payne v. Bullard, 23 Miss. (1 Cushm.) 88, it is held directly that the stockholders could not interpose the plea of the statute of limitations, as the unpaid stock was a trust fund.

W. G. Russell, George Putnam, Moorfield Storey, and Sidney Bartlett, for respondents.

Brief of W. G. Russell and George Putnam:

The bill alleges that the stock of the Central Coal Company was not in fact full paid, although issued as such, and that the defendants are holders of such stock. It does not allege that the defendants, or any of them, were parties to any of the fraudulent issues, or had any notice that the shares were not full paid. It may be therefore assumed that the defendants purchased the shares as full paid in good faith. The defendants being purchasers of stock, issued as full paid, and without notice that it is not, in fact, full paid, cannot be assessed for the unpaid portion of their shares, even in bankruptcy and for the benefit of creditors. Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 29; Guest v. Worcester, &c., R. Co., L. R. 4 C. P. 9; Spargo's Case, 8 Ch. App. 410; Nicholls' Case, 26 Wkly. Rep. 334. The remedy for unpaid calls in such case is against the original subscriber, who was a party to the fraudulent issue. Society for Illustration of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, 2 Beav. 559; Wallworth v. Holt, 4 Mylne & C. 619; Spargo's Case, 8 Ch. App. 410; Nathan v. Whitlock, 9 Paige, 152; Nicholl's Case, 26 Wkly. Rep. 334; Ex parte Currie, 7 Law T. (N. S.) 486; Leifchild's Case, 13 Law T. (N. S.) 267; Ashworth v. Bristol R. Co., 15 Law T. (N. S.) 561. And see Phelan v. Hazard [Case No. 11,068]. In Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65, where a purchaser of stock was held liable to pay up the unpaid instalments, the stock showed upon its face that it was only partially paid. And the same is true of all the cases in which a purchaser of stock has been held to pay subsequent calls. Bend v. Susquehanna B. & B. Co., 6 Har. & J. 128; Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill, 484; Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Boorman, 12 Conn. 530; Upton v. Hansbrough [Case No. 16,801]. No case can be found in which a purchaser of stock which did not show upon its face that it was not full paid has been held liable for calls or assessments made after his purchase. And the cases in which it has been held that creditors can enforce rights which the corporation itself would be estopped to enforce on account of fraud of its agents, were suits against original subscribers for instalments upon stock which, upon its face, was not full paid. Oakes v. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 325; Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45; Upton v. Englehart [Case No. 16,800]. Now, if a purchaser of stock is bound to find out whether the stock was honestly paid or not, he must clearly go beyond the books and ascertain the real value of the property transferred. And inasmuch as many properties, especially mining properties and patent rights, have been sold and bought in perfect good faith at prices which turned out to be grossly in excess of their true value, he must, if the value seems excessive, go further and ascertain whether it was honestly valued or not at the time of its transfer to the corporation. And it would also follow, contrary to the well-settled rule, that the original perpetrators of the fraud cannot be held to make good their fraudulently issued stock; for the ground of the equity of the bill is that the vendor has ceased to be, and the vendee has become, a stockholder, and that the liability to pay assessments is transferred with the stock. Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65, and cases cited; Ang. & A. Corp. § 534.

The cases in which it has been held that the purchaser of stock is liable to calls, notwithstanding the fraud of the corporation or of the vendor, are all cases in which the stock appeared on its face not to be full paid, and the fraud consisted, not in issuing it as full paid, but in making false representations as to its value or its liability to assessment. Oakes v. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 325; Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65; Upton v. Englehart [supra]. The stockholder has been held liable by reason of laches in not discovering the fraud or in not repudiating the stock when the fraud was discovered. Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45; Upton v. Englehart [supra]; Farrar v. Walker [Case No. 4,679]. The bankruptcy proceedings do not preclude defendants from taking the defences here set up. Lamb v. Lamb [Case No. 8,018]; Upton v. Hansbrough [supra]; In re Republic Ins. Co. [Case No. 11,704]; Michener v. Payson [Id. 9,524]; Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56. The defences of individual contributories are left to be dealt with in the suits brought by the assignee. In re Republic Ins. Co. [supra]; Lamb v. Lamb [supra].

The statute of limitations in the act relating to bankruptcy (Rev. St. § 5057) is a bar to the maintenance of the present bill. That act applies to all judicial contests between the assignee and any person whose interest is adverse to his. Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 342; Walker v. Towner [Case No. 17,089]. It appears that the present suit was brought more than two years after the appointment of the assignee, but less than two years after the order of the bankruptcy court directing the assessment of the capital stock. If, then, the cause of action accrued to the assignee at the time of his appointment, the bar of the statute applies. If it did not accrue till the assessment was made by order of the court, then it is not barred. We contend that it accrued to the assignee at once upon his appointment. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380; Ward v. Griswoldville Manuf'g Co., 16 Conn. 599; Adler v. Milwaukee Pat. Brick Manuf'g Co., 13 Wis. 61; Mann v. Pentz, 2 Sandf. Ch. 257; Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill, 484; Henry v. Vermillion & A. R. Co., 17 Ohio, 187. The right of the creditors rests on the right of the corporation, as against the subscribers to its capital stock and those who have succeeded to their liabilities, to compel the payment of so much of the capital as has not already been paid in. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380; Ward v. Griswoldville Manuf'g Co., 16 Conn. 599; Adler v. Milwaukee Pat. Brick Manuf'g Co., 13 Wis. 61; Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 29. The suit may be brought by the corporation itself, or by the stockholders who have paid in full, against delinquent subscribers, for the purpose of paying the corporate debts. Society for Illustration of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, 2 Beav. 559; Wallworth v. Holt, 4 Mylne & C. 619; Nathan v. Whitlock, 9 Paige, 152. And upon the bankruptcy of the corporation, the suit, which up to that time might have been brought by any creditor or by the corporation itself, may be brought by the assignee who represents both the corporation and the creditors, and succeeds to all their rights against the debtors to the corporation. See Baker v. Atlas Bank, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 182; Com. v. Cochituate Bank, 3 Allen, 42.

The discussion in this brief has proceeded upon grounds open to any bona fide purchaser of shares of either of the three issues, and upon the assumption that the theory of the plaintiff's bill is maintainable, viz., that the original transaction between the directors and the corporation, by which their land was taken in payment for the first issue, may be treated as a partial payment for that stock, leaving the balance due thereon to be recovered by the corporation or the assignee. We do not, however, concede this proposition. The original issue of stock, so far as any contract rights ever existed or are to be enforced between the parties, was full-paid stock. The fraud might furnish ground for avoiding and rescinding the contract by the corporation, or for the recovery of damages by the corporation or its assignee against the parties concerned in it; but even as against them it can furnish no ground for assuming or enforcing a contract which they never made, namely, a contract to pay for stock which, by the very terms of their real contract, was to be taken as full paid. Still less can it furnish ground for assuming and enforcing such an implied contract against bona fide purchasers of the stock so issued, who have taken it as full paid, and without knowledge of the fraud. It is evident that the remedy for such fraud, whatever it may be and against whomsoever it may lie, might have been pursued by the corporation at any time after the perpetration of the fraud, and by the assignee at any time after his appointment. In addition to the cases there cited, we refer to Ex parte Currie, 7 Law T. (N. S.) 486; Carling's Case, 1 Ch. Div. 115; Maynard's Case, L. R. 9 Ch. 60; De Ruvigne's Case, 5 Ch. Div. 306, 323.

Brief of Moorfield Storey:

A transferee of shares is not liable for unpaid subscriptions on his shares unless he has agreed with the corporation to pay them. If he has not promised he is not liable. A transferee's promise may be implied as well as that of an original subscriber. The latter may procure a release from his liability, if some one else, with the consent of the corporation, will assume his obligation. If a man buys shares from another, knowing that the seller is liable to the corporation for a portion of their price, procures a transfer of the shares to himself on the books of the corporation, and receives from the corporation a new certificate which on its face expresses the liability, it is not difficult to find in this transaction the intention of the buyer to assume the seller's liability, and the consent of the corporation to the substitution. The buyer knows that the seller is bound to pay the corporation the balance still due on the shares; he knows that, by the sale of his stock, the seller parts with all interest in the corporation and all right to share in its profits; and as no sensible man would part with the chance of profit, and retain the liability for loss which he assumed only for the sake of profit, and as a transfer cannot extinguish the corporation's claim to the balance due, it is clearly the intention of all the parties that by novation the buyer shall assume the seller's liability to the corporation. The cases support this view. Where there is no agreement by the transferee to pay, he is held not liable. President, etc., of the D. & S. Canal Nav. Co. v. Sansom, 1 Bin. 70; Palmer v. Ridge Mining Co., 34 Pa. St. 288; Franks Oil Co. v. McCleary, 63 Pa. St. 317; Pittsburg & B. C. C. & I. Co. v. Otterson, ubi sup. [4 Wkly. Notes Cas. 545]; Franklin Glass Co. v. Alexander, 2 N. H. 380; Seymour v. Sturgess, 26 N. Y. 134; Jay Bridge v. Woodman, 31 Me. 573; Upton v. Burnham [Case No. 16,798]. Where there is an agreement by the transferee to pay, either express or clearly to be inferred from his acts, he is liable. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Boorman, 12 Conn. 530; Ward v. Griswoldville Manuf'g Co., 16 Conn. 593; Mann v. Cooke, 20 Conn. 178. These cases are all cases where the intent of the buyer to assume the seller's liability was clear. In Bend v. Susquehanna Bridge & B. Co., 6 Har. & J. 128, the defendant acquired his stock by a transfer which recited that thirty per cent. had been paid, and that it was assigned "subject to the payment of the remaining seventy per cent. agreeably to the charter." In Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill, 484, the original subscriber expressly promised to pay $20 on every share for which he subscribed. He afterwards assigned to the defendant, who subsequently paid various instalments on the stock. The court says, "The transfer of the stock having been duly made to him, and he having assented thereto, as is unequivocally demonstrated by his payment of instalments subsequently called in by the president and directors of the company, he was, in respect to said stock, substituted to all the rights and liabilities which would have attached to the assignor had he continued the owner thereof." In Merrimac Mining Co. v. Bagley, 14 Mich. 501, where a transferee was held liable, there was a clear novation. Campbell, J., who dissented from the decision in the case of Carson v. Arctic Mining Co. [5 Mich. 288], in this case gives the opinion of the court. In dissenting he assumed that the court put the liability of an original subscriber on the relation of stockholder, independent of a promise to pay, whereas, in fact, the court made it rest on a promise. Merrimac Mining Co. v. Levy, 54 Pa. St. 227, was a suit by the same Michigan corporation in Pennsylvania, and the court follows the Michigan decision, saying it considers itself bound by it in construing Michigan statutes. But the clearest recognition of the principle above stated is found in the decision of the supreme court in Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65. This was an action for calls against a transferee of stock, and the court distinctly made the defendant's liability rest on a promise to pay, proved by the circumstances attending the acquisition of his shares. It is clear, from the authorities, that the liability of a stockholder for unpaid capital in every case rests upon a promise to pay, which if not express may be implied from "proof of circumstances that show the party intended to assume an obligation." As sustaining this proposition, see, also, Williams' Case, 1 Ch. Div. 576; Shackleford's Case, L. R. 1 Ch. 567; Mallorie's Case, L. R. 2 Ch. 181.

No contract of subscription preceded the organization. The bill expressly alleges that "up to this date none of the capital stock of said company had been subscribed for, issued, or sold." It is not claimed that any subscription agreement was signed afterward. No provision in the charter or any other statute prescribed the manner in which the capital should be paid, or imposed any liability to pay it upon the holders of shares. The contract of the original stockholders in this corporation was not express, nor can its terms be found in the language of any statute. It must, therefore, be implied, and the only fact from which any contract by the original stockholders can be implied is the fact that they took stock from the corporation. From this fact the law implies simply a promise to pay for it, not at some future time or in instalments, but at once and in full. The taking of the stock creates a debt from the taker for its full value, which is due as soon as the stock is taken. When, therefore, this corporation issued its stock, the law imposed upon the original holders an obligation to pay for it, from which they could be relieved in only two ways, viz., payment, or obtaining some one to assume the liability whom the corporation would accept as its debtor. In the latter case a new person contracts with the corporation to pay the old debt, and the new contract is accepted as a substitute for the old. If the respondents in this case are liable, it is because their shares have not been paid for, and they have assumed the obligation of the original takers, and have relieved them from their liability by agreeing to pay their debt. It is perfectly clear that they never made this agreement.

No express promise is alleged. No circumstances are alleged which show that they intended to assume any obligation to the company. On the contrary, the stock was issued by the corporation and taken by them as fully paid. Seymour v. Sturgess, 26 N. Y. 134. So far as the shares are concerned which were issued in payment for land, it is clear that there is no liability for this assessment. Neither the corporation nor the original takers of the stock contemplated any further payment on account of it. By the terms of the contract the land was taken as full payment for the shares. and by that payment all liability to the corporation for their price was extinguished, as long as that contract is not avoided. Where the contract is express no different contract can be implied; and neither by the original holders of this stock nor their transferees was there ever any promise to pay any thing for these shares except the land. The transaction is precisely the same in effect as if the corporation had received cash in payment for the shares, and the directors had taken the money and paid themselves the price agreed on for their land. Great Luxembourg Ry. Co. v. Magnay, 25 Beav. 586; Governor, etc., in York Buildings v. Mackenzie, 8 Brown, Parl. Cas. 42; 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. (last Eng. Ed.) 253, note to Robinson v. Pett; Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587; Grymes v. Sanders, 93 U. S. 55.

It is well settled by authority that in cases of this sort such a transaction, until avoided, is an effectual payment for the stock. Pell's Case, 5 Ch. App. 11; Drummond's Case, 4 Ch. App. 772; Maynard's Case, 9 Ch. App. 60; Ferrao's Case, Id. 355; Adamson's Case, L. R. 18 Eq. 670; Schroder's Case, L. R. 11 Eq. 131; Coates' Case, L. R. 17 Eq. 169; Jones' Case, 6 Ch. App. 48; Spargo's Case, L. R. 8 Ch. 407; Carling's Case, 1 Ch. Div. 115. Morton's Case, L. R. 16 Eq. 104, illustrates our proposition both in making the liability to pay depend on contract, and in recognizing the novation in the case of a transferee. In Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 46, was a case where a defendant, sued by a corporation, set up that the whole capital stock had not been paid in, but that by a fraudulent arrangement between certain subscribers and the commissioners it had been made to appear that it was all paid in. See opinion of the court. In the case of Phelan v. Hazard [Case No. 11,068], Judge Dillon sustains the claim of the respondents on both grounds. This was a bill brought by a creditor to enforce the liability of a stockholder for the unpaid balance on his stock. The case arose in Missouri, under the statutes of that state, and therefore the liability of the defendant, so far as it depended on statute, was precisely the same as that of the respondents here. In that case, as in this, the shares had been issued in payment for a mining property which the corporation had purchased, and there also the defendant was not the original holder of the stock.

The liability of the transferee arises from a novation, and how can there be a novation when there is no contract to renew? The respondents are not the original takers of the other two sets of shares, those representing the balance of the original capital and those representing the increased capital, which were issued without consideration, but purchased them as full-paid shares from the original takers or their assignees, they cannot be held liable to pay the assessment in this suit. They never promised to pay a debt, of whose existence even they were ignorant. And the corporation must look to the original takers for the amount which they should have paid. The corporation, having issued full-paid certificates and so assisted to defraud the respondents, cannot now be allowed to say that the shares were not paid for, nor can its assignee. This view is sustained in Nicholl's Case, decided by the court of appeal, chancery division, and reported in 26 Wkly. Rep. 334. In this case a company issued certificates of shares as fully paid up, when in fact no payment had been made, and they were taken without notice by Nicholls in payment for land which he sold a third party. The court unanimously held that Nicholls could not be held liable as a contributory for unpaid shares.

It may perhaps be argued that the respondents cannot now contest their liability because the proceedings in the district court of Missouri are conclusive against them, and it therefore becomes necessary to consider precisely what effect must be attributed to these proceedings. In Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill, 484, the corporation was put into the hands of receivers upon a bill in equity filed by a creditor, and afterwards, upon a petition filed in this suit, a decree was made, ordering stockholders to pay to the receivers all amounts unpaid on their stock, and directing the receivers to collect them by suit from all who did not pay after sixty days' notice. In a suit brought by the receivers, the proceedings and decree in the equity suit were put in evidence under objection; and in discussing the exception taken to their admission, the supreme court of Maryland say: "The proceedings of Baltimore county court when sitting in equity, which were objected to as evidence, were not offered as an adjudication of any of the rights of the parties in any suit between them, and upon that ground as admissible evidence in the present controversy, but were offered without reference to the parties thereto, for the purpose of showing by what authority the present action was prosecuted. In that aspect of their being offered, they are obnoxious to neither of the reasons urged for their rejection. The court's order for the institution and prosecution of this suit was definite and final." Upton v. Hansbrough, ubi supra, is the first case arising under the bankrupt law. In that case the unpaid balance was to be paid "on the call of the directors, when ordered by a vote of a majority of the stockholders themselves." In that case proceedings were taken in the bankrupt court, similar to those which were taken in this case. The proceeding in the bankrupt court takes the place of an assessment by the corporation, and its effect is the same, and the act of the court is held an exercise of the power to collect the assets of the bankrupt. But the claim of the respondents is supported by express adjudication. In re Republic Ins. Co. [supra]; Lamb v. Lamb [supra]. The claim is further supported by the recent decisions of the supreme court, which give to the proceedings in the bankrupt court the same effect and no more. The cases of Upton v. Tribilcock, Sanger v. Upton, and Webster v. Upton were all actions brought to collect from stockholders an assessment imposed by the bankrupt court. In every case proceedings in that court, like those detailed in the bill, preceded the suit. In Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65, the effect of the decree making the assessment was not considered by the court, but in this case, as in all the others, there is not the least suggestion that the decree in the bankrupt court was conclusive. Each case proceeded on the theory that the stockholder could contest his liability in the suit brought to collect the assessment imposed by it. The same conclusion is sustained by Turnbull v. Payson, 95 U. S. 418; Chubb v. Upton, 95 U. S. 665.

But even if the respondents were ever liable, the provisions of the United States bankrupt act (section 5057 of the Revised Statutes) are a bar to this action. Under that section an assignee can maintain no suit, either at law or in equity, unless it is brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued in his favor. That this provision applies to every suit by an assignee is settled. Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 342; Walker v. Towner [supra]. The cause of action accrued when the assignment was made.

A reference to the circumstances under which the stock was issued makes this clear. In the first place, all the stock, both the original and the increased capital, was issued as fully paid up. Neither the corporation which issued it nor the parties who received it contemplated any further payment for it, or intended to make any contract which would bind them to pay for it. The parties understood that the shares issued in payment for the land were paid for in full by the land. The persons who took the corporation's bonds at ninety cents on a dollar, and at the same time, as a further consideration for their money, received shares, did not intend, by receiving them, to make any contract to pay for them. Such a contract would have made the receipt of the shares not an inducement to buy the bonds, but a reason for not buying them. The directors who took the balance of the original capital without paying for it did not intend to pay for these shares,—they meant to take them discharged of the liability to pay. In each case, if we look only at the intention of the parties, no contract to pay for the shares was made. The contract under which the original recipients of the stock were liable to pay for it is a contract implied by the law against the intent of the parties. It is implied from the receipt of the shares and the knowledge of the recipients that they had not been paid for. The only promise that can be implied from the taking of stock under such circumstances is the promise to pay for it at once. The price of the shares is due as soon as the holder takes them. The liability to pay for them accrues then. Horsey's Case, L. R. 2 Eq. 167; Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 635, 636. This case, therefore, differs from those which have been cited, where the bankrupt court has made an assessment. In those cases it was a term of the subscriber's contract that there should be an assessment before he was called upon to pay any thing. His promise was a conditional promise; until that assessment was made, there was no debt from him to the corporation. In such cases it may be said that the right of action does not accrue until the assessment is made. In the case at bar there is no ground for interpolating into the subscriber's contract any new term, making the payment dependent on an assessment to be made. No call or assessment was contemplated by the subscribers when they took the shares. The promise which the law raises against their intention is an absolute promise to pay, implied from the receipt of unpaid stock. The debt for the price was due the moment the shares were taken. So far as the shares are concerned, for which the takers paid nothing, the corporation might have sued at any moment thereafter. No assessment was necessary to give it a right of action. The assignee acquired the corporation's right, and might have sued for the full value of the shares as soon as he received the assignment. No action of the bankrupt court was necessary to give him that right, and there was no ground for its interposition. Terry v. Anderson, ubi supra.

Brief of Sidney Bartlett:

First. What would be the remedy of the corporation itself against the parties to whom the shares were thus fraudulently issued? Carling's Case, 1 Ch. Div. 115, 124; De Ruvigne's Case, 5 Ch. Div. 306, 323; Ex parte Currie, 7 Law T. (N. S.) 486; 9 Ch. App. 6.

Second. If, then, it be true that the only remedy open to the corporation is as above supposed, the question arises, have creditors, or an assignee representing creditors, different and distinct rights from those of the corporation? Spargo's Case, 8 Ch. App. 407. The contract under discussion is, except for the fraud, in its consideration, perfectly valid. The general doctrine as to the rights of assignees to redress wrongs suffered by a corporation is stated with precision by Lord Westbury in a recent case in the house of lords. Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 29.

Having thus stated one of the defences to the claim of plaintiff to charge defendants who held shares issued in payment for mining property, we proceed to submit to the court the other defences applicable alike to that claim and to all the claims made by plaintiff's bill.

The first of these defences is, that each and all of the shares on which plaintiff's claim rests, are, as shown by the bill, held under certificates by bona fide purchasers not privy to the transactions attending their original issue, and not alleged by the bill to be affected with notice of the same, but who took the same on faith of the certificates issued by the company, and, as such bona fide holders, we submit they are not chargeable by the assignee with the vice attending the original issue or its consequences, but relief must be sought by him against the original parties to the wrong.

1. All the issues, as disclosed by the bill, were, and were intended to be, issues of full-paid shares, and it is a necessary inference that the certificates issued conformed to this expressed purpose, and contained no indication that they were not shares of that character, since otherwise a subsequent sale and transfer would be difficult, if not impossible, and the purpose of the parties be defeated.

2. That none of the present defendants were parties to the transaction under which the first issue of shares was made is distinctly stated in the bill, which gives the names of those parties. Simpson v. Fogo, 1 Johns. & H. 23; Ayck. Ch. Pr. 113; Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 461, 502, 503; Parker v. Nickson, 7 Law T. (N. S.) 461.

3. Assuming, then, that upon the pleadings and the legal results thereof defendants are to be deemed innocent holders of certificates of shares issued by the company subsequent to the issue of original shares (and upon their surrender), and that said original issue was fraudulent or without adequate consideration, the question is, whether, as against creditors or an assignee, defendants hold those shares, charged with the duty to pay the par value thereof or any sum whatever, or whether the assignee must resort to the parties to whom, under the fraudulent contract, they were originally issued. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 377; Leitch v. Wells, 48 N. Y. 585; Matthews v. Bank [Case No. 9,286]; Nicholls' Case, 26 Wkly. Rep. 334. It is to be noted that shares in a corporation are not mere choses in action which a transferee takes subject to all rights between the original parties. They are property in which the legal title vests by transfer (1 Lindl. Partn. 683, 684); and further, that plain certificates of shares, unless qualified on their face, contain nothing to put the purchaser on inquiry (Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 29). The bill seeks to charge stockholders of a bankrupt corporation severally upon two separate and distinct statements of alleged fact, namely: As holders of shares originally issued in February, 1867, at the time of the organization of the company, to the parties who organized that company. Also, as holders of shares under a subsequent increase and issue made in April, 1870, and sold, together with the bonds of the company, to parties purchasers thereof. Of one or the other class of the above-described shares the bill charges that each of the defendants held, at the date of the decree of bankruptcy, and now holds a designated number, but it does not aver of which issue either of the defendants held shares. True, it avers that the bankrupt court has declared that an assessment on both classes of shares is required to pay the debts of the company, but as to the ownership of the shares its averment merely is that "the certificates of the shares of said stock were, at the date of the adjudication, held and owned by the following persons: namely, H. J. Bigelow, 380 shares," &c., &c., but of which issue the several parties were thus holders is not disclosed. In default of any averment that each defendant holds shares of both issues, if one or more of the defendants hold shares of the first issue only, and if, as to that issue, there is apparent on the face of the bill a defence as matter of law, is defendant shut off from demurring, and compelled to set up the fact by plea, namely, his ownership of that issue only, when by law it is the duty of the plaintiff in his bill to have averred how the fact was? The rule that, on demurrer, a "court is bound to adopt the construction which is least favorable to the plaintiff," and "every ambiguous statement must be taken in the sense most adverse to the pleader," above referred to, need not be repeated. The true test is, if demurrer be overruled and no further proceedings had, and if one class of shares is, on the face of the bill, in law not liable, then what decree, and against whom, can the court proceed to enter? We submit, then, that it is to be inferred that some of the defendants do or may hold stock only of one of the issues; and as the question who they are is left by the bill uncertain, the objection may be taken by each defendant on general demurrer to the whole bill.

We come, then, to another ground of demurrer, namely, the limitation of suits to be brought by the assignee to two years from the time when the cause of action accrued to him. The statute applies to all judicial contests between the assignee and any persons whose interest is adverse to his, including actions for unpaid assessments of stock. Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 342; Walker v. Towner [supra]; Payson v. Coffin [Case No. 10,859], referred to in same. In this case the question is, did the cause of action accrue immediately upon the appointment of the assignee, or did it only accrue at the date of the order for assessment, the 4th May, 1877 (if the same is valid), for which order the application was made on the 26th April, 1877, nearly three years after the appointment of the assignee? The answer to this inquiry will necessarily involve the determination of all or of a part at least of the following questions: (a.) Is an assessment of any character by the bankruptcy court in any case a necessary preliminary to suit by the assignee, and, if in any case it be, still, may he not by bill in equity proceed to cause such assessment, and also obtain in the same suit decree charging the stockholders? So that his right of action is immediate on his appointment. (b.) If such assessment by the bankruptcy court is in any case necessary, is its necessity confined to cases where, by the terms of the subscription to shares or by the charter or by-laws, subscribers to stock are by contract liable to future calls only in the mode and at periods to be thereafter fixed by the directors or corporation, and where such calls have not already been made prior to bankruptcy? (c.) Can such assessment ever be a prerequisite to bringing suit by the assignee when not only no right exists by contract regulating the mode and time of future calls, but where shares are issued by the corporation by agreement (fraudulent in part or in whole) as being full-paid shares, so that no executory contract exists between the parties, but merely a right of action for the fraud after or without rescinding the contract? (d.) If in the case last named an assessment be a legal prerequisite to suit by the assignee, what is its purpose, and what its effect after it has been obtained, upon the rights of the parties in future suits by assignees against shareholders? (e.) Has there been in this case any such assessment (if such an assessment was a necessity), as has complied with the law or is valid for any purpose?

1. It will be conceded, we think, that it is the right and duty of the assignee to enforce all the claims of the corporation, whether against delinquent shareholders or others, to the end that, in case the property shall prove more than sufficient to pay the debts, all its property and rights shall be restored to the corporation unimpaired. The assignment vests in the assignee all the corporate property and rights, and among them the right to collect unpaid subscriptions. The corporation, though not extinct, is thenceforth powerless to collect or enforce those rights. However speedily the bankruptcy act may look to the winding-up of the estate, it is obvious that if it be not the duty of the assignee to enforce the payment of delinquent subscriptions until he has ascertained that they are requisite, after exhausting the other assets for payment of debts, insolvency, migration, or other causes may impair, if not destroy, all chances of their collection. If, then, a bankruptcy assignee represents both the corporation and creditors, it is submitted that, without applying for any assessment, such assignee has the right and duty to collect all unpaid subscriptions of the capital, whether needed to pay debts or otherwise. Defendants admit that under the usual creditor's bill, to reach the equitable assets of an insolvent corporation, consisting of unpaid subscriptions to shares or capital distributed among stockholders, it has been held that the only equity of the creditors is to subject such unpaid subscriptions or divided capital to their claims, when the other assets of the company shall have been exhausted or shown to be insufficient. The ground upon which this doctrine rests would seem to be that, as between a corporation and its shareholders, the capital is to be held as a fund to be resorted to only when there is a deficiency of other corporate property, and that creditors have no other or higher equity, as to this fund, than the corporation,—a doctrine seemingly open to discussion, at all events inapplicable in bankruptcy, where the assignee is bound to collect all assets for the benefit as well of the corporation as of its creditors. The only possible ground, therefore, for petitioning for an assessment in the bankruptcy court would seem to be that by contract between the shareholders and the company, at the outset, the former are not to be called on to pay assessments, except in the mode and at the times fixed by that contract. And such is the judgment of the supreme court (Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 635), which case deals with the rights of creditors against stockholders whose subscriptions are not full paid, thus: "There the charter of the bank made a call by the directors, and sixty days' notice of it to the stockholders, conditions precedent to the collection of unpaid stock subscriptions, and it was consequently held that the statute did not commence to run against a liability until the requisite call had been made and notice given. Neither in this case, nor in Terry v. Tubman [92 U. S. 156] does any such provision of the charter appear. For all that is shown in the record the stockholders were liable at any time for the balance due from them." Further, it has been determined, that in case of bankruptcy, or technical insolvency, where such contract exists (based as it is upon the assumed solvency of the corporation), it has no legal effect or force. Henry v. Vermillion & A. R. Co., 17 Ohio, 187.

2. But if it shall be held that, notwithstanding bankruptcy, such contract with shareholders, if made originally, still subsists,—that an assignee represents merely the creditors and not the corporation, and that, in conformity with that contract, he must in some court obtain an assessment,—the doctrine could have no application to this case, where there was no contract as to assessments, but a contract that no future assessments should be made. Whatsoever remedy the corporation had for the fraud was immediate and direct. It is submitted that the assignee had the immediate right which belonged to the company, and that it cannot be requisite to go through any form prior to bringing suit.

3. If, then, there was in this case no legal necessity for an assignee to procure an assessment in the bankruptcy court, it is hardly necessary to discuss the general character and effect of such assessments, when required and when legally made, nor of the character of the one attempted in this case, since it is obvious that the statute of limitations began to run with the date of the appointment of the assignee.

4. But if all this be wrong and unsound, and if an assessment was in some form and in some character a prerequisite in this case, it may be well to advert, first, to the general purpose and effect of such assessments; and, next, especially to the character of the pretended assessment in this case. Upon the assumption that the assignee represents creditors alone and not both creditors and the corporation, so that, as such representative, his rights are limited to recover for unpaid stock only when there is a deficiency of assets to pay the debts and to the extent of that deficiency, and that there must in all cases be ascertained at some time and in some mode the quantum of debt and the amount of assets to determine the extent of the shareholders' liability; it is clear, as will be shown hereafter, that there are two modes of accomplishing this object: One, by a suit in equity in which the debts and assets can be marshalled, the extent of the liability be determined; and the question whether the parties proceeded against as shareholders, are or are not chargeable with this liability, can be determined in a single suit. This is the usual course in regard to insolvent corporations not in bankruptcy, where creditors or receivers seek to recover unpaid assessments of capital. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380; Ward v. Griswoldville Manuf'g Co., 16 Conn. 599; Adler v. Milwaukee Pat. Brick Manuf'g Co., 13 Wis. 61; Henry v. Vermillion & A. R. Co., 17 Ohio, 187; Nathan v. Whitlock, 9 Paige, 152; Mann v. Pentz, 3 Comst. N. Y. 415. The other course usually adopted in bankruptcy, in cases of unpaid subscriptions to stock subject to future calls, is to apply by petition to the bankruptcy court for an assessment on unpaid subscriptions, in which proceeding the question of deficiency of assets, and the amount necessary to be raised and the sum for which the shares are liable, is determined as against all parties, leaving the assignee to enforce the assessment by suit at law or in equity against such parties as shall prove to be liable therefor. This course has probably been adopted instead of a suit in equity to avoid the necessity which would otherwise exist, in cases of the numerous suits necessary to charge the parties in different jurisdictions, of furnishing in each of those suits proof of such amount and deficiency and of the sums due upon the shares. In each of the following cases this last-named course has been adopted, and in most of them the question of the liability of the party sought to be charged is, in the suits brought to enforce such assessment, held to be open among the matters at issue; and it has been further distinctly held that only the quantum of the assessment, as distinguished from the question whether the defendant is chargeable therefor, is to be deemed settled by the bankruptcy court. Turnbull v. Payson, 95 U. S. 418; In re Republic Ins. Co. [supra]; Lamb v. Lamb [supra]; Upton v. Hansbrough [supra]; Upton v. Englehart [supra]; Michener v. Payson [supra]; Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45; Sanger v. Upton, Id. 56; Chubb v. Upton, 95 U. S. 665.

5. Such being the purposes and effect of assessments in general, where such assessments are by law or original contract necessary as preliminary to a suit by the assignee, although, as we have seen, wholly inapplicable to this case, yet, if it would be so applicable, this attempted assessment is wholly nugatory and void. An order or decree which leaves the quantum of delinquent assessments unsettled, and thus, if it be valid, leaves, in any future proceedings in other tribunals—facts open to proof and controversy, which are essential to the establishing of that quantum, and thus fails to accomplish the object on which its jurisdiction rests, is a nullity. The order or decree of the bankruptcy court in this case finds and declares the amount of the assets, the amount of debts, the quantum of deficiency of assets to pay those debts. It, then, instead of ascertaining and determining the amount of unpaid assessments due upon the several shares or classes of shares (which, as has already been suggested, may differ widely in the cases of the several defendants), proceeds to order an assessment of one hundred per cent. on each share, less whatever may, in future suits, be proved by the defendants respectively to have been paid on their shares. Is it valid? It would seem to be clear that such a decree, which ascertains part only of the elements necessary to determine the amount of unpaid assessments, and thus furnishes part only of the complete foundation on which to base future suits, to determine the liability and amount of liability of the parties sought to be charged, cannot be even received in evidence. It need not be added that, if no valid order or assessment by the bankruptcy court is shown, then, if such assessment be a prerequisite, the bill must be dismissed; if it be not a prerequisite, then the statute of limitations dates from the accruing of the original cause of action, viz., from the appointment of the assignee.

We next submit that even if an assessment was, in this case, one mode of ascertaining the deficiency of assets to which the assignee might lawfully resort (which, and the effect of which, in its bearing on this case, this defendant denies), and if this pretended assessment were a real assessment, yet it cannot be in the power of an assignee to defeat the statute of limitations by postponing his application for such assessment, as in this case, until long after the statute has run to completion, and thus continue defendant's liability indefinitely at his pleasure. If the filing of such petition for assessment be deemed the commencement of a suit by the assignee, of which the present suit is a mere continuation, then it was not filed until nearly three years after his appointment, and it almost warrants the suggestion that its filing was an experiment with a view to avoid, it might be, the bar which had already matured.

Finally, upon this point arising from the statute of limitations, we submit that if an assessment by the bankruptcy court was one of the lawful methods of proceeding in this case, and it had been legally made, yet there was another clear and complete remedy equally open to the assignee, in which an assessment and a final decree could be had, and the right of which accrued to him from the date of his appointment. And further, that he cannot lay by for years, neglect this remedy, and finally resort to an assessment as the means to avoid the statute. Defendants contend that the assignee had the legal right, at any period within the two years, without seeking an assessment from the bankruptcy court, to bring a suit in equity, in which, in conformity with the procedure of courts of chancery, all questions of the existence and amount of unpaid subscriptions on the shares or class of shares held by the defendants respectively, the question of deficiency of assets, the extent of that deficiency, the liability and amount of liability of each separate defendant, and the calls and assessment in conformity, could all be ordered, tried, and determined. Or, if it shall be held that such assessment can only be had in bankruptcy courts, then the bill in equity, and a proceeding for assessment in the bankruptcy court, may be brought contemporaneously, and the former proceeding, if need be, stand or be suspended until the order fixing the quantum of assessment on shares held by each class shall have been passed, and then the question of defendant's liability be heard and determined under the bill.

First. As to the first of the above propositions, it is submitted that although no case has been found where the assignee has, without procuring such assessment, proceeded to accomplish the same purpose by a bill in equity, yet it is undeniable that the jurisdiction of a court of equity is fitted in all respects to work out and perfect every step preliminary, or otherwise necessary in case of bankruptcy, to charge the proper parties for the proper amounts of unpaid subscriptions. This is shown by the various cases in which creditors of insolvent corporations by bill, in behalf of themselves and other creditors, and also where receivers appointed in cases of insolvency, have successfully invoked the aid of a court of equity to attain the same ends which are sought in this case by the plaintiff. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 380; Ward v. Griswoldville Manuf'g Co., 16 Conn. 599; Adler v. Milwaukee Pat. Brick Manuf'g Co., 13 Wis. 61; Henry v. Vermillion & A. R. Co., 17 Ohio, 187; Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill, 484; Mann v. Pentz, 2 Sandf. Ch. 257. If the processes of a court of equity are thus found adequate to accomplish in behalf of a creditor all that is sought in this case, it is difficult to see why the same remedy does not exist in behalf of an assignee in bankruptcy, who, upon the theory above stated, is the representative of creditors. The bankruptcy act (Rev. St. §§ 40, 79, 49, 72) confers on all district courts, including that in which the decree of bankruptcy is made, and on all circuit courts, full equity jurisdiction in all bankruptcy matters. Bump, Bankr. Pr. (9th Ed.) 341, in notis, 323, 324; Wilkins v. Davis [Case No. 17,664].

Second. As to the second of the above propositions, namely, that if it is by law requisite that the assessment be had in a bankruptcy court only, yet a bill to charge the defendants for their liability as ultimately ascertained, and a petition to the bankruptcy court to assess the amount attributable to the shares held by each defendant, may be instituted at the same time. For this we refer to the cases of Com. v. Cochituate Bank, 3 Allen, 42; Baker v. Atlas Bank, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 182. The first of these cases was a bill in equity, by receivers of an insolvent bank, to obtain an order conferring and carrying into effect an assessment made by them to enforce a statute liability in favor of bill-holders against parties who were stockholders when the bank stopped payment. The defence was the statute of limitations; to which it was replied that the right of action or process against the stockholders did not accrue until after assessment made by the receivers in conformity to the statute ascertaining the deficiency of assets. But it was held that the statute began to run when the bank stopped payment, and that suits against the bank, under which the assessment may be ordered to be made, and suits against the stockholders by the bill-holders, might be commenced and go on pari passu. This case reaffirms the same doctrine that is contained in the last-cited case (Baker v. Atlas Bank), which was a creditor's bill to enforce against shareholders the statute liability for mismanagement of directors. A synopsis of the case will be found in the opinion of the court in the Cochituate Bank Case, above cited. The argument in that case, in answer to the statute of limitations, was that the statute did not begin to run until the plaintiffs' right to sue arose from the refusal of the receiver to commence an action for their benefit, to which the court replied, "If this argument would hold good, the plaintiffs might delay the application to the directors or receivers any length of time, and the statute would be inoperative and nugatory;" and in answer to the suggestion that the statute could only begin to run after it was first ascertained what would be paid by the assets of the bank, the court declare that suits against the bank and against the stockholders may be brought at the same time.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Fraud does not render a contract void, but voidable only at the option of the party defrauded, both at law and in equity, whether the fraud was committed by one of the contracting parties upon the other, or by both upon persons not parties to the transaction, the rule being that where the fraud was committed by one of the parties upon the other, the contract remains operative and in force until it is disaffirmed by the injured party. Chit. Cont. (10th Ed.) 626; Add. Cont. (7th Ed.) 228; Clough v. London & N. W. Railway, L. R. 7 Exch. 34; Jones v. Carter, 15 Mees. & W. 722; Upton v. Englehart [supra].

Due consideration will be given to both defences, but it will be more convenient to examine the one addressed to the merits before considering the question whether the claim is barred by the statute of limitations.

Considered broadly, the bill of complaint seeks to enforce from the respondents the payment of the entire capital stock of the company, or such portion of the same as may be necessary to pay the debts of the corporation less the amount any particular holder of the stock may have paid towards his shares. Three classes of shares were issued, as plainly appears from the allegations of the bill of complaint: 1. Shares to the amount of $350,790, fraudulently issued to the directors in payment for the mining lands which they, at a greatly overvalued estimation, conveyed to the corporation. 2. Unpaid shares to the amount of $46,210, issued to the directors without any consideration. 3. Shares to the amount of $100,000, issued by the corporation to such persons as took an equal amount of the mortgage bonds of the corporation at ninety per cent.

Viewed in the light of these suggestions, it is plain that it is sufficient for the respondents to show that the complainant cannot sustain any claim against them as holders of the first issue of the original stock, as the bill of complaint does not charge that the respondents are holders of any particular issue of the stock, or either of the other issues. Such being the state of the pleading, it is open to the several respondents to assume that his stock, as charged, is wholly of the first class of the stock which was issued to the directors in payment for the mining lands, the rule being that pleadings which are uncertain or ambiguous must be taken in the sense most adverse to the pleader. Story, Eq. Pl. (7th Ed.) § 257; Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 503; Simpson v. Fogo, 1 Johns. & H. 23; Ayck. Ch. Pr. 113; Parker v. Nickson, 7 Law T. (N. S.) 461. .

Certificates of shares of that kind were issued to the amount of $350,790; and, nothing being alleged to the contrary, the several respondents in this controversy may properly assume that they are charged with holding of shares in the capital stock, the certificates of which were of that issue which were entered upon the books of the company as shares paid up in full. Issued, as these shares were, to the directors in payment for the mining lands, they were, as between the grantors of the land and the directors issuing the shares, fully paid up, as the shares paid for the land, and the land conveyed paid for the shares; and all this appears upon the books of the company. Transferees of the shares took the certificates with nothing on their face to show any unfairness, and with nothing appearing on the books of the company to put them upon inquiry. Suppose that is so, still the complainant contends that such payment was made in mineral lands at a fraudulent valuation, not binding on the corporation. Admit that, and still the fact remains that the land was actually received by the company in full payment for the stock, and that the shares were issued and delivered as fully paid up shares. Taken as a whole, the averments of the bill of complaint show that the transaction in purchasing the mineral land, and in issuing the first class of stock in payment for the same, was a gross fraud upon the company which cannot be sustained; but it does not follow that the present suit against the respondents is the proper remedy to redress the injury, for the reason that the contract was duly executed by the execution of the deed of conveyance to the corporation, and by issue of fully paid up shares to the corporation for the whole amount of the agreed consideration of the mineral land.

Nothing can be plainer in legal decision than that the title to the mineral land passed to the corporation, and that the title to the paid-up stock passed to the directors. Being formally executed the contract must stand until it shall be rescinded, or the assignee, if he prefers that course, may retain what the company received for the stock, and seek redress in damages against those who defrauded the corporation. And the redress is at his command, but he certainly cannot be allowed to disaffirm the contract only in part, and affirm it as to the residue, as he must do in order to maintain the present suit against the respondents.

Beyond all question the present respondents are bona fide purchasers and holders of shares in the capital stock of the company, which the books of the company show were fully paid for by the directors, and which, by the terms of the contract between the directors and the grantors of the mineral land, were fully paid in the manner stipulated by the contract. Under such circumstances it cannot be that the complainant, without disaffirming the contract, can be allowed to set up the theory that the property taken in payment of the shares was less than their estimated value, and to seek redress for the difference against bona fide purchasers of the same in the open market. Gross fraud may have been perpetrated between the parties to the sale and purchase of the mineral land; but it is nevertheless true, so far as the shares of the capital stock are involved, that the shares, as between the corporation and innocent purchasers of the stock in open market without notice, knowledge, or means of knowledge of the fraud, were paid up, as shown by the books of the corporation. Notice of the fraud as respects the respondents is not alleged, nor is there an intimation in the bill of complaint that any facts or circumstances were known to the respondents, to put them upon inquiry in respect to any such imputation.

Innocent purchasers of the stock in the open market are not liable in such a case; but the remedy of the corporation is against the guilty perpetrators of the fraud in their individual capacity. Support to the opposite theory is attempted to be derived from the adjudication of the bankrupt court; but the decree of the bankrupt court was only an adjudication that, for the purpose of paying off the indebtedness of the company, a call and assessment be made on the stock of one hundred per cent., less any sum or sums that may have been paid thereon. Properly considered, as a whole, the decree of the bankrupt court does not absolutely fix and determine the amount to be assessed. Instead of that, it merely calls for one hundred per cent. less all payments; nor does the decree in any respect contradict the theory that the class of stock first issued was fully paid up before it was put upon the market; and, if so, the court is of the opinion that the proper remedy of the complainant is against the perpetrators of the alleged fraud, which he might have enforced the moment he was appointed assignee of the bankrupt's estate. Holders of shares issued improperly stand on a different footing from the holders of shares which the company had no power to issue, as the purchaser in the latter case acquires nothing, and cannot, in general, be held as a contributory. 2 Lindl. Partn. (3d Ed.) 1381; Bank of Hindustan v. Alison, L. R. 6 C. P. 54, 222. But the mere fact that a person has become a shareholder pursuant to a scheme which is ultra vires will not relieve him from liability as a contributory, if the shares he has taken can be considered as legally existing, and he was himself a party to the scheme, or had knowledge of the fraud. Even where the shares were fraudulently issued, it is necessary to give strict attention to the precise facts in order to ascertain what are the rights of the parties in the case. The respondents were not subscribers to the stock, but the purchasers of the shares in the open market as paid-up shares. It was held in Carling's Case that, where the contract was to take paid-up shares, the court could not convert the contract into one for unpaid shares, for reasons which are obviously sound and correct. Carling's Case, 1 Ch. Div. 124.

Where there is a contract, even if fraud be imputed, the party seeking redress must disaffirm the contract, or proceed for damages against the perpetrators of the fraud. Such a party must throw over the agreement altogether, or he must take it as a whole. He cannot adopt as to one part, and reject it as to the rest. De Ruvigne's Case, 5 Ch. Div. 323. Certain shares of capital stock were allotted as fully paid up shares, and the court held that, as the shares had been allotted to a stranger as paid-up shares, they could not be considered otherwise, and that neither he nor his alienees could be liable to contribute in respect of the shares. Ex parte Currie, 7 Law T. (N. S.) 486.

Argument, to show that the transaction of issuing the stock in payment for the mineral land would have been valid if unmixed with fraud, is scarcely necessary, as the proposition is one which finds support in the daily transactions of life. Spargo's Case, 8 Ch. App. 413. Shareholders are not required to suspect fraud or to institute inquiries where all seems fair and conformable to the requirement of law and fair dealing. Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 29. Where certificates of shares were issued as fully paid up, when in fact no payment had been made, it was held in the chancery court of appeal, reversing the vice chancellor, that by the issue of the certificates the company were estopped from alleging that the stock was not paid up, and that an innocent holder of the shares could not be placed on the list of contributories in respect to such shares as unpaid shares. Nicholl's Case, 26 Wkly. Rep. 334.

Three of the judges gave opinions: The master of the rolls said: "Where you have a receipt given you by the company, a final receipt as a certificate of payment, what more is a bona fide purchaser to ask for, and what occasion has he to make inquiry? He has the representation of the company by the certificate that the shares are fully paid up. It appears to me the company, having made that representation by the certificate to be used by the vendor as evidence of title, is estopped from saying afterwards that the company has not received the money. * * * It appears to me impossible that the company should be allowed to say the shares were not paid up in due course." James, L. J.: "Every person connected with the company who issues a certificate for paid-up shares in money, when the money or value has not been paid, is guilty of a personal wrong towards the company, and may be made answerable for it in exactly the same way and to the same extent as if the money had been taken out of the coffers of the company to pay up the shares, or as if by some fraud of the directors and officers receipts had been given for the payment when payment had not been made. If any person is a party to such a breach he can be made answerable for it, but that cannot affect the position of one who says, 'You made a representation to me, and you are bound by every principle of law and equity to make good the representation upon the faith of which I was induced to act.'" Thesiger, L. J., held that any such shareholder may show either that the shares have been paid up in fact, or that the company whom the liquidator represents have, by their words or conduct, estopped themselves from disputing that the shares have been so in fact paid up.

Certificates of shares in due form were issued as paid-up shares, and there is much reason to hold that the corporation, as to innocent holders of the same, is estopped to set up the defence that they are void. They admit that the shares were paid up to the extent of fifty per cent, and the opinion of the bankrupt court contains a finding of the same import, which strengthens the position that the corporation is estopped to set up the defence that the certificates are void. Riche v. Ashbury Ry. C. & I. Co., L. R. 9 Exch. 264.

Power to issue shares was possessed by the company, and hence the rule, that the holder takes nothing where the power is entirely wanting, does not apply. Ferguson v. Landram, 436;[2] Stace's Case, 4 Ch. App. 688. Cases arise, however, where the suit was against the perpetrators of the fraud, or against holders of the stock, with notice that it was fraudulently issued, or with knowledge of such facts and circumstances as legally put them upon inquiry, in which the rule is different. Equity, in such a case, regards the property of the corporation as held in trust for the payment of the debts of the corporation, and recognizes the right of creditors to pursue it in whosesoever possession it may be transferred, unless it has passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser; and the rule is well settled that stockholders are not entitled to any share of the capital stock, or to any dividend of the profits, until all the debts of the corporation are paid. Railroad v. Howard, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 409.

Assignees in bankruptcy in such a case represent creditors as well as the bankrupt, and may disaffirm the contract, or retain what passed to the bankrupt and proceed for damages against the perpetrators of the fraud, or against subsequent transferees of the stock with notice that it was fraudulently issued, or with knowledge of such facts and circumstances as legally put him upon inquiry. Decided cases which assert that rule are quite numerous and decisive. Two or three cases of the kind deserve consideration, of which the following is, perhaps, the most important.

Money was owed to the corporation for a subscription to the capital stock, and the debtor and the officers of the company entered into an agreement to extinguish the stock debt, and to convert it into a debt for the loan of money. Bankruptcy of the corporation ensued, and the assignee claimed that the stock debt was due. Justice Miller gave the opinion, and, in replying to the argument that the assignee can assert no greater right than the bankrupt, said: "The assignee is the representative of creditors, as well as of the bankrupt. He is appointed by the creditors. The statute is full of authority to him to sue for and recover property, rights, and credits where the bankrupt could not have sustained the action, and to set aside as void transactions by which the bankrupt would be bound. * * * Though it be a doctrine of modern date, we think it now well established that the capital stock of a corporation is a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors of the corporation." Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 619. To the same effect also is the case of Upton v. Tribilcock, where the opinion was given by Justice Hunt. He decided that the original holder of stock in a corporation is liable for unpaid instalments of stock without an express promise to pay the amount, and that a contract between such a subscriber and the corporation or its agents, limiting the liability therefor, is void, both as to the creditors of the company and its assignee in bankruptcy; that representations by the agent of a corporation, as to the non-assessability of its stock beyond a certain percentage of its value, constitute no defence to the action against the holder of the stock to enforce payment of the entire amount subscribed, where the holder has failed to use due diligence to ascertain the truth or falsity of such representations. Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45. Due care and diligence was not exercised by the purchaser in that case, although the proof was full to the point that he was legally put upon inquiry. Thomas v. Bartow, 48 N. Y. 193. Half a century before these cases were decided, Judge Story held that the capital stock of a corporation was a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the corporation, and that it might be followed into the hand of the stockholders or of any persons having notice of the trust attached to it. Wood v. Dummer [Case No. 17,944].

Trusts are enforced not only against those persons who are rightfully possessed of the trust property as trustees, but also against all persons who come into possession of the property bound by the trust and with notice of the same, and whoever comes so into possession is considered as bound, with respect to that special property, to the execution of the trust. Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 574; Adair v. Shaw, 1 Schouler & L. 262. Reported cases almost without number lay down the same rule, but those referred to will be sufficient to illustrate the principle. Nothing is alleged in the bill of complaint tending to show that the respondents were participants in the fraud, or that they had notice of the transaction, or knowledge of any facts or circumstance tending to put them upon inquiry; and if there were any such matters alleged in the bill of complaint it could not benefit the complainant, as it is settled law that in such a case the cause of action arose in favor of the complainant when the estate of the bankrupt corporation vested in him as the assignee in bankruptcy.

Where the charter of a bank contained a provision binding the individual property of its stockholders for the ultimate redemption of its bills, in proportion to the number of shares held by the stockholders respectively, the supreme court held that the liability of the stockholder arose when the bank refused or ceased to redeem, and became notoriously insolvent. Terry v. Tubman, 92 U. S. 156. Just the same question, with others, was presented to the supreme court in a subsequent case in which the court held—the chief justice giving the opinion—that the liability of the stockholders upon their unpaid subscriptions is that of debtors to the bank, and that all such balances passed to the assignee under the assignment, which, by the bankrupt act, is of all the property, estate, credits, and assets of the bankrupt, whether a corporation or an individual; and, for all that is shown in the record, the stockholders were liable to suit at any time for the recovery of the balance due from them as such stockholders. Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 505; Com. v. President, etc., of Cochituate Bank, 3 Allen, 42; Baker v. President, etc., of Atlas Bank, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 182; Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 632. Apply that rule to the case before the court and it follows that, even if the bill of complaint had charged that the respondents had notice of the fraud, or were put upon inquiry in that regard, it would not have benefited the complainant, as in that event his claim would have been barred by the two years' limitation of the bankrupt act. Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 342.

Purchasers of stock, where it appears upon its face that it was only partially paid up, may be held liable to pay up the unpaid instalment; but the authorities to that effect have no application in this case. Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S. 65; Upton v. Hansbrough [Case No. 16,801]. Adjudged cases, in which it has been held that creditors or assignees in bankruptcy may enforce such payments when the corporation would be estopped to do so, are suits against original subscribers or transferees implicated in some way in the fraudulent transaction. Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45. Failure to use due diligence when put upon inquiry was the ground of the decision in that case. Oakes v. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 325. Whatever remedy for the fraud the assignee had, it is evident he might have pursued at any time after he acquired title to the bankrupt's estate. Ex parte Currie, 7 Law T. (N. S.) 486; Carling's Case, 1 Ch. Div. 124; 9 Ch. Div. 60; De Ruvigne's Case, 5 Ch. Div. 323.

DEPOSITIONS.

A deposition cannot, under the act of congress, be taken before a judge of the city court of the city of Lexington, in Kentucky.

Mr. Redin, for plaintiff, offered to read a deposition taken before the judge of the city court of the city of Lexington, in Kentucky.

Mr. Brent, for defendant, objected that the judge was not such a judge or chief magistrate as is described in the 30th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73); and—

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to suffer it to be read.

SEAMEN—RIGHT TO BE CURED AT EXPENSE OF SHIP—MEDICINE CHEST.

1. By the general maritime law, if a seaman becomes sick during the voyage, he is entitled to be cured at the expense of the vessel.

[Cited in The Ben Flint, Case No. 1,299; Brown v. The D. S. Cage, Id. 2,002.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Edward H. Daveis, Esq.]

2. The act of congress of July 20, 1790, c. 56, § 8 [1 Stat. 134], exempts the owner from the expense of medical advice and attendance, provided there be a medicine chest on board, with suitable medicines and directions for their use. But the owners are not exempted from these expenses although there be a medicine chest on board, when the seaman cannot have the benefit of the medicine, whether it be because he is removed ashore, or that there is no person on board the vessel by whom the medicine can be safely administered.

3. Where the master, mate, and four of the men were sick with the yellow fever at the same time, it was held that the owners were bound to pay the expenses of the attendance and advice of a physician, although a suitable medicine chest had been provided.

This was a libel for subtraction of wages. The libellants shipped for a voyage from Portland to one or more ports in the island of Cuba, and back to Portland. The service was performed, and there was no controversy about the amount of the wages earned. The only question in dispute was as to the claim of a deduction from the wages in the nature of a set-off. While the brig lay at Havana, the master [Blake], mate, and four of the crew were taken sick of the yellow fever, and the owners claimed to deduct from the wages of the men the sums paid to a physician for medical advice. These sums amounted to more than the whole balance of wages due.

Mr. Haines, for libellants.

Fessenden & Deblois, for respondents.

WARE, District Judge. The question whether the deductions claimed to be made in this case by way of set-off should be allowed, depends on the true construction of the 8th section of the act of congress of July 20, 1790, c. 56 [2 Bior. & D. Laws, 114; 1 Stat. 134, c. 29], and the act of March 2, 1805, c. 442 [3 Bior. & D. Laws, 657; 2 Stat. 330, c. 28]. The act of 1790 requires every vessel of 150 tons and upwards, navigated by ten or more persons, when bound on a foreign voyage, to be "provided with a chest of medicines, put up by some apothecary of known reputation, and accompanied by directions for administering the same; and said medicines shall be examined by the same, or some other apothecary once at least in every year, and supplied with fresh medicines in the place of such as have been used, or spoiled; and in default of having such medicine chest so provided, and kept fit for use, the master or commander of such ship or vessel, shall provide and pay for all such advice, medicine, or attendance of physicians, as any of the crew shall stand in need of, in case of sickness, at every port or place where the ship or vessel may touch, or trade, during the voyage, without any deduction from the wages of such sick seaman or mariner." The act of March 2, 1805, extends the provisions of this section to vessels of seventy-five tons, navigated by six or more persons, and bound to any port in the West Indies.

It will aid us in giving a construction to the statute, to consider what was the state of the law when it was enacted. Before the passing of this act, a seaman, when he received any injury while in the service of the vessel, or became sick during the voyage, and the sickness was not occasioned by his own fault, was entitled to be cured at the vessel's expense. The whole expense of his sickness, that for medical advice and attendance, as well as other expenses, whether he remained on board or was put on shore, was a charge on the ship. In the case of Harden v. Gordon [Case No. 6,047], where this subject was most fully and learnedly examined, it is shown that this principle, which makes the expenses of the sickness of any of the crew a charge on the vessel, is adopted as customary law, or incorporated in their maritime codes by nearly every nation of Europe. It is shown also to have been established among the usages and customs of the sea, from the earliest epoch to which we can trace the elements of the existing maritime law of the great commercial commonwealth of Christendom. It is found in nearly all those early digests of maritime law, which in various places were made for the regulation and government of maritime commerce upon the revival of civilization, letters, and the peaceful intercourse of commerce during the middle ages. It is not certain that the principle does not remount to an age even anterior to the Christian era, as we find traces of it in that ancient compilation of law which goes under the name of maritime law of the Rhodians. 1 Pardessus, Collection des Lois Maritimes, c. 2, p. 258; Id. c. 46, p. 257. And it is not questioned that this generally received principle has been adopted as part of the maritime law of this country. It has been supposed by learned judges that this provision in the act of congress was intended as a benefit to the mariner, and not as a measure of relief to the shipowner,—Walton v. The Neptune [Case No. 17,135]; Swift v. The Happy Return [Id. 13,697]; Lamson v. Westcott [Id. 8,035]; that it was not the intention of the legislature to deprive the mariner of any advantage, which the law before allowed him, but to provide additional security for his health and comfort. And this is certainly the inference which would naturally arise from the terms in which the law is expressed. It imposes on owners a new obligation, to which they were not subject by the maritime law, without liberating them in its terms from any liabilities, to which they were subject before. And it professedly subjects the master, within the range of whose peculiar duty it would be to see that the law is complied with, to a personal liability in case it is not; to which perhaps it may have been doubted whether he was subject by the general maritime law. For though there could be no doubt of the liability of the master for wages upon the ground of the contract, it might not have been deemed so certain that he was liable for the extraordinary expense of sickness of the crew, a liability not resulting from the terms of the contract, but imposed on the owners by the policy of the law. Harden v. Gordon [Id. 6,047].

But whatever may have been the intention of the legislature, the act appears early to have received a judicial construction by which the owners were exempted from their liability for medical advice and attendance in case a medicine chest was provided in compliance with the law. To this extent the act was held to be an implied repeal of the pre-existing law. The medicine chest, with the directions for the use of the medicine, was held to be a substitute for the advice of a physician. Though in the ordinary complaints with which seamen are affected, the medicine may without doubt be safely administered by the master with the aid of the printed directions which accompany the chest, yet it cannot be doubted that it would be an act of temerity in him to undertake to prescribe under such general directions as those with which he is furnished, for the case of dangerous and malignant disease, such as the libellants were affected with in this case; and great doubts have been repeatedly expressed, allowing the received construction of the statute to be correct, whether it ought to be extended to exempt the owners from the charge for medical advice in such cases. Swift v. The Happy Return [supra]; Lamson v. Westcott [supra].

But admitting that the providing of a chest of medicines with proper directions for their use, by the operation of the statute, exempts the owners from the charge for medical advice and attendance, it can only have that effect when the seamen can have the benefit of the medicine, administered under the printed directions for its use by the master or some other person fit to be intrusted with so delicate a duty. If the medicine chest is inaccessible to the seaman, it is the same thing to him as though none were provided. If the medicine chest is deemed by the law a substitute and an equivalent for the advice of a physician, it can only be so when the seaman can have the use of it, safely and properly administered. It cannot be pretended that he has the advantage of the medicine, when there is no person on board by whom it can be administered, or, what amounts to the same thing, no person of such intelligence and discretion, that it would be safe to intrust him with a duty of so much delicacy and responsibility. Would there be any safety in sending a common sailor to the medicine chest with the printed directions to serve out medicine to a patient laboring under a disease of such violence as the yellow fever? Surely but one answer can be given to this question. But the seamen are as much entitled to the benefit of the printed directions as they are to the medicine, and the owners, to bring themselves within the statute exemption, are as much bound to furnish one as the other. It may be said that the owners have done all in their power; they have provided a sufficiency of medicine with directions for its use; and having done all that is required by law, they are not in fault and ought not to be rendered responsible for the act of God. "Casus fortuitus nemini facit injuriam." The general principle of law is admitted. But it applies with equal force in favor of the seaman as it does for the owners. It is no fault of his that the medicine is inaccessible to him. Still the consequences of this unavoidable casualty must be borne by one or the other. On whom then does the law leave it? When a party claims under a special act of the legislature an exemption from any particular liability to which he is subject by the general law, he must show that the condition on which the exemption is granted, has been complied with. It is no excuse for him to say that a fortuitous event has rendered the performance of the condition impossible. When a right is to vest on the performance of a condition, and the condition becomes impossible before the right vests, the right is gone; and when a party claims the benefit of an exception, he must bring himself within the exception. It is not enough for him to say that he was prevented from doing it by an overruling fatality.

The application of these principles to the section of the law under consideration does not rest in speculation merely. It has been established by judicial decisions. In the case of The George in the circuit court of Massachusetts, and in the same case in the district court,—The George [Case No. 5,329]; Lamson v. Westcott [supra],—it was decided that if a sick seaman was put on shore for the convenience of the ship, the expense of medical advice, as well as the other expenses of sickness, were a charge on the vessel, notwithstanding there might be a sufficient medicine chest on board. The decision rests on this plain principle, that the seaman is deprived, without his own fault, of that which the law has directed as a substitute and equivalent for the advice and attendance of a physician; that he is entitled to the benefit of the directions for the use of the medicine, and to their being administered by some person fit to be intrusted with such a service, as well as to the medicine itself.

If these principles be applied to the facts of the present case, the conclusion to which they lead is very obvious. The master was first taken down sick with the yellow fever, a disease in that climate of the most dangerous and malignant character; and which ordinarily proves fatal unless the most powerful remedies are promptly applied. Before his recovery the disease simultaneously seized the mate and three of the men; and after a short interval, and before the full recovery of those first taken sick, the fourth man. If the disease had been of a less malignant character than it in fact was, of what use would a chest of medicine be on board a vessel when the whole ship's crew were sick? Would it be safe or prudent for the sick to prescribe for the sick? Would it not be considered as the height of imprudence, when the advice of a physician could be obtained? The mate seems to have thought so, and finding himself and all the crew, excepting one man, with the symptoms of the approaching fever upon them, immediately called a physician.

It is said that some of the men objected, and it is argued that as the physician was not called at their request, the expense ought not to be charged upon them. It is also said that the advice of a physician might not have been necessary. I do not, however, put my opinion on that ground. I think that there was no reason to doubt that the disease was the yellow fever, and that the advice of a physician was necessary, not improbably indispensably so, to the preservation of their lives. The fever was then prevailing in the place with great virulence, and swelling to a melancholy extent the bills of mortality. When the physician saw his patients he pronounced the malady to be the yellow fever, prescribed for it as such, and they all recovered under his prescriptions. In my opinion the mate was not only justifiable in calling a physician without the consent of the seamen, but would have been hardly excusable if he had not done so. All, who are conversant in maritime affairs and acquainted with the habits of seamen, know their carelessness with regard to the exposure of their own health and safety. The apprehension that the earnings of the voyage may be absorbed by physicians' bills, is more than enough to overbalance their fears for their own health. It is for these reasons that the maritime law, with a provident regard, not less to the general interest of commerce than to the safety and health of this valuable class of the community, made the expenses of the sickness of the crew a charge on the vessel. It is the duty of the master to call in the aid of a physician when it is necessary to preserve the health of his men. The case now before us is a strong one to illustrate the wise forecast of those who introduced this principle into the customary law of the sea, and to show that in its operation it is equally beneficial to the owners and the mariners. If the advice of a physician had not been obtained, it is, to say the least, probable that this vessel might have lost her whole crew. It was far better for the owners, in point of economy, and looking to the prospects of the voyage in a mere pecuniary point of view, to say nothing of the duties of humanity, to pay the physician's bill, than to risk the loss of the crew and incur the extraordinary expense and delay of collecting a new crew in a sickly port.

My opinion is that the wages are due without the deduction of the charges for medical advice and attendance, that it is not the intention of the law that the fact of a medicine chest being provided with suitable medicines and directions, should be held as a substitute for the advice and attendance of a physician, in cases in which the seaman without any fault of his own, cannot have the benefit of them, from whatever cause it may be, whether because it becomes necessary to put him ashore, or because there is no person on board by whom the medicine can be administered.

FOREST CITY, The. See Case No. 301.

Case No. 4,937.

The FOREST KING.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 45.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1861.[2]

PRIZE—ENTRY INTO BLOCKADED PORT—SUPPLIES—RESTORATION OF CARGO—CONDEMNATION OF PART OF VESSEL.

1. Cargo restored, being neutral property, and there having been no attempt to violate the blockade; but no costs or damages awarded, as the vessel was confiscable in part.

2. In the absence of notice of a blockade, an inquiry at a blockaded port excused.

3. An entry into a blockaded port to obtain necessary supplies excused.

4. A part of the vessel condemned as enemy property; the rest of the vessel restored.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The schooner Forest King, her tackle, &c., and cargo were captured on the 13th day of June, 1861, in the harbor of Key West, by the United States flag-ship Mississippi, under command of William Mervine, flag-officer. The libel charges that various other vessels of the United States were in sight at the time of such capture, and that the master of the schooner had notice and due warning of the blockade of the port of Key West, yet entered such port and violated the blockade thereof, whereby the schooner and her cargo became liable to condemnation as lawful prize; that the cargo laden on the schooner was enemy's property and liable to seizure and condemnation as such. The owners of the vessel, alleging that she was held in separate shares, all but four thirty-second parts, or one-eighth part, by residents in the state of Massachusetts, and that the one-eighth share is owned by a resident in Darien, Georgia, intervene and claim the vessel as an American bottom, owned by citizens of the United States, and deny that she is subject to seizure by reason of any charges in the libel contained. They state that she sailed under a charter-party dated at New York, January 17, 1861, for a voyage to Rio Janeiro, in Brazil, and back to an Atlantic port of the United States north of Cape Hatteras, or Gulf port of discharge in the United States, (Philadelphia and Boston excepted,) took on board a cargo of coffee in bags, and sailed from that port April 20, last past, bound to New Orleans; that having learned that the Mississippi was blockaded, she altered her course and spoke the blockading squadron at Pensacola for information, and there had a warning indorsed on her register against entering Pensacola, or any other port south of the Delaware, as they were all blockaded; that the schooner on June 30 entered the port of Key West to obtain supplies, and for no other purpose; and that the vessel was there seized as prize. The claimants also interpose exceptions similar in substance to those taken in other antecedent causes to the course and validity of the suit and the jurisdiction of the court.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

The firm of Rostron, Dutton & Co., trading at Rio Janeiro, and of Richard Rostron & Co., (through their agent,) of Manchester, England, British subjects, intervene and claim the whole cargo seized, and deny that the master was their agent, in relation of the cargo, in the navigation of the ship; that any of the owners of the cargo were and are enemies of the United States; that they had any knowledge or notice that Key West was blockaded, or that they attempted or intended to violate any blockade in the importation of the above cargo; and a commercial agent of theirs verifies the statement of their interest in the claim by his test affidavit.

Upon the issues and proofs, it appears to the court that no rightful cause of seizure is established against the cargo that was shipped, by two bills of lading, dated April 16, 1861, at Rio Janeiro, by the claimants, to P. A. Giraud & Co., or to their assigns, in New Orleans. Two causes of seizure are alleged against the cargo: First, that it was the property of citizens and residents of a blockaded port, and belonged to the consignees, who are enemies of the United States; and, secondly, that the ship, with knowledge that the port was blockaded, attempted to violate the blockade; and it would seem, further, to be urged that she was confiscable for afterwards entering Key West under formal warning.

Supposing the rule is not definite, whether the consignors or consignees shall, in presumption of law, be deemed owners of goods in transitu, on affreightment, evidence is furnished, in this case, which relieves that uncertainty, and shows that the cargo was shipped as English property by the consignors. It is so stated in the test oath by the agents of the owners, and also in the affidavits made before the British consul in Rio Janeiro, upon the bills of lading, at the time of their execution; and the consignors assumed control of the consignment in written instructions directed to the master after the vessel sailed, and which were taken with the ship's papers. These supply but slight facts, but are sufficient to indicate that the property was not intended to vest in the consignees, but remained at the control of the shippers on the voyage; and it belonged to the captors to give evidence changing that presumption. Had the evidence, then, convicted the master of an intent to violate the blockade, it would not affect the neutral cargo, because he is not shown to have been agent of the owners of the cargo, so as to render his illegal act binding upon them, or to subject their property to his control. The cargo, therefore, must be restored to the claimants, but, the ship being in part confiscable for other cause, the captors are not responsible to the claimants for damages because of the arrest of the cargo, that having been placed at the risk of the owners, in a bottom liable to seizure and condemnation by the prize law.

I do not think adequate proof has been given by the libellants to convict the schooner of a wilful attempt to violate the blockade after notice thereof. The voyage round was undertaken at New York, in January, 1861, and the cargo was laden on board, and the vessel cleared on the voyage in question, at Rio Janeiro, on or about the 16th day of April, 1861, so nearly coincident with the earliest public act of the president of the United States recognizing the commencement of public hostilities by the insurgents against the United States, and the proclamation by Jefferson Davis, president of the Confederate States, announcing such hostilities, that it would, on account of the distance of the United States and Brazil apart, be impossible for actual notice to have reached the claimants that their shipment could not legally be directed to New Orleans. Prize courts regard physical disabilities of that character, in judging the bona fides of commercial operations, and forbear exacting from neutrals that exactitude, in conforming to the instructions or conduct on very remote adventures, which would be enforced in those within reasonable proximity. The Betsey, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 332; Wheat. Capt. 194, and cases cited.

The master testifies that he approached Pensacola to ascertain the fact whether a port could be entered in that vicinity free from blockade, and that he, in making that attempt, received the first formal notice of the blockade of that section of the coast and up to the capes of the Delaware. I consider that his conduct in making the inquiry or search he did was blameless. So, also, I regard it as within the fair spirit of the doctrine adverted to that the master, under the information and suggestions given by officers of the United States blockading squadron off that coast at the time he was warned off, that he could properly go into Key West for supplies or stores, committed no evasion of the blockade of that port in entering therein. This is recognized by Lord Stowell as a fair and reasonable excuse for the entering of a blockaded port (The Neptunus, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 110) by a vessel acting in good faith on such notice; and as no claim for further proof has been made to the court to correct or impeach the testimony to this point, I shall accept the statement as true, and presume that the schooner was taken by her master into Key West for the purpose of obtaining supplies necessary to the voyage. Neither he nor his mate seems to have been required, on the preparatory examinations, to specify the wants of his vessel at Key West, or whether or not they were obtained by her. I must, on the case as it stands, regard the object of her visiting Key West as admitted to be that stated by the witnesses in their examination in preparatorio. The visit was for an allowable object, and the doings of the master do not therein compromise the safety of the vessel. The extra extent of the voyage to be performed renders probable the assertion that the vessel required further stores, and, at all events, removes the suspicions that generally apply to such excuses. The Fortuna, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 27; The Hurtige Hane, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 124.

I shall, accordingly, reject the application to condemn the vessel in full, and direct seven-eighths of the value to be restored to the loyal owners named as claimants. One-eighth of the value of the vessel owned by a claimant resident in the state of Georgia, being enemy's property, is condemned, with costs; and, part of the vessel being rightfully seized as enemy's property, the owners of the cargo are not entitled to costs against the captors.

The decree in this case was affirmed on appeal, July 17, 1863. [Case not Reported.]

The FOREST QUEEN.

[3 Ben. 181.] [1]

District Court, N. D. New York. March, 1869.

COLLISION ON LAKE ERIE—STEAMER AND SCHOONER—LOOKOUT—PRESUMPTION OF FAULT—CHANGE OF COURSE.

1. Where a collision takes place between two vessels, neither of which had a proper lookout, it is most likely that both vessels were in fault.

2. Where it is not clear what particular fault or faults should be deemed to be the more immediate and real cause of the collision, the absence of a lookout, and the want of careful attention to his duties on the part of the officer in charge of each vessel may be considered to be the causes of the disaster.

3. Inability of the officer in charge of a steamer to give instant orders to the engineer, when a collision is impending, is negligence.

4. A change of course made by a sailing vessel, in accordance with a hail from an approaching steamer, cannot be considered as a fault chargeable to the sailing vessel.

This was an action for collision, brought by the Western Transportation Co., owners of the propeller Tonawanda, against the schooner Forest Queen. The collision occurred on the night of the 22d of October, 1868, near Long Point in Lake Erie.

The propeller was about two hundred feet in length, and her speed was about eight or nine miles an hour. Her lights were good and the night though dark was not foggy. The master of the propeller, who had had the watch on deck for more than an hour, testified among other things, that the wind was about north, blowing quite fresh, and that the propeller's course was east by south; that he was standing a little abaft the capstan when he first made the white light of the Forest Queen, about twenty minutes before the collision, and about a point on the port bow of the propeller; that he remarked to his second mate that it was Long Point light; that his second mate took the glass and looked at the light and said, "No, sir, it is a vessel, I can see her green light;" that he (the master) then took the glass and could see both her red and green lights; that the schooner stood along, showing both lights five minutes, more or less; that she then shut in her green light and showed her red, and then bore about a point off the propeller's bow; that she stood along in that position ten or fifteen minutes, showing only her red light, which seemed to open on his port bow, and that the propeller continued on in her course of east by south; that the red light opened on his port bow until it bore from two to two and a half points off that bow, when the schooner shut in her red and showed her green light; that she might then have been a quarter of a mile off, and that up to that time there had been no indication of danger; that he then spoke to his second mate and said: "She has shown her green light; what is the meaning of that?" and that his reply was, "She has probably thrown off a little and will straighten up in a moment;" that he (the master) then took the glass and saw that the schooner was "standing right for" the propeller, and that the second mate at the same time started for the pilot house; that he (the master) ordered the wheel "right a-port" as soon as he saw the green light through the glass, and ordered it "hard a-port," in two seconds or but a few seconds after he saw the green light without the glass; that the wheelsman answered his order, and that, a minute or a minute and a half afterwards, the vessels struck; that he should judge the propeller had swung from two to three points before she was struck; that the schooner struck the propeller on her port bow, about twenty or twenty-two feet from her stem, and at an angle of about five points between the sterns of the two vessels, as near as he could judge; that the lookout had been on duty all night and had gone aft, about five minutes before the collision, and was then aft; that, while he was aft, the witness and his second mate were on the promenade deck; that he did not think there was time, after the red light was shut out and the green light appeared, to stop and reverse his engine; and that, when the schooner was four or five lengths from the propeller, he sung out to the schooner to put his helm hard up (to the starboard).

The testimony of the master of the schooner (who was also part owner) showed that she was one hundred feet in length; that the collision occurred about half past two o'clock and that he had not left the deck that night; that he made the light of the propeller about twenty minutes before the collision, and from half a point to a point on the schooner's starboard bow; that he then took it to be a green light; that the schooner's course was then west by south, but that he immediately changed her course to west south west, and that she was kept steady on that course until just before the collision; that immediately after giving the order to change her course to west south west, he observed that the propeller's light was from a point and a half to two points off his starboard bow; that the schooner went on steady on her course of west south west, and the propeller's light opened more on his starboard bow; that ten minutes before the collision the man who had been on the lookout was sent aft, to assist at the wheel and keep the schooner steady, the wind being puffy; that he (the master) remained between the foerigging and the foremast, and that the greatest distance the light bore on his starboard bow was about four points; that, when that was the bearing of the light, he observed a change in the propeller's course, and got a dim sight of her red light; that he had not before seen either of her colored lights; that after seeing the red light, and at the same time, came the call from the propeller to put his wheel hard up, and he sung out to the men at the wheel, "hard up," and got a response from both of them; but before there was time to get the wheel more than half up, the vessels struck at about a right angle.

HALL, District Judge. Upon the pleadings and proofs, it is entirely clear that the collision was caused by gross negligence, or grosser unskillfulness; but it is not entirely certain whether it was caused by a fault or faults imputable to only one of the vessels, or whether both vessels were in fault. It is, however, certain, that neither of the vessels had a proper lookout, at the time when the services of a competent and faithful lookout would have been of the most essential service in preventing the collision; and it is, therefore, most likely that both were in fault.

The absence of a proper lookout, and the want of careful attention to his duties, on the part of the officer of the deck, of each of the vessels, may sufficiently account for the absence of any testimony showing what particular fault or faults should be deemed the more immediate and real cause of the collision; and these circumstances may well be considered as the remote, if not the proximate, causes of the disaster.

The evidence in the case is, in most respects, unreliable and unsatisfactory; and there is not only much conflicting testimony, but it is also quite difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile many of the statements of the witnesses, on either side, with some of the admitted facts of the case.

As examples of the difficulty just alluded to, it may be useful to refer to the testimony of the master of each of the colliding vessels, in respect to their relative position, at the time each observed the change in the course of the other vessel;—to which change he attributes the collision. It should, first, be remarked, that the vessels were running in nearly opposite directions—there being but a single point between the lines of their respective courses—and that the speed of the propeller was about eight miles, and that of the schooner about nine miles, an hour. The testimony of the master of the propeller tends to show that the change of the schooner's course was made when she was about eighty rods distant, and from two to two and a half points off the propeller's port bow. Now, if this is correct, the schooner—fixing her position at two and one-fourth points off the propeller's bow—was more than thirty rods to the northward of the line of the propeller's course, and only about seventy-four rods to the eastward, and it is incredible that the schooner could have changed her course, as stated, and have reached and struck the propeller, except by a well-directed and persistent effort to follow the propeller, and produce a collision. On the other hand, the testimony of the master of the schooner tends to show, that the change of course made by the propeller, was made four or five minutes before the collision, and when she was four points off his starboard bow—a statement more incredible than that of the master of the steamer, as the bearing was more off the bow, and the schooner's speed exceeded that of the propeller;—especially, as the propeller's wheel was ported at the time of the change, and the testimony of the master of the schooner is, that the course of his own vessel was not changed, until it was changed under a hail from the propeller; and as the position of the claimant is, that it was not changed until it was apparently necessary, to lessen the chances, or diminish the force of the collision, which, as the event proved, it was then too late to avert. In truth, this case is one in which no very satisfactory conclusion in regard to the material questions of fact, controverted at the hearing, can be reached; but, unless several witnesses have been guilty of deliberate perjury, it must be conceded, (notwithstanding there is testimony from other witnesses which would lead to a different conclusion,) that each vessel exhibited her proper signal lights; and, that such lights might have been seen at a distance of more than two, if not more than three, miles, on the night of the collision. It is, therefore, clear that the collision was caused by negligence or fault in the management of these vessels, or of one of them.

Upon the whole evidence, it is clear, that the propeller was in fault, because she had no competent lookout stationed and kept on duty, during the time when the services of a lookout were most essential, for the purpose of preventing the collision which occurred. It is quite certain that, with a proper lookout, and a competent officer of the deck, in the best position to secure prompt action on the part of the engineer and wheelsman, the collision might have been avoided. The officer of the deck was at a distance from the point where he should have been, to communicate instant orders to his engineer; and the consequence was, that no orders to stop the engine were given. This should have been done, and the omission must be considered as a fault which may have contributed to the collision.

It is clearly shown that the schooner was in fault, in not having a competent lookout stationed and kept in the faithful discharge of that duty. The failure to observe the colored lights of the propeller shows that no sufficient lookout was kept by any one; and the master, knowing that the lookout had been sent aft, did not use ordinary care in the discharge of his duty as officer of the deck. The negligence thus distinctly proved, the testimony on the part of the libellants, and other circumstances, create grave doubts in regard to the correctness of the statements in respect to the steady and continued course of the schooner; and these doubts are much increased by the difficulty of accounting for the collision, upon the case made by the claimants —assuming a change of course, on the part of the propeller, when her light was four points off the starboard bow of the schooner.

Besides the faults which have been already imputed to the propeller and schooner, it is now quite certain that, if the propeller had put her helm hard-a-starboard, when it was put hard-a-port, there would have been no collision, if the schooner's course and change of helm were such as appears from the testimony; and if the propeller's course and change were those stated by her master, it is also quite clear that there would have been no collision, if the schooner's helm had been put hard-a-port, when it was put hard-a-starboard, or even if the schooner's course had remained unchanged. The change of course was, doubtless, made by both vessels, very near the same time, and each must have swung about three and a half or four points —or one somewhat more, and the other about as much less, than that—in order to strike at the angle they did actually strike, as established by the pleadings and evidence. Indeed, the testimony of the master of the propeller even indicates a greater change than that, or nine or ten points of change, to be divided between the two vessels.

The change made by the schooner, under the hail made by the master of the propeller, cannot be a fault chargeable to the schooner; and my experience in collision trials has satisfied me that a master who assumes to take command of an approaching vessel, with which his own is likely to come in collision, generally acts unwisely. The master of a steam vessel is rarely called upon to direct a change of helm on an approaching sailing vessel, unless his own negligence has previously brought the two vessels into imminent danger of collision.

From the best consideration I have been able to give the case, it must be considered one of mutual fault, and the damage to both vessels must be aggregated, and then equally apportioned; and no costs will be allowed to either party, as against the other.

BANKRUPTCY—FAILURE OF ASSETS—SECURITY FOR COSTS.

An assignee in bankruptcy who is prosecuting an expensive litigation, and is without funds belonging to the estate, may be required to furnish security for the costs.

[This was a suit by James Forman, assignee, against Felix Campbell.]

C. F. Dickinson, for plaintiff.

A. J. Perry, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The power to stay proceedings till security for costs shall be filed, is a power inherent in every court, and may be exercised independently of any statute. Swift v. Collins, 1 Denio, 659; People v. Oneida Common Pleas, 18 Wend. 652.

This power may properly be exercised in a case like this, where an assignee in bankruptcy, who is substantially without funds belonging to the estate, is prosecuting an expensive litigation. He may well call upon the creditors who are to reap the benefit of the litigation if it succeed to furnish him security to pay the costs of the litigation if it should fail.

Case No. 4,940.

FORMAN et al. v. MILLER et al.

[5 McLean, 218.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. April Term, 1851.

CONTRACTS—DEGREE OF CARE AND SKILL REQUIRED IN PERFORMANCE—DAMAGES.

1. Persons undertaking to pack pork, are bound to exercise all the skill and care which the business requires.

2. And if any part of the pork packed prove to be unsound, the jury will ascertain whether the unsoundness was attributable to the manner in which it was put up.

3. The damages sustained by the plaintiffs, for whom the work was done, may be ascertained by comparing the sales of the unsound article, with the market price for a good article.

[This was a proceeding by Thomas S. Forman and others against E. J. Miller and others.]

Mr. Chase, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Fox, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This suit is brought on a contract made between the parties, in which the defendants agreed to cut hogs enough to make fifteen thousand pounds of prime and mess pork. The declaration charges that the pork was badly put up, that many of the barrels were injured, and several of them fell short of the weight, and damage was claimed for meat not accounted for. The price for packing per barrel, and finding the salt, was fixed at one dollar and seventy cents; for selling shoulders per hundred pounds, sixteen cents; for selling hams, heads, and offal, two and a half per cent. Hams to be sold at four and one-half cents per pound, and lard at six and one-fourth cents. Rendering lard at thirty-three and one-third cents per one hundred pounds. And the defendants agree to give sixteen cents for each hog's head that may not be wanted in making prime pork. Six thousand shoulders were to be delivered to Holmes & Co., of Pittsburgh, they paying for the same $2.70 per hundred pounds. Plaintiff agreed to furnish the cash to make purchases. Defendants only to pack the number of barrels which the hogs purchased should fill.

It seems from a settlement that the number of barrels purchased amounted to twelve hundred and eighty-six. And the account was balanced. From the evidence it appeared that four hundred and seventy-three barrels were injured. And the court instructed the jury to inquire into the extent of the damages sustained by reason of any want of skill or care of defendants in packing the pork. The plaintiff's partner was present occasionally and witnessed the progress of the packing, and seemed to be well satisfied. And there is some evidence conducing to show that the plaintiff took the responsibility of directing in what manner the pork should be put up. So far as this evidence may go, the jury will consider it. If the plaintiffs changed the ordinary mode of packing, thus far the defendants are not answerable for damages. But, it is to be presumed that the plaintiffs relied on the skill and knowledge of the defendants in the business of packing pork.

The pork was packed, it appears, for the New Orleans market. Several barrels were sold at Cincinnati as bad pork. About fourteen thousand two hundred and thirteen pounds were sold. The defendants sent down to Louisville, as the proceeds of the unsound barrels, one hundred and ninety-nine dollars. The shipments were made on the order of the plaintiffs. The above sums the plaintiffs refused to receive. Twenty-six barrels were claimed as not accounted for. This was ascertained from the amount of pork purchased, and the amount packed.

The jury were instructed they should ascertain the damages suffered by the plaintiffs from the sale of the unsound pork at Cincinnati, comparing it with the price of good pork at the same market. The sales of the pork at New Orleans to be compared in the same manner with the marketable price of a sound article. This will enable the jury to come to a satisfactory conclusion as to whether the pork was well put up at Cincinnati, that being the place of delivery, as to the injury, if any, the plaintiffs sustained. And if it shall appear that the loss was caused by a want of skill or care, or both, by the defendants, the plaintiffs will be entitled to the market price of good pork at Cincinnati, where the plaintiffs received the pork.

The defendants made no other contract than that the pork should be well put up, and it will be for the jury to say whether there was anything in the season, or in the transportation of it to New Orleans, which could have injured it, had it been well packed. In holding themselves out to the public as pork packers, the defendants were bound to use the skill in the business which such a business requires.

The jury found for the plaintiffs $2756.63.

At a subsequent day a motion for new trial was made by the defendants' counsel, and strenuously urged. The ground was, that the jury had rendered a higher verdict than the facts authorized. It was argued that the season was very unfavorable, and that a great deal of the pork packed at Cincinnati and elsewhere spoiled. That it was impossible to expel the animal heat from the meat, before it was necessary to salt it to prevent it from spoiling. That the jury had misapprehended the facts, as, if they had found for the plaintiffs' at all, they could not have assessed the damages at the sum returned in their verdict. On the other side, the plaintiffs' counsel contended that the damages should, or at least, they might have been higher. That they must have omitted some of the items claimed. And this was attempted to be demonstrated by the items of damages claimed, showing the price of the pork sold as unsound, and comparing it with the price for which a sound article sold at Cincinnati.

BY THE COURT. There is no particular complaint as to the charge of the court. Specific charges were asked, and the court gave general instructions to the jury, embracing the points on which instruction was asked. This is a better mode, as the jury will see the views of the evidence applying to the case in connection with the law. The charge being delivered, no exception was taken to any part of it, nor was it intimated that any one of the points in the instruction prayed, had been omitted. This was necessary, if there was any objection to the instruction, as the court, by having its attention directed to the particular point noted, might correct or modify the instruction. Not long since, in a similar case, the court permitted an exception to be taken which had not been made when the charge was given; and although the decision of this court was affirmed in the supreme court, yet it subjected the plaintiff to delay and expense. Being convinced that an error in law is a matter of strict right, I determined that a strict practice, in justice, was required; and, consequently, where the matter of exception is not noted during the trial, a bill of exceptions will not be allowed afterwards.

In regard to the verdict of the jury in this case, if the verdict had been for a less sum, the court would not have set it aside for that cause. The jury were instructed that if they should find the defendants had been negligent in putting up the pork, the damage to the plaintiffs would be, the difference in the Cincinnati market between sound articles and those which were sold in that market as unsound. And that the pork shipped to New Orleans could only be examined at that port to ascertain its true condition when it was delivered at Cincinnati. That the Cincinnati market afforded the datum for an estimation of the damages.

After a deliberate revision of the evidence, the charge of the court, and the verdict, we are not brought to the conclusion that the verdict of the jury is against evidence. The weather was, undoubtedly, very unfavorable for pork packing the season this pork was packed; but the experience and skill of the defendants as packers were relied upon, and they should have acted under a knowledge of such a responsibility. Under such circumstances, the skill of the defendants is specially required. They should have declined killing the hogs, if they did not believe the pork could be saved. After this advice, had the plaintiffs directed them to kill and pack the pork, they would have been exonerated from any liability, had they put up the pork as carefully and skilfully as could be done by persons acquainted with the business. We do not feel ourselves authorized to set aside the verdict; the motion for a new trial is, therefore, overruled, and judgment on the verdict.

Case No. 4,941.

FORMAN v. PEASLEE.

[21 Law Rep. 273.]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1857.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — "PERIOD OF EXPORTATION" — COST OF LOCAL TRANSPORTATION BEFORE EXPORT — APPRAISEMENT.

1. The plaintiff entered into a contract with T. & Co. for the transportation of iron from Wales to the United States, in pursuance of which, T. & Co. employed coasting vessels to bring it from Wales to Liverpool, where it was transshipped on board their packets for Boston. Held, that the "period of exportation" at which the market value was to be ascertained, under the act of 1851, was the time when the goods left Liverpool for the United States. Gant v. Peaslee [Case No. 5,212] distinguished.

[Cited in Gibb v. Washington, Case No. 5,380.]

2. The cost of transportation from Wales to Liverpool is not a dutiable charge which can be added to the market price.

[Cited in Tomes v. Redfield, Case No. 14,085.]

3. By the act of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 629), all goods subject to an ad valorem duty are to be appraised at the period of exportation, and this includes goods obtained otherwise than by purchase.

4. The 17th section of the act of 1842 (5 Stat. 564) must, since the passage of the act of 1851, be held to point out the mode and consequences of all appraisements of imports, whether procured by purchase or not.

[At law. Suit by W. H. Forman against Charles H. Peaslee.]

Choate & Griswold, for plaintiff.

Mr. Hallett, Dist. Atty., contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an action against the collector of the port of Boston and Charlestown, to recover back moneys paid under protest for duties on an importation of railroad iron, manufactured by the plaintiff in England, and exported by him to this country, to be sold here on his account. It appears that the plaintiff made a contract with Train & Co., who had a line of packet ships plying between Liverpool and Boston, to transport this iron from Wales, where it was manufactured, to Boston, at a freight of twenty-two shillings and sixpence per ton. Train & Co. employed coasting vessels to take it on board at the ports of Newport and Cardiff, in Wales, and bring it to Liverpool, where it was laden on board their packet ships and brought to Boston. In appraising the iron, the appraisers fixed its market value at the time of its departure from Liverpool. The plaintiff insisted it should be at the time of his departure from Newport and Cardiff; and protested for this cause against the payment of the duties exacted by the collector. The act of March 3, 1851, § 1 (9 Stat. 629), requires the appraisers to ascertain the market value of the import, "at the period of the exportation to the United States." The natural meaning of the words "period of exportation," is termination of exportation. The period of exportation is that point of time when the act of exportation is complete. The subject matter of the statute is the appraisal of goods exported from a foreign country and imported into the United States. So that the inquiry in this case is, at what point of time was the act of exportation of this merchandise from the foreign country, England, complete? My opinion is, when it left Liverpool. Its transportation coastwise from one English port to another was not an exportation from England. Until the vessels of Train & Co. having it on board were cleared and sailed from Liverpool, there was no completed act of exportation. Until that time the property was under the control of the British government, whose order could have arrested and detained it within that country, and whose control over it would have been unaffected by the fact that it had been brought from Cardiff and Newport for the purpose of being sent to the United States.

The plaintiff's counsel relied on the case of Barrett v. Stockton & B. Ry. Co., reported in 2 Man. & G. 134, and on error in 3 Man. & G. 956, and 11 Clark & F. 590. But that case tends to support the construction which I place on the act of congress. It is true it was decided in all the courts that under the act of parliament then in question, exportation might mean simply carrying out of a port; and as between the public and a corporation claiming a toll, and upon the special provisions of that act, it was held it did mean so. But it was admitted that its more usual sense was a more restricted sense, and covered only cases where property was not merely sent out of one port to another of the same kingdom, but carried to a foreign country. And that such is the meaning of the word "exportation" in this act of congress can admit of no doubt, for it can have no reference to transportation from one port to another of the same country; its language and its object and its subject matter all confine the exportation here spoken of to an exportation from some foreign country to the United States.

But it is further argued that the merchandise left Wales for the United States, and under a bill of lading which showed that it was to come hither. The bill of lading, if it can be considered as but one, which I doubt, and the intent of the party in sending the property from Wales, cannot make the act of exportation from Great Britain complete on leaving Wales, when it was not so in fact.

It is further insisted that this case is like Gant v. Peaslee [supra]. But this is not so. Goods, the produce of Turkey, were exported from that country to the United States. On their way hither they were carried to England, and without being landed were transshipped. I held they were not imported into the United States from England. Their going to England and being transshipped there affected only the route and means of their transit after the act of exportation from Turkey had been completed. But here the fact that this merchandise went to Liverpool and was there transshipped, affected the mode and time of transit out of Great Britain, and prevented that from being complete until the merchandise left Liverpool.

The next objection is that the collector added to the charges six shillings sterling per ton for the cost of transporting the property from Wales to Liverpool. I am of opinion this was illegal. There was no such charge in fact. The plaintiff agreed with Train & Co. on a certain rate of freight from Wales to the United States. It does not appear that he paid any more freight because Train & Co., instead of sending their ships to Newport and Cardiff, chose to bring the iron in other vessels to Liverpool. It appears that the market price of railroad iron is always quoted, and was so taken by these appraisers, at so much per ton "free on board in Wales." So that from the nature of the trade no charges which precede the shipment are to be added to the market price. They are included in that price, and are borne by the seller. That marine freight, whether an import be brought direct from the country of exportation or via other ports and places, is not a dutiable charge, has been repeatedly held. Gant v. Peaslee [supra]; Millar v. Millar [Case No. 9,546].

The next objection involves a question of much importance, and which is attended with no little difficulty. It is, whether these goods, having been procured otherwise than by purchase, were rightly appraised by pursuing the course marked out by the 17th section of the tariff act of 1842 (5 Stat. 564), as amended by the act of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 629), or whether it was necessary to conform to the act of March 1, 1823 (3 Stat. 729). This question affects—First, the point of time at which the value should be ascertained; second, the persons by whom the appraisement should be made; third, the consequence of the appraisement as respects the additional duty by way of penalty.

As to the first of these, it is insisted by the plaintiff, that as these goods were procured otherwise than by purchase, their actual value at the time and place when procured, and not their market value at the period of their exportation, should have been ascertained, pursuant to the fifth section of the act of 1823 (3 Stat. 732). Independent of the first section of the act of March 3, 1851

(9 Stat. 629), this position would probably have been held to be correct. But the language of that section is, "in all cases in which there is or shall be imposed any ad valorem rate of duty, &c., it shall be the duty of the collector, &c., to cause the actual market value or wholesale price thereof at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported into the United States, to be appraised, estimated, and ascertained." This language is broad enough to cover cases of imports procured otherwise than by purchase. It expressly embraces all cases of imports subject to an ad valorem rate of duty. And when it is added that this law is known to have been passed to change certain rules decided by the supreme court in Greely v. Thompson, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 225, and that that was a case of goods not purchased, there can be no doubt that congress intended to embrace such cases and change the rule of the act of 1823, and bring them all under one uniform rule as to the time in reference to which the value should be fixed.

The second particular, viz., the persons by whom the appraisal is to be made, is attended with more difficulty. The sixteenth section of the act of 1823 required the president to appoint two appraisers for each port therein mentioned; and the eighteenth section provides for a reappraisement by two merchants chosen by the importer, together with the two government appraisers; and also, a further appeal to the secretary of the treasury. The 17th section of the act of 1842 (5 Stat. 564) points out the mode of proceeding by the government appraisers, confers on them certain special powers to enable them efficiently to discharge their duties, and gives an appeal to two merchants, to be chosen by the collector. This was the mode followed in the present case; and it is insisted that it was illegal, because this section applies only to the appraisement of goods purchased. It is said that in Greely v. Thompson [supra] the supreme court so viewed this section, and that this court followed this view in Barnard v. Morton [Case No. 1,005]. I think this is so. But in neither of these cases was this point necessarily involved in the decision, nor does the question whether the seventeenth section of the act of 1842 is restricted to cases of imports procured by purchase, appear to have been examined and carefully considered. Still, I should follow what is said in Greely v. Thompson [supra] if I did not think the subsequent legislation, in the act of 1851, had a most material bearing on the question. I proceed, therefore, to examine it. There can be no doubt that the sixteenth section of the act of 1842 applies only to goods purchased. It may be admitted, also, that the mode and means of appraisement provided for in the seventeenth section, had reference more immediately and prominently to the cases embraced in the sixteenth section. But the question is whether they extend to no other cases. The language is broad enough to include all cases of merchandise requiring an appraisal. "It shall be lawful for the appraisers, &c., to call before them and examine upon oath or affirmation any owner, importer, consignee, or other person, touching any matter or thing which they may deem material in ascertaining the true market value or wholesale price of any merchandise imported," &c. The subject of the appraisement is any merchandise imported. The purpose of the appraisement is to ascertain the actual market value; and by the act of 1823 (section 5) the actual value, which means the same thing, was to be ascertained. The mischief to be remedied was the same. No reason is perceived why it was not as necessary to give the appraisers these new powers in reference to importations of goods manufactured or produced, as well as goods purchased by the importer. Indeed, where there was an actual purchase, there would seem to be less danger of undervaluation than where no actual transaction had occurred to fix the market value of the particular goods. Upon mature reflection I should feel great difficulty in holding that this new and more efficient mode of appraisal, which in terms is extended to any merchandise imported, was designed to include only goods purchased. And the act of March 3, 1851, passed after the decision of Greely v. Thompson [supra] tends strongly, in my judgment, to show that the seventeenth section of the act of 1842 must now be construed to include all cases of appraisement. It has already been stated that the first section of that act extends to and includes goods procured otherwise than by purchase. The second section also applies to all cases of appraisement, and makes the certificate of one appraiser sufficient. The third section provides for the appointment of general appraisers, who are to visit such ports as may be designated by the secretary of the treasury, to give aid and assistance so as to secure uniformity in the collection of the revenue; and it proceeds: "And wherever practicable, in cases of appeal from the decision of United States appraisers under the provisions of the seventeenth section of the act of 1842, the collector shall select one discreet and experienced merchant to be associated with one of the appraisers to be appointed under this act, who together shall appraise the goods in question; and if they shall disagree, the collector shall decide between them; and the appraisement thus determined shall be final, and deemed and taken to be the true value of the said goods, and the duties shall be levied thereon accordingly, any act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding." Now it is, to say the least, highly improbable that congress would by the first and second sections of this act embrace all cases of importations calling for an appraisement, and change the rules as to the time of valuation and the number of appraisers required in all, and yet, when they came to these new and important provisions to secure uniformity of valuation, leave out of their operation all cases where goods were procured otherwise than by purchase. And yet they have done so if the seventeenth section of the act of 1842 does not include those cases. For they extend the new provisions only to appeals which are claimed under that seventeenth section. In my judgment this has a very strong tendency to show that the seventeenth section was intended to embrace, and does embrace, all cases of appraisements of goods, however the same may have been procured. And as these acts are in pari materia, and each is to be construed by the aid of all the light which can be obtained from all the rest, I shall hold, until otherwise instructed by the supreme court, that the seventeenth section of the act of 1842 points out the mode and the consequences of an appraisement of goods procured otherwise than by purchase. And this determines the remaining question, whether any penalty was incurred when it was found that the appraised value exceeded the invoice value ten per centum. As the seventeenth section of the act of 1842, in my opinion, applies to the case, and as the penalty fixed by that section was the one exacted, there was no error, save that the penalty was assessed on the charges; it was, in that particular, not warranted by law. The result is, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover back the six shillings per ton added to the valuation as a charge, and such part of the penalty as was assessed on the charges. For this, when computed, a verdict will be entered, as was agreed by the parties.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 12.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1801.

ATTACHMENT OF PRIVILEGE.

A clerk of this court is not entitled to sue by attachment of privilege.

Action on the case for slander.

The plaintiff [Uriah Forrest] being clerk of the court, had sued out an attachment of privilege, and now moved for a rule upon the defendant [Samuel Hanson] to plead on some day during the present term.

It was contended, on the part of the plaintiff, that the privileges of the officers of courts is a part of the law of Maryland, which, by the act of congress concerning the District of Columbia,—27th February, 1801, § 1 (2 Stat. 103),—was adopted as the law of this part of the District. That the legislature of Maryland had acknowledged the principle, by passing an act (1799, c. 29) restraining the application of it in some cases. That, in Maryland, it is not a matter of favor, but of right, to rule the defendant to plead at the first term. The oldest writers consider it as part of the common law of England. 4 Bac. Abr. 215, 218, tit. "Privilege," B; 2 Inst. 55, 551; 4 Inst. 71; Bract. 99, 112. It is the privilege of the court, and not of the officer. It is founded on the same reason and principle as the privilege of witnesses, jurymen, &c., to be free from arrest. 4 Bac. Abr. 222, 223. No court has power to issue a process not authorized by common, or statute law; the attachment of privilege is not authorized by statute law; it must therefore have issued as a common law process. Salk. 543, 544. In Maryland an attorney must be sued by bill of privilege; if he does not appear, he will be forejudged; and then being no longer an attorney, a capias may issue against him. Brown v. Van Braam, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 344. The act of congress respecting the courts of the United States authorizes them to make rules not repugnant to the laws and constitution of the United States.

On the part of the defendant, it was said that the privilege of the officers of the courts at Westminster is no part of the common law. It depends altogether upon the usage and custom of the courts. It extends only to the court of king's bench, the common pleas, the exchequer, and court of chancery. It is not claimed by all courts of record, as such. The privilege of officers of the common pleas must be certified to the king's bench, and that of the officers of the exchequer must be proved by the red book. 17 Vin. Abr. 518, 530, 531, tit. "Chancery"; articles 12, 16, "Stannary Courts"; 4 Bac. Abr. 219, 224; Id. "System of Pleading," 343, 348. It is to be presumed that it was originally granted to certain courts only, by the original grant or charter by which the courts were erected. By the charter to Lord Baltimore, he was empowered to erect courts, and if the privilege is claimed by the courts in Maryland, it may be presumed to be claimed under the charter (section 7). See Act Assem. 1637; 2 Rich. Pr. Com. Pl. 176, for the form of a plea of privilege.

KILTY, Chief Judge. It is the unanimous opinion of the court that the rule should not be laid, and that the privilege is not to be allowed. The court consider that the privilege, as exercised by certain courts in England, does not depend on any principle of the common law, extending, generally, to all judicial bodies, but is in the nature of a particular grant or charter to a certain court.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The exercise of the privilege in the state of Maryland depends on the like principle, and flows from a grant or charter to the courts there. The adoption of the laws of Maryland in this county, under the law by which this court is established, does not give to the court the privileges which have been thus derived to the courts of Maryland, and therefore they are not authorized or bound to extend to their officers the benefits or disadvantages of the privilege contended for; and have not the power to extend it to the prejudice of other persons. See 2 Hawk. P. C. 2, 4, 5.

FORREST v. HANSON.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 63.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1802.

SLANDER—PROOF TO SUPPORT PLEA OF JUSTIFICATION—ACTIONABLE WORDS—"SWINDLER"—INSTRUCTION TO JURY—COSTS.

1. A plea of justification in slander, must be substantially proved.

2. A breach of trust accompanied by falsehood does not amount to swindling, unless also accompanied by an intent to defraud.

3. The court is not bound, at the request of either party, to instruct the jury after they have retired to consider their verdict, unless the jurors themselves request such instruction.

4. It is actionable to say of a director of a bank, that he is a swindler.

5. In slander a verdict for one cent damages carries full costs.

6. The statute of Glocester is, but St. 21 Jac. I. c. 16, respecting costs, is not, in force in Maryland.

Action on the case for words. The plaintiff [Uriah Forrest] declares that being a director of the Bank of Columbia, the defendant [Samuel Hanson] on the 1st of June, 1801, in a certain discourse had concerning the plaintiff, as one of the directors, &c., spoke the following false, scandalous, &c., words of him, as a director, &c., "General Forrest is a liar and a swindler, and I can prove him to be so. I, as cashier, say so of one of the directors, and I think one or the other of us ought to be turned out of the bank." The 2d count states also the words liar and swindler (with this innuendo), meaning that the said Uriah Forrest had been guilty of falsehood, fraud, deceit, knavery, and dishonesty in his conduct, as one of the directors of the Bank of Columbia, whereby the plaintiff is injured in his good name, as one of the directors of the said bank, and his credit with the bank impaired, and he has been in danger of being turned out of the bank, and of losing his office as director, &c. The defendant pleaded in justification fourteen pleas, each plea containing a separate fact or transaction, upon which issues were joined. In the trial of the cause, at September term, 1801, the jury having retired to consider of their verdict, and before they had agreed, requested leave to return into court and ask the opinion of the court upon a question of law; whereupon, being brought into court, they asked whether they could find a verdict for the defendant upon any one plea if all the facts stated in such plea should not have been proved to their satisfaction.

THE COURT thereupon instructed them that the facts stated in such plea, must be substantially proved, and that where fraud was alleged in the plea, there fraud must be proved; and that where falsehood and deceit were alleged in the plea, there falsehood and deceit must be proved; to which opinion of the court and instruction the counsel for both parties assented. Whereupon the jury retired again, and not agreeing upon any verdict after being together some hours, THE COURT ordered the jury to be brought into court, and informed them that if they had any doubt upon matter of law they might inquire of the court. Whereupon the jury asked the opinion of the court whether a breach of trust accompanied with falsehood amounted in law to swindling. To which THE COURT replied "No, unless accompanied also with an intent to defraud." The counsel for the defendant then moved the court (while the jury remained standing at the bar) to instruct the jury that if they find the facts stated in any one plea to be substantially true, they should find the issue upon that plea for the defendant, although such facts do not amount to the crime of swindling in its legal acceptation.

But THE COURT refused so to instruct the jury. First, because they did not think themselves bound to instruct the jury, after having retired to their room unless the jury should request such instruction. And secondly, because they conceived they had already substantially instructed the jury to the same effect, in giving the instruction above stated.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with one cent damages.

The defendant moved, in arrest of judgment, because the words are not actionable; and also contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to full costs, because the verdict was for only one cent.

Mr. Dennis, Mr. Gantt, and Mr. C. Lee, for plaintiff.

Mr. Simms and Mr. Jones, for defendant.

1. For the defendant, it was contended that "swindler" is a word of uncertain meaning. It is not to be found in any dictionary. There is no statute against swindling. The term does not imply, in this country, any particular crime punishable by law. Words are not actionable in themselves unless they contain a charge of a crime for which the plaintiff might be punished by law. 1 Com. Dig. 266, 267; Onslow v. Horne, 3 Wils. 177. The act of 30 Geo. II. c. 24, respecting false pretences, is not in force in this country. The offences described in that act were not before cognizable by law; and the word "swindler" has been introduced since that statute, and is understood to indicate the offences created by it. 2d. As to costs. At the common law no costs were given. They were first given by the statute of Glocester. The statute of James (21 Jac. I. c. 16, § 6) respecting costs in actions of slander, where the damages are assessed at less than forty shillings is in force in Maryland. Acts Md. 1785, c. 87, § 2. By the practice of the general court of Maryland, no costs are given when the sum recovered is not sufficient to support the jurisdiction.

For the plaintiff, it was said, 1st, that the words were actionable in themselves; 2d, that they were actionable by reason of their being spoken of the plaintiff in his official character; 3d, that the statute of Glocester was, and that of James not in force in Maryland. The following authorities were cited: J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 Term R. 748; Berryman v. Wise, 4 Term R. 366; [Respublica v. Teischer] 1 Dall. (1 U. S.) 335-338; U. S. v. Ravara [Case No. 16,122]; 4 Bac. Abr. 487, 484, 485, 506; Hoyle v. Young, 1 Wash. [Va.] 152; Rue v. Mitchel, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 58; 4 Bac. Abr. 489; 1 Com. Dig. 180; Herty's Laws Md. 1793, c. 30, § 12, p. 86; St. 30 Geo. II. c. 24; Police of London, 105; Mesca's Case, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 74, 75; Esp. N. P. 504; 6 Bac. Abr. 222, 223; St. 33 Hen. VIII.; Charter Md. § 10; Act Md. 1763, c. 18; Id. 1785, c. 87, § 1; Id. 1713, c. 4, § 3; Id. 1763, c. 23, § 4; Id. 1771, c. 11, §§ 2-4; Entick, Dict. tit. "Swindler"; Bullock's Law of Costs, c. 1; 3 Bl. Comm. 400.

At this term, THE COURT gave judgment for the plaintiff with full costs.

Before KILTY, Chief Judge, and CRANCH and MARSHALL, Circuit Judges.

CRANCH, Circuit Judge. In this case, it is not necessary to consider whether the words would be actionable in themselves, if not spoken of a person who exercises an office of trust, because the plaintiff has grounded his action upon the speaking of the words respecting him in his official character as a director of the bank, and the words are alleged to be spoken of his official conduct. The question then is, whether these words, spoken of the official conduct of a person who holds an office of trust, are actionable? There is no doubt that words not actionable when spoken of a common person, may become actionable when spoken of an officer, and in relation to his official conduct. The general rule is laid down in 4 Bac. Abr. 489. thus: "As all words spoken of any person who is in the enjoyment of an office of honor, profit, or trust, which import a charge of unfitness to discharge the duties of the same, must be prejudicial to such person; these have, and with good reason, been always held to be in themselves actionable; but wherever words, in themselves not actionable, become so by being spoken of a person in office, it must appear from the words themselves, or from the pleadings, that they were spoken in a colloquium concerning his office; for the very foundation of the action is its being a disgrace in office." If this is law, (and the whole course of authorities proves it to be so)—if the office of director of the Bank of Columbia is an office of trust; if the plaintiff was a director at the time of the speaking of the words; if the words import an unfitness to discharge the duties of that office; and if it appears, from the words themselves, or from the pleadings, that they were spoken in a colloquium concerning that office, then it follows as an irresistible consequence, that the words thus spoken are actionable, and judgment must be rendered for the plaintiff. This is the result of a comprehensive view of all the cases decided on the subject.

The next question is, whether the office of director of the Bank of Columbia is such an office of trust as is contemplated by the law? That it is an office of trust seems to be proved by the words of the act incorporating the bank. By that act the directors are intrusted with the power of "regulating the affairs of the bank—of choosing a president and a cashier—of determining upon the manner of doing business, and the rules and forms to be pursued—of appointing and paying the various officers they may find necessary, and finally of disposing of the money and credit of the bank in the common course of banking, for the interest and benefit of the proprietors," &c., and by the 12th section any director who shall commit any fraud touching the money or property of the bank is liable to be prosecuted by indictment. It appears, then, that the office of director is an office of high trust and responsibility. The cases in the books speak not only of words being actionable by reason of their being spoken of judges and the higher judicial officers and justices of the peace, but also of sheriffs, stewards of courts-leet, church-wardens (Style, 338; Woodruff v. Weoley, Cart. 1); town clerk (Godb. 157, pl. 211; Yel. 142); a constable (Yel. 153); a deputy-clerk to an arch-deacon's register (Reignald's Case, Cro. Car. 563); and even a clerk to the Company of Merchant Tailors (Cro. Eliz. 358); and the steward of a private gentleman (Seaman v. Bigg, 3 Cro. Car. 480). Surely some of these offices are not more respectable, or of higher trust or responsibility than that of a director of a bank. In Sir Richard Greenfield's Case, March, 82, pl. 135, it is said, "that it is not material what employment he hath under the king, if he may lose his employment or trust thereby." In the case of Woodruff v. Weoley, Cart. 1, the action was for words spoken of a church-warden. A colloquium was laid of the office. Bridgman, C. J., said, "that to say he hath cheated me, are words of passion; but if applied to a man in his office, the action will lie; and so it must be adjudged." In the case of Wright v. Moorhouse, Cro. Eliz. 358, words spoken of the clerk of the Merchant Tailors were held actionable on account of the office. In the case of Strode v. Homes, Style, 338, words spoken of a church-warden were also held to be actionable on account of the office; and Rolle, C. J., said, "Officers which have no benefit by their offices have more need to be repaired, if they be scandalized in their execution of them; and here the scandal is a great loss to an honest man; and what other remedy can he have to repair himself, but by this action on the case?" The office of a director of a bank is clearly within the reason of the cases; and therefore is within the law.

The next question is, do the words import an unfitness to discharge the duties of the office? Upon this point, I presume there can be no difference of sentiment. No man will say that a liar and a swindler is a fit person to be intrusted with the office of a director of a bank. In 1 Term R. 753, it is said to be formerly held that the word "swindling" was in general use, and that the court could not say they were ignorant of it. In the same case, Ashhurst, J., held it to imply crimes for which the person might be indicted; and Buller, J., said it contained as libellous a charge as can well be imagined. In Berryman v. Wise, 4 Term R. 366, there was no question but the word was actionable when applied to an attorney in his official character; and in the argument of the present case, it seemed to be agreed that it was a word which had come into use since the statute of 30 Geo. II. c. 24, and was generally understood to imply a charge of the crimes, or some of them, mentioned in that statute. One of the principal offences mentioned in that statute, and the one to which the term "swindling" seems to be most appropriately applied, is that of "knowingly and designedly, by false pretences, obtaining from any person money, goods, &c. with intent to cheat or defraud any person of the same." This offence is substantially and accurately the common law offence of cheating, which is described in 1 Hawk. P. C. 343, to be "deceitful practices, in defrauding, or endeavoring to defraud another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty." To charge a man with swindling, seems, therefore, to be substantially to charge him with an offence for which he may be liable to a prosecution at common law. I have before observed that it is not necessary in this case to decide whether the words were actionable in themselves, in the strict signification of the phrase, but I can have no doubt of their being actionable when applied to a man either in his professional or official character. No man in the least acquainted with the world, particularly with the commercial part of it, can say that he does not know the meaning of the word. Everybody knows that it implies a high degree of moral depravity, and that its essence is fraud. No one will say that it is not totally incompatible with that strict integrity of character which ought to be the first qualification of a director of a bank, and no one will say that it does not destroy all idea of fitness for the high trust of that office.

The last question on this point is, whether it appears from the words themselves, or from the pleadings, that they were spoken in a colloquium concerning that office? To decide this question, it is only necessary to read the declaration. It states that the plaintiff was a director of the Bank of Columbia, and as such had well demeaned himself, &c., yet the defendant knowing, &c. but intending, &c. and to have the plaintiff turned out as a director, and to prevent him from having and obtaining credit at the bank, on the 1st of June, 1801, in certain discourse had concerning the plaintiff, as one of the directors of the said bank, spoke the following words: "General Forrest is a liar and a swindler, and I can prove him to be so; I, as cashier, say so of one of the directors, and I think one or the other of us ought to be turned out of the bank." From this it appears that there is not only an express colloquium laid of him as director, but it also appears clearly from the words themselves, that they were spoken of him in his official character. The fact, that the plaintiff was a director of the Bank of Columbia, is admitted by the pleadings and verdict. Upon the question whether the plaintiff shall recover his full costs, I have no doubt. The statute of Glocester is the foundation of costs in Maryland. It seems to have been in force from the first settlement of the country, and gives costs in all cases where damages are recovered. The statute of 21 Jac. c. 16, does not appear to have been at any time practised upon in Maryland; and there seems to be good reason why it has not. It was not applicable to the circumstances of this country. The intention of that statute was to prevent trifling actions of slander from being brought in the superior courts in England. It was never construed to extend to those courts whose jurisdiction was limited to actions of forty shillings value. 6 Vin. Abr. 530; Ld. Raym. 181, 182. Consequently the statute was of a local nature, and only applicable to the peculiar relative situation of the courts in England, and even there, if the action was carried up to the courts at Westminster Hall by habeas corpus or certiorari, and damages assessed under forty shillings, yet the plaintiff had his full costs. 6 Vin. Abr. 356; Ld. Raym. 395; 1 Bac. Abr. 514; 7

Mod. 129; 4 Mod. 378. The question made at the bar, whether that statute passed before or after the first emigration of inhabitants to Maryland, seems to me of little importance as to the present point. For if it passed prior to that date, still it is not law by virtue of the declaration of rights in Maryland, unless it had by experience been found applicable to their circumstances, before the year 1776. This experience could only be by practising upon it in courts of law. And if it was passed after the date of the first emigration to Maryland, it would still have no force here, unless it had been practised upon by courts of law or equity prior to the same year. So that it is not necessary to ascertain the precise time of the first emigration to Maryland. No case having been produced in which the statute of James has been practised upon in Maryland, we cannot consider it as in force here; and if it is not, there is nothing to prevent the full operation of the statute of Glocester, which gives costs in all cases where damages are recovered. The jurisdiction of this court is unlimited by the amount of the claim, or of the verdict, in actions of slander; for although the court has decided that the justices of the peace have exclusive original jurisdiction in all cases where they have cognizance, yet the justices have no cognizance of actions of slander. For these reasons, I am clearly of opinion, that the plaintiff ought to have his judgment, with full costs.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1839.

SUPERCARGO—POWER AND AUTHORITY — SALE OF CARGO—VALIDITY—USAGE OF TRADE—SALE ON CREDIT.

1. A supercargo is not bound to observe the exact terms of his instructions, if thereby the interests of the owner would be sacrificed or his objects frustrated.

2. In cases of necessity or great urgency it is only necessary, that the supercargo should act bonâ fide and with reasonable discretion, in order to bind the owner.

[Cited in Greenleaf v. Moody, 13 Allen, 367.]

3. If the owner receive the proceeds of a sale by the supercargo without objection, it is a ratification of the sale.

4. All sales but those by del credere commission are at the risk of the shipper.

5. The validity of a sale on credit depends upon the usage of trade in the place, where the sale is made, and such usage is a question of fact for a jury.

6. Where the usage of trade allows discretionary sales on cash or credit, a credit sale is at the risk of the shipper, unless some agreement can be shown restricting him to a cash sale.

7. Where a commission merchant or factor has sold goods upon credit, he is bound to exercise due discretion in enforcing payment, and not to sue or put the owner to expense, unless there is reasonable ground to believe, that he will be benefited.

[Cited in Greenleaf v. Moody, 13 Allen, 366.]

8. Where a commission merchant sells on credit to a person, who becomes insolvent, and does not give notice of that fact to the owner within a reasonable time, he is liable for all the damage the owner suffers in consequence of not receiving such notice.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by the plaintiff, a merchant of Batavia, to recover of the defendant, a merchant of Boston, $1637, the amount advanced by the plaintiff on a sale of flour made by him for the defendant on credit, the purchaser having become insolvent. It appeared in evidence, that in the year 1830, the defendant shipped in the Shylock, 1000 barrels of flour, and placed it in the keeping of Stephen H. Williams, as supercargo. The vessel sailed for Rio Janeiro, and 775 barrels of the flour were there sold. She then put into Monte Video, but the state of the market being very unfavorable, the supercargo concluded to carry the remaining portion to Batavia. He did so, and requested the plaintiff to sell it, and invest the proceeds, together with the proceeds of that sold in South America, for the benefit of the shipper. The market was glutted and the flour was somewhat damaged, but it was sold by the plaintiff to one Johannis, on a credit of six months, and the proceeds, deducting the interest, were invested in coffee, which was shipped to the defendant and by him received. No guaranty commission was charged in the account of sales, and Mr. Williams had no knowledge, that the flour was sold on a credit of six months, until after the sale was made. After the coffee had been shipped to the defendant, Johannis, to whom the flour was sold, became insolvent, and the plaintiff not being able to obtain payment from him for the flour, claimed in this action to recover of Bordman the amount of the advance.

C. P. Curtis, for plaintiff, objected, that the defendant ought not to be permitted to deny the authority of Williams, the supercargo, to make the sale at Batavia. Williams was admitted as a witness under exception by the plaintiff; he was not competent to prove such a defence as this, without a release, which had not been given him. If this point is insisted on, Williams's testimony ought to be rejected entirely. The sale by Williams at Batavia was a justifiable act. He found, that he could not dispose of the flour at Rio Janeiro, and went to Batavia, where he employed plaintiff to sell it and invest the proceeds in coffee, which the defendant received and appropriated to his own use without objection. This was a ratification by him, if any were needed. Story, Ag. 248, &c. In the next place the defendant objects to the recovery by the plaintiff, because he sold the flour on credit. The flour was consigned to the plaintiff for sale in the usual manner, without specific instructions, and it is proved by the testimony in the case, that sales on credit are usual and customary at Batavia. The flour was damaged, the sale dull, and the purchaser was in good credit when he made the purchase. Williams was in the plaintiff's counting-room almost all the time, and might have inquired about the transaction, and decided in relation to it, but he did not; he left the whole to the plaintiff's discretion, and the plaintiff was justified by the usages of the place in making the sale in the manner proved. Id. 60–220; Paley, Prin. & Ag. 212; 5 Cow. 473. But, it is alleged by the defendant, that the plaintiff, by advancing the amount of the sale and investing it in merchandise consigned to the defendant, assumed the risk of collection at maturity; and that, if this was not so, yet by his neglect to notify the failure of the purchaser to the defendant, he made the debt his own, and so ought not now to recover the amount claimed. As to the first of these averments, the plaintiff replies, that his account of sales showed, that the sale was on six months' credit, and his account current contained no charge of a guaranty commission, which would have appeared there, if the plaintiff had assumed or guarantied the sale. The charge of "discount" was the rebate of interest on the amount of the sale, for six months, at nine per cent. per annum, which is the usual rate of interest at Batavia. This was for cashing the sales. Williams testifies, that Barrell, the plaintiff's clerk, told him the sale was guarantied to him; but Barrell had no authority to make such a declaration for his employer; and the plaintiff was not bound by it; and the documents (which are in Williams's own handwriting), namely, the account sales and account current show no such thing, but negatively prove the contrary. As to the other averment of the defendant it is true, that a considerable time elapsed before the defendant had notice of the insolvency of the purchaser of his flour and of the plaintiff's reclamation on himself; and if defendant has sustained any loss through the plaintiff's neglect in this particular, he is entitled to a deduction to that extent. Story, Ag. 196; Paley, Prin. & Ag. 39. The defendant, however, received notice of the loss of the debt, and of the plaintiff's intention to call on him for reimbursement in May, 1833. He has received the plaintiff's money and has had the use of it ever since November, 1830; and if he now pays it back, he will be just where he would have been, if the plaintiff, instead of advancing the amount of the sales of flour, had waited for the maturity of Jordan Johannis's note. The evidence shows clearly, that the plaintiff has done all that he could to collect the amount, and in fact succeeded in getting something on account of it, for which he has given the defendant credit. It is said by defendant, that the plaintiff settled his account and paid over the balance, intending such payment to be final. That is the very question. We deny that such was the plaintiff's intent; his conduct shows the contrary; it shows only that he was willing to accommodate the defendant, by advancing the amount, but not that he intended to assume the ultimate responsibility of the debt, without compensation. The plaintiff is entitled to a credit for the balance of his advance with interest.

S. Hubbard and Willard Phillips, for defendant.

This claim is a surprise upon the defendant. It is the first one of the kind in the history of the East Indian trade, yet no one can doubt, that innumerable bad sales have been made by factors in the course of that trade. There are now outstanding debts for sales in India to vast amounts, which would be equally good ground of reclamation by the factors there, against American and European consignors. In order to recover, the plaintiff must show, that a sale by the factor, on credit, at the risk of the consignor, was previously authorized or subsequently ratified by the consignor. It is no violation of duty in the factor to sell on credit in any case, provided he pays over an amount, eqaul to the net proceeds, to his principal, and assumes the outstanding debt for the sales himself. This we contend the plaintiff did in this case; and this we contend is generally done, where the sales are on credit in India, and there is no express explicit understanding between the principal and factor, that the outstanding debt is at the risk of the principal. Sales are usually made on credit in all places, where commerce and civilization have made any progress; but this credit is in many places generally, and in individual cases in all places, a distinct concern between the factor and the vendee, and does not affect the consignor. The naked fact, therefore, that sales are made on credit, to a greater or less extent at any place, is no ground of presumption, that the credit is at the risk of a distant consignor. Whether it be at his risk must depend upon all the circumstances of the case, showing that the parties so understood it; for the general presumption is, that the consignor does not authorize any other than a cash sale. The burden is on the factor, to make out the authority for any other sale; whether by barter or on credit, at the consignor's risk. The naked fact of occasional or frequent sales on credit at any place does not make out such an authority, without, by testimony, carrying home to the consignors the risk of the sales, and that in so public and notorious a manner, that the consignors may be affected by a notice of the usage, that such risk of the sales reaches them. In this trade, and in all the East India trade, there is no proof of a single instance. We must look into the circumstances of this particular case, then, to find such authority, if it exists. Story, Ag. 208. The consignor is nine thousand miles off. It is his first and only transaction with the plaintiff, and indeed in India. The parties are utter strangers to each other. The business was put into the plaintiff's hands by the supercargo, with whom alone the plaintiff had any communication, direct or indirect, respecting it. No promise or intimation was held out to the plaintiff of any future business or intercourse. The vendee was an American merchant, utterly unknown to the consignor and the supercargo. The supercargo was a young man on his first voyage, and a stranger to the plaintiff.

Under the particular circumstances of this case we contend, that notice is irresistibly forced upon the plaintiff, that the consignor did not authorize or intend a sale on credit at his risk. It is shown, that the plaintiff himself supposed, that the credit was at his own risk, by his long delay to give the consignor notice of his claim, or make any demand upon him, though the communication between Boston and Batavia is easy and frequent. The case of the sale of the Jewel to the Emperor of Morocco, on credit, in which the agent was held to have given the credit at his own risk, does not by its circumstances negative an authority to sell on credit at the risk of the principal more strongly than this. The instructions to the supercargo, that he should take the proceeds of the sale of flour in South America to India, and there invest them in a return cargo, exclude any supposition, that a sale of the flour on credit in India, at the risk of the consignor, was authorized or intended, and these instructions were shown to the plaintiff. The testimony shows distinctly, that the supercargo did not authorize a sale on credit at the risk of the consignor, or at his own risk. He states distinctly, that he did not know of the sale being made, and that when the circumstance of the sale being on credit was first brought to his knowledge in the accounts at Batavia, when he was just ready to sail on his homeward voyage, he immediately, on the spot, in the plaintiff's counting-room, told the plaintiff's clerk, and only representative there, and who acted for the plaintiff in settling the accounts, the plaintiff being absent, that he, the supercargo, disclaimed for himself and his principal any sale on credit on his, or his principal's account and risk, and was told by the clerk in reply, that the credit was entirely the affair of the consignee, and the sale was guarantied. The plain meaning of which was this: "Though we have put down the term of credit in this account of sales, yet it is only for the purpose of showing you, that we make a proper discount of interest, in ascertaining the present cash value of the proceeds of your consignment, in the settlement of our accounts; this circumstance does not affect your risk or responsibility, or the risk or responsibility of your principal. The sale is in effect by the very transaction guarantied." So the supercargo understood the transaction, and so, we contend, he was fully authorized to understand it. The settlement of the account and payment of the precise balance, goes to the same conclusion. Oakley v. Crenshaw, 4 Cow. 250; Simpson v. Swan, 3 Camp. 291; Consequa v. Fanning, 3 Johns. Ch. 587.

The defendant has done nothing to ratify a sale on credit at his risk. He accepted the homeward shipment as the cash proceeds of the outward one, and as the accounts show it actually was. On the first notice of the claim, after so long a delay, he promptly repudiated the notion, that the credit was at his risk.

In the course of the trial a letter, written by the plaintiff's agent to the defendant was called for by the plaintiff, in which some facts were stated, having a bearing upon the case, of which the letter itself was not competent evidence. The defendant objected to the introduction of the letter itself, contending that, if he admitted the facts, intended to be proved by the plaintiff by the introduction of the letter, the letter could not be called for, or at least, that in case of such a letter or paper, a copy of the parts only of which the letter was evidence, could be called for. THE COURT ruled, that the plaintiff had a right to introuuce the letter, the jury being instructed not to regard the parts, which were not evidence.

STORY, Circuit Justice (summing up to the jury). The first point made at the bar is, that Williams, the supercargo, had no authority to carry the flour to Batavia and to sell it there, under the terms of his instructions. The voyage contemplated was to several ports of South America, where it was supposed, that the flour might and would be sold, and from hence the vessel was to proceed to India, for a return cargo. Certainly the instructions, in their terms, did not contemplate any other event than a sale of all the flour at some one or more of the South American ports. It turned out, however, that the flour could not all be sold at the South American ports, or at least not sold, unless at an enormous sacrifice. The parties had not looked for any such event. What then was it the duty of the supercargo to do, in such a case of unexpected occurrence, not within the contemplation of the instructions? Was he to sacrifice the flour, or throw it overboard? No one pretends, that it was intended to be brought back again to the United States under any circumstances. It would probably have been spoiled and ruined on the return voyage, and come home utterly worthless. Now, I take it to be clear, that if by some sudden emergency, or supervening necessity, or other unexpected event, it becomes impossible for the supercargo to comply with the exact terms of his instructions, or a literal compliance therewith would frustrate the objects of the owner, and amount to a total sacrifice of his interests, it becomes the duty of the supercargo, under such circumstances, to do the best he can, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to prevent a total loss to his owner; and if he acts bonâ fide, and exercises a reasonable discretion, his acts will bind the owner. He becomes, in such a case, an agent from necessity for the owner. Suppose, for example, that a cargo of a perishable nature is shipped on a voyage, and is to be carried to a particular port of destination, and there sold, and the ship should in the course of the voyage meet with a storm, which should disable her, and she should go into a port of necessity to refit; and that the cargo should be found so much damaged, that the whole must perish before her arrival at the port of destination; would not the supercargo have a right to sell it there, in order to prevent a total loss, although no such case was contemplated in his orders? Certainly he would have a right to sell; and indeed it would become his duty, under such circumstances, to sell. In truth, in all voyages of this sort, there is an implied authority to act for the interest and benefit of the owner in all cases of unforeseen necessity and emergency, created by operation and intendment of law. I shall put it to the jury to say, therefore, whether the carrying the flour to Batavia, and selling it there, was not an act of necessity to prevent a total loss to the owner. If it was, then the supercargo was justified in directing the sale.

But, in the present case, the flour was actually sold and the proceeds thereof invested in coffee, which came home in the Shylock, and was received by the owner in Boston, without objection, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, and sold on his own account. Now, I put it to the jury, whether this was not a complete ratification and confirmation of the sale. If the owner did not mean to ratify the sale, it was his duty at that time to have made his objections. He made none; and I put it to the jury to say, whether, having received the coffee, he ought now, at this distance of time, to be permitted to say, that he never meant to ratify the sale. Are his acts reconcilable with any supposition but that of an intentional ratification of the sale, even if unauthorized by necessity? Then, was the sale at Batavia a sale on credit at the risk of Forrestier, or of the defendant? We see, that no del credere or guaranty commission was in fact charged by Forrestier; and, therefore, it is not to be presumed, that the sale was at his sole risk, unless the other circumstances warrant the presumption, that it was so understood and intended between the supercargo and Forrestier.

And here the first point, which meets us, is, whether a sale on credit by Forrestier was authorized. That depends upon the usage of trade at Batavia. If it is the usage of trade there to sell for cash or upon credit, according to the discretion of the factor or commission merchant employed in the business, and the factor or merchant does sell upon credit, in the exercise of his discretion, then I take it, that the owner is bound by the sale, and the sale is at his risk, unless he can show, that there was some restriction imposed by himself, or by the supercargo, requiring a sale for cash. In every sale on credit, justified by the usage of the trade, the sale is at the risk of the owner, and not of the factor, unless the latter receives a guaranty commission, or the agreement of the parties, or the usage of the trade, makes the sale at the risk of the factor, or the risk is voluntarily taken by him. Now, in the present case, it seems to me, that the evidence clearly shows, that a sale upon credit is justified by the usage of trade at Batavia. But that I shall leave as a matter of fact for the jury to decide. The evidence seems also to establish, that sales on credit in this trade, like sales on credit in our home trade, are ordinarily at the risk of the owner. At least there is no determinate evidence, (as I understand it,) showing a contrary usage. But that I shall also leave for the consideration of the jury. Then, was any restriction imposed upon the factor in this case as to selling upon credit? No express restriction is pretended. The supercargo does not pretend to have given any. All he says is, that he directed Forrestier to sell and to hold the proceeds subject to his orders, to be invested, as he should direct. He does not pretend, that he directed the sale to be for cash only. Now, certainly, if the usage at the port was to sell for cash or credit, at the discretion of the factor, and he received orders to sell generally, he might fairly presume, that he was authorized to sell either for cash or credit, as would be most for the benefit of his employer. The flour was damaged. It might bring more upon a credit than upon a cash sale; and thus a credit sale, although the proceeds were to be invested in a return cargo, might by a discount or advance pro tanto, be more for the benefit of the owner, than a cash sale. The question, therefore, for the jury to decide is, whether Forrestier did, by a sale on credit, violate his orders, or act contrary to his duty, so as to make that sale at his own risk.

It is said, that as the supercargo was in the port at the time, Forrestier ought to have consulted him, before he sold on credit. But why should he do so, if he had no knowledge, that the supercargo wished a sale for cash, or wished to be consulted before a sale on credit? The supercargo was a very young man, utterly unacquainted with the trade; and this was his first voyage. It will be for the jury to say, under such circumstances, whether it was the duty of Forrestier to consult him before the sale on credit, or not. There is no usage of trade shown, which requires such a consultation. Then it is said, that the form and language of the account of sales show, that Forrestier took the note of Johannis to himself, and that the whole transaction was thus closed and settled. Now, this is a matter to be judged of by the jury. Does the language of the account import on its face, that the sale was at the risk of the shipper, and that he took the note to himself, advancing cash for the amount, deducting the discount for the time the credit was to run? If the language is equivocal, it is open to construction and interpretation from the known usage of merchants. Ordinarily, in the home trade of the United States, most, if not all the witnesses (as far as I recollect) say, that the like words and statements of account would not import, that the cargo was at the risk of the factor; but that it was at the risk of the owner. However, this is a point, upon which the jury must judge for themselves. Then come the statements of Mr. Barrell, the clerk of Forrestier, made to the supercargo, and to which the latter has testified. I admitted the evidence, but with some hesitation, and thought it proper to be submitted for the consideration of the jury. Now, as Forrestier was not present, unless Barrell had authority in this case, or in cases of this sort, to act and speak, and interpret for Forrestier, his declarations will not bind the latter. The first point, therefore, to be established is, whether Barrell had such authority. If the jury think he had not, then his declarations are of no importance in the cause. If Barrell had such authority, then the jury will consider all the circumstances, and decide, what credit ought to be given to those declarations compared with the other facts and circumstances of the case. If the jury are of opinion, that Barrell was authorized to speak for Forrestier in the premises, and they believe, that there is no mistake or misrecollection of the supercargo at this distance of time, (and he has certainly testified with great candor and fairness,) then it seems to me, that the evidence does show very strongly, if not conclusively, that Forrestier took the risk to himself of the sale on credit; and the present action is not maintainable. It is most unfortunate, that when the supercargo was, as he says, surprised at the sale on credit, which did not come to his knowledge until the day before he sailed on the return voyage, that he did not speak to Forrestier on the subject. If he had, the difficulty would probably have vanished; or at least, a full explanation could have been made. The supercargo seems to have acted under a strange delusion, that Barrell was a partner in the house. This was an entire mistake.

The next point in the case, (supposing the case to be otherwise with the plaintiff,) is, whether there has been any negligence on the part of Forrestier in not making a demand of Johannis at the maturity of the note, or subsequently in not collecting it from him if then unpaid. It does not appear exactly when Johannis failed. He was in good credit, when the sale was made, (in November, 1830,) and his failure must have been before September, 1831; for he then absconded, the note having become due in the preceding May. The case is left imperfect in this respect. If the note might have been paid, or secured in May, and Johannis was not then insolvent, and the money has been lost by the negligence of Forrestier in not demanding payment or getting security, then he is not entitled to recover. But if Johannis was then insolvent, and unable to pay the note, I do not know, that there was any absolute obligation on Forrestier to institute a suit against Johannis for the recovery of the amount of the note. He was bound to exercise a sound discretion in this respect; and ought not to sue, or put the owner to expense, unless he had some reasonable ground to believe, that a suit would be productive of benefit to the owner. Then was Forrestier guilty of negligence in not giving earlier notice of his claim to the defendant, and of the insolvency of Johannis? Undoubtedly the notice ought to be given within a reasonable time. And if the defendant has suffered any damage or loss by its not being given within a reasonable time, the plaintiff must bear such loss or damage, to be deducted pro tanto from his claim. The letter containing the notice was not sent until the 22d of December, 1832, and it reached Boston about May, 1833. Was there any change of circumstances of Johannis between May, 1831, and December, 1832, from which the defendant has suffered any injury or loss by the delay? The injury must decide this point upon the whole evidence.

Upon the whole, the case is submitted to the jury upon all these points; and they will apply the facts accordingly.

Verdict for plaintiff.

FORSAITH v. MERRITT et al.

[1 Lowell, 336;[1] 3 N. B. R. 48 (Quarto, 11); 2 Am. Law T. 123; 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 168.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1869.

CONVEYANCE BY INSOLVENT FIRM—DISCHARGE OF ONE MEMBER OF SUCH FIRM—STATUS AND EFFECT OF THE CONVEYANCE.

1. The assignee in bankruptcy of one partner cannot set aside a conveyance made by both partners with intent to prefer a joint creditor, the other partner not being bankrupt.

2. The payment of a joint debt does not become a voidable preference unless the debtors both become bankrupt within the time limited by the statute.

3. The assignee of one partner becomes a tenant in common with the other partner, and his equities depend on the title of his assignor.

Bill in equity by the assignee of Charles A. Church, alleging that said Church and Amos M. Farnum, both now of Boston, were copartners doing business in Chicago from December, 1867, to June, 1868; that on the fourth day of the latter month they were insolvent and dissolved their partnership, and on the same day made a conveyance of nearly all their joint personal property to the defendants, George and John Merritt, who were creditors of the firm, and had reasonable cause to believe them insolvent; that within four months afterwards the said Church was declared a bankrupt in this district, upon his own petition, and the complainant [W. J. Forsaith] has been duly appointed assignee of his estate. The bill made the former partner, Farnum, a defendant, and prayed for an account of the partnership dealings, and that the conveyance may be set aside. The defendants severally demurred to the bill.

W. A. Herrick and W. J. Forsaith, for plaintiffs.

H. A. Clapp, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. This is a case of new impression. The plaintiff who is the assignee of one partner seeks to set aside a preference given by both to a joint creditor. There is a suggestion of Mr. Justice Story that in some cases the court may require the partner who is not in bankruptcy to deliver up the joint assets. Parker. v. Muggridge [Case No. 10,743]. And Judge Ware acted on this intimation, and decreed to the assignee the possession of joint books and accounts which were in the possession of the insolvent partner, who was not a technical bankrupt. Ayer v. Brastow [Id. 682]. But I have seen no case which decides that a preference by two partners can be avoided by the assignee of only one of them. A preference is valid at common law and in equity, and is voidable only by an assignee in bankruptcy, and only when the proceedings in bankruptcy are begun within four months, or according to another construction of the statute, within six months after the act is committed; but in this case the defendant, Farnum, has not become bankrupt, and six months have elapsed, so that it is conclusively settled that there has been no joint preference. Now the assignment does not vest the joint property in the assignee of one partner, and he cannot sue for it without joining the other partner. Eckhardt v. Wilson, 8 Term R. 142. It does not dissolve an attachment of joint property theretofore made at the suit of a joint creditor. Fern v. Cushing, 4 Cush. 357. The equities of the separate assignee must be worked out through the title of his assignor. The decision of Judge Ware was founded on the equity which each partner has, to see that joint creditors are paid pro rata; but a partner has no equity to set aside his own conveyances.

I am not now dealing with the right of a separate assignee to recover the bankrupt's interest in joint property conveyed by a joint fraud, or to recover his share in a surplus. What I decide is that here was no joint fraud, because a preference is only fraudulent sub modo and on condition that the grantors become bankrupt within four or six months, and the bill clearly shows that there was no surplus.

If the facts are truly alleged in the bill the joint creditors should have taken care that both partners were adjudged bankrupt, within the time limited by the statute. As they have not taken this course, I must infer that they did not think it worth their while to interfere with what, in the absence of bankruptcy, is only the payment of a just debt.

So far as the bill seeks an account from Farnum of the partnership affairs, it is demurrable only on the ground of multifariousness and misjoinder, and may, perhaps, be amended on proper terms, by striking out all other matters after the defendants George and John Merritt have been dismissed. Demurrer sustained.

DEMURRAGE—EFFECT OF USAGE.

[A usage by which vessels, after reporting themselves to the consignee, allow two or three days for a sale of the cargo, and, if directed to another wharf, go there at their own expense, will not deprive a vessel of the right to demurrage, where her cargo was sold before arrival, and she gave immediate notice of readiness to discharge, and no objection was made, but she was detained for over a week.]

[In admiralty. Libel by David Forshay, master and owner of the schooner Eliza Jane, against F. Du Fais, for freight and demurrage.]

Benedict, Scoville & Benedict, for libelant.
Bowdoin, Barlow & Larocque, for respondent.

Before INGERSOLL, District Judge.

This was a suit brought by the master and owner of the schooner Eliza Jane, to recover the freight upon a cargo of grain brought from Norfolk to this port, and consigned to the defendant, and demurrage for delay in unloading the vessel. The freight had been paid into court by the defendant, leaving the question of the demurrage the only one before the court. Evidence was given by the libelant that the vessel arrived here on Sunday, the 12th of August last, and notice was given on Monday morning to the defendant; that the vessel lay at the wharf until Thursday, when she was ordered to another wharf, and was not finally unloaded until the Monday following; and that the vessel could have been discharged in one day. A witness was then examined for the defendant, who testified that there was a usage in the trade for vessels arriving from the South with grain to report themselves to the consignee—then to allow two or three days for the cargo to be sold, and, when directed, to go to another wharf, at the expense of the vessel, and unload there.

Judge INGERSOLL said that even if such a usage were proved, it would not alter this case, as the testimony was that this cargo had been sold before the arrival of the vessel; and that after a vessel had arrived in a proper place, and was ready to discharge, and notice was given of such readiness, and no objection made by the consignee, it would not follow, from such a usage, that where a consignee did then delay the vessel, he was not bound to pay a demurrage. A decree was accordingly rendered that the libelant recover demurrage for six days' detention, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain and compute the amount.

District Court, E. D. Michigan. 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE — JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT AND EXECUTION—PROVABLE DEBTS.

1. A creditor, who receives money and merchandise from his debtor knowing him to be insolvent, is guilty of obtaining a fraudulent preference; hence, if he refuses to surrender to the assignee the property and money so received, he cannot prove his claim, and must pay the costs of the proceedings by the assignee to compel him to relinquish his preference.

2. A debtor suffers his property to be taken on legal process when he allows it to be seized in execution on a judgment obtained against him by default.

3. When the execution creditor knew that his debtor was unable to pay his debts at maturity he was put upon inquiry at once, and must be adjudged chargeable with the knowledge he would have thus obtained, and guilty of receiving a preference with reasonable cause to believe his debtor insolvent. The claim cannot be proved until the creditor has surrendered to the assignee the advantage obtained by his judgment.

4. A note given in an individual transaction of one of the bankrupts and in no manner for the benefit of the firm, though signed in the firm name, is not provable in bankruptcy against the joint estate

On the certificates of the register, Hovey K. Clark, Esq., of issues of law and fact arising upon three several petitions of F. G. Russell, assignee, to expunge the claims of certain creditors who have proven their claims, viz.: (1) The claim of David Wilson; (2) the claim of Philip Nettre; (3) the claim of Vincent J. Scott.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. First, as to the claim of David Wilson. Section 23 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 528)] provides, among other things, as follows: "Any person who, after the approval of this act shall have accepted any preference, having reasonable cause to believe that the same was made or given by the debtor contrary to any provision of this act, shall not prove his debt or claim on account of which the preference was made or given, nor shall he receive any dividend therefrom, until he shall first have surrendered to the assignee all property, money, benefit or advantage received by him under such preference." The issue certified arises under this provision, and the questions presented are:

1. Had Wilson accepted a preference on account of the debt or claim proven by him?

2. Had he, at the time he accepted the same, reasonable cause to believe that the same was made or given by the debtors contrary to any provision of the act?

The bankruptcy proceedings were commenced October twelfth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one. Wilson's claim, as proven, is a stated account for money loaned and interest on the same, amounting to nine hundred and twelve dollars and seventy-six cents, and admitting credits for cash and merchandise received by Wilson on account at sundry times from April twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, to September twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, amounting in all to seven hundred and seven dollars and ninety-seven cents, of which amount four hundred and fifty-seven dollars and ninety-seven cents appear by the statement and also by Wilson's admission in his answer, to have been so received during the month of September next before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

The issue was submitted upon the petition and answer alone. From these it clearly appears that the debtors were insolvent during the entire month of September. It needs no argument to show that payments made by an insolvent debtor to any one or more of his creditors necessarily operates as a preference to such creditor or creditors to the extent of the payments so made, and that, therefore, Wilson, by receiving the payments which were made to him during the said month of September, in fact, accepted a preference. The first question presented must, therefore, be answered in the affirmative.

The first consideration presented by the second question is whether the preference so accepted by Wilson was made or given by the debtors contrary to any provisions of the bankrupt act. The debtors, as we have seen, were insolvent when they made the payments in question. It is now well set tled, not only by an almost unbroken current of decision in the bankruptcy courts, but by the highest judicial tribunal of the United States,—Toof v. Martin, [13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 40],—that payments so made are to be presumed to have been made with a view on the part of the debtor to give a preference. It needs no argument to show that a preference so made or given by a debtor, is contrary to the express provisions of the act contained in the first clause of section 35. See, also, section 39.

The only remaining consideration under the second question is whether Wilson, when he accepted such preference, had reasonable cause to believe that the same was so made or given by his debtors contrary to the provisions of the act. Wilson, in his answer, admits as follows: "This respondent further admits that when he received said money and merchandise as aforesaid (referring to the money and merchandise received by him on his debt during the month of September) he knew that said George Forsyth was in New York for the purpose of effecting a compromise with the creditors of said firm, and that said Forsyth & Murtha were insolvent and wholly unable to pay their debts." This admission settles the question beyond all doubt. Knowing the facts upon which, as we have seen, the illegality of the preference given him depends, he not only most unquestionably had reasonable cause to believe, but he of course actually knew that such preference was so unlawfully given by his debtors. The answer to the second question must also be in the affirmative.

Wilson not having surrendered to the assignee the property, money, benefit and advantage received by him under such preference, it results that proof of his debt or claim is absolutely prohibited by the clause of section 23, above quoted. The prayer of the petition is, therefore, granted, and Wilson's claim, so proven, must be expunged, and Wilson must pay the costs of this proceeding, to be taxed, including an attorney's fee of fifteen dollars. He appears to have been a sort of confidential clerk of the bankrupts, having the management, to a large extent, of their financial matters, and was thus enabled to take advantage of their other creditors. And having full knowledge of their condition, there is no excuse for his holding on to the advantage he has gained and presenting his claim for proof, and then insisting upon it after it was attacked, in plain violation of law. I there fore consider it but just that he should bear the burden of the costs of these proceedings instead of the estate.

Second. As to the claim of Philip Nettre. The issue certified arises under the same provision of the bankrupt act, (second clause of section 23) and the questions presented are the same as in the case of David Wilson, just disposed of by the first part of this opinion. As before stated the bankruptcy proceedings were commenced October twelfth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one. Nettre's claim, as proven, is for a balance due upon a judgment in his favor against the bankrupts obtained in the circuit court for the county of Wayne, in this state, September twenty-ninth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one. A statement of the account upon which the judgment was obtained accompanied his proof of claim and constituted a part of it, and by which a credit is admitted for money received by Nettre, October fifth, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, one hundred and ninety-one dollars and eighty-five cents. From Nettre's answer, and also from a stipulation in writing, at the hearing, it appears that this one hundred and ninety-one dollars and eighty-five cents was collected by the sheriff upon an execution issued on the aforesaid judgment. It is conceded by the stipulation that the debtors were insolvent; that the debt upon which the judgment was obtained was past due, and that the judgment was obtained by default. Here clearly was a preference of Nettre over the other creditors of the bankrupts to the amount of one hundred and ninety-one dollars and eighty-five cents. The debtors being insolvent, such preference was the necessary result of the facts stated. The first question, therefore, must be answered in the affirmative—that Nettre did accept a preference on account of the debt or claim proven by him.

The first consideration under the second question presented, whether the preference so accepted was contrary to any provision of the bankrupt act, is disposed of by a simple reference to section 39, the portions of which material in this connection are as follows: "That any persons residing and owing debts as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall," etc., "or, who, being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall * * * suffer his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors * * * shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy," etc. Here the debtors clearly suffered their property to be taken on execution, and they did so none the less because it was so taken against their will (as it is claimed in Nettre's answer) if such was the fact. A person suffers that to be done which he has the power to prevent and does not prevent. The debtors could have prevented their property being taken on Nettre's execution by going into voluntary bankruptcy, and thus placing their property where all their creditors, including Nettre, could share alike. That it was so suffered with intent to give a preference to Nettre, the debtors being, as we have seen, insolvent at the time, does not admit of discussion, since the decision of the supreme court in the case of Toof v. Martin [supra]. See, also, the remarks upon this subject in the case of Wilson's claims in the first part of this opinion.

It results, therefore, that the preference so accepted by Nettre was contrary to the provision of the act. Had Nettre reasonable cause to believe the preference was of that character? The debtors were merchants. As to them, inability to pay their debts as they became due in the ordinary course of business was insolvency, in the sense in which the term "insolvent" is used in the act in reference to debtors of that class. Toof v. Martin [supra]. The fact of insolvency is expressly conceded in the stipulation. Nettre was apprised of their inability to pay, and of course of their insolvency, by their failure to pay his debt, as to which they made no defense, and it is fair to presume they had none. This was at least sufficient to put him upon inquiry as to their solvency, and being so he must be held chargeable with the knowledge he would have thus obtained, which in this case would have been that his debtors were in fact insolvent. Nettre of course knew that his debtors suffered their property to be taken on the execution on his judgment against them, and that he thereby obtained a preference over their other creditors, which, as we have seen, the law presumes was intended by the debtors, and Nettre must therefore be held to have accepted such preference with reasonable cause to believe that the same was contrary to the provisions of the act above quoted.

A creditor may of course, if he chooses, do as Nettre did, instead of putting his debtor into bankruptcy in the first instance. In doing so, however, he takes the chances of his debtor going into bankruptcy within four months thereafter, either voluntarily or involuntarily, and thus losing the advantage obtained. In such cases, all he has to do to remove the obstacle to proving his claim in the bankruptcy, and to his standing on an equal footing with the other creditors, is simply to surrender such advantage to the assignee, as is provided in the provision of section 23, quoted in the first part of this opinion. Nettre not having so surrendered, his claim was not provable. The prayer of the petition must, therefore, be granted, and Nettre's claim must be expunged accordingly. As the unprovable character of Nettre's claim is founded largely on presumptions, I shall not impose costs in favor of either party as against the other.

Third, as to the claim of Vincent J. Scott. Scott's claim is founded on two promissory notes, both signed "Forsyth & Murtha," one for one thousand dollars, and one for five hundred and sixty dollars. The note for five hundred and sixty dollars only, is objected to. The objection is founded upon the allegation that the note was given in an individual transaction of the bankrupt George Forsyth, and in no manner for the benefit of the firm, and without Murtha's consent; all of which was well known to Scott. The note being signed with the firm name, it was prima facie a valid claim against the estate, and entitled to be paid out of the joint assets; and I think the burden was on the assignee to maintain his charges against it. This he contends he has done by the admissions contained in Scott's answer. The specific charges made by the assignee against this claim is that it "is not an indebtedness of said bankrupts to said Scott; that the note given for said sum of money * * * was signed in the firm name by said George Forsyth, without the knowledge or consent of said Murtha, and that said sum of money thus obtained from said Scott was not in any manner used in and about the business of said Forsyth & Murtha, or for firm purposes, but was obtained by said Forsyth for individual purposes solely, and was by said Forsyth delivered to his brother, James Forsyth, to enable said brother to visit Europe," etc., and charges Scott with knowledge of those facts.

Scott's answer, responsive to these charges, is as follows: "That the disputed claim of five hundred and sixty dollars was paid by him to James Forsyth, on receiving the note of the firm for that amount, to enable said James Forsyth to go to Great Britain, where he had an offer of employment, * * * and that the advance of this money by him at the request of both brothers was merely an act of friendship and to enable the said James Forsyth to accept employment, without which he could not have been enabled to accept it." The answer, it will be observed, fully sustains all the charges made by the assignee, except the one that the firm name was signed to the note by George Forsyth, without the knowledge or consent of Murtha. As to this last named charge, it does not need argument to show that the money having been advanced by Scott on the procuration of the bankrupt, George Forsyth, for a purpose which must have been known to Scott to have been entirely outside of the partnership business of Forsyth & Murtha, the burden of proof was shifted, and it was on Scott to show Murtha's consent to the giving of the note, or that George Forsyth had the right, as a member of the firm, to bind it for the payment of the money so advanced by Scott to James Forsyth, by reason of some indebtedness or obligation of the firm to the said James. The issue was submitted on the assignee's petition and Scott's answer alone, without any proofs being taken—Murtha's consent, or George Forsyth's right to sign the firm name to the note, nowhere appears. The statement thrown into Scott's answer that the money so advanced by him "was the whole consideration the said James Forsyth received for his interest in the stock of Forsyth & Co., which amounted to several thousand dollars," even if it could be considered as responsive to the charges made by the assignee, and so entitled to be taken as true without proof (which, I think, cannot be,) is of no avail. Its relevancy to the matter in controversy is not made in any manner to appear.

Upon the case submitted, therefore, it must be held that Scott's claim, so far as it is based upon the said note for five hundred dollars, was not a legal claim against the firm of Forsyth & Murtha, and therefore not provable against their joint estate in this court.

The prayer of the petition of the assignee is, therefore, granted, and the claim of Vincent J. Scott must be abated accordingly. A separate order will be signed in each case in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

Case No. 4,949.

FORSYTH v. CLAPP et al.

[6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 528; Holmes, 278; 4 O. G. 527; Merw. Pat. Inv. 448.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1873.

PATENTS—PATENTABILITY—ANTICIPATION—CONSTRUCTION OF REISSUE.

1. McBurney having formerly prepared a tube from fibrous material and India-rubber in a certain manner, and cut it into rings for stuffing boxes, Forsyth's use of similar tubes upon shafts for the rolls in a wringing-machine does not entitle him to monopolize them as his invention.

2. He may have a patent for the combination of such tube with the shaft, although united in the same way that other tubes and shafts have been before united for the same purpose, provided new results are obtained. Two old elements combined in an old manner but producing a new result, are patentable.

3. Moulton's roll for a wringer consisting of fibrous material, of which the fibers are looped about a wire wound closely about the shaft, and run out from the shaft in a radial direction, the whole imbedded in India-rubber, which is thereby attached to the shaft, is not an infringement of the Forsyth patent.

4. Although a reissued patent may have claims so broad as to cover a defendant's device, yet the court will look beyond the claims, into the body of the specification of both the original and reissued patents, and ascertain whether there is any invention to support the claim.

[Bill in equity [by James B. Forsyth against Charles M. Clapp and others] to restrain alleged infringement of reissued letters-patent [No. 5,081] for a wringer-roll, dated Oct. 1, 1872. The original patent [No. 101,994] was granted to the complainant April 19, 1870. The claim of the reissued patent was for "a rubber roll whose interior is composed of vulcanized rubber mixed with fibres, where the fibres are arranged substantially as above described;" i. e. (as stated in the specification), "so that they will extend through the rubber radially from the shaft." The principal question in the case was, whether the defendants infringed. The construction and operation of the complainant's and defendants' rolls are stated in the opinion.] [2]

William Whiting and James E. Maynadier, for complainant.

Benjamin R. Curtis and George L. Roberts, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Without at this time stating the conclusions at which the court arrived in relation to several questions presented in this case, it will be sufficient for the disposition of the cause to state the decision of the court upon the question of infringement. For a proper consideration of this question, it is necessary to consider the state of the art at the time of the alleged invention of Forsyth.

Rubber rolls for wringers were first made in the form of tubes or hollow cylinders, and expanded on to a plain shaft. Then attempts were made to secure the roll more firmly to the shaft, first by winding the shaft with wire, and afterwards with twine. An effort was made to secure a more lasting union to the shaft by forcing the tube upon a heated shaft. Next followed a mode of making the shaft itself of two or more parallel rods. The rubber rolls first made with a number of holes corresponding to the number of rods were forced on to these rods, which were then connected at their extremities. Canvas was also interposed between the shaft and the roll, and cemented to both. Various other devices appear to have been resorted to for the purpose of fastening more firmly the tube to the shaft. The purpose of all of these inventions was to make a more perfect connection of the elastic roll with the metallic shaft.

The difficulty which Forsyth thought he saw, and which he claimed had not been obviated by any of the other devices, was not so much the separation of the roll from the shaft at the lines or points of connection, as the tendency of the strain on the rolls when in use to a destruction of the body of the roll itself.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and Jabez S. Holmes, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus and opinion are from 6 Fish. Pat. Cas. 528, and the statement from Holmes, 278. Merw. Pat. Inv. 448, contains only a partial report.]

[2] [From Holmes, 278.]

His theory was, that while the connection of the shaft with the homogeneous body of the roll constricted on to the shaft was sufficient for all practical purposes in the use of a wringing-machine, the real difficulty to be overcome was, that the particles of rubber in contact with the shaft separate and tear away from the rest of the rubber composing the body of the roll. He acted upon the hypothesis that while the various connections of the roll with the shaft were sufficient to withstand the strain, a portion of the body of the roll would break away from the portion retaining its connection with the shaft by a process of disruption or rending asunder of the body of the roll itself. He commenced, thereupon, a series of experiments, the object of which was to substitute for the homogeneous rolls in use a roll with a tougher, stronger, and less elastic substance in the interior than in the exterior portion of the roll. After trying various methods to accomplish this result by the addition of fibrous or other nonelastic material to the stock of which the interior of the roll was composed, he finally constructed a roll with fibrous material arranged in the interior portion of the tubular roll in a manner which in an expression proximately descriptive he calls "radially." A sheet of cloth, with a thin layer of vulcanizable compound on each side of it, is first cut into long strips, "bias," or diagonally across the threads or fibres of the cloth. Several of these long strips are placed upon each other and pressed together until the surfaces of rubber or vulcanizable compound are cemented and permanently united. The sheet thus formed is cut into strips or bands of suitable width to admit of their being easily wound on a mandrel, or the shaft of a roll, in such a manner that the fibres of the cloth will radiate from the mandrel or shaft. As shown by the drawing accompanying his specification, it is obvious that each thread would thus extend from the interior to the exterior of the fibrous portion of the roll in a curved radial line, the threads crossing each other, and such threads being nearer together at the core or axis, and separated further from each other as the distance from the core or axis increases. The roll is then made up to the desired size by winding rubber sheets around it coated with cement, when it is placed in moulds and subjected to the vulcanizing process, the rubber in its soft and plastic state filling up all the crevices around and between the layers and incorporating the parts together. In this way it is claimed that "the tenacity of the roll and the degree of adhesion of the parts are much increased, and the position of the fibre is better adapted to resist any tendency of the roll to become loose and turn on its shaft when subjected to a strain."

Charles McBurney had invented and manufactured at the works of the Boston Belting Company a tube substantially, if not precisely, like the tube of Forsyth. No appreciable material distinction can be discovered between the modes of making the McBurney and the Forsyth tube, or in the tubes themselves when made on a mandrel. McBurney's tubes and their mode of manufacture are represented by Exhibits 10 to 14, inclusive. These tubes were made of all sizes, from three-quarters of an inch to several inches interior diameter, and from one-half inch to an inch and a half thickness of tubing, and sold in tubes to consumers. The purchasers cut them in sections or rings for stuffing boxes. Such a tube constricted on to a shaft would be Forsyth's roll. Forsyth does not describe any particular mode of connecting the tube with the shaft. He leaves that to be effected by any of the old and well-known processes in use. All that can with any show of reason be claimed for his roll is the combination of an old tube with an old shaft, in a mode which was old, to accomplish a new and useful result.

Treating it as a valid patent for this new combination of an old shaft with an old tube by old means of connection, for the purpose of considering the question of infringement in the light of the state of the art as existing when he made his roll, we now proceed to examine the construction of the Moulton roll as actually made, and relied upon as an infringing device. The Moulton roll, as manufactured by the defendants, was made by applying transversely to a sheet, or between two sheets, of vulcanized rubber, a layer or range of strands of fibrous material, and cutting this sheet into ribbons of the desired width at right angles to the length of the strands. These ribbons are folded in the centre, and a metallic wire is enclosed in the fold and wound spirally about the shaft under great torsion, from end to end between the journals, the wire being fastened to the shaft at each extremity. A cylinder or sleeve of rubber is applied over the surface, and the whole is subjected to a vulcanizing process until the whole mass of the roll is thoroughly compacted together. The wire is so tightly wound under pressure, that it, in fact, becomes a part of the shaft. The fibrous threads are, in fact, loops which pass into one orifice and out of another in the metallic shaft, their ends extending strictly radially into the body of the roll.

There is a radical and obvious difference in the function of the fibres in the two rolls. Their similarity consists in the fact, that the fibres in one are arranged in curved, radial, diverging lines, extending in a direction towards the periphery of the roll, and in the other in radial lines extending in the same direction. In both of them the effect of the fibres is more or less to diminish the elasticity of the interior portion of the resilient roll; but in the Moulton roll, as made by the defendants, not to any material, or to a scarcely appreciable, extent. Their difference consists in the function which they perform. The inner ends of the fibres in the Forsyth tube touch or nearly touch the shaft. They do not fasten the rubber compound to the shaft, or aid in fastening it. The ends of the fibres themselves are not fastened to the shaft except so far as they are cemented by the vulcanizable material. The vulcanizable material holds the ends of the fibres up to the shaft, instead of the fibres performing that function for the vulcanizable compound. The inner ends of the fibres in the Forsyth roll were attached to the rigid portion of the roll resting upon the shaft, and the outer ends extended from this rigid portion towards the circumference of the roll, thus tending to secure that "adhesion of the parts" of the roll to each other, at which he aimed, as well as to limit the mobility of the rubber into which they extend. If McBurney's tube, or Forsyth's, be constricted upon a shaft which is too small, or insufficiently cemented, or connected to the shaft by any of the then existing modes of connection in an imperfect manner, so that the shaft turns in the tube, that result would not be owing to the fact that the fibres of Forsyth failed to perform perfectly their function of confining the rigid portion of the roll to the more elastic portion of it, and of limiting the mobility of the rubber in which they are buried. So when the roll is subjected to strain by the passage of the sliver of cloth between the rolls of a wringer, causing the outer surface to be compressed in one place, and expanded in others, the fibres in the inner portion of the Forsyth roll do undoubtedly tend to prevent the body of the roll from being separated from the shaft; but they do not effect this result by reason of their attachment to the shaft preserving the connection between the shaft and the rubber, but by reason of their acting at the same time to preserve the form of the inner and more rigid portion of the tube, and keep up the adhesion of such parts with the outer portions where the mobility and resiliency is greater. But perfectly as the fibres may perform this function, a tube imperfectly cemented to the shaft may still, for that reason alone, turn on the shaft in the Forsyth roll. Now, the loops or bows in the Moulton fibres enter the shaft, and the ends of the fibres extend like "staples" (which they resemble in form) into the body of the roll, for the purpose of securing the interior of the resilient body to the shaft. The fibrous loop is to be taken as a whole. The parts of the fibres which extend from the interior towards the exterior of the rubber roll would not operate to confine the rubber to the shaft without the loops. By none of the methods in use at the date of Forsyth's patent, of making the connection between the shaft and the rubber, was the connection made any more tenacious by presenting the ends of the fibre to the surface of the shaft. In some of them the presence of the ends of the fibres lessened the adhesion by as much as it displaced the rubber. The principal function of the fibres in the Forsyth tube, as before stated, is to make the inner portion of the tube more rigid, and to tie the more rigid to the more elastic portion of the tube. Now, in the Moulton roll, as manufactured by the defendants, the principal function of the fibrous loops is to tie the rubber to the shaft, and they do not create any material rigidity in the interior portion of the tube. The method of fastening in the Moulton roll is an inseparable part of the roll itself, being necessarily constructed and built up with the roll, and constituting the inner portion of the roll. It is not adaptable to Forsyth's tube, nor is Forsyth's tube capable of having Moulton's fastening applied to it. Because Forsyth borrowed from McBurney his method of constructing the interior of a tube with fibres of cloth arranged in radial curves, it would be the height of injustice to allow him to monopolize any use of fibres for any purpose whatever in a wringer-roll, if the ends of the fibres extended in a radial direction into the body of the roll. His reissued patent, examined in the light of the invention described in the original patent, if valid, must be limited to such a mode of introducing the fibres of a woven texture radially into the tube for the purposes indicated, without regard to the mode of fastening to the shaft.

The court will look beyond the mere form of words in the claim of a reissued patent into the specifications, in both the original and reissued patent; and even if on the face of the reissued patent it does not embrace any thing not described or suggested in the original, nevertheless, the court will ascertain whether there is any substantive invention adequate to support a claim ingeniously worded, not so much for the purpose of describing what the patentee really invented, as of grasping within its terms, some contrivance not within the knowledge or contemplation of the patentee, and for that reason, not by reason of inadvertence or mistake, not embraced in the claims of the original patent.

Comparing the two rolls, as we have done in some more essential particulars, and without recapitulating other points of difference, enough has already been stated to show, that, so radically different is the structure of the rolls, and the function of the fibrous material, and its mode of operation, that the Moulton roll, as manufactured by the defendants, is clearly no infringement upon any thing secured to Forsyth by his reissued patent, even giving to the invention claimed in that patent the fullest scope claimed for it in the evidence of Forsyth himself, and the expert testimony introduced by him. Bill dismissed.

Case No. 4,950.

FORSYTH et al. v. SMALE et al.

[7 Biss. 201;[1] 8 Chi. Leg. News, 322; 7 Reporter, 262.]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May, 1876.

BOUNDARY OF LAND BORDERING ON STREAM — NON-NAVIGABLE LAKE—LINE AS MEASURED ON STREAM.

1. The law upon the subject of land bordering upon streams, is that the navigable streams are to remain navigable; that the land covered by the water is not to be sold. The acts of congress require that these streams shall always remain navigable as public highways; and in relation to streams not navigable, the law has always been that the purchaser takes the land to the center of the stream.

2. A non-navigable lake is governed by the same principles.

[Cited in Indiana v. Milk, 11 Fed. 395.]

3. Where land is purchased bordering upon a non-navigable stream, and the line is meandered upon the stream for the purpose of quantity, and the stream is intended as the boundary of the land, the grant includes any land between the meandered line and the water.

Ejectment [by Caroline M. Forsyth and Jacob Forsyth against John Smale and others] for land in what is called Lake George, in Lake county, Indiana. Demurrer to complaint.

Baker, Hord & Hendricks, for plaintiffs.

Harrison, Hines & Miller and McDaid & Knight, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. Lake George, according to the complaint, is a body of water about two miles long, north and south, and about three-quarters of a mile wide, east and west; its depth is not stated. It is called a non-navigable lake, and it is said that for many years after the survey was made by the United States, in 1835, the lake had no outlet. The plaintiffs are owners of the title from the government of two tracts of land on the east side of the lake, called lots No. 3 and 4, being parts of fractional section 18, in township 37 north, range 9 west, the western boundary of section 18 being most of it in the lake, certainly that part of it immediately west of lots 3 and 4.

Proceeding south on the shore line of the lake, the plaintiffs are owners of parts of section 19, which extend to the southern boundary of the lake; they are also the owners of parts of sections 24 and 13, extending around the lake by its south boundary, and north on its western boundary, so as to include the land immediately opposite lots 3 and 4. The plaintiffs are thus the owners as alleged, of all the land bordering the lake east and west, as well as south, that is to say, south of a line produced west on the northern boundary of lot 3, so as to cross the lake, and it would include all south of that, and on both sides of the lake, as the property of the plaintiffs. The complaint admits that when the survey was made, the lines were run, not upon the water's edge of lots 3 and 4, but they were run in the usual way for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity of land and from point to point near the boundary of the lake,

The complaint alleges that the defendants claim that the boundaries did not include whatever land was left west of lots 3 and 4, between the meandered line and the lake. It is insisted, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that this meandered line was run simply for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity of land, and not to exclude from that quantity the land between the meandered line and the lake.

The complaint produces and makes part of the pleading two plats, copies of the government survey, according to which it appears that the western boundary of lots 3 and 4 was the lake. There is no land shown on the west between the meandered line and the lake, but the lines are run from the eastern boundary of section 18, and of lots 3 and 4 to the lake, and it is admitted, extending the lines thus surveyed and as marked in rods they would not reach the lake; but this is not shown upon the surveys produced in evidence; on the contrary, as before stated the western line of lots 3 and 4 appears to be the lake. There is no gore or tongue of land represented on lot 3 according to this survey, but the water line is represented to be the ordinary varying line of the lake. The complaint alleges that there is a gore or strip of land extending from lot 3 in a south westerly direction into the lake, and it is in relation to that gore or strip of land that this controversy arises.

Defendants are in possession of that land, and the plaintiffs claim it for the reason as they allege, that whatever land is there is a part of lot 3; at any rate so far as the northern line of lot 3, when produced west, would describe the boundary of that gore or strip of land. The complaint says nothing about the condition of the lake at the time of the survey, whether it is the same now or at the time the suit was brought, as it was at the time of the survey. Whether any changes have taken place in the condition of things does not appear.

The first question to be determined is, whether the boundaries of lots 3 and 4 did extend to the lake, or whether, on the other hand, they did not include more or less of land which might be left between the meandered line and the lake, and, I think, upon the face of the pleadings as they stand when connected with the maps, we must assume that the boundaries extended to the lake.

It seems to me that the principles which are decided by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Railroad Co. v. Schurmeir, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 272, must to a great extent control this case. That was a case where there was a tract of land surveyed on the Mississippi river; a meandered line was run, outside of which was the tract of land in controversy in the case, which was claimed by the railway company, by virtue of a grant from the government to the state of Minnesota, but which was also claimed by the party who had entered the land bounded by the river. That line was run just as this was, with a meandered line upon the river, and the party purchased the land of the government as so much land, and took his patent for it, and the question was, whether the patent included the land outside of the meandered line, and which was sometimes covered with water and sometimes bare. The supreme court held that the patentee had the better right to the land because his patent covered the land in controversy. The meandered lines were run for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity of land, but the intention of the government was to leave the river as the boundary of the land, and the court says (Railroad Co. v. Schurmeir, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 286-289):

"Meander lines are run in surveying fractional portions of the public lands bordering upon navigable rivers, not as boundaries of the tract, but for the purpose of defining the sinuosities of the banks of the stream, and as the means of ascertaining the quantity of the land in the fraction subject to sale, and which is to be paid for by the purchaser.

"In preparing the official plat from the field notes, the meander line is represented as the border line of the stream, and shows, to a demonstration, that the water course, and not the meander line, as actually run on the land, is the boundary.

"Proprietors, bordering on streams not navigable, unless restricted by the terms of the grant, hold to the center of the stream; but the better opinion is, that proprietors of lands bordering upon navigable rivers, under titles derived from the United States, hold only to the stream, as the express provision is, that all such rivers shall be deemed to be, and remain public highways. * * * * *

"Rivers were not regarded as navigable in the common law sense, unless the waters were affected by the ebb and flow of the tide, but it is quite clear that congress did not employ the words 'navigable,' and 'not navigable,' in that sense, as usually understood in legal decisions. On the contrary, it is obvious that the words were employed without respect to the ebb and flow of the tide, as they were applied to territory situated far above tide waters, and in which there were no salt water streams. Viewed in the light of these considerations, the court does not hesitate to decide, that congress, in making a distinction between streams navigable and those not navigable, intended to provide that the common law rules of riparian ownership should apply to lands bordering on the latter, but that the title to lands bordering on navigable streams should stop at the stream, and that all such streams should be deemed to be, and remain public highways."

Now these principles are strictly applicable to this case, and in accordance with the facts of this case. The only difference is, the court was there speaking of a navigable river, in this case it appears that the lake, so far as we know anything about it, is non-navigable. But why should that, by any possibility, exclude the plaintiffs from the operation of the principle? One would think that, so far from having that effect, it might be brought within the rule of law in relation to non-navigable streams. The law upon the subject of the survey of land bordering upon navigable and upon non-navigable streams is, that the navigable streams are to remain navigable; that the land covered by the water is not to be sold. The acts of congress require that these streams shall always remain navigable as public highways; and in relation to streams not navigable, the law has always been that the purchaser takes the land to the center of the stream, as is stated by the supreme court in the case of Railway Co. v. Schurmeir, supra. So that, as to navigable streams, the purchaser takes the land only to the border of the stream, with the right, of course, to make improvements upon the stream, as wharves, just as can be done in water courses where the tide ebbs and flows. This is the case of a non-navigable lake, not of a stream, and the question is, whether that changes the principles of the case as stated. So far as we can judge from the statement made in the pleadings, it seems to me that it cannot. In the argument of this case a great many facts have been stated of which the court can take no judicial notice. For example, it is stated that the government, in many cases of these non-navigable lakes, has regarded the land covered by the water as still belonging to the government, and has had it surveyed, and has sold it. Some cases in Missouri are referred to and another on the Calumet river, in Illinois and Indiana. We do not undertake to lay down any absolute rule upon the subject. We do not say but that circumstances might change the principle applicable to such a case as this, but if it be true, as we have the right to assume upon the pleadings that it may be, or is, that the physical condition of this lake has not substantially changed between the time of the survey and the time when this suit was commenced, then it seems clear that the plaintiffs, in obtaining the title to lots 3 and 4 would have the right to include within the boundary of their land, as that which was sold by the government, all of the extension into the lake.

Whether or not this was the effect of a gradual accretion upon the land, or of some sudden cause, all we can judge from is the facts as they appear from the pleadings. As this lake is only three-quarters of a mile wide, it may be doubtful whether the same rule ought to be applicable to this case as to a larger lake, which, owing to the cultivation of the country or other cause, might dry up gradually or suddenly. For example; the plaintiffs being the owners of all the land on the east and west and southern boundaries of this lake, suppose that there is a gradual withdrawal of the lake, and the bed of the lake bordering upon the plaintiff's land should become dry land, what is to prevent the principle of accretion from operating in such a case as this, where the lake is only three-quarters of a mile wide? Ought there to be any difference in this case from that of a non-navigable stream, so called? Is not this within the spirit of the acts of congress? Whether that would be true of a large body of water where the water gradually or suddenly retired, it is not necessary to decide. It might be supposed in such case that the government did not intend to convey the land covered by the water, but that perhaps is not necessary to be decided in this case. Neither do I feel inclined to decide absolutely as to the rights of the parties in this case.

It may be that if the facts were all known to us, if the changes which had occurred since the time of the survey and the sale, and the time when this suit was brought were known, we might take a different view of the case. But as far as we can at present see, there seems to be no reason for taking this case out of the general rule, where land is purchased bordering upon a non-navigable stream, and where the line is meandered upon the stream for the purpose of quantity, and the stream is intended as the boundary of the land. The uniform rule as to the description of lands in deeds is that the great natural object is to govern, and courses and distances are to yield to the object. The great natural object here was the lake or the water, and the plat shows that the western line of lots 3 and 4 was intended to be the water, and we conclude that the government did not intend to exclude from the operation of the grant which was made to the purchaser, any land between the meandered line and the water, so without actually deciding what may be the ultimate rights of the parties, we must hold that the demurrer is not well taken, and must be overruled. Ordered accordingly.

FORSYTHE v. BALLANCE.

[6 McLean, 562.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July Term, 1855.

GRANT—CONSIDERATION—GRATUITY — DECEASE OF SETTLER — PATENT TO LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES —SALE FOR PAYMENT OF DEBTS — REGULARITY OF THE PROCEEDING.

1. A grant made by congress to certain settlers in the village of Peoria, whose buildings had been destroyed by a company of militia, in the service of the United States, cannot be considered as a gratuity.

2. The grant, when made, referred back to the consideration and fully recognized it.

3. The individual who made the settlement, and whose property was destroyed, died before the grant was made. The property descended to his heirs, and when the patent was issued, it was properly made to the legal representatives of the deceased.

4. Under the laws of Illinois, where the administrator finds it necessary to sell the real estate of a deceased person for the payment of his debts, he may make the heirs, if not residents of the state, or of the United States, parties to the proceeding by publication under the order of the court.

5. When this proceeding is offered collaterally, it cannot be objected to, the jurisdiction being undisputed.

6. The heirs being content, a stranger cannot object to the irregularity of the proceeding.

At law.

Mr. Williams, for plaintiff.

Mr. Browning, for defendant.

Before McLEAN, Circuit Justice, and DRUMMOND, District Judge.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This is an ejectment to recover the possession of a certain lot of land in the town of Peoria, of which the defendant is in possession, under a title adverse to that under which the plaintiff claims. The plaintiff claims under Lecroix, who was an early settler in Peoria, and who claimed under the acts of congress of 1820 and 1823. The first was entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of the village of Peoria," passed the 15th day of May, 1820 [3 Stat. 605]. The 1st section provides, "that every person, or the legal representatives of every person, who claims a lot or lots in the village of Peoria, shall, before the first day of October, deliver to the register of the land office at Edwardsville, a notice in writing of his or her claim, and the register is to make report to the secretary of the treasury of the evidence in support of the claim, and his opinion whether it ought to be confirmed." The register reported, among others, that Michael Lecroix claims a lot in the village of Peoria, eighty feet by three hundred in depth. And it appears from the facts in the report, that Lecroix purchased it and three other lots in 1808 or 9, very soon after which he built on the above lot a large two story dwelling house, a large store house, and other out buildings,

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

&c., and that he continued to occupy the same until the year 1812, when the village of Peoria was destroyed by Capt. Craig, who commanded a company of Illinois militia, in the service of the United States, because his company was fired upon at night, whilst at anchor in their boats in the lake opposite the town, by Indians, who were supposed to be friendly with the inhabitants.

On the 3rd of March, 1823, congress passed "an act to confirm certain claims to lots in the village of Peoria, in the state of Illinois" [3 Stat. 787]. The first section declared, "That there is hereby granted, to each of the French and Canadian inhabitants and other settlers in the village of Peoria, in the state of Illinois, whose claims are contained in a report made by the register of the land office at Edwardsville, in pursuance of the act of congress, approved May the fifteenth, 1820, and who had settled a lot in the village aforesaid, prior to the 1st day of January, 1813, and who have not heretofore received a confirmation of claims, or donation of any tract of land or village lot * * * so settled upon and improved, where the same shall not exceed two acres, * * * shall be confirmed." A survey of the lot in question was made by the United States in 1840, and a patent was issued to the legal representatives of Lecroix. The patent recited the report of the register, that "Michael Lecroix is the inhabitant or settler within the purview of the confirmatory act of congress, 3d March, 1823, &c., and that it has appeared to the satisfaction of said register and receiver, that the said inhabitant or settler, did not, prior to the said act, receive in confirmation of claims or donations of any tract of land or village lot from the United States, and that the legal representatives of the said Lecroix, in virtue of the confirmation act aforesaid," are entitled, &c. In March, 1848, the administrator of Lecroix filed his petition to have the lot sold for the payment of debts. Lecroix, having made a will, distributed his property between his wife and children, illegitimate, but recognized by him. He died in 1821. The court of probate, to whom the petition was presented, ordered publication, as required by the statute, as notice to the absent heirs who lived beyond the state of Illinois, some or all of them living in Canada. These heirs were made defendants in the petition, as well as the legatees of the deceased. After the requisite notice was given and the necessary proceedings had, the court directed a sale of the premises in pursuance of the statute, and a purchase was made by the administrator or executor of Lecroix, who afterwards sold to the plaintiff.

The right asserted by the defendant, originated before the patent, under which the plaintiff claims, was issued; and it is insisted that the title was a gratuity, and that until the patent was issued, no right vested in the representatives of Lecroix. That in this view the title of the defendant is paramount to that of the plaintiff. In no correct sense, can this lot be considered as a gratuity to Lecroix. It is true that the early settlers at Peoria had no right to the lots they occupied. They were the pioneers in that part of the country, and encountered privations and dangers incident to such a settlement. The country became involved in a war with England, and a consequent war with the Indians on our frontier. During this contest a Captain Craig, who commanded a company of militia, in the service of the United States, being fired on by some Indians from or near the village of Peoria, on the supposition that the people of the village were friendly to those Indians, in revenge destroyed the village. This was a great outrage, and was so considered by the government, and it was bound to remunerate the sufferers. It was done, to a limited extent, by giving to them the lots which they had occupied. The act of 1820 was passed for the relief of the inhabitants of Peoria. This was a recognition of the obligation by the government, but of a more limited extent than the merits of the inhabitants required, or was suited to the dignity or justice of the government. The report was made under the act of 1820, designating the extent of the claim of Lecroix. It seems he had constructed a large dwelling house, a large store house, and other buildings, on the lots awarded to him, and this was confirmed by the act of 1823, which granted the lots stated in the report to the former proprietors. This grant recognized the consideration of the former settlements and improvements, which had been burnt by the troops under the United States. The title related back, and took effect from the settlements made. To call this a gratuity would be to apply the term unjustly, as it supposes the thing to have been done without consideration, and would exclude the remuneration which was declared and intended by the government. Lecroix died before the act of 1823, but the proof of his loss was made, and the proceedings for his remuneration were not only commenced, but nearly completed. His claim was recognized by the government, and its final confirmation can not be separated from the basis on which it rests. It was property, property which, on the death of Lecroix, descended to his heirs. This was fully recognized by the government, by the issue of the patent to his legal representatives. This was not only a pre-emptive right, which is the right of purchase, but it was an absolute right to the property,—a right sanctioned by legislative grant, which is the highest evidence of title. This lot was sold as the property of the heirs of Lecroix, for the payment of his debts. The heirs, under the statute, were made parties to the suit. The proceedings are not alleged to be void for want of jurisdiction, or any other ground.

No fraud is charged. No person but the heirs can now object to the sale, and there is nothing in this case which shows that they are not content. The purchase was made under a judicial sale, and there is no presumption that it was not fairly made.

Can a stranger to this title object to the regularity of the sale? I think not. Under the laws of the state, the title of the heirs was transferred by the sale and the deed made under it. That sale was sanctioned, and the deed made, under the direction and special sanction of a court having jurisdiction of the case. The courts of the United States follow the decisions of the state courts in construing its statutes. The defendant, a stranger to this title, which is paramount to the one under which he claims, objects to the judicial proceedings under which the plaintiff claims, when they are offered in evidence collaterally. This cannot be done where the jurisdiction of the court is unquestionable. In Grignon v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319, in a case where there was a sale of property by an administrator for the payment of the debts of a deceased person, the court say, "The power to hear and determine the case is jurisdiction; it is coram judice, whenever a case is presented which brings the power into action. If the petitioner presents such a case, as, on demurrer, the court would render a judgment in his favor, it is an undoubted case of jurisdiction." And, "if the law confers the power to render a judgment or decree, the court has jurisdiction; what shall be adjudged or decreed between the parties, and with which is the right of the case, is judicial action by hearing and determining it." A case so adjudged, however, erroneously, when the judgment is given in evidence, must be considered as conclusive of the matters determined. I think the legal title is in the plaintiff.

DRUMMOND, District Judge, considered the grant to the legal representatives of Lecroix as a gratuity, which could not be reached by the creditors of the deceased.

FORT v. UNION PAC. R. CO.

[2 Dill. 259;[1] 11 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 101.]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. Nov. 10, 1871.[2]

NEGLIGENCE — LIABILITY OF MASTER TO SERVANT FOR ACTS OF FELLOW-SERVANT—DAMAGES.

1. A railroad company is liable for the negligent act of a foreman having charge of dangerous machinery, who, in the course and within the scope of his duties, orders an infant employé under him upon a service hazardous to life or limb, and which was not within the scope of the ordinary or proper duties of the servant thus commanded to perform it; in such a case the rule which exempts the employer from liability to one servant for the negligence of a fellow-servant in the same common service, has no just application.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Damages down to and even beyond the day of trial may, in proper cases, be given.

Action by the plaintiff [Jesse L. Fort] for an injury to his minor son when in the employment of the defendant. The allegations of the petition in respect to the manner in which the injury was caused are as follows: "Plaintiff further says that on or about October 1st, A. D. 1867, plaintiff's minor son, James H. Fort, then aged about sixteen years, was hired and employed by defendant to work in defendant's machine shop in the city of Omaha; that a portion of said shop and the machinery therein was under the superintendence and control of one Collett, agent and servant of said defendant; that said Collett, being grossly negligent and careless in so doing, did order and direct (being thereto duly authorized by defendant, and said minor as such employé being under him as such superintendent) said minor to ascend to a great height, to-wit—twenty feet from the floor of said shop, and among rapidly revolving and dangerous machinery, for the purpose of adjusting a certain belt by which a portion of said machinery was moved; that said undertaking was a hazardous one even for an adult to perform; that said minor undertook to perform said order, but in attempting so to do was caught by the right arm by said belt, said belt being caught by a certain key which was improperly projecting from the shafting near which he was so directed to go, and said arm torn from his body; that said minor was guilty of no negligence or carelessness in attempting to discharge said order, but that he was compelled to obey all orders and directions of said Collett pertaining to his said employment."

The answer puts in issue the substance of these allegations in regard to negligence.

After the evidence was produced, the jury were charged as follows by the circuit judge:

"1. This action is brought by plaintiff to recover damages for an injury to his minor son, resulting in the loss of an arm while in the employ of the defendant. That the plaintiff's son was employed by the defendant, and by an accident his arm was torn off by machinery in the car shop of the defendant, are facts which are admitted. Evidence has been offered tending to show that the defendant, in its works at this city (Omaha) had a car department, of which Mr. Gamble was the superintendent; that under him, and having immediate control of the shop, was a foreman, Mr. Ballou; that under the foreman there were various sets, or, as a witness called them, 'gangs,' of men, under the immediate direction and control of some employé or 'boss;' that, among those having control of a set or gang of men working in the shop was a Mr. Collett (named in the petition); that Collett's duty was to run and superintend the running of a certain machine, or certain machinery, in the shop; that, from the time the plaintiff's son was employed he had been working under Collett, obeying his orders and directions; that the chief employment of the son had been at a moulding machine, receiving and putting away mouldings as they came from the machine. After the son had been thus engaged for some months, the evidence tends to show that, on the day the accident in question happened, a belt or band connected with a shaft, some fourteen or sixteen feet high, was off the drum, or pulley, and needed lacing. It does not very clearly appear, perhaps, whether the belt thus out of order belonged to the moulding machine or some other machine near by; but there is evidence tending to show that it was within the scope of Collett's duty to see that it was repaired. The plaintiff has given evidence, which has not on this point been opposed by any evidence produced by the defendant, that at the time of the accident, Collett, wishing to lace the band at the end near the floor, ordered the plaintiff's son, about sixteen years of age, to ascend a ladder resting on the shaft at the upper end, which shaft was in motion at the rate of one hundred and seventy-five or two hundred revolutions per minute, and hold or keep the band or belt away from the shaft, while he (Collett) laced or sewed it together at or near the floor; and the right arm of plaintiff's son, while thus engaged, pursuant to the orders of Collett, was caught, or in some way became entangled, in the belt, or drawn between it and the shaft, and was instantly crushed to pieces and torn from his body. The plaintiff has offered evidence tending to show that he hired his son to the defendant to work in the car shop, making the contract with Mr. Gamble, the superintendent; that at the time Mr. Gamble went with the son into the shop, and directed him, in Mr. Collett's presence, to help Collett, or work under him, and obey his orders. Upon the evidence, I do not understand it to be claimed by the plaintiff that the accident was caused by the defect in the key (the only defect alleged in the pleadings as to the machinery), and on the trial no question has been made as to Collett's general skill, fitness, and capacity for the performance of the functions or duties assigned to him; and the specific ground on which the recovery is claimed is that Collett, in ordering the plaintiff's son to ascend the ladder and perform the service before mentioned, considering the age of the boy and the nature of the service required of him (which is claimed by the plaintiff to have been dangerous to life and limb), was guilty of a wrongful or negligent act, which resulted in the injury for which this action is brought.

"2. There is no statute in the state of Nebraska relating to the liability of masters to servants, and the rules regulating such liability must be found in the general principles of the law as declared by tl. courts. One of these principles, too often decided by all the English, and most of the American, courts, to be now denied, is, that a master is not liable to his servant or employé for the negligence of a fellow-servant while engaged in the same common employment or service, unless he has been negligent in the selection of the servant in fault, which is an element, as before observed, not in this case. And this doctrine has been extended by the English, and by many of the state courts in this country, to all persons serving the same master in the same employment, whether equal, inferior, or superior in grade, to the servant injured, and the fact that the injured servant was under the control of the servant by whose negligence the injury was caused, has been considered to make no difference in the application of the rule. Although the rule, particularly this extension of it, so as to exempt a master for the negligence of a servant within the scope of his employment, who has the control of another servant, for an injury to the latter, caused by his obeying the orders of his superior, has met with much, and perhaps, just and reasonable opposition; yet, it has been so often and so generally decided, that it is doubtful how far a court, whatever may be its own convictions, is at liberty to disregard it. But I do feel free to refuse to extend the rule to cases to which the reason on which it rests does not apply. The reason of the doctrine is, that a servant or employé, in making his contract, must be presumed to take into account all the ordinary risks of the business on which he proposes to enter, and obtains a compensation which, upon the average, covers these risks, amongst which are included negligence of fellow-servants in the same common employment, but he is not presumed to take into account a risk not included in his employment, and which, therefore, he has no reason to anticipate. In deciding this case, you should determine the nature of the employment on which the plaintiff engaged that his son should serve. If you find that his contract of service, or the duties which he engaged to perform were such that it was within the contract, or within the scope of those duties, that the son should assist in the repair of the machinery in question, and that the son, when injured, was in the discharge of a duty or service covered by the contract of employment, then the company is not liable for the negligence of Collett (if he was negligent), with respect to ordering the son to ascend the ladder and hold the belt away from the shaft. But I draw this distinction: If the work which the son was ordered by Collett to do was not within the contract of service, —was not one of the duties which fell within the contract of employment, but was outside of it, then Collett, in ordering the service in question (if he was in scope and course of his duties and power at the time), must, as to this act, be taken to represent the company (which is presumed to be constructively present), and if that act was wrongful and negligent, as hereinafter defined, the company, his employer, would be liable for the damages caused by such negligent and wrongful act; and the principle before adverted to, that the master is not liable for the neglect of a co-employé in the same service has, in my judgment, no application, or no just application, to such a case; for in such a case they are not, in any proper sense, 'fellow-servants' in the same common service.

"3. This action is based essentially upon the alleged negligence of Collett, and the negligence imputed consists in the nature of the order which he gave the plaintiff's son. If, under the foregoing instructions, you find that the company is liable in respect to the act of Collett in ordering the boy up the shaft, you will then have to inquire whether that act was wrongful and negligent. Now, gentlemen, that depends upon the circumstances of the case, which you should attentively consider. An employer is not an insurer of the lives and limbs of his men, but he does impliedly engage that he will not expose them to unnecessary, unusual, and unreasonable risks to life, or serious bodily injury. Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable, prudent man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do, under all the circumstances surrounding and characterizing the particular case; and in this case it is the duty of the jury to consider the age, and experience, and extent of judgment of the boy, and the nature of the service demanded of him, in respect to its being hazardous to life or limb, or otherwise. If a reasonable and ordinarily prudent man would not have ordered a boy of his age, under the circumstances, upon such a service, because it was dangerous, then it was a negligent and wrongful act; but if it could not, by a man of reasonable prudence and sagacity, have been foreseen that the service demanded was perilous to the life or limb of the boy, the company is not liable, although the act required of the boy was one not falling within the scope of his employment.

"4. This is an action by the father for loss of service of the son, and under the pleadings he can only recover pecuniary damages, which include actual or necessary expenditures for supplies for the son during his recovery, the value of his and his family's necessary attention to the son, and the value of the loss of the services of the son from the date of the accident down to the time of trial."

The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,264.92, if the damages be computed only to the date when suit was brought, March 10, 1870, but in the sum of $3,056.58, if damages be computed to the time of trial, November 10, 1871. The jury also made the following special finding in regard to the nature of the employment of Collett and of the plaintiff's son, and the cause of the injury, to-wit: "We find that the car department of the defendant was under the management of a general superintendent, who employed and dismissed the hands; that the shop, as to practical operations therein conducted, was under a foreman; that the employés were divided, according to their work, into sets, with an under or immediate foreman; that one of these under-foremen was Mr. Collett, named in the petition, under whom plaintiff's son was to and did serve, as a workman or helper, and whose orders he was to and did obey; that Collett had charge of running and superintending certain machinery in the shop. We find that the plaintiff's son was injured in executing or carrying out an order of Collett, as described in the petition; that this order related to a matter within the scope of Collett's duty and employment. We find that the order to the plaintiff's son (in carrying out which he lost his arm) was one which was not within the scope of the son's duty and employment. We find that it was not a reasonable order, and that its execution was attended with a hazard to life or limb, and that a prudent man would not have ordered the boy to execute it."

A motion was made by the defendant for a new trial, which was denied for the reasons stated in the opinion of the court.

Redick & Briggs, for plaintiff.

A. J. Poppleton and E. Wakeley, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. 1. In support of the motion for a new trial, it is urged by the defendant's counsel that the court erred in that portion of the second division, its charge to the jury commencing with, "But I draw this distinction," and ending with the words, "for, in such a case, they are not, in any proper sense, 'fellow servants' in the same common service." I fully appreciate the difficulties that surround the question here presented, and I do not feel certain that this particular case can be discriminated from those in which it is held that the common employer of two servants is not liable to one for the act or negligence of the other in the course of the common employment.

Considering, however, the peculiarities of the case,—the tender age and inexperience of the servant injured, the specially hazardous, extraordinary service which was demanded of him, and that the superior servant, who ordered the boy to perform it, was in the course of his proper duties, and that the injury resulted directly from his negligent and wrongful command, I do not think that it justly falls within the principle which disentitles a servant to recover from the master for an injury caused by the negligence of a co-servant in the same common service. At all events, it is my clear and fixed conviction, that, upon reason, principle and public policy, the employer ought to be, in such a case as the present, responsible civilly for the act of the servant whose neglect and wrongful conduct caused the injury. I do not intend to elaborate my views, nor enter upon a discussion of the authorities. I am aware of the great extent to which the general rule has been carried by the courts—particularly by the courts of England. I place my judgment upon this ground: Collett, in superintending the repair of the belt attached to the machinery, was in the discharge of a duty entrusted to him by the corporation, and in the performance of that duty he, and he alone, at that time, represented the corporation, which, in contemplation of law, was there present in his person, and when he ordered, without due and reasonable care and reflection, the boy to perform a service attended with so much danger, and one which involved a risk not within his ordinary duties and employment, the company ought to be held liable for the wrong the same as if, under the like circumstances, the same act had been required of the boy by an individual employer. True, Collett was a servant of the company, but so was Ballou the general foreman of the shop, and so was Gamble the superintendent, and so are all the other officers of the corporation in the long line of gradation from the president to the lowest. If the company is not responsible for the wrongful act of Collett, it would not be had the same act been done by the foreman of the shop, by the superintendent of the car department, or even by the president of the company himself. Here was dangerous machinery in operation; here was a service, dangerous in its nature, to be performed. Public policy requires that the master, where the safety of a person of tender years and inexperience is concerned, if, indeed, in any case, should not be able to abdicate his duty, or to shift upon another his liability, and this he is enabled effectually to do if he is not liable for the tortious act and neglect of his own servant, and his only representative in connection with the service which was required of the boy. Without denying the general rule, our conclusion is that it should not be extended to this case.

2. On the trial it was contended by the defendant that the jury could in this action only consider and allow for such damages as had happened when the action was brought, while the plaintiff maintained that the jury might take into consideration all the damages that had been sustained up to the day of trial. On this point the court charged as requested by the plaintiff, and there is little doubt that this was a view sufficiently favorable to the defendant. It has been held, indeed, that, in proper cases, damages prospective in their nature, but certain to result from the wrongful act, may be considered and allowed, when they do not form the basis of a new action. Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 172; cases cited, 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 268a, 268b.

Judgment will be entered upon the verdict for the sum of $3,056.58.

Judgment accordingly.

[NOTE. A bill of exceptions was signed, and the case taken to the supreme court, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed; Mr. Justice Davis delivering the opinion, in which it was held that the master's exemption from liability for the negligent conduct of a coemployé in the same service rests upon the theory that the employé, in entering the service of the principal, is presumed to take upon himself risks incident to the undertaking, among which are to be accounted the negligence of fellow servants in the same employment. But, remarked the learned justice, this presumption cannot arise where the risk is not within the contract of service, and the servant had no reason to believe he would have to encounter it. The injury in this case, it seems, did not occur while the boy was doing what his father had engaged he should do. On the contrary, he was at the time engaged in a service outside the contract, and wholly disconnected with it. He was employed as a helper at a moulding machine, or common work hand, on the floor of a shop; and this, in the language of Mr. Justice Davis, is a very different thing from ascending a ladder resting on a shaft, to adjust displaced machinery, when the shaft was revolving at the rate of 175 to 200 revolutions per minute, and at the order of his foreman. Mr. Justice Bradley dissented. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Fort, 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 553.]

NOTE. As to measure of damages, see Filer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 42, in which it was held that successive actions will not lie for the recovery of damages resulting from an injury to the person in consequence of a single wrongful act; but the recovery may include present damages, and such future or prospective damages as it is reasonably certain will necessarily and inevitably result from the injury.

In England the rule is "conclusively settled that one fellow-servant cannot recover (from the master) for injuries sustained in their common employment from the negligence of a fellow-servant, unless such fellow-servant is shown to be either an unfit or improper person to have been employed for the purpose. The FORTITUDE.

[3 Sumn. 228;[1] 1 Law Rep. 124.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1838.

SHIPPING—AUTHORITY OF MASTER—REPAIRS AND SUPPLIES AT FOREIGN PORT—BOTTOMRY—DUTY OF LENDER—LIEN—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The master of a ship has authority in a foreign port to procure all supplies and repairs necessary for the safety of the ship, and the due performance of the voyage.

[Cited in Pope v. Nickerson, Case No. 11,274.]

[Cited in Bliss v. Ropes, 9 Allen, 341.]

2. This authority is not confined to such supplies and repairs as are absolutely necessary or indispensably necessary; but includes all such as are reasonably fit and proper for the ship and voyage.

[Cited in Greely v. Smith, Case No. 5,750; The George T. Kemp, Id. 5,341.]

3. Where such supplies and repairs are reasonably fit and proper, the master, if he has not suitable funds, or cannot obtain money on the personal credit of the owner, may take it upon bottomry.

[Cited in Joy v. Allen, Case No. 7,552; Burke v. The M. P. Rich, Id. 2,161; The Lulu, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 204.]

4. The lender on bottomry is bound to exercise reasonable diligence, in order to ascertain whether such supplies and repairs are necessary and proper. He is not bound, however, to show that there was a positive necessity. It is sufficient, if there is an apparent necessity, so far as the lender is able upon due inquiry and due diligence to ascertain the facts.

[Cited in The Lulu, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 201.]

[Cited in Leddo v. Hughes, 15 Ill. 43.]

5. The lender upon bottomry will be protected in such a case of apparent necessity for his advances, even though, upon a fuller examination and a more thorough investigation of the facts, at a subsequent period, it should be doubtful whether the supplies and repairs were really necessary.

6. Where there is an apparent necessity for repairs, the lender on bottomry is under no obligation to inquire as to the best mode of making the repairs, or whether they are made in the most judicious manner, or to ascertain the cause of the injury. As, for example, where an acknowledged leak exists, how it is caused. It is sufficient if he acts with good faith, and does not co-operate wilfully in any unnecessary expenditure.[2]

[Cited in Nippert v. The William, 39 Fed. 828.]

7. A master, acting with reasonable diligence, discretion, and skill, upon the advice of competent persons, at a foreign port in making repairs, will be protected, even though a more judicious course might possibly have been adopted in the judgment of other more skilful persons.

[Cited in The Lucinda Snow, Case No. 8,591.]

8. In a suit on a bottomry bond, in rem, where the defence is, that the repairs were not necessary, it seems, that the master is not a competent witness for the libellant to establish the necessity of the repairs: as the decree would be evidence of this necessity in a suit brought against him by the owner for improper conduct in directing the repairs. But under such circumstances the court will presume favorably for the master, until the presumption is overcome by clear proofs.

9. Material men, and shipwrights and repairers, have a lien for repairs made on a ship in a foreign port, whenever these repairs are apparently reasonable and proper, although not absolutely necessary. All that is required on their part, is good faith, and reasonable ground for action.

10. A regular survey, by competent and skilful persons, and repairs made in pursuance of their recommendation, is primâ facie evidence of the propriety of making the repairs, to justify the master and lender on bottomry.

[Cited in The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 139; The Director, 34 Fed. 60.]

[1] [Reported by Charles Sumner, Esq.]

[2] In the case of Soares v. Rahn, on a bottomry bond, before the judicial committee of the privy council in England, on the 10th of January, 1839, in an appeal from the high court of admiralty, the court said: "If the foreign merchant shall have instituted reasonable inquiry, for the purpose of ascertaining, whether the repairs were necessary, and whether the owner had not personal credit, the transaction (the bottomry bond) will not be impeached, because making such reasonable and bonâ fide inquiry, the repairs were not necessary, and the owner had personal credit." See Month. Law Mag. (Eng.) Feb. 1839, p. 30.

11. The lender on bottomry is primâ facie presumed to have made inquiries as to the apparent necessity of repairs, and to have acted upon the facts and circumstances, as made known by the survey to the master.

12. The onus probandi, that the master has other funds, or that the owner has a personal credit in that port, is not upon the lender on bottomry, but lies on the owner, who resists the bottomry bond.

[Cited in Furniss v. The Magoun, Case No. 5,163; The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 137.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

This was the case of a suit in rem [against the ship Fortitude, Haven and others, claimants], founded on a bottomry bond given by the master of the ship, at Calcutta, East Indies, for moneys taken up for the repairs of the ship. The main question raised by the pleadings was upon the necessity of the repairs, the respondents contending, that they were unnecessarily, if not fraudulently made. At the hearing, the counsel for the libellant, (Dexter & Stackpole), offered the deposition of the master in proof of the necessity. The counsel for the respondents, (Choate & Mason), objected to it, upon the ground of the incompetency of the master.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The question now submitted is, whether the master of the ship, it being a suit on a bottomry bond, and the necessity of the repairs being denied by the answer, is a competent witness to establish the necessity of the repairs. The suit is in rem; and indeed no personal suit would lie against the owner. If the master is admissible to prove the necessity of the repairs, then it is plain, that, if a decree is obtained by the libellant, the master is discharged from all further responsibility. So that he has a direct interest in the event of the suit under this aspect, and will by his own testimony exonerate himself from all liability to the libellant. Then, does he stand indifferent from an opposing interest? Certainly he does not, if the decree in rem will exonerate him also from all liability to the owner of the ship. The question, then, arises, whether the decree in rem will be conclusive as to the necessity of repairs, in a suit brought by the owner of the ship against the master? I think it will, for two reasons; (1.) A decree in rem, as to the direct point decided in it, (and here the necessity of the repairs must be directly decided,) is conclusive in all other cases. In case of asserted forfeiture, the decree of acquittal or condemnation is conclusive, not only as to the property, but as to the point of forfeiture, or not. So it was adjudged in Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 241, and in Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 246. (2.) In the next place, the owner cannot found any claim against the master, but upon producing the proceedings and the decree in admiralty, for his loss and damage grew out of that. If so, the decree is evidence not merely of the fact of the decree of sale, but of the validity of the bottomry bond, and the necessity of the repairs. I do not say, that it is conclusive; that is not necessary to say in the point of view in which I am now looking to the case. It is sufficient if it be primâ facie evidence in the case, in favor of the master. If it be the latter only, can he be a witness, thus to create evidence in his own favor in such a suit? I think not. But if it be evidence at all in such a suit, (and that it is cannot be doubted), then it seems to me, that it must be conclusive as to the very hinge of the controversy.

Now I find, that in another class of cases, far less imposing and clear, a very able admiralty judge, (the late Judge Peters), decided, that the master is not a competent witness against the seamen. I mean in cases of libels for seamen's wages, brought by a suit in rem against the ship; or in personam against the owner of the ship. He gave, as a reason, that the decree in rem would be evidence in favor of the master in a suit brought in personam against him by the seamen for the same wages. And he applied the same reasoning to a suit in personam against the owner. In Malone v. Bell [Case No. 8,994], which seems to have been a suit in personam against the owner, the master was offered as a witness by the owner, and the learned judge said; "If a decree passes against the seamen in a procedure in rem, or against (it should be for, and is an obvious mistake) the owner, it may be given in evidence to repel a suit against the master." And he accordingly rejected the master's testimony. In Jones v. The Phoenix [Id. 7,489], the learned judge recognized the same doctrine in a suit in rem. In Atkyns v. Burrows [Id. 618], the same learned judge rejected the master as a competent witness for the owner, to prove that he had rightfully displaced the mate, (the libellant), from his station; and stated, that he was liable over in damages to the owner for his misconduct, in discharging the mate, if improper. The same doctrine was admitted at the bar, and acted upon by the court, in Galloway v. Morris, 3 Yeates, 445. In Robinett v. The Exeter, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 261, the master, under the like circumstances, was rejected as a competent witness. These cases are certainly far less cogent in favor of the rejection of the testimony of the master, than the present. In short, the whole merits of this controversy turn upon the master's conduct. If this suit were upon a policy of insurance by the owner against the underwriters, and the defence were barratry, or deviation by the master, he would not be a competent witness for the owner to establish the contrary fact. So, if a suit were brought against the owner, founded upon his misconduct or negligence, he would not be a competent witness for the owner to disprove his negligence or misconduct.

I am aware of the cases cited at the bar at common law. One answer is, that they are all suits in personam, though I confess, that I do not well see how all of them can be supported on that distinction. The case of Evans v. Williams, 7 Term R. 481, note c, may possibly have turned upon another point; not the necessity of borrowing, but the misapplication of the money when borrowed. Milward v. Hallett, 2 Caines, 77, and Rocher v. Busher, 1 Starkie, 27, proceeded on the same ground as Evans v. Williams, and indeed was very similar in its circumstances. If these cases are not reconcilable with the principles which I have already stated, I shall still adhere (at present) to the doctrine, that, in proceedings in rem turning upon the very point of the necessity of the repairs, the master is not a competent witness. At the same time, I am ready to confess, that I am not confident, that this opinion rests upon grounds so clear, that it ought not to yield to a settled course of practice; and I greatly fear, that there is no authority, which directly sustains it. Deposition rejected.

At a later day, the following opinion was pronounced on the merits of the whole case:

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is the case of a suit on a bottomry bond, executed at Calcutta on 21st of December, 1836, on the ship Fortitude, by one Jeremiah Spalding, the master thereof, in favor of the libellant. The libel asserts, that the money was advanced to supply the necessary repairs for the ship; and the defence set up is, in substance, that the repairs made, and for which the money was advanced, were, with a trifling exception, unnecessary and not required by the state and condition of the ship. And the respondents have, accordingly, imputed gross misconduct and want of judgment, and, indeed, the more grave offence of meditated fraud to the master. They have not, however, imputed any connivance or participation in that misconduct or fraud to the lender; although they do certainly rely upon his want of the exercise of due diligence in making inquiries as to the true state and condition of the ship. The cause has been most elaborately argued by the counsel on both sides, upon the principles of law applicable to the case, as well as upon the facts; and I propose to examine, in the first instance, those principles of law, as I cannot but think, that when well understood and clearly defined, they will greatly aid us in coming to a right conclusion as to the material facts, which ought to govern the judgment of the court.

It is agreed on all sides, that the master is to be treated as the general agent of the owner or employer of the ship, as to procuring repairs and supplies for the ship, in a foreign port, in the absence of the owner or employer. And it is equally agreed, that this power is not unlimited; but is restricted to such repairs and supplies as are, in a just sense, necessary for the ship under the actual circumstances of the voyage. But as to what is the true meaning of the word "necessary," or in other words, as to what repairs or supplies are to be deemed necessary in the sense of the rule, the learned counsel widely differ; the counsel for the respondents contending, that the repairs must be positively and absolutely necessary for the voyage in a strict sense; and the counsel for the libellant as strenuously contending, that all that is required is, that they should be reasonably fit and proper for the occasion. The respondents' counsel have placed great reliance in support of their position, upon certain language to be found in some of the text-books and authorities upon this subject, where it is suggested that the master's authority is confined to cases of actual necessity, of great extremity, of extreme necessity, of great and invincible necessity, and of absolute necessity. Language like this may undoubtedly be found in the text-books and authorities, sometimes used in a very loose and inexact manner; and sometimes looking to the subject-matter immediately in judgment, exceedingly appropriate, and, understood with its just limitations, entirely accurate. As far as I have been able to examine the authorities and text-books cited to sustain these intensive expressions of necessity, they are used in reference to bottomry bonds, as contradistinguished from other ordinary contracts for repairs. There is a manifest difference between that necessity which will justify repairs, and that superadded necessity, if I may use such an expression, which will justify the giving of a bottomry bond. To justify the giving of a bottomry bond, it is not only essential that there should be a necessity for the repairs, but that there should also be a necessity of resorting to a bottomry bond, in order to procure the proper funds to defray the expenditure. If the master has funds of his owner in his own possession, or if he can procure funds upon the personal credit of the owner, he is not ordinarily at liberty to resort to a bottomry loan. In short, it is only when this is the only or the least disadvantageous mode of borrowing, that the master is at liberty to resort to it as a dernier resort. The giving of a bottomry bond is, therefore, properly said to be justifiable only in cases of great extremity, of urgent necessity, or of extreme pressure. In cases of bottomry, the expressions may be appropriate, when they would be utterly inapplicable to common cases of repairs. See Heathorn v. Darling, 1 Moore P. C. 6, 14.

The distinction here alluded to is expressly stated in the case of The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 102, where it is said by the court: "The law in respect to maritime hypothecations is, in general, well settled. The master of the ship is the confidential servant or agent of the owners, and they are bound to the performance of all lawful contracts made by him, relative to the usual employment of the ship, and the repairs and other necessaries furnished for her use. This rule is established, as well upon the implied assent of the owners, as with a view to the convenience of the commercial world. As, therefore, the master may contract for repairs and supplies, and thereby, indirectly, bind the owners to the value of the ship and freight, so, it is held, that he may, for the like purposes, expressly pledge and hypothecate the ship and freight, and thereby create a direct lien on the same, for the security of the creditor. But the authority of the master is limited to objects connected with the voyage, and, if he transcend the prescribed limits, his acts become, in legal contemplation, mere nullities. Hence, to make a bottomry bond executed by the master a valid hypothecation of the ship, it must be shown by the creditor, that the master acted within the scope of his authority; or, in other words, it must be shown, that the advances were made for repairs and supplies necessary for effectuating the object of the voyage, or the safety and security of the ship; and no presumption should arise, that such repairs and supplies could be procured upon any reasonable terms with the credit of the owner, independent of such hypothecation. If, therefore, the master have sufficient funds of the owner within his control, or can procure them upon the general credit of the owner, he is not at liberty to subject the ship to the expensive and disadvantageous lien of an hypothecatory instrument." And again (page 506) it is added: "It is incumbent upon the creditor, who claims an hypothecation to prove the actual necessity of those things which give rise to his demand; and if from his own showing, or otherwise, it appears, that he has funds of the owner in his possession, which might have been applied to the demand, and he has neglected or refused so to do, he must fail in his claim." Nor is there any thing new in this statement. The same doctrine will be found laid down in all the leading elementary treatises and authorities, as incontrovertibly established. See 3 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) lect. 46, p. 171; 2 Emer. Traité à la Grosse, c. 4, §§ 6, 11; Abb. Shipp. 125 (Am. Ed. 1829), and note 2, and cases there cited; Moll. bk. 2, c. 11, §§ 11, 12; The Virgin, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538; The Nelson, 1 Hagg. Adm. 169, 175; Jac. Sea Laws, bk. 4, c. 2, p. 359, by Frick; 1 Bell, Comm. (4th Ed.) 430–434; The Rhadamanthe, 1 Dod. 201, 206; The Alexander, Id. 278, 280; Pard. Droit Com. tom. 3, n. 910, 911, pp. 509, 510.

Let us proceed, then, to the consideration of what, in the sense of the law, are necessary repairs, for which, when ordered by the master, the owner would be liable in case no bottomry bond had been given. Now, we all know, that where money is advanced in a foreign port, for necessary repairs, the owner is liable for the amount advanced for such repairs in a suit in personam at the instance of the lender. And if the work is done, and materials furnished for such necessary repairs in a foreign port, the material men and workmen, if unpaid, have a treble remedy, by a suit in personam against the master, and by a like suit against the owner, and by a suit in rem in the admiralty to enforce the lien given to them by the maritime law. This doctrine is well established; and the right to proceed in rem has been fully recognized by the supreme court of the United States. This inquiry is the more important, because, if the repairs made were, in the sense of the law, necessary repairs, for which the owner would have been personally liable in the manner above mentioned, if no bottomry bond had been taken; then it seems to me, that, if the necessary funds in order to make those repairs could not otherwise be obtained, and the bottomry bond was bonâ fide entered into by the lender, it would be extremely difficult to show, that it ought not to be upheld by this court. In relation to what are necessary repairs in the sense of the law, for which the master may lawfully bind the owner of the ship, I have not been able, after a pretty thorough search into the authorities and text writers, ancient and modern, to find it any where laid down in direct or peremptory terms, that they are such repairs, and such repairs only, as are absolutely indispensable for the safety of the ship, or the voyage, or that there must be an extreme necessity, an invincible distress, or a positive urgent incapacity, to justify the master in making the repairs. The general formulary of expression found to be laid down is, simply, that the repairs are to be necessary, without in any manner pointing out, what repairs are, in the sense of the law, deemed necessary, or what constitutes the true definition of necessity. But a thorough examination of the common text writers, ancient as well as modern, will, as I think, satisfactorily show, that they have all understood the language in a very mitigated sense; and that necessary repairs mean such, as are reasonably fit and proper for the ship under the circumstances, and not merely such as are absolutely indispensable for the safety of the ship or the accomplishment of the voyage. The Roman law manifestly took this view of the matter. In commenting upon the Pretor's edict, De Exercitoria Actione, it is well remarked by Ulpian, that as we are obliged from necessity to contract with masters of ships, of whose character and condition we are ignorant, it is equitable that the owner should be bound by his acts; and that the case is stronger than that of a contract with the clerk of a shopkeeper; for sometimes in the case of the master of a ship, neither the time nor the place allow us the opportunity of full deliberation. "In navis magistro non ita est; nam interdum locus, tempus non patitur plenius deliberandi concilium." Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1. And, therefore, the owner is held to contracts made in good faith with the master, since otherwise the persons contracting might suffer from his frauds. "Omnia facta magistri debet praestare qui eum praeposuit; alioquin contrahentes decipientur." This consideration may not be unimportant in reviewing other parts of the present case. Id. l. 1, § 5. The text of the Roman law then proceeds to state the right of the master of the ship to bind the owner as being limited to the concerns of the ship; "Ejus rei nomine cujus ibi praepositus fuerit, id est, in eam rem praepositus sit;" and illustrates it by reference to his ordinary power to buy things proper for the navigation of the ship or for repairing the ship; "utputa, si ad onus vehendum locatum sit: aut aliquas res emerit utiles naviganti; vel si quid, reficiendae navis causa contractum, vel impensum est." Id. l. 1, § 6; Id. l. 4, § 5. And it then declares, that if he borrows money for the same purpose, "ad usum ejus rei, in quem praepositus est," as, for example, to repair the ship, the owner will be liable therefor, even though the master should afterwards convert the money to his own use, (Id. l. 1, § 6; Id. l. 7; Emer. tom. 2, c. 4, § 5), if the creditor lent the money bonâ fide, and the ship stood in need of repairs and he knew it. "Si cum pecunia crederetur, navis in ea causa fuisset, ut refici deberet,—si illud quoque scierit necessarium refectioni pecuniam esse." Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1, l. 7; Poth. Pand. lib. 14, tit. 1, n. 7, 8; Emer. tom. 2, c. 4, § 5. It seems difficult to avoid the conclusion, that the Roman law understood that the owner was liable in the exercitorial action for all repairs, which the master, virtute officii, had an implied authority to order; and that the repairs which he had a right to order were not such as were strictly indispensable, but such as were reasonably useful and proper (utiles), and that money might be safely lent by the lender, whenever there existed such a good cause for repairs. But still the lender even in such a case, had a right to lend no more than was necessary for the repairs,—"Multo tamen magis pecunia credita fuerit quam ad rem esset necessariam non debere in solidum adversus Dominum Navis actionem dari,"—and if he did wantonly and knowingly lend more, then the owner was not responsible. Emerigon and Voet seem so to have interpreted the Roman law. Emer. Traité des Contrats à la Grosse, tom. 2. cc. 4, 5, 7, § 8; Voet ad Pand. lib. 14, tit. 1, §§ 3, 6. Cujacius has expounded it in the same manner in an ample commentary, illustrating the doctrine by stating, that if the creditor lends money to buy a sail for the ship, he must shew, that the ship wanted the sail, not that it was indispensably necessary. "Necesse erit probandi se veli emendi causa credidisse, et velo navem indiguisse." Cujacii Opera, tom. 1. cols. 1450–1453, ad Leg. 7; Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1, Afric. Quest.

In looking into the regulations customary or positive of modern commercial nations, it will be found, that language is used, which admits, if it does not absolutely require a similar force of the word necessary. The Consolato del Mare requires the merchant or shipper to lend to the master money, when it is necessary to procure rigging or other things necessary for the ship; and authorizes the master to buy whatever equipments or other things are necessary for the ship. The laws of Oleron (article 1) authorize the master to pledge the ship, if he needs money to defray the expenses of the ship. "Si après le départ, le maître d'argent pour les depens de la nef, il peut mettre aucun d' appareux en gage," &c. Consolato del Mare, cc. 106, 107; Pard. Coll. Lois Marit. tom. 2, pp. 109, 110; Id. p. 224, c. 239; Emer. Traité à la Grosse. tom. 2, c. 4, § 5. The laws of Wisbuy, (article 13) declare, that if the master is in need of provisions or supplies, he may pledge a part of his equipments therefor. Emer. Traité à la Grosse, tom. 2, c. 4, § 5. The old Hanseatic ordinance (article 60) declares, that, if the master stood in need of money for the ship in a foreign country, he might take it up on bottomry, if he could not do better. "S'il a nécessité et besoin d'argent pour le navire." Id. The new Hanseatic ordinance (article 6, § 2) is more impressive. It provides, that if the master in foreign places perceives a probable damage in the ship or its equipments, and he cannot obtain money on exchange, and has not goods in the ship, which he can sell more for the benefit of the owner than to take up money on bottomry, he may do the latter. "Si nauclerus in caeteris locis, et probabile damnum in navi, aut instrumentis navis perceperit, ac isthic loci nullum cambium ad exercitores transmittendum obtinere queat, &c.; tum hoc in casu necessitatis pro servanda navi et bonis habeat potestatem summae universarum Exercitorum tantum pecuniae sub faenore nautico accipiendae, quantum ad reparationem damni et alios similes casus necessitatis opus habet." Id.; Pard. Coll. Lois Marit. tom. 2, 527; Id. 547; Emer. tom. 2, c. 4, § 11. "Le Guidon de la Mer (chapter 5, art. 35) states: "Après la tourmente passée et les damages souferts, le maître pour restaurer son navire peut prendre argent sur le quille," &c. Emer. Traité à la Grosse, tom. 2, c. 4, § 5; Pard. Coll. Lois Marit. tom. 2, p. 396. The French ordinance of 1681 (article 19, of the captain) declares, that the master may, in the course of his voyage, take up money upon the body and keel of the ship for the repairs, provisions, and other necessities of the ship, "pour radoub, victuailles, et autres nécessités du batiment." In the interpretation of this ordinance it has been held by the ablest commentators, Valin and Emerigon, that, at most, nothing more than an apparent necessity and good faith on the part of the lender are necessary to make a bottomry by the master valid for repairs. Nay, it seems, that if the lender act in good faith upon the representations of the master, the bottomry will be valid, even if no necessity for the repairs really existed. Emer. Traité à la Grosse, tom. 2, c. 4, §§ 5, 7, 8, 11; 1 Valin, Comm. liv. 2, tit. 1, art. 19, p. 441; Id. liv. 1, tit. 14, art. 16, p. 362. See, also, Ersk. Inst. B. 3, tit. 3, §§ 44, 46; 1 Stair. The language of the earlier commentators upon the Roman law and the maritime law, as to this subject, is somewhat indeterminate; but their total silence, as to any intense phrases or qualifications implying absolute or indispensable necessity, seems to justify the conclusion, that all which was required on the part of the lender, was to ascertain, that there was a fair ground to believe, that the advances for the ship were reasonably fit and proper for its wants. Thus Peckius in his commentary on the Digest, de Exercitoria Actione, says: "Africani igitur praecepta creditorem observare oportet, quae haec sunt, quod sciat navem in ea causa esse, ut refici debeat; quod credat in eam causam contrahi; quod exprimat refectionis gratia mutuum se credere." Peck. Opera Omnia de Exercit. Actione, p. 838; S. P. Vinnius. Peck. ad Rem Nauticam, de Exerc. Actione, pp. 98, 99, 183. Vinnius in his notes on Peckius says: "Si navis instruenda aut reficienda sit, et magister in eam rem pecuniam mutuetur, etiam hoc casu actio in exercitorem dabitur. Caeterum non alios utiliter aget creditor, quam si concurrant illa omnia, quae hic exigit Africanus. Summa est; (1) ut navis in ea causa fuerit, ut refici deberet; (2) ut sciat se credere in hoc ipsum, cui sit aliquis magistri navis jure et nomine praepositus; (3) ut non major pecunia credita sit, quam navis reficiendae opus fuerit; (4) ut eo loco credita sit pecunia, in quo id, propter quod numerabatur, comparari potuerit." Vinnius, Peck. ad Rem Naut. de Exercit. Act. p. 183. And he repeats the same suggestions in his own commentary on the Institutes. Vinnius ad Inst. Lib. 4, tit. 7, § 2, nota 4. Marquardus, in his Treatise on Maritime Law, uses the following language: "Adeo autem favorabile est hoc refectionis navalis privilegium, ut si magister navis cavit se accipere in refectionem navis, etiamsi, in eam causam non impenderit, sed in suos usus converterit, tamen teneatur Exercitor. Marquardus, de Jure Marit. lib. 2, c. 5, p. 225, n. 27. Stypmannus says: "Si vero extra provinciam est, et navis indigeat, ex. gr. si vela emenda vel alia armenta, potest magister navis, pro resarciendo damno, quod navis a tempestatibus accepit, quantum est opus periculo exercitorem sumere; et quod ita accipit, tenentur exsolvere." He adds in another place: "Debet autem damnum in cujus reparationem pecunia accipitur, verum, non simulatum, vanum, aut imaginarium esse." (Stypmannus ad Jus Marit. p. 4, c. 5, n. 106, 107, 113–135, pp. 417–419); citing with approbation the commentary of Cujacius on the law of Africanus. Loccenius says: "Si navis reficienda aut instruenda sit, et magister in usum navis reficiendae aut instruendae, cui praepositus est, pecuniam, fuerit mutuatus, etiam si hoc non sciverit exercitor, tamen in exercitorem actio dabitur." He then puts the case of the money being misemployed; and states, that the owner is still bound; and then adds: "Sed et creditorem incautum esse decet eo ut dispiciat an in eam causum impendat pecuniam magister navis, in quam ab ipso mutuatus est; vel num iis impensis navis jam opus habeat, in quas ipsi credidit pecuniam; num navis in ea causa sit, ut refici debeat." Locc. de Jure Mar. lib. 3, c. 7, notes 6–8. Kuricke is far more direct: "Potest vero nauclerus in locis peregrinis faenus nauticum accipere; (1) si probabile damnum in navi et instrumentis navilibus adpareat; (2) si isthic loci cambio, sub fide exercitorum pecuniam ab exercitoribus solvendam comparare non queat; (3) si non habeat in navi bona, quae majori cum commodo exercitorum vendi, quam faenus nauticum contrahi, possint; (4) ne ultra quam ad reparationem damni, et similis casus necessitatis, opus est, accipiat." Kuricke Ins. Marit. Hans. ad tit. 6, art. 2, p. 765. Casaregis speaking of the greater liberty of the law in maritime affairs, says: "Quod exercitores remaneant obligati pro pecunia ad cambium capitaneo data in usum navis, absque onere creditoribus justificandi versionem pecuniae in illius utilitatem, juxta textum leg. ultimae, ff. de Exerc. Actione." Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1, c. 7. He adds: "In casu etiam generalis vel illimitatae praepositionis non potest aliquis cum magistro contrahere, nisi vero sciat navim indigere &c. Si vero contrahenti constaverit, quod navis non erat in ea causa, ut indigeret, vel saltem tanto non indigeret, tunc nulla ei dabitur actio contra navem ac exercitores." And he recognises in its full force the doctrine of the Digest, that the owner is bound, if the master procures things useful for the navigation of the ship, or to repair her: "Si aliquas res emerit utiles naviganti, vel si quid reficiendae navis causa contractum," (Casaregis Disc. 71, n. 12–14, 32, Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1, l. 1, § 7), as well as the doctrine of Africanus. Id. Disc. 71, n. 33. Roccus is equally significant in the passage cited at the bar. "Mutuans pecuniam magistro navis pro refectione ipsius navis aut ad hoc, ut aliquas res emerit utiles naviganti; vel pro salario nautarum, vel ad armendam et instruendam navem, semper dominus obligatus remanet." Roccus de Nav. et Naul. n. 23. He then adds: "Verum, nota circa hoc, quod si magister navis decipiat creditorem in mutuo pro dicta refectione vel in pretio rerum emptarum, hoc ad onus domini et exercitoris cedit, non autem ad onus creditoris." Roccus de Nav. n. 24. And he then proceeds to lay down the four rules already cited from Vinnius. In truth the whole of these writers have borrowed and adopted the expositions of Cujacius on this same subject, who has laid down the same rules, the principal of which points to the duty of the creditor to ascertain, "an navis indigeat refectione; ut re vera navis indiguerit refectione; satis est si navis reficiendae causa credíderit, et in ea causa fuerit navis, ut refici deberet." Cujacii Opera, tom. 1, col. 1451, 1452; Ad Afric. Tract. 8.

I have been the more full in these citations from the older writers—most of which will be found collected in Emerigon and Boulay-Paty (Emer. Traité à la Grosse, tom. 2, c. 4, §§ 5, 11; Boul.-P. Dr. Com. tom. 2, § 14, p. 62, etc. See, also, Valin, Comm. tom. 1, lib. 2, tit. 1, art. 19),—because, unless I greatly misunderstand the purport of their expressions, they inculcate a very different doctrine from that which has been supposed at the argument to be the general result of the maritime law. These writers use no intensive expressions as to the necessity of the repairs. Their language imports no more than what is meant by our common English phrase, 'that the ship needs or stands in need of repairs ut refici deberet; and some of them press it further by requiring no more than a probable damage or probable cause of repairs. So that at most these writers leave the whole subject open to a liberal interpretation of what constitutes necessary repairs; and relieve the court from all necessity of qualifying their language. The doctrines maintained by Valin and Emerigon on this subject have been already stated; and their authority upon questions of maritime law is justly entitled to very great weight. The modern Code of Commerce of France authorizes the master to take up money on bottomry, if, during the course of the voyage, there is a necessity of repairs, or to buy provisions, after having verified the same by a report drawn up and signed by the principal officers of the crew. "Si pendant la cours du voyage il y a necessité de radoub, ou d'achat de victualles." Code de Commerce, art. 234; and see 2 Emer. Traité à la Grosse, c. 4, § 5; Boul.-P. Dr. Com. (Ed. 1827) pp. 461, 462. And it declares the master, who shall, without necessity, have taken up money on bottomry, or have given a false account of damages sustained, responsible to the owners, without prejudice to a criminal prosecution against him, if there be good cause. Code de Commerce, art. 236. The modern commentators upon this code agree, that if the lender has acted in good faith, the ship is responsible, notwithstanding there may not have been a positive necessity for the repairs. Thus, Pardessus says: "Les Armateurs ne peuvent refuser d'acquitter les engagemens pris pour ces causes et avec ces formalités, sous pretexte qu'ils entendent contester, ce, qu'a fait le capitaine—ou que l' emprunt n'etoit pas reellement necessaire, et que le capitaine a supposé des besoins." Pard. Dr. Com. tom. 3, n. 911. Boulay-Paty holds the same doctrine; using the words, "pour les necessités du navire, et pour les besoins du navaire," as equivalent expressions. Boul.-P. Dr. Com. tom. 2, § 14, pp. 62, 64, 68, 69, 75. But what is more important, each of these authors lays down the general authority of the master to do, in the absence of the owner, what he shall judge to be most proper for the safety of the ship, and the success of the voyage. "Tout ce qu'il jugera convenable" (says Boulay-Paty) pour le salut du batiment, et le succes de l'expedition." Id. tom. 1, § 1, p. 262. "Lorsque l'Armateur est absent, &c. il est presumé s'en etre rapporté au capitaine (ses pouvoirs)" (says Pardessus) "et l' avoir autorisé a faire les depenses, qu'il jugeroit necessaires, même dans le lieu de l' embarquement et avant le voyage commence." Pard. Dr. Com. tom. 2, pt. 3, tit. 2, c. 1, § 626, pp. 58, 59.

But assuming the law of continental Europe to be different from what I have supposed; still, after all, we must be governed by that law, which prevails in our own jurisprudence. Now, it seems to me clear, that, by our law, the master has a right in a foreign port to bind the owners for all supplies and repairs of the ship, which, in the liberal sense of the terms, are deemed necessary supplies and repairs; that is, such as are reasonably fit and proper for the ship and the voyage. Lord Tenterden, in his excellent treatise on Shipping (Abb. Shipp. [Ed. 1829] pt. 2, c. 3, § 3, p. 102), lays down the proposition in the following exact and perspicuous language: "In order, however, to constitute a demand against the owners, it is necessary that the supplies furnished by the master's order should be reasonably fit and proper for the occasion, or that money advanced to him for the purchase of them should, at the time, appear to be wanting for that purpose. The contrary in either case would furnish a strong presumption of fraud or collusion on the part of the creditor. The proper mode of ascertaining what is necessary is, to ask what a prudent owner himself would have done, had he been present." In Webster v. Seekamp, 4 Barn. & Ald. 352, the very question was before the court, in a case where the plaintiff had coppered a ship at the request of the master, the owner being in the same country, and brought his suit against the owner for the amount. The defence was, that the coppering was not absolutely necessary for the voyage; and it was found at the trial, that it was extremely useful to copper vessels on such a voyage, but not absolutely necessary; for many vessels went the same voyage without being coppered. The judge at the trial put the question to the jury, whether the copper was useful and proper for the voyage; and whether it were such as a prudent owner himself, if present, would have ordered. The jury found that it was, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict. Upon a motion for a new trial, the court affirmed the ruling of the judge at the trial. Lord Tenterden on that occasion said: "I am of opinion, that whatever is fit and proper for the service on which a vessel is engaged, whatever a prudent owner would have ordered, if present at the time, comes within the meaning of the word 'necessary,' as applied to those repairs done or things provided for the ship by order of the master, for which the owners are liable;" and he rejected the suggestion, that they should be absolutely necessary as too narrow, and, in many cases, impracticable. The other judges concurred on the same ground; and Mr. Justice Best added: "No man can say, what is absolutely necessary. If the topmasts were lost, a vessel might sail without them, and possibly perform her voyage with safety. A topmast might, therefore, be said not to be absolutely necessary. Yet no prudent man would proceed to sea without it." Mr. Chancellor Kent has maintained a similar doctrine in his learned commentaries, stating that "the supplies must appear to be reasonable, or the money advanced for the purpose of them to have been wanting; and there must be nothing in the case to repel the ordinary presumption, that the master acted under the authority of the owners." 3 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) lect. 46, p. 163. See, also, Ross v. The Active [Case No. 12,070]; Phillips' Benecke, etc., on Average, 174–179; United Ins. Co. v. Scott, 1 Johns. 106. And such I conceive to be the established American law.

All the analogies of the law lead to the same conclusion. Thus, we all know, that infants are generally incapable of binding themselves except by contracts for necessaries, for necessary food, necessary clothing, and necessary means of instruction. In what sense does the common law interpret the meaning of such necessaries? Certainly not as limited to things absolutely and indispensably necessary; for then bread and water, the coarsest and meanest clothing, the narrowest means of the humblest knowledge would be the most, which could justifiably be embraced in such an interpretation. On the contrary, we all know, that necessaries for an infant, in the sense of the common law, are such as are suitable for his rank, degree, condition, and objects in life; and that a spirit of liberal allowance and enlightened policy governs in this matter, to attain the ends by the appropriate and best means. The same rule applies to cases where husbands are made responsible for necessaries furnished to their wives, either under ordinary or extraordinary circumstances. And, indeed, it will be difficult to find any department of the law, in which the same doctrine does not pervade the whole structure of its principles. The whole theory of the law of hailments turns upon it; as does also that of general agency.

Some criticism has been employed upon the words "moral necessity," as applied to the conduct of the master acting in cases of this sort; and it has been more than intimated, that the expression is quite new, and can scarcely be traced beyond the case of Gordon v. Massachusetts F. & M. Ins. Co., 2 Pick. 249. It does not appear to me, that the criticism has any just foundation, or that the expression is either new or inapt. It seems to me to indicate precisely that which such a case requires. Moral necessity arises, where there is a duty incumbent upon a rational being to perform, which he ought at the time to perform. It presupposes a power of volition and action, under circumstances in which he ought to act, but in which he is not absolutely compelled to act by overwhelming superior force. Indeed, I hardly know how a case of physical necessity can correctly be said to exist in cases where an agent is called upon to exercise judgment and discretion, to act, or not to act. Take the case of the master of a ship in a storm of imminent peril, where a jettison seems required, or masts are to be cut away to save the ship from foundering at sea. The master is called upon to act; but even in such an extremity he has a choice; and when he acts, he acts, properly speaking, upon his judgment, under a moral, rather than a physical necessity. But in ordinary cases, where a master orders repairs or supplies for the ship, it would be an entire deflection from the true use of language to call it a case of physical necessity. So far as the master is concerned, it is his duty to procure suitable repairs and supplies, in order to enable him to save the ship and prosecute the voyage; and this sense of duty, when it becomes imperative by its urgency upon his conscience and judgment, constitutes what is most appropriately called a moral necessity. No one can correctly say, in such a case, that the master is under a physical necessity to make the repairs, or to procure the supplies.

In the course of this examination I have not thought it proper to refer to the cases of sales by the master of the ship or cargo, or both, because they do not belong to his ordinary duties; and are only superinduced from an overwhelming or extreme necessity, which requires him to act in unforeseen emergencies for the best interests of all concerned. The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 240, and Petapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 604, and Winn v. Columbian Ins. Co., 12 Pick. 279, 283, 286, fully illustrate the doctrine of such cases.

Then, as to another point suggested at the argument, viz.: that the creditor, who lends money, is bound to use due diligence in ascertaining, whether it is wanted for repairs and supplies; and to advance no more than is reasonably necessary for such a purpose. I entirely agree to the doctrine, when it is interpreted with what I consider to be its true and just limitations. The point can only arise, where no necessity for the repairs or supplies exists, and where, by the use of reasonable diligence, the absence of such necessity could have been known and ascertained. If the repairs and supplies are necessary, then the creditor will be entitled to recover the amount from the owner (for I am speaking of cases of ordinary supplies and repairs, where no bottomry bond is taken), without making any inquiry whatsoever. On the other hand, if no inquiries whatsoever could have put the creditor in possession of the real facts, and he has acted upon the representations of the master, with good faith and under circumstances affording no ground of suspicion of ill faith in the master, I conceive that he is dispensed from all responsibility in regard to such inquiries. Thus, if he should be deceived in making advances for repairs or supplies for imaginary injuries or losses at sea, which he could have no means of knowing or tracing, but which the master and crew fraudulently pretended to exist, I presume that he would be enabled to recover against the owners for reasonable advances made by him to repair such injuries or supply such losses. Such certainly seems to be the doctrine of the civil law. "Omnia enim facta magistri debet praestare, qui eum praeposuit; alioquin contrahentes decipientur; et facilius hoc in magistro, quam institore, admittendum propter utilitatem." Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1, l. 1, § 5. "Sed et si in pretiis rerum emptarum fefellit magister, exercitoris erit damnum, non creditoris." Id. § 10; Emer. Traité à la Grosse, c. 4, § 5; 1 Valin, Comm. lib. 2, tit. 1, art. 19; Cujacii Opera, tom. 1, col. 1451, 1452; De Exerc. Actione. Pothier evidently so understood it; for in his edition of the Pandects, in his preface to the law of Africanus (Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1, l. 7), he says: "Sed etsi specialiter caverit (magister) se ad navis causam mutuari, puta, ad hujus refectionem; ita demum Exercitoria dabitur, si probabile videri potuit, quod ad hanc causam mutuaretur." Poth. Pand. lib. 14, tit. 1, n. 8. It certainly is the doctrine of the French maritime law. Emer. Traité à la Grosse, c. 4, §§ 5, 8; 1 Valin, Comm. lib. 2, tit. 1, art. 19. But where the creditor could by due diligence ascertain the necessity of the repairs or supplies, then, under such circumstances, if he makes no inquiries, and no such necessity in fact exists, he will have no claim upon the owner. Cujacius puts this doctrine in a strong light. "Hoc tantum exiginius, ut non fuerit falsa causa rogandae pecuniae mutuae, ut mutuo non fuerit quaesitus titulus falsus, id est, ut re vera navi indiguerit refectione, et uti hoc certo indagarit ac scierit creditor. Rogas me mutuam pecuniam in refectionem navis, cui dicis te esse praepositum. Ego debeo esse diligens et curiosus, et inquirere antequam numerem pecuniam, an navis indigeat refectione." Cujacii Opera, tom. 1, col. 1451; De Exer. Actione, L. 7, Africanus. But, notwithstanding this strong language, I conceive nothing more is meant than that after due inquiry there should be an apparent necessity for the repairs or supplies; for it is immediately afterwards added, that the creditor need not look to the exact amount required. "Quia non debet inquirere creditor, quanti sit impensa refectionis, vel quanti velum comparare possit, &c. Satis est, si navis reficiendae causa crediderit, et in ea causa fuerit navis, ut refici deberet." Id. Roccus himself admits, that if there be a case of apparent necessity, the owner will be bound, although the master has been guilty of fraud, in the passage already cited. Roccus de Nav. n. 24. Pothier, in his treatise on Obligations (449, note), put the rights of creditors for advances to the master upon the ground of the probable necessity, from the representations of the master. "Pourvuque la Declaration par le contrat d'Emprunt fut vraisemblable." Mr. Bell, in his Commentaries, (1 Bell, Comm. B. 3, pt. 1, c. 5, § 1, n. 454), says; "His (the master's) office holds him out as the accredited agent of the owners, on whose authority all repairs, furnishings of naval stores, subsistence or money necessary for the occasions of the voyage, may be contracted for or advanced on the credit of the owners. The only restraint is the necessity on the part of the furnisher or advancer of money to see, that the supply, which the master requires, is justified by at least apparent necessity." The language already cited from Abbott on Shipping, (part 2, c. 3, § 3), leads to the same conclusion; for it is there said, that "the money advanced should at the time appear to be wanting" for the supplies or repairs. Indeed, it seems to me, that any more strict rule would endanger the interests of all concerned, and more than all others of the owner; for who would be willing to lend a master abroad, if he were compelled to furnish positive proof of the necessity of the repairs or supplies beyond what fair inquiries and what the appearances of things would afford, upon due examination? If there ever was a case, in which the maxim should be applied, that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer, he should suffer who had by his confidence enabled another to perpetrate a fraud, this would seem to be the case, for the reason suggested by the Digest. "Eo usque producendam utilitatem navigantium." Kuricke, in the passage already cited, goes the whole length of the doctrine. "Si probabile damnum in navi et instrumentis navilibus adpareat." And Valin has wisely considered a different rule too subtile and punctilious for the usages of commerce.[3] I have, therefore, no difficulty in holding, that if there is an apparent necessity, at the time, for the repairs and supplies, the creditor, acting with good faith and reasonable diligence, will be justified, whatever may, at a future time, and under other circumstances, turn out to be the real state of things. The creditor must lend, if he lends at all, upon the faith of what is then known and seen upon due examination; and his rights ought not to be jeoparded by new proofs, which, at a distant period, or in another place, may spring up to create doubts, or to change opinions.

Hitherto, we have been looking to this matter as connected solely with the interests of the creditor and the owner. But a most important consideration remains; and that is, how it affects the rights and duties of the master of the ship. He is clothed with the general authority to make repairs and order supplies in all the exigencies of the voyage. He is compelled by his duty and the confidence of the owner, to act for the best interest of all concerned in the voyage; and to exercise a sound judgment as to what is to be done in new and unforeseen exigencies. According to the doctrine which we have heard, he is bound to act; and yet he must act at his own peril. If he acts with the most entire good faith, upon the purest exercise of his own judgment, with the fullest advice and assistance of other intelligent minds of reasonable skill and prudence upon the spot; yet, if, upon a review of the whole proceedings, other minds, in a distant country, at a different time, and under other local or professional influences, should come to a different conclusion, as to the necessity or the extent of the repairs or supplies, he is to bear the sole responsibility, and to meet in poenam to the full extent (it may be) of his fortune all the consequences, in a suit at the instance either of the creditor or of the owner. Now, I confess, that I should be very reluctant to hold to such a rigid doctrine; a doctrine, in my judgment, utterly unsafe and impracticable for the ordinary purposes of navigation and trade. It is not, to my knowledge, any where established; and I have not hesitated upon many occasions to repudiate it, in that limited administration of public justice, which has fallen to my lot. If it were true, no creditor would dare to lend money to the master of a ship for repairs or supplies; and no master would dare to borrow money for such purposes. An innocent mistake, under circumstances of the highest caution, and the most abundant good faith and reasonable diligence, would be visited with the same effects as gross negligence or fraud. What, under such circumstances, would be the situation of the shipwright or material-man, who should furnish the repairs or supplies in a foreign port? The maritime law gives him a lien on the ship for his necessary repairs and supplies; and when he comes to assert it in the home port of the ship, he is met by the owner with the defence, that no lien attaches; because, although the repairs and supplies have been made in good faith, yet, upon a full re-examination and revision of all the circumstances, the master and themselves have erred in judgment as to the extent or the necessity of the repairs. They were at the time, indeed, apparently necessary and proper in the judgment of those who seemed well qualified by nautical skill and judgment to decide upon the matter; but there is now a weight of better skill and judgment the other way, as to the positive, though not, perhaps, as to the apparent necessity. It seems to me, that such a defence, successfully maintained, would spread an alarm through the whole maritime world. Before I should yield to such a doctrine, I should require the most stringent authority directly on the point. I am not aware of any such authority. Even in the case of the sale of a ship by the master, which can be justified only upon an urgent necessity, no rule so rigid has yet been established; for if such a necessity does apparently exist at the time, and upon the spot, I conceive that the master will be justified even in a sale of a ship, although subsequent events may show that a different course might have been attended with success. See Petapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 605; The Sarah Ann [Case No. 12,342]; The Tilton [Id. 14,054]; Idle v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 8 Taunt. 755; The Warrior, 2 Dod. 288; The Packet [Case No. 10,654]. See, also, Winn v. Columbian Ins. Co., 12 Pick. [Mass.] 279. In the case of a sale of the cargo by the master, which can only be justified by necessity, since he is not ordinarily the agent of the cargo, an apparent necessity would seem to be all that the law requires. In the case of The Gratitudine, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 240, 259, Lord Stowell, alluding to such a case, said: "In such emergencies the authority of agent is necessarily devolved upon him, unless it could be supposed to be the policy of the law, that the cargo should be left to perish without care. What must be done? He must in such case exercise his judgment, whether it would be best to trans-ship the cargo, if he has the means, or to sell it. It is admitted in argument, that he is not absolutely bound to trans-ship. He may not have the means of trans-shipment. But even if he has, he may act for the best in deciding to sell. If he acts unwisely in that decision, still the foreign purchaser will be safe under his acts." In the case of Freeman v. East India Co., 5 Barn. & Ald. 617, which was the case of a sale of the cargo by a master, Lord Chief Justice Abbott said: "A sale of the cargo, or any part of it, by the master, could confer no title on the purchaser, unless there was an apparent necessity for such sale. That question I left to the jury, and they were clearly of opinion, that there was, in this case, no such apparent necessity." It is true, that the other judges, on the same occasion, used somewhat different language, speaking of the necessity, or the absolute necessity of the sale. But I conceive the lord chief justice's doctrine to be the true and exact doctrine.

The case of The Jane, 1 Dod. 461, 464, is still more direct in point; for in that case Lord Stowell puts the support of a bottom-ry bond mainly on the good faith of the lender. "The question," says he, "then is, whether this was a fair transaction. Whether the money was bonâ fide advanced, on the representation of the master, that he was in want of supplies. By the general law, the master has a right to take up money in a foreign port for the use of his ship. As long as he remains the ostensible master, exercising all the functions of that situation, he has the authority attached to it; ei rei praepositur. It is not alleged, that the master had any personal credit. Had he not resorted to this mode of raising money, the ship might have lain in port, till it perished by decay. I see no reason to suppose the master exceeded his power. It is a power certainly liable to abuse by the extravagance, indiscretion, or dishonesty of the master. But the master is a person selected by the owners themselves. They repose that trust in him, and hold him out to others as trustworthy. The reasoning is not confined to persons employed in this capacity only. It is common to most situations in life. If a domestic servant, employed by his master to purchase necessaries for the use of the house, misapplies goods obtained under that pretence, though the authority is abused, the master is still liable for his acts. The tradesman who supplied the goods is not to be the sufferer, unless it could be shown that there was collusion with the servant for the purpose of defrauding the master, &c. I cannot agree to the doctrine, that the party lending is obliged to see to the application of the money. If there is no collusion, if he has reasonable grounds for believing that the money is fairly borrowed, it is a known principle in that case, that no such obligation is imposed upon the lender, &c. The transaction may be fair in all its parts. But taking it to be otherwise; supposing it to be tinged with a shade of dishonesty in the master, the merchant, if he did not participate in the guilt, could not be affected by it." Now, some part of this language is addressed to the line of the defence at the hearing, where it was suggested, that, at the time of the borrowing, the master was dismissed, or about to be dismissed; that the intention to dismiss was known to the lender; that there was no account of the items which composed the amount of the bottomry bonds, nor of the application of the money. But still it is most clear, that Lord Stowell sustained the bond in that case upon the apparent necessity only, and the fairness of the transaction on the part of the lender, upon the representation of the master. The doctrine of the same great judge, in the case of The Nelson, 1 Hagg. Adm. 169, 175, 176, and The Zodiac, Id. 320, 326, seems to me to have proceeded upon the same views; and it is difficult to imagine any one, in whose enlightened judgment upon a subject of maritime law more confidence would be reposed. See, also, 3 Kent, Comm. (3d. Ed.) lect. 46, pp. 171, 174.

In short, it appears to me, that all that the maritime law requires, is, that the master should exercise reasonable diligence in ascertaining what repairs and supplies are necessary; and that the creditor should use reasonable diligence to ascertain, if there is such an apparent necessity, as the master has represented; and if he does, and acts with good faith, he will be protected, and the owner be responsible to him for the repairs and supplies furnished by him. Hitherto my observations have been mainly directed to the consideration, what are necessary repairs and supplies, in the sense of the law, for which the master is at liberty to contract; and the circumstances, under which the owner will be bound for such repairs and supplies in common cases. If the repairs and supplies are in a just sense necessary, then it is clear, that if the master has no other known means of meeting the expenditure, he may take up the money therefor upon bottomry. If he has any other funds, which may be properly applied for the purpose; or if he can procure the advances upon the personal credit of the owner, then he is not at liberty to take up the money on bottomry. See Ross v. The Active [Case No. 12,071]. But the onus of establishing, that there were other funds, or that they might have been obtained upon such personal credit, is on the owner, and not on the lender. And, if he has acted in good faith, and without any knowledge or suspicion of the existence of such funds, or personal credit, or could not, upon reasonable inquiry, acquire knowledge thereof, then the owner will be bound, notwithstanding they existed, or might have been obtained. Not only does the doctrine of the Continental Jurists lead to this conclusion; but it seems to me fully supported by the reasoning of Lord Stowell, in the case of The Nelson, 1 Hagg. Adm. 169; The Jane, 1 Dod. 461; The Rhadamanthe, Id. 201; The La Ysabel, Id. 273; The Hero, 2 Dod. 139; and of the supreme court, in The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; and The Virgin, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538, 550.

If the views which have been thus far suggested are correct, it seems to me that they will greatly narrow the grounds of controversy in the present case, and save us from the necessity of reviewing many of the very elaborate expositions of the facts which have been so fully presented at the bar. But, before I proceed to consider those facts, on which alone, in my opinion, the real controversy must hinge, I wish to take a brief notice of the objection urged at the bar, that neither the libel nor the answer, in this case, is adapted to such a mitigated form of necessity as has been insisted on at the argument; but that they propound a case of unmitigated and absolute necessity. If the objection were well founded, I should deem it my duty, as this cause was not heard in the court below, to admit the libel and answer to be reformed, so as to bring before the court the true merits. But, supposing the pleadings to be as suggested, still, in a court of admiralty, as the allegations are broad enough to cover the whole merits (if any there be), and upon the maxim, that omne majus in se continet minus, there would be little difficulty in maintaining their sufficiency. Even in the case of pleadings at the common law, in a declaration for a total loss, upon a policy of insurance, there may be a recovery for a partial loss by the same peril. The allegations of the libel are, that at Calcutta "the ship was in great need of reparations, provisions, and other necessaries to render her fit and capable of proceeding thence on her intended voyage back to the said port of Boston; and neither the owners of said ship, nor said Spalding (the master), having any funds or credit there, and the said Spalding being unable otherwise to procure the necessary money to repair, refit and supply said ship for her said voyage, the libellant did, at the request of said Spalding, advance and lend to him, said Spalding, the sum of 11,755 sicca rupees, &c., on the bottomry or hypothecation of said ship," &c. Now, if I have rightly understood the answer, as well as the argument at the bar, some repairs and supplies were necessary at Calcutta; and no argument has been addressed to the court to show, that the master had any other funds, or the owner any personal credit to meet the exigency. What the answer relies on is, that except some caulking in her upper works, and some supplies of provisions, and some inconsiderable repairs usual on such a voyage, the ship was not "in need of any other reparations, provisions, and other necessaries to render her fit and capable of proceeding thence on her then intended voyage." So that the whole matter of the repairs and supplies is left broadly open upon these general allegations; and, as far as by law they can, or ought to constitute a valid lien upon the ship, as useful, and proper, and reasonable under all the circumstances, for the master to make, they are fairly within the reach of the court.

Upon looking at the general outlines of the evidence, it appears to me, that the ship (which was only upon her second voyage,) was originally well and substantially built, of sound materials, and in a skilful and workmanlike manner. Still it is quite consistent with this general state of facts, that she might have betrayed some infirmity and weakness in some unexpected place. Nor ought this to surprise us, either upon general reasoning, or upon the admitted fact, that ships of this size, and with this peculiar build, that is, with very large round bottoms, exceeding greatly in their actual capacity the registered tonnage, are but of recent origin and structure in our shipyards. Here, for example, is a ship of the registered tonnage of 566 tons, with a capacity safely to transport a cargo of 1300 tons burthen. Under such circumstances, it would not be wonderful, that the degree of strength, which should be required for the keel and the keelson, and the proper positions of the scarfs thereof, relative to the masts, and to each other, should be a matter somewhat of experiment. It seems admitted also, that this class of ships are now built stronger than they were at first; as experience has led the parties interested therein to a more practical knowledge of their actual working at sea.

Now, the great defect supposed to exist in this ship is in the position of the scarfs of the keel and keelson, relative to each other and to the mainmast, and the want of a rider or false keel to increase the strength of this part of the ship. The scarf of the keel, it is said, is under or very near to the mainmast; and to remove this defect was the main object of the repairs, by placing what are called sister keelsons near to the main keelson, and thereby to increase the strength of that vital part of the ship. Upon this subject there is a great conflict of evidence and opinion; and it is somewhat difficult to say on which side there is a decided preponderance. If my judgment rested solely on this point, I should be greatly distressed; for I have not been able to persuade myself that the surveyors were wholly mistaken in their impression, that there was some infirmity of the ship, from the position of the scarfs, and the structure of the keelson, and the stepping of the masts. At least, my mind, after weighing the evidence and the argument, is left in some doubt. But it seems to me, that there are facts in this case, upon which the decision must finally turn, which are either uncontroverted, or, if controverted, are established by evidence entirely satisfactory. In the first place, it is admitted that the ship did leak on her outward passage from Boston to Calcutta, to a considerable extent; that the leak was progressive; and that in rough weather it was greater than in moderate weather; and that when the sea was heavy, and the ship was down on her sides, the leak was so great as to require from one thousand to fourteen hundred and more strokes a day. Now, that this leak, in a ship so new, and under the circumstances of the voyage, was of an unusual nature, and such as, for the success of the voyage, was necessary to be stopped by suitable examinations and repairs at Calcutta, has not been denied, and indeed cannot admit of any reasonable doubt. Indeed, it is positively testified by several shippers on the homeward voyage, some of whom were supercargoes on the outward voyage, that they should not have been willing to ship their goods on the homeward voyage, unless substantial repairs had been made, so as to stop the leak. The necessity of some repairs is, therefore, as I think, incontrovertible; and the questions, then, on this point, are reduced to these: What repairs were necessary? and, what was the best mode of making them?

The master, on his arrival at Calcutta, did what every prudent master ought to do under the like circumstances. He called a survey of persons skilful in nautical affairs to assist his judgment; and for this purpose selected three masters of American ships, (the only American ships then in the port); a choice certainly, in all respects, unexceptionable, whether it respects their character, or responsibility, or experience, or presumed skill; since they enjoyed the confidence of their respective American owners, and must have every reasonable motive to perform their duty with fidelity and a just regard to the interests of all concerned. The propriety of such a choice, under such circumstances, has not been disputed. But the conduct of the surveyors in making the survey, and the credibility of their statements, have been assailed with a rigor and zeal approaching very nearly to the imputation of their being the victims of the gross frauds or delusions of the master, or of their having wantonly become participators in his meditated wrongs. Now, I must say, that such imputations ought not lightly to be entertained by any court; but ought to be sustained by the most clear and irrefragable proofs. If persons, entrusted with the command of ships in voyages of such high importance and with such valuable cargoes, are, upon mere diversities of judgment and opinions of other witnesses, found wiser than themselves, after the event, and at a distance from the scene, to have their credibility shaken, and their characters assailed, I fear, that hereafter there will be found few of them, who will be willing to undertake the irksome task of a survey; and that it must be left to other humbler and more willing instruments, less confided in by the commercial world, and less entitled to confidence. It is no very pleasing consideration, to perform such a duty at the solicitation of a brother shipmaster and a countryman, and to find ourselves rebuked by reproaches for the want of more honesty of purpose and more skill in judgment.

But it has been urged at the argument, that there are discrepancies in the testimony of the surveyors with themselves, as well as with each other, in different parts of their own depositions. Much minute diligence has been employed in selecting and pointing out and comparing them. Some of them certainly appear to be well founded; but I have not been able to perceive that they amount to enough to overturn the general credibility of their testimony. The circumstances under which the testimony has been taken afford some grounds to account for these discrepancies, independent of any notion of an intention of wilful and deliberate perjury. The testimony of the surveyors has been taken at considerable length of time after the occurrences; at distant places; and without the means of refreshing their memories by personal communications with each other, and with others who were on the spot. Some facts must naturally have faded from their minds; and others, again, have left but obscure and broken traces behind them. Of one of the surveyors, the testimony has been taken twice; and another was subjected to a most severe cross-examination of more than one hundred and fifty cross-interrogatories, under circumstances which would lead to some hurry, impatience, and perhaps carelessness of statement. Under such circumstances, it could not be surprising that there should exist some slips, and some discrepancies in the statements. Human infirmity, even with the greatest caution, is not beyond the reach of such occasional lapses.

Now, the court is called upon to reject the whole testimony of the surveyors, and to repudiate the integrity of the survey, upon the discrepancies and diversities of opinion already suggested. I confess, that I have not been able to bring myself to any such conclusion. The surveyors may possibly have erred in their judgments; they may not have examined with the scrutinizing caution of a vigilant owner; they may have made some mistakes in matters of fact. But that they have been either the credulous victims of, or artful participators in, a meditated fraud of the master of the Fortitude, is what I find no warrant for in the evidence. I feel it my duty to say, that I see no reason to impeach either their skill, or their fairness, or their honesty. Their characters as shipmasters, in an independent service, enjoying public confidence, and bound by no known ties to the master of the Fortitude, without any assignable motives for such gross misconduct, forbid me to indulge any belief of this sort, without evidence far more stringent in its bearings, than any in this case. It is not unimportant to add in this connection, that there is a total absence of all evidence on the part of the respondents from other witnesses at Calcutta at the time, to show any misconduct or incompetency on the part of the surveyors, or that their judgment was founded upon false suggestions, or deficient examinations. And yet, if the case was such as the argument at the bar has supposed, it would seem difficult to believe, that there did not exist adequate means at Calcutta to detect the impositions, or to establish a want of judgment in the repairs. On the other hand, the whole testimony, from other witnesses at Calcutta at the time, of the officers, the crew, and the shippers, so far as it goes, leads altogether the other way, and confirms the bona fides of the whole transaction. And then, again, we find, that a Mr. Kidd, (whose premature death has deprived the parties of his testimony), a most distinguished naval architect, attended the surveyors, and coincided with their opinions both as to the necessity and the mode of the repairs.

We have not the testimony of the master in this case, to give us his own views of the necessity of the repairs, or to vindicate his own good faith in his proceedings. It was taken by the libellants; but upon an objection taken by the respondents at the hearing, it was rejected by the court, on the ground, that the master was incompetent, as a witness, to establish the necessity of the repairs in a suit in rem upon a bottomry bond, where the non-existence of such necessity was the very point of the defence. The ground upon which the court proceeded, in ruling out the deposition, was, that although, as a mere agent, he might not be an incompetent witness in an ordinary suit against the owner personally; yet, in a proceeding in rem upon the bond, the decree in favor of the libellant would necessarily be conclusive, as to the fact of the necessity of the repairs, or at least primâ facie evidence in any suit subsequently brought against the master for his supposed misconduct; since the owner must produce the decree as the substratum of his case. This decision is certainly with much difficulty reconcilable with the common law decisions on the same point, and especially with the case of Evans v. Williams, 7 Term R. 481, note c; Rocher v. Busher, 1 Starkie, 27; and Milward v. Hallett, 2 Caines, 77. I am by no means sure that I was right in this rejection of the deposition. My subsequent researches have not enabled me to feel more confidence in it. And in every case which I have since examined, in the supreme court of the United States, and in the high court of admiralty in England, I find the master's testimony has been admitted without objection, and commented upon as evidence; or else adverted to as proper evidence, when it happened to be absent, even when the point of the necessity of the repairs was directly before the court. See The Virgin, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538; The Jane, 1 Dod. 461; The La Ysabel, Id. 273; The Nelson, 1 Hagg. Adm. 169. I find, too, that Mr. Bell (1 Bell, Comm. B. 3, p. 1, c. 5, § 1, note 456), asserts, that the master is held a competent witness to establish the necessity of the supplies for the ship. If, therefore, this cause should be carried by appeal to the supreme court, I hope, that the libellant will take care to have my judgment upon this point, as one of great practical importance, reviewed.

The rejection of the testimony of the master, under such circumstances, admonishes the court, that it ought not to make any unfavorable inferences against the good faith of the master, unless they are positively required by the most persuasive evidence against him. Primâ facie, and until the contrary is shewn, I must deem him to have acted with good faith, and upright intentions, and reasonable diligence; for he was otherwise guilty of a criminal departure from duty; and the argument has imputed to him meditated fraud, or gross disregard of the interests of the owner.

Now, the surveyors made, as they state, four surveys, three before the repairs, and one after they were completed. They recommended the very repairs to be made, which were made, with entire unanimity; and the estimate of the actual expense of the repairs exceeded that, which was incurred on the occasion. If the leak was in the bottom of the ship, and arose from the infirmity of the keel and keelson, and the scarfs thereof, as the surveyors supposed, I am not aware, that the acts done, and the repairs directed were not reasonable and judicious. Several skilful witnesses have expressed their approbation of them; and at all events they are not proved to be grossly or wantonly unfit for the purpose. The main stress of the argument rests on another ground, that the leak was in the upper works, and could have been removed at a trifling expense. Now, upon this point, whether the leak was in the upper works, or in the bottom, all the surveyors, assisted, as they were, by Kidd, were unanimously of opinion, that it was in the bottom. The weight of evidence, if not the entire evidence, of the persons on board the ship, who have spoken on the point, is the same way. And, indeed, if the question were to rest upon the case, as disclosed by the witnesses at Calcutta at the time, there could be no reasonable doubt of the fact. The difficulty arises from the evidence taken of home witnesses, who testify pointedly to the solidity and sufficiency of the build of the ship; and therefore, by inference, repel the other conclusion, aided by the admitted fact, that in her former voyage, with a large cargo, the ship made no complaint. Here, then, we may be said to have opinion against opinion, and positive affirmative testimony, met by other testimony, amounting to an inferential negative of the former. I do not stop to compare the various portions of the evidence with each other; for in whatever particulars they may agree, or differ, the conclusion which, upon the whole, my mind has arrived at, is, that it is not clearly made out, that the surveyors were under a mistake, as to the cause of the leak, or that the repairs were, under the circumstances, injudicious or improper. The case, made out upon the survey and proceedings at Calcutta, appears to me one, in which primâ facie the repairs ought to have been made by the master. The onus under such circumstances is upon the respondents to displace that case; and I am not able to say that it has been done. The most that can be said is, that some doubt has been thrown upon it.

But, assuming that the surveyors have acted upon a mistake (for in my judgment there is not the slightest proof of fraud), and that all the Calcutta witnesses are equally under a mistake, as to the cause of the leak, and that the mistake, though then undiscovered and undiscoverable by the exercise of ordinary diligence, is now demonstrable upon a mere critical review of evidence then unattainable, but now within the reach of the parties, from the shipwrights who constructed the ship, and others, who are of great skill and experience; I say, assuming this to be the present position of the case, what is now to be the effect? Is the master, acting upon the best advice he could obtain at the time, and with an exercise of reasonable diligence, to be now treated as unworthy of confidence, and his acts utterly void, to bind his owner? What, under such circumstances, was the master to do? The shippers here told us, that they would not have shipped their goods, if substantial repairs had not been made. Was the master to give up all the interests of the voyage upon possible doubts, thereafter to be entertained, as to the repairs? It is true, that the ship was not then in the employment of the owners, but of the charterers for the voyage. But that makes no difference; for whatever it was his duty to do, if the owners had been interested in the freight for the voyage, it was equally his duty to do for the charterers. It seems to me that the master was reduced to this dilemma, either to give up the objects of the voyage, and return with little or no freight, or to go on, and make such repairs, as upon his own judgment, aided by the advice of competent surveyors, would meet the apparent exigencies of the occasion. If he has acted with reasonable discretion and diligence, it seems to me, that under such circumstances his acts ought to bind the owner, or there would be an end to all safety in commercial enterprises.

Then, again, what is the predicament of the lender under the like circumstances? No one pretends, that he is bound to superintend the repairs, or to see to the actual application of the money advanced therefor; or minutely to ascertain the exact amount required for the purpose. All the authorities, ancient and modern, speaking on the point, inculcate a very different doctrine as to his duty and responsibility. He is to see, that an apparent case of necessity for repairs is made out; and he is to take care, that he does not knowingly advance more money than what may be fairly deemed fit for the occasion. But having done this, and acted with good faith, he is protected by the law to the extent of his contract. Nothing more would seem necessary, than to refer to the very clear statements of Emerigon on this subject. Emer. Traité à la Grosse, tom. 2, c. 4, §§ 5, 8. If, then, there has been a mistake made, as to the mode or the extent of the repairs; but it has been unintentional, and after reasonable examination; and there was a leak necessary to be stopped, what has the lender to do with the matter? He is not supposed by the law to have any skill, or to exercise any particular judgment as to the mode of repairs. He may be utterly incompetent to decide upon such subjects; and he may be driven to rest his conduct upon the skill and judgment of others of reasonable nautical experience and practical knowledge. "Non oportet" (says the civil law), "creditorem ad hoc adstringi, ut ipse reficiendae navis curam suscipiat, et negotium domini gerat" (Dig. lib. 14, tit. 1, l. 7); and such is the language of all maritime jurists. For the same reason, the lender has no obligation on him to search out and ascertain the true cause of the loss, or the damage which requires the repairs. It belongs not to him rerum cognoscere causas; it is sufficient, that the necessity of the repairs is made apparent, and that he has made due inquiry into that fact. But, then, it is said, that the lender in this case made no inquiries, and exerted no diligence. But no proof is given to that effect. We find him advancing his money, and taking a bottomry bond from the master for the amount, which bond recites the ship's necessities; and it is to be presumed that he first made all due and reasonable inquiries on the subject which the occasion required. If the state of facts was such as justified the repairs, no diligence was necessary, except perhaps to ascertain whether the master had any other funds or credit, which is not pretended in this case; or at least was not made out at the argument. If there was no real necessity, and yet the lender could not by any diligence have ascertained the fact, the law would not force him to fruitless inquiries. If there was an apparent necessity, and farther inquiries would not have changed that predicament of the case, then it would be sufficient for him to act upon that apparent necessity. But it is hardly credible, that he should not have been informed of the survey, and of the opinion of the surveyors, and of the nature and extent of the repairs, for which he was required to advance his money. Indeed the bottomry bond contains a recital that, "a regular and careful survey had been made on the ship, and then it was found, &c. &c." What further duty of diligence was required of him? How is it shewn, that upon further inquiries his judgment would have been enlightened on the subject? Not a single Calcutta witness has been examined to disprove the state of things certified by the surveyors. I must presume, therefore, that none would be found, who would disprove it.

Having said thus much upon the general principles applicable to the case, and the material facts, so far as they bear upon the rights and duties of the bottomry lender, the subject is, with me at least, exhausted.

I have not thought it necessary to spread upon this opinion a minute survey of the evidence for, or against particular conclusions or presumptions. I have limited myself to such results as seemed to me to dispose of the whole merits of the case, so far, at least, as my judgment is concerned. In a case of this sort, I have not been able to persuade myself, that any comparison and balancing of minor facts, or supposed contradictions, though eminently fit and proper at the argument, would be of any service in the final judgment, which, after all, must rest upon a broad and general survey of the material facts necessary to sustain the bond. My judgment is, that the bottomry bond is well sustained; and that a decree ought to be rendered affirming its validity, and decreeing to the libellant the amount thereof with interest and costs.

FORT SCOTT (KEANE v.). See Case No. 7,631.

Case No. 4,954.

The FORTUNA.

[1 Brock. 299.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. North Carolina. Spring Term, 1815.[2]

PRIZE — VESSEL SAILING UNDER NEUTRAL FLAG — CONCEALED PAPERS — ENEMY'S PROPERTY.

A vessel, sailing under a neutral flag, was captured by an American private armed schooner, and brought into a port of the United States for adjudication. The vessel and cargo were libelled, by the captors, as enemy's property, and a claim was interposed, by neutrals, who appeared, by the ship's papers, to be the proprietors; but after the arrival of the vessel in the United States, other papers were found, artfully concealed, tending to show that the vessel and cargo were, in truth, British property; Great Britain and the United States being then at war. The concealed papers examined and compared with the ship's papers, and the vessel and cargo condemned as enemy's property; but order for further proof made, if an appeal should be taken, leaving the question of its admissibility to be determined by the supreme court.

[See note at end of case.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of North Carolina.]

The Fortuna, sailing under Russian colours, left Riga on the 2d of September, 1813, for London, where she arrived; and from thence, sailed on the 18th of November, 1813, in ballast, on a voyage to the West Indies, took a British convoy at Portsmouth, in England, and proceeded with it to Barbadoes, and thence to Jamaica. From thence she sailed to the Havanna, where she arrived on the 12th of February, 1814; took in a cargo of the produce of Cuba, and left the port of the Havanna on the 25th of March, 1814, under protection of a British convoy, bound to Bermuda. After parting with the convoy, she was captured on the 19th of April, 1814, in the latitude of 38°, west long. 60°, by the private armed schooner Roger, and brought into Wilmington, North Carolina, for adjudication. The master, and all the crew, except the mate and two seamen, were taken out, and kept on board the privateer until the 14th of August, when they were sent in to be examined. A claim was interposed by the master for the ship, as the property of Martin Krause of Riga, one of the house of trade of M. & J. Krause, of that place, for 1520 boxes of sugar, and 144 quintals of Campeachy wood, as the property of M. & J. Krause: for 160 boxes of sugar, as the property of J. F. Muhlenbruck, as the master understood, "a native of Germany, and of late usual abode at Hamburg," and who went out in the vessel, and shipped the whole of the cargo; and for small portions of the cargo, as the property of the master, and of a Swedish captain, Steinmeitz.

There were found on board, a certificate of the built of the ship in Finland; a passport or sea brief to proceed to London, granted at Riga, by the harbour-master and commander at that place; a bill of sale of the ship, from P. A. Severnon & Son, of Riga, to Martin Krause; and certificates of naturalization of the crew. The cargo was documented in the usual formal manner. The prize master, in his affidavit, on delivering up the ship's papers, sworn to on the 7th of July, 1814, states, "that the said papers were found in the said ship, at three different periods, and that on coming into his possession, or on discovery thereof, he proceeded with them forthwith, and without delay, to the admiralty office, &c., and that the last parcel of papers were, on the 8th of June last, being a considerable time after the arrival of the said ship, found concealed in a tin box, carefully let into an old piece of timber, to wit, part of the frame or belfrey of a vessel, by means of a mortice hole, which said mortice hole was covered with a piece of wood, in a way to elude observation, and which said piece of timber was stowed away among the ship's firewood," &c. Certain papers were also found in the master's trunk, after the ship's arrival.

In his examination, on the standing interrogatories, the master swore, that he was employed and appointed by a Mr. Hoffengartner, who gave him possession of the vessel in London, in 1812; that the said Hoffengartner was then travelling; and died about March, 1813; but his place of abode, birth, and country, the master did not know. That Messrs. Bennett & Co. of London, gave him his instructions, and informed him, that Martin Krause had directed them to fit out the ship, and order her to the Havanna. That the ship had before gone by some other name, which he did not recollect. That a bill of sale of the ship was made to Martin Krause, by the person from whom the said Krause purchased, but whose name he did not recollect, nor the time when it was made, nor in the presence of what witnesses; and there was no engagement different from, or in addition to, the bill of sale. He assigned, as his reasons for placing the papers in the piece of wood, that they were partly papers not belonging to the vessel, and partly private letters, and he did not wish to have them mixed with the ship's papers, as it might possibly create confusion, and that they might be put aside, when boarded by any private armed vessels, and, if there should be a necessity, produced when called for.

[2] [Affirmed in 3 Wheat. (16 U. S.) 236.]

The ship and cargo were condemned in the district court, and the claimants appealed to this court.[3]

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The Fortuna, a vessel sailing under Russian colors, was captured on a voyage from the Havanna to some port in Europe, by the American privateer Roger, and brought into the port of Wilmington, where she was libelled by the captors as enemy's property. The vessel and cargo were claimed as belonging to neutrals. Both were condemned in the district court as prize of war, and from that sentence the claimants have appealed to this court.

The ship's papers, which were found at the time of capture, represent the vessel as Russian, and the bills of lading and other papers, relative to the cargo, represent that as the property of the neutral claimants. The testimony of the captain and crew comports with these papers. There is, indeed, some apparent contradiction in the affidavits given at different times by the captain. In his claim, and in one of the affidavits, he says that the Fortuna was the property of Martin Krause; in another affidavit he states her to be the property of M. & J. Krause. Now as M. & J. Krause were partners in trade, both Russians, and both residing at Riga, it was perfectly immaterial whether the vessel belonged to one or both of them, and it is entirely probable, as M. & J. Krause were the ostensible owners of the principal part of the cargo, that this inaccuracy of expression in one of the affidavits might escape him inadvertently, or might, as has been stated, be the fault of the translator or person who wrote the affidavit. Although such negligence in those who give testimony in any cause, must be very reprehensible, it would be punishing it rather severely, even if it were certainly committed by the witness, to confiscate a ship in consequence of it. I should, therefore, not lay much stress on that circumstance. But while the Fortuna lay in the port of Wilmington, a canister containing several papers was found concealed in an old piece of timber. It appears that in the port of Havanna, just before the sailing of the vessel, the carpenter had been taken into the cabin by the captain, who brought in at the same time this piece of wood. They were locked in together, and while there, the canister was let into the timber, and a piece of wood morticed over it for the purpose of concealing it. The timber was then thrown into the hole of the ship. The papers thus concealed have a material influence on the cause. The claimants represent Messrs. Bennett & Co. of London, to be the agents of M. & J. Krause of Riga, with respect to the vessel, the voyage, and the cargo. Bennett & Co. are supposed to have empowered a Mr. Muhlenbruck, a German, to purchase a cargo at the Havanna, to which place the Fortuna sailed in ballast, with which she was to return to Riga, touching on her return at Leith or some British port. The concealed papers furnish considerable ground for suspecting, that both the vessel and cargo are, in fact, the property of Bennett & Co.

The first of these secreted papers, contained in the transcript of the record, is a letter of instructions from Bennett & Co. to Captain Behrens, dated London, 18th November, 1813, immediately before the departure of the vessel for the Havanna.[4] This letter commences

[3] The editor, not having access to the record in this case, which was decided in North Carolina, has adopted the statement published in [The Fortuna] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 161. See note of the decision of the supreme court, at the end of this case.

[4] "London, 18th November, 1813. Captain Henry Behrens,—As we have settled your ship's accounts, by paying you a balance of £206. 16s. 11d., up to November 13th, we now agree, that the arrangement made with Messrs. M. & J. Krause, when you were last at Riga, shall continue in force for the pending voyage, as far as relates to your pay and primage, and we agree to pay you a gratuity of £100 sterling, at the exchange current, whenever your voyage shall end; and, likewise, to allow you your cabin freight at the rate which the ship receives for her cargo. We have ordered Mr. J. F. Muhlenbruck, to supply you with the cash necessary for your expenses in the Havanna, when arrived out, which we beg may be as little as possible. And in case of your wanting any aid in Portsmouth, apply to Mr. Andrew Lindergreen, or in Plymouth, to Messrs. Fuge & Son, or in Falmouth, to Messrs. Fox & Son, who will supply you, on showing this letter. We desire that you will, with your ship Fortuna, as speedily as possible, join the West India convoy, now laying at Portsmouth, taking sailing instructions, and proceed with the same convoy to the Havanna, where you will apply to Mr. J. F. Muhlenbruck, at Messrs. Ychazo & Carricabura, merchants, there. You will receive, at the Havanna, Mr. J. F. Muhlenbruck's instructions, which you will follow implicitly. Mr. J. F. Muhlenbruck goes out to the Havanna, on board the Robert Bruce, or some other vessel in the convoy, if the Robert Bruce is too late. Should any accident befall him in the vessel, on board of which he goes, so that it is ascertained that Mr. J. F. Muhlenbruck cannot arrive at the Havanna, or if he should not be arrived there sixty days after you have arrived there, you will consult with Messrs. Ychazo & Carricabura, what is best to be done. Should the convoy be gone, on your arrival at Portsmouth, you are at liberty to follow it without convoy. Wishing you a good voyage, we remain, &c. (Signed) Bennett & Co. P. S. On your arrival at Leith, apply to Ogilvie & Patterson."

thus: "As we have settled your ship's accounts, by paying you a balance of £206. 16s. 11d., up to November 13th, we now agree," &c. The Exhibit No. 40 is an account (headed, "Dr.—Ship Fortuna,—Cr."), the balance on which is £206. 16s. 11d. The Dr. side of this account charges the ship with an account from Riga, due the captain, with primage going to Riga, the same from Riga, with cabin freight, and with his monthly wages from the 6th of May, to the 13th of November, and credits the ship by account against the captain from Carlscrona, the same from Gottenburg, and account in London, leaving the balance of £206. 16s. 11d. The balance arising against the captain, in London, is taken from Exhibit No. 3, which is headed, "Expenses in London, on the Voyage from Riga, Homeward." The account amounts to £202. 2s. 10d., and contains a credit for £300, received from Messrs. Bennett & Co., in cash, leaving, against the captain, the balance of £97. 17s. 2d., which is carried into the general account for final settlement. The Exhibit No. 1 is headed, "Expenses of the Ship Fortuna in Riga in the Month of July," and amounts to 1602.54⅔, Russian currency. A credit is there given in the following words: "From Mr. J. Krause in Riga, I received in cash 1600 roubles, leaving a balance in Russian currency due the captain of 2.54⅔, Russian currency." The same exhibit contains the expenses at Carlscrona, amounting to 161.39, and credits cash received from Buhling 180, leaving a balance against the captain of 18.9. Also, expenses in Gottenburg, amounting to 154.7, and credits by cash received from Mr. Wildenberg 150, leaving a balance due the captain of 4.7.

The appearance of these accounts demonstrates that no settlement was made with the captain at Riga, at Carlscrona, or Gottenburg which included them, but that advances were made to him at those places, respectively, to be accounted for by him when his accounts should be finally adjusted by Bennett & Co., and that the account itself was not stated, until after his return to England. The expenses of the whole voyage appear to be on the same paper, beginning at Riga. There, Mr. Krause is credited with a round sum of 1600 roubles, leaving due the small balance of two roubles and a fraction. This is the natural course of a person directed to make advances to the captain of a ship, but it is not credible that, had the account been settled, the precise balance would not have been paid. Precisely the same thing occurs at Carlscrona and at Gottenburg. At each place a round sum, as a sum in gross, is advanced, nearly the sum due, but never the exact balance. Then, these accounts appear, forming one exhibit, I suppose, drawn upon the same paper, showing that no account had been rendered at either of the foreign ports, but that the whole was received for adjustment with Bennett & Co. This is certainly very natural if Bennett & Co. be the owners of the ship, having agents at Riga, Carlscrona and Gottenburg, but very extraordinary if Krause at Riga was the owner, and Bennett & Co. were their agents in London. The force of this circumstance is, however, very much impaired by a paper which shows, that on the arrival of the Fortuna in Riga, in June, 1813, a settlement of some kind took place, in which the captain's wages, up to the 6th of May, and those of the crew, to the 22d of May, were included. With whom the settlement was made does not appear, but in the subsequent final adjustment with Bennett & Co., the wages of the captain and crew are calculated from the date at which this paper states them to have been paid. It appears then, that a settlement took place on his arrival at Riga on the 7th of June, including his wages to the 6th of May, and those of his crew to the 22d, and that his expenses at Riga, and at other ports, were to be settled in London on his return. There is some difficulty in accounting for the settlement as respects wages, if the vessel arrived at her home port in June. The most rational solution of the difficulty would seem to be, that his voyage commenced in May in London, and was to terminate in London, a circumstance from which it would rather be inferred that London had become her home port, rather than that Riga continued to be so. This is corroborated by the manner in which the account is headed, "Expenses in London on the Voyage from Riga Homeward." The critique on the word "homeward" is not sustained, for it is the voyage that is homeward, and the meaning is, expenses paid or settled in London, but incurred on the voyage. And we find in the account, the wages of the men from the last settlement. This phraseology might be used by men accustomed to consider London as their home, although the vessel might be chartered from a foreigner, but it could not be expected from a Russian captain, commanding a Russian ship, owned and sailing in the employ of Russians.

The other accounts in this record, relate chiefly to the Ceres, a vessel commanded by Captain Behrens, before he was placed in the Fortuna. They are somewhat mysterious, from the general want of dates, and names; but this may be readily accounted for. In other respects, they are not calculated to dissipate suspicion. That money was paid by Bennett & Co. in London, on account of the Ceres, furnishes strong ground for the opinion, that the account of December, 1812, was rendered to Bennett & Co. Now, that account appears, upon the face of it, to have been prepared for final settlement of the owners, or person, who acted as owner. The Fortuna and the Ceres, too, would seem to be under the management of the same person. Now, there is proof, that Bennett & Co. were the managers, and most probably, the owners of the Ceres; but we should not be justified by any paper or testimony in the cause, in supposing that the Ceres was owned by Krause, or that Behrens was ever employed by him, or known to him, until he was placed in the Fortuna. These accounts, taken together, certainly indicate a long connexion between Bennett & Co., and Captain Behrens, and seem to show, that they were in the habit of employing him in their vessels. After referring to the settlement which had been made, the letter of instructions proceeds thus: "We now agree, that the arrangements," &c. It has been very properly remarked, that this agreeing to confirm the contract made by Krause in Riga, is not the language of an agent, relating to a transaction of his principal; but it is undoubtedly true, that the agreement made by Krause, might terminate on the arrival of the ship in London, when a new contract might be made for the voyage to the Havanna, for the basis of which, the parties took the agreement at Riga. There are, however, in this contract, expressions which appear somewhat suspicious. It commences thus: "On the following conditions, have I given to Captain Henry Behrens, the command of the ship Fortuna, under Russian colours, lying, at present, at Riga."[5] This contract is dated in August 1813. These words, certainly import, that under this agreement, Captain Behrens took command, for the first time, of the Fortuna. Yet, in fact he took command of her in London, in 1812, and had sailed in her as commander from London, to the Baltic. This cannot be a confirmation of his previous appointment in London, for it is not the language of approbation or confirmation, but of original appointment. And this appears to be more than two months after the arrival of Behrens at Riga. The language does not appear to be at all fitted to the occasion, and whenever that occurs, there is much cause to suspect that it is uttered with an object, and for a purpose, not avowed. If it be supposed, that this contract was made in contemplation of the voyage to the Havanna, the difficulty is shifted, but not removed. The question recurs, what need had this contract of the confirmation of Bennett & Co.? or of the gratuity of £100? There is too much reason to suspect, that this is a feigned paper, prepared to give the ship the appearance of her being owned by Krause. It is a little remarkable, too, that Bennett & Co. speak of it, as an arrangement made with M. & J. Krause, whereas it purports to be made with J. Krause only. The letter proceeds, "We have ordered Mr. J. F. Muhlenbruck to supply you with the cash necessary for your expenses in the Havanna, when arrived out, which we beg may be as little as possible." The letter proceeds to mention persons to whom he may apply for aid, in different ports in England.

It cannot escape observation, that this letter contains no reference to the interests of the Russian merchants. The money is not to be advanced on their account. Mr. Muhlenbruck is not represented as their agent, or as advancing money on their account. The caution to economy, is not for the sake of his owners. This is certainly the language of an actual owner, but is very unlike the language of an agent. The letter then proceeds to give detailed instructions for the observance of the directions of Mr. Muhlenbruck, in the Havanna, without once alluding to any connexion between Muhlenbruck and Krause.

The next letter is dated Havanna, 24th March, 1814, and is written by Muhlenbruck, to Bennett & Co.[6] This letter is written [5] "On the following conditions, have I given to Captain Henry Behrens, the command of the ship Fortuna, under Russian colours, lying, at present, in Riga. 1. Captain Behrens shall have 25 Alberts dollars, monthly wages. 2. The whole cabin freight has been allowed him. 3. He is to receive 5 per cent. primage. 4. Travelling expenses for the benefit of the vessel, as likewise, victualling expenses for the use of the ship in port, consistent with moderation, have been allowed to the captain. Captain Behrens, on his part, promises to watch the interest of his owner, in every respect, and do the best he can for the benefit of the vessel. For the fulfilment of the present contract, I bind myself by my signature. Riga, the 12th of August, 1813.

"Per Proc. John Krause, (Signed) "Schultz."

[6] Havanna, 24th March, 1814. Messrs. Bennett & Co., London—Gentlemen: I have the honour to refer you to my last letters, of 21st February, and the 1st of March, of which I have sent you, by different opportunities, triplicates. The first letter principally contained to request the favour of your opening me a credit in Jamaica, or Cadiz, to be able to settle the surplus of the amount already shipped, which may be left out of the proceeds of the outbound shipment, of the Robert Bruce. I hope that the above letter has reached you in time to grant me, as soon as possible, the favour, and beg to be convinced, that only the greatest necessity engages me to request it: not being able to draw on either England or America. I have now the greatest pleasure to inform you of the safe arrival of the Robert Bruce, James Chessel, master, under the protection of his majesty's ship North Star, Captain Thomas Coe, from Jamaica. From Cork she sailed with convoy, consisting of his majesty's ship Leviathan 74, Captain Adam Drummond, the Talbot, 20, Captain Spelman Swaine, and the Scorpion of 18 guns. Therefore, she has been the whole voyage under convoy and the insurers have to pay the full return of 6 per cent. The North Star, which sails to-morrow, takes all the ready vessels for Europe out to Bermuda; from thence another convoy will be granted to protect them to England, or at least as far as the latitude of Halifax. The Russian ship Fortuna, Captain Behrens, laden with 1520 boxes assorted sugars, bound to Riga, and for account and risk of Messrs. M. & J. Krause at that place, is ready to join this convoy. I enclose you invoice and bill of lading, which you will be pleased to forward with the first opportunity to the above friends. The captain, Behrens, has got instructions from me to tack, according to the prevailing winds, either in Leith or in the channel. By the present circumstances on the continent of Europe, Messrs. M. & J. Krause may have been induced with circumspection, and represents the transaction in a manner entirely conforming to the pretensions of the claimants, and is certainly adapted to the inspection of cruisers. It could therefore be concealed only with a hope of keeping Bennett & Co. entirely out of view, if with any fraudulent motive. Taken alone, I should not be inclined to yield to the suspicions it has excited; taken in connexion with the letter of Bennett & Co. to Behrens, I acknowledge it acquires a meaning which might not otherwise be affixed to it. "The Russian ship, Fortuna, &c." This style of communication would rather create the idea, that with respect to the Fortuna, Muhlenbruck was the direct agent of M. & J. Krause, and gave this intelligence to Bennett & Co. as the friends and correspondents of that house; than that he was in fact the agent of Bennett & Co. appointed and instructed by them, with respect to this very vessel. "I enclose you invoice and bill of lading, which you will be pleased to forward by the first opportunity to the above friends." From this language, it could never be inferred, that Bennett & Co. had the sole management and direction of the vessel, and had employed Muhlenbruck, as a person who would obey and account to them. But if the invoice and bill of lading were intended for M. & J. Krause, why not have sent it in a letter to them? Why through Bennett & Co.? He then says, that he has given the captain orders to touch at Leith, or some port in the channel, according to winds, and gives as a reason for these orders, that M. & J. Krause may have been induced to countermand the destination to Riga, in some letter to their correspondents Bennett & Co.: thus studiously preserving the idea, that he acted directly for M. & J. Krause, and that the voyage was under their management, not under that of Bennett & Co. He suggests, that the idea of touching at Leith, or in the channel, originates with himself, and yet it appears from a postcript to the instructions given to the captain, by Bennett & Co., that they had ordered him to touch at Leith. "On your arrival at Leith," say they, "apply to Messrs. Ogilvie & Patterson." The next sentence requests them, should they have received orders from M. & J. Krause, to communicate them immediately to Captain Behrens; a request very proper from the agent of M. & J. Krause to their correspondents, but very extraordinary, if made by the agent of Bennett & Co., who were themselves, the sole managers of the vessel and voyage. The letter proceeds, "Please to inform, also, M. & J. Krause, that I have advanced here the captain $1332.04, for the use of the ship Fortuna." Who, that should collect his knowledge of the fact from this letter, would, or could suppose, that this money had been advanced by the agent of Bennett & Co., and by their express orders?

This letter, so far as it respects the Fortuna, is obviously intended to impress the idea, that Muhlenbruck was employed by M. & J. Krause, and that Bennett & Co. had neither the management of the vessel or cargo, but were written to by him, as the friends and correspondents of the owners at Riga, who might possibly have received instructions from them. Yet the letter of instructions from Bennett & Co. to Behrens, and their letter to the merchants at Charleston demonstrate, that if they were not the owners, they had the sole and exclusive management of the vessel and voyage, and that Muhlenbruck was their agent, appointed to superintend the affairs of the Fortuna, and of other vessels, acknowledged to be owned, or employed, by them. Why thus disguise the truth? If Bennett & Co. were not the owners of the vessel and cargo, but were, in fact, the agents of M. & J. Krause of Riga, with unlimited powers, why not address them in their real character? Why not write to them as the p rsons having full power o.e· the s ıbject, who had authorized Muhlenbruck to purchase a cargo for their friends, and who were responsible to him for the money he had advanced by their order? The letter of instructions from Mr. Muhlenbruck, to Captain Behrens, is written precisely in the spirit of that part of the letter to Bennett & Co., which relates to the Fortuna. It is precisely such a letter as would be written by the immediate agents of M. & J. Krause, supposing them to retain in their own hands, the control of the voyage, to their friends and correspondents, who had no certain agency in the business, but might possibly have received letters for the ship, countermanding orders previously given.

I will here notice the letter written by Mr.

to send this cargo to a better market than it probably meets at Riga. Should they have given you any instructions concerning this vessel, the captain, Behrens, has orders to wait for your kind information in regard of the further destination, which orders from you I beg to send him as soon as you know at what port of the above mentioned he has arrived in England. Please to inform also Messrs. M. & J. Krause, that I have advanced here the captain 1332 dollars, 4 cents, for the use of ship Fortuna. Next week the cargo of the Robert Bruce will be all delivered, and I endeavour to procure the highest prices possible. The oznaburgs will sell as well as the estopillas, but I am sorry you was not able to get more of the latter, and of a finer quality, being always the leading article of an assortment of linen. The prices of sugar are nearly the same, and the arrival of this convoy has brought them up ⅛ to ¼ dollar higher. Coffee is lower, and I expect to buy and lay in good coffee at 10 to 12 dollars. Messrs. Hubberts, Taylor & Simpson inform me that I may not expect a convoy leaving Jamaica before the 30th of April. This same convoy can arrive here the 10th or 15th of May, and all possible exertion shall be made on my side to get the Robert Bruce laden before this time. I have till now not received an answer of Messrs. Hubberts, respecting the bills on London. Your kind letter of the 18th of December, I have duly received. I am happy that the sugars are bought within your limits, and wish to be as fortunate with those wanted for the Robert Bruce's cargo. I have the honour, &c. (Signed) J. F. Muhlenbruck."

Muhlenbruck, at the Havanna, to M. & J. Krause.[7] This letter was not secreted, but kept among the ship's papers. Who, that should read this letter, would imagine that Muhlenbruck had been appointed, not by M. & J. Krause, but by Bennett & Co.? Who, that has read the letter of instructions from Bennett & Co. to Behrens, would not expect that this letter would contain some reference to the manner in which the writer became the agent of the persons to whom the letter is addressed? If to this it be said, that this may have been done in a previous letter, I answer, that if any such previous letter had been written, it would, according to mercantile usage, have been referred to in this letter; and the stay of Muhlenbruck, in the Havanna, had been so short, as to diminish the probability of his having written a previous letter to Riga. I think it almost impossible, that a stranger, slipped by Bennett & Co. into the business of M. & J. Krause, would have written them a letter without hinting at the manner in which he became their agent, or referring to the information they might have received on this subject from Bennett & Co. The proof of any previous letter, or connexion, might diminish, or, perhaps, destroy the impression this letter is calculated to make, but, at present, it has much the appearance of being prepared for the purpose of keeping Bennett & Co. out of view. Such studious concealment always conduces to the opinion, that the person thus kept out of view, is more than a mere agent.

The concealment of the canister, in the piece of timber, cannot, I admit, give to the papers a meaning which their words would not justify. But it shows that the captain, who was much trusted by Bennett & Co., and had, most probably, been long employed by them, believed that these papers contained something which he ought to conceal; what could this be, but the agency of Bennett & Co.? And why should he conceal that, if they were no more than agents? If the letters appeared to be all written with the same view; if Bennett & Co. appeared throughout, as the avowed agents of M. & J. Krause, there would be nothing extraordinary, or suspicious, in the transaction; and there could be no fair reason for attempting to conceal this agency. It would seem as if the original design was to keep them entirely out of view, and the agency was kept in reserve, as the dernier ressort, if the part they had taken should be discovered. My present impression is, that if the original purchase of the Fortuna was not made by Krause, for Bennett & Co., she was transferred to them before the commencement of this voyage, and that they are to be considered as the owners of the ship, and of that part of the cargo which is claimed for M. & J. Krause. There is no proof that Muhlenbruck is domiciliated in England, and his property would be restored if he stood in court unimpeached. But he is so deeply concerned in this whole fraud, if it be one, that he must suffer the consequences of fraud. The property claimed by him, is, on that account, condemned also. This cause operates equally against the claim of the captain. There is, however, a small claim of a Swedish captain, which is not infected with this general contamination, and which, therefore, ought to be restored.

The conduct of the privateer, though justly reprehensible, cannot be punished by this court in the manner required by the counsel for the complainants. If their case depended, in any degree, on the testimony of the sailors who were taken out of the ship, and might be tampered with, that testimony might be disregarded. Any circumstance in the cause, which could be accounted for by the removal of the persons who ought to have remained in the prize, might be leniently considered; but it is apparent, that the cause rests on testimony in no degree affected by these circumstances, and that the question before the court, appeals, not to its discretion, but to its judgment.

The sentence of the district court is affirmed, with costs, except as to the claim made for Captain Steinmeitz, a Swede, with respect to which, it is reversed, and restitution ordered.

This case might be very much altered by a claim made by M. Krause, in person, or by affidavit, for the vessel, and by M. & J. Krause, for the cargo, by the exhibition of original letters, showing the ownership of the Fortuna, and the plan of this voyage; by the exhibition of letters, showing that Muhlenbruck's appointment was communicated to the house at Riga; by the letter of instruction from Bennett & Co. to Muhlenbruck, showing that he was to act for M. & J. Krause; and by any letter from Muhlenbruck to Krause, communicating his situation to them. I do not suspend the cause, to give time for the production of these papers, because they ought now to be ready; but if an appeal should be prayed, I will make an order for further proof, leaving it to the supreme court, to decide on its admissibility.

[7] "Havanna, 24th March, 1814. Messrs. M. & J. Krause, Riga,—With the present, I have the honour to send you the invoice, and bill of lading, of a cargo of sugars for your esteemed account, in the Fortuna, Captain H. Behrens. The ship could not take more than 1520 boxes, white, and 600, brown, with Campeachy wood, which was necessary for stowing: together, $57,517.04; for which you will please give me credit. The sugars are of the new crop; bought at a moderate price, and of a very good quality. And I flatter myself you will be satisfied with the fulfilment of your kind commission. As there is a convoy leaving this place to-morrow, for Bermuda, I found it advisable for the Fortuna to join the same, and wish her a very quick and safe passage. Of the above documents, I shall send you duplicates, when I have the honour to write you again. The prices of Russian articles are, at present, raven's duck, $16; canvass, $42. Iron can only be sold with a loss, and in small quantities, as the price has fallen, &c. (Signed) J. F. Muhlenbruck."

NOTE. From this judgment, an appeal was taken to the supreme court, and the cause was argued at the February term, 1817, by Mr. Gaston and Mr. Hopkinson, for the appellants and claimants, and by Mr. Wirt, for the appellees and libellants. The court ordered that both parties be at liberty to produce further proof. [The Fortuna] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 161. At the February term, 1818, it was submitted, without argument, upon the further proof, when the decrees of the courts below, were affirmed. The following points were decided: (1) That the cargo was British property, and even admitting the Fortuna to be Russian property (and there were many circumstances to maintain the suspicion that she was British property, or, at least, not owned as claimed), still, where a neutral ship-owner lends his name to cover a fraud, with regard to the cargo, that circumstance alone will subject the ship to condemnation. (2) That it is a relaxation of the rules of prize courts, to allow time for further proof, in a case where there has been concealment of material papers. Id., 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 236–246.

BANKRUPTCY — GOODS IN CUSTODY OF SHERIFF—PAYMENT OF SHERIFF'S COSTS BY ASSIGNEE—LIEN.

1. Where certain creditors attached the stock of goods of a trader for the express purpose of keeping it together and preventing waste, and the attachments were afterwards dissolved by an assignment in bankruptcy, and the sheriff had incurred charges for insurance, packing, &c., held: All necessary and proper charges for the care and custody of the property incurred after the petition in bankruptcy is filed, are incurred for the assignee, and must be paid by him out of the assets.

[Cited in Re Foye, Case No. 5,021; Re Hatje, Id. 6,215; Re Wells, 4 Fed. 71.]

2. If the assignee has taken possession of packing-boxes, policies of insurance, &c., procured by the sheriff, he must pay for the cost of them.

3. The sheriff has no lien for his costs upon a stock of goods attached by him when the attachment has been dissolved by the proceedings in bankruptcy; but the bankrupt court has power to authorize the assignee to pay such part of the costs as can be shown, or may be presumed to have been beneficial to the estate.

[Cited in Gardner v. Cook, Case No. 5,226. Followed in Ex parte Holmes, Id. 6,631.]

In bankruptcy. Several creditors petitioned for payment of the costs of attaching the property of the bankrupt. The evidence was that when Fortune stopped payment these creditors consulted together and agreed to attach his large and valuable stock of goods to prevent its being removed or disposed of; that the sheriff caused it to be carefully examined, scheduled, packed, and stored, and procured insurance upon it. The petitioners alleged that the assignee had adopted and ratified these acts, and had taken the benefit of them, and this was admitted. The petitions were not opposed.

The sheriff has a lien for these charges including that for keeping the property. In re Housberger [Case No. 6,734]. At any rate the assignee may pay all reasonable expenses incurred for his benefit, whether before or after his appointment. He is not to take the assets and repudiate the necessary charges.

Hull & Childs, of New York, for general creditors.

J. H. Whitman, for bankrupt.

LOWELL, District Judge. The bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], in its operation in the New England states, failed to make an equal distribution of the effects of the bankrupt because it preserved the lien which creditors can always obtain by attachment. Mr. Justice Story endeavored to remove this objection by construction. Had not the statute itself expressly reserved all liens, his argument that the assignment operated per se to dissolve attachments would certainly have been very strong, because the attachment is only an incident to the suit, and the bankrupt court might stay the suit; but the language of the act was fatal to this interpretation. Ex parte Foster [Case No. 4,960]; Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612. The insolvent law of Massachusetts dissolved all attachments, but made the costs a preferred debt, whenever the attaching creditor chose to prove his principal debt against the assets. The act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517] dissolves all attachments not four months old, but fails to make provision for the costs; for section 28 refers to costs connected with or growing out of the bankruptcy. This is to be regretted, because there is an obvious injustice in destroying a valid and legal lien without compensation for the necessary expenses attending it. The creditor cannot even prove these costs and take a dividend on them, because, until judgment is obtained, they are not a debt of the bankrupt, for they were not incurred for his benefit, nor at his request.

I am unable to say that the sheriff has any lien for these costs. The attachment merely gives him a right of retainer until the suit is disposed of, and if the plaintiff chooses to discontinue his suit, or to discharge his attachment, the officer's only remedy is by action against the plaintiff himself. The report of the case in New York, cited in the argument, shows that the law is otherwise there, and that there is a right of retainer by the sheriff against the will of both parties. Applying the bankrupt act to such a law, there is perhaps no difficulty in concluding that the dissolution of the attachment does not destroy the right of the sheriff to the lien for costs, which he would have if the parties had themselves agreed to dissolve it. But I do not see how I can adopt that view here.

I have always required the assignee to pay all reasonable and necessary expenses incurred after the date of the filing of the petition, because his title relates to that time, and he is the debtor, by relation, for all such expenses. The bankrupt is bound to see that his estate is kept together and preserved for the assignee, and all the necessary charges for the fulfilment of this duty must be allowed him. In re Grant [Case No. 5,693]. And there is no reason why such sums expended by any person having a lawful connection with the estate should not be paid. The premiums of insurance on policies which have come to the possession of the assignee, and all other similar charges come within this rule, because they were no part of the attachment, and the sheriff would have the right to retain the policies, boxes, &c., until he was repaid. It is like the case of a consignee of goods becoming liable for freight or demurrage; or of the owners of goods saved at sea taking them out of the hands of the salvors, and thereby becoming liable to pay salvage for which there would ordinarily be no personal action.

To recur to the more difficult question whether the mere expenses of an attachment which has been dissolved can be paid by the assignee. Mr. Justice Story authorized such a payment to be made in Ex parte Foster [Id. 4,960], and it is the practice in the district of New Hampshire, as Judge Clark informs me, to allow them. I know of no authority to the contrary. Upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that the bankrupt court may, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, require the assignee to pay such charges as appear to have benefited the estate in his hands, though incurred before the petition was filed and not protected by any absolute lien. It is a very doubtful point, and I should be glad to have my decision reviewed. It is placed on this ground: The attachment of chattels under the laws of Massachusetts requires for its validity that a keeper should be put in possession to preserve the goods to answer the judgment. When the attachment is dissolved by the assignment in bankruptcy it must usually happen that the assignee gets the benefit of this keeping. In this case the benefit is proved as clearly as such a fact can be proved, and it was the distinct purpose of the creditors that this result should be obtained. Equitably considered the assignee has received a benefit, and should sustain the burden. There are some analogous cases to be found, though it must be admitted that they are rare. In England, under a statute which has since been modified, the assignees were empowered to pay for services rendered to a committee of trustees, though the deed appointing the trustees was never valid under the bankrupt law. See Griff. & H. Bankr. 1070, where this and some other similar decisions are mentioned by the learned authors. Our law at section 17 speaks of the necessary disbursements of the assignee, which is very like the language of the English statute under which those decisions were made. But I rely mainly upon the practice of Mr. Justice Story, which was undoubtedly followed throughout this circuit. Ordered accordingly.

FRAUDULENT STOCK—WHEN PURCHASER MAY RECOVER MONEY PAID—WHEN STOCK MAY BE REDUCED—AND HOW.

1. A purchaser of stock illegally issued by the directors of a railroad company at less than the charter price may rescind his contract and recover from his vendor who participated in the illegal issue of the stock the money paid for his stock.

[Cited in State Ins. Co. v. Redmond, 3 Fed. 767; Foster v. Seymour, 23 Fed. 67.]

2. The issue of the stock having been a fraud upon the law and the stockholders, the purchaser, although the stock has been regularly transferred to him upon the books of the company, and there was nothing in the transaction as to him to awaken his suspicion, may elect his remedy, and is not bound to remain content with the stock transferred to him.

[Cited in Taylor v. South & N. A. R. Co., 13 Fed. 155.]

3. A large amount of stock having been thus fraudulently issued, the prior stockholders being entitled to reduce it, in the hands of parties with notice, to the amount actually paid for, the fraud in which the vendor participated is material in its effects upon the rights of the purchaser.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This action is brought to recover the sum of twenty-four thousand dollars, which was paid by the plaintiff to the defendant for stock in the Hillsboro and Cincinnati Railroad Company, on the ground of fraud.

The declaration states that on the 3d of January, 1853, the Hillsboro and Cincinnati Railroad Company were engaged in extending and maintaining their line of road to the Ohio river, at or nearly opposite Parkersburg, in Virginia; that the issue and disposal of the stock were vested in the directors for the time being; that Sturges, the defendant, entered into an unlawful scheme and device with the board of directors, who issued a bond for seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, convertible into stock at par, with an understanding that the bond should be discharged by another bond for the sum of five hundred, twenty-one thousand, six hundred and seventy-seven thousand dollars; that Sturges was elected to convert the bond of the directors into stock, and that they issued to him certificates for fifteen thousand shares of stock, at fifty dollars per share, amounting to the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars; that in payment for such stock as had previously been agreed upon, he executed a bond to the company for five hundred, twenty-one thousand, six hundred and seventy-seven dollars, payable when called for; leaving the sum of two hundred and twenty-eight thousand, three hundred and twenty-three dollars less than the par value of the stock; that the defendant represented himself to be the lawful holder of the stock, so issued to him, and he proposed to sell to the plaintiff six hundred shares of the stock, at forty dollars per share, amounting to the sum of twenty-four thousand dollars; and that the plaintiff believing he was the lawful holder of the stock, purchased from him the six hundred shares, having no notice to the contrary.

The declaration further avers, that Sturges was not the lawful holder of the stock, his subscription for the same being void, as having been made in violation of the charter, for a less price than fifty dollars per share, as fixed by the charter; and the declaration also alleges, that Fosdick received from Sturges an assignment of the six hundred shares of stock, which on application were transferred to him on the books of the company, and a new certificate issued to him, which he brings into court, to be disposed of according to law.

To this count in the declaration a demurrer was filed.

There are other counts in the declaration, but they are not before the court on the demurrer.

The contract declared on, has been executed. Sturges assigned to Fosdick the six hundred shares of stock, and he paid for them twenty-four thousand dollars; and on the presentation of the assignment to the company, the stock was regularly transferred to him on its books. He had not, it seems, from the count demurred to, discovered the alleged frauds until after he had purchased the stock, and it had been regularly transferred to him, on the books of the company.

In the case of Sturges v. Stetson [Case No. 13,568], at the present term, it was held that the directors of the company had no power to receive subscriptions for stock at a less price per share than was fixed in the charter; and consequently, that notes given for stock, so obtained, could not be enforced. Such a subscription was held to be not only in express violation of the charter, but a fraud upon prior stockholders. Sturges, though holding by certificate his fifteen thousand shares of stock, regularly, to all appearance, entered upon the books of the company, was liable on the application to a court of chancery by a prior stockholder, to have his number of shares reduced to their par value.

Fosdick, on the demurrer, must be taken to be a bona fide purchaser of the six hundred shares of stock, without notice. The proceedings on the books of the company, in regard to the subscription of this stock by Sturges, can give rise to no suspicion of unfairness. The bond for seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars to be converted into stock, at the pleasure of the holder, in a limited time, was not out of the ordinary mode of business; and the issuing of the fifteen thousand shares on the surrender of the bond, could awaken no inquiry. The entire transaction in regard to the subscription of this stock, was apparently and clearly within the corporate powers of the company. Under such circumstances it appears to me that a bona fide purchaser of the stock could enforce a transfer of it on the books of the company.

The agents of a corporation have no license for the commission of wrongs. Their powers are limited, but when they circumvent and mislead to his injury an innocent individual, without knowledge to awaken his suspicion, the corporation is liable.

But the right to the six hundred shares of stock by Fosdick was admitted by the directors, and a regular transfer of it to him was entered on their books. And this, it is said, was a consummation of his right, by which he acquired all he contracted for, and all that he expected to receive.

It is true the prospective completion and business of the road have not been realized. But this is a disappointment common to all persons who have engaged in such enterprises. They have given their time and money to objects which have advanced beyond all other improvements the agricultural, the commercial, and the social interest of the country; but they have generally realized heavy pecuniary losses. But these constitute no ground for the rescission of contracts, or of equitable relief, unless fraud be established.

In the illegal issue of the stock, Sturges and the company participated, and they may be equally responsible, to a bona fide purchaser. But if it be admitted that the company, under the circumstances, may be liable to Fosdick, does it follow that he may not exercise his own discretion in regard to the remedy? This seems to be a matter for the determination of the party rather than the court.

The frauds charged against Sturges consist in his participation in the fraudulent issue of the stock, declaring that it had been lawfully issued; in his false and fraudulent representation to Fosdick that he was the lawful owner of the stock, through which false and fraudulent assurances Fosdick was induced to purchase the six hundred shares. These averments of fraud, are all admitted by the demurrer, and must be taken as true.

But, if the frauds alleged do not materially affect the rights of the plaintiff, he is not entitled to a remedy against the company or Sturges. Of the fifteen thousand shares of stock, subscribed by Sturges, at the par value, he paid for only ten thousand four hundred thirty-three and a-half shares; leaving four thousand five hundred sixty-six and one-half shares, for which he paid nothing. These amount much nearer to the one-third than the one-fourth of the fifteen thousand shares subscribed, and, at the par value of these shares, they amounted to the sum of two hundred and twenty-eight thousand six hundred and seventy-seven dollars.

It was held in Stetson's Case, that although the directors in receiving subscriptions for shares of stock, were bound by the price per share fixed in the charter, yet stock when once subscribed became property, and could be sold at any price fairly agreed upon, and that the assignment would convey the shares in full. The six hundred shares of stock were purchased by Fosdick at forty dollars per share, but each share was transferred, at its par value of fifty dollars. On the payment of twenty-four thousand dollars, Fosdick received in stock thirty thousand dollars, and any sum short of that amount will be so much less than he purchased and paid for.

There can be no question that any stockholder, prior to the subscription of Sturges, could, by legal coercion, reduce the stock subscribed by him to the number of shares he paid for, at their par value. And the same principle would apply to all the assignees of the stock, by Sturges, who had notice. This rule applied to Fosdick, would reduce his stock some one hundred and seventy-five shares.

But, if the rule should not apply to Fosdick, he being a bona fide purchaser, still the shares not paid for by Sturges must be distributed and apportioned among the prior stockholders, lessening the stock in value near one-quarter of a million of dollars.

In whatever light this question may be considered, it appears to me, there can be no escape from the conclusion, that the frauds complained of in the declaration are so material in their effect upon the rights of the plaintiff as to entitle him to a rescission of the contract, for the purchase of the six hundred shares of stock, and an action against Sturges for the money paid. The frauds, as alleged, are admitted to be true.

New issues may be raised, and a new aspect given to the case, in its future progress. But, as it now stands on the demurrer, with all the averments of the declaration admitted to be true, I feel bound to overrule the demurrer.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct. Term, 1856.

PATENTS—CLAIM FOR ENTIRE MACHINE AND SEPARATE PARTS—INFRINGEMENT—IMPROVEMENT OF PATENTED MACHINE BY STRANGER—MECHANICAL EQUIVALENTS.

1. A claim in a patent for an entire machine does not deprive the patentee of his right to claim the parts also.

[Cited in Leach v. Dresser, 69 Me. 132.]

2. It is not necessary, to constitute an infringement, that the whole machine should be used. If either one of the parts claimed is used in substantially the same manner in a similar machine, it is an infringement.

3. It is not material what the theory of the patentee, in regard to his invention, may be; but, the question is, do the tools used by the defendant act substantially in the same manner, and produce substantially the same result as those of the plaintiff?

[Cited in Hamilton v. Ives, Case No. 5,982.]

4. The drawings are a part of the description of the thing patented, and are to be considered with the specification.

5. A man may improve a patented machine so as to entitle him to a patent for his improvement; but that will not give him the right to use the invention of the first patentee without his license.

6. The question to be determined on the issue of infringement, is, whether under a variation of form, or, by the use of a thing which bears a different name, the defendant accomplishes, in his machine, the same purpose or effect as that accomplished by the patentee, or whether there is a real change of structure and purpose.

7. If the change introduced by the defendant (as, for instance, the substitution of the spring for the roller) constitutes a mechanical equivalent in reference to the means used by the patentee; and if besides being an equivalent, it accomplishes something useful beyond the effect or purpose accomplished by the patentee, (as, for instance, the effect claimed in its action on winding or warped boards,) it will still be an infringement, as respects what is covered by the patent, although the further advantage may be a patentable subject as an improvement on the former invention.

[Cited in Converse v. Cannon, Case No. 3,144.]

8. It is of no consequence, with respect to the question of infringement, whether the cutters of the defendant are like or unlike the plaintiffs' in respect to their cost, adjustability, mode of sharpening, or any other peculiarity of construction, provided that, notwithstanding such difference of construction, they are in their mechanical action, operation, and effect in the combination, the same with those of the plaintiffs.

This was a special issue out of chancery [in the suit of Robert H. Foss and others against George Herbert], tried by Judge DRUMMOND and a jury, to determine the question of the infringement of the tonguing and grooving combination set forth in letters patent granted to William Woodworth, December 27, 1828, for a "new and useful improvement in the method of planing, tonguing, grooving, and cutting into mouldings, of either plank, boards, or any other material, and for reducing the same to an equal width and thickness, and also for facing and dressing brick and cutting mouldings on, or facing metallic, mineral, or other substances;" extended by the board of commissioners for seven years, from December 27, 1842, extended by special act of congress passed February 26, 1845 [6 Stat. 936, c. 27], for seven years from December 27, 1849, and reissued July 8, 1845. The defendant's machine was known as the "Norcross Tonguing and Grooving Machine," employing a pressure spring, bearing down upon the face of the board at points between the axes of the tonguing and grooving cutter wheels, together with front and rear rollers for feeding, which rollers were pressed down with adjustable springs or screws. The cutter wheels consisted of circular plates cut as one plate out of the solid metal, and secured together upon the spindle with four, six, ten, and twelve teeth projecting from the periphery of the plate, (called, by the defendant, circular saws) and designed for cutting the tongue and groove.

S. A. Goodwin and E. C. Larned, for plaintiffs.

George Herbert and Grant Goodrich, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge (charging jury). This case comes before you on an issue from the chancery side of the court, to determine a question of infringement. Only one question is submitted to you by the court.

This is the sole question you have to consider, and in this respect you have no discretion. It is whether the machine of the defendant is an infringement on the machine of the plaintiffs', and if so, in what particular? You will therefore throw out of view all questions as to the originality or novelty of the Woodworth machine. These questions are not before you, and are not left to you, and you must pay no regard to them. They were not left to you, because they had been tried over and over again in nearly all the circuits of the United States, and as far as the novelty and originality of the patent are concerned, have been in every instance decided in favor of the patent, and it seemed an unnecessary consumption of time to investigate these matters again.

The defendant has used a machine which the plaintiffs allege is an infringement in whole or in part of the Woodworth patent. The first point to determine is the proper construction of the patent and specifications. This is matter of law, and you are to take the law as laid down by the court, as obligatory and controlling upon you whatever your own opinions may be in regard to it. The original patent was granted in 1828. In the original specifications, Woodworth disclaims the invention of circular saws or cutter wheels. He claimed his improved method of cutters for tonguing and grooving. In 1845, the patent was re-issued with amended specifications.

It is this amended patent which governs the rights of the plaintiffs and defendant. In this re-issued patent the invention is described as a machine for planing, tonguing, and grooving boards. The patentee claims as his invention: First. The planing cylinder in combination with the pressure rollers. Second. The combination of the planer with the revolving cutter wheels for tonguing and grooving. With these two claims we have nothing to do, as it is admitted that the planer is not used by the defendant in his machine. Third. The combination of the tonguing and grooving cutter wheel with the pressure rollers, so as to tongue and groove boards in one operation, as described. Fourth. The combination of either the tonguing or grooving cutter wheel with the pressure rollers as described. It is in relation to these two claims that the controversy arises. My views of the law governing the construction of this patent are expressed in Moody v. Fiske [Case No. 9,745.]

I understand that Woodworth claimed an entire machine, and certain combinations of parts of it, which went to make up the entire machine. And for the purpose specified, it is a valid claim. The third and fourth claims are valid claims under this issue, being parts of the combined machine specifically claimed, and a claim of the whole did not deprive him of his right to claim the other parts also. He claims combinations of different things which go to make up the entire machine, which entire machine consists of various parts, and each and all of which he claims as his invention.

Now, it is not necessary that the entire machine should be used to constitute an infringement of the patent; if any one of the parts claimed is used in substantially the same manner in a similar machine, it is an infringement. No person could take out the planer and use the rest, and thereby escape a violation of the patent.

There still remains, after the planer is removed, combinations which Woodworth claims to have invented, and although the planer is gone, it is still the Woodworth machine, shorn only of its planer, and the Woodworth combination for tonguing and grooving, remains.

Is the defendant's machine substantially like the plaintiffs' after the planer is removed from the latter? If it is, it is an infringement. In a patent for a combination there can be no infringement, unless all the material parts entering into the combination are used. You may use the parts provided you do not use the combination.

Thus there is in this case no infringement by using the cutters or the rollers alone, but they must be used in the same combination as in the Woodworth machine, as described in the patent,—that is the one in combination with the other,—to constitute an infringement. There are two particulars in which the alleged infringement consists. I do not see that there can be any controversy in regard to the two outside rollers, in either machine.

The fact that one is weighted with levers, and the other with springs, makes no difference,—they both operate as feed and pressure rollers. The two particulars in which the alleged infringement is claimed to consist are: First. In the use of cutter wheels. Second. In the use of the spring.

Now it is not necessary that the defendant should use the entire machine. It is only necessary that he should use the combination as it is described in the patent, but it must be the identical combination described. With this view other machines have been admitted in evidence. If prior machines were in existence at the time of the Woodworth patent, the only ground on which that patent could be good would be that it was different from such prior machines. It is for you to say whether the machine of the defendant is identical with those prior machines or not. Woodworth does not claim the art or result of tonguing and grooving boards, but only the mode in which he did it. Any person can use any other machine not identical with Woodworth's.

His claim is limited to the method described. The patent claims that the pressure rollers in this combination have the effect to hold the board steady and prevent its being drawn into the axes of the cutters. It is not material what the theory of the patentee was on this point.

Do the tools used by the defendant act substantially in the same manner, and produce substantially the same result as those of the plaintiffs? If the springs do produce substantially the same result, so that one is a mechanical equivalent for the other, then they infringe, and the same rule applies to the cutters. If the cutters of the defendant produce substantially the same result, in substantially the same way, so that the one is a mechanical equivalent for the other, then it is an infringement.

If you believe that the defendant's cutters operate differently on the boards from the Woodworth, that is an important consideration with reference to the question of their identity with those of the plaintiffs. They must not only produce the same result of tonguing and grooving, but they must do it in substantially the same way. You will determine: First. Whether these springs are mechanical equivalents for the pressure rollers of the plaintiffs. Second. Whether the cutters or saws of the defendant are mechanical equivalents for the cutter wheels of the plaintiffs, and whether the two are used in combination with each other in substantially the same manner as in the Woodworth machine. The drawings are a part of the description of the thing patented, and are to be considered in connection with the specifications.

An infringement of a patent takes place whenever a party avails himself of the invention of the patentee without such variation as will constitute a new discovery. A man may improve a patented machine so as to entitle him to a patent for his improvement, but that will not give him a right to use the invention of the first patentee without his license.

A machine is an infringement of another if it incorporate in its structure and operation the substance of the invention,—that is, by an arrangement of mechanism which performs the same service, or produces the same effect in the same way, or substantially the same way. Mere colorable alterations, or adroit evasions, by substituting one mechanical equivalent for another in the combination which constitutes the machine, should never be allowed to protect a party.

The question whether one thing is a mechanical equivalent for another is a question of fact, depending on the testimony of experts, on an inspection of the machines, and it is an inference to be drawn from all the circumstances of the case by attending to the consideration, whether the contrivance used by the defendant is used for the same purpose, performs the same functions, or is applicable to the same object as the contrivance used by the patentee.

The question to be determined is, whether, under a variation of form, or by the use of a thing which bears a different name, the defendant accomplishes, in his machine, the same purpose, object or effect, as that accomplished by the patentee, or whether there is a real change of structure and purpose.

If the change introduced by the defendant (as, for instance, the substitution of the spring in the place of the roller) constitutes a mechanical equivalent in reference to the means used by the patentee, and if besides being an equivalent, it accomplishes as is claimed, some other advantage beyond the effect or purpose accomplished by the patentee,—as for instance the effect claimed in its action on winding or warped boards, it will still be an infringement as respects what is covered by the patent, although the further advantage may be a patentable subject as an improvement on the former invention. It is of no consequence with respect to the question of infringement, whether the cutters of the defendant are like or unlike the plaintiffs' in respect to their cost, adjustability, mode of sharpening, or any other peculiarity of construction, provided that, notwithstanding such difference of construction, the cutters of the defendant's machine are, in their mechanical action, operation and effect in the combination, the same with those of the plaintiffs.

The only question for you to decide is, whether there has or has not been an infringement on the principles laid down by the court. You can find that the defendant has not infringed, in any respect, or that he has infringed, and in what particulars he has infringed.

The jury found a verdict that the defendant infringed the combination of Woodworth for tonguing and grooving in the use of the pressure springs, and the rear rollers in combination with the cutters described.

BILLS AND NOTES—BONA FIDE HOLDER—INDORSEMENT AFTER MATURITY.

1. A bona fide holder of a negotiable note, indorsed before maturity, holds it free of any claim by the maker against the payee. If indorsed after maturity, the indorsee takes it at his risk.

2. L. being solvent, and the debtor of F. & Co. without their knowledge procures and indorses the note of B. his debtor, and places it in the hands of G. to be held for the benefit of F. & Co., and G. holds it in his hands till it is past due, and then delivers it to F. & Co.—held, that B. can not in a suit by F. & Co. on this note, set off the note of L. to H. indorsed by H. to B. after the maturity of the note held by F. & Co.

3. In the absence of all circumstances warranting a presumption of fraud, the indorsement to F. & Co. takes effect from its actual date, and not from the date of its delivery to F. & Co.

Mr. Taffe, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Brush, for defendant.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This suit is brought on a note drawn by the defendant for $1,174 41, payable to Britton Leming, or order, twenty days after date, dated 2d of February, 1847, and indorsed by Leming to the plaintiffs. The defendant has pleaded a set-off to this note, in substance as follows: That before the indorsement of the note to the plaintiffs, Leming was indebted to Bell, in the sum of $750, on a note dated 1st of May, 1847, payable to E. Holmes one day after date, and in the further sum of $750, on a note dated 1st January, 1847, payable to said Holmes, the 1st of June in that year, both indorsed to Bell by Holmes. The matter in controversy between these parties is, whether these notes constitute a legal set-off in the present action. And this depends wholly on the date of the indorsement of the note on which this action is brought. It is very clear, if the plaintiffs became the owners of this note for a good consideration, before its maturity, and without notice of any offset against it by the defendant, the latter can not avail himself in this action of Leming's note to Holmes, indorsed by Holmes to him. It is well settled, that the bona fide holder of a negotiable note, indorsed before it is due, holds it clear of any claim in favor of the maker against the payee, existing before or at the date of the indorsement. In such a case, the remedy of the maker is against the payee. The reverse of this principle obtains, if the note is indorsed after maturity. Then the indorsee takes it at his own risk, subject to any demand in favor of the maker against the payee.

It will be for the jury to decide the question of fact, involving the actual date of the indorsement of the note in question. It would appear from the evidence, that this note became the property of the plaintiffs under the following circumstances, as set forth in the deposition of Joseph R. Gitchell. He testifies, that in January, 1847, Leming sent for the witness; that he went to Leming's house, and found him sick and confined to his room. Leming expressed a wish to secure certain creditors, and especially the plaintiffs in this suit. And for this purpose transferred, for the special benefit of the plaintiffs, an account against the defendant, amounting to $1,300, executing at the same time an order for the payment of the account to them. The defendant, it seems, recognized this transfer, and on the 1st or

2d of February, 1847, paid in cash on the account transferred for the security of the plaintiff, the sum of $135, and gave his note, payable to Leming, for the balance, $1,174 41. This is the note on which this suit is brought—it bears date 2d of February, 1847, and is payable in twenty days. Leming, on that day indorsed the note in blank and delivered it to Gitchell for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs. Gitchell acted as the friend and agent of plaintiffs, but without any previous understanding or conference with them in regard to this transaction. He states, that the note was delivered to the plaintiffs or their agent, in the beginning of May, 1847.

From the evidence before the jury, there seems to be nothing disclosed impeaching this transaction as fraudulent. Leming, who was a bona fide debtor of the plaintiffs, evinced a proper desire that they should be paid, and for this purpose transferred his claim against Bell, as before stated. Subsequently, on the 2d of February, 1847, Bell gave his note for the balance then due on that account, payable to Leming or order, in twenty days, and this note on the same day was indorsed by Leming, and placed in the hands of Gitchell, to be held by him for the benefit of the plaintiffs. There is no evidence that Leming was, at this time, insolvent or even embarrassed in his circumstances; and there is, therefore, no ground to presume an intention on his part, to give a fraudulent preference to the plaintiffs over the other creditors. Nor is there any pretense that he was not justly indebted to the plaintiffs to the amount of this note. If the jury are satisfied that the note on which this suit is brought, was fairly indorsed to the plaintiffs, on the 2d of February, 1847, and on that day became the property of the plaintiffs, through the agency of Gitchell, though not delivered to them till the beginning of May following, it will result, from the principles of law before laid down, that they are entitled to a verdict for the amount of the note and interest

The notes of Leming to E. Holmes, insisted on as a proper matter of set-off against the plaintiffs' claim, were indorsed by Holmes to the defendant on the 1st of May, 1847—more than two months after the maturity of the note indorsed by Leming to the plaintiffs. These notes can not, therefore, be set off in this suit. It would seem, from the evidence, that they were transferred to the defendant upon the condition that they could be set off against the note on which this suit is brought. From this, it is to be inferred that the defendant entertained doubts whether they could be so used, at the time they were transferred to him. He has no ground of complaint that they do not constitute a set-off in this action. By the terms of the agreement between the defendant and Holmes, the former has a clear right to return the notes to Holmes; or, if he prefers that course, he can seek his remedy by suit against Leming. In either case, he will not be a sufferer.

Verdict for the plaintiffs.

Ex parte FOSTER.

In re REMICK.

[5 Law Rep. 406; 1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 232.]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Dec., 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBT—DENIAL BY BANKRUPT—TRIAL BY JURY.

1. In a proceeding in bankruptcy in invitum, the oath of the petitioning creditor is ordinarily a sufficient proof of his debt to sustain his right, but it is liable to be rebutted by counter proofs, and may be overcome by such proofs.

2. Thus, where the supposed bankrupt denies the existence of the debt, and offers prima facie evidence, that it is not due, the oath of the petitioning creditor to the debt, without further proof, is not a sufficient foundation for a decree of bankruptcy.

3. When the existence of the debt is denied, and the petitioning creditor desires a trial by jury, the court may grant it upon a proper issue framed for the purpose of ascertaining, whether the debt is due or not; but if the petitioning creditor does not desire it, the court may or may not, in its discretion, order a trial by jury.

In bankruptcy. On petition for review. This case was certified and adjourned from the district court of Maine, into this court, under the following circumstances. The petitioners proved, before a commissioner, a debt of $526.63, it being the balance of an account for goods sold. The goods were purchased by Remick, of the petitioners in Boston, April 14, and he returned to Portland the fifteenth. On the eighteenth, he sold out his whole stock of goods, exclusive of those he purchased of Foster and Taylor, to one Simeon Pease. The goods which he purchased of Foster arrived on the twenty-fifth of April, part of which were sold by Remick in the ordinary course of business, and on the twelfth of May, by auction bill of sale, he transferred all his stock of goods then remaining in his store, to Pease, including what remained unsold of the invoice purchased of Foster. On the twenty-first of May, Foster came to Portland and compromised the debt, amounting to $1,279.81, for the sum of $700.48, paid by Remick, and gave a receipt in these words: "$700.48. Received of John C. Remick, seven hundred dollars and forty-eight cents in full of all accounts now due up to this date. Foster and Taylor, Portland, May 21, 1842." Foster now contended, that the goods in the first instance were obtained by fraud, the purchaser intending, at the time, to transfer them to another and defraud the seller; and also that he was induced to compromise the debt by false and fraudulent representations made by Remick of his circumstances, and that, therefore, the settlement and receipt having been procured by fraud, were not binding, and that, consequently, they were no bar to his right to recover the full amount of his debt. There were points admitted in the case and testimony offered, from which a jury might or might not infer that fraud was contemplated in the original purchase, and also that Foster was induced to settle and give a receipt in full by false and fraudulent representation. On the hearing in the district court, in Maine [case unreported], the district judge ordered the following questions to be adjourned into the circuit court for a final determination, namely: (1) If the petitioning creditor has sworn to a debt of five hundred dollars or more, and the supposed bankrupt denies the existence of the debt, and offers prima facie evidence that it is not due, is the oath of the petitioning creditor to the debt, without further proof, a sufficient foundation for a decree of bankruptcy? (2) When the existence of the debt is denied, and whether it is due or not, involves a question of fraud, is the fact, whether the debt is due or not, to be decided by the court, or is the existence of the debt to be established by the verdict of a jury on a proper issue to be framed for that purpose?

The case was submitted without argument.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The real controversy in this case, which is a proceeding in invitum by creditors to have the debtor declared a bankrupt, is, whether there is a good and sufficient petitioning creditors' debt to support the proceedings. Two questions are presented upon the facts. As to the first, under the particular circumstances, I am satisfied, that the oath of the petitioning creditors is not sufficient to establish the existence of their debt. In the ordinary course of proceedings of this sort, the oath of the petitioners is a sufficient proof of the debt to sustain his right; but it is liable to be rebutted by counter proofs, and may be overcome by such proofs. In this case, I think the primâ facie evidence of the debt from the oath of the petitioners is completely overcome by the proofs on the other side; and, therefore, the burthen of proof is on the petitioners to establish by evidence beyond the oath, that the debt is a true and subsisting one.

As to the second question, the case clearly does not fall within the proviso of the first section of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9 [5 Stat. 440]. But I think, that it either falls directly within the provisions of the fifth and eighth sections of the act, or, by a close analogy, ought to be governed by similar considerations. The fifth section declares, that "the district court shall have full power to set aside and disallow any debt, upon proof, that such debt is founded in fraud, imposition, illegality or mistake." Now, it seems to me, that the very case now before this court is within the purview of this clause; and that the court is to decide the whole matter, upon examination of all the proper evidence of itself summarily, and sitting as a court of equity, with full equity powers for the purpose. The seventh section, in its introductory provisions, applies, in terms, to cases of petitions by creditors in bankruptcy against a debtor in invitum, as well as to cases of a voluntary petition by the debtor for the benefit of the act. And after having provided that "All proof of debts or other claims of creditors, entitled to prove the same by this act, shall be under oath or solemn affirmation, &c." proceeds to declare: "But all such proof of debts and other claims shall be open to contestation in the proper court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, and as well the assignee as the creditor shall have a right to a trial by jury, upon an issue to be directed by such court to ascertain the validity and amount of such debt or claims." Now, certainly, there is some difficulty in avoiding the conclusion, that this clause of the seventh section does apply to every case, where the creditor seeks to have the fact ascertained by a jury, of the validity and amount of his claim, whatever may be the case of the debtor, where no assignee has as yet been appointed. It strikes me, therefore, that if the creditors, in the present case, should desire a trial by jury, it ought to be granted; but if not desired, then the court may proceed to decide the case of itself, as a summary proceeding in equity. But if this conclusion admitted of some doubt, it seems to me, that it furnishes so clear an analogy, that the court may well follow it, as a guide in the exercise of its general equity jurisdiction in bankruptcy. I shall direct a certificate accordingly, to the district court, as follows: (1) That upon the first question, the oath of the petitioners to the debt, is not, under the particular circumstances, without further proof, a sufficient foundation for a decree in bankruptcy. (2) That upon the second question, if the petitioning creditors desire a trial by jury under the circumstances, the court ought to grant it upon a proper issue framed for the purpose of ascertaining, whether the debt is due or not, as a matter of discretion, if not of right; but that otherwise the court may proceed to decide the case, of itself, by evidence, in a summary proceeding in equity, or may, ex mero motu, in its discretion, require the fact to be tried by a jury.

BANKRUPTCY — JURISDICTION IN EQUITY—ACT OF 1841—LIENS AT LAW AND IN EQUITY — ATTACHMENT—EFFECT OF ADJUDICATION IN BANKRUPTCY—RIGHTS OF ATTACHING CREDITORS.

1. By the bankrupt law of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], the district courts of the United States are possessed of the full jurisdiction of courts of equity over all subject-matters arising in bankruptcy.

2. By the common law, liens exist only in cases, where the party, entitled thereto, has either actual or constructive possession of the goods; but in the maritime law, and in equity, they exist independently of possession.

[Cited in Ex parte First Nat. Bank, 70 Me. 379; Shirk v. Thomas, 121 Ind. 150, 22 N. E. 976.]

3. A lien in equity is not a property in the thing nor does it constitute a right of action for the thing; but is a charge upon the thing.

[Cited in Sullivan v. Portland & K. R. Co., Case No. 13,596.]

[Cited in McAfee v. Reynolds, 130 Ind. 38, 28 N. E. 423.]

4. An attachment on mesne process does not exactly correspond to a lien, either in the sense of the common law, or of the maritime law, or of equity. It is only a contingent and conditional charge, until the judgment and levy.

[Cited in Hubbard v. Hamilton Bank, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 344; Davenport v. Tilton, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 326.]

5. A foreign attachment, like an attachment on mesne process, is a remedy, and, like every remedy, may be defeated by any act, that bars, or takes away the remedy or right to judgment under it.

[Cited in Taylor v. Irwin, 20 Fed. 617.]

[Cited in Ames v. Wentworth, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 296.]

6. Where the property of a bankrupt is attached on mesne process, before proceedings in bankruptcy are instituted, if he obtain a discharge before any judgment is rendered in such suit, it is pleadable as a bar to that very suit, and will prevent the attaching creditor from completing his attachment by a judgment.

[Applied in Ex parte Martin, Case No. 9,149. Cited in Smith v. Gordon, Id. 13,052; Humble v. Carson, 6 N. B. R. 84; Re Brinkman, Id. 1,884. Approved in Re Bellows, Id. 1,278.]

7. By a decree of bankruptcy, all the property and rights of property of the bankrupt are devested from him, and vest in the assignee as soon as one is appointed; and such decree relates back to the time of the petition; consequently, pending the proceedings in bankruptcy, before or after the decree, an attaching creditor will not be permitted to proceed in his suit against the bankrupt to trial and judgment, because there can be no party defendant properly before the court.

[Cited in Ex parte Waddell, Case No. 17,027; Kinzie v. Winston, Id. 7,835; Young v. Ridenbaugh, Id. 18,173; Re Werner, Id. 17,416.]

[Cited in Talcott v. Dudley, 5 Ill. 436.]

8. If an attaching creditor, knowing that proceedings in bankruptcy have been instituted, should nevertheless proceed in his suit to get a judgment against the bankrupt, before an assignee was appointed, it would be a fraud upon the law; and if such creditor should obtain satisfaction of his judgment, it seems, that he would not be allowed to hold the money.

[Applied in Everett v. Stone, Case No. 4,577.]

9. While the bankrupt proceedings are in progress, no attaching creditor, by a mere race of diligence, will be permitted to overreach and defeat the just rights of the other creditors, or the right of the bankrupt, if entitled to a discharge, to plead the same in bar of a judgment in such suit. In such a case, the court will enjoin a creditor from proceeding further in his suit than is necessary to protect his ulterior rights, and will allow the writ and proceedings of the attaching creditor to be entered in the proper court and to be continued, if the creditor elect so to do, until the discharge of the bankrupt is obtained; but not to proceed in the mean time to trial or judgment.

[Cited in Hudson v. Maze, 4 Ill. 583; Kittredge v. Warren, 14 N. H. 527; Leighton v. Kelsey, 57 Me. 86.]

10. Where A. by a writ of attachment from the state court, attached the goods of B.; and soon afterwards B. petitioned for the benefit of the bankrupt act; and then fearing that A. might proceed to get judgment before he could be declared a bankrupt and obtain a certificate of discharge, and levy his execution upon the goods attached, B. applied to the district court for an order to stay further proceedings by A. in the suit, and for other relief; it was held, that the district court had authority to control the proceedings of A. in the suit; and that A. might be permitted to enter his action and continue it; but he had no right, during the proceedings in bankruptcy, to proceed to a trial and judgment in the suit.

[Distinguished in Parker v. Muggridge, Case No. 10,743.]

11. Whether, if the bankrupt fail to obtain his discharge, the attachment would be gone by the mere operation of the bankrupt act; or whether a judgment in personam may be rendered against him, quaere.

[Explained in Re Cook, Case No. 3,152.]

12. Where a suit has been commenced bonâ fide, and the defendant becomes a bankrupt, the actual costs are to be paid out of the estate, but no subsequent costs.

[Cited in Re Fortune, Id. 4,955.]

This was the case of a petition filed by John S. Foster, in bankruptcy, in the district court. [Case unreported.] The petition was, in substance, as follows: "To the honorable the district judge of the district aforesaid John S. Foster respectfully represents, that on the twenty-fifth day of the present month of March, he filed a petition in this honorable court to be declared a bankrupt, pursuant to the provisions of the statute of the United States in that behalf made and provided. And your petitioner further represents, that William Appleton, one of the creditors mentioned in the schedule marked A, annexed to his said petition, did, upon the fourth day of March aforesaid, sue out a trustee writ against your petitioner, from the court of common pleas for the county of Suffolk and commonwealth of Massachusetts, returnable to the next ensuing April term of said court; and did cause to be attached thereon certain of the goods and merchandise belonging to your petitioner, being a portion of his stock in trade mentioned in his schedule marked B, annexed to his said petition; and your petitioner further states, that one Coburn, the deputy of the sheriff of the county aforesaid, to whom said writ was directed for service thereof, did, after notice that your petitioner was about to file his said petition to be declared a bankrupt, remove from the store of your petitioner, divers goods and merchandise of the value of about seven hundred dollars, and still holds and detains the same in his possession. And your petitioner further represents that certain other persons doing business respectively under the names of Davis, Bates and Turner, and Stephen Brownell, likewise creditors of your petitioner, mentioned in said schedule marked A, did, within the said month of March, and prior to the filing of said petition, sue out certain trustee writs against your petitioner from said court of common pleas, returnable at the April term thereof aforesaid, and that they and also said Appleton did cause the Boston Mutual Fire Insurance Company, a corporation doing business in said Boston, and a debtor of your petitioner, to be summoned as a trustee of your petitioner, and the debt due from said corporation to your petitioner to be attached upon said writs respectively. And your petitioner further states, that he is apprehensive that such creditors may obtain judgments in said several suits at an early date of the term aforesaid; and that they may procure executions to be issued thereon, and satisfied out of the property attached as aforesaid, and their several demands on your petitioner to be paid in full, and thereby greatly diminish and reduce the assets of your petitioner, and obtain an undue proportion thereof, to the great injury of the other creditors of your petitioner, and in direct violation of the spirit and true intent of the statute aforesaid, or expose the assignee of your petitioner to great risk and trouble in the recovery of the property attached as aforesaid. Wherefore your petitioner respectfully prays this honorable court, that an order of notice may issue on said petition, &c., and that an injunction may be granted against said attaching creditors, enjoining them from further proceeding against said property of your petitioner, and requiring them to surrender the same to such assignee as may be appointed by this honorable court in the premises; and that such other orders may be issued, and relief granted, as to this honorable court shall seem meet."

The answer of John G. Davis, Benjamin E. Bates, and John N. Turner admitted that on the fourth day of March, current, they had sued out a writ against said Foster, and one Locke, his former partner, upon a joint debt due from said Foster and Locke, returnable to the court of common pleas to be held at Boston on the first Tuesday of April next; upon which writ they caused the Boston Mutual Fire Insurance Company, a corportion, to be summoned as trustees of said defendants, or one of them, and certain goods, effects, or credits of said defendants, then in the hands of said corporation, to be attached. That said attachment was made, and the service of said writ completed, long before said Foster filed his petition in this court to be declared a bankrupt, and without notice to them that he contemplated such an act. And they claimed to hold the goods, effects or credits, so attached, as security for such judgment as they might recover in said writ, as a lien thereon, valid by the laws of Massachusetts. And these respondents further represented that they had incurred expenses and costs in and about said suit, which they prayed the court to consider in any decree which might be made in the premises. Wherefore they prayed that the petition of said Foster might be denied.

The answer of William Appleton was as follows: "And now William Appleton, who has been summoned in the said matter to show cause why he should not be enjoined from further proceedings against the property of said Foster, attached by him, as set forth in said Foster's petition, comes and represents to this honorable court, that he did, on or about the fourth day of March, current, sue out a writ from the court of common pleas for the county of Suffolk, against said Foster, returnable into the next April term of said court, upon a demand legally and justly due him from said Foster; and that on said fourth day of March one Daniel J. Coburn, then and ever since a deputy of the sheriff of said county, did, by virtue of said writ, attach thereon certain personal property of said Foster then in the store occupied by him. That said Coburn preserved said attachment on said goods by a keeper placed in said store, according to the laws and usages of this commonwealth, until the twenty-third day of said March, when, to avoid further expense of a keeper, the said Coburn removed said goods from said store into a place of safety, where he still hath them in custody under and by virtue of said attachment so made as aforesaid on the fourth day of said March, and long before the filing of said Foster's petition to be declared a bankrupt. And said Appleton doth not admit that any notice of an intention on the part of said Foster to file a petition to be declared a bankrupt was given to said Coburn, as set forth in said Foster's petition, and require said Foster to prove that fact, if it be deemed material. And said Appleton further represents, that he has expended large sums of money in making and preserving said attachment, and keeping said property, and that said demand is still due him from said Foster. Wherefore said Appleton prays that said Foster's petition for said injunction against him the said Appleton, and for the surrender of said attached property, be dismissed for his costs. But if said court shall be of opinion that said injunction shall issue and said attached goods be surrendered as prayed for, then said Appleton requests that such orders be passed only on condition that said Appleton be first paid the sums expended by him in making said attachment, and in the keeping and preservation of said property."

The case came before the district court on the petition and answers, and the district judge ordered the following questions to be certified to the circuit court: 1. Whether, upon the facts stated in said petition, and admitted by the answer of William Appleton, one of said attaching creditors, the injunction prayed for, enjoining the attaching creditors from further proceeding against the property of the petitioner, and requiring it to be surrendered to such assignee as may be appointed by the court, shall be granted? 2. Whether any, and if any, what relief shall be granted to the petitioner?

The case was argued by C. G. Loring and Dehon for petitioner, and by J. L. English and E. D. Sohier, Jr., for attaching creditors of Foster. And the same question, being for argument upon other petitions, was argued by Mr. Rand for the attaching creditors. The case of another petitioner was argued by Mr. Goodrich.

Mr. English, for the attaching creditors, argued as follows: It is admitted, that the doctrine contended for by the petitioner is in accordance with the general principles of equity, and if established, would effect a more equal distribution of the property than our construction of the law would do. But the question is upon the true construction of the last clause of the second section of the bankrupt law, and the language seems to be quite explicit. It is clear, that congress meant to preserve and uphold certain securities existing on the property of the bankrupt at the time of his bankruptcy; and it is equally clear, that they did not mean such securities only as are valid every where, but had reference to the special legislation and local law of the respective states. It is submitted, that the property attached in the present case passes to the assignee, subject to, and not discharged from, the attachment, because:

1st. An attachment does constitute a lien or other security upon the property attached, which is valid by the law of Massachusetts. This seems clear both from the language and object of the statutes on the subject, as well as from the established doctrine and express decision of the courts. Rev. St. c. 90, §§ 23, 24; Ladd v. North, 2 Mass. 514; Grosvenor v. Gold, 9 Mass. 209; Bigelow v. Willson, 1 Pick. 492; Denny v. Willard, 11 Pick. 524; Smith v. Bradstreet, 16 Pick. 264. In Smith v. Bradstreet the court say in so many words, "An attachment constitutes a lien, a real interest in the land, which may be followed up to a perfect title."

2d. The upholding such a security would not be inconsistent with the provisions of the second and fifth sections of the bankrupt law, whether taken by themselves, or construed by the other parts of the act. This attachment was made bona fide, before petition filed, and without notice of any contemplation of bankruptcy. It does not come within the class of fraudulent preferences declared void by the second section. The equal distribution provided for in the fifth section, does not extend to all the creditors, but only to such as prove their debts. It is left optional with the creditor to prove or not. If he proves, he thereby disables himself to prosecute further any suit then in progress, and all his proceedings are deemed to be voluntarily surrendered by the act of proving. Why was it left optional with the creditor to prove, and thus surrender his proceedings at law, if, whether he proves or not, he is to lose all benefit of his proceedings? It can hardly be said to be optional with a creditor, whether or not to surrender his proceedings, if he is restrained by injunction, and so compelled to lose all benefit of his proceedings. It is admitted that the lien or security created by an attachment is a conditional security only, dependent on the recovery of judgment, and due proceedings on the execution. A mortgage also is a conditional security, and depends both for its validity and extent upon the establishment of a debt secured. If the discharge, if and when obtained, may be pleaded in bar of the suit, and therefore, and thereby, the attachment would be discharged, why is not the same argument equally good in relation to the validity of a security by mortgage? So an attachment may in strictness be called only an inchoate lien. But it is still a security. Whatever its precise nature may be, the statutes and courts of Massachusetts call it and hold it to be a valid lien and security. In Connecticut, under the old bankrupt law of the United States, it was expressly decided that an attachment created a lien on the property, attached within the meaning of the sixty-third section, and that when the discharge was pleaded in bar of the suit, judgment would be rendered against the bankrupt, but execution issued against the property attached only. Ingraham v. Phillips, 1 Day, 117; Barber v. Minturn, Id. 136. If the property attached is more than sufficient to pay the attaching creditor, the assignee may relieve it. This is provided for in section eleven of the law. Or if the property is sold on execution, the surplus would be paid to the assignee, who stands in place of the debtor.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is the case of an application by Foster, a petitioner for the benefit of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9, against William Appleton and others, who were severally attaching creditors, some of whose attachments were made upon his personal estate and others upon his effects in the hands of his debtors under the trustee process, before the date of the petition, Foster not having as yet been declared a bankrupt, because the time has not yet arrived, when the petition is to be heard in the district court. The petition, which is on the equity side of the court, seeks relief against these attachments by a decree of the district court, for an injunction enjoining the creditors from further proceedings against the property attached, and requiring them to surrender these attachments, or for an injunction and other relief against these attaching creditors, according to the view, which the court shall take of the matter. The discussion has taken a very wide range, and the questions arising in the case have been argued with great ability and learning. In the view, which I have taken of the questions, I do not deem it necessary to go into a minute examination of the weight and bearing of the numerous authorities cited at the bar, some of which certainly seem open to much juridical criticism and doubt, from the looseness of the language used, as well as from the extraordinary nature and extent of some of the propositions asserted in them. And, after all, the questions must mainly depend for their decision upon the true character and effect of an attachment upon mesne process under the laws of Massachusetts, and the extent to which such an attachment is recognized and protected, or is maintainable under the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9, either by the express savings of the act, or by the policy and general provisions thereof. The attachments under the trustee process must be governed by similar considerations, and therefore they will require no separate notice.

Before proceeding to consider the questions, which have been argued, I wish to say a few words as to the jurisdiction of the district court in the premises. And here I lay it down as a general principle, that the district court is possessed of the full jurisdiction of a court of equity, over the whole subject-matters which may arise in bankruptcy, and is authorized by summary proceedings to administer all the relief which a court of equity could administer under the like circumstances, upon a regular bill and regular proceedings, instituted by competent parties. In this respect, the act of congress, for wise purposes, has conferred a more wide and liberal jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States than the lord chancellor, sitting in bankruptcy, was authorized to exercise. In short, whatever he might properly do, sitting in bankruptcy, or sitting in the court of chancery, under his general equity jurisdiction, the courts of the United States are by the act of 1841 competent to do. So that the question resolves itself, so far as the exercise of jurisdiction for relief in this case is concerned, into this, whether it is a fit case for interposition and relief by a court of equity.

Having disposed of this preliminary matter, let us now proceed to the consideration of the questions raised at the bar. And in the first place, what is the nature and effect of the common writ of attachment, as mesne process (for the case which I mean here to consider is that of William Appleton, by an attachment upon mesne process, and not of the other attaching creditors and trustees, under the foreign attachment act), under the laws of Massachusetts. It contains a command to the sheriff, or other proper officer, to attach the goods or estate of the defendant, and for want thereof, to take his body. The officer is at liberty, under that precept, to take the goods and chattels, or the lands and other hereditaments of the defendant, or both, to answer the exigency of the writ. If the officer attaches the goods and chattels of the defendant, he takes them into his possession, and they are then deemed to be in custody of the law, and are to remain under his care and possession, to abide the final judgment in the suit. If lands or other hereditaments are attached, they are not taken possession of by the officer; but they are bound by the attachment from the time, when it is made, if all the regular proceedings are had. And in such a case, the creditor is at liberty, if he obtains judgment in the suit, to levy his execution upon the goods and chattels, or lands, or either of them, until he has obtained satisfaction; and his attachment gives him a priority of right of satisfaction, out of the property attached, over all other creditors, for thirty days after his judgment, and no longer. If the judgment is for the defendant, the attachment is forthwith dissolved by mere operation of law. Such is the general character and operation of the common process of attachment (for I need not go into minor particulars); and by the very language of the laws of Massachusetts, the property so attached, whether real or personal, is "held as security to satisfy such judgment as the plaintiff may recover." Rev. St. 1836, pt. 3, tit. 2, c. 90, §§ 23, 24. But whether it be such a security, as is within the savings of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9, is quite a different question, and will come more directly under consideration hereafter. The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts have (as I think) taken the true view of it, in the case of Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 23 Pick. 488, where they declared, that an "attachment on mesne process is to be considered as a remedy merely given and regulated by law, to enable one creditor, who is proceeding for himself alone, to obtain satisfaction of his debt; and when several are so proceeding, he who is first in time is prior in right." But the court immediately adds: "But in equity, all these priorities give way to a general proceeding which has for its object to distribute all the effects of a debtor, by paying the whole, if there be assets, and then proceeding for a ratable distribution. If the property turn out to be sufficient to pay the whole, any priority by attachment would be useless; if not, it would be unjust." Now, this latter language is exceedingly pointed, and applicable to the case now before the court; for the bankrupt act has for its object and policy a distribution of all the assets of the debtor equally among all his creditors; and it positively prohibits any preference to be made by the debtor in favor of any creditor, in contemplation of bankruptcy. And hence a commission and decree, declaring a man to be a bankrupt, has been emphatically said to be a statute execution for all the creditors. See Barker v. Goodair, 11 Ves. 78-80; Cook, Bankr. Law (Ed. 1799) p. 5, c. 1; Twiss v. Mussey, 1 Atk. 67; Ex parte Knott, 11 Ves 608, 619.

But it is said, that an attachment under our law constitutes a lien upon the property attached; that it is a perfect, fixed, and vested lien, as much so as a lien by a mortgage upon personal estate; that it gives a vested interest in the real estate attached, so that the creditor may dispute the validity of a will thereof; and that it is deemed equivalent to a title by purchase for a valuable consideration. And certain authorities are relied on to establish and confirm these positions. One of these authorities, I own, is very direct to the position, that an attaching creditor of real estate has a right to contest the validity of a will of that estate before he has obtained judgment, and levied his execution thereon; that is, before it is ascertained, whether he has any debt due to him, or any right to make an attachment. If this be so, I can only say, that I am unable exactly to comprehend the grounds of the decision, and bow to it solely as a decision founded upon the local law, that is binding upon this court. But I must treat it as an exception to the general rule, and I am not called upon to give it a more enlarged operation. It seems to stand (as may be respectfully submitted) upon the very verge of the law, inter apices juris; and may enable any stranger, however remote, and without any just debt or claim, by a mere attachment, to interpose himself as a party to contest the most solemn and well-authenticated will. It asserts directly, that a creditor acquires an interest in real estate by a mere attachment, although never consummated by a judgment, and although he may never levy thereon, nor indeed have any right to levy thereon. It appears to me, that most, if not all, the other cases cited at the bar, have been pressed beyond their fair and reasonable bearing, into the service of the argument, at least since the alterations of our law under the provisions of the Revised Statutes of 1836.

It is true, as asserted at the bar, that an attachment upon mesne process is constantly spoken of in our Reports as a lien; and doubtless it is so, in a very general sense of the term, adopted by way of analogy and illustration, rather than from a very exact resemblance, which it bears to liens, generally recognized, as such, at the common law, or in equity, or in maritime jurisprudence. But, as has been truly said by Lord Coke, no simile holds in every thing ("Nullum simile quatuor pedibus currit"). Co. Litt. 3a. Lord Tenterden has said, that the word "lien," in its proper sense, in the law of England, imports that the party is in possession of the thing which he claims to detain; and that where there is no possession, actual or constructive, there can be no lien. Abb. Shipp. (Am. Ed. 1829) p. 171, pt. 3, c. 1, § 7; Id. (6th Ed., by Shea, 1840), p. 220, pt. 4, c. 1, § 8; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 506; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1215-1254. And this is generally true, perhaps universally true at the common law, independently of statutable provisions, or of special contract. The doctrine was explicitly asserted by Mr. Justice Buller in delivering his opinion in the great case of Lickbarrow v. Mason (before the house of lords) 6 East, 21, note; Id. 25,—where he says: "Liens exist at law only in cases where the party entitled to them has the possession of the goods; and if he once part with the possession after the lien attaches, the lien is gone." Mr. Justice Grose, in delivering the opinion of the court in Hammonds v. Barclay, 2 East, 227, 235, said: "A lien is a right in one man to retain that which is in his possession, belonging to another, till certain demands of him, the person in possession, are satisfied." The same thing has been often insisted upon by other judges. Wilson v. Balfour, 2 Camp. 579; Ex parte Heywood, 2 Rose, 355; Heywood v. Waring, 4 Camp. 291; Gladstone v. Birley, 2 Mer. 404; Hallet v. Bousfield, 18 Ves. 188; Giles v. Grover, 6 Bligh (N. S.) 340. But in the maritime law, liens are recognized, independently of possession, actual or constructive; such as in cases of seamen's wages, and bottomry bonds and liens by material-men upon foreign ships. But in such cases, there is no pretence of a vested lien, until the labor or service is complete, or the voyage ended, and the contract become absolute. Until that period, it is merely inchoate, and conditional, and imperfect. In equity, also, liens exist independent of possession, either actual or constructive; as, for example, the lien of a vendor on the land for the unpaid purchase-money. But it has been long the established doctrine in equity, that a lien is not, in strictness, either a jus in re, or a jus ad rem; that is, it is not a property in the thing itself, nor does it constitute a right of action for the thing. It more properly constitutes a charge upon the thing. See Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough, 2 P. Wms. 491; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 506; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1215, 1216, and the cases there cited; Ex parte Knott, 11 Ves. 617; Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 386, 441, 442. It is, therefore, at most a simple right to possess and retain property until some charge attaching to it is paid or discharged; or a mere right to maintain a suit in rem to enforce payment of the charge. Id. Mr. Justice Buller, speaking of liens at the common law, is equally expressive. He says: "Liens are not founded on property; but they necessarily suppose the property to be in some other person, and not in him, who sets up the right. They are qualified rights." Lickbarrow v. Mason, 6 East, note, pp. 21, 24.

Now, an attachment does not come up to the exact definition, or meaning of a lien, either in the general sense of the common law, or in that of the maritime law, or in that of equity jurisprudence. Not in that of the common law, because the creditor is not in possession of the property; but it is in custodiâ legis, if personal property; if real property, it is not a fixed and vested charge, but it is a contingent, conditional charge, until the judgment and levy. Not in the sense of the maritime law, which does not recognize or enforce any claim as a lien, until it has become absolute, fixed, and vested. Not in that of equity jurisprudence; for there a lien is not a jus in re, or a jus ad rem. It is but a charge upon the thing, and then only, when it has, in like manner, become absolute, fixed, and vested. In truth it bears a closer resemblance to the lien created by a judgment upon the real estate of the debtor. But that is only a general lien or charge over all the real estate of the debtor, to be enforced by an elegit, or other legal process, upon such part of the real estate of the debtor as the creditor may elect. And it is not a common law lien; for it had its origin in the statute of 2 Westm. (13 Edw. I. Stat. 1, c. 18), giving the right to an elegit. But there is, however, this strong and clear distinction between the case of a lien by judgment, and a lien by an attachment, that the former takes place only when the debt is ascertained and fixed by the judgment; whereas the latter is before the debt is ascertained, and is altogether future, and contingent upon a judgment being rendered in the suit in favor of the creditor. Yet a judgment creditor has never been held in England to have any interest in the land; but only a sort of preëmptive right or lien to acquire it by an extent upon an elegit; and then his title relates back to the time of the judgment, so as to cut down all intermediate incumbrances, sales, and other puisne titles. Yet a judgment creates no interest in the land; and therefore, though the creditor should release all his right to the land, he might extend it afterwards. Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough, 2 P. Wms. 491. It was very justly observed by the master of rolls (Sir Joseph Jekyll) in Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough, Id., that all that the creditor has by the judgment, is but a mere lien upon the land; but non constat, that he will ever make use thereof. If, then, a lien be not, in the sense of the law, founded in property; if it be not an interest in property, nor even a jus ad rem; upon what ground can it be argued, that it is equivalent to a mortgage or a pledge? In the former of those cases, the immediate right and title to the general property passes at law to the mortgagee, who becomes and is the positive owner, liable to have it devested by a condition subsequent. In the latter, a special property passes to the pledgee, accompanied and conferred by the possession thereof. There is no ground to assert either of these considerations to be true in respect to the lien of an attaching creditor. The possession is not in him to any intent or for any purpose. The property of the debtor is not devested; and the possession thereof is in the attaching officer, holding it sub modo, and merely as bailee, for the purposes of the law; that is, the possession is in custodiâ legis.

The nature and character of a lien on lands, created by a judgment, were very fully expounded by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 386, 441, 443; and, on that occasion, the court took the distinction between the rights acquired by a mortgage, and those acquired by a judgment; and, among other things, said: "Now it is not understood that a general lien, by judgment on land, constitutes, per se, a property, or right, in the land itself. It only confers a right to levy on the same, to the exclusion of other adverse interests, subsequent to the judgment; and when the levy is actually made on the same, the title of the creditor for this purpose relates back to the time of his judgment, so as to cut out intermediate incumbrances. But, subject to this, the debtor has full power to sell, or otherwise dispose of the land. His title to it is not devested or transferred by the judgment to the judgment creditor. It may be levied upon by any other creditor, who is entitled to hold it against every other person except such judgment creditor: and even against him, unless he consummates his title by a levy on the land, under his judgment. In that event, the prior levy is, as to him, void; and the creditor loses all right under it. The case stands, in this respect, precisely upon the same ground as any other defective levy, or sale. The title to the land does not pass under it. In short, a judgment creditor has no jus in re, but a mere power to make his general lien effectual, by following up the steps of the law, and consummating his judgment by an execution and levy on the land. If the debtor should sell the estate, he has no right to follow the proceeds of the sale into the hands of the vendor or vendee; or to claim the purchase-money in the hands of the latter. It is not like the case where the goods of a person have been tortiously taken and sold and he can trace the proceeds, and waiving the tort, chooses to claim the latter. The only remedy of the judgment creditor is against the thing itself, by making that a specific title which was before a general lien. He can only claim the proceeds of the sale of the land, when it has been sold on his own execution, and ought to be applied to its satisfaction."

The case of an attaching creditor is not near so strong as that of a judgment creditor, who has obtained a fieri facias, under which the sheriff has actually seized the goods of the judgment debtor to satisfy the same. And yet in this very case, it is perfectly clear, that before a sale, the general property of the debtor is not devested, and that the creditor does not, under the levy upon the fieri facias, acquire any interest or right in the property. The subject underwent a very elaborate consideration of all the judges, in the case of Giles v. Grover, 6 Bligh (N. S.) 279, where the main question was, whether the crown, upon an exeat issuing on behalf of the crown, after a levy on the goods of the crown debtor, under a fieri facias, against him in favor of a private creditor, but before a sale under the fieri facias, was entitled to a priority of satisfaction before the private creditor, or not. It was held by all the judges, who delivered their opinions in the house of lords (except Mr. Justice Gaselee and Mr. Justice Littledale) that it did. The two latter judges held the contrary opinion. But upon that occasion, all the learned judges concurred in opinion, that the general property of the debtor in the goods was not devested by the levy on the fieri facias, but only when a sale thereof had taken place; that the creditor had no interest or title whatsoever, nor even a lien in the property; but, at most, that the sheriff had, for his own protection, merely a special property, (as some of the judges thought), or a lien, (as others thought), or (as a majority of the judges thought), that the goods were in the custody of the law, and the sheriff held them as bailee, and in that character virtute officii. Lord Chief Justice Tindal has expressed the true position of the sheriff, in delivering his opinion in the case above cited, in the house of lords. Speaking of the case of the goods seized under the fieri facias before the sale, he said: "The goods are not sold; they are only on the way to be sold. It would be a better definition of the sheriff's relation to these goods, to say, he has them in his custody, under a power to sell them, than any actual interest or property in them. His situation, indeed, cannot be better defined, than by saying, the goods are, in custodiâ legis, a phrase, which plainly distinguishes a mere custody and guardianship of the goods from a change of property; so far, therefore, as a special property in the goods is necessary for their safe custody against wrong-doers, and to render the execution of his public duty useful to the judgment creditor, so far he may be said to have property. But beyond this, as against the rights of adverse claimants, there is no authority for saying, that he has any property at all." Lord Tenterden, in the same case said: "It has been argued that the property is vested in the sheriff, because there are authorities to show, that the sheriff, if the property be taken out of his hand, may maintain an action of trover against the wrong-doer. Now, actions are maintainable upon a ground perfectly distinct from the right of property. They are maintainable upon the ground of possession. Any man in the possession of goods, whether as bailee, or otherwise, may, in his own name, maintain an action. The power, therefore, of bringing an action of this kind, does by no means prove, that the property is in the sheriff." His lordship immediately added: "It is supposed by some, that the property is in the judgment creditor. But it is perfectly clear, upon consideration of the subject, that the judgment creditor has no property in the goods, while they remain in the hands of the sheriff. If the sheriff executes the process of the court, and serves a bill of sale to the plaintiff in the action, then the judgment creditor obtains the property; but until that is done, while the goods are in the possession of the sheriff, they are in the custody of the law, but still remain the property of the debtor, to whom they originally belonged." This last doctrine, that the creditor has no property by the seizure, was (as has been already stated) unanimously affirmed by all the judges; and the doctrine, maintained by Lord Chief Justice Tindal and Lord Tenterden, and the majority of the judges, was adopted by the house of lords. See Giles v. Grover, 6 Bligh (N. S.) 289–292; Id. 312–314, 317–319, 322; Id. 333–341; Id. 367, 368, 371, 372; Id. 374–376, 384; Id. 404–406; Id. 421, 431. Mr. Justice Patterson said: "The goods are in substance in custodiâ legis; the seizure made by the officer of the law is for the benefit of those who are by law entitled. It is made against the will of the debtor, and no property is transferred, by any act of his, to the sheriff. In this respect it differs from all cases of special property, and of charges on goods, created by the debtor, while he has the absolute dominion over the goods." Id. pp. 292–317. Here we see clearly stated the distinction between a title by conveyance, or contract of the debtor, and a seizure under process of law. In confirmation of this view, Mr. Baron Alderson said: "The true description of the state of the property is, that it is in the custody of the law where, as in the case of the factor, wharfinger, pawnee, or equitable mortgagee, it is in the custody of the party himself, being a beneficial interest under a valid contract." Id. p. 318. Lord Chief Justice Tindal took notice of the same distinction between the case of a seizure in execution, and goods being pledged, or lands mortgaged; that the one amounted to an alienation of the property pro tanto, the other gave only an inchoate claim on the goods; or, to use his own expression, the goods "are on their way to be sold." Id. p. 437.

Mr. Justice Taunton, in answer to the argument urged at the bar, that by the seizure on the execution, the judgment creditor had a lien on the goods, or a special property therein, and, therefore, that the crown could only take, subject to that lien or special property, peremptorily denied the doctrine; and said, "This special property is in the sheriff, not as trustee for the judgment creditor; but for the purpose of his own protection. Neither had the judgment creditor in this instance any lien on the goods." Id. p. 340. And he added: "How can the doctrine of lien to retain these goods be applied to this judgment creditor, who had no possession; the goods being in the possession of the sheriff?" Id. 341. And again, in answer to the argument, that the judgment creditor had by the seizure at least a security for his debt, he admitted that, as it had been stated by the court, in Morland v. Pellatt, 8 Barn. & C. 822; but immediately added (what is most important to be here noticed) that "the security may be vested and certain, or it may be contingent and defeasible. It does not necessarily import present property, nor even beneficial interest." "A jus tertii might interpose, and destroy it." Gilb. Exch. Pr. 89. The truth is, that goods were, at the common law, bound from the teste of the writ of execution, whether it was a levari facias, or a fieri facias, because otherwise the debtor, by an alienation of the chattels, might disappoint the execution. Giles v. Grover, 6 Bligh (N. S.) 315, 316; Id. 367, 435, 436. But this has been since altered by statute, so that on a levari facias, or fieri facias, the goods are bound only from the time of the delivery of the execution to the sheriff; and as to real estate, it is bound for the time of the judgment, upon the construction of the statute of Westminster. Id.; Lowthal v. Tonkins, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 381; Smallcomb v. Cross, 1 Ld. Raym. 251; Philips v. Thompson, 3 Lev. 191; Payne v. Drewe, 4 East, 523. When therefore, the word lien is used in cases of this sort, it is used in a peculiar and general sense, and indicates no more, than that the goods or lands are bound by the judgment, and not that the judgment creditor has any interest or property therein. As to the goods, they are bound only from the delivery of the execution to the sheriff, as against the debtor himself; but still a sale by him in market overt would be good.

I have dwelt the more upon these authorities, because if they present, as I think they do, the true state of the law, even in the case of a seizure under execution, they necessarily apply with vastly greater force to the case of a mere attachment, which, at most, can be no more than a contingent, conditional, lien or security, to satisfy the judgment of the creditor, if he ever obtains one; whereas, on an execution, the debt has been already ascertained and fixed by the judgment. Nor do I think that the decisions in the Massachusetts Reports (except that of Smith v. Bradstreet, 16 Pick. 264), construing them reasonably, and with reference to the case before the court, inculcate a different doctrine. In the very case of Grosvenor v. Gold, 9 Mass. 209, 210, Mr. Justice Sedgwick admitted the lien by an attachment to be merely a conditional security. He said: "By an attachment the plaintiff has a lien upon the subject provisionally, that is, to the amount of the judgment he may finally recover." In Denny v. Willard, 11 Pick. 524, Mr. Justice Morton, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The special property (after the attachment) was in the officer making the attachment, unless he had lost the lien by giving up the possession to the general owner." In Fettyplace v. Dutch, 13 Pick. 388, 392, the court said, that an attachment constitutes a lien; but the general property remains in the owner, subject to that lien; and he may sell the same subject to the lien. In Arnold v. Brown, 24 Pick. 89, 95, the court said: "An attachment constitutes a mere lien on the property, and the general owner may as well sell, subject to that lien, as any other. The effect of the sale will be to pass the general property, incumbered by the attachment. If that be extinguished by the settlement or failure of the suit, or the neglect to levy an execution in thirty days after the judgment, the sale of the property will become absolute, and the purchaser will hold it free of the incumbrance." Now, here we have admitted, in the most explicit terms, that the lien or security, call it whichever you may, is merely conditional, and depends upon the event of the suit. It is not a present, fixed, vested interest in any one; and certainly not in the creditor.

But it has been said, that in cases of foreign attachment under the custom of London, the attaching creditor had a lien or pledge of the goods attached in the hands of the garnishee; and although they were but a pledge to draw the defendant to answer, yet that before the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 19, § 9, it was deemed such a security of the debt, that if the defendant became bankrupt after the attachment, and before the recovery of judgment, the commissioners could not take or assign the goods, except subject to the lien and security of the attaching creditor. For this position great reliance is placed upon Goodinge on the Bankrupt Law (1726 Ed. p. 107). Now, I know of no authority for that position; and the case of Bingly v. Warcop, 3 Keb. 480, cited by Goodinge in his text, does not support it; nor, as far as I can trace it in the Reports, has any such doctrine ever been established by the courts of law in the construction of the statute of Jac. I. c. 19, § 9, although that clause of the statute has on various occasions received ample commentary from the courts. Its construction was a good deal considered in the case of Giles v. Grover, 6

Bligh (N. S.) 277; and, indeed the whole train of reasoning in that case is against the doctrine. If it be true, that a foreign attachment is but process to draw the party to answer, still, if he does not appear and answer, or give security, the suit proceeds against the garnishee. The truth is, that a foreign attachment is like a common attachment on mesne process, as the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts have declared it to be, a remedy, merely given and regulated by law, to enable a creditor to obtain satisfaction of his debt (Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 23 Pick. 488); and, like every other remedy, it is liable to be defeated by any act, that bars or takes away the remedy or right to judgment under it. Ever since the statute of Jac. I. c. 19, there could be no possible doubt; for that defeated all executions not actually executed, as well as all foreign attachments, after the act of bankruptcy, if a commission issued thereon, down to the latest statute in England. The policy, therefore, upon this subject, for at least two hundred years, has been uniform; and I doubt not was so from the earliest period of the bankrupt laws.

I have gone over the grounds thus suggested, not because my judgment rests upon them, but because they were mainly relied upon at the argument to support the title of the attaching creditor, and to defeat the petition. My judgment turns, however, upon other and distinct grounds. Assuming, for the purposes of the argument, that the attachment constitutes a lien or security to or for the benefit of the attaching creditor, still it is but a contingent or conditional lien or security, arising under a mere remedial process, and, therefore, the question must still remain for consideration, whether it is such a lien or security, as is within the savings of the bankrupt act of 1841. And if it be within the savings, then there still remains the ulterior question, whether the attaching creditor has a right to go on, without any interposition of the district court, sitting as a court of equity in bankruptcy, and obtain a judgment in his suit, before the bankrupt can obtain his discharge, which discharge, if obtained before a trial, would constitute a complete bar to the suit; and thus the attaching creditor, by a race of diligence, be allowed to obtain and to complete a preference in violation of the whole policy of the bankrupt act, which is an equal distribution of the assets among all the creditors.

Now, the saving, in the second section of the bankrupt act of 1841, which has been pressed so much at the argument, is in the following words: "That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to annul, destroy, or impair any lawful rights of married women or minors, or any liens, mortgages, or other securities on property real or personal, which may be valid by the laws of the states respectively, and which are not inconsistent with the provisions of the second and fifth sections of this act." Now, certainly, the natural interpretation of these words "liens, mortgages, and other securities on property real or personal," would seem to be, that they referred to things of a like nature; or, as the maxim of law is, each may be known from its associates ("Noscitur a sociis"). The words may all be perfectly satisfied by treating them, as referring to liens fixed and vested in the party by a consummate title, such as liens by contract, resting on possession, or absolute by law, such as pledges, and not merely inchoate and conditional liens, dependent upon a mere remedial process. The term "securities" follows "mortgages," which are clearly vested rights under the grant of the party, defeasible only upon a future fulfilment of some condition subsequent. Securities of this nature may be by a deposit of title deeds, or conditional assignments of choses in action or the lien of a vendor for unpaid purchase-money. If we look back to the words of the enacting clause of this same section, to which the saving is appended as a proviso, we shall see, that there, the enumeration is confined to "securities, conveyances, or transfers of property or agreements made or given" by the bankrupt for the purpose of giving a preference or priority of a creditor, or indorser, or surety, &c. over the general creditors, and which are therefore declared fraudulent. Now, the natural inference certainly would seem to be, that the proviso is carved out of the enacting clause, and saves things ejusdem generis. The fifth section, to which also reference is made in the proviso, provides for an equal distribution of all the bankrupt's effects among all his creditors, with one or two exceptions, unimportant of this connection; and it declares, that creditors, proving their debts under the bankruptcy shall be deemed thereby to have waived all right of action therefor, and all unsatisfied judgments obtained thereon. So that the policy of the act, as to an equal distribution, is here made most manifest and positive. The 14th section of the act contains a provision, that the assignee may redeem, under the order of the court, "any mortgage or other pledge or deposite or lien upon any property real or personal, whether payable in presenti, or at a future day, and to tender a due performance of the conditions thereof." The words "mortgage or other pledge, or deposite or lien" in this clause clearly can mean nothing else, than such as arise from contract, and are of a present, fixed, vested, and ascertainable value. And it would be impossible to strain them, so as to include liens or securities by an attachment upon mesne process or other remedial process. And yet they certainly reflect great light upon the meaning of the like words in the proviso of the second section. But I do not propose to rest my present judgment upon any construction of the words, limiting them, so as to exclude in-choate, conditional liens, arising, not under contract, but under remedial mesne process. Assuming such liens to be within the protection of the proviso (which is an admission, which I make merely for the sake of argument, and I am by no means satisfied, that it is a correct exposition of the words or intent thereof), still there remains behind a much more grave and pressing difficulty, to which I have heard no sufficient answer at the bar.

It is conceded on all sides, that unless the attaching creditor obtains a judgment in his favor in the suit, his attachment is gone. It is plain, therefore, that it gives no absolute right of any sort. It merely puts the remedy in progress. It is to my mind as perfectly clear and incontrovertible, that if the bankrupt, before any trial or judgment in that suit, obtains a discharge, that discharge is by the express terms of the bankrupt act (section 4), a full and complete discharge from all his debts provable under the bankruptcy, of which the debt sued for must be one; and of course, that it is pleadable as a bar to that very suit of the attaching creditor, in the nature of a plea puis darrien continuance. There is another provision in the third section of the act equally important to be considered, namely, that from the time of the decree in bankruptcy, all property and rights of property, of every name and nature, of the bankrupt, are devested out of the bankrupt, and become vested in the assignee upon his appointment; and it is further declared, "that all suits in law or in equity then pending, in which such bankrupt is a party, may be prosecuted and defended by such assignee to its final conclusion in the same way and with the same effect, as they might have been by such bankrupt." And it goes on further to provide that "the assignee so appointed shall be vested with all the rights, titles, powers, and authorities to sell, manage, and dispose of the property and rights of property of the bankrupt, and to sue for and defend the same, &c., as fully to all intents and purposes, as if the same were vested in or might be exercised by such bankrupt before or at the time of his bankruptcy declared as aforesaid." The act, therefore, manifestly contemplates, that as to all property and rights of property of the bankrupt, and as to all suits in law or equity pending, in which the bankrupt is a party, the bankrupt is to be treated, as if he were civiliter mortuus, and all his property and rights of property were vested in the assignee, as his executor or administrator. The moment that the decree in bankruptcy is passed, it relates back, for all the purposes of the act, to the time of the petition; and as soon as the assignee is appointed, all the rights, titles, powers, and authorities of the bankrupt vest in him by relation from the same period. How then, pending the proceedings in bankruptcy, before or after the decree, can the attaching creditor be permitted to go on with his suit, and proceed to trial and judgment, when there is, and can be, no party properly before the court to appear and defend the suit? If the attaching creditor had knowledge of the facts, it would be a fraud upon the bankrupt act for him to proceed in his suit, and to get a judgment before an assignee was appointed, or was in a situation to appear and defend the suit. Nor could the court, where the process should be pending, properly proceed in the cause, until it had been ascertained, whether the bankrupt was entitled to, and had received his discharge or not. If the bankrupt should receive his discharge, he would be instantly entitled to plead it in bar of the suit. And if the attaching creditor should forthwith proceed to judgment without waiting for the time when such discharge would or might be obtained, and be properly pleaded, either by the bankrupt, or by the assignee, or by both, in bar of further proceedings in the suit, and should obtain satisfaction of his judgment, I do not perceive, how, consistently with the principles of a court of equity, the creditor could be entitled to enforce the judgment, or to hold the money. The judgment must, to all intents and purposes, be treated as a fraud upon the bankrupt act, and as intended to defeat the just rights of the other creditors of the bankrupt.

It is precisely in this view, that it has struck me during the whole course of the argument, that no attaching creditor could be thus permitted by a court of equity, by a mere race of diligence, while the bankrupt proceedings were in progress, to overreach, and defeat the just rights of the other creditors, or the right of the bankrupt, if entitled to a discharge, to plead the same in bar of a judgment in the suit. I agree, that the court ought not to dissolve the attachment, or to take away the inchoate rights of the creditor to the security thereof, until it is ascertained by a decree, whether the party is a bankrupt, and whether he is entitled to a discharge from his debts. The court may, and, indeed, ought to allow the proceedings to be entered in the proper court, and to be continued, if the creditor elects so to do, until the discharge is obtained; but not to proceed in the mean time to trial or judgment; for if the petitioner should never be declared a bankrupt, or should not obtain any discharge, it may be, that there may be a judgment against him in personam, even supposing, (which I do not decide), that, in such an event, the attachment would be gone by the operation of the bankrupt act of 1841. But if a discharge should be obtained, I can entertain no doubt, that no judgment whatsoever could be had in the suit against the bankrupt, and that he and the assignee might each plead the discharge in bar of further proceedings. It strikes me, therefore, as perfectly clear, that, under such circumstances, it is the duty of the district court, as a court of equity, sitting in bankruptcy, in order to prevent irreparable mischiefs, and the defeating of the true objects and policy of the act, to interpose by way of injunction to control the attaching creditor from proceeding further in his suit, than is necessary to protect his ulterior rights, and that he must act in the suit under the direction of the district court in the premises. See Ex parte D'Obree, 8 Ves. 82.

There is no novelty in this course. On the contrary, it is the common course in all cases, where upon the application of any creditor, or of an administrator or executor, a court of equity takes upon itself the administration of the assets of a deceased debtor. As soon as the decree for the administration is passed by the court, taking upon itself the administration of the assets, the executor, or administrator, or any creditor, is entitled to an injunction to prevent any other of the creditors from suing the executor or administrator at law, or further proceeding in any suit, already commenced, except under the direction and control of the court of equity, by which the decree is passed; for, under such circumstances, the court will not suffer a race of diligence by different creditors, each striving for an undue mastery, or preference, or priority of payment out of the assets, to prejudice the rights of the others. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. bk. 3, pt. 2, pp. 538–543, c. 5; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 549, and note 3; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 890; Drew. Inj. pt. 1, pp. 109–122, c. 4, §§ 2–7; Thompson v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 619; Lee v. Park, 1 Keen, 714; Kenyon v. Worthington, 2 Dickens, 668; Brooks v. Reynolds, 1 Brown, Ch. 183. The decree in such a case is treated as a judgment for all the creditors. But it is not necessary to put it upon that ground; for when once the administration of the assets is taken by the court upon itself, as a matter of duty, it must be of course, that it cannot and ought not to permit any creditor to defeat, or to obstruct, or to interfere, with its own proceedings. Now this is precisely the situation of the district court, as to proceedings in bankruptcy, after a decree in bankruptcy. The court necessarily takes upon itself the administration of all the assets; and it is its duty to protect the property against all claims of creditors, which are inconsistent with the objects and policy of the act. I have no doubt, therefore, that it is the duty of the district court to issue an injunction in this case to the attaching creditor, directing him not to proceed in his suit, except under the order and direction of the court, until it shall be ascertained, whether there is a decree in bankruptcy, and a discharge of the bankrupt, which may be pleaded in bar of farther proceedings. If, indeed, I entertained any doubt upon this subject, (which I certainly do not) I should not entertain any doubt as to the jurisdiction of the circuit court upon a bill, filed by the assignee, after his appointment, to overhaul and control, or set aside all the proceedings, had in the intermediate time by the attaching creditor against the rights of the other creditors, and in subversion of the policy and objects of the bankrupt act of 1841. It would, therefore, after all, be but a postponement of the evil day, and a mere change from the equity jurisdiction of one court to the like jurisdiction of another court having full authority to act in the premises. It appears to me, that the reasoning of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 23 Pick. 480, is very strong in favor of the doctrine, which I hold upon this subject.

In the opinion here expressed I have not thought it necessary to advert to cases, where the right of the United States to a priority of satisfaction would attach under the laws of the United States. I have no doubt, that that priority would overreach any attachment under mesne process by any private creditor in a case of bankruptcy of the debtor. But it has seemed to me better to rest the whole case upon general principles, applicable to all cases of creditors.

It was asked, at the argument, what is to be done, as to the costs already incurred under the attachments? I answer unhesitatingly that all the costs already incurred are to be borne by the bankrupt's estate; for they must be deemed to have been fairly incurred. But as to future costs, there can be no claim upon the bankrupt's estate; and the creditor, if he chooses to pursue his suit, must do so at the peril of losing all his costs, if the bankrupt obtains his discharge. But if the creditor chooses at once to come in under the bankruptcy, and to prove his debt, I should not hesitate to decree him a priority of satisfaction of the costs already incurred out of the assets before the debts of any of the creditors. I shall direct a certificate to be accordingly sent to the district court in answer to the question propounded for the consideration of this court.

The following order was accordingly sent:

Circuit Court of the United States, Massachusetts District. In Bankruptcy. In the Matter of John S. Foster, Petitioner. April 30th, 1842. Upon the question certified and ordered to be adjourned into this court by the district court, to be heard and determined in this court. It is hereby ordered and decreed to be certified to the district court, as follows: That the said William Appleton ought not to be permitted to proceed further upon and under his suit and attachment named in the petition and answer, except subject to and under the directions of the district court, until the further order of the district court, after it shall have been ascertained by a decree therefor, that he, the said Foster, is a bankrupt, entitled to the benefit of the bankrupt act; and after it shall also have been ascertained, whether the said Foster is or shall, as such bankrupt, be entitled to a certificate of discharge from all his debts provable under such bankruptcy. And that an injunction ought forthwith to issue from the district court against the said Appleton, and his agents for this purpose. And that in the intermediate time, and until the further order of the district court, the said Appleton is to be at liberty to enter his said suit in the proper state court, and to continue the same therein, taking no step, that shall prejudice the rights of the said Foster, or of his creditors, until the further order of the district court, so as to preserve, if he elects so to do, his attachment in the premises, to abide the final event of the proceedings in bankruptcy, as to the certificate of discharge of the bankrupt.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE.

An assignment of a claim to secure a pre-existing indebtedness made when the bankrupt was insolvent and not as a pledge of security, made at the time the indebtedness was contracted, and not as a part of the transaction, is a fraudulent preference, and a good ground for refusing a discharge.

[This was a petition for the discharge of B. N. Foster, a bankrupt.]

Cooley, Hatch & Beneville, for bankrupt.

Samuel G. Jelliffe, for creditors.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the evidence in this case, as it now stands, I think the sixth and eighth specifications filed by the creditor, William P. Dixon, in opposition to the discharge of the bankrupt, are substantially proved in part. The sixth specification states, among other things, that the bankrupt gave a fraudulent preference, contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt act, by assigning to William P. Dixon a third of his claim against the National Ice Company of the city of New York. The eighth specification states, among other things, that the bankrupt, in contemplation of becoming bankrupt, made a conveyance of part of his property for the purpose of preferring a creditor and preventing the property from coming into the hands of the assignee and being distributed under the bankrupt act, by assigning to William P. Dixon, for such purpose, one-third of his claim against the National Ice Company, such assignment having been made after the bankrupt was insolvent, and after he had made up his mind to take the benefit of the bankrupt act.

There is no oral testimony in the case but that of the bankrupt himself. On the 30th day of July, 1868, he testified that whenever he borrowed money he generally gave security; that there were several notes protested against him in 1866; that during the winter of 1866 and the spring of 1867 he found himself unable to meet his current engagements; that during the year 1867 he gave a number of notes for borrowed money, trusting to something to turn up in order to pay them; that he did not recollect having paid any borrowed money, during the year 1867, and that he made up his mind that he should be obliged to take the benefit of the bankrupt act in the summer of 1867. On the 18th of August, 1868, he testified that between November, 1866, and July, 1867, he received at least three thousand dollars from William P. Dixon, which was not repaid or expended for Dixon, and which now constituted his indebtedness to Dixon. On the 25th of August, 1868, he testified that it was during and after the summer of 1867 that he found himself unable to meet his current engagements; that he was sure he paid no borrowed money after the 1st of August, 1867; that although some days usually elapsed between his borrowing money and pledging the securities mentioned in Schedule A No. 2, to his petition, the securities were always agreed upon at the time the money was borrowed, but were not always given then, and not until a few days afterwards; that he desired to withdraw the statement so made on his former examination, that between November, 1866, and July, 1867, he received at least three thousand dollars from William P. Dixon, which was not repaid or expended for Dixon, and which now constituted his indebtedness to Dixon, and to state in substitution that between November, 1866, and February, 1867, he and Mr. Dixon had many money transactions together, amounting in the aggregate to fifty thousand dollars or more; that sometimes Dixon would borrow money from him and pay him by checks, that sometimes he would borrow money of Dixon on his checks without security, and sometimes on notes of other persons, and for other persons endorsed by him, and that these notes were sometimes secured by stock collaterals.

The proof of debt filed in this matter by Dixon, and which was sworn to and filed on the 28th of July, 1868, two days before the first examination of the bankrupt, and is part of the testimony in the case, shows an indebtedness of the bankrupt to Dixon, amounting to four thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars and thirty-three cents, and states that the indebtedness arose out of loans of money made by Dixon to the bankrupt, evidenced by a note and due bill made by the bankrupt, and out of the discount by Dixon of six notes made by other parties and endorsed by the bankrupt, and that to secure that indebtedness the bankrupt executed to Dixon the assignment hereafter mentioned. Copies of the note and bill made by the bankrupt and of the other six notes above referred to are annexed to the proof of debt. The note made by the bankrupt is dated March 4th, 1867. The due bill is dated April 27, 1867. It must be assumed on the evidence, that the loans on the note and the due bill respectively were not made after their respective dates. The six notes discounted matured between April 30, 1867, and July 22, 1867. At how late a period any of them were discounted does not distinctly appear. A copy of the assignment before referred to, executed to Dixon by the bankrupt, is set forth in the proof of debt. It is dated August 24th, 1867, and by it the bankrupt, in consideration of one dollar to him paid by Dixon, for the purpose of securing to Dixon one thousand dollars, assigned to Dixon all his claim against the National Ice Company of New York, except one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars assigned to Louis S. Robbins, of New York, August 24th, 1867, growing out of the various notes of said company, for pay as its secretary and treasurer, said claim amounting, by estimation, to the sum of three thousand dollars. The proof of debt states the estimated value of the security so assigned to Dixon as being two hundred dollars.

On all the testimony the assignment of August 24th, 1867, to Dixon, must be regarded as a transfer to secure a pre-existing indebtedness, and not as a pledge of security made at the time the indebtedness was contracted, and as a part of the transaction. All transactions of borrowing money from Dixon, or obtaining discounts from him, seem to have been at an end by July 1, 1867. The assignment of the claim to Dixon was a fraudulent preference contrary to the act, made when he was insolvent and was contemplating bankruptcy, within the causes for withholding a discharge specified in the twenty-ninth section, and within the sixth and eighth specifications. The testimony of the bankrupt is very confused and unsatisfactory. It may be that the points on which the discharge is now refused may be explained. If so, I am disposed to allow an opportunity for making the explanation, if such a favor shall be asked, the creditor to be at liberty also to introduce such testimony as he desires. I do not pass upon any other points raised by the specifications, but refuse the discharge at present on the grounds above stated.

JURISDICTION — PLACE OF FILING PETITION IN BANKRUPTCY—CARRYING ON BUSINESS.

Where a bankrupt, during the six months previous to filing his petition, carried on business for two months in the Southern district of New York, and, for the same two months, in the district of Massachusetts, and carried on business no where else, during such six months: Held, that his petition was properly filed in the Southern district of New York.

J. M. Ball, for petitioner.
D. S. Riddle, for Day.
S. E. D. Currier, for Pratt.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 4th of December, 1868, Elisha Foster filed a petition in this court, describing himself therein as of the town of Franklin, in the state of Massachusetts. The petition sets forth, that the petitioner and Charles C. Day, of Jersey City, New Jersey, and William W. Pratt, of Medfield, Massachusetts, formed a copartnership in November, 1866, for the transaction of the business of manufacturing and dealing in straw goods, at said town of Franklin and the city of New York, and have carried on said business as such copartners for the longest period during the six months next immediately preceding the filing of the petition, at the city of New York; that the members of said copartnership owe debts exceeding the amount of $300, and are unable to pay their debts in full; that the petitioner is willing to surrender all the estate and effects of said copartnership, and all his separate estate and effects, for the benefit of the creditors of said partnership, and of his separate creditors; that the said Day and Pratt are respectively unwilling to join in the petition; that the petitioner desires to obtain the benefit of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]; that Schedule A to the petition contains a statement of all the debts of the copartnership; that Schedule B thereto contains an inventory of all the estate of said copartnership; that Schedule C thereto contains a statement of the petitioner's individual debts; and that Schedule D thereto contains an inventory of his individual estate. The prayer of the petition is, that the petitioner and Day and Pratt may be adjudged to be bankrupts, and that the petitioner may have a certificate of discharge. On the filing of this petition, an order was made requiring Day and Pratt to show cause why they should not be adjudged bankrupts. On the return day of such order, each of them put in an answer, denying the allegation of the petition that Foster, Day and Pratt had carried on business as copartners, as alleged, in the city of New York, for the longest period during the six months next immediately preceding the filing of the petition, and denying the jurisdiction of this court to grant the prayer of the petition. Evidence has been taken on the issue thus raised.

The copartnership of Foster, Day and Pratt was formed in November, 1866, and thenceforth, until the 4th of August, 1868, carried on the business of manufacturing and buying and selling straw goods, the manufacturing being done in Massachusetts, and the buying and selling in the city of New York, and in Massachusetts, the largest portion of the sales being made in the city of New York. The copartnership was dissolved on the 4th of August, 1868, and thenceforward ceased to carry on business. Consequently, it carried on business in the city of New York for only two months of the six months next immediately preceding the time of the filing of the petition. By section 11 of the act, it is necessary to jurisdiction, that the petition be addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which the debtor has resided or carried on business for the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing the petition, "or for the longest period during such six months." The sole question in this case is, whether this court has jurisdiction to entertain the petition of Foster, and, under it, to adjudge Foster, Day and Pratt to be bankrupts. Schedule B to the petition shows that there are assets of the copartnership. The members thereof continue, therefore, for the purposes of section 36 of the act, to be partners in trade quoad their creditors, and they may, under that section, be adjudged bankrupt on the petition of any one of them, the others, if they refuse to join in the petition, being brought into court by proper process, under the provisions of general order No. 18. As the petition of Foster, filed in this court, that the three copartners may be adjudged bankrupt, was the first petition filed in any court for that purpose, it follows, under section 36 and general order No. 16, that this court, if it has jurisdiction of such petition, is entitled to take and retain exclusive jurisdiction over all proceedings in regard to the bankruptcy of all three of the copartners until the same shall be closed. The question then recurs, whether this court has jurisdiction of the petition of Foster. It has such jurisdiction, if the three copartners have carried on business in this judicial district for the longest period during the six months next immediately preceding the 4th of December, 1868. This involves a determination as to the meaning of the expression, "the longest period" during such six months. It is contended, on the part of Day and Pratt, that the longest period during the six months must be more than three months in duration, and that, therefore, the two months in this case, from the 4th of June, 1868, to the 4th of August, 1868, during which the copartnership carried on business in this judicial district, is not such longest period. It is urged, that two months can never be the longest period during the six months; that three months and a day is the shortest time that will answer the requirement of the longest period during the six months; and that the expression, "the longest period during such six months," means, the longest part of such six months. I cannot assent to this view. The meaning of the 11th section is, I think, that the debtor may file his petition in the district in which he has resided or carried on business for the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing the petition, or for the longest period during or within such six months that he has resided or carried on business in any district. Any other interpretation would wholly exclude a class of debtors from the operation of the act. Every debtor who has changed his residence and his place of carrying on business so often during the six months, as not to have resided or carried on business in any one district for more than three months thereof, would be wholly excluded from the operation of the act. It is not to be presumed that such an effect was intended. The object of the provision is to bring within the operation of the act every debtor who has resided or carried on business in any district for any length of time, provided the proceedings are instituted in the district in which his residence or carrying on of business has continued so long as to cover the longest space of time that he has resided or carried on business in any district during the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing the petition. The idea manifestly is, to select as the forum the district where, by reason of the longest residence or the longest duration of carrying on business, the debtor is likely to be best known, or to have had the largest number of business transactions, with the proviso, that such residence or carrying on of business need not have continued for a longer period than for the six months next immediately preceding the time of filing the petition. Thus, during or within such six months, the debtor may have resided or carried on businees in one district for two months, in another for one month and three quarters, in another for one month and one quarter, and in another for one month. In such case, the proper district in which to file the petition is the one in which the debtor has resided or carried on business for the two months. So, if, as in this case, business has been carried on in one district for two months during such six months, by the debtors, as copartners, and has not been carried on by them as copartners, in any other district, for any other portion of such six months, such district is the proper district in which to file the petition.

The fact, that the three copartners carried on business as such, in Massachusetts, for the same period, during the six months, that they carried it on in New York, does not deprive this court of jurisdiction, it not appearing that they carried on business in Massachusetts for a longer period during the six months than they carried it on in New York. Two months is the longest period during or within the six months, that the three copartners carried on business as such in any district, and they so carried it on for that length of time in this district. Their carrying on of business in this district, as copartners, having continued so long, during the six months, as to cover the longest space of time that they carried on business as copartners in any district during that period, this court has jurisdiction, notwithstanding they carried on business, as copartners, in Massachusetts, for the same time, during the same period.

The jurisdiction of this court is sustained, and Day and Pratt must answer to the merits of the petition.

MORTGAGEE—RENT OF MORTGAGED PREMISES—TAXES—LIEN.

An assignee in bankruptcy received, as property of the bankrupt, real estate subject to mortgages, and collected rent due on a lease of the same made by the bankrupt. Proceedings were taken to foreclose the first mortgage, in which a decree was had, and the property sold and bought by the second mortgagee. The taxes on the property were paid by the second mortgagee out of his purchase money. He then petitioned the bankruptcy court to direct the assignee to pay him the amount of the rent and of the taxes, out of the bankrupt's estate: Held, that there was no ground on which he could claim either the rents or the taxes.

This was a petition by William Foster for an order that the assignee of James F. Rhodes, a bankrupt, pay to him the amount of certain rents collected by the assignee, and of certain taxes paid by the petitioner. The petition set forth that, when Rhodes became a bankrupt, he was the owner of certain real estate which was subject to a mortgage to one Pearless, and a second mortgage to the petitioner; that the assignee had collected rents for the premises due on leases executed by Rhodes for a period subsequent to the adjudication in bankruptcy, and to the becoming due of the petitioner's mortgage; that a suit was commenced to foreclose the Pearless mortgage, and a decree entered in that suit, under which the premises were sold and were bought by the petitioner, who received a small sum on his mortgage out of the surplus moneys arising out of such sale; and that he had paid the taxes on the premises out of the purchase moneys. The petitioner claimed to have an equitable lien on the premises and on the rents, and prayed for an order that the assignee be directed to pay them to him.

Jesse Johnson, for petitioner.

Wm. W. Bliss, for assignee.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I do not at present see how any proceeding, no matter when taken, can entitle a mortgagee to collect the rents of mortgaged property, which had passed into the possession of an assignee in bankruptcy before the rents became due. An application by a mortgagee for the appointment of a receiver to collect, for his benefit, rents of the mortgaged premises accruing during the pendency of a foreclosure suit is not based upon any absolute right.

It is, in legal effect, a proceeding to acquire immediate possession of the mortgaged premises, and it may be defeated by the intervention of superior equities, or by the collection of the rents by the mortgagor. It is addressed to the discretion of the court; when granted, the rents secured thereby arise from the possession of the property at the time the rent became due, such possession being acquired by means of a receiver.

But if some proceeding, intended to divert the rents from the hands of the assignee, could avail when taken in time, it seems clear that there remains no ground on which to base a claim like the present, where a second mortgagee petitions to be paid rents which, before the filing of his petition, had been collected by the assignee in bankruptcy, as owner in possession of the mortgaged property at the time they became due. Moneys so collected by an assignee in bankruptcy are assigned by the law to be distributed equally among all the creditors, unless shown to be subject to some prior specific lien.

It has been claimed that the petitioner has a specific lien upon these rents by the terms of the mortgage, which contains, as part of the description, the words "together with all, and singular, the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereto belonging, and the reversion, remainder, rents, issues and profits thereof."

This is the usual form of a mortgage; these words are intended simply to give a full description of the property; they do not entitle the mortgagee to collect the rents, nor do they create a lien upon rents accruing and collected before the possession of the property passes away under foreclosure proceedings.

The petitioner also prays that the assignee be directed to pay him the amount of certain taxes upon the mortgaged property, paid in course of the foreclosure proceedings taken by a prior mortgagee, whereby the surplus was by so much diminished to the detriment of the second mortgage held by the petitioner.

But I see no principle by which the rents in the hands of the assignee can be held to be charged with the taxes so paid.

The prayer of the petition must therefore be denied.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—PREFERENCE.

On the 11th of January, 1878, the bankrupt, a druggist, executed a chattel mortgage on all his stock of drugs, etc., constituting his stock in trade, to his father-in-law, to secure him as surety on a note given by the bankrupt. The mortgage was taken with the understanding that the bankrupt was to go on and sell at retail in the ordinary way, which he accordingly did. On the 20th of May the mortgagee, having become dissatisfied with the way in which the business was being conducted, took possession of the property under the mortgage. On the 4th of June the petition in this case was filed. Held, That the mortgage and the seizure of the property thereunder were both acts of bankruptcy, the first as being a fraudulent conveyance, and the second as operating as an unlawful preference.

[On certificate of register in bankruptcy.]

By N. W. Branson, Register.

To Honorable Samuel H. Treat, District Judge: The petition of Richardson & Co. and Clarke M. Smith, creditors of William A. Foster, praying for the adjudication of said debtor as a bankrupt, which was filed on the 4th of June, 1878, and the answer of said debtor denying the alleged acts of bankruptcy, and the testimony heretofore taken in this matter, having been referred by order of the court to the undersigned register, to consider the same and make report of his conclusions thereon, I would respectfully report that, after examining the evidence in this matter and hearing the arguments of Honorable J. W. Patton, attorney for the petitioning creditors, and Honorable A. L. Knapp, attorney for the debtor, I have arrived at the following conclusions: The debtor is a retail druggist, doing business at Springfield. On the 11th of January, 1878, he executed a chattel mortgage to his father-in-law, Isaac L. Ewell, to indemnify said Ewell as surety for Foster on his note to H. B. Buck, for two thousand dollars, of even date with the mortgage, and payable eighteen months after date. This two thousand dollar note was partially in renewal of a former note to Buck, signed by Ewell, as surety for Foster, for one thousand two hundred dollars, which was taken up on the execution of the new note. The mortgage was acknowledged and recorded on the 14th of January last. By this mortgage Foster conveyed to Ewell, among other things, all the stock of drugs, chemicals, medicines, wines, etc., constituting his stock in trade. The mortgage is in the usual form, and contains the usual privilege to the mortgagee to seize the property whenever he shall feel himself unsafe or insecure.

It is charged by the petitioning creditors that this mortgage was fraudulent and void as to creditors, because made to delay and hinder creditors. On this point I quote the testimony of Mr. Ewell literally as follows: "When I took this mortgage it was the understanding that he was to go on and sell at retail until I became dissatisfied. I knew that he had been selling at retail, and I also knew that since I took the mortgage, and up until I took possession, he had been selling as before." Mr. Foster testifies: "I have done a retail trade since the mortgage was given, the same as I did before." "I have bought goods such as our business demanded since the mortgage was given." On the 20th of May last Mr. Ewell took possession of the property under the mortgage. He says he took possession because he was dissatisfied with the way the store was running. C. M. Smith had told him Foster was some two or three hundred dollars behind on rent. On inquiry, he found indebtedness of Foster of seven or eight hundred dollars to six or seven persons, besides the debts on which Ewell was liable as surety. Ewell had also gone Foster's security on a debt of seven hundred dollars to First National Bank, for money borrowed in February or March last, which has not been paid. He further says: "At the time I took possession under my mortgage, I thought it was necessary to protect my interest, and, in my view, that necessity arose when I learned of the indebtedness of Foster, and because of Foster's failure to make deposits to meet the notes in the bank. Foster told me before I took possession under my mortgage, that times were so hard that it was impossible to make the payments to meet the bank notes and Buck's note. That information contributed towards my action in taking possession of the stock of goods under my chattel mortgage."

Mr. Foster testifies: "At the time Mr. Ewell took possession under his mortgage I could not pay C. M. Smith what I owe l h'm, and one of the notes to the First National Bank had become due and had been renewed because I could not meet it when due. The failure to meet these debts when the same became due was because of the dullness of the times." There is no evidence tending to show that Foster was insolvent at the time he executed the mortgage; but at the time possession was taken by Ewell under the mortgage, Foster, being a merchant or trader, was unable to pay his debts in the ordinary course of business, and was, therefore, within the meaning of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], insolvent.

The questions presented for determination in this matter are, whether the chattel mortgage, with the continued exercise of the right of sale of the mortgaged property by the mortgagor, constitute a fraudulent conveyance, and whether the seizure of the property by the mortgagee constitutes an unlawful preference. In the case of Robinson v. Elliott, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 513, it was determined by the supreme court of the United States that a chattel mortgage of a stock in trade, which permits the mortgagor to dispose of the mortgaged goods in due course of trade, is fraudulent in law as to other creditors, and is null and void as to them, without reference to the good faith of the mortgage debt, or the intentions of the mortgagor as to fraud. The same doctrine was announced many years ago by the supreme court of this state, in Davis v. Ransom, 18 Ill. 396. In that case the court say: "The law gives no sanction to such arrangements, and, however well intentioned in fact, will hold them void as against creditors as tending to encourage and sustain frauds, and to hinder creditors in the collection of their just demands." This rule has been adhered to in several subsequent decisions of that court, and I understand this to be the doctrine established by the general current of authorities, both in this country and in England, though in some few states, a different rule has obtained. And it has also been held by many courts of high authority, that when the agreement permitting the mortgagor to sell does not appear on the face of the instrument, but appears by proof aliunde, the instrument is equally fraudulent and void as if the agreement had appeared on its face. Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 123; Russell v. Winne, 37 N. Y. 591; Putnam v. Osgood, 52 N. H. 148; Collins v. Myers, 16 Ohio, 547; Freeman v. Rawson, 5 Ohio St. 1; Horton v. Williams, 21 Minn. 187; Steinart v. Deuster, 23 Wis. 136; Bank of Leavenworth v. Hunt, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 391; In re Manly [Case No. 9,031]; In re Kahley [Id. 7,593]. And the supreme court of this state in case of Barnet v. Fergus, 51 Ill. 352, use the following language: "It was held by this court, in Davis v. Ransom, 18 Ill. 402, and in Read v. Wilson, 22 Ill. 377, that a mortgage of a stock of goods, containing a provision authorizing the mortgagor to retain possession for the purpose of selling in the usual course of trade, was fraudulent and void as to creditors. This was held to be fraud in law. It is a necessary consequence of these decisions that where the mortgage contains no such provision, but the mortgagee nevertheless knowingly permits the mortgagor to make use of the property in the ordinary course of trade, and in the same way as before the mortgage was made, this would be such a perversion of the mortgage from its legitimate purposes as to withdraw from its protection, and place within the reach of other creditors, all the property which the mortgagee had permitted the mortgagor to hold for sale in the ordinary course of business. This principle has been recognized in Griswold v. Sheldon, 4 Comst. [4 N. Y.] 581, and Delaware v. Ensign, 21 Barb. 85." And in the case of Edgell v. Hart, 9 N. Y. 213, Denio, C. J., held that the existence of a provision permitting sales by the mortgagor, out of the mortgage or in it, would invalidate it as matter of law, and that where the facts are undisputed the court should so declare.

In view of the authorities above cited it would seem to be clear that the mortgage in question, which the mortgagee took (as he himself testifies) with the full understanding that the mortgagor was to go on and sell the mortgaged property at retail, was fraudulent in law and void as to creditors. But counsel for the debtor insist that while the mortgage may have been void as to creditors, yet it was good as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, and that as the mortgagee took possession of the property before any execution or other lien was obtained on the part of any of the creditors, and before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, that the mortgage, or at least the seizure of the property under it, is now valid as against the creditors. Under the state law this position is doubtless well taken. The law of Illinois permits a debtor to prefer some of his creditors to others. But the bankrupt act was intended to prevent such preferences; and the question is thus presented as to whether the seizure of these goods by the mortgagee was such a transfer of the property as to make an unlawful preference within the meaning of the bankrupt act, and consequently to constitute an act of bankruptcy. If, as I think is clear, the mortgage in question was void as to creditors up to the 20th of May, 1878, when the mortgagee seized the property, then the seizure was the first act which gave it validity as against the creditors, and this was only fifteen days prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. The seizure operated as a transfer of the property to the mortgagee, and enabled him to apply the proceeds of the property to his individual use, and thus gave him a preference over the other creditors. This question is incidentally passed upon by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Robinson v. Elliott, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 513. In that case the debtor had given a chattel mortgage which permitted the mortgagors to remain in possession of the mortgaged goods, and sell them as before, and supply their place with other goods. The mortgagees seized the goods under the chattel mortgage, and twelve days after such seizure a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the surviving mortgagor. The mortgagees filed a bill praying that an account be taken of the amount due them, and for a sale of the goods.

The supreme court held that the mortgage was constructively fraudulent, it appearing upon its face that the legal effect of it is to delay creditors. It was insisted by the mortgagees that if the mortgage is held void in law, still, the delivery of the goods to the mortgagees vests a sufficient lien prima facie to enable the mortgagees to enforce their lien in equity. On this point Mr. Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The answer to this is, that the case made by the bill does not proceed upon such a delivery at all, but upon the mortgage and seizure under it. Besides, if the appellants (mortgagees) could turn the proceedings into a voluntary pledge by the debtors, it would not help them, for it would violate the preference clause of the bankrupt act, as they got the goods only twelve days before the petition in bankruptcy was filed."

If the principle held in the numerous decisions above cited is correct, that a mortgage of goods is fraudulent in law where the intention appeared aliunde to permit sales of goods in the usual course of trade, then the fact that such permission appears on the face of the mortgage in question in Robinson v. Elliott does not make that case, so far as it refers to the preference clause of the bankrupt act, distinguishable in principle from cases where such permission is proven aliunde. The decision of Judge Drummond in Harvey v. Crane [Case No. 6,178] appears to be in point in this case. In that case the chattel mortgage in question was executed on the 20th of March, 1869, but not recorded until the 5th of March, 1870. It had not been acknowledged as it stood when the decision was rendered, and included after purchased goods, and permitted the mortgagor to go on and sell in the usual course of business, and was void as against creditors under the law of this state. On the 7th of March, 1870, the mortgagee took possession of the property under the mortgage, knowing, or having reason to believe, that the mortgagor was insolvent. On the 30th of the same month a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the mortgagor. The mortgage was given for a bona fide loan. After reciting these facts in his opinion, Judge Drummond says: "But in this case it is claimed that a mortgage, not valid as against creditors under the laws of this state, has ripened into an effectual lien or transfer by virtue of the possession taken on the seventh of March, because, though the mortgagor was then insolvent, and the mortgagee knew it, proceedings in bankruptcy were not commenced until the thirtieth of March, and the assignee took as a purchaser, with notice of all equities. But there was nothing operative as against creditors until the defendant took possession. As against them, until then, the defendant had no security for his loan. A creditor may obtain a preference from an insolvent debtor with knowledge of the insolvency, if within the limitation prescribed by the law. Bean v. Brookmire [Id. 1,168]. But the possession must be obtained by a complete act within the limitation. Here the mortgage did not create the preference as against creditors that was invalid; neither did the record. It was still, when recorded, an invalid mortgage as against creditors under the law of the state, among other reasons, because as it stood it was an unacknowledged mortgage. That which operated against creditors, if at all, was the taking possession on the 7th of March. It is true it was authorized by the mortgage, and it was, in that sense, the joint act of the mortgagor and the mortgagee, possession being the consummation of the act. The assignee represents the creditors, and any claimed lien which would be void as against creditors generally, would also be void as against the assignee. In this case the defendant cannot rely upon the mortgage, because it is invalid as to creditors under the law of the state. He cannot rely on the possession, because it was taken under authority from an invalid mortgage, and because, further, the mortgage was wrongfully used by the defendant to obtain possession, he, at the time, knowing the insolvency of the mortgagor."

This decision then seems to announce the principle that a chattel mortgage, void as to creditors under the law of this state, and under which the mortgagee has taken possession, having at the time reasonable cause to believe the mortgagor to be insolvent, is also void as against the assignee in bankruptcy, appointed under bankruptcy proceedings commenced against the mortgagor within two months after possession has been taken by the mortgagees; that such taking of possession operates as a preference, and is, therefore, void as against the other creditors, and does not remit the mortgagee to his rights as of the date of the mortgage. The decision of Justice Woodruff, of the United States circuit court for the Northern district of New York, in Smith v. Ely [Case No. 13,044], also appears to be in point. Of the mortgages in question in that case, Justice Woodruff says: "Although it is not in terms so expressed in the mortgages, yet it is clear upon the evidence that the understanding of all parties was, that the mortgagors should continue their business as merchants, as such sell the goods then on hand, buy others, and sell them in turn in their discretion, for the purposes of gain." On the 12th of November, 1870, the mortgagees took possession under the chattel mortgages, and on the 13th of January, 1871, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the makers of one of the mortgages. As to the effect of such possession, the court says: "Under these views of the rights of the parties and of the validity of the mortgages, how did the delivery or surrender of possession by the bankrupts to the defendants on the 12th of November, 1870, affect the right of the assignee in bankruptcy? If, as against creditors, the mortgages and the alleged title of the defendants to the property was fraudulent and void, their taking possession in the mere exercise of their claim of the title would not aid them. Their title remained fraudulent and void still, as against creditors. If, on the other hand, the assent of the bankrupts to their taking possession, the delivery of the property, and surrender of the keys, were of themselves an appropriation of the property to the payment of the mortgage debt, then the bankrupt law pronounces it void, for this reason—both parties then knew that the bankrupts were insolvent; it swept the entire partnership property into the hands of the defendants; it operated, and was clearly intended to operate, to give them security and payment to the exclusion of their creditors, and it was within four months next preceding the filing of the petition upon which the defendants were adjudged bankrupts. The defendants can, therefore, gain nothing from this latter view of the transactions." See, also, Smith v. McLean [Id. 13,074]; In re Kahley [Id. 7,593]; In re Eldridge [Id. 4,330].

This last case was also decided by Judge Drummond, and grew out of chattel mortgages executed in Wisconsin, in March and May, 1868, under which the mortgagees took possession on the 15th of October, 1868. The petition in bankruptcy against the mortgagor was filed on the 19th of October, 1868. The court held that, as to the property afterwards acquired under the law in Wisconsin, there was not a valid mortgage, but only authority to take possession, and the rights of creditors, under the bankrupt law, must depend upon its effect upon the property at the time the act was done which might be supposed to operate as a transfer. This was the taking possession under the license contained in the mortgage. At that time the mortgagor was insolvent, and the mortgagees had reason to believe it. The court says: "It is true in this case there was not, in one sense, a transfer made on the 15th of October, 1868, because the instruction or authority to take possession of after-acquired property, as the supreme court of Wisconsin construes it, was given in the mortgages executed some months before. But it is not competent for a party to give this authority in relation to property which he may afterwards acquire, and thus prefer a creditor who shall take possession when he is known to be insolvent, and thus avoid the effect of the bankrupt law, because literally he has not made a transfer. That, certainly, would be a facile method of evading the scope and spirit of the law. In legal effect it was a transfer within the meaning of the law. It was a continuing act from the date of the authority to the taking possession, the last act being the consummation of the transfer, and in this instance the transfer giving a preference, the mortgagor being insolvent, and the mortgagees knowing the fact. It must be treated as if a mortgage were made of the after-acquired property at the time the mortgagees took possession. It was in substance, then, the case described in the 35th section, and as against the assignee of Eldridge, representing the general creditors, was void."

In view of the authorities above referred to, my conclusion is, that the mortgage in question, and the seizure of the property thereunder, were both acts of bankruptcy, the first as being a conveyance with intent to delay or hinder creditors; the second as operating as an unlawful preference.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1869.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—SALE OF MORTGAGED PROPERTY BY ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY—TRANSFER OF LIEN TO PROCEEDS — JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS.

1. The circuit and district courts of the United States have jurisdiction of a bill by an assignee in bankruptcy, to redeem a chattel mortgage made in Massachusetts.

[Cited in Giveen v. Smith, Case No. 5,467, Olney v. Tanner, 10 Fed. 104. Distinguished in Goodall v. Tuttle, Case No. 5,533.]

2. The district court has power to order chattels in the possession of the assignee, and on which there is a mortgage, to be sold free of the incumbrance, and the mortgagee's lien is then transferred to the proceeds of sale.

[Cited in Re Kahley, Case No. 7,593; Markson v. Heaney, Id. 9,098; Re Brinkman, Id. 1,884; Sutherland v. Lake Superior Ship Canal Railroad & Iron Co., Id. 13,643.]

[Cited in Clifton v. Foster, 103 Mass. 236; Markson v. Haney, 47 Ind. 35; Marston v. Stickney, 55 N. H. 385; Munson v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co., 120 Mass. 85.]

3. This power depends upon the true construction of the first section of the bankrupt act; and may be exercised notwithstanding the mortgagee has by his contract a right of immediate possession of the goods, and desires to avail of that right.

[Cited in Re Kahley, Case No. 7,593; Davis v. Anderson, Id. 3,623; Goodall v. Tuttle, Id. 5,533; Taylor v. Robertson, 21 Fed. 215.]

4. Such an order ought not to be passed when a mortgagee, whose title is admitted to be valid, would be injuriously affected, as where there is clearly no market value for the property, or not more than the amount of the mortgage.

5. The bankrupt court may in some cases order the assignee to expend money in finishing goods for sale, when it is clearly shown that a benefit must result to the estate, and that the work can be done within a reasonable time.

Bill in equity by the assignees of McKay & Aldus to restrain the service of a writ of replevin by mortgagees of machinery and other personal property. The bill charged that the bankrupts were largely engaged as makers of locomotives, machinery, and other like articles, in Boston, and being insolvent, mortgaged all their personal property to the defendant Ames, as trustee for himself and the other defendants composing the firm of Page, Richardson & Company, October 17, 1868, to secure an antecedent debt, as well as future advances, and with intent to prefer the mortgagees who had reasonable cause to believe them insolvent; that the defendants laid claim to all or nearly all the assets from which a dividend could be realized, including unfinished locomotives, which in their present state were of little value, but which could be finished in a short time and at comparatively small cost, and would then be worth a large sum; that if carefully managed the assets would probably realize a handsome dividend, but if pressed for sale under the power in the mortgage would be sacrificed; that the said McKay & Aldus filed their petition in bankruptcy, December 15, 1868, and that on the day the plaintiffs were appointed assignees, the defendant Ames sued out of the circuit court the writ of replevin now sought to be enjoined, with intent to obtain immediate possession of the property, and forthwith to dispose of the same, which suit is irregular, because twenty days' notice thereof was not given to the assignees. On the same day that this bill was filed in the circuit court, the assignees filed a petition in the district court, praying that the unfinished locomotives might be finished and sold for the benefit of all parties interested, and that the mortgage to Ames might be declared void, &c. By consent, both cases were heard together upon affidavits addressed to the motion for a preliminary injunction. It appeared that the mortgagees had made advances in cash and by accommodation acceptances to the amount of about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; that for the debt alleged to have been incurred before the mortgage was given, there was collateral security taken at the time it was contracted, which, at its supposed value, exceeded the amount of that part of the debt; and that all the advances were made under a written promise of full security by way of mortgage.

D. Foster and T. K. Lothrop, for plaintiffs.

1. The district court has jurisdiction to settle all controversies between the assignees of a bankrupt and persons claiming any lien or adverse interest whatever, and to order the property to be disposed of, leaving all incumbrancers their just claims against the proceeds. Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292; Bill v. Beckwith [Case No. 1,406]; McLean v. Lafayette Bank [Id. 8 888]; In re Stewart [Id. 13,418]; In re Salmons [Id. 12,268].

2. The power should be exercised in this case, because it is clearly for the benefit of all parties that the property should not be sold in its present condition; and because it must be assumed on the hearing that the title of the mortgagees is at least doubtful.

3. The mortgagees have no right to foreclose excepting under the orders of the court of bankruptcy, nor to bring a writ of replevin without twenty days' notice.

B. F. Thomas and J. D. Ball, for defendants.

1. The affidavits show that our mortgage is valid. All the advances were made under a written promise for security, and we actually took it contemporaneously with each advance.

2. By the terms of the mortgage we have the right of possession; and section 25 of the bankrupt act gives the court power to order a sale of property in dispute only when it shall not have been taken from the possession of the assignee by process of law.

3. The court has no authority to permit the goods to be finished. They can only be sold. No section of the statute, and no rule of court, contemplates that the assignees shall carry on the business of the bankrupt. In England there was such a power, and it has been purposely omitted by those who drew up our bankrupt act. See 1 and 2 Wm. IV. c. 56, § 35; 12 and 13 Vict. c. 106, § 150, under which it has been decided that the objection of any creditor will avail to prevent the exercise of this right by an assignee.

4. Replevin is not one of those actions of which notice must be given, as is seen by comparing sections 14 and 25 of the bankrupt act and the law of Massachusetts, from which section 25 is taken. Gen. St. c. 118, § 54.

5. This cannot be a bill to redeem, because there is no equity of redemption in chattels. Gen. St. Mass. c. 151, §§ 4, 5: Taber v. Hamlin, 97 Mass. 489.

LOWELL, District Judge. It is admitted that either the circuit or the district court may entertain a bill by an assignee to redeem property mortgaged by the bankrupt. It is said, however, that there is no equity of redemption in chattels, but that the title becomes absolute immediately upon a breach, unless some remedy is given by statute; that in this case there should have been a tender of the amount due, according to sections 4 and 5 of chapter 151 of the General Statutes of Massachusetts, which is the sole mode of preventing a forfeiture. I am of opinion that there is such an equity: 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1031; Patchin v. Pierce, 12 Wend. 61; Slade v. Rigg, 3 Hare, 35; Wayne v. Hanham, 15 Jur. 506; Whitfield v. Parfitt, Id. 852. Nor does it appear to me that the statute remedy is exclusive. If the tender is not made, the legal estate is not revested in the mortgagor, but he may still come into equity, at least when a tender was impossible, or when for any other reason, the remedy at law is inadequate, as in this case, in which the assignees show a necessity for marshalling the securities, even if the mortgage is wholly valid. See Dunn v. Massey, 6 Adol. & E. 479. Upon the remedy which may be had in the state courts, I speak with diffidence, but there is direct authority in this court to the point that the want of a tender required by statute is no bar to equitable relief here. Gordon v. Hobart [Case No. 5,609]. By section 14 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] the assignee has all the rights of redemption which the debtor had; and it has been thought that he has more, and may redeem before the debt is payable, as the law of England has been held to be under the words "whenever payable." But that point does not arise in this case.

Taking this merely as a bill to redeem, a court of equity would hesitate to permit the mortgagee to sell the property immediately, since the delay will largely benefit the assignee, with no risk to the mortgagee, who in the mean time can diminish his debt by the application of other securities.

But the assignees contend that bankruptcy so far changes the remedies of the respective parties that they ought to have the right, which they deny to the other side, of selling the property under the direction of the court, holding the proceeds to answer the lien of the respondents; and that this is a case in which the court should give such a direction. Both the power and the expediency of its exercise are denied by the mortgagees.

Under the bankrupt law of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], the district court had power upon the petition of the assignee and notice to the mortgagees, to order a sale by the assignee which should pass an unincumbered title to the bankrupt's land, and the several mortgagees, whether assenting or not, were bound by the sale, and remitted to their rights against the proceeds. Houston v. City Bank of New Orleans, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 486; Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292; Norton's Assignee v. Boyd, Id. 426. In the circuit court for Ohio, a bill was maintained by an assignee against several mortgagees of distinct parcels of land, and against persons claiming title to bank stock, to ascertain which transfers were valid and which voidable, and to redeem the former and annul the latter, all which was done; and when the case came to the supreme court the objection of multifariousness, which had been overruled in the court below, does not seem to have been brought up. McLean v. Lafayette Bank [Cases Nos. 8,885-8,889]; Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 150. The sixth section of the act under which these decisions were made is nearly identical with the first section of the present law, excepting that the latter adds words which seem to have been adopted for the purpose of recognizing those decisions, namely, that the jurisdiction shall extend "to the collection of all the assets of the bankrupt, to the ascertainment and liquidation of the liens and other specific claims thereon, to the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties, and to the marshalling and disposition of the various funds and assets, so as to secure the rights of all parties, and due distribution of the assets among all the creditors." And the cases cited in argument accord with this construction. It is urged that it is only on the application of the mortgagee that the property can be sold, and such appears to have been the practice in Massachusetts and in England. But in the latter country, it is merely a matter of practice which the courts can change at any time; and in the former, the language of the statute is that when a creditor holds a mortgage the property shall, "if he requires it," be sold, &c. These words are not found in our statute, section 20, and though the variation is slight, it is not unimportant in view of the practice under the act of 1841, by which the assignee might apply for the order of sale. Besides, section 20 must be construed with section 1, which, as we have seen, gives the district court power to order the sale, and to require the incumbrancers to follow the proceeds only. Of course such a sale ought not to be ordered when the mortgagee's title is admitted to be valid, and the sale will injure him, as where there is no market value, or not value enough for his own security. In such a case he ought to have the right to foreclose. In this case there appears to be both a serious dispute of title, and reason to believe that the mortgagee's rights will not be injuriously affected by the sale.

It was strongly urged that whatever power might otherwise exist, the 25th section clearly indicates that an adverse claimant may sue out replevin at any time before the court has ordered a sale. Such appears to be the effect of the latter part of that section, but it may perhaps be neutralized by the earlier part which gives the power to the court to order the sale, not only of property in possession of the assignee, but of all "which is claimed by him," and Mr. Justice Swayne has held, in the case cited in the argument, that the power does extend to property in the possession of an adverse claimant. Bill v. Beckwith [Case No. 1,406]. It may be observed in support of this view, that the Massachusetts statute, from which section 25 of our act is evidently taken, has not the words "or which is claimed by him," so that that law only authorizes the sale of property in the possession of the assignee; and then the proviso that the possession may be recovered by replevin at any time before the order of sale, is harmonious with the remainder of the section, and perfectly intelligible, and these additional words may have been inserted in the bankrupt law for the very purpose of effecting a change. I do not decide this point, and have considerable doubt upon it. But I am clear that under the full powers given by section 1, I can order the sale of mortgaged property which is in the possession of the assignee, whether there is any dispute of title or not, and that section 25 does not take away this power, and that when the assignee has applied for such an order it is too late for the mortgagee to avoid it by replevin. What I doubt is, whether when the case is not one concerning liens and incumbrances upon property in the assignee's possession, but a mere adverse title asserted by a third person, the assignee can force a sale against the will of the adverse claimant.

Another important question which was very strenuously debated, was, whether the court can authorize the assignee to finish the locomotives at the expense of the estate. There is no express provision of the statute touching this point, but, upon careful reflection, I am satisfied that where a great advantage will result to the estate, and within a reasonable time, the assignee may be permitted to expend money in this way. I do not refer to trading; I cannot see that buying and selling as a trader can come within the scope of the assignee's duty, but his office being to sell and collect the assets, he may, by order of court, put the assets into a merchantable form, as by cutting timber, harvesting crops, and the like, and so of finishing unfinished goods, though not, perhaps, working up mere raw materials, unless under very peculiar circumstances. I yield to the argument that the necessary delay must not be at the risk of the mortgagee, and due order can be taken for his protection, by a deposit of money, or in some other way, if necessary.

Temporary injunction ordered in the suit in the circuit court. Reference of the petition in the district court to ascertain what part of the goods can be sold at once; what part, if any, can be advantageously finished, and within what time, and at what expense; what part of the goods is covered by the mortgage, and the consideration and validity of the mortgage. Leave given to all parties to apply to the court from time to time as they may be advised; and to the mortgagee to apply to have the proceeds of sales of goods embraced in his mortgage, paid over to him from time to time, on proper terms.

[NOTE. At a subsequent hearing in the district court, on the petition of the mortgagee, several questions were passed upon touching the validity of the mortgage, and the amount of the property conveyed by it. Case No. 323.]

CARRIERS—DAMAGE TO CARGO—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

[The measure of damages for negligence causing injury to cargo is the difference between the cost of the damaged goods and the proceeds received from the sale thereof.]

[This was a libel by Foster against the bark British Oak for damage to cargo.]

Plaintiff shipped on board the Sligo, in June, 1849, 8,075 empty corn bags, to be delivered at New York. He charges gross waste on the part of the master, both in the storage and transportation, and that in being discharged in New York the bags were wet, filthy and rotten, requiring immediate sale at auction. The owners of the vessel take issue only as to the extent of damages, and say they tendered $250, together with costs. The libellants being dissatisfied, went on with the suit.

It is clear, THE COURT said, that the master has been grossly negligent, and not only that, but the violation of contract was accompanied by indecent and aggravated misconduct, which can receive no countenance from the court; and there is no special claim to any abatement from actual damage. The cost was $706.55, from which deduct the proceeds at auction, $344.98; the amount tendered, $250,—leaving $111.57; for which, with interest after date of sale, decree ordered.

RAILWAY AID BONDS — CHARTER PRIVILEGE OF RECEIVING SUBSCRIPTIONS WITHOUT A VOTE OF THE PEOPLE.

1. The power conferred upon counties along the route of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company by the charter of that company of March 10, 1859, to subscribe for its stock without a vote of the people, was not taken away, as respects Callaway county, by the amendatory act of March 24, 1868 [Laws Mo. 1868, p. 97].

[See note at end of case.]

2. The provisions of the state constitution as to aid to railways, amendatory acts and titles to acts, discussed.

[Cited in Merriwether v. Saline Co., Case No. 9,485.]

This is an action upon coupons attached to bonds issued by the defendant to the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, or bearer, dated January 1, 1869. The answer denies the authority of the county court of Callaway county to issue the bonds, and this denial rests upon the grounds mentioned in the opinion of the court. The cause was submitted to the court upon the pleadings, an agreed statement of facts, and the record of the county court of Callaway county in relation to the issue of the bonds. The plaintiff [Thomas J. Foster] is admitted to be the owner of the bonds for value, without notice. The defendant insists that the bonds were issued to the south branch of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, under the act of March 24, 1868, and not under the act of March 10, 1859, both of which are referred to in the opinion of the court; and the defendant further insists, as there was no vote of the people as required by the constitution of 1865, and as no part of what is claimed to be the "main line" of the road is within the county of Callaway, that the bonds were issued without authority of law, and are void. It is admitted that the county has paid interest on the bonds for 1870 and 1871, and has also paid a small part of the principal. It is also admitted that no vote of the people of the county was had authorizing the subscription by the county court. The bonds were made payable to the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company or bearer, and contain the following recital: "This bond is issued by Callaway county by authority of an act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri, approved March 10th, 1859, as amended by an act approved March 24th, 1868."

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Affirmed in 93 U. S. 567.]

J. D. Stevenson and Ewing & Smith, for plaintiff.

O. Guitar, T. C. Reynolds, Lay & Belch, Jeff. Jones, and Boulware & Flood, for the county.

PER CURIAM (DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge, concurring). On the 10th day of March, 1859, the general assembly of the state of Missouri passed an act authorizing the organization of a railroad company under the name of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, with a capital stock of three million dollars, and granting it power to "mark out, locate, and construct a railroad from the city of Louisiana, in the county of Pike, by the way of Bowling Green, in said county, to some suitable point on the North Missouri Railroad, intersecting said road between the southern limits of the town of Wellsville, in Montgomery county, and the northern limits of the town of Mexico, in Audrain county, thence to the Missouri river, at the most eligible point on the line the most suitable and advantageous as regards distance, grade, cost of road, and permanent value of same."

In this act of incorporation power was given "the county court of any county in which any part of the route of said railroad may be, to subscribe to the stock of said company, and to invest its funds in the stock of said company, and issue the bonds of such county to raise funds to pay the stock thus subscribed, and to take proper steps to protect the interests and credit of the county." No popular vote was required as a condition to the exercise of this power by the county courts. Before any subscription by Callaway county to the stock of the company, a number of the surveys of the route of the road had, according to the agreed statement of facts, been made, some of them running through Callaway county and others through Boone and Howard, and not touching any part of Callaway county. On the 16th day of January, 1868, the county court of Callaway county appointed Thomas B. Harris "commissioner and agent of the county of Callaway to take stock in and subscribe to the capital stock of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, being five thousand shares of one hundred dollars each, of said capital stock, said subscription to be paid by the issue of county bonds, * * * as may be required by said company during the progress of the construction of said railroad from some point west or southwest of the North Missouri Railroad, on either the Wellsville or Jefftown routes, as surveyed through said county through the city of Fulton (in said county), and by way of New Bloomfield (in said county), as near as practicable to the Missouri river." This subscription of five hundred thousand dollars by the commissioner thus appointed by the county was made by him on the books of the company on the same day (January 16, 1868), as appears by a recital on the records of the county. Three smaller subscriptions were afterwards made by the order of the county court to the stock of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company. The Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, it is agreed, subsequently to the said 16th day of January, 1868, "located and built the road now operating, running from Louisiana, in Pike county, to Mexico, in Audrain county, and located and graded throughout, and partially completed, the road running from Mexico to Glasgow (in Howard county), on the Missouri river, and completed the road now running and operated from Mexico, in Audrain county, by way of Fulton, in Callaway county, through Callaway county, to a point therein on the Missouri river opposite Jefferson City."

The constitution of the state of Missouri in force at the time of the passage of the act of incorporation of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, on the 10th day of March, 1859, contained no provision restraining the legislature from authorizing subscriptions to railroads in any manner it saw fit, but the present constitution, which went into effect on the 4th day of July, 1865, contains this provision: "The general assembly shall not authorize any county, city or town to become a stockholder in, or to loan its credit to, any company, association, or corporation, unless two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city, or town, at a regular or special election to be held therein, shall consent thereto."

In reference to laws in force at the time of the going into effect of the present constitution of the state, it has this provision: "All statute laws of the state now in force, not inconsistent with the constitution, shall continue in force until they shall expire by their own limitations, or be amended or repealed by the general assembly."

In reference to the subject and title of laws, the present constitution has this provision: "No law enacted by the general assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title; but if any subject embraced in an act be not expressed in the title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as is not so expressed."

A further provision of the constitution is: "No act shall be revised or re-enacted by mere reference to the title thereof, nor shall any act be amended by providing that designated words thereof shall be struck out and others inserted in lieu thereof; but in every such case, the act revised or re-enacted, or the act or part of the act amended, shall be set forth and published at length, as if it were an original act."

With these constitutional provisions in force, the legislature, on the 24th day of March, 1868 (Laws 1868, p. 97), which was after the subscription of $500,000 by the defendant, undertook to amend the original act of incorporation of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, by increasing its capital stock, fixing the terminus of the road, authorizing the location and construction of a branch road, and granting power to carry into effect the provisions of the act. It may be proper, although not strictly necessary, to notice here one question discussed by counsel and by the state supreme court in the Saline county case (State v. County Court Saline Co., 51 Mo. 350), as to whether the act of March 24, 1868, is an amendatory act; and as to this point, it seems to us only necessary to state that the amendment of 1868, aside from the title, repeats nearly the whole of the original charter, verbatim, embodying in it new provisions only, thus literally complying with the constitutional provision cited, requiring an amendment to be "set forth and published at length, as if it were an original act."

Looking thus at the amendatory act, it cannot, as we think, be held that the legislature undertook thereby to create by special act a new corporation, which, under the constitution (article 8, § 4), it was prohibited from doing.

As to the constitutional provision requiring that an act shall not relate to more than one subject, and that expressed in its title, our opinion is that the mischief sought to be provided against was the passage of acts having no title at all, a false title, or mixing up matters incongruous and having no relation to each other. The whole of the amendatory act embraces but one subject when viewed with reference to the matter in hand, viz.: the building of a railroad, and this is sufficiently expressed in the title. With the question of the validity of the amendatory act, so far as it relates to counties south of the Missouri river, we have no concern, and pass no opinion, having to deal here with Callaway county, on the north side of the river, and in which a part of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad might, by the original charter of March 10, 1859, be located and built.

The question as to whether the legislature in 1868 had authority to amend the charter of 1859 would seem to be settled by the constitutional provision above cited in respect to amending statute laws, as expounded by the supreme court of Missouri in the case of State v. Cape Girardeau & S. L. R. Co., 48 Mo. 468, and the late case of State v. Greene Co., 54 Mo. 540. But we do not mean to be understood as holding that the power of amendment of charters would exist to the extent of conferring, by way of amendment, powers prohibited by the express provisions of the constitution of 1865.

Callaway county is undoubtedly on the line of the railroad as contemplated in the original charter, and hence the county court had the right to subscribe, provided any part of the road was within it. At the time of the county's subscribing the $500,000 stock under the original charter and prior to its amendment, some of the lines of the route of the railroad had, in fact, been run through Callaway county, as admitted by the agreed statement of facts.

The order of subscription speaks of paying out the bonds as the work of construction progresses through the county. The supreme court of Missouri has so repeatedly decided, under provisions such as those contained in the charter of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad, that the county courts had the right, unaffected by the constitution of 1865, to subscribe without submitting the question to the people, that it is not necessary to dwell upon the point, or do more than to refer to the late case of Smith v. Clark Co., 54 Mo. 58, in which the former decisions are cited and affirmed; and to the still more recent case of State v. Greene Co., 54 Mo. 540.

Another question discussed by counsel relates to the effect of the recital in the bonds, which were made payable to the "Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company," or bearer, that the same were issued in conformity to the act of the 10th day of March, 1859, and the amendatory act of March 24, 1868. Under our view, the amendatory act did not create a new corporation, and we are inclined to think that it did not take away the power of the county court to subscribe for the stock as conferred in the original charter of the company, and that it should not be held to do so as respects the bona fide holder of bonds which purported on their face to be issued under the authority of the charter. And this view finds a very strong support in the decisions of the supreme court of the state affirming the power of the counties along both the main line and branches, to subscribe for the stock under the provisions of charters antedating the present constitution, in the Macon, Sullivan and Greene county cases.

As to the amendatory act calling the road running through Callaway county the "South Branch," after the main subscription had been made to the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad to aid in building a road surveyed and afterwards built through Callaway county, this cannot affect the bona fide holders of the bonds.

From the evidence and the original charter of 1859, it would appear that the road, as now built through Callaway county, was the main line, or, at least as much the main line as the line farther west, which does not touch Callaway county. The limitation in the charter of 1859 of the capital stock to three millions, scarcely sufficient to build a road of a hundred miles, the direction of the road from Louisiana by way of Bowling Green, crossing the North Missouri Railroad west of Wellsville and east of Mexico, thus narrowing down as it were the objective points, all indicate that the nearest place on the Missouri river was in the minds of the originators of the road, as well as of the legislature when it passed the charter.

We have adverted to the nature and effects of the amendatory act because these subjects have been largely discussed by counsel, and not because they are absolutely necessary to reach a conclusion in the present case. We place our judgment on this ground: The plaintiff is a bona fide holder of the bonds issued by the county. These bonds recite that they are issued by virtue of the power conferred upon the county by the original charter of the company of March 10, 1859, as amended by the act of March 24, 1868. The act of March 10th, thus recited, did give the power, and that power is not taken away by the amendatory act of 1868, but according to the decisions of the supreme court of the state, above mentioned, remains unaffected by the provisions of the constitution of 1865, requiring a popular sanction to such subscriptions. All of the subscriptions were made to the "Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company," the original corporation, and not to the branch mentioned in the amendatory act.

As there was legislative power in the county to make the subscription and to issue the bonds, and as the county court has exercised this power and issued the bonds which have found their way into the hands of the plaintiff, a bona fide holder for value, the decisions of the supreme court of the United States conclude the county from making the defense here attempted, and this whether the amendatory act be or be not void, and whether the county was or was not authorized to transfer the subscription to what is called the "South Branch," or to apply the money raised by the sale of the bonds to the building of that branch.

It may be further remarked that the record of the county court shows that the proceeds of the bonds issued by the county were applied to the building of a road substantially along the line to which the subscription was made on the 16th day of January, 1868; that the work progressed thereby and the bonds issued from time to time; that the minor changes in the line of the road were assented to by the county court; that the road passes through the entire body of the county, and is in full operation, and that two years interest and part of the principal of the bonds had been paid. Under these circumstances it seems to us that no one, familiar with the decisions of the supreme court of the United States upon the general question, and of the supreme court of Missouri to the effect that the power of the county court to subscribe without a vote of the people survived, unaffected by the constitution of 1865, can reasonably anticipate any but one result.

The case, in the aspect in which it is viewed by the defendant's counsel, presents some new questions, and it is certainly one of great moment to the county, as it involves in its consequences a liability of over half a million of dollars. We are relieved of much of the weight of responsibility we would feel by the consideration that our judgment is not final, and that the record can so easily be put in a shape to present the merits of the case for the decision of the supreme court of the United States. In our opinion the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

NOTE. In the case of City of San Antonio v. Gould, 34 Tex. 49, it was held that the charter of a railroad company, which contained a provision that the city of San Antonio might subscribe to the capital stock of the road, and issue its bonds in payment of the same, was obnoxious to that provision of the Texas constitution (article 7, § 24) which provided that "every law enacted by the legislature shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title." But the ruling is in direct conflict with City of San Antonio v. Lane, 32 Tex. 405,—a suit upon the same securities,—where the reverse was held in a well-considered opinion. And in order to reach the result arrived at, it was necessary to overrule not only City of San Antonio v. Lane, but also the still earlier case of City of San Antonio v. Jones, 28 Tex. 19, where the same securities were likewise sustained.

[NOTE. On writ of error the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court, Mr. Justice Hunt delivering the opinion, in which it was held that upon any reasonable construction of the language of the statute it embraces Callaway, which was one of the possible sites, and a site ultimately occupied in fact. Continuing, the learned justice remarked: "We are of the opinion, therefore, that the subscription actually made by the county of Callaway in January, 1868, was legal, and that the circumstance that the bonds were issued at a later date is an immaterial one. We are of the opinion, also, that the amendments of the charter, and the subsequent action by which the portion of road from Mexico through Callaway county, and under such amendments was made a branch road, and the portion from Mexico to Glasgow was called the 'main road,' and that the bonds were issued both under the act of 1868 and the act of 1859, if such were the fact, do not affect the case. The latter act is an amendment and continuation of the former, and refers to what was then termed a 'branch road.'" Mr. Justice Miller dissented. Callaway Co. v. Foster, 93 U. S. 567.]

CONTRACT FOR BUILDING A SHIP.

A contract for building a ship, or supplying materials for her construction, is not a maritime contract.

FOSTER v. GODDARD.

[1 Cliff. 158.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1858. [2]

CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION — ACCOUNTING BETWEEN TRADERS—EXPENSES — TERMINATION OF CONTRACT — EFFECT ON EXISTING BUSINESS RELATIONS.

1. Under a written contract to pay one tenth of the net profits after deducting expenses "that may appertain to the goods themselves," the expenses of clerk-hire, advertising, and taxes were properly deducted from the gross amount. [See note at end of case.]

2. Under this contract the respondent, who had the exclusive control of the accounts of the business, refused to receive a sum less than he considered due from a debtor of the concern, after the claim was barred by the statute of limitations, declined to allow the complainant to receive his proportion of the sum offered, and withheld from him the means of adjusting such proportion. Held, that respondent must account for complainant's proportion of the sum thus offered.

3. Where, by the terms of a contract, the respondent had the right of purchasing, selling, and chartering the vessels designed for the trade, at his option, the loss or profit to be charged or credited in the general account, held, that respondent should account to the complainant for the profits made by him on the sale of a vessel built expressly for the business, though never used in it, but sold for a large profit soon after being launched.

4. When the agreement under which a vessel was employed expired two months before her return, and while she was at sea, held, that her value must be computed, in determining the respective shares of the parties to the agreement, at what she was worth at the time of arrival, and not at the date of the expiration of the agreement, such appearing to be the intention of the parties, and that the burden was on the party contracting to pay a certain proportion of the value, to show that she was worth less at the time of her arrival than she was actually sold for two months after.

5. At the expiration of an agreement, by its own limitation, claims to a large amount arising from transactions under the agreement were still outstanding and uncollected. The respondent, one of the parties to the agreement, claimed that the master, in making up the account under it, should deduct the discount necessary to make the debts due equivalent to cash on the day the agreement expired, and that henceforth they were to be regarded as his property, and at his risk. Held, that the master properly declined to adopt this theory, and justly allowed the complainant his portion of the profits made after the agreement expired.

This was a bill in equity praying for an account of all the dealings between the parties, under two agreements, dated June 24, 1843, and May 7, 1849, respectively. The first agreement was set forth in the bill as follows:—

"This memorandum of an agreement entered into this 24th of June, 1843, by and between William W. Goddard, on the one part, and George J. Foster, on the other part, witnesseth: That said Foster engages to proceed at once in the ship Robin Hood direct to Valparaiso, and that he will there remain for the term of five years, and devote himself for the whole time exclusively to the management of said Goddard's business, such as the sale and purchase of cargoes, collecting freight moneys, procuring return freights, eliciting orders for the purchase and shipment of goods for the coast, effecting the sale of vessels, when wished, and collecting and forwarding all the information that may be obtained respecting the trade. In fine, to transact any and all business that may be required of him by said Goddard, in strict accordance with his instructions, whose interest he is to care for and protect from frauds, impositions, false and unjust charges, and also extravagant expenditures of the shipmasters, to the best of his ability; he is also to give to each vessel the greatest possible despatch that may be consistent with the owner's interest. In consideration of which, said Goddard engages that said Foster shall, at the expiration of five years, be entitled to one tenth of the net profits of his business in that trade, after deducting interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum on the capital invested, and all costs and expenses of whatever name and nature that may be incurred, both at home and abroad, in sailing, victualling, manning, and keeping in repair the vessels employed, including all port charges, as also the actual expenses that may appertain to the goods themselves, including the cost of said Foster's living, which is not to exceed six hundred dollars per annum. And, furthermore, said Goddard has the right of purchasing, selling, and chartering the vessels designed for the trade, at his option, the loss or profit attendant thereon to be charged or credited in the general account. The vessels now designed for the trade are the ship Robin Hood and bark Roscius, and are valued, the Robin Hood, at ten thousand five hundred dollars, cash, at the completion of her last voyage; and the Roscius, at eight thousand dollars, cash, on the completion of her present voyage. It is also understood that said Foster's interest of one tenth is liable to the full extent for all the risks and casualties in the business attendant upon the goods and vessels. It is furthermore agreed that said Foster shall be entitled to a compensation of one thousand dollars per annum, in lieu of his share of the profits, should it fall short of that amount; it is understood, however, that this is not in addition to his share of the profits, and that the profits of the business are not to be abstracted until the expiration of the five years agreed upon. Said Foster is also hereby authorized to call to account and to displace any and all masters of vessels that may be sent out by said Goddard, and replace them with others, should he find it expedient so to do. In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals."

Under this agreement the complainant alleged that he proceeded to Valparaiso, where he continued to reside during the time limited therein, and well and truly performed all things in said agreement provided to be done by him. The general mode of conducting the business was by adventures and shipments of merchandise, procured at Boston by defendant, and consigned to complainant, by whom the merchandise was sold, and the proceeds invested in other merchandise which was consigned to defendant, who sold the return cargoes; by whom, also, books and vouchers were kept, showing the exact profit and loss on each adventure. At the time limited for the existence of said agreement there was due the complainant, and in the hands of the respondent, as alleged in the bill, a large sum, which, for the accommodation of the respondent, was allowed to remain in his hands, without the rendition of any account. The second agreement entered into between the parties was set forth as follows:—

"This memorandum of an agreement entered into this 7th of May, 1849, by and between William W. Goddard, on the one part, and George J. Foster, both of Boston, on the other part, witnesseth: That said Foster engages to proceed at once to the west coast of South America, and that he will devote his whole time in those parts, as also in Mexico and California, exclusively to the management of all said Goddard's business in those countries, such as sale and purchase of merchandise and any other property, collecting freight moneys, procuring freights and consignments of goods, eliciting orders for the purchase and shipment of property, investing money, drawing and negotiating bills of exchange, and forwarding all the information that can be obtained respecting the trade; in fine, to transact any and all business that may be required of him by said Goddard, in accordance with his instructions and best interests, which he is also to care for and protect from impositions, unjust charges, and also extravagant expenditures of the shipmasters, to the best of his ability. In consideration for which, said Goddard engages that said Foster shall on his return be entitled to one fourth part of the net profits of his business in that trade that he (said Foster) shall have conducted to completion, after deducting interest on the capital furnished by said Goddard, as also all costs and expenses of whatever nature that may be incurred both at home and abroad in prosecuting the business, including the expense of sailing and keeping in repair the vessels employed, together with the port charges, as also the cost of said Foster's living, which is not to exceed one thousand dollars per annum; and, furthermore, said Goddard has the right of purchasing, chartering, freighting, and selling the vessels designed for the trade at his option, the profit or loss attendant thereon to be charged or credited in general account. The vessels now designed for the trade are the ships Crusader and Harriet Erving, which are to be charged in account, the former at the value that may be agreed upon between William W. Goddard and Samuel Goddard, in settlement of their account; and the latter, at the cost of construction and equipment when new, abating nothing for the use of the ship for her present and first voyage. It is understood that said Foster is to leave in hands of said Goddard, bearing interest, what funds he may have,—less two thousand dollars, to be paid him before leaving this country,—and that neither the same nor any portion of his profits shall be abstracted until he shall see fit to withdraw from the present arrangement, which he is at liberty to do at any time, by giving said Goddard so much notice, that any voyage he may have commenced previous to receipt of such advice shall receive the full benefit of all said Foster's services to its final accomplishment, and not otherwise. It is also understood, that said Goddard has the right to annul this agreement whenever he may choose to do so; and, furthermore, that said Foster is liable to the full extent of his interest and means for all the losses that may be made in this business, as also for all the risks and casualties attendant thereon. Said Foster is hereby authorized to call to account, and to displace, any and all masters of vessels that may be sent out by said Goddard, and to replace them with others, should he find it expedient so to do."

Under this second agreement the complainant proceeded to the west coast of South America, and there conducted the portion of the copartnership business provided for him to do, until the 31st of September, 1850, when he terminated the agreement in the manner therein provided. The business under this contract was conducted in the manner similar to that under the first, the accounts and vouchers being in the hands of the respondent, who had been, by the complainant, repeatedly requested to effect an adjustment, and furnish the complainant an account of the profits of the business. The cause was referred to a master, to take an account of the dealings and transactions of the parties under the agreements, and to state balances. After the reference to the master, the complainant, by leave of court, filed an amendment to the bill, and the respondent filed his answer to the same. An order was also passed by the court, that the amendments to the pleadings should be submitted to the master to whom the cause had been previously referred, to state the accounts with the same powers, and in as full and perfect a manner as if the amendment had been introduced prior to the first order of reference.

The material portions of the master's report were as follows:—

"The first disputed item is a claim made by the complainant to a share in the profits realized by the respondent upon a sale of the ship Valdivia. This was a new ship, built under a contract made by the respondent, and she was launched on the 15th of October, 1846, and was sold by the respondent to the United States government the 7th of December, 1846, at a profit. The validity of this claim depends upon the construction to be given to the particular stipulations upon the subject in the first agreement. She was never actually employed in the business of this trade. On the other hand, there is evidence tending to prove that she was originally contracted for, built, and designed for this trade; that the respondent had engaged a part of her outward cargo; that these facts were communicated by him to the complainant; and that, under instructions from him, the complainant had procured a portion of her first return cargo. But she was sold before any cargo had been laden on board of her at Boston. It is contended by respondent, that complainant is only entitled to a share of the profits of such vessels as were actually employed in the trade, and not of those which might have been designed for the business, but not actually employed in it; that, although the respondent may have intended the Valdivia for this trade, yet he abandoned that intention before carrying it into effect, and that the agreement of June 24, 1843, did not restrict him from pursuing business on his private account. The language of this contract is, that the respondent may purchase, sell, or charter any vessel designed for this trade, and any profit or loss attendant upon such purchase, sale, or charter is to be credited or charged in the general account. If the respondent purchased or sold any vessel designed for this trade, an interest was expressly given to the complainant in the results of that transaction. Whatever was designated for use and sale, and set apart, became a part of the common stock. That this language was here used in its natural and obvious sense will appear from a reference to the succeeding provision in the agreement, viz.:—'The vessels now designed for the trade are the ship Robin Hood and bark Roscius, and are valued, the Robin Hood at $10,500 cash, at the completion of her last voyage, and the Roscius at $8,000 cash, on the completion of her present voyage.' At this time, the Roscius, so far from being actually employed in the joint business, was then absent upon a different voyage. She was, however, agreed upon and designated for this trade, and her value was fixed upon the completion of her then present voyage. It seems to me, therefore, upon every view of this contract, that the construction for which the respondent contends that the complainant had an interest only in the vessels actually employed cannot be maintained.

"Crusader's second voyage.—Complainant claimed, in the next place, that he should be credited with a share of the profits of the Crusader's second voyage. His engagement was for the term of five years after his arrival in Valparaiso, which expired October 3, 1848; he was to receive one tenth of the profits of the business for the same period, or the sum of $5,000, at his election. He in fact remained in Valparaiso until November 30 or December 1, 1848, employed, as he claims, in the business of the respondent. The agreement was for a fixed and definite period, and it makes no provision for compensatory services rendered after its expiration. If the complainant rendered any services after October 3, 1848, he did not render them under this agreement, for it expired by an express limitation at that date. It seems to me, therefore, that he cannot claim by virtue of this agreement an interest in a voyage which was not completed until more than three months after October 3, 1848, as compensation for any services rendered by him after that date. It was competent, however, for these parties to make an additional agreement covering a period not embraced within the original contract, and the evidence clearly shows that they have so done. It must be conceded that the respondent had no right to call upon the complainant for his services for a single day beyond October 3, much less for a period of two months; neither is it very probable that the latter would have gratuitously rendered such services. Upon this point, I find, as matter of fact, that the respondent did request and did receive of the complainant the benefit of his services after October 3, 1848, and particularly in reference to the second voyage of the Crusader, upon the agreement, if not express, yet clearly implied and well understood, that the latter was to share in the profits of this voyage. It was competent for the parties to make an additional agreement, and they have done so; but I cannot acquiesce in the suggestion of complainant's counsel, that it was competent for the parties subsequently to agree that a certain voyage begun before the agreement ended should be deemed to be within the original contract, which would not have been otherwise embraced in its terms,—thus giving to the contract a construction and effect which by law it would not have.

"The amount to be credited for the sale of the Charlotte.—The Charlotte was sold by the respondent, in February, 1849, for the sum of $23,000. In the first account filed by him in this case, he credited the business with that sum, and charged commissions on that sum for effecting the sale. The respondent now asks to reduce that credit to the sum of $16,000, which he alleges was the true value of the vessel on October 3, 1848, and alleges that the complainant is only entitled to a credit of her value upon that day, when the agreement of 1843 expired. On October 3, 1848, the Charlotte was upon her fourth voyage, having left Valparaiso, September 9, and arriving in Boston, December 5, 1848. In the accounts filed by the respondent in this case, he has credited the complainant with a share (one tenth) of the profits of this voyage. It has thus been treated by the respondent as embraced within the agreement, although the voyage did not terminate until December 5, 1848. I can draw no other inference, from the fact that the respondent himself has thus credited the profits of this voyage, than that, by common consent, this voyage was taken and agreed to be within the first agreement. On the 3d of October the Charlotte was at sea, engaged in this voyage for the common benefit, and her service was not ended until December. And therefore, until the completion of that voyage thus prosecuted for the joint benefit, she was by the express terms of the agreement at the joint risk. From this consideration it seems to me clear that the period for her valuation must be deemed to have been postponed until the termination of this voyage. The Charlotte arrived the 5th, and was probably discharged about the 20th, of December. According to the testimony the demand for California vessels began in December, 1848, and the witness advertised one about the 10th of December. The Charlotte was sold in February, 1849. There is no evidence before me that her value on December 5th or 20th was not about the same as in the succeeding February. Respondent credited the amount received on the sale in February, and charged commissions thereon. I am of the opinion, therefore, that no sufficient reason has been shown for disregarding the credit originally given for the sale of the Charlotte, and that this item must stand as originally credited in the first account filed by the respondent.

"New England Worsted Company's account.—The respondent in his account has charged the general account with a balance due from the New England Worsted Company, under date February 28, 1848, $2,173.04. The complainant objects to this item, and claims that there should be deducted from it the sum of $1,789.89, which, as he avers, the New England Worsted Company were willing to pay, and which the respondent was bound to receive.

"The facts proved are as follows:—The company were charged, on the books of the respondent, with the sum of $2,173.04 on the balance of an account due for wool; but the amount due was in dispute between them. In 1850 or 1851, the company tendered in payment about $1,500, which he declined to receive. Nothing further was done by either party, until January, 1857, after the claim had been outlawed three years, when the company offered the sum of $1,789.89, but the respondent refused to receive it, and also declined to permit the complainant to receive his proportion of that sum. It is contended by the respondent that he had a right to conduct his own business, in his own way, being responsible only for a want of good faith, and that he was neither bound to accept a sum less than what he believed to be due, nor to institute a suit to recover what he claimed; and that, if any loss has thereby occurred, it is properly chargeable to the business. The management of the business, including the collection of the accounts, was under his absolute control; and in conducting it he was responsible, I think, only for the exercise of good faith and ordinary diligence. He was not bound to accept a sum less than what he believed to be due; and if he had instituted a suit to recover the full amount, the complainant would undoubtedly have been bound by the result. But was he at liberty to do neither? Moreover, in January, 1857, when the New England Worsted Company offered to pay the sum of $1,789.89, Goddard had no legal claim whatever upon them; for he had already allowed his right to recover the original demand, or any sum, to be barred by the statute of limitations for three years. If under these circumstances he chose to decline the sum of $1,789.89, he voluntarily subjected himself to the loss; but he could not in good faith compel the complainant, against his expostulations, to share it with him. In my opinion, therefore, the sum of $1,789.89 should be deducted from the item in dispute.

"Rent, taxes, clerk hire, &c.—The respondent has charged in his account, under both agreements, certain items for store rent, taxes, clerk hire, and advertising, paid by him, as he claims, on account of the joint business, and which should be allowed. The complainant disputes these charges; and the first question is, whether they are to be considered in ascertaining the complainant's share of the profits. How far these charges are maintainable under the first agreement, I have found to be a question of difficulty in view of the provision upon that subject. By the terms of the contract the parties have, as it seems to me, expressly provided that, so far as the complainant's share is concerned, the profits are to be ascertained by deducting—1st. The interest on the capital invested (not the interest and taxes). 2d. All costs and expenses of sailing, victualling, manning, or repairing the vessels employed, including port charges. 3d. The actual expenses that may appertain to the goods themselves. 4th. The cost of the complainant's living, not exceeding $600 per annum; and that no expense which does not belong to one or the other of these clauses can be included. Under this view, I incline to the opinion and do report that the charges for clerk hire, for taxes on the capital employed, and for advertising the business generally, ought not to be allowed. As to store rent, so far as the store was procured or occupied for the storage of the goods, the charge is proper, but beyond this it must be disallowed.

"Third voyage of the Harriet Erving.—It is said by the respondent that the sales of this cargo were not completed until long after January 1, 1851; that they were made by Alsop & Co. after the complainant became a member of that firm; that one of its articles was, that no partner should be interested in any other business; and that he as such partner received his share of the commissions upon these identical sales. It is argued that the complainant never had any interest in this voyage, or, if he had, that he forfeited the same, because he was entitled only to a share of the profits of such business as he should conduct to completion. These suggestions deserved, and I have endeavored to give them, the most careful consideration. The duties which the complainant was to perform are stated in the agreement with considerable particularity. According to the arranged course of business, the merchandise shipped by the respondent to Valparaiso for sale was placed in the house of Alsop & Co., who made the sales upon a guaranty commission, with the assistance and under the general control of the complainant, who acted under instructions from the respondent. It thus appears, that, while aiding in the sales of the outward cargoes formed a material, it by no means constituted the main part of the duties devolving upon the complainant under the agreement. The evidence very fully shows that it was not the habit nor according to the intention of these parties to force immediate sales of the entire cargoes, either by auction or otherwise. So that, although the larger portion of each cargo was generally disposed of within a few months—often a few days—after its arrival, yet in most, if not in all cases, some portion of it remained undisposed of for one, two, or even three years. It must, therefore, have been perfectly well understood by them, that, whenever this agreement should be terminated, more or less would remain to be done in disposing of the outward cargoes. Respondent, in his letter of March 18, 1846, wrote thus: 'Do not, however, suffer our goods to be forced upon people at a sacrifice. My object is to supply the market at the highest point, and deeply mortified should I be to learn that another had afterwards obtained better prices.' The business seems to have been conducted subsequently in accordance with these instructions. Whether the respondent, under any circumstances, after the termination of the agreement upon notice, could have required the complainant to remain in Valparaiso and devote himself, to the exclusion of all other business, for one, two, or more years, as the case might be, in disposing of the residue of cargoes, at such prices as the former might prescribe, upon pain of forfeiting all his interest in such cargoes, may admit of grave doubt. He might, perhaps, reasonably have required that he should have the benefit of the complainant's services in substantially disposing of any such residues, and that the latter should not engage in any other business which would conflict with his duty in this respect. Complainant was indeed bound to conduct to completion the business of this voyage, by superintending the sale of the cargo; but, their relations having terminated in all other respects, it is difficult to perceive why that duty might not have been fully performed by him, in letter and spirit, although he had become, without the assent of the respondent, a member of the house of Alsop & Co., or of some other firm. What remained for him to do under this agreement was this: to aid and superintend Alsop & Co. in effecting sale of the residue of the cargo. What the respondent had a right to require was, that he should perform this service faithfully, and that he should enter into no engagements that would be inconsistent with its performance; and therefore it is, that I do not perceive why the circumstance of his joining a mercantile house, after the termination of his agreement, although before the last cargo was entirely disposed of, would necessarily involve a violation of his agreement, or a forfeiture of his rights. If the respondent could have exacted more than this, it certainly was not practically necessary for the protection of his interest, and it is not strange that he should have waived it. That he did waive any such right, if it existed, is, I think, clearly proved. Upon the 13th of April, 1850, the third voyage of the Harriet Erving had been projected, and the respondent must have known then, as well as in June, July, and August, during which months the evidence shows much correspondence relating to this voyage, that, according to all former experience, some portion of her outward cargo would remain to be sold after December 31, 1850. Knowing this, on the 13th of April, in reply to the complainant's letter of February 22, announcing his intention to terminate the agreement, January 1, 1851, and then to join the house of Alsop & Co., he not only assented to this course but warmly approved of it. It was after this expression of assent that the voyage in question was undertaken, and that most of the services in reference to it were rendered. Let it be observed that under the agreement of 1849, then subsisting, the complainant could be called upon to transact no business of which he was not to share the profits. He was called upon by the respondent to transact this business, and he did it. I think that the cordial assent which the latter gave on April 13th to Foster's joining the house of Alsop & Co., January 1, 1851, fairly carried with it an assent that he might, after becoming a member of that firm, complete what would remain to be done under this voyage. It is now too late for him to object, especially as, after giving that assent, he required and accepted the services of the complainant as to this voyage,—services which he was not bound to render, and which the respondent could not require, except upon agreement that he was to share in the profits. The argument pressed against the complainant's right to share in the profits of the Harriet Erving applies as well to every preceding voyage, for the sales of none of them were completed on January 1, 1851, when he joined the house of Alsop & Co. But the same answer applies to all: either, 1st, that, after the termination of the agreement by notice, the complainant was at liberty to engage in other business, provided that he, at the same time, faithfully performed what remained for him to do in completing the sale of the residues of cargoes; or, 2d, if the agreement authorized the respondent to require of the complainant that he should abstain from all other business until the sales of all residues of cargoes were absolutely completed, yet that he waived this harsh and oppressive privilege, and consented to his joining the house of Alsop & Co. As to the suggestion that the complainant, after becoming a member of the firm of Alsop & Co., was not at liberty to engage in other business, that would seem to be a matter between him and his partners, rather than between him and the respondent; but a complete answer to it, as well as a sufficient reason for the respondent's ready assent to the arrangement, are found in the previous connection that had existed between all these parties in this business, and in the fact that, in effecting the best sales possible of this cargo, their interests were identical.

"Mode of making up the accounts, &c.—The respondent claims that the accounts are to be made up as cash on the 3d of October, 1848, the day when the first agreement terminated, and on the 1st of April, 1850, or the 1st of January, 1851, according as it may be determined upon which of said days the second contract terminated. Accordingly, to accomplish this, in crediting the account with the outstanding claims due under the two contracts, but running to maturity, he proposes to deduct the amount of discount necessary to make them equivalent to cash on the 3d of October, 1848, and April 1, 1850, or January 1, 1851, as the case may be, and then to charge the amount with interest ever afterwards on such discount, as if the cash had actually been paid by him. No such discounting of the claims for cash actually occurred. In my opinion this is not the proper mode of making up the accounts, for two reasons. 1st. The contracts do not provide for this mode of accounting and settlement, but, as it seems to me, contemplate the contrary. If the respondent may now make up the account on that theory, then certainly the complainant, on the days when these contracts severally terminated, had the right to require that the former should assume the risk that all debts due to the concern, amounting as it is said in the whole to over four hundred thousand dollars, would be paid, and he was then entitled to an absolute credit for these sums, deducting the discount. So that if every dollar had been lost or uncollectible, the complainant would still have been credited with the full amount. The propositions cannot be dissevered. If the respondent may now assume that he took this risk, then certainly Foster could have required him to take it. But the written contracts, as well as the conduct of the parties, contradict this view. 2d. In the second place, if the respondent had the right, or was bound to assume and to give credit to the concern for all outstanding claims, as cash on the day when each contract terminated, and to settle on that basis, he did not do it, but refused so to do. He advanced no money, he discounted no credits. Having refused or neglected to come to an account, until all the claims had matured, and until the filing of this bill, I do not perceive upon what equitable or legal principle he can now assume that he has done what he refused to do, or be entitled to any such benefit as he now claims. The period to which the account must be made up under both contracts is the filing of the bill.

"Recapitulation.—The master finds and reports that under the original and amended bill the complainant is entitled to recover: 1st. The balance due him under the first and second agreements (exclusive of the second voyage of the Crusader and the third voyage of the Harriet Erving), as per item No. 1 ($41,581.56), $41,581.56. 2d. One tenth of the profits of the second voyage of the Crusader, as per item No. 3 ($4,005.72), $4,005.72. 3d. One fourth of the profits of the third voyage of the Harriet Erving, as per item No. 2 ($21,943.15), $21,943.15."

To which the respondent alleged the following exceptions:—

"First exception.—For that the said master has not allowed to the said respondent, and has not permitted him to debit the business of this respondent, carried on by him under the contract dated June 24, 1843, sundry sums of money paid by the said respondent in the regular and usual course of his said business, for clerk hire, taxes, and advertising, to wit, thirty-eight hundred and thirty-eight dollars and seventy-eight cents for clerk hire, seventeen hundred and eleven dollars and ninety cents for taxes assessed upon the property employed in said business, and three hundred dollars paid for advertising his said business; the said sums amounting in the aggregate to fifty-eight hundred and fifty dollars and sixty-eight cents, all which were proper expenditures in the course of the said business.

"Second exception.—For that the said master has erroneously charged this respondent with the sum of seventeen hundred and eighty-nine dollars and eighty-nine cents, the amount of a loss made in the prosecution of the business aforesaid, by a sale of goods to the New England Worsted Company, for which they have not paid, but refuse to pay.

"Third exception.—For that the said master has allowed to the complainant, under the contract of June 24, 1843, one tenth of the profits made by this respondent in the construction and subsequent sale of a vessel commonly called the Valdivia, which vessel was not employed in, or put into, the business of this respondent, carried on under the contract aforesaid.

"Fourth exception.—For that the said master, in taking an account of the business of this respondent to which the contract of June 24, 1843, refers, has fixed the value of a vessel called the Charlotte as it was at a period of time some six months subsequent to the expiration of the five years mentioned in the contract of June 24, 1843, whereas it should have been fixed at its value at the time of the expiration of said five years.

"Fifth exception.—For that the said master has allowed the complainant one tenth of the profits made by this respondent by the use and employment of a vessel called the Crusader, and its cargoes, during her second voyage, which was not sought to be recovered by the bill of the complainant as originally filed or as amended, and which was not and is not embraced by or in the contract of June 24, 1843.

"Sixth exception.—For that the master, in taking the accounts under the contract of June 24, 1843, did not ascertain the value of the assets which had been employed in the business to which the contract refers, at the expiration of the five years in the said contract mentioned, as should have been done in order to ascertain the profits in which the complainant under said contract was entitled to share, but, in taking the said accounts, erroneously allowed the complainant a portion of the profits made by the respondent in the prosecution of his business after the 3d of October, 1848, at which time the interest of the complainant in the business of the respondent altogether ceased.

"Seventh exception.—For that the said master, in taking the said accounts, has allowed the complainant a portion of the interest received by the respondent for the use of the money of this respondent subsequent to the 3d of October, 1848.

"Eighth exception.—For that the said master has allowed to the complainant, under the contract of the 7th of May, 1849, a portion of the profits made by the respondent in the prosecution of his business and trade connected with Valparaiso, which was transacted and carried on by this respondent after the relation established by said contract between the complainant and the respondent had ceased, and the rights and interest of the complainant in the business of this respondent had altogether determined, which rights and interest did determine on or about the 1st of April, 1850, which business and trade were not conducted to completion by the said complainant, and which did not receive the full benefit of all the services of the complainant to its final accomplishment.

"Ninth exception.—For that the said master did not ascertain the profits made by the respondent in his Valparaiso trade, to which the contract of the 7th of May, 1849, refers, by ascertaining the value of the assets which had been employed in the trade, as it existed at the expiration of the time during which the complainant had an interest in the business and trade of said respondent under the said contract, as the said master should have done.

"Tenth exception.—For that the said master has allowed the complainant one fourth of the profits made by this respondent in the use and employment of a vessel called the Harriet Erving, and its cargoes, during her third voyage, which was not sought to be recovered by the complainant in his original or amended bill, which vessel and cargoes, and the profits resulting therefrom during the said voyage, were not embraced in the contract of May 7, 1849, nor by any contract or agreement made by the respondent with the complainant, but were solely and exclusively at the profit and loss of the respondent.

"Wherefore the said respondent doth except to the said master's report, and appeals therefrom to the judgment of the court."

The argument was upon these exceptions.

C. A. Welch, and E. D. Sohier, for complainant.

Watts and Peabody, for respondent.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Ten exceptions are filed by the respondent to the master's report, which will be considered in the order in which they were made. In the first place, the respondent complains that he was not allowed by the master to debit the assets on hand, under the first contract, with the sums paid by him for clerk hire, taxes upon the property, and for advertising the business. Those expenses amount in the whole, as alleged by the respondent, to the sum of five thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars and sixty-eight cents, and it is insisted by the respondent that the decision of the master on this point was incorrect. Net profit was the basis prescribed by the contract, by which the amount of the complainant's compensation was to be ascertained. If there had been no net profit, then he would have been entitled to no compensation, except the six hundred dollars allowed for his support. As a general rule, the term "net profits" may be defined to be the gain made by the merchant in buying and selling goods after paying all costs and charges for transacting the business, and such it is insisted by the respondent is the sense in which the words are used in this instrument. By the terms of the contract, the complainant was entitled, at the expiration of five years, to one tenth of the net profits of the business in that trade, and by necessary implication the remaining nine tenths of the profits belonged to the respondent. Were this the whole of the contract, it would unquestionably follow, as is contended by the counsel for the respondent, that each of the nine parts of the profits belonging to the respondent ought to be equal to the one tenth part allowed to the complainant. On the part of the complainant it is insisted that the words "net profits," as used in this contract, must be understood in a special sense, and that they mean the gain made in the business after the expenses therein specially enumerated have been deducted. Suppose it to be so for the sake of the argument, it still remains to ascertain whether the charges in question are not properly embraced in the expenses appertaining to the goods themselves, which it is admitted are specially enumerated among those which are to be deducted. Unless clerk hire and expenses for advertising fall within that class of expenditures, it is difficult to see what terms short of the actual enumeration of those expenses could have been employed to accomplish that purpose. Expenses for clerk hire and advertising are as much incident to the transaction of mercantile business as those incurred for insurance, "freight," and storage, and the merchant might as reasonably calculate to procure goods without cost, as to expect to keep them on hand for sale without their being subject to taxation. Interest on capital was, doubtless, enumerated, on account of the special character of the arrangement, to exclude the conclusion that might otherwise follow, that the capital for the business was to be furnished by the respondent without any such allowance, and the same remark applies also to the costs and expenses in victualling, manning, and sailing the vessels employed, and keeping them in repair. Necessary expenses of that sort would arise at home as well as abroad, and hence it was provided that all such expenditures should be deducted from the gross proceeds of the business, in order to ascertain the net profits, to diminishing the usual signification of that term. For these reasons the first exception to the master's report is sustained.

Complaint is made, in the second place, by the respondent, that the master has erroneously charged the business with $1,789.89, being the amount of a loss made in prosecuting the same, for which payment has not been made. Credit had been given to the debtors owing this sum to the amount of $2,173.04 on the sale of a certain quantity of wool; but the amount actually due was in dispute. They tendered to the respondent, in 1850 or 1851, the sum of $1,500, which he declined to receive. Nothing further was done by either party until January, 1857, which was three years after the demand was barred by the statute of limitations. At that time the debtors offered to pay the sum charged by the master to the general account, but the respondent refused to accept it, and also declined to allow the complainant to receive the proportion belonging to him, although the complainant was present and requested permission so to do. Mere omission to collect, without more, would not render the respondent liable for a claim of this description; but the claim in this case does not rest on that fact alone. He not only suffered the demand to be outlawed, but when the debtors voluntarily came forward after the limitation had taken effect, and offered to pay nearly the whole amount of the principal, he refused to receive it, and by virtue of his exclusive control over the accounts withheld from the complainant the means to adjust the proportion belonging to him. Suffice it to say on this point, that I am of the opinion that the decision of the master was correct, and for the reasons that he assigned for his conclusion. Both of the preceding exceptions refer to the business transacted under the first agreement, and so does the third, which will now be considered.

It is to the effect that the master has improperly allowed to the complainant one tenth of the profits made by the respondent in the construction and subsequent sale of the vessel called the Valdivia, which he alleges was sold by him for his own benefit. By the terms of the contract, the respondent had the right of purchasing, selling, and chartering the vessels designed for this trade, at his option; and it was expressly stipulated that the loss or profit attendant thereon should be charged or credited in the general account. According to the report of the master, the allegation that this vessel was never employed in the business is technically correct, but she was constructed under a contract made by the respondent, and was in fact built and designed for that purpose, and by the express words of the contract, the interest of the complainant to the full extent of his one tenth was made liable for all the risks and casualties in the business, whether attendant upon the goods or the vessels. As early as the 17th of March, 1846, and before the vessel was constructed, the respondent wrote to the complainant, informing him that he had made the contract for her construction, expressing the hope, at the same time, that she would make the outward passage in sixty-five or seventy days. On the 22d of August, 1846, he wrote again, to the effect that one of the masters employed in the business was waiting for this vessel, adding, in the same letter, that she would be despatched in November. His next letter is dated October 12, 1846, in which he informs the complainant that the vessel would be launched on the following day, saying, "She will be our next ship." In that letter he also informed the complainant that he had engaged a part of her outward cargo, and in a letter dated on the day following he instructed the complainant not to sell anything to arrive by this vessel. During the period covered by this correspondence, and before any intimation had been given by the respondent of any different arrangement, the complainant, on the faith of these letters, had procured a part of her return cargo. Another vessel, however, was sent in her stead, and on the 15th of January, 1847, the respondent wrote to the complainant to the effect that he expected the complainant would be surprised, and perhaps disappointed, in seeing another vessel instead of the new ship, and admitting that he had been tempted to sell her for some $9,000 or $10,000 advance above cost. On these facts, and others which need not be reproduced, the master in this case found that the vessel in question was built and designed for this trade, within the meaning of the contract. It appears to the court that the finding is correct, and for the reasons assigned by the master, which need not be repeated. Accordingly the exception is overruled.

In the first account filed by the respondent, he credited the business with the sum of $25,000 received by him, for the sale of the vessel called the Charlotte, and charged commissions on that sum for effecting the sale. That sale was made in February, 1849, as appears by the report of the master. Afterwards he asked to reduce that credit to $16,000, alleging that the last-named sum was the true value of the vessel, on the 3d of October, 1848, when the first agreement expired. His request was denied by the master. To that refusal he objected, and insists in his fourth exception, that, in taking the account, the master has fixed the value of the vessel at a period subsequent to the expiration of the five years mentioned in the contract, whereas it should have been fixed, as he contends, on the 3d of October, 1848, when the five years, from the time of the arrival of the complainant in Valparaiso, expired. When the agreement expired, as is assumed by the respondent, this vessel was at sea upon her fourth return voyage; and it appears, by the report of the master, that she did not arrive in Boston until the 5th of December, 1848. She was not sold until the following February; but the master reports that there was no evidence before him that the value was not about the same at the time of her arrival as at the time of her sale. If any such difference existed, as is supposed, it was certainly incumbent upon the respondent to prove it; and, in the absence of any such proof, it cannot be presumed that mere lapse of time had added anything to the value of the vessel. He gave the credit at the time of sale, and there is no evidence of any mistake or any sufficient reason offered why the correction should be made. On the contrary, it appears, from the report of the master, that he credited one tenth of the profits of the voyage to the respondent, although it did not terminate until two months after the agreement expired. From these facts the master draws the inference, and I think justly, that these transactions were understood and agreed between the parties to be within the first agreement. For these reasons, as well as those assigned by the master, the fourth exception is overruled.

When the cause was first submitted to the master, he refused to allow the complainant for the profits made in the second voyage of the Crusader, for the reason that those profits were not claimed in the bill of complaint. Subsequently, an amendment to the bill was introduced into the cause, by leave of the court, alleging in substance and effect, that the complainant rendered the same service in relation to that voyage as that rendered by him in relation to the preceding voyages, and that it was well understood and agreed between the parties that this voyage also should be deemed within the original agreement, and that the complainant should be interested therein in the same manner, as if it had been completed within the five years. All these allegations were denied by the answer. In the fifth exception, the respondent complains that the master has allowed the complainant one tenth of the profits of this voyage, insisting, notwithstanding the amendment, that the claim is not embraced in the original or amended bill. Comment upon the objection that the claim is not embraced in the amended bill is unnecessary, as the amendment was introduced into the cause for the very purpose of obviating that difficulty; and its language is as well suited to accomplish the purpose for which it was drawn as could well be chosen. Suffice it to say, that so much of the exception as alleges that the claim is not within the amended bill cannot be sustained. Upon the question of fact put in issue by the pleadings, as amended, the master finds that the respondent requested and received the services of the complainant after the expiration of the five years, and particularly in reference to this voyage; and that the services were rendered by the complainant, with the understanding and agreement between the parties that he was to share in the profits. Such being the state of the facts, the master reported that, under the amended bill, the complainant was entitled to recover one tenth of the profits of this voyage. On an examination of the evidence, the finding of the master appears to be satisfactory, and accordingly the exception is overruled.

It was also contended by the respondent, before the master, that the accounts, under the first agreement, should be made up as cash collected on the day the agreement terminated; and the refusal of the master to adopt that theory constitutes the foundation of the sixth exception. It is to the effect that the master, in taking the account, did not value the assets at the expiration of the five years, but allowed the complainant a portion of the profits after the agreement expired. Claims were still outstanding and uncollected at that time to a large amount; and the respondent proposed and insisted that the master, in making up the accounts, should deduct the discount necessary to make the debts due equivalent to cash on the day the agreement expired, and calculate interest accordingly. In other words, he contended, and still insists, that the assets, so far as they consisted of unpaid balances, should be valued in the manner suggested as cash on hand; and that thenceforth they were to be regarded as his property, and at his risk. That theory the master declined to adopt, and, as it seems to me, for good reasons which need not be repeated.

Upon the expiration of each contract certain sums were due for goods already sold, and other goods belonging to the joint account were remaining on hand, which were subsequently sold, and the proceeds of both these classes of goods were collected by the house of Alsop & Co. On these sums while they remained in their hands they allowed interest. Remittances were not made by bills of exchange, but the proceeds of the outward adventure were invested in the purchase of return cargoes, and the remittances were made in that way. Interest paid by Alsop & Co., on the funds collected by them on the goods thus circumstanced, was charged by the master in the general account. To that allowance the respondent objected; and it constitutes the essence of his complaint as set forth in his seventh exception. Those funds were clearly at the joint risk, until they were received by the respondent, and no reason is perceived why the complainant is not entitled to his share of the interest accruing on the same. It is clear, therefore, that the seventh exception cannot be sustained.

Another position assumed by the respondent before the master was, that the second agreement terminated on the 1st of April, 1850, when the complainant gave the notice of his intention to withdraw from the business. His letter giving the notice was dated February 22, 1850; but it was not received until the 1st of April following. On the 13th of the same month the respondent replied, approving of the complainant's decision to join the house of Alsop & Co. at the time mentioned in his letter, and promising to comply with the complainant's request for an account as speedily as possible. He made no objection to his withdrawal, or to the time fixed for its accomplishment; and the case shows that the complainant remained and transacted the business as usual, up to the 31st of December, 1850, when he withdrew, and became a member of the house mentioned in his letter. On this state of facts, the master held that the relation between them, under the second agreement, did not terminate before the period when he joined that house. To that finding the respondent objected, and it constitutes the foundation of the eighth exception. It appears to the court that the finding of the master was correct; and the exception is accordingly overruled.

All that need be said concerning the ninth exception is, that it presents the same question, as to the mode of stating the account under the second agreement, as the one involved in the sixth exception, touching the same subject under the first agreement, and must be overruled for the same reasons.

More difficulty arises in disposing of the tenth exception, which is the only one that remains to be considered. It alleges in effect that the master has allowed the complainant one fourth of the profits of the third voyage of the Harriet Erving, which, it is insisted, are not claimed in the bill or the amendments to the same, and that the voyage was not the subject of any agreement between the parties. Some reference to the pleadings, so far as respects the second agreement, becomes necessary, in order that the precise nature of the question presented may be clearly understood. As contended by the respondent, the bill sets up the contract, alleges that the complainant entered upon and conducted the business until December 31, 1850, when the agreement was terminated, by the complainant's giving due notice to the respondent in the manner provided in the contract. In the answer, the agreement is admitted; but the respondent denies that it constituted a partnership, as alleged in the bill. He also admits the complainant's right to withdraw on giving the required notice, and avers that the notice given was received by him on the 1st of April, 1850, and that he acknowledged its receipt, and expressed his satisfaction with the same. No additional agreement was made in respect to this voyage; and if the complainant is entitled to recover this claim at all, he must do so under the pleadings as stated, and the written agreement set up in this part of the bill of complaint. This vessel sailed from Boston, on her outward voyage for Valparaiso, on the 21st of August, 1850, more than four months after the notice had been received by the respondent. She arrived out on the 8th of December, 1850, and sailed thence for Coquimbo on the 27th of the same month. On the 4th of January, 1851, she sailed for Talcahuano, and afterwards, during the same month, for Boston, where she arrived on the 7th of April, 1851. By the terms of the second contract, under which this claim arises, the complainant was entitled to have one fourth part of the net profits of the respondent's business in that trade, which he should have conducted to completion. He was at liberty to withdraw at any time, by giving to the respondent so much notice, that any voyage he had commenced prior thereto should receive the full benefit of the complainant's services to its final accomplishment, and not otherwise. This voyage had not been commenced when the notice was given, nor until more than four months after the respondent received it, and had signified to the complainant his satisfaction at learning the decision to which he had come. At the time the vessel sailed on her outward voyage, both parties understood that the complainant had complied with the terms of the agreement in giving the notice, and that he was under no obligations arising out of its terms and conditions to transact this business. Beyond question, the reply of the respondent must be understood as an assent to the sufficiency of the notice; and if so, then both parties knew, or ought to have known, that their relations under the second agreement would terminate at the time therein specified. That the complainant so understood it is manifest, not only from the terms of the letter in which he gave the notice, but from his subsequent conduct in joining the house of Alsop & Co. at the time therein designated. It is admitted that the complainant joined the house of Aslop & Co., on the 1st of January, 1851, agreeably to his intention, as expressed in the letter giving the notice, and that he did not go to Coquimbo in this vessel, on the 27th of December, 1850. Another fact is also admitted, of some importance in this investigation, and that is, that the business after the 1st of January, 1851, was transacted by the house of Alsop & Co., and that the new agent of the respondent reached Valparaiso on or about the 1st of November, 1851. As before stated, this vessel arrived at Valparaiso on the 8th of December, 1850. Net sales of the voyage amount in the whole to the sum of $205,620.74, as appears by the record. All of the sales were made by the house of Alsop & Co., who regularly rendered an account of the same to the respondent, for which they charged two per cent. for guaranty, and four and one half per cent. for commissions on sales. Sale of the cargo commenced on the 31st day of December, 1850, as appears by the account of sales, and was continued at different periods down to June 30, 1853. On each and all of these sales they charged the six and one half per cent. commissions, amounting to the sum of $9,736.26. During the whole of the period through which the sales were continued the complainant was a member of that mercantile house, and as such, of course, received his share of those commissions. Whenever he assisted in the business, as appears to the court from the evidence, he acted in virtue of the new relations he had contracted, and not under the agreement with the respondent, which he had previously terminated by the notice. But it is insisted by the complainant that the parties understood their relations otherwise, and that there is evidence in the case sufficient to warrant the conclusion that they had agreed that this voyage should be settled and adjusted within the principles of the written agreement. Suppose it were so, it is not perceived that it would benefit the complainant in this suit, as the difficulty would still remain in all its force, that there is no proper allegation in the bill, or in either of the amendments, to support any such new agreement. After a careful examination of all the correspondence, I am of the opinion that it does not sustain that view of the case. On the contrary, it appears to me that both parties well understood that their relations, under the written agreement, so far as respects this voyage, had ceased. For these reasons, the tenth exception is sustained, and the accounts must be adjusted so as to conform to the opinion of the court. When that is done, the complainant will be entitled to a decree in his favor. Should any dispute arise in making the adjustment, the cause must be recommitted to the master, to make the necessary corrections.

[NOTE. Cross appeals were taken from this decree to the supreme court, and the decree of the circuit court was duly affirmed, Mr. Justice Swayne delivering the opinion. The charges for taxes, clerk hire, and advertising, under the clause, "actual expenses that may appertain to the goods themselves," were held to be legitimate, the learned justice remarking: "It was certainly not the intention of the parties that the defendant should make a donation by an expenditure in the business. The computation should be made as if he were engaged in no other business. The items in question are as much a part of 'the actual expenses,' appertaining 'to the goods themselves,' as storage, commission, or insurance. They rest on the same foundation, and the same language in the contract which affords a warrant for including the latter applies with equal force to the former." Foster v. Goddard, 1 Black (66 U. S.) 506.]

FOSTER v. HACKLEY et al.

[2 N. B. R. 406 (Quarto, 131);[1] 2 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 8; 1 Chi. Leg. News, 137.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Michigan. Jan. 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCES—SUIT TO RECOVER ASSETS.

A. being insolvent, sold and transferred to a creditor, with knowledge of the fact, all his real and personal property. Held, that the sale was in fraud of the act, and the assignee could maintain an action of trover to recover the value of the personal property.

Alexander Blake was a lumberman, possessed of real and personal property valued at about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, and owing about one hundred and forty thousand dollars. Nearly or quite one-half of his indebtedness was to the defendants, Hackley & Sons, of Muskegon. On the 25th of May last, Blake transferred all his personal and real estate to Hackley & Sons, in payment of his indebtedness to them. About the 1st of June, some of Blake's creditors filed a petition in bankruptcy, to have Blake declared a bankrupt, in pursuance of which the district judge of this district adjudicated Blake a bankrupt, and Wilder D. Foster was appointed assignee. The suit which has just been tried was brought by Foster, as assignee, to recover from Hackley & Sons, a portion of the personal property so transferred to defendants by Blake, seeking to recover some forty or fifty thousand dollars—the damage being laid at the last named sum. Under the rulings of Judge WITHEY, and his instructions to the jury, the plaintiff obtained a verdict of fifteen thousand five hundred and seven dollars and eleven cents. The requests made by counsel on both sides for instructions to the jury, embraced some forty points, all of which were fully covered by the judge, in the comprehensive charge given to the jury.

John W. Champlin, George Gray, and John T. Holmes, for plaintiff.

E. S. Eggleston, Emory A. Storrs, and D. Darwin Hughes, for defendants.

WITHEY, District Judge (charging jury). Gentlemen of the Jury: Since the commencement of this trial, on the morning of the 15th of December, ten days have been consumed by the introduction of evidence—one entire day in arguments to the court upon the construction of section thirty-five of the bankrupt act, on the question of the admissibility of testimony, and three days have been occupied by counsel in summing up the case. This is the twenty-third day since the commencement of the trial; of this time you have sat fourteen days to hear the evidence and arguments of counsel. You have evinced throughout the trial the utmost attention, and although there has been a large amount of testimony introduced, I can but hope you are so well possessed of the case, as to enable you to arrive at a satisfactory result to yourselves as well as to the parties concerned in your verdict. The cause is one of no common importance or magnitude—considering the amount and legal questions involved in the issue. It is your duty as well as mine to give to the case an unbiased and unprejudiced judgment. We are to know no party in the cause, to have no prejudices, but arrive at conclusions, solely from the law and testimony of the case, aided as we may be in so doing by the very able and exhaustive argument of the learned counsel. It is the duty of the court to instruct you in the law of the case, and it is your duty to take the law as the court shall declare it to be. In no other way can the rights of parties be protected. Should either party be dissatisfied with any ruling the court makes, his remedy lies in a court possessing power to review the decisions of this tribunal. But there is no way of reviewing your conclusions of law otherwise than by setting aside the verdict, as being contrary to the instructions of the court, and awarding a new trial. Such a calamity, I trust, will not fall upon the parties, the counsel, or the court, in this case. It belongs to you, gentlemen, to determine what the evidence proves and establishes. You are sole judges of the facts; but you are to consider only such testimony as has been admitted into the case. You are to know nothing of any facts bearing on the issue, except those which have been introduced in evidence. The entire testimony is to be weighed and considered by you, under and in accordance with the rule of law and the instruction which the court shall give to you.

To the evidence and the law of the case, thus placed before you, you shall apply such tests in reaching conclusions as your experience and intelligence shall enable you. The court will endeavor to avoid an argument of the facts. No further consideration of them is designed than shall be sufficient to illustrate and instruct as to the law which is to govern your deliberations. The plaintiff brings this action of trover, to recover damages which he alleges to have sustained by reason of certain personal property he claims to have owned at or before the commencement of this suit, having been by defendants appropriated to their use. The damages which the plaintiff is entitled to recover, if he is successful in this suit, is the value of the property owned by him as assignee and shown to have been converted by defendants, at the time of such conversion, with interest. The defendants, by their plea of the general issue, deny property in the plaintiff, and deny the conversion. The questions, therefore, which ultimately will be reached and constitute the result of all your enquiries, are, whether Foster, as assignee of the estate and effects of Blake, a bankrupt, was owner of any property described in the declaration, and what property; next, whether defendants appropriated or converted any and what of this property; and finally, the value.

In reaching these questions, several other questions of the first importance are to be settled in part by the court, and in part by the jury. At the outset, then, we find that Blake was possessed of a large amount of property, both real and personal. It has been valued at about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars; the defendants value it at much less. At the same time he was owing in the neighborhood of one hundred and forty thousand dollars, considerable of it due and about to come due, and he without money to meet even a small portion of such indebtedness. Blake realized his embarrassed condition, and impressed by the effects a falling market for lumber must have on his ability, he sought Charles H. Hackley, one of the defendants, and stated his inability to go on in his business, and that he should be obliged to make an assignment. He was advised by Hackley not to do this, but to make an absolute sale of his property. Blake acceded to this, and conveyed, by bills of sale and deeds, what Blake says was intended to cover all his personal and real estate—except lands mortgaged to Foster to secure him against endorsements for Blake. This was May 25th, 1868. At the time of this transfer defendants were creditors of Blake to a large amount, claimed by defendants to have been some seventy thousand dollars, and the sale by Blake to them was designed to prefer and pay defendants. A valuation was fixed on the property, which nearly or quite absorbed it in paying Blake's debt to defendants. The value fixed between the parties on Blake's interest in the logs and lumber was sufficient to reduce Blake's debt to defendants to some sixteen thousand dollars; and the stock of goods and other personal property, with the land, was designed to cover this balance, and enable defendants to pay two or more thousand dollars, part of which Blake wanted paid to certain home creditors; the residue of about one thousand dollars Blake was to receive, of which seven hundred and fifty, defendants paid to him. June 2d a petition was filed to have Blake declared a bankrupt.

Without intending to be at all minute in the statement of the transactions involved in the sale and transfer, but only in a cursory and general way giving the principal features, as a basis for instructions upon certain of the questions of law that have been urged, we will now proceed to state those questions and give you instructions. The arguments of learned counsel have been characterized by great clearness and directness, which no one more appreciates and approbates than a judge on the bench. These arguments, as forensic discussions, have not only been marked by great learning and ability upon the whole case, but exhaustive. The questions which have been discussed and require our ruling arise under a law which has been but a brief period in existence, and have not, as far as I am advised, been decided; so that for the most part the court must look to the statute alone for its construction. This I have done with that consideration and care which the magnitude of the case and the importance of the questions have demanded. The design of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 517] is to relieve an insolvent debtor from his debts; and, in justice to creditors who are compelled to receive less than the debtor owes them in full satisfaction, the law also designs to give them, pro rata, all the estate and property of the debtor, not exempt to him. To this end congress has intended, as I understand the statute, to prevent preferences by the debtor for four months, and transfers for six months before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, so far as reasonably may be, and not unjustly interfere with the business relations and dealings of men.

The first question is, whether there can be a recovery in this suit under any other than section 14 of the bankrupt act, and if not, it is claimed that a recovery can only be had by showing that the bill of sale of May 25th was made to defraud creditors, and void by virtue of the statutes of Michigan against fraudulent conveyances. In this connection it is claimed also, that even though the transfers made May 25, and about that time, by Blake to defendants, to give a preference to them, was void by section 35, yet there exists no right of action at law in the assignee of the bankrupt, to recover the property so transferred, or its value; but that a recovery can only be had by a proceeding in a court of bankruptcy of a summary character. I have embraced in the claims now stated what covers several requests of defendants' counsel for instruction, because the view which I take enables me to best dispose of them together, in connection with my construction of section 14. The court is of opinion, and instructs the jury, that section 14 gives to the assignee in bankruptcy the right to bring this suit, as well as to recover, where the proofs establish a transfer made to defraud creditors within the state statute against fraudulent conveyances—otherwise known as the "Statute of Frauds"—as also to recover property, or its value, which by section 35 or 39 has been transferred in fraud of the bankrupt act. Section 14 provides that all the estate and effects of the bankrupt shall pass to the assignee in bankruptcy, and that the deed of transfer to the assignee shall relate back to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that he may sue for and recover all said estate, and such as has been conveyed in fraud of creditors. Now, although, at the commencement of the bankruptcy proceedings against Blake, the bankrupt's property was held by one who claimed it by transfer—still, if it be shown that such transfer is void by virtue of section 35 or 39 not by section 14; it follows that the bankrupt did own such property at the time when bankruptcy proceedings were commenced, and therefore the title to such property vested in the assignee under the deed of assignment, by virtue of section 14; and as this section expressly gives a right of action to the assignee to sue for and recover all the estate of the bankrupt, owned by him at the time of filing the petition in bankruptcy, it follows, logically and certainly, that the assignee is not confined to summary proceedings in a court of bankruptcy, though he may resort to that mode of enforcing his claims to recover property or its value, the sale or transfer of which is made void by sections 35 and 39, but may sue at law if he so elect. It becomes unnecessary, under this view, to determine whether, outside of section 14, the assignee could maintain an action at law by virtue of sections 35 and 39, when viewed with reference to the right to sue declared by section two; though I incline to the view, that under those sections the action could be maintained.

The plaintiff claims the right of recovery under the evidence, substantially upon two distinct grounds: First. That the transfers by Blake to defendants in May are void, under the statute of frauds, as fraudulent conveyances. Second. That those transfers are void, as a fraud on the provisions of the bankrupt act. The defendants insist that these grounds for recovery are in law but one ground, and that the proofs must, under either claim, satisfy you that the transfer, if fraudulent at all, is so by the statute against fraudulent conveyances; that the thirty-fifth and thirty-ninth sections of the bankrupt act mean and refer to such transfers as by the statute of Elizabeth are void, and to no other. In other words, that those transfers having been made by way of giving a perference by Blake to his creditors, the defendants, they are only void when it is shown that the design was to hinder, delay, or defeat other creditors, and not a mere preference in good faith of a bona fide indebtedness. The question is an important one; the views of the learned counsel are radically at variance as to the law. It becomes necessary in this connection to examine the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt law, under which, as well as under section 39, the plaintiff claims the transfers in May last by Blake to defendants are void.

The section now under consideration, so far as affects the questions presented in this case, provides: First. "If any person, being insolvent, shall, within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, with a view to give a preference to a creditor, make any payment or transfer of any part of his property, and the person who receives such payment or transfer has reasonable cause to believe that such person is insolvent, and that such payment or transfer is made in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act, the same shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property or the value of it from the person receiving it." Second. "If any person being insolvent shall, within six months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, make any transfer of any part of his property to any person who then has reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, and that such payment or transfer is made with a view to prevent his property from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to prevent the same from being distributed under this act, or to defeat the object of, or in any way impair, hinder, impede, or delay the operation and effect of, or evade any of the provisions of this act, the transfer shall be void, and the assignee may recover the property or the value thereof, as assets of the bankrupt." The first provision is designed to defeat a preference to a creditor, while the second is designed to defeat any transfer of property. To defeat either the preference or transfer, it must appear that the act done was a violation of the provisions of the bankrupt law. What is it that renders a transfer void, under this section? First, the debtor making the transfer must be insolvent; second, if the transfer gives a preference, it must have been made with a view to give preference to the creditor; third, in any event the person receiving the transfer must, at the time, have reasonable cause to believe the person making the transfer to be insolvent; and, fourth, must also have reasonable cause to believe that such transfer was in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act. You will notice that if the object was not to give a preference to a creditor, then the question whether a preference was intended is rendered wholly immaterial. That Blake was, in May, insolvent, is not denied; and that he made the transfer to the defendants, with a view to give a preference, is also admitted; thus two questions are disposed of, and but two remain for you to pass upon, so far as this section is involved, both of which must be found, from the evidence, to establish fraud on the provisions of the act.

The first, whether defendants had reasonable cause to believe Blake insolvent, is purely a question of fact. If you find that Hackley had good reason to believe that Blake was unable to pay his debts as they became due, and for that reason his business must be broken up or stopped, then defendants had reasonable cause to believe Blake insolvent.

The other question: Did Hackley have reasonable cause to believe that the transfer in May was in fraud of the provisions of the act? Neither question involves the inquiry whether defendants knew, but whether they had reasonable cause to believe. To aid you in forming a conclusion, you are instructed that the law conclusively presumes defendants knew the provisions of the bankrupt act at the time of the transaction in May. You are instructed, also, that it is entirely immaterial whether defendant, Charles H. Hackley, who carried on the negotiations for the transfer of property by Blake to defendants, had in contemplation the bankrupt law or not, and alike immaterial whether Blake had. Again, the court instructs you, that whether the defendants had reasonable cause to believe that the transfer was in fraud of the provisions of the bankrupt act, must be determined from the transaction, from the attendant circumstances, from the information he possessed of Blake's pecuniary affairs [see In re Blake, Case No. 1,492], from what was said and the conversation that passed between them, and from all that transpired at and about that time, in reference to the transfer and property. Further, if the defendants had reasonable cause to believe that the transfer was made with a view to prevent the property from being equally distributed among all Blake's creditors, then they did have reasonable cause to believe that the transfer was in fraud of the bankrupt law; for then it would impair, hinder, impede, and delay the operation and effect of the act, and would tend to evade the provisions thereof. Again, a conveyance by an insolvent debtor of all, or nearly all, his property and effects to a creditor, whereby his business is broken up, is a very strong proof as to the fraudulent character of the transfer. Or if, in making the transfer, there was a secret benefit to result to the insolvent debtor, it is evidence of fraud, and renders the conveyance void in favor of creditors.

Finally, on the question under consideration—if the transaction will, in fact, operate as a fraud on the provisions of the bankrupt act, all parties to it must be presumed to know the necessary consequences and result of their acts, with reference to the effect on the provisions of the bankrupt act. As requested by the plaintiff's counsel, the court instructs the jury that any bill of sale which was not accompanied by a delivery of the property, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, is evidence of fraud, unless it be made to appear that the sale was made in good faith, and without intent to defraud the creditors of the vendor. The court also instructs you that it is wholly immaterial whether the preference given to defendants was voluntary or by reason of threats of legal proceedings or coercion. The voluntary or involuntary character of the transactions is not important under the present bankrupt act.

I shall now dispose of the question presented in reference to the contract of January 25, 1868, known as the log contract. It certainly presents some unusual features, and it may be difficult of construction, but the duty of the court is to tell you how you are to view it, however difficult the task may be of forming a correct judgment. Able counsel have entirely and widely differed as to its import. It is claimed to be a bill of sale with an agreement, with an appendage designed as a mortgage, but which is not a mortgage. It is claimed to be a contract embracing a mortgage clause which is valid. The plaintiff claims fourteen to eighteen million feet of logs by virtue of it, and the defendants likewise claim under it all the logs.

The court regards this contract as expressing all the evidence which you are to consider in reference to agreements between Blake and defendants about getting in logs and advances for logs, none other having been introduced in evidence, though referred to by a witness; and so far as oral agreements on the subject referred to existed prior to the date of the contract, this of January 28th must be regarded as doing away with, and to contain the entire agreements of, the parties at its date. The court holds the contract was not a sale of logs by Blake to defendants, but an agreement by Blake to furnish Hackley & Sons, to saw on shares, eighteen million feet of logs. Blake was to put the logs into Muskegon river during the winter of 1867 and 1868, and deliver to defendants in the booms of the booming company, in the spring, when the main drive of logs should be delivered at the booms.

Part of the logs were then in the river, on its banks, in the woods where cut, and others were being cut. The contract was executory. Hackley & Sons agree to take the logs when delivered as described, and saw them on shares, for one half the lumber they should make. The lumber was sent forward to market and sold to the best advantage. the net proceeds of sales to be equally divided between Blake, and Hackley & Sons. Hackley & Sons were to advance Blake four dollars on each thousand feet of logs, to enable him to put them in—on which, and other advances for rafting up and delivering to the mills, and other charges, Hackley & Sons were to receive interest. Both advances and interest were to be paid to them from the proceeds of the first lumber sold. Such is the contract, omitting the mortgage clause. Who was to ship the lumber and control its sale is not distinctly stated. But it is fairly inferable that Hackley & Sons were to do this, for the logs were to be delivered to them in the main boom, where they were to receive and saw them. The clause in reference to shipping and selling is incorporated among Hackley's agreements, and when shipping commenced in the spring, it appears Hackley shipped and controlled as to sales. This shows what the parties understood as to who was to have possession and sell. But outside of this fact, such the contract itself is held to be.

When the logs were in the booming company's booms, so as to be in defendants' possession, the defendants had possession. coupled with the right to saw the logs into lumber, and they could not be divested of that right, or of possession, either of the logs or lumber, by Blake or by his assignee, while defendants were in good faith proceeding on their part to execute and carry out the contract. They had made advances and were making other advances, and incurring expense so long as the logs were being sawed; and it is not the purpose of the bankrupt law to interfere with, or to avoid contracts made by the bankrupt with other parties, or to prevent their execution. Blake's interest and rights under that contract were, by the deed of assignment to Mr. Foster, transferred to him as assignee in bankruptcy. Whatever Blake's rights were under that contract, the assignee can claim and enforce. Blake cou'd not lawfully claim possession of either logs or lumber sawed from them, and therefore the assignee has no such claim. But one-half of the net proceeds of the sales he may claim, and may undoubtedly recover in any appropriate form of action. Those net proceeds cannot, however, be recovered in this suit, as it is not the proper form of action, this being a suit in trover.

Gentlemen, under the views I have expressed, you will have nothing to do with the contract of January 25th, so far as relates to the question of the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover, if anything. So far as the question of fraud is concerned, the contract is evidence, but for no other purpose. The mortgage clause of the contract does not change in any respect the views already announced as to the construction and effect of the contract, and therefore requires no consideration. It is claimed by plaintiff's counsel that the sale of May 25th, which embraced the logs and lumber cut under the contract of January 25th, being valid as between Blake and Hackley, cancelled the January contract. This would be so if the sale of May 25th is not void, but if void—as it is under the bankrupt act, should the jury find that transaction a fraud on the provisions of the act—then the court holds that the contract of January 25th is not affected by the fraudulent transfer of May 25th, but remains of force and effect, and the rights of both plaintiff and defendants are to be determined under it, without reference to the void bill of sale. Then, gentlemen of the jury, if you shall find the transaction of May 25th, between Hackley and Blake, fraudulent and void, and that plaintiff has a right to recover from the personal property covered by the bills of sale of Blake to defendants, still you will reject all claim made for the value of both logs and lumber, covered by the contract of January 25th, known as the log contract, in making up the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to have. But this log contract does not cover the "crown" marked logs, nor the rafted lumber, &c. As to all personal property covered by the bills of sale—which defendants are shown to have converted, other than the logs and lumber covered by the log contract—you are at liberty to take into account an estimating damage.

The amount of damages, as I have before said, if you find for the plaintiff, will be the value of the property covered by instructions already given, at the time of conversion, with interest to this time.

Case No. 4,972.

FOSTER v. HILLIARD et al.

[1 Story, 77; 3 Law Rep. 175.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1840.

SALE OF REAL PROPERTY—DIVISION OF PURCHASE MONEY BETWEEN LIFE TENANT AND REMAINDER MEN — COMMON LIFE TABLES — DEATH OF LIFE TENANT—WHEN RIGHTS OF PARTIES WERE DETERMINED.

1. When a sale of real estate is made jointly by persons having independent interests, in the absence of other countervailing circumstances, the purchase money is to be divided according to their respective interests.

2. In the case of a tenant for life, remainder in fee, of lands under mortgage, the parties contribute to discharge the incumbrance according to the relative value of their respective interests, calculated according to the value of the estate of the tenant for life by the common tables.

[Cited in Danforth v. Smith, 23 Vt. 256.]

3. The same principle applies where a mortgagee devises the mortgaged estate to one for life, remainder over in fee.

4. A court of equity will decline to interfere in adversum to change real estate, by a sale, into personal estate, without imposing conditions, by which the proceeds shall retain throughout the character of the original fund. Yet it would be different, if there had been a voluntary sale by the parties.

5. Certain real estate was devised to A. for life, remainder to certain minors in fee. A., with the consent of the guardian of the minors, sold the land, but died before receiving the whole of the purchase money, and the residue was received by his executors. Held, that the rights of the parties were absolutely fixed at the very time of the sale; and that the executors of the deceased and the remainder men were entitled to share in the proceeds, according to the interests of A., and the remainder men at that time.

6. The interest of the tenant for life was to be determined, not by the time when he actually died, but by the value of his life, as ascertained by the common tables at the time of the sale. And although he died within four years from the time of the sale, yet his interest was to be calculated for about twenty years, as that was the duration of his life, as ascertained by the common tables.

Assumpsit [by Samuel C. Foster against Abraham Hilliard and another, executors]. The case came before the court upon an agreed statement of facts, in substance as follows:—A devise was made by Thomas Foster of certain wild and uncultivated lands in Maine, to John Foster as tenant for life, remainder to his nephews, Andrew, Samuel C., James, and George Foster, then minors, under the guardianship of Mary Foster, their mother. In 1832, after the death of the testator, the tenant for life and the guardian of the remainder men, who were then still under age, sold the land to Jacob D. Brown, and the tenant for life received a part of the purchase money, and took from the purchaser a deed of mortgage of the same land, in his own name, to secure certain notes, made payable to him or his order, which were given for the balance of the purchase money, and certain other moneys due from the purchaser to him. Soon after the sale, the tenant for life brought a bill in equity and obtained an injunction against the purchaser to restrain him from committing waste on the mortgaged premises, and incurred great expenses in prosecuting this suit and in other legal procedures in the collection of said notes. The tenant for life, after receiving sundry sums of money on account of the mortgage and other securities, sold and assigned the same, and took, in payment therefor, other notes and securities, in like manner made payable to his order, and a sum in money. He subsequently died, and after his death, his executors sold the last mentioned notes and securities, and received payment therefor in money. The tenant for life, while he lived, had the possession, control, and entire use of the money and the securities and notes given in payment for said land, and the moneys and interest paid thereon; and neither the guardian nor the remainder men exercised or asserted any right of supervision, or interfered in any way, in the management and use of the said property by the tenant for life; nor were they knowing to, or ever consulted in reference to said legal procedures, or the transfers, sales, and investments made by the tenant for life or his executors, or any matter or thing concerning the property in his hands. John Foster died on the 1st of November, 1836, aged 54 years, 3 months, and 27 days; having been born on the 4th of July, 1782. At the time of the sale, on the 14th of November, 1832, his age was 50 years, 9 months, and 10 days, and at that time his expectancy of life, by Wigglesworth's tables, was 20.96 years; by the Carlisle tables, used at the life office in Boston, it was a fraction greater. The executors were requested to pay over to the devisees in remainder, the whole capital sum, retaining only the interest, as belonging to John Foster. They offered to pay only that portion of it, which would result from a calculation of the value of John's life estate, supposing the land to be converted into cash on the day of sale, and the money divided on that day, according to the rules for calculating the value of annuities. The case was submitted to the court upon the agreed statement of facts, with liberty to infer such other facts as a jury would be authorized to infer.

Mr. Dehon, for plaintiff.

The first question is, whether the change of the property from real to personal estate affected the relative rights of the parties making the conveyance. The mutual relative rights were settled by the will. The sale effected merely a substitution of personal for real estate, and the substitute, like the original, was dependant on the provisions of the will. To suppose any other result to be effected by the change is absurd; for otherwise no guardian could have consented to such a conveyance, as might injure the interest, or affect the estate, of the ward. In the absence of any agreement, it is the reasonable and natural inference, that the parties did not intend to vary their right. When, therefore, John Foster received from Brown the money, and notes, and mortgages from the sale of the estate, he was entitled to the interest and income thereof, for his life only, but to no part of the principal. He was further entitled to the exclusive possession and control of the fund and property, subject to restraint from any such use as would endanger the interests of the remainder men. As there was no division of the proceeds after the sale, the court should presume, that there was an agreement between John Foster and the guardian, that he should have the same use and enjoyment of the proceeds, as he would have had of the estate, if it had not been sold; and that the remainder men should take no part till his decease, and then that they should take the whole. It will not be questioned, that John Foster actually received the whole proceeds, and held them within his entire control and management during his life; and there is no evidence to show, that either the guardian, or the remainder men, ever moved in reference to the estate, after it was sold, until the death of John Foster. The acts of all the parties, therefore, show what was their intent at the time of the sale. It is not, however, necessary to make out such an agreement. It is enough to show, that John Foster exercised the right of a tenant for life; that is, that he has received all that the testator intended, that he should have; and, it seems, that the representatives of his estate can, with little justice or equity, claim more. We contend, that John Foster has had the use and enjoyment of the estate in the only manner, in which he could legally have or enjoy it under the will. Had it remained real estate, it could not have been partitioned in 1832. The estate of John Foster was a life estate, and that of Andrew's children a remainder in fee simple conditional, disposable on the subsequent uncertain event of their death, before they arrived at the age of 21 years. Upon reaching that age the fee would become absolute. Lippett v. Hopkins [Case No. 8,380]; Sayward v. Sayward, 7 Greenl. 210. The statute of Massachusetts of 1817, c. 90, by which the power of partition of real estate is conferred on the probate court, is judicially construed in Wainwright v. Dorr, 13 Pick. 333, and Packard v. Packard, 16 Pick. 194. By these decisions it appears, that a division of remainders is not contemplated by the statute, and that no division can take place, until the several proportions of the parties are ascertained and made certain. The estate of the minors is a remainder, and their shares are uncertain and within the rule. No division of the realty, therefore, could have been made; and if the proceeds are to be considered as personal property, the same reasons exist against a division of them, as against a partition of real estate. If the conversion to personal property took it out of the jurisdiction of the court and left it in the hands of the parties, we say, that, as they made no division, an agreement is to be presumed, that the personal estate should stand just as the real estate did. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 487. But if the court decide, that the present fund should be divided, we are not content with the rule of apportionment. The rule of calculating the value of life estates by the tables is one of convenience, and only to be resorted to in cases of necessity, where it cannot be otherwise ascertained. The adoption of this rule, resulted from the necessity, under which courts were placed, of ascertaining the relative value of life estates and remainders, where some charge was to be borne by them pro rata; or where the tenant for life was to be paid a sum for his estate, equal to its value, the duration of his life being uncertain. But, how can the court be asked to resort to the tables to guess at the probable duration of a man's life, when his death has rendered it certain; more especially when the result must necessarily prove erroneous? It would be doing actual injustice to the remainder men. If the division was to have been made in 1832, the value of John Foster's share would properly have been calculated according to the tables; but not since his death; because we have no right to resort to approximation, where we can arrive at certainty. We contend, therefore, that the life estate should be calculated according to the time he actually lived after the sale, viz. 4 years, less by 14 days. Clyat v. Batteson, 1 Vern. 404; Nightingale v. Lawson, 1 Brown, Ch. 443.

S. Greenleaf, for defendants.

The general question is that of an apportionment between the tenant for life and the remainder man. The old rule, in case of incumbrances, of one third and two thirds, is now exploded. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. p. 465, §§ 487, 488. The modern rule is, that each shall contribute to the relief of the estate, according to the "benefit he derives" from the payment; which, of course, will depend on his age, and the present value of his life; and a reference will be directed to the master, to ascertain the proportion he ought to pay. 1 Pow. Mortg. (Rand's Ed.) 312, etc., note M; Allan v. Backhouse, 2 Ves. & B. 65, 79. In White v. White, 4 Ves. 33, it is said, that it shall be "according to his interest," that is, the value of his life. Lord Penrhyn v. Hughes, 5 Ves. 107. If the estate is sold, the proceeds shall be divided according to the interests. Clyat v. Batteson, 1 Vern. 404; 1 Pow. Mortg. 314a, note Q; 3 Pow. Mortg. 920, 923, note H; Id. 1043, note O; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. pp. 465, 466, and the cases there cited. The same principle is applied, when the mortgagee devises the mortgage to one for life, with remainder over; and the money is paid by the mortgagor during the lifetime of the devisee for life; viz. it is divided between them according to the present value of their interests. In Brent v. Best, 1 Vern. 69, the principle is correct; the rule of proportion only, that is, of one third and two thirds, is exploded. Thynn v. Duvall, 2 Vern. 117; Lord Penrhyn v. Hughes, 5 Ves. 107; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 446, note 1. In Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. 482, the same principle is adopted in a bill for dower, brought by the widow of the mortgagor against the heir, who had paid off the mortgage. The same principle is applied in distributing the proceeds of an estate sold, as between tenant by courtesy and reversioners. Houghton v. Hapgood, 13 Pick. 154. The parties here have turned the land into another species of property, subject to other rules, and have thereby reduced the question to one of a mere division of money. How is this division to be made? We say, according to the interest of the parties, and the rights vested in them at the moment of sale. The interest of John Foster was then equal to the value of an annuity for his own life, viz. the interest of the whole price for which the land was sold. Besides, it is better and safer for all parties, and even indispensable to the security of the remainder men, that a right to a present division should exist. But in this case, it was particularly desirable, because in Massachusetts, where the parties were all resident, there exists no chancery power, to prevent the tenant for life from expending the whole of the property. It was undoubtedly the intent of the testator, that, under the circumstances, there should be a sale and division of the proceeds. The will itself demands such an interpretation; because every devise imports a benefit intended. And in the present case, where the devisee was an only brother, and heir at law, and the property consisted of wild lands, from which no benefit could accrue, until they were sold, such a sale might be enforced at law. In Revel v. Watkinson, 1 Ves. Sr. 93, the tenant for life being heir at law, and otherwise unprovided for, was allowed maintenance out of the estate. The same was adjudged by Lord Harcourt, in the Case of Rutter of Woodhall, there cited. The rule of construction with regard to wills is, that every will must be expounded most favorably for the devisee (6 Mass. 169; 10 Mass. 303; 12 Mass. 546), and with equal favor to all the devisees. The rule, that the plaintiff insists upon, however, will not be equally beneficial to all, as it gives to John Foster no vested and present right to any part of the money.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The case may be shortly stated, upon which the arguments have been addressed to the court. A devise was made of certain wild and uncultivated land in Maine to A., as tenant for life, remainder to his nephews, who were minors, in fee. After the death of the testator, the tenant for life, with the assent of the guardian of the minors, sold the land, and received a part of the purchase money, and then died, and the residue of the purchase money has since been received by the executors of the tenant for life. The minors have since come of age; they do not seek to disturb the sale; but they claim the whole purchase money from the executors. The present action is brought by one of the remainder men, to recover his share. There is no proof of any agreement between the tenant for life and the guardian, as to the distribution or division of the purchase money between the tenant for life and the remainder men. On behalf of the remainder men, it is contended: (1) That the purchase money is to be treated as a mere substitute for the land on the sale; that the tenant for life was entitled to the income thereof during his life; and that the whole principal now belongs to them. (2) That if they are not so entitled, the apportionment of the purchase money is to be made between them and the executors, not according to the value of the life estate of the tenant for life, according to the common annuity and life tables, but according to the actual facts, he having died shortly after the sale. On the other hand, the executors contend: (1) That the tenant for life was entitled, and they, as his executors, are entitled, to hold so much of the purchase money as the value of his life estate, at the time of the sale, bore to the whole interest in fee. (2) That the apportionment between them is to be made according to the value calculated by the common annuity and life tables, at the time of the sale, without any reference to the actual duration of his life. It is admitted, that there is no case exactly in point; and, perhaps, considering the frequency of sales by a tenant for life and a remainder man, it is a matter of some surprise, that no such case should be found. The circumstance, however, may be reasonably accounted for, either upon the ground, that the sale usually takes place upon distinct and independent bargains; or, where there is a joint bargain, the shares of the respective parties are usually ascertained and apportioned by some private agreement Here, no such agreement can be traced; and the sale seems to have proceeded upon a mutual confidence, that the proceeds would ultimately be divided justly and equitably between the parties, according to their respective rights. What are those rights? It seems to me, that when a sale of real estate is jointly made by two or more persons, having independent interests, the natural, nay, the necessary conclusion, in the absence of all other countervailing circumstances, is, that they are to share the purchase money according to their respective interests. If three tenants in common should jointly sell an estate, they would certainly be entitled to share the purchase money according to their respective undivided interests. If one held a moiety, and the others one quarter part each, they would share in the like proportions. So, if three parceners should sell an estate, they would all share equally in the purchase money. What difference can it make, whether they have undivided interests in the fee, or separate interests, carved in succession out of the fee? Whether they are tenants in common of the fee, or tenants for life, and remainder men in fee? In contemplation of law, in each case, the sale is a sale of distinct and independent interests; and if the parties do not fix the amount of their respective shares in the purchase money by some positive agreement, the natural conclusion is, not that any one of them surrenders his right to the other, but that they silently agree to apportion the same among themselves according to their respective rights. Now, if in the present case, the tenant for life had separately sold his life estate to the purchaser, there is no pretence to say, that he would not have been solely entitled to the principal of the purchase money. What difference can it make, except as to the means of ascertaining the value of his life estate, that he proceeds to make sale, or joins in a sale of the remainder in fee? It does not strike me, that there is any. Suppose A. and B., the several owners of two adjoining acres of land, should unite and sell them both in one deed, to a purchaser for a gross consideration; would not the purchase money be divisible between them according to the relative value of the two acres? I think it clearly would.

But it is said, that, upon the sale, the purchase money was substituted for the land, and it is therefore to be treated exactly, as if the land had remained in the parties; and hence, that the tenant for life had an interest for life in the purchase money, that is in its income, and, subject thereto, that the whole purchase money belonged to the remainder men, the present claimants. Now, this is assuming the very point in controversy; it is stating the difficulty, and not solving it. When a sale is made, the ordinary result is, that the vendor is entitled to the purchase money itself, and not merely to the income thereof. If a different appropriation takes place, it is a matter of private agreement, and not an inference of law. If (as I have already suggested) a tenant for life of land sells his life estate, he has a title to the whole purchase money, and not merely to the income thereof. He sells his own estate, and he is entitled to its full value at the time of the sale. Then, how stands the law in cases, bearing a close analogy. Suppose the case of a tenant for life, remainder in fee, of lands under mortgage, in what manner do the parties contribute to the discharge of the incumbrance? Exactly, as we all know, according to the relative value of their respective interests in the land, calculated according to the value of the estate of the tenant for life, by the common tables. I need not cite authorities to this point; they are familiar to the profession. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 487, where many of the authorities are collected; 1 Pow. Mortg. (by Coventry & Rand) 312, note M; Id. 314, in note Q.; 3 Pow. Mortg. (by the same) 920, 923, note H; Id. 1043, note O. The rule is founded upon the obvious equity, that every one of the parties in interest shall contribute in proportion to the benefit, which he derives from the discharge of the incumbrance. The same principle applies to the case of a sale. Each party is to participate in the purchase money, in proportion to the beneficial interest he has in the land. The same principle applies, where a mortgagee devises the mortgaged estate to one for life, remainder over in fee; the tenant for life and the remainder man share the mortgage money, if paid by the mortgagor during their lives, according to the value of their respective interests at the time of the payment. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 485, and note; 3 Pow. Mortg. (by Coventry & Rand) 1043, note O. This was indirectly admitted in Brent v. Best, 1 Vern. 69; and directly held in Thynn v. Duvall, 2 Vern. 117. That is certainly a case nearly approaching the present, where it might have been said, that the devisee for life of the mortgagee ought to be entitled only to the interest for life, and to no part of the principal. A doctrine somewhat different was asserted in the case of Lord Penrhyn v. Hughes, 5 Ves. 99, 107, where the master of the rolls said, that where there is a tenant for life and remainder men, entitled to an estate under incumbrances, the tenant for life and the incumbrancers have a right to have the estate sold to discharge the incumbrances, and the surplus of money, after discharging the incumbrances, is to be divided between the parties, in the proportion, that their interests bear to the estate; that is, as the master of the rolls afterwards explained, by putting the whole out at interest, and allowing the tenant the interest for his life. See White v. White, 9 Ves. 554, 4 Ves. 33; 3 Pow. Mortg. 1043, note O. It is not, perhaps, very easy to see the reason of this particular doctrine. It may be, that the tenant for life shall not, by his own act, compel the remainder men to submit to a sale, by which his interest in the remainder may be materially affected without his consent. But that case is unlike the present, where there is a voluntary joinder in the sale, or a confirmation of it. A court of equity may well decline to interfere in adversum to change real estate, by a sale, into personal estate, without imposing conditions, by which the proceeds shall retain throughout the character of the original fund, when it might not act in the same manner, where there had been a voluntary sale by the parties. The distinction is often acted on in courts of equity. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 1357. In the case of Houghton v. Hapgood, 13 Pick. 154, as far as I am able to gather from the report, (which, on this point, may be thought somewhat indeterminate,) a tenant by the curtesy of his wife's estate, which was sold by an executor improperly, but the sale was afterwards confirmed both by himself and by her heirs, was held entitled to share in the proceeds according to the value of his life estate, as tenant by the curtesy, calculated by the common tables of life annuities. If I take a right view of that case, it is in exact coincidence with the opinion, which I hold in the present case.

It appears to me, that the sale in the present case, having been confirmed and adopted by all the parties in interest, must be treated in the same way and manner, and have the same effect, as if it had been originally made by the consent of all the parties in interest, and all of them were then competent to make the sale; and that the rights of all the parties were fixed at that time. And this leads me to say a few words on the second point, made at the bar, as to the rule of apportionment. I think it must be according to the value of the life of the tenant for life at the time of the sale, calculated according to the common tables. If I am right in the opinion already stated, that the rights of the parties were absolutely fixed at the very time of the sale, then it follows, as a necessary consequence, that they are entitled to share in the proceeds according to the relative values of their respective interests in the estate at the time of the sale. The case of Clyat v. Batteson, 1 Vern. 404, is not opposed to this doctrine. In that case lands in mortgage were devised to A. for life, remainder to B. in fee. B. bought up the mortgage, taking an assignment thereof in the name of trustees. A. died; and then B., the remainder man, brought a suit against the defendant, who was the representative of A., to redeem the mortgage, and insisted, that the representative ought to pay one third of the mortgage money, paid by B., by reason, that A. enjoyed the profits during his life. The court held, that if B. had brought the bill in A.'s lifetime, he would have been entitled to the proportion of the money according to the value of the respective estates of the tenant for life and the remainder man (that is, according to the old rule, now exploded, to one third); but that A. being dead, and having enjoyed the estate but one year only, the representative was bound only to allow for the time A. enjoyed the estate. This decision turned, therefore, upon the very point of the value of the estates of the tenant for life and the remainder man at the time, when the parties were charged with the payment of the money. But when the tenant for life sells his life estate, he sells it for what it is then worth, and of course his share of the purchase money does not depend upon the future event of his life or death, but upon its present value. It strikes me, therefore, that the true rule in the present case is to apportion the purchase money between the tenant for life and the remainder men, according to the relative values of their respective estates in the land at the time of the sale, unaffected by the subsequent events. It is said, that the duration of the life of the tenant for life, calculated according to the common tables, was over twenty years, whereas he died in a little less than four years after the sale. Be it so. The event has turned out unfavorably for the remainder men,—as contingent events sometimes do. But the tenant for life might have lived thirty years, and then the apportionment would have been favorable to them. The fact, therefore, does not shake the propriety of the rule of apportionment; but it only shows, that it has the common elements of uncertainty belonging to all calculations of contingencies. A tenant for life of a mortgaged estate may die within a year after he has been compelled to pay one third part of the mortgage money upon a decree for redemption, his life having been calculated as worth that proportion of the money. He may, on the other hand, live far beyond the period of average life. Yet this inequality has never been supposed to justify any departure from the general rule of contribution.

In the view, which I take of the case, the other points made at the bar are not material to be discussed. I think, that the remainder men are entitled to their proportion of the purchase money, according to the relative value of the life estate, and the remainder at the time of the sale; that the executors are liable for this amount to the remainder men, and that, upon so much of the money as either the tenant for life or the executors have received interest, they are entitled to receive their proportionate share of the interest.

[13 N. B. R. (1876) 239.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine.

BANKRUPTCY — ALLOWANCE FOR TAXES ON REAL ESTATE TAKEN BY CREDITORS PRIOR TO FILING OF THE PETITION.

Where it appears that creditors have taken the real estate of the bankrupts by levy or execution prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and under attachments valid as against the assignee, and the collector of taxes makes proof against the bankrupt estate, for taxes due on such real estate, held, that it would be inequitable to allow the attaching creditors to escape the burden of the taxes on the estate they have acquired under their levy, if the taxes were at the time of the levy allowed and deducted from the valuation made by the appraisers.

[William] Inglee, the collector of taxes, having made his proof of taxes assessed on the real estate of the bankrupts [E. Longfellow and son], prior to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, asked for an order for their payment by the assignees [Jeremiah Foster and others]; thereupon the assignees applied to the register for a re-examination of the proof.

H. L. Mitchell, for assignees.

John F. Lynch, for deposing creditor.

FOX, District Judge. State taxes duly assessed have a preference over general creditors under the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]; but under the laws of Maine a lien is created for taxes on real estate. This estate has been taken by creditors under attachments valid as against the assignees, and it would be inequitable to allow these creditors to escape the burden of the taxes on the estate they have acquired under their levy, if the taxes were at the time of the levy allowed and deducted from the valuation made by the appraisers. The proof is therefore suspended to ascertain that fact. If the creditors had them deducted from the value at the time of appraisal, the collector should in equity be required to assert his lien therefor against the estate levied upon. If they were not deducted and allowed, then the taxes should be proved as a preferred claim against the estate.

FOSTER v. JOICE.

[3 Wash. C. C. 498.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1819.

REAL PROPERTY—LIFE ESTATE—EJECTMENT—DEFENSE BASED ON OUTSTANDING TITLE IN THIRD PERSON.

1. A conveyance "to J. M. and his generation, to endure as long as the waters of the Delaware should run," passes no more than a life estate.

2. When the defendant, in an ejectment, opposes to the plaintiff's title a superior and outstanding title in a third person, under whom he does not claim, it must be subsisting and available; and on which the asserted owner might recover in ejectment, if he was plaintiff. If such a title is barred by the statute of limitations, or by a descent cast, the defendant cannot avail himself of it, to protect his mere possession; he being a perfect stranger to the title.

In the year 1740, John Wells conveyed by deed, the land in dispute, lying in New-Jersey, to three Indian chiefs, of whom Jacob Mootes was the survivor, "to them, and their generation, and to endure as long as the waters of the Delaware should run," according to the usage of Indians. On the 15th of June, 1783, Jacob Mootes duly made his last will and testament; and thereby devised this land to his three children, Charles, Mary, and Hannah; and departed this life in 1784. Charles Mootes survived his sisters; and, on the 9th of September, 1797, he duly made his will; and thereby devised the land, except some small lots, to [Josiah Foster] the lessor of the plaintiff, in fee, and died seised, some time in 1798. The defendant [Clayton Joice] set up no other title, except a lease made to him in 1806, by certain commissioners, appointed in virtue of an act of the legislature of New-Jersey, to take care of this property for this tribe of Indians, called the "Cohaxen Indians," saving the rights of all persons to the same. The cause turned principally on the validity of the will of Charles Mootes; which was remitted by the surrogate to the orphans' court, for probate, in consequence of a caveat entered on behalf of this tribe of Indians. Probate was refused; but, on appeal to the surrogate-general, the decision of the orphans' court was reversed, and the will was duly admitted to probate. The plaintiff's counsel, after examining one of the subscribing witnesses to the will, offered to read the deposition of another subscribing witness, (since dead,) taken in the orphans' court, in the trial there, as well as all the depositions taken upon that occasion. It was contended, in support of this evidence, that it not only results from the provisions of the act of assembly, passed in 1813 (Patt. Laws, 5); but that it was the uniform practice in the state courts, to read the evidence given in the orphans' court, if the will was finally admitted to probate, in cases where its validity came into question in an ejectment. The 2d section of this law provides, "that all wills and testaments which shall be made in writing, signed and published by the testator, in presence of three subscribing witnesses, and regularly proved, and entered upon the books of record or register, in the proper office for that purpose, shall be deemed sufficient to devise and convey any lands, &c., or other estate whatsoever within the province, as effectually as if the testator had conveyed the same in his lifetime; and the books, in which they are registered, may be given in evidence; and shall be accepted as sufficient evidence, at all times and places, where the said wills may be requisite to be given in evidence." It was insisted, that the court was to decide, whether the will had been regularly proved, and recorded, so as to give it the effect of a conveyance; which could only be done by examining the proofs given in the orphans' court, upon which it was finally admitted to probate by the surrogate-general. Penn v. Allen, Penning. 35; 4 Bin. 204; 2 Bin. 40; Spencer v. Spencer [Case No. 13,233]; 3 Day, 318. The admission of this evidence was resisted, principally on the general ground, that the contest before the orphans' court respected personal property only, and was between different parties than those now before the court; and, consequently, that the evidence was ex parte as to the defendant.

Mr. Ewing and L. H. Stockton, for defendant.

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PENNINGTON, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. Upon what seems to me to be the reasonable construction of the act of assembly, I should have supposed, that the probate of a will, relating to land, before the orphans' court, or before the surrogate-general, would be conclusive in any other court, where the validity of the will might incidentally come in question. But I understand, that a different opinion has prevailed in the courts of this state; and I submit to the authority of that opinion. But if this be the law, I am entirely at a loss to give any sensible interpretation of the 2d section of the act, if the court, in which the validity of the will is incidentally in issue, is precluded from examining the evidence taken in the orphans' court, that it may be seen whether the will was regularly proved or not. Suppose all the witnesses, whose depositions were taken, should die—how could it be decided on the trial of an ejectment, whether the will was regularly proved or not, unless the depositions are read? And if they cannot be read, then a will so proved and recorded, cannot be equivalent to a conveyance; because it never can be known, whether it was regularly proved and recorded, or not. I am therefore of opinion, that the evidence ought to be allowed.

PENNINGTON, District Judge, was against admitting the evidence.

A number of witnesses were then examined, and the depositions taken in the orphans' court were read, (the defendant's counsel having waived the objection,) which presented much contradictory testimony, as to the sanity of the testator, and the fairness of Foster's conduct in obtaining the will. The only question of law raised, was, whether the defendant could protect his possession, by the outstanding title in the heirs of John Wells; it being conceded on both sides, that the conveyance of 1740 passed only a life estate to the grantees.

The defendant's counsel relied upon the case of Roe v. Harvey, 4 Burrows, 2487, Bull. N. P., to show that the defendant may protect his possession, by a subsisting outstanding title in a third person, and that the plaintiff must recover upon the strength of his own title. 2. That the will of Jacob Mootes, passed only an estate for life to Charles Mootes; and, therefore, he had not such an estate as he could devise to the lessor of the plaintiff.

For the plaintiff, it was answered, that in no case can the defendant set up an outstanding title in a stranger, to defeat the plaintiff in ejectment, unless he shows that he himself claims under such title; and that the plaintiff may recover, even upon a prior possession, against a mere intruder or disseisor, who comes into possession without a colour of title. [Robinson v. Campbell] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 224, note; 11 Johns. 509; 3 Bl. Comm. 167.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. 1st. As to the outstanding title in the heirs of Wells. Without giving any opinion as to many of the cases referred to in the note to 3 Wheat., I feel no difficulty in saying, that wherever the defendant opposes to the plaintiff's title, a superior outstanding title in a third person, under whom he does not claim, it must be a subsisting and available title, on which the asserted owner of it might recover in ejectment, if he were the lessor of the plaintiff. If it be barred by the act of limitations, or by a descent cast, it would be quite absurd to contend, that the defendant, a perfect stranger to that title, can avail himself of it, to protect his mere possession.—That is precisely the present case. Upon the death of Jacob Mootes, in 1784, the right of this land reverted to John Wells, or to his heirs. The entry of Charles Mootes was that of an intruder, and adverse to the title of Wells. He continued in possession until his death in 1798, when, by force of the 6th section of the act of 1813 (Patt. Laws, 6), the possession vested in the lessor of the plaintiff, the devisee, (if the jury should establish the will,) without the necessity of an actual entry, although some evidence of such an entry has been given. This possession continued until 1806,—more than twenty years after the entry of Charles Mootes. But even if this were not the case, there has been an adverse possession to the title of the reversioner, more than twenty years,—sufficient to bar his right of entry. This outstanding title, then, cannot avail the defendant.

2d. As to this objection, there is nothing in it. It may be admitted, that the will of Jacob Mootes passed only a life estate to his son. In truth, it passed nothing, since Jacob did not hold adversely to, but under the reversioner, and had no estate in him which he could devise. Charles Mootes, on the contrary, gained, by his intrusion, a defeasible estate in fee, of which he died seised, and could dispose of by will; subject, however, to the better title of Wells.

PENNINGTON, District Judge, did not concur in the opinion on the first point.

The question, as to the validity of the will, was submitted to the jury on the evidence. Verdict for plaintiff.

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. Dec., 1874.

PATENTS — SUIT TO REPEAL INTERFERING PATENT UNDER ACT OF 1870—PLEADINGS—ANSWER.

1. Section 58 of the patent act of 1870 [16 Stat. 207], authorizing a court, in a suit thereunder, to adjudge and declare either of the interfering patents void, in whole or in part, is broader, in its application, than section 16 of the patent act of 1836 [5 Stat. 123]; and under the act of 1870 the court may review both patents on their merits, and decree the cancellation of either or both on the ground of want of novelty, or any other ground that would, in an action for infringement, affect the validity of either of the patents.

2. The case of Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 434, in which section 16 of the patent act of 1836 was construed, considered and distinguished.

3. In a suit brought under section 58 of the act of 1870, to repeal an interfering patent, a motion was made to strike out such part of defendants' answer as related to an alleged lack of novelty in the invention, covered by complainant's patent, on the ground that the object of the statute was merely to enable the complainant to determine the question of priority as between himself and his adversary, prior to going before the public to test the validity of the patent on its merits: Held, that this allegation of the answer was admissible, and the motion was accordingly overruled.

This was a bill in equity, brought under section 58 of the patent act of 1870, for the repeal of certain letters patent [No. 149,589] granted to the defendants [William M. Lindsay and another], April 14, 1874, which were alleged to be for the same invention as was covered by a patent granted to complainant [Alfred F. Foster], May 12, 1874, and, therefore, to constitute an interfering patent. The defendants, in their answer, besides denying that their patent was for the same invention as complainant's patent, and alleging that they were prior in date, asserted that complainant's patent was void for want of novelty, and set up alleged anticipations. The case came up upon a motion made by the complainant's counsel, to strike out that part of the answer which alleged want of novelty and the anticipations, as irrelevant and immaterial. In support of the motion, and in behalf of complainant, it was urged that the object of section 58, of the statute, was to enable the patentee to remove the cloud cast over his prima facie right, by the improper action of the patent office in granting two patents for the same invention, prior to going before the public to test the validity of his patent upon its merits, and to place himself in the same position, no better and no worse than he would have occupied had the interference been declared and determined, as it should have been, in the patent office; that it was the design of the section, to enable the patentees to determine, between themselves, which was prior in rights, before either should be put to the expense of ascertaining whether his patent was valid as against the world; that, if the construction was otherwise, the patentee would derive no advantage whatever from this section, as he could, without it, in an action for infringement, determine the validity of the respective patents; while, if he was obliged, in an action under the section in question, to establish the validity of his patent, he would be put to the same trouble and expense as in an action for infringement, and at the same time fail to obtain a decree for profits or damages; that the object of the statute was not to provide an additional mode of determining the validity of a patent, since, if it were, there was no reason why it should not apply to the repeal of other patents, as well of interfering patents; that the court could, under the statute, decree the cancellation of either patent, only on the ground that it was in conflict with the other, since the statute makes no provision for cancellation on the ground of want of novelty, or upon any other ground than the existence of the other patent; that the statute provides in terms for the repeal of either of the interfering patents, but not of both; that the statute provides in terms for the defence of want of novelty in an action for infringement, and the fact that it makes no such provision in this case, supports the presumption that it contemplated no such defence; and that the fact that an earlier patent was defective, on grounds extraneous to the patent office record, was no reason why a later patent, which was defective on the very ground, and the only ground to which this statute referred, should not, upon that ground, be cancelled. It was insisted, on behalf of the defendants, that the complainant's right of action, being founded upon the existence of his patent, they were at liberty to attack its validity upon any ground that affected it.

Hatch & Parkinson, for complainant.

Kellogg & Holmes, for defendants.

Before TREAT, District Judge.

The court delivered no written opinion, but after stating the nature of the motion, and the character of the suit in which it was made, referred to the 16th section of the statute of 1836 as analogous to the one it was called upon to construe. The case of Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 434, was referred to, as indicating the construction put upon that statute by the supreme court. That was a suit in equity for the repeal of a patent, on the ground of fraud in the extension of it, brought in the name of a party who had been sued for an infringement. The supreme court held that "no one but the government, either in its own name or the name of its appropriate officer, or by some form of proceeding which gives official assurance of the sanction of the proper authority, can institute judicial proceedings for the purpose of vacating or rescinding the patent which the government has issued to an individual, except in the cases provided for in section sixteen of the act of July 4, 1836;" that under this 16th section the court was only authorized to try the conflicts of claim arising from two interfering patents, and only to annul or set aside one patent so far as is necessary to protect the rights of the other party; that the decree in such a suit, can have no validity, except between the parties to the suit, and that the general public is left to the protection of the government and its officers. The court, after a review of this case of Mowry v. Whitney [supra], held the statute of 1870 to be broader in its application than that of 1836; that under it the court was authorized to review both patents on their merits, and to decree the cancellation, not only of either, but of both; and that it might do so on the ground of want of novelty in either, or both, or any other ground that would, in an action for infringement, affect the validity of either.

The motion was accordingly overruled.

[NOTE. Subsequently, both patents were held void for want of novelty. Case No. 4,976.]

INTERFERING PATENTS—ACT OF JULY 8, 1870—FORM OF DECREE.

1. In a suit under section 4,918 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning interfering patents, a court may declare either one or both of the interfering patents void on the ground of want of novelty, or any other ground which in a suit for an infringement of the patent would invalidate it.

2. In a suit between parties owning interfering patents, if the court should hold that either one of the patents was void, a decree should be entered annulling the patent, and not merely dismissing the bill or entering judgment against the defendant.

3. The case of Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 434, commented on and distinguished.

[This was a suit in equity by Alfred T. Foster, patentee under patent No. 150,854, granted May 12, 1874, against William M. Lindsay and another, to repeal patent No. 149,589, granted to Lindsay & Kalb, April 14, 1874, and was instituted by virtue of the special provisions of the act of July 8, 1870 (Rev. St. § 4918).

[At a former term, a motion was made to strike out that part of the defendants' answer which alleged want of novelty of complainant's invention. The court overruled the motion (Case No. 4,975), and the case is now heard on the claims of the respective patents.]

Hatch & Parkinson, for plaintiff.

G. B. Kellogg and Mr. Holmes, for defendants.

TREAT, District Judge. This is a suit in equity under section 4918 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning alleged interfering patents. The defendant's patent [No. 149,589] was prior in date to plaintiff's; also the application therefor. The plaintiff claims that the invention was by him; that he had, previous to any knowledge thereof by the defendant, not only invented the patented composition, but actually reduced it to a practical and successful test; that he had shown to the defendant the manufactured article, and when, as their foreman in the brick business, he was consulted thereafter about manufacturing fire-brick by means of which they could obtain a large and profitable order, he called their attention to the fact that he had exhibited to them before entering upon their service, a specimen brick of the needed quality; that thereupon he as their foreman directed various experiments to be made at defendant's brick yard; that when the defendant suggested subsequently that they proposed to obtain a patent for that mode of making an improved fire-brick, he remonstrated against their doing so, claiming that he was the original inventor, and alone entitled to a patent if one was obtainable.

On the other hand, the defendant claims that it was only after a series of experiments under his direction and supervision, in his own establishment, that the success of the mode patented was ascertained.

Without analyzing the testimony with the view of determining whether the plaintiff in his isolated experiment, prior to entering into the service of defendants, had invented the patented mode of securing the desired result, or had merely experimented so far as to ascertain that the use of sand-rock would furnish the needed glazing in his pottery business, and without enquiring further whether he had not abandoned all purpose of pushing his experiments to ultimate success for fire-bricks, and also without determining to what extent he and the defendant respectively suggested the experiments made in the defendant's establishment which first resulted in an ascertained and definite value from the compound, whereby the rights of the respective parties as employer and employé would arise, we will first consider the true construction of the act of congress. The language of the section is peculiar, and the object designed by it is not free from doubt. The section is as follows:

"Wherever there are interfering patents, any person interested in any one of them, etc., may have relief against the interfering patentee and all parties interested under him, by suit in equity against the owners of the interfering patent; and the court, on notice, may adjudge and declare either of the patents void in whole or part, or inoperative or invalid in any particular part of the United States, according to the interest of the parties, etc. But no such judgment or adjudication shall affect the right of any person except the parties to the suit," etc. Rev. St. § 4918.

So far as known this section has not received any express adjudication. In Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 434, an allusion is made to a somewhat similar provision in the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 123]. The latter act in the section referred to covered two distinct classes of cases, viz: 1st, where there were interfering patents; and 2d, where the examiners refused to issue a patent applied for, on the ground of interference with a prior patent. In each of those cases a bill of equity would lie at the instance of either of the parties, and the court could determine in the latter class of cases whether the applicant should have a patent issued to him; and in the former, might adjudge either of the patents void in whole or in part, etc.

In ordinary cases, where a patentee brings suit for infringement, the defendant can assail the validity of the patent in the manner prescribed; and the decree of the court is binding on the parties. It is contended that, inasmuch as this suit is not for an infringement, the defendant must be confined to the respective merit or claims of the patentees inter sese, irrespective of the validity of either. The defendant in this case, among other defences, has set up that the patented compound or process had been anticipated and in use before either of the interfering patents had been claimed or issued. The evidence fully establishes the fact. In a suit for an infringement, a defence for want of novelty would, under the evidence in this case, be successful, whether the one or the other of the interfering patents was the basis of the action. The case of Mowry v. Whitney [supra] goes no further than to hold that if a patent is to be annulled ab initio, the proceeding must be at the direct instance of the government, but it does not decide that the question between conflicting patents may not be fully and finally determined as to the parties to suit for interfering patents.

The plaintiff in this case contends that he has the prior and better right, although his application and patent are of subsequent date, and that the court is bound to adjudicate solely as between his and the interfering patent, leaving one of the patents to stand for subsequent adjudication when assailed in a proper suit.

The act of congress provides for a suit in equity against the owners of the interfering patent for such relief as equity would furnish. If the action stopped there, would a court of equity grant relief to a complainant who had no equity? If it would not, could not the court enquire through proper pleadings and evidence, into the equities of the complainant? But the section proceeds to authorize the court to adjudge either of the interfering patents void in whole or part. If it adjudged the plaintiff's patent void, should not a decree to that effect be entered, instead of a simple decree dismissing his bill? If it ascertains that the defendant's patent is void, and the plaintiff's also, must the decree be restricted to a judgment against the defendant's patent, leaving the plaintiff's patent as if in full force and of established validity; so that if a new suit were brought by the same plaintiff against the same defendant for an infringement of plaintiff's patent, the defendant would then for the first time be able to dispute the validity of plaintiff's patent for want of novelty, etc.? Why two suits between the same parties to adjust the controversies between them, when one suit would accomplish the end according to the well-known purposes of equity proceedings? Unless the terms of the statute restrict the court, sitting in equity, so that it can not do full and complete justice between the parties and end the litigation between them, it would seem to be its duty to pass upon the whole controversy when fairly and fully presented. The statute says that the court may adjudge either void in whole or part. How can it do so, consistently with law and equity, unless each of the patents is under consideration in all respects? It may conclude that in some respects there is an interference, and in others none, so that the decree would be only for an annulment in part; or it may decree that there is an interference in toto, and consequently annul one of the interfering patents, leaving the other to stand as valid. But what would be the position of one who had previously used the patent declared void, when suit was subsequently brought against him by the other patentee for an infringement? Could he assail the validity of the patent which had already, as between the same parties, been adjudged, at least impliedly, to be valid? It seems that the suits in equity authorized in cases of interfering patents should not be restricted to the narrow limits urged. The controversy is between two patentees or those claiming under them. If neither has a valid patent, the court should adjudge both void, and thus end the strife. It is on this theory that the defendant was permitted to set up in his answer the lack of novelty, not of plaintiff's patent alone, but of his own. True, he might voluntarily have surrendered his patent, and contested the plaintiff's right in a suit for infringement; but why should he not, when sued, insist upon a full defence, whereby a second suit could be avoided? The power vested in the court to adjudge either of the interfering patents void, in whole or part, is held to confer full authority, where the evidence justifies, on issues fairly made, to decree, not one of the patents alone, but both, to be void. The court so adjudges in this case, and the decree will be accordingly at the costs of the plaintiff. Decree accordingly.

FOSTER v. The MIRANDA.

[6 McLean, 221;[1] Newb. 227.]

District Court, D. Illinois. Oct. Term, 1854.

COLLISION BETWEEN SAILING VESSELS—NECESSARY LIGHTS ON THE GREAT LAKES—ACT OF MARCH 3, 1849—LOOK-OUT—DIVISION OF DAMAGES.

1. The 5th section of the act of congress of 3d March, 1849 [9 Stat. 382], required a vessel navigating the lakes in the night, while on the starboard tack, to show a red light, and a vessel having the wind free, a white light. It also required sailing vessels to have reflectors to their lights, and that they should be such as to insure a good and sufficient light, as well as propellers and steamers.

2. In a collision, in the night, between a brig and a schooner, at the foot of Lake Michigan, the weight of the evidence is that the brig, close hauled on the wind on the starboard tack, had a white light. This was in violation of the act of congress and was such a fault as to preclude the brig from recovering full indemnity for the damage done by the colllsion, which occurred while the brig carried such a light.

3. The act of 1849 did not intend to abrogate the rules which have been generally observed for the management of vessels: it only added a new one. But it once being established that the brig had the wrong light, the burden of proving that the loss was not the consequence of it, is thrown upon the brig. The proof clearly shows that, at the time of the collision, the schooner had not a competent look-out. The schooner also should have kept away and not held on her course. It cannot be said, therefore, within the meaning of the act of 1849 that the loss resulted entirely from the neglect of the brig to carry the proper light.

[Cited in The City of Washington, 92 U. S. 36; The Buckeye, 9 Fed. 667.]

4. Both vessels were in fault, and the loss was divided equally between them.

[This was a suit in admiralty by George Foster, owner of the brig S. F. Gale, against the schooner Miranda.]

Mr. Hurd, for libellant.

Mr. Goodrich, for claimant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. This is a libel filed by the owner of the brig S. F. Gale, against the schooner Miranda, for damages sustained by the brig, from a collision with the schooner in the fall of 1849. The brig S. F. Gale from Chicago with a load of wheat, was proceeding down the lake on her way to Buffalo. When near the foot of Lake Michigan, off Point Wabbeshanks, not far from the light-ship stationed near that point, about three o'clock in the morning of the 11th of October, the collision took place. The wind was south-south-east. The brig was close hauled upon the wind with her starboard tacks above, steering nearly east. It was a clear star-light night, and a vessel could be discerned and a brig distinguished from a schooner a mile or more distant. Some time before the collision occurred, the light carried by the Miranda, was seen from the S. F. Gale, two points on her bow. The man at the helm was ordered to keep the brig clear to the wind, because the light of the Miranda indicated a vessel approaching from an easterly direction. The brig was accordingly kept as clear to the wind as possible. The Miranda was bound up the lake, on a voyage from Cleveland to Chicago, and was standing about west by north, and consequently had the wind free. Some time before the collision, those on board of the Miranda had seen the light of the brig, and, believing it a white light, supposed it was a vessel on the same course with themselves, and immediately preceding the collision, the watch on the deck of the Miranda had gone aft to lower the peak, with a view to haul round the light-ship—a usual and proper precaution—the captain being at the helm. As the two vessels approached, the mate of the brig shouted to those on the schooner, not to run into them. When this was done the helm of the schooner was put hard-a-port, and that of the brig put down; but the vessels ran so near that at that moment, when apparently for the first time those on each vessel entertained apprehension of a collision, it was impossible to prevent them from meeting, and the Miranda struck the S. F. Gale on the larboard bow near the fore-rigging. Both vessels were injured, but the brig suffered the most.

By the 5th section of the act of congress of 3d of March, 1849, making appropriations for light-houses, &c., and for other purposes (9 Stat. 382), vessels, steamboats and propellers navigating the northern and western lakes, are required to comply with certain regulations "for the security of life and property," among which are the following:—During the night, vessels on the starboard tack shall show a red light, and vessels going off large or before the wind, a white light; and it is provided, "if loss or damage shall occur, the owner or owners of the vessel, steamboat or propeller neglecting to comply with these regulations, shall be liable to the injured party for all loss or damage resulting from such neglect." This law is undoubtedly binding upon all the classes of vessels mentioned. It follows that it was the duty of the S. F. Gale to carry a red light, and of the Miranda to carry a white light at the time of, and previous to the collision. There was no point made as to the light of the Miranda. Those on board of the brig admit that the schooner showed a white light. The evidence, however, proves that it was an ordinary globe lantern without reflectors; and if so, it could hardly be said to come up to the standard required by the law; because I think the words in the act, "said light shall be furnished with reflectors, &c., complete, and of a size to insure a good and sufficient light," apply as well to the lights carried by vessels as to those carried by steamboats and propellers.

The libel alleges that the S. F. Gale carried at the time a red light. The answer of the claimant denies it, and asserts it was a white light. Of course, the dispute is to be determined by the proof. And here is to be found the conflict of evidence which so often occurs, in these cases between the persons on board of the different vessels. A brief examination will show where the weight of the testimony is upon this point.

Langley, the captain of the brig, merely says they had a red light. Scott, a seaman, states they had a red light on the pall bitts, but he did not notice the Gale's light when he went on deck. It being his watch below at the time, he did not go on deck till the collision occurred. Hitchcock, also a seaman of the brig, who was at the helm, says that at the time the Miranda's light was first discovered, and for more than an hour previous, and up to the time of the collision, the brig showed a red light suspended from the pall post. This is the whole testimony on the part of the libellant. The witnesses simply declare the fact to be so, without adverting to any circumstances which show that their attention was particularly called to it, or that they had any special reasons for recollecting it.

On the other hand Durand, the captain of the Miranda, says that he saw the light of the Gale about fifteen minutes before the collision, a mile or more distant: that it was a white light. He is positive it was a white light, because the second mate and himself had previously talked of it, and there was no other light in sight except that of the light-ship, and he is certain also, because the Gale carried the same light (white) when she shot across the bows of the schooner. Wilgus, the first mate of the Miranda, declares he noticed the signal light of the Gale. It was a white light, but burned low, giving a dull light. He still saw the same light hanging after the two vessels parted. Isaac Brown, the second mate, was one of the watch on deck at the time. He and the captain spoke together of the white light carried by a vessel then ahead of them as they supposed. They stood some time on the forecastle deck and saw a white light and that only. If the Gale had carried a red light, he says, they would not have gone aft to lower the peak of the mainsail, Joseph Brown, a seaman of the Miranda, states the brig had a white light, which burnt dim at the time. The light was so near he could not but observe it; and he says it was remarked by others at the time that the Gale carried a white light. Turner, also a seaman of the Miranda, says that the Gale carried a dim, white light; and is positive it was a white light, because he had heard the captain and second mate previously talking of the light in sight as a white light, and because, when he found the brig was close hauled on the wind, with her starboard tacks aboard, he noticed that she showed the wrong light.

It is apparent from the foregoing statement of the evidence upon this point, it predominates strongly in favor of the conclusion that the S. F. Gale showed a white light. The witnesses who testify on that side, had their attention particularly drawn to the fact: it was the subject of remark at the time. They saw the light before the collision, and after; their opportunity for observation was favorable, and it seems clear that those on board of the brig who speak to this point were mistaken; or, at all events, the S. F. Gale did not show that kind of light which the law required. There can be no doubt the act demands the exhibition of such a red light (when the vessel during the night is on the starboard tack), as under ordinary circumstances, and more especially in so clear a night as that when this collision occurred, can be distinguished from a green or white light. It is possible the explanation may be found, as has been suggested, in the fact that the S. F. Gale, just before the light-ship was passed, had been sailing with the wind free, and her officers had neglected to change their white light when they changed their course. However this may be, I am forced to the conclusion that the brig was not at the time showing the proper light, consequently those who had charge of her were themselves in fault in that respect. There is some doubt, also, whether there was a good look-out kept on board of the brig. The captain of the Miranda says, if a good look-out had been kept on the brig, the collision might have easily been avoided. This might have been so, but those on board of the S. F. Gale had a right to suppose, as they were close on the wind, the usual rule would be observed by the Miranda—to keep away; whereas, as we shall presently see, the course of the schooner was unchanged until the collision was unavoidable. The S. F. Gale not being free from blame, it follows the owner cannot, under the maritime law, sustain a claim for full indemnity for the damage done.

The next question is, whether within the meaning of the act of congress the loss or damage resulted from the neglect of the brig to comply with the requirement of the law, because if that is the case, so far from the Miranda being liable to the S. F. Gale, the latter would be liable to the owner of the schooner for the injury done to the Miranda. And perhaps we cannot better illustrate the principle than by supposing this were a libel filed by the owner of the Miranda against a brig for injury done to the former. Could it be sustained under the circumstances of this case? Conk. Adm. 302. We have to set out with the admitted fact, that the S. F. Gale violated an express law of congress. In the case of the collision of the De Soto and Luda (Waring v. Clark, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441), the supreme court went out of its way to decide, that if a collision occurs between steamers at night, and one of them has not signal lights, it will be held responsible for all losses until it is proved that the collision was not the consequence of the absence of signal lights. The court say they do not put the decision of the case on that ground, and they do not determine whether there was an absence of signal lights or not. The real ground of the decision on the merits was, that the Luda was run down whilst in the accustomed channel of upward navigation, by the De Soto, which was out of that for which it should have been steered to make the port to which it was bound. The opinion of the court in Waring v. Clark [supra] was given under the act of 7th July, 1838, which made it the duty of the master and owner of every steamboat running between sunset and sunrise, to carry one or more signal lights. It is said this principle applies also to the act of 1849 which we are now considering, and that the Miranda cannot be accountable for any loss to the S. F. Gale, until it is shown it was not occasioned by the brig carrying a white light.

Did the collision happen in consequence of the neglect of those who had charge of the brig? It may be admitted that the fact of the brig not having the proper light throws upon the libellants the onus of proving the damage was the result of some fault on the part of the Miranda. I have come to the conclusion, after an attentive examination of the evidence, that while it may be said the collision might not have happened if the brig had shown the right light, it may also be said it would not have occurred if there had not been fault on the part of the Miranda. It is insisted, if it be proved that the brig violated the law, it follows as a necessary consequence that the Miranda must stand excused. I do not so understand the law. There are certain rules which are settled in the maritime law, respecting the conduct of vessels at sea, but the neglect of these by one party will not excuse the other for the want of ordinary care and diligence. In a recent case, it seems to be implied that every proper precautionary measure must be taken on the part of the collided vessel to pass the other in safety; and then if a loss happen in consequence of the fault of the other, the damage is attributable to the neglect of this last. Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 605. And see St. John v. Paine, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 55, and The Cynosure [Case No. 3,528].

If the S. F. Gale showed the wrong light, it was not the less the duty of those on the Miranda to observe the usual nautical rules in the management of their schooner. It was not the intention of the act of congress to abrogate those regulations which have always been observed in the management of vessels. Notwithstanding the brig carried a white light, it was the duty of the Miranda, having the wind free, to keep away, and not to hold on her course. It was a clear starlight night, those on the Miranda had a right at first to presume that the brig was on the same course with themselves. But if it be true as stated, that the captain and mate of the Miranda looked at the light of the S. F. Gale for some time, they must have seen that they were overhauling the vessel ahead at a very rapid rate. It is to be borne in mind that the evidence shows the two vessels were approaching each other at the combined speed of from eight to ten miles an hour. It should have been enough to have excited to watchfulness. The law of congress is obligatory, but so are all the laws of the sea. There have been many rules and regulations established by the wisdom and experience of nautical men and sanctioned by the courts, for the conduct of vessels, but there is none of more imperative obligation, than the one which declares that when a vessel is approaching another in the night a competent and vigilant look-out should be kept on board of each. It is a rule prescribed alike by the law, and by common sense and common prudence. Did the Miranda keep such a look-out? It seems to me not. According to the evidence the officers knew they were approaching a vessel. What if it was a vessel on the same course with themselves? They were not the less bound to be vigilant in looking out for her and watching her movements. I concur entirely in the opinion of one of the nautical witnesses examined in court, Capt. Napier, that even if they had supposed the vessel ahead was on the same course with themselves, still it was their duty to keep a good look-out, and to call all the watch on deck to lower the peak, at a time when they were so near another vessel. It is impossible to escape the conclusion that if this had been done, in so clear a night as that was, it would soon have appeared that the brig ahead was in fact approaching them from an opposite course close hauled on the wind, notwithstanding the white light, and thus the collision might have been avoided. It was also the duty of the schooner, having the wind abaft the beam, to keep away. It seems clear that if the Miranda had had a competent watch at the time, and kept away as she ought to have done, no collision would have taken place. The loss that was sustained was not the result altogether of the neglect of the brig to show the right light, and was not the consequence alone of that neglect, but to say the least it was occasioned in a measure by the neglect of those in the Miranda. I find, therefore, that the two vessels were each in fault.

But it is urged, conceding there was a fault on the part of the Miranda, yet it was not such an omission as that of the brig.

The latter had violated an express law, by neglecting to do that the omission of which no circumstances could excuse, and it is not like other rules, which vary according to contingencies. I cannot yield my assent to this doctrine. The law of congress under particular circumstances requires a particular light. The maritime law requires a vessel under certain circumstances, to be managed in a certain way. Both are equally binding upon those who have the charge of vessels. And I think that is a sound rule, which, if sustained and enforced by the courts, conduces, to the greatest extent, to unremitting vigilance on the part of seamen. The doctrine laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Hope, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 154, seems to be founded in good sense, and may be applied to this case: that if the brig carried the wrong light, and the master of the Miranda should say, "we will keep our course nevertheless," he would be to blame. It would be a dangerous doctrine, to authorize the master of the Miranda to say under the circumstances of this case: "That vessel has the wrong light; I will not trouble myself to avoid her: the consequences be upon herself."

Both vessels then being in fault, the next inquiry is how is the loss to be apportioned? The rule laid down by Lord Stowell in the case of The Woodrop Sims, under his second possibility by which a collision may occur, when both parties were to blame, or where there is a want of due diligence on both sides, is, that the loss must be apportioned equally between them as being occasioned by the fault of both. This seems to be the well settled doctrine in the English admiralty, and is the general rule of the maritime law. Story, Bailm. § 608; Abb. Shipp. (Shee's Ed.) 230–233, pt. 3, c. 1; Conk. Adm. 300. It has, however, been said in the argument, that the rule has never been adopted in this country. No case was cited in which the doctrine has been applied by a court of admiralty in this country, and it is certainly singular, in the many cases which have arisen, there are so few in which the fault has been found to be common to both parties, so as to determine what the rule is in such cases. But the doctrine to divide the loss appears to have been approved, and whenever it is referred to, it seems to be considered as a part of the maritime law to be administered by our admiralty courts. Story, Bailm. ubi supra; 3 Kent, Comm. 231, 232. It is treated as settled law by Judge Hopkinson in Reeves v. The Constitution [Case No. 11,659]; by Judge McKinley in Strout v. Foster, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 92; and by Judge Woodbury in his separate opinion in Clark v. Waring, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 503. And it was expressly decided and applied by the district court of Massachusetts in 1846, and treated as the settled doctrine in admiralty. Rogers v. The Rival [Case No. 11,867], and authorities there cited. And see the case of The De Cock [5 Mon. Law Mag. (Notes of Cas.) 303].

It is admitted that the rule in the common law courts is different, but all the text writers and judges who have mentioned the subject, seem to regard it as a fixed rule in admiralty. And on the whole, though it has sometimes been considered objectionable by able judges and writers, yet after some reflection I am satisfied the strength of the argument, reasoning upon general principles, is in favor of the rule, and sustains the authorities, in spite of a sneer that has occasionally been thrown out of its being rusticum judicium. It is safer to adopt this rule in cases of collision, than it is to measure out to each party in a particular case, the precise quantum of damage that he may have sustained.[2]

As the parties wish me to decide the question of damages on the proof now in, without referring it to a commissioner, I will state my views on the subject. The evidence is that the S. F. Gale was injured to the amount of $336, for which repairs were actually made and about that amount paid The other damage is stated by the captain at $300. One of the witnesses puts it from $300 to $500. They do not give all the particulars of the injury, from which the court might ascertain with accuracy the amount. It is stated that the new fore-sail was worth $40 more than the old. On the whole I have thought that $600 would, under the proof, be a fair amount to fix upon as the damage sustained by the S. F. Gale. The witnesses say that the damage done to the Miranda was $300. The whole damage done by the collision was then $900, one half of which would be $450. The S. F. Gale being injured $300 more than the Miranda, I shall order a decree to be entered against the claimant and his sureties for $150, and that divides the loss equally between the parties. I shall allow costs to neither party; each one must therefore pay his own.

This was a suit in equity [by George Foster against Abner S. Moore] founded on letters-patent [No. 3,857] granted to Richard Richards, on the 16th day of December, 1844, for "improvements in machinery for cutting leather into soles." The letters-patent had been assigned to the complainant. The specification was in the following words: "To all Persons to Whom These Presents shall Come: Be it known that I, Richard Richards, of Lynn, in the county of Essex, and state of Massachusetts, have invented certain improvements in machinery for cutting leather into soles, and that the following description and accompanying drawings, taken in connection, constitute a full and exact specification of the construction and operation of my said invention: Figure 1, of the drawings above mentioned, represents a top view of my machine. Figure 2, is a side elevation. Figure 3, is a longitudinal vertical and central section. Figure 4, is an elevation of the end nearest to the cutting knives. Such other drawings as may be necessary to the following description will be referred to and described therein. So far as my machine consists of one or more cutters, suitably arranged in frame-work, and capable of being raised from, and depressed upon a platform beneath them, for the purpose of supporting the leather during the operation of cutting, it does not differ from many other machines in common use. A, Figures 1, 2, 3, is the frame work or table, which sustains the operative parts, and within which a frame B, is arranged in the position as seen in the drawings, and sustained in suitable bearings, in which it may be freely moved up and down in a vertical direction,—the object of the frame being to carry and elevate and depress the cutters. The frame B, is operated by the foot of the attendant, applied upon a treadle C; the said treadle being connected to the frame B, by a suitable roll D, jointed at its lower extremity to the treadle, and at its upper to the frame—the same being seen in Figure 3. A curved arm E, projects upwards from the treadle, and has at its upper end a projection a, to which one end of a strap b, is attached; the said strap being wound around and attached at its other end to a pulley or drum c, fixed upon a main transverse shaft d, upon which is a fly-wheel e. Another strap f, is attached at one end to, and wound around the drum c, in a reverse direction to that of the strap b, and extends downwards, and is secured at its other end to the treadle, so that the movement of the treadle by the foot causes a motion, first in one direction, and next in the opposite, of the balance or fly-wheel e. A small pulley g, is fixed upon one end of the shaft d; a strap or band h, being attached to the periphery of the pulley, and passing partly around it, thence upwards, in contact with a guide pulley i, thence over a pulley k, and thence downwards, and having a weight l, appended to it, as seen in the side elevation. The pulley k, runs loose upon the end of the knife or cutter shaft m, and has a small dog or pawl n, jointed to its side, and pressed against the toothed circumference of a ratchet wheel o, by a spring p,—the ratchet wheel being fixed upon the end of the cutter shaft. The cutter shaft m, turns or revolves in suitable bearings, in the frame B. It has the holders or plates qq, of the two cutters or bent knives r, s, confined upon it between its bearings, as seen in the drawings. Each of said holders is formed rectangular in its cross section, and rests upon the shaft, which is formed to receive it; the one holder with its knife being directly over the other, and its knife,—that is to say, the holders being on opposite sides of the shaft, and so arranged that the two knives, which are to be curved alike, shall be brought into line transversely with each other, throughout the curves of both. The two holders of the knives turn midway between their ends upon a pin t, which extends through, and is fixed in the cutter shaft, and projects from the same into each holder, so that when the end of one, or adjacent ends of both of the holders, is moved transversely in one direction, the other end of the same, or other adjacent ends of both, will be equally moved in an opposite direction, thus enabling us at any time to narrow or widen the toe or heel of the sole as occasion may require. The adjacent ends of the cutter holders are confined down upon the shaft by a screw u or v, which passes through one of the holders and the shaft, and is screwed into the other holder,—there being an elongated slot or opening formed transversely through the shaft for each screw to pass and move through, when the adjacent ends of the cutter holders are moved to the right or left transversely. Figure 5 denotes a vertical cross section of the cutter shaft and cutter holders taken through one of the confining screws, and its slot, u, being the screw, and w the slot. On the end of the cutter shaft, opposite to that on which the loose pulley is placed, a circular plate x is fixed,—the said plate having two notches formed in its circumference on opposite sides of its centre, and at one hundred and eighty degrees distant from the centre of one to that of the other; the said notches being arranged in a vertical line with each other. An end view of this plate is given in Figure

G, in which one of the notches is seen at y, the other being covered by the lower end of a slide z, which is adapted to the surface of the plate so as to play up and down vertically,—the length of the said slide being equal to the diameter of the plate, diminished by the depth of one of the notches. A latch a^1 is arranged horizontally over the cutters and turns on a fulcrum or joint at b^1, in such manner as to allow its end over and which is in contact with the circular plate x, to play up and down vertically. A stud, or other analogous contrivance, c^1, projects vertically from the frame A, directly underneath the slide Z, and has its top graduated or situated at such a distance from the lower end of the slide, that when the frame B descends, so as to carry either one of the cutters through the leather to be cut, the said stud will come into contact with the slide, and elevate the same to such extent as to throw the latch a^1 out of the notch, and thereby permit the cutter shaft to be partially revolved so as to bring the knife which was previously upwards into the position of the one which last performed its cutting operation, and thereby turn the circular plate so as to cause the latch to fall into the other notch. The partial revolution of the cutter shaft is effected by the treadle when it rises, acting through the arm E, and the mechanism directly intervening between it and the cutter shaft. When the treadle is depressed, the loose pulley upon the cutter shaft carries the dog or pawl over the teeth of the ratchet wheel O; that is to say, causes it to slip or slide over the same, but the instant the direction of the pulley is reversed by the band h, which is wound upon the pulley g, the dog acts in the teeth of the ratchet wheel and turns the cutter shaft. The leather to be cut into soles being previously reduced to a proper width, is placed upon the table or platform G, and between parallel guides H H. It is pressed forward beneath the cutting knife until it comes into contact with a vertical gauge plate K, which extends downwards from a horizontal shaft L, supported and moving in bearings M M, in a frame N, which is capable of being moved towards or from the cutter by a screw O, or any other suitable contrivance. The shaft L, has a bent lever P, fixed upon one end, as seen in Figures 1, 2, the said lever extending in one direction towards and underneath the cutter shaft, and being borne up against the said shaft by a weight Q, applied upon its opposite end. From the above it will be seen that the depression of the frame B, will cause the end of the lever P, first mentioned, to descend, and thereby turn the shaft L, a little in its bearings, in such manner as to cause the lower end of the gauge plate to move in a direction away from the cutter, and allow the piece of leather separated from the sheet thereof to fall freely away from the same and drop upon an inclined plane R, over which it slides out of the machine. Having thus described my machinery, that which I claim is as follows, namely: I claim the above specified manner of operating the cutting knives r, s, applied upon the revolving shaft m, namely: the arranging said knives as described upon a revolving shaft and causing them and the shaft to be partially revolved at suitable periods of time in the manner as set forth, so as alternately to bring each cutting knife in succession into the required position for it to cut through the leather when depressed by the frame or mechanism by which it is made to act upon the same. I also claim, in combination with the above, giving to the gauge plate (K) at the time of, or soon after the depression of either knife into the leather, a motion in a direction away from the cutting knives in order to permit the piece of leather separated from the sheet thereof to fall freely away from the same, as described. I also claim the combination of mechanical parts by which the requisite degrees of rotary motion of the shaft which carries the cutting knives, are determined in the manner hereinbefore described, the said parts being the notched circular plate x, applied upon the rotary cutter shaft, the catch or latch a^1, the slide Z upon the circular plate, and the fixed stud, or other analogous contrivance, by which the slide is moved when the knife frame is depressed; the whole being applied and operating substantially as described. I also claim, attaching the knife holders to the revolving shaft m, in such manner as to admit of a corresponding movement of their adjacent ends, in transverse direction, at one and the same time, and the fixing the said ends afterwards to the shaft, the same being for the purpose of narrowing or widening the toe or heel of the sole as set forth. In testimony that the above is a correct specification, I have hereto set my signature this twenty-first day of September, A. D. 1844. Richard Richards. Witnesses, R. H. Eddy. John Noble."

The complainant alleged that each of the things specifically claimed were used by the defendant. A machine constructed according to the specification, and also the machine complained of, were produced, and affidavits of experts were made by each party. The motion was for a preliminary injunction, founded on long possession under the patent, and an allegation that the defendant's machine was an infringement.

G. T. Curtis, for the motion.
R. Choate, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The first question is, whether the complainant has shown such a prima facie title to the things patented, as will enable him to call on the court to protect his right until it can be tried. The affidavit of Pillsbury states that the patentee, and those claiming under him, have been engaged in building these machines since the letters-patent were granted, a period of about eight years. That, during this time, they have made and sold upwards of one hundred and fifty of these machines, and they have been put in use in Massachusetts, Maine, Ohio, Pensylvania, and other parts of the country. That about fifty of these machines are now in daily use at Lynn, in Massachusetts, the place where they were originally introduced. And that, except in this case, the witness has not known the novelty, or validity of Richards's patent disputed; nor has he known any attempt made to infringe it. No conflicting evidence has been introduced by the defendant, tending to show that the possession of the patentee has been questioned, or interrupted, or that it has not been as extensively enjoyed as this witness declares; nor is the validity of the patent denied by any affidavit of the defendant.

This is such a primâ facie title as a court of equity is bound to protect. The familiar rule stated by Lord Eldon, in Hill v. Thompson, 3 Mer. 622, is, that when a patent has been granted, and there has been an exclusive possession of some duration under it, the court will enjoin, without putting the party previously to establish his right at law. And this rule has been followed in this and other circuits, and is well established in England. Isaacs v. Cooper [Case No. 7,096]; Washburn v. Gould [Id. 17,214]; Orr v. Littlefield [Id. 10,590]; Bickford v. Skewes, Webst. Pat. Cas. 211; Neilson v. Thompson, Id. 277. It is not possible to fix any precise term of years during which the exclusive possession must have continued. The reason for the presumption in favor of the validity of the grant is, the acquiescence of the public in the exclusive right of the patentee, which, it may reasonably be assumed, would not exist unless the right was well founded. And it is obvious, that this public acquiescence is entitled to more or less weight, according to the degree of utility of the machine, and the number of persons whose trade, or business are affected by it. I am satisfied that this is a useful machine, not only because it is so stated by Pillsbury, but from the number which are now in use; and there can be no doubt that it affects the trade and business of a numerous and intelligent body of persons in this and other states. In a case where, though the validity of the patent has been questioned, no specific and satisfactory ground of doubt has been laid by the defendant, this acquiescence, for a period of about eight years, dispenses with the necessity of bringing an action, at law, before moving for a preliminary injunction. But the complainant must show an infringement by the defendant; and the next question is, if he has done so.

In this, as in other patent cases, this is a complex question, partly of law and partly of fact; and in this, as in most patent cases, when the law has been determined and applied, the facts do not present great difficulties. The first inquiry is, what is claimed? and the second, has the defendant used what is claimed? The construction of the claim is matter of law. It has been argued that the first claim is for an abstraction. I do not so consider it. The claim is, of the described means of arranging the knives on a shaft, and causing them to revolve and be depressed, so as to produce certain effects; and this is, in substance, a claim of certain mechanism, described in the specification, so combined and arranged, as is therein shown, and adapted to produce specific effects. In point of form, I see no sound objection to the claim. Laying aside, for the present, the last claim, which is for the attachments of the knives, I find the mechanism claimed, consists in a revolving shaft having two knives placed upon it in a particular manner, and in the means of working this shaft, and, in combination with these, the means of giving to the gauge plate certain movements. It has not been denied, that the gauge plate itself, in the defendant's machine, and the means of moving it, so as to allow the soles, when cut, to fall out of the machine, are substantially the same as in the plaintiff's; and, indeed, an inspection of the two machines can leave no reasonable doubt on this point. It is true, the defendant's has a screw, by means of which the gauge plate may be moved, so as to adapt it to different sizes of soles; but this is plainly an addition to, and not an alteration of, this part of the thing patented, which does not consist in the gauge plate itself, or the means of graduating it, but solely in the means of communicating to it the rocking motion which allows the escape of a sole when cut, and then brings the plate into position to act as a gauge.

But it is correctly argued that even if the patentee was the original inventor of this means of giving this motion to the plate, and the defendant has used it, still, as it is claimed only in combination with the shaft and knives, and mechanism to move them, unless the defendant uses these also, he does not infringe; because these are, undoubtedly, an essential part of the combination, and if the whole, in substance, is not used, there is no infringement. And, therefore, it is necessary to see whether the defendant has infringed upon what is first claimed. That he uses a shaft, with knives attached to it in the same manner as is described in the plaintiff's specification, is clear. Here, also, he has added a screw, by means of which the knives may be moved, when the screws which attach the knives to the shaft, by compressing the knife-holders, are loosened. But this does not affect the arrangement of the knives on the shaft. It is an addition to, and not an alteration of, the thing patented. But the real question is whether the defendant's means of working the shaft are, within the patent law, substantially the same as the plaintiff's. These means may be considered under two heads: namely, the mechanism by which the shaft is rotated and depressed, and that by which the degrees of rotary motion, requisite to bring the knives into the position to cut, are determined, and the revolution arrested and the shaft held while the cut is made, and then released. As to the first, Mr. Robert H. Eddy, whose affidavit is adopted by Mr. Thomas Blanchard, as correctly expressing his views, says: "I do not perceive any thing essentially new, or not well and long known to mechanicians, in the machinery used to rotate the shaft in the defendant's machine; nor does it seem to me to be so practically useful as that used by Richards for such purpose. The invention of Richards, namely, the arranging the knives upon a revolving shaft, and causing them and the shaft to be partially revolved, at suitable periods of time, in the manner as set forth in Richards's specification, namely, on its axis, so as to bring the knife, which was previously upwards, into the position of the one which last performed its cutting operation, is, in my judgment, identical with that adopted in the machine seen at the shop of said Moore," (that is, the defendant's machine.) "The vertical and intermittent movements of the knife-shaft are produced by machinery, which may be considered as common and well-known mechanical equivalents for those described in the said specification of the said Richards." No affidavit made by the defendant contradicts this; for though, as will presently be noticed, his experts declare that the two machines, in their opinion, are not substantially the same; they do not say that the defendant's devices are not well-known means of accomplishing the same ends effected by Richards. Indeed, in the written argument for the defendant, it is not insisted, that there is a substantial difference between the machines in this particular. The position there taken is, "that the combination of mechanical parts, whereby the degree of rotary motion is determined in the defendant's, is not shown to be substantially the same as in the plaintiff's."

It appears, by an inspection and comparison of the two machines, that in both, the degree of rotary motion is determined by a notched plate, fixed to the end of the knife-shaft, with which a catch engages when the notches are brought opposite to the catch in their revolution. The knife-shaft is thus arrested and fixed while it descends, and the knife cuts. The catch is disengaged, when this operation is completed, and the knife-shaft is left free to revolve, so far as to bring the other notch opposite to the catch, which engages with it, and the same operation is repeated. In the plaintiff's machine, the catch is placed above the plate, and at a right angle with it, and engages the notch, partly by its own weight, but assisted by a spring. In the defendant's, the catch is placed opposite the face of the plate, which has a flange upon it, in which are the notches; and the catch is a spring-catch, of well-known construction. In the plaintiff's machine the catch is disengaged from the notch by a slide, working on the face of the plate, put in motion upwards against the catch by descending with the knife-shaft, and striking a stud fixed to the frame of the machine.

In the defendant's, the catch is disengaged by impinging on an inclined plane, or wedge, against which it is moved by descending with the knife-shaft. In other words, the diversities are, that the defendant uses a spring-catch, the plaintiff a catch and spring; the defendant disengages by working against a wedge, the plaintiff by working through a slide against a stud. Of these diversities, Mr. Eddy, supported by Mr. Blanchard, says: "These are not, strictly, a combination, like that described in the patent of the said Richards; but they are a common and well-known combination for the purpose, and are mere substitutions for such mechanism as is described by the said Richards." Six experts, including Mr. Thompson, who built the defendant's machine, testify that, in their opinion, the two machines are not the same in principle and mode of operation. But no witness says that the use of a spring-catch, in place of a catch and spring, or the use of a wedge, or inclined plane, to disengage a catch, in place of a slide and stud, were not, what Mr. Eddy and Mr. Blanchard pronounced them to be, well-known combinations for those purposes. In my judgment, this is decisive. I do not think the doctrine respecting the use of mechanical equivalents, is confined by the patent law to those elements which are strictly known as such in the science of mechanics. In the present advanced state of that science, there are different well-known devices, any one of which may be adopted to effect a given result, according to the judgment of the constructor. And the mere substitution of one of these for another, cannot be treated as an invention. It does not belong to the subject of invention, but of construction. One constructor may adopt a spring-catch, another a catch and spring; but whether he takes one or the other, is matter of judgment in construction, as long as both are designed to accomplish the same end, and both are in common use to accomplish it.

The substance of this invention does not consist in the identical devices used, but in a practicable and described mode of effecting certain operations; and when the patentee has described what those operations are, and one practicable mode of effecting them, he has enabled constructors to effect these operations, not only by the identical devices he employed, but by all other known substitutes. If this were not so, no patent for machinery, of the least complication, would be of any value. Now, the difficulty which attends the affidavits, on the part of the defendant, is, that the opinions given by them are not accompanied by any explanation of what the witnesses mean by principle, or mode of operation, or by any statement of what, in point of fact, they consider are the diversities between the two machines; or whether those consist in the substitution of one well-known mode of effecting a given movement, in place of another. And this is equally applicable to what they say respecting the means of revolving the shaft. They express an opinion that the means are different, and the practical result better. Mr. Eddy and Mr. Blanchard think the practical result not so good; and though they do not say the means are the same, they do say they are long and well-known means of revolving the shaft.

If I were to come to the conclusion that the defendant's mode of revolving the shaft was a real practical improvement, it would by no means follow that it would not be an infringement of the patent. Looking at the whole structure devised by the patentee, and covered by the first claim, the question would then be, if its substance was not used by the defendant, though he had improved it, by adopting a continuous, in place of an intermittent, motion. Very nice and difficult questions have been made concerning what are often called combinations, but the elements of which are not capable of being distinctly defined and separated. If a combination, properly so called, consist of two or more distinct things, and the patent is for combining them into one whole, it is familiar law, that if all are not used, the patent is not infringed. But the first claim in this patent is not for such a combination. It is for an operative part of a machine, and in substance covers that operative part; just as a patent for an entire machine covers the whole machine. In some sense, it may be called a combination, for it consists of different parts united together, as an entire machine does. But it is not strictly and technically a combination, any more than an entire machine is. And it may be improved, and a patent taken for that improvement; and at the same time, the improvement cannot be used without the consent of the original patentee. And even where a strict combination is claimed, if one of the elements of that combination is complex enough to admit of an improvement, without destroying its identity, such improved combination would still be an infringement. This case presents an illustration. The patentee claims the means of moving the gauge plate, in combination with the knife-shaft, and the means of revolving, fixing, and depressing it. This is technically a claim for a combination, and would not be infringed by a machine which should omit the motion of the gauge plate. But if that is used, the other element of the combination may be capable of being improved, without destroying its identity; and if thus improved, the whole combination, in the sense of the patent law, would be used.

Whether the change made by the defendant, in this case, goes beyond the mere substitution of one known device for another, so as to amount to a patentable improvement, or whether, if it does, it is still only an improvement of the thing patented, and so an infringement, are questions which it may be proper to raise hereafter, in the progress of the cause; but in the present state of the evidence, I do not see such grounds of doubt upon these points as ought to prevent the court from protecting the right of the plaintiff, by requiring the defendant to keep an account and file a bond, with sufficient sureties, to pay such sums as may be finally decreed against him; and in default thereof, an injunction must issue. I make the order for an injunction conditional, because it is not suggested that the defendant has constructed, or is about to construct, any other machine than the one complained of; and if the plaintiff is made secure of receiving all the profits which may arise from the use of the machine until a final decree, he will be sufficiently protected in case it is decided that the defendant infringes on a right belonging exclusively to him. I have not thought it necessary particularly to examine the other claim in the specification.

POWERS OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY TO SUSPEND THE ISSUE OF CERTIFICATES TO IMPORTERS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS—ACT OF MARCH 2, 1799.

1. The collection act of 1799, § 41 [1 Stat. 659], requires the delivery to the importer of distilled spirits, of a certain certificate to accompany each cask, as evidence that the same has been lawfully imported; and section 43 provides that the finding of such cask, without such certificate, shall be presumptive evidence of its being liable to forfeiture. In 1850 the secretary of the treasury directed the collectors to discontinue the delivery of said certificates, except on payment of fees therefor, on the ground that, the object of said provisions being the prevention of fraudulent claims for drawbacks, subsequent legislation had rendered them unnecessary. Held, that their object was also to prevent illegal importation, and that the secretary, having no power to repeal the rule of evidence established by section 43, had no right to withhold the certificate on which the burthen of proof depends.

the positive requirement of an unrepealed act of congress, because later legislation, in his opinion, rendered the same unnecessary, quaere.

This action was assumpsit for money had and received, and was submitted upon the following statement of facts, viz: On the 26th day of December, 1854, the plaintiff imported into the port of Boston, from Rochelle, ninety-seven packages of brandy, of which due entry was made, in bond, at the custom house, at said port of Boston; and the plaintiff applied to the defendant, who was the collector of customs at said port, for the certificates to accompany each cask or package of said brandy upon the sale thereof. But the said defendant refused to grant said certificates, unless the said plaintiff would pay therefor the sum of four cents for each and every of said certificates, which the said plaintiff paid, but under the following protest in writing, then and there filed with said defendant: "We protest against the payment of fees for particular certificates, which we are entitled to without charge under section 41 of the act of 1799, and for marking and gauging under said act, believing that such charges or fees are unauthorized by any law of congress, and that they are illegal and unjust."

Milton Andros, for plaintiff.
B. F. Hallett, for defendant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The collection act of March 2, 1799, by its 41st section, requires the delivery to the importer of distilled spirits, of a particular certificate, in the form prescribed, to accompany each cask, wherever the same may be sent within the limits of the United States, as evidence that the same have been lawfully imported. The 43d section enacts that the importer shall deliver to the purchaser of each cask the certificate belonging thereto, on pain of forfeiting fifty dollars for neglecting so to do; and if any such cask of distilled spirits be found in the possession of any person unaccompanied by its certificate, it shall be presumptive evidence of its being liable to forfeiture, and shall be seized and a forfeiture inflicted, if the claimant shall fail to prove on the trial that it was legally imported, and the duties paid thereon. It is stated at the bar that these certificates continued to be given, pursuant to the above directions of the collection act, until the year 1850, when, by a circular of the 28th of March of that year, the then secretary of the treasury directed the collectors of the customs to discontinue their delivery, unless the importer should request it and pay fees to the officer for making the same.

The grounds upon which the defendant's counsel has rested the justification of this change of practice are, that the main purpose of these provisions of the collection act of 1799 was to guard against fraudulent claims for drawbacks on the exportation of spirits, wines, and teas, for which opportunity was given by other provisions of law, which allowed those articles to go into the possession of the importer; and that, as by force of the acts of April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 469), and March 3, 1849, § 5 (9 Stat. 399), drawbacks cannot be claimed on the export of any articles, save those which have remained in the public stores, the opportunity for frauds and the necessity of the certificates, marks, &c., to guard against them no longer exist, and the secretary of the treasury had power to dispense with them.

Without stopping to inquire whether the secretary of the treasury has power, in any case, to order the collectors of customs to disobey the positive requirement of an unrepealed act of congress, because later legislation has rendered that requirement, in his opinion, unnecessary, I think it clear that, in this case, he had not power to order these certificates to be discontinued. The purpose of these provisions of the act of 1799 was not limited to the prevention of fraudulent claims for drawbacks. The object was to afford security against illegal importations. This appears from the provisions requiring the certificate to accompany each cask when sold, though the time limited for exportation may have expired; and also from the change of the burthen of proof respecting the legality of the importation, if such a cask be found in the possession of any person unaccompanied by the appropriate certificate. This rule of evidence the secretary of the treasury has no power to repeal, and it is the law of the land now; and if so, it cannot be maintained that the secretary has power to direct his subordinates to withhold these necessary documents altogether, and thus subject the importer to the penalty which is inflicted for selling without a certificate, or the purchaser to the risk of seizure and condemnation; or to withhold them unless the importer will pay fees for them, thus exacting from the importer a tax not imposed by law. My opinion is that upon the facts agreed the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—LIBELANT AS PART OWNER OF THE VESSEL.

1. A seaman who is at the same time a part owner of the vessel in which he serves, is not thereby precluded from libeling in admiralty for wages.

2. A. & B. were, with others, part owners of a vessel, and also served on board her as mariners. The vessel was sold on execution out of a state court, on a judgment against all the owners. Held, that the sale not affecting the liens of seamen, A. and B. might libel the vessel in the hands of the purchaser at sheriff's sale, for wages due prior thereto, notwithstanding the former part ownership.

3. The seamen's lien for wages is not discharged by a sale on execution against the owners of a vessel.

[Cited in The Skylark, Case No. 12,928.]

In admiralty. Libel for wages.

Mr. Pinney, for libelant.

Mr. Stanton, for respondent.

IRWIN, District Judge. On the 7th day of December last, several bills were filed by James Foster and others, for wages alleged to be due them as mariners of the steamboat Pilot No. 2, belonging to the port of Pittsburg. On the same day, the marshal seized the vessel by process in favor of said libelants, and has since held it in custody to answer their claims, and to await the adjudication of this court. Prior to the time when the said libels were filed and the attachments served, the said steamboat was taken in execution by the sheriff of Alleghany county, upon judgments obtained in the district court of said county, against the owners, and after due notice, it was on the 18th day of December, publicly sold by the said sheriff to B. McBride, for the sum of seven hundred and sixty dollars. On the 21st of December, the said McBride, as intervener, answered the several libels, from which it appears that as purchaser at sheriff's sale, he claims to hold the said steam vessel discharged from any lien which may have existed prior to the sale, and from the claims of the libelants, who are denied to have been mariners in said vessel as is asserted in the said libels, which, therefore, he prays may be dismissed, and the libelants condemned in costs, &c. At the hearing no proof was offered in support of the latter allegation, but it was contended that two of the libelants named, Alexander Woods and Jacob Gallatin, whose claims for wages amounted to the sum of five hundred and eighteen dollars and sixty-three cents, were before and after the voyage last made by the steamboat, and at the time of filing their several libels, its part owners, and that the judgment and execution upon which it was sold, were against the said Woods and Gallatin, as well as against the other part owners, and that, therefore, they have no lien thereon for wages or otherwise. So much of the answer as alleges the part ownership of the vessel by Woods and Gallatin at the time mentioned, is admitted to be true, but it is denied that their claim as mariners of the said vessel for wages due and their lien as such mariners can in any manner be affected by such part ownership. This is the only question for consideration.

There are principles of law governing mercantile partnerships which in argument are supposed to involve and settle the points raised by the answer adversely to the claim of the libelants. But it is unnecessary to inquire what would have been the legal effect of the disputed claims if creditors of the partners of the steam vessel claiming by liens inferior to that of wages or claiming in personam had intervened to contest the claims for wages or to inquire whether part owners not parties to the libel, could successfully intervene to resist the claims for wages of their copartners, on the ground that such claims, like all other claims between partners in relation to services to the partnership, or connected with the partnership property, can only legally be adjusted and determined according to the law of partnership. Neither creditors nor part owners have intervened; but had either or both events occurred, it must not be inferred that such intervention, under the circumstances supposed, would be regarded as a legal obstacle to the mariner's claims for wages. It is not meant, however, to say more than what properly belongs to the case under consideration, as it may be affected by the proofs exhibited, the principles of maritime law, and as in principle it is distinguished from that assumed in argument. The respondent is a purchaser of the steam vessel subject to liens for mariner's wages, and as no one else intervened to contest those liens, the inquiry will be confined to what he has set forth in his answer as above noticed, and the proofs and the law which sustain the claims of the libelants.

The claim of mariner's wages has a priority above all other claims against the vessel, the freight, and the proceeds of both, into whosesoever hands they may come. It is a permanent lien, and secures to the mariner for his wages, a preference above all other persons, and may be enforced in admiralty against a bona fide purchaser, without regard to the title through which the purchaser claims. The respondent purchased the steam vessel at sheriff's sale, eleven days after it had been libeled, and was in custody of the marshal, and while the libelants were proceeding in this court to enforce their liens. He cannot, therefore, allege with truth, that when he purchased her he had no legal notice of these claims. But with or without notice. if all the libelants were mariners, and were all entitled to wages, their lien against the vessel, after as well as before sale, is unquestionable. But whilst this is not denied as a general principle, it is contended that two of the libelants, though they might have been as alleged, employed as mariners in the vessel, yet as part owners of it, they could not by any known principles of law, proceed by libel in admiralty for the recovery of wages: that all the owners of the vessel were debtors for wages, and all equally liable: that the libelants could not separate themselves from other part owners, and assert a separate claim against the partnership property, which, in effect, would be to claim against themselves as well as against their copartners, nor could they claim against a bona fide purchaser of the partnership property under a judicial sale: that such claims for services to the partnership in a steam vessel or otherwise, might be met with similar or equally good claims by other part owners, and that their separate or mutual charges and accounts can only be legally settled by the law of partnership. It was further urged that, if part owners of a vessel had in admiralty a lien for wages as mariners, the right would extend to all other admiralty liens to the exclusion of creditors, and thus open a door to fraudulent claims, which, in most instances, it would be impossible to expose, or successfully resist. The argument in this case is specious, but unsound. The owners of a steam vessel must, from necessity, in a voyage of that vessel, be subject to mariner's wages; and, if it should happen that one of their number should be employed as a mariner, such employment would be in a capacity distinct from, and unconnected with the appropriate business of a partnership of that nature, the object of which is either to let the vessel out to freight, or for mutual adventure in vessel and cargo. As one of the crew, his name would regularly be included in the shipping articles for the voyage; and either by them or other contracts, his station and rate of wages would be determined; and while subject to all the penalties and forfeitures, prescribed by the act of congress for a failure to perform his duties as a mariner, he would, as such, be entitled to the stipulated wages, and the triple remedy which the law provides for enforcing its payment: a lien upon the vessel, the freight and the proceeds of both, regardless of partnership relations and liabilities, unless by express contract another way of securing his wages had been provided. Without such an agreement, it would be fair to infer that his copartners in a vessel regarded his right to wages as unconnected with, and beyond the control of the partnership. In pursuing the remedy by libel, it would, therefore, be enough for the libelant to show, by the shipping articles or otherwise, that he shipped as a mariner, and, as such, was entitled to wages, and that his wages were due and unpaid. The act of congress, which secures this right, is in accordance with the policy and usages of maritime law, which regards, with peculiar favor and tenderness, the situation of seamen, by giving them a lien for wages paramount to all other claims, and a summary remedy for enforcing the right, unaffected by collateral matters, or common law pleadings. But whatever doubt there may be as to the remedy, when a vessel is owned by several in strict partnership, there can be none in a case where they they are merely part owners, as the respondents are alleged to be in the answer, and as they must be taken to be in the absence of all controlling circumstances. The general relation of part owners of a vessel, is that of tenants in common and not as copartners; they are, therefore, not liable in solido, nor entitled, in the settlement of their accounts, to be governed by the principles of partnership. Nicholl v. Mumford, 4 Johns. Ch. 522; 2 Johns. 611. There are exceptions, but this case is not one of them; and as liens may arise either from express or implied assignments, it is but a reasonable presumption, when not opposed by special or express contract, that part owners do not intend to rely solely upon the personal responsibility of each other, to reimburse themselves for expenses and charges incurred upon the common property for the common benefit, but that there is a mutual understanding that they shall possess a lien in rem. Story's Partn. 444.

The navigation of the western waters by steamboats is often attended with more than ordinary risk and loss; to lessen such risk, it is not unusual for those about to engage in such business to unite in partnership with one or more persons, known to be skillful and trustworthy mariners, whose interest in the vessel, though generally small, is always sufficient to call into action the greatest amount of vigilance, ability and care of which they are capable, an advantage which it would be vain to expect from mariners bound to their duty only by the prospect of ordinary wages. The law, as explained, harmonizes with this policy, by giving to a mariner, though a part owner of a vessel, a maritime lien for his stipulated wages, while it does no injustice to another part owner, or to their creditors, since it adds nothing to the wages which must necessarily be incurred in a voyage. The creditors are generally such as have claims for repairs to a vessel, or for materials furnished, and have often no other security for payment than the lien which the law gives them upon the vessel. Both part owners and creditors have a deep interest in its safe return; and when, to the usual means of promoting that object, is superadded the connection of mariner and part owner, it may be safely assumed, that it would be impolitic, unjust, and contrary to the principles of maritime law, to deny to the mariner his claim for wages. Upon full consideration, made the more necessary from the absence of a reported case of a similar nature, I feel satisfied that the claims of the libelants are fully sustained by the proofs and the law. Decree accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY — RECEIPT OF RENTS OF MORTGAGED PROPERTY BY ASSIGNEE—FORECLOSURE—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE.

1. Where an assignee in bankruptcy receives the rents of mortgaged property, it must be distributed among the general creditors of the bankrupt. If the mortgagee desires it to be applied specifically to his lien, he must not only show the insufficiency of his security without the pernancy of the rents and profits, but he must also intercept the rent before it can reach the assignee.

2. Where a mortgagee completes his foreclosure without intercepting the rents, he cannot afterwards, on finding the property insufficient, have the rents applied; whatever rights to intercept the rents he may have had ceased with the completion of the foreclosure.

[Cited in Teal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 251, 4 Sup. Ct. 425.]

The plaintiff [William Foster] claimed a lien on certain assets of the bankrupt [James F. Rhodes] in the hands of the assignee; consisting of rents derived from two houses owned by Rhodes prior to his bankruptcy, under leases made as early as May 1, 1871. The plaintiff claims his lien or priority in these rents, by virtue of two mortgages on these two houses, which were made by the bankrupt twenty days later than the leases. Each mortgage was made to secure the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars and interest. Under a thirty days' interest clause, both became due at the option of the petitioner, on the 26th of December, 1871. Rhodes' bankruptcy dates from the 11th day of November, 1871. About January 1, 1872, the plaintiff took measures to foreclose his two mortgages. On the 30th day of March, 1872, the usual decrees of foreclosure were made therein, and the property subsequently sold. The rents, amounting to one thousand dollars, became due after Rhodes became a bankrupt, and before sale of the premises. Under the above facts, the plaintiff, after sale, finding the proceeds of the mortgaged premises greatly insufficient to pay his debt, applied to have the rents received by the assignee paid to him, claiming a specific lien by virtue of a clause in the mortgage, after the granting part, in these words: "Together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging. and the reversions, remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof."

Mr. Johnson, for plaintiff, made the following points:

First. A mortgage operates as an assignment of the rent due under a lease made prior to the mortgage. 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 570; McKircher v. Hawley, 16 Johns. 289; Demarest v. Willard, 8 Cow. 206; 1 Doug. 279.

Second. The mortgage conveys the rents, issues, and profits of the premises.

Third. There are no cases that hold that the mortgagee has not a lien on rents accruing after default made.

Fourth. But for the bankruptcy proceeding we had a right to acquire a lien; this was a part of our security, and entitles us to the relief prayed. In re Dey [Case No. 3,870].

W. W. Bliss, for assignee.

HUNT, Circuit Justice. The petitioner insists that by virtue of his mortgage, he became assignee of the rents under a lease made prior to the mortgage. I think the creditor can no more ask for an incident under this mortgage, such as the rents, than he can ask for the principal, that is, the land. His mortgage and all rights and claims incidental and collateral as well as direct and immediate, are at an end. By the foreclosure, every right or claim, in whatever form it existed, is terminated. If he ever had a claim to the rents, it was ended when the foreclosure was complete. Judge BENEDICT'S opinion is satisfactory to me. The order should be affirmed.

SEAMEN—SHORT ALLOWANCE — DOUBLE WAGES—DAMAGES.

1. Where a vessel sails, without the statute quantity of bread, and the crew are put upon a short allowance of bread, it is no defence to their claim for double wages that flour was furnished as a substitute.

[Distinguished in The Hermon, Case No. 6,411.]

2. Where double wages are allowed, under the statute, for such short allowance, damages may also be given for a deficiency of other food.

3. The owner is bound by his contract to furnish the seamen suitable subsistence. What is suitable, depends upon what is usual, in similar voyages.

This was a libel, promoted by three of the crew, against the master of the bark Fanny, claiming compensation for short allowance of provisions, on a voyage from St. Ubes to Boston.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for libellants.

Edward Dexter, for respondent.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. It is admitted that this vessel, when she left St. Ubes, had not on board more than one-half the quantity of ship-bread required by Act 1790, c. 29, § 9 (1 Stat. 135), and that, in consequence thereof, the crew were put on an allowance, one week, of three and a half pounds, and another week, of three pounds of bread, for each man. It is not denied, that this is a short allowance of bread; but the defence is rested on the fact, that flour was given to the crew, which could be baked into bread, in quantities sufficient to make up the deficiency. The statute requires that there shall be a certain quantity of ship-bread on board, at the commencement of the voyage, beside any other provisions. It is clear, that this requirement can be satisfied by nothing but ship-bread. The statute subsequently says, that if the crew shall be put upon a short allowance of bread, extra wages shall be recoverable. It is not necessary to decide whether this, having reference to what precedes, means ship-bread only, or all kinds of bread, because flour is not bread. It may, with other ingredients, be converted into bread; but even this is not practicable, under all circumstances. There is good reason for requiring a strict compliance with the statute; for it is important to have food that does not require cooking, especially in case of wreck, or bad weather.

It is further contended, that the master made efforts to procure bread at St. Ubes, but that it was impracticable. It is not necessary to decide whether this would be a defence, under the statute, as it is not made out by the evidence. I would remark, however, that the point has never been decided by the supreme court, or by any circuit court; and the only case in which the defence was sustained in the district courts, is that in The Washington [Case No. 9,086], while in The Harriet [Id. 2,982] the defence was not sustained. In The Mary [Id. 9,191], on the other hand, the reasoning of the court sustains the decision in The Washington. I am of opinion that the libellants are entitled to double wages, for two weeks, under the statute.

The libel also claims compensation for short provisions, in other respects, beside the bread, on the general principles of the maritime law. Proper subsistence is a part of the contract between the owners and seamen. Dixon v. The Cyrus [Case No. 3,930]; The Castilia, 1 Hagg. Adm. 59. What is proper subsistence, depends upon what is usual, in similar voyages, in vessels of this description. We have had the evidence of shipmasters and merchants, acquainted with the subject, who agree that the practice is so uniform, to give tea, or coffee, night and morning, and flour, rice, or beans at dinner, in addition to meat, that every seaman has a right to expect substantially that kind of fare. In this vessel, there were ten days when the crew had nothing but meat, of which there was an abundance, and a short allowance of bread. For thirty-five days they had no tea, and for nineteen days only bean coffee in the morning. The weather was unusually severe, and the crew were subjected to more than usual exposure.

I shall allow them $20 each, in addition to the two weeks double wages, with costs. Decree accordingly.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—WASHED AND UNWASHED WOOL—COMPUTATION OF DUTIES—TIME FOR PROTEST.

[1. The provision of Rev. St. § 2504, Schedule L, that the duty on wool of the first class, imported washed, shall be "twice the amount of the duty" to which it would be subjected if unwashed, must, in view of the necessities of its practical application, be construed to require a doubling of the specific and ad valorem rates, and not a computation of the amount of duties which the law would impose on the number of pounds of unwashed wool, and then a doubling of this amount.]

[2. There is no new liquidation of duties when goods imported for warehousing are withdrawn from bond, and consequently the 10 days allowed for filing a protest (Rev. St. § 293) must be computed from the date of the original liquidation, which is made at the same time and the same manner as when the entry is for immediate consumption.]

Statement of Agreed Facts.

This is an action of money had and received, to recover $342.46 in gold coin, and interest thereon, the same being the amount of customs duties exacted by the defendant [William A. Simmons], then collector of customs for the port of Boston, and paid by the plaintiffs [Charles O. Foster and others] to him under protest, upon certain importations of washed wool of the first class, imported by the plaintiffs from Liverpool, England, in the steamers "Minnesota" and "Illyrian," as hereinafter set forth. The writ is dated August 10, 1877, and, with the declaration and answer, may be referred to as part of these agreed facts.

The first importation of the plaintiffs was by the "Minnesota," of "70 bags River Plate skin wool," containing 11,678 pounds, at the entered value of $4,963, and was so invoiced and entered for warehousing. The invoice was dated Liverpool, March 17, 1877, and the entry for warehousing was duly made here April 2, 1877, when an estimate of duties was made, a bond given, and the goods sent to the warehouse. At the time of the entry the collector designated upon the invoice one bag of the wool in every ten to be opened, examined and appraised, and ordered these designated packages to be sent to the public stores for that purpose; and the packages so designated were sent to the public stores, where they were duly opened and examined by the appraiser, who, on the 3d of April, 1877, made the following report on the invoice:—"Washed River Plate Wool. Class I. Value over 32 cents per lb. Duty 20 cents and 22 per cent. Correct." On the 20th of

April, 1877, the duties were ascertained, liquidated and assessed upon the merchandise so entered in accordance with that report; that is to say, at 20 cents on the pound, and 22 per cent. ad valorem. On the 13th of April, 1877, the plaintiffs withdrew from the warehouse three bags of the above wool, amounting to 487 pounds, and of the value of $207, upon which the defendant, as collector of customs, exacted the customs duty according to the foregoing ascertainment and liquidation of 20 cents a pound, and 22 per cent. ad valorem, amounting to $142.94, which amount the plaintiffs paid on the same day. On the 27th of the same April, the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant the following protest:—"Charles O. Foster & Co., 22 Broad Street. Boston, 19 April, 1877. To the Honorable the Collector of Customs, Boston: Dear Sir:—On the 2d day of April, 1877, we imported per steamer 'Minnesota' from Liverpool, 70 bags River Plate skin wool, as per invoice dated 16 March, 1877. Upon this importation duty has been assessed at 20 cents per pound, and 22 per cent. ad valorem—the wool in question being rightly classed as 'washed wool of the first class.' By the act of congress, passed 2d March, 1867, it is provided (section 1) 'that the duty upon wool of the first-class which shall be imported washed, shall be twice the amount of duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed.' In the present case we are charged upon washed wool double the rates of duty levied upon unwashed wool, instead of twice the amount of such duty, as the act provides. We therefore hereby respectfully protest against the assessment of duty made upon the present importation. We remain, dear sir, Your obedient servants, Charles O. Foster & Co." The collector not changing the assessment and liquidation of the duty, the plaintiffs thereafter, and within thirty days, duly appealed to the secretary of the treasury, who, on the 16th of May, 1877, affirmed the decision of the collector. The plaintiffs claim that this sum of $142.94 was $28 in excess of the true amount of duty due upon that withdrawal.

The second importation of the plaintiffs was by the steamer "Illyrian" from Liverpool, of 219 bags, containing 38,455 pounds of River Plate skin wool, of the entered value of $16,321; and was so invoiced and entered for warehousing. The invoice was dated Liverpool, March 24, 1877, and the entry for warehousing was duly made here April 9, 1877, when an estimate of duties was made, a bond given, and the goods sent to the warehouse. At the time of the entry the collector designated upon the invoice one bag of the wool in every ten to be opened, examined and appraised, and ordered the designated packages to be sent to the public stores for that purpose; and the packages so designated were sent to the public stores, where they were duly opened and examined by the appraiser, who on the 10th April, 1877, made the following report upon the invoice:—"Washed Wool. Class I. Value over 32 cents per lb. Duty 20 cents and 22 per cent. Correct." On the 27th April, 1877, the duties were ascertained, liquidated and assessed upon the merchandise so entered, in accordance with that report; that is to say, at 20 cents on the pound and 22 per cent. ad valorem. Afterwards the plaintiffs from time to time, as below stated, made withdrawals of said wool, upon which the defendant, as collector, exacted, at the time of the withdrawals, from the plaintiffs, customs duties according to the said ascertainment and liquidation, of 20 cents a pound and 22 per cent. ad valorem, which several sums the plaintiffs paid at the time of the withdrawals, and within ten days after said several payments made and delivered to the collector protests against such payments, and the collector, not changing his exactions of duties, the plaintiffs within thirty days respectively, from the date of the several protests, appealed to the secretary of the treasury, who affirmed the decisions of the collector, and the writ was brought within ninety days thereafter.

The dates and the amounts and values of the withdrawals, the amounts of duties exacted and paid, the dates of protest, and the amounts claimed to have been paid in excess, are given in the following schedule:—

Dates of Withdrawals and of the Payment of Duty Thereon.	Number of Bags Withdrawn.	Amounts Withdrawn in Pounds.	Values, $	Amounts of Duty Paid, $ cts.	Amounts Claimed to have been Paid in Excess.	Dates of Protest.
May 16, 1877.	6	1,054	447	309.14	60.61	May 23, 1877.
May 18, 1877.	5	883	375	259.10	50.77	May 24, 1877.
July 2, 1877.	5	883	375	259.10	50.77	July 6, 1877.
July 6, 1877.	5	883	375	249.10	50.77	July 7, 1877.
July 9, 1877.	10	1,766	750	518.20	101.54	July 10, 1877.

One of the protests last named, which may stand for all, was as follows:—"Charles O. Foster & Co., 22 Broad Street. Boston, May 23, 1877. W. A. Simmons, Esq., Collector of Customs, Boston. Sir:—We hereby protest against charge of duty of 20 cents per pound, and 22 per cent. ad valorem on six bales washed wool, part of goods entered by us on the 9th of April, 1877, per S. S. 'Illyrian' from Liverpool (bond No. 584), and withdrawn for consumption on the 16th of May, 1877. We claim that, for the purpose of assessing duty, the washed wool should be treated as unwashed, the duty charged at ten cents per pound on the number of pounds withdrawn, and eleven per cent. ad valorem upon the same number of pounds of the wool if unwashed, and that double the aggregate is the correct amount of duty; we therefore further claim that, under the existing laws, the duty as exacted by you on the said six bales wool should be reduced, so that the same should merely equal two times the amount of duty on the same number of pounds of the same wool in the grease or unwashed. Yours, very respectfully, Charles O. Foster & Co." The value of the wool of both these importations, in its unwashed condition, at Liverpool, the last port whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, was, at the time of exportation, less than 32 cents a pound, and its value in a washed condition at the same time and place, was somewhat more than twice the same per pound. Wools of this class, by being washed, shrink from 50 to 65 per cent. in weight, the dirt and grease being removed by the washing, and the wool remaining; and the value of the pound of washed wool of this class is somewhat more than double the value of the pound of unwashed wool of the same class.

The law imposing duty upon wools of this class is as follows (Rev. St. U. S. p. 474): "Wools of the first-class the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound, ten cents per pound, and in addition thereto, eleven per cent. ad valorem. Wools of the same class the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound, twelve cents per pound, and in addition thereto ten per cent. ad valorem." "The duty upon wool of the first class which shall be imported washed, shall be twice the amount of the duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed."

If the protests of the plaintiffs, or any of them, shall be held to be sufficient and made in season, and if the mode of assessing the duty upon the merchandise in question, claimed by the plaintiffs in their protests severally, is the correct mode, it is agreed that the several sums hereinbefore stated to be claimed by the plaintiffs as exacted in excess are correct amounts, and that judgment may be rendered in gold in favor of the plaintiffs, for such of these amounts as the court shall decide the plaintiffs to be entitled to, with interest thereon from the date of payment, with costs, otherwise judgment shall be rendered for the defendant with costs.

A. D. Chandler, for plaintiffs.

The government in assessing the duty on these wools, doubled the rates. The correct method, under the statute, is to double the amount. There is a marked difference between the two methods, thus:—

Government Method.

1,000 lbs. Washed Wool of the First Class.
1,000 lbs. washed wool at 20 cents per pound.....	$200 00
1,000 lbs. washed wool are worth $280.00 (at 28 cents per lb.), 22 per cent of which is.....	61 60
Duty by government method.....	$261 60

Correct Method.

1,000 lbs. Washed Wool of the First Class.
1,000 lbs unwashed wool at 10 cents per lb.....	$100 00
1,000 lbs unwashed wool are worth $140.00 (at 14 cents per lb.), 11 per cent of which is.....	15 40
Duty on 1,000 pounds unwashed wool	$115 40
"Twice the amount" of this duty gives the correct duty on 1,000 lbs of washed wool, as.....	2
	$230 80

Difference Between the Two Methods.

Government method	$261	60
Correct method....	230	80
Difference	$ 30	80 on every 1,000 lbs.

It is not to be forgotten, in these calculations, that washed wool is worth at least twice as much as unwashed wool, at the last port of export. Washed wool is, in fact, worth more than twice as much as unwashed wool. Hence the difference against the importer is really greater than that shown by the above examples.

This difference in the value of the wools expressly appears in the agreed facts, as follows: "The value of the pound of washed wool of this class (washed) is somewhat more than double the value of the pound of unwashed wool of the same class." As the Revised Statutes require the duty on washed wools to be assessed at "twice the amount" of duty to which it would be subjected if unwashed, and not double the rates, the correct method is demonstrable as above shown.

George P. Sanger, U. S. Atty.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Masters of ships laden with goods for importation, on their arrival within four leagues of our coast, or within any of the bays, harbors, ports, or inlets thereof, are required, upon demand, to produce the ship's manifest of such goods to such officer of the customs as shall come on board the ship for his inspection, and it is made the duty of such officer to certify the fact of compliance with that requirement, and the day the manifest was so produced. Imported goods may be entered for consumption or for warehousing, at the option of the importer or consignee, and the proceedings in the two cases, so far as respects the entry, are in all particulars the same. Such an entry must be in writing, and must be made to the collector of the district within fifteen days after the required report is filed by the master. Appropriate forms for that purpose are prescribed by law and the regulations of the treasury department, and the provision is that the owner or consignee making the entry shall also produce to the collector and naval officer, if any, the original invoice or invoices of the goods or other documents received in lieu thereof, or concerning the same, in the same state in which they were obtained, with the bills of lading for the importation. Waring v. Mayor, etc., 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 117. Two importations from Liverpool were made by the plaintiffs, of River Plate skin wool, one by the Minnesota and the other by the Illyrian. Entry for warehousing was duly made in the former case, April 2, 1877, and the latter, April 9, in the same year. In the first importation there were 70 bags, containing 11,678 pounds of wool, invoiced and entered as of the value of $4,963; and in the second importation there were 219 bags, containing 38,455 pounds of wool, invoiced and entered as of the value of $16,321. Beyond question these proceedings were regular, and the agreed statement shows that the duties were estimated in each case at the time of the entry, that the required bond for the same was also given in each case, and that the collector designated on the invoice one in ten of the packages to be examined and appraised, and ordered the same to be sent to the public store for that purpose. Due report was by the appraiser made in the first case, April 3, 1877, as follows: "Washed River Plate Wool. Class 1. Value, over 32 cents per lb. Duty 20 cents and 22 per cent. Correct." In the second case the report bears date April 10, in the same year, and is in the words following: "Washed Wool. Class 1. Value over 32 cents per lb. Duty 20 cents and 22 per cent. Correct."

All these facts are agreed to, and it is also agreed that the duties in the first case were on the 20th of April, in the same year, ascertained, liquidated and assessed in accordance with the report of the appraiser, and that the duties in the second case were ascertained, liquidated and assessed by the appraiser, April 27th, of that year, in accordance with the report of the appraiser in that case. Protests were subsequently filed by the plaintiffs in each of the cases. In the first case, the protest though bearing date April 19th, 1877, was not delivered until the 27th of the same month. They, the importers, object to the liquidation of the duties in that case because the goods are charged with double the rates of duty upon unwashed wool instead of twice the amount of such duty as the act of congress provides. Formal protest was also filed in the second case, dated May 23, 1877, in which the plaintiffs object to the liquidation of the duties in that case, because, as they, in effect, insist, the washed wool should be treated as unwashed wool, and double the aggregate duty imposed upon the unwashed wool is the correct amount of duty to which the washed wool is properly subject, under the existing act of congress. Provision is made that the decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of duties shall be final and conclusive unless the owner or importer, consignee or agent shall, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties, as well in cases entered in bond as for consumption, give notice in writing to the collector on each entry, if dissatisfied with his decision, setting forth therein distinctly and specifically the grounds of his objection thereto, and shall, within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation, appeal therefrom to the secretary of the treasury, whose decision on such appeal shall be final and conclusive. 13 Stat. 215; Rev. St. § 2931; 19 Stat. 247.

Ten days from the date of the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties are allowed for the filing of the protest, or the giving notice in writing to the collector by the importer, consignee or agent, of his dissatisfaction with the collector's decision, setting forth therein distinctly and specifically, the grounds of such objection; and the agreed statement shows that the protest in the first case was seasonably filed, and in the judgment of the court it is sufficiently distinct and specific to constitute a compliance with that requirement in the act of congress. Davies v. Arthur, 96 U. S. 758.

Certain descriptions of importations were, under the act of the 2d of March, 1867 [14 Stat. 559], divided into classes, to facilitate the ascertainment of the duty, or rate of duty, to which the articles were subjected by the provisions of that act, which classification was, to a large extent, preserved in the Revised Statutes. Wool of the first class, the value whereof, excluding certain charges, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound at the port whence exported, is subject to a duty of ten per cent. per pound, and in addition thereto, eleven per centum ad valorem; and wool of the same class, whose value, excluding charges, exceeds thirty-two cents per pound, is subject to a duty of twelve cents per pound, and in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem, the antecedent provision being that the duty upon wool of the first class, which shall be imported washed, shall be twice the amount to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed. Washed wool was imported in both of these cases, and the contest upon the merits is, whether the duties imposed by the collector were or were not correct. Both of these importations, if unwashed, were, at the time of their importation, excluding charges at Liverpool, valued at less than thirty-two cents per pound, and their value in a washed condition was somewhat more than twice the value per pound of the unwashed wool. Wools of the class mentioned, by being washed, shrink from fifty to sixty-five per cent. in weight, the dirt and grease being removed by the washing, which greatly diminishes the weight of the article, consequently the value of the pound of washed wool is somewhat more than double the value of the pound of unwashed wool of the same class. First class wool, if imported washed "shall be twice the amount of the duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed." Although the appraiser found that the value of the wools in these cases was over thirty-two cents per pound, yet it is plain that he committed an error in that regard, as the duty which he recommended in each case was twenty cents specific and twenty-two per cent. ad valorem, which is the duty imposed upon washed wool of the value of thirty-two cents per pound and less, as will be seen by doubling the rates charged upon unwashed wool of that valuation. Twenty cents specific duty and twenty-two per cent. ad valorem is just double the duty imposed on unwashed wool of the first class, when of the value of thirty-two cents and less, excluding charges at the last port or place whence exported. Grant the value of the wool imported was thirty-two cents or less, then it is clear that the collector in ascertaining and liquidating the amount, doubled the rates imposed by law upon unwashed wool of the same class, which is the theory assumed by both parties in this controversy. Viewed in that light the United States contend that the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties were correct and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover any thing, because they fail to show that they paid to the collector any excess beyond what the law imposed. On the other hand the plaintiffs contend that the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties were erroneous; that the collector should first have computed the amount of the duties which the law would impose on the number of pounds of unwashed wool and then have doubled that amount. Opposed to that it is contended by the United States that double the rates of duty in such a case, and twice the amount of the duty, are the same thing, which cannot be sustained, if it be meant by the proposition that the two methods of computation will produce the same aggregate result. Nor can the theory of the plaintiffs be sustained, as the agreed facts show that the unwashed wool, by being washed, shrinks from fifty to sixty-five per cent., which is sufficient to show that the construction of the provision assumed by the plaintiff cannot be correct. Instead of that, the exact, literal meaning of the phrase would be approached much more nearly by adding the amount of the shrinkage of unwashed wool to the number of pounds of washed wool imported, and computing the duty at twice the amount of the duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed. If the amount of the shrinkage could be ascertained in every case, the theory suggested would work out the correct result; but it cannot be admitted that congress intended that it should be the duty of the collector in every case to ascertain how much the shrinkage of the unwashed wool was when it was converted into washed wool, before he could estimate and liquidate the duties upon the goods imported as washed wool. Congress never intended that such a construction should be adopted, as it would impose upon the collector the duty of making an inquiry which he could rarely, if ever, answer; and it is equally clear that congress never intended to adopt the theory of the plaintiffs, as that would leave fifty per cent. or more of the goods imported, duty free or without any customs taxation whatever. "Twice the amount of the duty to which it would be subjected, if imported unwashed," are the words of the act, and in the judgment of the court the rule of computation adopted by the collector is the only one of a practicable character which can be adopted consistent with the language of the provision. Customs taxation is usually by rates of duty specific or ad valorem, or by both, as in this case; and if the language had been twice the aggregate sum imposed upon a like amount of goods the case would have been clear, but the language is "twice the amount of the duty," which may well be construed to mean twice the duty upon the pound of washed wool to which the importation would be subjected if imported unwashed. Judgment must therefore be for the defendant in the first case.

Enough appears in the statement of the case to show that the protest in the second case was not filed in season to constitute a compliance with the act of congress, to which reference has already been made. 13 Stat. 215; Rev. St. § 293. Neither party controverts that proposition, if the ten days be computed from the original ascertainment and liquidation of the duties, but the plaintiffs insist there may be and is a subsequent ascertainment and liquidation of duties where the entry is for warehousing, and that if any subsequent protest is filed within ten days from such subsequent ascertainment and liquidation of the duties, the protest is seasonable. Nothing of the kind is provided for in the acts of congress. Nor can any such inference be drawn from the provision, which is that the decision of the collector as to the rate and amount of duties, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, shall be final and conclusive, unless the owner, importer, consignee or agent shall, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs give notice in writing to the collector, on each entry, if dissatisfied with his decision, setting forth therein distinctly and specifically the grounds of his objection thereto. Appeal, if any, must be taken within thirty days from that ascertainment and liquidation of the duties, and the same proceedings take place in respect to the entry and the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties, whether the entry is for warehousing or for consumption.

Usually the boarding officer, as before remarked, boards the vessel on her arrival, and obtains the manifest and delivers it to the collector; but if the boarding officer does not perform that duty, then the act of congress makes it the duty of the master to deliver the manifest to the collector within twenty-four hours after the arrival of the vessel, and to make formal entry of the vessel within forty-eight hours after the vessel arrives in port. On the arrival of the vessel the consignee, owner or agent is required to make an entry of the cargo, either for consumption or for warehousing, and to produce the bill or bills of lading, together with the invoice duly certified, setting forth the quantity, quality and general description of the merchandise. Where the entry is for consumption, an estimate of the amount of the duties appearing to be due, is made from the quantity and description given in the invoice; and, if the person making the entry deposits the estimated amount of the duties so appearing to be due, a permit is then issued to deliver the cargo after the quantities are ascertained, the invoice being at the same time sent to the appraiser with the request endorsed on its face to "examine and classify the merchandise, and to report thereon;" and at the same time the surveyor is requested to ascertain and report quantities. Step by step the same proceedings are had in the case of merchandise entered for warehousing, except that in lieu of a deposit covering the estimated amount of the duties, a bond is taken in the penal sum of double the amount of the duties appearing to be due by the invoice. Formal entry is required in both cases, and in both cases the duties are ascertained and liquidated on the receipt by the collector, of the appraiser's report in relation to classification and rate, and the surveyor's report in relation to quantity. No other appraisement takes place unless the party making the entry, or the collector, is dissatisfied with the appraisement, in which event the collector may order another appraisement by the local appraisers, or by the principal appraiser, or by three merchants. Alterations are sometimes made by the second appraisers, but when the duties are ascertained and liquidated, the importer, if dissatisfied with the decision of the collector, has ten days from the date of such ascertainment and liquidation in which to enter his protest, and may appeal to the secretary of the treasury within thirty days from the same date. Withdrawals of parcels of merchandise where the entry is for warehousing, may be made at any time pursuant to the treasury regulations, but there is no act of congress providing for any other ascertainment and liquidation of the duties, nor for any other protest or appeal. When the entry is made the duties are estimated by the collector for the purpose of fixing the amount of the required deposit or bond, but the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties follows the action of the appraiser and that of the surveyor, unless the importer augments the value or quantity, or both, in the entry. The estimation of duties for the purpose of fixing the amount of the deposit in case the entry is for consumption, or of the bond in case the entry is for warehousing, is always made from the value and quantities specified in the invoice, but it is a mere estimate, and should never be confounded with the subsequent ascertainment and liquidation of the duties. Attempt is made in argument to support the opposite theory from Mr. Justice Strong, in an opinion given by him in the supreme court. Westray v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 322.

Four points were decided in that case: 1. That the collector is under no obligation to give notice to the importer of the liquidation of duties on imported merchandise. 2. That the right of the importer to complain or appeal begins with the date of the liquidation, whenever that is made. 3. That the warehouse bond is a bond given to secure the payment of whatever duties may be by law chargeable upon the merchandise to which it refers. 4. That the obligor can only be relieved from the penalty by the payment of all the duties, to secure which he gave the bond.

Beyond that there is nothing in the opinion which controls the present case. In the course of the opinion the judge points out very clearly the difference between the estimate of duties made to fix the amount of the deposit or the amount of the bond, and the subsequent ascertainment and liquidation of the duties which mark the date from which the ten days allowed for protest begin to run. It is clear from that opinion that the limitation of the right to complain or appeal, commences with the date of the liquidation, and that the collector is not required to give notice when the liquidation takes place. Nor is there any thing in that opinion in the judgment of the court here which gives any sanction to the theory that the collector must make a new liquidation of duties every time the importer withdraws from the warehouse any portion of the imported goods. Such a theory, if accepted, would prove to be very inconvenient, and would increase the duties of the collector's office beyond what the present force in those offices could perform, but the better answer to the proposition is that there is no act of congress which authorizes any such proceeding. Apply the rules here suggested and it is clear that the defendant is also entitled to judgment in the second case.

Judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 4,983.

FOSTER v. SIMMONS.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 316.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1806.

SLAVERY—IMPORTATION INTO WASHINGTON.

An importation of a slave from the county of Alexandria, into the county of Washington, is an importation into the state of Maryland, within the meaning of the act of 1796, c. 67, as adopted by congress on the twenty-seventh of February, 1801.

Petition for freedom on the ground that the petitioner [William Foster, a negro] was born and on 27th of February, 1801, resided in that part of the District of Columbia which was ceded by Virginia to the United States, with Mr. Chapman, his owner, who sold him to Mr. Payne, who sold him to the defendant [William Simmons] in Washington county, in this District, and sent him to the defendant, from the county of Alexandria, into this county. By the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801 (2 Stat. 103), it is enacted that the laws of Maryland, as they then existed, should continue in force in that part of the District which was ceded by that state. And the act of Maryland, 1796, c. 67, was then in force, by which it is enacted "that it shall not be lawful to import or bring into this state, by land or water any negro, mulatto, or other slave for sale or to reside in this state; and any person brought into this state as a slave contrary to this act, if a slave before, shall thereupon cease to be the property of the person so importing, &c., and shall be free."

Mr. Caldwell, for defendant, moved the court to instruct the jury, that if they should find that on the twenty-seventh of February, eighteen hundred and one, the petitioner resided with, or under the authority of his master in Alexandria, his master had a right to send him into the county of Washington, and the petitioner did not thereby gain his freedom.

Mr. Mason, on the same side, contended that all locality as states ceased as to the two parts of the District at the time of the transfer of jurisdiction by the two states to the United States. That a law for the forfeiture of property ought to be construed strictly in favor of the property in the master. That neither the letter nor spirit of the act of Maryland has been violated. That the defendant has not brought a slave into the state of Maryland.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Hiort, for petitioner, contended, that as the law in Washington county was to continue as it was before the twenty-seventh of February, eighteen hundred and one, and as the law before that day, in the county of Washington, was, that no slave could be lawfully imported into that county, the law is the same yet, and that a bringing from Alexandria county to Washington is the same as from Virginia to Maryland. If this adopted law is to be construed so strictly, there is no limitation to importation of slaves, even directly from Africa. The act of congress of the third of May, 1802, c. 52, § 7 (2 Stat. 193), only authorizes slaves to be brought from Virginia and Maryland into the District as they might before the twenty-seventh of February, 1801. That is, Virginia slaves may be brought into Alexandria county, and Maryland slaves into Washington county, but it does not authorize the bringing of slaves from Virginia into Maryland, nor from Maryland into Virginia. Lacy carried Lee's slaves from Alexandria to Georgetown, and the court decided it was a carrying out of the state of Virginia, within the meaning of the act of assembly of Virginia of the 25th of January, 1798, p. 374, §§ 6, 7.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused the instruction, saying that they must take the whole act, or no part of it. If this construction be not given to the statute, there is no law to prevent the importation of slaves into the District of Columbia. It was the intention of congress to continue in force in this part of the District all the laws as they then existed.

[2 Woodb. & M. 217; 10 Law Rep. 32; 16 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 602.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1846.

EQUITY JURISDICTION—REMEDY AT LAW — FRAUD IN SALE OF PROMISSORY NOTE—AUTHORITY OF SPECIAL AGENT TO BIND PRINCIPAL.

1. A complainant in chancery, residing in another state, but in the same circuit, cannot be required to furnish security for costs, except at the first term.

2. When redress is sought in chancery, it cannot be granted in the courts of the United States, however it may be in England, or in the states, if the redress is in every way as full and appropriate at law. This objection may be taken on demurrer, when it appears on the face of the bill, but is not too late at the hearing, if after an answer no disclosure is obtained.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq. 10 Law Rep. 32, contains only a partial report.]

[Cited in Hathaway v. Roach, Case No. 6,213; Almy v. Wilbur, Id. 256.]

3. An averment of fraud in the sale of a promissory note, and a request for a discovery of facts accompanying the sale, furnish sufficient ground for jurisdiction in chancery, and the proceedings once properly begun there, will be continued, when important facts are thus disclosed, and the subject in controversy is one proper for chancery, as well as a court of law.

4. An expression of belief, by the vendor of a note, that the maker is responsible, is equivalent to an assertion that he is so, if meant to be so understood, and if made with knowledge that he was not responsible.

5. Where the vendor receives valuable property for such note, and no payment is made for part of the price except in the note, the owner of the property is entitled to recover that part, or damages equal to it, if the signer of the note was worthless, and so known to be by the vendor of the note.

6. A special agent has no power to go beyond what is confided to him, in making a trade, so as to bind his principal by any contract he thus makes, but is liable for himself. Yet a contract made by such an agent, by means of false and fraudulent assertions, is void, and may be rescinded or damages given in a suit against the principal, if the latter received the benefits and proceeds of it.

7. Quaere. If notes are sold, which are worthless, and the purchaser does not specially agree to take the risk, whether he may not recover the consideration paid for them.

This was a bill in equity, alleging that the plaintiffs [Samuel J. Foster and others] about the 5th of August, 1842, sold to the defendant [John H. Swasey] through his agent, T. George, a certain quantity of lumber, and received in part payment thereof, a draft on the defendant, and, for the residue, a note, dated July 23, 1842, for $910, made by M. M. Rice, of Brighton, to E. Rice, and by him indorsed, payable in four months at the Suffolk Bank. It further averred, that the note has never been paid; that the drawer and indorser were insolvent, and, when sending the note to his agent, the defendant knew the same to be worthless, and that he obtained it without consideration. That the note was represented by the agent to them to be good, and thus the defendant "committed a gross fraud on them, and he ought in equity to pay to your orators the whole amount of the said note, with interest and damages therefor." A disclosure was also asked as to certain facts material in the case, and, after being made, a decree was requested for such other relief as the case and equity may require. The answer denies, that the defendant became possessed of the note, except for a valuable consideration. It admits the sending of it to George, as his agent, to sell for lumber, and that it was sold to the plaintiffs, and the balance for the lumber paid in a draft on him and Boynton, a partner, but denies that he authorized George to state the note was good, or that he did so state, but merely referred the plaintiffs to others for their responsibility, and avers that the plaintiffs made inquiry as to it, and relied on their own information so obtained. It alleges further, that his letter to George concerning the sale of the note, was not shown to the plaintiffs before the sale, or in any way used at the sale; nor was he known to the plaintiffs as the owner, except by inference from the draft for the balance being made on himself and partner. That the maker and indorser were not then insolvent; that he believes there was a valuable consideration for the note between them; that in September, 1842, E. Rice conveyed his farm to E. Rice, Jr., but still resides on it, and the sale was not bona fide; that neither he nor his agent intended any fraud in the sale of the note; that he wrote a letter to the latter inclosing it, similar to the one set forth in the bill, about August 5, 1842; that one George Miller brought this note to him July 26, 1842, and he advanced $200 on that and two notes of G. Winthrop, for $267.46 each, to be repaid in ten days, or said notes kept and their proceeds applied to a debt of almost $3,000 then due from Miller to them; that M. M. Rice was a frequent borrower of money; that another note of his was pledged to him about the same time in a like manner, payable at a future day, and that he made frequent loans to him before the date of this transaction, but none since. There was much contradictory evidence in the case as to the reputed solvency of the indorser and maker when the note was sold, though they themselves both swore to their want of ability then to pay, and to their failure in business before the note became due. The letter of the defendant, inclosing the note to George to be sold, promised five per cent. commission, if selling it for lumber, and offered to put a few hundred dollars with it to get rid of it, and said others had stated the Rices were good, and some at Bangor knew them, and added, "I think the note good." It desired secrecy as to himself. Some of the rest of the testimony is referred to in the opinion, when found to be important. In this case, before the argument on the merits, but after the close of the pleadings and publication of the evidence, the defendant moved that the plaintiff, being resident abroad, should furnish security for cost.

T. P. Chandler, for plaintiff.
Allwyn & Paine, for defendant.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The motion is refused, because it is so late. The place of the plaintiff's residence appears in the bill, and was known several terms ago. 1 Daniels, Eq. Prac. 56, 41; 3 Johns. Ch. 520. The motion, therefore, should have been made before so much cost was incurred, and the case ready for a hearing. A motion of this kind, too, is granted only when the party is a resident abroad. Newl. Ch. Pr. 410. Cases exist where being resident in Ireland or Scotland has been regarded as abroad for this purpose. But those countries are under distinct judicial tribunals, and in some respects under different laws; while in this case the plaintiff resides, not out of the United States, nor even out of this circuit, but in the state of Maine. I think it would, at this late day in the case, and under the circumstances of his living within this circuit, be unjustifiable to require him to furnish security as coming either within our practice or that of England. The 44th rule provides, if the plaintiff lives without the state, the defendant may require security for cost, if moving it at the first term. But the motion is not made in season to come within this rule, and being founded only on the general practice in chancery, must by that be refused.

At a subsequent day in the term, after the argument in chief on the case, the following opinion on the merits was delivered by—

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. This case is one of some difficulty as to entertaining jurisdiction over it in equity, and as to the real merits between the parties. There is enough alleged to give jurisdiction prima facie, by averring fraud on the part of the defendant, in selling or delivering the note in part payment to the plaintiffs for this lumber, and asking for a discovery of certain material facts under oath, in order to support the charge. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. c. 6; 6 Ves. 182; 7 Johns. Ch. 201. But after having obtained all the plaintiffs could by way of discovery, it is difficult to see much in the relief requested from the supposed fraud, that could not be given at law. See cases in Pierpont v. Fowle [Case No. 11,152]. In such cases in England, a court of equity will proceed further, and complete the inquiries, or will send the parties to law, when the jurisdiction is there concurrent and the remedy ample, according as to its discretion may seem proper. See cases in Pierpont v. Fowle [supra]. Here, under the 16th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 82], it has sometimes been held, that a like course will be pursued. Bean v. Smith [Case No. 1,174]; [Boyce v. Grundy] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 215; [Herbert v. Wren] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 370. While at other times it has been held, that the case cannot proceed in equity at all, if the power is concurrent in the whole matter at law, and the relief is as full and as good in all respects. Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 89; Baker v. Biddle [Case No. 764]; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 91, 194. I have been inclined to the latter opinion; and hence would not proceed to sustain jurisdiction longer in equity than to obtain the disclosure, as has been done here already, if it was not as well settled in my judgment, that having once obtained jurisdiction of a case, in equity on proper grounds, and what remains to be done being still a proper subject for equity, it is taken out of the operation of the 16th section of the judiciary act.

The court in equity may, in such a case, proceed to finish it, if deemed expedient, and if a good ground in equity is set out, rather than send the parties to new actions and longer delays in the courts of law. Warner v. Daniels [Case No. 17,181], and cases there cited; [Hepburn v. Dunlop] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 197; Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 619; [Pratt v. Law] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 493. An additional reason for continuing to act in equity here is, that some of the material facts have been obtained by the disclosure, and in rescinding the contract for fraud, if void, some conditions may be imposed as to the return of the note, which could not be at law. The time of taking this objection is also excepted to; but, as remarked in the case just cited, of Pierpont v. Fowle, it need not be by demurrer, unless appearing on the face of the bill; and where a disclosure is asked as here, the court should in no case send it to law till after the answer and disclosure are completed in equity. Continuing, then, to sustain jurisdiction over this case, it once having been proper for a discovery, and still being a matter of fraud to be decided, over which the general jurisdiction of a court of equity is clear, the next inquiry is, whether the facts disclosed in connection with the other proof, show the defendant to have been guilty of fraud in disposing of this note.

What was said and done at the time of the sale is the first test. The defendant was not then present, but did the business by an agent. What that agent said and did, will not bind him, it is argued, as he was a special agent for this business alone, and acting under a written authority, which gave him no direction to make false representations, or to bind his employer by any warranties or affirmations. It is true, that such is the general rule in cases of that character. 5 Johns. Ch. 247; Raymond v. Crown & E. Mills, 2 Metc. [Mass.] 324. It is, therefore, that such an agent is himself liable to a suit in that case. Pasley v. Freeman, 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 51. But this principle relates to the power of such an agent to enter into a contract for his principal, and to bind him by express stipulation. For, at the same time that this principle thus applies, it is well settled, that if an agent, in making a sale of an article, commits a fraud or states falsehoods as to material facts, which are relied on, it exposes the sale to be avoided. The theory is not, in such case, that he binds his employer by any engagement which he is not empowered to make, but that his employer cannot take the benefit of his sales without taking the burthen of them, and that he must repudiate the whole, and not merely a part, where all was dependent and united. That if he does not choose to ratify the whole, he must ratify nothing connected and interwoven; and that the fraud or falsehood, if bad at all, is bad for the whole, and restores the parties to the condition in which they stood before it happened. Doggett v. Emerson [Case No. 3,960]; Mason v. Crosby [Id. 9,234]. The employer of an unfaithful agent is to suffer by his misconduct generally, rather than his victim. Hence, in this case, if the agent did at the sale what he was not authorized to do, and it amounts to a falsehood or fraud, and the defendant repudiates it, he must repudiate the matter or engagement to which it related, and restore things to the position in which they would otherwise have stood. What did the agent here do? He either bought the lumber for the note and draft, or bought the lumber and agreed to pay for it in the note and draft. In either event, if the statements as to the note were deceptive, so as to avoid the sale or the payment, the amount to be refunded would be the same. It would not be the course here, if the sale was void, to rescind the sale, and restore the lumber on the one hand and the note and draft on the other. Because the lumber has, doubtless, been sold and worked up, and the draft converted into money, and the relief would rather be to give damages to the amount for which the note was received, and order the latter to be returned. So if the sale of the lumber was good, but the payment, so far as regards the draft, void, because accompanied by deception, then the relief would be, the further payment of a sum equal in amount to the note.

It is of no consequence, therefore, under which aspect it is regarded. But the difficult and doubtful question is, whether the agent was in fact guilty of deception. He denies any. The answer, also, from the information and belief of the defendant, denies any under oath. And the letter sent with the note does not expressly direct any misrepresentation to be made, and the agent swears that none was made; but that the plaintiffs were merely referred to others for information. On the other hand, the force of these matters is some weakened by the circumstance, that the respondent was not present, and hence could not know personally what took place, and that the agent is in a position impairing his credibility. Story, Ag. § 131; 1 Metc. [Mass.] 201. Beside this, there is the positive testimony of the clerk, that the agent represented the maker and indorser to be good. There is the admission of George, the agent, also, that he showed the defendant's letter to the plaintiffs at the sale, in which he states, "I think the note is good." Fraud may consist in asserting a belief as well as asserting a fact. Indeed, asserting a belief is asserting the fact of belief, and if it is done with a design to mislead, it is fraudulent. Stebbins v. Eddy [Case No. 13,342].

There are numerous circumstances, also, soon to be particularized, showing the defendant to have placed little confidence in the goodness of the note; and the distance to which it was sent for sale, and the secrecy as to the name of the owner, and the length of time the note run, with an intermediate failure of the parties to it, and the number of other like notes in the market, known to the defendant, and much discredited; lead the mind strongly to a conviction, that the defendant did not then believe the note to be good, or that it would be ever paid; and that the agent understood from the letter of the defendant that the note was to be got rid of, even at the hazard of paying more money with it; and of stating the opinion of others as of the defendant to be, that "the note was good." Allow me to repeat, as the contrary view seems to have been much relied on, that it was of no consequence whether this was flung into the form of an opinion, or assertion by Swasey or George, if it was meant to impress and did impress on the minds of the plaintiffs, convictions that the note was good, when in truth, they had sufficient reason to believe it never would be paid. [Smith v. Richards] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 36. Indeed, the letter of the defendant being shown to the plaintiffs by the agent, contains enough from the defendant himself to deceive and mislead, as to the goodness of the note, beside the oath of the clerk to the assertion of the agent, also, that it was good. The whole letter is tantamount to an assertion by the defendant himself, that the note was good; and all this was done when the current of circumstances is strong, that he knew and felt convinced to the contrary. Because: Firstly. Why should the defendant want to sell it for boards, if it was good? He was a grocer and a man of substance, and could well wait till it became due, rather than take lumber. Secondly. Why should he pretend in the letter, that he wished to realize the money on it earlier than the day, as a reason for selling, when he paid out on the draft $908 in money, in order to realize only $910 on the note? The gain in money to use was $2 only, till the lumber was converted into money, and out of that and other funds was to be paid freight of the lumber also from Bangor to Boston. Thirdly. How could he expect to sell for $910 what he advanced only $200 on, aided by other notes of more than $500 in amount, provided the purchasers were not in some way misled? How could he, if they were dealt fairly by, and knew as much as he did of the Rices and their condition—he who told some witnesses before in August, the note was worthless, not worth the paper it was written on? Fourthly. Why did he write, but for this wish, to be concealed in the business, when done at such a distance from his partner? and why did he not indorse the note, if he did not desire to get it off without giving his responsibility? and why not give his responsibility if the note was really believed to be good? or why did not his agent do it when asked? and why after all this, did he say, "I think the note good," if he did not mean to have it reported as the opinion of one like himself, having the best means of judgment? and why give so large commissions for selling it, if not wishing to get rid of a bad note? Fifthly. How could he say likewise, that he thought the note good, when nobody at Boston would advance over $200 on it, and other notes united? when he knew several other notes of like tenor of the same parties to be in the market at a low credit, apparently "made to sell," when the same parties were otherwise indebted much to him? when they were in broker's hands? when one of them had then failed? when the other had made a conveyance of his property as early as June, 1842? and, though not known to all then, a person so much connected with them as the defendant, probably knew the fact before or as early as the sale of this note, August 5, 1842? The elder Rice testifies the business of the conveyance was done openly, and the son took possession of part of the property in June, 1842; and Swasey told Veazy he knew it in July, and Goding swears he knew it within three weeks of its taking place.

To doubt, after all this, that the Rices were both then insolvent, as they both swear, and were likely to be, when the note fell due, as both went into bankruptcy before, and their notes were pledged as early as the date of this for less than one fourth their face; and to doubt that this was the impression among money dealers like the defendant, as he knew no more than one fourth could then be raised on them, is not reasonable. There may be purchases or sales of notes without recourse, and this without fraud; and then the rule applies, caveat emptor. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 147–149, 204–212; 2 Kent, Comm. 482, 491; Salem India Rubber Co. v. Adams, 23 Pick. 256. The defendant's not having indorsed this note, is some evidence of such a sale here, and exonerates him from liability on the note himself as a party to it. Chit. Bills, 244; 6 Barn. & C. 373; 9 Dowl. & R. 391; 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 759. But it still leaves him responsible for the property or money given for the note in either of three events. One is, if the notes paid over or sold were bank notes or bankers' drafts, which pass as money, and were then worthless, the promissors having previously failed. 2 Hill, 509; Chit. Bills, 244–246; 7 Durn. & E. [7 Term R.] 65; 8 Yerg. 175; 10 Ves. 204; 8 Durn. & E. [8 Term R.] 40; 11 Wend. 9. Though once the rule was different, if they were paid over when the debt was incurred. Id.; 12 Mod. 203; 6 Barn. & C. 373. Another is, if they were promissory notes, which the seller knew to be worthless. Fenn v. Harrison, 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 759. Lord Kenyon said it was like sending out a counter, instead of current coin. Another, though more doubtful, is, that if without such knowledge, notes or drafts on individuals are not specially agreed to be taken at the risk of the purchaser, the loss will not fall on him. Ex parte Blackburne, 10 Ves. 204; Jones v. Ryde, 1 Marsh. 157–159. But if he agrees to take the risk, he must, if nothing indicates fraud or knowledge, and it is an honest exchange. Chit. Bills, 246, and cases. When it is questionable what the agreement or knowledge was, it seems more just to require a good payment for a good consideration. There are, then, several equitable grounds made out in this case for a recovery, with considerable strength of evidence, but some of them more satisfactorily than others. One is, that the defendant has received valuable property of the plaintiff, for which he has not paid in full, except by a worthless note, which it is doubtful whether the plaintiff agreed to take at his own risk. Another is, that it was passed to the plaintiff by the defendant's agent, under circumstances rendering it probable that the defendant knew and believed the note to be worthless. And finally, the evidence is quite strong, that false representations were made by the defendant as to the note being good, which were communicated to the plaintiff by his agent, and which led to the purchase.

It is satisfactory to reflect, also, in support of the equity of this conclusion, that the defendant will lose nothing by it, as he will have the benefit of his note against the Rices if they be good, since it must be restored to him; and will be obliged merely to pay, for aught which appears, a fair market price for the lumber he got, merely making up now the part which was paid in worthless paper, like that which is counterfeit, or on a broken bank. The man who circulates such a discredited note as this, should suffer by it, rather than a credulous and innocent receiver. I have not gone into the question, as to this note being an accommodation one, and without consideration (4 Johns. Ch. 128; 7 Wend. 5677), because, in the hands of third persons without notice, like the plaintiffs, and before due, that circumstance would be no defence. Let the decree be entered, that there was fraud as to the note in controversy, when sold in part payment for the lumber, and that it be restored to the defendant on his paying the amount for which it was taken by the plaintiff with interest since, and which amount and interest he is decreed to pay.

A question as to costs was afterwards made, which is not deemed of sufficient importance to be reported.

Case No. 4,985.

FOSTER et al. v. SWASEY et al.

[3 Woodb. & M. 364.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1847.

BANKS AND BANKING—SERVICE OF TRUSTEE PROCESS—PAYMENT TO DEPOSITOR—ENTRY OF BANK'S BOOKS.

A bank, the teller of which, on the day of, but before, the service on it of a trustee process against a depositor, had paid the depositor's check to a larger amount than his deposit, was held not to be chargeable as trustee, though the payment was not entered on its books till some days subsequent.

This was an action of debt on a judgment [by Samuel J. Foster and others against John H. Swasey and the Atlantic Bank, as trustee]. The writ was sued out on the 4th day of August, 1847, and served the same day on the trustees. The latter disclosed that, previous to the 4th of August the defendant Swasey had in deposit in their bank a balance of about $1,500. That he then drew a check for about $2,500, in favor of a third person, on the bank, which was presented and paid before the 4th of August by the teller, but not entered on the books till the 7th of August, when the excess of the check was paid to the teller by Swasey. The bank further stated, by their cashier, in answer to interrogations by the plaintiffs, that the teller had no authority to pay from the funds of the bank more than the drawer of a check has on deposit, and if he does it by accident or knowingly, and it is repaid in a few days, the entry is not usually made on the books till then. If the drawer does not soon repay it, the bank has the right to charge the excess or difference to the teller. The question whether the bank could be considered chargeable as trustee of Swasey or not, was argued by Mr. Andrew and T. P. Chandler, for plaintiffs.

Clark & Bigelow, for the bank.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. There are two grounds on which the bank is entitled to a discharge in this case. 1st. The draft on them by Swasey for the amount on hand, and even more, may properly be considered as an assignment of that balance to the drawee. It is a direction to pay it to him, probably being a third person, and is, therefore, good for the amount, though asking a still larger sum to be paid to him. The excess does not vitiate it for what is good. It is a valid transfer of all he has a right to. Notice of it was given to the bank before the service of the trustee action, and the money was actually paid over in conformity to the order or assignment. Because the teller chooses to pay over a still greater sum does not affect the rightful payment of the amount due, looking to the transaction as an assignment and a payment under it. 2dly. If the holder of the check is regarded as an agent or representative of Swasey, then it would seem that a payment had been actually made to him of all the balance held by the bank before the institution of this suit. In this view, whether the draft was nominally in favor of Swasey himself or not, would be immaterial. A depositor has the right to withdraw the balance of his deposits in favor of himself whenever he pleases. And if doing it before this suit, then Swasey had no money or effects in the hands of the bank when the writ was served. If there was any collusion or fraud or conditions attached to the draft or the payment, to the extent of the true balance, it should be made to appear in the answers; and interrogatories to draw out that fact should have been put, and probably would have been, if any foundation was supposed really to exist in favor of such a hypothesis.

Something has been said in the argument as to the want of legal power in the teller to pay over the amount of the whole draft. But however that may have been, he and the bank were both bound to pay on it the balance due; and his payment to this extent was legal and authorized. This settles the question as to that, and it is only that which is sought to be reached by this action. Indeed, if it was necessary to pass on the validity of the payment of the whole as regards the bank, I have little doubt it was a valid payment, both as regards the bank and the holder of the draft. Being done by the agent of the bank and from the funds of the bank, without notice shown of any objection made to the holder of the draft, it is an admission by the bank and the teller, its agent for this purpose, that Swasey, the drawer, had funds there to that amount, or at least funds and credit, which induced them to honor the whole draft. The payment, therefore, as between the bank and the holder, was valid for the whole, and could not be ripped up. The remedy by the bank for the excess was good against both the teller and Swasey; against the former on his violated bond, and against the latter for money paid for him to the extent of the excess. 1 Hall, 78. In the case of Menard v. Cox, 7 La. 167, the teller informed the holder that the drawer had not funds, and hence the money was paid by the teller, rather than the bank; and he, and not the bank, could sue the drawer for the amount, it being advanced by the teller, rather than the bank, for the amount and the benefit of the drawer. 7 Har. & J. 381; 1 Hall, 78.

There is no ground on which the creditors of Swasey could rightfully complain of what was done in this case by the bank or the teller, unless they were actually misled by the transaction not being entered on the books till the 7th of August. If between the payment to the holder and the entry of it on the books, the plaintiff, as a creditor of Swasey, had inquired at the bank, and not been told of the payment, and had seen or been informed of the balance standing to Swasey's credit, then some ground would have existed to say they had been injured or misled by the transaction, though then it is doubtful whether, in law, the payment would not be a good one, if made, in point of fact, before the service, and done bona fide. But the bank would, in that event, be entitled to no cost on account of the suit, caused by their neglect to disclose all the facts to the plaintiffs. Nothing of this kind, however, is shown to have happened here; no such inquiries and no such neglect to give full information. When the truth of the money having been actually paid over, and not of its being entered on the books the same hour, day or week is the test of the bank having or not having money on hand after the payment, it seems of little importance when the entry is made on the books, if nobody is misled by the delay to do it. District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1867.

PRACTICE—BONDING GOODS SEIZED IN WAREHOUSE—VALUATION—DUTIES.

Where goods which had been entered for warehouse were libelled by the United States as forfeited, and were attached by the marshal under the process while still in warehouse, and the owners filed a claim to them, and presented a petition to the court praying that the goods be appraised at their cash value, less the duties, that they might be bonded in accordance with the eighty-ninth section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 696): Held, that the practice of giving the bond in such cases, in the amount of the value of the property, less the duties, is correct, and will continue to be the practice of this court till overruled by superior authority. The case of U. S. v. Segars [Case No. 16,249] commented on.

[Disapproved in U. S. v. 12,347 Bags of Sugar, Case No. 16,555. Approved in U. S. v. Three Horses, Id. 16,500. Cited in U. S. v. 1,291 Bales of Tobacco, Id. 15,965.]

This was a petition by Sarasin & Co., of Basle, Switzerland, the owners and claimants of the goods proceeded against in this suit [viz. four cases of silk ribbons, marked S. & C. 1208, 1210, 1211, 1213], praying for an order that the goods be appraised at their cash value in the city of New York, less the duties legally chargeable thereon; and that, upon filing such appraisement and a certificate from the collector and naval officer of the port of New York, that the duties on the goods have been paid, or secured to be paid, the goods be delivered to the claimants, on their executing to the United States a bond, with sureties, according to the statute in such case made and provided.

The goods were imported in August, 1866, and entered for warehouse under the acts of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. 53), March 28, 1854 (10 Stat. 270), and March 14, 1866 (14 Stat. 8). The general provisions of those acts are, that goods entered for warehouse may remain in warehouse, under bond, for a limited time, without the payment of duties, subject to withdrawal for consumption on payment of duties, and to withdrawal for reexportation without payment of duties. The bond under which the goods are warehoused, is a bond to secure the proper duties and expenses, to be ascertained on the entry for warehousing. Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 12, as amended by Act Aug. 6, 1846, § 1 (9 Stat. 53). In the present case, such bond was given. Afterward, and in October, 1866, the goods, while still in warehouse, were seized by the collector as forfeited, under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of May 28, 1830 (4 Stat. 410), and the first section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 737). A libel of information was filed by the United States, and the goods were attached by the marshal, and were in his custody. A claim to the goods had been filed by the petitioners.

This application was founded on the eighty-ninth section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 696), which provides that, on the prayer of any claimant of goods so seized and prosecuted, for their delivery to him, the goods shall be appraised; and if, on the return of the appraisement, "the claimant shall, with one or more sureties, to be approved of by the court, execute a bond in the usual form to the United States, for the payment of a sum equal to the sum at which the * * * goods * * * so prayed to be delivered are appraised, and moreover, produce a certificate from the collector of the district * * * and of the naval officer thereof, if any there be, that the duties on the goods * * * so claimed have been paid or secured in like manner as if the goods * * * had been legally entered, the court shall by rule order such * * * goods * * * to be delivered to the said claimant." The statute merely provides that the goods shall be appraised, and that the bond shall provide for the payment of a sum equal to the sum at which the goods are appraised. The claimants insisted that the court should order the goods to be appraised at their cash value in the city of New York, less the duties legally chargeable thereon; and that the bond should be a bond for the payment only of such cash value, less such duties. The district attorney, representing the government, insisted that the goods should be appraised at their cash value in New York, without any deduction of such duties, and that the bond should be given accordingly. The question to be determined by the court was, which was the proper course of procedure.

It was made known to the court, that under instructions from the treasury department, the officers of the customs had been, for about six months previous, requiring appraisements and bonds, in cases like the present one, for the value of the goods, without any deduction of the duties. Such procedure was said to be generally acquiesced in by the claimants of property seized, but the present application was brought before the court for the purpose of obtaining an adjudication as to the correct practice.

S. G. Courtney, Dist. Atty., and Thomas Simons, for the United States.

Sidney Webster, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This question has heretofore been presented to this court in at least two cases, in which orders for bonding were made in accordance with the views urged by the claimants. One of the cases was that of U. S. v. 1,406 Boxes of Sugar [Case No. 15,959], marked "L. V. H. & Co.," in which, February 25th, 1862, an order was made by this court (Judge Betts), that the property be bonded at its market value, less the duties. But no minutes of any argument of the question before the court and no written opinion are found. The second case referred to was that of U. S. v. 1,382 Hogsheads of Sugar [Id. 15,962], in which, March 22d, 1862, an order was made by Judge Betts, that the goods seized be bonded by the claimant at their appraised value in this market, exclusive of the duties. In an opinion delivered in this court, by Judge Smalley, in that case, in June, 1862, on a motion made by the United States to set aside an order releasing the goods from custody, it is stated that the question decided by Judge Betts, by the order of March 22d, 1862, was argued before him, and that, after full consideration, he held that the bond should be for the value, less the duties. But in that case, as in the other, no minutes of the argument of the question before Judge Betts are found, nor does the subject appear to have been disposed of by him in a written opinion. The motion before Judge Smalley in the case, turned upon other points than the one now presented for consideration. This court is, therefore, now asked to review the subject, and settle the course of practice for this district.

Under the acts on which the libel in this case is founded, the penalty imposed is the forfeiture of the goods. If the goods are not warehoused, but are entered for consumption and the duties on them are paid, and they are, when seized, in the hands of the importer, he loses, if the goods are forfeited, the duties which he has paid, and the goods also. As the duties on the goods have been paid, those duties enter as an element into the value of the goods at the time of their seizure; and the government, in availing itself of the provisions of the ninetieth section of the act of March 2, 1799, in case the goods are condemned and not delivered on bond to a claimant, and selling the goods at auction to the highest bidder, receives the market value of the goods, of which value the duties form a part. The government receives just what the importer loses. If, after the government, under such circumstances, seizes the goods for forfeiture, they are bonded at their market value, then, in case they are condemned, the government receives and the importer loses the same amount as if they were not bonded, that is, the duties which have been paid, and the value of the goods in market, into which value the duties enter as a constituent part.

If the duties on the goods have not been paid, and the goods are, when seized, in warehouse under the warehousing acts, with a bond to secure the duties, the property is in a very different situation from that which it is in when it is not warehoused, but is seized in the hands of the importer, after a consumption entry and after the payment of duties. The interpretation uniformly given to the eighty-ninth section of the act of March 2, 1799, is that the sum at which the property seized is to be appraised is its value as of the time and place of seizure. The theory is, that the government is entitled, on a forfeiture and condemnation, to the value of the property as it stood at the time of the seizure—at the time it thus came into the hands of the government. When the property is not warehoused, but is seized after a consumption entry, and after the duties on it have been paid, and is then condemned, this theory is carried out by causing the importer to lose and the government to receive, either by sale of the property, or by a suit on the bond given to procure its release after arrest, what was its value as it came into the possession of the government at the time of its seizure. It is true that, under such circumstances, the government receives, on the consumption entry, the duties on the property, and that afterward those duties enter into the price or value which the government receives for the property, after it is condemned; and thus, according to a form of speech, the government may be said to receive, and the importer to pay, the amount of the duties twice. But this is a fallacy. The duties are first paid as duties on the consumption entry, and then the property becomes part of the common stock of the country, and enters into its markets, and has a merchantable value, composed of all the elements which go to make up such value, such as cost of manufacture, freight, commissions, duties, mercantile profit, and other items. That value it is, which, when the property is seized under such a state of facts, passes from the importer to the government; and the importer necessarily loses the duties he has paid, and the money value of the property, which otherwise would have gone into his own pocket—no more and no less. But when the property is in warehouse, under a bond to secure the duties, it is there subject to withdrawal for consumption on payment of duties, or to withdrawal for re-exportation without payment of duties. If seized while so in warehouse, it has, at the time of seizure, a value composed of very different elements, so far as the question now under consideration is concerned, from those which compose its value when it is not in warehouse, but is seized in the hands of its importer, after a consumption entry and after the payment of duties. If sold by the importer while so in warehouse under bond, the duties do not form an element of its price or value. The purchaser pays to the importer the value of the property, not including any duties, and afterward pays the duties on withdrawing the property for consumption, or re-exports it without paying duties. The property cannot, while in warehouse under bond for the duties, be put into market for consumption, so as to have the duties enter as an element into its value; and if it is withdrawn for re-exportation, the duties can never enter into its value in any market in this country under its existing importation. These views show, that when property in warehouse under bond for duties is seized, the duties form no part of its value at the time it is seized. Now, applying the remedies which the law gives to the government to this state of facts, these consequences follow. If the government enforces the forfeiture, and the property is not released on bond, but is sold, the government receives for it, by putting it into market, a price into which the duties enter as a component part (the property, when sold, being put into competition with other property of the same kind which has paid duties), and thus the government receives not only what was the value of the property to the importer at the time of the seizure, but also an additional value representing the amount of duties. Thus, the government virtually receives the duties on the property, and also its value at the time of seizure. It receives what the importer ought to lose, namely, the value of the property to the importer at the time of its seizure; and it also practically receives the duties, by receiving the same price for the property which it would bring if it had paid duties. It also claims the right to enforce against the importer the bond for duties given on the entry for warehouse. If it should be allowed to enforce that bond, then, in such case, as in the case where the property was condemned and sold on being seized while not in warehouse, but while in the hands of the importer, after a consumption entry and after the payment of duties, it would seem to receive the amount of the duties twice. But this again is specious. The bond for duties given by the importer, if enforceable, would be enforced by reason of the voluntary act of the importer in giving it. The transaction of giving such bond, and any rights of the government under it, are separate and distinct from the rights acquired by the government by virtue of any fraud which justifies the seizure of the property. As to what the government receives as representing duties when it sells the property in market, it receives that as an incident of sovereignty. The property has virtually been imported by the government itself, and it has the right to put it into the market, and all it receives for it, as representing duties on like property, is clear gain. But such gain arises from the principle that the government pays no duties on articles imported by itself. If the government imports property which is afterward sold by it, it receives on the sale a price into which the amount of duties on like property, when imported by an individual, enters as a constituent part, and the gain thereby accruing to the government is an inherent incident of its sovereign right. But, although the course of proceeding in the case of a sale on forfeiture where the goods are in warehouse under bond, may bear the semblance of giving to the government the amount of the duties on the property twice, in addition to the value of the property to the importer at the time of its seizure, yet the importer loses nothing but what was the value to him of the property at that time; and, if the bond given by him for the duties is enforced, he loses those also.

At this stage comes up the question now presented for decision. If the property proceeded against in this suit is released on a bond such as the government insists on—namely, a bond for the value of the property when seized, including the duties—and the property is condemned in the suit, the government will receive, under such bond, not only the value of the property to the importer at the time of seizure, but also an additional value, representing the amount of the duties; and, besides that, it will receive the duties imposed by the collector, in case the goods are withdrawn for consumption. It will thus receive, in all, just what it would receive in case the property were condemned and sold, on its seizure while not in warehouse, but while in the hands of the importer, after a consumption entry, and after the payment of duties. And it will not receive that full amount, if a bond for the value less the duties, is given. But it has been already shown that the warehousing system introduces a change, to the full benefits of which the importer is entitled. Where the property is not warehoused, the government receives the duties; and if it afterwards seizes and condemns the property, it receives its full market value. If the property is warehoused, and then seized, condemned, and sold, without being delivered to the claimant on bond, the government acquires the title to the property, and sells it in like manner as if it had itself imported it. But in case such a bond as the government claims to receive in the present case is given, the importer will, as we have seen, lose, if the property is condemned in the suit, not only what was the value to him of the property, in warehouse, at the time of its seizure, but, in addition, a sum equal to the amount of the duties legally chargeable thereon; and if, after thus bonding the property, he withdraws it for consumption, he must pay the duties on it in cash to the collector, notwithstanding the amount of them has been included in such delivery bond. He will thus, in case of a condemnation, lose more than he would if the property were not delivered to him on bond, but were to remain in the hands of the government, and be sold by it. In each case, the same offence is charged and has been committed, for which the property is forfeited. In each case the property is in warehouse, under bond for the duties. The merchandise is equally guilty in each case; but, if the claimant seeks to avail himself of the privilege of bonding his property when it is seized while in warehouse, he cannot do so, according to the views urged by the government, without imposing upon himself a liability, in case the property is condemned, which he will not incur if he leaves the property in the hands of the government. Such a result is opposed to the spirit and intent of the eighty-ninth section of the act of March 2, 1799. One of the principal points involved in the case before referred to, decided by Judge Smalley, was, whether the bonding system, provided for cases of seizure by the eighty-ninth section of that act, applied to property seized while in warehouse. He decided that it did so apply, and that it was the intention of congress that the merchant should have the full benefits and advantages of the warehousing system. To require from him such a bond as the government claims, would be to deprive him practically of the benefit of bonding warehoused property seized and prosecuted while in warehouse. But if the property is delivered to the claimant on a bond for its value when seized, not including the duties, then, if the property is condemned in the suit, the importer will lose the same amount as if he had not bonded the property, and no more; and will thus have the full benefit of the privileges of the warehouse system, and the full benefit of the system of bonding provided by the eighty-ninth section of the act of 1799.

It is claimed by the government that this view is contrary to the decision of Judge Cadwalader, in the district court of Philadelphia, in the case of U. S. v. Segars [Case No. 16,249]. It does not appear, in the report of that case, that the property seized was in warehouse. The question before the court for decision, as stated in the opinion, was whether the amount of regular duties payable on the property, if legally entered, was to be deducted by the appraisers in ascertaining the value for which the delivery bond should be given; or, in other words, whether, in case of condemnation, the claimant should lose the amount of those duties, as well as the value of the property forfeited. The court does not, in its opinion, allude to the warehousing acts, or discuss the question in reference to property seized while in warehouse. It lays down the principle, that if the property is to be delivered to the claimant, on substituting for it a bond, under the eighty-ninth section of the act of 1799, that bond should be a substitute for the full value of the property. Such full value the court, in that case, held to be the market value, without a deduction of the amount of the duties. Where property is seized in the hands of the importer, after a consumption entry, and after the duties are paid, the full value of the property to the importer, at the time of the seizure, necessarily includes the duties, as we have seen. But where property in warehouse under bond for duties is seized, the full value of the property to the importer at the time of seizure does not include the duties. The delivery bond is intended to be a substitute for the full value of the property to the importer at the time of seizure, and for nothing more.

Uniformity of principle and equal justice to the importer in all cases of seizure can be carried out only by varying the basis of appraisement in the manner indicated, in cases of delivery bonds on seizures of property in warehouse. It is said by Judge Cadwalader, in his opinion, that the circumstance that the duties have not been paid when the proceeding to forfeit the property is instituted, is, in reason, attended with no difference in favor of the importer. That is very true. But it is equally true that the circumstance that he has availed himself of the provisions of the warehousing acts, and given a bond for the duties, instead of paying them, ought not to work a difference against him. Such a difference is manifestly worked if he is compelled, as a condition of obtaining a release of his property from seizure, to give such a bond as the government claims in this case.

While I regret to seem to differ from so experienced and able a jurist as Judge Cadwalader, I am satisfied, after thorough reflection, that the principle laid down by Judge Betts, and always adhered to by him, in regard to the amount of the bond to be required in cases of seizures and prosecutions for forfeiture of property in warehouse under bond for duties, was correct. Such will continue to be the ruling of this court in like cases, until varied by superior authority.

The prayer of the petition is granted.

District Court, S. D. New York. April 27, 1869.

INFORMER—INTERNAL REVENUE ACTS—GOVERNMENT OFFICER.

Where an inspector of internal revenue at Philadelphia, appointed under the fifth section of the act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 224], made researches there as to sales of tobacco made by merchants at New York to customers in Philadelphia, which researches were embraced within his duties as such inspector, and were discharged in co-operation with, and under the direction of, officers of the internal revenue at New York: Held, that information so obtained by him never became, as against the United States, his private property, so as to allow him any discretion as to withholding it from his superior officers, and that he was not entitled to share as informer in forfeitures resulting from violations of the internal revenue law which he thus discovered, and of which he gave information.

[Cited in U. S. v. Chassell, Case No. 14,789; U. S. v. Two Hundred and Seventy-Eight Barrels of Distilled Spirits, Id. 16,581; U. S. v. Simons, 7 Fed. 714.]

A. J. Vanderpoel, for Payne.

B. K. Phelps, for Michener.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case, an order of reference was made to a commissioner, in August, 1868, to ascertain and report who is the informer in this case, entitled to share, as such, in the sum of $21,558.44, now in the registry of this court for distribution. The contest has proceeded before the commissioner between one Michener and one Payne, and a large mass of testimony has been taken before him on the part of those parties respectively, each of them claiming, as against the other, that he is entitled as informer. The United States do not seem, by the minutes of testimony taken by the commissioner, to have been represented before him on the reference, and the witnesses produced by each claimant were cross-examined only on the part of the other claimant, and not on the part of the United States. It was, therefore, very naturally and properly assumed by the commissioner, that the United States regarded the one or the other of the claimants, at all events, as entitled to share, as informer, in the funds, and that his duty was limited to the inquiry, as matter of fact, into the question as to who, within the language of the 179th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 305), as amended by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 145), first informed of the cause, matter or thing whereby the forfeiture in this case was incurred. That forfeiture is one incurred under the internal revenue acts of the United States. The commissioner has reported that Michener was the sole informer in this case. Payne has filed five exceptions to this report: (1) Because Michener is found to be the sole informer; (2) because Michener is found to be an informer; (3) because Payne is not found to be the informer; (4) because Payne is not found to be the sole informer; (5) because certain testimony offered by Payne before the commissioner was excluded by him. The questions arising on these exceptions have been argued before the court by the counsel for Michener and Payne respectively, the United States not being represented. The counsel for Payne, however, in fact argued on the part of the United States, by contending, that, independently of the question of Payne's rights as informer, Michener could not, in any event, share as informer, even though he should be found to be, as matter of fact, the person who, within the 179th section of the act of 1864, first informed of the cause, matter or thing whereby the forfeiture was incurred.

I have examined the evidence in this case with care, and am of opinion that Payne was not the person who, within the 179th section, first informed of the cause, matter or thing whereby the forfeiture in this case was incurred; and that Michener was the person, and the only person, who, as against Payne and all other persons, except the United States, first informed of such cause, matter or thing. I also think that the commissioner properly excluded the evidence named in the fifth exception. As respects Payne, therefore, and the exceptions taken by him, all of them are disallowed. But I think that Michener, although in fact the first informer, as against Payne and all other persons, is not entitled, as informer, to any share in the moneys to be distributed in this case. If I were inclined to a different opinion, I should, under the circumstances of this case, give an opportunity to the United States to be heard on the question, through their attorney, but that now becomes unnecessary.

It appears, that, during the whole period covered by the acts of Michener, on which he relies as constituting him informer, he was a revenue inspector at Philadelphia, appointed by the secretary of the treasury under the authority of the 5th section of the act of June 30, 1864; and that it was a part of his official duty to make the investigations and do the acts on which he relies. The property seized was forfeited and condemned for violations of the internal revenue laws, committed in New York by the firm of Alexander Ross & Co., in the manufacture and sale of tobacco. The researches and investigations made by Michener at Philadelphia, which place was his post of duty, were in reference to sales of articles made of tobacco by Ross & Co to customers of theirs at Philadelphia. Such duties were discharged by Michener in co-operation with, and under the direction of, officers of the internal revenue at New York. The duties of an inspector, as defined by the 5th section of the act of June 30, 1864, are, the "proper enforcement of the internal revenue laws" and the "detection of frauds." The duties performed by Michener in this case were strictly duties of that character. The same section confers on an inspector the power of examining persons, books and premises, as may be necessary in the discharge of the duties of his office. In the present case, he examined and investigated in Philadelphia, to detect frauds committed by tobacco manufacturers in New York. But that was as much a part of his official duty as if the manufacturers had carried on their manufactory and committed the frauds in Philadelphia, and in the assessment district in and for which Michener was appointed. In discharging duties of this character, the whole time and services of Michener belonged to the United States, for the per diem compensation fixed by the said 5th section. All information acquired by Michener in the discharge of those duties, became, ipso facto, the property of the United States. Such information never became, as against the United States, the private property of Michener, so as to allow to him any discretion as to communicating it to or withholding it from his superior officers. That is the test. Information possessed by a private individual, holding no official relation to the United States, and bound by no official duty to disclose such information to his superiors, may be withheld or disclosed by him, as he elects. If he is the first to disclose it, he may become an informer under the law. But a person whose duty it is to disclose information, and who violates such duty if he does not disclose it, cannot be an informer. The information is, in judgment of law, disclosed to the United States, by being possessed by him as an officer of the United States charged with the duty of procuring the information, the moment he obtains the information. Undoubtedly, congress may, if they choose, award to an officer, under such circumstances, a share, as informer, in the proceeds of forfeitures; and if the language of the 179th section of the act of 1864 were such as to require or admit, in its proper construction, the including of Michener in its description of informers, I should so hold. But the language of that section is, that the informer's share is to be to the use of the person who shall first inform of the cause, matter or thing whereby the fine, penalty or forfeiture has been incurred. Who is to be first informed? The statute is silent. But it must necessarily mean, that the person to be first informed is a person whose duty it is, on behalf of the United States, to receive the information and impart it to his superior officers. That was, in this case, the duty of Michener. But it was equally his duty to procure and impart the information; and he cannot be treated as an informer, for having ascertained the facts in question and imparted them to himself. Nor can he be treated as an informer because he imparted them to another or a superior officer; because, if, in this case, any other person besides Michener himself be regarded as the proper person to be first informed, so as to give to the communicator of the information the position of informer under the statute, we cannot stop short of the highest officer, the secretary of the treasury or the president, as the only proper recipient of the information, and the person who first informed such highest officer would be entitled as informer. Under the 91st section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 697), the informer is required to be a person who gives to a collector information in pursuance of which a fine, penalty or forfeiture is recovered, and may be any person other than the naval officer or surveyor of the district. Under that section, it was very properly held, by Judge Ware, in the district court for Maine, —Hooper v. Fifty-one Casks of Brandy [Case No. 6,674],—that an inspector of the customs could be an informer. But, under that act, the information was required to be given to the collector. If that language had not been used in that act, it would have been difficult for the court to say, as it did, that congress had offered to the inspectors an additional compensation beyond their regular stipend, and that they came within the words of the act. Under the 179th section of the act of 1864, the words "first inform," in order to warrant the treating of Michener as an informer, in this case, must be read as if they were written "first learn," or "first ascertain." But that is not the language. The import of the words "first inform" is, that the information is to be imparted by one person to another and a different person; that the latter person is to be one whose official duty it is to act on such information by imparting it to his superior officers, or otherwise; that he cannot obtain such information in the course of the discharge of his official duty, and impart it to himself, so as to make himself an informer under the law; and that the person who is to impart the information, so as to be informer, must be a person who has imposed upon him no official duty to impart the information. There is no principle which would put Michener in the position of informer, in this case, for what he did, which would not also require the court to regard Mr. Harvey, the inspector in New York, who received the information from Michener, as an informer in the case, because he was the first to inform Collector Bailey, who seized the property; and it would be difficult to say that Mr. Harvey and Michener would not, each of them, be entitled to the same share as the other. These views are substantially those held by Judge Lowell, in the district court for Massachusetts, in the case of U. S. v. One Hundred Barrels Distilled Spirits [Case No. 15,946].

There must, therefore, be a distribution of the money in court in this case, without any reference to the claims of either Payne or Michener, as informer.

FOUR HUNDRED AND SIX HOGSHEADS OF MOLASSES.

[4 Blatchf. 319.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 17, 1859.

CHARTER PARTY—CONSTRUCTION OF BILL OF LADING GIVEN BY MASTER FOR GOODS PURCHASED BY CHARTERER—SPECIFIED FREIGHT.

Where a vessel was chartered to G. by a charter party, for a specified sum, for a voyage to Cuba and return, and G., at Cuba, loaded the vessel with molasses which he bought there from P., but the purchase was not absolute, the transfer of title to the molasses depending on the payment of drafts drawn by P. on G., and the molasses was shipped in the name of P., and a bill of lading was signed therefor by the master, which stated that the cargo was to be delivered to the order of P., at a specified rate of freight, to be paid by him or his assigns, but contained at its foot the words, "without prejudice to charter party," and afterwards R. advanced, on the security of the bill of lading, the money to take up the drafts, and took an assignment of the bill of lading: Held, on a libel filed by the owner of the vessel against the molasses, for the charter money, that the molasses was liable only for the freight specified in the bill of lading.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, to recover freight under a charter party, entered into between one Townsend, agent and part owner of the vessel, and the firm of T. R. Gordon & Co., for a voyage from Savannah, Georgia, to Matanzas, Cuba, and back to the port of New York. The charterers were to load the ship with a cargo of yellow pine timber at Savannah, and with such return cargo as they might think fit, and were to pay for the vessel, for the voyage, $3,400. The cargo of yellow pine was taken on board, and delivered at Matanzas to the firm of C. E. Poujaud & Co., of that place, agents of the charterers. A return cargo of molasses was taken on board, T. R. Gordon, one of the charterers, being present, and, on the arrival of the vessel at New York, she was reported by the master to Gordon. A bill of lading was signed by the master at Matanzas, from which it appeared that the molasses was shipped by C. E. Poujaud & Co., to be delivered at New York to their own order, they or their assigns paying freight at the rate of $2.50 for every 110 gallons. At the bottom of the bill of lading were the words, "without prejudice to charter party." The house of D. Curtis & Co., correspondents of C. E. Poujaud & Co., received, early in May, 1857, advices from the latter concerning the cargo, together with a copy of the bill of lading, which was dated the 25th of April previous. With the bill of lading they received drafts of C. E. Poujaud & Co. on T. R. Gordon & Co., the charterers, for the price of the molasses, payable at 60 days' sight. D. Curtis & Co. received the amount of the drafts, deducting the discount for the time they had to run, from T. R. Gordon & Co., and endorsed the bill of lading, and delivered it to that house. It appeared, from the proofs in the case, that T. R. Gordon & Co. were unable to raise the money for the price of the molasses, and that they applied to the claimants, Reid & Nash, who advanced the money, and took an assignment of the bill of lading as their security. They claimed to have the goods delivered to them, on payment of the stipulated freight in the bill of lading, and that they were not bound to pay the amount due on the charter party. The district court decreed for the libellants, for the full amount of the charter money [case unreported], and the claimants appealed to this court.

Welcome R. Beebe, for libellants.
James N. Platt, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It is quite clear that the purchase of the molasses by the firm of T. R. Gordon & Co., at Matanzas, was not absolute, so as to vest the title, legal or beneficial, in it; and that the transfer of title depended upon the payment of the drafts at New York. The molasses was shipped in the name of the vendors, and bills of lading were taken in the usual way, and the bills of lading, drafts, &c., were forwarded to their correspondents, to close the transaction. Reid & Nash advanced the purchase money, on the security of the bills of lading, and the cargo of molasses became subject to this advance. There can be no claim, therefore, upon the cargo, for the payment of the charter money, founded upon the idea that the molasses belonged to the charterers. This brings the case down to the question as to the effect to be given to the words at the foot of the bill of lading, "without prejudice to charter party." On the part of the libellants it is insisted, that these words should be construed as qualifying the price of the freight stipulated in the bill of lading, and as subjecting the shipper to the payment of the charter money, though that should exceed the specified freight. On the part of the claimants it is insisted, that these words were intended only to guard against any waiver of the charter money, as between the charterers and the owner. I am inclined to adopt the latter view.

The bill of lading contains the contract between the shipper and the master, and in it the latter stipulates to carry the cargo at a fixed rate; and it appears to me, that if he intended to qualify the contract in respect to the rate of the freight, he should have used more specific terms than those relied on. The shipper was specially interested in the matter of freight, as it was to be paid by him or his agent on the arrival of the cargo; and it is quite clear that he had a right to enter into this particular contract for the freight, without regard to the charter party. In the case of Heckscher v. McCrea, 24 Wend. 304, it was held, that if the charterer had no cargo at the place stipulated in the charter party, the master was bound to take cargo offered by others, sign bills of lading therefor, and credit the proceeds of the freight to the charterer, and look to the charter party for any balance. The master may have had this rule of law in view when he consented to enter into the special contract of affreightment irrespective of the terms in the charter. Even if the charter party contained a clause hypothecating the cargo for the freight (which it does not), it would be difficult to maintain the position that the consent by the master to ship the goods of a third party for a specific freight, differing from that in the charter party, should not be binding between the parties.

It was insisted, on the argument, that there was some collusion between Reid & Nash and T. R. Gordon, with a view to evade the lien or liability of the cargo for the charter money. I am not satisfied that the evidence in the case supports any such conclusion; but, if it did, the question here is solely between the shippers (C. E. Poujaud & Co.) and the owner, as the former were bound to pay the freight; and, if the cargo is liable for the balance of the charter money, instead of the price specified in the bill of lading, the loss would fall on them. At least, this is the necessary conclusion from the terms of the bill of lading, and there is nothing in the proofs tending to contradict it.

Upon the whole, after the best consideration I have been able to give to the case, I think that the decree below should be reversed, with costs, and a decree be entered charging only the freight specified in the bill of lading; and, as this was tendered, this decree must be entered without costs.

Circuit Court, D. Nevada. Nov. 8, 1876.

PATENT TO MINING CLAIM — WHO ENTITLED TO — PRE-EMPTION — DEFENSES IN ABATEMENT AND ON MERITS — SEVERAL DEFENSES IN SAME ANSWER—ESTOPPELS MUTUAL—JUDGMENT TECHNICALLY CORRECT REVERSED—PARTIAL NEW TRIAL —STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS AND MINING CLAIMS — PAROL PARTITION — TENANTS IN COMMON — OUSTER—TITLE UNDER STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS —TITLE QUIETED.

1. Under the act of congress of 1866 (14 Stat. 251), the right to purchase a mining claim to a gold or silver-bearing lode, and to receive a patent therefor from the United States, was granted to the person, or association of persons, who, in pursuance of the laws of the state or territory, and the mining customs, rules and regulations of the place embracing the location, recognized and enforced by the courts, is the owner, and entitled to the possession, as against everybody except the United States.

[Cited in Trafton v. Nougues, Case No. 14,134.]

2. The right given is simply a right of purchase, and is in the nature of a pre-emption right, founded upon like principles as the pre-emption laws; and not a right similar or analogous to that of a grantee under an inchoate or imperfect Mexican grant.

3. Under the statute of Nevada authorizing the defendant to set up in his answer as many defenses as he has, if an answer contains a defense which only goes to defeat the present action and other defenses on the merits, and the issues as to both are in fact found for defendant, but the judgment is apparently entered for defendant upon the finding upon the merits, the matter upon the merits will be res adjudicata, and the parties will be estopped from further litigating the merits, even though the issue upon the matter of abatement is also found in favor of defendant, and the judgment might have been rested on that issue.

4. In such case, where all the issues are in fact specially found in favor of the defendant, and judgment entered thereon generally, without any provision that it shall be without prejudice, or without any other limitation or restriction, the estoppel will extend to every matter of fact in issue, and in fact found by the court in favor of the defendant.

[Cited in Stubblefield v. Menzies, 11 Fed. 273.]

5. Where the statute authorizes the defendant to set up in the same answer as many defenses as he has, and several defenses are set up, it is competent for the court to determine them all, without reference to the character of the different defenses, and where all are in fact determined, the determination as to all will be conclusive between the parties.

6. When the findings and judgment in a given case are conclusive on both parties if conclusive on one, the estoppel is mutual within the meaning of the rule requiring estoppels to be mutual.

7. Where a judgment is broader in its scope, and more advantageous to a party than he is entitled to have, it will be reversed or modified, although upon the record it appears to be technically correct.

8. A judgment which would operate as an estoppel upon points that manifestly ought not to be concluded, will be reversed, although there is no technical error shown by the record.

9. A new trial may be granted, under the practice in Nevada, upon some issues without disturbing the findings upon other issues, and in such cases the judgment would not necessarily be reversed if the remaining findings not vacated are sufficient to sustain the judgment. The judgment in such case may be reversed, modified or affirmed, as justice may require; but there would be no estoppel as to the matter embraced in the finding vacated.

10. The statute of limitations of Nevada relating to mining claims constitutes a part of the local laws by which the rights of parties are to be determined for the purpose of ascertaining who is entitled to purchase a part of a mineral lode under the act of July 26, 1866.

11. A parol partition executed by the parties taking actual exclusive possession of the portions respectively assigned to them in pursuance of the agreement to partition, which possession and partition are acquiesced in by the parties is valid; and upon such a partition the parties cease to be tenants in common.

[Cited in Kinney v. Consolidated Virginia Min. Co., Case No. 7,827.]

12. One tenant in common may oust his cotenant, and claim adversely, thereby setting the statute of limitations in motion, and from the time of such actual ouster and adverse possession, they deal at arms length, and there is no longer any relation of trust or confidence between them.

13. Adverse possession for the time limited by statutes of limitations not only bars the remedy, but extinguishes the right and vests a perfect title in the adverse holder.

14. A title acquired under a statute of limitations will be quieted in the adverse holder on a bill in equity filed for that purpose, even against the holder of the paper title barred.

The facts as alleged in the bill are as follows: On June 23, 1859, John Cosser and Walter Cosser, under the firm name of Cosser & Co., J. Morris, J. Durgan, Thomas Winters, V. A. Houseworth, C. True, J. Powell and A. Ricard located and appropriated, in the manner prescribed by the mining rules on the Comstock lode, a mining claim of 1,600 feet in length on the lode; took possession of the same, and thereby, as tenants in common, became the owners of said claim, as against all the world, except the United States. In July, 1859, the said parties, while still in possession, by a verbal agreement, to which all assented, agreed that said mining claim should be segregated into two parts, and that said Durgan, Morris, Powell, Ricard and True should thenceforth, as tenants in common own and possess exclusively the portion of said claim and lode extending from its northern boundary southerly a distance of 420 feet, and should release all their interest in the other portion of said claim and lode to said Winters, Crosser & Co. and Houseworth, who should own and possess, in the same manner, said southern portion of said claim and lode, and release to said first-named parties all their interest in said northern portion of 420 feet. In pursuance of said agreement a monument was placed to mark the division line and the parties took possession of their respective portions, Durgan and his associates taking possession of the northern part, and Winters and his associates of the southern part, and thenceforth each of said parties and their successors in interest exclusively held possession and improved the part so allotted to them, in accordance with the mining rules and regulations, and claimed no interest in the other portions of said claim or lode. No written conveyance was ever made in pursuance of said agreement, and no demand for one was ever made, except the demand for the purposes of this action. All the right, title and interest of said Durgan and his associates in said north 420 feet of said lode were subsequently, by sundry mesne conveyances, conveyed to the complainant, a corporation organized under the laws of Nevada. Between the segregation, as aforesaid, and January 1, 1864, said Durgan and associates had spent in prospecting and developing said mine not less than $30,000, and since the latter date the 420 Mining Company has for like purposes spent an additional sum of $30,000. The Bullion Mining Company, a corporation organized under the laws of California, has since acquired all the right, title and interest of said Winters and his associates in the southern portion of said lode, and has since held the same in accordance with the mining rules and regulations. On November 16, 1868, the Bullion Mining Company commenced an action in the proper court against the 420 Mining Company, to recover said northern 420 feet of said lode, alleging title in plaintiff, and wrongful possession and withholding by defendant. Defendant answered, admitting possession by defendant, but denying that the possession was wrongful. This action was voluntarily dismissed on plaintiff's motion without trial, on June 3, 1872, without notice to the defendant to the action. On November 6, 1868, while the 420 Mining Company is alleged to have been in possession of said northern 420 feet of said lode, the Bullion Mining Company applied at the proper land office for a patent, embracing the whole of said claim, both the southern part and said northern 420 feet conveyed to the 420 Mining Company, being the part now in controversy, under the act of congress entitled, "An act to grant the right of way to ditch and canal-owners and for other purposes," approved July 26, 1866, and in pursuance of such application a patent embracing the whole of said claim on the Comstock lode was issued in due form to said Bullion Mining Company on March 26, 1875. It is alleged in the bill that the said application for a patent was based solely on the said location, made June 23, 1859, and that the only pretense of title to said part in controversy is a conveyance to the Bullion Mining Company of their interest therein by said Durgan and his associates, made subsequently to the said conveyance by the same parties to the 420 Mining Company, with a knowledge at the time on the part of the Bullion Mining Company, of the prior conveyance to the 420 Mining Company. On November 30, 1872, the 420 Mining Company commenced an action in the proper court in the state of Nevada against the Bullion Mining Company, to determine the adverse right of the latter company to said 420 feet of said lode, which action was duly tried and a judgment therein duly entered, and a copy of the record in that suit is annexed to, and made a part of, the bill of complaint in the present action. It is further alleged that by reason of the issue of the patent, as aforesaid, the legal title to said northern 420 feet of said lode became wrongfully vested in the defendant; but, that by reason of the facts alleged, the complainant was really the owner of said 420 feet of mining ground, and entitled under said act of congress to the patent therefor. The bill thereupon prays that the complainant be decreed to be entitled to said mining ground; that the defendant holds the legal title in trust for complainant, and that it may be required to convey said 420 feet of said lode to complainant.

The complaint in the record of the said action of the 420 Mining Company against the Bullion Mining Company commenced November 29, 1872, to determine the adverse claim of the latter, attached to and made a part of the bill, alleges that the 420 Mining Company, complainant therein, is "the owner of, in possession of, and entitled to the possession of," the said 420 feet of the Comstock lode now in controversy; that the Bullion Mining Company, defendant therein, "claims an estate or interest therein adverse to the plaintiff," and denies the validity of such adverse claim. It then sets out the commencement of the said former action by defendant against complainant to recover possession of said 420 feet; the answer of defendant denying the right; the application of defendant in this action for a patent; the filing of protest by complainant; the subsequent dismissal of the action to recover possession by complainant in that action (defendant in this) without notice to the defendant therein that the right has never been determined between the parties; and praying that the Bullion Mining Company, defendant, may be required to set forth its claim; that the rights of the parties be determined by the court, and that the defendant, the Bullion Mining Company, be adjudged not to have any estate or interest in said mining ground, etc. The answer to said complaint denies the ownership of the complainant, its right of possession and its actual possession of said 420 feet, or any part thereof, at the time of the commencement of the action. It denies that the defendant's claim is without right, and then affirmatively avers that "at the date of the commencement of this action, and for a long time prior thereto, it was and still is the owner of, and in possession of, and entitled to the possession of, said mining ground, ledge, or lode, and every part thereof." It then alleges affirmatively, in appropriate terms, an adverse possession in the defendant of the said 420 feet of the Comstock lode for a period exceeding the time required to give a title under the statute of limitations of Nevada in cases of mining claims; and that during all of said time the defendant had held and worked such claim in the manner required by the laws and customs in force in the district in respect to such claim; and then also avers affirmatively that neither the claimant nor any person under whom it holds had been seised or possessed of said 420 feet, or any part therein, within the period prescribed by the statute of limitations applicable to such cases; and further, that the alleged cause of action had not accrued within a period of four years. Upon the trial of the issues, the court found the facts to be as follows: "(1) That the plaintiff was incorporated in the state of California, on the twenty-third day of June, A. D. 1863. (2) That the trust deeds were executed to the 420 Mining Company, located in the Virginia mining district, county of Storey, territory of Nevada, the first bearing date September 30, 1863, and the second July 5, 1864, and each conveys all the right, title and interest of the parties therein named, as grantors of, in and to that certain mining ground known as the mining ground of the 420 Mining Company. No other description of the ground is given, and no title in either of the grantors to the mining ground in dispute in this action was shown. (3) That some time in the fall of 1859, a shaft was commenced on the northern end of the ground in dispute in this action, by some persons, claiming to represent a company called the 420 Company, and thereafter, down to the early part of the year 1863, work was done in three different shafts on the ground in dispute, by persons claiming to work for a company called the 420 Company. That no further work for any company of that name is shown to have done until some time in the year 1865, when some persons commenced work in a shaft on said ground, claiming to work for the 420 Company, and continued there for a short time, until ejected by the employés of the defendant, as hereafter stated. (4) That on the sixteenth day of November, 1865, the defendant in this action filed a complaint in this court against the plaintiff, alleging that it was the owner of the ground in dispute in this action, and that the defendant had entered upon and taken possession of and ousted the plaintiff from said mining ground now in dispute, and was still in possession thereof, holding adversely to the plaintiff, the Bullion Mining Company. Said complaint was sworn to by George W. Hopkins, secretary of said Bullion Mining Company.

To that complaint the defendant, the 420 Mining Company, this plaintiff, filed an answer denying specifically each allegation of the complaint, and the same was sworn to by C. J. Lansing, its attorney in the case. Said action was pending untried until the ——— day of - ——, 1872, when it was dismissed, on motion of the plaintiff therein. (5) There was no evidence showing that any location of the mining ground in dispute in this action had ever been made by the plaintiff, or any person or persons through whom it claims. (6) The defendant proved that it claimed under two locations of the ground and claim in dispute in this action. The two claims were united early in 1863, under the name of the Bullion Company, and on the eighteenth day of February, A. D. 1863, a trust deed, in which some of the original locators in each of said locations joined, was executed by various persons which conveyed, in terms, to this defendant, mining ground which embraces all the grounds in dispute in this action. (7) In August, 1860, persons commenced work on the mining ground described in finding six, under the locations therein mentioned, and continued work until the conveyance made to the defendant, as aforesaid, and defendant has continued to work thereon day and night, from that time to within a few months past, all the time claiming title to all of said mining grounds, including said ground in dispute. (8) On the seventh day of June, 1866, defendant received from one G. W. Birdsall, a deed of a mining claim, embracing the mining ground in dispute in this action. No title thereto was shown in said Birdsall, but defendant claimed title under that deed and the trust deed aforesaid. (9) That the agents of defendant, in the year 1865, forcibly ejected from the mining ground in dispute in this action the persons mentioned in finding three as working thereon for the 420 Company, and from that time until the commencement of this action, and until the trial, the defendant has been in the actual, exclusive, and uninterrupted occupation and possession of all the mining ground in dispute in the action aforesaid, claiming title thereto, and claiming the same adversely to plaintiff. As a conclusion of law, I find that the defendant is entitled to judgment as prayed in the answer, and order accordingly." Thereupon the following judgment or decree was entered: "This cause came on regularly for trial on the fifteenth day of August, A. D. 1873, and by oral consent, given in open court, a jury was waived, and the trial had by the court, and the court having heard the evidence, and the cause being subsequently submitted, the judge, this day filed his findings of fact herein in favor of the defendant. Thereupon it was ordered by the court that judgment be accordingly entered for the defendant. Wherefore, it is ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff is not entitled to any of the relief prayed for in its complaint, and that it take nothing by its action. It is further adjudged that the defendant have and recover of the plaintiff its costs of suit, taxed at $155.05. Judgment filed August 21, 1873."

The following are the provisions of the acts of congress construed by the court: Section 1 of the act of July 26, 1866 [supra], "granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands, and for other purposes," declares "mineral lands on the public domain to be free and open to exploration and occupation by all citizens of the United States," * * * "subject to such regulation as may be prescribed by law, and subject also to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same may not be in conflict with the laws of the United States." Section 2 provides that "whenever any person, or association of persons, claims a vein or lode of quartz, or other rock in place bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, or copper, having previously occupied and improved the same according to the local customs or rules of miners in the district where the same are situated, and having expended in actual labor and improvements thereon an amount of not less than $1,000, and in regard to whose possession there is no controversy or opposing claim, it shall, and may be lawful for such claimant, or association of claim ants, to file in the local land office a diagram of the same so extended laterally or otherwise, as to conform to the local laws, customs and usages of miners, and to enter such tract, and receive a patent therefor granting such mine," etc. Section 3 provides "that upon the filing of the diagram as provided in the second section of this act, and posting the same in a conspicuous place on the claim, together with a notice of in tention to apply for a patent, the register of the land office shall publish a notice of the same in a newspaper published nearest the location of said claim, and shall also post such notice in his office for the period of ninety days; and after the expiration of such period, if no adverse claim shall have been filed, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general upon application of the party, to survey the premises and make a plat thereof, indorsed with his approval, designating the number and description of the location, the value of the labor and improvements, and the character of the vein exposed; and upon the payment to the proper officer of five dollars per acre, together with the cost of such survey, plat and notice, and giving satisfactory evidence that said diagram and notice have been posted on the claim during said period of ninety days, the register of the land office shall transmit to the general land office said plat, survey and description, and a patent shall issue for the same therefor." Section 6 provides as follows: "That whenever any adverse claimant to any mine located and claimed as aforesaid, shall appear before the approval of the survey, as provided in the third section of this act, all proceedings shall be stayed until final settlement and adjudication, in the courts of competent jurisdiction, of the rights of possession to such claim, when a patent may issue as in other cases." Section 9 makes similar provision for confirming water rights under like circumstances; that is to say, "whenever by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing and other purposes have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws and decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected therein." On July 9, 1870 [16 Stat. 217], six sections were added to the act and were thenceforth to form a part of it. Similar rights under section 12 (section 1 of the new act) were extended to the possessors of placer claims; and section 13 provided that "where said person or association, they and their grantors, shall have held and worked their said claims for a period equal to the time prescribed by the statute of limitations for mining claims of the state or territory where the same may be situated, evidence of such possession and working of the claims for such period shall be sufficient to establish a right to a patent thereto under this act, in the absence of any adverse claim." In 1872 [17 Stat. 91] a new act was passed as a substitute for much of the former acts, making still more specific provisions as to the mode of proceedings, etc., but providing that the repeal of portions of former acts should not affect rights already vested thereunder, and that proceedings to perfect such vested rights might be had in pursuance of the provisions of the new act.

C. J. Hillyer, Delos Lake, and R. S. Mesick, for complainant.

M. N. Stone, John Garber, and R. H. Lloyd, for defendant.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts). Upon the facts shown by the bill of complaint, the defendant insists that the right to the 420 feet of the Comstock lode in question, and, consequently, the right to the patent, appears in the bill to have been once directly put in issue, in an action between the same parties fully litigated and determined in favor of the defendant; and that the matter is res adjudicata, and a bar to further litigation. On this ground it is claimed that the bill shows no equity. After a careful consideration of the acts of congress set out in the statement of the case, it is clear to my mind, that it was the intention of congress to give the right of purchase of a mining claim, to a silver or gold bearing lode or vein, to the person or association of persons who, in pursuance of the laws of the state or territory and the local mining customs, rules and regulations of the place where located, recognized by the laws and enforced by the courts, is the owner and entitled to the possession as against everybody except the government of the United States. It will be seen that the act expressly refers to, and recognizes, the laws of the state or territory, the local customs, rules and regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States, the decisions of the courts, and even, in express terms, the states and territorial statutes of limitation applicable to the subject. The act requires the party seeking a patent to file a diagram of the claim, and post a copy in a conspicuous place on the claim, together with a notice of intention to apply for a patent, and requires the register of the land office, also, to publish a notice of the same in a newspaper published at the nearest place, for ninety days. It then authorizes the adverse claimant, before approval of the survey, to file a protest, upon which all proceedings are stayed "until final settlement and adjudication in the courts of competent jurisdiction of the rights of possession to such claim, when a patent may issue as in other cases." That adjudication is to be had in the ordinary courts, and to be determined under the ordinary rules, regulations, customs, and laws of the locality. It seems impossible to come to any other conclusion, than that the party, who at the time can maintain his right to the claim in the courts of the country as against any person but the United States, under the local laws, customs, rules and regulations, is the party upon whom congress intended to confer the right to purchase, no matter how that right originated, if under such laws and customs and decisions of the courts he has the present right. And this is simply a right to purchase—a privilege given to the party, of which he may avail himself or not, exactly like a pre-emption law, and founded upon similar reasons and policy. And what this privilege is, is stated in the cases of Hutton v. Frisbie, 37 Cal. 479, and Frisby v. Whitney, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 191. The case is in no wise like the case of an inchoate, imperfect Spanish grant, but is in all respects like a case under the pre-emption laws. The object of a determination of the right by litigation where there is an adverse claim, is simply to ascertain the party who has the right to the claim under the laws of the state and local rules and customs; for that person, when found, is the party upon whom the law confers the privilege—the right to purchase. There is no bounty about it, for the party must pay for the land five dollars per acre and the cost of survey, which is more than double the price of ordinary public lands. Undoubtedly the price is often far less than the real value, and so it often is in ordinary pre-emption cases; but this fact in no way affects the principle upon which the law proceeds. Doubtless the object of conferring the privilege is to encourage exploration of hidden mines, as the privilege in ordinary cases of pre-emption is to encourage settlement and cultivation of the public lands, for the purpose of developing the resources, and contributing to the general prosperity of the country.

If I am right in this view—and it really does not seem open to serious argument—then, in order to ascertain which party was entitled to a patent, it is only necessary to determine which party at the time of its issue was the rightful owner of the mining claim in question, as against everybody but the United States, under the laws, rules, customs and the decisions of the courts in force at the time in the locality embracing it without regard to the act of congress; for the act of congress remits the parties to these laws, rules and customs solely to determine their rights.

The next question is, whether it appears, upon the averments of the bill, that the title to the mining claim in dispute, under the local laws and customs upon which it depends, has been once directly put in issue between the parties, and tried and determined in such manner as to become res adjudicata. If so, it ends the case. If not, it will be necessary to consider the other questions raised by the demurrer. After a thorough consideration of the question, I am unable to resist the conclusion that the title has been so put in issue, tried and determined as to become res adjudicata, and a bar to further litigation. That it was put in issue, and the facts found, there can be no doubt; and I do not understand that this proposition is controverted. But it is insisted that there was another issue, also found for defendant, upon which the judgment might have been rested, and still be correct; and that there was no occasion to pass upon the title, and no authority in the court to pass upon it; or if there was authority so to do, that it does not appear affirmatively that the judgment went upon that ground, and consequently there is no estoppel. The statute of Nevada, at the time of the commencement of the action, the record of which is made part of the bill, authorized a party in possession of land or of a mining claim to bring an action against any adverse claimant to determine his adverse claim. As that is the most favorable view for complainant, I shall assume, what the defendant denies, that the action in question was brought under, and depended upon, that provision of the statute; and that in case of a failure to prove possession at the time of the commencement of the action, the suit would necessarily fail on that ground, if on no other. The want of possession is not, strictly speaking, jurisdictional, for the court has jurisdiction to consider and determine the subject-matter. It is a technical dilatory objection in the nature of matter in abatement. It simply defeats the present action, without regard to the merits. The party out of possession, upon this view, must first bring his action to get into possession; but this would not be a complete remedy against a party claiming title adversely. A recovery of possession might be had and the defendant still set up his claim, and make it necessary for the successful party to bring another suit to determine his adverse claim, and injoin his silence, even though the first judgment might be conclusive evidence of his right on the trial of the second action. Having recovered possession, he would then be in a position to maintain his further action to obtain a complete remedy. If he brings his action to determine an adverse claim while out of possession, the most that can be said is that his action is prematurely brought, and on this appearing it would be dismissed, as it would be one valid ground of defense to this particular action. The statute has since been amended, both in Nevada and California—and in Nevada the act passed pending this action—so that a party out of possession can now, at least, maintain the action. But conceding a want of possession at the commencement of the action to be one good defense, there may be several other good defenses, and section 1112 of the Compiled Laws of Nevada provides that "the defendant may set forth by his answer as many defenses and counterclaims as he has. They shall each be separately stated," etc. Thus all defenses, whether dilatory or to the merits, may be set up in the same answer and tried together. If it is admissible to set up several defenses in one answer, it must be competent for the court to try and determine them all. The law neither injoins nor permits a vain thing to be done. But it would be doing a vain thing to set up a defense which could not be tried when set up.

It may not be necessary to dispose of all the issues, and sometimes, doubtless, all are not determined; but it is certainly admissible to do so, and if properly tried and determined, I can see no good reason for not holding every issue so properly in fact tried and determined, to be finally and conclusively determined. Suppose the judge should be entirely satisfied that defendant's title is good, and so find distinctly, on that issue, without passing at all upon the issue as to whether defendant was in possession at the commencement of the action, either because the evidence on that point left it in doubt, or because, for any reason, he preferred to rest his judgment on the defendant's title—on the real merits of the case—can there be any doubt that the matter would be res adjudicata? If he is authorized to find the issue, without passing upon the other issue, and his determination would be res adjudicata, he is certainly authorized to pass upon it in connection with the other issue, and if so determined, it must have the same force as a determination in the other mode. The question must be: "Was the issue in fact determined?" In the case before tried, the complaint of plaintiff alleged title in itself, possession at the commencement of the action, and an adverse claim on the part of the defendant, together with other matters. The defendant took issue directly on the allegation of title, and on the allegation of possession in plaintiff at the commencement of the action, but admitted making an adverse claim. Another answer, then, affirmatively alleged title in defendant itself, and as affirmative matter, also, directly alleged, in apt and proper form, an adverse possession during the period prescribed by the statute of limitations of Nevada, applicable to the subject. Thus the title of the plaintiff, his possession at the commencement of the suit, and the adverse possession of the defendant for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations to bar the action and vest the title in defendant, were each directly in issue, and each issue was in fact submitted by the parties and tried by the court without a jury. A special finding was filed, from which it appears exactly what was found, and, manifestly, all these three issues were found against the plaintiff. The court did not, in so many words, say in its finding that the plaintiff had no title, or, in so many words, that the plaintiff was not in possession at the time of the commencement of the action, but it found facts which necessarily showed that plaintiff had no title, and that defendant had title; and it found in express terms, in so many words: "That the agents of defendant, in the year 1865, forcibly ejected from the mining ground in dispute in this action, the persons mentioned in finding three, as working thereon for the 420 Company, and from that time until the commencement of this action, and until the trial, the defendant has been in the actual, exclusive and uninterrupted occupation and possession of all the mining ground in dispute in the action aforesaid, claiming title thereto, and claiming the same adversely to the plaintiff."

From the finding of the fact of adverse possession of defendant since 1865 it inferentially or argumentatively appears that the plaintiff could not have been in possession at the time of the commencement of the action. The court adds, as a conclusion of law, that the defendant is entitled to judgment, as prayed in the answer, and orders judgment accordingly. Upon these findings a judgment for the defendant, in the usual and proper form of a judgment on the merits, was entered, wherein, after reciting the filing by the judge of "his findings of the facts herein in favor of the defendant," "it is ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff is not entitled to any of the relief prayed for in the complaint, and that it take nothing by its action," and adjudged costs. This is certainly an appropriate judgment upon the finding on the issue as to adverse possession, and more appropriate to this issue than upon a finding merely against possession in the plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the action. It is not a judgment of nonsuit, or a judgment in form upon a plea in abatement, or a judgment in any manner without prejudice, but apparently and in form a judgment on the merits. As a matter of construction of the findings, and judgment, I also think it manifest that the judgment was intended by the judge to be based, and that it is based, upon the finding of adverse possession in the defendant for a period prescribed by the statute of limitations for barring the action and vesting title in the defendant, and on title in the defendant. The judge finds in express terms on that issue, and makes it the prominent finding in the case; while he does not find expressly on the issue as to the possession of plaintiff at the commencement of the suit, but omits to say anything about that distinct issue presented on the allegation of the complaint.

It is only inferentially and argumentatively that we ascertain the fact of want of possession of the plaintiff at the commencement of the suit, from the finding of adverse possession in the defendant for a period covering the date of the commencement of the suit, on the affirmative issue tendered by the defendant in setting up the statute of limitation. It is evident from this, and from the fact that the judgment is appropriate to the finding, that the judge proceeded especially upon this finding in adjudging the matter in controversy—that he intended to put his judgment upon the merits of the case and not upon the matter of abatement—or matter not touching the merits, which only defeated the present action. Suppose this ninth finding had been omitted, there would be no finding at all upon the issue as to whether the plaintiff was in possession at the commencement of the action. Or, suppose, on appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial the supreme court had reversed the order as to the ninth issue only, finding adverse possession for the period specified, on the ground that it was not supported by the evidence, there would be no other finding showing that the plaintiff was not in possession at the time of the commencement of the action, upon which the judgment could be sustained. The supreme court of Nevada, under the practice that prevails in that state, only exercises appellate jurisdiction. It could not set aside a verdict on the issue as to adverse possession, and itself investigate the question anew, and make for itself another finding that plaintiff was not in possession at a particular date—the date of the commencement of the suit—and on its own finding sustain the judgment. Non constat, that the court below would find on the evidence that there was no possession at that date, if the evidence was insufficient to show an adverse possession for the whole period found. The supreme court would, upon vacating the ninth finding, necessarily remand the case for a new trial on these issues. Had there been a tenth finding, that the plaintiff was not in possession at the time of the commencement of the action, the judgment might be sustained on that finding, upon the hypothesis I have assumed for the purpose of the argument, even upon a reversal of the ninth finding. Thus it appears that the judgment of the court must rest upon the ninth finding, which was evidently intended to be, and is, a finding on the issue of adverse possession, and only inferentially and argumentatively shows that it includes the time at which the suit commenced, but is not an express finding on that issue. The two issues are not the same, not identical, for one is broader and includes more than the other. The court found the larger issue, which, of course, includes the smaller, and the judgment is rested on the issue as found, and not upon issues not mentioned at all in the finding, and which are only worked out by inference. As a matter of construction, then, I hold that the record shows upon its face that the question of adverse possession, and, consequently, of title in the defendant, was put directly in issue, litigated and found for the defendant, and that the judgment entered is rested on that finding. But if there had been another distinct, express finding that the plaintiff was not in possession at the time of the commencement of the action, the other findings and the judgment being precisely as they now are, I still hold that the matter would be res adjudicata. As before stated, the statute of Nevada authorized the defendant to plead as many defenses as he had. He did plead several, each of which, if sustained, is good. All were tried and submitted, and the issues on the merits were expressly found in a special verdict showing that they were determined and the judgment is appropriate to the issues on the merits, and sanctions and concludes the findings which after judgment are no more open to question except on appeal. So are the authorities under the same system of practice as that which prevails in Nevada, and I have found none to the contrary. Sheldon v. Edwards, 35 N. Y. 286, is exactly in point on this proposition and on the last, but by no means so strong a case on the last proposition as is the case now under consideration. Clink v. Thurston, 47 Cal. 30, and Munson v. Munson, 30 Conn. 426, 433, 434, are also in point; although the latter is under a system of practice different from that which prevails in Nevada. See, also, on the more general question, Low v. Mussey, 41 Vt. 394; White v. Simonds, 33 Vt. 178; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Bronson, 14 Mich. 371; Bissell v. Kellogg, 60 Barb. 627; Amory v. Amory, 26 Wis. 152; Felter v. Mulliner, 2 Johns. 181; Rockwell v. Langley, 19 Pa. St. 502; Day v. Vallette, 25 Ind. 42.

But the law as stated in a recent decision of the supreme court of the United States is also in point, and if it be correct must be conclusive. In House v. Mullen, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 42, there was a demurrer to the bill on four distinct specified grounds, of which the first was misjoinder of the parties; and the fourth, that the claim is stale and barred by the statute of limitations, etc. The decree is, "that it is considered by the court that the said demurrer of the defendants be sustained. It is therefore adjudged and decreed that the said bill of complaint of Eliza House, Mary Hunter and Charles Hunter be, and the same is, hereby dismissed out of this court." On appeal, the supreme court hold that the second, third and fourth grounds of the demurrer are untenable, and in those particulars the bill is good; but that the bill is bad on the first ground for misjoinder of parties, and that the "demurrer therefore was properly sustained and the bill dismissed." Id. 46. But, says the court, the record does not show that the bill was dismissed for misjoinder of parties, and it is not dismissed "without prejudice." "There are grounds stated in the demurrer which would, if sustained, be a bar to any other suit, to wit: staleness of the claim, statute of limitations, and long acquiescence in the possession and claim of title by the defendants. It does not appear by the decree, or by the order sustaining the demurrer, on which of the grounds set out in the latter it was dismissed, or on what ground it was dismissed. As the record stands, this decree might be pleaded successfully as a bar to any other suit brought by Eliza House, or by Mary Hunter, her child, in assertion of her right to this lot, though we are of opinion that the only defect in the bill is that it shows no interest in Mary Hunter, while it does show a good cause for equitable relief on the part of Eliza House. If the decree had dismissed the bill without prejudice, or had stated as the ground of dismissal the misjoinder of the parties, or the want of interest in two of them, we would have affirmed it; but to prevent a great injustice we must reverse the present decree and remand the case," etc. Thus on the ground alone that the decree in the form rendered would be a bar to another action, on points that ought not to be concluded it was reversed, although there was no technical error. Upon the doctrine of that case there is no escaping the conclusion that the former judgment between the parties in this action is conclusive; for it is a much stronger case for the application of the doctrine than the one cited. In the former action between these parties, the issues were made, submitted, tried, and found by the judge in favor of the defendant in such manner as to show the exact issues found, and a judgment upon the findings entered, such as should be entered on the merits, a judgment in form upon the merits, and not in terms a mere "dismissal out of this court," as in the case of House v. Mullen [supra]. This, therefore, must be regarded as a judgment rendered on the merits. See, also, Durant v. Essex Co., 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 109. There was, in fact, an appeal in the former action, and counsel on both sides have referred to the opinion of the supreme court of Nevada on the appeal. 9 Nev. 248. It is manifest that the supreme court also regarded the judgment as having been rendered on the merits, and affirmed it on the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. In the case of Aurora City v. West, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 103, the supreme court also says: "The better opinion is that the estoppel, when the judgment is on the merits, whether on demurrer, agreed statement or verdict, extends to every material allegation or statement which, having been made on one side and denied on the other, was at issue in the cause and was determined in the course of the proceeding." And Mr. Justice Miller, who alone dissented, stated the rule to be that "when a former judgment is relied on, it must appear from the record that the point in controversy was necessarily decided in the former suit, or be made to appear by extrinsic proof that it was in fact decided." Id. 106. The case under consideration is, in my judgment, clearly within the very restricted doctrine as stated by Mr. Justice Miller; for it appears by the record itself what issues were submitted, and what issues of fact were in fact found, at least, so far as the defense and title founded upon the statute of limitations are concerned.

The discussions in the courts have heretofore mostly arisen upon general verdicts where it could not be known from the verdict and pleadings upon what particular issues the jury passed. In such cases, some authorities hold that the party relying on the estoppel must show by extrinsic evidence what issues of fact were determined, and this is the view which Mr. Justice Miller seems to hold in the dissenting opinion cited. Other, and apparently a majority of, cases hold that a general verdict is itself prima facie evidence that all the issues of fact were determined, and that the party seeking to avoid the estoppel must show by extrinsic evidence what points in issue were not in fact determined by the jury; and the supreme court seems to go to this extent at least. But no such question can arise on special findings like those in this case where the record itself shows the exact issues found by the judge. The authorities cited by complainant's counsel relate to general verdicts, and are therefore inapplicable.

It is urged that upon the findings there is no estoppel, because the estoppel is not mutual, for the reason that, if certain findings had been the other way, it would not have been conclusive on both. It is not necessary to inquire what might have been the effect, had the findings and judgment been different. The question is, what is the effect upon both parties of the findings and judgment under consideration, not what the effect of some other findings and judgment might be. Are these findings and judgment conclusive on both parties, if conclusive on one? If so, the estoppel is mutual within the meaning of the rule. This point is also judicially determined in Sheldon v. Edwards, 35 N. Y. 288, before cited. There can be no doubt, I think, that in this case both parties are concluded if either is, and the estoppel is therefore mutual within the rule.

It is further argued, that if this adjudication is conclusive it might result in injustice to the complainant; for, if on appeal, the supreme court should come to the conclusion that the finding upon the issue of the statute of limitation was not supported by the evidence, the judgment could not be reversed, because it is still right on the issue that the plaintiff was not in possession, and the court could not disturb a judgment which is not erroneous. We have already seen that the supreme court of the United States, in House v. Mullen [supra], did reverse the judgment where there was no technical error—where the judgment was not erroneous in the sense in which counsel use the term for the purposes of this argument—and on the sole ground that all the points covered by it would be res adjudicata and operate as an estoppel, whereas it appeared to the court that some of the points ought not to be considered as finally determined, which upon the record as presented would be concluded. This reversal, doubtless, proceeded upon the idea that the judgment was broader in its scope and more advantageous to the plaintiff than he was entitled upon the record to have it. So in this case, if the defendant in the former action obtained a judgment covering the entire merits when, in fact, either upon the issues found or upon the issues correctly found, after determination of the appellate court, that other issues were improperly found, he ought only to have had judgment of nonsuit or dismissal without prejudice, the appellate court would undoubtedly have reversed or modified the judgment, and the latter might be done under the practice in Nevada. This would certainly be doing no vain thing, as insisted by counsel, but doing what a party would be legally entitled to claim at the hands of the court. The court would have no discretion to allow a judgment to stand which would conclude a further litigation of issues, that they were satisfied from the record ought not to be concluded, simply because the judgment in its present form might, also, give proper effect to the determination of other issues properly determined.

Under the system of practice in Nevada at the time, there were two appeals allowed, one from the judgment and one from an order granting or denying a motion for new trial, wholly independent of each other, and which might be taken separately or together, and upon either of which the judgment in a proper case might be modified or reversed. Upon an appeal from a judgment, only questions of law affecting the validity of the judgment could be considered. The facts could not be reviewed. If a party desired to have the facts reviewed, it was necessary to move for a new trial, and to prepare a statement as the basis of the motion, specifying the precise issues, or points upon which the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict or finding, and to insert all the evidence bearing upon that precise point, and no more. Upon a denial of the motion for new trial, the party had his appeal; and the statement for new trial constituted the record upon which the appeal on the points specified was heard. Should the verdict or findings be found to be unsupported by the evidence wholly, or in part, it might wholly, or to the extent found erroneous, be set aside. If the finding set aside is material to support the judgment, the judgment would necessarily be reversed. But if the other findings, not disturbed, are still sufficient to sustain the judgment, the judgment would not, necessarily, be reversed, but it, doubtless, might be. If not reversed, the vacating of the findings on some of the issues not necessary to sustain it, would take those issues out of the operation of the rule relating to res adjudicata, because they would appear not to have been determined. Thus, in the case in hand, suppose there had been another express finding, that the plaintiff in the former action was not in possession at the commencement of the action, and on motion for new trial, or on appeal from the order denying a new trial, the court should be satisfied that the finding as to the adverse possession was not supported by the evidence, but that the finding of want of possession at the commencement of the action was correct, the finding on the issue as to adverse possession could be set aside without disturbing the other findings. But the judgment, if correct, on the remaining issues need not be disturbed, or, if too broad in its scope, it could be modified and properly limited. Thus the rights of the parties could and would be protected. New trials as to some particular issues were often granted, even under the old system of practice, without disturbing the verdict or findings on other issues. Wiggin v. Smith, 54 N. H. 213, 223, 224; Robbins v. Inhabitants of Townsend, 20 Pick. 351; Winn v. Columbian Insurance Co., 12 Pick. 288; Hutchinson v. Piper, 4 Taunt. 555. The practice in California and Nevada affords still greater facilities for pursuing this course, as is sometimes done. Argenti v. City of San Francisco, 30 Cal. 463. Doubtless, if it was more frequently done, it would greatly redound to the advantage of the parties, and conduce to the administration of justice.

But in this case, if the finding upon adverse possession should be set aside, as we have seen, there would be no finding at all on the issue as to plaintiff's possession at the commencement of the action, as that fact is only inferred from the finding on the larger issue of adverse possession for a period of time covering the commencement of the suit, and the judgment would necessarily fall on the vacation of this finding, unless the other facts found also show the better right to be in defendant. The difficulty suggested, therefore, if any there be, could not apply to this case, and the argument is without force here, whatever might be said had there been an express finding on the other issue. In this case, as we have seen, there was an appeal from the order denying a new trial upon the issue as to the adverse possession, and the supreme court held the finding to be amply supported by the evidence. Thus, it is manifest that the power of the courts is ample by vacating one or more of the findings, and by reversing or modifying judgments on appeal so as to restrict their operation, to fully guard and preserve all the rights of litigants without encroaching upon the application of the wholesome doctrine of res adjudicata. Speyer v. Ihmels, 21 Cal. 280, 288, 289, is another example of the reversal of a judgment technically correct on the record for the protection of the rights of the parties. Upon my view therefore there is nothing either upon authority or upon principle to take the case out of the rule of estoppel invoked by defendant. If I am right thus far, then it was finally and conclusively determined in the former action between the same parties that the defendant had the title as against the complainant; for the adverse possession for the time prescribed, not only barred the action to recover the possession, but vested the title as against complainant in the adverse possessor—the defendant. See Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 380-385, and the numerous cases there cited; Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 540; and Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 605, where it is said by the supreme court of the United States that "the lapse of time limited by such statutes not only bars the remedy, but extinguishes the right and vests a perfect title in the adverse holder." A title so acquired will be quieted in the adverse holder on a bill in equity for that purpose, even against the holder of the paper title barred. Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 386; Pendleton v. Alexander, 8 Cranch. [12 U. S.] 462. The latter case, and the statutes under which it arose, were fully examined in Arrington v. Liscom [supra]. The other findings, also, seem to show title in the defendant.

It is further argued, on the part of the complainant, that the statute of limitations does not apply, because the title is in the United States, and such statutes do not run against the government; and Gibson v. Choteau, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 92, is cited to sustain the position. But this case can have no application, for, as we have seen, the party who is the owner of the mining claim as against everybody but the United States, under the laws of the state or territory, and the rules and regulations of the locality embracing the mine irrespective of the act of congress, is the party entitled to a patent; and the statutes of limitations of the state or territory applicable to the subject themselves constitute a part of the laws by which the right to a mining claim is to be determined, for the purpose of ascertaining who is the party upon whom the right to purchase is conferred by the act of congress. Such statutes, as we have seen, are expressly recognized by section 13 of the act of congress as a part of the laws by which the right to a patent is to be determined.

So, again, it is urged that there was a trust, or confidence, reposed in the defendant and its grantors by complainant and its grantors, as tenants in common, which precluded the defendant from acquiring the title except for the benefit of all. This proposition is also untenable. According to the allegations of the bill there was a valid parol partition and segregation of the interests of the parties executed and followed by exclusive possession in pursuance of such partition. Such partitions are, doubtless, valid. Long v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 218. Thus the parties by this partition ceased to be tenants in common, and forever after dealt at arm's length. Besides, the taking possession of the whole under conveyance from the former locators, claiming to own the whole, and excluding the complainant and its grantors, was a hostile act, which constituted an ouster, and set the statute of limitations in motion. It certainly will not be claimed that one tenant in common cannot oust his co-tenant and by long-continued adverse possession bar his right. But, as we have seen, the parties had ceased to be tenants in common.

After a careful consideration of the case, I am satisfied that the right of the defendant as against the complainant was conclusively adjudicated in the former action, and that the patent properly and rightfully issued to the defendant in its own right. It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider the question as to the conclusiveness of the patent upon the other grounds argued. If, however, the procuring of a patent in a proceeding in all respects regular in its forms in the mode pointed out by this statute, where no fraud has intervened in the course of the proceedings, cannot be regarded as a proceeding in rem, or in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and be conclusive upon all the world, then, in my judgment, the statute ought to be speedily so amended as to make it such a proceeding and conclusive. So, also, if there is any case wherein the doctrine of res adjudicata should be carried to its utmost limit, or where the statute of limitations should be rigorously applied, it is this class of cases. There certainly can be no class of cases wherein it is more to the interest of the public that there be an end of litigation. Happily, in this case, as I view it, the question of title appears to have been adjudicated within the most limited scope of the rule of law invoked. I cannot close this opinion without expressing my obligations to the counsel on both sides for the very able, thorough and exhaustive printed arguments furnished—arguments every way worthy the inportance of the questions involved and the very large pecuniary interests at stake. Let the demurrer be sustained and the bill dismissed.

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1879.

FREIGHT—LIEN—CHARTER—CARGO—PRACTICE.

1. A vessel was chartered to go from New York to ports in the West Indies and back to New York. The charter was expressed to be for the purpose of carrying a circus company and their necessary tents, clothing, horses, etc. It provided for the payment of charter money at the end of each month and it bound the vessel "and the merchandise laden on board" to the performance of the charter. On the return of the vessel, while she was at Flushing, L. I., and before she was towed to her pier in New York, and before any of her cargo was discharged, the owner of the vessel filed a libel to recover a balance of charter money due and attached the horses and paraphernalia of the circus company on board. The charterer excepted to the libel: Held, that the property attached was cargo, on which the lien for charter money was given by the charter.

2. The clause in the charter making the charter money payable by instalments, at a place where the vessel would not probably be when the time of payment arrived, did not destroy the lien on cargo given by the charter.

3. The failure to pay the monthly instalments due before the filing of the libel was a breach of the charter, and the owner of the vessel had a lien on the cargo for his security.

4. The libel was not prematurely filed, and the libellant was entitled to recover.

In admiralty.

Edward L. Owen, for libellant.

Edward D. McCarthy, for claimant.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a libel against the cargo of the schooner John N. Colby for freight, etc., alleged to be due under a charter party. The charter party was made in New York, on the 27th of October, 1876, between the libellant as master and agent of the owners and one Murray. By its terms the libellant agreed on the freighting and chartering of the vessel to Murray, for a voyage from New York to such safe ports and places as charterer may direct, including the West Indies and South America and back to New York, for a term of at least three months, with privilege to keep the vessel three months longer, the owner to furnish crew and provisions, the whole of the vessel, except the captain's and mates' room and necessary accommodations for the crew and for the tackles, sails and provisions of the vessel to be at the sole use of the charterer, the owner to take on board during the voyage "all such lawful goods and merchandise as the charterer or his agent may think proper to ship," the charterer to pay to the owner or his agent "freight at the rate of $690 per month and pro rata for parts of a month earned and due at the termination of each month, payable $500 to Evans, Ball & Co. upon the presentation of order of charterer, and $190 to the captain," "the charterer to pay all port charges, both foreign and domestic, including loading, discharging, consul fees, etc." The charter contained the following clauses: "It is understood that the vessel is chartered for the purpose of transporting a circus company and their necessary tents, clothing, horses, etc." "It is hereby understood that the monthly payments under this charter are to commence November 6th, 1876." "To the true performance of the foregoing agreements the said parties do hereby bind themselves, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and also the said vessel, her freight and appurtenances and the merchandise laden on board, each to the other in the penal sum of the estimated amount of charter."

Under this charter, the vessel took on board at New York, on the 6th of November, the circus company, its horses, tents, and other equipments, and proceeded under the direction of the charterer to various ports in the West Indies, and arrived at New York on her return on the 3d of April, 1877. During this time the vessel was at sea, going from port to port, seventy days; the rest of the time was spent in various ports where the circus was landed and gave public performances.

This libel is brought by the owner of the vessel, claiming a balance of freight money and port charges paid. The libel was filed April 3d, 1877, while the vessel was lying at Flushing, L. I., and before she was towed to her pier in New York, and before any of the cargo was discharged. The property seized by the marshal was also seized on board the vessel and before it was discharged. The libel avers that the libellant has always, since the making of said charter party, well and truly performed all the covenants and undertakings thereof on his part, but that the charterer has not kept his covenants and undertakings; that the vessel was employed under the charter about five months and that there became due at the end of each month $690, or for the five months $3,450; that there has been paid $1,450, leaving a balance of $2,000 or thereabouts over and above all offsets and credits; that the charterer had failed to pay all the port charges and to furnish water and provisions and libellant had paid out $117 therefor, no part of which had been repaid; that payment of these sums had been demanded and refused.

Process having issued, under which part of the circus property on board was attached by the marshal, the charterer appeared as claimant and bonded the same. He filed exceptions and answer. Upon the hearing, the claimant waived the defences set up in his answer, relying only on his exceptions, which were as follows: (1) That the libellant cannot proceed in rem against the property herein attached, the same not being cargo on which freight had been earned nor merchandise subject to a lien for freight money; and that the contract between the parties was not a contract of affreightment, nor was the adventure a commercial adventure; and (2) that the libellant had not completed his contract at the time the libel was filed and the process of attachment was issued; that the charter party had not been fulfilled; that the vessel had not reached the port of New York, and that the property attached was still on board the vessel, not having been discharged; that no cause of action had arisen under this contract at the time the libel was filed and process issued.

As to the first exception, the point taken is that from the peculiar character of the goods laden on board and the use they were to be put to at the several ports to be visited, they could not be regarded as cargo to which a maritime lien would attach, nor could the adventure be considered a commercial adventure; that a maritime lien is a creation of the maritime law solely in the interests of commerce. The distinction here attempted to be drawn is certainly novel, and no authority is produced in its support. If the use to which merchandise carried on the water was to be put at the end of the voyage were the test of its being "cargo" to which the general principles of maritime law apply, as well for its protection as for its responsibility, this distinction would have been made long ago, for hardly any general ship sails from port without some articles of merchandise not designed for sale, but for the use or pleasure of the owner and shipper. The true rule appears to have been well understood by both parties to this charter, who expressly pledged the vessel to the cargo and the cargo to the vessel. It is, that all property, of whatever kind, carried by sea, whatever may be the use to which it is to be put when landed, is "cargo," and the carrying of it on ship-board is itself a commercial adventure, which clothes it with the privileges and subjects it to the liabilities which belong to cargo by the maritime law.

As to the second exception, it is doubtless well settled as a general rule that freight under a charter party or bill of lading is not due till the cargo has been discharged; that till the cargo is discharged the voyage is not completed nor the contract of the ship fully performed. Cargo of Salt [Case No. 2,406]. But it is equally clear that by the terms of the charter party, freight may become due before the discharge of the cargo, and during the running of the charter, as in this case, at the end of every month. McGilvery v. Capen, 7 Gray, 525; Raymond v. Tyson, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 53. And while the agreement to pay freight by instalments at fixed intervals may, under some circumstances, show an intention to waive the ordinary maritime lien on the cargo therefor, as in the case last cited, yet where the charter, by which the agreement for payment in instalments is made, expressly pledges the vessel and cargo to each other for the performance of the charter party, the maritime lien for the freight cannot be held to be waived, even though the instalments are payable at a place other than that at which the vessel will probably be when the time of payment arrives. In this case, therefore, the failure of the charterer to pay the monthly instalments due prior to the filing of the libel was a breach of the charter party, for which an action would then lie, and the owner of the vessel had a lien on the cargo for his security. The libel was not prematurely filed and the process was properly issued. The libellant was not bound to wait till he had discharged his cargo. He had the right to treat the contract as broken and to sue thereon. It is suggested by claimant's counsel that if the libellant could thus libel the cargo on board at Flushing or in New York before its discharge, he could have done so at Key West or a port in the West Indies, and so have broken up the voyage or indefinitely detained the vessel. I see no reason why the owner of the vessel could not do so, if the freight already due had not been paid. Such failure to pay was a breach of the contract, and the owner of the vessel would thereby be absolved from any obligation to continue the performance of the contract on his part, if he saw fit to insist on the failure to pay as a breach of the contract. Such a detention or interruption of the voyage for the enforcement of an accrued right expressly secured to the owner of the vessel by the terms of the charter, could not be charged against the owner of the vessel as a breach of the contract. It would be caused wholly by the fault of the charterer in violating the contract on his part.

It is claimed by the counsel for the charterer that the owner of the vessel waived payment of the monthly instalments, but I think this point is neither sustained by the evidence nor is it set up in the exceptions, nor indeed in the other defences of the answer which have been abandoned.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 7, 1876.

REFERENCE—ERRONEOUS ENTITLING OF THE REFEREE'S REPORT—AMENDMENT—ENTERING JUDGMENT WITHOUT APPLICATION TO COURT — STATE PRACTICE—REVIEW.

1. On a consent given in open court, a reference of an action at law was made to a referee, to hear and determine all the issues therein. The referee found for the plaintiff for a sum certain, and a judgment was entered on the report without any application to the court. The report was, by a clerical error, entitled in the district court, but it was filed in the circuit court, and was proceeded upon as if it had been correctly entitled. There was no other cause pending between the same parties, and no one was misled by the mistake. The defendant moved to set aside the judgment: Held, that the mistake as to the entitling might be disregarded or amended nunc pro tunc.

[Cited in Woolridge v. M'Kenna, 8 Fed. 663.]

2. It was not irregular to enter the judgment without an application to the court, such being the practice of the courts of the state.

3. Suggestions as to the proper mode of obtaining a review of the decision of a referee, where a judgment is entered on his report without having been presented to, or considered by, the court.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. This is a motion to set aside a judgment in an action at law, entered upon a report of a referee, without any application to the court. The order of reference was made by the court upon consent given in open court, and thereby the action was referred to Isaac M. Lawson, as referee, to hear and determine all the issues therein. The referee heard the cause and made his report, finding certain facts which are set out, and that the plaintiff had suffered damages, by reason of the matters found, to the amount of $12,161.43. He further finds, as a conclusion of law upon the facts found, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover judgment in the action, against the defendant, for the said sum of $12,161.43. By a clerical error, this report was entitled in the district court. It was filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court, and proceeded upon as if it had been correctly entitled.

No other cause was pending between the same parties, and no one was misled in any manner by the mistake. Under these circumstances, I think the mistake may be disregarded, or amended nunc pro tunc.

The question upon the merits is, whether judgment can be entered without an application to the court. In the case of Heckers v. Fowler, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 123, it was held that a reference by consent, in an action at law, could be made in the circuit court of the United States, and that a judgment could be entered without application to the court, upon the report of the referee, where such was the stipulation of the parties, and the order of the court thereupon, in making the reference. The act of June 1, 1872 [17 Stat. 196], adopting the state practice for the time being, in actions at law, which is now contained in section 914 of the Revised Statutes, is, I think, at least equivalent to the clause of the stipulation in Heckers v. Fowler, and authorizes the entry of judgment upon the report of the referee, without any application to the court.

The only difficulty which the matter presents grows out of the fact, that there is, in the circuit courts of the United States, no division into special and general terms, as there is in the state courts of New York. This presents some embarrassment in respect to preserving the right of review of the decision of the referee; for, it is quite probable, that the supreme court of the United States would not examine exceptions to a referee's report, which had never been presented to nor considered by the circuit court. But, if the exceptions taken to the referee's report were brought before the circuit court by proceedings taken under, or in analogy to those authorized by, section 987 of the Revised Statutes, or those provided when a trial is by the court without a jury, and its judgment obtained upon those questions, and entered at the foot of the judgment roll, or inserted therein, it appears to me that the difficulty would be obviated.

In any event, the judgment was not irregular, in being entered without an application to the court, founded on the referee's report, and the motion to set it aside on that ground must be denied.

FOURTH NAT. BANK v. WALKER et al.

[24 Int. Rev. Rec. 211; 10 Chi. Leg. News, 323.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. 1878.

TRANSFER OF SECURITIES—RIGHTS OF GUARANTOR—ESTOPPEL.

Held, that a guarantor of commercial paper has the right, as guarantor, to take up such paper and transfer his claim as guarantor, to the parties from whom he obtained the means with which to take up the paper. The court states how the parties in this case would be estopped by their acts.

On the tenth day of August, A. D. 1869, S. J. Walker borrowed of Sarah Maher, wife of Hugh Maher, $50,000, and secured the same by causing Henry H. Walker, his brother, to execute two promissory notes, of that date, each for $25,000, and falling due three years after date, respectively. He also caused H. H. Walker to execute two certain trust deeds to John G. Rogers, as trustee, each of said trust deeds securing one of said notes. It does not clearly appear whether said two trust deeds were altogether upon the same premises, or upon different pieces of property. The premises which were conveyed by the trust deed, although standing of record in the name of H. H. Walker, were in fact, the property of S. J. Walker, and the indebtedness so secured was, in fact, the indebtedness of S. J. Walker, the former holding the title and executing the papers for the convenience of the latter. Both the notes in question were indorsed by Sarah Maher and Hugh Maher, her husband, and guaranteed in writing by S. J. Walker. Hugh Maher pledged both of said notes, secured as aforesaid—one with the Fourth National Bank [of Chicago] and the other with J. Irving Pearce, president of the Third National Bank, in his individual capacity. The note held by Pearce, falling due August 10, 1872, was taken up in the following manner within ten days after maturity. Pearce urged Maher, and Maher urged S. J. Walker, to take it up. On the day of its maturity or thereabouts, S. J. Walker paid thereon to Pearce, $10,000, and being unable to pay the balance, made the following arrangement with Greenebaum and Foreman, bankers, with whom he had been doing a very large business. He was then largely indebted to Greenebaum and Foreman, which indebtedness still remains unpaid, and for the security of which, among other collaterals, they held what was known as the "Price note," originally for the sum of $12,000, but reduced to $10,000, by payment or otherwise. S. J. Walker represented to Greenebaum and Foreman, that he desired the Price note upon which to raise money elsewhere, with which to aid in payment of the note held by Pearce, and that if they would surrender it to him, he would with the proceeds thereof, and other means, take up the note so secured, out of the hands of Pearce, and would in consideration thereof, deliver to them the Walker note and the security held by Pearce, in lieu of the Price note. He also represented to them that it would be a valid binding security in their hands, and that he had a right so to pledge it; and upon the faith of such representations they agreed to surrender to Walker the Price note for the purpose aforesaid, upon condition that they should receive the note held by Pearce, as well as the trust security therefor. S. J. Walker then, on August 19, 1872, gave Pearce his check upon some bank—what particular bank the evidence does not show—with the understanding that it should go through the clearing house, and be paid the next day. On August the 20th, Greenebaum and Foreman, under the agreement stated, surrendered the Price note to Walker, who pledged or sold same to raise money thereon, and on that day Pearce sent Walker's check through the clearing house, with the $25,000 note reduced to $15,000, pinned thereto. The check was paid and the note surrendered to S. J. Walker, who delivered it, with the trust deed securing it, to Greenebaum and Foreman, who still hold and claim it as a security for the indebtedness due them from Walker, which is much larger than the amount due upon the Walker note. Neither Pearce nor Mr. nor Mrs. Maher knew how Walker had raised the money with which to pay that note. Pearce told Maher the note had been paid, and both of them so regarded it. As to the other $25,000 note so pledged with the Fourth National Bank, it fell due at the same time, but was not paid or taken up until about November 5, 1872. It was taken up and satisfied in some way by Walker, and on November 5, 1872, in satisfaction of the old note or for some other indebtedness, S. J. Walker delivered to the Fourth National Bank another promissory note for $25,000, due in two years and executed by H. H. Walker, and secured by a new trust deed. This was likewise guaranteed by S. J. Walker. The new trust deed ran to Samuel M. Moore, and covered the same property contained or described in the trust deed transferred to, and held by, Greenebaum and Foreman. The new trust deed taken by the Fourth National Bank was filed for record December 31, 1872, several months after Greenebaum and Foreman had obtained the one held by Pearce. The Fourth National Bank filed a bill to foreclose the trust deed securing the note of November 5, 1872, alleging that the security held by Greenebaum and Foreman had been paid and satisfied, and that the trust deed securing the same had consequently ceased to be a lien for the security of that note. It prayed that that deed might be declared a cloud upon the title, and as such, removed by decree, and that the premises be sold to satisfy the indebtedness so due to it.

Monroe, Bisbee & Ball, for complainant.

Rosenthal & Pence, for Greenebaum and Foreman.

Held by HARLAN, Circuit Justice. That as to Maher and wife and Pearce, the note for $25,000, held by Greenebaum and Foreman was paid. As between Greenebaum and Foreman and Samuel J. Walker, the latter was estopped by his representations to the former from alleging that it had been paid. H. H. Walker was equally estopped in view of his relations in this matter to Samuel J. Walker. But if Samuel J. Walker and H. H. Walker are to be regarded as having distinct, separate rights, then the lien claimed by Greenebaum and Foreman can be sustained upon the ground that S. J. Walker had the right, as guarantor, to take up the $25,000 note and transfer his claim as guarantor to the parties from whom he obtained the means with which to take up the note. In a suit by Greenebaum and Foreman, against the Walkers, to enforce the lien given by the trust deed, the latter would be estopped from saying that the debt had been fully paid, or from disputing the lien. The rights of Greenebaum and Foreman are none the less in this action, since the debt and lien asserted by the complainants were both created subsequent to the delivery to Greenebaum and Foreman of the Walker note and deed of trust. Greenebaum and Foreman are entitled to the benefit of the security received from S. J. Walker for such amount as was due upon the Price note surrendered to Walker.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 70.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1827.[2]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — AUCTIONEER'S LICENSE—FAILURE TO REQUIRE BOND—LIABILITY FOR DAMAGES.

1. Under the law of Virginia the defendant may demur and plead to issue, to the whole declaration.

2. The act of Virginia of 1796, "concerning corporations," which requires bond and security to be given by auctioneers, does not prescribe the condition of the bond, but leaves it to the discretion of the respective corporations; but when the condition has been fixed by a by-law, it cannot be dispensed with at the will of the corporation, unless that will be expressed in such a formal manner as to repeal the by-law. [See note at end of case.]

3. A corporation aggregate, having, or supposed to have, a corporate fund, is liable in an action at common law for negligence of its duty.

4. The inhabitants of Alexandria, as such, are no part of the corporation.

5. A judgment against the corporation cannot be levied on any inhabitant who is not a member of the common council.

6. The "Common Council of Alexandria" is an entirely new corporation erected by the act of congress in 1804 [2 Stat. 256], and derives all its powers from that act.

7. By that act, this new corporation is neither authorized to grant licenses to auctioneers nor to restrain them from exercising their business without license.

8. The old corporation erected by the Virginia statute of 1779, by the name of "The Mayor and Commonalty of the Town of Alexandria," was, by its own consent, destroyed by the repeal of that statute by the act of congress of 1804 erecting the new corporation.

9. The Virginia act of 1796, "concerning corporations," was applicable only to corporations then existing, and created no duty or obligation upon any corporation subsequently erected.

This was an action upon the case [by William Fowle], against "the common council of Alexandria," for negligence in licensing an auctioneer without taking bond and security according to the Virginia act of 1796 [Laws 1796, p. 22, c. 13], "concerning corporations," and the by-law of "the mayor and commonalty" of the 5th of February, 1800. By an act of the legislature of Virginia in the year 1779 [Hening's Laws 1779, p. 173, c. 25], the mayor, recorder, aldermen, and common councilmen, elected in the manner therein prescribed, were made a body corporate and politic by the name of "Mayor and Commonalty of the Town of Alexandria." By the Virginia act of December 22, 1796, "concerning corporations," it is enacted that "the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the several corporate towns in this commonwealth, and their successors, shall, upon request of any person or persons desirous thereof, grant licenses to exercise, in such town, the trade or business of an auctioneer; provided that no such license shall be granted until the person or persons requesting the same, shall enter into bond with one or more sufficient sureties payable to the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of such corporate town and their successors, in such penalty, and with such condition as by the by-laws and ordinances of such corporate town, shall be required." By the by-law of February 5, 1800, it is enacted that "the mayor and commonalty shall grant to any person or persons desiring the same, a license to exercise the trade or business of an auctioneer, within the town; provided that no such license shall be granted, until the person or persons applying, shall enter into bond with one or more good securities, in the sum of $20,000 payable to the mayor and commonalty, and conditioned for the payment of the annual rent of $500 to the mayor and commonalty, in quarterly payments, for the said office; and for the due and faithful performance of all the duties of the same; which bond shall not become void on the first recovery, but may be put in suit and prosecuted, from time to time, by, and at the costs of any person injured by a breach thereof, until the whole penalty shall be recovered." The by-law regulates the fees and commissions of the auctioneer and prescribes his duties; one of which is that he shall, in three days after any sale made, deliver, to the owner of the goods sold, a fair account of the sale, and pay the amount of the money received, deducting therefrom his fees and commissions. By the act of congress of the 25th of February, 1804 (2 Stat. 255), "to amend the charter of Alexandria," after providing for the election of a common council, it is enacted "that the common council, so elected, and those thereafter to be elected and their successors shall be and hereby are made a body politic and corporate by the name of 'The Common Council of Alexandria,' with the usual corporate powers; and all the estate, rights, and credits now vested in the mayor and commonalty of the town of Alexandria, shall be vested in the said common council when elected, and may be recovered in their name for the use of the said town, and in like manner all claims and demands against the mayor and commonalty of Alexandria, prior to the operation of the present act, may be prosecuted and recovered against the aforesaid common council." They were authorized to appoint all officers deemed necessary for the execution of their laws; but no power was thereby given to appoint or to license auctioneers. The 12th section enacts "that so much of any act or acts of the general assembly of Virginia, as comes within the purview of this act, shall be and the same is hereby repealed. Provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or destroy any right or remedy which the mayor and commonalty of Alexandria now possess or enjoy, to or concerning any debts, claims, or demands against any person or persons whatsoever, or to repeal any of the laws and ordinances of the mayor and commonalty of the said town now in force, which are not inconsistent with this act." In June, 1817, the common council of Alexandria passed "An act to amend the act for licensing auctioneers, and for other purposes," by which it is enacted "that every person obtaining a license to exercise the business of an auctioneer within the town of Alexandria. shall annually apply for, and obtain a renewal of his license, and shall also annually renew his bond in the manner provided by law; and every person failing to renew such license, and give bond annually, shall cease to exercise the business of an auctioneer, and shall be proceeded against accordingly."

The declaration contained three counts. The first count, after setting forth the by-laws of the 5th of February, 1800, and 3d of June, 1817, avers that on the —— day of ——, 1815, the common council of Alexandria granted a license to one Philip G. Marsteller, to exercise the trade of auctioneer in Alexandria, and continued to renew the same from year to year until the —— day of ——, 1819, during which time he sold at auction for the plaintiff goods to the amount of $——, which sum he failed to pay to the plaintiff, who recovered judgment against him for that sum, and obtained a fieri facias, which was returned nulla bona; at the time of which judgment, long before, and ever since, he was and is wholly insolvent; by reason whereof the plaintiff became entitled to the benefit of the bond and security required to be taken as aforesaid by the said "common council" previous to granting the said license, as aforesaid; yet the defendants, not regarding their duty in that behalf, but contriving, &c., did not, nor would not, take any bond and security as aforesaid, from the said P. G. M. "during the time when the transactions aforesaid, between the plaintiff and the said Philip took place, but on the contrary thereof, so carelessly, negligently, and improperly conducted themselves in the premises, that by and through the negligence, carelessness, and default of the defendants in the premises, no bond and security was taken from the said Philip to which the plaintiff can resort, and the money due to him as aforesaid is wholly lost to the plaintiff," &c. Second count: "And whereas also the said common council of Alexandria, on the 1st of April, 1815, did license and permit one P. G. M. to carry on the trade and business of auctioneer in the town of Alexandria, and so from year to year to the 1st of February, 1819, and the said Philip, in virtue of the said license and permission, did carry on the said trade and business of auctioneer in the said town during the whole of the period aforesaid, and the plaintiff believing that the said common council had well and faithfully performed their duty in taking from the said Philip, bond and security for the faithful discharge of his duty as auctioneer aforesaid, and confiding in the same, did deliver to him the said Philip, from time to time during the years 1815, 1816, 1817, and 1818, goods, wares, and merchandise to the value of $10,000 and upwards, to be sold by him as auctioneer as aforesaid; and the said Philip as auctioneer aforesaid did sell the said goods, wares, and merchandise at auction aforesaid, and did become indebted to the plaintiff, by means of the said sales at auction as aforesaid in the sum of $1,583.09, which said sum the said Philip, although often required, altogether failed and refused to pay to the plaintiff. And the said plaintiff saith that the said Philip was at the time he became so indebted, altogether insolvent and unable to pay the said sum of money, by means of which said premises the plaintiff became entitled to the benefit of the bond and security required by law to be taken by the said common council upon granting the license to the said Philip to exercise the trade and business of auctioneer as aforesaid. Yet the said common council not minding their duty in the said premises, but contriving to injure and deceive the plaintiff, altogether failed to take any bond or security from the said Philip for his license to carry on the trade and business of auctioneer for the years 1815, 1816, 1817, and 1818 as aforesaid; in consequence and by means of which said failure the plaintiff hath altogether lost the debt so due to him from the said Philip to the plaintiff as auctioneer aforesaid, and therefore the plaintiff saith he is injured and hath sustained damage to the value of $3,000," &c. The third count sets forth the act of Virginia of 1796, entitled "An act concerning corporations," and the by-laws of 1800 and 1817, and avers that the common council of Alexandria did knowingly suffer and permit the said P. G. M. to exercise the trade and business of an auctioneer within the said town from the 1st of January, 1815, to the last day of December, 1819; and during that period did take and receive from the said P. G. M. the annual sum of $500 as a rent for exercising the said trade and business of auctioneer as aforesaid, and the plaintiff believing that the said common council had taken bond and security from the said P. G. M. for the faithful performance of his duties of auctioneer, &c., did from time to time during the said period, deliver to him goods to be sold by him as auctioneer; and that he so sold them to the amount of $1,583.09, and failed to pay the same to the plaintiff; and was, when he so became indebted, altogether insolvent; by means of which premises the plaintiff became entitled to the benefit of the bond and security required by law to be taken by the common council as aforesaid; yet the said common council, not minding their duty in the premises, but contriving, &c., failed to take such bond and security; in consequence of which failure the plaintiff has lost the debt due from the said P. G. M. to the plaintiff, whereby he is injured, &c. To this declaration there was a general demurrer and joinder. The defendants were also permitted to plead sundry matters of fact in bar, under the Virginia statute of the 12th of December, 1792, § 40, which enacts "that the plaintiff in replevin, and the defendant in all other actions, may plead as many several matters, whether of law or fact, as he shall think necessary for his defence."

Mr. Taylor, for defendants, contended that no action for a tort lies against a public corporation; that the "common council" had no power to grant licenses to auctioneers either under the charter of 1779 or 1804. The Virginia law of 1796 does not prescribe the condition of the bond; it might have been only for payment of the rent or tax. They were not bound to provide for the security of those whose goods should be sold by the auctioneer. If the plaintiff has any remedy it is rather against the individual members of the common council, than against the public body which is a municipal corporation; and would have no right to pay the damages out of the public funds; nor would it have a right to lay a tax for such a purpose. The act of 1796 only gives the power of licensing auctioneers to the mayor, alderman and commonalty of the several corporate towns within the commonwealth. That act was applicable only to corporations then existing. The corporation known by the name of "The Mayor and Commonalty of the Town of Alexandria," which then existed, was dissolved, with its own consent, by the act of congress of 1804 (2 Stat. 255), which erected a new corporation by the name of "The Common Council of Alexandria." This new corporation derived no power from the Virginia act of 1796. It had no right to require the bond. The act of 1796 requires the bond to be made payable to the "mayor, alderman and commonalty," —the by-law requires it to be made payable to the mayor and commonalty only.

Mr. Swann, contra, contended that the corporation is liable for torts done within the sphere of its powers, and has power to raise money to pay the damages. Townsend v. Susquehanna Turnpike, 6 Johns. 91; Yarborough v. Bank of England, 16 East, 6; Riddle v. Proprietors of Locks and Canals, 7 Mass. 169; Holmes v. Remsen, 20 Johns. 230; Patterson v. Bank of Columbia, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 306. The charter of 1804, does not repeal the Virginia act of 1796, nor the by-law of 1800.

Mr. Jones, in reply. The people of the town are no part of the corporation. The corporation is the government, the inhabitants are the governed. No action can be maintained by the governed against their governors for neglect of duty. The people are not responsible for the neglect of their government. The corporation cannot tax the people for the torts or negligence of the corporation. It is not the subject of a private action. All the powers of the new corporation are those given by the charter of 1804

Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and THRUSTON, Circuit Judges.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The act of Virginia of 1796, "concerning corporations," requires that bond and security shall be taken; the condition, however, is left to the discretion of the corporation; but that condition, when once fixed by a by-law, is necessary, and cannot be dispensed with at the will of the corporation, unless that will be expressed in such a formal manner as to repeal the by-law.

The first question is, whether the corporation is liable in an action upon the case at common law, for negligence of its duty. In the case of Yarborough v. Bank of England, 16 East, 6, it is decided that trover will lie against a corporation aggregate; a fortiori an action upon the case for negligence, which requires no evidence of any act done by the defendants, but is for a mere omission. In the case of Riddle v. Proprietors of Locks & Canals, 7 Mass. 169, it is decided that case lies against a corporation aggregate, for neglect to make the canal as wide and deep as required by statute, whereby the plaintiff suffered damage. In that case Mr. Chief Justice Parsons takes "a distinction between proper aggregate corporations and quasi corporations, such as counties and towns in Massachusetts, which are invested with particular powers without their consent. No private action can be maintained against them for breach of their corporate duty, unless such action be given by statute; and the reason is, that, having no corporate fund, and no legal means of obtaining one, each corporator is liable to satisfy any judgment rendered against the corporation. This burden the common law will not impose but in a case where the statute is an authority to which every man must be considered as assenting. But in regular corporations which have, or are supposed to have a corporate fund, this reason does not apply." In such cases, where an action is given by statute, it is cumulative. Is the common council of Alexandria such a regular corporation, having or supposed to have such a corporate fund? I think it is. The inhabitants of Alexandria, as such, are no part of the corporation. The judgment cannot be levied on any inhabitant who is not a member of the common council. None of the inconveniences mentioned by the court in the case of Russell v. Men Dwelling in the County of Devon, 2 Term R. 667, can occur in this case. If the corporation granted the license contrary to law, without taking the bond and security required by law, and the plaintiff has thereby sustained a special damage, I think he may maintain his action upon the case, at common law, against the corporation.

But it is said, that the "Common Council of Alexandria" is an entirely new corporation, erected by the act of congress in 1804, and derives all its powers from that act. That by that act this new corporation is neither authorized to grant licenses to auctioneers, nor to restrain auctioneers from exercising their business without license. That the old corporation, "The Mayor and Commonalty of the Town of Alexandria," which was erected by the statute of Virginia in 1779, was, by its own consent, destroyed by the repeal of that statute by the act of congress erecting the new corporation. That the act of Virginia of 1796, "concerning corporations," which imposed the duty upon corporations to license all such auctioneers as should apply and offer the requisite bond and security, was applicable only to corporations then in existence, and could give no authority, nor impose any duty upon a corporation subsequently erected; and therefore that the new corporation had no authority, and was not bound to require the bond and security. That the by-law of the 5th of February, 1800, although not expressly repealed, was virtually of no effect, because the authority, upon which it was founded, had ceased to exist, and could create no obligation upon the "common council" to require bond and security. In this view of the case I am inclined to concur. They cannot be bound by their own by-law unless they had authority to pass such a by-law; nor can the by-law of the old corporation bind the new, when the authority upon which that by-law rested is taken away. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment upon the demurrer should be for the defendants, upon all the counts.

It may be observed, also, that the first count does not state that the said P. G. M. ever received any money for the plaintiff; nor that the plaintiff ever demanded any from him; nor does it expressly aver that the loss happened in consequence of the negligence of the defendants; nor that the plaintiff believed that security had been given. The second count does not refer to the by-laws, or to the Virginia act of 1796; nor does the plaintiff aver it to be the duty of the common council to require the bond and security; nor that P. G. M. received the money for the sales, but says that he became indebted to the plaintiff "by means of said sales." There is nothing in this count which shows the obligation of the defendants, or the title of the plaintiff. The third count does not state that the defendants granted any license, but knowingly permitted and suffered the said P. G. M. to carry on the business of auctioneer, and took no bond and security; but received the annual rent of 500 dollars. It does not state that the said P. G. M. received any money for the goods sold. This count I think is clearly bad.

Judgment for the defendants upon the demurrer.

[NOTE. Plaintiff brought error, and the judgment of the circuit court was duly affirmed by the supreme court, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion, in which it was held that there is no precedent for holding a municipal corporation, established for the general purposes of government with legislative powers, liable for losses consequent on its having misconstrued the extent of its powers in granting a license, which it had not authority to grant without taking that security for the conduct of the person obtaining the license which its own ordinances had been supposed to require. PRACTICE AT LAW—FAILURE TO PLEAD—DEFAULT.

Although the term should continue beyond the rule-day, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment by default, if the defendant did not plead by that day.

[This was an action by Fowle and Daingerfield against Robert W. Bowie.] The rule to plead expired in November, 1827. The May term was continued by adjournment beyond the rule-day. The defendant pleaded in abatement on the 6th of December, 1827, during the adjourned May term.

The plaintiffs' counsel contended that it was too late, and that judgment should be entered by default.

Mr. Key, for defendant, contended that if he pleaded before the expiration of the term in which the rule was laid, he was in time.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the rule-day being before the expiration of the term, made no difference; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment by default.

CONTINUANCE—NEW TESTIMONY.

At any time before the fifth term, after the appearance term, the plaintiff may obtain a continuance of the cause upon affidavit that he has recently learned from his counsel that the documents upon which he relied are not good evidence for him, and that he wants the testimony of persons beyond sea, although a day, by consent of the parties, had been assigned for the trial.

Mr. Jones, for plaintiff, moved for a continuance of the cause upon affidavit by the plaintiff, that he has but recently learned by consultation with his counsel, that certain documents upon which he had relied, were not good evidence for him; and that he wants the testimony of certain persons in Holland.

The cause was at issue at the last term, and this day had been assigned by the court, with the consent of the parties, for the trial. This was the second term after the appearance court.

Mr. Key, for defendant, objected.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) continued the cause, it not being after the fourth term after the appearance court. See Laws Md.

TRADE MARKS—QUACK MEDICINES—PROTECTION BY COURT OF EQUITY.

1. A court of equity will not, in a contest between persons who profess to be manufacturers of quack medicines, interfere to protect the use of trade marks, by injunction.

[Cited in Tufts v. Tufts, Case No. 14,233; Heath v. Wright, Id. 6,310; Kohler Manuf'g Co. v. Beeshore, 59 Fed. 574.]

2. A complainant, whose business is imposition, cannot invoke the aid of equity against a piracy of his trade marks.

In equity. This was an application for an injunction, upon notice given to the defendant, to restrain him from using wrappers, labels and bottles, resembling those used by the complainant in his business of selling "Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry." The bill, filed November 7th, 1847, stated that Lewis Williams, in 1844, was proprietor and possessor of the original receipt for preparing and compounding a certain valuable medicine invented by Dr. Henry Wistar, of Virginia, called "Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry," and that the said Williams prepared the same, and sold it in Philadelphia, and all the principal cities in the United States, with great profit and advantage; that about the 20th of May, 1844, Williams transferred to Isaac Butts of New York, and his assignees, the sole and exclusive right to manufacture and sell the said medicine in various states and places, including all the eastern part of Pennsylvania, which right Butts, on the first of March, 1845, conveyed to complainant, together with all the apparatus and appurtenances used in manufacturing the medicine, and all stereotype plates, pamphlets and bottle moulds used in vending the same. The bill contained, as part of it, the advertisements, wrappers and labels used in advertising the medicine by Fowle, and a bottle filled with the medicine, and stamped with the words, "Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry. Philadelphia, I. B." was deposited with the bill, and referred to in it as an exhibit. The bill then further alleged, that the defendant, for the purpose of selling some composition which he called "The Original Dr. Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry," and inducing persons to purchase the same as complainant's medicine, had caused to be manufactured bottles, which exactly resembled in size and shape those used by complainant, and caused the same inscription to be stamped thereon, except two letters, "I. B.," for which defendant substituted "W. & Co." but which, as was done by complainant, defendant covered with the label he used, and also used wrappers and labels substantially the same as complainant's. The wrappers, advertisements and labels, used by the defendant, formed part of complainant's bill, and one of the bottles used by defendant was deposited with the bill, and referred to therein as an exhibit. The facts and allegations set forth in the bill were supported by the complainant's special affidavit thereto, and the affidavits of three other persons were filed in support of certain of the material facts and allegations thereof. A motion was made for an injunction upon the filing of the bill, and notice given to the defendant, who appeared to oppose it; but no answer was filed nor any affidavits read on his part.

Mr. Ingraham, for complainant, in support of the motion for an injunction.

This case being heard upon the bill and affidavits produced by complainant, the only question is, as to the relief afforded by the law. The application is to restrain the use by the defendant of the complainant's trade marks, upon the well-known principles which courts of law and equity both enforce. The principle of protection is, that every man has a right to the means of distinguishing his own property from that of another. Blofeld v. Payne, 4 Barn. & Adol. 410, where it was decided that though you sell your own goods, you cannot use a wrapper resembling that of another person, and thus represent them as his; and this principle has been applied to a case where no mistake could have been made by a purchaser. Lewis v. Langdon, 7 Sim. 421.

KANE, District Judge. Is there any case in which a court of equity has interfered to protect a quack medicine?

Mr. Ingraham. The bill alleges that this is "a valuable medicine," and that is uncontradicted; besides, it is not very easy to understand what it meant by a "quack medicine," and what is meant by a "quack" is still harder to define.

KANE, District Judge. In a late trial for libel in this city, it seemed to be the result of the understanding of the most eminent of the faculty who were examined, that a "quack" meant a practitioner who prescribed or recommended a secret medicine.

Mr. Ingraham. That is very intelligible certainly, and of easy application, for unless I am greatly mistaken, the names of the most eminent of the faculty are to be found to certificates recommending Swaim's Panacea; but the answer to the suggestion is, that if the plaintiff has no right to the claim he makes and appellation he assumes, another person cannot use his own name, if it be the same as plaintiff's, in such a way as to produce an eventual deception. Sykes v. Sykes, 3 Barn. & C. 541; Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84; Hine v. Lart [10 Jur. 106], 2 Sandf. Ch. 600. Damages are recovered at law in such cases. Southern v. How, Poph. 144. And equity interferes by injunction. Dolland v. Bell, Harris v. Callaghan (Rolls, 1825), and Partridge v. Fatman, circuit court of Pennsylvania, May, 1847 [unreported], were cited, and also the Case of Tom Pouce, or General Tom Thumb, in the "Tribunal de Commerce," at Paris, May, 1845; Stratton v. Roqueplan, in which Roqueplan was enjoined from using and announcing in playbills or placards, that one Duhamel would appear in the character of Tom Pouce; which name had become the property of young Stratton, and therefore no one else could use it. These cases were cited from newspaper reports. Gout v. Aleploqlu, 6 Beav. 69, note; Coats v. Holbrook, 2 Sandf. Ch. 586; Taylor v. Carpenter, Id. 603,—were also cited and commented on, and also 2 Keen, 213; 2 Man. & G. 385. It is not at all material that the acts complained of should have been knowingly done. Millington v. Fox, 3 Mylne & C. 338, which case, for the process was secret there, and Croft v. Day, decided the very point presented for adjudication, the resemblance "being sufficient to mislead the ordinary run of purchasers."

Mr. Goodman (and Mr. Guillou was with him) resisted the motion. This claim to protection of mere names is of recent origin, and may be traced to the protection afforded in England to persons who have served apprenticeships before they are permitted to work at a trade. It will not be extended here so as to protect a useless compound, by protecting the shape of bottles, and any designation that may be used to sell articles not clearly of a useful nature; and that is the answer to Croft v. Day, for there is no allegation that Day & Martin's blacking itself is protected by a patent. The case in Popham is clearly on that ground; and Lord Hardwicke's determination not to protect a complainant in the exclusive use of the stamp of the "Great Mogul" on packs of cards, any more than he would prevent "one innkeeper from setting up the same sign with another," 2 Atk. 485, proceeded upon the same principle. The spirit of our patent laws is on the same principle; it must be for some "useful" invention; and in England the doctrine has been applied in practice to publications not deemed of a meritorious character, the piracy of which will not be interfered with by injunction. The cases of Walcot v. Walker, 7 Ves. 1, and Southey v. Sherwood, 2 Mer. 438, illustrate the course of courts of equity; and the case of Pidding v. How, 8 Sim. 477, is conclusive that in this stage of the cause such a court will not interfere, any more than it will in any doubtful case. 3 Paige, 214. In addition to the cases referred to by the complainants, Eden, Inj. 70; Drew. Inj. 235; Canham v. Jones, 2 Ves. & B, 218; Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1869, 1870 (Boston Ed. 1846), and 3 Doug. 293, were cited; as also Snowden v. Noah, Hopk. Ch. 347. Besides, another ground of uncertainty in this case arises from the act of assembly of March 3, 1847 (Pamph. Laws, 198), in relation to "false stamps and labels." It is not clear that the answers to some of the interrogatories of this bill might not involve the defendant in a prosecution under that act; and the same ground upon which he could demur to any matter of that kind, will be his protection from an injunction till answer, if the court have any doubt, whether he is bound to answer at all, derived from the bill itself.

KANE, District Judge. I have considered the application for an interlocutory injunction in this case, and have come to the conclusion that it must be refused. The bill sets forth in substance, that the complainant is the manufacturer of a secret medicine, which he calls "Dr. Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry," and that he sells it in bottles of a peculiar form, enclosed in wrappers, which bear certain devices and directions. On one of these wrappers, which is made part of the bill, the balsam is described as "a valuable family medicine for consumption of the lungs, coughs, colds, asthmas, bronchitis, croup, whooping-cough, difficulty of breathing, pains in the side or breast, liver complaints, &c.;" to which another paper, also among the exhibits, adds "influenza, hoarseness, pains or soreness of the chest, &c." The bill then charges, that the defendant has fabricated a different medicine, and is selling it in bottles of the same form, bearing almost the same title, and enclosed in wrappers, which proclaim in the same words exactly the same virtues for the spurious, as are asserted by the complainant for the genuine, balsam. The defendant has not answered, nor filed any responsive affidavit. I should most anxiously avoid every appearance of discourtesy towards parties who have been so honorably represented before me; but speaking from the record, this is plainly a contest, real or simulated,—and whether it be the one or the other, neither the highly respectable counsel, nor the court can know, —between the vendors of a quack medicine, the elements and action of which are not disclosed in evidence. For aught that appears, it may be innocent enough; but though "valuable," as it is sworn to be, to the party who compounds and sells it, it is readily conceivable that to him who buys and takes it, it may be far otherwise. It is not the office of chancery to intervene, by its summary process, in controversies like this; "non nostrum tantas componere," looking at the incongruous group of diseases, for which the balsam prescribes itself to public credulity, I must apply the principle of the vice chancellor's decision in Pidding v. How, 8 Sim. 477, that a complainant, whose business is imposition, cannot invoke the aid of equity against a piracy of his trade mark. The only remedy in such a case is at law. Motion dismissed.

OCCUPATION OF REAL ESTATE BY ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY—RENT.

Bankrupts, at the time of their bankruptcy, were in the occupation of premises, on which were an engine and some rice-cleaning machinery. After the adjudication of bankruptcy, which was on December 23d, 1874, the assignee took possession of this property, which remained on the premises till November following, when it was sold by the assignee. The landlord then petitioned to be allowed for the use and occupation of the premises, and, on a reference to the register, he gave evidence to show that the fair rental value of the premises was $600 a year, and claimed compensation at that rate. The assignee gave evidence that the value of the premises, as a store house for the property, was $200. The register reported in favor of the payment of that sum by the assignee to the landlord, for the use and occupation of the premises: Held, that the estate in bankruptcy should make compensation for the use and occupation of the premises, to the extent that the estate had been benefited thereby, and that the report of the register should be confirmed.

This case came before the court on a petition by Moses S. Beach, owner of premises in Furman street, Brooklyn, to be paid for the use and occupation of those premises from the date of the adjudication, December 23d, 1874, to the following November. The matter being referred to the register, it appeared, by the evidence adduced before him, that, at the time of the adjudication, the premises were in the occupation of the bankrupts [Charles R. and Edward Fowler], in their business of dealing in rice, for cleaning rice, they having therein a large amount of machinery, and a steam engine which they used in their business; and that the assignee, on his appointment, took possession of the property, which remained in the premises till it was sold by the assignee in November, 1875, for $1,000. The landlord gave evidence to show that the rental value of the premises was $600 a year, and claimed to be paid at that rate. The assignee gave evidence that the value of the premises, as a store house for the machinery, was $200. The register reported in favor of the payment of $200 to the petitioner, and gave the following opinion: "The undersigned considers that the estate in bankruptcy of a bankrupt is not chargeable for the use and occupation of a store or other premises, unless the purposes of the estate require the use and occupation of such premises, and then that the compensation for such use and occupation is to be measured by their benefit and value to the estate. Where rent is in arrear, the landlord has it in his power, at any time, to put an end to the occupation of the premises by the bankrupt or by the marshal or assignee or other officer of the court. If he is dissatisfied with the prospect of an award of compensation for the use of his premises for the purposes of the estate in bankruptcy, he may generally have his remedy by summary proceedings, under the statute. At any rate, unless under an order of the court after the filing of the petition by or against the bankrupt, there cannot be a contract, express or implied, to bind the estate of the bankrupt to pay rent, because the parties who are to pay rent, the creditors or others interested in the estate of the bankrupt, are not parties to the contract. The assignee in bankruptcy is not the agent of those parties to enter into any contract. The property of the estate of the bankrupts in the building for the use and occupation of which the claim against the estate of the bankrupts is made in the present case, produced, on the sale by the assignee, the sum of about one thousand dollars. The landlord asks from the estate of the bankrupts, for the use and occupation of his premises for the storage of this property, the sum of five hundred dollars. It is plain that it would be a reproach upon the administration of the law to allow fifty per cent. of the value of the property of the bankrupts merely for taking care of it. If, by leaving property of the estate of the bankrupt on the premises, or by advertising the lease for sale, the assignee incurs a liability for rent, it is a personal liability, and, if there is a lease, the liability of the bankrupts, upon the covenants of the lease, for rent accruing after the filing of the petition, will not, it is believed, be discharged by his discharge in the proceedings in bankruptcy. It is right, however, that the estate in bankruptcy of the bankrupts should, to the extent that the estate has been benefitted by the use and occupation of the premises, make compensation for such use and occupation. Upon the evidence on this reference, the reasonable amount of such compensation, is, in the judgment of the undersigned, the sum of two hundred dollars. The undersigned has accordingly reported that sum as an allowance for such compensation."

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I concur in the foregoing opinion of the register.

[1 Lowell, 161;[1] 1 N. B. R. 680.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1867.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—VOLUNTARY PETITION—CONCEALMENT OF ASSETS—RIGHT OF CREDITORS TO RESIST ADJUDICATION.

1. A debtor over whom the court has jurisdiction commits an act of bankruptcy when he files his voluntary petition for adjudication, and a single creditor cannot resist the adjudication by plea and proof that the debtor is really able to pay all his debts.

2. If the debtor has property concealed, the assignee is the proper person to recover it for the benefit of the general creditors.

3. Such a concealment would be itself an act of bankruptcy, and is no ground for refusing to adjudge the debtor a bankrupt on his own petition.

4. The cases in which creditors may resist an adjudication are where there is some defect in the proceedings, or the court has no jurisdiction.

5. A petition by one partner against another is quasi in invitum, and the objecting partner may show that the firm is not insolvent; though in such a case, if creditors intervened, perhaps the court might require security to be given for the payment of the joint debts before dismissing the petition.

In bankruptcy. James L. Fowler filed his voluntary petition early in June, being the thirteenth case begun under the act, and before adjudication one of his creditors filed written objections to the petition, setting out that Fowler was not unable to pay all his debts, and that his only object was to delay him in the collection of certain executions which he held against Fowler. The question whether these objections if well sustained in fact were sufficient in law to prevent an adjudication, was heard by the court.

R. M. Morse, Jr., for creditor. The district court has full equity powers under the statute, analogous to those which the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts exercised under the insolvent law. It will stay proceedings that are improperly brought, as that court has often done. Thompson v. Thompson, 4 Cush. 127. That the allegations of the petition may be contested, see Holbrook v. Jackson, 7 Cush. 136, remarks of Shaw, C. J.

A. Wellington, for bankrupt.

LOWELL, District Judge. The district court has power to hear and decide all contested questions, and to stay proceedings improvidently begun. The eleventh section of the statute [Act 1867 (14 Stat. 521)] seems to contemplate that voluntary petitions may sometimes be contested, for it provides that the register may make adjudication if there be no opposing party. But it is not the intent of the act that the court should inquire whether the petitioner is insolvent or not. When a debtor swears that he is unable to pay his debts in full, and files the requisite petition and schedules, he has committed an act of bankruptcy, and any creditor may then carry on the proceedings if the debtor shall fail to do so. His act is for the benefit of all persons interested, and cannot be retracted on the application of only one of them, with or without the debtor's consent. No notice is required to creditors before adjudication, and the judge or register is only to inquire whether the debtor owes three hundred dollars. Section 11. That he is unable to pay his debts in full and is willing to surrender all his property is conclusively proved by his petition, so far as a decree of bankruptcy is concerned. He may be, in fact, fraudulent, and able and unwilling to pay his debts; but the law takes him at his word, and makes effectual provision, not only by civil but even by criminal process to effectuate his alleged intent of giving up all his property. If I should undertake, on a preliminary hearing, to decide that the petitioner has ample means to pay his debts, but is unwilling to discover them, and should dismiss the case on that ground, I should be usurping the province of the assignee, and should surrender the very powers and remedies which the bankrupt law provides for that exigency; besides giving the single creditor, who objects in order to save some attachment or security, an advantage which the law intends to avoid. The only questions open upon a voluntary petition are those which go to the jurisdiction, such as residence, and a sum total of provable debts of three hundred dollars. It is these which section 11 refers to as being possibly contested. So where one copartner petitions and another copartner resists, the latter has an interest to retain his own property, and may show that the firm is not insolvent. A creditor has no such interest in his debtor's property as a partner has in that of his firm. His rights, except where they tend to give him a preference over the general body of creditors, are fully secured in bankruptcy. And even in case of a partnership, the court might perhaps have power to order security to be given for the payment of the joint debts before dismissing the petition.

If this creditor were the only one, and the petition were intended merely to vex and hinder him, or if all the creditors joined in a protest, and were ready to discharge the debtor, there might be some ground to stay the proceedings; but to do it at the instance of one out of several, on the ground that the debtor has undisclosed assets, would be contrary to the whole spirit of the act. There is no such effectual mode of obliging a fraudulent debtor to do justice to all his creditors, as to proceed against him in bankruptcy, and the law does not intend that he should do justice to less than all. The only objection made to this adjudication is one which, if true, would be a sufficient reason for adjudging the debtor a bankrupt, namely, that he has property concealed which ought to be used in payment of his debts. Such a fact is evidence of insolvency as well as bankruptcy, and if other evidence than the debtor's petition were admissible, would tend to confirm rather than to disprove the allegations of the petition. Adjudication ordered.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY — RIGHT OF CREDITORS IN THE MATTER OF DISCHARGE—FRAUD—WHEN DISCHARGE MAY BE ANNULLED.

1. Any creditor who has a provable debt against a bankrupt may apply to the court, after a year, and perhaps earlier, to require the bankrupt to have the question of his discharge determined.

2. If a bankrupt has applied for his discharge, and given due notice, &c., but has neglected to procure an order granting the discharge, it is not usually permitted to a creditor, who neglected to file objections in due time, to come in and file charges in opposition. The rights of all parties have already been fixed, and the mere neglect to take out an order ought not to prejudice the bankrupt.

3. If, in such a case, a creditor discovers frauds, he may require the bankrupt to take his discharge, if he chooses to do so, and the creditor will then have his remedy by applying to annul it.

4. The two years within which a creditor may have discharge set aside begins when the debtor actually takes his discharge; but the previous knowledge which is to bar the creditor's right to annul, must be knowledge which he could have availed of, that is, such as he had before the return-day of the order, to show cause why the discharge should not be granted.

In bankruptcy. This bankrupt [James L. Fowler] applied for his discharge in May, 1868, which was within one year after the proceedings were begun; and on the return-day in the following month a creditor filed specifications of objection; and nothing more appeared of record until March, 1872, when a different creditor applied for an order on the bankrupt to show cause why he should not bring the proceedings to a close, and for permission to oppose the discharge, on the ground that the first objecting creditor had been settled with, in order to avoid his opposition. This applicant had not proved his debt, and had not opposed the discharge, and said he had discovered the facts only a few months before he made his application.

A. Wellington, for bankrupt.

F. Woodside, for creditor.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

LOWELL, District Judge. It appears that the plaintiff, so to call him, has a provable debt, for which an action is pending in a state court. Under section 26 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 529)], which requires all such suits to await the determination of the question of discharge, provided there be no unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in endeavoring to obtain it, it is my practice to permit any creditor, whether he has proved his debt or not, to apply for such an order as was granted in this case, to show cause why he should not receive his discharge, or be refused it. If this were not allowed, every state court, where any suit was pending against the bankrupt, would be obliged to inquire whether any delays that might have occurred in this court were due to the bankrupt's fault; an issue which might often be not only very embarrassing to the state court, but might lead to misunderstandings and counter orders in the different jurisdictions. When, therefore, any creditor demands it, after the lapse of the year allowed by statute, and perhaps in some cases before that time, I proceed to require the bankrupt to bring forward the case, or be refused his discharge.

I am not prepared to grant the second part of the application, and hear objections from a creditor who has neglected for so many years to take any steps in the cause. Supposing it to be true that the bankrupt has dealt unlawfully with the original objecting creditor, and has influenced his action by a pecuniary consideration, contrary to section 29, yet this is alleged to have been done long ago, and the present applicant, when he discovered the fact, did so with no view to the proceedings here. He was merely looking up the evidence here, in order to see what his rights were at common law. It seems to be in violation of sound practice to let him in to oppose the discharge at this time. All that a creditor in that situation can do is to speed the cause on the record as it stands.

I have known the argument to be advanced that a creditor should be heard against the discharge, at any time before it is actually taken out; because, if he discovers any fraud before that time, he cannot obtain a rescission of the discharge under section 34. But my opinion is that section 34 must be construed to mean, that if within two years after the actual date of the discharge, or of the order for it, a creditor applies to annul it, and proves a fraud such as is referred to in that section, and proves that he did not know of the fraud on the return-day of the order to show cause, on the bankrupt's application for his discharge, he is entitled to have it set aside. My reason is, that the return-day is the last day on which a creditor has a right to appear. It cannot be that he is to be barred of his petition to annul, by a knowledge which was too late to be of any use to him, nor that he is bound to apply to the court for an enlargement of time, in every case in which the discharge happens not to have been issued or granted as soon as the bankrupt was entitled to have it. By intendment of law, the rights of the debtor and his creditors are ascertained on the return-day. But the debtor cannot defeat the operation of the thirty-fourth section by neglecting for two years to procure an order of discharge. It follows, as a reasonable construction of the whole section, according to its true intent, that different points of time must be considered as referred to by the two phrases, in themselves very much alike, concerning the time for applying to annul, and the time after which the creditor must have acquired his knowledge, else the discovery of a fraud during the interval, long or short, after the bankrupt's right to his discharge is fixed, and before it is actually granted, will be a casus omissus. The protection which the court has, in this precise case now before me, is that the bankrupt must make oath that he has not influenced any creditor.

Discharge to be granted, if the bankrupt files the usual certificate and oath within fourteen days; without prejudice to the right of this creditor to apply under section 34.

PLEADING—LIS PENDENS—BURDEN OF PROOF—RECORD EVIDENCE.

1. Lis pendens in chancery is created by filing a bill and actual service of subpoena.

2. At law, suing out a writ constitutes the pendency of a suit, without service of the same.

3. A plea of another action pending is an affirmative plea, and casts the onus probandi on the party pleading it, and the proof to sustain it must be record evidence.

4. When the defendant has shown the issuing of a writ for the same cause of action, he has proved, prima facie, the pendency of a suit; and it then devolves on the plaintiff to show, by record evidence, the disposition of it, parol evidence being inadmissible.

5. It would be competent to dismiss the previous writ at the time, by leave of the court, or have an order of dismissal nunc pro tunc entered of record, and thus destroy the effect of the plea in abatement; but the omission cannot be supplied by parol testimony.

Appeal from Pulaski circuit court.

Before CROSS and CLAYTON, JJ.

CLAYTON, J. This was an action of debt, brought by Richard C. Byrd against Absalom Fowler, in the circuit court of Pulaski county, in which the defence set up was a plea of the pending of a former suit for the same cause of action. The circuit court permitted the clerk to prove by parol that the writ in the former suit had been dismissed, overruled the plea, and gave judgment for the plaintiff; from which judgment an appeal was taken to this court. In chancery it is settled, that a lis pendens is created by filing a bill and actual service of the subpoena. 2 Madd. 256; 1 Johns. Ch. 566.

At law, suing out a writ constitutes the pendency of a suit, without any further step, and neither service of process, nor any other proceeding, is required to form the ground of a plea of another action pending for the same cause. 1 Bac. Abr. 23; 5 Coke, 48, 51. The plea of another action pending is an affirmative plea, and casts the onus probandi upon the defendant pleading it, and the proof to sustain it must be record evidence. 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 19. A record is a memorial of a proceeding or act of a court of record, entered in a roll for the preservation of it. 7 Com. Dig. tit. "Record," A. When, in this case, the defendant in the court below showed the issuing of a writ for the same cause of action, he proved, prima facie, at least, the pendency of a suit; and it then devolved on the plaintiff to prove, by competent testimony, that the suit had been disposed of, and was no longer pending. The parol evidence introduced for the purpose was not, in our opinion, legal. Brush v. Taggart, 7 Johns. 20; Hasbrouck v. Baker, 10 Johns. 248; Jenner v. Joliffe, 6 Johns. 9. Had he moved for leave to enter at that time a dismission of the first writ, or an order directing the clerk to make out upon the record a statement of the facts and dismission, as they had actually occurred, nunc pro tunc, we think upon that state of the case the plaintiff would have been entitled to succeed. But the failure to do so, and the attempt to supply the omission by parol testimony, constitutes such an error as to warrant the reversal of the judgment.

It is probable that even now, the plaintiff, by entering of record a dismissal of the first suit in the circuit court, will be entitled to have judgment in that court. Judgment reversed.

BANKRUPTCY — JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT IN EQUITY—JUDGMENTS AT LAW—WAR—INTEREST.

1. The United States district court, as a court of equity, having cognizance of all cases and controversies between a bankrupt and his creditors, has the same power to restrain creditors in judgments at law against a bankrupt that a state court of equity would have over such creditors if the debtor were not a bankrupt.

[Cited in Hudson v. Schwab, Case No. 6,835.]

2. The power to reduce the amount of judgments at law rendered on Confederate contracts, to the equivalent in legal money, is an equitable power belonging to state courts of equity, and may be exercised in cases where bankrupts are parties defendant, by the United States district courts, sitting as courts of equity.

3. War interest being inequitable under the laws of Virginia, the United States district court, as a court of equity, may require the judgment creditors of a bankrupt to abate such interest when embraced in judgments rendered by default, before 1873.

[Cited in Harmanson v. Wilson, Case No. 6,074.]

[Suit by John S. Fowler, assignee, against John J. Dillon and others.]

At the June term of the county court of Loudon, 1871, judgments by default were obtained, one of them by the administrators of Anne Dillon, deceased, against William N. Hough, for two thousand six hundred and fifty dollars, with interest and costs; another of them against W. N. Hough and two other defendants jointly in favor of John J. Dillon, for one thousand nine hundred dollars, with interests and costs; and another by John J. Dillon against W. N. Hough and two other defendants, for four hundred and fifty dollars, with interest, and costs. At the October term, 1868, of the circuit court of Loudon, a judgment was obtained by the representative of Joshua Reed, deceased, against William N. Hough, for eighty-three dollars and forty-four cents, with interest and costs; and at the June term, 1871, of the county court of Loudon, an office judgment was obtained by the representative of Joshua Reed, deceased, against William N. Hough, for the sum of two thousand dollars, with interest and costs, subject to large credits for payments made November 28th, 1870, and December 21st, 1870. Upon these latter judgments execution went out, and were returned, or levied, so as to bind the personal property of William N. Hough; and the judgments were docketed as liens upon his real estate. Except the one specified, no part of these judgments has been paid. On the 15th day of March, 1873, the said William N. Hough was adjudicated a bankrupt in this court. All the debts on which the judgments named were taken were Confederate debts, made during the Civil War, and the consideration of them Confederate money or bank bills of banks of the Confederacy. The amounts of the debts for which the judgments were taken were never scaled down to their value in genuine money; but the judgments were taken for their full face value. All the judgments, except probably that of October, 1868, were by default, and embraced interest for the period of the Civil War. The act of assembly relieving against war interest was not passed until April 2d, 1873.

HUGHES, District Judge. The question is, can this court require the creditors in these judgments to scale these debts? The courts of Virginia, as courts of equity, have frequently interfered when their powers were invoked to rectify the amounts for which judgments at law have been taken expressed in Confederate money. And besides this prescriptive equitable power to correct mistakes in judgments, and prevent the enforcing of unconscionable claims, exercised by these courts as courts of chancery, the legislature has conferred statutory powers upon the courts in this class of cases. Recognizing the equity of thus scaling debts contracted in an inflated and depreciated currency, and in order to secure uniformity of procedure, the general assembly of Virginia, in Acts of Assembly for 1872–73, p. 219 (Code 1873, p. 982), passed laws allowing proof of the real consideration of Confederate contracts to be made; directing Confederate debts to be scaled by a fixed schedule of values; giving remedies in the courts against judgments for Confederate debts obtained after the war by default, and obtained during the war for Confederate amounts; and giving the courts power, upon evidence, "to scale the said debts and judgments" as of such date as may to the court seem right "in the particular case."

The courts of the state, as courts of chancery, have not considered that in exercising this power to adjust the amounts due upon money contracts according to principles of equity and good conscience, they were violating or impairing contracts; but have thought, rather, that they were executing them according to the real intention of parties. And the general assembly of Virginia has not, in endeavoring to fix a schedule for the graduation of contracts, thought for a moment that it was abrogating or impairing contracts; but rather that it was providing a legal basis for the private settlement of Confederate contracts, and thus preventing the necessity of carrying every such contract into the courts.

I do not, therefore, concur in the proposition of counsel for the judgment creditors of Hough, that judgments by default for the full amount of money called for by Confederate contracts are vested rights, beyond the reach of an act of assembly or a court of equity. The power of the court of chancery over judgments at law has not been disputed since the reign of James I., and extends to the proceeding at law in every stage. Story, Eq. Jur. § 886; Kerr, Inj. pp. 21–27; and Spence's Eq. Jur. p. 674. In repeated cases in Virginia have the state courts, as courts of equity, interfered to rectify the amounts recovered by judgment on Confederate contracts, by scaling them to their equitable value. And the general assembly of Virginia has, in chapter 43, § 10, of the Code, recognized this power in courts of equity, and forbidden its abridgment, by providing that nothing in the act making provision for the correction of judgments and adjustment of accounts due upon Confederate contracts "shall be construed to take away or impair the ordinary jurisdiction of courts of equity." It has, moreover, given a remedy by summary motion in courts of law to any defendant aggrieved by judgment on default for Confederate money, rendered since March 3d, 1866. Certainly, if such judgments may be opened by summary motion on notice to the creditor, there can be no successful denial of the power of a court of equity, clothed with a prescriptive jurisdiction over contracts and judgments, which has existed for nearly three centuries, to correct judgments of the class under consideration, by enjoining creditors from enforcing them.

If, therefore, this were a court of the state sitting in chancery, upon a general creditors' bill, brought for the marshalling and distribution of the effects of an insolvent debtor, there would be no doubt not only of its power to look into the consideration of the contracts on which the judgments against Hough were obtained, for the purpose of rectifying them, but it would be its duty to do so, and to reduce the amounts to their proper value for the benefit of the creditors of the estate.

The proceeding in bankruptcy is nothing more nor less in its nature and objects than a general creditors' bill; and the bankruptcy court is in effect a court of chancery, established for the specific purpose of administering a bankrupt's estate under a proceeding which is in effect a general creditors' bill. As such, it has precisely the same powers in equity over judgments of state courts affecting the bankrupt's estate, which a state court of equity would have under a general creditors' bill, if the debtor were not a bankrupt. It is true that the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] forbids the summary proceedings in bankruptcy to be used where third persons, other than the bankrupt and his creditors, are to be affected, and requires, in such cases, that the proceedings taken in the district court shall be plenary proceedings, in the form of a suit in equity. This requirement has been enforced in the present case; and the question is, has this court power to look into the consideration on which the debts of Hough, the bankrupt, were founded, which are the subject of the judgments that have been described?

As a court of equity, clothed with power and jurisdiction over "all cases and controversies between the bankrupt and his creditors, for the collection of assets, and the ascertainment and liquidation of liens thereon, and for the marshalling and disposition of the different funds and assets, so as to secure the rights of all parties, and to effect a due distribution of the assets among all the creditors," this court has not only the same power as a state court of equity to restrain the enforcement of a judgment at law recovered against a bankrupt for an improper amount, but it is its peculiar duty and province to do so. As the state courts of equity do not hesitate, when invoked, to restrain the enforcement of judgments for the full amount of confederate contracts, it cannot be deemed an unusual or unauthorized stretch of power in a bankruptcy court sitting in chancery to do the same thing.

I have already stated the reasons which induce me to reject the idea that judgments of the class under consideration confer vested rights, and cannot be disturbed, except by violating the constitutional inhibition against impairing the obligation of contracts. Congress is not subject to this inhibition, and the courts of the United States may proceed in the discharge of the functions with which they are clothed by congress without violating it. But in this case no such objection can hold good. To correct a judgment at law so as to conform the amount recovered by it to the real intention of the parties, and render it consistent with justice and equity, is not to impair the obligation of contracts, but the reverse.

There is but one other question left for consideration; and that is whether, after judgment by default, the judgment creditor may be made to abate the interest which accrued on his debt during the period of the late civil war. I think the principle is settled in Virginia, that interest during a period of war is not recoverable except by the express allowance of the court or a jury. Judge Joynes, president of the district court of appeals at Petersburg, said in the case of Tucker v. Watson, 6 Am. Law Reg., (N. S.) 220, upon a review of the authorities on the subject: "After such an array of judicial opinion and authority, including at least one express decision of the court of appeals of Virginia, we do not feel disposed, if we were at liberty, to examine the question as an original one, and do not think it necessary to explain the various grounds on which the decisions referred to have been placed..... We are of opinion that interest during the war is not recoverable."

The laws of Virginia have, from the earliest history of the commonwealth, left the question of interest, in every contract, to the discretion of the jury. The language of Code 1849, p. 673, is: "The jury, in any action on contract, may allow interest on the principal sum due, or any part thereof, and fix the period at which such interest shall commence." The language is repeated in Code 1873, p. 1120, § 14; as taken from the act of assembly of 1872–3 (chapter 353), passed April 2, 1873. This act gives the same power over interest as to all future contracts. The same act, in another clause, gives power to the court or jury to allow or disallow interest arising during the period of the late civil war. The same act, in another clause, provides that on any "judgment or decree heretofore rendered, which has not been paid, the defendant may, on motion, after ten days' notice to the plaintiff, cause the same to be reviewed by the court in which it was rendered, and if it shall appear from the record that the judgment embraces (war) interest, it shall be lawful for the court to cause said judgment to be abated to the extent of the interest so embraced." These provisions of statute law, all taken together, conclusively show that in Virginia interest is deemed to be a subject not of natural, but of statutory right, to be allowed to a creditor only when and to the amount prescribed by statute or by the tribunal intrusted with power over the subject. And the last clause above quoted is virtually an assertion by the legislature, that its power is so complete that judgments for interest shall not confer a vested right, which shall transcend the power of the legislature or the courts and juries to reach it.

The settled law of Virginia being not only generally that interest is subject to the discretion of a jury, but, specially, that interest during the period of war shall not be taken, except by allowance of court or jury after contest, it follows that if a judgment has gone by default for interest during the war at any time before the act of 1873, it is within the province of a court of equity to require the creditor in such a judgment to abate the interest. The judgment does not confer a vested right, and covers an inequitable claim, which it is against the policy of the law of Virginia to allow.

I return, therefore, to the question whether this court, as a court of equity, with jurisdiction and power over the creditors in the judgments under consideration, may compel those creditors to abate the war interest on their debts. If they had recovered those judgments after contest, and after the passage of the act of assembly of 1872–73, c. 353, then the subject may have been res adjudicata, and the creditors might not have been interfered with. But, as laid down by Judge Marshall, in [Marine Ins. Co. v. Hodgson] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 336: "Any fact which clearly proves it against conscience to execute a judgment, and of which the party enjoined could not have availed himself at the trial at law.... will authorize a court of equity to interfere by injunction to restrain the adverse party from availing himself of such adverse judgment."

Not doubting, therefore, the power of this court over the creditors in these judgments, and seeing that the laws of the state declare that the collection of war interest is inequitable, and that the law authorizing the disallowance had not been passed at the time that these judgments were rendered, I am of opinion that this court ought to interfere to require an abatement of the war interest on these judgments; and that it ought not to put the bankrupt or the assignee to the needless task of applying to the courts of law which rendered these judgments for an abatement of this war interest.

NOTE. The decree in this cause was affirmed on appeal by the circuit court. [Case unreported.]

EVIDENCE—FOLLOWING STATE STATUTES—ATTACHMENT OF WITNESS FOR CONTEMPT.

1. The state statutes which prescribe rules of evidence in civil cases, in trials at common law, are, by the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 92), made rules of decision in trials at common law, in civil cases, in the courts of the United States.

2. The provision extends so far as to make evidence competent which would be inadmissible under the rules of the common law, whether the state statute be or be not enacted subsequently to the passage of the judiciary act.

3. Accordingly, a defendant made liable by the statute law of New York, to examination as a witness for the plaintiff, is liable to be attached for contempt in not obeying a subpoena issued by this court and served on him, commanding him to attend and be examined on the trial of a civil suit at common law, pending in this court.

This was an action at common law, on trial before a referee appointed between the parties. A subpoena, issued under the seal of the court, on behalf of the plaintiff [John Fowler], directed to the defendant [John Hecker], commanding him to appear before the referee, as a witness for the plaintiff, at a time therein designated, and also requiring him to produce in evidence certain books of account, was duly served on the defendant, by the marshal, who made a return to that effect. The defendant refused to obey the subpoena. The plaintiff now, on affidavit and notice, moved for an attachment against the defendant, for contempt of court, in not obeying the subpoena. The defendant opposed the motion, on the ground that he was the party defendant to the record in the cause, and, as such, not liable by the statute laws of the United States, or the usages and practice of its courts, or the principles of the common law, to be called as a witness in the cause.

Horace Andrews, for plaintiff.
Robert B. Campbell, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. In McNiel v. Holbrook, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 84, 89, the supreme court determined that the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 92), embraces within its provisions those statutes of the several states which prescribe rules of evidence in civil cases, in trials at common law. The same principle is confirmed in Sims v. Hundley, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 1, 6. This doctrine is now followed in this circuit, in common law cases, in all instances where the statutes of the state render evidence competent which would be inadmissible under the rules of the common law, whether the state statute be or be not enacted subsequently to the passage of the judiciary act. The 390th section of the Code of Procedure of the State of New York provides, that "a party to an action may be examined as a witness, at the instance of an adverse party, or of any one of several adverse parties, and, for that purpose, may be compelled in the same manner, and subject to the same rules of examination, as any other witness, to testify either at the trial, or conditionally, or upon commission." Supposing the reference in the present case to have been legally instituted, the defendant was bound to obey the subpoena, and the cause he offers in excuse is no protection to him against the mandate. An order against the defendant for contempt of court may, accordingly, be entered and enforced against him, unless, at the adjourned day appointed for the hearing before the referee, he appears and submits himself to examination as a witness.

[NOTE. On the report of the referee to whom the cause had been referred by consent of the parties, judgment was rendered for the defendant, whereupon he brought error, and the cause was heard by the supreme court on motion of defendant in error to dismiss, which motion was overruled. Hecker v. Fowler, 1 Black (66 U. S.) 95. At the December term, 1864, the cause was again heard by the supreme court, and the judgment of the circuit court duly affirmed, Mr. Justice Clifford delivering the opinion; but the questions determined in the principal case did not arise, as the case was presented to the supreme court. BILLS AND NOTES—MAILING NOTICE TO INDORSER—POST-OFFICE ADDRESS.

Notice to an indorser, if sent by mail, must be directed to the post-office of his place of residence.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Assumpsit by the indorsee against his immediate indorser of a draft by T. B. Pottinger on John E. Dorsey, at Baltimore, to the order of Thomas Mustin, indorsed by him to the defendant [Peregrine Warfield], and by the defendant to the plaintiff [Charles S. Fowler] for $300, at sixty days from September 13th, 1828. The defendant's residence was notoriously at Georgetown, D. C., where there was a post-office, distant three miles from the post-office in Washington, D. C. The notary who protested the draft at Baltimore, put into the post-office there, a notice directed to the defendant at Washington. The plaintiff proved by George Sweeny, who was then a clerk in the post-office at Washington, that it was customary, when a letter was directed to that office for a known resident in Georgetown, to forward it to the post-office there; but it was uncertain whether it would be so forwarded by the mail on the same day on which it arrived, as it might not be noticed by any one who knew that the residence of the person to whom it was directed was in Georgetown. That he knew that the defendant resided in Georgetown, but had no recollection of sending such a letter.

THE COURT (nem. con.), at the prayer of the defendant, instructed the jury, that this evidence of notice was not sufficient to charge the defendant in this action; upon the authority of the case of the Bank of U. S. v. Corcoran, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 121. Nonpros.

It is admitted that their petition was was also duly filed in the state court. The motion now made to docket this cause brings before the court the question whether this removal is warranted by the act of congress, and whether this court can entertain jurisdiction in the cause. The petitioners allege that they are colored citizens of the United States, and of this state, to whom a certain George Fowlkes, deceased, late of Pittsylvania county, devised valuable lands and other property, by will duly recorded in the county court of Pittsylvania, at its December term, 1873; that afterwards the heirs at law of said George Fowlkes brought their bill in chancery against those petitioners and others to impeach the validity of said will in the circuit court of Pittsylvania; that an issue of devisavit vel non was directed and tried in said cause; a verdict found against the will; that verdict was set aside by the judges; a new trial awarded, and upon the trial the jury were hung and discharged from rendering a verdict; upon these facts the petitioners predicate their averment that "they are unable to enforce their rights in the judicial tribunals of the state on account of the prejudice that exists against them in the minds of the white population on account of their color, race and previous condition of sevitude." They further declare "their belief that if no difference existed between them and those claiming to be the heirs at law of the said Fowlkes, as to race, color and previous condition, that the juries in the state courts would have no difficulty in finding, under the facts and circumstances of the case, that the said paper writing was the true last will and testament of the late George Fowlkes." Is this application, then, in conformity with the 641st section of the Revised Statutes?

It is observable that the late comprehensive act for the removal of causes from the state courts, approved March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 470], embraces cases only originally cognizable by the federal courts. The same is the case of removal on the ground of "prejudice and local influence." The exception to this applies to cases of public officers, civil and military, sued on account of acts in the discharge of their official duties; and to persons denied or prevented from enforcing in the courts of the state their equal civil rights of citizens of the United States, and to officers, civil and military, or other persons for their acts or refusals under authority of the civil rights act. This departure from the fundamental principle of limiting removals to cases cognizable in the federal courts, results from the duty of the government to its officers; and the obligation of congress to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution. These exceptional statutes, therefore, are to be strictly construed, interpreted if practicable, in subordination to and conformity with the theory of our judicial systems, state and federal, and the provisions of the constitution.

There is no law enabling a colored citizen, when impeached by another citizen of the same state, to remove his cause because of prejudice or local influence. This right is only given him when sued by a citizen of another state. And then the affidavit is prescribed to him, namely: "That he has reason to believe, and does believe, that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court." The interposition of the federal judiciary is wholly based upon this belief or apprehension; and why? Because the cause was originally cognizable in that judiciary, and its removal thereto would involve an enlargement of the jurisdiction. Had congress supposed that it had the power under the fourteenth amendment in a case between residents of the same state to give the colored citizen a right to remove his case on the ground of his belief that he could not obtain justice in the state court, why did it not use the language of the 639th section? Doubtless, the omission to use this language is due to the restricted and well guarded inhibitions of the fourteenth amendment: "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Now, when section 641 speaks of "the denial of or inability to enforce in the judicial tribunals of the state, or in the part of the state, etc., equal civil rights of citizenship, is such language to be satisfied by the declaration of a belief or apprehension that such may be the result of the prejudice of race? The latter is a state of the mind; matter of conjecture and not traversable; it may be mere suspicion. At any rate, it is vague, uncertain, and can produce no practical issue. Not so with the former: there it appears as a fact, certain and absolute and, if need be, issuable and capable of contradiction. The petition must state "the facts; of what?" manifestly of "the denial or inability to enforce;" not merely of a belief or suspicion of these facts. When we construe this language in subordination to the constitutional amendment, it seems to me it clearly points to the action of the state in one of its three capacities—legislative, executive or judicial. Ought not the petitioner in such case to designate some law, some judicial ruling, some executive act, as the denial of his equal and civil rights, or as constituting the obstacle to his obtaining them? Surely it would be a mockery to assume his "suspicions" or "belief" in place of "the facts" for which this enactment calls. So far as the record of this case shows, the petitioners are enjoying their rights under the will of George Fowlkes; it is true, they are sued in respect to them; and when they were about to lose them by the verdict of a jury, the judge interposed to shield them from the effects of prejudice, they deprecate, and now their complaint is that on a second trial the jury were hung, and the plaintiffs could not obtain the verdict they wished. They are still secure in their rights, but apprehend they may not remain so.

This enactment of congress was never designed to appease the fears or lull the suspicions of a suitor in a case wholly cognizable in the state courts; it is designed to secure him the equal protection of the laws, and his equal civil rights, when invaded by the state in any part of its administration—legislative, executive or judicial. Nevertheless, the petition does not disclose any such case; it complains of no law of the state, general or local; no judicial ruling; no executive interference; it was a fear and belief of the existence of a prejudice of race, that is obstructing or delaying a decision in favor of the petitioners. They do not allege the absence of a law for change of venue in such case. They do not complain that juries are selected contrary to the state law, to which this court is required to conform as far as practicable. The fact is, my rule is based on the state law; it uses its phraseology as to qualification, and ordains a selection by lot as nearly conformable as practicable to the state practice; the only difference is that I require a representation of the colored race in the jury box, while the state merely allows their eligibility. I can scarcely doubt that in a case like this where there is a fear of race prejudice, the state court would guard against it by an impartial composition of the jury, as is often practiced; and may, it seems to me, be rightfully demanded in this cause. If this court were to try this case they would have to do so under the laws and judicial decisions of the state, when not in conflict with the laws of the United States and judicial decisions of its courts; hence there is eminent propriety in limiting removals to cases of such conflicts pertaining to the guaranteed, equal rights of citizens.

For these reasons, I conclude that the case of the petitioners is not embraced by the terms nor the proper construction of the section of the law, under which they prefer their application; that they allege "no denial of their civil rights nor inability to enforce them in the state court" arising from any act of the state government, either legislative, executive or judicial; and hence that this court cannot assume jurisdiction of their case by removing and entertaining it here.

THE COURT, therefore, refuses to docket the case, and directs it to be remitted to the circuit court of Pittsylvania.

BANKRUPTCY — SALE OF PERSONAL PROPERTY — POWER OF COURT TO SET ASIDE — RIGHTS OF PURCHASERS—NOTICE — SUPERVISORY JURISDICTION — RIGHT TO GRANT A SUPERSEDEAS — REPLEVIN IN STATE COURT.

[An order made by the circuit court, in the exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction over the proceedings of the district court in bankruptcy, may be reviewed on appeal by the supreme court.]

[See note at end of case.]

In bankruptcy. At chambers. On motion for a supersedeas from the decision of Judge Drummond, of the United States circuit court, to the supreme court, in the matter of the possession of the dredging machinery and property of the bankrupt firm of Fox & Howard. Judge Blodgett confirmed, some months ago, the sale of this property for $40,500, to Conro & Carkin, and subsequently Judge Drummond reversed the action of Judge Blodgett, and decreed the right of possession to Crane & Hodgkins, the original bidders, directing that the former account to the latter for the profits arising therefrom during the time they have used it. An application was thereupon made for an appeal to the supreme court, which was refused by Judge Drummond, who intimated, however, that if they thought an appeal would lie from his decree, where it was made under the supervisory jurisdiction given the circuit court by the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], they could present the matter before Justice Davis. Therefore, when Justice Davis was in Chicago on the 3d inst., the matter was fully presented to him and he took it under advisement. Prior to this, however, the property was taken, on a writ of replevin issued by the supreme court of Cook county, from the possession of Conro & Carkin, on giving bonds in $80,000. This was done after the decision of Judge Drummond.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice, said this case presented no difficulty for him when it was first heard, but he had since then turned the matter over in his mind a good deal, and the first impressions he had about it had been confirmed. The only point that was argued and that he had considered at all, was whether there was such a question growing out of the exercise by the district court of its summary jurisdiction, as ought to be reviewed by the supreme court. He had come to the conclusion when he had heard the case, and reflection had convinced him that he was right, that the case ought to go to the supreme court for its opinion. He did not want to express any opinion as to whether the district court had jurisdiction in this case or not. It all turned on this point in his opinion. Nor had he read the evidence with a view to ascertaining anything in relation to the merits of the transaction. A good deal could be said on both sides of that question. It was one of great importance, and he knew of no decision in this country, either by the district court or by the United States circuit court, that exactly met it. In his own opinion there were grave doubts whether the district court had summary jurisdiction of this matter; and, although, as he had stated before, he had no fixed opinion upon that question, yet he thought it was right to the party, under the rules applicable to all courts granting a writ of supersedeas, to be allowed to take the case to the supreme court. He did not wish to go on and give his opinion at all. Although he had a strong opinion as the case exists now, he did not wish to give any at all upon the question, reserving himself free, when the case shall be argued in the supreme court, in order to pass upon it. It was very certain that the question was one that ought to be passed upon by the supreme court. If the supreme court was of opinion that the district court had summary jurisdiction in this matter, the case, of course, would be dismissed. If, in the judgment of the supreme court, the district court had not the summary jurisdiction which was invoked, then the case might be retained there, and could be disposed of at that time. Had there not been so much feeling on this subject he would have had no doubt that this was a proper case to take to the supreme court. He did not believe it was the intention of congress to give the district court exclusive jurisdiction in anything. It was neither his duty nor pleasure to pass upon any questions passed upon by the circuit or district courts except what had been brought up here to be determined now. If there was any question about this case at all, with reference to the court granting a supersedeas, there was no question that when Mr. Cooper, on behalf of Crane & Hodgkins, made an application for a writ of replevin, he was guilty of a gross contempt of court. The question as to whether these parties have been in contempt or not was for the district and circuit courts to determine.

Thereupon Justice Davis directed the clerk, Bradley, to draw up the supersedeas, in order that he could sign it. Considerable side discussion ensued between Mr. Cooper, Mr. Ayers, and Justice Davis regarding the matter. Justice Davis said that inasmuch as the property had been replevied from Conro & Carkin, contracts made, and the season pretty well advanced, he was of the opinion that it would be about the proper thing to place the property in the hands of a receiver until the matter could finally be disposed of. The great difficulty, he said, existed in the bad feeling between the respective parties; it was entirely wrong to go into the state court for the purpose of obtaining the property in question when it was in the bankruptcy court of the United States. That, however, was a matter, he said, between Judges Drummond and Blodgett. He thought there was not a spirit of compromise manifested by either side.

[NOTE. The appeal of Conro & Carkin was dismissed by the supreme court, Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivering the opinion, on the ground that appeals do not lie to the supreme court from decisions of the circuit courts in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction under the bankrupt law. In this case the rights of the parties grew out of a sale made by the authority of the court under section 5065, Rev. St. The bids were received by the provisional assignee; but the court determined which should be accepted, and gave directions as to the transfer of title. Clearly, then, remarked the learned justice, "what was done as to the first and second sale was in the course of the bankruptcy proceeding, and part of that suit. As such, it was subject to revision in the circuit court under its supervisory jurisdiction." Conro v. Crane, 94 U. S. 441.

[In May, 1877, the district court ordered that Conro & Carkin have leave to withdraw the $40,500 paid for the machinery on giving proper security. The money was paid to them, whereupon Crane & Hodgkins filed a bill in the circuit court against Conro & Carkin and the assignee, charging fraud and conspiracy, etc. The circuit court rendered a decree for complainant, and Conro et al. appealed to the supreme court. The decree of the circuit court was there reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the circuit court to dismiss the bill. Conro v. Crane, 110 U. S. 403, 4 Sup. Ct. 102.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Dec. 18, 1879.

MORTGAGES — LIMITATIONS — ACTION BARRED IN FAVOR OF HOLDER OF JUNIOR MORTGAGE.

1. By the law of Connecticut, the right of a mortgagee of land to foreclose the mortgage or to sue to recover possession of the land, is barred, if the mortgagor has been permitted to remain in possession of the land for 15 years at least, without paying any part of the debt or recognizing the mortgage.

2. A second mortgagee of the same land, out of possession, can bring a suit in equity against the first mortgagee, out of possession, and the mortgagor in possession, to have the first mortgage cancelled, on the ground of the bar of such statute.

In equity.

Thomas E. Graves, for plaintiff.

Edward Goodman and John J. Hill, for defendant.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity, by a mortgagee out of possession, against a prior mortgagee and the mortgagor in possession, praying that the prior mortgage may be decreed to be cancelled, upon the ground that, more than fifteen years prior to the date of the bill, the mortgagor paid the notes secured by said mortgage, and that, for more than fifteen years, the mortgagee has had no equitable interest in the land conveyed by said deed, and that, during all said term, the mortgagor has been in full and exclusive possession of said land, adversely to said prior mortgagee, and paying no interest upon said mortgage notes. The bill was served October 30th, 1877. Said prior mortgagee has brought a cross-bill, praying for a foreclosure of his mortgage.

On or about June 6th, 1854, Orange D. Day executed and delivered to Frederick A. Blossom a mortgage of that date upon land in Killingly, in this state, correctly described in said bill, to secure five promissory notes of $1,000 each, payable respectively in four, six, twelve, eighteen and twenty-four months from said date, with interest payable semi-annually. Said mortgage was duly recorded on July 14th, 1854, in the town records of Killingly. No interest or principal has been paid upon said notes. In June, 1855, Day acknowledged an indebtedness to Blossom upon said notes. There was testimony contradicted by Day, that, in 1858, he also acknowledged an indebtedness to Blossom, but, since 1855, Day has never admitted or acknowledged an existing liability to Blossom, and has never done any act recognizing the continued existence of the mortgage, or by which an acknowledgment of an existing liability could be inferred. In December, 1868, Blossom brought against Day a petition for the foreclosure of said mortgage, returnable before the supreme court for Windham county, alleging the execution of the mortgage, and the delivery and non-payment of the notes. To this petition Day filed an answer, admitting the execution and delivery of said notes and mortgage on June 6th, 1854, and that before that date he owed Blossom $4,000, but averring that said notes were executed in pursuance of an usurious agreement in regard to the forbearance of said debt, and that said notes and mortgage were void, and denying all other allegations of said petition. The petition was withdrawn during the August term, 1870. Blossom was then in Europe, where he had been detained by sickness. Ever since 1854, Day has been in the exclusive, uninterrupted use and occupation of said land, and, since 1858, at least, has occupied said land adversely to any rights of Blossom, and has held the same not recognizing any title, equitable or otherwise, existing in said Blossom. The mortgage deed to Blossom excepts from the covenant against incumbrances "a life lease to my" (the mortgagor's) "mother." There never was a lease to his mother, but he had executed a mortgage to William S. Day, upon condition that the mortgagor should provide or pay for his mother's (Amy Day's) support during her life. The consideration of said Blossom notes was a good considera tion, and they were not usurious. Prior to June 6th, 1854, said Blossom, Day, and one E. G. Reynolds were partners in the city of New York, under the name of O. D. Day, but the remaining allegations of the answer to the cross-bill of Blossom, in regard to the purpose for which the notes were given, and the cancellation or payment thereof by set-off or otherwise, are not affirmatively found to be true. The testimony is contradictory and untrustworthy.

Said Day, on August 27th, 1877, was justly indebted to John O. Fox, the plaintiff, in the sum of $3,000, which indebtedness was evidenced by his promissory note, dated August 11th, 1877, payable to said Fox three years from said date, with interest semi-annually, and, to secure the payment of said note, mortgaged, on said August 27th, 1877, the lands described in the bill and the same lands mortgaged to Blossom. Said mortgage was duly recorded. Fox did not examine the records, but was informed by Day and believed, that the property was free from incumbrances, except the mortgage to William S. Day for the support of Amy Day. Nothing has been paid upon said note, either as interest or principal. Day is insolvent and there is no probability that he ever will pay the note.

By the law of Connecticut, the mortgagee's right of foreclosure, in a suit at law for the recovery of possession, is barred, if the mortgagor has been "permitted to remain in possession of the premises for a period of fifteen years, at least, without payment during that time of any portion of the debt, or the performance of any act recognizing the continued existence of the mortgage." But, an acknowledgment of the existence of the debt by the mortgagor during his ownership, and within fifteen years from the time of bringing the bill for foreclosure, is sufficient to remove the bar, for, such recognition of the debt, as a subsisting debt, is a recognition of the mortgage as a security, and prevents "the time that had elapsed from being counted or considered as any part of the fifteen years' uninterrupted possession, necessary in order to bar the mortgagee's right to bring ejectment or to foreclose the mortgage." Hough v. Bailey, 32 Conn. 288; Jarvis v. Woodruff, 22 Conn. 548; Haskell v. Bailey, Id. 569; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 489.

It is useless to say that Day's answer in the superior court foreclosure suit was an acknowledgment of the debt, for he expressly denied that it was an existing debt, and denied non-payment of the notes, and averred that the mortgage and notes were void.

The defendant Blossom insists, as matter of law, that the plaintiff has no right to a decree, because he is out of possession, and is a mortgagee whose debt may be paid at maturity. When the mortgagee ascertains that there is an apparent but fictitious in cumbrance upon the mortgaged land, and that the safety of his mortgage is important to the safety of his debt, he has the same right to have his lien protected by a court of equity and relieved from prior nominal incumbrances which have been paid or otherwise satisfied or extinguished, which the owner has to have his title relieved from a cloud. The suit is not prematurely brought because the principal of the debt is not due. Lounsbury v. Purdy, 18 N. Y. 515. The principle upon which courts of equity act in the cancellation of invalid deeds or other invalid instruments does not depend upon the particular interest or title which is to be protected. It is sufficient if the plaintiff has some interest in or title to the land which is clouded with an invalid lien, and that his interest or title is endangered thereby. Hartford v. Chipman, 21 Conn. 488; Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 430. The principle is familiar and is as clearly stated as anywhere in Martin v. Graves, 5 Allen, 601. "Whenever a deed or other instrument exists, which may be vexatiously or injuriously used against a party after the evidence to impeach or invalidate it is lost, or which may throw a cloud or suspicion over his title or interest, and he cannot immediately protect or maintain his right by any course of proceedings at law, a court of equity will afford relief by directing the instrument to be delivered up and cancelled, or by making any other decree which justice and the rights of the parties may require."

The fact that the plaintiff is out of possession does not deprive him of the right to the benefit of a bill quia timet. Martin v. Graves, 5 Allen, 601; Hartford v. Chipman, 21 Conn. 488; Lounsbury v. Purdy, 18 N. Y. 515. There are, probably, instances where a claimant out of possession should not obtain the aid of a court of equity, by a bill quia timet, to establish his right to a legal title and to the possession, against a defendant in possession with an apparently valid legal title; but, the case of a mortgagee who claims that another mortgage of record is functus officio, and has been extinguished, both parties being out of possession, is not of such a character.

Let there be a decree that the mortgage to Blossom constitutes no lien upon the lands named therein, and that said lands are freed from said nominal incumbrance, and that the cross-bill is dismissed.

District Court, D. Maryland. 1871.

BANKRUPTCY — CONCEALMENT — BONA FIDE CONVERSION OF ASSETS—CUSTODY OF PROCEEDS—INVESTMENT.

1. There is no concealment where a debtor makes a bona fide conversion of his property, and shows good faith in respect to the care of the money received therefrom.

2. A debtor will not be adjudicated a bankrupt simply because, after selling his property for the purpose of going into a new business enterprise, he does not put the proceeds into a tangible shape to prevent the same being seized on process issued out of a state court. Petition dismissed.

The allegation was that defendant, on January 4, had concealed a portion of his property, viz.: the sum of two thousand dollars, with intent to prevent its being taken on legal process, which he knew was about to issue at the suit of one or more of his creditors. The defendant excepted to this allegation on the ground that it was too general; that it did not state that any legal process was in existence, that there was no legal process which could reach money in possession, and that the act did not embrace the concealment of property which it was impossible to reach by any legal process. Objections overruled.

It appeared in evidence that the petitioner, defendant, and seven others, had given their joint and several promissory notes in the sums of two thousand five hundred dollars, and one thousand five hundred dollars, for moneys borrowed in behalf of the Scheutzen Association; that the association had made a real estate mortgage to Fox and others to secure them in this sum of four thousand dollars; that after maturity, Fox had paid the one thousand five hundred dollars in cash, and given his individual note (not yet due), with collaterals, in payment of the two thousand five hundred dollar note, and his demand against the defendant was for contribution of one-ninth part of the four thousand dollars. The defendant objected, that petitioner had not a provable claim of sufficient amount, because: First, he did not offer to surrender the security which enured to his benefit on payment of the notes, nor show that there was an overplus of two hundred and fifty dollars; second, the petitioner not having paid the two thousand five hundred dollar note in cash, but having only given for it another obligation, he could not demand from defendant his proportion of that amount; that a co-obligor has no right of contribution against his co-promisor, or co-security, unless he has actually paid the money, and therefore the petitioner's claim was not large enough to support an adjudication.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

Marshall & Fisher and Ross & Urner, for petitioner.

John & Albert Ritchie, for defendant.

THE COURT (GILES, District Judge), held that the security being upon the property of a third party, and not upon the debtor's, the case was not within the act; and that the petitioner having satisfied the holder of the note, it was immaterial how he had done so, and he had a demand for contribution, whether he had, in point of fact, paid it or not.

Touching the allegation, the evidence was, that seven months before the defendant had sold his real estate for two thousand dollars to his son, who gave his note, which was paid at ninety days; that the notes in question, and one other of the same character, were outstanding at the time, and had been for two or three years, and that defendant's other property was about seven hundred dollars; that defendant had sold his said real estate for the purpose of investing the proceeds in a proper business enterprise in which he expected to enter; that on payment of the two thousand dollars he handed it over to his wife, and that she had been in the habit of taking care of any large sums of money defendant had for twenty-five years; that she kept it about the house for several months, and had it on the said 4th January; that when the enterprise referred to was abandoned, defendant looked about for another investment, bought two lots in the county, built the foundations, and was in negotiation with a carpenter for the erection of several small houses when these proceedings commenced; that in December judgment had been had against defendant, and five other co-promisors by another party, on the third note referred to (of four thousand dollars); that defendant claimed to have a right of action against the petitioner for damages amounting to about his proportion of the two notes taken up by said petitioner; that on January 4th petitioner's attorney called on defendant and told him that petitioner had paid these two notes, and he had called to collect his proportion; that defendant replied that he (petitioner) was the one who ought to pay them, and that when petitioner settled his claim for damages referred to, he (defendant) was ready to pay him the difference; that the attorney then asked him what he had done with the two thousand dollars; to which defendant replied that he had it and intended to keep it.

THE COURT held that there was no concealment shown; that the conversion of his property had been shown to be bona fide; that no act had been shown further than to preserve custody of the proceeds; that the proceeds he had a right to preserve in money or not, as he pleased; that the evidence showed good faith on the part of defendant in respect to the care of the money; and that the proposition of the petitioner was substantially that the defendant ought to be adjudicated bankrupt, simply because he had not put his two thousand dollars again into tangible property that could be seized on a fieri facias. Petition dismissed.

FOX v. HEMPFIELD R. CO.

[3 Wall. Jr. 243;[1] 14 Leg. Int. 148; 1 Pittsb. Rep. 372; 5 Pittsb. Leg. J. 37.]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. May Term, 1857.

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT TO SUBMIT TO PRIVATE AWARD.

If parties, in making a contract under which disputes are contemplated as possible, agree under seal to submit any such disputes to private arbitration, as e. g., to the award of some third person, so that his decision shall be final and conclusive on them both, it is a bar to any action on the contract that the plaintiff does not either aver and prove such award, nor aver and prove such facts as excuse it.

[Cited in Hudson v. McCartney, 33 Wis. 346.]

The plaintiff—a contractor on the Hempfield Railroad—declared in an action of covenant, on an article of agreement made by him with that railroad company, the present defendant, for the construction of a section of the road. He averred that he commenced the work according to contract and continued to prosecute the same, and was ready and willing to have completed it, but was hindered and prevented by the defendant from prosecuting and completing the work, and was thereby deprived of his reasonable gains and profits that would have accrued to him, to the amount of $50,000. He averred also that the defendants have not paid him for work which he did, the sum of $25,000.

The defendants craved oyer of the article of agreement, which on being read showed the following clause in them: "And it is mutually agreed and distinctly understood that the decision of the chief engineer for the time being, shall be final and conclusive in any dispute which may arise between the parties of this agreement relative to or touching the same; and each and every of said parties do hereby waive any right of action, suit or suits, or other remedy in law or otherwise, by virtue of said covenant; so that the decision of the engineer shall, in the nature of an award, be final and conclusive on the right and claims of the said parties; and the said engineer being a stockholder of this company shall be no objection to his exercising the trusts and power herein granted to him."

The plea averred that the supposed breaches of covenant, wrongs and injuries of which the plaintiff complained, had not been submitted to the decision of the engineer, and that the defendants have always been and still are ready and willing to submit all controversies and disputes between them and the plaintiff relative to and touching said agreement, to the final and conclusive decision of said engineer.

A demurrer to this plea raised the question, which was now before the court for decision, st., Can the plaintiff sustain this action without averring and proving an award by the engineer on the matters in dispute, between the parties, or excusing the want of it by averment and proof that it was out of his power to obtain such an award?

Mr. Shaler, for plaintiff.
Mr. Hamilton, for defendant.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The meaning of this clause cannot be doubted, notwithstanding its rather awkward expression. The parties agree that in case any matter arise between them concerning any matter connected with their agreement, instead of resorting to the legal tribunals for their settlement, they will submit the same to the decision of the engineer, whose award shall be final and conclusive.

If the plaintiff had averred that the matters in dispute had been submitted to the arbitrator, and that he had awarded the sum of $50,000 as damages, there is no doubt he could support an action on the award, if the defendant had refused to perform it. Such contracts to submit anticipated disputes on any subjects to an arbitrator whose award should be conclusive, have sometimes been held void, for the reason (if reason it can be called) that it was an attempt to oust the supreme courts of their jurisdiction. In Scott v. Arery, 8 Exch. 487, the court of exchequer ruled a plea like the present, bad, for this reason. The exchequer chamber reversing this judgment held, that although an agreement which ousts superior courts of their jurisdiction is illegal and void, yet as the contract did not deprive the party of his right to sue, but only rendered it a condition precedent that the amount to be recovered should be first ascertained by the arbitrator, it bound the parties. This latter judgment has now been affirmed by the house of lords on the advice of four to three learned judges, and sanctioned by the recommendation of the lord chancellor, and Lords Campbell and Brougham.

The result appears to be: First, that a condition in a contract that the sum recoverable on a breach shall be ascertained by arbitrators before the parties shall sue, either at law or at equity, is not such an agreement as will be treated as invalid, or as an attempt to oust the courts of their jurisdiction; and, secondly, that it is even doubtful whether there is any sufficient foundation, either in policy or principle, for the ancient and hitherto undoubted doctrine that parties cannot bind themselves by contract not to resort to the courts of law or equity. Lord Campbell stated thus emphatically his view of the main question in dispute:—"There is an express undertaking that no action shall be brought until the arbitrators have decided. There is abundant consideration for that in the mutual contract into which the parties have entered. Therefore, unless there be some illegality in the contract, the courts are bound to give it effect. There is no statute against such a contract. Then on what ground is it to be declared illegal? It is contended that it is contrary to public policy. That is rather a dangerous ground to go upon. What pretence can there be for saying that there is anything contrary to public policy in allowing parties to contract that they shall not be liable to any action until their liability has been ascertained by domestic and private tribunal upon which they themselves agree? Can the public be injured by it? It seems to me that it would be a most inexpedient encroachment upon the liberty of the subject if he were not allowed to enter into such a contract." And his lordship subsequently traced with much disapprobation the origin of the opposite principle, which he attributed to the endless competition of the courts, and their desire to absorb litigation into their respective jurisdictions.

This obsolete dogma does not appear to have been received with approbation in Pennsylvania. In the case of Monongahela Nav. Co. v. Fenton, 4 Watts & S. 205, it was decided that "if the parties to an executory contract make a provision in it that any dispute, which shall arise between them on the subject of the contract, shall be determined by an individual named, whose decision shall be final, no action will lie for a breach of the agreement by one against the other, but they must resort to the tribunal appointed by themselves, from whose award there is no appeal." That case governs the present, as to every dispute arising "relative to or touching the agreement" declared on.

Such a clause in contracts like those constantly made by corporations for great public improvements, is absolutely necessary to prevent the corporations from being ruined by endless litigation. It should be liberally construed and not subjected to ingenious criticism in order to support the jurisdiction of courts . law and encourage litigation.

The defendant is entitled to judgment on the demurrer. [See same case [Case No. 5,011]; Snodgrass v. Gavit, 4 Casey [28 Pa. St.] 221; Wightman v. Pettis, 5 Casey [29 Pa. St.] 283; McCahan v. CORPORATIONS—EXECUTION AND LEVY—JURISDICTION.

1. The act of 1870 does not repeal any of the preliminaries before levy and sale, required by section 75 of the act of 1836, in proceeding against a corporation, but is "in addition" thereto. The preliminaries required by the former act are still essential to the validity of a levy.

2. Where the supreme court of a state has, by its decree and authorized officers, taken judicial control of the property and franchises of a corporation, and ordered their sale, they cannot be taken in execution by process from any other jurisdiction.

Motion to set aside execution and levy against the defendant.

Burgwin & Shiras, for the motion.

Kirker & Schoyer, opposed.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. On November 23, 1860, the plaintiff obtained in this court two several judgments against the Hempfield Railroad Company, amounting now, in the aggregate, to a sum exceeding seventy thousand dollars.

These judgments were subsequently revived, and a fi. fa. issued, by virtue of which the marshal, on October 12, made a levy upon the road, its rolling stock and franchises, and all its property, real and personal.

The road was chartered by Pennsylvania, to run from Greensburg, in Westmoreland county, to a point on the western boundary of the state, and Virginia granted a similar charter, so as to make a continuous road from Greensburg to Wheeling. The road has only been completed and operated from Wheeling, in the state of Virginia, to Washington, in the state of Pennsylvania.

A motion is now made to set aside the execution and the levy for several reasons assigned, to two of which it is alone necessary to refer.

It is contended, and the point is well taken, that this levy under the act of 1870 [Laws Pa. 58], has been prematurely and illegally made. This supplementary act, which I hesitated to adopt as part of the process of this court, because of the sharpness of its practice, is amendatory of section

[2] [From 1 Pittsb. Rep. 372.]

[1] [Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

72 of the act of 1836 [Laws Pa. 774]. It provides that in addition to the provisions of the seventy-second section, and in lieu of the proceeding by sequestration, the plaintiff may have execution by fi. fa., commanding the officer to levy the sum due of any personal, real, or mixed property, franchises, and rights of the corporation, and proceed to sell the same. It does not repeal any of the preliminaries, before levy and sale, required by section 72 in proceeding against a corporation, but it is "in addition" thereto. What is necessary to be done before you arrive at the point of sequestration, for which this process is designated to be a substitute? Section 72 provides that executions against corporations shall be executed in the following manner: The officer shall go to the principal office of the corporation during the usual office hours, and demand of the president, or other officer having charge of such office, the amount of such execution, with legal costs. If no person can be found on whom demand can be made, or if the amount be not forthwith paid after demand be made, the officer shall seize the personal property of the corporation sufficient to satisfy the debt. If no sufficient personal property be found, the officer shall levy upon the real estate of the corporation and proceed as in other cases for the sale of land. When the execution issued is returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, then begin the proceedings by sequestration, which the supplementary act of 1850 was designed to supplant. This course of proceeding divests the statute of many sharp features which render it obnoxious to criticism, and affords the corporation ample notice of its peril, before its property and valuable franchises can be seized and sold. For it will be remembered that this levy and sale is in addition to the provisions of section 72, and was intended to relieve the creditor and the courts of the cumbrous machinery of sequestration, which was found inadequate to meet the exigency of the case. As none of these essential preliminaries have been complied with, this levy must be set aside.

Here we arrive at a consideration of graver consequence, which goes to the merits of the question submitted. Shall we, by the process of the courts of the United States, interfere with a court of competent jurisdiction, which has already assumed the control and custody of the whole property of the corporation? Conflicts of jurisdiction are to be avoided as well from necessity as from comity.

On the 27th of June, 1855, the Hempfield Railroad Company executed a mortgage to certain trustees, which, with its supplements, was given to secure the payment of the bonds of the company to the amount of one million dollars. Interest in a sum exceeding three hundred thousand dollars having accrued upon these bonds, the bondholders filed their bill in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, praying for a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises, and a distribution of the proceeds among the creditors of the corporation. After some delay and much litigation, in which the validity of the mortgage was called in question, that high court, on the 10th day of April, 1869, inter alia, decreed a sale of all the property and franchises of the company upon the 1st of March next, upon the failure to pay, on the 30th of the present month, the coupons ascertained to be due.

It was urged with much force at the argument, that the plaintiff decedent in this case being a contractor who had expended his time and labor in the construction of the road, by virtue of the act of 1843, the mortgage must be postponed, and as to him was utterly null and void.

Whatever may be the merits of his claim as to priority under the statute, the validity of this mortgage cannot be controverted in a collateral proceeding here or elsewhere. The judgment of the supreme court as to its binding force, whether this question as to the act of 1843 was raised or not, is conclusive upon this and all other courts. The plaintiff is at liberty to contest his priority yet, in that forum, upon the question of distribution. The fact that his claim has passed into judgment in a court of the United States, does not deprive him of the rights of a creditor in the tribunals of the state.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania having, by its decree and authorized officers, taken judicial control of the property and franchises of this corporation, and ordered their sale, they cannot be taken in execution by process from any other jurisdiction. Mr. Justice McLean, in [Hagan v. Lucas] 10 Pet. [33 U. S.] 401, says, the first levy, whether it was made under the federal or state authority, withdraws the property from the reach of the process of the other. A most injurious conflict of jurisdiction would be likely often to arise between the federal and state courts, if the final process of the one could be levied on property which had been taken by the process of the other. Property once levied on remains in the custody of the law, and is not liable to be taken by another execution in the hands of a different officer, and especially by an officer acting under a different jurisdiction. Similar doctrine is held in [Williams v. Benedict] 8 How. [49 U. S.] 107; [Wiswall v. Sampson] 14 How. [55 U. S.] 52, 374; and in [Marks v. Dickson] 20 How. [61 U. S.] 503. Judge Agnew, also, in Robinson v. Atlantic & G. W. Ry. Co. [66 Pa. St. 160], adheres to the same rule. And as it will be borne in mind that a part of the property levied on in the present case is in the state of Virginia, and beyond our territorial jurisdiction, we may adopt his language, that "if the property may be taken piecemeal, the remedy of the creditors under the mortgage would become worthless, or at least greatly imperiled."

The fi. fa. having regularly issued to collect the fruits of the judgment, although wanting in the preliminaries to the levy for its proper execution, it may be said there is no good reason why the court should recall it. But, as pending the decree of the supreme court, the plaintiff can take nothing, except litigation, by his writ, it is set aside.

Rule absolute, and the levy and execution set aside.

FOX et al. v. HOLT et al.

[4 Ben. 278;[1] 36 Conn. 558.]

District Court, D. Connecticut. July 27, 1870.

POWERS OF MASTER — DISCHARGE — SAILING ON SHARES — LIABILITY OF OWNERS FOR HIS CONTRACTS—FREIGHT — DELIVERY OF CARGO — SUPPLIES—MORTGAGE—BILL OF LADING.

1. Where a corporation, owning fifteen sixteenths of a vessel, voted to discharge the master of her "unless he pays $200, on what he now owes this company," but the master still remained in actual possession of the vessel, which was then absent from her home port, and on her return he was actually displaced: Held, that, till such actual displacement, he must be deemed to have been master of the vessel.

2. Where the vessel had been employed in carrying stone from Connecticut to port out of that state, and had been accustomed to take return cargoes, for which the master had been accustomed to execute contracts of affreightment, and this practice was known to the owners: Held, that the vessel was a general freighting vessel as to these return cargoes, and, as to them, the master must be deemed clothed with the ordinary powers of masters of general freighting vessels.

3. Where a master described himself as such in the body of a bill of lading and signed it with his own name: Held, that the fact, that he did not add the word "master," after his signature, was of no importance.

4. Where the master of a vessel, who was also part owner, was sailing her on shares, in an employment as above stated, and took a cargo of stone to New York, and went up the Hudson river for a cargo, and the vessel was there frozen in, and the master, leaving her with the mate as ship-keeper, returned to his home at Deep River, Conn., and, while there, agreed with residents of Deep River, to bring a load of coal for them, from Rondout to Deep River; and in the spring he received the coal on board, signed a bill of lading for it and sailed for Deep River, and, on his arrival there, was displaced from the command of the vessel, and another master put in charge, who offered to deliver the coal to the consignees, if they would pay the freight, and they refused to pay the freight, but offered to give security to pay it "if they were liable," and thereafter all the coal was delivered to the consignees except thirty-seven tons, which was retained on board, and with which the vessel sailed to Portland, and landed it there, giving notice to the consignees, that it was at their disposal whenever the freight should be paid; and the consignees filed a libel against the owners of the vessel, for their refusal to deliver it; and it appeared that, when the vessel arrived at Deep River, the master was indebted to the consignees for supplies, some of which had been furnished to the vessel, some to the master's family, and some to the family of the mate, on the master's order: Held, that the master could bind the owners, by taking the coal on board, and signing the bill of lading.

5. The owners of the schooner generally were not liable to the libellants for any of the indebtedness of the master to them, except for that portion which was for implements for necessary and permanent use on board the vessel.

[Cited in Schultz v. Bosman, Case No. 12,488.]

6. The owners were justified in detaining part of the cargo till the freight was paid; but they should have seen to it, that they retained no more than was necessary.

7. As the value of the thirty-seven tons, retained, exceeded the amount of the freight, the respondents were liable to the consignees for the excess, together with the amount for which they were indebted to the libellants for supplies furnished to the vessel, directly.

8. As the master had agreed to deliver this coal to the libellants, at a stipulated freight of $2 a ton, in discharge of the debt due from him to them, part of which they could not have recovered in a suit in admiralty against him, as it did not rest on a maritime contract, and he had received the cargo under that contract, he became bound to its performance, and was personally liable for its failure, and a decree must be rendered against him, for the amount of the debt.

[Cited in Robinson v. Memphis & C. R. Co., 9 Fed. 137; McKay v. Ennis, 37 Fed. 231.]

9. It is the duty of a shipmaster, where a consignee refuses to pay the freight, to land the goods and store them with some competent third party, subject to the consignee's order on payment of the freight. If there is no such competent party at the port of discharge, the master should probably land the goods at the nearest port, where such competent party can be found. But he must act prudently and in good faith, in view of all the circumstances.

[In admiralty. Suit by Henry Fox and John S. Lane against Hubert B. Holt and the Middlesex Quarry Company.]

D. Chadwick and A. P. Hyde, for libellants.

S. L. Warner, for respondents.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This was a libel in personam against the respondent Holt, as master, and both the respondents, as owners of the schooner Daniel Russell, a domestic vessel, belonging to Portland, in the state of Connecticut, within the collection district of Middletown, and registered at the latter port. The suit is to recover damages for the breach of a contract of affreightment, in the failure to deliver a part of a cargo of coal shipped at Rondout, in the state of New York, and to be delivered at Deep River, in the state of Connecticut. The amount in controversy is not large, but the principles involved are of interest to persons owning, navigating, and dealing with domestic vessels employed in the coasting trade. As the facts in the case are peculiar, a somewhat extended statement of them may be useful.

The Daniel Russell is one of a number of vessels owned in great part by the Middlesex Quarry Company, a corporation located at Portland, and engaged in quarrying stone, and delivering the same at various ports beyond the limits of this state. The quarry company own fifteen-sixteenths of this schooner, and, on the 10th of March, 1865, Holt became the owner of one-sixteenth, by bill of sale from one White. On the same day a new enrollment was taken out of the collector's office at Middletown, in which Holt is described as master. He took charge of her as such, and the answer admits that he continued as master down to about the 30th of January, 1868. The bill of lading of the cargo was signed by him on the 31st of March, 1868. The quarry company deny that he was master at the latter date, and also that he signed the bill of lading as master. On the facts before the court, he must be deemed master on the day the bill of lading was signed. He had been master for several years preceding this contract. "Being once master, he must be deemed still to hold that character, until some overt act or declaration of the owners displaced him from that station." The Tribune [Case No. 14,171]. He is described in the enrollment as master. "The enrollment is evidence of what it declares at the time it was made, and it may be presumed that the same facts exist until a change is shown." Jordan v. Young, 37 Me. 276, 280. Of course, neither the fact that a person was master at a particular time, nor that he is so described in the enrollment, or any other of the ship's papers, is conclusive evidence that he was so at any subsequent date, however little remote. If he was afterwards displaced, the fact can be shown. In order to effectually displace him, so that he can no longer bind the vessel or owners, it is not necessary that his formal discharge should come to the actual knowledge of others. If he is legally deprived of his command, and disconnected from the ship, that determines his authority. If he is legally discharged, but in fact continues in command, he is a mere usurper, and all persons having knowledge of his discharge are bound by it, and can make no contract with him binding on the ship or owners. But there is no evidence, in this case, that Holt was discharged from the command of the Daniel Russell prior to his receiving this cargo on board, under this bill of lading. It is true, the quarry company have proved the following vote, passed by them March 10th, 1868: "Voted, to discharge H. B. Holt from the captaincy of schooner Daniel Russell, unless he pays $200 on what he now owes this company." But this vote is both conditional and vague. It was not a discharge, but a mere threat that he would be discharged, unless he should pay two hundred dollars on his indebtedness. When he was to pay that amount, in order to save his place, the vote does not specify. This vote was never communicated to these libellants, or at least, not till this cargo was received on board the schooner at Rondout. There was a correspondence between Holt and the quarry company's agent, about the subject matter of this vote, but there was no overt act, or declaration to the world, by either, which could bind third parties. Indeed, the only material fact proved, bearing on this point, is this conditional discharge, until the schooner had arrived at her port of destination with the coal on board, when, before the delivery of any part of it, Holt was discharged absolutely, and displaced from his station. Until this latter act, he must be deemed to have been master.

The objection that he did not sign the bill of lading, as master, is untenable. He described himself, in the body of the instrument, as master, and signed the same with his own name. The fact that he did not add the word "master" to his signature is of no importance. If he was in fact master, with the authority to contract for the delivery of the cargo, and the latter was laden on board, the vessel and owners would be liable in case of a breach of the agreement, even had there been no bill of lading signed. "It is the fact, that the goods are shipped, and not the written acknowledgment of it,—the obligation to carry them safely, and not the written contract,—that creates the liability and fixes the jurisdiction of the court." Ben. Adm. § 286; The Peytona [Case No. 11,053]. Of course I am here speaking of the contract, in its ordinary legal aspect, to carry and deliver this cargo laden on board, and not the peculiar agreement in relation to the mode of payment, which the libellants rely on to support the main feature of their claim. The cargo was in fact laden on board, the voyage performed, and a portion of it actually delivered. The question whether the owners are liable for the non-delivery of the remainder, would be the same, if there had been no bill of lading at all. The pertinent enquiry here is, not what was the form of the bill of lading, but whether Holt was master of the vessel, and thus had the authority to receive the coal on board, and bind the vessel and owners to transport and deliver it.

I now come to the more important part of this controversy, in reference to which, a detail of the facts is necessary, in order to properly present the questions which arise. The primary business of this schooner was transporting stone from Portland, to ports out of this state. In addition to this, she was, unless ordered home light by the agent of the quarry company, accustomed to take return cargoes, and deliver them at other ports. These return cargoes were not always taken from the ports, at which the stone was delivered, but often from other places. The port of delivery of a return cargo was not often, or at least not always, on the direct route of the voyage home, and, of course, a deviation from that route was sometimes made. The master had been accustomed to make and execute contracts of affreightment for these return voyages. His last trip down, before the close of navigation on Connecticut river, was from Portland to New York. He delivered his cargo of stone at the latter place, and not being ordered home light, went a short distance up the Hudson river, to Cold Spring, after a load of iron, to be taken to Fall River, in Massachusetts. The cold weather caught the schooner at Cold Spring, where she was frozen in, and laid up for the winter, or till she should be released by a thaw. The mate was left in charge as shipkeeper, and the captain returned home to Deep River in this state, where he and the libellants reside, and remained there through the winter.

The practice of the captain, to take return cargoes in the manner stated, was well known to the agent of the quarry company. He testified on the hearing, that Capt. Holt had taken the schooner up the Hudson river, in the summer of 1867, for freight. It is true, he added, that it was stupid for him to take her there, at the time he did, in December of that year. But that error in judgment could in no way affect third parties, dealing with the schooner through the master. That was a question between the master and owners alone. This practice of the master, to take return cargoes in the manner already stated, permitted as it was by the owners, made his schooner a general freighting vessel, so far as these return freights are concerned, and, as to them, the master, in judgment of law, must be deemed clothed with the ordinary powers of masters of general freighting vessels. No private instructions from the quarry company to him, could abridge these powers, so far as third persons, without notice, are concerned.

While the vessel was thus frozen in, at Cold Spring, and the master was at home, at Deep River, sometime during the latter part of the winter, he agreed with the libellants to bring the load of coal in question from Rondout to Deep River, provided he could get released from his Fall River engagement. On the 31st of March, 1868, at Rondout, and while in the actual possession and command of the vessel, he received the coal on board, signed the bill of lading, and sailed for Deep River, where he arrived on or about the 6th of April. While at the latter place, and before any part of the cargo was delivered, he was, as already stated, displaced from the command of the vessel, by the quarry company, and another master put in charge. The latter offered to deliver the coal to the libellants, provided they would pay the freight. The libellants declined to pay the freight, but offered to give security to pay, if they were liable. Of the peculiar character of this offer of security I shall have occasion to remark hereafter. The master, acting under the direction of the quarry company, declined to accept it. Then commenced a correspondence, and a series of manoeuvres by the parties, which need not be detailed here, as they are of no importance in settling the legal questions in this case. The libellants continued to demand the coal, and finally, on or about the 20th of April, the master delivered, and the libellants received, all the cargo except thirty-seven tons, which he declined to deliver until the freight was paid. The libellants demanded the whole, and renewed the offer of security, which they had made at first. This was not accepted, and the thirty-seven tons have not been delivered, but are still retained as security for the freight money, and for this refusal to deliver, the libellants have brought this suit.

The first question to be disposed of, in this part of the case, is whether Captain Holt had the authority to make the contract, embraced in this bill of lading, for this is the one upon which the suit is founded. Some confusion crept into the argument of the case, by confounding this contract with the agreement made by Captain Holt with the libellants, during the winter, at Deep River. It was insisted by the quarry company, that the master could not, under the circumstances, bind the owners by a contract for the future employment of the vessel. That may be conceded. But he could, and did bind them, by receiving this coal on board, and signing this bill of lading. And, as already remarked, it is this contract, upon which the libel is founded, and the duty of the parties under it is to be determined by the settled rules of maritime law. The claims set up by the libellants, as to the mode of paying this freight, will be considered hereafter. For the present, therefore, I lay out of the case, the agreement made by the master with the libellants at Deep River, during the winter. The master, both by the rules of maritime law, and by the course of business, long pursued by him, with the knowledge of the quarry company, in regard to return freights, had full power to receive this coal on board, and sign the bill of lading. The vessel then became bound to the cargo, and the cargo to the vessel, for the faithful performance of the contract by both parties. This is familiar law.

The next question is, whether the owners of the schooner were justified in detaining part of the cargo until the freight was paid. This point is entirely free from doubt. They could have detained the whole, if they had so chosen, as the lien of the owners of the vessel attached to the whole as security for the freight money. No principle is better settled, both at common law, and by the maritime codes, than that which holds that the ship owner, and the master as his agent, have a lien on the goods carried in their ship, for the freight. Indeed, a late writer remarks that this has never been denied. Pars. Mar. Law, 1, 125. Of course they have the right to retain the merchandise until this lien is discharged, for, unless there is some special agreement to the contrary, the lien is lost by the delivery of the goods. In the case of Drinkwater v. The Spartan [Case No. 4,085], Mr. Justice Ware remarks: "The general right of the master and owners to retain the merchandise for the freight due upon it, has not been denied. It is too well established to admit of doubt. It is a principle of the general maritime law, the common law of the commercial world, sanctioned by all the maritime codes, ancient and modern, and confirmed by numerous decisions of the highest courts, both in this country and England. Nor does there appear to be any difference in principle, nor is any recognized in law, whether the merchant takes the whole vessel by charter party, or sends his goods in a general ship. The lien of the owners is as perfect for the hire of the vessel stipulated in the charter party, as it is for the freight stipulated in the bill of lading." This doctrine is recognized by Mr. Justice Story, in the case of Certain Logs of Mahogany [Id. 2,559]. In the latter case, it is stated that, by the maritime law, the shipper has a right to have the goods unlivered, so that he can examine them to ascertain whether they are damaged or not. But this point does not, and could not arise in the present case. This cargo was all anthracite coal, which was not susceptible of damage. The existence of the lien of the master and owner on the cargo, for freight, is also recognized in Raymond v. Tyson, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 53. In that case, and many others, it is said that this lien may be waived without express words to that effect, if there are stipulations in the charter party, inconsistent with the exercise of the right of lien, or when it can be fairly inferred that the owner meant to trust to the personal responsibility of the charterer. See, also, The Eddy, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 481. I shall hereafter consider whether there is anything in this bill of lading, or in the agreement relied on by the libellants, inconsistent with the right of lien, which was binding on the owners of this schooner.

The authorities generally state that this right of detention continues "until the payment of, or security for, the freight." It is claimed by the libellants that they offered security, and, therefore, complied with the rule, and were, consequently, entitled to delivery. It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine whether they offered the security contemplated by law. I assume that they tendered such security as they proposed to give, and thus clear the case of all technical difficulties. What security did they tender? A statement of the prior dealings between the libellants and Captain Holt, with the admissions of the former, will, of itself, furnish an effectual answer to their principal claim in this case. It appears from the testimony of one of the libellants, together with a transcript from their books, which they put in evidence, that on the 6th of November, 1867, Captain Holt was indebted to them to the amount of $30.03. This I assume to be for supplies furnished him for use on board of the vessel, though the evidence is not very clear on this point, and the items are not given. Under the same date he is charged $14.76, which, from the items, and the statement of the libellants, appears to have been supplies and provisions for use on the vessel. November 27, 1867, the captain is charged with $25.15 for amount paid the mate on the captain's order. November 28th, $13.88 is charged, and the articles are stated by the libellants to have been for provisions for the schooner. December 19th, a small charge of $1.50 appears in the account, but whether the article was for the schooner does not appear. From December 23rd to December 30th, $31.92 is charged, and the libellant Lane testifies that this amount was for supplies furnished the captain's family. December 30th, $15.55, for goods delivered to the mate on the captain's order. From January 7th to January 29th, 1868, $29.54, supplies to the captain's family. January 30th, cash $50, paid the captain. February 6th to 26th, $27.07, for family supplies. March 28th, $60.64. This latter amount was for supplies furnished the mate's family, on the verbal order of Captain Holt, while the former was at Cold Spring, in charge of the schooner as shipkeeper. I may have omitted some small items, but this is substantially the account of the libellants as it stands on their books, and was explained by the testimony of the libellant Lane, with the exception of a small bill of items, amounting to $9.84, for implements and small furniture for the schooner. There is also a credit on the general account of $30.10. Now the agreement made between the master and the libellants, at Deep River, some time during the winter, and I infer, from the evidence, about the 30th of January, 1868, was that Holt should bring a load of coal for the libellants from Rondout to Deep River, as soon as navigation opened, provided he was not held to his Fall River engagement, and that the freight money should be applied on this account, and thus extinguish it as far as it went. When, therefore, the libellants offered security for the freight, it was, to use the language with which they accompanied the offer, "for the freight for which they were liable," or, as stated by the libellant Lane, "if they were legally liable." The latter testified on this point as follows: "I considered that we had performed our part of the contract—that we had paid for the freight. We agreed to give security to pay if we were legally liable." It is obvious that this was practically nothing more than an offer of security to pay the freight if the owners should be able to establish their claim to it at the end of a lawsuit. It was in no sense such a security to pay the owners, or the master then in charge of the schooner, the freight earned by the carriage of this coal, as the law contemplates, and they were justified in refusing to accept it, and in declining to deliver the coal until the freight was paid or properly secured.

The assumption of the libellants that the owners of the schooner generally were liable to them for this debt of Holt, and that therefore they had a right to delivery of the cargo, without other payment, was clearly an error. In the first place, they charged the account on their books alone to Holt, and not to the schooner, or her owners generally. It is true that this is not a conclusive circumstance, but one that an adequate explanation might overcome. If the supplies were furnished on the credit of the master, instead of that of the vessel or her owners, then the former is alone liable. This would be true, whatever might have been the character of the supplies furnished. In the second place, no liability could attach to the owners generally for the supplies furnished Captain Holt for this vessel, under the circumstances. He was running her under a special contract to victual and man her himself, and this was known to the libellants. The libellant Lane, in his testimony, said: "I understand that coasting vessels, on Connecticut river, to and from other ports, are run on this plan. The captain victuals and mans the vessel, and takes a certain share of her earnings, after such deductions as are agreed upon. The share of the captain depends not upon custom, but upon special agreement." This was, in general terms, the arrangement of Holt with the owners. In victualing and manning the schooner, he was acting on his own account, and not as the agent of the general owners. To that extent he was owner pro hac vice, and could not bind the owner for supplies. Webb v. Pierce [Case No. 17,320]; Mayo v. Snow [Id. 9,356].

This doctrine has been recognized by the supreme court of the United States, although the latter tribunal has held that the owner pro hac vice can, in case of necessity, and when in a foreign port, hypothecate the vessel for repairs and supplies, although he cannot bind the owners personally. Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22, 30. I do not overlook the fact that in Webb v. Pierce, already cited, the master had entire control of the vessel, and power to direct her movements and employment; and that this arrangement was deemed by the court a severance of the usual relation of principal and agent which ordinarily exists between master and owners. In such a case even persons who have no actual notice of the arrangement cannot contract with the master for supplies so as to bind the owners personally. In this case Holt had substantial control over the freighting business on his return voyages; but I do not rest this point on that circumstance. It is sufficient that these libellants knew that he was running this vessel under an agreement with the general owners by which he and not they were to victual and man her. In that matter he was, within the libellants' knowledge, acting as principal, and not agent. It follows, of course, that these libellants could not charge the owners generally for these stores and provisions delivered to the master, or on his order, to the mate. As this could not be done directly, the liability could not be created indirectly by an arrangement with the master that the future earnings of the vessel should be applied to the payment of this debt against him. The master of a vessel has no power to pledge the freight for his private purposes. Keith v. Murdoch [Case No. 7,652]. The offer of the libellants, therefore, to give security for the freight on this coal "if they were legally liable" was a conditional offer, resting upon the baseless assumption that they had already paid the amount due, and were, therefore, not liable at all. No such offer as that could entitle them to delivery. If the words "as agreed" written in the bill of lading after the printed words "they paying the freight for the same," refer to this agreement to apply the freight on this debt of Holt, they cannot be allowed to alter the result, for the master had no authority to make such an agreement, and this the libellants must be presumed to have known. This disposes of the principal claim set up by the libellants; but there seem to be so many vague notions afloat in the vicinity of Connecticut river, touching the liability of domestic vessels and their owners for supplies contracted for by the master, that it may be well to say a word on that subject in connection with the facts developed in this case.

It will be noticed by the account of the libellants and their testimony, already referred to, that a considerable portion of the supplies furnished were not for the schooner at all. They were advanced to the master while he was off duty, at home, and his vessel lay in a foreign port disabled for the winter. They were supplies, not for the schooner Daniel Russell, but for the family of Captain Holt. To call such a transaction furnishing supplies to a vessel is little short of absurdity. As well might a builder charge the owners of a vessel for repairs on the master's house, or a physician for services in curing his children. Indeed, such advances, wherever the vessel might be, and however employed, and whether the master be merely master, or owner pro hac vice, have no relation to her—are not for her benefit, and are not chargeable to her owners, nor can the debt for them be made a lien on the ship. It is elementary law that the only supplies for which a ship or its owners are liable, when contracted for by the master, are those which relate to the ship itself or to her navigation and use in the business of the voyage.

They must be fit and proper for her, and pertain to her wants, necessities and business as an instrument of commerce. Parsons in his work on Maritime Law remarks, "One general limitation of the power of the master to bind the owner by the contracts he makes for him is this: they must relate to the condition, or the use and employment of the ship, and be within the usual duty and business of the master." Volume 1, p. 383. In Rocher v. Busher, 1 Starkie, 27, Lord Ellenborough remarked in regard to money advanced to the master: "The money supplied must not be understood of an indefinite supply of cash, which the master may dissipate, but only such as is warranted by the exigencies of the case, as for the payment of duties or other necessary purposes." Chief Justice Abbot, in his work on Shipping (page 175, Story & Perkins' Ed.), after citing Lord Ellenborough's remark, adds: "And it must be advanced expressly for the use of the ship, otherwise, although expended for that purpose, the owner will not be responsible for it to the lender."

The necessaries which a ship may need in the course of her voyage, of course include victualing for the crew, and such funds as the master might require for the payment of their wages then due. But the notion that while a vessel is laid up in a foreign port, a merchant residing in the state to which she belongs, can charge the owners for supplies furnished the master for the use of his family residing at the latter place, has no foundation in law or good sense. Indeed such supplies are not chargeable to the owners under any circumstances, in the absence of an agreement on their part to that effect.

The same principles are applicable to the advances made to the mate upon the order of the captain, while the former was in charge as shipkeeper at Cold Spring. It is possible that this mate at Cold Spring in charge of the schooner, might have obtained there, on the credit of the owners, such supplies and necessaries as were wanting to enable him to perform his duty and protect the vessel; and if he could not have obtained them on the credit of the owners, might have bound the vessel itself: though this point is not clear. The Harriet [Case No. 6,097]. But if he chose to rely on advances made at a home port, even for his wants there, he should have applied directly to the owners, and not to the master. But, as already remarked, supplies to his family at Deep River were in no sense supplies to this vessel at Cold Spring, and the owners are not responsible for them, although they were, as it is claimed by the libellants, advanced on the order of the master.

It necessarily follows that there is no liability on the owners of this vessel generally for the supplies and provisions furnished Captain Holt while he was master. So far as victualing and manning the vessel was concerned, he acted for himself, and not the owners. Even if he had been in a foreign port he could not have obtained supplies on the credit of the owners, though the necessities of the vessel might have required them. He could only have bound the vessel itself, by a tacit or direct hypothecation. This is the doctrine of Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22, already cited. To the same point is Freeman v. The Buckingham, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 182. This rule would apply to the case under consideration, even had the articles purchased by Holt been for the vessel and consumed on board of her. As to those advanced to him for the use of his family when the vessel was laid up, under no circumstances could the owners have been made liable for them without their express consent. As to the $50 cash paid Holt January 30, that stands upon no better ground. To be sure the libellant Lane says that this sum was advanced to him as part of the freight money on this coal, which he was to bring at the opening of navigation. But there is no evidence that it was intended to be employed, or was in fact employed, in promoting the voyage. The master was at home. The vessel was frozen in and laid up at a foreign port. The fair inference is that the captain wanted this money for his own private purposes. For that we have seen that he could not pledge even a present freight of his vessel. A fortiori he could not pledge her future earnings.

As already remarked, the account of the libellants shows a small bill of $9.84 furnished the schooner on the order of Captain Holt, for small articles, of a character pertaining to what may be called her furniture. They were not provisions for her crew, but implements for necessary and permanent use on board. They were furnished during the summer of 1867, while the vessel was pursuing her voyages. They were articles required for immediate use, and though furnished at a home port, it was at a place twenty miles distant from the residence of the principal owner. Such articles, immediately needed for current use, I think the master could, in the absence of funds in his hands, obtain, even in a home port, at this distance from the owner's residence, upon the credit of the owner. In Jordan v. Young, 37 Me. 276, 280, the court say: "The master of a vessel can do all things necessary for the prosecution of the voyage. But this authority does not usually extend to cases where the owner can interfere, as in a home port. If the vessel be at a home port, but at a distance from the owner's residence, and provisions or other things require to be provided promptly, then the occasion authorizes the master to pledge the credit of the owner." But it must not be inferred from this that the authority of the master to bind his vessel, or pledge the credit of her owners, for supplies and repairs is without limit. It was remarked by Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Druid, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 391, 399, that "in all causes of action, which may arise from circumstances occurring during the ownership of persons whose ship is proceeded against, I apprehend that no suit could ever be maintained against the ship, where the owners were not themselves liable, or where their personal liability had not been given up, as in bottomry bonds, by taking a lien on the vessel. The liability of the ship, and the responsibility of the owners, in such cases, are convertible terms; the ship is not liable if the owners are not responsible, and, vice versa, no responsibility can attach upon the owners, if the ship is exempt, and not liable to be proceeded against." Now, it is quite true that this doctrine is not of universal application in this country. We have already seen that in cases where the master, pro hac vice, contracts for supplies, even in a foreign port, he may bind the ship, but cannot pledge the personal credit of the owners. But ordinarily, where the master simply represents the general owners, I apprehend that the doctrine laid down by Dr. Lushington is the true one. As an eminent admiralty judge, his decisions command the highest respect. In view of this doctrine, it will be instructive to look at the state of the law in this country as to the extent of the master's power to create a lien on his ship for repairs and supplies. This is well stated in 3 Kent, Comm. 169, 170: "In this country, it was formerly, and rather loosely, declared in some of the admiralty courts of the United States, that the person who repaired or furnished supplies for a ship, had a lien on the ship for his demands. But the doctrine was examined, and the rule declared with great precision, by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, and reasserted in the case of The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409. The rule of the English common law is explicitly adopted, that material men and mechanics, furnishing repairs to a domestic ship, have no particular lien upon the ship itself, or its proceeds in court under a decree of sale, for the recovery of their demands, with the exception of the shipwright who has possession of the ship. As long as he retains possession, he has a lien for repairs. The distinction is, that if repairs have been made or necessaries furnished to a foreign ship, or to a ship in the port of a state to which she does not belong, the general maritime law, following the civil law, gives the party a lien on the ship itself for its security, and he may maintain a suit in rem, in the admiralty, to enforce his right. But in respect to repairs and necessaries in the port or state to which the ship belongs, the case is governed by the municipal law of that state, and no lien is implied unless it is recognized by that law." By the municipal law of this state, no such lien is created or recognized. Buddington v. Stewart, 14 Conn. 404. Under this doctrine of the supreme court of the United States, it is clear that the master can create no lien on the ship for repairs and supplies in a port of the state to which she belongs, and where her owners reside. The question arises, can he bind the owners personally by such a contract? The authorities on this point, though somewhat numerous, are not very uniform or consistent. But they undoubtedly imply exceptions to the rule laid down by Dr. Lushington, and their general tendency is to support the doctrine that the owners are personally responsible for such repairs and supplies, ordered by the master, "as are reasonably fit and proper, and apparently necessary to enable the vessel to navigate the sea, and perform her voyage in safety," though obtained in a home port, and especially in one at some distance from that at which the owners reside. Jordan v. Young, 37 Me. 276; 1 Conk. Adm. (2d Ed.) 74, 75. The question of the liability of the owners for repairs and supplies furnished on the order of the master at the port of their residence would not often arise, for such acts of the master would usually be known to the owners, and his authority to make the contracts presumed.

Another point raised by the pleadings in this case, and discussed on the argument, was whether Holt, at the time of his dealings with the libellants, was a part-owner of the schooner. This question is not important, in the determination of the case, for his power as master was not enlarged by his being part owner, so far as these transactions are concerned, unless with reference to the payment of the shipkeeper while the vessel was laid up at Cold Spring. He left the mate in charge, at small wages, and informed the agent of the other owners of the fact. The payment of his wages at any particular time or place was not a matter of necessity. Supplying his family, at Deep River, was not a duty of the owners. It was indeed, their duty to pay him his wages, but there was no necessity for Captain Holt to pledge their credit for that purpose, and, under the circumstances, he had no authority to do so. The principal owners lived near Deep River, were abundantly responsible, and an application to them could have been made with promptness and ease. The service of the shipkeeper did not relate to the navigation of the vessel, nor did the supplies furnished relate to her care and supply, and there is no principle known to the law which can bind the owners to pay this debt contracted by Holt. The latter, certainly, could not as part-owner, in a home port, pledge the future earnings of the vessel to a third party making the advances. Whether one part-owner can bind another at all, in a home port, for repairs and supplies to the vessel itself, without specific authority, is still an open question. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 90.

But, to prevent misapprehension hereafter, it must not be inferred that this court assents to the claim set up by the quarry company, that Holt is not to be deemed a part-owner, because he had mortgaged his share in the vessel. They set up in their answer, and proved, a mortgage to them by Holt of his interest, to secure the payment of five hundred dollars, or so much thereof as might be found due on final settlement, and also to secure any earnings of the vessel that might thereafter become due from Holt to them. This mortgage was dated September 5th, 1866; but no possession was taken by the mortgagee under this mortgage. The relation of the mortgagor and mortgagee, to all the rest of the world, remained the same. Holt still continued in possession as part-owner and master. Under these circumstances, he is to be deemed a part-owner, as to third parties contracting with the vessel in regard to freight or supplies, just the same as if no mortgage had been given. The mortgagee of a vessel, out of possession, is never in this country, regarded as the owner. If he were, very serious consequences would follow. He would then become personally liable for supplies and repairs. "But it is well settled in our law, that a mortgagee out of possession is not liable for supplies and repairs. And it is equally well settled, that the holding of a conditional bill of sale, or having the mere legal title to a vessel, does not, of itself, render a party liable. The law presumes the credit to be given to the party in possession as acting owner, and as long as he remains in possession, with the consent of the holder of the legal title, and manages and controls the vessel, and receives the profits, he is, for all practical purposes, the owner. So far as he is concerned, the law treats the mortgage as if it had no existence." Fland. Shipp. §§ 400, 401. In this case, the quarry company merely held the legal title as security for the obligations of Holt to them. The practical ownership, as to third parties in their dealings with the vessel, remained the same as if no mortgage had been given. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 116.

I come now to the question as to what decree is proper to be rendered in this case. I have already disposed of the question of the lien of the owners on this coal for the freight money, and their consequent right to detain it until the same was paid or secured. This lien attached to the whole cargo, and the master might have landed it at the port of delivery, and placed it in charge of a third person, and, if the freight money continued to be withheld, the owners of the vessel could have kept it in that condition, or libelled it, had it sold by a decree of the court, and thus obtained the freight money. They, however, chose to deliver a part and detain the rest. The lien on the part delivered was, of course, extinguished by delivery. After some doubt, I am inclined to the opinion that the lien for the whole freight may be considered as remaining on that portion of the cargo detained. It was broken coal, in bulk, belonging to one owner and consignee. That a part was detained, instead of the whole, was no injury, but a benefit to the shipper and consignee. Abb. Shipp. (Story & Perkins' Ed.) p. 461, note 2. The remaining portion, which was not delivered, was never landed at Deep River at all, but was taken away by the schooner, and left at Portland, and notice given to the libellants that it was at their disposal whenever the freight should be paid. The proper course would have been to land this remainder at the port of delivery, and place it in charge of a third person, subject to the libellants' order, on their paying freight. But this point was not made a question on the trial. The whole struggle was over the liability of the owners to deliver, without further or other payment of freight than the advances made to Holt.

As the owners of the vessel undertook to sever the cargo, and retain only so much as would secure the freight money due, and took this quantity away, they should have seen to it that they took no more than was necessary. They detained and removed thirty-seven tons, worth, as I find from the evidence, three hundred and seventy dollars. The freight on the whole amounted to two hundred and forty-six dollars. As they show no necessity for thus taking the amount not delivered away from the port of the consignee, they substantially converted it to their own use, and must be held liable for any excess of its value over the amount of the freight. This excess was one hundred and twenty-four dollars. To this I will add the $9 84, for which they are indebted to the libellants for supplies furnished the vessel directly—the whole, with interest from April 20th, 1868, to the present time, amounting to $152 06. Let a decree be entered for the libellants for that amount, with costs, against both the respondents. Holt is liable for the balance of the libellants' account. Though much of the account against him would not have been recoverable in a suit in admiralty, brought directly upon it, as it did not rest on a maritime contract, yet he bound himself, as master, to deliver this coal at the stipulated freight of two dollars per ton, in discharge of the debt due from him to the libellants. He received the cargo, and then became bound to the performance of his contract, which he failed to complete. He is therefore personally liable for his failure. Let a decree be entered against him separately for $279 50.

NOTE (by Judge Shipman). It will be noticed, that there is no formal discussion, in the above opinion, of the legal character of the act of the master in carrying away a portion of the cargo from the port of delivery, named in the bill of lading. No notice of this point was taken by counsel. But it will be seen, by reference to the closing part of the opinion, that it was held to be the duty of the master, on the refusal of the consignee to pay the freight, to land the cargo at the port of delivery, and place it in charge of some third party, subject to the consignee's order on payment of freight and charges; and that removing it to another port, without showing any necessity therefor, was practically an illegal act, and a conversion of that part of the cargo. For this act I held the owners liable for the full value of the coal thus removed, at the local price, deducting freight. To prevent, however, any erroneous inference being drawn from the omission to discuss the point on principle and authority, it may be well to state, that the rule undoubtedly is, that where the consignee refuses to receive the cargo at the port of delivery and pay the freight, the master should then land and store it with some other party, subject to the order of the consignee or owner, on the payment of freight and charges. I applied this rule, several years ago, in an important case in the district court for the Southern district of New York. Atlantic & P. Guano Co. v. The Robert Center [Case No. 630]. The same doctrine is laid down by Mr. Justice Story in Arthur v. The Cassius [Id. 564]. See, also, The Convoy's Wheat, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 225. In Arthur v. The Schooner Cassius, Mr. Justice Story remarks: "If the consignee refused to receive the cargo after it was landed, and to give a bill on New York for the freight, then it became the duty of the master to place the same in the hands of some trustworthy person for the security of his lien for the freight, and subject thereto, for the benefit and account of the owners. But no right, even under the circumstances, could exist on the part of the master to sell the cargo, unless it was perishable, and might otherwise have been lost or have perished, which is not proved, or pretended by the answer. A fortiori, if the master had no right to sell at Velasco, he could not have a right to carry the cargo to New Orleans, and sell it there; since it is just as clear that there was no necessity therefor. This act, therefore, in carrying it to New Orleans, was a gross breach of his duty, and the sale a tortious conversion of the property. It might, perhaps, have admitted of a different construction, if the cargo could not have been landed at Velasco, or there deposited in safety for the owners; or if the sale at Velasco or New Orleans had become indispensable from the perishable nature and condition thereof. Such a case has not been made out; and, therefore, it need not be decided on the present occasion."

It is obvious that cases may arise where, on refusal of the consignee to receive the cargo, it may be the right of the master to leave it at some other port than that named in the bill of lading, especially where the consignee is also the owner. If the latter refuse to receive the cargo and pay, or secure the freight money, and no person can be found at the same port to receive it, it is clear that the master should not be shut up to the alternative of tying his vessel to the dock to rot, with the cargo on board, or delivering it to the consignee, thus losing his lien. I apprehend that, in such a case, the master might safely leave the cargo at the nearest port to the residence of the consignee, at which a person could be found who would take charge of it. It is true that this difficulty would not occur where the port of delivery was one of considerable size and business, as, in such a port, persons could be found who would receive and store the cargo, and hold it subject to freight and charges; but in a very small place, like the one where this coal was to be delivered, this very embarrassment might arise.

Where the consignee is not the owner, and refuses to receive the cargo, it should be stored at the port of delivery by the master on account of the owner, if any one can be found who will receive it. If no one can be found at that port who will take charge of it, a more embarrassing question will arise as to what disposition the master should make of it. He cannot sell it unless it is perishable, or to save it from certain loss. Shall he store it at a place nearest the port of delivery named in the bill of lading, at which a person can be found to receive it, or shall he return it to the shipper or owner? It would be difficult to lay down a rule in advance, which would furnish a safe solution in all cases of questions of this character. In such a dilemma the master must act prudently and in good faith, in view of all the circumstances. If the owner be within reasonable distance, and yet not within easy communication, so that he can take his direction, it might be best for the master to return him the cargo. Yet it is clear that this would not be his duty where the owner resided at a distant port. The same may be said in regard to his returning it to the shipper, where the latter was not the owner, even though he might be the owner's agent. A cargo might be shipped by a merchant at London for a port on the Pacific coast of America. The owner of the cargo might reside in New York. On a refusal of the consignee at the port of destination to receive the cargo and pay the freight, the master, finding no one else at that port to receive it, and being unable to communicate speedily with the owner or shipper, would doubtless be authorized to land and store the cargo at the nearest proper and convenient port, having reference to his own convenience, and the apparent best interest of the owner. This would seem to be his only safe course. To return the cargo to London, or send it to New York, would be ruinous to the owner, as well as beyond the duty of the master. Leaving it, therefore, with a responsible party, at some proper adajcent port, would, I apprehend, be a discharge of the duty of the master, and exonerate the ship and her owners. Of course, the master should then notify the owner as expeditiously as possible.

Case No. 5,013.

FOX v. The LUCY A. BLOSSOM.

[4 West. Law Month. 415.]

District Court, N. D. New York. Feb. Term, 1854.

MARINE INSURANCE — SUBROGATION — ABANDONMENT BY ASSURED—DAMAGES ARISING FROM COLLISION—ESTOPPEL.

1. Where the owner of a vessel sunk by a collision, recovers the full value of the vessel in admiralty, on the ground that the vessel is totally lost, and is actually paid the amount of such decree, the title of the submerged vessel passes to the party paying its value, on the familiar principle "Solutio pretii emptionis loco habitur," which may be rendered, substantially, Payment of the price operates a purchase of the thing.

2. The application of this maxim is not confined to those cases where the property has passed into the hands of the party paying, as recoveries in actions of trespass and trover, where the property has been actually taken or converted; but seems to extend to all cases where the value has been demanded and paid. The better opinion is, that it is not the recovery of a judgment that operates the change of property, but the demand and payment of value, with or without a judgment.

3. The rule applies in the case of a compulsory payment or payment by virtue of a legal obligation, though the party paying was a corporation, incapable in law of making a direct purchase. The application of this principle to various legal relations considered.

4. When a vessel, insured, has been sunk by a collision with another vessel through the fault of the latter, and pending an action brought by the insured against the owners of the vessel in fault, for the injury, claiming the full value for a total loss, the assured abandons to the underwriters, who accept the abandonment, the action proceeds for the benefit of the latter:

and, upon the principle of the maxim above cited, where the defendants pay the judgment or decree for the full value, the title of the underwriters to the submerged vessel passes to them.

5. And when, in such a case, after payment made by the defendant to the plaintiff of the amount of the judgment or decree without notice of the abandonment, the vessel is raised by the defendant, the original owner is estopped, in an action brought by him against the original defendants, from denying his title at the time of the judgment, and relying on a title subsequently acquired from the underwriters.

[This was a libel by Watson A. Fox against the brig Lucy A. Blossom and against Henry C. Walker and others, claimants.]

John Ganson, for libellants.

W. H. Greene, for defendants.

HALL, District Judge. This suit was instituted for the purpose of establishing an alleged title to the brig Lucy A. Blossom, her tackle, &c.; and of obtaining the possession and claimed to be the rightful owners thereof, under an adverse title.

The facts in the case are substantially as follows: On the 18th day of November, 1851, the brig Blossom—then being the property of the libellant—was run into and sunk by the steamer Niagara. The Niagara was then owned by Charles M. Reed, Esq., but was running under a charter to the New-York & Erie Railroad Company, and she was victualed, manned, managed and controlled, wholly by the agents of that company. On the 4th of December, 1851, the libellant in this suit filed in this court, his libel against the Niagara, her tackle, apparel, and furniture; and thereby alleged that by the collision referred to, the said brig, and the freight or the cargo on board of the same, became wholly lost to the libellant; and that it occurred through the negligence, unskilfulness and fault of those in charge of the Niagara. The Niagara was thereupon arrested, and Reed, her general owner, appeared and defended. After a hearing on pleadings and process, this court adjudged and decreed that the collision in the libel mentioned occurred as therein stated, and that the brig Lucy A. Blossom was thereby lost; that the libellant should recover $7,755.-20 for his damages and also his costs of suit; and that if the said damages and costs were not paid into court in ten days, the Niagara her tackle, &c., should be sold to satisfy the decree. The court intended to give, and by this decree, did give, to the libellant full damages for the total loss of the vessel; upon the basis that such vessel having been sunk, was of no value; or that her value was so entirely speculative that it ought not to be taken into consideration; and it was conclusively established by the testimony, given on the hearing in this case, that the court intended to give to the libellant, by way of damages, the whole value of the property sunk; and that its award of damages was made on that basis. From this decree against the Niagara, an appeal was taken by Reed, her owner; but a few days after the appeal had been perfected the whole matter was settled, and Reed, the general owner and claimant of the Niagara, gave the libellant his drafts on the New-York & Erie Railroad Company for the full amount of the decree. These drafts were accepted and afterwards paid by the railroad company; and when given by Reed and accepted by the company, they were taken and received by the libellant in full payment and satisfaction of the decree. The appeal was of course abandoned upon the decree being thus fully settled and satisfied.

At the time of the collision, the Blossom was insured by "The New-York Protection Insurance Company," of Rome, N. Y., in the sum of six thousand dollars. She was valued at eight thousand dollars in the policy issued on such insurance, but an insurance beyond the sum of six thousand dollars was forbidden by the terms of such policy. About the time that the libellant filed his libel against the Niagara, he gave notice of the loss of the Blossom by the collision, and that he abandoned the vessel to the company as a total loss. There is no direct proof of an acceptance of this abandonment, and it is doubtful whether the testimony authorizes the inference that the abandonment was ever accepted by the company. A short time after this notice of abandonment was given, the insurance company failed, and its assets passed into the hands of assignees. The libellant had had other dealings with the company, in respect to other insurances; and after the settlement and satisfaction of the decree in the collision suit, as hereinafter mentioned, the libellant settled with the assignees of the insurance company in respect to all the dealings between him and the company, (including the insurance upon the Blossom), and then took from the assignees of the company an assignment of all their interest in the Lucy A. Blossom, her tackle, apparel and furniture. The assignee who made this settlement, was informed at the time it was made that a decree had been obtained against the Niagara, but he stated on his examination as a witness in this suit, that he was unable to say that he then knew, or had been informed, that the decree had been paid or satisfied. The vessel remained submerged until the spring of 1852; and until after the payment of the decree in the collision suit and settlement between the libellant and the insurance company. Early in the spring of that year, both the libellant and the New-York & Erie Company, intimated an intention to make efforts to raise the sunken vessel, and the agent of the company made a contract with certain parties to raise her for the benefit of the company. This became known to the libellant, and, as soon as these contractors proceeded to the vessel for the purpose of raising her in pursuance of their contract, he caused notice of his claim to the ownership of the Blossom to be served on the persons employed in the effort to raise her. He also gave notice of his intention to prosecute any one who should interfere with the vessel in violation of his rights. The Blossom was nevertheless raised by the persons employed by the New-York & Erie Railroad Company, and afterwards sold by that company to the claimants in the present suit. They repaired her at great expense, after which she was taken from their possession under the warrant of arrest issued in this suit.

Under this state of facts, it was claimed by the advocate for the claimants and respondents that, by the recovery and payment of the decree for the value of the sunken vessel, the property therein passed to the New-York & Erie Railroad Company, or to Reed, the owner of the Niagara; and that the libellant had no right of property in the vessel after such payment, and he cited 2 Kent, Comm. 388, and note c, 380; 2 Bouv. Inst. 148; 8 Cow. 43; 2 Bailey, 466; Hopkins v. Hersey, 7 Shepley [20 Me.] 449; 2 Starkie, Ev. 1169; 1 Rawle, 121, 273, 285; 12 Pick. 202; 4 Esp. 251; 3 Barn. & C. 196; [Comegys v. Vasse] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 214; 2 Kent, Comm. 334–336, 360.

On the other hand, it was insisted—1st. That the principle established by the cases which decide that when a defendant in an action of trespass or trover, pays a judgment for the value of a chattel which he has tortiously taken and converted to his own use, only applies in cases where the possession has been changed and the action is brought to recover damages for the unlawful appropriation of the chattel; and not when it was brought, as in the collision case referred to, to recover damages for an injury to the chattel, the possession not being changed. 2d. That the New-York & Erie Company had no right to purchase a vessel or take the title to the brig; that therefore the title could not pass to them, and could not leave the original owner of the vessel until it passed to another; that Reed was not personally liable for the damages decreed in the collision suit, and did not pay them; nor were they paid for him, or for his benefit; and that therefore the title did not pass to Reed. 3d. That the vessel having been abandoned to the insurance company, the title to it was vested in that company at the time the decree was obtained and paid; and that it could not, therefore, pass in consequence of the payment made to the libellant; and that the title the libellant now sets up was subsequently acquired, and can not be affected by the payment.

Other questions in respect to the right of the court to entertain jurisdiction of the questions presented, and to the right of the libellant to demand possession of the Blossom until payment of salvage and of the costs of subsequent repairs, were raised and ably argued by the advocates of the respective parties; but it is unnecessary to discuss those questions, as the case will be disposed of upon the principal question—that of title—raised in the suit.

The existence of the principle which transfers to the defendant, in an action of trover or trespass, the title to a chattel which he has wrongfully appropriated, whenever he pays the judgment for its value, recovered against him in consequence of that appropriation, is not denied. It is, however, insisted that it is not applicable in a case like the present; and this is the first question to be decided in this case. The principle itself is founded in natural justice and equity and we accordingly find it distinctly recognized in the earliest authentic code of laws to which we have access. In the law promulgated from Mount Sinai we find it declared: "And if a man shall open a pit, or if a man dig a pit, and not cover it, and an ox or an ass fall therein; the owner of the pit shall make it good, and give money unto the owner of them, and the dead beast shall be his. And if one man's ox hurt another that he die; then they shall sell the live ox and divide the money of it; and the dead ox also they shall divide. Or if it be known that the ox hath used to push in time past, and his owner hath not kept him in; he shall surely pay ox for ox; and the dead shall be his own." Exodus, xxi., 33–36. In the civil law, the same principle is recognized. Coop. Just. lib. 4, tit. 1, §§ 15, 16. The common law courts have uniformly recognized the principle from the reign of James I.; but some judges have held that the title passed upon the recovery of the judgment, while others have adopted the more reasonable doctrine that the transfer takes place only upon satisfaction of the judgment. Brown v. Wootton, Cro. Jac. 73; 2 Kent, Comm. 387, 388, and note, where the cases are referred to and discussed; Curtis v. Groat, 6 Johns. 168; Osterhout v. Roberts, 8 Cow. 43.

I can not think that the form of the action determines the principle. In the cases of judgment and satisfaction in trespass, trover, detinue and replevin, it would now be applied without hesitation; and these are, perhaps, the only form of action at common law, in reference to which the question has arisen in the form in which it is presented in this case. The Mosaic Code had as little respect for forms of action as the present New York Code of Procedure, and the cases to which the former code applied this principle, as well as the cases to which the civil law applied it in the sections before referred to, were cases in which the possession of the property was not necessarily in the party by whom the price for value was to be paid; nor was its appropriation to his own use essential to its application. In Lacon v. Barnard, Cro. Car. 35, the right of the parties was determined, not upon the form of the action, but upon the question whether the defendant in the prior action of trespass had recovered damages in lieu of the property—that is, its estimated value. The court in Curtis v. Groat, while declaring that the "recovery ought to have been distinctly for that specific chattel before the rule could apply." also declared the principle on which the rule was based. It was then said by the court: If a trespasser takes a chattel into his own possession, and the owner sues and recovers damages for the specific chattel so taken and detained, the recovery and execution done thereupon will change the property by operation of law, on the principle "Solutio pretii emptionis loco habitur" (Jenk. Cent. 56, 189, Case 88); and this seems to be the rule, both in the French and in the civil law, where the transfer by such means is considered as a complete and absolute title (Pothier, Traité du Droit Propriété, No. 464, Dig. 1, 35, 63). This principle of "solutio pretii emptionis loco habitur," is variously, and perhaps, it may be truly said, frequently applied, in the courts of common law and equity. The doctrine of subrogation may, I think, be traced to this principle. In many other cases, where no suit has been brought, the principle is properly and uniformly applied. The indorser or guarantor of a promissory note, which he has transferred to another, by indorsement or other writing, is undoubtedly reinstated in his ownership whenever he pays the note in discharge of his fixed liability as such indorser or guarantor; the party who duly pays a bill or note, after an acceptance by him, supra protest for the honor of an indorser, becomes the owner of the bill as to all parties standing before him for whose honor he pays; one of several underwriters upon different policies covering the same risk, who pays the whole amount insured, has a claim for contribution against the others (Lucas v. Jefferson Ins. Co., 6 Cow. 635; Newby v. Reed, 1 W. Bl. 416; Wiggin v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 18 Pick. 155); the underwriter who has paid a loss occasioned by an unlawful capture of a ship insured, or by the negligence of the master, pilot, &c., has a right of action, even in the name of the assured, for reimbursement of the loss he has sustained (Phil. Ins., 3d Ed., §§ 2008, 2009); the underwriter on the life of a debtor, who had paid the loss to the assured, is entitled to an action against the assured for any amount he may receive from the executors or administrators of the party whose life was insured on account of the debt, to secure which the policy was made (Id. §§ 1729, 2010). And these are all, as I understand it, instances of the transfer of rights of property or rights in action, in accordance with this principle. It is also in accordance with this principle that the underwriter is entitled to the property insured when the assured has been voluntarily paid or has recovered, or has obtained satisfaction upon a judgment, for a total loss without an abandonment (Phil. Ins., 3d Ed., §§ 1495, 1511; Arn. Ins. p. 1185, § 410), and that an abandonment (and of course the receipt from the underwriter of the whole sum insured on the basis of a total loss) is in law a transfer to the underwriter of all claims against third parties on account of negligence or misconduct occasioning the damage to the subject insured, or the destruction of it, by a peril insured against (Phil. Ins., 2d Ed., 1711).

The same principle has doubtless been applied, in analogous cases, in the admiralty courts; for in questions of this character, relating to the title of property, the admiralty almost uniformly adopts the doctrines which prevail in the common law and equity courts. I have not, therefore, sought for similar cases in the reports of the decisions of the admiralty courts, but have endeavored to find a case, or cases, like the present, in which the doctrine we have been considering has been discussed or applied. Perhaps I have not been sufficiently diligent in the search, and, at all events, I have been able to find but a single case bearing directly upon the question now presented. The case referred to is that of The Columbus, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 158; and in that case the question was whether the registrar and merchants had properly allowed a libellant in a cause of collision, the whole value of his vessel, by way of damages. The vessel of the libellant had been sunk by the collision, but before the proceedings were commenced in the court of admiralty, the sunken vessel had been raised at the expense of the owner of the vessel which had caused the injury, and carried into Rye harbor. Notice thereof had been given to the agent of the libellant, with an intimation that the owner of the Columbus was ready to deliver up the same and that he would not be responsible for any further damage or expense incurred by her remaining unrepaired in the harbor. No notice was taken of this intimation, and the suit in admiralty was subsequently commenced. The registrar and merchants reported the full value of the vessel, by way of damages, as for a total loss; and this report was, after discussion and argument, confirmed by the court. In delivering his opinion in that case, Dr. Lushington, as I think, sanctioned the principle for which the advocate for the respondents has contended, not only in declaring that the report ought to be confirmed, but also when he declared that Mr. Fletcher, the owner of the vessel by which the libellant's vessel had been sunk, was, as the case then stood, entitled to have the vessel; or her proceeds, if he thought proper to make application for her sale under the direction of the court.

Without referring to other authorities or enumerating other cases in which the principle we have been considering has been substantially applied, I shall hold that the recovery and satisfaction of the decree in the collision case, if the libellant had been still the owner of the injured and submerged vessel, would have transferred the title to the sunken vessel to the party paying the same. As between the libellant and Reed, the payment of the former decree was made by the latter, but if it had been made in fact and in law by the New-York & Erie Railroad Company, I do not think the objection that such company had no legal right to make a direct purchase of the vessel, could avail. If the law could not cast the title upon the company by reason of their inability to take such title, then the payment must be deemed to have been made by Reed, or in his behalf, and the title to have vested in him; but I can perceive no legal objection to the vesting of the title in the railroad company. But it is said that the title to the vessel was in the insurance company, in consequence of an abandonment and acceptance; and that, consequently, the title could not pass by the payment to Fox, the libellant in this and the collision suit. I have already stated that it was at least doubtful whether there was any proof of an acceptance of the abandonment, but I propose to assume that the abandonment was accepted, and then consider the question which the case will, after that assumption, present. From the time of the abandonment and acceptance, the suit against the Niagara necessarily proceeded for the benefit of the insurance company; for the right of action had, by the abandonment and acceptance, been transferred to the company (Phil. Ins., 3d Ed., 1711); and when the decree was recovered and paid, the claim of Fox, the libellant in this and the collision suit, for the amount insured, was fully discharged, and he held the balance above that amount as a trustee for the company. The right of action and the decree then belonged to the insurance company, and the payment made to the libellant was made for their benefit, and upon that payment, thus made for their benefit, the title passed from them in accordance with the principle we have been considering. The insurance company's interest in the vessel resulted from the loss and subsequent abandonment and acceptance, and their consequent legal liability to pay as for a total loss under their policy; and when that total loss was paid, and more than paid, to the libellant by the payment and satisfaction of the decree, the libellant could have no further claim against the company, but the company could probably have recovered from him what he had received over and above the amount to which he was entitled under the policy. In short, the principle "Solutio pretii emptionis loco habitur," which would have transferred the absolute title to the vessel to the insurance company, if they had paid a total loss under their policy, applies with equal force between the insurance company and those who actually pay the loss by paying the value of the vessel under the decree; for the insurance company actually received the price of the vessel through the present libellant as their trustee or agent. Besides, the suit had been prosecuted and the decree recovered in the name of Fox, the libellant, and there is no proof that Reed or the railroad company knew that the right of action had been assigned or transferred to the insurance company before the payment of the decree. And this is enough to make the payment binding on the company and operate to transfer the title to the vessel, even if there had been no subsequent confirmation of the acts of the libellant in prosecuting the suit to a decree in his own name.

But as between the present libellant and the parties here maintaining their rights derived from the railroad company and Reed, the libellant is estopped from averring that he had abandoned and thus assigned the sunken ship and the right of action for the collision, to the insurance company. The parties liable for the injury, and against whom the assigned right of action and decree existed, paid the libellant the amount of such decree, believing him to be entitled to receive it; and he accepted that payment without disclosing the fact of the assignment or transfer. Under such circumstances he is clearly estopped from setting up his own want of title at that time to defeat any right which the parties paying would have acquired by their payment in case his right and ownership had continued. The libel must be dismissed with costs.

FOX v. PAINE et al.

[Crabbe, 271.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. June 18, 1839.

SHIPPING — REGISTRY AND ENROLMENT — PART OWNER—FOREIGN VESSEL—VOYAGE DISAPPROVED BY PART OWNER—SECURITY.

1. E. F., a part owner of a vessel, known to be so by the other owners, not having, when he became a part owner, complied with the acts of congress, such omission not being for purposes of fraud or concealment, one of the other owners obtained an enrolment of the vessel, swearing that he and some others, totally omitting E. F., were sole owners. E. F. is entitled to ask the court for security, from the other owners, for the safety of the vessel on a voyage not approved by him.

[Cited in The Marengo, Case No. 9,066.]

2. An omission in the registry and enrolment of an American vessel does not make her foreign, but, at best, only deprives her of her American privileges.

3. It is not unlawful for Americans to be part owners of a foreign ship; but she will not become entitled thereby to American privileges.

4. Where the owner of one-eighth of a schooner disapproved of a voyage sanctioned by the other part owners, the court ordered the other part owners to secure the dissentient in double the value of his share.

[Cited in The Marengo, Case No. 9,066; Coyne v. Caples, 8 Fed. 640.]

The libel in this case alleged that the libellant [Evan Fox] was the owner of one eighth part of the schooner [Lodemia and Eliza]; that the other owners, to wit, Levi Paine [the master], William S. Reed, William Murphy, and Isaiah Dunlap, were about to send her to sea, on a voyage to New Orleans, against the consent of the libellant; and prayed for security in the usual way, to the amount of the libellant's interest in the schooner, conditioned for her safe return. Stipulations having been given to abide by the decree of the court on the petition, the vessel was allowed to proceed to sea. The application was, at first, resisted on the ground that the libellant had no interest or ownership in the schooner. A supplemental answer was afterwards filed, setting forth that, although the libellant might hold a bill of sale, for one eighth of the schooner, from John Compton, a former owner, yet that, as neither the libellant nor Compton had complied with the requisitions of the acts of congress, not having delivered to the collector of the port the former enrolment of the schooner, nor applied to the secretary of the treasury for an order on the collector to grant a new enrolment and license, not having taken and transmitted to the proper collector, the oath or affirmation required by law, they, or either of them, were not entitled, by the law of the land, or the practice of the court, to ask the interposition and aid of the court in the manner set forth in the libel. It appeared that the libellant had not, on his becoming a part owner, complied with the requisitions of the various registry acts, &c.; that his omission to do so was not for any purpose of fraud or concealment; that the bill of sale, from Compton to the libellant, was drawn up by an officer in the custom-house where the schooner was subsequently enrolled; that William Murphy, another part owner, had caused the schooner to be enrolled as being the sole property of himself together with Levi Paine, William S. Reed, and Isaiah Dunlap, he making oath to that effect; and that, at the time of such enrolment, the interest of the libellant in the schooner was fully known to the other part owners.

St. G. T. Campbell, for libellant.

The interest of the libellant, and the jurisdiction of the court are undoubted. The only question is, whether or no the libellant has forfeited his right to come into court, by any act or omission on his part; that is, by not having his name inserted as an owner on the enrolment and license? There is nothing in the act of 31st December, 1792 (1 Story's Laws, 269), respecting enrolments and licenses, which deprives the party of the right to come into this court. No fraud has been intended upon the revenue here; the bill of sale to the libellant was drawn by a custom-house officer, at the very place where the vessel was enrolled, and it is by the neglect of that officer that the libellant's name has been omitted from the documents. The libellant is in fact a part owner, whatever the enrolment or license may say, and, as such, has a right to the protection of this court. The other owners, by omitting to put his name in the papers, cannot deprive him of his rights, most especially against themselves. Bronde v. Haven [Case No. 1,924]; Strelly v. Winson, 1 Vern. 297; Graves v. Sawcer, T. Raym. 15.

G. M. Wharton, for respondent.

The libellant has neglected or refused to comply with the laws of the United States, in regard to the ownership of vessels, and yet he comes into court to claim all the privileges and rights of an owner according to law. Act Feb. 18, 1793 (1 Story's Laws, 285); Act Dec. 31, 1792 (1 Story's Laws, 268), §§ 3–5, 11, 14; Act March 2, 1797 (1 Story's Laws, 453). The libellant has endangered the national character of the vessel by not complying with the fifth section of the act of 1792. In England, the law makes all bills of sale of vessels void, unless the revenue regulations are complied with; but here the vessel only loses her national character and privileges. The libellant is not the part owner of a national vessel, and therefore this court will not aid him.

Mr. Campbell, for libellant, in conclusion.

All the other part owners knew of the libellant's interest. In regard to the alleged violation of the fifth section of the act of 1792, the time therein allowed has not yet expired. If a citizen of the United States was part owner of a prize, he could come into court and ask for such security as is now demanded.

HOPKINSON, District Judge (after stating the facts as above). The ownership of the libellant has been made out very clearly. The schooner appears to have been built by one John Compton, for himself and others. On the 15th of September, 1838, he executed bills of sale to the other owners, in the proportions to which they were respectively entitled, to wit, one fourth to William S. Reed, one fourth to William Murphy, one eighth to Levi Paine, and one eighth to Isaiah Dunlap, the other one fourth remaining his own. On the 15th October, 1838, Compton transferred one eighth of the schooner, that is, one half of his fourth, to Evan Fox, the libellant, for the consideration of $669 96. There is nothing to impeach the validity or fairness of this sale; on the contrary, there is positive proof that Fox gave full value for it. The interest of Fox, to the amount stated in his libel, being thus established, the defence is left on the ground set forth in the supplemental answer, that is, that the libellant does not appear to be an owner of the schooner in her enrolment and license, and has not complied with the requisitions of the revenue laws. We must recollect that this is not a question between the United States and this vessel, or her owners, or any of them; nor a question of the rights of this vessel, or her owners, in navigating her under the laws of the United States, nor to what privileges she is entitled under those laws. It is a question between the owners themselves, and their rights against each other.

It is in full evidence that the respondents well knew of the purchase, by the libellant, of one eighth part of this schooner, from the same person, Compton, from whom they derived their title. The officer of the custom-house at Bridgetown, where she was built, also knew of the bill of sale from Compton to Fox, it being drawn by him. It seems, also, that Fox applied at the custom-house of this port, to have his name inserted in the enrolment and license of the schooner, and produced his bill of sale, but was told that, as all the owners resided in another district, new papers could not be granted here. There was, therefore, no attempt at fraud or concealment by Fox, either from the other owners, or the government. The right of Fox, and the agreement between him and Compton, by which he obtained it, were well known to the other owners. Yet, in April last, William Murphy, one of the owners, went to the custom-house at Bridgetown, and there swore that he, together with Levi Paine, William S. Reed, and Isaiah Dunlap, were the sole owners of the schooner, wholly omitting the name of Fox. Now, putting Fox out of question, how are these respondents the sole owners? They have shown title to but three fourths. Whatever right Compton had not transferred to Fox, he assigned to his creditors, on the 26th October, 1838, eleven days after his transfer of one eighth to Fox. We find, then, that Murphy, well knowing of Fox's right, goes to the custom-house, and swears that he, Paine, Reed, and Dunlap, are the sole owners of the schooner, and gets the enrolment and license, accordingly; and now, when Fox claims, against them, his right as a part owner, they tell him he has lost it, because his name is not in the enrolment and license. And why is it not there? By whose act was it omitted? Did Murphy give Fox notice of his intention to take out the enrolment and license, and to omit his name? Never. It is impossible for any court to sanction such a defence, unless under the imperative commands of the law. The omission in the registry and enrolment of this schooner, does not make it, in point of fact, a foreign vessel. It can but deprive her of the privileges of an American, but her ownership is, in truth, American.

Granting that the omission of the name of Fox has deprived the vessel of American privileges, whose fault was it? . If a fraud has been committed on the revenue laws, whose fraud was it? Certainly not the libellant's. He had no part in the false statement made at the custom-house; it was not known to him. There was a double deception practised by Murphy; first, on the custom-house, and then on Fox, and now Murphy attempts to visit the consequences of his illegal act on the libellant. But suppose the consequence of this omission were even to convert the schooner, in point of law, into a foreign ship. Is there anything unlawful in an American citizen becoming a part owner of a foreign ship? Certainly not. He cannot claim for her American privileges; but, as between the owners, their rights are the same. These owners have entered her as an American ship, the tonnage duties have been assessed as such, and they cannot now be allowed to tell this court that their knowingly omitting to insert the libellant's name in her license, has deprived her of her national character.

It is ordered and decreed, that William Murphy, William S. Reed, Isaiah Dunlap, and Levi Paine, enter into stipulations in the sum $1340, being double the estimated value of one eighth part of the said schooner Lodemia and Eliza, to Evan Fox, the libellant, owner of the said one eighth part, for the return of the said schooner to the amount of the share of the said Evan Fox; and, unless they shall do so, they do severally consent that execution shall issue forth against them, their heirs, executors, administrators, goods, and chattels, wheresoever the same shall be found; and upon this being done, by sufficient sureties, the said schooner shall be released from arrest.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Aug. 6, 1803.

SURRENDER OF BANKRUPT BY HIS BAIL.

A bankrupt, surrendered by his bail, during the time allowed for his examination, will not be committed in execution.

Stewart was surrendered in discharge of his bail [Levi]; and being prayed in commitment, produced a summons from commissioners of bankruptcy in Baltimore, dated August 4, 1803, to appear, &c., on the 5th of August, and the 25th of August, 1803, and the 15th of September next.

Upon which THE COURT refused to commit him in execution. The summons was simply signed by the commissioners, stating themselves as such. There was also a certificate that he did attend yesterday at Baltimore agreeably to his summons. See the bankrupt law of the 4th of April, 1800, § 22 [2 Stat. 19], which declares that the bankrupt shall be free from arrest; and on producing the summons or notice under the hands of commissioners, shall be discharged, if arrested.

Case No. 5,016.

FOXALL v. McKENNEY et al.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 206.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1827.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL.

1. Coffee in a bag, wine in bottles, and brandy in a cask, laid in by the testator for the current use and consumption of himself and family, did not pass, under a bequest to the testator's wife, of "all his furniture, and other household effects, in both of his residences," "to be held and occupied by her, for her sole and separate use and benefit, provided she should continue to reside in either of the said residences, and for life, if she should so long continue to reside therein." The bag, bottles, and cask go with their contents, as incidents thereto.

2. The words, "all my servants," were limited to house servants, by the intention of the testator, as gathered from other parts of the will.

3. A bequest of the use of the testator's "property" in a certain baking business, comprehends the use of the testator's servants employed therein.

This was a bill in equity, filed by Mrs. [Catherine] Foxall against the executors of her husband's will, and certain trustees under her marriage settlement, for certain provisions of coffee, wine, and brandy, which had been laid in by her husband for the current use and consumption of the family; and also to obtain the use of his servants, who had been employed in a baking business carried on under the superintendence of his son-in-law, Mr. McKenney; and to be reimbursed her travelling expenses from England, where her husband died, to the United States. This cause was heard in this court at the same time with the two causes of Foxall v. English and English v. Foxall, which were decided by the supreme court of the United States, in 1829. 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 595. This cause, however, was not carried up.

Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL, Circuit Judge.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The third bill, namely, Foxall v. McKenney et al., presents three questions: 1st. Who is entitled to the coffee, wine, &c., laid in by Mr. Foxall for household consumption? 2d. Are the trustees entitled to the use of the servants employed exclusively in the bakehouse? 3d. Is the plaintiff, Mrs. Foxall, entitled to be repaid by the defendants her travelling expenses from England to Georgetown?

1. As to the coffee, wine, &c. By the marriage settlement she was to have, for life, the dwelling-house and appurtenances in Georgetown, his "household goods, implements, and utensils of household, china, linen, family carriage, and pair of horses," then (4th November, 1816) in his dwelling-house in Georgetown; and the trustees were to hold the same in trust; to permit Mrs. Foxall "to occupy and enjoy" the dwelling-house and appurtenances; and "to hold, use, and enjoy the said household furniture, implements, and utensils of household, china, linen, carriage, and horses, for and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long continue to reside in the said dwelling house, to and for her own sole and separate use and benefit;" and after her decease, or ceasing to reside therein, upon trust for Mrs. Foxall's executors, administrators, and assigns. By the will, after confirming the marriage settlement, he bequeathed to his wife $500, as a temporary "provision for her support, until the enjoyment of the provisions of the settlement should accrue to her." He also gives her, "for her own use absolutely," certain plate in the house at the time of his death. He also gives her the use of all his servants, during the remainder of their time of servitude. He also gives her a right to select either his town or country residence, "or to continue in the occupation and enjoyment of both. the same as they had been occupied and enjoyed by himself;" his "desire being to promote the personal comfort of his wife," and that the occupation by her, of both residences, should be as his had been. He declares that his book-case, and books therein, shall be considered as forming a part of the household furniture, limited to her by the settlement; "and if she shall choose to continue the occupation of both residences," he gives and bequeathes to her all his "furniture, and other household effects, in both residences, not included in said settlement, to be held, used, and enjoyed by her, in the same manner, and upon the same terms, and for the same time, as the furniture and other household effects included in the said settlement;" but if she shall choose Spring-Hill, (the summer residence,) instead of the house in town, he then gives her power "to take and remove such part of his furniture and other household effects in his town-house, and carry the same with her to Spring-Hill, to be held and enjoyed by her in the same manner, in every respect, as the furniture and other household goods in his said dwelling-house; and as to such part thereof as she should not remove to Spring-Hill," he directs that the same shall sink into and form part of the "residuum of his estate." At the time of Mr. Foxall's death, there remained in his dwelling-house in Georgetown a small quantity of coffee in a bag, and some wine in bottles, and brandy in a cask, the whole value of which was $458.48, after deducting $20.06¼ for the bottles, &c., which coffee, wine, and brandy had been laid in by Mr. Foxall for the current use and consumption of himself and family, and not for sale. Mrs. Foxall, after her return from England, where her husband died in December, 1823, having determined to continue the occupation of both residences, (viz., the house in town and Spring-Hill,) took possession of the same and all the household effects in both, including the coffee, wine, and brandy; and the question now is, whether these family stores, or provisions, passed to her under the bequest of "all his furniture and other household effects in both residences, not included in the settlement; to be held, used, and enjoyed by her, in the same manner, and upon the same terms, and for the same time, as the furniture and other household effects included in the said settlement," that is, "for her sole and separate use and benefit," provided she continued to reside in either of the said houses, and for life if she should so long continue to reside therein. The intention of the testator is the ruling principle of construction in expounding a will. If the words are, in their usual import, extensive enough to carry the thing in question, but may be so construed as not to carry it, the intention of the testator must be sought by a comprehensive view of the whole will, and the circumstances in which the testator was, at the time of making it.

The words, "goods and chattels," are the most comprehensive terms of description for passing personal property by will; yet they may be restricted by the context. Thus in Crichton v. Symes, 3 Atk. 61, the words "all my goods, wearing apparel of what nature and kind soever, except my gold watch," were restricted to household goods and furniture, there having been a legacy of £50 given by the same will to another legatee; which showed the intention of the testator not to give every thing to the first legatee; it appearing also that the household goods, furniture, wearing apparel, and watch, together with the £50, constituted the whole personal estate, except about £16. And in Woolcomb v. Woolcomb, 3 P. Wms. 112, one devised to his wife "all his household goods, and other goods, plate, and stock, within doors and without," and bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to J. S. It was contended that the words "all other goods," carried the whole personal estate; but the lord chancellor was of opinion that such a construction would make void the bequest of the residuum; and that it seemed reasonable that the words "other goods" should be understood to signify things of the like nature with household goods, "to the end the whole will might have its effect; and consequently that the money, cash, and bonds should not, in this case, pass by the word 'goods,' but should go to the residuary legatee." In the case of Pratt v. Jackson, 2 P. Wms. 302, the words "household goods, utensils, and household stuff," in a marriage settlement, were held, by the house of lords, upon appeal, to carry only such as were in the dwelling-house of the husband, who lived in London, and not the beds, &c. in a marine hospital in Portsmouth, where he provided for sick and disabled seamen, under a contract with the government; these beds, &c. being considered rather as stock in trade than household goods.

These cases, and many others which might be cited, show that words, which are, of themselves, large enough to include the thing in question, may, by their associates, or by the context, or other circumstances, be so far contracted as to exclude that thing; and they are all examples of the rule that "the intention of the testator is to govern the construction of the will."

In the present case, if the coffee, wine, and brandy were bequeathed to Mrs. Foxall, it must be because they are included in the expression "household effects." These words do not seem to comprehend more than the words "household goods;" and they are used by the testator himself as equivalent terms; and in the marriage articles he has repeatedly used the words "household furniture" as equivalent to "household goods." By his will, he declares that his book-case and books therein shall be considered "as forming a part of the household furniture which is limited to" his wife by the settlement; and if she shall choose to continue the occupation of both residences, he gives her "all his furniture and other household effects, in both his said residences, not included in the settlement; to be held, used, and enjoyed by her, in the same manner, &c. as the said furniture and other household effects, included in said settlement." The indiscriminate use which he makes of the expressions "household furniture," "household goods," and "household effects," seems clearly to prove that he considered them synonymous; and by limiting his wife to the use of the "household effects" bequeathed, in the same manner, upon the same terms, and for the same time, as the "household effects" included in the settlement; it is strongly to be inferred that they were to be effects of the same kind. It had been decided, nearly a century before the date of this will, by Lord Chancellor Talbot, in the case of Slanning v. Style, 3 P. Wms. 334, 335, that malt, hops, beer, and ale, "which are victuals, and whose use is in their consumption, cannot, in their common, natural sense, be taken to be household goods, and pass under that denomination." And the case is much stronger where the use of the household effects is limited to the life of the legatee. In a still earlier case (Mich. T. 1729) Trafford v. Berrige, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 201, case 14, it was holden that where a man devised to his niece "all his goods, chattels, household stuff, furniture, and other things, which then were or should be in his house at the time of his death, and some time after died, leaving about £265 in ready money in the house, this ready money did not pass; for, by the words 'other things,' shall be intended things of like nature and species with those before mentioned." It is evident, by the various clauses of the will which have been cited, that it was the intention of the testator to give Mrs. Foxall those things only, of which there could be a use for life, and which might remain in specie at her death; and that such as would be consumed in their use were not in his contemplation; and therefore he could not intend to give them. And, although from the general tenor of the will, and the solicitude it manifests to provide for the personal comfort of his wife, we may suppose that if these household stores of coffee, wine, &c. had been the subject of his thoughts, he would probably have given them to her; yet as it seems manifest that he did not think of them, and that he has not, in his bequest, used such expressions as, according to settled rules of construction of wills, will comprehend them, I am compelled to say that they did not pass to her by the will. I am also of opinion that the bag, the bottles, and the cask, go with the coffee, wine, and brandy, as incidents thereto.

2. The 2d question arising upon this bill, is, whether the trustees are entitled to the use of the servants who had been exclusively employed in the bakehouse in the lifetime of the testator. The clause of the will under which Mrs. Foxall claims them is in these words: "Also I give to her the use of all my servants during the remainder of their time of servitude." After this and several other specific bequests and devises, and subject thereto, he bequeaths and devises, to his trustees, whom he also appoints his executors, all his property of every kind, with the most ample powers to manage the same. Then comes the following clause, under which the trustees claim the use of the bakehouse servants: "And whereas I am now carrying on the baking business, in Georgetown, under the care and superintendence of my said son-in-law, Samuel McKenney, who accounts to me," &c., "now I do hereby declare my mind and intention to be that my said trustees do and shall, in their discretion, continue to carry on the said business after my death, for such time as they shall think it proper and prudent; and to use and employ my property therein, under the care and superintendence of the said Samuel McKenney, in the same manner as the same is now carried on by me and superintended by him," &c. &c. The servants in the bakehouse were literally Mr. Foxall's servants, and had a limited time to serve; and the words of the bequest to Mrs. Foxall are extensive enough to comprehend them, and she is entitled to the use of them, unless the general expression "all my servants" can be limited by the intention of the testator as discovered by a consideration of the other parts of the will. The 1st clause of the will confirms the marriage settlement; the 2d gives his wife $500 in addition to the settlement; the 3d gives her certain articles of plate; the 4th gives her the use of the servants; the 5th gives her the use of both his residences. These provisions seem all to be made in pari materia, and to have had the same object—the personal comfort of Mrs. Foxall in the residences she was to continue to occupy as he had done. They all relate to the household establishment, and to the small farm at Spring-Hill, which she was to occupy as a "retreat merely." For these purposes the bakehouse servants had not been used, and seem not to have been contemplated by the testator in the bequest, to his wife, of the use of his servants. I think therefore that she is not entitled to the use of the bakehouse servants.

3. The 3d question, arising upon this bill, is, whether Mrs. Foxall is entitled to be repaid, by the defendants, her travelling expenses from England to Georgetown. I see no part of the will which justifies such a claim; and therefore am of opinion that it cannot be allowed.

TREAT, District Judge. This cause coming on to be heard upon the pleadings and proofs therein, and Mr. Thos. H. Dodge appearing for the complainants, and filing an original stipulation, signed by the defendants, waiving any further defense therein, it is now, at this day, ordered, adjudged, and decreed: (1) That the several letters patent, viz: letters patent No. 45,296, dated the 29th day of November, 1864, granted to Lavinia H. Foy, for improvement in corset skirt-supporters; and reissue letters patent No. 4,831, granted to Lavinia H. Foy, assignor, by mesne assignment, to herself and James H. Foy, for improvement in skirt-supporting corsets, March 26, 1872, the original letters patent [No. 39,911] having been granted September 15, 1863; in the bill of complaint in this cause mentioned and set forth, are good and valid letters patent, and that the complainants became vested with the exclusive right in and to the said letters patent, and each of them as in said bill alleged and claimed. (2) That the said defendants have infringed upon the said complainants in their exclusive rights under said letters patent aforesaid, as in said bill set forth, and by the testimony in this cause set forth and proven. (3) And it being admitted and agreed, by the stipulation aforesaid, that all the damages due to the said complainants for the infringements aforesaid, excepting one dollar damages and one dollar profits, have been settled and paid to the full satisfaction of said complainants; it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said defendants, their attorneys, agents, servants, and workmen be perpetually enjoined during the lifetime of the said letters patent, and each of them, from making, manufacturing, selling, or using, in violation of the said letters patent, and each of them, any corset skirt-supporters containing the said inventions of the said Lavinia H. Foy, in the said letters patent, and each of them, set forth and described, and that an injunction issue accordingly. FOY v. TALBURT.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 124.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1837.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE — JURISDICTION OF ACTIONS AGAINST EXECUTORS—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT.

1. A justice of the peace has not jurisdiction of an action against an executor; and money paid by the defendant in such a case, while in commitment upon a ca. sa. issued upon the judgment of the justice, was money paid by duress, and may be recovered in an action for money had and received.

2. A judgment of a justice of the peace, being in part for a matter not within his jurisdiction, is void in toto.

3. The plaintiff cannot, in an action before a justice of the peace, recover upon a cause of action different from that stated in the warrant.

This was an action for money had and received, to recover money paid by the plaintiff [Mordecai Foy] while in commitment upon a ca. sa. issued upon a judgment of a justice of the peace against the plaintiff as executor de son tort of a living man, for damage done to land.

R. J. Brent, for defendant [Jane Talburt], contended that money paid under valid process cannot be recovered, and cited 5 Wheeler, 89; Selden, 72; Cobb v. Curtiss, 8 Johns. 367; White v. Ward, 9 Johns. 231, 232; Phillips v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 414; Brisbane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt. 144, 160; Marriot v. Hampton, 7 Term R. 269; 1 Wheeler, 232; Walker v. Ames, 2 Cow. 428; Norfolk v. Gantt [2 Har. & J. 435], in the court of appeals in Maryland.

Mr. Bradley, contra, admitted the law as cited; but it does not apply to a judgment void because the court which rendered it had not jurisdiction of the cause. It is not, then, valid process; but wholly void.

The jury having been sworn, THE COURT, at the motion of Mr. Bradley, instructed the jury, that if, from the evidence, they should be of opinion that a judgment was rendered in this case by a justice of the peace against the present plaintiff as executor, and that upon such judgment a ca. sa. was issued, and the plaintiff committed to prison, and that while there he paid the said judgment and costs, then the said money was paid by duress. Verdict for the plaintiff, $54.15.

[2 Lowell, 399.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1875.

BANKRUPTCY — PROVABLE DEBTS — COSTS OF ATTACHMENT IN DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS AGAINST BANKRUPT.

The costs of an attachment, laid by the wife of the bankrupt in a libel for divorce, are not provable in the bankruptcy, and are not an equitable charge against the assets in the hands of the assignee.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of George F. Foye.]

R. M. Morse, Jr., for petitioner.
C. Blodgett, for assignee.

LOWELL, District Judge. The bankrupt's wife sued for a divorce, and by order of one of the justices of the court in which that cause was pending, passed in accordance with a statute of Massachusetts, she attached his personal property, to answer any decree for alimony, and incurred large costs in the custody thereof. Before that suit was decided, the husband became bankrupt, the attachment was dissolved, and the chattels came to the possession of the assignee. The wife now applies for an order that her costs may be paid her in full.

The insolvent law of Massachusetts provided, that, when an attachment should be dissolved by the proceedings of the defendant in insolvency, and the plaintiff proved his debt, his costs should be a privileged claim upon the assets. Gen. St. c. 118, § 127. In Fortune's Case [Case No. 4,955], I worked out an equity in favor of attaching creditors, for their costs incurred in putting the property into the custody of the law, for the general benefit.

It is insisted, on behalf of the petitioner, that she has an equity like that which was admitted in Fortune's Case. I do not think so. She has no provable debt, and whatever she may hereafter recover in the way of alimony, and for costs, will be a valid debt against her husband, notwithstanding his discharge in bankruptcy. In the case cited, the debt and costs would have been barred; and the costs were not even provable as an ordinary debt, and unless they could be paid by a sort of equitable privilege, they could not be paid at all. Besides, the action in behalf of the wife is not one which I could presume, as in the case cited, to have been intended for the general good. It was brought for a quasi tort, and tended to diminish the fund which would have inured to creditors. Suppose a writ of replevin is brought against the bankrupt claiming all his personal property, but the action is finally decided in favor of his assignees, it might be argued that, but for the replevin, the bankrupt would have squandered his estate, and therefore the costs ought to be allowed. It seems to me that the statute of Massachusetts adopted the true equity. Some bankrupts, indeed, may not be discharged, and then the debt and costs might be recovered; but those cases form a very small fraction of the whole number. If the bankrupt is discharged, those plaintiffs whose debts or demands are not provable, have, to be sure, lost their original security, which is a hardship; but, on the other hand, they hold their full claim, and may levy it out of the future acquisitions of the bankrupt. The debt not being a provable one, its incident is not so, either as privileged or otherwise. Petition denied.

SEAMEN — WRONGFUL DISCHARGE IN FOREIGN COUNTRY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Wrongful discharge in a foreign country.
2. Measure of damages.

[Cited in Coffin v. Weld, Case No. 2,953.]

This was a libel by the second mate of the bark Ithona, against the owners, claiming wages for the entire voyage for which he shipped. This case was tried at the same time, and on the same evidence, as Foye v. Leckie [Case No. 5,023], with the further fact that the second mate, after his discharge, shipped on wages, at Trieste, in a vessel bound to New York, and voluntarily left that vessel at Leghorn.

J. H. Prince, for libellant.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for respondents.

THE COURT held, that the discharge of the second mate was not voluntary on his part, but coerced by the illegal conduct of the master, and that he was entitled to compensation as for a wrongful discharge. That the measure of damages was not, necessarily, his wages for the whole voyage. See Hunt v. Colburn [Case No. 6,886]; Sheffield v. Page [Id. 12,743].

His contract wages and expenses were allowed, up to the time when he might have reached his original home port, deducting what he had actually earned, or might have earned, on his passage home.

Case No. 5,023.

FOYE v. LECKIE.

[1 Spr. 210.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan. 1853.

SEAMEN—PUNISHMENT OF SECOND MATE—IMPRISONMENT.

1. Where a master orders a second mate to slush the masts, or to take in light sails, as a punishment, when no offence has been committed that would justify it, the second mate has a right to refuse obedience.
2. The master has no right to imprison him, for such refusal.

This was a libel for damages, by the second mate, against the master of the bark Ithona.

It appeared that the libellant shipped for a voyage, from Boston to the Mediterranean and back; that when a few days out, the master found fault with the manner in which he had sewed a rope upon an old sail, and ordered him as punishment, to slush the mast. This order he refused to obey; the master gave him time to reflect, telling him, that if he did not obey, he should be put in irons. He then ordered him to go aloft, and take in the top-gallant studding-sail, and furl the royal. This order he also refused to obey. At the time he told the master, that if he would put him forward, he would obey these orders. The master then put him in irons, and he remained in irons, until the arrival of the vessel at Trieste, when he applied for his discharge, and was discharged before the consul, but without wages. While in irons, he was allowed the use of his state-room, and of the quarter-deck, and was set free at meal times, and whenever else it was necessary. It was also understood between him and the master, that he could come out of irons, whenever he would promise to perform any seaman's duty that the master might order. These terms he refused to comply with, but was willing to be turned forward.

A number of ship-masters were examined, as experts, as to the extent of the duties of a second mate, in vessels of this size.

J. H. Prince, for libellant.
R. H. Dana, Jr., for respondent.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. It is not necessary to lay down any general rule, fixing the limits of a second mate's duty. Slushing masts and taking in light sails, are parts of a seaman's duty, but not usually assigned to able seamen, if there are light hands on board, and never to a second mate, unless in an exigency, and when all the men are otherwise employed. The experts agree in this. It is argued, that the second mate is a workman on board, and must, at the discretion of the master, do any part of the duty of a seaman, when not in command of a watch. I do not deem it necessary to go into the inquiry, how far the second mate is bound to slush the masts and take in light sails, when ordered to do so, in the fair exercise of the discretion of the master; for in this case, it is plain, that the order was given, not for the performance of a necessary duty, but as a punishment, when there had been no offence which could justify it. The officer had a right to protect himself and his rank. He did not do so by formidable resistance. He submitted quietly to the penalty of his refusal.

I am of opinion, that his imprisonment was wrongful, and that he is entitled to compensation. It appears that the libellant has also instituted criminal proceedings against the master, which are still pending. I shall give no damages beyond the mere indemnity for the wrong done.

FOYLES v. LAW.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 118.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1827.

EXECUTION—STAY—WRIT OF ERROR—SUPERSEDEAS—CA. SA.—INJUNCTION.

1. The court will not order an execution against bail to be stayed because a writ of error has been taken out by the principal, which is still pending in the supreme court, it not having been taken out in time to be a supersedeas; nor will they grant an injunction for the like cause.

2. If the party is taken upon a ca. sa. an injunction will not relieve him.

3. If a defendant is brought in upon a ca. sa. and not committed in execution, and the execution "not called by consent," it seems that the plaintiff cannot have another execution.

[This was an action by Foyles, for the use of Smallwood, against Thomas Law, special bail of J. D. Barry.]

A writ of error had been sued out by Barry to the original judgment against him, but too late to be a supersedeas; and a ca. sa. against him having been returned non est, a scire facias against Mr. Law as his bail was sued out, and a ca. sa. awarded thereon against him upon which he was arrested, and brought into court by the marshal.

THE COURT, upon motion, refused to order the execution against Mr. Law to be stayed until the writ of error to the original judgment should be decided in the supreme court of the United States.

Mr. Law then filed a bill for an injunction.

Mr. Worthington, for Mr. Law, contended that it was not too late, and that an injunction to stay further proceedings at law would justify the marshal in discharging Mr. Law from the arrest upon this execution; and he cited the case of West's Ex'r v. Hyland, 3 Har. & J. 200, to show that after a return of cepi upon a ca. sa., if no other entry be made on the record; and the plaintiff take no further steps, either by praying the defendant in commitment, or defaulting the sheriff, or by stating, on the record, that the plaintiff, by consent of the defendant, "elected not to call the execution," the plaintiff may have a new ca. sa.[2]

CRANCH, Chief Judge. But in the present case the plaintiff does not elect not to call the execution, but has called upon the marshal to return the writ; and it is now returned "cepi," and the plaintiff prays that the defendant may be committed in execution. The equity relied on in the bill is, that there is error in the original judgment; that the plaintiff expected that the case in error would have been decided before the plaintiff at law could obtain an execution against the complainant; that if the money should now be paid to the plaintiff at law, there will be great trouble, delay, and expense in getting it back, and risk of losing it altogether.

All the equity of the case may be resolved into the negligence of the principal debtor, in not obtaining a supersedeas in proper time; and of the bail, in not producing his principal upon the return of the scire facias. I do not think there is equity enough to justify the court in depriving the plaintiff at law of his legal remedy; no fault can be imputed to him. Nor do I think that an injunction to stay further proceedings at law in the case, can avail the complainant; for there is nothing remaining to be done to enforce the judgment. The plaintiff has gone the whole length, and the marshal has nothing further to do. If the court should refuse to order the defendant, Mr. Law, to be committed in execution, I doubt very much whether the plaintiff could have a new execution. A ca. sa. is the highest execution the party can have. When the body is taken on a ca. sa., and the writ is returned and filed, it is an absolute and perfect execution of the highest nature against the defendant, and no other execution can afterwards be had against his lands or goods, except where a person dies in execution; in that case, his lands and goods are liable to satisfy the judgment, by the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 4; 3 Bl. Comm. 415.

[2] It appears in the record of the case of West's Ex'r v. Hyland that the defendant had escaped from the first ca. sa., and therefore the court refused to quash the second ca. sa. See 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 677.

The case of West's Ex'r v. Hyland, cited by Mr. Worthington, is reported without argument, or reasons given for the judgment of the court. It is probable, however, that it was considered as a case within the statute of 1789, c. 42, by which, if a plaintiff elect not to call a ca. sa. at the return term, with the assent of the defendant, he may have a new ca. sa.; and the election of the plaintiff, and the assent of the defendant, not to call that ca. sa., must have been proved to, or presumed by, the court, from the silence of both parties. See the case of West's Ex'r v. Hyland, cited in 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 677, in Appendix. This is not a case coming within that statute; and if the court should refuse to commit the defendant in execution, at the prayer of the plaintiff, I do not think, as I before observed, that he could have a new execution.

I also think that the injunction must be refused, because it has nothing to operate upon. There is no proceeding at law to be stayed. The judgment is executed; and because, if it should operate as a discharge of the defendant from this execution, the plaintiff cannot have another. Injunction refused.

FRALOFF v. NEW YORK CENT. & H. R. R. CO.

[10 Blatchf. 16.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 15, 1872.

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS — LOSS OF BAGGAGE — VALUABLE LACES—ACTION BY MARRIED WOMAN—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. In an action against a common carrier, to recover for the loss of laces contained in a trunk, the baggage of the plaintiff, as a passenger, it appeared that none of the laces had been purchased by the plaintiff, and that they were purchased by no one, at least within living memory, but were inherited or received by gift, and were many years old: Held, nevertheless, that their value must be ascertained by a money standard, based on evidence, and could not be assessed upon conjecture, and that, in the absence of such evidence, nominal damages only could be given.

2. The action was properly brought in the name of the plaintiff, she being a married woman.

3. The laces were reasonable apparel and baggage, reference being had to the social position and wealth of the plaintiff, the state of her health, and the object of her journey to this country from abroad.

[This was an action at law by Olga de Maluta Fraloff against the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company.]

Thomas C. T. Buckley and James W. Gerard, Jr., for plaintiff.

Theron R. Strong, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge (orally charging jury). The plaintiff in this suit seeks to recover of the defendants the value of certain laces which she claims to have lost out of her trunk, while it was in the custody of the defendants, and in course of transportation over their road, from Albany to Niagara Falls. She alleges, that she bought a ticket for herself, as passenger, on the 4th of November, 1869, delivered her trunk, or caused it to be delivered, to the defendants, at their baggage car, in Albany, and received from them a check therefor; that both herself and trunk passed over the route that day, reaching Niagara Falls some time after midnight; and that, on her arrival at the latter place, her trunk was found to be in a damaged condition. Of these facts there does not seem to be any serious dispute.

But the plaintiff further claims, that, when she delivered her trunk to the defendants, it was in good order, and securely fastened, and that it contained the laces which she has described in her deposition. This the defendants deny; and they say that the evidence on this point is not sufficient to warrant you in finding that these laces were in her trunk at the time they received it from her at Albany. On this point the burden of proof is on the plaintiff. I do not propose to rehearse the evidence. You will remember it, especially as it was very fully and recently commented on by counsel on both sides, and say whether or not you are satisfied that the laces in question formed part of the contents of the trunk at the time it was placed in the baggage car at Albany. If they did not, then the defendants are not liable in this action, and your verdict should be for them. If, on the other hand, you are satisfied that the laces did constitute a portion of the contents of her trunk when it was received by the defendants, and that they constituted a part of her reasonable and ordinary baggage, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff. This is very obvious. The defendants admit that they are common carriers of passengers over the route in question; and, as such, they are responsible for all reasonable and proper baggage of those they transport, while it is in their custody. They are bound to return it to the traveller in substantially the same condition as that in which they received it, and no excuse can exonerate them from the non-performance of this duty, except the act of God or the public enemies, neither of which are pretended in this case. It is immaterial, then, if these laces were in fact abstracted from the trunk while in the defendants' custody, by whom it was done, if it was not done by the plaintiff herself, or by her assent or connivance.

You will have no difficulty in disposing of this part of the case. The evidence is not long or complicated, and you will readily determine whether or not the articles alleged to have been lost by the plaintiff were, or not, delivered to the defendants at Albany, and lost while in their custody. If you find the claim of the plaintiff in this respect true, you will, as I have already intimated, find a verdict for her. The question will then arise as to what amount of damages she is entitled to. This is a very important question, and yet one upon which there is very little proof upon which you can lawfully act. This renders it proper that I should submit some considerations to you in regard to the condition of the evidence as to value.

The plaintiff, in her deposition, describes the character and quality of the laces which she says she lost, to some extent, but she fixes no value which can be any guide to you, acting as you are under oath, and bound to come to definite results upon definite evidence, or upon such evidence in regard to facts, as alone would warrant you in deducing a definite price. The plaintiff states, that she purchased none of these laces, and that they were purchased by no one, at least within living memory; and it is inferrible from her statements, that there is no one living who can testify as to the cost of their manufacture. She says that they were made many years ago, and were inherited by her from her grandmother, or received by way of gift from her aunts. Nor is the plaintiff able to testify as to the value of similar laces which, to some limited extent, are sold in the markets of the world. Vague hints, such as that attributed to the empress, that they were worth a kingdom, or the evidence of some of the plaintiff's witnesses, that they were very beautiful, unique and exquisite, furnish no reliable guide by which you can fix a definite price. The defendants, if liable, are only liable for the value of these laces at the time they were lost, and that value is to be ascertained, if at all, by a money standard. Neither courts nor juries are permitted to assess values upon conjecture. They must have proof of value, or evidence of such facts as will warrant a deduction of the value with reasonable certainty. This is peculiarly true in regard to articles like these laces, the character and value of which are not generally known. According to the statement of the plaintiff, she possessed the only specimen of one kind of this lace, except a similar one belonging to the queen of England. It is obvious, therefore, that, before you can say, by your verdict, what the value of these lost articles was in November, 1869, you must have some specific information on that precise point, and it must come from witnesses, or some one witness who is competent to speak on the subject. The counsel for the plaintiff claims, that you can find sufficient evidence of that character in the statements of Mrs. Carter, who has been before you. And it is true that Mrs. Carter gave some evidence as to the value of laces which bear the same name as some of those which the plaintiff alleges that she lost. This evidence is very meagre, and I admitted it with considerable hesitation. But it is before you, for your consideration, and it is the only evidence in the case which approximates to any precise valuation. Counsel on both sides have referred to it, in their arguments to you, and have submitted to me computations based upon her evidence. You will remember her statements. Upon some laces of the same general character she did give the prices. I was compelled to restrict her testimony to the narrowest width and the poorest quality, for the reason that no specimens of the plaintiff's laces were here, to be submitted to her inspection and judgment. You will recollect what the plaintiff said about the quantity and character and variety of the laces which she claims to have lost. You will also recollect the values which Mrs. Carter gave of the similar kinds, upon which she expressed an opinion; and you must arrive at their value as best you can. I think it my duty to say to you, that, by no computation, however liberal, based upon Mrs. Carter's prices, can the value of the laces in question, to which Mrs. Carter's estimates refer, exceed one thousand dollars. I do not say that it would reach that sum, but I do say that it will not exceed it. In regard to the laces upon which Mrs. Carter could fix no price, which the plaintiff lost, (if she did lose them,) she will be entitled to nominal damages only.

I have been thus particular in directing your attention to the peculiar condition of the evidence on this question of damages, because, an error on your part on this point might render this trial fruitless of any good result. Had the plaintiff produced in court the specimens of the laces which she referred to in her deposition, and which were marked as exhibits, but not attached to her deposition, and satisfied you that they fairly represented those she lost, there would have been some definite evidence before you, from which you could ascertain their value. That she has not done so is, in judgment of law, her own fault, and the consequences of that fault cannot be visited upon these defendants.

On the question, whether the action is properly brought in the name of the plaintiff, she being a married woman, I charge you in the affirmative. On the question to which counsel have called my attention, and requested me to instruct you, as to whether the lost laces were reasonable apparel and baggage, reference being had to the social position and wealth of the plaintiff, the state of her health, and the object of her journey, I have no remarks to submit to you, inasmuch as, by the proofs in the case, so far as they go, the value and character of this ornamental apparel was not greater than any respectable lady, traveling in a foreign country, might reasonably carry in her trunk.

You will consider the evidence before you, in the light of these instructions, and return such a verdict as that evidence will warrant, adding interest to the principal sum, from November 4th, 1869, to the present time, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum.

The jury were discharged without agreeing on a verdict.

[NOTE. At a subsequent trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $10,000. Motion for a new trial was denied (Case No. 5,026), and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court in New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. Fraloff, 100 U. S. 24.]

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS — LOSS OF BAGGAGE — VALUABLE LACES—REASONABLE AND ORDINARY WEARING APPAREL.

1. On the trial of a suit against a railroad corporation, to recover the value of certain laces, forming part of the contents of a trunk, which the corporation transported as the baggage of a passenger, who went by the same train with the trunk, the jury were instructed, that they were to decide, as a question of fact, under the rules defined by the court, whether or not the laces in question were baggage; that the responsibility of a carrier could not be maintained to the extent of making him responsible for such unusual articles as the exceptional habits or fancies, or the idiosyncrasies, of some particular individual, might prompt that individual to carry; that liability was limited to responsibility for such articles as it was customary or reasonable for travelers of the same class or tastes, in general to take with them for such journeys as the one which was the subject of inquiry; and that they could find a portion of the laces to have been reasonable baggage and the remainder not. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $10,000. A motion was made by the defendants for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence: Held, that, as the jury must have found that the laces, to the value of $10,000, were baggage, and, as their verdict was sustained by credible testimony as to such value, it was conclusive.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Whether the laces in question were the wearing apparel of the plaintiff, and were reasonable and ordinary wearing apparel to be carried by her as baggage, was a question of fact for the jury.

[See note at end of case.]

[This was an action at law by Olga De Maluta Fraloff against the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Company to recover the value of certain laces alleged to have been abstracted from the baggage belonging to the plaintiff while in course of transportation over the defendant's road. At the first trial the jury were unable to agree, and were discharged. Case No. 5,025.]

James W. Gerard, for plaintiff.

Elliott F. Shepard, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. This is a motion, upon a case made, for a new trial. The action is by a passenger, to recover for baggage lost while in charge of the defendant. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, for $10,000.

The facts upon which the verdict of the jury is predicated are so unusual, and the amount of the recovery, in view of the nature of the action, is so exceptional, that this motion deserves and has received careful consideration; but, notwithstanding the very elaborate and able argument of the defendant's counsel, and my own inclination to dissent from the conclusions of the jury, upon one of the vital questions of fact, I am convinced that the case presented is not within the rules which authorize a verdict to be set aside as contrary to evidence.

Credible testimony was given which authorized the jury to find the following facts: The plaintiff was a Russian lady, of high rank and large estates, who, for some time prior to coming to the United States, had been traveling in Europe, spending her time mainly in its principal capitals. Partly for health and partly for pleasure, in September, 1869, she determined to visit the United States, and left England, under the escort of one Webber, as a traveling companion, and came to New York City. While in England, her baggage comprised twelve trunks. Of them she brought here four large and two small ones, containing wearing apparel for her own use, of great variety and quantity, and of very expensive quality. Included in her wearing apparel was a large quantity of rare and valuable laces, which she had been accustomed to wear occasionally at home and during her travels in Europe, and which she valued at $200,000. She contemplated extensive travels in this country, and brought with her about $15,000, for her expenses, but had no fixed plans as to the duration or details of her travels. After staying several weeks in New York City, she commenced her travels here, and started for Chicago, intending to visit various places on the way, designing not to return to New York, but to decide, after arriving at Chicago, where she would go, contemplating, in a general way, going to New Orleans, Havana, California, and, possibly, Rio Janeiro, or to some of those places. She carried with her, from New York, one large trunk, a small trunk, a hat box, four satchels, a bag containing jewelry, and a cage of birds. She took with her the laces in question, which were packed in the large trunk. This contained several trays, the laces being in the fifth one from the top. Webber accompanied her. They stopped at the Delavan House, in Albany, for a day or two, and the large trunk was allowed to remain, during that time, in the baggage room of the hotel, locked up with other baggage. Webber went to the trunk once or twice, by the plaintiff's request, and procured from it articles which she wanted. Just before it was taken from the hotel to the defendant's depot, by the hotel porter, Webber returned these articles to the trunk. He then saw the package in which the laces had been folded by the plaintiff when she packed her trunks. He locked the trunk, and, soon after, it was delivered by the porter to the defendant's baggage agent, and was checked for Niagara Falls, whither the plaintiff and Webber went by the same train as did the baggage. The trunk was in good condition when delivered to the defendant's agent. When it arived at Niagara Falls, the locks were broken, the contents disturbed, and the plaintiff refused to receive it until it was examined to ascertain if the contents were safe. Upon examination, it appeared that the laces were missing, although nothing else had been taken. Articles of great value were necessarily exposed to view before the laces could have been abstracted from the trunk. As to the value of the laces, the jury were authorized to find a verdict for a very small sum, or for $62,000. Some of the laces were collars and handkerchiefs, and others were flounces, corsages, and dress trimmings, of various kinds. Although a large amount of testimony was elicited on the part of the defendant, tending to contradict many of these facts, and, upon some of them, strongly discrediting the plaintiff's case, I am constrained to hold that there was sufficient evidence to authorize the jury to find them substantially as above stated.

Among other things the jury were instructed, that they were to decide, as a question of fact, under the rules defined by the court, whether or not the laces in question were baggage, and, in this connection, the court charged as follows: "The responsibility of a carrier cannot be maintained to the extent of making him responsible for such unusual articles as the exceptional habits or fancies, or the idiosyncrasies, of some particular individual, may prompt that individual to carry. That liability is limited to responsibility for such articles as it is customary or reasonable for travellers of the same class or tastes, in general to take with them for such journeys as the one which is the subject of inquiry." They were also instructed that they could find a portion of the laces to have been reasonable baggage, and the remainder not.

I have summarized these facts, and referred to the instructions mentioned, for the purpose of presenting satisfactorily the salient features of the case in regard to the question which has impressed me as the most serious one—whether the jury could properly find that the property for which the plaintiff has obtained a verdict was reasonable and ordinary baggage.

The jury must have found that laces of the value of $10,000, carried by a traveller, with a large assortment of other articles of apparel, for personal use, are reasonable and ordinary baggage, for the loss of which a carrier, to whom they have been delivered, without notice of their value, is responsible. On first impression, the statement of this conclusion raises a somewhat violent presumption against the correctness of the verdict. No precedent for a recovery so large has been found, and, if it is sustained, it is difficult to ascertain where the limit of a carrier's liability exists. Nevertheless, if the question was properly left to the jury to decide, as one of fact, the value of the articles was peculiarly for their consideration, and abundant testimony was before them to sustain the conclusion they reached. The difficulty, in this case, lies in the character of the articles for the loss of which the action was brought. They were claimed to be a portion of the plaintiff's wearing apparel. If they were such, within all the cases, they were baggage, unless they were so valuable and rare as to exclude them from that category. What is wearing apparel, must necessarily be a question of fact. What is reasonable and customary wearing apparel, to be carried by a traveller upon a particular journey, must, also, be a question of fact. I know of no case where this has been held to be a question of law. The conflict in the authorities arises when we pass beyond these articles, to inquire what other property is baggage. By some of these authorities it is held, that the broad question is one for the jury to determine, both as to character and value, depending upon the tastes and habits of the traveller, his pecuniary circumstances, his position in society, and the conveniences and necessities of the particular journey, and that their decision cannot be disturbed (Rawson v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 2 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 220; McGill v. Rowand, 3 Barr [3 Pa. St.] 451); while, by others, it is held to be one of law for the court; and in these we find an irreconcilable conflict in its determination. Thus, money for travelling expenses has been excluded (Grant v. Newton, 1 E. D. Smith, 95), and allowed (Merrill v. Grinnell, 30 N. Y. 594); jewelry excluded (Richards v. Westcott, 2 Bosw. 589, and The Ionic [Case No. 7,059]), and allowed (McCormick v. Hudson River R. Co., 4 E. D. Smith, 181); pistols excluded (Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Collins, 56 Ill. 212), and guns allowed (Van Horn v. Kermit, 4 E. D. Smith, 453); manuscripts excluded (Hannibal Railroad v. Swift, 12 Wall [79 U. S.] 262), and allowed (Hopkins v. Westcott [Case No. 6,692]). An examination of these cases justifies the remark, that the limit of the carrier's responsibility seems as uncertain when left to be ascertained as a question of law by the court, as when left to the inquiry of a jury. Holding, as I do, that, whenever the article in controversy is, or may be, wearing apparel, a question arises for the determination of the jury as to whether, upon the facts in the particular case, it was such as the traveller was entitled to carry as baggage, it follows, that the finding of the jury, when sustained by credible testimony, must be conclusive. If the court can set aside the verdict, because it appears that the property was of greater value than the judge deems it reasonable that a traveller should carry, the question is no longer one of fact for the jury, but one of law for the court. If it is to be decided as matter of law, what standard of value is to be adopted? Illustrated by the present case, when the jury have found that the value of the plaintiff's property was $10,000, or that such of it as, under the circumstances, she was entitled to carry, was of that value, is it to be said it must be set aside, whereas, if it had been $1,000, or $3,000, the law would sanction the recovery? If so, it is the duty of the court, instead of instructing the jury that they are to determine what, in the particular case, is reasonable and customary baggage, to instruct them that the value or amount must not exceed some arbitrary limit defined by the court. To this proposition I cannot assent. If carried to its logical conclusion, it would abrogate the functions of the jury with reference to questions of this class. On the other hand, if the views I have expressed are a correct exposition of the law, the carrier is exposed to the hazard of most onerous responsibilities. In this case, the verdict might have been for $62,000, and it could not have been said that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, as to the value of the property lost. It would be difficult to conceive that any facts would justify such a recovery for loss of baggage. Undoubtedly, the case would be rare where such a verdict would not indicate prejudice, partiality or misconception on the part of the jury; and, in such case, under its general power over verdicts, the court could set it aside. But, had it been for that sum here, I am not prepared to say that it could not be sustained, in view of the extraordinary features of the case. As is said by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in McGill v. Rowand, supra, it is not obvious in what manner the court can restrict the quantity or value of the articles that may be deemed either proper or useful for the ordinary purposes of the traveller, because, in the nature of things, it is susceptible of no precise or definite rule, and, when there is an attempt to abuse the privilege, the court must rely upon the intelligence and integrity of the jury, to apply a corrective. If carriers are unwilling to assume the liabilities which they may incur if this rule is adopted by the courts, they must resort to such regulations, in regard to the transportation of baggage, as are sanctioned by law, or appeal to legislation for protection.

I have not deemed it necessary to refer to any other of the many grounds upon which it is urged a new trial should be granted. I entertain no doubt that, upon the other questions of fact, there was sufficient evidence to justify the conclusions of the jury. As to the rulings of the court upon the trial, those of importance were quite maturely considered, and, upon examination, meet my approval now. The novelty and importance of the questions involved render the case one eminently fit for the consideration of a higher tribunal, and to its consideration these questions should be remitted.

The motion for a new trial is, accordingly, denied.

[NOTE. The defendant brought error, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed; Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion, in which it was held: "1. In absence of legislation, or of special regulations by the carrier, or of conduct by the passenger misleading the carrier as to value of baggage, the failure of the passenger, unasked, to disclose the value of his baggage is not, in itself, a fraud upon the carrier. 2. To the extent that articles, carried by a passenger for his personal use when travelling, exceed in quantity and value such as are ordinarily or usually carried by passengers of like station and pursuing like journeys, they are not baggage for which the carrier, by general law, is responsible as insurer. 3. Whether a passenger has carried such an excess of baggage is not a pure question of law for the sole or final determination of the court, but a question of fact for the jury, under proper guidance as to the law of the case. And its determination of the facts—no error of law appearing—is not subject to re-examination in this court." Mr. Justice Field, Mr. Justice Miller, and Mr. Justice Strong dissent. [See note at end of case.]

4. If in answer to a question in the application, "Has the party ever had any of the following diseases? If so, how long, and to what extent?" (one of these diseases being rupture) the reply is "None," it is for the jury to say whether he was ruptured at the time or at any such previous period that the rupture may have been material to any question of the soundness of his health when his life was insured; and if so, or if at the time or any such previous period he wore a truss to repress hernial extrusion, the policy was void.

[See note at end of case.]

5. The statement of a party's age in his application for a policy of insurance on his life does not import absolute accuracy, whether it be stated positively or with a qualification that it is as near as he can recollect.

6. But even when such words of qualification are added to the answer in respect to age, they do not mean that the party is of uncertain age, but of the age stated or thereabouts, and a slight or immaterial discrepancy would not avoid the policy.

[See note at end of case.]

7. But if the party were seven or even five years older than the age stated in the application, the discrepancy would not be immaterial, and the policy would be void.

8. The company are estopped from denying their liability upon a policy as to a party who has purchased it from the holder after the death of the insured, on the faith of representations made by their agent after he had received the proof of loss; provided the purpose and object of the purchaser was sufficiently indicated to the agent, and what passed between them was mutually understood as a waiver of any objections to the validity of the policy, there being no fraud or knowledge of such objections on the part of the purchaser.

9. But there is no such estoppel if the agent told the purchaser before he parted with the consideration that he had no authority to act, but that the policy would be paid if the claim was a just one.

[1] [First case reversed in 91 U. S. 510. Second case affirmed in 94 U. S. 561.]

[This was an action of assumpsit by David France and Lucetta T. France, his wife, to the use of Samuel B. Selvage, against the Aetna Life Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn., on a policy of insurance for $10,000, upon the life of Andrew J. Chew, issued in July, 1865, and was commenced in the district court for the city and county of Philadelphia, from which the defendants removed it to this court. The cause is now heard, with a like action by David France and Lucetta P. France, his wife, in the right of the said Lucetta T. France, and to her use, against the same defendant, on a policy of insurance for $10,000 upon the life of the said Andrew J. Chew, issued in September, 1865.]

Nathan Sharpless, for plaintiffs.

Christian Kneass and Samuel C. Perkins, for defendant.

CADWALADER, District Judge. These were separate actions tried together by consent, on two policies of insurance each for $10,000, made by defendants on the life of Andrew J. Chew for the benefit of his sister Mrs. Lucetta T. France. The application and the policy issued thereon in the first of above cases were dated September 13, 1865, and in the second case July 12, 1865. The applications and policies were alike in both cases, and the defences, so far as regarded the questions affecting the force and effect of the contracts themselves, were the same. There was a special and distinct question in Selvage's case arising out of his position as assignee, or alleged purchaser for a valuable consideration of the policy sued on to his use.

There were three grounds of defence mainly insisted upon: First.—Want of interest on the part of the plaintiff in the life insured. Second.—Misrepresentation and concealment of the fact that the party insured had been ruptured, and actually was so at the time the applications were made. Third.—Misdescription of the age of the party insured, making him seven years younger than he really was. The premiums on both policies were regularly paid up to the time of the death. On the policy assigned to Selvage they were all cash; on the other one-half note. The money was paid and the notes executed for the premiums by Mrs. France. As to the want of interest, it appeared that Mrs. France, at the time the policies were issued, and up to the time of trial was a married woman, and in no respect dependent on her brother whose life was insured; nor was there any evidence of any indebtedness on his part to her, either prior or subsequent to the applications for insurance.

The defendants requested the judge to charge: "That if the applications and policies were in fact made and taken out by Mrs. France for her own benefit, she must show an insurable interest in the life of Chew; and if she was a married woman and in no way dependent on him for support; the mere fact that she was his sister did not give her such insurable interest; and that if Chew at the time the applications were made and policies issued was not indebted to her, then she had no insurable interest as a creditor in his life."

The judge declined to charge as requested, but charged as follows: "If Chew at the time of the insurance was unmarried and without issue or parent living, the insurance for the benefit of his sister was valid if the risk insured was properly described in the policies. As men of business you will see the importance of this last remark. There are persons who may be described as presumptively next of kin, and who can insure the lives of their relatives; or if any lives may be insured by any persons it is of course of paramount and indispensable importance that the risk be correctly described." The policies each contained a clause making the proposal, answers and declaration in the application part of the policies, and with a condition that if false or fraudulent the policies should be void; and the judge instructed the jury that this clause made the answers to the question part of the contracts, and they had thus the effect of warranties, and if they were wholly or in any material respect false or fraudulent the plaintiffs could not recover. The words "in any material respect," he said, must be understood as meaning in any respect or degree material to the risk insured, whether as to age, or health, or otherwise howsoever.

In answer to a question, whether the insured had ever had any of certain specified diseases, among them "rupture," and if so how long and to what extent? the insured stated in the applications "None." The defendants alleged that he had been ruptured, and was ruptured at the time of the insurances, and much evidence was given on this point, as to which the judge gave the following instruction: "If the jury believe that Chew was ruptured at the time, or at any such previous period that the rupture may have been material to any question of the soundness of his health when his life was insured; or if at that time or within such prior period he wore a truss in order that it might repress hernial extrusion, the verdict should in either case be for the defendants. But though he was ruptured in 1846 and 1854, and although the rupture accidentally recurred in a worse form in 1870, from an extraordinary exertion of strength in lifting a heavy weight, yet if the jury find that from 1855 or thereabouts until after the last insurance in 1865, he had no such disease, and was in all this interval in the habit of working and using bodily exercise, and occasionally dancing, bathing and traveling, and could walk long distances without being fatigued, and either did not wear a truss or wore it only from continuance of early habit; that his health was not impaired or affected by the former rupture; that it would not if mentioned have increased the risk or the premium, and that there was in this respect no falsehood or wilful suppression, I cannot give the instruction absolutely that the answer 'None' to the question was untrue or false. I have doubts whether I have not charged too favorably for the plaintiffs on this point. My chief difficulty is that the next question is, whether the party is subject to 'habitual' diseases mentioned in the same, as if there were a distinction between 'habitual' and ever having had them."

Upon the third ground of defence the defendants requested the court to instruct the jury: "That if the answers in the applications to questions four and five, as to the date of birth and age next birthday of Chew were false or untrue, the policies are void, and the verdict must be for the defendants."

The judge instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe that the answers to these questions were materially untrue as to the age of Chew, the policies are void, and the verdict must be for the defendants; and if he was thirty-seven or even thirty-five years old, the difference was not immaterial. I give the instruction as requested. There are two distinct questions in the application. '4. Place and date of birth of the party whose life is to be insured. 5. Age next birthday.' A good deal has been said about the uncertainty this man was under as to his age. I cannot say that was any reason he should be careless in describing his age, but, on the contrary, he ought to have been the more careful. I agree that if he had described his age as uncertain, the defendants must have abided by the contract as made. But this is not the contract; he is not described as a person of uncertain age. As to the insurance of July his answer to question five is simply 'Thirty years.' and his answer to question four, 'Born in 1835, Gloucester county, New Jersey,' and there is interlined between '1835' and 'Gloucester county, New Jersey,' the words 'October 28th.' Mr. Scott, the agent who took the application, has explained how that occurred. He says Chew said it was as near as he could recollect, and although he states there was no doubt at all about the year, he says there was a difficulty in determining the day of the month. Now, though this application does not contain the words 'as near as I can recollect,' I think under the circumstances of the case you are at liberty to read it as if they were there. I don't think it makes any material difference whether they are there or not. As to the second application, the one in September, the answer to question four is, 'Born in New Jersey, 1835.' The fifth question is, 'What is your age next birthday?' and the answer, 'Thirty years, October 28, as near as I can recollect.' That certainly does not mean to apply to the thirty years; it means, according to fair reading, that he was born in 1835. It was the 28th October, as near as he can recollect. He signs at the foot of this application, 'That is as near as I can remember,' applying to all the preceding questions. It is not a question of words but of fair meaning. If the man was a few months or even perhaps a year or two older than he states, it might not materially affect the risk; and even without the words 'as near as I can recollect' or 'remember,' if the difference was a slight discrepancy such as would not affect the risk, I should not think it a material difference, and certainly not when these words are contained in the application. But these words have not any indefinite meaning; they don't mean 'I am a person of uncertain age but am a person of the age of thirty years or thereabouts,' which in law means not materially different from that age."

The judge then reviewed and commented on the evidence respecting the age of the party insured, and added: "I do not see how you can decide this case upon the evidence, disregarding the fact that Chew was at least 35 or 37 years of age. If so the risk was materially misdescribed in these policies and the plaintiffs cannot recover except as to one of them, and that upon a special ground. This special ground applied to the first policy, issued in July, 1865, and upon which the second of the above suits was brought in the name of Selvage, who it was alleged, had bought this policy from Mrs. France, after the death of Chew, upon the faith of representations by the agent of defendants that it would be paid. The evidence showed that Selvage had lent Mrs. France $2,000 shortly before the death of Chew, and that the policy had been assigned to him as collateral for this loan; and that within a month after Chew's death he had paid Mrs. France the further sum of $7,280, and as he alleged, had then bought the policy absolutely from her on the faith of representations by the agent as above. The agent testified that not very long before the death of Chew there had been some intimations that there was suspicion as to the character of the risk, and that he had told Selvage that he had no authority to act, but that the claim would be paid if it was a just one."

The defendants requested the court to instruct the jury: "That if Selvage had loaned $2,000 to Mrs. France upon the security of an assignment, before the death of Chew, of this policy as collateral, the defendants could not be estopped by anything alleged to have occurred after Chew's death, from denying their liability as to this $2,000. That if before Selvage paid Mrs. France the $7,280, the agent of the company told him that he had no authority to act; that the matter was out of his hands, but that the policy would be paid if the claim was a just one, and unless Selvage fully disclosed the purpose and object of his inquiries as to the policy to the agent, the defendants are not estopped from denying their liability."

The judge gave these instructions as requested, but said that the words "fully disclosed" should be understood to mean "sufficiently disclosed to indicate the purpose and object." And added: "If the agent was the agent for the defendants to receive the preliminary proofs, and having received them knew that Selvage was negotiating with Mrs. France to purchase this policy, and by representing to him that the loss would be paid, induced him to pay her $7,280 for the assignment of it without any fraud on his part, or knowledge by him of the objections now made to his validity, then if the jury find that what passed was mutually understood and intended as a waiver of any such objections to the plaintiffs' recovery on this policy as have been made in the present trial, the jury may find for the plaintiffs on this policy, although the objections would otherwise have been fatal. There is great responsibility upon the jury on this part of the case. If you simply regard the testimony of the witnesses, it is very easy to understand the facts just as I have put them. But if you look carefully at the documents there is a great deal of difficulty in arriving at that belief. When you examine the documents you can get over the mistakes in the testimony of the witnesses. They may be partly explained perhaps by the fact of Selvage being deaf."

The judge then reviewed and commented on the testimony of the witnesses, and the documents in evidence, the letters, assignment, and the check with which the $7,280 was paid, and said: "The point in question is whether Selvage paid his money on the assurance of the agent of the company, and is in such a condition that the agent's mouth is stopped from telling the truth. Mrs. France could not confer any better title than she had herself, unless from something the agent said. What I ask your particular attention is whether the letters and the testimony together do not convince you that the only conversation that ever occurred with Selvage was before the preliminary proofs were in the hands of the company. If so you can scarcely understand the agent to have intended to waive objections."

[NOTE. In the first case, which was to the use of Selvage, the defendant brought error, and the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, and a new trial ordered, Mr. Justice Hunt delivering the opinion. It was held that the applicant for the insurance expressly agreed that the answers made by the assured to the questions put to him should be true, and that, if any of them were false, the policy issued to her should be void, and that consequently the alleged recovery of the assured from the rupture of 1846, so as to permit of ordinary bodily exercise and occasional dancing, bathing, and traveling without fatigue, should not have been given to the jury for their judgment. It was for the jury to determine whether the facts existed, and, accordingly as they determine upon that point, the one or the other result must necessarily follow. In this case the answer of the assured to the question in the application for the insurance as to whether he had ever had certain diseases specified, including the one named, was "None," and there was no qualification. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. France, 91 U. S. 510.

[In the second case, which was to the use of Lucetta T. France, the defendant brought error, and the cause was duly heard by the supreme court, and the judgment of the circuit court affirmed. Mr. Justice Bradley delivering the opinion. In this case the same answer was made in the application to the question respecting certain diseases, and there was also some evidence that the assured's age had been erroneously stated; but at the foot of the application, which was the one made in September, 1865, the following qualification was made: "The above is as near correct as I remember." In view of this qualification it was held that the assured must be understood as stipulating only for the integrity and approximate accuracy of his answers, and not for their absolute verity. Without this qualification, substantial error in any of the answers would avoid the policy, irrespective of the motive, but with the qualification the jury must be satisfied that the answers, or some of them, were untrue in any respect materially affecting the risk, and that the assured knew of their incorrectness. In respect to the rupture the learned justice remarked that if it appeared to have been completely reduced, so that its effects had entirely passed away, and had ceased to impair his health or to affect his capacity to take fatiguing or prolonged exercise, the jury will determine whether the answer is untrue as nearly as he could remember. Case No. 5,028.

FRANCE v. WASHINGTON.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 667.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1840.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PROHIBITORY LICENSE TAX.

The corporation of Washington has power, under the charter of May 15, 1820, § 7 [3 Stat. 586], "to provide for licensing, taxing, and regulating" "venders of lottery tickets," although the tax may be so high as to amount in effect to a prohibition; and to require the applicant for a license to deposit the license-money in bank before the issuing of the license.

Appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace [in the case of the corporation of Washington against Lewis H. France], for the penalty of twenty dollars, for exercising and dealing in the business and employment of a vender of lottery tickets, in the city of Washington, on the 25th of February, 1840, contrary to the by-law of the 25th of October, 1838.

The words of the charter upon this subject, are "That the corporation aforesaid shall have full power and authority" "to provide for licensing, taxing, and regulating," "venders of lottery tickets;" and "to restrain or prohibit lotteries." By the first section of the by-law of the 25th of October, 1838, it is enacted, "That it shall not be lawful for any person or persons within the limits of this corporation to exercise or deal in the business or employment of vender of lottery tickets, without having first obtained a license for such purpose from the mayor." "And that before the mayor shall grant such license there shall be paid into bank, according to the act of May the thirty-first, eighteen hundred and thiry-six, for the use of this corporation, by the person or persons applying for such license, the sum of three hundred dollars." And by the second section, it is enacted, "That if any person, or persons, shall, from and after the passage of this act, exercise, or deal in the business or employment of vender of lottery tickets, within the limits of this corporation, without having first obtained a license for such purpose, as required by the first section of this act, he, she, or they shall forfeit and pay to this corporation, the sum of twenty dollars for each and every day, he, she, or they shall so offend, to be recovered and distributed as is by law provided for the recovery and distribution of fines." By the first section of the by-law of May 31, 1836, it is enacted, "That from and after the 30th day of June next, all money due, accruing, or receivable by the corporation, except the taxes upon real and personal property, and wharfages, shall be paid by the person making the same, directly into the bank in which the deposits of the corporation are or shall be made; which bank shall issue to the person a certificate therefor; and no license shall be issued or credit given, by any officer of the corporation, for a payment made, except upon a surrender of such certificate of deposit, as hereinbefore provided."

Brent & Brent, for appellant, contended that the charter gave the corporation power to license only, not to prohibit the exercise of the business of vender of lottery tickets. That the tax of three hundred dollars amounts to a prohibition, and exceeds the power given, and is, therefore, void. They contended, also, that the corporation had no authority to require the applicant for a license to pay the money into any bank as a condition of granting the license.

But THE COURT nem. con. overruled the objections, and affirmed the judgment, with costs.

Case No. 5,029.

The FRANCESCA CURRO.

[4 Wkly. Notes Cas. 415.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May 18, 1877.

CONSTRUCTION OF CHARTER-PARTY—COMMENCEMENT OF VOYAGE.

A vessel lying at Genoa was chartered for a voyage from Philadelphia to a British port, with the express stipulation that she should sail from Genoa during December. On Dec. 30, having procured all necessary provisions and papers for the voyage, she was unmoored and towed by a tug about three quarters of a mile, to the western side of the harbor opposite the roadway, where she again anchored. At the time a strong headwind prevented her from going to sea, and she was unable to proceed for several days. Held, that although she remained under the jurisdiction of the local authorities, she had nevertheless broken ground for the voyage, and must be held to have "sailed" within the provision of the charter.

[Cited in Pedersen v. Pagenstecher, 32 Fed. 842.]

Libel for breach of charter party.

The respondents had chartered the bark Francesca Curro, then at Genoa, to sail from Philadelphia to a port in Great Britain, it being expressly stipulated that she should sail from Genoa during the month of December. The question in the case was whether or not this stipulation had been performed. It was shown by the testimony that the harbor of Genoa is semicircular, being about two miles in width from east to west, and one mile from north to south. The roadway for ingress and egress is between two moles extending towards each other in parallel lines from the eastern and western sides of the harbor and about a quarter of a mile apart. Upon December 30, 1876, all the papers necessary for departure were obtained. The bark was then lying on the eastern side of the port, where is the anchorage for merchant vessels, with anchors fore and aft, and was on that day unmoored and towed by a tug to the western side of the port, opposite the roadway, for departure, a distance of about three quarters of a mile, where she anchored again. When this movement was made the wind was blowing dead ahead, and so continued for several days. The master knew he could not go to sea until the wind changed, and lay at this second anchorage within the harbor, and, presumably, within the jurisdiction of the local authorities until January 4, 1877, when he was taken out by a tug, and proceeded on the voyage. Upon the arrival of the bark at this port, the respondents refused to receive her. The cause was reargued May 17, before Cadwalader, J., and Captain Young, who had been requested by the judge to sit with him as an assessor.

Mr. Flanders, for libellant.

It is admitted that the stipulation is a condition precedent, but it has been performed. Entire readiness to go to sea within the time fixed and an actual movement, however short the distance, in the prosecution of the voyage, is in contemplation of law a sailing if the delay arises from vis major. Arnould, Ins. p. 554; Maclachlan; Pittegrew v. Pringle, 3 Barn. & Adol. 520; Bond v. Nutt, 2 Cowp. 607; Fisher v. Cochran, 5 Tyrw. 496.

Wilson & Ward, contra.

All the books require, besides readiness, a movement with the bona fide expectation of at once prosecuting the voyage. Arnould, Ins., supra; Phil. Ins. § 773. The case of Pittegrew v. Pringle, supra, does not apply, because the ship was not ready within the time fixed. In Bond v. Nutt, supra, and Earle v. Harris, 1 Doug. 357, there was an actual sailing of five miles. Fisher v. Cochran, supra, was especially confined by the court to similar cases, viz., time policies, where there was no terminus a quo, as in this case. The case which governs this is Nelson v. Salvador, 1 Moody & M. 309. The movement cannot have been with the bona fide intention of at once going to sea, because the master admits he knew he could not do so. The direction of the movement throws no light upon the question of intention, because he could have gone in no other direction. On account of the nature of the harbor of Genoa the vessel could not be said to have been ready for sea until she had arrived at the second anchorage.

May 17, 1877. The assessor presented the following report:—

The assessor in this case having read the testimony and heard the arguments of counsel, respectfully presents, That the bark Francesca Curro was lying in the port of Genoa, under charter to sail in Dec., '76, for Philadelphia or Baltimore. On the 30th of said month she got out from among the shipping, and proceeded about three fourths of a mile towards the mouth of the harbor, and anchored; the wind was blowing from southward and eastward, which was ahead for her proceeding to sea. It continued to blow from the same quarter for several days, so that the vessel was detained thereby; she might have gone to sea with two tugs, but as the vessel was in ballast only, she was not in a condition, nautically, to contend with a head wind, on a lee shore, particularly when taking into consideration the stormy season of the year, and the lateness of the hour, 3 p. m. It certainly would have been the height of imprudence for her to have gone to sea that day, say Dec. 30, 1876.

The question for the assessor is, Was the moving of the vessel, say three-fourths of a mile, to be considered as commencing the voyage? The assessor is clearly of the opinion that it was not, but merely a shifting of berths, preparatory to getting ready for sea. Such ports as Marseilles, Pernambuco, Genoa, and many others, although small, are made capable of accommodating a large number of vessels, by the peculiar mode of arranging the same in "tiers," with two anchors out at the bow and two at the stern, what is "mooring head and stern." This method renders it imperatively necessary for vessels, when about ready to sail, to notify the harbor authorities thereof; the proper boats and number of men, with a pilot, are sent on board, who takes charge of the ship, gets up the anchors, unmoors the ship, and takes her to a convenient berth, anchors, and turns her over to the officers and crew. No vessel can be deemed as ready for sea, from any such ports as the above, without several hours' detention, so that the anchors and cables may be properly secured, and many other things to be secured and prepared, which, in many instances cannot be performed prior to getting the ship out from among the crowd of vessels. The writer has been in many ports of the above description, and has never seen or known vessels to unmoor, get outside of the crowd of shipping, and go to sea the same day.

CADWALADER, District Judge. After the argument of this case, I asked one of the nautical experts on whom I frequently call to act as assessors, to read the papers, and let me know his opinion. I had no definite purpose to refer the case for his formal assistance. But he naturally understood the question to be such a reference, and has reported accordingly. The report may be filed.

I do not concur with him in opinion. The case, in my opinion, is less one for the decision of a nautical assessor than for consideration by the judge of a court of admiralty. I also think that the question to be decided is one rather of fact than of law. The vessel was not beyond the jurisdiction of the local authorities of the port of Genoa until the 3d of January. I am of opinion that she had, nevertheless, sailed before the end of December. Before the end of that month she was completely ready for sea, had on board all necessary papers, and had broken ground. This was not enough to constitute a commencement of the voyage. But there was in addition a certain progress made in the direction of her destination. This progress, though small, was measurable. It placed her near the mouth of the harbor, where the time, space and labor of ulterior progress were already abridged. This occurred on the 30th, and, in part of that day, and the whole of the 31st, she was only prevented by continuance of the headwind from running out. It may be that before the use of steam towage, she could not have made the progress which was actually made. But I cannot acquiesce in the suggestion that progress by the use of sails was indispensable. The commercial world is entitled to all the benefits of towage in modifying the definition of progress in such a case. Decree for libellants, with costs.

Oct. 17, 1877. On appeal the case was argued by the same counsel. Decree affirmed, with costs.

Case No. 5,030.

The FRANCESCA T.

[9 Ben. 34.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Jan., 1877.

WHARFAGE—DOUBLE RATE—DEMAND OF PAYMENT—STAGE-BERTH—OFFSET.

1. A vessel occupied a stage-berth at a wharf, and when partly loaded was compelled by insufficiency of water to move to another berth, which made two days delay in completing her loading. The oil company that owned the wharf, had stored and were delivering the cargo on board; and they presented a bill for wharfage at full rates to the mate on board the vessel, who, as he could not read English, referred them to the master at the office of the agents of the vessel; they went there and meanwhile the vessel left the wharf. The master objected to the bill for wharfage, claiming that he was only liable to pay half rates, as for an outside berth, and that there should be a deduction made for the two days delay in loading. Suit being brought by the oil company to recover double wharfage, under the statute of the state of New York of 1875, regulating wharfage: Held, that the use of a stage-berth by a vessel moored to a pier is such a use of the wharf as entitles the wharfinger to full wharfage rates: but that in this case no demand of payment before the vessel left was proved that entitled him to the double rate.

[Cited in The Shady Side, 23 Fed. 731.]

2. The presentation of a bill made out in English to the mate, a foreigner who cannot read it, the wharfinger agreeing to refer it to the master as the proper person to pay or refuse, is not such a demand of payment as the statute requires.

3. The mere fact of insufficiency of water in a berth does not show fault on the part of the wharfinger that renders him liable to the vessel for damage or delay; nor can any offset be allowed the vessel in this case by reason of the delay in loading, though the wharf was owned by the company that stored and delivered the cargo, there being no contract between them and the ship as to the cargo.

An Italian vessel, the Francesca T., took in a cargo of oil from a wharf, being moored to the pier, but loading from a stage-berth, outside of two other vessels. When partly loaded she touched bottom, and had to move to another berth, which made two days delay. The company that stored and delivered the oil also owned the wharf, and collected wharfage. They presented a bill for wharfage to the mate of the vessel on board, who could not read English, and sent them to the master at the office of the agent of the vessel. The bill was not paid, as the master claimed that he was liable to pay for an outside berth only, and should also have some deduction for the two days' delay made necessary by the moving of his vessel to another berth. Before the bill was presented to him, the vessel left the wharf; and on his refusal to pay, the oil company as wharfingers filed a libel to recover double wharfage under the statute.

Scudder & Carter, for libellants.
Butler, Stillman & Hubbard, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought to recover wharfage.

The main question in the case is whether the vessel is liable as to a portion of the time while she lay at the libellants' wharf for full rates or only half rates of wharfage.

The rate of wharfage entitled to be charged by wharfingers at Long Island City, where this vessel lay, has been fixed by the law of the state of New York (Laws 1875, c. 482). The provision is as follows:

"Section 1. It shall be lawful to charge and receive within the cities of New York and Brooklyn and Long Island City wharfage and dockage at the following rates, viz: From every vessel that uses and makes fast to any pier, wharf or bulkhead within said cities, or makes fast to any vessel lying at such pier, wharf or bulkhead, or to any other vessel lying outside of such vessel, for every day or part of a day as follows: from every vessel of 200 tons burden and under, two cents per ton, and from every vessel over 200 tons burden, two cents per ton for each of the first 200 tons and one-half of one cent per ton for every additional ton, except that all canal boats navigating the canals in this state, and vessels known as North river barges, market boats and sloops (employed on river, &c.,) shall pay the same rates as heretofore, and the class of sailing vessels now known as lighters, shall be at one-half the first above rates; but every other vessel making fast to a vessel lying at any pier, wharf or bulkhead within said cities, or to another vessel outside of such vessel, or at anchor within any slip or basin, when not receiving or discharging cargo or ballast, one-half of the first above rates, and no boat or vessel shall pay less than 50 cents for a day or part of a day; and from every vessel or floating structure other than those used for transportation of freight or passengers double the first above rates (except floating grain elevators, &c.) and every vessel that shall leave a pier, wharf, bulkhead, slip or basin, without first paying the wharfage or dockage due thereon, after being demanded of the owner, consignee or person in charge of the vessel, shall be liable to pay double the rates established by this act."

It will be seen that according to this statute the wharfinger is entitled to charge the full rates fixed by the act for all vessels while using or made fast to the pier. Vessels not using or made fast to the pier but made fast to a vessel, lying at the pier, or to another vessel outside of such vessel, are chargeable with half rates when not receiving or discharging cargo. The provision contained in the words, "when not receiving or discharging cargo," is not applicable to a vessel when either using or made fast to the pier. In this case the vessel during part of the time lay at what is termed a stage berth, that is she was made fast to the pier and had a stage running from her to the pier passing between two vessels that lay between her and the pier—over which stage the vessel took in cargo directly from the pier. A vessel so moored is using and made fast to the pier within the meaning of the act and is liable to pay full wharfage while so fastened to the pier and maintaining the stage in the position described, whether engaged in receiving or discharging cargo or not. The evidence, therefore, introduced to show that on some days the vessel did not work, is immaterial.

It has been contended that it is competent for the claimants to show in reduction of the libellants' claim for wharfage that the ship lay idle part of the time, because the libellants failed to furnish cargo as rapidly as it could be laden on board. But the connection of the libellants with the cargo arose from the circumstance that they were not only wharfingers but owned an oil yard where certain oil to be laden on this vessel was stored. As warehousemen in pursuance of a contract between them and a third party they delivered certain oil from their yard to this vessel, but the vessel was no party to that contract. The libellants made no contract to furnish the vessel with cargo, nor were they under any obligation whatever to the ship in respect to her cargo, and they are not liable to answer to the ship for their acts relating thereto.

It is further contended that there should be a deduction from the wharfage bill by reason of the fact that the berth at the pier which was first taken by the vessel proved not to have sufficient water, and it became necessary to stop taking in cargo during two days, at the expiration of which time the vessel moved to a safe place and the loading then proceeded. The damages arising from this detention of two days are sought to be set off against the wharfage, by way of diminishing the compensation of the wharfingers, on account of imperfect performance of their contract.

Here the difficulty is that there is no evidence whatever of the existence of any obstruction in the water at the pier, or of any imperfection in the wharf, or of any irregularities of the bottom, upon which to charge the wharfingers with negligence or a failure to perform their contract. The delay arose from the fact that the vessel when loaded as deep as the master desired to load her, required a greater depth of water than could be obtained at the place where the vessel first made fast alongside the bulkhead. When she was loaded down to some 19 feet, she touched the bottom, and it became necessary for her to move to a place where she could have some 24 feet of water. The mere fact of insufficient depth of water at the wharf does not show fault on the part of the wharfinger that renders him liable. See Nelson v. Phoenix Chemical Works [Case No. 10,113], decided by this court. I must therefore reject the set off.

There remains only to determine whether the libellant is entitled to double wharfage as provided in the statute. In order to collect double wharfage it is incumbent on the libellant to prove a demand of the single wharfage due, made at the vessel, of the owner, consignee or a person in charge of the vessel at the time, and before the vessel leaves the pier. And the proof of such a demand made must be clear. Here the proof is not clear. Saxton swears that he presented the bill of wharfage to the captain of the vessel on Saturday afternoon between two and three o'clock. But he made no memorandum of the demand, and I am not certain that he has any definite recollection on the subject. The master denies in positive terms that the bill was ever presented to him before his vessel left the wharf, says that the vessel was not at the wharf at all in the afternoon of Saturday, and that the presentation of the bill on Saturday afternoon was at the office of the agent in New York where for the first time he saw it. The chief mate swears that the vessel finished loading on Friday and left the wharf at 8 a. m. on Saturday. He therefore also contradicts the witness Saxton; but he says that he thinks a bill was brought to him on board the vessel before she left, and as he could not read English he told the man to present it to the captain. What the bill was he cannot say. The presentation of a bill made out in English to a mate who cannot read it, accompanied by a reference to the master as the proper one to pay or refuse the bill assented to by the presentor, is not such a demand of wharfage as the statute requires to entitle the wharfinger to demand double wharfage. Plainly the mate was justified in supposing that the demand was transferred to the master according to his suggestion, and under such circumstances he cannot be held to have refused the demand. Besides, there is no evidence that the mate was the person then in charge of the vessel.

I am therefore of the opinion that the wharfinger is not entitled to recover double wharfage. There is upon the bill put in evidence a charge for the use by the vessel of a cook house on the dock. But there is no mention of such a charge in the libel. The libel is for wharfage and nothing else. Under the libel this item cannot be considered. The libellants are entitled to recover for 14 days wharfage at full rates amounting to $119 70, and as no tender has been proved, or any sum paid into court, they are also entitled to their costs.

PARTNERSHIP—PARTICIPATION IN PROFITS, PROOF OF—PROOF OF WHEN DISGUISED.

1. Participation in the profits of a business is presumptive or prima facie proof that the participator is a partner in such business, and in the absence of other proof is sufficient evidence thereof, but such presumption may be overcome by showing that such profits were received by the party simply as wages for services performed, or interest for money loaned to the person carrying on such business.

2. The English and American authorities examined and commented on, touching the rule announced in Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Bl. 235, upon the authority of Grace v. Smith, 2 W. Bl. 998: "That he who shares in the profits indefinitely, shall by operation of law, be made liable to losses," and the rule denied to be law.

3. Upon the evidence, and as a matter of fact, a partnership found to exist between two parties, where the transaction was intentionally, and for collateral reasons, disguised under the cloak of a pretended loan and employment as book-keeper.

In bankruptcy.

John W. Whalley and Richard Williams, for petitioners.

W. W. Page and A. A. Northrup, for respondent.

DEADY, District Judge. On October 29, 1872, the firm of Walter Brothers filed their petition in this court, alleging that at and between the dates hereinafter mentioned, W. W. Francis and W. A. Buchanan were partners, doing business at Portland, under the name and style of "W. A. Buchanan," and praying that said "firm and its members" be adjudged bankrupts for the following causes:

I. That said firm, on September 10, 1871, made their promissory note, payable nine months after date, to the order of the petitioners, for $200, with interest at one per centum per month; and that on and after June 10, 1871, they fraudulently stopped payment of said note during a period of fourteen days.

II. That there is due the petitioners from said firm the sum of $500.29, the same being a balance of account for goods sold said firm between November 1, 1871, and October 1, 1872.

III. That on September 15, 1872, said firm being then insolvent, paid $250 to a creditor thereof, to wit: Field & Frie, of San Francisco, with the intent to thereby give a preference to such creditor, and to defeat and delay the operation of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

Buchanan made default, but on November 6, Francis answered, denying in effect that he was a partner with Buchanan in any of the alleged transactions or indebtedness. On November 12 and 13 the issue was tried by the court without a jury, and reserved for decision.

The following facts are admitted or satisfactorily proven:

I. That the matters stated in the petition, except as to the allegation of partnership between Francis and Buchanan are true.

II. That on January 24, 1871, Paul Richter and W. A. Buchanan were doing business as furniture dealers and upholsterers, under the firm name of Paul Richter & Co., and that on said day said firm made an agreement in writing with said Francis, to the effect following:

1. Francis agrees to advance said Richter & Co. the sum of $3,000 "in all before June, 1871, and to also keep the books of the firm for one year from said date," unless agreement terminated in the meantime.

2. Richter & Co. agree to pay Francis interest monthly at the rate of twelve per centum per annum upon said $3,000, and any further sum which he may advance to them, and also, "as remuneration for keeping the books of the firm, a sum equal to one sixth of the net profits of the firm which shall be made during the year 1871."

3. If Francis is absent from the city, a deduction in proportion to the length of such absence to be made from his remuneration.

4. Agreement may be terminated at the pleasure of either party, on giving the other notice in writing, in which case the amount then due Francis to "be repaid in notes of firm of $1,000 each," payable at intervals of sixty and thirty days after such notice, with interest at the rate of twelve per centum per annum; and if agreement terminated before end of year 1871, Francis to be paid as compensation for keeping books a fair sum, "not less than $45 per month."

III. On August 1, 1871, Richter retired from the firm, and said written agreement was modified by a verbal one, then made between B. and F., to the effect that the latter should receive one fourth of the net profits of the business for keeping the books, but not less than $25 per month, profits or no profits.

IV. For the five months ending December 31, 1871, Francis' share of the profits amounted to $389, $250 of which was added to the $3,000 due him, and a new note, payable on demand, taken by him for the amount, with interest at the rate aforesaid, signed W. A. Buchanan; but during the year 1872 the business made no profits.

V. Francis advanced the sum of $3,000, as per agreement, in January, 1871, and the $250 left in the business as aforesaid, and kept the books until September, 1872, during which time he loaned W. A. Buchanan, to be used in the business, from $2,000 to $2,500, on current account, which was secured by sufficient collaterals, and received from the business for all the money so advanced and loaned interest monthly at the rate aforesaid, and $25 per month.

VI. Francis was not known by the creditors of W. A. Buchanan to be a partner in the business, nor did he, during the time of his employment therein, volunteer any direction or advice in the conduct of it, except for a few weeks in 1872, while Buchanan was absent from the city, when he took into his custody the daily receipt of sales, and in some instances directed the salesman whom to credit and whom not; but during this time he had written authority from W. A. Buchanan to act as his agent, which authority, however was not exhibited to said salesman, or any one else, so far as appears, until it was produced on the trial.

VII. That Buchanan was adjudged a bankrupt, individually, on the petition of one of his creditors, in this court, on October 28 and that the liabilities incurred in the business, at the time of such adjudication, amounted to $13,000 or $14,000, and that Francis' claim against Buchanan for money loaned and advanced the business was, at that time, $5,200 or $5,300.

Upon this state of facts, counsel for the petitioners insist that, as to third persons, the law conclusively presumes that Francis was a partner in the firm of W. A. Buchanan, and therefore he is liable for its acts of bankruptcy and debts.

Under what circumstances a person not ostensibly a partner is nevertheless liable as one, is a vexed question. In the language of a distinguished commentator, "The cases on this subject are not easily reconciled, nor is the language used in relation to it always admissible, or indeed intelligible." T. Pars. Partn. p. 66. And again (Id. 92), "The many cases cited in the notes to this chapter exhibit in strong light the difficulty, if not impossibility, of drawing from the decisions any definite principle or rule applicable with certainty to the question, 'Who are partners as to third persons?'"

In Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Bl. 235, cited as the leading case on this subject (1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 1289), Lord Chief Justice Eyre held that, while upon the facts, the Carvers and Geslier were not partners inter se, and did not intend to be, still they were such as to third persons, because, by the arrangement between them, they agreed "to take a moiety of the profits of each other's business generally, and indefinitely, as they should arise, at certain times agreed upon;" and upon the alleged authority of Grace v. Smith, 2 W. Bl. 998, he laid down the rule as follows: "He who takes a moiety of all the profits indefinitely, shall, by operation of law, be made liable to losses, if losses arise, upon the principle that, by taking a part of the profits, he takes from the creditors a part of that fund which is the proper security to them for the payment of their debts." But in Grace v. Smith supra, Chief Justice De Grey says: "Every man who has a share of the profits of a trade, ought also to bear his share of the loss. And if any one takes part of the profits, he takes part of that fund upon which the creditor of the trader relies for his payment. * * * I think the true criterion is to inquire whether Smith agreed to share the profits with Robinson, or whether he only relied upon these profits as a fund of payment."

It will be observed that this latter case makes no distinction between sharing the profits definitely or indefinitely, the point for which it was cited in Waugh v. Carver, supra, but does make an entirely different distinction, that is, between sharing in the profits of a trade or relying upon them for payment, in both of which cases the degree of indefiniteness may be the same. Again, the reason given in the distinction taken in Grace v. Smith is not sufficient, because in point of fact, a person who shares in the profit of a trade, or receives such profits in payment, equally diminishes the fund on which the creditors rely.

In Ex parte Rowlandson, 1 Rose, 91, Lord Eldon said: "The ground was settled, that if a man as the reward for his labor chooses to stipulate for an interest in the profits in the business, instead of a sum proportionate to those profits, he is, as to third persons, a partner."

In Ex parte Hamper 17 Ves. 403, he said: "The cases have gone to this nicety, upon a distinction so thin, that I cannot state it as established, upon due consideration, that if a trader agrees to pay another person for his labor in the concern a sum of money, even in proportion to the profits, equal to a certain share, that will not make him a partner; but if he has a specific interest in the profits, themselves as profits, he is a partner. * * * It is clearly settled, though I regret it, that if a man stipulates that as the reward of his labor, he shall have not a specific interest in the business, but a given sum of money, even in proportion to a given quantum of the profits, that will not make him a partner, but if he agrees for a part of the profits, as such, giving him a right to an account, though having no property in the capital, he is, as to third persons, a partner."

These dicta of Lord Eldon's have been very much deferred to by the courts and the profession. Parsons says: "We have reason to believe that for many years, in various parts of this country, numerous contracts of this kind have been drawn, carefully using the language which Eldon is supposed to have made safe by the distinction he asserted. Nor is it difficult to account for this. For, to say nothing of the immense authority of so eminent a judge, his words so understood, supply a clear, simple, and easily applicable rule for the avoidance of a great danger. They tell the lawyer who would draw a contract of this kind, how, by a mere formula, he can guard his clients from a great uncertainty; the inconvenience of which might otherwise suffice to prevent the proposed arrangement. As a convenient rule, much may be said of it; but as an accurate one, it must be spoken of very differently.

"It is indeed remarkable that a rule, or a distinction, to which Lord Eldon strongly objects, not merely 'doubting,' but positively affirming his dislike, and which he lays down, as he says, under the constraint of irresistible authority, should since have been generally adopted, not so much on his authority as on his assertion of preceding authority, when in point of fact no such authority can be found, or, so far as any accessible evidence goes, can now be believed to have existed."

The criterion for determining whether the agreement makes a case of compensation or partnership as to third persons, differs in these cases (Ex parte Rowlandson and Ex parte Hamper) from the one asserted in Waugh v. Carver, that he who participates in the profits of a trade, indefinitely, is liable as a partner, because he takes from the fund upon which the creditors rely; and the only reason given for the distinction between the liability of the person who contracts to take a sum equal to a share of the profits of a trade, and one who stipulates for a share of such profits, as profits, is, that the latter has a right to an account, and therefore he is liable as a partner. And this reason has been since asserted and relied on by courts and writers. 3 Kent, Comm. 25, note b; Champion v. Bostwick, 18 Wend. 184; Heinstreet v. Howland, 5 Denio, 68; Denny v. Cabot, 6 Metc. [Mass.] 92.

In reference to these, Bisset on Partnership, 14, says: "Some of the writers, and even some of the judicial authorities, on this subject appear to think they have surmounted the difficulty, by confining the rule of liability to the cases where the party would have a right to an account of the profits; but to this it may be answered, that in all cases where a person is to be paid for his services by a sum proportioned to the profits, he must be entitled to an account of the profits. If not, how is he to ascertain that he has what he has stipulated for? * * * The distinction between the cases where a participation in the profits has been held to make a man liable as a partner, and those where it has been held not to make him so liable, is certainly, at least as Lord Eldon has given expression to that distinction, so thin, that it does not appear possible, from the most careful consideration of it, to arrive at any clear, general conclusion; nor does Mr. Justice Story's attempt to reconcile the repugnancy of the various decided cases, and to bring them, as he says, 'into harmony with each other, as well as with common sense,' appear to be very successful. If the matter were res integra, a plain and intelligible rule, and one, too, which would not be at variance with anything in the cases decided previously to Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. 403, would be, that those whose share of the returns of the business or adventure consisted wholly of the profits of the stock, or partly of the profits of the stock, and partly of the wages of labor, should be held liable as partners; but those whose share of the said returns consisted wholly of the wages of labor, or the interest of money lent, or a certain fixed annuity, and who had no control or voice as principals in the management of the business or adventure, should not be held liable as partners."

In discussing this supposed test of liability as a partner—the right to an account of the profits of the business—T. Parsons on Partnership, p. 92, says: "Undoubtedly every partner has a right to an account of the profits; but the converse is not true, that every one who has such a right is a partner. There are many ways in which a man may represent another, and in that right be entitled to an account, without being liable as a partner."

Hickman v. Cox, 91 E. C. L. 523, is a comparatively late English case, 1860, in which the rules given in the cases above cited seem to have been treated as erroneous or unintelligible. The case was this:

Smith and Son, prior to 1850, carried on business at the Stanton Iron Works, as ironmasters and merchants, and being involved and indebted to the defendants and others, executed a composition deed transferring their property and business to certain trustees, in trust, that they would carry on the business in the name of the Stanton Iron Co., and after paying expenses and interest on a certain mortgage whenever and as often as the net income amounted to a shilling on the pound of the indebtedness, to divide the same among the creditors in proportion to their claims, and when these were discharged to reconvey the property to Smith and Son. The deed was executed by the trustees and creditors, who thereby released the debtors. In 1855, the plaintiff, who was the proprietor of the Grafton Iron Ore Works, drew three bills for upwards of 1,300 pounds, for ore furnished the Stanton Iron Co., which were accepted by James Haywood, one of the trustees, "per procuration, the Stanton Iron Co." Afterwards the works passed into the hands of the mortgagee, and ceased to be carried on under the composition deed, when the plaintiff brought suit against the defendants as acceptors of the bills, on the ground that the creditors under the deed were partners in the business of the Stanton Iron Co., because the same was conducted by their agents, the trustees, and they had stipulated to take the profits therof.

At Trinity term, 1856, the plaintiff had judgment in the court of common pleas, the court holding on the authority of Owen v. Body, 5 Adol. & El. 28, and Janes v. Whitbread, 11 C. B. 406, that the creditors executing this deed became partners in the trade agreed to be carried on thereunder. On appeal the case was argued in the exchequer chamber in February, 1857, and judgment reserved until November, when the judgment of the common pleas was affirmed—three judges for and three against. On appeal to the house of lords, the decision was reversed (99 E. C. L. 47). The six judges who heard the argument in the house of lords, delivered opinions seriatim, and were equally divided on the question, "are the defendants liable upon the bills of exchange?"

The lord chancellor, Campbell, and the law lords, Brougham, Cranworth, Wensleydale and Chelmsford, delivered opinions to the effect that the defendants were not partners.

In the course of the opinions delivered, the supposed rule that participation in the profits of a trading concern makes one liable as a partner, was questioned and commented upon freely. Blackburn, J., who was for holding the defendants as partners, said: "The phrase taking the profits as such, is not a happy one; and there is some difficulty at times in defining what it means; but I think, at all events, it means this: It is not possible, according to the common law, to cause a trading concern to be carried on upon the terms that the advantages of a partnership, including the participation in profits and partnership lien and security over the assets of the firm, shall belong to those who have but a limited liability."

Whightman, J., who was for reversal, said: "It is said that a person who shares in net profits is a partner. That may be so in some cases, but not in all; and it may be material to consider in what sense the words 'sharing in the profits' are used. In the present case, I greatly doubt whether the creditor who merely obtains payment of a debt incurred in the business, by being paid the exact amount of his debt, and no more, out of the profits of the business, can be said to share the profits."

Pollock, C. B., who was of the same mind, said: "The question then arises, whether the interest which the creditors had in the profits to be made by the carrying on of the business under the deed, was such as to make them partners in respect to third persons. * * * If a firm were in difficulties, and a person proposed to assist them by a loan of money, engaging to receive payment out of the profits only, and to make no claim in the event of there being no profits, but stipulating that one half of the profits should be applied as they arose in payment of his debt, and that he should have power to see that this was done—would he thereby become a partner, and liable for all debts contracted subsequently to this arrangement? On this very simple state of facts, there may possibly arise a difference of opinion; but I think a large majority of all lawyers and commercial men would decide at once that assistance so offered and so accepted, would not make the lender of the money a partner as to third persons. If he took a warrant of attorney, entitling him to enter up judgment at his pleasure, and sweep away in payment of his demand, capital, debts, profits and everything, he certainly would not be a partner; but as is said, if he limits his claim to be paid out of the profits only, his limited right to payment creates an unlimited liability. I think, my lords, there must be some fallacy in this; the conclusion, to my mind, appears so unjust and absurd, and so much at variance with natural equity."

Lord Cranworth said: "Would they (the creditors) have become partners in the concern carried on by the trustees merely because they passively assented to its being carried on upon the terms that the net income, i. e., the net profits, should be applied on discharge of their demands? I think not. It was argued that, as they would be interested in the profits, therefore they would be partners. But this is a fallacy. It is often said that the test, or one of the tests, whether a person, not ostensibly a partner, is nevertheless, in contemplation of law, a partner, is whether he is entitled to participate in the profits. This, no doubt, is in general a sufficiently accurate test; for a right to participate in the profits affords cogent, often conclusive evidence that the trade in which the profits have been made, was carried on in part for or on behalf of the person setting up such a claim. But the real ground of the liability is, that the trade has been carried on by persons acting on his behalf. When that is the case, he is liable to the trade obligations, and entitled to its profits, or to a share of them. It is not strictly correct to say that his right to share the profits makes him liable to the debts of the trade. The correct mode of stating the proposition is, to say that the same thing that entitles him to the one, makes him liable to the other, namely, the fact that the trade has been carried on in his behalf, i. e., that he stood in the relation of principal towards the persons acting ostensibly as the traders, by whom the liabilities have been incurred, and under whose management the profits have been made."

Lord Wensleydale said: "A man who orders another to carry on a trade, whether in his own name or not, to buy and sell, and to pay over all the profits to him, is undoubtedly the principal, and the person so employed is the agent; and the principal is liable for the agent's contracts in the course of his employment. So, if two or more agree that they should carry on a trade and share the profits of it, each is a principal, and each is an agent for the other, and each is bound by the other's contracts in carrying on the trade as much as a single principal would be by the act of an agent who was to give the whole of his profits to his employer. Hence, it becomes a test of the liability of one for the contracts of another, that he is to recover the whole or a part of the profits arising from that contract, by virtue of the agreement made at the time of the employment. I believe this is the true principle of partnership liability. Perhaps the maxim, that he who takes the profits ought to bear the loss, often stated in the earlier cases on this subject—Waugh v. Carver [supra]—is only the consequence, not the cause, why a man is liable as a partner."

From the general conclusion reached in this case, that the defendants were not partners in the Stanton Iron Co., simply because they were to receive the net profits of the business, and from the opinion expressed in the H. of L., I think it is clear that the decision set aside the arbitrary rule, that indefinite or other participation in profits necessarily made one liable as a partner under any circumstances, but the fact of such participation is to be treated as evidence, more or less cogent, according to the circumstances, of a partnership.

Following the final decision in Hickman v. Cox, supra, and in consonance with the views therein expressed, the English parliament recently passed an act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 86), which provides, among other things, that a loan to a person engaged in trade, upon a written contract, that the lender shall receive a rate of interest in proportion to profits, or a share of the profits, shall not of itself constitute the lender a partner; nor shall a contract to remunerate a servant or agent of a person engaged in trade by a share of the profits, of itself render such servant or agent liable as a partner. In noticing this act, T. Parsons on Partnership, p. 93, says:

"We will add our hope and our belief that the courts of this country will regard this statute rather as declaratory of the law-merchant in respect to partnership, than as changing that law, and will apply to cases which come before them the principles upon which the statute is founded."

The American cases on this subject are also conflicting, but the weight and tendency of authority appears to be in favor of the doctrine "that a mere promise to pay out of the profits a sum of money, as a specific proportion of the profits, does not necessarily constitute the payee a partner, and gives him no interest in the profits, and no right to the profits, but only a personal claim against the promissor for such money, or for such a share of profits, after they are ascertained and may be divided." T. Pars. Partn. p. 70. In Berthold v. Goldsmith, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 542, Mr. Justice Clifford, speaking for the court, says: "Actual participation in the profits as principal, we think, creates a partnership as between the parties and third persons, whatever may be their intentions in that behalf, and notwithstanding the dormant partner was not expected to participate in the loss beyond the amount of the profits."

In support of this proposition, the cases of Waugh v. Carver and Grace v. Smith, supra, are cited, together with the rule announced therein, that he who has a share of the profits ought to bear his share of the loss. But the opinion goes on to say: "That rule, however, has no application whatever to a case of special service or agency, when the employé has no power as a partner in the firm, and no interest in the profits, as property, but is simply employed as a servant or special agent, and is to receive a given sum out of the profits, or a proportion of the same, as a compensation for his services." In other words, the participation in the profits which will make one liable to third persons as a partner, is a participation as a partner, or, in the language of the opinion, as principal—and that is the fact to be ascertained. In that case, the court held that a person who negotiated the sale of goods for another, under a contract to have half the profits and a certain compensation in any event, was not a partner as to such sales.

Mr. Justice Story believes that the true doctrine upon this subject is, that a participation in the profits is presumptive proof that the participant is a partner, and sufficient proof in the absence of all other opposing circumstances. Story, Partn. § 38.

Having reached this conclusion, I cannot, upon the facts so far stated, conclude that Francis is liable as a partner with Buchanan. For although he participated in the profits of the trade, the agreement and circumstances under which such participation took place are sufficient to modify the presumption of law that he did so as a partner or principal, and so leave it in doubt whether he took such profits only as a compensation for money loaned and services rendered, or otherwise.

It then becomes necessary to inquire further and ascertain whether, upon the whole evidence, Francis was in fact a partner or not.

Buchanan being called as a witness by the petitioners, testified that Francis was an actual partner in the firm of Richter & Co., and also in that of W. A. Buchanan, so far as the profits were concerned, but not in the losses, and that the written and verbal agreement aforesaid, and the manner of keeping the books, and the written authority to Francis to act as his agent, by which it appeared that Francis only loaned money to Richter & Co. and to W. A. Buchanan, for a certain interest, and kept their books for a share of the profits with a guarantee of a certain sum per month, were all a mere pretense and device, not intended to wrong any one engaged in business with said firms, but merely to conceal the fact of such partnership from Francis' employer, the Bank of British Columbia, it being contrary to the rules of such bank that their employés should be engaged in other business.

Francis being called as a witness on his own behalf, testified that he was not a partner in the concern, unless the agreement made him one, that it truly stated his relations to the parties and the business, and that he desired such relations to be kept secret, but did not state why. He also admitted that he was a clerk in the bank aforesaid, during the period covered by these transactions.

Paul Richter, called as a witness by the petitioners, testified that it was his understanding that Francis was a partner in the firm of Richter & Co., but he had no direct knowledge on the subject.

Dr. Cardwell, called by the petitioners, testified that after Buchanan was adjudged a bankrupt, Francis urged him to agree to a settlement for fifty cents on the dollar, and he then said that if witness would so settle he would never hear of a $600 note made by witness as an accommodation to B., and which Francis then held as collateral security for money loaned B. on account, and that B. considered their debts confidential, and would pay them dollar for dollar.

Here is a direct conflict between the testimony of the two persons who ought to know better than any one else what was the real relation between them concerning this business. Resort must, then, be had to the circumstances and other proofs of the case to ascertain the truth of the matter. Buchanan, so far as can be seen, has no pecuniary interest in the question. Francis has a large one. Buchanan may have some personal feeling against Francis, regarding him as one who, in the language of counsel, has sucked the sap out of the business; or, as the leonine partner in what the Roman lawyers called societas leonnia, in allusion to the fable of the lion—who, having entered into a hunting partnership with the other beasts of the forest, appropriated to himself all the prey. Be this as it may, he did not impress me as a witness who was inimical in his feelings towards Francis. He stated that he did not first disclose the fact of partnership. His testimony was direct and positive, and went into details of conversations between himself and Francis, with the circumstances of time and place, that gave it the semblance of probability and truth. On the contrary, Francis' testimony was brief, somewhat ambiguous—as that he was not a partner unless his agreement made him one—and consisted mainly of general denials.

Again, the fact of Francis' employment in the bank furnishes a motive, reason or inducement to disguise a partnership with this cloak of a loan of money and hiring of services.

The interest which Francis took in having the creditors settle at fifty cents on the dollar may have been prompted by mere friendship for Buchanan, but the fact that he assured Cardwell that in such event his debt would be paid in full, or he would never hear of his note again, indicates a concern, knowledge and authority in the premises that we might expect of a person interested in the matter otherwise than as a mere creditor.

When Francis exercised the direct authority in the business that he did in the absence of Buchanan, although he had a secret writing appointing him agent, he did not deem it necessary to show it to the salesman or any one else, but proceeded to take the cash into his own custody from the till, daily, and direct who to credit and who not, with all the authority of a partner. The salesman, Mr. Lewis, don't seem to have had any question or doubt about his right to do so, independent of the writing, which he never saw or knew of, until it was produced in court.

Richter's testimony goes to establish the partnership. The particulars of the transaction don't appear to have been disclosed to him by either B. or F. But from all that he observed during the six or seven months that he was an active partner in the concern he regarded and treated Francis as a partner in the profits at least, although not in the capital stock. As to what B. told Richter, I do not consider it, because B.'s declarations upon the question of the existence of the partnership are not evidence against Francis.

It does not directly appear from the evidence what was a reasonable compensation for keeping the books. It was assumed by counsel for the petitioners, and not questioned by opposing counsel, that twenty-five dollars per month was a fair compensation, and the conclusion appears probable. Now, if Francis was simply employed to keep books, what inducement was there for Buchanan to agree to give him any interest in the profits of the business, or any other compensation beyond the twenty-five dollars per month, which he was guaranteed and paid, profits or no profits? The money put into the concern, if a loan, was drawing the highest legal rate of interest, independent of the compensation paid as bookkeeper.

This single circumstance indicates that this arrangement was either a device to cover up a partnership in the profits or a usurious loan. As it is not unlawful to be a dormant or secret partner in a trading business, and it is to loan money at usurious interest, the court ought to infer that the contingent and extra compensation for keeping the books was a device whereby Francis was to be admitted to a share in the profits as a partner.

All these circumstances considered, I think the weight of the testimony is in favor of the conclusion that Francis was a partner in the firm of W. A. Buchanan. But if, as contended by counsel for respondent, the evidence was evenly balanced, effect being given to the fact that Francis did participate in the profits, the same conclusion would follow.

As has been shown, a participation in the profits, in fact, is presumptive proof of partnership, and sufficient proof, unless overcome by other circumstances. Story, Partn. § 38. It being admitted that Francis participated in the profits of the concern, and the circumstances of the agreement at least, leaving it in doubt whether such participation was as partner or employé, the burden of proof is upon him to overcome the presumption that such profits were received by him as a partner.

Wheaton, Burrill, and Dexter, for captors.

Mr. Searle, for claimants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The question now before the court arises out of the claim of Messrs. Dunham and Randolph of New York, who claim, as their own property, sundry bales of merchandize, shipped to them on board the Francis, by Alexander Thompson of Glasgow. The Francis sailed from Greenock about the 19th of July, 1812, for New York, and on her passage was captured by the privateer Yankee, Oliver Wilson commander. By the papers on board, the goods appear to be shipped by Thompson, and consigned to the claimants. Several letters of Thompson accompany the bills of lading. In one of them, dated the 11th of July, 1812, after speaking of the shipments, one on board of the Fanny, and the other on board of the Francis, he says, "I have exceeded in some articles, I have sent you others not ordered at all, the reason of which is, I intended to have made a small shipment on my own account, but found the circumstances such, that it would have been very apt to create confusion and mistakes. I therefore concluded to send you the whole. I assure you, nothing has been wanting on my part to get every thing done in the best manner I could, but I wish to go on the most liberal and fair principles. I leave with yourselves to take the whole of the two shipments or none.

[1] [Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

at all, just as you please. If you do not wish them, I will thank you to hand the invoices over to Messrs. Falconer, Jackson & Co. I think twenty-four hours will afford you ample opportunity for you to make up your minds on this point, and if you do not hand them over within that time I will of course consider that you take the whole." In other parts of the letter the same proposition is repeated. Towards the close he says, "The premium of insurance is three guineas, warranted free from capture by the Americans. I presume there is no danger of their injuring the property."

In another letter, addressed to Messrs. Falconer, Jackson & Co. of New York, dated 15th of July, 1812, after acknowledging the receipt of letters from them of the 1st and 11th of June, 1812, he observes, "The government of the United States seem really to be in earnest about war, but there was such a train of circumstances occurred (the death of Perceval, &c.) that I think would induce them to wait the final result," &c. He then goes on to state the shipments by the Fanny and the Francis, and says, "I have had an order from Dunham & Randolph sent me for about a year, to be shipped when the orders in council were removed. I have sent them more of some articles, than they ordered, and some not ordered at all, the reason of which was, &c. I concluded to send them the whole, leaving it to their option to take them to account or not, just as they pleased; but if they took any, it must be the whole of both shipments or none at all. I gave them twenty-four hours after the arrival of the first vessel, to make up their minds, and if they did not hand you over the invoice of letters in that time, I would consider they had taken the whole to account. Should they not take them, you will of course do the best you can for me." It is conceded, that the Fanny was captured by a revenue cutter of the United States, and upon her arrival in the United States, which was before the Francis arrived, she was proceeded against in the proper judicial tribunal.

It has been argued, that under these circumstances the property of the goods, at the time of the shipment, actually vested in the claimants, subject however to be divested by their subsequent refusal to accept the same. But can this, by any reasonable construction, be so held? The shipment is conceded by the shipper not to have been made in conformity with the orders of the claimants, and that larger quantities of some goods, which were ordered, and other goods, which were not ordered, had been sent; and the shipper expressly declares, that the whole must be accepted, or none. Until the acceptance then, there could be no property in the claimants, even if the intentions of the shipper had been to vest that property; because no man can be bound, against his will, to take the risk of goods, for which he has not contracted. Here, however, there was no such intention. The shipper plainly declares, that the goods were at his own risk, and on his own account, until the claimants should make their election. If the goods had been lost during the voyage, and before the arrival of the time of the election, there cannot be a doubt, that it would have been the loss of the shipper. I would adopt the language of Sir W. Scott, in the case of The Packet De Bilboa, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 133, "that it is the true criterion of property, that if you are the person on whom the loss will fall, you are to be considered as the proprietor." The argument therefore of the claimants' counsel, on this point, cannot be supported.

It has been suggested, that if the claimants can be admitted to the benefit of further proof, they will be able to show, that the Fanny arrived before the Francis, and that, previous to the capture of the latter, the claimants had made their election to receive the whole shipment. It is however admitted, that the Fanny was actually captured and brought into one of our ports, and underwent a judicial examination. It is somewhat difficult to conceive, how any election to take the property could have been effectually made, while it was emphatically in the custody of the law. But notwithstanding this objection, if I were satisfied that a legal defence could be shown to the court under an order for further proof, I should not hesitate to allow it. It is clear, however, to my mind, that the assumed defence could never prevail. At the time of the shipment the property was clearly hostile. And open and public war existed between Great Britain and the United States. By the general law, a state of war puts an end to all executory contracts between the citizens of the different countries. Whatever contract remains then in fieri is either suspended or dissolved, flagrante bello. A familiar instance is that of a contract of affreightment to the enemy country, which has been solemnly held to be dissolved by the breaking out of the war. It might therefore be exceedingly doubtful, if it were competent to citizens of the United States, after a knowledge of the war, to make or to ratify a contract with the public enemy. I do not, however, rely on this consideration. I consider it as a general principle, liable to very few exceptions, that the character of hostility impressed upon property cannot be altered during the voyage, or, as it is usually expressed, in transitu. A strong case of the application of this principle is The Danckebaar Africaan, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 107. An exception to the rule is, when the transfer is made in a time of profound peace, without reference to a contemplation of hostilities. The Vrow Margaretha, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 338. If it were necessary, I might draw in aid the principles of these decisions, because it is clear that, at the time of the shipment, hostilities had actually commenced and were in the contemplation of the shipper. The whole papers and documents, read in this cause, point to the expectation, as one of public notoriety. And upon the ground assumed by the claimants' counsel, that the election of the claimants vested in them the property during its transit, it would follow, that the case would be comprehended within the general rule of illegal transfers, during hostilities actually existing or imminent.

But I do not rest the present claim upon this ground alone. I consider it a clear principle, that the property of an enemy, going to a neutral or a friend, to be his at his election at the end of the voyage, remains, during the whole voyage, as to the claim of belligerents, enemy's property. It is not competent for the neutral or friend, during the voyage, to change by his election the character of hostility, which is attached to the property at its shipment. During the whole voyage it must be subject to the shipper's right of stoppage in transitu; and this right, by the capture, becomes legally and effectively vested in the captors. I do not undertake to say, how the case might stand, as between the shipper and the consignee, upon such election being made; it will be time enough to decide that question when the case arises. But where the interests of third persons intervene, the right of election cannot defeat their rights; and the laws of belligerent capture would remain a mere theoretical system, if the doctrine contended for by the claimants should prevail. In my judgment, the great principles of national law require, that no secret liens, no future elections, no private contracts looking to future events, should cloak with the garbs of neutrality the property of an enemy, while sailing on the ocean. I know not that any person could foresee the alarming extent, to which the contrary doctrine would lead us. Frauds of every name and character would thicken around us and not a single bale of hostile property would swim on the ocean, but it would be covered with neutral liens, and secret and interminable contracts. Against the adoption of principles, which would lead to this inevitable result, I beg to enter my solemn dissent.[3]

In the present case, I feel myself bound to declare, that I see no fraud properly imputable to the claimants; they are innocent. But the rule cannot be relaxed in their favor: and I feel some consolation, that the loss, which will accrue, will in no event rightfully fall on them. Claim rejected. Decree of condemnation.

[NOTE. For hearings on various other claims, see The Francis, Cases Nos. 5,033–5,036.

[This case was heard on appeal by the supreme court, and was ordered to stand for further proof. The Frances, 8 Cranch (12 U. S.) 354. It came on to be heard again in 1815, when the decree of condemnation was affirmed, Mr. Justice Johnson delivering the opinion. It was held: "If a British merchant purchase, with his own funds, two cargoes of goods in consequence of, but not in exact conformity with, the orders of an American house, and ship them to America, giving the American house an option, within 24 hours after receipt of his letter, to take or reject both cargoes, and if they give notice within the time that they will take one cargo, but will consider as to the other, this puts it in the power of the British merchant either to cast the whole upon the American house, or to resume the property, and make them accountable for that which came to their hands. The right of property in the cargo not accepted does not, in transitu, vest in the American house, but remains in the British subject, and is liable to condemnation, he being an enemy." The Frances, 9 Cranch (13 U. S.) 183.]

PRACTICE—COSTS.

As to costs to be taxed on several claims in one information, upon a remission of the forfeiture.

[This was the case of the ship Francis and cargo (Joseph Boyer, master), which was captured and libeled as enemy's property.]

In this and some other prize causes pending before the court, the captors had relinquished their rights to a considerable portion of the property found on board, and claimed by American citizens; and congress having passed an act [2] remitting all forfeitures under the non-importation acts,[3] upon the payment of the duties, costs, and charges, a question arose as to the costs which ought to be taxed upon each claim.

The counsel for the claimants contended that the attorney for the United States was entitled, on each claim, to the sum of $6 only; and they cited the act of 28th of February, 1799, c. 125, § 4 [1 Stat. 625], regulating his fees.

The district attorney, on the other hand, contended that he was entitled to $17 on each claim; and, to show that such had been the general practice, he introduced certificates, &c., from the districts of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, and Pennsylvania; and he alleged that such had also been the practice of the district court of Rhode Island.

STORY, Circuit Justice. These prize causes have been certified to this court by the district judge, under the act of 8th of May, 1792, c. 36 [1 Stat. 275], on account of his having been of counsel for the United States; and I consider myself therefore as sitting, in effect, for him. On examining the act regulating fees, I confess that I was at first strongly inclined to think that, at most, $11 only were taxable against each claim; and there is certainly weight in the argument which would confine the taxation to $6. No judicial proceedings appear to have been had on the behalf of the United States, except the filing of an information or claim for the municipal forfeitures. The subsequent collateral proceedings of the parties were to obtain a remission of the forfeitures from the secretary of the treasury. But I am pressed with the uniformity of the practice to allow $17; and certainly, sitting merely for the district judge, I should not feel at liberty to disturb a practice, which seems to have obtained so general a sanction. I shall therefore allow the $17 for each claim in these causes.[4]

WAR—CONFISCATION—NATURALIZED CITIZEN DOMICILED IN FOREIGN COUNTRY—ENEMY PROPERTY.

1. A naturalized citizen of the United States, domiciled in the enemy country at the breaking out of war, is deemed an enemy, and his property is confiscable as such. The Chester, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 41; Murray v. The Betsey, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 64; Maley v. Shattuck, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 488; Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 506; The Venus, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 253.

[See note at end of case.]

2. If a party so domiciled puts himself in itinere, to resume his acquired country, he is deemed to have returned to its domicil. Story, Confl. Law, § 48.

[The ship Francis, Joseph Boyer, master, having sailed from Scotland for New York, July 19, 1812, with a British cargo on board, was captured by the Yankee, an American privateer, and libeled as enemy's property. Claims to portions of the cargo were interposed by various American citizens. See Cases Nos. 5,032, 5,033, 5,035, and 5,036.]

Mr. Colin Gillespie, whose claim was now under consideration, was born in Glasgow in Scotland, came to the United States in 1793, and was naturalized as a citizen thereof at New York, in 1798. In 1799, he married in Scotland, and returned with his wife to New York, where he resided until 1802, when, on account of the ill health of his wife, he went to Scotland. In 1805 he came again to New York, and having formed a mercantile copartnership with Mr. John Graham of that city, it was then agreed, for the benefit and mutual interest of the copartnership, that Mr. Gillespie should reside in Great Britain, and there transact the business of the copartnership, under the firm of Colin Gillespie & Co. and that Mr. Graham should transact their business at New York, under the firm of John Graham & Co. In pursuance of this agreement, Mr. Gillespie went in the same year to Scotland; established his house of trade there, and continued to reside there with his family until the spring of 1813, doing business as a merchant, receiving consignments of American produce, selling the same, and purchasing goods in that market to ship to the United States. During this residence in Scotland, Mr. Gillespie accepted a commission from the British government, as an officer in the local and embodied militia, which, however, he resigned in 1810. Mr. Gillespie, in his affidavit, further stated, that it was always his intention to hold to his adopted allegiance, and to do no act inconsistent with his duties to the United States; and that, as soon as he could arrange his business in Great Britain, after knowledge of the war, he set sail with his family for the United States, and now resides with them at New York. The present shipment was made in July, 1812, and the capture took place on or about the — of August, 1812.

Crapo & Searle, for claimant.
Burrill & Robbins, for captors.

STORY, Circuit Justice (after reciting the facts). Upon the foregoing facts, and the presumption that Mr. Gillespie's return to the United States is with a bona fide intention of permanent residence, the case seems entitled to a very indulgent consideration. My duty, however, requires me to apply the rules of law, and though I may lament individual hardships, I am not permitted to relax general principles in favor of them. And I take it to be clear, that the facts of this case establish the position, that Mr. Gillespie, at the time of this shipment and capture, was a merchant domiciled in Great Britain, and of course affected with its national character. He was settled there with a house of trade, and for purposes of indefinite extent and duration. Had the facts been equivocal, the circumstance, that it was his native country, would undoubtedly have been entitled to great weight, in deciding the question of domicil; for, as Sir William Scott justly observes, the native character easily reverts, and it requires fewer circumstances to constitute domicil, in case of a native subject, than to impress the national character on one, who is originally of another country. The La Virginie, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 98. Such then being the domicil and national character of Mr. Gillespie, he must,

[4] See Act 22d July, 1813, c. 14 [3 Stat. 19], respecting suits and costs in United States courts.

[1] [Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

according to the settled rules of public law, be deemed to partake of the advantages and the hazards of a British merchant, in peace and in war. For all commercial purposes, it is quite immaterial, what is the native or adopted country of a party. He is deemed a merchant of that country, where he resides, and carries on trade. The Indian Chief, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 12. Under such circumstances, Mr. Gillespie must be held, so far as the present transaction applies, to be completely invested with the hostile character of a British merchant.

But it is argued, that Mr. Gillespie, having become a naturalized citizen of the United States, could not be deemed an enemy merchant, unless he continued voluntarily to reside in Scotland after a full knowledge of the war, and that, as he had no such knowledge at the time of the shipment, he is entitled to all the benefits of his American character. I should have been glad to have seen an authority, which distinctly countenanced this exception. No such authority has been produced, and as the general rule is so often and so forcibly laid down in elementary works, it is difficult to conceive, that so important an exception, if it existed, should not have attracted public notice.

It is certainly true, that a character acquired by residence, ceases with the discontinuance of that residence. And, therefore, if a party, who has resided in an enemy country, puts himself in itinere to return to his native country, wtih an intention of bonâ fide residence there, he is deemed already to have resumed his native character, although he has not actually arrived in such country. The Indian Chief [supra]. But, until he has actually so put himself in itinere the character of the country, where he resides, attaches indissolubly to him. He takes it with all its benefits and all its disadvantages. Undoubtedly, cases of hardship often arise on the breaking out of hostilities, as to native citizens, who are domiciled as merchants in the enemy country. The hardship is often forcibly pressed upon the prize court; but, as Sir William Scott observes, that the interest of friends may sometimes be involved in our vengeance upon enemies, is a matter, which it is natural to regret, but impossible to avoid. The administration of public rules admits of no private exceptions: he who clings to the profits of a hostile connexion must be content to bear its losses also. The Phoenix, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 21.

As to citizens domiciled in the enemy country, I hold it to be the established rule, that if they wish to avoid the hostile character, they must actually remove before the breaking out of hostilities. Otherwise their property then afloat will be liable to confiscation. If they do not so remove, the character of the country is completely impressed upon their property, wherever it is found, and remains until they have abandoned their residence, and then, as to all future transactions, the character of their native or adopted country returns. It is said, that there is no authority, which pointedly decides this doctrine. But it seems to me, that Dr. Robinson's note to The Ocean, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 91, fully shows the understanding of the prize courts on the subject; and the case of The Osprey, before the lords commissioners in 1795, cited in The Vigilantia, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 1, is a strong instance of its application to a neutral subject. There can be no well founded distinction in this respect between a neutral and a citizen. But independently of all authority, it seems to me that the principle obviously flows from the general rule, as to the effect of domicil, and cannot form an exception without shaking its foundations.

In the present case, if the doctrine of the claimant's counsel be true, Mr. Gillespie's property at the time of the capture, was completely protected from capture by British and American cruisers. He was certainly entitled to protection, as a British merchant domiciled in Scotland; and upon the argument of the counsel, as an American merchant also. I should have been glad to have learned, how this double character, this hostile and amicable character, could coalesce in the same person, as to the same transaction. I imagine it would be a novus hospes in the prize jurisdiction.

On the whole, I deem Mr. Gillespie, as to this shipment, an enemy merchant, and therefore reject his claim, and condemn the property as lawful prize to the captors.

[NOTE. On appeal this decree of condemnation was affirmed by the supreme court, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion, in which it was held that the commercial domicile of a merchant at the time of the capture of his goods determines the character of those goods hostile or neutral. [1] [Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. The claim of Mr. John Graham to the sole and exclusive property of certain packages of dry goods is now to be heard, upon the further proof directed in the cause. On the original papers accompanying the shipment, the goods were stated to be on account of John Graham. In an accompanying memorandum, they are stated to be for John Graham & Company; and in a sub-invoice, particular packages are alleged to be for Peter Graham & Company. There are also several letters, addressed to the claimant, &c. giving information as to the goods, which seemed to point to an interest in the shippers, William Graham & Brothers of Glasgow. Upon the further proof it appears that the three firms aforementioned are composed of the same partners, namely, William Graham, John Graham, and Peter Graham, who are all brothers and natives of Scotland. William Graham is a naturalized citizen of the United States, and has resided many years in Scotland, doing the business of their house of trade there, under the firm of William Graham & Brothers. John Graham is also a naturalized citizen of the United States, and has resided many years at New York, doing the business of their house of trade there, under the firm of John Graham & Company, and also carrying on considerable other business on his own private account. Peter Graham (who has been naturalized as a citizen of the United States since the war) has for some years resided at Philadelphia, doing the business of their house of trade there, under the firm of Peter Graham & Company. The principal business of these houses is the shipment of goods between Scotland and the United States, either on their own account or on consignment. The affidavits of all the brothers are produced, and they all allege the exclusive property to be in Mr. John Graham; and attempt to explain the apparent discord of the original papers. The affidavits of their clerks are offered for the same purpose. But no original letters or orders from Mr. John Graham, or copies thereof are exhibited, to relieve the cause from the pregnant suspicions of partnership interest. The whole evidence consists of naked affidavits, although letters and orders are admitted to have passed between the parties.

I am entirely satisfied, that the present shipment having been made by the Scotch house in the ordinary course of their trade, must be held to be on joint account, unless the presumption is conclusively repelled by proof of a shipment on the exclusive account of Mr. John Graham. The best proof, which the nature of the case admits, or which is in possession of the parties, is not brought out. Here are no original orders or letters, or extracts therefrom; and certainly naked statements must be entitled to little weight, when the parties hold better evidence behind the scenes. Either, therefore, this shipment was without orders, and then it stands on joint account; or if there were orders, the latter, if produced, would demonstrate a joint interest. The voluntary suppression, or the original silence of the parties, authorize the court to adopt the same conclusion. I therefore hold Mr. William Graham as entitled to one-third part of the present shipment; and as he is a domiciled British merchant, I condemn it as lawful prize to the captors. The other two third parts I order to be restored.

Case No. 5,036.

The FRANCIS.

[2 Gall. 391.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1815.

SALE—DISCRETIONARY ORDERS TO SHIP—WHEN TITLE PASSES.

If shipment be made without, or contrary to orders, it still remains at the risk of the shippers. If a shipper have general discretionary orders to ship goods, the shipment will remain at his own risk, unless at the time of shipment, by some overt unequivocal act, he designates or appropriates the shipment to his correspondent. Until such appropriation, the property is not changed. See The Frances, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 354, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 183 (Dunham and Randolph's Claim); The Mary and Susan, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 25.

[Cited in New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (47 U. S.) 405.]

[Heard on the claim of Low & Co. to a portion of the cargo on board the ship Francis, captured by the American privateer Yankee, and libeled as enemy's property.]

Mr. Searle, for claimants.

Burrill & Robbins, for captors.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a mere question of proprietary interest. The shipment was made by Mr. Bowman Fleming of Glasgow, to his brother, Mr. John Fleming at New York. The packages are all marked with the initials BF, but neither the bill of lading, nor invoice, nor accompanying letter, express any account or risk. The natural conclusion would be, that the property belonged to the shipper. The claimants, who are merchants at Savannah, claim the shipment on their own account, and upon their urgent application, an order for further proof was made, and the original letters and documents respecting the shipment were required to be produced. They have had full warning of the extreme difficulty of their case, and ample time to remove it; and it must now be presumed, that every thing is before the court, which they could call in aid of their claim.

Considering the nature of the claim, the evidence adduced is not so complete, as might have been reasonably expected. There are several omissions, which it is very difficult to account for, and a considerable degree of laxity in the statements of the affidavits of claim.

No specific orders are produced, to authorise the shipments; and the orders, contained in the letter of the 21st of December, 1811, would seem directly to negative it. It is a clear result of the decisions of the supreme court (The St. Jose Indiano, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 208, and cases there referred to) that a shipment made without orders, or contrary to orders, is at the risk of the shipper during the voyage. The claimants attempt to support their case under the allegation, that the shipper had general discretionary orders to ship, what and when he pleased, and that there was a sort of general usage between him and them on the subject. It strikes me, that there is no sufficient evidence, to justify so broad an allegation. And if there were, in point of law, the shipment would remain at the risk of the shipper, unless at the time of the shipment, he, by some overt unequivocal act, designated or appropriated it to his correspondents. He cannot ship goods generally to a third person, and govern himself as events may turn up, either to claim the gain for himself, or to throw the loss on them. Until such appropriation, the property is not changed. It might, with as much propriety, be claimed as changed, when ordered from the manufacturers on the general account of the shipper, merely because he had a contingent intention of shipping it to his correspondents. And this also, as I apprehend, has been the doctrine asserted by the supreme court.

In the present case, there is not a scrip of paper on board pointing to an interest in the claimants. If really designed for them, it is inconceivable that no letter, ordering the trans-shipment to Savannah, was sent to the consignee. No original letters to Mr. John Fleming are produced; and although the parties, from being brothers, cannot but be presumed to have an intimate connexion (a connexion palpably admitted in all the letters of a confidential nature), there is not a line from Mr. Bowman Fleming to him, nor even an affidavit from Mr. John Fleming, to negative the presumption necessarily arising from the consignment. This gentleman has studiously withdrawn himself from all connexion with the cause, though from his residence at New York, it is difficult to conceive, why he should not have originally interposed a claim as consignee, if there had been the slightest pretence for a bona fide claim. It is impossible not to draw very unfavorable inferences from this sedulous omission of a necessary witness, who may be really deemed conductor operarum. I have a strong impression, corroborated by some of the letters, which are in the case, that if the confidential correspondence and articles of copartnership of the parties, were fully before the court, it would appear that Mr. Bowman Fleming was either a dormant partner, or a principal, in all the shipments made by him to the houses at Savannah and New York.

There is another important omission. In the letters produced, there is a perpetual reference to other letters previously written; and contemporaneous shipments are spoken of in the Fanny, and the Thomas Gibbons. These vessels were captured, and brought into the United States for adjudication, and all the letters were deposited in the prize court, or delivered to the parties. How has it happened, that not a single letter, sent by any vessel after the Francis sailed, has been produced? How has it happened, that not a copy of any paper, relative to the shipments in the Fanny or the Thomas Gibbons, has been adduced? Is it credible, that the shipment in the Francis should be stated in letters written in October, 1812, and not once alluded to in prior letters? Since there must have been letters received by the claimants, which they hold back from the court, it is not an unjust conclusion, that they would not, if shown, support the present claim.

In respect to the letters disclosed to the court, there is much to awaken jealousy. The letter of the 22d of October is doubtless genuine. But I am entirely satisfied, that it was written after a knowledge of the capture of the Francis. And I cannot but remark, that notwithstanding all these ships were captured, that circumstance is not once alluded to in the correspondence, at any time. Is it possible, that the shipper should never have expressed any solicitude on the subject? Must there not be other letters between the parties? The time elapsed after the arrival of the Francis was ample to give the knowledge of that fact in Glasgow on the 22d of October, and the letter of that date has, in the concluding paragraph, an intimation, which may be interpreted to allude to the protection of the interests, which the writer had in the shipments, made by him. The language of that letter is, in other respects, worthy of attention. The writer is very scrupulous in declaring his having made shipments, according to orders from the claimants, in the Fanny and the Francis, to his brother's address in New York. Yet, in a letter written only eight days before (on the 14th of October) there is not the slightest intimation of any shipment, except in the Thomas Gibbons. The same remark also applies to the letter of the 1st of January, 1813; and I will add, that although the originals were specially directed to be produced, a copy only of that letter is before the court. How can these omissions be reasonably accounted for, consistent with the verity of the present claim?

The letter, however, which is annexed to the invoice of the 16th of July, is that, upon which the claimants mainly rely, to support their title; and if that letter be spurious, or not sufficiently authenticated to entitle it to credit, the court would be insensible to its own duty, if it did not reject it, and decree condemnation. That letter has not on it the slightest mark, to verify the time of its date, or of its receipt. It has neither post mark, nor ship-mark, nor mode of conveyance on it. The claimants themselves do not give any satisfactory account of it. They state, that it was received either personally, or by enclosure, from Mr. John Fleming, but do not declare at what time, or at what place it was so received. Neither is there offered any suppletory affidavit of Mr. John Fleming, to confirm the declaration, nor the original letter in which it was enclosed to him. All the other original letters from Mr. Bowman Fleming are in his own handwriting. In this letter, the signature only is his, and the body is filled up in another handwriting. The invoice, on the same paper, is asserted to be in the handwriting of his clerk; and on examination, it bears considerable resemblance to the original invoice. There is this remarkable circumstance, that in the original invoice found on board, no charges are added, which would be natural, if the goods belonged to the shipper, but in the present invoice, charges, and insurance and commissions are found. The words "Ship Francis, Capt. Boyer," on the direction of the original invoice, resemble the handwriting of Mr. Bowman Fleming, and incline me strongly to believe, that it passed through his hands. How then can we account for the omission of the charges, or of the words "the account and risk," which the new invoice of the 16th of July affects to supply?

There is another circumstance connected with this letter, which has great weight. In June, 1813, a petition was presented to the court for a remission of the forfeiture of this shipment under the act of 2d of January, 1813. In support of the verity of that petition, and of the proprietary interest, copies of the letters of the 14th and 22d of October, and of the 1st of January, were presented. The letter, which is now under consideration, was not even alluded to, much less was it presented, as the papers in this cause most distinctly show. This omission cannot be otherwise accounted for, than upon the supposition that no such letter was then in existence or in the possession of the claimants. It is incredible, that merchants in regular business should not be able to tell, when or where they receive important letters; and in this very case there is proof, that the claimants usually endorse letters received by themselves. If, as the claimants would lead us to suppose, this letter was written and sent about the 16th of July, it is somewhat singular that it should not have been filed with their claim, late as that was interposed, in October, 1812. That it never was produced until the present term, is not accounted for in any manner; and for aught that appears on it, it may have been a fabrication of but a very few months ago.

If the court should restore the property upon the footing of a letter so totally without authentication, it would voluntarily submit itself to every species of imposition. I have not the slightest doubt, that it was never written bona fide in Scotland. It would not, considering all the circumstances, be a harsh imputation to declare, that it was probably transmitted with the invoice, and in blank, to be filled up over the signature in this country, in such manner, as the friends of Mr. Bowman Fleming might deem advisable. If I had entertained any doubt, as to this transaction, I should have directed the papers and affidavits of the parties in the prize causes of the Fanny and the Thomas Gibbons to be invoked into this cause. And I should have been surprised, if some light would not have been reflected from those causes in aid of the opinion which I entertain on this subject. But as I am entirely satisfied, that the claim is utterly without satisfactory proof, I shall condemn the property as good prize to the captors.

In case of an appeal, I shall direct all the original papers to be delivered to the captors, upon their undertaking to deliver them to the supreme court, and leaving attested copies in the circuit court. It is impossible, without an inspection, to feel the full force of some portion of the difficulties of this cause.

Condemned.

FRANCIS v. BASSETT.

[1 Spr. 16.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb., 1842.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—FORFEITURE—LEAVING VESSEL BEFORE DISCHARGE OF CARGO—TIME OF FILING LIBEL.

1. No statute prohibits the filing of any libel within ten days after the discharge of the cargo.

2. Wages are not forfeited by leaving the vessel after the voyage is ended, and before the cargo is unladen.

3. Wages in such case allowed, up to the time of leaving by reason of illness.

In admiralty.

F. W. Sawyer, for libellant.

B. F. Hallett, for respondent.

SPRAGUE, District Judge.—This is a libel in personam for wages.

The first objection by the respondent is, that the libel was filed within ten days from the discharge of the cargo. But the statute only prohibits the issuing of process against the vessel within ten days—not the filing of the libel. See The William Jarvis [Case No. 17,697].

It is next objected, that here was a desertion, and consequent forfeiture of wages. The vessel arrived in Boston, and was moored in safety on Friday the third day of December last; and sometime during the evening or night of the same day, the libellant left her, and did not return. But a desertion can only be in the course of the voyage, not after its termination. Here the voyage had been ended, by the vessel's being moored in safety in the usual place. Cloutman v. Tunison [Case No. 2,907].

It is further insisted, that if there be no forfeiture, there should be a deduction from the wages of the libellant, because he absented himself without leave. The evidence shows that he was suffering from disease, to that extent which should excuse him from the performance of a contract for personal service.

Decree for the libellant for his wages up to the time of leaving the vessel.

NOTE. Whether seamen are bound by the maritime law, in the absence of special stipulations, and of any custom of the port, to perform further duties, in unlading the cargo, after mooring the vessel in safety at her last port of destination, see Swift v. The Happy Return [Case No. 13,697]; The Martha [Id. 9,144]; The Mary [Id. 9,191]; Granon v. Hartshorne [Id. 5,689]; The Eagle [Id. 4,233]; Cloutman v. Tunison [Id. 2,907]. That the seaman's leaving the vessel when she is thus moored, or refusing to perform such duties, does not incur the statute forfeiture for desertion, see cases cited above, and The Elizabeth Frith [Id. 4,361].

SHIPPING—LIENS UNDER STATE LAWS.

1. A state statute, such as chapter 6 of the practice act of California, declaring vessels subject to liens for materials or supplies furnished towards their construction, repair, or equipment, and directing that demands secured by such liens shall have preference in order of payment over other demands, is valid and operative, even in its application to a domestic vessel supplied in her home port, so far as to entitle the holder of a demand within the statute to payment out of surplus proceeds remaining in the registry, after the satisfaction of maritime liens, in preference to a mortgagee of the vessel.

2. The successive decisions of the supreme court abrogating the practice of enforcing such liens by proceedings in rem, reviewed and explained.

[Cited in The Kate Tremaine, Case No. 7,622; Wilson v. Bell, 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 219.]

[This was a suit in admiralty by John Francis and others against the bark Harrison (John Kentfield and others, interveners).]

Milton Andros, for interveners.

W. W. Cope, for mortgagee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The question presented in this case is whether a material man claiming a lien under the laws of this state upon a domestic vessel, is entitled to payment out of the surplus proceeds in the registry, in preference to a mortgagee of the vessel.

By the sixth chapter of the practice act of California, it is provided that all steamers, vessels, etc., "shall be liable for supplies furnished for their use at the request of their respective owners, masters, agents and consignees, and for materials furnished for their construction, repair or equipment."

The act further provides, "that said several causes of action shall constitute liens upon all steamers, vessels and boats, and have priority of payment in their order herein enumerated, and shall have preference over all other demands; provided, such liens shall only continue in force for the period of one year from the time the cause of action occurred."

If this statute be constitutional and operative, it is evident that the material man has by law a lien and right to priority of payment in preference to all other demands; and that this right must be recognized by the court which has in its possession the surplus proceeds which remain after satisfying the maritime liens on the vessel.

From the time of the decision in the case of The General Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, the supreme court has held in numerous cases that no lien was created by the maritime law in favor of material men supplying domestic ships in their home ports.

In respect to demands of this description, "the case is governed," says the supreme court, "altogether by the municipal law of the state, and no lien is implied unless it is recognized by that law." The General Smith [supra]; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324. It was further held that when such liens were recognized by the state law, they might be enforced in the district courts, according to the course of the admiralty.

The twelfth rule in admiralty, adopted by the supreme court in 1844, expressly provides "that proceedings in rem shall apply to cases of domestic ships where by the local law a lien is given to material men for repairs, supplies, and other necessaries." No recognition could therefore be more emphatic of the constitutionality of state laws creating liens of this description, and of the jurisdiction of the national courts to enforce them.

The distinction too, between the rights created by the state law, and the remedy afforded by it, was also recognized—for the national courts enforced the right by an admiralty proceeding, in the usual form, and not in the manner prescribed by the state law.

In 1858, the twelfth rule was repealed, and proceedings in rem, in cases of domestic ships for supplies, repairs, or other necessaries, were prohibited. The reasons for the repeal of the rule are given by the court in the case of The St. Lawrence, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 522. The court says: "The state lien was, however, enforced, not as a right which the court was bound to carry into execution upon the application of the party, but as a discretionary power which the court might lawfully exercise for the purpose of justice, when it did not involve controversies beyond the limits of admiralty jurisdiction."

The court, after referring to the inconveniences of enforcing such liens in the admiralty, says: "Such duties and powers are appropriate to the courts of the state which created the lien, and are entirely alien to the purposes for which the admiralty power was created, and form no part of the code of laws which it was established to administer." Id. 531.

We have here a distinct recognition of the right of the states to create liens on domestic vessels in cases where none exists by maritime law, and to enforce them by appropriate proceeding.

In the case of The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 645, which is the latest decision on the subject, it is held that the states "may create these liens, and enact reasonable rules and regulations for their enforcement."

It is apparent therefore: 1st. That the contract of a domestic material man is a maritime contract, and of admiralty jurisdiction. 2d. That it may still be enforced in the admiralty by a suit in personam; and might constitutionally be enforced by a proceeding in rem, where a lien has been by the state law engrafted on the contract. But that on grounds of convenience this proceeding has been prohibited. 3d. That liens created in such cases by state laws are valid, and the states may provide reasonable rules and regulations for their enforcement in their own courts.

It is contended that, as a necessary consequence of these propositions, the state legislatures have the right to authorize a proceeding in rem to enforce liens created by state laws, and not existing under the maritime law.

In support of this view, various authorities are cited: The Circassian, 50 Barb. 490; Id. 501; 4 Ill. 504; 4 Mo. 244; 41 Mo. 491; 2 Pars. Adm. §§ 154, 155; The Maggie Hammond [9 Wall. (76 U. S.) 435].

It is urged that in the cases of The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 411, and Hine v. Trevor, Id. 555, where a contrary doctrine is supposed to have been held, the liens attempted to be enforced in the state courts by a proceeding in rem, were not liens owing their existence solely to the state law, but were liens created by the general law maritime. That the question before the court was as to the validity of a pretension avowedly set up by the state courts to exercise general admiralty jurisdiction concurrently with the United States courts of admiralty. That the right of the states to authorize proceedings in rem to enforce liens created by state laws, was not in question; and that the language of the court must be construed with reference to the circumstances of the cases presented. That in subsequent cases the supreme court has explicitly declared the power and duty to enforce liens of this class, to be appropriate to the courts of the state which created the lien (The St. Lawrence, ubi supra), and that the states may provide for their enforcement, "by reasonable rules and regulations" (The Belfast, ubi supra). That the proceeding in rem is the most speedy, appropriate and effectual, if not the only practical, means of giving effect to these liens. That to deny the right of the material man to avail himself of that proceeding in a state court, and at the same time to decline to enforce his lien in the admiralty, is to leave him without a remedy, and to reduce the declaration of the validity of his lien to the announcement of a barren proposition, unaccompanied by any substantial right, or available means of enforcing it.

The force of these suggestions is admitted. It has been recognized in the cases above cited. But in my opinion the answer to them is conclusive. In the cases of The Moses Taylor and Hine v. Trevor, the general principle is established that "whenever the district courts of the United States have original cognizance of admiralty causes by virtue of the act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], that cognizance is exclusive, and no other court, state or federal, can exercise it, with the exception always of such concurrent remedy as is given by the common law." "This," it is announced in Hine v. Trevor, "must be taken as the settled law of the court."

It is also in those cases explicitly declared that a proceeding in rem is not a remedy afforded by the common law, and therefore not within the exception which saves to suitors such concurrent remedy as is given by the common law.

We have already seen that the contract of the domestic material man is of original admiralty cognizance in the district courts of the United States. The case therefore clearly falls within the principle laid down by the supreme court. To interpolate into the doctrine as announced by the court, the exception in favor of proceedings in rem to enforce liens, attached by state laws to a certain class of maritime contracts, would not only be inconsistent with the language of the supreme court, and with the principles on which the decision rests, but would give rise to great embarrassments and perplexities.

If proceedings in rem are allowed in the state courts, to enforce the liens in question, all holders of maritime liens should be allowed to intervene and establish and enforce their claims according to their respective priorities. If the state courts proceed to adjudicate upon these claims, they will unquestionably be exercising admiralty jurisdiction, and might do so to any extent under cover of a proceeding initiated by the domestic lien holder. If they decline to entertain such claims, how can justice be done?

Again.—If the holder of the maritime lien should resort to the court of admiralty, a conflict of jurisdiction would ensue, for another tribunal, authorized to exercise jurisdiction in rem, would be already in possession of the vessel.

The state courts are necessarily bound to pursue exactly the provisions of the statutes under which they acquire jurisdiction. In the California act, six classes of cases are enumerated, in which alone liens are to be enforced, or, it would seem, recognized: (1) For services rendered on board vessels. (2) For supplies furnished to them. (3) For materials furnished in their construction, repairs, etc. (4) For wharfage and anchorage within the state. (5) For non-performance or mal-performance of any contract for the transportation of property or persons. (6) For injuries committed by them to persons or property.

These liens are declared to have priority in the order in which they are enumerated, and the provisions of the law embrace "all steamers, boats and vessels"—foreign as well as domestic.

When judgment is obtained against any vessel, the sheriff is directed to apply the proceeds of the sale—1st. To the payment of the wages of mariners, boatmen, etc. 2d. To the payment of the judgment and costs. 3d. To pay over any balance to the owner, master, agent or consignee, who may have appeared in the action.

The rights of salvors, the holders of bottomry bonds, and perhaps of those who have advanced moneys to the master, seem thus to be wholly ignored, while an attempt is made to fix the respective rank of liens, some of which are confessedly maritime.

The sheriff is directed in all cases, after paying any claims for wages, to apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of the judgment —that is, the payment of the particular lien on which suit is brought. The balance he is to pay to the owner of the vessel. Neither the bottomry bondholder or the salvor is authorized to intervene in the suit; nor is either allowed by the statute to attach the vessel to enforce his demand.

No provision is made for any proclamation, publication, or other notice to parties interested in the vessel, except that a summons is to be served on the master, mate, or other person in charge. The vessel is seized under a process of attachment, and the other proceedings are to be conducted in the same manner as in actions against individuals. When judgment is recovered, the vessel is sold under an execution issued to the sheriff, and the proceeds are distributed as already stated.

The supreme court in The Moses Taylor considered the action authorized by the statute of California, "a proceeding in the nature and with the incidents of a suit in admiralty," and observes, that "the jurisdiction of the courts of California is maintained on the assumed ground, that the cognizance by the national courts of civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is not exclusive, as declared by the ninth section of the judiciary act of 1789." It was to this claim, on the part of the states, to concurrent jurisdiction on admiralty causes, that its attention was chiefly directed.

It is unnecessary to consider whether the proceeding under the statute of California has all the incidents of a suit in rem in the admiralty, or to inquire what is the nature of the title obtained by the purchaser under an execution issued in such a proceeding.

It is decided "that the statute of California, to the extent to which it authorizes actions in rem against vessels for causes of action cognizable in the admiralty, invests her courts with admiralty jurisdiction," and is therefore unconstitutional. The statute has been referred to in this opinion to illustrate the difficulties which attend the exercise by state tribunals of any jurisdiction in rem or quasi in rem in cases of admiralty cognizance, and the reasonableness as well as policy of the simple and clear principle announced by the supreme court, that in all such cases the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty is exclusive, except so far as a concurrent remedy exists at common law, and that a proceeding in rem, authorized by a state statute, is not such a concurrent remedy.

Nor is it true that if the right to proceed in rem in the state courts be denied to the material man, he is left wholly without remedy. His lien may be enforced like any other mortgage, by appropriate proceedings.

The right of prior satisfaction out of the proceeds of the sale on execution against the owner of any vessel may be conferred, on the material man, by law, and his lien may be recognized and enforced in the distribution of estates of deceased persons, or of bankrupts. It may also be recognized by courts of admiralty, when disposing of remnants and surplus proceeds in the registry. In these and other ways, the lien created by state laws may become effectual. And it is to be supposed that it was to provisions of this character that the supreme court referred when it observed that the states might enact reasonable rules and regulations for their enforcement.

This construction of the language of the opinion in The Belfast is more reasonable than to suppose that the court referred to proceedings in rem, and thus overruled the doctrine clearly announced in The Moses Taylor and Hine v. Trevor, that such a proceeding in a state court was inadmissible in any case of which the district courts of the United States have original cognizance, as an admiralty cause.

From the foregoing, it results that the state law is invalid only so far as it attempts to authorize actions in rem, against vessels for causes of action cognizable in the admiralty; but the validity of the lien itself, especially when given by the state law in general terms, without specific conditions and limitations, inconsistent with the rules and principles which govern implied admiralty liens, is, as is said in the case of the St. Lawrence, "undoubted."

It is urged, that inasmuch as the remedy, by a proceeding in rem, afforded by the statute, is unconstitutional, the right is totally lost, and the lien created must be treated as nonexistent. But we have seen that the lien is created by the California statute in general terms: "The said several causes of action shall constitute liens upon all steamers, vessels," etc. A mode of enforcing these liens is provided, but it is not declared that this remedy shall be exclusive, nor that the courts shall refuse to recognize the liens except in the proceeding authorized by the statute.

It is probable that in all the cases where, under the former twelfth rule, liens conferred by state laws were enforced by the admiralty courts, those laws authorized a proceeding in rem in the state courts—or a suit against the vessel by name—but this circumstance did not impair the validity of the liens, nor affect the right of the admiralty courts to enforce them. A right which they still retain, though its exercise has been prohibited on grounds of expediency.

The New York statute, under which the supreme court held that an "undoubted lien" was acquired, provided, like the California statute, for an action against the vessel by name, and authorized a proceeding much more closely resembling a suit in admiralty. It results, that the states have clearly the power to engraft upon such causes of action cognizable in the admiralty, liens which, although they cannot be enforced in the state courts, by a suit in admiralty, or a proceeding in rem, are nevertheless valid, and should be recognized by this court in the distribution of surplus proceeds of any vessel sold to satisfy a maritime lien, or, by parity of reasoning, which have come into its possession under a proceeding in bankruptcy.

No question was raised at the hearing, as to the respective priorities of persons claiming liens under the state laws, and the holders of a prior mortgage recorded under the laws of the United States—for the claims of material men which accrued prior to the date of the mortgage, are sufficient to absorb all the surplus proceeds in the registry.

The fund in court, must, therefore, be applied: First, to the satisfaction of any maritime lien which has been proved. Second, to the payment pro rata of the claims of material men entitled to liens under the state law. An order to this effect will be entered.

Since the above was written, the supreme court of this state has decided that a state law authorizing a proceeding in rem by a domestic material man for supplies furnished in the home port of a vessel, is unconstitutional.

NOTE.—The foregoing decision, which seems to be the necessary result of the principles established by the supreme court, involves the anomaly of admitting the validity of a lien created by state laws, and at the same time denying the right to enforce it by the most appropriate and effectual means, viz.: a proceeding in rem. This, and other difficulties which beset the subject, owe their origin to early decisions of the supreme court, rendered at a time when the nature and extent of the grant of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction had been imperfectly investigated, and when the more liberal views with regard to the powers and duties of American courts of admiralty, which have since been adopted, had hardly been suggested.

In The General Smith it was held that no lien is implied by the maritime law in favor of persons furnishing repairs and necessaries to a vessel in a port of a state to which she belongs.

The operation of the principle thus announced, was in some degree mitigated by subsequent decisions, which held that even in the case of domestic vessels, a lien created by state laws might be enforced in the admiralty.

This remedy being now prohibited, while the power of the states to authorize a proceeding in rem in their own courts, is at the same time denied, it seems not improper to revisit the foundations of the doctrine which has produced this anomalous result, and to inquire how far it is reconcilable with the maritime law and the recent and more liberal principles established by the supreme court.[2]

[2]By the Roman law, the privilege of those who lent money to purchase, build or repair a ship, was exclusively personal. It had no effect against those who were secured by express hypothecations. By the maritime law, every privilege imparted a tacit hypothecation or lien, which differs from an ordinary hypothecation in this, that the latter is governed by the date of the contract, while the privilege of the former is regulated by the degree of favor due to the particular claim. See The Young Mechanic [Case No. 18,180]. The liens for seamen's wages for moneys advanced on bottomry bonds, for repairs and necessities in the course of the voyage, are, therefore, preferred to that of a mortgagee prior in date. If it be admitted that the domestic material man has no maritime lien, and if the states have no power to create new maritime liens or affect

"It is," Mr. J. Ware observes, "a general principle of law extending to a great variety of cases, that a person who has by his own labor added a new value to a specific article, has a lien on that article for the value of his service. It is a right consonant to all ideas of natural equity, and is highly favored by law. 2 Kent, Comm. 496. The mechanic is considered as gaining a qualified property in the article when he has incorporated into it his own skill, care and labor.

"Another general principle is, that when this sort of confusion of goods is produced at the request of the general owner, he that has given the last increment of value to the article is entitled to be first satisfied out of the common stock. In the nature and reason of the thing, there is no difference in this respect between the mechanic and the carrier." Poland v. The Spartan [Case No. 11,246].

This right is recognized by the common law wherever the person claiming it is in possession of the article with which his labor and materials have been incorporated, and by the maritime law as giving rise to a privilege or right of prior satisfaction out of the thing itself, except where that privilege has been voluntarily renounced by an agreement incompatible with its exercise, or an exclusively personal credit has been given.

"There is nothing," says Emerigon, "which is regarded with so much favor as debts for work and labor furnished to a vessel. Commerce and the country at large are interested in them. It is right that workmen and material men should enjoy the real lien, which is given them by the 'Ordonnance de la Marine.' They cannot be deprived of it, unless it is proved that they contracted on the faith of the person and not of the thing." Emerig. Cont. Grosse, c. 12, § 3. In most of the states, the defects of the common law have been supplied by statutes. The law of California gives to artisans, machinists, builders, mechanics, material men, laborers, miners, etc., liens upon buildings, wharves, bridges, ditches, flumes, tunnels, sluices, machinery, aqueducts, etc., for which they have furnished materials or labor, and to enforce these liens, remedies partaking of the nature of a proceeding in rem have been provided. The decision in the case of The General Smith has also given rise to the statutes, by which the rights of those who supply or repair vessels have received similar protection, and the supposed defect of the maritime law has been supplied.

But this attempt to enforce rights so agreeable to our ideas of natural justice has proved in a great measure abortive. For the admiralty courts, though retaining jurisdiction of the contract in personam, decline to enforce the lien, and the state courts are without power to resort to a proceeding in rem.

That material men, that is, those who furnish material or labor in building or repairing vessels, or necessary supplies for their outfit, have, by the general maritime law, a lien on the vessel for their security, cannot be disputed.

Article 16, liv. 1, tit. 14, of the Marine Ordonnance, places the lien of material men who have furnished supplies, etc., before the departure of the vessel, in the third rank, postponing their claims only to those of mariners for wages, and those who have furnished money for the necessities of the ship during her last voyage. The ordonnance itself is said to have been "formed on the general jurisprudence of Europe, and for this purpose information was sought, at enormous expense, in all the ports of the continent." Preface to Valin's Comm. on Ordonnance de la Marine, p. 4.

"It was at once adopted by foreign nations," says Valin, "as an eternal monument of wisdom and intelligence, and it has ever since commanded the admiration of all civilians and lawyers, and has obtained the respect of every maritime state." It, therefore, affords the highest evidence of the general maritime law, as administered in the admiralty tribunals of Europe, and derived from the ancient laws of the sea. See Append. 2 Pet. Adm. p. 1; The Calisto [Case No. 2,316].

It is said by Mr. J. Ware (The Calisto, ubi supra) that this principle of maritime law is not acknowledged by the common law, and has never been received by the commercial jurisprudence of England.

Undoubtedly the English common law courts hold that although by the maritime law every contract with the master of a ship implies an hypothecation, yet that it is otherwise by the law of England, unless expressly so agreed; and this doctrine has not only been recognized by the courts of chancery, and in the distribution of bankrupts' estates, but prohibitions have been granted to the court of admiralty to stay proceedings in rem to enforce the lien given by the maritime law. Abb. Shipp. 143 et seq.

But it is not true that the principles of the maritime law, with respect to these liens, were never adopted into the jurisprudence of England, or that the court of admiralty was always forbidden to enforce them.

In the articles drawn up in the reign of Charles I. to accommodate the differences between his majesty's courts of Westminster and his court of admiralty, which were debated in the presence of the king and all the lords of his council, twenty-three in number, and which were agreed to by the judges of the courts at Westminster, and by the judge of the court of admiralty, it is provided:

"3d. If suit shall be in the court of admiralty for building, amending, saving or necessary victualing of a ship, against the ship itself, and not against any party by name, but such as for his interest makes himself a party, no prohibition is to be granted, though this be done within the realm." Cited in Ben. Adm. p. 51; also in De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776] in note.

In 1648, disputes having arisen between the courts of common law and the courts of admiralty, an ordinance was passed by the lords and commons assembled in parliament, defining the jurisdiction of the court of admiralty. It provided 'that the court of admiralty shall have cognizance and jurisdiction against the ship or vessel, with the tackle, apparel and furniture thereof, in all causes which concern the repairing, victualing and furnishing provisions for the setting of such ships or vessels to sea." This ordinance ceased to be in force at the restoration. Prohibitions were again issued by the common law judges, and the admiralty, weary of the struggle, appears to have abandoned all further efforts to retain its ancient authority. Ben. Adm. p. 58.

Although the common law courts have thus finally succeeded in preventing the incorporation into the jurisprudence of England of the just and rational principles of the maritime law, with respect to the liens of material men, yet it clearly appears that those principles were zealously maintained by some of her ablest lawyers, and even for a considerable time adopted and enforced by the court of admiralty, with the sanction of the king's council, and of all the judges, and subsequently under an act of parliament.

The admiralty courts of America have long ceased to be governed by the arbitrary and their priorities, the liens under the state laws will be regulated by their date and not by the favor due them And thus in the distribution of surplus proceeds in the registry, the court might be compelled to accord to a mortgagee recorded under the laws of the United States, a preference over the claims of a material man, who might subsequently to the mortgage, have by his labor imparted a greatly increased value to the ship. See In re Scott [Id. 12,517].

irrational restrictions imposed by the common law courts of England upon the admiralty court of that country.

The maritime jurisdiction of the admiralty courts of the United States is, "that jurisdiction which commercial convenience, public policy and national rights have contributed to establish with slight deficiency over all Europe—that jurisdiction which, under the name of 'consular courts,' first established itself on the shores of the Mediterranean, and from the general equity and simplicity of its proceedings, soon commended itself to all the maritime states; that jurisdiction, in short, which, collecting the wisdom of the civil law, and combining it with the customs and usages of the sea, produced the venerable Consolato del Mare, and still continues in its decisions to regulate the commerce, the intercourse and the warfare of mankind." De Lovio v. Boit [supra].

The American courts of admiralty freely recognize and enforce the liens created by the maritime law in favor of shippers of goods, and of material men who supply foreign ships.

In matters of tort, the jurisdiction is determined by locality, and in those of contract by the subject matter; and it embraces torts committed upon, and contracts relating to the trade, business and navigation of not merely the sea or tide waters, but of our inland lakes, and great navigable rivers.

In the exercise of this jurisdiction, our admiralty courts are governed, not by the common law of England, but by the principles of the general law maritime, as embodied in the ancient laws of the sea, as expounded by the great jurisconsults of Europe, and illustrated and adorned by the genius and learning of the English admiralty judges in those cases in which the bigotry of the courts of common law has suffered them to retain admiralty jurisdiction, and to apply the principles of the maritime law.

But the progress towards these enlarged and liberal ideas has been slow, and marked with occasional hesitation and inconsistencies. The influence of the decisions of the common law judges of England is still discernible in this branch of our jurisprudence. We adopt the principle of the maritime law which gives to the material man a lien upon a foreign ship, and for this purpose we regard as foreign, ships, the owners of which reside in another state; but we refuse to recognize the lien of the builder or furnisher of a domestic vessel, although that lien is unquestionably allowed by the maritime law.

The received doctrine involves an even greater departure from the rules of that law—for it not only refuses to adopt them in the case of domestic material men, but by admitting a liability in personam, enforceable in the admiralty against the owners, it violates its fundamental principles and analogies.

In the infancy of modern commerce the master of a vessel was regarded as the gerant, or active partner of a societe en commandite. His contracts bound himself, and operated a tacit hypothecation of the vessel. He could bind the property committed to his charge, but he had no power to engage the private fortunes of the owners, unless under a special authority for the purpose. The creditor being thus restricted to a particular fund, the maritime law permitted him to proceed directly against it in specie, and gave him a privilege or jus in re in it as against the general creditors of, or purchasers from, the owner.

This principle, which appears to have been highly favored, and to have been recognized by nearly all the maritime codes of the middle ages, does not, says Mr. J. Ware,—The Rebecca [Case No. 11,619],—seem to have reached England, or at least was not adopted there as a general commercial custom; but its justice and policy have been recognized in recent statutes of Great Britain and the United States by which the liability of owners is restricted in certain cases to the value of their interest in the vessel and freight. The liability, therefore, of the owner on the contracts of the master was, as observed by Emerigon, real rather than personal.

Article 2, tit. 8, liv. 2, of the Ordonnance de la Marine, adopted in article 216 of the Code de Commerce, was variously interpreted by the commentators and the courts. Valin held that the owner's right to be discharged from the obligations of the master, by giving up the vessel and freight, applied only to the obligations arising from his negligence or torts. Emerigon and Pothier maintained that it embraced all obligations ex contractu as well as ex delicto. This question after much discussion, was finally settled in France, in accordance with the unanimous demand of the commercial interests, and with the approval of all the courts, by the adoption, in 1841, of the amended article 216 of the Code de Commerce. By this article, the proprietor of a ship is made civilly responsible for all the acts of the master, and for the obligations contracted by him relative to the ship or the adventure. But he may in all cases discharge himself from these obligations by abandoning the ship and freight. Rogron's Code de Com., liv. 2, tit. 3, art. 216.

This recent legislative interpretation in France of the provisions of the marine ordinance, is not cited as authority. But its unanimous approval by the French courts and jurisconsults, so thoroughly versed in the rules, and profoundly imbued with the principles of the maritime law, may be received as high evidence of what that law is. And it serves to show how repugnant it would be to its fundamental principles to hold that the master may bind his owners personally by his contracts, to the whole extent of their private fortunes, or their "land goods," without binding the ship or creating any lien upon her.

It has been suggested that the lien of the domestic material man is denied because he is presumed to have contracted on the personal credit of the owner. This is obviously not a reason, but merely a mode of stating the proposition. The presumption of an exclusive personal credit is, in the case of supplies furnished to coasters and the small craft which navigate our inland waters, in most instances, untrue in point of fact; nor can I perceive how such a presumption can now be indulged, for the supreme court in the case of The Belfast has decided that a maritime lien exists in favor of the shipper of goods, although the voyage is to be performed wholly within the limits of the state of which all the parties are residents.

If the freighter of goods on one of our river steamers, or the deck-hand, is not deemed to have contracted on the personal credit of the wealthy corporation which owns the line, with what reason can the mechanic who has repaired a steamer be presumed to have done so? The same remark may be applied to cases of pilotage and towage, which are generally admitted to give rise to a maritime lien irrespective of the residence of the owners of the vessel.

The attempt to mitigate the effects of the doctrine we are considering by treating the states as foreign to each other, and regarding vessels as "domestic," only when in the ports of the state where their owners reside, will be found, not only to give rise to insuperable difficulties, and to lead to absurd consequences, but to rest on very unsatisfactory grounds.

A few illustrations will expose its practical operation. If, for example, a person who resides in New York, where his business and credit are established, sends a vessel to be repaired in Jersey City, the mechanic will be allowed a lien, while if he sends her to Brooklyn no lien will be implied. But if the same person should in the succeeding year fix his residence in Jersey City, though he still carries on his business in New York, the case will be precisely reversed.

So if one own a vessel navigating the lakes, the mechanic will be denied a lien for repairs made at Buffalo, if the owner resides anywhere in the state of New York, while the lien will be allowed if the repairs are made at Jersey City on the order of any New York owner, no matter though he be the wealthiest and best known merchant or corporation of the city.

So, if a vessel be owned by two persons, one of whom resides at New Orleans and the other at St. Louis, between which ports the vessel plies, and at each of which the resident owner conducts her business, is the vessel to be deemed to "belong" to Missouri or Louisiana? At which of the termini of the voyage is the mechanic who repairs her to be allowed a lien? At both, or at neither?

In truth, the notion that vessels belong to the state where the owners happen to reside, or that they are to be treated when in a port of that state as "domestic vessels," seems to have been adopted on insufficient consideration. All registered and enrolled vessels, are vessels of the United States, and whether navigating the ocean, the lakes, or the great rivers of the country, are subject to admiralty jurisdiction, both in matters of tort and contract. Congress has regulated not only their registry and enrollment, and the mode in which they may be transferred and mortgaged, but has also, especially in the case of steamers, prescribed rules for their equipment and furniture, and for the transportation of passengers, and has subjected them to inspection by United States officers, and provided for the licensing of the pilots and engineers. They are thus, vessels of the United States, and are all domestic vessels, belonging to citizens of the United States.

The classification, therefore, of vessels as domestic and foreign, or quasi-foreign, according to the residence of the owner within or without the state, at a port of which they have been repaired or supplied, seems arbitrary and unsound. Especially when this classification is resorted to in but a single case, and for the purpose of excluding a lien allowed by the maritime law, and which has the most solid foundation in natural justice. Ben. Adm. § 273; The St. Iago de Cuba [9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 409]; 5 Pet. Cond. R. 630.

Our attention has thus far been confined to the broad doctrine that no lien is implied by the maritime law in favor of domestic material men, although the supplies have been ordered by the master with the owner's consent, or by the owner himself—and when the personal liability of the owner is admitted. It may be said, however, that the master's authority ceases on his arrival at the port of his owner's residence, and that unless expressly empowered by the latter, his contracts ought not to bind the vessel.

But this restriction upon the master's authority could, at most, be imposed only when the vessel is in the place where her owner resides—her home port. "An epithet which," says Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, "has no necessary reference to state or 'other limits.'" The St. Iago de Cuba, ubi supra. On principle, the determination of the master's agency should depend on the readiness with which the owner may be consulted, the urgency of the necessity for repairs or supplies, the authority, real or apparent, which the owner may have held him out as possessing, and the means which third persons may have possessed of ascertaining the extent of the powers confided to him.

In this view, the mechanic, who by the master's order, repairs, in Jersey City, a vessel belonging to a wealthy and well-known merchant, or corporation of New York, should not be entitled to recourse against the vessel, or her owners, any more than he who makes like repairs in Brooklyn, while conversely, the New York mechanic should, under certain circumstances, have both remedies, notwithstanding that the owner may reside in a remote part of the same state.

The taking of goods on freight, the shipping of a crew, the procuring supplies for them and the vessel, as well as the making of ordinary repairs, are within the usual scope of the master's duty and authority. See Curt. Merch. Seam. p. 172. On general principles of agency, the owner and a fortiori the ship, should be bound by his contracts, unless notice, actual or constructive, be clearly brought home to the person with whom he deals, that he is exceeding the limits of his authority. And on the principles of the maritime law, the liability of the vessel, at least, for the contracts of the master, would seem unquestionable. In article 216 of the Code de Commerce, which, as before stated, was taken from the Marine Ordonnance, the liability of every owner for the obligations of the master, up to the value of the vessel and freight, is established. Under this article it is held that the ship is liable, even though the proprietor or general owner is not armateur or owner for the voyage. Rogron, Code de Comm. art. 216.

And so is our own law. For the vessel is liable in rem to seamen, freighters, etc., on the contracts of the master, although she may have been demised or chartered to one who appoints the master, or whose agent he exclusively is.

Article 232 of the Code de Commerce provides for the very case we are considering. This article, which is taken from article 17, liv. 2, tit. 1, of the Ordonnance, enacts that the captain shall not in the place of residence (dans le lieu de la demeure) of the owners or their agent, without special authorization, cause repairs to be made, buy sails, cordage, etc., or take up money for the purpose. Under this article it is held that if the captain should violate it, the proprietors would nevertheless be bound under article 216, to the extent of their interest in the vessel, i. e. the vessel would be liable, except for money taken up on bottomry.

The remedy of the owner is against the master for violation of the article, but even this, says Valin, should be subject to his right to be allowed for absolutely necessary supplies, obtained for a reasonable price, however blameable he may be for having acted without authority. Valin's Comm. tom. 1, p. 440. The fifty-fourth chapter of the Consolato del Mare, and the observations of Valin and Emerigon upon it (Valin's Comm. tom. 1, p. 369; Emerig. Cont. Grosse, Hall's Translation, p. 227) illustrate the favor with which the maritime law regards debts due for work and materials furnished to a vessel.

Both of these great jurisconsults agree that workmen employed by a master-carpenter or caulker, who has contracted with the owner, shall have a lien on the vessel for the sums due them, unless they have received actual notice of the arrangement between the owner and contractor.

On this, which is an admitted exception to the ordinary principle of domino non mandante, Emerigon observes: "The carpenters, caulkers and other workmen employed in building, together with the creditors for the timber, cordage and other articles furnished, ought to enjoy the privilege allowed to them, unless they have been warned in due time that if they do not secure the payment of their claims against the contractor, they shall have no lien on the ship. And I do not believe that a simple registry of the contracts would be considered as a notification, within the meaning of the consolato, which requires that notice should be given to the workmen and other material men, in order that they may not be deceived. Emerig. Cont. Grosse, p. 229.

If the ship is thus liable to workmen employed by a contractor, and not by the owner or master, unless warned by the latter, a fortiori should she be liable to workmen employed by the master, unless affected by a similar notice. See cc. 32, 33, Consulat de la Mer par Boucher, tom. 11, pp. 38, 39.

It is thus evident that by the principles and analogies of the maritime law, and the "good customs of the sea," ("les bonnes coutumes de la mer," as they are called in the consolato), and on grounds of equity and natural justice, the lien of the material man who has constructed, repaired or supplied a vessel, ought to be recognized and enforced as a maritime lien by courts of admiralty. And this whether the work has been done in a port of the state in which the owner resides, or elsewhere; and whether upon the employment of the master or of the owner, or of his agent—excepting in those cases where the lien has been clearly waived, or "notice has been given to the workmen and other material men, in order that they may not be deceived."

The lien laws of the states, hitherto deemed necessary to obviate the consequences of the decision in the case of The General Smith, would seldom or never be resorted to, and the anomalous consequences of the adjudications with regard to them would disappear if it were established "that it is the ship, and not the ship of a particular owner, nor the ship of a particular flag, or national character; not a domestic ship, nor a foreign ship; not a ship in a port of a state to which she does not belong, or in which the owner does not reside, but a ship—every ship—that is bound for the bill of lading, the charter party, the wages of the seamen, repairs, supplies, materials and maritime loans." Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 2, 1871.

PATENTS — LIBERAL CONSTRUCTION — PRINTER'S ROLLER COMPOSITION—INGREDIENTS AND PROPORTION—REISSUE.

1. Patents are to be construed liberally, so as to sustain and not destroy the right of the inventor.

[Cited in Burke v. Partridge, 58 N. H. 351.]

2. Hence, the whole of the specification may and should be looked at, not only to learn from the description of the invention how to make it, but to ascertain what it really is.

3. It is not only where the specification is expressly referred to that the claim is to be construed in connection with it, but, as a general rule, the explanations contained in it are to be taken as the inventor's own interpreter of the meaning of his claim.

4. Where, in the body of the specification, a composition of matter is described as the product of glue, glycerine, and sugar, united in certain specified proportions, it being added that the proportions may, in some cases be advantageously varied, but the claim is for "combining glue, glycerine, and sugar, or any other analogous saccharine matter, to form a new and useful composition of matter:" Held, that the patent is not broadly for a substance composed of these ingredients, irrespective of the proportions in which they are combined, but for one produced in substantial or approximate accordance with the formulas given in the specification.

5. Semble, that where the original patent described a composition for printers' inking rollers as consisting of glue, glycerine, castor-oil, or any of the fixed oils, borax, ammonia, and sugar, mixed in certain approximately-specified proportions, and claimed "the use of the ingredients specified, when combined to form a composition for the manufacture of printers' inking-rollers," a claim upon reissue for "combining glue, glycerine, and sugar, or any other analogous saccharine matter, to form a new and useful composition of matter for various purposes," can not, if construed in its broadest significance, be sustained.

6. While characteristic resemblance is preserved between two compositions of matter, they may, perhaps, be considered as identical, within the meaning of the patent law, although one of them may not contain some of the constituents of the other, which are not necessary to impart to it its peculiar attributes.

7. If known elements are combined in new proportions, and the result is a product possessing distinct properties and applicable to distinct uses, this must be regarded as a patentable subject.

8. Where only approximate proportions are named in the specification for the several elements of a given composition of matter, the right to vary these proportions is not unlimited. It can only extend to any adjustment which will result in the production of a substance possessing the peculiar properties attributed to the substance described in the patent.

Final hearing on pleadings and proofs. Suit brought [by L. Francis and C. H. Loutrel against A. Mellor and H. Rittenhouse] upon two letters patent for "improved composition for printers' inking-rollers." The first patent was granted to Lewis Francis and F. W. Letmate, June 21, 1864, and reissued November 26, 1867. The infringement of this patent was expressly denied by defendants, and no proof was offered by the complainants to maintain the same. The second patent was granted to Lewis Francis, March 8, 1864, and reissued in two divisions, Nos. 1771 and 1772, September 27, 1864. Reissue No. 1772 was reissued February 28, 1865, and August 3, 1869.

The original patent of March 8, 1864, described an improved composition in the manufacture of printers' inking-rollers, the ingredients employed being "combined in about the following proportions, namely: Glue, 14 pounds; glycerine, 28 pounds; castor-oil, or any of the fixed oils, 2¼ pounds; borax, 3 ounces; ammonia, 2 ounces; sugar, 7 pounds." The glue, before being added to the heated glycerine, was to be soaked in water in which lime had been dissolved. The specification concluded as follows: "I do not wish to be understood as confining myself to the use of lime, ammonia, or borax, as any of the alkalies or alkaline earths, or alkaline compounds of any of the alkaline earths or alkalies, may be used. Neither do I intend to confine myself to the use of the ingredients employed by me in the proportions herein set forth, as, in some cases, it may be necessary to vary their proportions. * * * I claim the use or employment of the ingredients specified, when combined to form a composition for the manufacture of printers' inking-rollers."

The reissue of August 3, 1869, omits all reference to the use of the lime, the ammonia, the borax, and the oil, in making the improved composition, and specifies the following approximate proportions of the remaining ingredients, viz.: "Glue, 15 pounds; glycerine, 30 pounds; sugar, or other analogous crystallizable saccharine matter, 7 pounds." The claim is in these words: "Combining glue, glycerine, and sugar, or any other analogous saccharine matter, to form a new and useful combination of matter for various purposes."

The defendants, in their answer to the bill, admitted the use of glue, glycerine, and sugar, in varying proportions, in the manufacture of inking-rollers, but denied that they had used these ingredients in proportions or in a mode conforming to those specified in complainants' patent, averring that the compositions made and sold by them were substantially and materially different from those described and claimed in the patent, and were "in no wise a violation or infringement of any right or privilege validly secured to or vested in" the complainants. It was insisted by the complainants that this apparent denial of infringement was not direct and unequivocal; that the claim of the patent was to be construed broadly, irrespective of the proportions in which the ingredients were used, and, therefore, that the answer was, in fact, an admission of infringement. No direct proofs of infringement were offered. On the other hand, it was urged by the defendants that the patent should be interpreted by the formula stated in the specification, and not by the technical claim, and that, with this construction, the answer constituted a full and sufficient denial of the infringement charged.

Horace Binney, 3d, and George Harding, for complainants.

Charles Howson and Furman Sheppard, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The respondents are charged with the infringement of reissued letters patent No. 3576, dated August 3, 1869, and No. 2805, dated November 26, 1867, for new and useful compositions of matter. The original of the first of these reissues, No. 41887, was issued March 8, 1864, and was surrendered and reissued September 27, 1864, in two divisions, Nos. 1771 and 1772. No. 1772 was again surrendered and reissued February 28, 1865, which was also surrendered and reissued in its present form. No. 2805 is a reissue of No. 43192, dated June 21, 1864.

The respondents opposed a decree in favor of the complainants upon several grounds, involving the validity of the reissued patents and the novelty and utility of the alleged invention; but, in view of the state of the proofs, I do not consider it necessary or proper to consider them. Irrespective of these grounds the case must be decided against the complainants. Whatever may be the merits of their inventions, however defensible their title, they have failed to prove that the respondents are infringers.

The claim of 2805, as limited by a disclaimer of the patentees, is for a composition for printing purposes, combining glue, glycerine, and molasses. The bill alleges that the respondents have made, used, or sold a composition embodying these ingredients; but this, in the words of the interrogatory of the bill, the respondents deny. No proof is produced by the complainants of the truth of their averment, and this patent, therefore, must be put out of the case.

The claim of 3576 is for "combining glue, glycerine, and sugar, or any other analogous saccharine matter, to form a new and useful composition of matter for various purposes." With the infringement of this claim, the respondents are charged, and they answer "that they have for about —— years been engaged, in the city of Philadelphia, in the manufacture of composition for printers' inking-rollers, said composition containing, with other ingredients, the common and for many, the last twelve, years past, well known ingredients for such purpose, glue, glycerine, and sugar, employed in varying proportions, but in no case in proportions or in mode conforming to those specified in the said plaintiffs' said respective letters patent; and defendants further aver that the said compositions so made and sold by them were and are substantially and materially different from the compositions described and claimed in said plaintiffs' said respective letters patent." This answer is treated by the complainants as an admission of infringement, and no proof has, therefore, been taken in relation to it.

That the complainants have succeeded in producing a valuable composition, adapted to various useful purposes, is beyond dispute; but whether they are justified in treating the respondents' answer as a confession that they have made and used it, depends, necessarily, upon the construction of the patent.

Patents are to be construed liberally, so as to sustain and not destroy the right of the inventor. Hence the whole of the specification may and should be looked at, to learn from the description of the invention not only how to make it, but to ascertain what it really is. By the requirements of the statute, the description must be in full, clear, and exact terms; and it is, therefore, an authorized guide to an accurate comprehension of what the patentee meant to claim as his invention. It is not only where the specification is expressly referred to that the claim is to be construed in connection with it; but, as a general rule, the explanations contained in it are to be taken as the inventor's own interpreter of the meaning of his claim, and of the essential qualities of the invention protected by his patent. Turrill v. Railroad Co.,

1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 511; Curt. Pat. §§ 453, 454.

The claim in this case is for combining glue, glycerine, and sugar, or any other analogous saccharine matter, to form a composition for various purposes. In the body of the specification, the proportions in which the ingredients are to be combined are given, approximately, thus: "Glue, 15 pounds; glycerine, 30 pounds; sugar or other analogous crystallizable matter, 7 pounds."

But it is stated that "it is not intended to confine the patent to the use of the ingredients specified, in the proportions specified, as those proportions may, in some cases, be advantageously varied."

It is plain that the patent is not for the mode or process of making the composition. It is for a composition embodying glue, glycerine, and sugar; but is it broadly for a substance containing these ingredients without regard to the proportions in which they are combined, or is it for a substance produced by their conjunction in substantial or approximate accordance with the formulas given in the specification?

If the claim is to be construed in its broadest significance, it is difficult to see how this reissued patent can be sustained. It is the third reissue of a patent whose claim is for the use or employment of glue, glycerine, castor-oil, or any fixed oil, ammonia, borax, and sugar, when combined to form a composition for the manufacture of printers' inking-rollers. Now, if the composition claimed in the reissue is to be treated with reference exclusively to its constituent parts, it is not identical with the composition for which the original patent was granted. A compound of glue, glycerine, and sugar is not physically the same as a compound consisting of these ingredients, with a fixed oil, ammonia, and borax added to them. They can only be regarded as the same in another sense, as possessing like special and distinguishing properties and like adaptability to the uses for which they are designed. While characteristic resemblance is preserved, they may, perhaps, be considered as identical within the meaning of the patent law, although one of them may not contain some of the constituents of the other, which are not necessary to impart to it its peculiar attributes.

The patent, however, should be so construed as not to avoid it. That conclusion can be averted by interpreting it as claiming a composition of matter distinguished by new and useful qualities, which are the product of the conjunction of certain elements in prescribed relative proportions.

It is apparent that the complainants have produced a substance of great practical excellence, possessing peculiar and valuable properties; and that these constitute its patentable merit. The complainants can not successfully claim to be the first to compound glue, glycerine, and sugar; but they may claim to have discovered that these elements may be combined in such proportions as to yield a new product. Charles and Nelson Goodyear conferred inestimable benefit upon the world by the production of substances respectively known as hard and soft rubber. They were not the first to combine the constituents of these substances, but both were treated as original inventors, although their inventions were the product of a combination of the same elements, native India rubber and sulphur. But the proportions in which these elements were combined were different, and the result was a product possessing distinct properties, and applicable to different uses, and so they were each regarded as patentable substances.

The distinctiveness of the complainants' invention must in like manner be determined by its inherently new and useful attributes. It is described as uniting elasticity, firmness, "suction," freedom from the influence of atmospheric changes, susceptibility of recasting, and therefore of indefinite use; and that thereby it is distinguishable from other compositions used for like purposes. That these properties are due to an empirical combination of glue, glycerine, and sugar can not be maintained. They are the product as well of the graduated proportions as of the mechanical union of these ingredients. Glycerine must be used in excess of either of the other ingredients, or the compound will lack some of its most valuable qualities. And it may be said of the other ingredients that they must be employed in proper relative proportions to secure the characteristic merits of the product. These are obvious deductions from the testimony of the complainant, Francis.

As the proper adjustment of proportions, then, is essential to the efficiency of the invention, it is a reasonable construction of the patent to expound it as claiming substantial conformity to the specific proportions of glue, glycerine, and sugar, as well as their conjoint use, in producing the described result. Exact conformity to these proportions is not required, because they are stated as approximate, and the right is claimed to vary them. But this right is not unlimited. It can only extend to any adjustment of proportions which will result in the production of a substance possessing the peculiar properties attributed to the substance described in the patent. Substantial identity of result is the test of substantial conformity to the mode of combination prescribed in the specification.

The respondents deny that in making the compounds used by them they have conformed to the proportions or adopted the mode specified in the patent; and they aver that their compositions are substantially and materially different from that described and claimed by the complainants. In view of the construction given to the patent, this is not an admission of infringement, but a denial that either in the proportions or mode of combination observed, or the result produced, the compositions made and used by them are the same as the compositions claimed by the complainants. This denial imposed upon the complainants the burden of proving the fact of infringement; but as they have furnished no proof of it, they have failed to sustain their bill, and it must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Decreed accordingly.

NOTE [from 1 O. G. 48]. In connection with the above case there was tried the suit of Francis and Loutrel v. Mahn, upon an alleged infringement of the reissued patent No. 2,805. The invention covered by this patent and the appended disclaimer is described as consisting in "combining glue, glycerine, and molasses to form a composition for printing purposes," and certain proportions are stated as those which are "found to be advantageous, and which may be generally adopted," the claim being for "a composition, made substantially as described, for printing purposes." The denial of infringement was in substantially the same terms as in the above suit. The case turned upon the interpretation of the patent and the sufficiency of the answer, the questions arising in the same way as before. The bill was dismissed.

PACKER v. The FRANCIS ASHBY.

[3 Adm. Rec. 142.]

Superior Court, S. D. Florida. April 1, 1843.

SALVAGE—VESSEL WRECKED BY SALVORS.

[Where a vessel, while lying on a mud bank with wrecking vessels alongside and anchored near, is bored with augers and fills with water, and the guilt cannot be fixed, the court will allow only simple compensation for work and labor performed in saving the cargo and materials, except as to salvors affirmatively proven innocent.]

[This was a libel by James Packer, William Kemp, and others against the cargo and materials of the brig Francis Ashby for salvage.]

S. R. Mallory, for libellants.

G. W. McCrae, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. This brig while lying on the mud bank described in the pleadings was bored with augers, and in consequence thereof she filled with water. She was subsequently stripped and abandoned. She was bored in the night. Two wrecking vessels with their crews were lying alongside at the time, and several others with crews were anchored at a short distance, and the master, officers and passengers slept on board the brig. After several days' examination of witnesses, no satisfactory evidence is adduced to ascertain or fix the guilt of this transaction upon any particular individual or individuals. But the brig was bored by some person or persons there, and as long as the guilty person remains undetected I am not disposed to reward the libellants for their services beyond a simple compensation for the work and labor performed by them. Not to compensate them at all would be confounding the innocent with the guilty to an extent that I deem unjust. To reward them by giving a salvage increased beyond a simple compensation for work and labor would impair the principle of holding the wreckers more or less responsible, according to the circumstances, for the safety of the property upon which their labor is bestowed. Important considerations of policy, too, prevent my decreeing salvage eo nomine. These I have so often expressed that I deem it unnecessary again to repeat them.

With this principle in view I order and decree as follows, to be paid out of the cargo and materials saved: To James Packer, master of the sloop George Eldridge, for himself, owners and crew for piloting the brig as described in the pleadings, $80.00. For laboring in discharging the brig during the night, himself and crew, 11 in all, $55.00. For labor during Saturday (Sunday) and Monday in discharging the brig, himself and crew, and for discharging his vessel on Tuesday, $2.00 to each man, 11 in all, $88.00. To the owners of the sloop George Eldridge for her services in bringing the cargo to this port, $50.00. To William Kemp, master of the schooner Rome, for himself and crew, 15 in all, for labor in discharging the brig and landing the cargo, 4 days at $2, each, $120.00. To the owners of the schooner Rome for her use, $50. To Saffrey, master of the schooner Sally Ann, for himself and crew, 6 in all, $48.00. To the owners of the Sally Ann for her use, $25.00. To Adams, master of the sloop Lavinia, for himself and crew, 4 in all, 4 days each, at $2.00, is $32.00. To the owners of the sloop Lavinia for her use, $25.00.

I regret that I cannot, consistently with the view I have taken of this case, compensate Captain Adams, of the Lavinia, more liberally, or by giving him a sum that would be deemed a fair salvage. He is a regular wrecker, and the salvages decreed him constitute his means of living. He is entirely exculpated by the testimony from any participation in the boring of the brig. The costs and expenses of the suit must be paid out of the cargo and materials saved.

[An appeal was taken to the court of appeals for the territory of Florida, where the following order was made, February 24, 1844:]

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the decree made in this cause in the court below be in all things affirmed, except as to Captain Adams, master of the sloop Lavinia, and, as to him, that there be allowed and paid to him, for himself, owners and crew, as salvage for his services rendered said cargo and materials, twenty-five per cent. upon the value of the cargo saved by him in said sloop, to be ascertained by the court below, including that already paid him, and that the costs of this appeal be paid out of the cargo and materials aforesaid, to be taxed and allowed in that court, and let the cause be remanded to the court below to be proceeded with in conformity to his decree.

FRANCIS v. SLACK.

[4 Cliff. 186; 16 Int. Rev. Rec. 134.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1872.

LIMITATIONS—ACTIONS AGAINST COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Judgment for defendant was ordered in this case upon the ground that the claim of the plaintiff was barred by the act of July, 1862, as construed by the supreme court.

The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of fact, of which the following is the substance:

This is an action of contract to recover the amount of taxes assessed, under the internal revenue laws of the United States, upon the plaintiff's share in the undivided profits of two corporations, in each of which he was a stockholder, made during the years 1862 and 1863; and for the purpose of this trial it is agreed: That the defendant [Charles W. Slack] was and is the United States collector of internal revenue for the Third congressional district in the commonwealth of Massachusetts; and that the plaintiff [Nathaniel Francis] was a resident of that district. That the plaintiff, from the first day of January, 1862, till the commencement of this action, owned a certain number of shares in the capital stock of two corporations,—the Saxonville Mills and the Roxbury Carpet Company,—organized under the laws of the said commonwealth, and doing business therein. That, in each of the years from 1862 to 1869 inclusive, each of these corporations made certain profits from its business, which were not distributed in such year among its stockholders, but remained undivided in its treasury. That the plaintiff, through ignorance of the law, did not include his share of the said undivided profits in making the returns of his income for those years. That in March, 1870, an assistant assessor for the said district, by examining the returns of the said corporations to the said commonwealth, discovered that each had made profits which were not divided as aforesaid, and reported the facts to the assessor of the district, who, on the 16th of that month, sent for the plaintiff, and told him that he should have returned his share in such profits as income in each year from 1862 to 1869 inclusive. That the plaintiff replied, that he desired to pay all that was justly due to the government; and that, if he ever owed the money, he owed it still, and wished to pay it. The assistant assessor then suggested that the plaintiff might make an amended return of income for each of said years, returning his share for such year in the said undivided profits; and offered to prepare them. To this the plaintiff assented, and, when they were prepared, signed them. Before he did so, the assessor advised him to consult counsel, but he replied, that he had confidence in the assessor, and was satisfied that he would not make any demand on him which the law did not justify. That the assessor assessed upon his share in such undivided profits, realized by the said corporations during the year 1862, taxes amounting to the sum of $2,192.47; and, on his share in such profits realized during the year 1863, taxes amounting to the sum of $1,796.20. That the defendant thereafter sent to the plaintiff notices in a printed form, a copy of which is hereto annexed, and marked "A;" upon and after the receipt of which, to wit, on the 30th of March, the plaintiff paid the said taxes to the defendant, who on the same day paid them over to the United States treasury. That on or before June 1, 1870, the plaintiff filed a claim, in the manner prescribed by law, for the refunding of said taxes, a copy of which is hereto annexed, and marked "B," which was rejected by the commissioner of internal revenue on the 13th of April, 1871. That this action was commenced Aug. 25, 1871.

If, upon this statement of facts, the plaintiff ought to recover, judgment is to be entered for him for the amount to which the court shall find that he is entitled, with interest and costs; otherwise, for the defendant.

[7 Ben. 11.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. July, 1873.

TUG-BOAT AND TOW—PROPER HAWSERS.

1. A tug-boat, the K., was towing six canal-boats, three abreast, by two hawsers from the head tier, on Long Island Sound. The port hawser, not being as long as the starboard hawser, had been lengthened by a piece of stern line. The wind and sea rising, another tug-boat, the G., belonging to the same owners, took hold ahead of the first. Soon after the port hawser parted, which threw the tow out of shape, and the canal-boats in the second tier pounded together so as to receive serious injury. The G. took hold of them, and towed them for a while till the two tiers separated, when the G. took the head tier alone and the K. the hind tier, two boats in which soon after sank. The owner of one of the canal-boats filed a libel against the tug-boat to recover for the loss of the boat: Held, that the port hawser was insufficient for the service required of it.

2. The sinking of the boat was due to the parting of that hawser, and the tug-boat was liable for the damages.

This was a libel filed by Cary Rigney, the owner of the canal-boat Crosby, to recover for the sinking of the boat while in tow of the Francis King. The canal-boat was taken in tow by the King, to be towed to New Haven. Eight other boats were in the tow, ranged in three tiers, three abreast, and towed by two hawsers to the outside boats in the head tier. At Bridgeport the three boats in the stern tier were left, and the tug proceeded with the other six. The wind and sea rose before the tow reached New Haven, and the tug Gamecock, belonging to the same owners as the King, was signalled and took a hawser ahead of the King to help with the tow. After towing in this way the port hawser from the King to the head tier parted. It had been lengthened out by the use of a piece of stern line, of smaller size than the towing hawser, and it was this smaller line that parted. On the parting of this line the tow was thrown out of shape, and the boats pounded against each other, the libellant's boat and another boat receiving severe injuries, from which they began to leak. The Gamecock cast off her line, and coming back put out a separate hawser to the head tier of boats, and towed in this way for a time till the two tiers separated, when she took the head tier alone, and the King, coming back, got hold of two of the boats in the hind tier, one of them having broken loose from the other two, and towed them till the libellant's boat sank. There was evidence tending to show that, when the libellant was taken off from his boat, as he was by a small boat before the King took hold of her the last time, he left the cabin windows unfastened, and that the sinking of the boat was due to the waves coming in at the windows.

F. A. Wilcox, for libellant.

W. R. Beebe, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I have examined the mass of testimony with which this case has been loaded, and from out of its contradictions and bold statements think that the following conclusions of fact can be properly drawn. And first I conceive that the evidence fails to prove that the sinking of the libellant's boat was caused by his own carelessness, in leaving his cabin windows open, so that the waves coming in through the windows caused her to sink. I have not overlooked the positive evidence of claimant's witness Marsh upon this point; but neither the matter nor the manner of his testimony are, to my mind, convincing. On the contrary, I conclude that the immediate cause of the boat's sinking was injuries sustained by her from pounding against the other boats in the tow, when the tow was thrown out of shape, and all placed in peril in the trough of the sea, by reason of the breaking of the port hawser. The sea was heavy and the motion of the boats in the trough of the sea abundant to account for the sinking of the two boats which were lost, of which the libellant's boat was one. I cannot doubt, upon the evidence, that, if the hawser had not parted, all the boats would have reached New Haven in safety, and that the parting of the hawser was the cause of the disaster. This breaking of her hawser casts upon the tug the responsibility of the loss which resulted therefrom. The transportation of tows of loaded canal-boats in the waters of the Long Island Sound involves much danger and corresponding responsibility. Tow-boats engaged in that business must be competent in power and equipped with hawsers of sufficient strength to hold their tows in any weather ordinarily to be anticipated in that navigation. The canal-boats are frail, and their safety in any sea-way is dependent upon the union of many boats in one compact mass, which, when kept moving together, properly lashed, experience has shown to be able to withstand all weather necessarily experienced in navigating the Sound. This union, which is the source of their strength, is maintained by the power of the tug applied by means of the hawsers, and, in any case of disasters arising from a failure of the hawser, it is incumbent upon the tug to show plainly that its failure arose from no defect in quality or size. In this case the hawser which parted was an old hawser of short length, which was eked out by bending on to it part of a 4-inch stern line. In order to hasten the tow when near New Haven, to the power of the Francis King was added the power of the Gamecock. To that strain the smaller line proved unequal, and it parted, whereby the tow was at once thrown out of shape in a chopping sea. This parting of the port hawser was the real cause of the loss of the libellant's boat, and for its failure the Francis King is responsible.

It has been strongly argued that the tow remained in shape and intact, until after the King had cast off the tow and the Gamecock had taken hold, and that the subsequent sinking of the Crosby cannot, therefore, be charged upon the Francis King. In point of fact, when the Crosby sank, she was in tow of the Francis King, for the King again took hold of her after she had broken away from the tow. But the truth of the case is that injury sustained by the boat, while the boats were disarranged and pounding in the trough of the sea, was the cause of her sinking, and that arose from the breaking of the Francis King's hawser. After an examination of all the evidence, and in spite of the inaccuracy of some of the libellant's statements of fact, and of the extraordinary circumstances under which the evidence of the witness Pierce was given in his favor, I am forced to the conclusion that it was not through any fault of the libellant, nor by reason of any unforeseen and inevitable peril of the seas, that his boat was sunk, but because the tug-boat undertook to conduct the tow with a hawser insufficient for the purpose to which it was applied.

The decree must, therefore, be for the libellant, with a reference to compute the amount of his loss.

District Court, E. D. New York. July, 1874.

TUGBOAT AND TOW—DAMAGES—CARRIER—MASTER—INJURY TO CARGO.

1. The master of a vessel may recover damages for injuries inflicted upon cargo on board of his vessel as a common carrier.

2. A tug was held liable for the sinking of a canal-boat loaded with coal, which she was towing. On a reference to ascertain the damages, it appeared that part of the cargo was raised. There was evidence that the consignees of the cargo had released the owners of the tug, but not the libellant, who was master of the canal-boat, from any claim for damages arising out of the sinking of the cargo. Held, that the libellant must have a decree for the cost of raising the cargo, as well as his other damages, but that the respondents might have that item stricken from the decree on filing satisfactory proof that the libellant also had been released from such claim.

This was a libel by the master and owner of a canal-boat to recover damages for the sinking his boat while in tow of the Francis King. The court held the tug responsible, and ordered a reference to ascertain the damages. [See Case No. 5,042.] The proofs were completed before the commissioner, but before he made his report he died. Thereupon, the court ordered the question of damages to be heard before the court on the evidence taken before the commissioner. It appeared on the evidence that the boat was a total loss; that part of the cargo was raised for certain salvage, and that the consignees of the cargo had released the tugboat and her owners from all claim for damages by the injury to the cargo.

Benedict, Taft & Benedict, for libellant.

Platt, Gerard & Buckley, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The proofs show the amount of damages caused by the accident in the pleadings mentioned to be as follows: The value of the boat, as a total loss, $2,000; the value of personal effects lost, $200; the amount of freight, $205, and the costs of raising the cargo, $640. As to this latter item, although no doubt exists as to the general rule that the master of a vessel, entrusted with cargo for transportation, may recover for damages received by that cargo while in his custody, in the present case the evidence indicates that the consignees of the cargo may have relinquished all claims for such damages.

As to this item, therefore, I shall permit the claimants to insert a provision in the decree that the item shall be stricken from the decree when they file satisfactory proof that the libellant is released from liability by reason of injury to said cargo. Let a decree be entered in accordance with this opinion.

[7 Ben. 88.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1874.[2]

CHARTER—AGENT—UNSEAWORTHY BOILER — LOSS OF CARGO—NEW TRIAL.

1. The owners of a steamship at New York chartered her to D. & P. of Philadelphia, "for the term of six months, to run between Philadelphia or New York and Galveston, &c., &c." The charter party contained the following covenants on the part of the owners: (1) That "the said vessel, in and during the said voyage, shall be kept tight, staunch, well-fitted, tackled and provided with every requisite for such a voyage;" (2) that "the whole of the vessel (with the exception of the necessary room for the sails, cables) shall be at the sole use and disposal of the charterers during the voyage aforesaid;" (3) that the owners "will take and receive on board the said vessel, during the aforesaid voyage, all such lawful goods and merchandise as the charterers may think proper to ship." The charter also contained the following covenants on the part of the charterers; (1) "To man, coal and victual steamer, and pay all expenses of every nature (including port charges, &c.) connected with the running of the steamer, except insurance on vessel and repairs;" (2) to pay for the charter of the vessel $:5 a day, "vessel to be delivered to the owners at the expiration of this charter, in the same order and condition as she is now in, less the ordinary wear, and charterers to take and deliver the steamer at New York." There were also in the charter the following provisions: "Owners to nominate, and charterers to appoint, chief engineer, to be paid by charterers at rate of $125 per month. Charterers to appoint captain, subject to the approval of the owners." In accordance with this charter, a captain and chief engineer were appointed, and the vessel was taken to Philadelphia, where the charterers fitted her out with a refrigerating apparatus, and put on board of her about 260 tons of ice and sent her to Galveston, to bring a cargo of fresh beef in the refrigerator to Philadelphia. On the voyage out, some of the tubes of the boiler gave out, and some repairs were put on the boiler at Galveston. A cargo of fresh beef was taken on board, and the vessel started on her return voyage on the 31st of October, 1872, at 11 a. m. At 7 p. m. of that day, she stopped because 20 out of the 144 tubes of her boiler were leaking. She had to put back to Galveston to obtain a proper tool with which to make repairs, and she lay there till November 7th, thus losing full 7 days of time. She then sailed again, and put into Key West for coal, losing 24 hours thereby. She left Key West on November 15th, at 2.30 p. m., and arrived at Philadelphia on November 22d, at noon, with 26 tubes of her boiler plugged up. At Key West 20 tons of ice were purchased and put on board. Between Key West and Philadelphia, the beef was thrown overboard, as spoiled. The charterers filed a libel against the steamer, to recover for the loss of the cargo, charging that the beef was spoiled in consequence of the delay caused by the unseaworthiness of the boiler: Held, that, under the charter, the owners were bound to keep the boiler in proper condition, through the captain and chief engineer as their agents, and remained in possession of the vessel for that purpose, through those officers as their agents.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The boiler and its tubes were not kept in proper condition, and from that cause the voyage was delayed and prolonged.

3. The burden of proof was upon the charterers, to establish that the beef was spoiled and lost in consequence of this delay.

4. On the evidence, they had failed to establish this, the inference from the evidence being that the cargo, if good at Key West, was spoiled afterwards either from the want of ice, more of which could have been purchased at Key West, or from the inability of the refrigerating apparatus to prevent the spoiling.

5. A new trial is not ordered in an admiralty suit, on the mere ground of oversight in not putting in evidence which might have been put in.

Benedict, Taft & Benedict, for libellants.

C. Donohue and T. B. Stillman, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 13th of September, 1872, the libellants, Duncan & Poey, entered into a written charter party with Woodhouse & Rudd, owners of the steamer Francis Wright, then at New York, whereby Woodhouse & Rudd charter the steamer to the libellants "for the term of six months, to run between Philadelphia or New York and Galveston, or any intermediate safe port in the United States, or any foreign port not prohibited by the insurance," with the agreement that the libellants are to have the privilege of cancelling the charter at the expiration of three months, on giving Woodhouse & Rudd fifteen days' notice and the payment of $1,500 bonus. The instrument then sets forth the following agreements by Woodhouse & Rudd: (1) That "the said vessel, in and during the said voyage, shall be kept tight, staunch, well-fitted, tackled, and provided with every requisite for such a voyage;" (2) that "the whole of the said vessel (with the exception of the necessary room for the sails, cables) shall be at the sole use and disposal of" the libellants "during the voyage aforesaid;" (3) that Woodhouse & Rudd will "take and receive on board the said vessel, during the aforesaid voyage, all such lawful goods and merchandise as" the libellants "may think proper to ship." The instrument then sets forth the following agreements by the libellants: (1) "To man, coal, and victual steamer, and pay all expenses of every nature (including port charges, etc.) connected with running of the steamer, except insurance on vessel and repairs;" (2) to pay to Woodhouse & Rudd, for the charter of the vessel, "eighty-five dollars per day. United States currency, due daily, but payable at the expiration of each and every month, in New York—vessel to be returned to the owners, at the expiration of this charter, in the same order and condition as she is now in, less the ordinary wear, and charterers to take and deliver the steamer at New York." Then follow these provisions: "Owners to nominate, and charterers to appoint, chief engineer, to be paid by charterers at rate of one hundred and twenty-five dollars per month. Charterers to appoint captain, subject to the approval of the owners. It is also agreed that this charter shall commence at New York on the 18th of September, 1872. If, from any derangement of machinery, steamer is delayed, the time lost is not to be paid for by charterers, and in case of such derangement (if any), owners to have privilege of cancelling charter. In case of any wreckage, towage or salvage accruing to the vessel whilst under this charter, one-half of said earning to be paid to the owners of the steamer."

In accordance with the terms of the charter party, John A. Sherman was appointed chief engineer of the vessel, and Henry Denison was appointed her captain. She was taken to Philadelphia, and there the libellants fitted her with a refrigerating apparatus, to bring a cargo of fresh beef from Galveston, Texas, to Philadelphia. They put on board of her at Philadelphia a general cargo of merchandise, and proper fuel, and about 260 tons of ice, the latter to be used in connection with the refrigerating apparatus, to preserve the fresh beef on the homeward voyage. She left Philadelphia for Galveston on the 3d of October, 1872, and arrived at Galveston on the 17th of the same month.

The libel alleges, that, during the voyage from Philadelphia to Galveston, the vessel gave evidence of unseaworthiness, by having a number of her boiler tubes blown out, and by great and unusual leaking in her boiler tubes, which rendered it difficult to make steam on the vessel, by reason of the water from the blown out and leaking tubes escaping into the furnaces, and affecting and diminishing the fires therein, by reason whereof the steamer was unable to attain her usual and proper speed, and was 14 days in making the passage from Philadelphia to Galveston, instead of ten days, which is the full, usual and ordinary time for a steamer of that capacity to make such voyage; that, when the vessel arrived at Galveston, Woodhouse & Rudd, through their agent and representative, the chief engineer of the vessel, were requested to make the proper and necessary repairs to the boiler and its tubes, in order that there might be no further delays after the cargo of fresh beef was laden on board, and that the vessel might make the return passage in 10 days; that the chief engineer promised that all necessary and proper repairs to the boiler and its tubes should be made, but they were not made, by reason whereof the steamer, having on board about seventy tons of fresh beef, was, on the 31st of October, 1872, being then four hours at sea out of Galveston, on her voyage to Philadelphia, compelled to put back to Galveston for repairs, by reason of the tubes of the boiler again blowing out and leaking badly, and was detained at Galveston seven days thereafter in repairing some of the tubes; that the steamer again left Galveston, for Philadelphia, on the 7th of November, 1872, and was 15 days making the voyage, owing to the unseaworthy condition of the steamer, some of the tubes blowing out and others of them leaking so badly that the boiler could with difficulty make steam, and thereby the speed of the vessel was greatly reduced below what her ordinary speed would have been if her boiler tubes had been kept in a proper and seaworthy condition; that, by reason of the detention of the steamer at Galveston, while making repairs, and by reason of the detention of the steamer in making her passage from Galveston to Philadelphia, owing to the unseaworthy condition of the boiler tubes, and by reason of the hot water which escaped from the defective boiler tubes, and was negligently allowed to run into the bilge of the steamer and melt the ice in the refrigerator, where the fresh beef was stowed, the beef became damaged, spoiled and entirely lost to the libellants; that Woodhouse & Rudd did not perform their covenant, that the vessel, in and during said voyage, should be kept by them tight, staunch, well-fitted, tackled and provided with every requisite for such a voyage; that the value of the fresh beef at Philadelphia was $23,000; that, by reason of the failure of Woodhouse & Rudd and the vessel to comply with said covenant, the fresh beef has been wholly lost to the libellants; and that, at the time of the making of the charter party, Woodhouse & Rudd knew that the steamer was chartered by the libellants for the purpose of carrying fresh beef from Galveston to Philadelphia, and also knew that the steamer was in an unseaworthy condition as regards her boiler and its tubes. The libel claims $30,000 damages against the vessel and her owners.

The answer of Woodhouse & Rudd, as claimants, sets up that the libellants had the entire charge and possession of the vessel, and denies that the chief engineer was the agent or representative of the claimants, and avers that the repairs which the claimants were bound to make were made, and that the steamer was, so far as the claimants were bound to do so, kept as called for by the charter party, and denies all the allegations of the libel on which the libellants claim a recovery.

It may not be difficult to hold, that, under the charter party, the claimants were bound to keep the boiler and its tubes in proper condition during the voyage, through the master and the chief engineer, as their agents; that the claimants remained in possession of the vessel for such purpose, through those officers, as their agents for such purpose; that the boiler and its tubes were not kept in proper condition; and that, from that cause, the voyage was delayed and prolonged.

By the charter party, the claimants agree to keep the vessel, while on a voyage named in the charter party, well-fitted and provided with every requisite for such a voyage; and it is agreed that the libellants shall not pay any expenses of repairs. To enable the claimants to discharge such duty, it is provided that they shall have the nomination of the person who is to be chief engineer, and that no appointment of a captain shall be made otherwise than subject to their approval. The chief engineer was nominated by them, and the captain was appointed with their approval. The claimants assumed absolutely the obligation referred to. They either deprived themselves voluntarily of all means of fulfilling it, by not having any agent on board to attend to its fulfillment, or the officers referred to must be regarded as being in the interest of the claimants, through their mode of appointment, for the purpose of seeing to the fulfillment of such obligations.

The claimants contend that the libellants were in the exclusive possession of the vessel. But the provisions that the vessel shall be at the sole use and disposal of the libellants, and that the libellants shall man, coal, and victual her, and pay her running expenses (except insurance and repairs), and return her at the expiration of the charter in proper condition, less ordinary wear, and take and deliver her at New-York, and pay one-half of her salvage earnings to the claimants, are not at all inconsistent with a fulfillment by the claimants of the agreed duty of keeping the vessel well fitted and provided with every requisite for the voyage, or with such possession by the claimants, through the captain and chief engineer, appointed in the manner prescribed, as would enable the claimants, through those officers to represent them in that regard, to see that the agreement was performed.

That the boiler and its tubes were not kept in proper condition during the voyage is established by the evidence. The boiler was not seaworthy. Whatever its apparent condition was when the vessel left Galveston the first time, with her cargo of beef on board, subsequent events and the result show that the boiler was unseaworthy. There was no cause to produce the blowing out and leaking of the tubes, but the inherent defects of the boiler. Having left Galveston on the 31st of October, at eleven o'clock a. m., the vessel was stopped at seven p. m., because 26 out of the 144 tubes in her boiler were leaking. She lay until ten a. m. on the 1st of November, making repairs, and then returned to Galveston, and remained there making further repairs till seven a. m. on the 7th of November, thus losing full seven days of time. The return to Galveston was necessary in order to obtain a proper tool with which to make the repairs. On the voyage from Philadelphia to Galveston the vessel was stopped at sea, on the 8th of October, for five and a half hours, to make repairs on the boiler and engine, and on the 12th for two and a half hours, to plug leaking tubes, and on the 17th for two hours, for repairs to the boiler. This indicated a condition of things which required that the boiler should be thoroughly repaired before starting on the return voyage. But the repairs made were not thorough, as shown by the result. The return to Galveston was the result of the co-operating judgment of the captain and the chief engineer, that such return was necessary. On the return voyage the vessel put into Key West, arriving there at three p. m. on the 14th of November. During the passage to Key West the boiler leaked, though there was no stoppage. The vessel left Key West on the 15th, at 2.30 p. m. On the 16th and 17th the boiler leaked. On the 18th the vessel stopped for seven and three-quarter hours, and stopped up three tubes, and on the 21st she stopped for four and a half hours, and stopped up one tube and repaired three others. She arrived at Delaware City, three and a half hours below Philadelphia, at noon on November 22d, with twenty-six of her tubes plugged up.

The quarters of beef were on slatted racks in a refrigerating room in the hold of the vessel. In such room was a box, standing on the floor, about four feet square and eight or nine feet high. This box was replenished with ice from time to time. By machinery outside of the room, the air of the room was driven through the box, and into contact with the ice, and out again into the room, constantly circulating. There was no opening into the room except by a hole in the top, and there was an opening into the box from the outside of the room, to replenish the box with ice, from the general depository of ice elsewhere.

The difficult question in the case is, as to whether it is satisfactorily shown that the beef was spoiled and lost through the causes set forth in the libel. The burden of proof is on the libellants, to show this. The averment of the libel is, that, by reason of the detention of the steamer at Galveston, while making repairs, and by reason of the detention of the steamer in making her passage from Galveston to Philadelphia, owing to the unseaworthy condition of the boiler tubes, and by reason of the hot water which escaped from the defective boiler tubes and was negligently allowed to run into the bilge of the steamer and melt the ice in the refrigerator where the fresh beef was stowed, the beef became damaged, spoiled and entirely lost to the libellants. It is not enough to show the unseaworthy condition of the boiler tubes, and that the vessel was detained at Galveston to repair them, and was detained on her passage by reason of them and to repair them, and that hot water escaped and ran into the bilge, and some ice was melted from such cause. It must be shown that, but for such things, the beef would have been and was unspoiled, and merchantable as fresh beef.

Zane, the person who came in the vessel, from Galveston, in charge of the beef, testifies, that, when the vessel left Galveston the first time, the temperature of the room was 39° Fahrenheit; that, while they were stopped at sea, outside of Galveston, it rose to 46°; that, when they returned to Galveston, it was 44°; that the day before they arrived at Key West it was about 50°; that they had about 100 tons of ice when they left Galveston the first time, and about 95 tons when they left there the second time; that they had about fifteen tons left when they reached Key West; that they procured twenty tons more at Key West; that the first day out from Key West (November 16th), the temperature of the refrigerating room was about as usual, say 40°; that the next day it became 60°, and afterwards increased to 68°, when they were about at Cape Hatteras; that then the beef spoiled, and part of it was thrown overboard; and that, at that time, the ice was not quite all used up.

The libellants contend that the beef remained unspoiled until after the vessel had left Key West for Philadelphia, and that the cargo would have been landed in good merchantable order at Philadelphia before the time it, in fact, spoiled, but for the detentions specified in the libel, because, but for such detentions, it would have been at Philadelphia, unspoiled, at a time when it was at sea, unspoiled.

No complaint is made as to any loss of time by putting in at Key West. From the time the vessel left Galveston the second time (November 7th, at 7 a. m.), till she substantially reached Philadelphia (November 22d, at 3½ p. m.), was 15 days and 8½ hours. Leaving Galveston October 31st, at 11 a. m., a trip of 15 days and 8½ hours would have brought her to Philadelphia November 15th, at 7½ p. m., at which time she was at sea, having left Key West 5 hours before.

Was the beef unspoiled and merchantable at the time the vessel left Key West? Captain Denison, on his direct examination, testifies, that he saw the cook cutting some of the beef and cooking it, and the men eating it, on the Monday after leaving Key West (which Monday was November 18th); that it was on the cabin table, and eaten by some, after leaving Key West; and that it cut as if it was good. On his cross-examination, this is his evidence: "Q. Did not you, yourself, at that time, at Key West, after the attempt was made to get the beef, say it was stinking? A. I do not remember that I did. Q. Will you swear you did not? A. I will not. Q. Will you swear it was not stinking? A. I will not swear. Q. Was it not, in fact, beginning to taint? A. That is a hard question for me to answer, because I did not know the condition of it then. Q. You have been swearing to something about its condition; I ask whether it was not beginning to taint? A. I had my suspicions about it. Q. Were not you suspicious that it was beginning to taint? A. I was told it was not. Q. Did you not know that that beef was beginning to taint at that time? A. I would not swear it was good, nor would I swear it was bad. Q. You were one of the persons interested in the beef? A. I was very anxious to get it here safe. Q. Did you not state, in Key West, at that time, that it was beginning to taint, or was tainted? A. I might have said so, but I do not remember. Q. Did you not say to Mr. Sherman, your chief engineer, that the beef stank, at Key West? A. I may have said so, but I do not remember that I did; I will not swear I did not, because I said a great deal about the beef being bad. Q. Did you not say, at Key West, that it was 'all up'? A. Not that I remember. Q. You will not swear you did not? A. I will not swear I did not. Q. Did you not say, in Key West, that you were very much worried about buying the ice, as you thought it was so much money thrown away? A. I said, in Key West, that I would not buy the ice, if the party in charge did not give me a written order to buy it. Q. Did you not say it was so much money thrown away? A. I may have said I feared it; ice was so very high there, that I hated to buy it, and I thought we had enough, when we left Galveston, to see us home."

Zane, on his direct examination, says, that the beef was in good order when they arrived at Key West; that he is sure it was good the Tuesday morning after leaving Key West (which Tuesday was November 19th); that he knows it was good then because he ate of it and saw others eat of it; that he examined it himself; and that he detected indications of its spoiling the next day. On cross-examination, he says that he gave some of the beef to one of the government vessels at Key West, and it was good.

The evidence shows that this was an experimental voyage, to see whether the refrigerating apparatus and machinery would work successfully. There were 15 tons of ice left on arriving at Key West. The consumption of ice from Galveston to Key West, in 7 days and 8 hours, had been 80 tons. The running time of the vessel from Key West to Philadelphia, was 6 days and 12¾ hours, after deducting the stoppages, yet the vessel did not have over 35 tons of ice (including the 20 purchased at Key West), for use during that time. The same rate of use as from Galveston to Key West, would have required over 71 tons for the voyage from Key West to Philadelphia, instead of 35 tons. If the beef was good at Key West, these facts would tend to show that its subsequent spoiling was due to a want of sufficient ice, or, if there was ice enough, to the inability of the apparatus to preserve the beef. Notwithstanding the delay, the libellants were bound to use all accessible means to preserve the beef. If ice was needed and could be procured, it should have been procured at Key West, and such additional expense, and not the loss of the beef, have been thrown on the claimants. It does not appear that more ice could not have been obtained at Key West. The impression produced by the evidence is that, as the ice was giving out, the beef began to spoil, and that it spoiled because the ice gave out. The first day out from Key West, the temperature of the refrigerating room was about 40°, the usual, and, as I understand from the testimony, the proper temperature. The fact that so small a supply of ice was procured at Key West, and that there was such reluctance on the part of the captain to procure what he did, looks in the direction, very strongly, of a spoiled condition in the beef, at Key West, or such a condition as made it substantially unmerchantable when it reached Key West. This is confirmed by the halting testimony of the captain. If true, then the delay before the vessel reached Key West was not the reason why the beef did not reach Philadelphia in merchantable condition, because, the delay before reaching Key West was only seven days, and the running time from Key West to Philadelphia added to the time the vessel remained at Key West was 7 days and 12¼ hours. If the beef was good at Key West, and spoiled afterwards for want of ice, the claimants are not shown to be responsible for the loss. If there was plenty of ice after leaving Key West, and yet the beef spoiled, it would indicate inability in the apparatus to prevent the spoiling, and for this it is not shown that the claimants are liable.

As to any melting of ice by hot water in the bilge, any effect therefrom to spoil the beef is covered by the views before stated. But I am not satisfied, from the evidence, that any hot water in the bilge, from the leaking tubes, had any effect to raise the temperature of the refrigerating room, or to melt any ice.

On a full consideration of the whole case, I can come to no other conclusion than that the libellants have not made out the cause of action set forth in the libel, and that it must be dismissed, with costs.

After the rendering of the above decision, the libellants applied for a new hearing, on further evidence, alleging that they had evidence to show that the beef was not spoiled for lack of ice, or for any deficiency in the apparatus, which they could have offered, if they had supposed the case was to turn on that question.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I have announced a decision, in this case, that the libel must be dismissed, with costs. No decree has been entered. The libellants apply for a rehearing of the case on further testimony. They state that they desire to present evidence on a point on which they say the decision turned, and that such point was not fully inquired into on the trial, and that material evidence was omitted. It is not claimed that there is any newly discovered evidence, but it is said that evidence which could have been given was not given. The case is presented as merely one of oversight, and I do not think that a retrial in such a case, in an admiralty suit, ought to be allowed. The Vrouw Hermina, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 163, 170; The Fortitudo, 2 Dod. 58, 70. An appeal will give a retrial in the circuit court, and on that the omitted evidence can be adduced. The claimants have been subjected to one trial in this court, and I think they have a right, on the facts presented, to require that the omitted evidence shall be presented, if at all, only on an appeal. The application is refused.

[NOTE. On libellants' appeal to the circuit court, the decree of the district court dismissing the libel was affirmed. (Case not reported.) An appeal was taken from this decision to the supreme court, and the decree there affirmed, Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivering the opinion. It is held that while the claimants knew that the charterers intended to use the vessel in connection with their contemplated business, they did not insist upon any higher degree of seaworthiness than that required for any other kind of transportation. They did not apply for a vessel suitable for carrying fresh beef, but merely for one suitable for navigation generally between designated ports and places. All the claimants covenanted for was that she was provided with every requisite for safe navigation, and the libellants took all the risks of the undertaking except such as arose from a general unseaworthiness of the vessel when she was delivered into their possession. Delays growing out of derangement in the machinery were to be deducted from the charter time, and the pay for the use of the vessel correspondingly reduced, but beyond that the owners were not to be bound if the vessel were actually seaworthy. Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1875.[2]

BANKRUPTCY—REARGUMENT—DECISION OF CIRCUIT JUSTICE.

The bankrupts [Charles J. and Charles F. Francke] brought this decision before the circuit court, for review, by petition of review. It was argued before Judge WOODRUFF, by the counsel for the bankrupts, there being no opposing party. Judge WOODRUFF arrived at the conclusion that the decision of the district court [Case No. 5,046] was erroneous, but he regarded the question as of such interest and importance, that, without announcing any decision on the merits, he ordered a re-argument of the question, with a view to having it heard before Mr. Justice HUNT and himself. If, on such hearing, Mr. Justice HUNT had concurred in the view of the district court, the decree of the circuit court would, under section 650 of the Revised Statutes, have been required to be in conformity with the opinion of Mr. Justice HUNT (as the presiding judge), though not concurred in by Judge WOODRUFF; and, in such event, it was supposed that the bankrupts would have been enabled, under sections 652 and 693 of the Revised Statutes, to carry the question to the supreme court of the United States for decision, and would have done so. In the event of a decision by the circuit court in favor of the bankrupts, the case could have been carried no further as there was no opposing party. The petition of review was accordingly reargued before HUNT, Circuit Justice, and WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

HUNT, Circuit Justice, delivered no opinion, but filed on the 25th of June, 1875, a decision in these words: The petition of the above named bankrupts, praying for a review of the order of the district court of the southern district of New York, refusing their prayer for a certificate of discharge from their debts, is granted, and it is ordered that a certificate of discharge be issued to said bankrupts in accordance with the provisions of the bankrupt act.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, on the 7th of July, 1875, filed a decision in these words: The question in this case is of such interest and importance, that a re-argument was ordered, in the expectation, that, on a hearing before two judges, the proceedings might assume such a form that it could go to the supreme court for examination and final decision. But the conclusion of Mr. Justice HUNT, that the decision of the district court should be reversed, disposes of the matter in this court. The decree must conform to the direction filed by Mr. Justice HUNT.

A decree directing the granting of a certificate of discharge to the bankrupts was made by the circuit court, and, on the return of such order to the district court, that court granted such certificate of discharge.

DISCHARGE — EFFECT OF AMENDMENT TO THE BANKRUPT ACT, PASSED JUNE 22, 1874, ON PREVIOUS CASES.

On June 28, 1872, F. & F. were adjudged bankrupts, on a petition filed against them. A warrant was issued, and an assignee was appointed. On July 23, 1874, they filed a petition for their discharge. Creditors had proved their debts, but no one opposed their discharge. The assignee had assets of the estate, but it did not appear that the assets of the bankrupts were equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against the estate, on which the bankrupts were liable as principal debtors, nor was the assent of a majority in number and value of the creditors produced. The register certified that the debtors had conformed to their duty under the act. Held, that the ninth section of the amendment of the bankruptcy act, passed June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 178], did not apply to cases of involuntary bankruptcy commenced before its passage, and that, in order to obtain a discharge, the bankrupts must comply with the requirements of the first section of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 227).

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Charles J. and Charles F. Francke.]

Joseph Gutman, Jr., for bankrupts.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The bankrupts were adjudged such, as copartners, by this court, on the 28th of June, 1872, on a petition filed against them. They appeared and filed a written consent to an adjudication. A warrant was issued, and the first meeting of creditors was held on the 2d of August, 1872. On that day thirty creditors proved their debts. An assignee was elected by the votes of twenty-seven of these. On the 19th of September, 1872, the bankrupts filed their sworn schedules of debts and assets. On the 23d of July, 1874, and not before they filed a petition for discharge. By the 24th of July, 1874, forty-four creditors had proved their debts. The hearing on the petition for discharge was fixed for the 18th of August, 1874. No creditor appeared to oppose a discharge. The assignee has received moneys belonging to the estate to the amount of $9,996.22. It is not shown that the assets of the bankrupts are equal to fifty per centum of the claims proved against their estate, upon which they are liable as principal debtors; nor is it shown that the assent, in writing, of a majority in number and value of their creditors, to whom they have become liable as principal debtors, and who have proved their claims, was filed at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge. According to the said schedules, all of the debts were contracted after the 31st of December, 1868. Notwithstanding these facts, the register certifies that the bankrupts have "conformed to their duty, under the act of congress entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 517], and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and have conformed to all the requirements of the said act, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto."

[2] [Reversed in Case No. 5,045.]

The first section of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 227), amends the second clause of the thirty-third section of the said act of 1867, so as to read as follows: "In all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to fifty per centum of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as the principal debtor, unless the assent, in writing, of a majority in number and value of his creditors to whom he shall have become liable as a principal debtor, and who shall have proved their claims, be filed in the case at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge." By the first section of the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 270), it is declared that the provisions of the second clause of the thirty-third section of said act of 1867, as amended by the first section of the said act of 1868, shall not apply to those debts from which a bankrupt seeks a discharge, which were contracted prior to the 1st of January, 1869.

The requirements of the act of 1868 apply to "all proceedings in bankruptcy" commenced after the 1st of January, 1869, whether the petition be one filed by, or one filed against, the debtor. Under those requirements, the right to discharges in this case is not shown. But the certificate of the register implies that it is supposed, that, because this is a case of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, discharges may and must, under the act of June 22, 1874, be granted, without a compliance with the requirements of the act of 1868.

The ninth section of the act of 1874 provides as follows: "In cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, the provisions of said act" (the original bankruptcy act of March 2, 1867), "and any amendment thereof, or of any supplement thereto, requiring the payment of any proportion of the debts of the bankrupt, or the assent of any portion of his creditors, as a condition of his discharge from his debts, shall not apply; but he may, if otherwise entitled thereto, be discharged by the court in the same manner and with the same effect as if he had paid such per centum of his debts, or as if the required proportion of his creditors had assented thereto. And in cases of voluntary bankruptcy, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to thirty per centum of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as principal debtor, without the assent of at least one-fourth of his creditors in number, and one-third in value; and the provision in section thirty three of said act of March second, eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, requiring fifty per centum of such assets, is hereby repealed." The provisions of the act of 1868 were in amendment of the thirty-third section of the act of 1867.

What is the effect of the ninth section of the act of 1874? Was it intended to apply to cases commenced before the date of its passage? It does not repeal anything except the provision "requiring fifty per centum of such assets;" and the twenty-first section of the act of 1874 repeals only such acts and parts of acts as are inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 1874. Is it inconsistent with the provisions of the act of 1874, that, in the present case, it should be necessary to comply with the requirements of the act of 1868? Does the repeal of the provision "requiring fifty per centum of such assets," make the act of 1868 inapplicable to the present case?

The ninth section of the act of 1874 must be construed in connection with the other provisions of the same act. The language of the ninth section is general. It says, "in cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy," and "in cases of voluntary bankruptcy." This language is satisfied by applying it to cases to be commenced after the passage of the act of 1874. That is the natural meaning of such language. It is not to be construed as applying to cases commenced before, and pending at the time of, the passage of the act of 1874, unless the intention to have it so apply is apparent from the act. The intention to have other provisions of the act of 1874 apply to cases commenced before its passage is manifested and declared by that act, and, if such intention is not declared in regard to the provisions of section 9, and if those provisions can have proper scope without applying them to cases commenced before the passage of the act of 1874, and, especially, if, to apply those provisions to such cases, would be inconsistent with the intent manifested by all the provisions of the act of 1874, considered together, then the inference is proper, that it was not intended that those provisions should apply to cases commenced before the passage of the act of 1874. The twelfth section of the act of 1874, in amendment of the thirty-ninth section of the act of 1867, in regard to cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, declares that the provisions of such twelfth section shall apply to cases commenced after the 1st of December, 1873, and prior to the passage of the act of 1874, as well as to those commenced after its passage. So, too, the seventeenth section of the act of 1874, which prescribes proceedings for a composition with creditors, prescribed them for "all cases of bankruptcy now pending or to be hereafter pending."

Under the act of 1874, in cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy commenced after its passage, one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the creditors of a debtor must join in a petition against him, or he cannot be adjudged a bankrupt. The idea of the act, then, seems to be, that if such number and value of creditors bring the debtor into court, in cases commenced after its passage, he shall not be required, in order to obtain a discharge, to obtain any further assent of any creditor to his discharge or to pay any specified proportion of his debts; for, it provides, in section 9, for dispensing, in such case, with the payment of any per centum of debts, and with the assent of any proportion of creditors. The bringing of the petition is regarded, in respect to cases commenced after the passage of the act of 1874, as the assent of the one-fourth in number and the one-third in value, of the creditors, to the discharge. But, a voluntary petitioner comes into court of his own volition, and without the previous assent of any of his creditors. As to such a case, commenced after the passage of the act of 1874, the ninth section of that act declares that the debtor shall not have a discharge unless his assets shall be equal to thirty per centum of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as principal debtor, or unless one fourth of his creditors in number, and one-third in value, assent to his discharge. In regard to voluntary cases, the assent of creditors seems to be required with a view of placing the bankrupt on the same footing, as to the action of creditors, with the bankrupt in involuntary cases, the thirty per centum of assets being regarded as the equivalent of the assent. The ninth section of the act of 1874 does not contain language simply repealing, as a whole, the provision found in the act of 1868. It prescribes what per centum of assets there must be in cases of voluntary bankruptcy, namely, thirty per centum, and then repeals the provision "requiring fifty per centum of such assets." Provision being made by it for cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, and also for cases of voluntary bankruptcy, without any declaration that cases pending at the time of the passage of the act are referred to, the repeal of the fifty per centum provision may properly be regarded as a repeal of it only in pari materia with the scope of the rest of the section, with which it is joined by a copulative, and as repealing it only in reference to cases to be commenced after the passage of the act. In this view, there is nothing in the provisions of the act of 1868, as applicable to cases pending at the time of the passage of the act of 1874, that is inconsistent with the provisions of the ninth section of the latter act, because such last-named provisions have reference only to cases to be commenced after the passage of the act of 1874.

One consequence of holding that, by virtue of the ninth section of the act of 1874, discharges can be granted in this case without a compliance with the provisions of the act of 1868, would be that, in some cases of involuntary bankruptcy commenced before the passage of the act of 1874, bankrupts would have obtained discharges only on a compliance with the act of 1868, in other such cases bankrupts would have endeavored to comply with the act of 1868, but failed to obtain the assent of their creditors, and in other such cases bankrupts would have made no effort to obtain discharges because satisfied they could not obtain such assent, and yet now all bankrupts put into involuntary bankruptcy in proceedings commenced before the passage of the act of 1874, would obtain discharges without procuring any assent of any creditor. This would work a practical discrimination among involuntary bankrupts in cases commenced before the passage of the act of 1874, resulting in injustice to some or in injustice to the creditors of some—injustice to bankrupts who had complied with the act of 1868, or injustice to the creditors of those who had failed to obtain the assent required by the act of 1868. A construction which would so operate is not to be given unless imperatively indicated.

In considering the question, the fact has not been overlooked that, under the act of 1874, the requirement that one-fourth in number and one-third in value of the creditors shall join, in order to put a debtor into compulsory bankruptcy, applies to all cases commenced after the 1st of December, 1873. But such fact is of no moment. The debtor so put into bankruptcy in a case commenced between the 1st of December, 1873, and the 22d of June, 1874, must, indeed, although put into bankruptcy by one-fourth in number and one-third in value of his creditors, still comply with the provisions of the act of 1868, before he can obtain a discharge. But this is only through a failure, in the act of 1874, to relieve him from the operation of the act of 1868, and imposes upon him no burden to which he was not subject when the act of 1874 was passed.

Entertaining these views, I must withhold discharges in this case until the provisions of the act of 1868 are complied with.

Case No. 5,047.

Ex parte FRANCOIS.

[3 Woods, 367.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Texas. Aug. Term, 1879.

MARRIAGE BETWEEN CAUCASIAN AND NEGRO—PROHIBITORY STATUTE—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

1. A statute of the state of Texas, passed February 12, 1858, and unrepealed, prohibited a white person from marrying a negro, and for its violation inflicted a penalty upon the white person, but none on the negro. Held, that the law was still in force.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. It was not in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States.

The relator [Emile Francois], who was alleged to be of the white race, and a citizen of Texas, was indicted in the district court of Travis county, Texas, for having unlawfully intermarried with a colored female who was of the African race. He was tried, convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary for five years.

The act under which the indictment was framed was passed February 12, 1858, when slavery still existed in Texas, and this act constitutes article 386 of Penal Code of Texas (Pasch. Dig. art. 2016), and reads thus: "If any white person shall, within this state, knowingly marry a negro, or a person of mixed blood, descended from negro ancestry, to the third generation inclusive, though one ancestor of each generation may have been a white person, or having so married in or out of this state, shall continue within this state to cohabit with such negro, or such descendant of a negro, he or she shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary not less than two or more than five years."

Before being sent to the penitentiary, the relator made application for a writ of habeas corpus to the United States district judge, on the ground that his conviction was in violation of the constitution of the United States. On a previous occasion, in Ex parte Brown,[2] Judge Duval held the act in question to be no longer in force by reason of the changes wrought by the amendments to the constitution of the United States, and discharged the relator. After the decision of that case, the court of appeals of Texas, in Frasher v. State, 3 Tex. App. 263, held the act under consideration to be still in force. The legislature of Texas, at its session in April, 1879, changed the above act so as to punish both parties for the commission of the offense named in it, and the law on that subject now reads as follows: "If any white person and negro shall knowingly intermarry with each other within this state, or having so intermarried in or out of the state, shall continue to live together as man and wife within this state, they shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a term not less than two nor more than five years." But the latter act above cited does not take effect until September, 1879.

C. J. Garland, for relator.
D. G. Wooten, for the State.

DUVAL, District Judge. An application similar to the present one was made to me some two years ago, in behalf of one Lou Brown, a white woman who had married a negro man. In her case the writ was granted and the petitioner was discharged. On that occasion no argument was had. The case was submitted to the court upon the facts as they appeared from the petition and the return of the officer, and with what seemed to be a tacit understanding of counsel on each side, that the prisoner ought to be discharged. Such at least is my recollection of the case. My impression then was that the act of the Texas legislature of February 12, 1858, which made it a penitentiary offense for a white person to marry a negro, was obsolete and inoperative, as having been passed when the negro was a slave, and not regarded in law as a "citizen of the United States." And if not obsolete, that it was in contravention of the fourteenth amendment of the federal constitution, and of the civil rights bill, because it inflicted a penalty upon the white person alone. At a subsequent period, the precise question came before the Texas court of appeals, in the case of Frasher v. State, 3 Tex. App. 263. That court held that the statute in question was still in force, and was not invalidated by the adoption of the constitutional amendments, or by the civil rights bill. The reasoning of the court in this case, and a more thorough consideration of the case, induce me to doubt the correctness of my first impressions when acting in the case of Ex parte Brown.[3]

The subject of marriage is one exclusively under the control of each state. Each one may pass such laws as it deems proper regulating the institution. One may forbid marriage for some causes, which would be no impediment in another, and may prescribe different penalties for a violation of the same prohibition. If a state thought proper to do so, I am not satisfied that she would be prohibited by any express provision of the federal constitution, or of the civil rights bill, from passing a law forbidding a marriage, among white persons, between an uncle and his niece, or between a Christion and a Jew, and imposing a penalty for its violation upon the man alone. If it could do this, then it could certainly forbid the marriage between a white person and a negro, and affix a penalty for the act upon the former alone. If the Texas statute punished the negro in such case and not the white person, then it would be clearly opposed to the civil rights bill, which expressly provides that the negro shall only be subject to the like pains and penalties as the white race. But is the converse of this proposition to be held as true in all cases? Upon mature consideration, I doubt whether it is so.
