Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Oct. 7, 1862.

MARTIAL LAW — SUSPENSION OF WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS — ORDERS TO MARSHAL TO DISREGARD WRIT — AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

1. The two orders issued by the war department of the United States, August 8th, 1862, one being an order "to prevent the evasion of military duty, and for the suppression of disloyal practices," and the other being an order "authorizing the arrest of persons discouraging enlistments," were issued in violation of section 9 of article 1 of the constitution, and of articles 4 and 5 of the amendments to the constitution.

2. Those orders cannot be regarded as having emanated from the president of the United States, although the one first above named purports on its face to be issued "by direction of the president of the United States," nor can they be regarded as suspending the writ of habeas corpus, in the cases embraced in them.

3. An order from a subordinate in the war department to a marshal of the United States, who holds in custody a person arrested by him under said orders, not to produce such person before a court of the United States, under a writ of habeas corpus issued by it to such marshal, requiring him to produce before it the body of such person, is no justification to such marshal for disobeying such writ.

4. The president of the United States had authority to issue his proclamation of September 24th, 1862 (13 Stat. 730), proclaiming martial law and the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in the case of military arrests.

5. Such writ having been issued and so disobeyed by such marshal before the issuing of such proclamation, the fact that such proclamation had been issued was taken into consideration by the court, in punishing the marshal for his contempt, and a fine of $100 was imposed upon him, and he was not permitted to act as an officer of the court until he had paid the fine.

6. A jailor who acted as the mere servant of the marshal, in disobeying the writ, was discharged without punishment.

This was a hearing on a writ of habeas corpus, issued on the petition of Anson Field, directed to C. C. P. Baldwin, marshal of the United States for the district of Vermont, and Noble B. Flanagan, jailor of Chittenden county, Vermont, commanding them to produce the body of said Field. The petition for the writ set forth, that the petitioner resided in Jericho, in Chittenden county; that he was illegally imprisoned in the common jail of the county, by the marshal; that the jailor of said county held him by the order of the marshal; that the marshal held him by some pretended order of the president of the United States; and that he was not held by force of any process of any court of the state, or of the United States. On the return day of the writ, the jailor produced the body of the petitioner and made a verbal return to the writ, to the effect, that the petitioner and two other persons were brought to the jail by the said marshal, who directed the jailor to commit and hold them until further orders; and that the marshal presented no process or warrant, but said that he had arrested them under some general order from the war department. It not appearing that the said marshal had received notice of the issuing of the writ, the court adjourned the hearing, and directed that in the meantime the jailor should hold the petitioner in custody. On the adjourned day, the marshal and the jailor appeared, with their counsel, but without the petitioner, and made the following return to the writ: "United States of America, District of Vermont, September 1st, 1862. Now, in pursuance of the mandate of the within writ, the said C. C. P. Baldwin, marshal of the said district, and the said Noble B. Flanagan, say, that the said Field having been brought into court on the 28th day of August, 1862, and the matter continued until this day, and the body of said Field having been ordered to remain in custody, they now say that the said Anson Field is in their custody, and they say he was arrested and is held and detained, by virtue of orders issued by the authority of the president of the United States, signed by Edwin M. Stanton, secretary of war, copies of which are annexed hereto; and they further state, that said Field is held in custody, to be dealt with under said orders, report having been made to Major L. C. Turner, judge advocate, as in said orders directed; and said Flanagan acts solely under the directions of said Baldwin, being jailor in the county of Chittenden; and said Baldwin says that he has informed the war department of the United States of the issuing of the writ, and he is instructed by said department to pay no regard to it, and not bring the body of said Field into court; and the said Baldwin says that, as marshal of said district, having made said arrest, and now holding said Field in custody, by order of said department, he deems it his duty, in obedience to such instructions, not to bring said Field into court, intending thereby no disrespect to this court. C. C. P. Baldwin, Marshal. N. B. Flanagan, Jailor. Sworn to before me, September 1st, 1862, D. A. Smalley, Judge." The following were the orders referred to in the return: "Official War Bulletins. Persons liable to draft not allowed to leave their county. Washington, Friday, August 8th, 1862. The following order has just been issued by the war department: War Department, Washington, D. C., August 8th, 1862. An order to prevent the evasion of military duty, and for the suppression of disloyal practices. First: By direction of the president of the United States, it is hereby ordered that, until further orders, no citizen liable to be drafted into the militia shall be allowed to go to a foreign country; and all marshals, deputy marshals, and military officers of the United States, are directed, and all police authorities, especially at the ports of the United States on the sea-board, and on the frontier, are requested, to see that this order is faithfully carried into effect; and they are hereby authorized and directed to arrest and detain any person or persons about to depart from the United States in violation of this order, and report to Major L. C. Turner, judge advocate, at Washington city, for further instructions respecting the person or persons so arrested and detained. Second: Any person liable to draft, who shall absent himself from his county or state before such draft is made, will be arrested by any provost marshal, or other United States or state officer, wherever he may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, and conveyed to the nearest military post or depot, and placed on military duty for the term of the draft; and the expenses of his own arrest and conveyance to such post or depot, and also the sum of five dollars as a reward to the officer who shall make such arrest, shall be deducted from his pay. Third: The writ of habeas corpus is hereby suspended in respect to all persons so arrested and detained, and in respect to all persons arrested for disloyal practices. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War. Persons discouraging enlistments, to be arrested. The following order, authorizing the arrest of persons discouraging enlistments, has been issued: War Department, Friday, August 8th, 1862. Ordered—First: That all United States marshals, and superintendents or chiefs of police, of any city, town, or district, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to arrest and imprison any person or persons who may be engaged, by act, speech, or writing, in discouraging volunteer enlistments, or in any way giving aid and comfort to the enemy, or in any other disloyal practice against the United States. Second: That an immediate report be made to Major L. C. Turner, judge advocate, in order that such persons may be tried before a military commission. Third: The expenses of such arrest and imprisonment will be certified to the chief clerk of the war department, for settlement and payment. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War." As the return recited two distinct orders, the court directed the marshal to specify under which of them the arrest was made, when he further returned, "that said arrest and detention was and is had under the order entitled, 'Persons discouraging enlistments, to be arrested,' copied in the first return." After hearing the counsel for the marshal and the petitioner, the court decided that the return was insufficient, and ordered that the petitioner should be produced before the court within three hours, (he then being in the same village,) and that, in default thereof, the marshal and the jailor appear before the court on the 3d day of October, and show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of court. On that day, the marshal being in court, the district attorney, on his behalf, requested that the consideration of the matter be postponed until the 7th of October, which request was granted. No farther hearing was asked for.

SMALLEY, District Judge. As both of the orders of the 8th of August are referred to, and as it is conceded that a portion of the first one must be borrowed and added to the one entitled "Persons discouraging enlistments, to be arrested," in order to constitute any pretence of excuse for disobeying the order of the court, made on the 1st of September, I shall consider them both in connection with the constitution of the United States, to which both must be subservient.

The constitution of the United States provides (article 1, § 9), that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." Article 4th of the amendments to the constitution provides as follows: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." In article 5th of the amendments it is provided, that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law."

The order first referred to in the return states, that it is made "by direction of the president of the United States," and assumes to direct all marshals and military officers of the United States, and authorize all police authorities, to arrest, &c. It further assumes to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in relation to all persons arrested for disloyal practices. Neither at the time this order was issued, nor at the time the proceedings were had upon this habeas corpus, had congress or the president declared that the public safety required that martial law should be established, or that the writ of habeas corpus should be suspended, in loyal states. It will not be pretended that Vermont is not a loyal state. She has been, and is, among the first and most earnest to aid and sustain the government in putting down the causeless and atrocious rebellion which is now distracting and desolating our hitherto happy country. She has furnished more men to fight the battles of the Union than any other state of equal population; and thousands of the best and bravest of her sons now sleep the sleep of death, in the swamps and on the battle-fields of Virginia, Maryland, and Louisiana. The petitioner is a citizen not subject to military law, his age, being over sixty, not only excusing, but excluding him from military service, unless by that order every citizen is subjected to martial law. If that order is to receive the construction the marshal claims for it, then more than thirty thousand men in the states of New England and in New York, many of them of very limited intelligence and of low moral character, were authorized to arrest any citizen within those states, from the lowest to the highest, without complaint, without warrant, and without even informing their prisoner by whom, or of what, he was accused. This order assumes to authorize each of the officers or agents to determine who are guilty of disloyal practices —a phrase hitherto unknown, and as yet undefined, in this country—and each to give his own construction to the term; and, if any one of these inquisitors pretends to think that a citizen has done or said anything which he chooses to consider disloyal, the poor unfortunate, though he may be the most worthy, loyal, and patriotic person in the community, may be thrown into prison, and deprived of all opportunity of being heard before a court or a jury to establish his innocence, or of being confronted with the witnesses against him, or of even ascertaining the offence with which he is charged. Those who claim to exercise this extraordinary power may be governed by whim or caprice, personal ill feeling, political or religious prejudice, the hope of pecuniary gain, or any other of the many unworthy motives which influence human action; and yet all classes of citizens, from the day laborer in the field, to the senator in the legislative halls of the country, are subject to this despotic power. None are exempt. If one person argues that General McClellan is the most suitable person to command the army, and another insists that General McClellan ought to be removed and some other general appointed, both persons are liable to arrest, according to the peculiar views of the different agents who hear or are informed of the discussion, because each will say that such expression of opinion tends to discourage enlistments, and is a disloyal practice. One argues that the Quakers ought to be subject to draft, while another insists that they ought not. Yet both are in the same danger. One claims that the principles and policy advocated by the New York Tribune for the prosecution of the war should be adopted and followed, while another denies it, and avers, as his opinion, that the policy indicated by the New York Herald should be pursued. Yet both are liable to be arrested by a partisan of the other, for discouraging enlistments. These illustrations might be extended ad infinitum.

This order was made, and the action under it was had, before any attempt was made to establish martial law. Can it be contended, that, with the construction claimed for it, it is not in direct violation of section 9, of article 1, of the constitution; and of article 4 of the amendments thereto, which declares, that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, &c., shall not be violated," and that "no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized;" and of article 5 of the amendments, which declares, that no person shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law?" If there be any force in language, it appears to me too plain for discussion, that either the constitution or the order must fall.

Our revolutionary fathers having, after eight years of desolating war, achieved their independence of the British crown, were so jealous of their liberty, and so determined to protect it against any future encroachments of power, that they were not satisfied to leave it with the safeguards that appear in the constitution which was submitted on the 17th of September, 1787; but, in 1789, they submitted to the several states ten amendments thereto, which were duly ratified before 1791, in order to give more certain and complete protection to the liberty and rights of the citizen. How futile were all their efforts, if the doctrine contended for in this case is to prevail. That liberty which they held so dear, and guarded with such jealous care, has much less protection than it had under the British crown. If the arrest and detention in this case be sustained, it strikes a much more deadly and fatal blow to civil liberty, than did the general warrants which the British cabinet ordered to be issued against the printers and publishers of the North Briton, number 45, in 1763. The parties aggrieved in that case sought redress before that illustrious and fearless judge and protector of civil liberty, Chief Justice Pratt, (Lord Camden,) who held such warrants to be illegal, who liberated the notorious Wilkes from the tower of London, upon a writ of habeas corpus, and under whose instructions, British juries gave, in two cases, £300 damages each, whilst in the other two the counsel for the crown consented to a verdict of £200 each, rather than have them go to a jury. Leeman v. Allen, 2 Wils. 160; Huckle v. Money, Id. 205. In this last case, the defendant made a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the damages were excessive. After argument, Chief Justice Pratt said: "I shall now state the nature of this case, as it appeared upon the evidence at the trial: A warrant was granted by Lord Halifax, secretary of state, directed to four messengers, to apprehend and seize the printers and publishers of a paper called the North Briton, number 45, without any information or charge laid before the secretary of state, previous to the granting thereof, and without naming any person whatsoever in the warrant. Carrington, the first of the messengers to whom the warrant was directed, from some private intelligence he had got that Leech was the printer of the North Briton, number 45, directed the defendant to execute the warrant upon the plaintiff, (one of Leech's journeymen,) and took him into custody for about six hours, and during that time treated him well. The personal injury done to him was very small, so that, if the jury had been confined by their oath to consider the mere personal injury only, perhaps twenty pounds damages would have been thought damages sufficient. But that small injury done to the plaintiff, or the inconsiderableness of his station and rank in life, did not appear to the jury in that striking light, in which the great point of law, touching the liberty of the subject, appeared to them at the trial. They saw a magistrate over all the king's subjects, exercising arbitrary power, violating Magna Charta, and attempting to destroy the liberty of the kingdom, by insisting upon the legality of this general warrant before them. They heard the king's counsel, and saw the solicitor of the treasury, endeavoring to support and maintain the legality of the warrant, in a tyrannical and severe manner. These are the ideas which struck the jury on the trial, and I think they have done right in giving exemplary damages. To enter a man's house by virtue of a nameless warrant, in order to procure evidence, is worse than the Spanish inquisition—a law under which no Englishman would wish to live an hour. It was a most daring public attack upon the liberty of the subject." A new trial was refused. That ruling was afterwards reviewed by Lord Mansfield, in Money v. Leach, 3 Burrows, 1742, and affirmed, against the crown, and has ever since been the settled law of England. Those warrants were not so arbitrary, and utterly repugnant to liberty and justice, as are the arrest and detention in this case. There the parties could resort to the writ of habeas corpus, if they felt aggrieved. The British ministry did not attempt to suspend that great writ of freedom. Is the British Magna Charta any more sacred than the United States constitution? Are the rights and liberties of the British subject any more securely protected than those of the American citizen? Even the French arrests under the "lettres de cachet," by which the Bourbons filled the prison of the Bastile, and thereby contributed so largely to the first French revolution, had more of the semblance of justice than the arrest in this case, for those letters named the person to be arrested, though they assigned no cause, and allowed no hearing.

If the language of this order of the war department could be considered without reference to the constitution of the United States, perhaps we might suppose that it was issued under the express direction of the president, and intended to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in the cases to which it refers. But, when it is considered in connection with the constitution, I can give it no such construction. I cordially adopt the language used by Judge Hall, of the northern district of New York, in the case of Ex parte Benedict [Case No. 1,292], where a person was arrested under the same order and brought before him on a writ of habeas corpus and discharged. After considering the order, in connection with the constitution, Judge Hall says: "My personal confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and good sense of the president, as well as the respect due to the high office he holds, compels me to require the most conclusive evidence upon the point, before adopting the conclusion that he has ever deliberately sanctioned so palpable a violation of the constitutional rights of the citizens of the loyal states, as the order of the war department, thus construed, would justify and require."

The second order, entitled, "Persons discouraging enlistments, to be arrested," does not profess to be issued by the order or authority of the president, or to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and it is only by borrowing two of the provisions of the first order, and appending them to the second, that the detention in this case, and the disobedience to the writ, can be pretended to be justified; for, even if the president possessed the delicate and dangerous power of suspending the writ of habeas corpus, it will hardly be claimed that he could delegate it to all or any of his subordinates, to be exercised when, in their discretion, the "public safety" might require it, any more than he could delegate the veto power. An order so entirely unprecedented, and so clearly in derogation of the common rights of the citizen, it is the duty of courts to construe most strictly. I cannot think, therefore, that it was intended, by itself, or in connection with the other, to have the operation which it is contended should be given to it or them.

Events which have transpired subsequently to the 1st of September, indicate very decidedly that the president did not intend that the orders should have any such construction. On the 6th of September, both of the orders of the war department, of the 8th of August, were rescinded; and, on the 24th of September, the president issued his proclamation, over his own signature, countersigned by the secretary of state, establishing, for reasons therein assigned, martial law over all the loyal states, and, as a consequence thereof, suspending the writ of habeas corpus. What effect should be given to that proclamation, I will consider hereafter. But the fact that the orders of the 8th of August, which, upon the construction claimed to be given to them, were broad enough to embrace every species of disloyalty, in word or act, were revoked in less than thirty days after they were issued, and that, eighteen days thereafter, the president issued his own proclamation in relation to military arrests and the writ of habeas corpus, is strong evidence, that he did not regard the aforesaid orders from the war department as emanating from him.

But there is another statement in the marshal's return to the writ, that is relied upon as a justification for disobeying it, which is this: "And said Baldwin says that he has informed the war department of the United States of the issuing of the writ, and he is instructed by said department to pay no regard to it, and not bring the body of said Field into court." The instructions here referred to were produced and read to me. They were in a telegram, which reads thus: "Washington, August 30th, 1862. To C. C. P. Baldwin, U. S. Marshal: Pay no attention to the habeas corpus for the liberation of Lyman, Barney and Field, and, if any attempt be made to liberate them from custody, resist it to the utmost, and report the names of all who may attempt it. By Order of the Secretary of War. L. C. Turner, Judge Advocate." It is proper to take some notice of the tenor of this despatch. Though coming from a major in the war department, it is not addressed to a military officer, but to a civil officer, and one peculiarly the officer of the court, created for that purpose, to execute its bidding, and whose official oath binds him to do so. It peremptorily orders him to disobey the legal process of the court, and, if others attempt to enforce it, to resist them to the utmost. It contains an implied threat against the members of the bar, and other officers of the court, and even against the court itself, if either shall do anything judicially or professionally to liberate a prisoner, confined in jail upon what we have already seen was a despotic and illegal order of the war department. A more flagrant disregard of the constitution of the United States can hardly be conceived. That great organic law and charter of American liberty distributes the powers of the government into three parts, executive, legislative and judicial, each, in their respective spheres, independent of the others. The framers of that once sacred instrument took especial care, so far as human wisdom could provide, that the judiciary should be placed entirely beyond the control or influence of either or both of the other branches of the government, believing that, in its being so constituted, was one of the great safeguards of civil liberty. I deeply regret that such an order should go abroad, purporting to come from the war department, not on my own account, but because such illegal assumptions of power go far to bring our institutions and government into disrepute, both at home and abroad. I need not say to the people of Vermont, my native state, where my temper and conduct through life are well known, that threats will not influence me, nor that I shall do what I deem my duty, unawed. "If" (in the language of a great magistrate) "they had any effect, it would be contrary to their intent. Leaning against their impression, might give a bias the other way. But I hope and believe that I have fortitude enough to resist that weakness." At a very early stage of the rebellion, it became my judicial duty to express my views and opinions in relation to it, and the obligations of all loyal citizens; and thus they became widely known. I have had no change of opinion since, upon those questions, nor has any act or word of mine indicated any. In issuing this writ of habeas corpus, and in passing on questions raised upon it, I have simply performed an imperative judicial duty. If I had shrunk from it, or in any way avoided it, I should have proved recreant to the great trusts reposed in me. A judge who will not faithfully and fearlessly perform every duty imposed upon him by the constitution and the laws, as much merits disgrace and punishment, as does the soldier who deserts his colors on the battle field.

There are other facts connected with the arrest and detention in this case, which deserve notice. At the last term of this court, it was determined that, when two or more persons were acting together in any way to discourage enlistments, it constituted an offence under the act of July 31, 1861 (12 Stat. 284), and, under a charge to the grand jury, delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson, an indictment was found against three persons, who are now held for trial thereon. This was well known to the marshal. He had no order from the war department to arrest any particular person, but only authority to arrest such as he chose. If he had reason to suspect that this petitioner, and the two others who were arrested with him, had been discouraging enlistments, he could have gone to a United States commissioner, and procured a warrant and had them brought up, and, if there was sufficient evidence, held for trial before this court; and it was his duty to do so. But, instead of performing his duty under the law, as an officer of this court, he volunteered, as a military agent, to make the arrest upon his own motion, and throw the accused into jail in violation of law. When he was before me on the 1st of September, he was reminded that, if the petitioner was guilty of the offence charged against him, he could and would be punished under the law; but he still chose to disobey the positive order of the court to bring the prisoner before it. This was a high handed, arbitrary exercise of power, without right, and in defiant violation of all constitutional authority and law, and of all civil liberty; and, if the power and majesty of the law are not to be trampled on with impunity, but are to be vindicated and maintained, as in times past, he ought to be and must be punished therefor.

In considering the character and extent of that punishment, it becomes necessary to inquire what effect is to be given to the President's proclamation of the 24th of September, 1862 (13 Stat. 730), which is as follows: "By the President of the United States of America. A proclamation. Whereas, it has become necessary to call into service, not only volunteers, but also portions of the militia of the states, by draft, in order to suppress the insurrection existing in the United States, and disloyal persons are not adequately restrained, by the ordinary processes of law, from hindering this measure and from giving aid and comfort in various ways to the insurrection: Now, therefore, be it ordered: First—That, during the existing insurrection, and as a necessary measure for suppressing the same, all rebels and insurgents, their aiders and abettors, within the United States, and all persons discouraging volunteer enlistments, resisting militia drafts, or guilty of any disloyal practice, affording aid and comfort to rebels against the authority of the United States, shall be subject to martial law, and liable to trial and punishment by courts martial or military commissions. Second—that the writ of habeas corpus is suspended in respect to all persons arrested, or who are now, or hereafter, during the rebellion, shall be, imprisoned in any fort, camp, arsenal, military prison or other place of confinement, by any military authority or by the sentence of any court martial or military commission. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. [L. S.] Done at the city of Washington, this twenty-fourth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty-seventh. Abraham Lincoln. By the President: William H. Seward, Secretary of State." Is the power thus assumed by the president conferred upon him by the constitution or any act of congress, or by both combined?

This is the most grave and important question that has ever been presented before the judicial tribunals of this country—one upon which eminent jurists have differed and upon which they will undoubtedly continue to differ. I approach it with great hesitancy and would be glad to avoid expressing an opinion upon it; but I have no choice. In order to examine it in all its aspects, it is necessary to consider the present condition of the Union. That a gigantic insurrection and rebellion has been, for more than eighteen months, and is still, raging in many of the states, and that the armies of the rebellious states have been, and are, invading loyal states with immense forces, that hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended, and many thousands of lives lost, in endeavors to suppress and put it down, and that hundreds of thousands of men are now in the field, and in hostile array against each other, we know to be true. That there are recruiting stations in nearly every town in the loyal states, and troops in various places in every state being drilled and disciplined, in squads, companies, and regiments, and that a draft has been ordered, we also know.

The constitution of the United States makes the president commander-in-chief of the United States army, and of the militia of the several states when called into the actual service of the United States. It also provides, that he shall "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and that congress shall have power "to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union. suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." In pursuance of this authority, the act of the 28th of February, 1795 (1 Stat. 424), was passed, the 2d section of which provides, "that whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any state, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the president of the United States to call forth the militia of such state, or of any other state or states, as may be necessary to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed." The same act provides for organizing and governing the militia when so called out, and for establishing courts martial, &c. The question as to the construction of this act came before the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 19. It was an action of replevin, for certain goods and chattels, brought in a state court of the state of New York. The supreme court of that state gave judgment against the avowant, and that judgment was affirmed by the court for correction of errors, and from thence was taken by writ of error to the supreme court of the United States. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice Story, who says: "The avowry, in substance, asserts a justification of the taking of the goods and chattels to satisfy a fine and forfeiture imposed upon the original plaintiff by a court martial, for a failure to enter the service of the United States as a militia man, when thereto required by the president of the United States, in pursuance of the act of the 28th of February. 1795 (chapter 101). It is argued, that this avowry is defective, both in substance and form, and it will be our business to discuss the most material of these objections." "For the more clear and exact consideration of the subject, it may be necessary to refer to the constitution of the United States, and some of the provisions of the act of 1795. The constitution declares, that congress shall have power 'to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;' and also 'to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.' In pursuance of this authority, the act of 1795 has provided." &c. "It has not been denied here, that the act of 1795 is within the constitutional authority of congress, or that congress may not lawfully provide for cases of imminent danger of invasion, as well as for cases where an invasion has taken place. In our opinion, there is no ground for a doubt on this point, even if it had been relied on, for the power to provide for repelling invasions includes the power to provide against the attempt and danger of invasion, as the necessary and proper means to effectuate the object." "The power thus confided by congress to the president, is, doubtless, of a very high and delicate nature. A free people are naturally jealous of the exercise of military power; and the power to call the militia into actual service is certainly felt to be one of no ordinary magnitude. But it is not a power which can be executed without a correspondent responsibility. It is, in its terms, a limited power, confined to cases of actual invasion, or of imminent danger of invasion. If it be a limited power, the question arises, by whom is the exigency to be judged of and decided?" "We are all of opinion, that the authority to decide whether the exigency has arrived, belongs exclusively to the president, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons." Again, Mr. Justice Story says: "Whenever a statute gives a discretionary power to any person, to be exercised by him upon his own opinion of certain facts, it is a sound rule of construction, that the statute constitutes him the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts. And, in the present case, we are all of opinion that such is the true construction of the act of 1795. It is no answer, that such a power may be abused, for there is no power which is not susceptible of abuse. The remedy for this, as well as for all other official misconduct, if it should occur, is to be found in the constitution itself." Mr. Justice Story states and disposes of another objection to the avowry, in these words: "In the first place, it is said, that the original plaintiff was never employed in the service of the United States, but refused to enter that service, and that, consequently, he was not liable to the rules and articles of war, or to be tried for the offence by any court martial organized under the authority of the United States. The case of Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 1, affords a conclusive answer to this suggestion. It was decided in that case, that although a militia man, who refused to obey the orders of the president calling him into the public service, was not, in the sense of the act of 1795, 'employed in the service of the United States,' so as to be subject to the rules and articles of war, yet that he was liable to be tried for the offence under the 5th section of the same act, by a court martial called under the authority of the United States." The decision of the state court was reversed, and the case was remanded to it, with directions to cause a judgment to be entered in favor of the avowant.

This question as to the power of the president to call out the militia and establish martial law, was again before the supreme court of the United States in the case of Luther v. Borden, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 1. That was an action of trespass for breaking open the plaintiff's house, in Rhode Island, and arresting him under a military order, growing out of what has been usually called the "Dorr Rebellion." The opinion of the court was delivered by that eminent jurist, Chief Justice Taney. After considering the question as to who should determine whether the exigency had arisen which would justify calling out the militia, the chief justice says: "After the president has acted and called out the militia, is a circuit court of the United States authorized to inquire whether his decision was right? Could the court, while the parties were actually contending in arms for the possession of the government, call witnesses before it, and inquire which party represented a majority of the people? If it could, then it would become the duty of the court, (provided it came to the conclusion that the president had decided incorrectly,) to discharge those who were arrested or detained by the troops in the service of the United States, or the government which the president was endeavoring to maintain. If the judicial power extends so far, the guarantee contained in the constitution of the United States is a guarantee of anarchy and not of order. Yet, if this right does not reside in the courts when the conflict is raging, if the judicial power is at that time bound to follow the decision of the political, it must be equally bound when the contest is over." "It is true," adds the chief justice, "that in this case the militia were not called out by the president. But upon the application of the governor under the charter government, the president recognized him as the executive power of the state, and took measures to call out the militia to support his authority, if it should be found necessary for the general government to interfere; and it is admitted in argument, that it was the knowledge of this decision that put an end to the armed opposition to the charter government, and prevented any further efforts to establish by force the proposed constitution. The interference of the president, therefore, by announcing his determination, was as effectual as if the militia had been assembled under his orders; and it should be equally authoritative." "It is said that this power in the president is dangerous to liberty, and may be abused. All power may be abused if placed in unworthy hands. But it would be difficult, we think, to point out any other hands in which the power would be more safe, and at the same time equally effectual. When citizens of the same state are in arms against each other, and the constituted authorities unable to execute the laws, the interposition of the United States must be prompt, or it is of little value. The ordinary course of proceedings in courts of justice would be utterly unfit for the crisis. And the elevated office of the president, chosen as he is by the people of the United States, and the high responsibility he could not fail to feel when acting in a case of so much moment, appear to furnish as strong safeguards against a willful abuse of power as human foresight could well provide." The chief justice then examines the case of Martin v. Mott [supra], and says: "The grounds upon which that opinion is maintained are set forth in the report, and, we think, are conclusive. The same principle applies to the case now before the court. Undoubtedly, if the president, in exercising this power, shall fall into error, or invade the rights of the people of the state, it would be in the power of congress to apply the proper remedy, But the court must administer the law as they find it. The remaining question is, whether the defendant, acting under military orders issued under the authority of the government, was justified in breaking and entering the plaintiff's house." And, after examining matters as then existing in Rhode Island, he says: "It was a state of war; and the established government resorted to the rights and usages of war, to maintain itself, and to overcome the unlawful opposition. And, in that state of things, the officers engaged in its military service might lawfully arrest any one, who, from the information before them, they had reasonable grounds to believe was engaged in the insurrection; and might order a house to be forcibly entered and searched, when there was reasonable ground for supposing he might be there concealed. Without the power to do this, martial law and the military array of the government would be mere parade, and rather encourage attack than repel it."

The principle established by these cases determines, I think, that the president has the power, in the present military exigencies of the country, to proclaim martial law, and, as a necessary consequence thereof, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in the case of military arrests. It must be evident to all, that martial law and the privilege of that writ are wholly incompatible with each other.

But it may be argued that Vermont is a loyal state, more than five hundred miles from the seat of war; that the people are patriotic and law abiding; that the enforcement of civil law has not been interfered with within her borders; and that, therefore, there is nothing to justify martial law. But we have already seen that this is a question for the president, not for the court, to determine.

I am aware that the conclusion at which I have arrived may seem to conflict with some very high authorities, but it appears to me that they can be reconciled. In Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 95, Chief Justice Marshall incidentally remarks, that only congress can suspend the writ of habeas corpus. And Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution (volume 3, § 1336), makes the same remark. But neither was discussing the question, where, how, or by whom it could be suspended. It seems to have been an obiter dictum with both of those learned judges. The question came directly before Chief Justice Taney, in Ex parte Merryman [Case No. 9,487], and again before Judge Hall, of the northern district of New York, in Ex parte Benedict, before referred to. But both cases came up on an entirely different state of facts from that which now exists. The president had not then proclaimed martial law, and, in neither of the cases, was the act of 1795 referred to at all by the court, in its opinion. On the other hand, the president's legal adviser, (the attorney general,) Mr. Horace Binney, of Philadelphia, Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, and Judge Parker, of Cambridge, Massachusetts, have, I understand, give deliberate opinions, that the privilege of the writ may be legally suspended without an act of congress. I have not had an opportunity of seeing the last named three opinions, and therefore do not know on what grounds they are based; but, coming from eminent lawyers and pure patriots, they are certainly entitled to great weight.

What, then, should be the order in this case? The writ of habeas corpus being now suspended, as to persons arrested as the petitioner was, if he were at this time before me, I should be constrained to order him back into the custody of the marshal. But, on the 1st of September, when the marshal was directed to bring him before me, he was legally entitled to the privilege of the writ; and, for disobeying that order, I shall direct the following sentence to be placed upon the records of the court, and shall use all the power the law confers upon me, to have it enforced: "District of Vermont. In the Circuit Court, October 7th, 1862. In the matter, Ex parte Anson Field [Case No. 4,761]. On the order on C. C. P. Baldwin, marshal, and N. B. Flanagan, jailor, to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of court, in refusing to bring said Field into court in pursuance of the order of September 1st last, the court, having fully and carefully examined the matter in all its relations, and given it mature consideration, adjudges that said Baldwin was guilty of contempt of court in disobeying the order aforesaid, and that, within ten days, he pay to the clerk of the court a fine of one hundred dollars, and that, until he purges himself of said contempt, by complying with this order, he be not permitted within the court, to act as one of its officers; and that, the said Flanagan having acted as the mere servant of said Baldwin, he be discharged, as a vindication of the power of the law, does not require that he should be punished."

The marshal having, in accordance with the order of October 7th, paid into the court the fine of $100, was restored by the court to his full privilege as an officer of the court.

FIELD v. BAKER et al.

[12 Blatchf. 438;[1] 11 N. B. R. 415.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 9, 1875.

BANKRUPTCY—CONDITIONAL SALE—NON-PERFORMANCE OF CONDITION—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE SUBSEQUENTLY APPOINTED — CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT BY BANKRUPT BEFORE ADJUDICATION — SOLVENCY.

1. In April, 1871, B. sold to F. his stock of goods in his store, for a price payable in instalments in fifty weeks, by a bill of sale, with an agreement therein, that, if F. should make default in paying any instalment, B. should be at liberty to treat the whole amount unpaid as due, and take possession of the goods and sell them to satisfy the debt. At the same time, F. gave to B. a mortgage on the goods, containing like terms as in the bill of sale. B. omitted to file the mortgage in conformity with the statutes of New York. F. went into possession of the goods, and, in November, 1871, made default in payment of an instalment. On the 13th of December, 1871, B. took possession of the goods, and afterwards sold them, and applied the proceeds on the said debt to him. No actual fraud in the transaction was alleged, nor was it claimed that F. was insolvent when he received the bill of sale and gave the mortgage. On the 20th of December, 1871, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against F., and he was afterwards adjudged a bankrupt. His assignee filed a bill against B. and F., to have the mortgage adjudged void, as against him, and the value of the goods taken by B. accounted for by him: Held, that, as the goods were sold with the reservation, in the bill of sale, of a right in B. to resume possession of them, and as B. did take possession of them before any other lien on them was acquired, and before the petition in bankruptcy was filed, the transaction was valid, as against the assignee.

2. In May, 1871, B. endorsed a note for F., and it was discounted by a bank, on a pledge, also, to the bank, of securities belonging to B., and the proceeds of the discount were paid to F. In July, 1871, a like transaction was had. Afterwards, and on the 28th of July, 1871, F. gave to B. a confession of judgment, in the amount of the endorsements, as security, on which a judgment was entered the next day. The notes were renewed twice, and F. agreed to pay them on the 1st of December, 1871, and that, if he did not, B. might pay them, so as to release the securities. F. failed to pay them, and then B. paid them, and caused execution on the judgment to be issued by a creditor of his to whom he had assigned it. The execution was levied on other goods than those sold by B. to F., and, on or about the 20th of December, 1871, such goods were sold under the levy, and the proceeds were credited on the judgment. In the bill before mentioned, the assignee prayed to have the judgment declared void, as against him, and the value of the goods sold under the levy, accounted for by B.: Held, that the time to be taken at which to test the condition of F. and the knowledge of B., was the time when the confession of judgment was given, and not the time when the execution was issued; and that, as it did not appear that F. was not solvent at that time, the transaction was valid, as against the assignee.

in bankruptcy of Harris Fiegel, against Adolph Baker and the said Harris Fiegel, to set aside a mortgage given by Fiegel to Baker, and to require said Baker to account for the value of the property taken by virtue of the same. The district court decreed in favor of the complainant (case unreported), and Baker appealed to this court.]

Thorndike Saunders, for plaintiff.

Tracy, Catlin & Brodhead, for defendant Baker.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. On the 1st of April, 1871, the appellant, Adolph Baker, sold to the other defendant, Harris Fiegel, a stock of dry goods in the store theretofore occupied by the said Baker, in Grand street, Williamsburgh, together with store fixtures, &c., for the sum or price of $5,000, payable in instalments of $100 each week, until paid, with certain interest upon a portion thereof, and with an agreement, that, if Fiegel made default in the payment of the instalments as they became due, the vendor should be at liberty to treat the whole amount then unpaid as due, and to enter and take possession of the goods and sell and dispose thereof for the satisfaction of the amount remaining unpaid. These terms are embodied in the bill of sale; and, had there been no mortgage given by Fiegel, the transaction would have been in the nature of a sale, in which the vendor, in order to preserve his lien for the price, makes a conditional delivery of the goods, reserving the right to reclaim the goods in case the price is not paid agreeably to the terms of sale. Such a transaction is perfectly valid as between the parties, and involves no idea of preference, within the meaning of the bankrupt law. The vendor, by such a transaction, gains from the bankrupt no more than by the same transaction he gives. The taking of a security for money then presently loaned is not taking a preference; no more is a sale of property, and, at the same time, reserving a lien for the price.

This arrangement by the parties was carried into further execution by the simultaneous execution of a mortgage of the goods to the vendor, corresponding, in its provisions, with the terms and conditions expressed in the bill of sale. There is no pretence of any actual fraud in these transactions, nor that, at that time, Fiegel was insolvent, or that there was any suspicion, or ground of suspicion, that he was so. Baker, the vendor, omitted to file the mortgage in conformity with the statutes of New York, and, as Fiegel took possession and remained in possession, the mortgagee could not claim under that mortgage, as against creditors of the mortgagor or subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith. Fiegel, the purchaser, made payment of instalments upon the purchase money down to some time in November, 1871, paying, in all, $3,200, and then made default. On the 13th of December, the vendor, in accordance with the terms of the sale and with the mortgage, entered, took possession of and removed such of the goods as had not been already disposed of by Fiegel, and afterwards sold the same at auction, and applied the proceeds to the satisfaction of the unpaid portion of the purchase price and interest. No question has been raised, in this case, of the regularity and validity of such sale and application of the proceeds, if, as against this complainant, the vendor had a right to take possession of the goods, as security for the balance due him as the price of the goods. This statement exhibits one of the transactions which is the subject of contest herein.

The other was as follows: In May, 1871, Fiegel requested the assistance of Baker in procuring a discount at bank, (where he was a stranger,) to the amount of $3,000. Baker introduced him to the officers of the bank, endorsed his note for $3,000, at three months, and pledged United States bonds as further security; and, on the 15th of July, 1871, another discount was obtained for Fiegel, to the amount of $2,000, upon the like security; and, on the 28th of the same month, Fiegel gave to Baker a confession of judgment, in the sum of $5,000, as security, to indemnify him against his endorsements and the hypothecation of his United States bonds, and judgment was entered upon such confession on the following day, July 29th, 1871. There is no evidence justifying any impeachment of the good faith of these transactions—certainly, none creating any doubt of the good faith of Baker; and it is clear, that Fiegel received thereby the full amount of the discount of the notes so given. These notes were twice renewed, but, at the time of the last renewal, Baker being desirous of obtaining his bonds, it was agreed that Fiegel would retire the renewal notes on the 1st of December, and, if not, that Baker might pay them, although they had not yet matured. Fiegel failed to pay the notes, and, soon afterwards, Baker paid them, and thereupon issued execution upon the judgment so confessed for his indemnity, or caused it to be issued by a creditor of his own, to whom he had assigned it. The execution was levied upon the goods of Fiegel, (not included in the sale by Baker,) and, on or about the 20th of December, the property levied upon was sold, and the proceeds of sale credited on the judgment. These proceeds were not paid to the sheriff by the purchasers, but appear to have been collected by the attorney who issued the execution, and to have been paid over to the creditor of Baker, above referred to, on Baker's account.

On the 20th of December, 1871, a creditor of Fiegel filed his petition in the district court, in bankruptcy, and such proceedings were had in that court, that Fiegel was afterwards adjudged bankrupt and the complainant was appointed assignee. He filed his bill in the district court, praying that the hereinbefore mentioned mortgage and the said judgment be declared void, as against him, as assignee, and that Baker be required to pay the value of the property taken by virtue of the same respectively. In that court, and, as I think, in comformity with views that have until recently been generally entertained upon the questions involved, the complainant had a decree for such value, from which the defendant, Baker, has appealed to this court.

1. As to the judgment confessed by the debtor, to indemnify the appellant against his endorsements and the hypothecation of his United States bonds, to procure discounts for the use of the debtor. As already suggested, there is no sufficient evidence that this transaction was not made by the appellant in perfect good faith, as an act of kindness to Fiegel, without any reason whatever to believe that the latter was insolvent. On the contrary, the proofs show that Baker then had confidence in the solvency of Fiegel, and was justified in that confidence. More than this, it is not shown that at that time Fiegel was not in fact solvent. It is impossible, I think, to say that either party contemplated any fraudulent preference, or any insolvency or fraud upon the bankrupt law. Nor did the decision below proceed upon any such ground. Before the execution was issued, there was reason to believe that Fiegel was insolvent. He was, no doubt, insolvent in fact; and, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, Baker had knowledge enough to make him apprehend such insolvency, if not believe it. The decision below proceeded on the ground, that the time to be taken at which to test the condition of the debtor and the knowledge of the creditor, is the time when the execution was issued which gave to Baker a lien upon the property seized thereon; and that then an advantage gained by Baker, with reasonable cause to believe his debtor was insolvent, was illegal and void. In Clark v. Iselin [21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 360] the supreme court of the United States have, at this present term, decided, (reversing the decision of the circuit court,) that, where a warrant of attorney is executed, authorizing the entry of a judgment, the validity of a judgment and levy made in pursuance thereof is to be tested by the condition of things existing when the warrant is executed and delivered, and, if such warrant is not invalid or impeachable, then the judgment and levy are valid, notwithstanding the debtor's insolvency, and knowledge thereof by the creditor, before such execution is issued. Indeed, that case goes one step further than is required to sustain the execution and levy in this. There, the judgment itself was not entered until the insolvency of the debtor was apparent, and it was quite clear that such judgment, and the levy of an execution on the debtor's goods, must result in giving a preference to the judgment creditors over the other creditors of the debtor. I think conformity to that decision requires that this court sustain the validity of the judgment, execution, levy and sale in the present case.

2. As to the mortgage, I find no sufficient reason to doubt the correctness of the decision made in Re Leland [Case No. 8,234], that, where the holder of a chattel mortgage under the laws of New York omits to file his mortgage, or to take possession, and an assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor comes to the actual possession of the property, his title is unaffected by such outstanding mortgage; and that, as to him, the mortgage has no validity. This case is distinguished from that in two particulars—First, the property itself was sold and delivered with the express reservation of the right to resume the possession, expressed in the bill of sale; second, the vendor did, in fact, take possession before any other lien thereon was acquired, before the title of the assignee in bankruptcy, and, in fact, before any petition was filed. If the appellant be regarded simply as mortgagee, he took actual possession before any lien upon the property was acquired by any third person. Denio, J., in Van Heusen v. Radcliff, 17 N. Y. 580, in the court of appeals of New York, says, in reference to this statute: "When a conveyance is said to be void as against creditors, the reference is to such parties when clothed with their judgments and executions," &c. Hale v. Sweet, 40 N. Y. 97, and Doll v. Harlow [2 Hun, 659], in the supreme court of the second department (unreported), indicate that, in such case, the title of the mortgagee is regarded by the state courts as valid. How far it would be permitted to show fraud upon creditors, or the procurement of credit upon faith of the possession and apparent title, and hold such a mortgage void upon that ground, as to creditors who became such in reliance on the debtor's unincumbered title, it is not necessary here to inquire.

My conclusion is that the decree should be reversed, and the bill be dismissed, without costs.

Case No. 4,764.

FIELD v. COLUMBET.

[4 Sawy. 523.][1]

District Court, N. D. California. July 22, 1864.

CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—DESIGNATION OF QUANTITY — CONVEYANCES UNDER CALIFORNIA STATUTE — DIFFERENCE BETWEEN QUITCLAIM AND OTHER DEEDS IN CALIFORNIA — OPERATION OF QUITCLAIM DEED—ACTION OF MESNE PROFITS—VALUE OF IMPROVEMENTS AS SET-OFF TO DAMAGES—COLOR OF TITLE, WHAT—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS, TO BE AVAILABLE, MUST BE PLEADED.

1. The designation of quantity in the description of a deed will not control the boundaries where they are clearly indicated; but where there is doubt as to the true description, such designation of quantity may be properly considered.

2. Under the California statute of conveyances, any words in a deed indicating an intention to transfer the estate, interest or claims of the grantor will be a sufficient conveyance, whether they be such as were generally used in a deed of feoffment, or of bargain and sale, or of release, irrespective of the fact of possession of grantor or grantee, or of the statute of uses.

3. The only practical difference in deeds in use in California, arises from their different operation upon subsequently acquired interests, or the covenants implied by particular terms; a quitclaim deed only passing such interest as the grantor possessed at the time, and having no operation whatever upon subsequently acquired interests.

4. A quitclaim deed does not affirm the possession of any title in the grantor, nor does it preclude him from subsequently acquiring a valid title and holding it for his own benefit; but it is equally effectual with any other form of deed to transfer existing interests.

5. In California claims for damages for withholding possession of land, or for waste and for rents and profits, may be, and usually are, united in the same action with a claim for the recovery of the premises; but distinct actions may be brought, if desired, for the land, and for the damages.

6. Under the California statute allowing the value of permanent improvements to be set-off, in certain cases, against damages for withholding possession of land, the defendant must have held the land not only in good faith, but also under color of title.

7. By "color of title" is meant the semblance or appearance of title. Wherever any instrument by apt words of conveyance from grantor to grantee in form passes what purports to be the title, it gives color of title.

8. The period prescribed within which actions for mesne profits must be brought in California is three years; but if the statute be not pleaded, mesne profits for a longer period may be recovered.

This was an action [by Edward Field against Clement Columbet] to recover the possession of a tract of land, containing about seven hundred and thirty acres, situated in the county of Alameda, in the state of California, and was tried at the June term of 1864 by the court, without the intervention of a jury, by stipulation of the parties. Both parties deraigned their title from the same source—from Fulgencia Higuera, the original grantee of the Mexican government, the plaintiff claiming by a deed executed in July, 1860, and the defendant by a deed executed to his wife, Ann Columbet, in December, 1854, and a subsequent deed to himself in January, 1859. The wife of Higuera united in the deed to the plaintiff, and his wife and children united in the deed to the defendant; but it did not appear that either wife or children ever possessed any interest in the premises to convey. No importance was therefore given to that fact.

A. M. Crane, for plaintiff.

Williams & Thornton, for defendant.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. Two positions are taken to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff: First. That the premises are embraced in the deed of December, 1854, to Ann Columbet, and in the deed of January, 1859, to the defendant. Second. That if the title remained in Higuera, his deed of July, 1860, was inoperative to pass it, the grantee not being at the time in possession of the premises.

The first position depends upon the construction to be given to the description of the premises in the deeds of 1854 and 1859. The description is identical in both deeds. It gives the boundary as commencing at a point on a certain creek "where the wagon-road passes to the house of Galindo," and after running in different directions as reaching on the north a range of hills designated "Lomas Altas," and proceeding thence "along the Lomas Altas southerly up to the aforesaid wagon-road to Galindo's house," and thence "westerly to the point of beginning," the tract "to contain in limits one mile square in quantity, including the two springs known as the 'Agua Calientes.'"

There are irreconcilable calls in this description, and the only question is, which of them must be rejected? If the line be run "along the Lomas Altas," it will not strike the wagon-road, which stops at Galindo's house; and it will follow for a great distance an easterly and not a southerly course. Yet this is the boundary for which the defendant contends, his theory being that the grantor intended that the line should follow the hills, and strike the line of the wagon-road protracted nearly a mile. On the other hand, if the words "along the Lomas Altas" be rejected, and the line be run southerly, it will strike the wagon-road and will include precisely the one mile square of land and the two warm springs mentioned. I am of opinion that the latter is the true description of the premises deeded. If the grantor had intended to convey the whole tract, as the defendant contends, it is not probable that he would have designated the two warm springs as included in the tract sold, for in that case there could have been no question on the point—each spring would have been more than a mile from the outer boundary of the premises. This opinion is strengthened by the designation of quantity in the deed. The designation of quantity, it is true, will not control the boundaries where they are clearly indicated. Yet where there is doubt as to the true description, it may be properly considered. The boundary for which the defendant contends embraces over fourteen hundred acres—more than double the amount designated in the deeds under which he claims.

The position of the defendant, that the deed to the plaintiff is inoperative to pass the grantor's title, arises from the fact that it is what is termed a quitclaim deed, and the grantee was not in possession of the premises at the time of its execution. The deed recites a money consideration of $2930, and witnesseth that the grantors "have remised, released and quitclaimed, and by these presents do remise, release and quitclaim," to the grantee the land in question, and all their "estate, right, title and interest therein," to have and to hold the same to the grantee and his heirs forever. A deed of this character would be sufficient to pass the interest of the grantors under the statute of uses. It was so held by the supreme court of New York, in Jackson v. Fish, 10 Johns. 456, and the ruling has ever since been followed in the courts of that state. Lynch v. Livingston, 8 Barb. 485; Id., 2 Seld [6 N. Y.] 422.

In this state, the statute of uses has not been in terms adopted, and it is unnecessary to express any opinion whether it is to be considered in force as part of the common law. The statute of conveyances renders the deed as effectual for every purpose to pass the title or right of the grantors as it would have been had the statute of uses been expressly adopted. By the common law, where the right of property and the possession were united in the same person, a conveyance could only be made by feoffment with livery of seisin. But where the right of property and the possession were in different persons, a transfer of the estate could be made to the party in possession by a deed of release. The operative words of such release were the same as those used in the deed under consideration, "remise, release and quitclaim." The release operated in various ways according to the character of the possession and interest held by the releasee—sometimes by passing the estate or right of the releasor, sometimes by extinguishing his claim, and sometimes by enlarging the estate of the releasee. Without further particularizing the manner of its operation, it is sufficient to say that the deed divested the releasor of whatever estate and right he possessed, and transferred the same to the releasee, except where, from the nature of the interest or right released, the instrument could operate only by way of extinguishment, as in case of the release of a rent charge, or a common of pasture to the terre-tenant. Thus Sheppard, in his Touchstone, in defining the instrument, says: "A release is the giving or discharging of the right of action which a man hath, or may have or claim, against another man, of that which is his. Or it is the conveyance of a man's interest or right which he hath unto a thing to another that hath the possession thereof, or some estate therein." 1 Shep. Touch. 320. And again, the same writer says: "Lands, tenements and hereditaments themselves may be given and transferred by way of release; and all rights and titles to lands may be given, barred and discharged by release; and so also may rights and titles to goods and chattels." Id. 321. The only condition required for the efficacy of the deed was that the releasee should be in the actual possession of the premises. Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, "Deed," §§ 18–39.

The operative words of the instrument are as significant and potential now as at the common law, and their efficacy under our statute of conveyances is not dependent upon the fact of possession by the releasee. The statute allows the transfer of real property and of interests therein, whether the grantor or grantee be in or out of possession. It designates no form in which the conveyance shall be made, except that it shall be made by deed. Any words in a deed indicating an intention to transfer the estate, interest or claim of the grantor, will be a sufficient conveyance, whether they be such as were generally used in a deed of feoffment, or of bargain and sale, or of release, irrespective of the fact of possession of grantor or grantee, or of the statute of uses. The only practical difference in deeds in use in this state arises from their different operation under the statute upon subsequently acquired interests, or from the covenants implied by particular terms. The quitclaim deed only passes such interest as the grantor possessed at the time, and has no operation whatever upon subsequently acquired interests. By its execution, the grantor does not affirm the possession of any title, nor is he precluded from subsequently acquiring a valid title, and holding it for his own benefit. The subsequently acquired title does not inure in any respect to the benefit of the grantee in the quitclaim; and herein lies its distinction from the deed in fee-simple absolute under the statute, or the deed with covenants. It is equally effectual with either of the other forms in transferring existing interests. Such is the common opinion of the profession, and in consequence the quitclaim has become the form most generally in use. To hold that it has no efficacy, except where the grantee is at the time in possession, would disturb titles to property of the value of millions. Sullivan v. Davis, 4 Cal. 291, and Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. 142.

Judgment must be rendered for the plaintiff, and it is so ordered.

Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff, and under it he was placed in possession. He then brought an action against the defendant for the use and occupation of the premises recovered from the time his title accrued as established in that case, and the time he was thus placed in possession; and also for the value of a building removed by the defendant from the property. The action was what was technically called an action for mesne profits, to which was added a claim for injuries to the freehold.

The defendant in his answer set up that he entered upon the premises in good faith under his deeds, and had made valuable improvements, the value of which he asked to have set-off against the claim of the plaintiff. The statute of the state provided that in actions for the recovery of real property, "where damages are claimed for withholding the property recovered upon which permanent improvements have been made by a defendant, or those under whom he claims, holding under color of title adversely to the claims of the plaintiff in good faith, the value of such improvements shall be allowed as a set-off against such damages."

The case was tried with a jury at the July term of 1865, the same counsel appearing for the parties as in the original action.

FIELD, Circuit Justice, charged the jury, among other things, as follows:

1. That although in this state there was a statute which allowed a plaintiff to unite in an action for the recovery of land a claim for damages for withholding the property, or for waste committed thereon, and for the rents and profits thereof, and in practice claims of this character are usually united in the same action with a claim for the land, as it was found to be more convenient and less expensive than separate actions, and equally effectual to enforce the rights of the plaintiff, yet that such union was not essential, but that distinct actions might be brought for the land and for the damages.

2. That to entitle the defendant to set-off the value of his improvements on the land recovered against the plaintiff's claim for damages, his holding of the premises must have been adversely to the claim of the plaintiff "under color of title;" that a holding in good faith was of itself not sufficient; and that by color of title was meant the semblance or appearance of title. Wherever any instrument by apt words of conveyance from grantor to grantee, in form, passed what purported to be the title, it gave color of title. If one entered under a deed purporting to transfer the title, he entered under the color of title, although in point of fact the title was never in the grantor.

3. That the defendant not having pleaded the statute of limitations, which prescribed three years as the term within which actions for trespass upon real property must be brought, and the action for mesne profits was considered one of that kind, the jury were not restricted to a consideration of the use and occupation of the premises for that period in the estimation of damages.

The jury found for the plaintiff.

FIELD v. DE COMEAN et al.

[5 Ban. & A. 40;[1] 17 O. G. 568.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 18, 1879.[2]

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT.

Letters patent number 155,077, dated September 15th, 1874, granted to complainant for improvement in glove fastenings, construed, and, upon the construction given, the defendants held not to have infringed.

[Followed in Field v. Ireland, 19 Fed. 835.]

[This was a bill in equity by Joseph F. Field against Oliver De Comean and others for the alleged infringement of a patent for an improvement in glove-fastenings.]

M. B. Andrus, W. S. Pladwell, and P. J. O'Reilly, for complainant.

C. A. Seward and C. B. Stoughton, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. The orator has a patent, No. 155,077, dated September 15th, 1874, for an improvement in glove-fastenings, consisting of the combination of a spring inserted in the material of the glove and extending around the edges of the slit, which permits drawing the wrist of the glove over the hand, and adjusted so as to spring open by the insertion of the hand and to close automatically and overlap itself, and cause the edges of the slit to overlap each other when the glove is on. The defendants deny infringement. They make and sell for use springs for gloves, to be inserted into the material, and with arms extending along each edge of the slit, jointed at the apex, working together like the blade and handle of a jack-knife. The only question is whether the use of such springs is an infringement.

The plaintiff stated in the specification of his patent that springs had been combined before with the wrists of gloves, but of a different form. So his patent is not, and could not be maintained as a patent for the combination of springs in every form with the wrists of gloves to close them. It professes to be and is a patent of his style of spring combined with the wrists of gloves for that purpose. The question is whether the defendants' spring is substantially like his. His is a spring throughout, and pulls constantly upon the parts of the material until they come together and overlap. The defendants' has stiff arms, and pulls the parts together only when closed far enough to have the spring on one arm operate in the opposite direction upon the cam-shaped end of the other, and it pulls the edges apart until the arms are at right angles to each other when opened far enough to cause the spring to act the other way on the cam. When so opened it will not close itself, as the orator's will, but has as much tendency to remain open as it has to remain closed after being closed.

It is said by an expert, called by the orator, that, if the edge of the cam which throws the arms apart was removed, the spring would become more like the orator's in its operation; but he probably failed to notice that the spring operates on the same edge of the cam, although on different sides of its pivot, both in opening and closing the spring, and that if this edge was removed, the spring would not move the arms together, or either way, at all. The form of the defendants' spring is different from the orator's, its mode of operation is different, and the result of its operation is somewhat different. It cannot be said to be the same as the orator's, or to be substantially like the orator's. Each got the idea of closing the wrists of gloves, by means of springs, from others. The orator carries out the idea in his mode, and the defendants in theirs, and as neither has control of anything but the particular mode, neither can justly say that the other uses his mode.

Let a decree be entered dismissing the orator's bill, with costs.

[Pet. C. C. 155.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1815.

SUIT UPON FOREIGN JUDGMENT — OBJECTION TO RECORD IN RESPECT TO SERVICE AND APPEARANCE—APPEARANCE BY ATTORNEY—AUTHORITY.

1. In an action of debt, on a judgment obtained against the defendants in the court of common pleas of Pennsylvania, one of the defendants pleaded, that he had not been served with process, and had not appeared in the suit in which the judgment had been entered. On a demurrer to this plea, it appeared from the record of the judgment, that there had been a general appearance by attorney, and that the pleadings had been entered by him for both defendants. The court overruled the demurrer.

[Cited in Lincoln v. Tower, Case No. 8,355.]

2. Nothing can be assigned for error, which contradicts a record.

[Cited in Kittredge v. Emerson, 15 N. H. 262; Wilcox v. Kassick, 2 Mich. 169; Dalton v. Luck, 16 Mo. 102; Baker v. Stonebraker, 34 Mo. 173; Downing v. Still, 43 Mo. 321.]

3. Facts, in opposition to the record of a judgment obtained in one state, cannot be alleged to contradict the judgment, in an action brought upon it in another state. A judgment, in one state, is conclusive between the parties in another state.

4. Construction of the act of congress of 26th May, 1790 [1 Stat. 122], entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings in each state, shall be authenticated, so as to take effect in every other state." In a judgment obtained in one state, against a person residing in another state, who had no notice of the suit, the remedy of the defendant is by application to the court, in which the judgment was entered. The attorney and the plaintiff are answerable in damages to the defendant, so also is the officer to whom the process was delivered; if the judgment was entered by default.

[Cited in Taylor v. Carpenter, Case No. 13,785.]

5. An attorney, who enters an appearance in a suit, without authority, is answerable in damages, for the injury he may thereby have occasioned the parties.

[Cited in Lewis v. Sumner, 13 Metc. (Mass.) 272.]

This was an action of debt, brought against Joel Gibbs and Martin Gibbs, for two thousand seven hundred and three dollars and fifty-eight cents. The first count in the declaration, was for fourteen hundred dollars; upon a judgment. obtained by the plaintiff, against these defendants, in the court of common pleas for the county of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania. The second count was for thirteen hundred and three dollars and fifty-eight cents, for goods sold and delivered. To this declaration, Martin Gibbs pleads, as to the first count, that at the time when the proceedings in the said count mentioned, were commenced, and always, before and since, he was a citizen of New Jersey, residing and commorant in the county of Burlington, in the said state; that no writ of summons or capias, or other process, was served upon him to answer the plaintiff in that suit, nor had he any notice or opportunity to defend himself in that suit; that he never appeared in the said court in the said suit, nor did he ever consent to any of the proceedings, or authorise any person to consent for him, thereto; therefore he says, said judgment, as to him, is void. As to the second count he pleaded nil debet, and tendered an issue which was joined. To the plea in bar to the first count, the plaintiff demurred generally, in which there was a joinder by the defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The question for the consideration of the court is, whether the matter stated in the plea to the first count, is sufficient. in point of law, to bar the plaintiff from recovering upon the judgment set forth in that count. Upon examining the record of this judgment, it appears by the declaration, that Martin and Joel Gibbs, were attached to answer the plaintiff, in that suit; and both of the defendants appeared by John P. Ripley, their attorney, and pleaded several pleas. In every succeeding stage of that cause, until the judgment was rendered, it is stated in the record, that both defendants appeared by the same attorney. The question then is, can the defendant, Martin Gibbs. plead in bar of the count on this judgment, that he was not served with process, and did not appear in the cause, or authorise any person to appear for him? The general rule of law, to which I know of no exception, is, that nothing can be assigned for error, nor can any averment be admitted, which contradicts a record. "A record," says Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 260), "imports in itself such uncontrollable credit and verity, that it admits of no averment, plea. or proof to the contrary; for otherwise there would never be an end of the controversy."

If then, the present suit had been brought in a court of the state of Pennsylvania, there could have been no doubt as to the insufficiency of this plea; because it alleges facts, which are in direct opposition to the record. See the cases in 2 Bac. Abr. 219. Is there any difference where the action is brought in one state, upon a judgment rendered in another? I think not. In the case of Green v. Sarmiento [Case No. 5,760], which was tried in the Pennsylvania circuit court, in October, 1810, the court decided, that a judgment rendered in one state, is conclusive between the parties in every other state; precisely in like manner as it would be, had a suit been brought upon the judgment in a court of the state. where that judgment was rendered. The opinion given in that case, proceeded upon the ground, that the act of congress of the 26th May, 1790 [supra], was intended to carry into effect, that part of the first section of the fourth article of the constitution, which declares, "that congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the different states, should be proved, and the effects thereof" as evidence.

The constitution declares. that they shall be entitled "to full faith and credit;" and consequently, no law was necessary or would have been proper, to make them evidence. The law therefore in using the words, "full faith and credit," must have meant to express the effect, to which they were to be entitled in other states. Such is declared by the title of the law to be the design of it. If, to use the words of Lord Coke again, a record imports in itself such uncontrollable credit and verity, that it admits of no averment, plea, or proof to the contrary; and on this account, nothing would be heard in a Pennsylvania court, in contradiction to this record; can it be said. that a New Jersey court, in allowing this plea. gives to the judgment such faith and credit, as would be given to it in the state of Pennsylvania? It is impossible that this can be seriously asserted. But what, it may be asked, is to be done, if the judgment has been obtained against a person, residing out of the state, who was never served with process, or even notified of the existence of the suit, in which it was rendered.[2] I answer, that his remedy is the same, and no other, as would be open to him, if the suit had been brought in the state, where the judgment was rendered. The court in which the judgment was given, would upon motion, accompanied by sufficient proof, stay the execution, and set aside the judgment. Most certainly, if the attorney, who, without authority, entered the appearance, be not clearly able to answer in damages for the injury he has occasioned, the parties will be responsible. That the attorney in such case, is liable for such damages, there can be no doubt.

If the judgment was entered by default, for non-appearance upon a false return of the officer, the officer is liable. The injury complained of in this case, might have resulted, if the defendant had lived in Pennsylvania, and this suit been brought there; but he could not have pleaded the same matter in bar of the action on the judgment, which he has pleaded in this suit; nor can a sound reason be given, why it can be pleaded in this court. I am therefore of opinion that the plea to the first count is bad, and that judgment upon that count must be for the plaintiff.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Case No. 4,767.

FIELD v. INSURANCE CO. OF NORTH AMERICA.

[6 Biss. 121.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. June, 1874.

OVER-VALUATION FOR INSURANCE — BURDEN OF PROOF — CONDITION OF TITLE — ESTOPPEL — PROOFS OF LOSS—WAIVER OF PROOFS—OWNERSHIP OF INSURED PROPERTY—VALUE—INTEREST.

1. A provision in a policy that "if the insured shall cause the property to be insured for more than its value, the policy shall be void," only avoids the policy in case of intentional over-valuation or fraudulent concealment. This is particularly true where an agent of the company was requested to examine the property, or had an opportunity so to do.

2. Burden of proof is upon the company to show that the over-valuation was intentional.

3. Though the policy provides that if the property is leasehold, or held otherwise than by absolute ownership, it must be so represented to the company and expressed in the policy, or the insurance will be void, yet if at the time of issuing the policy the agent of the company knew the actual condition of the title to the property, and failed or neglected to make the proper note in the policy, it cannot be avoided on that ground.

4. If these are presented in apt time, and are substantially in compliance with the requirements of the policy, that is sufficient, unless the company asks for more specific proof.

[2] See the case of Borden v. Fitch, 15 Johns. 121, where the principles decided in this case are discussed with great ability.

5. If the adjuster of the company, after examining the premises, stated to the insured that the company was not liable, on the ground of the invalidity of the policy, such facts may be considered as a waiver of the proofs of loss.

6. If the property was insured as belonging to the wife, and the ownership lies between the husband and wife, and the former is estopped from claiming it, then the title is sufficient in the wife to support the action on the policy.

7. Value of insured property is for the jury to determine.

8. Interest may be allowed after the expiration of sixty days from the furnishing of proofs of loss.

Bennett, Kretzinger & Johnson, for plaintiff.

I. When the agent of the insurance company is advised of all the facts at and before the policy is issued, and the agent makes out the application and policy, the company are bound, notwithstanding the errors of the agent in writing the application, or the failure to state all the facts in the application, or to comply with a condition in the policy requiring an indorsement on the policy. Wharton & Canfield, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge (charging jury). This is an action on a policy of insurance issued by the defendant, dated on the 20th of January, 1872, whereby defendant insured the plaintiff against loss by fire for the term of one year, for the sum of $3,000, upon her two-story frame warehouse, size, 22x40 feet, with addition, 16x24 feet, used for shelling corn and elevating by horse-power, and for storing grain, situate on lot five in block four, in Galva, Illinois, and which policy at the expiration of the year was renewed and extended for the term of another year.

The property insured was destroyed by fire on or about the 20th day of March, 1873, while the policy by the terms of renewal remained in full force.

The defendant having refused to pay the loss, this suit is brought.

No question is made by the defendant as to the fact of the issue of the policy or its extension, nor is it denied that the property insured was destroyed by fire during the life of the policy. The defendant, however, denies its liability in this case upon the following grounds.

1st. That the property in question was insured for more than its value, and the policy thereby became void.

2nd. That the plaintiff was not at the time the said insurance was effected, nor at the time of said loss, the owner in fee of the lot on which the building in question stood, and the nature of the plaintiff's title to or interest in said lot was not expressed in writing in the policy.

3d. That plaintiff did not within apt time after the loss, render to defendant proper proofs of loss as required by the terms of the policy.

4th. Defendant insists that plaintiff was not at the time of the issuing of the said policy, nor at the time of the fire, the owner of the property insured, but that the same was in fact, owned by her husband Solomon Field.

5th. That even if defendant is liable at all to plaintiff on this policy, the value of the property is far less than is claimed by plaintiff.

I will consider the various points made by the defendant in their order.

That the policy is void because the plaintiff has caused the property to be insured for more than its value.

The policy contains a provision that "if the insured shall cause the property to be insured for more than its value, the policy shall be void."

The fair and legal meaning of this language is that if the insured shall intentionally obtain insurance on her property to an amount greater than its value, with a design thereby of obtaining, in case of loss, more than her property was fairly worth, she shall forfeit her policy.

It is a clause to prevent fraudulent over-valuation, and intended to deprive men of the benefit of such intentional over-valuation. But the clause does not render void a policy for such slight over-estimates of value as may be reasonably accounted for from difference of opinion as to value.

Value is always to a considerable extent a matter of opinion and judgment, and it would not be right to hold a policy void for over-valuation when it was clear from the proof that there was no intention to deceive, and when there was room for an honest difference of opinion. And this is especially true when the insurer, through its agent, has an equally good opportunity with the insured to ascertain the value of the property, and when the value is a matter of discussion between the parties at the time the insurance is effected, and the agent is requested to personally examine the property, and act upon his own judgment as to its value. In such cases, unless some fraudulent concealment of material facts is shown, the over-valuation must appear from the proof to be very considerable and palpable, and to have been intentional, to avoid the policy under this clause.

In this case plaintiff has introduced proof tending to show that defendant's agent was requested to examine the property and place all the insurance upon it that it would bear; that the agent lived in the same town where the property was located, and had some personal knowledge of the property. If you believe this testimony, then you ought not to find this policy void for over-valuation, unless you are satisfied that the agent was in some way imposed upon and induced to issue the policy for the amount in question, by reason of something more than a mere error of judgment on the part of the plaintiff or her agent as to the value of the property. On this branch of the defense, the defendant has the laboring oar and must make out the charge of intentional over-valuation by a preponderance of evidence.

As to the second point insisted upon, the policy contains this clause, "If the property insured be held in trust or on commission, or by a leasehold or other interest not amounting to absolute or sole ownership, or if the building insured stands on leased ground, it must be so represented to the company and expressed in the policy in writing; otherwise the insurance will be void." The main object of this clause is to prevent parties from insuring property in which they have no insurable interest. It is admitted by the plaintiff in this case that she did not own the fee simple title to the lot on which the property insured stood, but that she did own the building, and moved it on the lot under a verbal arrangement with the owner, whereby she was to pay the taxes and have the privilege or option of buying the lot for $400, whenever she saw fit to do so, and the owner was not to sell to any one else without notifying plaintiff and giving her the privilege of buying at the price stipulated. There is nothing in this policy to indicate that plaintiff's interest in the lot is less than a fee-simple title. The insurance is upon her two-story frame warehouse, situate on lot 5, block 4, etc. Upon the face of the policy it would appear that she claimed to be the owner of the lot as well as the building; that is, there being no expression to the contrary, such would be the legal inference from the language of the policy itself. The agent of the defendant, who wrote the policy, testified that when the application for the policy was made, the husband of plaintiff, who signed the application in her behalf, said, when asked about the title of the lot, that he had as good as bought it, while the evidence on the part of the plaintiff tends to show that when the application was made, a full and true statement of the facts in regard to the terms on which the warehouse had been moved upon the lot was made to defendant's agent, and he was referred to the owner of the lot for further information in regard to the matter. You will observe in this connection that no answer was written into the application in reply to the question as to the title. This application is filled up by defendant's local agent at Galva, but whether signed by plaintiff's husband in her behalf in blank and filled up afterwards by the agent, or whether filled as far as it now is before he signed it, is a matter upon which there is a conflict of evidence. If, however, you are satisfied from all the evidence in the case, that at the time the policy was issued the agent of defendant knew the actual condition of the title to the lot,—that is, knew that plaintiff was occupying the lot under a verbal contract with the owner for the occupation or purchase of the same at her option,—and failed or neglected to write into this application or policy such statements in regard to the title, then defendant cannot avoid this policy by reason of the failure to express in the policy the exact terms of plaintiff's interest in the lot. In other words, it is a question of fact for you to determine from the evidence whether the agent of the defendant knew at the time he issued this policy to the plaintiff, that she did not own the fee-simple title to said lot; and if you find he did so know, then his failure to make a proper note of the fact in the policy does not render the policy void. It was the duty of the agent to have made this explanation as to the title if he knew the facts, and the company will not be allowed to take advantage of his neglect in that particular, if he had such information.

As to the third point of the defense, the policy requires that the assured shall give immediate notice of the loss, "and as soon thereafter as possible render a particular account and proof thereof, signed and sworn to by him," and a failure to do so forfeits all claim under the policy. The defendant claims that plaintiff has not complied with this condition.

Plaintiff claims, first, that she did in apt time—that is, on the 14th day of April, 1873—render the proofs of loss required; second, that defendant, by its own action, waived the rendering of the proofs of loss.

It is admitted that plaintiff did furnish to defendant, on the 14th day of April, 1873, a proof of loss duly sworn to, but defendant insists that it does not comply with the policy, because she does not state her interest in the property insured, nor does she state in detail the nature of her ownership of the property. It being admitted that plaintiff did submit to defendant what purported to be and was intended as a proof of loss, in compliance with this condition of the policy, it is a question of law whether such proof was sufficient, no question being raised at the time; and I instruct you that the proof rendered was a substantial compliance with the terms of the policy. True, it might have been more specific, but it stated substantially all that she was required to state. That is, it gave the full written portions of the policy and all the indorsements thereon. It stated there was no other insurance, which is admitted to be the fact; it stated the actual cash value of the property at the time immediately preceding the fire; it stated that the property belonged to the plaintiff, which, I think, was a substantial compliance with the requirement that she should state the ownership and interest of the assured. It also states the purposes for which the building was occupied and by whom, the date of the loss and amount, and how the fire originated if known.

But as there is testimony in the case tending to show a waiver of proof of loss, I shall also ask you to make a special finding upon this point as a question of fact.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff, bearing on this point, tends to show that, a few days after the fire in question, Mr. Holden, who was a general agent and adjuster for defendant, went to Galva and had an interview with plaintiff and her husband; that after being fully informed in regard to the condition of plaintiff's title to the lot, he informed plaintiff or her husband that the company was not liable for said loss, by reason of the failure to truly state the title to the lot in the policy, and only offered to make some small payment by way of gratuity or to save a law-suit. If you are satisfied from the evidence that defendant by its agent, did refuse to pay said loss on the ground of the invalidity of the policy for the reason stated, such facts may be considered by you as tending to show a waiver of the proofs of loss; for it may be properly asked, why should plaintiff be required to submit proofs as to the nature and extent of her loss, if defendant did not intend to pay or even examine such proofs, but placed its refusal to pay on entirely other grounds, which the proofs of loss called for by the policy could not remove or do away with?

As to the fourth point, whether the plaintiff was the owner of the warehouse at the time of the loss and at the time the policy was issued, you have heard all the proof. It is admitted that plaintiff was the wife of Solomon Field at the time this policy issued, and at the time of the loss. She claims to have purchased the property with her own means, and I take it there can be no doubt it was either hers or her husband's; at least defendant does not contend that it belonged to any one else. If the husband, by his dealing with defendant, had estopped himself from claiming the property, that is, if he had insured it as the plaintiff's, then, as between plaintiff and defendant, she had the right to assert the ownership and take the insurance. You have heard all the proof on this question of ownership, and can say whether the plaintiff has or has not shown an ownership of this property as against defendant. And, finally, as to the value of the property destroyed which was covered by the policy, it is for you to say under the proof what that value was. If you are satisfied from the evidence that the building and addition insured, with the machinery, excluding the fanning-mill, was of the value of $3,000 at the time of the fire; then the plaintiff will be entitled to recover that amount with interest at six per cent., since the expiration of sixty days after proofs of loss were furnished or waived.

If it was worth less than that amount, then she will be entitled to recover what it is found by you to be worth under the proof, with interest.

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, fixing damages at $3,000, and also found that proofs of loss had been waived by defendant.

NOTE. If the insured, with intent to defraud, makes claim for a larger loss than he actually sustained, he forfeits his rights. Huchberger v. Home Ins. Co. [Case No. 6,821]; Same v. Merchants' Fire Ins. Co. [Id. 6,822]. As to the agency of a solicitor, and forfeiture of policy and waiver, consult Cahill v. Andes Ins. Co. [Id. 2,289], and notes thereto. CARRIERS — DELIVERY OF CARGO TO CONSIGNEE — USAGE OF PORT.

[1. Delivery of cargo according to the usage of the port is equivalent to delivery to the consignee personally or at his warehouse.]

[Distinguished in The Ben Adams, Case No. 1,289.]

[2. A vessel is not responsible in rem for cargo lost from the pier through negligence of her officers, but after delivery to the consignee.]

In admiralty.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This was a libel upon a bill of lading for alleged non-delivery of cargo. The bill of lading was given by the master at New Orleans, for 32 hogsheads of sugar, to be delivered to the libelants [Barnum W. Field and others] at New York, and the libelants claimed that one of them had never been delivered.

HELD BY THE COURT: That the contract of the vessel was to transport and deliver the goods laden on board according to the terms of the affreightment. She assumed no further obligation, and no further one can be imposed upon her in relation to that undertaking after it has been fulfilled. That a delivery according to the usage of the port is equivalent to one to the consignee personally or at his warehouse. That the testimony is clear that the usage in the port of New York in the foreign and coasting trade is to deliver goods on proper wharves within the harbor upon reasonable previous notice of the time of unlading, and that the mode of delivery in this case conformed to that rule. That the weighmaster and porter of the libelant, when they came on Saturday to remove the sugars from the pier, did object that all the thirty-two hogsheads had not been fully unladen for the consignee, but they did state that one hogshead was not found in the number landed, having the requisite marks upon it. The officers of the ship insisted that it had been discharged, and would be found upon the pier. Probable proof is furnished that one of two hogsheads, which were not removed from the wharf on Saturday, was purloined in charge of the persons taking it away. If such loss is owing to misconduct or negligence on the part of officers of the ship as bailees of the property, the blame is imputable to them personally, because of acts or omissions, after the sugar was out of the charge of the vessel, and cannot be attached to her, and a remedy therefor pursued in this form of action. The sugars were by law in possession of the consignees the moment they were lawfully out of the vessel and free of her custody and control, and neither the omission of the master or mate, or their positive misfeasance in respect to the cargo, could be longer charged upon the vessel.

Libel dismissed with costs.

FIELD v. LOWNSDALE et al.

[Deady, 288.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Sept. 18, 1867.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — DETERMINATION OF JURISDICTION BY FEDERAL COURT — CAUSE PENDING AGAINST SEVERAL DEFENDANTS — APPLICATION FOR REMOVAL BY ONE OR MORE — ACT OF JULY 27, 1866.

1. Notwithstanding the order of a state court allowing a petition for removal of a cause to an United States circuit court, the national court must determine for itself the question of its jurisdiction, and if it appears that any of the defendants are not entitled to such removal, the cause as to them must be remanded.

2. An application to a state court for removal of a cause need not be made at the same time by all the defendants, though under the construction given to section 12 of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 79) all the defendants must have been entitled to such removal.

[Cited in Northern Pac. Terminal Co. v. Lowenberg, 18 Fed. 343.]

3. Certain defendants not served or appearing in the state court when an order of removal was made, are not affected by it, and as to them the cause is still pending in that court, and must be removed by its order upon the petition of such defendants, before they can come into the national court.

4. The act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), gives each defendant in a cause the right of removal without reference to the status of his co-defendant, "if the suit is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerns him, without the presence of the other defendants, as parties in the cause."

5. A suit to quiet title to real property against several defendants, who, as alleged in the bill, claim to be the owners of the same as tenants in common, "is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy," as to each defendant, without the presence of the other, as a party in the cause, and therefore within the act of July 27, 1866, aforesaid.

W. W. Chapman, for complainant.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Matthew P. Deady, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

W. W. Page and W. Lair Hill, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit was commenced in the circuit court of the state for the county of Multnomah, on April 8, 1867. On May 23, 1867, the circuit court of the state made an order transferring the cause to this court. In pursuance of this order, copies of the complaint, process and order were filed in this court on August 30, 1867.

The order of removal recites, that it was made on the petition of the defendants, James P. O. Lownsdale, William E. Cooper, Mary E. Cooper, Millard O. Lownsdale, by his guardian, J. P. O. Lownsdale, Ruth A. Lownsdale, by her guardian John A. Blanchard, and Ida Squires, and that it appears from the petition that the plaintiff is a citizen of Oregon, and that Ida Squires is a citizen and resident of the state of Kentucky. At the date of the order of removal, it does not appear that the other defendants, namely, Robert [John R.] Lamb and Emma his wife, and William and Isabella Ellen Potter had been served with process or appeared in the suit. The order of removal is in terms unqualified, and removes the whole cause.

On September 9, 1867, the plaintiff filed a motion in this court, praying that the cause be remanded to the state court, for the reasons following: 1. It does not appear that this court has jurisdiction by removal. 2. The defendants were not all in court when the petition for removal was presented. 3. A part of the suit is yet pending in the said state courts. 4. The grounds of removal are insufficient.

The order of removal made in the state court is not conclusive upon the question of jurisdiction in the federal court. Notwithstanding this removal, this court must determine for itself whether it can take jurisdiction of the cause. This proposition has, I believe, never been disputed, and is expressly affirmed in New Jersey v. Babcock [Case No. 10,163]; Ward v. Arredondo [Id. 17,148]; Illius v. New York & N. H. Ry. Co., 3 Kern. [13 N. Y.] 598. The first and fourth grounds of the motion to remand are general and may be passed over for the present.

The second ground is not maintainable. The application to remove need not be made at the same time by all of the defendants. If the defendants in court were required to delay the motion for removal until all the defendants appeared or were brought into court, the result might be that the time for making the motion would pass by, and the right to a removal be lost. Ward v. Arredondo [supra].

The third ground of the motion assumes that the cause as to all of the defendants must be removed at once. But by the authority just referred to, it appears that the law has been held otherwise. Besides, as a matter of fact, the order of removal purports to transfer the whole cause to this court. I suppose that counsel for the plaintiff mean to insist, as a matter of law, that the cause is still in the state court as to the defendants—the Lambs and Potters. As to these defendants the cause is not in this court. They are not included in the order of removal, and the fair presumption from the whole record is, that they were not before the state court, when the order was made. They cannot enter an original appearance in this court, but only in the state court. They can only come into this court in pursuance of an order of the state court where the suit was commenced.

But it may be that the state court did not deem it necessary to a determination of this cause, that these absent defendants should be brought before it; and in this view of the matter, in making the order of removal, it may have regarded them as if they had not been named in the complaint. Or, it may have appeared to the court that it was by the plaintiff's neglect or contrivance that these defendants were not brought before it, or that they, or some of them, were fictitious persons or dead, and that, therefore, the defendants in court should not on that account be delayed in or denied their application for removal. I do not deem it necessary to decide this question absolutely, and only make these suggestions to prevent the contrary from being taken for granted if the question should arise in this court hereafter.

As the law stood up to the passage of the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), the removal of a cause from the state court to the national court, was governed by section 12 of the judiciary act. 1 Stat. 79. The uniform—though not the most obvious—construction of that act has been that all the defendants must be entitled to have the cause removed. In other words, all the defendants, either as being aliens or citizens of another state, must be entitled to sue in the national courts. Smith v. Rines [Case No. 13,100]; New Jersey v. Babcock [supra]; Ward v. Arredondo [supra]; Wilson v. Blodget [Case No. 17,792]. The only exceptions to this construction were the instances in which the defendants, who were residents and citizens of the state, were merely nominal or technical parties, without a beneficial interest in the controversy. Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 451.

Taking section 12 of the judiciary act, with its received construction as the rule regulating removals, and this motion to remand would have to be allowed. Of all the defendants who appeared at the state court and joined in the petition for removal, only one of them—Ida Squires—appears to be a citizen of another state than Oregon. When the jurisdiction of this court depends upon the character of the parties, it must appear affirmatively and cannot be presumed. For the purposes of this question of jurisdiction, the defendants before this court, except Ida Squires, must be considered as not being entitled to sue in this court, and therefore not entitled to remove a cause there from the state court.

By the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), it is provided that when a suit is commenced "in a state court against an alien, or by a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought against a citizen of another state, * * * and if the suit so far as relates to the alien defendant or to the defendant who is a citizen of a state other than that in which the suit is brought, is or has been instituted for the purpose of restraining or enjoining him, or if the suit is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerns him, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause, then in every such case the alien defendant or the defendant who is a citizen of the state other than that in which the suit is brought, may at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause, file a petition for the removal of the cause as against him, into the next circuit court of the United States to be held in the district where the suit is pending, * * * and it shall be thereupon the duty of the state court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the cause as against the defendant so applying for its removal. * * * And such removal of the cause, as against the defendant petitioning therefor, into the United States court, shall not be deemed to prejudice or take away the right of the plaintiff to proceed at the same time with the suit in the state court as against the other defendants, if he shall desire to do so."

This act in a measure obviates the difficulty, not to say hardship, which arose from the early construction given to section 12 of the judiciary act. By the constitution of the United States, and even the letter of that act, a certain class of defendants—aliens and citizens of other states—when sued in a state court are entitled to have the cause removed into the proper national court. Yet by this construction they were debarred of this right if they were joined with a codefendant who was not so entitled.

Still, as to all these defendants, except Ida Squires, this cause must be remanded to the state court. As between them and the plaintiff, it is simply a controversy between citizens of the same state, who are supposed to have the same standing in the local forum, and with regard to whom the law presumes there exists neither prejudice nor favor on account of nationality or residence. The judicial power of the United States, so far as it depends upon the character of the parties, does not extend to a controversy between citizens of the same state. And although there are many reasons why it should be held to extend to the whole of a controversy, where some only of the defendants are aliens or citizens of another state—as in this case—at present, it is sufficient to say, that congress has not seen proper to provide for its exercise to that extent.

The only remaining question is, has this court jurisdiction of this cause as to the defendant Ida Squires? To answer this question it is necessary to consider the nature of the suit and the relation of Ida Squires to the subject of it and the parties thereto. From the complaint, it appears that the ancestor of Ida Squires conveyed block G. in the town of Portland, to W. W. Chapman, and that the plaintiff is in the possession and claims title by a regular chain of conveyances from Chapman to the north half of said block. The conveyance to Chapman is dated June 25, 1850. The complaint further alleges that the defendants, inclusive of Ida Squires, "are setting up some claim to the premises, tending to cast a cloud over the plaintiff's title," and therefore prays a decree against all the defendants, that they "be barred of setting up any claim or demand" to the premises in question. This is the subject of the suit—the title to the north half of block G, and the object of it is to quiet the title of the plaintiff thereto. If the defendants have any interest at law or in equity in the premises they must claim as the heirs of their ancestor, or the donees of the United States. In that case they must claim as tenants in common. If so, the interest of each in the land would be distinct from that of the other, and the suit might be separate as to each of them, either to quiet the title of the plaintiff or by the defendants for the purpose of recovering their supposed interest in the land. This being so, there can be no doubt but that the case falls exactly within the provision of the act of July 27, 1866—"The suit is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy so far as it concerns Ida Squires, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause."

An order will be entered remanding the cause as to all the defendants named in the order of removal except Ida Squires, and as to her the motion to remand is denied. This order is to be understood as in no way affecting the cause as to the defendants—the Lambs and Potters—who appear not to have been before the state court, when the order of removal was made. If they, or either of them, should hereafter appear or be brought into the state court, and that court should deem it proper to order a removal of the cause, as to them, the question of jurisdiction, as to such defendants, can then be considered in this court.

[NOTE. Subsequently, an order of removal was made in the case of the Lambs and others, and a motion to remand to the state court was denied (Case No. 4,775), it appearing that this court had jurisdiction of the cause.]

FIELD v. MOULSON.

[2 Wash. C. C. 155.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1808.

OMISSION OF CONSIGNEE TO OBJECT TO INVOICE—PRESUMPTION AS TO RECEIPT OF GOODS — ACCOUNT OF SALES—PRESUMPTION AS TO PRICES—EVIDENCE.

1. An invoice of goods received by the consignee, retained by him, and not objected to, and the truth of it not disproved, is evidence that all the goods enumerated in it were received by the consignee.

2. If a consignee has rendered no account of sales of merchandise for many years, and at the trial offers no evidence to prove what part was sold, and at what prices, there is every presumption that the goods were sold at the invoice prices.

3. The plaintiffs offered to read an entry in the books of the bankrupt, to prove an item in the account against the defendant; but the court would not permit it.

Action [by Field's assignees] for goods sold and delivered. The plaintiffs proved that Field had, as long ago as 1794, consigned a quantity of goods to the defendant to sell on commission, by a letter, which the defendant, being called upon by the plaintiffs, produced in court on the trial, with an invoice enclosed; making the amount two hundred and fifty-four pounds one shilling and ten pence. In the letter, the bankrupt stated the goods to be unsaleable, and that he expected they would hardly sell for two-thirds, or one-half of the invoice price. The defendant could not show that he had rendered the bankrupt any account, or given him any information respecting the goods so consigned, nor did he produce any evidence upon the subject. The defence was, that the plaintiffs ought to prove that all the goods mentioned in the invoice were actually sent, and that they were sold; otherwise, the plaintiffs could only recover as much as the defendant was willing to admit.

Mr. Serjeant, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Shoemaker, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). An invoice of goods, received by a consignee, retained, and not objected to, and the truth of it in no manner disproved, is evidence that all the articles enumerated in it, were received by the consignee; and if the consignee has rendered no accounts of sale, particularly after so many years, and at the trial offers no evidence to prove what part was sold, and at what prices; every presumption is against him, that he sold them at the invoice prices. But in this case, as the bankrupt stated in the letter which covered the invoice, that they would not probably sell for so much, the jury will say what damages the plaintiffs are entitled to receive.

Verdict for 447 dollars and 13 cents.

COSTS—REMOVAL FROM STATE COURT—RECOVERY OF LESS THAN $500.

1. In a suit brought in a state court, to recover back an excess of duties paid to a collector, and removed to this court, where the plaintiff recovers here under $500 and over $50, and the case is one in which the plaintiff would have recovered costs in the state court, if the suit had not been removed, he is entitled to recover, in this court, the costs of the suit in this court, although, if the suit had been originally brought in this court, he would have recovered no costs.

[Cited in Wolf v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., Case No. 17,924; Scripps v. Campbell, Id. 12,562; Kreager v. Judd, 5 Fed. 28; Jerman v. Stewart, 12 Fed. 275.]

2. Neither a docket fee, nor any item of costs, is taxable, on a reference to the collector, in a suit to recover back an excess of duties, to adjust the amount of the recovery, nor are any costs taxable for such adjustment.

This was an appeal from the taxation of a bill of costs by the clerk [in the suit of Benjamin H. Field against Augustus Schell, collector of the port of New York. See Case No. 4,772.]

John McKeon, for plaintiff.
James I. Roosevelt, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This suit was originally brought in a state court, to recover back an excess of duties paid to the collector, and was removed to this court under the act of congress of 1833 [4 Stat. 633]. The amount recovered was under $500, but over $50, which would have entitled the plaintiff to costs in the state court. The clerk refused to tax any costs in behalf of the plaintiff, on the ground that the recovery was less than $500. It is admitted that, if the suit had been commenced in this court, no costs could have been recovered, within the 20th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73]. The case, however, does not fall within that section, as the suit was commenced in a state court, and removed to this court, under the act stated. The question is not, therefore, necessarily concluded by the act of 1789.

I had occasion to look into the subject of costs in civil cases, on a question of taxation, and to express an opinion upon it, which is reported in Costs in Civil Cases [Append. Fed. Cas.] and came to the conclusion, that, although the right to recover costs by the prevailing party, with the exception of a few cases, was not given in express terms, yet the general right was recognized in the judiciary act of 1789, and in numerous acts of congress passed since down to the present day. See, also, Conkling's Treatise, under the head of "Costs," pt. 2, c. 2, § 7, subd. 4, and S. D. Law's work on the Jurisdiction and Powers of the U. S. Courts, p. 255. Even the judiciary act of 1789 does not give costs in express terms. I have said that this case does not come within the prohibition of the 20th section of that act, and hence, if the plaintiff, as the prevailing party, is entitled to costs under the right as generally recognized by acts of congress and the usage and practice of the courts, there can be no well-rounded objection to the allowance of costs in the present instance; and, although the question is one not without difficulty, I am inclined to think that the case comes within this generally-recognized right, and that the costs should have been taxed by the clerk. That officer was doubtless controlled by the case of Coggill v. Lawrence [Case No. 2,957], and it must be admitted that some expressions in the opinion would lead to a denial of costs in the present case. But, in that case, the plaintiff would not have been entitled to costs in the state court, if the suit had not been removed, which distinguishes it from this one. Let the case be referred back to the clerk, for taxation according to the rules and practice of the court.

I observe one item in the bill which I feel bound to notice, by way of instruction to the clerk in this and all like cases. It is a docket fee on a reference to the custom-house. This is an abuse that has recently sprung up in the trial of these revenue cases, and must be corrected. The reference to the collector is simply to apply the rate of duty settled by the court to the goods entered. It is a matter of convenience to the court, and, so far as my experience goes, has always been adopted by the consent of counsel. It is simply a matter of arithmetic or calculation, and the collector is presumed to be the most familiar with the service. He applies the rate of duty which should have been applied at the entry of the goods. An effort seems to be made to turn this informal proceeding, adopted for the convenience of counsel and court, into a second trial or hearing of the case, which cannot be admitted. Even if the court had power to refer, which it is understood it has not, the practice should not be countenanced. I have never known a reference in the federal courts, in a common law case. No costs of any description should be allowed for adjustment at the custom-house, nor in the state court.

REPEAL OF TARIFF ACTS—DUTY ON NON-ENUMERATED ARTICLES—ACT OF AUGUST 30, 1842.

The 20th section of the tariff act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 565), in regard to the rate of duty on non-enumerated articles, was not repealed by the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 42), or by the act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. 192).

[Cited in Cohen v. Phelps, Case No. 2,964.]

This was an action [by Benjamin H. Field] against [Augustus Schell] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an alleged excess of duties exacted by him on several importations of caustic soda, made after the passage of the tariff act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. 192). The defendant imposed upon the article a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem, which was paid under protest, the plaintiff claiming that it was liable to a duty of only four per cent., under the 20th section of the tariff act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat 565), on the ground that it resembled soda ash more nearly than it resembled any other article enumerated in the act of 1857, and that soda ash was, under that act, liable to a duty of only four per cent. Caustic soda was not enumerated in the tariff act of 1842, or in that of 1857, or in the tariff act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 42). The plaintiff introduced considerable evidence, to show that caustic soda bore a close similitude, in material, quality, and the uses to which it was applied, to soda ash. The court charged the jury, that if, from the evidence, they were satisfied that caustic soda resembled soda ash, in material, quality and the uses to which it was or might be applied, or either of them, more nearly than it resembled any other article enumerated in the act of 1857, then only four per cent. duty should have been charged on it, and their verdict ought to be rendered for the plaintiff, for the excess. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant now moved for a new trial, on the ground of an alleged misdirection of the court to the jury, in such charge.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SMALLEY, District Judge.

SMALLEY, District Judge. Whether there was error in the charge of the court, depends upon the question whether the 20th section of the tariff act of 1842 has been repealed by either the act of 1846 or the act of 1857. That 20th section provides, that "there shall be levied, collected and paid on each and every non-enumerated article which bears a similitude, either in material, quality, texture, or the use to which it may be applied, to any enumerated article chargeable with duty, the same rate of duty which is levied and charged on the enumerated article which it most resembles in any of the particulars before mentioned; and, if any non-enumerated article equally resembles two or more enumerated articles on which different rates of duty are chargeable, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on such non-enumerated article, the same rate of duty as is chargeable on the article it resembles paying the highest duty; and, on all articles manufactured from two or more materials, the duty shall be assessed at the highest rates at which any of its component parts may be chargeable." The 3d section of the act of 1846 provides, that, "from and after the first day of December next, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on all goods, wares, and merchandise imported from foreign countries, and not specially provided for in this act, a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem." The 11th section of the same act provides, "that all acts and parts of acts repugnant to the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed." These sections, considered by themselves, would seem to indicate, quite decidedly, an intention to repeal the 20th section of the act of 1842, and, if this was an open question, I should have had great difficulty in coming to the conclusion that such was not their design and effect. It cannot now, however, be regarded as an open question. The supreme court, in the case of Stuart v. Maxwell, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 150, after an elaborate argument and full consideration, decided, that there was no necessary repugnance between the act of 1846 and the 20th section of the act of 1842, and, consequently, that the former did not repeal the latter, and that the duty, which was in that case assessed under the 20th section of the act of 1842, was rightly assessed. The case turned upon that question, it was the only point made or decided, and this court must be governed by it.

It was argued by the defendant's counsel, that, in the case of Stuart v. Maxwell [supra], the government sought to avail itself of this 20th section to enforce the payment of a higher rate of duty than it would otherwise have been entitled to, and thus increase the revenue; and that that decision, being in favor of the government, was not applicable to this case. It is very difficult to see why, if this 20th section is to operate in favor of the government in one case, to increase the revenue, it should not operate in a similar case against it, although it may diminish the revenue. Why the government should be permitted to avail itself of this 20th section for the purpose of increasing the duties, and the importer should not be permitted, under the same or similar circumstances, to avail himself of it for the purpose of diminishing the duties, I am at a loss to conceive. But, if there could, at any time, have been a doubt upon that question, it is removed by the case of Ross v. Peaslee [Case No. 12,077], in which Mr. Justice Curtis (who delivered the opinion of the court in Stuart v. Maxwell) held, that this 20th section was in force, and did not operate to reduce the duties in that case, from twenty per cent. to five per cent.

This brings us to the act of 1857. Does that act repeal the 20th section of the act of 1842? There is much less reason for saying that it does, than for saying that the act of 1846 does. There is nothing in the act of 1857 which indicates any intention to extend the act of 1846, or in any way to change or interfere with the construction given thereto, further than generally to reduce the duties, and take certain articles from one schedule and place them in another, and put others into the free list. The case of Stuart v. Maxwell was decided in 1853, and that of Ross v. Peaslee in 1855. Congress can, therefore, hardly be supposed to have been ignorant of these decisions at the time the act of 1857 was passed; and I think it cannot be presumed that, with such knowledge, it intended to alter that important provision of the law, without some definite expression of that intention. There are no repealing words in the act of 1857, and neither from the phraseology nor from the general purpose of that act, can I see any reason for supposing that it was designed to have, on the 20th section of the act of 1842, an effect which the courts had decided the act of 1846 did not have. It is clear, that the words, "non-enumerated article," in the 20th section of the act of 1842, the words, "not specially provided for in this act," in the 3d section of the act of 1846, and the words "not enumerated in the said schedule," in the 1st section of the act of 1857, mean the same thing and should receive the same construction. The distinction attempted to be drawn between them by the defendant's counsel cannot be sustained. This view of the subject is fully sustained by the decision of Judge Giles, in the Maryland district, in a case precisely like this, and in relation to this same article. Gamble v. Mason [Case No. 5,209]. The result is, that the 20th section of the act of 1842 is not repealed either by the act of 1846 or by the act of 1857, but remains in force. There was, therefore, no error in the instructions given by the court to the jury, and there must be a judgment for the plaintiff, on the verdict.

LIABILITY OF SURETY IN EQUITY — DISCHARGE AT LAW — JOINT OBLIGATION — EFFECT OF SUBSEQUENT STATUTE.

1. Equity will not hold a surety liable, when he is discharged at law.

2. In the case of an obligation joint, and not joint and several, executed by a principal and a surety, and the death of the surety, the remedy at law is gone, as against the legal representatives of the surety.

[Cited in Hudelson v. Armstrong, 70 Ind. 101.]

3. No state statute, enacted after the making of such an obligation, can change the contract of the surety, to his prejudice.

[Cited in Randall v. Sackett, 77 N. Y. 482.]

In equity. This case came up on a demurrer to a bill filed against the defendant [Louis Emile] Lahens, and the representatives of John Lafarge, deceased, to enforce the collection of the amount payable by the condition of a bond executed by Lahens and Lafarge, on the issuing, in a state court, of an injunction to stay the proceedings in a suit at law pending in such court. The bond was joint, and not joint and several. Lafarge was only a surety, and was in no way interested in the proceedings in the state court. The bond was dated April 25th, 1846, and was conditioned to pay to the firm of Fielden Brothers, & Co., (of whom the plaintiffs [Thomas Fielden and William C. Pickersgill] were the survivors,) all moneys which might be recovered by them in such suit at law, or the collection of which might be stayed by such injunction. A judgment was recovered by the plaintiffs in the suit at law, for $129,429.52, and the suit in which the injunction was issued was dismissed. Lafarge died, and Lahens, who was a defendant in the suit at law, was insolvent when the judgment was recovered, and had petitioned for a discharge under the bankruptcy act of the United States [14 Stat. 517]. Lafarge left assets sufficient to satisfy the judgment. The demurrer was interposed by the representatives of Lafarge.

William W. McFarland, for plaintiffs.
Charles O'Conor, for defendants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This case is an important one, on account of the large amount involved, and the certainty that, unless it shall be recovered out of the assets of the estate of Lafarge, it will be lost. But, in my view of it, the principles that must govern it are not new or difficult. One branch of it falls directly within the doctrine of the case of U. S. v. Price, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 83, 90–95, and the cases there referred to. The principle is, that equity will not hold a surety liable, when he is discharged at law; and that, in the case of a joint obligation, and of the death of the surety, as in the present case, the remedy at law is gone, as it respects the legal representatives of the surety. The cases on this subject are numerous, and it would be useless to discuss them. Several of them will be found referred to in the opinion of the court in the case of U. S. v. Price [supra], and many more in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Woodbury in that case (pages 96–108).

It is urged, that certain provisions in the Code of Procedure of the state of New York have had the effect to change this rule, and to furnish a remedy at law against the representatives of a deceased joint obligor. That Code provides, in substance, that, in a suit upon a joint contract against defendants, a judgment may be rendered against any or either of them, severally. Sections 136, 274. These provisions were enacted after the date of the bond in question, and, if then operative and effectual to change the contract made by Lafarge, they must be disregarded, as the legislature possessed no such power. I agree, that if this bond had been joint and several, a suit at law might have been sustained against the representatives of Lafarge, and his estate would have been bound to pay the judgment and as, in such case, a joint suit could not have been maintained, at law, against the surviving obligor and the representatives of the deceased obligor, equity would have afforded relief. See cases in dissenting opinion of Woodbury, J., above referred to, pages 96–98. So, also, if the Code has the effect of converting this bond into a joint and several bond, and the legislature was competent to make the change, this suit is well brought, and should be sustained. But, as at present advised, I am of opinion that the provisions of the Code have no such effect; and, what is more important, if they purported to have such effect, they could not be upheld, on the ground that they would change a material part of the contract, to the prejudice of the surety. Lafarge, the obligor, did not agree to become severally bound, but jointly; and this distinction is so material, that bills are not unfrequently filed, and suits sustained or defeated, after a serious litigation to ascertain whether the bond, or other contract, was joint, or joint and several.

In any view, therefore, the demurrer must be sustained.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—UNDERVALUATION — PENALTY—TENDER OF FEES FOR REAPPRAISEMENT — PROTEST—ACT OF FEBRUARY 26, 1845.

1. Where the invoice value of iron was raised by the official appraisers, on appraisal, and duty on the increase in value and a penalty for under-valuation were imposed, and the importer, on making entry of the iron, served on the collector a written notice, protesting "against the said increased appraisement, and against the exaction of the said increased duty and penalty," but was, at the same time, asked if he desired an appraisement by merchant appraisers, under section 17 of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 564), and answered, that he did not or did not ask one, and did not offer the fees for such appraisement: Held, that if the protest might have amounted to notice of dissatisfaction with the appraisement under that section, had the notice been delivered without qualification, yet the assertion of the importer at the time, that he did not ask a re-appraisement, took from it that effect.

2. The importer was bound to offer the appraisers' fees for a re-appraisement, in order to put the collector in the wrong for not ordering one, and that, therefore, the appraisement by the official appraisers was conclusive as to value.

[Cited in Hedden v. Iselin, 31 Fed. 268.]

3. The protest did not comply with the act of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), and that, as it did not set forth distinctly the omission of the collector to order a re-appraisement, or that the appraisers valued the iron at the time of shipment and not at the time of purchase, as grounds of objection to the payment of the duties imposed, the importer could not raise those objections, in an action to recover back those duties.

This suit was brought [by Thomas Fielden and others] against [Cornelius W. Lawrence] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back penalties and increased duties imposed on importations of iron from Liverpool, upon which various entries were made, the additional duties amounting to $672, and the penalties to $2,264.60. The importations were made in 1847, and the appraisal was made under section 16 of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 563). The plaintiffs, at the time of making their several entries, addressed to the collector the following notice, varied only so as to adapt the description of iron to the particular entry:—"Sir: The custom-house appraisers having appraised —— bundles, &c., of iron at £——, thereby subjecting the iron to an increased duty, as well as a penalty of 20 per cent., which we are required to pay, in order to enter and obtain possession of the goods, we hereby protest against the said increased appraisement, and against the exaction of the said increased duty and penalty, and, in making payment, reserve to ourselves, or whom it may concern, the right to recover the same back by action or otherwise," &c. It was proved that, when the protest was made, the plaintiffs were asked by a deputy collector, if they desired an appraisement by merchant appraisers, pursuant to the act, and answered, that they did not or did not ask one. The points taken for the plaintiffs on the argument were, that the letter was notice to the collector, within the meaning of the act, of the dissatisfaction of the plaintiffs with the appraisement, and that thereupon it became the duty of the collector to order a re-appraisement, without which the first appraisal was void; and that the appraisal was void for the further reason, that the appraisers took the market value of the iron at the time of exportation, and not at the time of purchase.

THE COURT held: 1. That if the protest might have amounted to notice of dissatisfaction with the appraisement, within the meaning of section 17 of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 564), had the letter been delivered without qualification, yet the assertion of the plaintiffs, at the same time, to the collector, that they did not ask a re-appraisement, took from it that effect.

2. That a re-appraisement being at the expense of the importer, the plaintiffs were bound to offer the appraisers' fees, &c., in order to put the collector in the wrong for not ordering one; and that, as the plaintiffs did not take legal means to entitle themselves to a re-appraisal, the one made by the official appraisers was conclusive against them as to value.

3. That the protest did not comply with the requirements of the act of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), because it did not set forth, distinctly and specifically, the omission of the collector to order a re-appraisement, or that the appraisers valued the iron at the time of shipment and not at the time of purchase, as grounds of objection to the payment of the duties imposed; and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were not now entitled to raise those objections.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. July 21, 1868.

RIGHT OF REMOVAL TO FEDERAL COURT — STATUS OF CODEFENDANT—ACT OF MARCH 2, 1867.

1. The act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), gives each defendant in a cause the right of removal, without reference to the status of his co-defendants, "if the suit is one on which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerns him, without the presence of the other defendants, as parties in the cause."

[Cited in Goodenough v. Warren, Case No. 5,534.]

2. The act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558), does not in any particular repeal the act of 1866 (14 Stat. 306), but is supplemental thereto, and adds another cause for removal of cases from the state to the national courts.

[This was a suit by James Fields against John R. Lamb and Emma, his wife, to quiet the title of plaintiff to certain real property, claimed by defendants and others as tenants in common. A motion was made to remand the cause to the state court in which it was originally brought. A similar motion, made by the plaintiff, as to certain other defendants in the case of Field v. Lownsdale, Case No. 4,769, was allowed.]

W. W. Chapman, for complainant.

W. W. Page and W. Lair Hill, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit was commenced in the state court for the county of Multnomah, against the above named defendants and others; and afterwards, on March 17, 1868, upon the petition of such defendants, was, as to them removed into this court. The petition and order for removal was made under the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306). The complainant now moves this court to remand the cause to the state court, upon the ground that the order for the removal was made without authority of law.

From the petition it appears that Lamb and wife are citizens of the state of Kentucky; and it also appears from the complaint, that the suit is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerns these defendants, without the presence of those who are residents of the state of Oregon. This being so, the case is within the purview of the act of 1866, giving defendants the right of removal. Field v. Lownsdale [Case No. 4,769].

But counsel for the motion to remand insist that the act of July 27, 1866, is repealed and superseded by the act amendatory thereof, of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558). It is admitted that the latter act does not expressly repeal the former one, but, on the contrary, only purports to amend it. The two acts are upon the same subject and must be construed together; and unless the one, or some provision of it be manifestly repugnant to the other, they must both stand. Between these acts there is no repugnance. The latter is nothing more than what it purports to be, both in its title and body, an amendment of or supplement to the former, providing an additional cause of removal. The act of 1866 enables a defendant, who is an alien or non-resident, to remove a cause to this court, "so far as it concerns him," although his co-defendants may not be entitled to such removal, "if the suit is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, * * * without the presence of the other defendants, as parties in the cause." The reason of this enactment is obvious. Prior thereto, the removal of a cause on account of the citizenship of the parties, from the state to the national courts, was governed by section 12 of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 79). Upon the construction given to this section by the courts, an alien or non-resident defendant, if joined with a citizen of the state where the action was brought, was denied the right of removal, because his co-defendant was not entitled to it. Smith v. Rines [Case No. 13,100]; New Jersey v. Babcock [Id. 10,163]; Ward v. Arredondo [Id. 17,148]; Wilson v. Blodgett [Id. 17,792]; Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 451.

This technical construction of the act excluded many persons from the benefit of it, whose cases were fully within the reason of it. The term—"the defendant"—although used in the singular number, was construed in a collective sense, so as to include all the persons sued, be they many or few. If any of these persons were not aliens or non-residents, then this technical defendant, constituted of all the individual defendants, was held not to be an alien or non-resident, and therefore not entitled to a removal. To remedy this evil, so far as practicable, the act of 1866 was passed. The act of 1867 provides, that a citizen of another state, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, may remove a cause to the national court upon making an affidavit to the effect that he believes, that from prejudice or local influence, he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court. Between this provision and the act of 1866 there is neither conflict nor repugnance. Another cause of removal is simply added to those already provided. The latter act is supplemental to the earlier one. Neither was it necessary to make the affidavit in this case, required by the act of 1867. This removal was made under the act of 1866, on account of the citizenship of the parties solely, and not for the cause specified in the act of 1867—that the defendant believes he cannot obtain justice in the state court on account of "prejudice or local influence."

In conclusion, it is sufficient to say, that the act of 1867 does not repeal that of 1866, but amends it, not by changing it, but by adding thereto another cause of removal. They are both upon the same subject matter and can stand together without a shadow of repugnance or conflict in any particular. The removal was authorized, and the motion to remand is denied with costs.

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Feb. 15, 1868.

REAL PROPERTY — DIVISIBILITY OF COVENANTS RUNNING WITH THE LAND — SUIT BY ASSIGNEE OF COVENANT FOR TITLE AGAINST HEIR OF COVENANTOR—OREGON DONATION ACT — PRIOR POSSESSION—COVENANT TO CONVEY PARTICULAR TITLE—ESTOPPEL.

1. The assignee of a covenant for title, may maintain a suit to enforce the performance of such covenant, against the heir of the covenantor, to the extent of the interest inherited, although such covenant was the joint covenant of the ancestor and another, and such heir is not named therein.

[Cited in Hall v. Russell, Case No. 5,943.]

2. A covenant which runs with the land, is divisible into as many parts or interests as the land itself may be divided by subsequent successive conveyances, and the grantee of each parcel or interest may, as to the same, maintain suit upon such covenant against the original covenantor, or his legal representatives.

3. The donation act [of 1850 (9 Stat. 497)] does not include settlers upon the public lands in Oregon, who died before its passage—September 27, 1850.

4. One half of the land taken by a married settler, under the donation act, be it more or less, enures to the benefit of the wife; and she takes the same in her own right, as the direct donee of the United States, and not subject to any of the previous acts or contracts of the husband.

[Cited in Fitzpatrick v. Dubois, Case No. 4,842; Stevens v. Sharp, Id. 13,410.]

5. A grant to a settler under the donation act, does not take effect prior to the passage of such act, although made in consideration, or on account of prior residence and cultivation thereon.

[Cited in Mizner v. Vaughn, Case No. 9,678; Wythe v. Haskell, Id. 18,118; Bear v. Luse, Id. 1,179; U. S. v. Tichenor, 12 Fed. 421.]

6. On June 25, 1850, no law had been passed by congress for the disposal of the public lands in Oregon, and it was well known to all persons resident therein, that no one had any interest in such lands, except the bare possession, and on said day Lownsdale, Coffin and Chapman, by their deed, wherein they described themselves as proprietors of the town of Portland, Oregon, for a valuable consideration "thereby released, quitclaimed and confirmed" unto said Chapman, block G in said town, and delivered him the possession thereof; said deed contained two covenants—one of warranty against all claims, the United States excepted, and the other to convey the title of the United States if the covenantors obtained the same: Held, that the grantee in said deed took nothing thereby, except the actual interest of the grantors at the time—the possession.

[Cited in Lamb v. Wakefield, Case No. 8,024; Myers v. Reed, 17 Fed. 405; Wilson v. Fine, 38 Fed. 792.]

7. By the first of said covenants, Lownsdale, and those claiming under him, are rebutted from claiming any interest in block G, however acquired, except an interest or title derived from the United States.

8. Nancy Lownsdale, the wife of a settler under section 4 of the donation act, died intestate, after the provisions of such act had been complied with, and before the issuing of a patent for the donation, leaving her husband and four children living: Held, that her estate in the land was a qualified fee, and terminated with her life, and that the remainder was given by said section 4 directly to said husband and children in equal parts, who took the same as the donees of the United States, and not as the heirs of said Nancy; and that the interest thus acquired by said husband, is within the second of said covenants—the one for further assurance.

[Cited in Lamb v. Starr, Case No. 8,022; Mizner v. Vaughn, Id. 9,678; Lamb v. Davenport, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 313; Semple v. Bank of British Columbia, Case No. 12,660; Alexander v. Knox, Id. 170; Cutting v. Cutting, 6 Fed. 263; Traver v. Tribon, 15 Fed. 33.]

9. A covenant to convey a particular title if after acquired by the covenantor may be enforced by a suit in equity, if such covenantor neglect to perform the same, without a prior demand and refusal.

10. The possession delivered with the deed of June 25, 1850, was a sufficient estate to carry the covenants therein to the assignee thereof.

11. The prohibition contained in the proviso to section 4 of the donation act, does not include covenants or contracts made prior to the passage of such act.

12. The deed of June 25, 1850, is not within section 6 of the act of September 29, 1849, to regulate conveyances, and therefore cannot be construed as containing any covenants not specially set forth therein.

13. In the year 1860, Lownsdale being the owner of one fifth of Nancy's share of their donation as above stated, purchased the interest of Isabella Ellen, one of Nancy's children and died intestate, in 1862, leaving children; in 1864, the proper court of the state partitioned said Nancy's share of the donation, by giving three fifths thereof to Nancy, and the other two fifths to the heirs and vendees of said Lownsdale, and because of the inequality of said partition, required the two fifth tract to pay a certain amount of owelty to said children of Nancy: Held, that by this partition, Nancy's three children were divested of their interest in the two fifth tract, and Lownsdale's heirs were divested of their interest in the three fifth tract, and that Lownsdale's prior vendees of any particular parcel in this two fifth tract neither gained or lost by this partition, but can only claim that interest therein which their deeds from Lownsdale entitle them to, discharged from the owelty.

[This was a suit in equity by James Fields against Ida Squires, by her guardian, William E. Cooper.]

W. W. Chapman, for complainant.

W. W. Page and W. Lair Hill, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. By this suit the complainant seeks to have his title to the north half of block G in the city of Portland ascertained and declared, as against the defendant, and also to obtain a decree against such defendant for specific performance of the covenant of her ancestor for further assurance, in regard to said block.

From the bill it appears, that on June 25, 1850, Daniel H. Lownsdale, Stephen Coffin and W. W. Chapman, had surveyed and laid off divers lots and blocks in the town of Portland, and made a map thereof, designating the same by numbers and letters, and being in possession, said Lownsdale, Coffin and Chapman by deed of that date, assumed and represented themselves to be the proprietors of the town of Portland, and "for a valuable consideration, thereby released, quitclaimed and confirmed, unto the the said Chapman, to have and to hold to him and his assigns forever, a certain two acre block of land, situate in said town, and represented upon the map thereof by the letter 'G,' and then and there delivered to him the possession thereof. That the said grantors in and by said deed covenanted to and with the said Chapman, that the property aforesaid, unto him, his heirs and assigns, they would warrant and defend against all claims, the United States excepted; and that if they should obtain the fee simple of said property from the United States, they would convey the same to the said Chapman by deed of general warranty."

That on March 7, 1851, Chapman sold and conveyed the north half of said block G to William Dobleblower, and gave him possession, and that on August 27, 1852, Dobleblower sold and conveyed said north half to complainant, and gave him possession, which possession he still retains. That on September 22, 1848, said Daniel H. being a widower and unmarried, settled on the tract of land embracing block G, and containing less than 320 acres, and continued such residence and settlement for more than four years thereafter, and thereby became the owner of the same under the donation act of September 27, 1850. That in the year 1850 or 1851, Daniel H. intermarried with Nancy Gillihan, the widow of William Gillihan, and in April, 1854, said Nancy died intestate. In the year 1862, Daniel H. died intestate. On October 17, 1860, a patent certificate issued from the U. S. land office, at Oregon City, for the land settled by Daniel H., to him and the heirs-at-law of his deceased wife, in which certificate, the west half of said tract of land embracing block G, was assigned to said heirs-at-law. That at the time of the marriage, between Daniel H. and said Nancy, the former was the father of three children by a former wife—namely: James P. O., Mary E., and Sarah; and the said Nancy was the mother of two children by her former husband—William Gillihan—namely: Isabella Ellen and William. That in the year 1848, Nancy and her former husband—Gillihan—settled on a tract of land, situate on Sauvie's Island, in Multnomah county, containing less than 640 acres. and continued to reside upon and cultivate the same, until some time in the year 1850, when said Gillihan died—having done and performed all things in and upon said land, as contemplated by the said act of September 27, 1850, up to the time of his death, by means whereof the widow of said Gillihan became and was entitled to one half of said tract, and is therefore not entitled to any part of the donation claim of said Daniel H. That, if notwithstanding the premises, the said Nancy was entitled to a part of the donation claim of the said Daniel H., she had notice, and good reason to be informed, that the said Daniel H. had sold and conveyed block G as aforesaid, "and that she took such part subject to the contract aforesaid of the said Daniel H., and that her heirs and assigns are bound thereby."

That on the death of Daniel H., he left as his heirs-at-law, the said James P. O., Mary E. (now wife of William E. Cooper), and Ida Squires the defendant, and Emma Lamb, children of the said Sarah, deceased, and Millard O. and Ruth A., children of the said Daniel H. and Nancy; and that on the death of the said Nancy, she left as her heirs-at-law, the said William and Isabella Ellen Gillihan and the said Millard O. and Ruth A. Lownsdale. That in the year 1860, Daniel H. purchased from the said Isabella Ellen (then intermarried with William Potter) and her husband, "all the right, title and interest of the said Isabella in said tract of land as the heir of said Nancy;" and that by means of the death of said Nancy and the purchase aforesaid, the same Daniel H. became "the owner and holder of the title of the government of the United States of two fifths of the lands alleged to be patented to the said heirs of Nancy," including block G, and that thereupon "the said two fifths interest in the north half of said block enured to the use and benefit of the complainant."

That in 1864, the said William Gillihan, Jr., by his guardian Martin Gillihan, commenced a suit in the circuit court for the county of Multnomah, state of Oregon, for a partition of the tract of land patented to the heirs-at-law of Nancy, claiming in such suit to be entitled to one undivided fifth thereof; and that the heirs-at-law of both Daniel H. and Nancy, as well as the grantees and assignees of the former were made parties to such suit; and that by the decree rendered therein, the said two fifths of said tract of land was recognized as having belonged to said Daniel H., "with all the equities in partition." And divers lots and blocks in said tract having been before then laid off and "disposed off" by the said Daniel H. and improved by different persons, were allotted to the heirs, grantees and assignees of the said Daniel H.; and to make partition equal the said lots and blocks were severally encumbered with large sums of money, which if not paid within a specified time, should be sold to pay the same; and that if any claiming under the said Daniel H., and paying such assessments, should be afterwards evicted, that the sum so paid and interest should continue a lien on the particular tract for reimbursement. That the said block G was among the blocks so assigned in partition to the heirs and grantees of the said Daniel H., and the sum of $998.79, and $—— costs, was assessed upon the north half of said block, which the complainant was compelled to and did pay to prevent the same from being sold.

That the defendant, Ida Squires, though a resident and citizen of Kentucky, had a guardian (the said William E. Cooper), a resident of the city of Portland, and that said guardian and his ward well knew that the complainant was about to pay said sum, claiming this property as his own, yet neither of them made any objection thereto, but suffered and encouraged the complainant to pay the same: "Whereby the said Daniel H. in his life time and his heirs-at-law since his death, became and are bound to convey the said half block to your orator, by a good and sufficient deed;" and that the said Ida Squires, by virtue of the covenants in the deed of June 25, 1850—the possession of the complainant, and the said decree and the payment of the assessment thereunder is estopped to set up the title of the said Daniel H., so obtained as aforesaid, as a defence to the suit of the complainant. That the defendant paid Dobleblower $250 for the premises in question, and has since expended about $2,700 in improving the same, and that his possession from the date of such purchase until the present time has been visible and notorious, to the knowledge of Daniel H. and Nancy while living, and of the heirs of the former since his decease; and that at the date of such purchase, Daniel H. "assured the complainant that the title was good," which assurance said Daniel H. in his lifetime 'frequently' repeated to the complainant—by means whereof the defendant as heir-at-law of Daniel H., is estopped and ought to be barred from asserting any claim to the premises, or denying your orator's right thereto." The defendant demurs to the bill, and maintains in argument, that upon the facts stated, the complainant is not entitled to any relief.

The objections of the defendant, as specified in the demurrer and developed and amplified on the argument, involve the consideration of questions, some of which, besides being interesting in themselves, are of the highest practical importance to this community. The deed is objected to as inoperative and void because Chapman is both grantor and grantee, covenantor and covenantee, therein. Of course, Chapman could not grant to himself or covenant with himself. So much of the deed may be treated as surplusage—a blunder of the scrivener. There still remains, the grant and the covenants of Lownsdale and Coffin to and with Chapman, and these are easily and fairly divisible and separable from the void and repugnant grant and covenants by Chapman to and with himself. Waiving this objection, it is further objected, that the covenants with Chapman by Lownsdale and Coffin are joint and not several, and that therefore the remedy upon them must be joint—against both Lownsdale and Coffin or their representatives.

Counsel for the complainant maintains that equity will treat these covenants as joint or several, and among others cites Duvall v. Craig, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 45, and 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 162, 163. But neither of these authorities support the position. In Duvall v. Craig, supra, the question was not whether the covenant could be treated as joint or several, but what constituted a breach of it. The case only decides that a joint covenant against encumbrances is broken by an encumbrance suffered or done by a part of the covenantors, and that all the covenantors are liable for such breach. To the same effect is Merriton's Case, Noy, 86, cited in the note to Duvall v. Craig. There the lessors covenanted against any encumbrance made by them. One of the lessors made a lease to a stranger. In an action on the covenant against both lessors, it was held that the act of one constituted a breach, for which the lessors were jointly liable. The citation from Story only goes to the extent, that in equity a joint debt will be deemed the several debt of each of the contractors in a certain class of cases, from the fact—either proven or presumed from the nature of the transaction—that each of the contractors had the benefit of the money advanced, or that the joint obligation has been given to pay an antecedent debt, for which all the obligors were severally liable. But "when the obligation exists only in virtue of the covenant, its extent can be measured only by the words in which it is conceived." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 163. The general rule upon this subject seems to be well expressed in Rawle on Covenants (578): "Whether the liability created by the covenant be joint or several, or joint and several, obviously depends upon the terms in which it is expressed. Where an obligation is created by two or more, the general presumption is that it is joint, and words of severance are required in order to confine the liability of the covenantor to his own acts."

In support of the text the author cites among others Comings v. Little, 24 Pick. 266. In this case the court say: "The distinction is this: Where a man covenants with two or more jointly, and the interest and cause of action of the covenantees is several, each of the covenantees may bring an action for his particular damage, notwithstanding the words of the covenant are joint. But when two persons covenant jointly with another, a joint action lies for the covenantee on a breach of the covenant by one of the parties only, because they are sureties for each other for the due performance of the covenant." In the case under consideration the covenants are joint —they are the joint contracts of Lownsdale and Coffin with Chapman. An action at law for the breach of these covenants could not be maintained against either of the covenantors separately. But this is a suit in equity, not for damages for a breach, but to declare the legal effect of the one covenant and obtain the specific performance of the other, as against the heir of one of the covenantors on account of her interest in the land embraced in the covenant of her ancestor. As appears, Coffin has no interest in the land and can claim none. At the date of these covenants this was public land of the United States, and it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that if the property was subsequently acquired from the United States, it would be by one of the covenantors and not all of them. In such a case, I think the rule of law applicable to actions at law wherein the covenantee seeks to recover damages from the covenantors for a breach of the covenant, does not apply.

The defendant as heir-at-law of Lownsdale, appears to have inherited a separate interest in the property in question, of which the complainant by this suit seeks to obtain a conveyance on account of the covenant of her ancestor. The suit is to enforce performance of this covenant, not as a whole but as to a separate interest, which has descended to this heir, and as to such interest no other person is liable or interested as defendant; nor can such covenant be enforced in this particular against any other person, than this defendant.

Counsel for the defendant also object that the heir is not liable upon these covenants, because not named therein. The authorities cited in support of this position, are cases that arose under the ancient feudal warranty, and not the personal covenants contained in modern conveyances. Common law warranty was created without covenant, and was a natural incident of the feudal tenure. By the joint operation of the statutes de bigamis and quia emptores, the law was changed so that this warranty did not have the effect to bind the heirs unless mentioned in it. Rawle, Cov. 2, 3, 203. The authorities cited refer to this kind of warranty and are not applicable to the case under consideration. The covenants in this deed are deemed to run with the land, "and pass to the heirs of the purchaser and also to all persons claiming under him, who may maintain actions against them, against the vendor or his heirs." Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 26, § 66. In support of this rule the author last quoted cites from 4 Ves. 370, as follows: "Rachel Boyes and her son conveyed a copyhold estate to a mortgagee by lease and release and covenanted for further assurance. The son died; and the mortgagee filed his bill against the customary heir of the son, who was an infant; praying that he might be decreed to surrender the estate to the plaintiff. The master of the rolls (Sir R. P. Arden) said, he was clearly of the opinion that this covenant was a contract for a valuable consideration, affecting the land and would affect the heir. And by the decree it was declared that the covenant in the mortgage deed, bound the land descended to the defendant." To the extent which these covenants affect the land, the heir is bound by them, though not named in them, so far as any interest which she may have by descent from the covenantor. Being so bound, the grantee or his assigns are entitled to maintain this suit against the heir as they would against the ancestor if now living.

Counsel for defendant further object that the complainant is not the assignee of the covenants in the deed, because he is the grantee of only one half of the premises embraced in the deed and to which the covenants relate. This objection rests upon the consideration that the covenantor ought not to be subject to a multiplicity of separate suits, by subsequent grantees of separate parcels of land, which he conveyed and covenanted concerning as a whole. But the law after some fluctuation, seems now to be well settled otherwise. In 2 Washb. Real Prop. 662, the author says: "The action for breach of this covenant (of warranty), should be brought by him who is the owner of the land, and, as such, the assignee of the covenant, at the time it is broken. Such covenant is moreover susceptible of division into as many parts or interests, as the land itself shall be divided into by subsequent successive conveyances, so that if A convey to B two parcels by one deed, with a covenant of warranty, and B sells one of them to C who is evicted by an elder title of the parcel so purchased by him, he may have covenant in respect to the same against A." The same rule is laid down as to all the covenants which run with the land in Rawle, Cov. 354, 355. Rawle cites the opinion of Lord St. Leonards (Sugd. Vend.), and says: "This view of the law has been adopted in this country." The opinion cited was upon a similar case to the one put by Washburne. "The better opinion seems to be, that an alienee of one of the estates could maintain covenant against the covenantor where the covenants run with the land, and as such, an action would lie either for damages, which would be measured by the loss of the assignee, as far as he might be entitled to recover it under the covenant, or for an act to be done, e. g. further assurance, which might be confined to the particular proportion of the property. It does not seem that any injustice would arise by suffering several covenants to lie, although it might expose the covenantor to inconvenience, whereas the denial of the right to each assignee might lead to positive injustice, or if not, to greater inconvenience on their part."

One of the grounds for the relief prayed for in the bill, is that Nancy did not take any share or interest in the donation of Daniel H., and therefore Daniel H. acquired the whole of such donation from the United States, including the premises in controversy. The reason alleged is, that Nancy was entitled to a share of the donation of her former husband—Gillihan, and therefore disqualified to take a share of the donation of Daniel H., on account of the proviso to section 5 of the donation act (9 Stat. 497): "That no person shall ever receive a patent for more than one donation of land in said territory, in his or her own right." From the statements in the bill, it appears that Gillihan had not completed his four years' residence upon the land on Sauvie's Island at the time of his death, so as to entitle Nancy to claim as his wife under section 4 of the donation act; and moreover, Gillihan being dead at the passage of the act—September 27, 1850—was not comprehended in the grant made by said section 4, and therefore Nancy could not claim a donation as his wife in the land occupied by him during his life. This question must be considered as not open to argument in this court, and needs no further discussion. Ford v. Kennedy, 1 Or. 166; Lamb v. Starr [Case No. 8,021].

But the complainant further contends that Nancy was not entitled to take a share of the donation of Daniel H., because such donation only included the number of acres (320), which he was entitled to hold as a single man, but that if she is allowed to take in such donation, she must take subject to the acts and contracts of Daniel H. before her marriage with him, and of which she then had notice. The facts stated in the bill, from which this conclusion is drawn, are, that Daniel H. settled upon his donation in 1848, and that it contained less than 320 acres. That in 1850 he married Nancy—prior to the passage of the donation act, and after the deed to Chapman, of which she then had notice.

Upon the first part of this position arises the question:—Can a married man exclude his wife from the benefit of the donation provided for her in section 4 of the donation act by simply limiting his settlement to the quantity of land thereby granted to a single man; or, in other words, can a married man claim and receive a grant as a single man? The language of the section is: "There hereby is granted to every white settler * * * the quantity of one half section, if a single man, and if a married man * * * the quantity of one section * * * one half to himself and the other half to his wife, to be held by her in her own right." The evident policy of the law was to give to husband and wife an equal quantity of land, imposing upon the husband, as the head of the family, the burden of performing the services upon which the grant is conditioned, coupled with the right of selection, within the limits of the act, as to place and quantity. The settlement of a married man is intended for the benefit of his wife as well as himself—to enable her to obtain her equal share of the bounty of the grantor. A married man may occupy less land than the law permits. He may have good reasons for so doing. A particular half section may be deemed of more value than any whole section, open to settlement. In this respect the act commits the interest of the wife to the judgment and thrift of the husband. But he cannot change the law and elect to take as a single man to the exclusion of his wife. The exclusive power of the husband is confined to the selection and location of the land. In any event, the land embraced in the settlement, whether a whole section or less, is granted to the husband and wife in equal parts. Even the division of the donation is beyond his control, as the act vests the power "to designate the part enuring" to each in the officers of the land office.

Neither did Nancy take her half of the donation subject to the deed of her husband to Chapman, whether she had notice of it or not. At the date of the deed and the marriage, this was public land of the United States. None of the parties had any interest in it, or claimed any power over it beyond the bare possession. Subsequently, congress by statute granted the west half of the donation to Nancy in her own right. These words—"to be held by her in her own right," were not inserted in the act without a purpose. It appears that they were placed there for the express purpose of excluding the conclusion that she took in right of or through her husband, and that therefore she would take subject to the previous acts and contracts of her husband—as an heir from an ancestor, or a vendee from a vendor. True, the services upon which the grant is conditioned are to be performed by the husband, yet by the terms and manifest intention of the act, the wife takes and holds as the direct donee of the United States as much as though she was a stranger to the husband. Under these circumstances, Daniel H. had the same power to affect or encumber his neighbor's donation, by a deed to Chapman, as his wife's. The question of notice is immaterial, as there is no privity between Nancy and her husband. Carter v. Chapman, 2 Or. 95. Neither did the grant relate back to the date of the settlement by Daniel H. in 1848, so as to give effect to his deed to Chapman, before Nancy became his wife. The grant was subsequent to the marriage, and "although the act of congress grants the land on account of the prior residence and cultivation, the grant itself cannot be said to take effect before it was made—the time of the passage of the act. A grant of land by statute for considerations transpiring years before, as for military services, takes effect from the date of the grant, and not the performance of the service. In point of time the grant and the cause or consideration of it, may be identical or widely separated." Chapman v. School Dist. No. 1 [Case No. 2,607]; McCrackin v. Wright, 14 Johns. 193; Allen v. Parish, 3 Ohio, 107.

Before considering the nature and effect of the covenants in the deed, it will be necessary and proper to examine the condition of the subject matter described in the premises, and the nature and extent of the interest thereby released, quitclaimed and confirmed. Covenants cannot enlarge the premises of the deed, but the latter may and often do control the former. "The covenant of warranty is often limited and defined by the subject matter of the grant, as where the deed only purports to convey the right, title and interest of the grantor." 2 Washb. Real Prop. 665; Blanchard v. Brooks, 12 Pick. 66, 67; Comstock v. Smith, 13 Pick. 120. From the language of the bill it might be inferred by a stranger that the grantors in this deed undertook as owners of the land to convey the land, and that the grantee accepted the conveyance upon the faith of this undertaking or representation. But nothing would be more erroneous than this impression, or more unjust to the parties concerned. As a matter of law and public history, it is well known to the court, that at the date of this deed the title to lands in Oregon was in the United States, and that no law had been passed to dispose of it. This was as well known to the people of Oregon at that day—the parties to this deed included—as that they were living in a territory, and not a state. At the same time these lands were freely occupied by the inhabitants of the country, holding, as between themselves, under the laws of the provisional government, the bare possession. It is also true, that at the date of this deed and for years before, it was confidently expected that congress would—as they afterwards did—pass an act donating these lands to actual settlers. In June, 1850, the matter was specially before congress, and the result was the passage of the donation act of September following.

Under these circumstances this deed was made, and it is unreasonable to suppose that it was either executed or received upon the impression that the grantors were the proprietors of the soil or had any interest in it—particularly when it appears that Chapman, the grantee in the deed, was in fact one of the grantors and parties in possession. But the most casual examination of the deed itself, will show this to be so. The operative words in the premises of the deed are those of release and quitclaim. And although by the deed as set forth in the bill, the grantors "released, quitclaimed and confirmed" the block of land to the grantee, yet the natural and legal import of these words is not to assert that the grantors had then any particular estate or interest in the land. This taken in conjunction with the historic fact, that the grantors had then nothing in the block but the possession, with what may be called an expectancy of title from the United States, it may be safely concluded that the deed only passed the actual interest of the grantors—the possession. This was all the grantee took or could have expected at the time; and this is evident from the covenants which he took as security for the future.

These covenants are two in number, and both special or limited. The first is a warranty against all claims—the United States excepted; and the second is for special further assurance—that if the grantors should obtain the fee simple from the United States, they would convey the same to the grantee by deed of general warranty. The title of the United States is excepted in the covenant of warranty and in the covenant for further assurance, it is plainly asserted that the title was then in the United States. By this deed only the right to the possession—the then estate of the grantors—passed to the grantee. By the first covenant Daniel H. and those claiming under him are rebutted from claiming any interest in the premises, however acquired, except an interest or title derived from the United States. The title of the United States being expressly excepted from the operation of the warranty, Daniel H., if living, would not be prevented thereby, from asserting such title to the land, if by any means he should acquire it. The same is true of his heir—the present defendant. This covenant is exactly similar to the covenant in Cole v. Hawes, 2 Johns. Cas. 203, which was to warrant the bargained premises against all claims, except the lord of the soil. In that case the court held that the warranty did not extend to the title or claim of the lord of the soil—the owner of the fee simple. So here, the title of the then lord of the soil—the United States—is excepted from the warranty. As it appears then from the bill, that the alleged interest of the defendant in the premises is derived from the United States, it is not within the warranty of her ancestor, nor in any manner affected by it. Upon this covenant the complainant is not entitled to any relief against the defendant. The second covenant binds Daniel H., if he should obtain the fee simple from the United States, to convey the same to the grantee. This covenant is binding upon all persons claiming by, through or under Daniel H. It being decided that Nancy took a share in the donation of Daniel H., it is admitted that the latter never acquired, by any means, more than an undivided two fifths of the premises in question, and that of this interest he died seized, and it descended to his heirs-at-law. If Daniel H. obtained this interest from the United States, it is within the covenant, and his grantee is entitled to a conveyance from the heirs, but if he did not, it descended to the latter unaffected by the covenant. As to the acquisition of these two fifths, the case is this—Nancy having died intestate, before the issuing of the patent, her share of the donation, by direction of section 4 of the act, went to Daniel H. and her four children in equal proportions. Some years afterwards, Daniel H. purchased the interest of Isabella Ellen, one of these children. The fifth purchased from Isabella Ellen, was not obtained by the covenantor from the United States, and is therefore not within his covenant to convey.

As has been shown, at the date of this deed, it was expected that congress would or might give this land to Daniel H. Upon the faith of this expectation, Chapman took this deed of release to himself, with the covenant of further assurance, if this expectation should be realized. Beyond the right to the possession, as against the grantors, Chapman took nothing by that deed but a possibility—the promise of a chance—that if congress gave the land to Daniel H., the latter would convey it to him, his heirs, or assigns. This must have been the understanding and intention of all the parties to the deed at the time. Upon this contingency the deed was made, and the covenants entered into. As to this fifth, the chance failed—the contingency did not happen—and so far the covenant never became operative. Congress gave the land to Nancy, and she dying before patent, this fifth went to Isabella Ellen. The latter by this means became the absolute owner of this interest and could dispose of it as she saw proper. Waiving the question of whether she took as the heir of her mother or the donee of the United States, it is sufficient that she was neither the child or heir of Daniel H., and did not claim under or through him. Her interest came to her unaffected by any acts or contracts of Daniel H. When the latter purchased it, he in no sense obtained it from the United States, and was therefore not bound, either in law or morals, to convey it to the grantee in the deed of June 25, 1850. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 665; Rawle, Cov. 192; Comstock v. Smith, 13 Pick. 119; Blanchard v. Brooks, 12 Pick. 66; Ellis v. Welch, 6 Mass. 250. As to the other fifth, the solution of the question is not so apparent and simple. After careful consideration of the authors and authorities upon the subject—keeping in view in the meantime, the expectation and intention of the parties to the deed, I have concluded that Daniel H. took this interest, not by descent as the heir to Nancy, but directly from the United States, as its donee.

There are only two ways of acquiring real property, one by descent, the other by purchase. If a person does not take as heir, he takes by purchase, no matter how he acquires his title. At the death of Nancy—April 15, 1854—there was no statute in Oregon regulating the descent of real property, or declaring who should be the heirs of an intestate, and therefore the subject was regulated by the common law. By this rule, her children were first entitled to take as heirs, and her husband never. The donation act does not prescribe who shall be considered the heirs of a deceased settler or his wife, any more than it prescribes who shall be considered the wife of a settler. Both these subjects are left to the local law—the law of Oregon. Counsel for the defendant maintain that this grant is within the rule in Shelley's Case, and that therefore Daniel H. must be considered as taking by descent from Nancy and not by purchase from the grantor—the United States. The rule in Shelley's Case, as a law of property, has always been in force in this state as a part of the common law; except as to devises by will. If the present case was within this rule, the consequences claimed by counsel would follow. Daniel H. would be considered as taking by descent from Nancy. This being so, he could not be said to have obtained this interest from the United States, and therefore it would not be within the operation of the covenant for further conveyance. Courts and commentators have differed as to the reasons of the rule in Shelley's Case, some resting it upon the grounds of feudal policy, others upon the policy of the law which prefers descent to purchase, or the technical doctrine of the common law, which would not allow that the fee could be in abeyance—not vested in some one. But it is agreed on all hands that it is a purely artificial rule, often in direct opposition to the real intent of the grantor or donor, and therefore not to be extended by analogy.

By the rule in Shelley's Case, if a grant was made to a person for life, with remainder to his heirs in fee or tail, such person, notwithstanding the words of the grant to the contrary, was deemed to take an estate of inheritance, and might alien the fee and bar the heirs. If he died seized it descended to his heirs, but they were not allowed to take the fee, by force of the grant, as purchasers, but only as heirs, by descent from their ancestor. But if the remainder is given to any other person than the heir of the first taker, or to such heir with another person, or to only a portion of the persons constituting the heirs of such first taker, the case is not within the rule, and the persons to whom the remainder is given take under the grant as purchasers. To be in by descent, a person must take as heir—in the quality of heir—and take neither more nor less than the law would give him as heir, independent of the grant. If, by the terms of the grant, the heir is to take exactly what the law would have cast upon him, on the death of his ancestor, the case is within the rule, and he is deemed to be in by descent, and not by purchase. You cannot by any grant or conveyance provide that an estate, after the life of the first grantee, shall go in the exact line of descent, and at the same time the heirs be considered as in by purchase, and not liable to the incidents and burdens of an estate by descent. 4 Kent, Comm. 215, 232; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 78; 2 Jarm. Wills, 178 et seq.; Richardson v. Wheatland, 7 Metc. [Mass.] 171; Bond v. Swearingen, 1 Ohio, 395. The grant to Nancy took effect from the passage of the act. It was not of an estate for life merely, but of inheritance. Yet by the terms of the grant it was made liable to be determined by the happening of a particular event—namely: her own death before the issuance of the patent. The estate granted her was therefore, what the law calls a qualified or determinable fee, because, although it might have continued forever and descended to her heirs ad infinitum, yet it was liable to be determined—terminated—by the happening of this event, by which, its continuance or extent was limited. This event actually happened, and in contemplation of it, the act limited the estate in Nancy's share of the donation over to third persons in equal parts—her husband and children. Upon the determination of her estate in the land, the act in effect granted it over to these persons. Until this event, the husband and children had a contingent remainder in the land, which thereupon vested in them absolutely. This interest they took as direct donees of the United States by force of the grant, and not as heirs of Nancy, who left nothing for them to inherit, because her estate in the land terminated with her death. They were in by purchase and not by descent. The husband and children derived their interest from the United States, and not from Nancy, and therefore there is no privity of estate between them. 4 Kent, Comm. 9, 126; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 224 et seq.

In support of the position that Daniel H. took by descent from Nancy, counsel for defendant have cited Frizzle v. Veach, 1 Dana, 211, and McNair's Adm'r v. Hawkins, 4 Bibb. 390. The first case was this: In early days a person entered and surveyed a portion of the public land in Kentucky, and died before the issuing of the patent. In pursuance of the law in such cases the patent issued to the heirs of the person who located the land—afterwards execution issued against the estate of the deceased, and a question arose whether the land could be taken on the writ. If the heirs took as purchasers, of course the land was not liable for the debts of their ancestor, but if they took by descent it was. The court decided that the heirs took by descent. This is not a case in point. Under the system then in vogue in that country an entry and survey of a particular tract of land amounted to a purchase. Thereafter the locator had the equitable estate, and if he died before patent, it descended to his heirs. It went to his heirs, as heirs, by force of the law of descents, and not by operation of the grant. Then they stood in his place and represented him and were entitled to the patent. Bond v. Swearingen, 1 Ohio, 395. The second case so far as it bears upon this is directly against the defendant. It was a devise to A and the children of her body lawfully begotten, forever, with provision that after the death of A, the children, whether sons or daughters, were to have the devise equally. The court held that the estate was limited for life to A, with remainder to the children, and therefore it came within the rule in Shelley's Case, but for two reasons. The devise used the word "children" and not "heirs"—a term of purchase and not limitation. It also gave the devise to the children equally, while the law of descent at the time of the making of the will, cast the estate upon the males to the exclusion of the females and of the former preferred the eldest. The judgment was that the children took by purchase, and not descent. The court said: "The manner in which the estate is limited over to them" (the children, contrary to the law of descent), "precludes all possibility of their taking by descent."

So in this case, the grant in section 4 limited the estate in the land granted, after the death of Nancy before patent, and without will, not to heirs—those upon whom the law would cast it, but to her husband and children. Unless the law of descent, independent of the limitations in the grant, would have cast the estate upon the husband and children, and in the proportions which they took, they take by purchase—as donees of the United States. It is believed that no case can be found which does not agree with this proposition. In these respects a grant by the United States, is to be construed and have the same effect as that of a private person. The grant in section 4 is not couched in the language of a conveyance, though it must operate and be construed as one so far as practicable. When it provides that upon the death of Nancy, before the issuing of the patent, her husband and children shall be entitled to the share or interest in the donation, before granted to her, it may admit of argument whether they take such share by way of remainder or conditional limitation, after the determination of what proved to be only a life estate in Nancy. This is an abstruse branch of the law, and one that has in times past been fruitful of unprofitable subtleties. The question is not material here, for in any view of the case there can be no doubt that the grant is not within the rule in Shelley's Case, and that the material conclusion arrived at is correct—that Daniel H. took this fifth as the donee of the United States, and not by descent from Nancy. He was not an heir of Nancy, and could not inherit from her. The donation act does not pretend to make him her heir or call him such, and should not be so construed, in the absence of clear and express language to that effect. The object of this act was to make grants of land to actual settlers in Oregon, and not to establish or change the law of descent. The power over this subject, as "a rightful subject of legislation," had been already delegated to the territorial legislature. [Act Aug. 14, 1848] 9 Stat. 323. Had the gift been to Daniel H. of the whole interest of Nancy, upon the contingency that she died without children, it would not be different in legal effect from the case under consideration. Yet the survivor, so far from being thereby made an heir, would take in opposition to and exclusive of the heirs. Even if he only was admitted to take an equal proportion with them, he would thereby take so much from them. The estate was not to go in the ordinary line of succession. The survivor takes that which the law of descent would give to the heirs, and the latter take so much less than they would if claiming as heirs. This being so, neither of them take in the character or quality of heirs, but as donees from the United States.

It is also evident that the purpose of congress was, in case of the death of the settler or his wife, without will, between the date of the act and the issuing of the patent, not to allow the share of the deceased to descend to his or her heirs generally, but to give it first to certain members of the family, without reference to the local law of descent. Independent of the intrinsic justice of this provision, it might have been dictated by a desire to prevent any uncertainty concerning the condition and disposition of the grant, if the grantee should die before patent. With the conclusion now reached, coincides the justice and equity of this case. As to this fifth it was obtained by Daniel H. under just such circumstances as the parties to the deed contemplated when this covenant was made and accepted—by gift from the United States. The complainant, as the assignee of Chapman, is entitled under the second covenant to a conveyance of this fifth from the heirs or grantees of Daniel H.

Before leaving this subject, it is proper to notice some minor objections to the enforcement of this covenant, insisted on by counsel for defendant. It is claimed that there is no breach of the covenant for further assurance, because it does not appear that the complainant has devised or demanded any particular assurance or conveyance. Where the covenant is general and does not specify the particular conveyance to be made, but only such as may prove necessary or be advised by counsel, the party claiming under it should demand such a conveyance as he conceives himself entitled to, or counsel shall devise, before he can allege a breach and maintain an action for damages. In such case, until the party bound to make further assurance is advised as to what is demanded, or needed, he cannot be said to be in default for not performing it. This is the rule in actions at law for damages, which can only be maintained when an affirmative breach of the covenant is shown. But, I apprehend it will be found that the rule has little application to a suit in equity for the specific performance of a covenant. Such suit is not maintained upon a technical breach of the contract, but upon its continuing obligation, binding the party to perform it specifically. In the absence of any special provision in the covenant to the contrary, the suit itself is a sufficient demand for performance. This covenant is special, and requires the performance of a particular thing—the conveyance of the property if obtained from the United States. A neglect to perform such a covenant, for the purposes of this suit, is equivalent to a refusal to do so. In this respect the covenant does not differ from an ordinary agreement to convey real property. Rawle, Cov. 109.

It is also objected that the defendant is not liable on this covenant to Chapman's assignee, because it does not run with the land. The reason given for this position is, that no estate passed to Chapman by the deed—the grantors not having any interest in the land at the time. This was the doctrine of the common law as to conveyances of estates less than freehold, which passed without livery of seizin. Noke v. Awder, 1 Cro. Eliz. 437; cited in Rawle, Cov. 383. And as under our modern system of conveyancing, freeholds pass without livery of seizin; it was held at one time that the doctrine became applicable to conveyances of such estates, and in case the grantor had no interest in the land, the assignee of his grantee could not sue upon the covenants, because they only passed as an incident of the estate. But this doctrine has been modified substantially, so that it may be said that whenever possession is taken under the deed, there is sufficient estate to carry the covenants to the assignee. Beddoe's Ex'r v. Wadsworth, 21 Wend. 123; Slater v. Rawson, 6 Metc. [Mass.] 439; Rawle, Cov. 382 et seq. This doctrine is peculiarly adapted to the early circumstances of this country. For years before the passage of the donation act, the right of the settlers upon the land was a mere possession with an expectation of future title from the United States. Under these circumstances, in all the towns, this possession was conveyed and re-conveyed with covenants for the title expected, and it is proper and safe to hold with these authorities that a sufficient estate passed to carry the covenants to the subsequent occupants and assignees.

It is further objected to these covenants, that they are void, because they are contracts prohibited by the donation act. The second proviso in section 4 is relied on. It reads—"That all future contracts, by any person or persons entitled to the benefit of this act, for the sale of the land to which he or they may be entitled under this act, before he or they have received a patent therefor, shall be void." Waiving the question of whether this prohibition extends to future contracts concerning lands which the covenantor might receive, but which eventually he does not acquire under the act and receive the patent therefor, it is plain that it does not include these covenants which were made before the passage of the act. It is a plain case for the application of the familiar rule—the mention of one excludes the other. The prohibition of future contracts is a recognition and affirmance of past ones, otherwise lawful.

Counsel for the complainant also insists, that independent of the covenants in the deed, Fields is entitled to the relief prayed for. In support of this position counsel cites section 6 of "An act to regulate conveyances," the same being included in "An act to enact and cause to be published a code of laws," passed September 29, 1849, and commonly called the "Steamboat Code." Laws 1843–49, p. 139. This section was in force at the date of the execution of the deed. It reads: "The words 'grant, bargain and sell' in all conveyances, in which any estate of inheritance, in fee simple, is limited, shall, unless restrained by express terms in such conveyance, be construed to be the following express covenants on the part of the grantor for himself and his heirs, to the grantee, his heirs and assigns." Then follows the specification of the covenants—namely, of seizin of an indefeasible estate in fee simple—against encumbrances, and for further assurance. This section is taken almost literally from the statute of 6 Anne, c. 35, and was first introduced into the United States in the province of Pennsylvania. Rawle, Cov. 533, 537.

It is difficult to perceive, how it can be even claimed that this deed falls within the operation of this section. It does not contain the words, "grant, bargain and sell," or either of them, or the equivalent of them, but the very reverse—"release, quitclaim and confirm." The deed does not assume to pass or limit an estate of inheritance in fee simple, but as has been shown only the interest of the grantor, which was then well known to all the parties to be merely the possession. Besides the express words in the special covenants restrain the statute and prevent the covenants from attaching. By the language of his covenants the grantor excepts the title of the United States from his warranty and expressly asserts that the title is in the latter, and not himself. The habendum—to have and to hold to him and his heirs and assigns forever, does not affect the question of whether the deed purports to pass an estate of inheritance. These words grant no estate, nor do they enlarge the interest already released by the premises or granting part of the deed. By this clause it is simply declared, that the interest of the grantor, whatever it is, is released absolutely—forever, and not for a limited time, to be by him thereafter resumed. This disposes of the case as to the two fifths interest of which Daniel H. died seized. The complainant is entitled to a conveyance of the fifth which Daniel H. obtained from the United States.

But the complainant alleges that he has since acquired three other undivided fifths of this half block by the decree in the partition suit. As has been shown in the statement of the bill, while the heirs of Daniel H. and the children of Nancy were tenants in common of the whole of the west half of the donation, and while such heirs and children and the grantees of Daniel H. were tenants in common of certain parcels of such half, the circuit court made a partition of the whole tract as between those two classes—the children of Nancy on the one hand and the heirs and grantees of Daniel H. on the other. By the decree it was declared that Daniel H. in his lifetime was the owner of two fifths of the whole tract, and that the other three fifths was the property of the children of Nancy. It also appeared that Daniel H. had disposed of certain parcels of the tract. From these premises it followed that the children of Nancy were entitled to three fifths in equal parts, and that the heirs and grantees of Daniel H. were entitled to the other two fifths according to their respective interests, or in other words, that such heirs were entitled to such two fifths, subject to the rights and interests of the prior grantees of Daniel H. The parcels affected by the contracts and conveyances of Daniel H., being in the aggregate more than two fifths of the tract, the court, in making partition between the two classes as above stated, was compelled to divide the tract into two unequal portions, and decree compensation in money from the greater to the less to make partition equal.

Thus the greater portion of the tract was allotted to those who represented only the two fifths interest, but for the sake of convenience it may be called the "two fifths tract." The lesser portion was allotted to those who represented the three fifths interest, but for the same reason it may be called the "three fifths tract." By this decree and allotment the interests of the children of Nancy in the two fifth tract were divested, and also the interest of the heirs of Daniel H. in the three fifth tract. The grantees of Daniel H. had no interest in the three fifth tract. They yielded nothing in the partition and received nothing. The decree left their interests as it found them. The exchange of interests was between the heirs and children. What the latter parted with in the two fifth tract the former received, and what the former parted with in the three fifth tract the latter received. Here the partition ended. No partition was made of the two fifth tract as between those to whom it was allotted. Nor was it ascertained and determined to whom it belonged, or in what proportions. It is allotted to a class of persons known or supposed to exist, to some or all of whom it must belong—namely: the heirs, grantees and assignees of Daniel H., who died seized.

It is allotted to them according to their respective interests, and not in definite quantities, divided or undivided. To the heirs the law will give in equal parts all that portion of the tract allotted, not previously disposed of by their ancestor, Daniel H. To the grantees or assignees of Daniel H., the law will give all those parcels or interests in the tract which by any conveyance or contract binding on the heirs, he disposed of in his lifetime. But as between these persons, whoever they may be, the determination of these questions is very properly omitted by the decree, and the parties interested must settle them among themselves amicably, or by judicial proceedings, as may be found necessary or deemed best.

Apply this statement of the operation and effect of the decree in the partition suit to the case of the complainant. Block G is a part of the two fifth tract, and the complainant claims the half of it. By the decree in the partition suit it is in no way ascertained or determined that the complainant is either heir, grantee or assignee of Daniel H., or that he had any interest in the two fifth tract. He brings this suit claiming to be entitled to the half of the block by virtue of the deed and covenants to Chapman, and the subsequent conveyances to himself. He claims under these conveyances, and whatever interest he is entitled to, results from them, and not the decree in partition. As has been shown, the complainant at the time of the decree had an equitable estate in an undivided one fifth of the half block and no more. As to this fifth he is now entitled to a conveyance of the legal title from the heirs of Daniel H., by reason of the covenant in the deed to Chapman, and it may be assumed for the present that he has the legal estate therein. Prior to and at the date of the partition the other four undivided fifths of the half block belonged—three fifths to the children of Nancy, and the other fifth to the heirs of Daniel H. As has been shown, this three fifths was by the partition vested in the heirs of Daniel H., in consideration of their interest in the two fifth tract being vested in the children of Nancy, and the payment of the owelty deemed necessary to make the partition equal.

The interest of the complainant was not diminished or increased by the decree. The decree left him as it found him, except that it diminished the number of his co-tenants or persons with whom he held in common. Before the decree he was practically the owner of an undivided fifth of the half block, and his co-tenants and owners of the other four fifths were the children of Nancy and the heirs of Daniel H. Since the decree, and by virtue of the decree, the heirs of Daniel H. are the owners of these undivided four fifths, and the complainant is tenant in common with them alone. It follows that the complainant acquired no further or additional interest in the half block by the partition. The nature or quantity of his interest has never varied or been affected by the partition and exchange between the children and the heirs. He claims under the deed and covenant of Daniel H., and not otherwise. If by these he would have been entitled to the whole interest in the half block, as against Daniel H., or his heirs, the decree would have reserved it for him. But by the deed and covenant he is only entitled to an undivided fifth of the half block, and the decree allotting this half block to the heirs and the complainant according to their respective interests, does not nor should not increase or diminish the interest of the latter. His interest, as now ascertained, was an undivided fifth, and he cannot take more, except at the expense of the lawful owners—the heirs of Daniel H.

Upon this point, the argument for the complainant is sought to be strengthened by appeals to the fact that he has made valuable improvements, and what is called in the statement of the bill, "the equities in partition." But certainly this is all irrelevant and beside the matter in controversy. The complainant cannot enlarge his interest in the land, by making improvements upon it. This is not a suit for partition. When partition is sought between the complainant and his co-tenants, the heirs of Daniel H., it can be properly considered and determined, to what extent the former may be equitably entitled to have the value of his improvements estimated in his favor in the partition, provided his fifth cannot be set off to him so as to include them. In such suit, equity may also apportion the owelty charged upon the half block, so as to relieve the complainant's fifth from any part of it, if it should be found proper and equitable to do so. The complainant to protect his interest from sale, deemed it necessary to pay this owelty, and has paid it. Because, as he alleges, the defendant and her co-heirs suffered and encouraged him to pay the owelty, he claims to have acquired some additional interest in the half block. This claim is without any foundation in law. Whoever deemed it necessary to protect his interests in the land might pay the owelty, but he thereby acquired no right as against the real owner, beyond the right to be re-imbursed the amount paid for the benefit of the latter, with a lien upon the land as security. The decree in this respect, is too plain to be misunderstood. Whoever paid owelty, paid it upon his own judgment, and could not thereby acquire or affect the rights of others, whether they had notice of it or not. The owelty was not apportioned among the persons who owned the two fifth tract, for the same reason that the land was not—the court did not know or undertake to determine, who the owners were, or what was the relative or absolute proportion or quantity of their interests. The owelty was charged upon the land in gross, and not upon any portion of it or to any particular person. The land remains as security to any one, who from necessity or misapprehension, may pay beyond the extent of his real interest. But whether a mere volunteer, who confessedly had no interest in the land, could claim this security, may be a question. As between the heirs and the complainant, it appears to me that no part of the owelty is chargeable upon the complainant's fifth. The cause of and consideration for owelty was the excess in value of the land which the heirs got in the partition, over that which they thereby yielded to the children of Nancy. In a suit for partition between these parties, the court, upon this view of the case, ought to apportion the owelty, so as to discharge the complainant's fifth from any part of it, or by some means compel restitution or make compensation, for so much of the sum as has been paid on account of such fifth. This, it appears to me, is what equity would do in a suit for partition between these parties; but the occasion for furnishing this relief to the complainant does not arise in this suit. This suggestion rests upon general principles, and is equally applicable to any distinct parcel of the two fifth tract, upon which owelty was charged in gross, and which may be owned by the heirs and grantees of Daniel H. in common.

But there is a special circumstance in this case, which, as between the complainant and the heirs, must have the effect or operate to relieve or discharge the complainant's fifth from the owelty. The heirs are bound by the covenant of their ancestor, to convey to the complainant, his undivded fifth as their ancestor obtained it from the United States—free from encumbrances, or respond in damages for the breach of the covenant, so far as they have received assets. The owelty is an encumbrance, suffered during the time of their interest in the land, as heirs, and of which they have received the benefit.

The complainant also claims, that independent of the paper title set forth, there has arisen an equitable estoppel in pais, sufficient to bar the rights of the heirs in any part of the premises. The alleged declarations of Daniel H., and his and the heirs' notice of the complainant's possession and improvements and their acquiescence therein, are relied upon as constituting this estoppel. 2 Am. Lead. Cas. 754, upon the doctrine and effect of license to do some act or enjoy some privilege upon the land of another, is cited in support of this position. The authorities cited have no bearing upon the question; and moreover the facts alleged in the bill, do not show even a license for any purpose.

This is a question of title—ownership of the soil, and not a mere easement or privilege. Titles would not be worth the paper upon which they are written, if they could be called in question or destroyed in this way—by the proof of stale parol declarations inconsistent with or in opposition to them. As to these declarations the dead cannot answer. If allowed to be shown, in bar of the acknowledged title of the ancestor, the heirs would hold their property upon the insecure tenure of the testimony of interested witnesses and claimants, as to matters resting only in parol, which if false or exaggerated, are incapable at this late day of either contradiction or explanation This would be to offer a bounty for frauds and perjuries, instead of preventing them as the statute of frauds commands and intends. In 1852, when complainant purchased from Dobleblower, this land belonged to Nancy. She was then living, and to whom it would go upon her death was not known to any one. She had the power of disposing of it by will. If she died intestate, and before patent, and Daniel H. survived her, he would be entitled to a certain interest in it, depending upon the number of children she left living. But at that time Daniel H. had no interest. Under these circumstances, he is said to have assured the complainant that the title was good, and thereupon the latter purchased of Dobleblower. Waiving the question of what title is referred to by this ambiguous expression—whether it be that of Dobleblower, Chapman, Daniel H., or Nancy, this assurance amounts to nothing more that the expression of an opinion by a stranger—a person who had then no interest in the land and could not know that he ever would have. This expression of opinion as to the existing title—that it was good—could not create an estoppel against Daniel H. as to a subsequently acquired estate in the land. No special relation, implying trust and confidence, is shown or pretended to have existed between these parties. Daniel H. was not the guardian or attorney of the complainant. No misrepresentation of facts or concealment of them or fraudulent purpose is imputed to Daniel H. The complainant had the same means of knowing the state of the title that Daniel H. had. The latter is not responsible to the former for the correctness of his opinions about the title, even if these opinions influenced the complainant to make the purchase—which is extremely doubtful, even upon the face of the bill. So far as Daniel H.'s opinions resulted in written acts—his deed and covenant—he is responsible, and no further. If the complainant proposed to purchase upon the opinion of another as to the title, he should have taken the advice of counsel, and not Daniel H. Of course the subsequent repetitions of this assurance by Daniel H. do not vary the effect of the first one. Moreover, they are perfectly immaterial in any view of the matter, as the purchase was made before they were uttered, and could not have been influenced by them.

As to the other branch of this alleged equitable estoppel—the possession and improvements of the complainant—the case is equally clear against the complainant. During the tenure of Nancy in the land she was a married woman, and the complainant could not acquire any rights as against her, on account of her silence as to his occupation and improvements, whether she had notice of them or not. And if this were otherwise, the land did not descend from her, so as to be bound for her acts or omissions, in the hands of Daniel H. and the children. Her estate in the land terminated with her death, as well as her enjoyment of it. Thereafter a new estate in the land commenced in Daniel H. and the children, which they took directly from the United States. During the lifetime of Nancy, Daniel H. and the children had no interest in the land, and could not be affected by notice of possession and improvements, more than any other stranger. After the death of Nancy, they became the owners of the land, and were capable—except those who were minors—of affecting their interests by their acts and doings, so far as the law allows them to be sufficient for that purpose.

But the whole idea upon which this branch of the case rests is a novelty and without authority of law. It is, that the complainant could acquire the title to this property as against the lawful owners, by being in possession and improving it, to their knowledge, for a less period than that prescribed by the statute of limitations. Mere possession, unless it be adverse and continued for twenty years, does not give title as against the owner. Possession is evidence of title, and sufficient evidence, in the absence of better. But here the title is shown beyond a doubt to have been in the defendant and those under whom she claims, all the period of the complainant's possession, since the death of Nancy. The possession of the complainant, if adverse, might ripen into title by lapse of time, and in such case it would be immaterial whether any one had notice of it or not. For the same reason, if sufficient time had not elapsed to work a transfer of the estate by reason of the possession, the owner's right is not affected by the possession, however distinctly he had notice of it. As was said in Chapman v. School Dist. No. 1 [Case No. 2,607]: "The owner of real property may rest upon his title, and is not required to be always upon the premises, asserting his title, as against the world or any less number of persons, whom he may permit or suffer from time to time, to be in the temporary occupancy or enjoyment of it." Admitting then, for the present, that the complainant was in the adverse possession, and that Daniel H. had notice thereof from the time he became owner of the land, it in no way benefits the complainant. It was the business of complainant to know whether he was upon his own land or that of another. But it is apparent and undeniable that the complainant's possession continued as it commenced, under the deed to Chapman and the mesne conveyances of Chapman to Dobleblower, and the latter to himself. By force of these, upon the death of Nancy, he became equitably entitled to an undivided fifth. Thereafter he was tenant in common with Daniel H. in his lifetime and his heirs since. His possession was not adverse to their title or right, but consistent with, and would not in any length of time affect their interest in the land. Tenancies in common would be dangerous tenures, if one tenant could occupy and improve the other out of his estate—particularly if that other was a minor, resident in another state.

It is also alleged that Daniel H. had notice of the complainant's possession when he purchased the fifth of Isabella Ellen, and, therefore, he and his heirs are estopped from asserting their title to such interest. How this can be, I cannot see. Daniel H.'s purchase of this interest, worked no wrong to the complainant. It was Isabella Ellen's property, and complainant, as against her, had no claim to it, either at law or in equity. She had an undoubted right to dispose of it, and Daniel H. to purchase it. If the complainant being in possession, did not prevent her from selling, as it did not, it did not prevent Daniel H. from purchasing. If Isabella Ellen, had agreed by a valid contract to sell this fifth to the complainant, or had for any other reason been bound in equity to convey it to him, and Daniel H. had interfered and obtained the conveyance first, with notice of the complainant's possession, then, this matter of notice would be material. But as it was, it amounts to nothing. If one tenant in common cannot dispose of his interest to a person who has notice of his co-tenant's possession, estates in common would often be inalienable. This, I believe, disposes of all the material questions raised and argued by counsel on the demurrer.

The demurrer is overruled, at the costs of the defendant, and unless leave is given to answer, there must be a decree for the complainant, that the defendant, by a proper conveyance with covenants of warranty, release to the complainant, her interest in the undivided fifth of the premises, which her ancestor obtained from the United States, and which she inherited from him.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1799.

ALIENS—SUITS BETWEEN.

The plaintiff named himself of London, and the defendants of Manchester, Eng., and declared on two notes made and endorsed in England. The defendant Taylor pleads to the jurisdiction that the causes of action accrued to the plaintiff at Manchester, etc., and of the jurisdiction of this court, and that since the said notes became due, he, Taylor, came to Boston to reside, and is now there with the property only brought with him. The plaintiff in his replication confesses that the causes of action accrued at Manchester, etc., but inasmuch as the defendant has by his own showing since that time come to reside in Boston, he prays judgment, etc. After argument, THE COURT adjudged the plea in bar a good and sufficient answer in law to the plaintiff's declaration, and that he ought not to have or maintain his action.

FIFTEEN EMPTY BARRELS.

[1 Ben. 125.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. April, 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE SEIZURE — COSTS — WATCHING SEIZED PROPERTY — DUTY OF COLLECTOR ON A SEIZURE.

1. Where a collector of internal revenue seized property as forfeited, and did not turn it over to the district attorney to have proceedings commenced, for thirty-seven days, and the property being forfeited, the collector presented for taxation a bill for watching the property while in his custody, at $5 per day, as being the "cost of seizure," within the ninth section of the Internal Revenue Act of July 13, 1866, but no facts were stated to show that the interests of the government required the delay in the prosecution: Held, that the language of the section in question covered any necessary expenses of watching property seized by a collector, for such time as should necessarily elapse between the seizure by the collector and that by the marshal under process.

2. It is the duty of a collector on seizing property, forthwith to turn the case over to the proper law officer of the government.

3. In this case twenty-four hours was sufficient time for that purpose, and the expense of watching it for that period is all that can be taxed.

4. Unless under special circumstances, the rate cannot be greater than that allowed to the marshal.

B. F. Tracy, U. S. Atty.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before me upon a question of costs. It appears that the property condemned in the cause was seized by Collector Wood on the 5th day of December, 1866, as forfeited for a violation of the internal revenue laws. The property remained in the hands of the collector until the 12th of January, when the case was turned over to the district attorney, an information filed, and the property condemned, no one appearing to defend.

The collector now presents for taxation a bill of costs of $185, which is supported by his affidavit that he has paid or has obligated himself to pay that sum to one Nathan Beers, for watching the property while in custody of the collector, at the rate of $5 per day.

The language of the section of the internal revenue law under which the claim is made is as follows: "The cost of seizure made before process issues, shall be taxable by the court." [Act July 13, 1866;] 14 Stat. 110.

This language can, I think, be properly construed to cover any necessary expenses of watching property seized by a collector, for such time as shall necessarily elapse between the seizure by the collector and the seizure by the marshal under process. But I am unwilling to extend its effect so as to cover a charge like the one before me.

The duty of a collector upon making a seizure of property which he has probable cause to believe liable to forfeiture, is to turn the case over to the proper law officer of the government forthwith, in order that legal proceedings may be commenced without delay.

This is also the right of the citizen whose property is seized, and who may justly complain if his property be detained for any considerable time, when he can neither take steps to make his defence, nor to obtain its release upon giving bonds. Any other practice is liable to abuse, and to bring suspicion and discredit upon the revenue department, and will never be encouraged by me.

In the case before the court, the property was detained by the collector for the space of thirty-seven days, and no other reason is suggested for the delay, except that Revenue Agent Linton, and Inspectors Cocheu and Meade desired proceedings to be delayed. But no facts are presented before me to show that the interests of the government required any delay at all, and it is not easy to imagine any proper reason for delaying proceedings in a case so clear that the owner deemed it not worth while to interpose any defence.

In such a case my opinion is that no more than twenty-four hours' delay was necessary, and expenses for custody of the property for that period is all that can be taxed as cost of seizure.

I notice also that the rate charged per day is double that allowed by law to the marshal in such cases. Unless under special circumstances of necessity, but $2.50 per diem is allowed to the marshal, and no greater rate can be claimed by the collector in this case.

Let the bill be taxed by the clerk in accordance with this decision, and the amount so taxed be paid the collector.

FIFTEEN PIECES OF BLACK SILK.

[3 Ben. 189.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1869.

BONDING PROPERTY SEIZED AS SMUGGLED.

1. Where goods were seized as smuggled, and a libel was filed without delay to forfeit them and a claim was put in by an agent of the owner of the goods, who applied for an appraisement of the property and its delivery to him on bond: Held, that the 89th section of the act of 1799 (1 Stat. 695), applies only to seizures for violations of that act.

2. A delivery on bail in this case was a matter of discretion, and, as there had been no delay in the prosecution and the goods were not perishable, the application to bond must be refused.

T. Simons, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

M. V. B. Wilcoxson, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an information in a cause of seizure and forfeiture of certain goods for an alleged violation of the 46th and 68th sections of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 661, 677), and of the 4th section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 179). On the facts shown to the court, the goods were smuggled into the United States, in the ship Australasian, from Liverpool, by a passenger from Liverpool, as personal baggage. A claim has been filed to the goods, by one Josias Taylor, as agent for one George Pursey, who is sworn by Taylor to be the owner of the goods and to reside in London. An application is made to the court by the claimant for the delivery of the goods to him, as such agent for such owner, on an appraisement thereof and the execution of a bond therefor, in pursuance of the requirements of the 89th section of the act of March 2, 1799.

I concur with Mr. Justice Story (The Struggle [Case No. 13,550]) in the view, that the provision for the bonding of seized property, made by the 89th section of the act of 1799, applies only to seizures for violations of that act, and that, even under that section, a delivery on bail is not compulsory on the court, but is a matter of sound discretion. It is, therefore, discretionary with the court, as regards both of the statutes under which this case is prosecuted, whether it will deliver the goods on bail.

It appears, by the papers, that Pursey, the alleged owner, came as passenger in the ship, and himself conducted in person the smuggling proceedings on board of the vessel, which consisted in representing the property as personal baggage, and in offering money to the inspector to pass it. Why Pursey does not himself make the claim and verify it is not explained, nor does he make any affidavit in explanation of the facts sworn to by the inspector. In view of the provisions of the 4th section of the act of 1866, that, in all cases where the possession of goods brought into the United States contrary to law shall be shown to be in a defendant, or where he shall be shown to have had possession thereof, such possession shall be deemed evidence sufficient to authorize conviction, unless the defendant shall explain the possession to the satisfaction of the jury, and of the fact that the claimant in this case swears that Pursey is the owner of all the property, and that it is apparent from the papers, that Pursey was in possession of all of the property on board of the vessel, and of the circumstances of the smuggling, I cannot regard this as a proper case in which to allow the property to be delivered on bail. Mr. Justice Story, in the case before referred to, says: "I cannot say that I approve of the practice of an indiscriminate delivery of property seized, on giving bail for the appraised value. It is attended with many inconveniences and often leads to frauds. In the exchequer, in England, no delivery is allowed, unless the property be perishable, or the government officers have been guilty of laches and delay in the prosecution." Such a practice is a sound one. The property in this case consists wholly of dry goods and not at all of perishable articles, nor has there been any delay in the prosecution. The seizure was made March 5th, 1869, and the libel was filed March 13th, 1869.

The application is refused.

PRACTICE—BRINGING THE UNITED STATES INTO COURT.

1. The district attorney is not so far an officer of the court that the court can compel him to enter the appearance of the United States.

2. The United States can be brought into court by the entry of an order that it shall plead, etc., within a given time, and the service of a copy of such order upon the proper representatives of the government.

In equity.

Hitchcock, Dupee & Judah, for complainant.

Mark Bangs, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The motion made in this case is that the court direct or order the district attorney to enter the appearance of the United States as one of the parties defendant.

The case is really this: The complainant files a bill to foreclose a mortgage made by Long to the complainant. It appears that the United States recovered a judgment at some time after the mortgage in question against Long, so that the United States are judgment creditors of Long, and the complainant is anxious to foreclose the equity of redemption against the United States, as well as against Long. The motion is that the district attorney shall be required to enter the appearance of the United States.

I do not think the court has any power to enter any such order, or to entertain such a motion as that. The district attorney is not so far the officer of the court that the court can compel him to perform an official act for the United States in reference to a matter of this kind. I think—I only make this by way of suggestion—that the court can enter the following order if the complainant wishes it: that the United States shall enter its appearance in this case, and plead, answer or demur to the bill by a given time, and direct that a copy of this order shall be served upon the district attorney, and also upon the attorney general, or some other government officer, and then if the government does not enter its appearance, it will be a question for you to determine whether you will take a default against them or not.

I should be quite inclined myself to think that if the government did not enter its appearance, and the record shall show such a service, inasmuch as the government has entered the arena as a property holder, or rather as a lien holder, that it could be treated like any other person. It is true the old English rule holds that the king cannot be sued in his own court, or the sovereign cannot be sued here in its own court, and that rule is carried so far in England that the king cannot be sued for debt or for trespass, but Mr. Justice Greer, in Elliot v. Van Voorst [Case No. 4,390], seems to think that there may be such a thing as a distinction between the United States as a sovereign in executing its prerogatives of sovereignty, and the United States as a property holder; and I am inclined to give you the rule which I have suggested, but I do not think I can enter an order that the district attorney shall enter the appearance of the United States.

Another suggestion has occurred to me in the matter: that is, inasmuch as this judgment appears from the record of the judgment itself—being a judgment in favor of the United States—to have been rendered in the interest of the internal revenue bureau, perhaps the order had better be served upon the commissioner of internal revenue, the attorney general, and the district attorney.

FIFTY-ONE BALES OF GOATS' HAIR.

[2 Ben. 479.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1868.

REVENUE ACT OF 1861—GOATS' HAIR.

Under the twenty-third section of the tariff act of March 2, 1861 (12 Stat. 193, 195), goats' hair, uncleaned and unmanufactured, is exempt from duty, notwithstanding the provisions of the fourth section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 206).

This was an application, on the part of the collector of the port of New York, for an order directing the payment, out of the proceeds of the property above-named, which had been sold as perishable, of duties on the goods. The suit was brought to forfeit the goods to the United States, by reason of fraud in the entry, and the duties were claimed under the fourth section of the tariff act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 206).

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The prayer of the petition is denied. I think that the twenty-third section of the act of March 2, 1861 (12 Stat. 193, 195), exempting from duty hair of all kinds, uncleaned and unmanufactured, applies to the goats' hair in question, which is uncleaned and unmanufactured, and that such section is in force, notwithstanding any thing in the act of June 30, 1864. The fourth section of that act is merely a substitute for the twelfth section of the act of March 2, 1861, and is not repugnant to anything in the provision, in regard to hair, in the twenty-third section of the act of 1861. The hair in question was exempt from duty.

QUI TAM ACTIONS — DEPUTY-COLLECTOR AS INFORMER — INFORMATION RECEIVED BY DEPUTY COLLECTOR.

1. A deputy-collector of customs who receives information by a telegram addressed to the collector, that a certain vessel within his district has goods on board liable to forfeiture, and who sends the telegram to the collector, does not thereby become the informer under the statute of 1799 [1 Stat. 627], as against the person sending the telegram, though he may have verified some of its statements and have sent information of such verification to the collector.

[Cited in U. S. v. Simons, 7 Fed. 712.]

2. Nor is the person who carries the telegram and information such informer; nor the officers who seize the goods but make no new discoveries.

3. Information received by a deputy-collector under such circumstances, is received by the collector, within the meaning of the statute.

This was an information against fifty thousand cigars and a small quantity of sugar, seized on board the schooner Atlantic at Holmes Hole, in the collection district of Edgartown, for smuggling. The property had been heretofore condemned as forfeited, and the proceeds ($4927.49) paid into the registry of the court. The question now was between several persons claiming as informers, under the statute.

On Saturday, the 4th of March, 1865, Lewis B. Smith, deputy collector of customs at Portland, Me., obtained information that a quantity of cigars intended to be smuggled were on board said schooner, then reported at Holmes Hole. He communicated the fact to Israel Washburn, Jr., collector of the port of Portland, and requested him, as he was better known than himself, to telegraph it to the collector of the district where the Atlantic was. The following despatch was accordingly sent:—

"Confidential. Portland, March 4, 1865. To Collector of Customs, Holmes Hole, Mass.: I have information that a very large quantity of cigars in schooner Atlantic are intended to be smuggled; reported at Holmes Hole, 2d inst. [Signed] Israel Washburn, Jr."

The despatch reached Holmes Hole on the 4th, a little after sunset, and was opened by Mr. Beetle, the deputy-collector of customs for the district, who resides there, the collector living at Edgartown, eight miles away. Mr. Beetle immediately put an officer on board with instructions to see that nothing was landed. No cigars appeared on the schooner's manifest. The wind coming fair on Sunday morning, the officer, without the knowledge of Mr. Beetle, came ashore, and the schooner went to sea. A head wind, however, coming up, she put back in the afternoon, and Mr. Beetle again put the officer on board with instructions to prevent any thing from being landed and to detain the schooner. Mr. Beetle testified that he then went to the house of Mr. Luce, an inspector, about four miles from Holmes Hole, on the road to Edgartown, and sent him with the despatch to Mr. Vinson, the collector at Edgartown, telling Luce to give the despatch to Vinson, and to tell him all about the matter, and what had been done; and to have the revenue cutter come round and make the seizure; that he himself hastened back to Holmes Hole to see that the schooner did not escape; that Luce went, and the cutter came round in the evening, the schooner was taken possession of, searched, and the cigars and sugar found; that if the cutter had not come round, he should have obtained a force and seized her, but that he thought it better to have the cutter do so if she was at hand.

Mr. Vinson, collector of the port, testified that Luce came to him, told him that he believed the schooner Atlantic had cigars on board intended to be smuggled; that Mr. Beetle had put an officer on board, who came ashore; that she left the harbor, but came back again, and that Mr. Beetle had put the officer on board again; that no cigars appeared on her manifest; and then handed him the despatch from Mr. Washburn. Mr. Vinson further testified that it was in consequence of the information and the telegram thus received that he ordered the seizure to be made; that he could not discriminate between them, and should have made the seizure from either.

The persons claiming as informers were Mr. Smith, who caused the telegram to be sent, Mr. Luce, Captain Usher, commanding the revenue cutter, Mr. Beetle, and Mr. Andrews, the inspector put on board by him.

The affidavit of Mr. Luce was presented, in which he said that he carried no message from Mr. Beetle to Mr. Vinson, but gave original information; and, on Mr. Luce's behalf, it was contended that he appropriated the contents of the despatch, made the information his own, and then communicated it to Mr. Vinson as original, and was, therefore, the informer.

R. R. Bishop, for Smith.

W. J. Forsaith, for Luce and the other petitioners.

LOWELL, District Judge. In this case a large quantity of cigars, and a small quantity of sugar and molasses, have been condemned and sold, having been found on board the American schooner Atlantic under circumstances which showed very clearly an intention to smuggle them into the United States. Several persons have filed petitions for the share of the proceeds of the forfeiture provided by sect. 91 of the collection act of 1799, which enacts, among other things, that in all cases where such fines, &c., shall be recovered, in pursuance of information given to the collector, by any person other than the naval officer or surveyor of the district, a certain share shall be given to such informer.

[2] [The petitioner Smith, who is a deputy collector of customs at Portland, was told by a person in the trade in which the schooner was engaged, and who appeared to have adequate means of knowledge, that a large quantity of cigars were on board the vessel, and were about to be smuggled. This person most positively refused to inform him against the goods himself, or to let his name appear in any way, and he has not made claim in this cause, and so far as appears is not known to any one connected with the affair, excepting Mr. Smith. He evidently intended that Smith should inform against the goods. The vessel was reported as then lying at Holmes Hole, in Massachusetts, which was the fact; she having put in there on her voyage from Cuba to Winterport, in Maine. It being Saturday, Smith, finding that he could not reach Holmes Hole before Monday night, requested Mr. Washburn, the collector at Portland, whose name, he thought, would be better known than his own, to telegraph these facts to the collector of the port, where the vessel was lying. Mr. Washburn accordingly sent a telegram, addressed to the "Collector of Customs, Holmes Hole," saying that he had information that a large quantity of cigars in the schooner Atlantic were intended to be smuggled. Holmes Hole is a port of the collection district of Edgartown, and has a custom house under the charge of a deputy collector. The collector resides at Edgartown, some eight miles from Holmes Hole. Mr. Beetle, the deputy collector, received this despatch on Saturday evening, and read it, and at once put Mr. Andrews, an inspector of customs, on board the schooner with instructions not to permit anything to be taken out of her. The next morning, the wind coming fair, the schooner sailed, after sending the inspector on shore; but the wind again changing, soon returned, and the inspector was put on board a second time by Mr. Beetle, with the further instructions not to leave the vessel. In the course of the day, Mr. Beetle, as he says, sent Mr. Luce, another inspector, to Edgartown, to inform Mr. Vinson, the collector, of the facts, and to ask the assistance of the revenue cutter J. C. Dobbin, then at that port. This course he took to save the expense which would be incurred in calling upon persons not in the employ of the government. But he was resolved to stop the vessel at all hazards, if she should attempt to sail before the cutter arrived. The cutter came round that night with orders from the collector to make a thorough search for cigars, and if any were found to bring the vessel to Edgartown; and upon careful examination the cigars were found carefully concealed behind a bulkhead. Mr. Beetle, Mr. Luce, Mr. Andrews and Capt. Usher, of the cutter, all claim as informers under the act; the two last on the ground of their diligence and success in searching for and discovering the goods; Mr. Luce, partly on that ground, and partly for having given information to the collector before the search was ordered, which is also Mr. Beetle's ground for claim. Mr. Washburn makes no claim, and says he acted at the suggestion and as the agent of Mr. Smith, whom he supposes to be, in point of fact and law, the sole informer.

Now it is very clear, in the first place, that some officers of the customs other than the collector himself and the surveyor and naval officer (all of whom share in all these forfeitures), may themselves be informers. This has been decided so far as inspectors and officers of revenue cutters are concerned, and perhaps it is true of deputy collectors.][2]

That this court has jurisdiction of this controversy is clear. Hooper v. 51 Casks of Brandy [Case No. 6,674]; Westcot v. Bradford [Id. 17,429]; McLean v. U. S., 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 404.

It is not denied that some officers of the customs, other than the collector himself and the surveyor and naval officer, all of whom share in all these forfeitures, may themselves be informers. This has been decided so far as inspectors are concerned, and perhaps is true of deputy-collectors. Hooper v. 51 Casks of Brandy, ubi supra; Brewster v. Gelston, 11 Johns. 390; Sawyer v. Steele [Case No. 12,406]. And, as to officers of revenue cutters, the act itself is explicit in their favor. But I am not aware that it has ever been said or thought that an officer, being charged with the special duty of searching a vessel, in purusance of definite information given by another person, could become the informer by reason of the diligence, fidelity, and success with which he prosecuted the search, and found what he was sent to seek. To allow this would be contrary to the general principles of law, and to the intent of the revenue laws, which expect the collector and his subordinate officers to pursue the course indicated by the information with all the means and effort that may be necessary.

Who, then, gave the collector the information in pursuance of which this search and seizure were made, and the forfeiture was recovered? Mr. Beetle and Mr. Luce each says that he did; the former, because he received the telegram and sent it to the collector; and the latter because he carried the telegram, and gave, as he says, some oral information. Mr. Luce denies that Mr. Beetle "sent" him to the collector, and says that he agreed with Mr. Beetle, that, as the wind would keep the vessel in port, it was better to consult with the collector, and to procure the services of the cutter. There is no doubt that he carried the telegram, with Mr. Beetle's consent; and whether he is to be considered as Mr. Beetle's messenger, or not, is immaterial, in the view I take of the case. Mr. Vinson says, in his deposition, that, acting on the despatch, and on oral information received from Mr. Luce, he ordered the search and conditionally the seizure, and that either information would have been sufficient. It is to be regretted that Mr. Vinson should have made this general statement, which is calculated to leave an erroneous impression. The evidence shows quite conclusively that Mr. Luce had no information to give, beside the telegram and its contents, which was of any importance. Neither he nor Mr. Beetle knew any thing about the vessel or her cargo or papers, excepting that no cigars were set down in the manifest; a fact of no importance in itself, and which had not attracted Mr. Beetle's attention before he read the despatch, and was not calculated to do so, any more than the absence of all other goods which might, by possibility, have been on board. When the despatch was received, he recollected, or found by examining his records, that no cigars were mentioned in the manifest. But this fact was included in the information given by the despatch; for, if there were cigars on board intended to be smuggled, they would certainly not be found in the manifest. So that this fact, independently known to him, only confirmed the despatch to this extent, that if it were true, as therein stated, that a large quantity of cigars were on board, then its further statement that they were intended to be smuggled, was also probably true. I say this is abundantly evident from all the testimony in the case, including Mr. Luce's affidavit and from the subsequent particular explanation of the collector himself to what Mr. Luce did tell him. Now it is not to be believed that a prudent collector would have seized this vessel or have searched her on the mere information that she had no cigars on her manifest. So, then, in point of fact, the information which Mr. Luce orally gave, besides the above-mentioned fact, unimportant of itself, could only have been that he had read the despatch and believed, from the known character of Mr. Washburn, that it was likely to be well founded. But this was information which Mr. Vinson hardly required, and the giving of which cannot constitute Mr. Luce the informer in this case.

Again, it is assumed, that the collector must personally receive the information which is the foundation of such a claim; and thereupon it is argued that Mr. Beetle and Mr. Luce, or one of them, as the evidence may be thought to favor the views of one or the other, appropriated the information contained in this telegram, and gave it out again to the collector, as their own, and so became the informers. But, on this supposition, they had no right to read the telegram, or reading it, to do any thing but forward it as quickly as possible to the collector. The law does not recognize a title to telegrams, or their contents, acquired by appropriation by persons intervening between the sender of the despatch and the person to whom it is addressed. The telegraphic operator, who has not filed a claim, would stand, in this respect, full as well as these petitioners: he was nearer the source of knowledge, and his position was not more confidential. But the assumption is itself without warrant. The deputy-collector has, in law, a recognized position, with all or nearly all the powers of a collector; insomuch that, for example, an oath required by statute to be taken before the collector is well taken before his deputy, without proof of the absence or inability to act of the principal; U. S. v. Barton [Case No. 14,534].

It is plain, therefore, that Mr. Beetle had power to receive this despatch for the collector, and to act on it. He was the collector, for all purposes, at Holmes Hole, and the moment he received the despatch, the collector had, in law, received it; the information had been officially communicated, and the inchoate right to the reward had attached. All that was done after that was executive, and was in pursuance of the information so given and received.

I must decide, therefore, that Mr. Smith was the person and the only person who gave to the collector of the district of Edgartown the information, in pursuance of which the forfeiture of the cigars was recovered, and is entitled to one-fourth of their net proceeds. The evidence does not clear up the question about the sugars, and their value is comparatively trifling. I cannot say that any one informed against them, as the case is presented. The form of decree is shown in Jones v. Shore, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 475.

Mr. Smith adjudged sole informer.

FIFTY THOUSAND FEET OF TIMBER.

[2 Lowell, 64.][1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept., 1871.

SALVAGE SERVICE—SAVING RAFT OF TIMBER.

1. A salvage service is performed when a raft of timber is saved from peril on navigable waters.

[Cited in Maltby v. Steam Derrick Boat, Case No. 9,000; Cope v. Vallette Dry-Dock Co., 119 U. S. 630, 7 Sup. Ct. 338; Seabrook v. Raft of Railroad Cross-Ties, 40 Fed. 597; Bywater v. A Raft of Piles, 42 Fed. 918.]

2. A claim for such salvage service may be maintained in a court of admiralty, if there is no local custom making the service gratuitous.

[Cited in Seabrook v. Raft of Railroad Cross-Ties, 40 Fed. 596.]

In admiralty.

LOWELL, District Judge. These two rafts of timber were found floating in the harbor of Boston during the ebb tide in the evening, at a considerable distance from the place where they had been moored, and services were rendered by the libellants which would enable them to secure reasonable compensation, at least pro opere & labore, if the court has jurisdiction of the suit as one of salvage, and if salvage services can be performed to a raft of timber. Decisions can be cited against the view that this is a case for salvage; but I am of opinion, nevertheless, that it is of that character. A salvage service is performed when goods are saved from peril at sea, or on other navigable waters, or cast upon the shores thereof. And this case is within the definition.

There are two judgments that a raft of timber is an exception to the general rule. Nicholson v. Chapman, 2 H. Bl. 254; Tome v. Four Cribs of Lumber [Case No. 14,083]. The first of these cases was decided when the admiralty courts were prohibited from entertaining such actions if the place of performance was in the body of a county; and the court held that there would be great hardship and inconvenience to the trade in permitting such claims to be set up when the services were done so near home; and, as no compensation is allowed by the common law in cases of this kind, it refused to make any distinction in favor of a river. This decision appears to be sound, upon common-law principles. When Taney, C. J., decided the second case above cited, our courts of admiralty had made the discovery that water is water, even within the limits of a county; and he gave no force to the point of locality as a jurisdictional fact, but he thought that Nicholson v. Chapman was well decided upon general grounds of convenience, especially as he found a custom to prevail in the timber trade of the Susquehanna, by which there was to be no salvage in such cases. He said that the salvors must seek their remedy for a reasonable compensation in the courts of common law; forgetting that these courts never allow any compensation, unless there is evidence of a promise.

Another decision sometimes cited is A Raft of Timber, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 251, which turned merely upon a question of jurisdiction; the courts of admiralty having been prohibited from entertaining such a claim arising, as this arose, within the limits of a county, and parliament having granted them jurisdiction, even within those sacred precincts, in respect to salvage services rendered to any ship or sea-going vessel, Dr. Lushington very properly decided that a raft was not a ship or sea-going vessel. Another statute soon remedied the defect pointed out by this case; and gave the admiralty jurisdiction to decide upon all claims and demands in the nature of salvage for services performed, whether in the case of ships, goods, or other articles found at sea or cast on shore, and whether the services had been performed on the high seas, or within the body of a county. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 99, § 40. It is perfectly clear from this statute, and from the concessions of counsel and court in the case in 2 W. Rob. Adm., that salvage services may be performed to a raft of timber as well as to any other property, and that the only difficulty was one of locality. And so it was held by Judge Betts, in a well considered judgment. A Raft of Spars [Case No. 11,529].

A suit for salvage is neither contract nor tort. It resembles the latter in being a proceeding for unliquidated damages, and in depending on locality. No personal action will lie without either an express promise or an acceptance of the goods subject to the maritime lien, and in the latter case it is only maintainable to the extent of the lien, and only in the admiralty. If the services are rendered, it is of no consequence whether the goods are a ship or part of a ship, or were ever on board a ship. A great many of the cases are of mere derelict goods picked up at sea; and no one ever heard that it would be a defence to a proceeding for salvage, that the goods had been washed out to sea from the shore by a gale or flood, or had been dropped from a balloon. I have had a case of the former kind; though, to be sure, the subject-matter was an unmanned vessel. If it had been a barrel of oil, the principle would have been the same.

No custom has been proved in this case for timber merchants to assume their own risks. Nothing whatever has been advanced in evidence to distinguish this from any other case of salvage. The arguments which prevailed in the two cases first cited find no support from the facts of this case. Most of them will apply to any salvage services performed near the shore; and to all of them the sufficient answer is, that the admiralty court has full power to regulate the compensation, or to deny it altogether, as circumstances may require. To my mind it is entirely clear that the only adverse case in this country depends, and can only be supported, upon the custom proved to exist in that case; and that the English cases, which failed solely from a defect of jurisdiction, have been remedied by the healing power of parliament, which has restored the old jurisdiction of the admiralty.

Salvage decreed.

FIFTY-TWO BALES OF COTTON.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 309.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 31, 1862.[2]

PRIZE—PURCHASE OF COTTON IN ENEMY'S COUNTRY BY LOYAL CITIZEN.

Cotton condemned, having been purchased by the claimant, a citizen of the United States and of a loyal state, in the enemy's country, during the war, and having been arrested while water-borne and in the act of being exported from there in violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The cotton proceeded against in this suit was captured, July 15, 1862, in Aransas bay, Texas, on board a scow or lighter, by the United States bark Arthur, and sent into this port for adjudication, where it was libelled, October 1, 1862. The claimant intervened, and filed his claim to the property, November 3, 1863. It is useless to recapitulate in detail the facts stated in the libel and proofs, as the claim interposed and attested to by the claimant states, and substantially admits, all that is asserted by the witness of the libellants, as well as the supposed grounds or excuse for the acts done by the claimant. The evidence shows that the war and the blockade were known to the master and owner of the Monte Christo, and that she was chartered by the claimant to transport this cotton from Aransas to the port of New York. The claimant admits that he is a native and resident merchant of New York, and that he purchased the cotton in Texas, with Confederate funds, since the war and the blockade with intent to bring it from Texas north, and chartered the Monte Christo to that end. The vessel was placed in the harbor of Aransas in order to receive this cotton on board. While the cotton was in the act of being carried in flat-boats or lighters to the vessel, and before it was laden on board, it was captured by the United States, and the Monte Christo was burned.

Upon these facts, it results that the cargo was arrested while it was in the act of being exported from the enemy country in evasion of the blockade of the port. But in addition to that, the claimant, being a citizen of the United States, was disabled from obtaining a lawful ownership of the cotton, by purchasing it from the enemy in the enemy country. He was interdicted from all trade with the enemy, and the cotton remained liable to capture as enemy property, being water-borne at the time.

These points of law have been repeatedly considered and passed upon in prize suits during this war. The claimant has no legal defence to the suit. If he has any remedy, it must be by a remission of the forfeiture of the government.

Let there be a decree of condemnation and forfeiture.

This decree was reversed, on appeal, by the circuit court [Case No. 4,785].

FIFTY-TWO BALES OF COTTON.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 644.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. July 17, 1863.[2]

PRIZE—PROPERTY OF LOYAL CITIZEN IN ENEMY'S COUNTRY AT COMMENCEMENT OF WAR.

The property was captured on a flatboat fastened to a wharf in Texas, and belonged to a citizen and merchant of New York, who went to Texas before the war to collect debts due to him. The cotton was the proceeds, and claimant used all diligence to collect his effects, with a view to leave the hostile country after the breaking out of the war. [Held, that the cotton was not enemy's property, and should not be condemned.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

In admiralty.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This cotton was captured from on board a flatboat fastened to the wharf at the town of Lamar, at the head of Aransas bay, Texas. The flatboat was not captured, but a schooner, called the Monte Christo, lying in the same waters, undergoing repairs, and on board of which, as is claimed, it was intended to place the cotton, was captured. This vessel was afterwards burned, but her master was brought to New York, and has been examined in preparatorio. The cotton belongs to a citizen and merchant of New York, who had gone to the south, just before the breaking out of the war, to make collection of debts, and was engaged, at the time, in gathering together the funds realized from these collections, with a view to make his way home. The cotton in question comprised a part of these funds. He was not a resident south, nor engaged in business there. The war found him there temporarily, for the purposes above stated. The property was not enemy's property, nor is it pretended that there was any intention to run the blockade. The court below and its officers seem to have been in some doubt whether the proceedings against the cotton were on the prize or the instance side of the court. It was not on board of the vessel captured, which was undergoing repairs, nor was it to be placed on board unless, after she was repaired, she should prove seaworthy; and, if it had been on board, there is no proof of any intent to run the blockade.

The only pretext for condemnation is, that the property in question was enemy's property, which I think is not sustained. It appears to me that the claimant used all diligence to collect his effects, with a view to leave the hostile country, after the breaking out of the war, and is brougnt fairly within the principle of international law that protects him.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

[2] [Reversing Case No. 4,784.]

Decree below reversed.

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

On an application for a new trial, on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it should appear that it was unknown to the party at the trial, as well as his counsel.

Appeal from the Conway circuit court [in a suit by Fire Fikes against George Bentley].

Before ESKRIDGE, JOHNSON, and TRIMBLE, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an appeal from the Conway circuit court. The appellant moved for a new trial, on an affidavit setting forth newly discovered evidence, and stating that the evidence was not known to his counsel on the trial of the cause. But it does not state that it was unknown to himself, which we think indispensable. Judgment affirmed.

FILKINS et al. v. BLACKMAN.

[13 Blatchf. 440; [2] Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 282.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. June 30, 1876.

TRADE-MARKS—ASSIGNMENT FOR LIMITED TERM—TRANSFER OF ASSIGNEE'S RIGHT TO COPARTNERSHIP.

1. B. invented a medicine which he called "Dr. J. Blackman's Genuine Healing Balsam," and made and sold it under that name. In 1865, B. conveyed to F. the exclusive right to use B.'s name in making and selling such medicine, for 10 years, for a sum to be paid every three months during that time, and, if F. performed his contract for the full 10 years, then B. granted to F. "all of the rights and privileges" to use B.'s name in making and selling such medicine, without fee or reward to B., for 50 years: Held, that F. acquired, after the 10 years, the same exclusive right which he had during the 10 years, and that his right for the 50 years was exclusive as against B. and subsequent grantees of B.

2. The name of such medicine is a valid trade-mark; and the exclusive right to use such trade-mark will pass, by assignment, to any one who has lawfully obtained from the inventor of the medicine the exclusive right, also, to make and sell, and who does sell, the medicine compounded according to the original formula.

3. When a partnership is formed to make an article to which a given trade-mark is properly applied, such trade-mark, if belonging to one partner, becomes, in the absence of special regulations, part of the partnership property.

4. A preliminary injunction granted to restrain the use of such trade-mark.

[Cited in William Rogers Manuf'g Co. v. Rogers & Spurr Manuf'g Co., 11 Fed. 499.]

[This was a bill in equity filed by Morgan L. Filkins and another to enjoin Newton M. Blackman from the use of plaintiffs' trade-mark.]

Chase, Bestow & Holt, for plaintiffs.

Henry T. Blake and E. D. Strong, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. In the bill in equity which was originally filed by the plaintiffs, they averred that they were residents of the city of Albany, and citizens of the state of New York, and were, as copartners, manufacturers and dealers in proprietary medicines; that they had long manufactured and sold a well known article of medicine, called "Dr. J. Blackman's Genuine Healing Balsam," which had gone into extensive use, and obtained a high reputation; that they had acquired an exclusive right to the use of that name as a trade-mark, and had also a right to the use of certain labels, which had been devised by one of the plaintiffs, upon the bottles containing the medicine; and that the defendant, a resident and citizen of Danbury, in Connecticut, was using, upon bottles of medicine of his own manufacture, said trade-mark, and labels which were close imitations of the plaintiffs' labels. The bill prayed for an injunction. Upon the hearing of a motion for preliminary injunction, the plaintiffs asked and obtained leave to amend their bill, by the averment, that, on October 14th, 1875, they deposited in the patent office, for registration, a label, of which the following is the title, viz., "Dr. J. Blackman's Genuine Healing Balsam," the right to the use of which they claimed as sole proprietors, and that said trade-mark was then duly registered in the patent office, and a certificate thereof was duly issued to the plaintiffs. The motion was tried upon the affidavits which were presented by the parties, no answer having been filed at the time of said hearing. The affidavits of the defendant deny the right of the plaintiffs to any exclusive use of such name or title, and assert the right of the defendant to manufacture said medicine, and to use said name, and assert that the plaintiffs do not manufacture the medicine according to the original formula, and have abandoned the use of the name "J. Blackman" in their trade-mark.

From the affidavits which are on file, it appears that Jonas Blackman is the father-in-law of Morgan L. Filkins, one of the plaintiffs, and was, about the year 1840, the inventor of the article which was called, at the time of the discovery, "Dr. J. Blackman's Genuine Healing Balsam." It was at first sold under said name from house to house, until Dr. Filkins made a contract with Dr. Blackman, by which the former obtained a right to manufacture, or assist in the manufacture and sale of, said medicine. He subsequently entered into the business somewhat extensively, and placed the medicine upon the market. Two or three contracts were made between these parties, which expired by lapse of time or by mutual agreement. The final contract was as follows: "This agreement made and entered into this 28th day of November, A. D. 1865, between Jonas Blackman, of the town of Brookfield, and county of Fairfield, state of Connecticut, of the first part, and Morgan L. Filkins, of the city and county of Albany, and state of New York, of the second part, witnesseth, that, in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained, to be performed by the party of the second part, the said party of the first part hereby sells and conveys unto the said party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, the exclusive right to use his name in the manufacture, putting up and sale of certain medicines, known as Dr. J. Blackman's Genuine Healing Balsam, Dr. J. Blackman's Valuable Red Salve, and Dr. J. Blackman's Valuable Strengthening Plasters, for the term of ten years from the first day of January, A. D. 1866; and the party of the first part hereby agrees not to manufacture, or cause to be manufactured, either himself or by his agents, or authorize any other person or persons to use his name in the manufacture of, said medicines, or any other medicine recommended to cure diseases said medicines are said to cure; and the party of the second part agrees, in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinbefore stated, to pay unto the party of the first part, or his assigns, the sum of $365 annually, lawful money, at Brookfield, in the state of Connecticut, in manner following, to wit, $91 25 on the first day of each of the following months of April, July, October and January, of each year, up to and including the 1st day of January, A. D. 1876; and it is further agreed by the party of the first part, provided always that the party of the second part does well and truly perform the covenants and agreements to be by him kept and performed for the full term of ten years from the 1st day of January, A. D. 1866, thereafter the party of the first part gives and grants to the party of the second part all of the rights and privileges to use his name in the manufacture, putting up and sale of said medicines, without fee or reward to the party of the first part, his heirs or assigns for the full term of fifty years or more; and it is mutually agreed by and between the parties to these presents, that, in case either party shall fail to perform the covenants and agreements by such party to be kept and performed, the party so failing to perform shall pay unto the other party the sum of fifty thousand dollars, which sum of fifty thousand dollars the parties hereto have agreed to fix and liquidate as the damages in case of non-performance."

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission. Cox, Manual Trade-Mark Cas. 282, contains only a partial report.]

The medicine has become well known, mainly through the efforts of Dr. Filkins to introduce it to the public, has quite a large sale among druggists, and has been a source of profit. It is now made by the plaintiffs substantially according to the original formula which was furnished by Dr. Blackman, and the plaintiffs have never abandoned the use of the original name. The name of the inventor, "J. Blackman," is the distinctive part of the name or title of the medicine, and gives to the title its peculiar value. Newton M. Blackman, who is the son of Jonas Blackman, has engaged in the manufacture of the same medicine, which is put up in bottles encircled with labels closely resembling those which are used by the plaintiffs, and containing the same title or name—"Dr. J. Blackman's Genuine Healing Balsam." The defendant states, in his affidavit, that his father has sold him the formula, and the right to manufacture the medicine, and to use the father's name.

The question in the case is, whether or not the plaintiffs now have a clear and exclusive continuing right, under the contract which was entered into between Jonas Blackman and Morgan L. Filkins, to the use of the name which was originally given to the medicine by the inventor, and whether or not, therefore, the plaintiffs held the right, at the time of the registration of the trade-mark, to its exclusive use after January 1st, 1876.

The following general principles in regard to the assignment of the exclusive use of trade-marks are applicable to this case. The name "Dr. J. Blackman's Genuine Healing Balsam," which was originally given to the medicine by the inventor, "points out distinctly the origin or ownership of the article to which it is affixed," and the words "were appropriated as designating the true origin or ownership of the article or fabric to which they are attached." Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 311. The name, as a whole, was his trade-mark, which he had the exclusive right to use, and the exclusive use of which would pass, by assignment, to any one who had lawfully obtained from the inventor the exclusive right, also, to manufacture and sell, and who did sell, that particular article compounded according to the original formula. "The property or right to a trade-mark may pass, by an assignment, or by operation of law, to any one who takes, at the same time, the right to manufacture or sell the particular merchandise to which said trade-mark has been attached. As a mere abstract right, having no reference to any particular person or property, it is conceded that it cannot exist, and, so, cannot pass by an assignment, or descend to a man's legal representatives." Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, Am. Trade-Mark Cas. 331. If the assignee should make a different article, he would not derive, by purchase from Jonas Blackman, a right which a court of equity would enforce, to use the name which the inventor had given to his own article, because such a use of the name would deceive the public. The right to the use of a trade-mark cannot be so enjoyed by an assignee, that he shall have the right to affix the mark to goods differing in character or species from the article to which it was originally attached. It is not, however, necessary that an article to which a trade-mark, personal in its inception, was originally affixed, should always be manufactured at the same place where it was originally made. This particular trade-mark, being the name of the inventor, was personal to Dr. Blackman, in its inception, but has been permitted by him to be applied, and to be appropriated, to the same article when manufactured by Filkins Bros. Under the circumstances in which the medicine has been manufactured and sold, the use of the trade-mark does not imply that the medicine was manufactured by Jonas Blackman, but that it is the same article which he originally invented and manufactured. Bury v. Bedford, 10 Jur. (N. S.) pt. 1, p. 503; Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 11 Jur. (N. S.) pt. 1, p. 513. It is also to be noticed, that an assignee of a trade-mark does not obtain a right to restrain copyists of his mark, merely by virtue of his assignment, but he must also show that it has actually been used and applied upon an article, so that the public have come to understand that "the article to which it is attached is the manufacture or production which is generally known in market under that denomination." Walton v. Crowley [Case No. 17,133].

In this case, an agreement was made on November 28th, 1865, between Jonas Blackman and Morgan L. Filkins, by which, in consideration of the agreement of the latter to pay specified royalties, Blackman sold and conveyed to Filkins, his heirs or assigns, the exclusive right to use the name of the inventor, in the manufacture and sale of certain medicines, for the term of ten years from January 1st, 1866. Blackman further agreed not to manufacture, or cause to be manufactured, and not to authorize any person to use his name in the manufacture of, said medicines; and, in case the said Filkins performed his covenants for the term of ten years, Blackman further granted "all of the rights and privileges to use his name in the manufacture, putting up and sale of said medicines, without fee or reward, for the term of fifty years or more." There is no question that an exclusive right was granted for the ten years ending January 1st, 1876; but it is claimed that thereafter a bare right or privilege was granted, in common with Jonas Blackman, to use his name and to manufacture said medicines. The determination of this question depends upon the construction which shall be given to the grant of "all of the rights and privileges to use my name." An exclusive right had been given for ten years, upon the payment of royalty, and, thereafter, "all of the rights and privileges" to use the name of the grantor were given, without royalty, for the term of fifty years. The terms "an exclusive privilege," and "all of the rights and privileges," as used in this contract, are synonymous, and, by the words "all of the rights and privileges" are meant all the rights, or the entire right, which the grantor had at the expiration of the term of ten years. Each word in the phrase "all of the rights" is to have the force which naturally belongs to such word, and, by construing the words to mean a conveyance of a bare right, the same effect is given to the language as if it had been "I convey the right, or a right, to use my name," which construction leaves the word "all" without any significance. If the grantor retained the right in common with Filkins to use the name of the inventor, he did not convey all of his rights, but retained as much as he granted. The grantor intended to convey, in a certain contingency, all the rights, for fifty years, which he had previously conveyed for the term of ten years. If the same language which is used in this entire contract had been used in an assignment of a patent or of a copyright, although it is true that "property in a trade-mark, or in the use of a trade-mark, has very little analogy to that which exists in copyrights or in patents for inventions" (Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 311), the assignment would, it is believed, convey the exclusive right for the specified term. The grant is unlike a grant of an easement, for, there, the title to the land is retained, and in this case, the grantor parts with his entire right to the thing which is the subject-matter of the conveyance—the use of the trade-mark. I am of opinion that Filkins obtained, by the contract, an exclusive right to use this name, in the manufacture of the medicine, for the term of fifty years from January 1st, 1876.

The contract was made by Blackman with Morgan L. Filkins alone, and it is suggested, that, inasmuch as the bill is brought by Filkins Brothers, and as Welcome L. Filkins was not a party to the contract, or to the grant, the firm has no legal right to the use of the mark. When a partnership is formed in regard to the manufacture of the article to which the trade-mark is properly applied, "the trade-mark of one partner, in the absence of special regulations, becomes part of the partnership property." Bury v. Bedford, 10 Jur. (N. S.) pt. 1, 503.

In regard to the propriety of granting a preliminary injunction, it is obvious that the plaintiffs have expended a good deal of money in advertising and in bringing this medicine into public use. They have made its manufacture profitable, and have invested their property in the business. The defendant has but recently, and not extensively, engaged in the manufacture, but is seeking to take advantage of the reputation which the efforts of others have given to the article. The contest between the parties is plainly the result of a family quarrel, in which, I think, the defendant is seeking to obtain a position to which the previous contract and business relations between his father and brother-in-law have given him no right.

Let a preliminary injunction issue, restraining the defendant from the use of the trade-mark "Dr. J. Blackman's Genuine Healing Balsam," and from the use of any label containing that name, or the name of Dr. J. Blackman.

TRADE-MARKS—ABANDONMENT.

G., having a patent for an improvement in stoves, acquiesced, during the entire duration of the patent, in the manufacture and sale by M., of stoves containing said improvement, with the name "Charter Oak" upon them. After the patent expired, M. continued to make and sell stoves containing said improvement, and to put the name "Charter Oak" upon them, but did not represent them as made by G. G., claiming the name "Charter Oak" as a trade-mark, applied to stoves containing said improvement, brought a suit to restrain the use of it by M., on such stoves: Held, that M. ought not to be so restrained.

[This was a bill in equity by Giles F. Filley against Perley A. Child.]

Samuel S. Boyd, for plaintiff.

Esek Cowen, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The bill alleges, that the plaintiff, in 1851, "conceived of applying" the name of "Charter Oak," as a trade-mark, to cooking stoves embodying certain improvements in their internal construction, which he had invented, for the purpose (1) of securing to himself more completely and exclusively the benefits to be derived from the manufacture and sale of such cooking stoves, and (2) of giving to the same a particular name, to enable the general public and purchasers to distinguish the same from all other cooking stoves. It is not alleged in the bill that the plaintiff has ever applied the name "Charter Oak" to any other cooking stove than the one embodying said improvements, nor that the cooking stoves sold by the defendant, bearing upon them the name "Charter Oak," embodied said improvements. nor that the said improvements were patented to the plaintiff. It is shown that said improvements were patented to the plaintiff June 14th, 1853; that the patent was reissued to him December 27th, 1859; and that it was extended for seven years from the 14th of June, 1867. There is no evidence that any one, prior to the plaintiff, applied the name "Charter Oak" to a stove containing said improvements; and it is shown that all the stoves sold by the defendant have been stoves containing said improvements, and having upon them the name "Charter Oak." The suit is not brought upon the patent, for a violation thereof. The bill alleges, that the use of said trade-mark by the defendant "is intended and designed and well calculated to deceive the public into the belief that the stove bearing it is the genuine stove" of the plaintiff, "since by said name 'Charter Oak' alone is the said stove bought, sold and known." There is no evidence that any person buying one of such stoves as the defendant has so sold, would believe that he was buying a stove made by the plaintiff, although he would believe that he was buying a stove containing the improvements so patented to the plaintiff. As the patent has expired, and the defendant has a right to sell cooking stoves embodying the patented improvements, the sole question is, whether the defendant has a right to sell them with the name "Charter Oak" upon them. The evidence satisfactorily shows, that the plaintiff, during the entire twenty-one years' duration of the patent, knew of, and acquiesced in, the manufacture and sale, by M. L. Filley and those under whom he claims, of cooking stoves containing the patented improvements, with the name "Charter Oak" upon them. M. L. Filley made the stoves now complained of. He has built up a business through such acquiescence, in the manufacture and sale of such cooking stoves, with such name. Under such circumstances, the plaintiff cannot, after his patent has expired, and when M. L. Filley has the right to make stoves containing said improvements, prevent him from calling them by the name of "Charter Oak," so long as he does not represent them as being made by the plaintiff, or induce others to believe that they are made by the plaintiff.

The bill is dismissed, with costs.

FINCH v. RIKEMAN et al.

[2 Blatchf. 301.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 1851.

PRODUCTION OF BOOKS AND PAPERS — AUTHORITY OF FEDERAL COURTS — ACT OF SEPT. 24, 1789— LIABILITY OF DEFENDANT TO PENALTY.

1. Under section 15 of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 82), the courts of the United States have power, on the application of a party to an action, to require the production of books or writings in the possession or power of the adverse party, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue, only in cases and under circumstances in which a court of chancery, by the ordinary rules of proceeding in that court, would compel the production of the same.

[Cited in U. S. v. Younge, Case No. 16,783.]

2. The authority conferred by the act can be exercised, therefore, only in cases where the relief might have been had by a bill of discovery, and as a substitute for that proceeding.

[Cited in Kirkpatrick v. Pope Manuf'g Co., 61 Fed. 47.]

3. Where, in an action at law for the infringement of a patent, the plaintiff applied to this court for an order requiring the defendant to produce his books, for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to establish therefrom the quantity and value of certain machinery made by the defendant, which the declaration charged to have been made in violation of the patent: Held, that the application could not be granted, because the direct consequence of the evidence, if obtained, would be to subject the defendant to a penalty under section 14 of the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 123), and the plaintiff had not relinquished his claim to the penalty.

4. A bill of discovery will not be allowed in any case where the discovery will subject the defendant to a penalty, unless the bill relinquishes all claim to the penalty.

This was an action on the case, to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent for an improvement in railroad cars. The plaintiff [Reuben R. Finch] set forth, by affidavit, that the action was at issue; that the defendants [Cornelius Rikeman and David L. Seymour] had made the patented cars in whole and in part, and had sold the same to various persons in different states, and had kept books of account, in which were entered the numbers of cars or parts of cars sold by them; and that the production of those books would show the extent of the damages or loss sustained by the plaintiff, for which the action was brought. On this affidavit, the plaintiff moved, that the defendants be ordered to produce, under oath, their books of account; that the plaintiff have leave to take copies of such parts thereof as related to the matters stated in his affidavit; and that, on the failure of the defendants to produce their books, final judgment be rendered against them in the action. The defendants, by affidavit, denied the infringement complained of, and set forth that they were iron-founders and machinists by trade, and kept only one set of books, in which were entered all charges for goods sold and work done in their line of business, and that they kept no separate entry or account of any particular jobs of work or articles sold.

BETTS, District Judge. The provisions of the act of congress under which this motion is made are, that the courts of the United States shall have power, in the trial of actions at law, on motion and due notice thereof being given, to require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue, in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceedings in chancery. Act Sept. 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 82, § 15). It is plain, from the language of this statute, that congress did not intend to vest in parties litigant an unrestricted right to all written evidence in the possession of an adverse party, which might be pertinent to an issue in a trial at law; the qualification being explicit, that the right is allowable only in cases and under circumstances in which the court of chancery, by the ordinary rules of proceeding in that court, would compel the production of books and documents.

We find no decision of the courts of the United States upon the effect of this qualifying clause in the statute. The practice in this court, so far as it has come to our knowledge, has been uniform, to regard the summary authority given by this statute as one to be exercised only in cases where the relief might have been had by a bill of discovery, and as a substitute for that proceeding. This act of congress was probably the earliest regulation of the subject, within the United States, by positive law. The substance of its provisions has since been adopted in most of the states, either by express legislative enactments or by rules of court authorized by existing laws or usages. The English practice, however, obtained in some of the states long after the passage of this act, and the party claiming to use the contents of papers in the hands of his adversary, was obliged to resort to a notice to produce them, and, on non-compliance, to secondary evidence of their contents; or, under particular circumstances, he might have an order of the court compelling their production. 1 Tidd, Pr. 639; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 559, 560. But the practice in England and in the state courts did not enable one party to bring from the possession of the other party, as a matter of course, documents to be used on a trial, nor to compel the latter to disclose whether they were in his hands or under his control. The relief proposed to suitors by that practice was, however, more especially defective in affording no summary sanction to an order to produce papers, which should apply to and affect the cause itself. The act of congress remedies this deficiency, by authorizing a final judgment or a judgment of nonsuit, as the case may require, so that the rights of the party in the suit are made dependent on his compliance with the order against him to produce the books or papers. These are stringent conditions, and require from courts a careful consideration of the provisions of the act, before enforcing them. The plain limitation to the right to the interposition of this court by giving final judgment, is, that the application by a party for the production of papers be one which a court of equity would sustain on a bill of discovery. The right, in our opinion, rests entirely on that condition.

This motion demands the production of the defendants' books, to establish the quantity and value of the manufactures of machinery made by the defendants, which manufacture is charged in the declaration to be an infringement of the plaintiff's patent. The effect of the evidence sought for will be not only to enable the plaintiff to recover his entire damages, but its direct consequence will be to subject the defendants to a penalty of three times the amount of those damages, under section 14 of the act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 123). We think it against the rules of equity, to allow a bill of discovery in such a case, unless the bill relinquishes all claim to the penalty which may be superinduced by the production and exhibition of the books, and, for that cause, the motion must be denied. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1494; Story, Eq. Pl. § 575, and notes; 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 625, 821.

District Court, W. D. Wisconsin. Nov. 1873.

PLEADING AND PRACTICE IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. The answer of the debtor to an involuntary petition must be in writing and verified.

2. The rules governing pleadings in common-law cases apply to the pleadings under the 41st section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 537)], and the allegations of the debtor should be presented and embodied in substantially the same form as defenses in common-law cases.

3. The court may in its discretion issue a special venire and impanel a jury to try the issue at any time, without waiting for a regular term.

A petition was filed in this court against the above debtor, alleging as acts of bankruptcy, that he, being a merchant, had suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper for a period of fourteen days, describing the particular paper upon which the allegation was founded. Whereupon an order was issued that he show cause on the 17th inst., an injunction granted, and provisional warrant issued for the seizure of the debtor's property. The debtor appeared on the return day, and after moving for a continuance, which was denied, presented a general denial of the acts of bankruptcy set up in the petition, together with the demand that the same be inquired of by a jury, as provided in section forty-one of the bankrupt act, properly signed by the debtor, but not verified. The counsel of the petitioner objected to the answer, because not verified, and insisted that the answer of the debtor to allegations of the petition should be verified before it was filed or admitted as constituting an issue for trial either by court or jury.

Orton, Keyes & Chynoweth, for petitioning creditors.

S. U. Pinney, for debtor.

HOPKINS, District Judge. This question has been raised on other occasions before me, and on intimating that I thought it a better practice to add a verification, parties have complied, and in that way the practice here has become settled to annex affidavit. But in this case the counsel for the debtor challenges the authority of the court to require a verified answer. So I have to examine and determine the question in a more considerate manner than I have heretofore done.

The section under which these proceedings are had is quite vague, and the meaning somewhat uncertain. It does not provide in what form the issue between the petitioning creditor and the debtor shall be framed. That seems to be left for the courts to arrange and determine. It ordains that the court shall "proceed summarily to hear the allegations of the petitioner and debtor, and * * * if the debtor on the same day so demand in writing, order a trial by jury * * * to ascertain the fact of such alleged bankruptcy."

This is all there is on the subject of forming the issue for trial, in the act. But it is claimed that "form 61," in general forms adopted by the supreme court under the authority contained in the act, being all there is in relation to that matter, is all that is necessary to constitute an issue for trial.

I can not adopt that view. That is the form of the order to be entered by the court. It is not an act or allegation of the debtor, but is an order of the court, based upon the allegation the debtor previously presented or communicated to the court in some form, either orally or in writing. The court is required to hear the "allegations of the petitioner and debtor."

The question is, what is meant by the word "allegations." On the part of the petitioner it must mean those stated in his petition on file, so as to him it means written allegation, and if so, for what reason should the courts permit or hold that the allegations of the debtor should be presented in a less formal and certain manner? I am unable to discover any. A reasonable construction would require the debtor's allegations to be reduced to writing, and in such form as to raise an issue analogous to issues in other cases triable by a jury.

The word "allegations" is used in the act in the sense of "pleadings," as meaning a formal statement of the acts of bankruptcy in the petition, and a like formal defense of the debtor thereto, either a general denial which would put in issue all facts stated in the petition, or a statement of any matters in avoidance according to the rules governing pleadings in common-law cases. Construed in this way, it gives the proceedings the essential form used in other judicial proceedings, whereas the construction contended for by the debtor's counsel makes the proceeding anomalous, and not subject to any known rules relating to the forming of issues for trial before courts, and especially before juries. I think, in view of the objects to be obtained, and the manner of obtaining them, that the section should be construed as requiring the debtor to answer the petition in writing, and in courts where defenses are admissible upon oath of party only, that the same rule should apply to the answer of debtors to petitions filed against them under the provisions of the bankrupt law.

There has been some contrariety of opinion among the district judges on this question, and the practice in the different districts is not uniform.

But since the construction given in the case of Knickerbocker Ins. Co. v. Comstock [16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 258], by the supreme court of the United States, I am satisfied that in those courts where a verified answer in common law cases is necessary, it is equally imperative to file a verified answer in cases of this character.

Justice Clifford, who wrote the opinion of the court in that case, in considering the proceedings under this section, says: "Such a provision is certainly entitled to a reasonable construction, and it seems plain when it is read in the light of the principles of the constitution and of analogous enactments, and when tested by the general rules of law applicable in controversies involving the right of trial by jury, that the process, pleadings, and proceedings must be regarded as governed and controlled by the rules and regulations prescribed in the trial of civil actions at common law."

I understand from this language that the allegations of the debtor should be presented and embodied in substantially the same form as defenses in common-law cases.

The learned judge, in another part of his opinion, speaks of the petition as the "first pleading" of the moving party. If a pleading, it should be answered in the same way as other pleadings—in writing. Such a construction gives to the proceedings a judicial character, and harmonizes them with the proceedings ordinarily taken in suits in courts.

A general denial is tantamount to the general issue, and casts the burden of making out the case upon the petitioning creditor, and special matter in avoidance should be set up and presented in form of special pleas, as in other cases.

If the pleadings are to be governed and controlled by the rules and regulations in common-law cases, the answer must be verified, for the code practice of this state is now the law governing pleadings in the federal courts in common-law cases. [Act June 1, 1872;] 17 Stat. 197.

And the Code requires all answers to be verified when the first pleadings of the moving party are verified; so, if I am right in my understanding of the decision of the supreme court, the debtor must verify his answer to the petition, else it may be treated as a nullity. Debtors are required to put in verified answers in the northern district of New York. In re Safe-Deposit & Sav. Inst. [Case No. 12,211].

In Re Sutherland [Case No. 13,638], it is held that whether the answer should be verified or not, depended upon the general rules of the court in regard to pleadings in bankruptcy. That case concedes the power of the bankrupt court to make rules requiring it. But under the decision of the supreme court supra special rules are not necessary, for it is there held that the "process, pleadings and proceedings are governed by the rules prescribed in common-law cases." In reaching this conclusion I have followed certain well-settled rules and principles in relation to pleadings and issues in courts of justice.

The general rule in all courts is to require a pleading or petition to be answered in as solemn a manner as it is required to be made—if made under oath to require the denial or answer to it to be under oath.

This was always the rule in equity, and latterly has commended itself to courts of law, so that the rule, in states where the improved system of pleading is adopted, is to require verified pleadings to be answered only upon the oath of the other party. Therefore requiring a sworn answer from the debtor is but assimilating the practice in cases and proceedings under this section to the practice of the courts in other cases and controversies.

It seems to me that the reasons for requiring a sworn answer in these cases are very apparent and cogent, as is well illustrated in this case.

This debtor is an extensive grocery merchant, with a large and valuable stock of goods. They were seized, and are now in the custody of the marshal under a provisional warrant, being held at a large expense for rent, etc., and also subject to material deterioration, which, if the debtor is a bankrupt, as is alleged in the sworn petition of the creditor and affidavit of another party filed with it, must be at the expense of his creditors; hence, to require the alleged bankrupt to meet such an allegation with a sworn denial, is not unreasonable, or a hardship that he can very meritoriously complain of.

But this is not all. In this district we have but two stated terms a year, and unless a special jury is ordered the issue can not be tried until next June, and if one is ordered, as the justice of the case would almost seem to demand, it will be at a large public expense, which certainly ought not to be incurred unless there is a real defense to allegations or acts of bankruptcy set out in the petition. And if a debtor is permitted to answer without verification, I do not see any way of escape from the most vexatious and unreasonable delays on his part, destitute of merit or advantage to him, and burdensome and expensive to his creditors, besides casting an additional charge upon the public, and occupying the time of the court in the trial of frivolous issues. Such unjustifiable practice by a debtor can not be allowed, according to my understanding of the true intent and meaning of the section of the act under consideration. I therefore hold that the answer of a debtor to the petition must be verified the same as pleadings in suits at common law, and reject the proposed answer of the debtor until verified.

NOTE. After this decision, the debtor filed a sworn denial of the acts of bankruptcy; whereupon the petitioner's counsel moved for a special venire to summon a jury to try the issue. The court held that the first section of the bankrupt act authorized such a practice, and directed the clerk to issue a special venire for that purpose, returnable at an early day, to be agreed upon to suit the parties.

Contra:—Neither the bankrupt law nor form sixty-one require that the answer to a creditor's petition, to entitle the debtor to demand and have a hearing by the court or a trial by jury, should be verified, or even in writing. In re Heydette [Case No. 6,444].

FINDLAY et al. v. The WILLIAM.

[1 Pet. Adm. 12.][1]

District Court, D. Pennsylvania. June 21, 1793.

PRIZE—JURISDICTION OF COURTS OF A NEUTRAL COUNTRY.

A British vessel captured by a French privateer, within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. The owners of the vessel claim her, with damages, but their claim dismissed, the court having no jurisdiction.

[Cited in Hopner v. Appleby, Case No. 6,699.]

PETERS, District Judge. The libel states that the libellants [Robert Findlay and others, subjects of Great Britain] are owners of the ship mentioned in the libel, and that the said ship being on her voyage from Bremen to Potowmac river, in the state of Maryland, and within nine miles of the sea coast of the United States, received an American pilot on board, for the purpose of conducting her to the place of her destination. That, after receiving the pilot on board, she continued her course until she arrived within two miles of Cape Henry, in five fathoms water, and as near the shore as the pilot thought proper to go; when she was seized by a number of armed men, under the command of Peter Johannene, captain of the schooner Citizen Genet, and bearing the national colours of France, as a prize, and the captain and crew made prisoners. That they do not admit, but pray that it may be enquired into, whether the schooner was commissioned or not. That the said ship was, at the time of her capture, within the territorial jurisdiction, and under the protection of the United States; who are now at peace with the king and people of Great Britain. That the persons so capturing had no authority from or under the United States, to capture British vessels within that distance of the sea coasts, to which, by the laws of nations, and the laws of the United States, the rights and jurisdiction of the United States extend. They therefore pray that, as the capture and detention are unjust, and against the laws of nations, and of the United States, the ship and cargo be discharged, and the prisoners liberated, and satisfaction given in damages for the capture. To this a plea was offered on the part of Pierre Arcade Joannene, a French citizen, on behalf of himself and all concerned in the capture, setting forth, that he was at that time, &c. commissioned by the French republic, to attack &c. the enemies of the said republic wherever he might find them, and take them prisoners with their ships, &c. That he took the ship, &c. and the persons on board, who were subjects of his Britannic majesty, then at open war with the republic of France, and brought the ship as prize, and the people as prisoners, into the port of Philadelphia; and alleges that, by the laws of nations, and the treaty between the United States and the said republic, it doth not pertain to this court, nor is it within the cognizance of this court to hold plea respecting the said ship and property, so taken as prize, or the British subjects on board her, and prays that he may be dismissed, and the ship and cargo discharged. To this the libellants put in a replication in the nature of a demurrer to the plea, and because the ship &c. were captured in the territory of the United States, prayed a sentence and decree, according to the force, form and effect of their libel. The commission from the French republic, whereby it appears that the said schooner Citizen Genet was duly commissioned, &c. was produced, and a copy thereof filed among the proceedings of the court.

In this cause it has been contended, in support of the plea to the jurisdiction of the court: 1. That the treaty between France and the United States, in its 17th article, forbids any examination of the lawfulness of prizes taken by either party when at war, by the officers, which include judges or courts, of the other; and that such prizes may enter into the ports of either party, and depart at pleasure, without search or any impediment; and that this court should immediately stay proceedings when the commission is produced under which the capture in question was made. 2. That, by the laws of nations, to which the treaty is conformable, a neutral nation has no right to be the judge, either of the lawfulness of the war between belligerent powers, or of their conduct towards each other in the prosecution of hostilities. That undertaking to determine on the question of prize, in this case, would be interposing our judgment not only illegally, but in a manner unprecedented; there being no instance to be found, in which the courts of a neutral nation have ever exercised jurisdiction in such cases. 3. That, by the voluntary law of nations, every war is considered by parties, as well as neutrals, just as between such parties, and all acquisitions lawful. If these acquisitions are disputed, it must be in the courts of the nation to which the captor belongs, and cannot be the subject of enquiry in those of a neutral nation, even at the instance of the neutral sovereign, much less at the suit of private subjects of one of the belligerent powers, against those of the other. 4. That the right of entry and sale of prizes, in neutral ports, is lawful; and it is sufficient for the neutral that the prize is found in complete possession of one of the powers at war, or their subjects. No judiciary enquiry should be made on the occasion. But if, in the capture, an invasion of the territorial rights of the neuter has been made, it must be canvassed by the diplomatic body, and finally settled by the sovereigns of the neutral and of the belligerent nation whose subjects have done the wrong. It is an offence against the neutral nation, and not an injury to the captured.

To shew that the court have jurisdiction in this case, the advocates for the libellant contended: 1. That every sovereign and independent nation has a right to vindicate a wrong done to its dignity, and to repel, and obtain satisfaction for, invasions of its territory. 2. That the attacking and capturing the vessels of a friend, coming into the ports, or acting in a hostile manner, by one belligerent power against another, within the limits of a nation at peace with both, is a wrong done to the nation so at peace, an insult on its sovereignty, and an invasion of its territorial rights. 3. That we are bound, by the laws of nations, to seek reparation for the wrong thus committed, as well on our own account, as to enable us to give satisfaction to a friendly nation, the property of whose subjects has been taken within our limits. 4. That all captures made within the territories of a neutral, either on land, in their ports or harbours, or on their coasts to a certain distance from the land, are unlawful, and ought by the laws of nations to be restored. 5. That the word "prizes" in the treaty means "lawful prizes," and illegal captures are as none, so far as relates to the subject matter of the treaty, and, therefore, were not the objects of the contracting parties, at the time of making it: and it could not have been the meaning of the treaty to let captures in a neutral country pass without enquiry. 6. That this is not judging of the war between the neutral powers; it is an enquiry into an allegation of an invasion of territorial rights. Every nation is obliged to take care of its own preservation; it has a right to prevent any other injuring its security, and may make use of force to retaliate injustice, to prevent injury to its territory, and to punish the invaders of its privileges. 7. That we are bound by treaty to be at peace with the sovereign whose subjects and their property have been captured, and, unless restoration is made, and the property of these subjects protected, our engagements may be considered as violated. We are also bound to protect and defend the ships and merchandise of Prussia, Holland and Sweden, if attacked on our coasts, &c. and if captures take place, to use our endeavours to cause restitution to be made. 8. That the best mode of causing restitution is through the courts of admiralty, by process in rem, when the capture is within their power. These courts proceed according to the laws of nations, and, in a government like ours, are the only tribunals that can properly be applied to. In despotic sovereignties, force may immediately be applied; but here ours is a government of laws, and our executive is not vested with the authority exercised by sovereigns in such cases. All he can do is to represent and negociate, and his representations may be slighted, and our government treated with indignity. If there is no power in this court to effectuate the purpose required, it does not exist any where. The reason why cases of admiralty adjudications and interferences cannot be produced, is that captures have seldom been carried into the ports of the injured neutral. And those who commit these outrages will take care not to put the property into the power of the injured, unless it shall appear they can do it with impunity. If they can dispose of their prizes here, they will not go to their own courts to have them condemned. 9. That though it is true that a remedy may be applied by negotiation and diplomatic discussion, and ultimately by force, yet the remedy through the courts of admiralty jurisdiction is a concurrent one. It is also the less liable to objection, as these are courts regulated by the laws and customs of all nations, and not liable to political bias, or entangled in political considerations. They are also courts, to whose decisions, for reciprocal benefit, all nations pay a particular respect.

I have given this subject every consideration I am capable of, and have deliberated on the arguments and authorities brought forward by the advocates on both sides the question, with the attention they justly merit. But it seems to me that much has been said not immediately applicable to the only point I have now to determine, to wit: Whether this court is vested with the power to enquire into the legality of the prize, and to investigate the fact on which all the reasonings are founded? If this fact is established, and the extent of our territorial limits ascertained, so as to make it clear that a capture has been made within the territories of the United States, there is not a doubt but that a flagrant violation of the rights of neutrality has been committed. Vatell, l. 3, § 132; Lee, c. 9, p. 151. And this is followed by many of the consequences mentioned by the advocates for the libellants, so far as they respect our national dignity and duty towards a friendly power, in endeavouring to cause restitution or recompence to be made. Nor does this seem to be denied by the other side of the question. But the embarrassment still exists. Who is to enquire into the matter, and either give or attempt the redress? It is difficult for a neutral nation, with the best dispositions, so to conduct itself as not to displease one or the other of belligerent parties, heated with the rage of war, and jealous of even common acts of justice or friendship on its part. Neither is it easy for the nations at war to restrain their subjects from acts of violence, even in the territories of their friends. The least under control are those whose object is not honourable conflict, or patriotic exertion. These are actuated by a spirit of lucre, which not only incites to plunder the base and lawless freebooter, but tarnishes even heroism, by seducing into unjustifiable actions the bravest men. It would be for the interest of nations, and the happiness of mankind, if, by universal consent, the quarrels of nations were prevented from being turned to the purposes of private advantage. But the swords of those who fight for gain will not, in our day, be beaten into ploughshares. We must take nations and men as we find them, and consider as lawful what those at war authorize, so far as it respects the parties engaged. After all, it depends much on the interest, the convenience, or the good temper of governments, whether a neutral shall or shall not be engaged in war. A prudent and just conduct, on the part of the neutral particularly, is the surest preventive. But how to evidence this, is a matter of consideration with those to whom the government is delegated. The simplest mode of evincing our impartial disposition, is to confine ourselves to the customs of other nations in our predicament; an over anxious zeal to avoid contests may otherwise lead us into errors; and, while we are endeavouring to avoid one rock, we may split on another. Mutual toleration must be exercised; for those who are at war, and those who are not, have their share of difficulties on this subject. Under this view of the matter before me, I have given a patient hearing to both sides; and have particularly attended to the arguments by which it has been endeavoured to establish a jurisdiction in this court. It must certainly be allowed, by the advocates for the libellants, that they have not been able to shew any direct authority upon the point. For the two cases of the Duke of Tuscany (Lee, 131) seizing the vessel committing the outrage near the port of Leghorn, and that of the king of England (Bynk. c. 8, p. 177; Molloy, 85) ordering restitution of the effects taken out of the houses of the inhabitants, and belonging to a ship of a friendly power, driven by its enemy on his shore, appear to have been acts of power and not done in consequence of decrees or orders of courts of admiralty. Yet these jurisdictions existed, in both the countries above mentioned. The case of Captain Landy, in the American frigate Alliance, who was ordered by the court of France to restore a ship taken by him, is not in point (2 Code de Pris, p. 877), for the Forsters, who appeared as owners, were either subjects of, or persons resident and domiciliated in, France, and the ship was sailing under a passport of that nation. They, therefore, could not be considered as enemies; and, the capture not being made from enemies, the case was not comprehended in the treaty, or the capture authorized by the laws of nations. In the case falling under the notice of the king of England (except that of his having the powers of peace and war, as an appendage to which he might have exercised this kind of authority) I should not have supposed him vested, without an act of the legislature, with the authority he used; and it is doubted, by Bynkershoek, whether he did right in interfering at all on the occasion. If it be consistent with treaties, and otherwise right, our legislature can vest the executive in future with similar powers. I should suppose, too, that the liberty of selling prizes, in a neutral country, is not a perfect right; and may also be considered, by our national legislature, as a subject of regulation. If any captures are made within our limits, and the vessels or plunder is brought within our ports, the sale may be forbidden. They must then be either abandoned or carried within the jurisdiction of the captors, where the proper courts will consider of their legality. Yet this is a matter, not of judicial, but political arrangement; and must be left to those who have the authority to direct. The sovereignty of our nation is as complete as that of any other; therefore, whatever other sovereigns can do, we have in our power. But because, at this time, the authority, supposed necessary on this occasion, is not, as it is alleged, to be found in the executive branch, I do not see that the judiciary ought to exercise it, as a consequence resulting from political convenience, or the necessity of the particular case. This, I fear, would be a novelty dictated by our zeal, and might give cause of offence to one, while we were aiming at justice to ourselves, or gratification to the other. I hesitate not to use any plain authority I know this court to possess, let the consequence be what it may; but this is a question too important in its effects, to be acted on but on the surest grounds. I agree here, as I do in many of their other positions, with the advocates for the libellants, when they say that "courts of admiralty jurisdiction are less liable to objection, as these courts are regulated by the laws and customs of all nations, and not liable to political bias, or entangled in political considerations." This should induce the greater caution in their determinations. I have not seen any proofs that "the laws and customs of all nations" warrant the interference of this court. If they do not, no authority can be derived from our own laws, if they were not silent on the subject. In the existing arrangement of our government, we did not calculate on our relative situation, as to contests between other nations. If, for this reason, no immediate remedy is at hand, who can justly censure the executive, when he has given decided evidence of his impartial and just inclinations? Who can with reason blame the judiciary, if they will not assume a power not conceived to be vested in them? Not the government of the country, whose subjects are the libellants, and to whom I wish every degree of justice may be done. The principles established in the decisions of their own courts, and the opinions of their most celebrated lawyers in the contest with the king of Prussia in the Case of The Silesia Loan, in a great degree reach the point, as to judiciary authority in a neutral nation. In Palachie's Case, 1 Rolle, 175, I am aware that it is only said the vessel "was taken at sea," but if not, it rather appears, that it would be more proper for a diplomatic than a judiciary examination. The general principle, as to the capture, is agreed; and is similar to that established in our treaty with France, which ought to have its proper weight. 4 Inst. 154. "It was resolved, by the whole court of king's bench, upon conference and deliberation, that the Spaniards (whose ship had been taken by an enemy and brought into England, a friend to both parties) had lost the property of the goods forever, and had no remedy for them in England; and it relied principally upon the book in 2 Rolle, 3, ubi supra, being of so great authority; for, by that book, he that will sue to have restitution of goods robbed at sea, ought by law to prove two things: 1. That the sovereign of the plaintiff was, at the time of the taking, in amity with the king of England. 2. That he who took the goods was, at the time of the taking, in amity with the sovereign of him whose goods were taken: for, if he who took them was in enmity with the sovereign of him whose goods were taken, then was it no depredation or robbery, but a lawful taking, as every enemy might take from another." It is true that, by the laws and customs of nations, the capture, if taken in neutral bounds, is not lawful prize. Woodeson, 443. But I do not see that this court can get at that circumstance, without holding plea as to the lawfulness of the prize.

It is the original question, and not collateral matter, which determines jurisdiction. The courts of common law in England will not take cognizance of anything arising out of the question, prize or no prize (Le Caux v. Eden, Doug. 612), "because the original cause must all come into question again:" and yet the admiralty had determined that the ship was no prize. This will be a proper subject of enquiry on the part of our government, or in a court of the country of the captor. Every nation has established these courts, and knowing that, if at war, they are answerable to a nation at peace, or in amity; if violations of territory happen in captures, care is taken to examine into this circumstance. If, on this account, the capture is illegal, it is so adjudged; and the party taking is liable to damages. Whether such damages shall exceed the amount of the security given by commanders of private ships of war, or whether one nation is answerable to another for injuries done by its subjects to others, contrary to or without its orders, is a matter in which there are differences of opinion among civilians (Lee, 226–231, 222; Grotius de J. B. & P. l. 2, c. 17, § 20), and which it is unnecessary for me now to investigate. It is doubtless contrary to the instructions of the French government, that any of the ships, commissioned by them, act in a hostile manner in a friendly and allied territory. It is to be expected by one power from another, that her courts and her administration will do justice to the rights of sovereignty and neutrality. It will be the more to be lamented if a friend and ally should disappoint this expectation. But, should this be the case, it is not for me to say what proceedings should be had. I have subjoined to this decree some extracts from the "expositions of the motives, &c." from the duke of Newcastle, the British minister's letter to Mr. Mitchell, the minister of Prussia, and from the report and opinion of Sir George Lee, Dr. Paul, Sir Dudley Rider and Mr. Murray, the late Lord Mansfield, on the subjects I have mentioned, which are to be found in Magens, 463, 482, 487, 491, 496, 505.[2]

[2] 1 Magens, 505. Each crown has no doubt an equal right to erect admiralty courts for the trial of prizes taken by virtue of their respective commissions, but neither has a right to try the prizes taken by the other, or to reverse the sentences given by the other's tribunal. The

Other authorities from British and other writers might be added, by which it appears, that when two powers have any difference between them, the affair must be treated by negotiation, and not through the instrumentality of their courts of justice. That affairs of prizes are only cognizable in the courts of the power making the capture: these courts being generally styled courts of admiralty; and, that it never was attempted, before the subject of that controversy happened, to erect in a neutral state courts for the trial of prizes, taken by belligerent powers, even where neutrals were concerned; and that, of course, no court of one sovereign has a right to try the prizes taken by the ships, public or private, of another.[3] A dispute of this nature, in which the king of Prussia could not prevail, who, though weak at sea, was powerful at land, and had a propensity for war, would not very well suit us. We have, indeed, shewn that we know how to make war, but it is now our interest and inclination to cultivate the arts of peace. Much has been said, on both sides, to shew the importance of this cause, and the necessity of caution in its determination. I am sufficiently impressed with those considerations; but I feel myself at ease in this view of the subject. I am persuaded that any thing which affects the sovereignty and rights of our country will not be passed unnoticed by those who have the power to regulate our national concerns. On my own account, I have no disquietude; for no error of mine can affect the nation. There is an appeal, from any determination I may give, to a superior tribunal. I am anxious for the peace and dignity of my country, but not deeming myself authorized to decide in a matter growing out of the contests between belligerent powers, nor considering this court, in this instance, the vindicator of the rights of our nation, I leave in better hands the discussion on the subject of national insult, and the remedy for any invasion of territorial rights.[4] The instance side of this court seems to have other objects; and a prize court, called into activity when only regular method of rectifying their errors is by appeal to the superior court.

1 Magens, 491. If a subject of the king of Prussia is injured by, or has a demand upon, any person here, he ought to apply to your majesty's courts of justice, which are equally open and indifferent to foreigner or native; so, vice versâ, if a subject here is wronged by a person living in the dominions of his Prussian majesty, he ought to apply for redress in the king of Prussia's courts of justice. If the matters of complaint be a capture at sea, during war, and the question relative to prize, he ought to apply to the judicatures established to try these questions. The law of nations, founded upon justice, equity, convenience and the reason of the thing, and confirmed by long usage, does not allow of reprisals, except in cases of violent injuries, directed or supported by the state, and justice absolutely denied in re minime dubia, by all the tribunals, and afterwards by the prince. Where the judges are left free, and give sentence according to their conscience, though it should be erroneous, that would be no ground for reprisals. Upon doubtful cases, different men think and judge differently, and all a friend can desire is, that justice should be as impartially administered to him, as it is to the subjects of that prince in whose courts the matter is tried.

1 Magens, 496. For as to the Prussian commission to examine these cases ex parte, upon new suggestions, it never was attempted in any country in the world before. Prize or no prize must be determined by courts of admiralty, belonging to the power whose subjects make the capture. Every foreign prince in amity has a right to demand that justice shall be done to his subjects in these courts according to the law of nations, or particular treaties, where any are subsisting. If, in re minime dubia, these courts proceed upon foundations directly opposite to the law of nations, or subsisting treaties, the neutral state has a right to complain of such determinations. But there never was, nor ever can be, any other equitable method of trial. All the maritime nations of Europe have, when at war, from the earliest times, uniformly proceeded in this way with the approbation of the powers at peace.

1 Magens, 487. By the maritime law of nations universally and immemorially received, there is an established method of determination, whether the capture be or be not lawful prize. Before the ship or goods can be disposed of by the captor, there must be a regular judicial proceeding, wherein both parties may be heard, and condemnation thereupon as prize in a court of admiralty, judging by the laws of nations and treaties. The proper and regular court for these condemnations is the court of that state to whom the captors belong.

1 Magens, 482. First, that affairs of this kind are and can be cognizable only in the courts belonging to that power, where the seizure is made, and consequently that the erecting foreign courts or jurisdictions elsewhere, to take cognizance thereof, is contrary to the known practice of all nations in like cases, and therefore a proceeding which none can admit.

1 Magens, p. 463, § 47. When two powers have any difference between them, neither of them can on either side appeal to the laws of the country, because one of the two parties does not acknowledge them. The affair then must be treated in the way of negotiation from court to court, and the difference can only be decided with the consent of both parties according to the laws of nations, or by the means founded thereon.

[3] See on this point the case of The Flad Oyen, 1 C. Rob. Adm. (Philadelphia Ed.) 135, Id. (English Ed.) 137. In the case the question is discussed with great learning and ingenuity by Sir William Scott. See, also, the case The Kierlighett, 3 C. Rob. Adm. (Philadelphia Ed.) 96, Id. (English Ed.) 29.

[4] When this cause was decided, no territorial limits were established by any national act. The facts were not accurately investigated. On the exhibition of the testimony, it did not appear to me to be clearly ascertained that the place of capture was left without doubt, as to its distance from the shore. The whole of the case was novel in the United States. There is no point on which the writers on maritime laws and privileges so much disagree, as on that of the extent of the territorial rights of the sovereign possessing the shores, into the contiguous sea. All maritime people deem the nation in rightful possession of the coast, sovereign of the adjacent sea; yet there is no general agreement as to the nature or extent of this sovereignty. Time has not matured or settled opinions on this subject among jurists; nor have particular compacts established any general principle. From the period of the compilation of the Digest of Justinian, to this day, the point has been uncertain, and open to controversy. Some early commentators on that work assert that the territorial sea extended 60 miles from the shore. A majority of ancient writ-a nation is at peace, appears to be a solecism in jurisprudence. I do, therefore, decree, order and adjudge, that the libel in this cause be dismissed; and that the ship therein mentioned be discharged from the arrest, the plea in this case being relevant.

NOTE. The case of The William became a subject of diplomatic discussion, which may be seen in the publications of that period, containing the correspondence between the then secretary of state, Mr. Jefferson, and the ministers of France and England.

M. Azuni, in his celebrated work, "The Maritime Law of Europe" (volume 2, pp. 330, 331), asserts, that the English are the only nation who have been guilty of seizing ships of their enemies in the ports or within the territorial jurisdiction of neutrals. The candour and accuracy of the learned translator of this work would have induced him to notice the case of The William had it been known to him.

ers carry it to 100 miles. Valin endeavours to ascertain it by the sounding lead; whether the coast be composed of extensive shallows and flats, or bold and deep shores! Others fix the distance at the point capable of being defended from the shore. Hubner, the champion of neutral rights, thinks the limit ought to be the range of a cannon shot; and of this opinion is Bynkershoek, Vattel and other eminent civilians, and among them Azuni; who, in volume 1, pp. 193–208, discusses the point, and cites many authors, and some treaties and documents. It seems to be a claim of power in extent, though of justice in its origin: and when viewed according to the contradictory opinions of writers, it appears difficult, doubtful, and often visionary. It is even left by some to the determination of those, whose wants, or convenience, require a greater or less distance from the shore. Some have need of more sea room for fishing; and it suits others to distinguish between extent for operation of revenue laws, and that for protection of neutral trade; the latter, these say, must be at the greatest distance. The range of a cannon shot is generally accounted about a sea league. Our act of congress (3 Stat. 91), fixes that distance, on the maritime territorial limits, for our nation: and gives the district courts jurisdiction to that extent, of captures made in violation of our territorial rights; by the law, passed after the foregoing decree, to wit, in June 1794, as opinions were various on that point, the extent might have been declared greater, without violating the pretensions or just claims of others. There is no doubt of the right (if they have the power) of any nation, to forbid and prevent captures, at a greater distance than the sea league from their coast. Nor can it be fairly questioned that, where coasts are indented, or firths or bays are included in the territory of a nation, what are called chambers, by Sir L. Jenkyns, may be established. These are parts of the ocean included within lines drawn from promontory to promontory, or perhaps from points a league distant from each. And it is not a question to be made by any other nation, whether some parts of the space included be or not more than a sea league from the shore. It seems, on the whole, a point for treaty or compact, or one left to the discretion of sovereign states. But, in fixing extent of maritime territory, they must not invade the rights of others; or pass into, so as to disturb or obstruct, the common path-way of nations, in its freedom of navigation. To this freedom all are entitled on the high seas, which are called the high road, through an expanse given by the creator, to be held in common; indivisible and incapable of allotment, in separate ownership, or propriety. In a case of similar circumstance, this subject was, at the time, discussed more at large. But the notes of that case (The Fanny [unreported]) are mislaid.

Case No. 4,791.

FINDLAY'S EX'RS v. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES et al.

[2 McLean, 44.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1839.

JURISDICTION — CITIZENSHIP OF DEFENDANTS — JUDGMENT AGAINST ACCOMMODATION INDORSER AND MAKER—PAYMENT BY INDORSER—CREDITOR WITH RIGHT TO TWO FUNDS — RESTRICTED TO ONE IN FAVOR OF CREDITOR OF THE OTHER FUND.

1. To give jurisdiction, the citizenship of the defendants is as necessary to be stated as that of the complainants.

2. Where the complainants, being citizens of the state, brought their bill against the Bank of the United States, and certain individuals whose citizenship is not named, the court cannot take jurisdiction.

3. A judgment against an accommodation indorser, who is considered as a surety, and, also, the drawer, merges the relation of principal and surety. In such a case, the only remedy is for the surety to pay the judgment, and ask to be substituted to all the rights of the principal.

[Cited in Dunham v. Downer, 31 Vt. 263.]

4. A creditor who looks to two funds may be restrained to the use of one, if sufficient, at the instance of a creditor of one of the funds; or, if satisfaction be obtained by the creditor of both funds, out of the common fund, equity will give the other creditor a lien on the fund not exhausted.

5. A debtor has a right, without the assent of his surety, to convey his property, fairly, in payment of his debts. And the court will not set aside such conveyance at the instance of the surety, unless there has been fraud.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This bill was filed by the complainants to procure certain credits on certain judgments obtained by the Bank of the United States, against Findlay, in his lifetime, as the surety of Sutherland. Findlay, and one Thomas Irwin, who some years ago deceased, indorsed three several notes to the Bank of the United States, for Sutherland, on which judgments were entered the 13th July, 1824, for $5,619 71; the 7th June, 1825, for $5,330 13; the 23d July, 1828, for $5,508 75. To secure the payment of these notes a mortgage to the bank was executed by Sutherland, the 25th September, 1829; and at December term, 1828, a decree was entered for $20,623 32, and a sale of the mortgaged premises ordered. Another mortgage, bearing the same date, was executed by Sutherland to the bank, to secure the payment of four several notes—two of which were indorsed by Joseph Hough. On the two unindorsed notes judgment was entered the 15th July, 1824, for $2,726 25, and the 23d July, 1827, on one of the other notes for $4,841 36. On the other note, for $4,346 00, due 25th August, 1827, no judgment was obtained. A scire facias was issued on this mortgage, and a judgment obtained for $16,011 00 at July term, 1828. The judgment for $5,619 71, against Findlay, Sutherland and Irwin; and that for $2,726 25, against Sutherland only, were levied 10th November, 1824, on certain real property. On the 5th November, 1821, John Busenbach obtained a judgment in the court of common pleas, for Butler county, against Sutherland, which was levied 27th October, 1826, on a part of the property covered by the prior levy. The above judgments against Findlay, were, also, levied on his property the 16th June, 1827. In the spring of 1829, Findlay and Sutherland frequently solicited the bank to take the property mortgaged and levied upon at certain prices stated; and afterwards, the 29th June, 1829, an agreement, in writing, was made between the bank and Sutherland, by which the latter agreed to convey to the bank the property levied upon, and, also, that covered by the mortgages, for the sum of $25,794. This sum was produced, probably, by adding to the prices originally talked of, $1,000 upon a lot in Cincinnati, and deducting from the same $1,260, the balance due on the Busenbach judgment.

In addition to the above sum, the bank agreed to pay Mrs. Sutherland $3,000 for her right of dower; and it was agreed that the proceeds of the land covered by the mortgage, to secure the payment of the two unindorsed notes of Sutherland, and the two notes indorsed by Hough should be first applied in payment of Hough's liability; and that the residue of such liability should be discharged out of the proceeds of the property conveyed, exclusive of that which was mortgaged to secure the payment of the notes indorsed by Findlay; and it was stipulated that the property should be offered by the marshal at public sale. Sutherland executed the conveyances in pursuance of the agreement; and the property was publicly sold by the marshal, and credited by him on the several executions and order of sale, under which it was sold. The proceeds of the mortgaged property were applied in discharge of the liabilities which the mortgages were intended to secure; and the proceeds of the levied property were apportioned between the judgment against Sutherland and Hough, and the two against Sutherland only. The bank purchased the property at the marshal's sale, for less than the contract price. For the property levied on, the bank agreed to give the sum of $5,939, and this property was struck off by the marshal at the sum of $5,206 53. On the 10th September, 1830, the bank conveyed the lot in Cincinnati (conveyed to it under the contract with Sutherland for $10,000) to D. Griffen for the consideration, as named in the deed, of $19,000. These are the principal facts out of which this controversy has arisen.

Before the merits of the case are considered, it may be proper to notice an objection which arises to the jurisdiction of the court, from the parties to the suit. The complainants are citizens of Ohio, and Timothy Kirby, alleged to be the agent of the bank, and Samuel Gray, administrator of Sutherland, and Thomas D. Carneal and Lewis Whiteman, administrators of Irwin, whose citizenship is not alleged, are made defendants. To give jurisdiction to the court, it is as necessary to allege the citizenship of the defendants as of the complainants. This is in the nature of an original bill, and calls for the exercise of chancery powers; and if the defendants named are citizens of Ohio, it is clear the court, cannot, as the parties now stand, take jurisdiction of the case. It is true, the whole object of the bill is to have certain credits entered on judgments of this court; but the right of the complainants depends on the construction of an instrument, dated long after the judgments, and of certain equitable liens as between the sureties of Sutherland. This objection may be obviated by discontinuing the bill as to Kirby, who is not a necessary party; by making the administrators of Irwin co-complainants, and by discontinuing the bill as to the administrators of Sutherland. If the estate of Sutherland cannot be affected by a decree in this case, as it most clearly cannot be, his administrators are not indispensable parties in the case. In addition to this, the proof in the case shows that Sutherland died insolvent. With this intimation, which may be a matter for future consideration, the questions made in the argument will be examined.

The complainants insist that they are entitled to a credit on the judgments against Sutherland and Findlay, for the fair value of the Cincinnati lot, or the sum for which it was sold by the bank, deducting therefrom a reasonable amount on account of dower. At the time Sutherland conveyed this lot to the bank, the title was, to some extent, embarrassed; and there is no proof that the sum at which it was estimated was less than its value. There is no allegation of fraud in the conveyance of the lot to the bank, for the price agreed; and if such an allegation were made, it would not be supported by the fact that some fifteen months afterwards, the lot was sold by the bank at an advance of eight thousand dollars. Within this time an outstanding claim was bought in by the bank, the right of dower was paid for, and the property may have risen in value.

A debtor has an undoubted right fairly to convey his property in satisfaction of a debt, without the assent of his surety. If such conveyance be made fraudulently, with the view of injuring the surety, it should be set aside. But if the parties act in good faith, and the transaction is characterized by fairness and propriety, though without the knowledge of the surety, he has no ground to complain, much less to set aside the conveyance. But in this case there is satisfactory evidence that Findlay, admitting him to be the surety of Sutherland, was desirous that the lot should be conveyed to the bank for a sum less than that which was agreed to be paid for it. The conveyance of this lot, and the other property, was made by Sutherland under the agreement which fixed the price at which the whole property was taken by the bank; and if this agreement, in so material a part as this, shall be set aside, how can any part of it be enforced? And if the agreement does not stand, the sales by the marshal, being public and in pursuance of legal process, must stand. This would reduce the gross sum for the property much below the price allowed in the agreement. In no point of view, as it regards the price of the property conveyed, is there any ground on which to set aside this agreement. There is neither hardness, unfairness, fraud, nor want of assent of the surety, on which to give relief.

The counsel for the bank insist that the evidence in the case does not show that Findlay was the indorser on the notes, without any interest in them, for the benefit of Sutherland. The notes were indorsed by Findlay and Irwin, and were discounted for the benefit of Sutherland. He is treated as the principal by the bank, in the negotiations respecting the property, in giving the mortgages, and, finally, in the conveyance of the property to the bank. In the agreement between Sutherland and the bank, respecting the property to be conveyed, the judgments are referred to as "against Sutherland and others as his securities." It is true that the judgments are not in form entered against the indorsers as sureties, but this does not lessen the force, and, indeed, the conclusiveness of the facts admitted. The parties to the agreement evidently looked more to the facts, with which they were familiar, than the technical description of the judgments. But, independently of this admission, there is enough in the facts of the case to show that Findlay was surety. If Sutherland were not principal, why did he give the mortgages to secure the payment of all the notes? Why did he negotiate with the bank to take property in payment of them? and why did he, finally, convey all his property to the bank? No doubt is entertained of the suretyship of all the indorsers on the notes specified. The relationship of principal and surety being established between Sutherland and Findlay, if this relationship continue, under the circumstances of this case, it may be proper to inquire whether the complainants would be entitled to the priority of the judgment against Sutherland and Findlay first levied, of which they have been deprived to some extent, under the agreement. The proceeds of the property, bound by this lien, were applied to pay the judgment and note for which Hough was liable.

This great head of equity is derived from the civil law, and is founded upon the immutable principles of justice and benevolence. It protects the rights of sureties as between themselves, compelling a just contribution from each; and as against their principal, by subrogating them, on the payment of the debt, to all his rights. And it will, under certain circumstances, interpose its powers, and prevent the principal from impairing or destroying the collateral indemnities which he holds from his debtor; or, if destroyed, will, to the same amount, relieve the sureties. And this does not embrace securities taken at the time the debt was created only; for where the principal in a bond having been sued, gave bail, against whom judgment was entered, the original sureties having paid the debt, obtained a decree for the assignment of this judgment. Parsons v. Briddock, 2 Vern. 608; Wright v. Mosly, 11 Ves. 22; 3 Bligh, 590, 591; 6 Ves. 805; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 477; 1 Ves. 339; 2 Ves. 569, 570; 2 Johns. Ch. 560; 4 Johns. Ch. 323.

But the great question in this case is, whether, after judgment, the relationship of principal and surety exists. The affirmative of this question is earnestly and ingeniously maintained, by the complainants' counsel. They rely upon certain statutory provisions, and the decision of the supreme court of the state.

By the 8th section of the act to regulate judgments and executions, passed 24th February, 1824, it is provided, that in all cases where judgment is rendered upon any bond, sealed bill, promissory note, or other instrument of writing, in which two or more persons are jointly and severally held and bound, if it shall be made to appear to the court that one or more of said persons so bound, signed the same as surety or bail for his or their co-defendant, it shall be the duty of the clerk, in entering the judgment, to designate the principal and sureties, and the execution is required to issue first against the principal whose property shall be exhausted, before execution shall issue against the surety. And in the 9th section of the act to regulate proceedings where banks or bankers are parties, passed February 2, 1824, it is provided, that a bank may bring a joint action against all the drawers or indorsers and declare for money lent, &c. These statutes introduce a new principle in pleading, and in the rendition of judgment in certain cases; and they seem to have been, in the mind of the legislature, in some degree connected. They were passed at the same session. That which authorized a joint proceeding against all the drawers or indorsers, and which, by construction, authorizes a procedure against all drawers and indorsers being first enacted, seemed to require a protection to sureties which was given in the second statute. This statute provides a new remedy for sureties unknown to the law, but it does not establish any general principle, or change the relation of principal and surety as it before existed. The remedy affords summary relief to a surety against the hardship or inconvenience of a joint judgment, as authorized by the previous statute; but it does nothing more than this. And it might be a matter of doubt, if the relationship of principal and surety exist after judgment, whether equity could interpose in a case where this plain and adequate relief at law had been neglected. Unless this be made an exception to the general rule, equity could give no relief except upon special ground of fraud or circumstances, which prevented or rendered ineffectual the remedy at law.

The case of Dixon v. Ewing's Adm'rs, 3 Ohio, 280, is considered by the counsel as conclusive of the present question. That was a bill in chancery which stated that the complainants joined in a title bond to Ewing, as the securities of one Foot, for the conveyance of a tract of land. They had no interest in the transaction. Foot failed to convey the land. Suit was brought on the bond and a judgment obtained. Execution on the judgment was issued and levied on the personal property of Foot. The levy was afterwards discharged by the plaintiffs' attorney, without their knowledge, and the property was returned to Foot. And the court enjoined the plaintiffs at law to the amount of the value of the property levied on. In their opinion the court say: "Our statute for the relief of bail and sureties is a beneficial one, and although this case, as it now stands, is not within its letter, it is within its spirit, at least, so far, as injurious preferences are attempted." This decision rests upon general principles, and not upon the construction of a statute. If it involved the construction of a statute of the state, it would, under our practice, constitute a rule of decision for this court. But standing, as it does, upon principles of general law, it can only be considered as the authority of a high and enlightened court. In this view it will be regarded, and if it shall fail to establish the rule on this subject, it cannot fail to command the highest respect. The decision is in point and if it be conformable to law, it is conclusive of the question under consideration.

A case similar in principle, and not very dissimilar in facts, came before the supreme court of the United States, and is reported in [Lenox v. Prout] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 520. In that case a judgment was obtained against the maker of the note, and a separate judgment against the indorser. The indorser fearing the failure of the maker of the note, called upon the agent of the plaintiff and requested an execution to be issued. It was issued, and the indorser offered to point out property to the marshal on which he might levy the amount of the judgment; and proposed to indemnify him for so doing. The execution was recalled by the plaintiff's agent, and the maker of the note became insolvent. In their opinion the court say: "Although the original undertaking of an indorser of a promissory note be contingent, and he cannot be charged without timely notice of nonpayment by the maker, yet, when the holder has taken this precaution, and has proceeded to judgment against both of them, he is at liberty to issue an execution or not, as he pleases, on the judgment against the maker, without affording any cause of complaint to the indorser; or, if he issues an execution, he is at liberty to make choice of the one which he thinks will be most beneficial to himself without consultation with the indorser." And they add: "If the indorser suffers any injury, by the negligence of the judgment creditor, it is clearly his own fault, it being his duty to pay the money, in which case, he may take under his own direction the judgment against the maker." The assignment of the judgment was provided for by the statute of Maryland. It is insisted that the language of the court, in this case, means nothing more than to "distinguish the position of the indorser after judgment, from that of conditional liability, which he occupies before it." But is this the full import of the decision? Do not the court say, after judgment, the plaintiff is not bound to take out execution against the principal, or if issued, to have it levied, though property be shown to the marshal, and an offer be made to indemnify him; and this in a case where the principal became insolvent, and all recourse against him was lost? If the relation of principal and surety existed after the judgment, and the surety had an equitable right to do what he did do, he had good ground for relief. But the court take this position from the surety. They tell him that his liability is in no respect affected by the conduct of the creditor, and that he is bound, absolutely bound to pay the judgment.

The same principle is decided by Chancellor Kent in the case of Bay v. Tallmadge, 5 Johns. Ch. 312. That was a case where there was a postponement of an execution against the principal, without the assent of the sureties, and to their injury. But the chancellor says "the postponement did not discharge the sureties from their obligation to pay the judgment against them." "Their privileges as bail," he says, "were lost and they had become fixed as principal debtors." And he further remarks: "I am not aware of any case that has ever imposed upon the creditor the necessity of peculiar diligence against the principal, on the ground of the still subsisting relation of principal and surety, after judgment and execution against the bail or surety. It becomes then too late to inquire into the antecedent relations between the parties. Those relations become merged in the judgment."

My researches have not enabled me to find a single case, except the one cited from the Ohio reports, where relief has been given on the ground that the relation of surety subsists after judgment. There are many cases where a court of chancery has acted on this relationship and given relief before judgment. In some instances, under very peculiar circumstances, it has required the principal to use peculiar diligence. And in all cases where the surety has paid the debt of his principal, equity will substitute him to all the rights of the creditor. This doctrine is learnedly discussed by Chancellor Kent, in the case of Millard v. Cheeseborough, 1 Johns. Ch. 408; and by Mr. Justice Story, in his treatise on Equity (volume 1) under the head of "Substitution." 2 Johns. Ch. 562; 3 Mer. 579; 2 Fonbl. Bankr. Cas. 302, note 1; 17 Ves. 517, 520, are, also, full on the point. In the case of Hayes v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. 123, Chancellor Kent, under peculiar circumstances, enjoined a suit at law against a surety, until the creditor had pursued his remedy on a mortgage for the same debt. But these cases all proceed upon equities held to exist prior to the judgment, or upon the fact of payment of the judgment by the surety. And this doctrine, when examined, will be found consistent with the principles of justice.

A rule which would make the liability of a surety depend upon contingencies until all the resources of the principal were exhausted, and that by a strictly legal course, would seem to regard the protection of the surety more than the safety of the creditor. It would be inconvenient in practice, and not suited to a commercial community. The accommodation indorser agrees to pay on condition of demand and notice. And why should he be permitted to vary his contract, or excuse himself from its performance? By paying the money he is substituted to all the means of coercion against the principal which the creditor could use; and, also, to all the collateral indemnities he holds. And after judgment against him, this is the only relief, it would seem, which the law gives him. It is as ample a one as can be afforded, and imposes no hardship, of which the surety has a right to complain. In the present case Findlay's character, as surety, was merged in the judgments; and he could claim, as surety, no equities but the right of substitution on the payment of the judgments. If Findlay be regarded as a principal, and equally liable with Sutherland to pay the judgments, it is not perceived on what ground he can ask the interference of this court. The position assumed by the counsel is admitted, that where a creditor has a claim on two funds, and another creditor has a claim on one of the funds, equity will either restrain the creditor from going against the fund liable to both, or, on its exhaustion, will substitute the creditor of this fund to the rights of the other.

But how can this doctrine be made to apply in the present case? The defendants are all principals, and Sutherland, the owner of the property, is bound to pay all the judgments. And by a conveyance of his property he does pay one in full and others in part. Now, is there any principle of equity which will restrain him from doing this? I confess I know of none. The complainants insist that it was not the intention of the bank to make an application of the proceeds of the lands conveyed to it by Sutherland, different from that which the law would make. Mr. Jones, the agent of the bank, does state in his deposition, that he objected to the clause in the agreement, which provided that Hough's liabilities should be first discharged, and that it was agreed that this clause should be altered. But this statement is not corroborated by Mr. Wood, who drew the agreement, and no alteration of it was ever made. On the contrary, it appears that the bank permitted satisfaction to be entered of the judgment against Hough, which sanctioned this part of the contract. It would be extremely dangerous to admit parol evidence to vary, or alter, a written agreement. The rule is well settled, that such evidence cannot have this effect, especially where the written agreement has been acted on and confirmed, and there is no fraud.

The marshal, it appears, credited the amount of his sales on the respective executions and order of sale; and this, it is insisted, is obligatory on the bank, and must fix the rule by which the proceeds of the lands conveyed must be applied. The credits thus entered show, it is urged, the election of the bank, which, being made, cannot be changed. On the other side, it is contended, that the credits were entered by the marshal without the direction of the bank, which looked to the agreement for the application of the proceeds, and not to the marshal. It is very clear that the act of the marshal, in this respect, cannot bind the bank, especially where a different application of the proceeds had been made by the parties. The marshal's sale was provided for in the agreement, probably, with a view to perfect the title, and give to Sutherland the benefit of any advance of price for which the lands might sell. They sold for less than the contract price, and, of course, the sale could have no effect on the contract. We must look to the contract, and not to the marshal's sale and return, for the sum to be credited, and the mode of its application. The agreement does not change, except as to the judgment against Sutherland only, the legal application of the proceeds of the mortgaged premises. It provides that the judgment, including interest and costs, of $5,462 20, and the note, including interest, amounting to $4,779 88, shall be first satisfied and discharged out of said sum of $25,794, so far as derived from the property mortgaged to secure said judgment and note; and the residue to be satisfied out of the proceeds derived from the other property, not interfering with the amount received from the property mortgaged for other purposes. The balance remaining due on the above judgment and note, after exhausting the mortgage given to secure their payment, is, by the agreement, to be paid out of the proceeds of the lands not mortgaged. And no ground is perceived which authorizes this court to change this application of the proceeds of this property. It disregards the priority of the judgment against Findlay, but of this, as has been stated, his representatives cannot complain. He stands as a principal in the judgments, and can be considered in no other light, until the judgments shall be satisfied. The judgment against Sutherland, only, was secured by mortgage, but the proceeds of this mortgage, under the agreement, were applied in the payment of Hough's liabilities. So that that judgment stands without any special provision for its payment.

It is insisted, that this judgment shall be paid out of the proceeds of the property not covered by the mortgages, on the ground that the bank had a right to make such an application. The bank, undoubtedly, might have provided in the agreement for the payment of this judgment in the manner stated, but it has not done so; and the court, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, will not direct the credit to be thus entered. This judgment must stand with the judgment against Findlay, both of which were entered on the same day, and levied at the same time, to be discharged in proportion to their respective amounts, out of the proceeds of the property levied on. It is agreed in the contract that the premises described shall be taken by the bank, subject to the judgment of Busenbach. If the bank, in the language of the agreement, received the property subject to this judgment, no deduction should be made, from the consideration stated, on account of it. Indeed, it would seem that this judgment was deducted from the general amount, before the contract was drawn. The calculations can be made, and the credits entered, in conformity with this opinion. FINDLEY et al. v. SATTERFIELD.

[3 Woods, 504; 7 Cent. Law J. 365; 7 Reporter, 6.] [1]

Circuit Court N. D. Georgia. Sept. Term, 1877.

REMOVAL OF PROSECUTIONS AGAINST FEDERAL REVENUE OFFICERS—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT.

1. Section 643, Rev. St., in so far as it provides for the removal to the United States circuit court of prosecutions against federal revenue officers in the state courts, is a constitutional enactment.

2. The provisions of said section apply to every case of a federal revenue officer indicted in a state court for an act done under color of the United States revenue laws, but charged to be in violation of the criminal law of the state, and are not restricted to cases where an attempt is made by a state legislature to nullify a law of the United States.

Habeas corpus. Findley, Gaston and Prater were indicted in the superior court of Lumpkin county, Georgia, for the offense of assault with intent to murder, charged to have been committed on one Thomas, and were arrested to answer the indictment. The facts of the assault, as they alleged, were that Findley, a deputy collector of the internal revenue of the United States, and his assistants, Gaston and Prater, were going to a small distillery that was running illicitly, for the purpose of seizing the still. Discovering their approach, the distillers and their friends, of whom Thomas was one, took the still and made off with it, and were pursued by the revenue party. Thomas aimed his gun at one of the pursuers, and seemed about to shoot, when one of the pursuers shot a pistol and wounded him, and on this shooting the indictment was founded. Upon these facts the prisoners petitioned the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Georgia—the district in which Lumpkin county lies—for the removal of the prosecution into that court, and the writ of habeas corpus cum causa was duly issued under section 643 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and was served on the superior court of Lumpkin county. The judge of that court disregarded it, and directed the sheriff to retain the accused in prison. The prisoners then petitioned the circuit court for the writ of habeas corpus directed to Satterfield, the sheriff, alleging that they were held in custody by him in violation of the law of the United States. The writ was issued and served. Satterfield produced the prisoners before the circuit court, and returned that he held them under the authority of the superior court of Lumpkin county, as above set forth.

A. T. Akerman, for petitioners.

R. N. Ely, Atty. Gen. of Georgia, for respondent.

Before WOODS, Circuit Judge and ERSKINE, District Judge.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The petitioners do not deny that it was lawful for the sheriff to arrest them, and to hold them until the writ of habeas corpus cum causa was served on the superior court of Lumpkin county. But they say that, under the laws of the United States, the effect of that writ, when served, was to remove the indictment, and with it the lawful custody of their persons from that court to this; and that, therefore, the holding of them since by the officer of that court, the sheriff, has been in violation of the law of the United States. On the other hand, the attorney-general of Georgia, for the respondent, contends that the jurisdiction of Lumpkin superior court over the prosecution, and the attendant right of that court to hold the prisoners for trial, have not been displaced by the proceedings which have been had for removal, because, first, the act of congress which is supposed to authorize those proceedings is not warranted by the constitution of the United States; and, second, that the act, even if constitutional, is not applicable to such cases as the present. He concedes that if the act is constitutional, and is applicable to this case, the custody of the prisoners belongs here, and the sheriff has no right to hold them.

The first question, then, for our consideration, is whether congress has constitutional power to remove from the state courts into the United States courts for trial there, criminal prosecutions under the state laws commenced in the state courts, against persons executing the revenue laws of the United States, for acts done under color of those laws, or on account of rights claimed by such persons under those laws, and to prohibit the state courts from proceeding further with such prosecutions after the prescribed steps for removal have been taken.

If a question of this kind can be settled by the practice of the government, and by the authority of eminent men, the answer must be in the affirmative. The history of the legislation in which congress has undertaken to exercise this power has been brought to our notice. We find that the temporary act of February 4, 1815, approved by President Madison (3 Stat. 195), contained, in section 8, provisions similar to those of section 643 of the Revised Statutes. In January, 1833, President Jackson recommended that congress should re-enact the law of 1815, with some amendments, and accordingly the act of March 3, 1833, was passed (4 Stat. 632), section 3 of which is repeated in section 643 of the Revised Statutes. This act was passed under circumstances which drew upon it the serious attention of the country, and caused its provisions to be thoroughly considered. The material part of the third section received its final shape from an amendment proposed in the senate by that wise and learned jurist, Thomas Ewing, of Ohio. The test vote upon the bill in the senate was thirty-two yeas to eight nays, and the vote in the house of representatives was one hundred and twenty-six yeas to thirty-four nays. Among the yeas were John Quincy Adams, James K. Polk, John M. Clayton, George M. Dallas, Thomas Ewing, John Forsyth, Theodore Frelinghuysen, Felix Grundy, William C. Rives, Peleg Sprague, Daniel Webster, Hugh L. White, William Wilkins, John Bell, Edward Everett, Richard M. Johnson and the name, ever to be revered in this court, of James M. Wayne, with others of scarcely less note, representing different parts of the country and different political parties. President Jackson approved the bill, his legal adviser at the time being Roger B. Taney. This act remained in force until superseded by the Revised Statutes in 1874. As it was held to apply only to the customs revenue, section 67 of the act of July 11, 1866, approved by President Johnson, extended its provisions to the internal revenue. 14 Stat. 98.

We should not feel at liberty to pronounce unconstitutional a course of legislation so long continued, so deliberately maintained—sanctioned by so many venerated names and by the general approbation of the country, unless its unconstitutionality was made very clear to our minds; and, aside from this weight of authority, our reflections have brought us to the opinion that these statutes are fully warranted by the fundamental law.

The judicial power extends to all cases arising under the laws of the United States. It is argued that no criminal case can arise under those laws, except when a person is accused of violating them. But we think that, when an officer, executing in a lawful manner a law of the United States, meets with resistance, and, to overcome that resistance, uses necessary force, and, for such use of force, is charged with crime against the state, the case arises under the law of the United States. To hold that a case arises under that law, when it forbids the act under investigation, but does not arise under that law when it produces and justifies the act under investigation, is to take the words of the constitution in a sense too partial and limited. Congress can give criminal jurisdiction to the courts of the United States, when the law of the United States is the ground of defense, as well as when it is the ground of accusation.

Congress has power to levy and collect taxes and excises, and to make all laws necessary and proper to carry that power into execution. This includes the power to employ suitable officers and agents, and to protect them from accountability in the state courts for acts done, or in good faith alleged to have been done, in the course of their duty. We can not say that this protection is not necessary and proper for the prompt and effective collection of the revenue. It is obvious that, where a local sentiment, adverse to a particular revenue law, could exert itself in irremovable prosecutions in the local courts against persons executing that law, the collection of the revenue might be seriously impeded. Congress has thought proper to guard against such impediments by the law that we are now considering, and we are satisfied that it is a constitutional means to a constitutional end.

We do not overlook the objection that no tribunals but those of the state can try for crime against the state. This objection does not appear to us well founded. To try, is to ascertain by a jury whether a criminal law of the state has been violated. In civil cases, congress has directed the courts of the United States to apply the law of the state, and they do it daily. In the criminal cases under consideration, congress has directed the circuit courts to apply the law of the state, and we do not see why they may not do it as well as in cases of the other class. To learn what is the criminal law of the state is no more difficult than to learn what is its civil law. Juries are, in the courts of the United States, composed of the citizens of the state, of the same qualifications as jurors in the state courts, and selected by similar rules. The courts of the United States ascertain facts by evidence substantially the same as that received in the state courts, and have the like aid of counsel for the prosecution and for the defense. In case of conviction, the accused could not decently object to a jurisdiction to which he had himself appealed. If any difficulty should arise in executing a sentence, congress could provide against its recurrence by further legislation; but, until such a difficulty shall occur in practice, we need not apprehend one.

We would not suffer the right of removal to be abused. We shall enforce it only when it has been claimed in good faith and on good grounds. Should we discover, either before or during trial, that the facts of a case did not bring it within the act of congress, we should proceed no further with it, and should remand it to the state court.

But suppose that the circuit court can not try such cases, it would not follow that congress could not deliver the prisoners from the custody of the state court, and stay proceedings there. The power to do this is distinct from the power to give the courts of the United States a jurisdiction for trial. A notable instance of the exercise of such a power by congress is found in the act of August 29, 1842 (5 Stat. 539), re-enacted in the Revised Statutes (section 762), empowering the judges of the United States to deliver, by the writ of habeas corpus, foreigners confined by the state courts for acts done under the authority of foreign powers. The confinement and trials of such prisoners by the state court for such offenses was deemed by congress incompatible with the international obligations of the United States, and accordingly provision was made for discharging them by habeas corpus. This act was drafted by Mr. Webster and was introduced and advocated in the senate by Mr. Berrien, and though it did not escape criticism at the time, we believe that the intelligent minds of the country now approve of it.

If a prisoner can be delivered from the custody of the state courts by habeas corpus, in order that the government may be unembarrassed in its international duties, he can be similarly delivered when congress so provides in order that the government may be unembarrassed in the collection of its revenue. If the law of the United States and the law of the state can not both be executed, the latter must give way. But in the case now before us, we think that the state law can be executed, though not by the state tribunals.

The present case falls within the letter of section 643. It is argued that this section applies only to cases of attempts by state legislatures to nullify a law of the United States. It is not so limited in its terms. Indeed, the act of 1866 was passed when no such attempt existed or was apprehended. We, therefore, think that the law is applicable to this case.

It is, therefore, adjudged that the detention of the petitioners by the sheriff is in violation of the law of the United States, and it is ordered that the marshal hold them in custody, subject to the further order of this court, for trial under the indictment found against them by the superior court of Lumpkin county.

FINLAYSON v. CHICAGO, B. & Q. R. CO.

[1 Dill. 579;[1] 5 West. Jur. 342.]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. May Term, 1871.

RAILROADS — LIABILITY FOR INJURY TO PERSONS IMPROPERLY UPON THEIR TRACK — DUTIES AND LIABILITIES OF PARTIES.

1. A railroad company, whose train is approaching a man, walking lengthwise upon its track, which rings its bell, and sounds its whistle, in time to enable him to get off, is not liable for an injury which happens to him under such circumstances.

2. The duties and liabilities, under such circumstances, of the company, on the one hand, and of the person injured on the other, stated by Mr. Justice Miller.

The plaintiff [Mary Finlayson] is the administratrix of her deceased husband, and brings this action [against the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company] under a statute of the state, to recover damages for his death, which is alleged to have been caused by the wrongful acts of the defendant. The defendant's road at the place where the accident happened, runs parallel to the county road, and upon the same general level, and about thirty feet from it. The deceased had been a laborer upon the public canal, in the vicinity, and on the day he was killed had left the wagon with his wife to do some business, and the wagon passed along. The deceased, when he had finished his business, started to overtake the wagon, and went upon the railroad track instead of on the public road. He had walked along it about six hundred feet before he was injured, and was walking along it at the time of the injury. There was no reason why he did not take the public road. The railroad was in a straight line, or nearly so, for the distance above mentioned. The deceased was struck and killed by the passenger train, running on time, and which approached him from behind. There was conflicting evidence as to the distance from the deceased at which the bells were rung, and the whistle sounded, and the brakes applied. The wind was blowing in the face of the deceased, and in the direction of the approaching train. The injury did not happen at a public crossing.

Before MILLER, Circuit Justice, and DILLON, Circuit Judge.

MILLER, Circuit Justice (orally charging jury). This case which you have heard with patience, and which has been very ably presented to you, belongs to a class which is becoming very common in this country. All great motive agencies, when brought into dense communities, endanger life and property to some extent. Railroads, in their motive power, and in the manner in which they are necessarily conducted, are powerful instruments of good, and, also, to some extent, of evil. It is, or it ought to be, the object of all good citizens, to increase the good and to diminish the evil.

Those of you who have traveled here from a distance to attend this term of court, on railroads, and who remember the inconvenience, and, I might say, the suffering of the same journey in the old stage coaches, can well appreciate the good which railroads do; and those of you who have listened to the detailed testimony in this case have seen the capacity of a railroad for evil. There can be no question, however, but that they are necessary and useful. We should, therefore, by a just administration of the law, so far as it depends upon courts and juries, and by proper legislation, so far as it depends upon legislative bodies, do all we can to diminish the evils which seem, in some sense, to be incidental to these great motive powers.

I am, gentlemen, happy in the consciousness that I am addressing a jury who will consider the case before it without being influenced by any prejudice against railroads, on the one hand, or by any undue sympathy for the unfortunate woman who is the plaintiff in this case, while you would do her full and complete justice. If the case presented to you is, unfortunately, not altogether new in some of its features, certainly not new in the fact that human life has been destroyed by a railroad train, it is, on the other hand, according to the researches of counsel engaged in the case, novel in one feature at least; and that is, that those researches have not enabled counsel to present any reported case where suit has been brought to recover for an injury to the person, received while the party was walking along on the track of the railroad company voluntarily. In that respect the case before you is novel, and presents to me, at all events, who am to declare the law applicable to it, something of an embarrassing question.

The action upon which you are now to render a verdict is founded essentially in its nature upon the charge of negligence on the part of the railroad company in performing some duty which is required of them by law, in regard to the transaction presented to you. But this class of cases nearly always presents two questions which are correlative, and this case is not an exception to that general rule. These questions relate in the first place to the negligence and want of care on the part of the defendant, and in the second place to the care and diligence on the part of the plaintiff. The first question to be determined is, whether the defendant, in the sense of the law, has been negligent in regard to the transaction which has been presented to you, and if this is found to be so, the second question arises whether the plaintiff, on his part, used such care and diligence that he is exempt from blame in the matter. In the case before you, then, you are first to consider whether, under all the circumstances, the defendants were guilty of negligence. The question of negligence, by which, of course, is always meant that want of care and diligence which it is the duty of a party to observe, is always one which must be considered in regard to the circumstances. There is no absolute rule of negligence or diligence. The diligence required of a party is, that care and attention to the matter in hand which an ordinarily prudent, careful man would exercise in regard to his own transactions. In this case the uncontradicted evidence on both sides is, that the man who was killed was walking on the track of the defendant corporation along the same course the train was going that struck and killed him, and the question arises, what degree of precaution or care a railroad company or its servants are bound to take to guard against injuring a man under such circumstances.

I instruct you as a matter of law, in the first place, that the officers of this corporation, the men who had charge of this train, had a right to presume that this man was a man of sound mind and good hearing, and that the case is not to be considered by you in regard to the diligence of these officers as if he were a dumb man, known to the parties, nor as if he were a child which the parties could see was incapable of taking care of itself.

I instruct you that the agents of the railroad company had a right to suppose he was such a man, of sound mind and sound hearing, and that he would take reasonable care to protect himself in case of danger. Under that view of the case, I further say to you that these agents or officers of the company were bound to give a reasonable and fair notice of their approach, when they found that the man was not taking steps to get out of the way—such a notice as would reach a man under ordinary circumstances of good hearing, and who had his attention alive to his situation. If, then, you believe that the bell was rung and that the whistle was sounded, in time to enable this man to get off the track, these parties are guiltless, and the company is not liable. If, on the other hand, you believe they delayed making any signal at all until it was entirely too late for him to get off the track, that they being aware of his presence, delayed to ring the bell or sound the whistle, until he could not have stepped aside and saved himself—in that case there was negligence on the part of these employés, for which the railroad company is responsible. And I further say to you that the fact that in the place, and at the time where this accident occurred, there was a noise arising from the work on the canal, and a confusion arising from other trains running along the canal bank they were working on, which might be confounded with other trains, and that this fact was well known to the man who was killed, does not vary the matter. That was reason for additional care and diligence on his part; for knowing that he was traveling along a place where there was a loud noise that would impair his power of hearing any bell from a train, or a whistle from a train, it was his duty to be more vigilant and more careful, and to watch closely to protect himself. If you find that within this definition of what the duty of the railroad company was, they discharged that duty; if you find that they blew the whistle in time for this man to get off,—not to run to some place that he might choose to get off,—but if they rang the bell and blew the whistle, in such time as any reasonable man of good hearing could have heard it, and got off instantly, without deliberation or trying to go farther to select a place to get off, then the defendants are not liable.

If they delayed ringing the bell or sounding the whistle until they were right on him, then that delay would constitute negligence.

If, however, you find that the railroad company's agents were guilty of negligence, there is still a farther inquiry before you can find a verdict in behalf of the plaintiff, and that is the amount of care and precaution which he took to avoid this accident. I lay it down to you that he had no legal right to be on that railroad track; the track at that place not being a crossing or any part of a public highway, was private property; that it was built for other purposes; that it was not built to be walked upon by the public, and the fact that persons did walk upon it, however frequently and however common, does not change the proposition of law. This man had no right to be there, and he should not have been there. It does not follow, however, because he was there unlawfully, that the other party could run him down; but it does follow that he being on private property of the company, on a track which is used for a purpose which is dangerous to human life, well known to him, that he being in a place where he ought not to be, that he was bound to use every precaution, every diligence, every care, against the possibility or probability of any danger which might happen to him there.

This was his duty, and it was imperative; and if you find, in the language of one of the counsel for the plaintiff, that he was going along the track with his hands in his pockets, his head down, and his attention abstracted from everything around him, then he was guilty of such negligence as forbids recovery. No man has a right to go upon a railroad track in such a place, and go along in a state of abstraction, careless of what might happen to him; and then turn around and say to the railroad company, however negligent they may have been, You are responsible for my safety. If he is careless himself, it cannot be expected that the railroads can be made to take care of him, and pay for him if he is killed. Being on the track, and walking in a direction where a railroad train might overtake him, reasonable care required of him that he should be vigilant and watchful to discover the approach of any train, and especially from behind; and this vigilance on his part should be increased, from the fact that the noise from the trains and the blasting on the canal, would tend to prevent his hearing the noise made by the approach of a car or train, or its bell, or its whistle.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants. Judgment accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—ADVICE OF COUNSEL—DISCHARGE.

1. The discharge of a bankrupt was refused where it appeared that he had made an illegal and fraudulent preference of one of his creditors, although it appeared he had acted under advice of counsel, and the transferee had surrendered the goods without suit by the assignee.

2. If the advice of counsel will be a protection in any case, it must be shown that the bankrupt acted on it in good faith, believing he had a legal right to do what he did, and the question must be one of sufficient delicacy to rebut all possible fraudulent intent in seeking the advice.

[Cited in Re Jessup, 19 Fed. 96.]

In bankruptcy. On petition for discharge [of Michael Finn] and specifications in opposition thereto. The specifications of opposition are three in number: 1. A fraudulent preference to Edward Ryan and Peter Ruppe, who were creditors of his or under liability for him, by way of a chattel mortgage of his goods. 2. A sale to the same parties of goods of the value of about one thousand dollars, with a view to prefer them and to prevent the said property from coming to the hands of the assignee, and being distributed under the bankrupt act in satisfaction of his debts. 3. The collection of moneys due the estate after the bankruptcy, and applying the same to his own use.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The bankrupt, on his final examination, states as follows: "Some few days previous to the filing of my petition in bankruptcy I gave a chattel mortgage to Edward Ryan and Peter Ruppe for one thousand dollars, to secure them for a note for that amount which they had previously endorsed for me. After filing the petition I sold the same parties goods to the amount of one thousand and ten dollars. I suppose their object was to secure themselves for their endorsement, and my object was not to prevent their doing so if they could get it. The mortgage was cancelled at the time of the sale of the goods to the said parties." He also states that the value of goods so sold to Ryan and Ruppe was afterward paid by them to the assignee, and that what he did in giving the chattel mortgage and sale of goods was done by him under advice of counsel. He also states that after the bankruptcy he collected about six hundred dollars in money, four hundred and fifty dollars of which he paid over to the assignee, eighty dollars converted to his own use, fifty dollars "for sundry small bills previously incurred" and the balance to his attorneys for services in connection with the bankruptcy proceedings.

It does not need argument to show that the foregoing fully sustains the specifications The fact that the property was surrendered by Ryan and Ruppe in no manner does away with the effect of the bankrupt's act in giving them the fraudulent preference. As to the statement that he acted on the advice of counsel, it is sufficient to observe that it is not made to appear that he did so in good faith, believing that he had a legal right to do what he did; neither can it be well conceived that so flagrant a violation of law, and of the most common principles of honesty and fair dealing toward his other creditors, could have been done in good faith, whether with or without legal advice. The petition for a discharge is denied.

INSURANCE — ASSIGNEE IN BANKRUPTCY CANNOT WAIVE CONDITIONS — SHOULD EXAMINE PROOFS —YEAR-CLAUSE — EFFECT OF PROOF OF DEBT— ADJUSTMENT—EFFECT OF WAIVER BY COMPANY —CONTESTED CLAIM—PRACTICE.

1. The terms and conditions of an insurance policy remain binding upon the insured after adjudication of bankruptcy to the same extent as before. The policy holder is bound by the terms of his contract.

2. Though an insurance company may, while solvent, waive the performance of conditions the assignee has no such power.

3. Even where proofs have been furnished and losses adjusted before adjudication, it is the right and duty of the assignee to examine and revise such proofs and adjustment, and to call for further proof if the claim is not clearly made out, or there is any evidence of lack of entire good faith.

4. A clause in a policy limiting the right of action to one year from the loss is valid as a limitation, but proof of the debt in bankruptcy is equivalent to the commencement of a suit. Failure or neglect to make such proof, or bring suit, however, within the time limited, bars the claim as effectually as failure to sue if the company were solvent.

[Cited in Re Brunquest, Case No. 2,055.]

5. If the loss has been adjusted before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, such adjustment is a settlement and a waiver of the limitation clause.

6. After such adjustment in good faith, the claim can be proven without regard to the limitation clause in the policy.

7. If, however, the proof was not submitted until after petition filed, the assignee cannot make an adjustment or agreement upon which an action can be maintained.

8. A company while solvent may waive the proofs required by the policy, and where there is clear evidence of such waiver shown in the proof of debt in bankruptcy the debt should be allowed, subject to the right of the assignee to make inquiry into all the facts touching such alleged waiver.

9. If the assured shows such waiver regularly made in good faith by the company while it had the right so to do, the assignee should allow the claim, otherwise not.

10. The proper practice where the assignee wishes to contest any claim of the above classes is to ask that the claim be expunged under the 34th rule in bankruptcy.

BLODGETT, District Judge: Several questions of importance in the settlement of the affairs of this company, as well as other bankrupt insurance companies now in this court, have been certified up from the register for the opinion and direction of the court. The policies issued by the Firemen's Insurance Company contain the following clauses:

"Ninth—Persons sustaining loss or damage by fire shall forthwith give notice of said loss to the company, and as soon thereafter as possible render a particular account of such loss, signed and sworn to by them, stating whether any and what other insurance has been made on the same property—giving copies of the written portion of all policies thereon; also the actual cash value of the property and their interests therein; for what purpose and by whom the building insured, or containing the property insured, and the several parts thereof, were used at the same time of the loss; when and how the fire originated; and shall also produce a certificate, under the hand and seal of a magistrate or notary public nearest to the place of the fire, not concerned in the loss as a creditor or otherwise, nor related to the assured, stating that he has examined the circumstances attending the loss; knows the character and circumstances of the assured, and verily believes that the assured has without fraud sustained loss on the property insured to the amount which such magistrate or notary public shall certify. The assured shall, if required, submit to an examination or examinations under oath by any person appointed by the company, and subscribe to such examinations when reduced to writing, and shall also produce their books of account and other vouchers, and exhibit the same for examination at the office of the company, and permit extracts and copies thereof to be made. The assured shall also produce certified copies of all bills and invoices, the invoices of which have been lost, and shall exhibit all that remains of the property which was covered by this policy, damaged or not damaged, for examination, to any person or persons named by the company."

"Twelfth—It is furthermore hereby expressly provided and mutually agreed, that no suit or action against this company, for the recovery of any claim by virtue of this policy, shall be sustainable in any court of law or chancery unless such suit or action shall be commenced within twelve months next after the loss shall occur, and, should any suit or action be commenced against this company after the expiration of the aforesaid twelve months, the lapse of time shall be taken and deemed as conclusive evidence against the validity of such claims, any statute of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding."

These clauses, with some slight modifications of phraseology, have been inserted for many years past in nearly all policies issued by fire insurance companies, and their binding effect as essential parts of the contract has been frequently sustained by the courts.

The ninth clause imposes a condition precedent to be performed by the assured before any right of action accrues under the policy. It is true the company may waive the performance of this condition, and many cases are found in the books where the courts have decided what acts amounted to a waiver in those cases, but the principle is well established that, unless waived by the company, the notice and proofs of loss must be furnished by the assured, as a prerequisite to his right of action on the policy. Mason v. Harvey, 8 Welsb., H. & G. 819; Wellcome v. People's Ins. Co., 2 Gray, 480; Spring Garden Mut. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 9 Md. 1; Boyle v. N. C. Mut. Ins. Co., 7 Jones (N. C.) 373; Smith v. Haverill Ins. Co., 1 Allen, 297; Desilver v. State Mut. Ins. Co., 38 Pa. St. 130; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 406, and notes. The questions now submitted to the court are as follows:

1. Ought the assignee to allow and pay a claim for a loss arising under a policy where no proof of loss, as required by the ninth clause, has been submitted to the company or assignee, nor any proof of debt made in the proceedings in bankruptcy, nor suit commenced, within twelve months after the loss occurred?

2. Ought the assignee to allow and pay a claim for a loss arising under a policy where the assured has furnished either to the company before adjudication, or to the assignee afterwards, the proofs of loss required by the ninth clause of the policy, but has not proved his claim in bankruptcy nor commenced suit within twelve months?

3. Ought the assignee to pay such claim where no proofs of loss have been furnished either to the company or assignee, but the assured has proved a claim in bankruptcy in the ordinary form prescribed by the rules within twelve months after the loss occurred?

There can be no doubt that the terms and conditions of the policy remain binding upon the assured to the same extent whether the company is adjudicated bankrupt or remains solvent; in other words, the policy holder must recover, if at all, by the terms of his contract.

The ninth clause was undoubtedly adopted by the insurance companies for the purpose of compelling the assured to furnish the company with all the facts and details in regard to the nature and extent of the loss sustained, and a full disclosure of all the circumstances affecting the right to indemnity; and the assignee in bankruptcy, who must be supposed to be an entire stranger to the transaction up to the time of his appointment, must certainly need the information called for by this clause much more than the company, who, through its agents and officers, placed the risk. They may be presumed to know something about the nature of the risk and probable loss under it, but no such knowledge can be presumed against the assignee. It is the duty of the assured to furnish such proof as the terms of his policy require, and bring himself within the terms of his contract. As I said before, the company, by its officers, can waive this proof, but I am very clear that an assignee can make no such waiver. His duty requires him to allow and pay no claim for losses unless the assured first furnishes all the proofs and submits, on request, to the examination provided for. As an officer of the court, he can allow no claim or debt upon his own information or knowledge, and can waive the performance of no condition which the assured is bound to perform in order to vitalize his demand. Even where proofs have been furnished, and losses adjusted before adjudication, especially if such adjustment was made after the intervention of actual insolvency, as is the case in most of the companies before this court, it would undoubtedly be the right and duty of the assignee to examine and revise such proofs and adjustments, and call for further proof if the claim was not clearly made out, or there was any evidence of the lack of entire good faith in the adjustment.

The twelfth clause, commonly spoken of as the "year clause," has been so frequently held valid by the courts as a limitation of the right of action by contract as hardly to require authorities. Fullam v. New York Union Ins. Co., 7 Gray, 61; Brown v. Roger Williams Ins. Co., 5 R. I. 394; Brown v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., Id.; Brown v. Savannah Mut. Ins. Co., 24 Ga. 97; Northwestern Ins. Co. v. Phoenix Oil & Candle Co., 31 Pa. St. 448. As no suit can be maintained against the bankrupt after adjudication, except such as may be prosecuted by leave of the bankrupt court, proof of debt in bankruptcy must be deemed equivalent to the commencement of a suit, within the spirit and meaning of the twelfth clause, and if the company is in bankruptcy, a failure to make such proof, or bring a suit, within twelve months from the time loss accrued, bars the claim as effectually as would failure to sue if the company were not in bankruptcy.

I do not intend now to determine the effect of bringing suit against the company after adjudication as a saving act against the limitation of the twelfth clause, as such cases are probably not numerous, and may rest on facts peculiar to themselves.

From what I have already said, it is clear that a negative answer must be given to the first question. As to the second proposition, where proofs of loss have been furnished either before adjudication to the company, or afterward to the assignee, but no proof of the claim made in bankruptcy, it seems to me that if the assured has furnished his proof of loss, and his loss has been adjusted, the amount determined and agreed upon before the petition in bankruptcy is filed, and while the company is acting through its officers, a suit may afterwards be maintained upon such adjustment for a balance struck on settlement. The parties have agreed upon the amount due under the policy while they were both competent to make such agreement, and a suit may be maintained on such agreement at any time within the statutory limitation. And I am of opinion that if the loss had been duly and regularly adjusted in good faith, before the company was adjudicated a bankrupt, the claim can be proven like any other debt, without regard to the year clause of the policy. But if the proofs of debt were not submitted or acted upon until after the petition was filed in bankruptcy, I think that, while the assignee may examine and pass upon such proofs for certain purposes, he cannot make an adjustment or agreement to pay, upon which an action could be maintained, and the assured, in order to preserve his claim, must not only present his proofs under the ninth clause, but must also make his proof in bankruptcy, as the substitute or equivalent for the commencement of a suit within twelve months under the twelfth clause. The principle on which I hold that an adjustment of the loss by the company is a waiver of the year clause, is, that the law will imply a promise by the company to pay the sum at which the loss is adjusted as a new contract arising out of the old one; but this principle does not apply to the assignee, as he has no right to make an express promise of that kind, and the law will not imply one against him from what he may do. I therefore think that when the assured has furnished his proofs of loss to the assignee, but has failed to follow them up by proofs of his claim in bankruptcy, within twelve months from the time of loss, his claim is barred by the year clause.

As to the third proposition, where no proofs of loss have been furnished to the company or assignee, but the assured has proved up his loss as a debt against the estate in bankruptcy, under the rule of the bankrupt court. This case is similar in principle to the bringing of a suit against the company for loss on a policy without compliance with the ninth clause.

As I have said before, a company while in control of its affairs may waive the proofs required by the ninth clause, and cannot afterwards insist upon such proof as a condition precedent to bringing a suit; and in cases where there is clear evidence of a waiver of the preliminary proof shown in the proof of debt, I think the debt should be allowed, subject to the right of the assignee to have inquiry made into all the facts touching such alleged waiver; or, to illustrate my meaning, if suit is brought on a policy, the plaintiff must aver and prove that he has given notice and proof of loss as required by the ninth clause, or aver and prove a waiver of such notice and proofs. When he substitutes proof of a claim in bankruptcy for such suit, he must show either compliance with the ninth clause or a waiver of it; and if the waiver is aptly alleged, and stands the ordeal of investigation as to whether it was regularly made in good faith, the assignee should pay the policy. But if there is no evidence of waiver by the company while it had the right to make such waiver, it appears very clear to me that the assignee has no right to pay the claim unless the assured shows that he has complied with the prerequisites of the ninth clause, and the allegations of the assured in that regard may be inquired into by the assignee, and if it appears that the proofs of loss have not been duly furnished, or waived, he should not pay the claim.

The proper practice in cases where the assignee wishes to contest any claim of the nature referred to under either of the foregoing propositions, is to ask that the claim be expunged under the thirty-fourth rule of the general orders in bankruptcy, and proceed as in that rule directed.

Case No. 4,797.

FIREMEN'S INS. CO. v. HEMINGWAY et al.

[8 Ins. Law J. 520; 8 Reporter, 741.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Mississippi. Nov. Term, 1878.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES—FUND DEPOSITED FOR PROTECTION OF DOMESTIC POLICY HOLDERS —ASSIGNMENT — INSOLVENCY OF COMPANY — BANKRUPTCY—DUTY OF STATE TREASURER.

[1. The sum of money which a foreign insurance company is required by the Mississippi statute (Code 1871, § 2446 et seq., as amended by the Acts of 1873 and 1874) to deposit with the state treasurer is intended, under the scheme of the statute, as a protection to domestic policy holders insured by agents authorized to do business in the state in the manner prescribed by the statute; and in case of the company's insolvency or withdrawal from further business in the state the fund is only to be charged with unpaid losses and unearned premiums due to such policy holders, as distinguished from policy holders insured by other agents outside of the state.]

[2. The company, on withdrawing from business in the state, and giving the required notice of intention to withdraw the fund, may make a valid assignment thereof to another company which succeeds to its business in the state; nor is such assignment invalidated, either in equity or under the state statute, by the fact that it is made expressly subject to all accrued charges in favor of the domestic policy holders.]

[3. The fact that within four months after making the assignment the company is declared a bankrupt does not render the assignment void as to foreign creditors who seek to attach the fund, for the assignee in bankruptcy is the only person entitled under the bankrupt law to question the validity of the assignment.]

[4. A subsequent assignment of the fund, made by the assignee in bankruptcy to the original assignee, is but a confirmation of the original title, derived from the same source, and is no more to be questioned than the original assignment.]

[5. The state treasurer, in determining pursuant to the statute what claims constitute charges upon the fund, acts in a quasi judicial capacity, and is not personally liable for money paid out under an honest mistake as to his duty, especially when advised by the law officers of the state that the claims in question are a proper charge on the fund.]

[6. Another insurance company, which takes the balance of the fund by a valid assignment, is entitled thereto, as against subsequent attachments for claims upon policies issued outside the state, and which did not, therefore, constitute charges upon the fund under the state statute.]

The following additional facts, from E. R. Bowen, of counsel for plaintiff, will more fully explain this case. The bill for injunction was originally drawn to be filed in a United States court, but no United States judge could be found in the state at the time, and it was deemed necessary to resort to a state court to save the fund. The state supreme court, in a suit by one of the claimants, has held that the language of the statute, "at the expiration of thirty days from the publication" the treasurer "shall proceed to pay," etc., means thirty days after the expiration of the sixty days notice. About $3,000 had been paid out within five days after the expiration. The claimants under policies issued in other states insisted that by transferring the ownership to citizens of Mississippi they were within the protection of the deposit law. It appears that but one of the claims by agents for unearned premiums had been returned canceled with the agent's certificate, while the claims included policies previously canceled and taken up by the insolvent and its reinsurer. Some of the claims were in suit by attachment, and were paid before trial.

Marcellus Green and George F. Harding, for plaintiff.

T. C. Catchings, Atty. Gen., Nugent & McWillie, Pitman & Pitman, Smith & Klein, O. B. Sansom, and Barrows & Smythe, for defendants.

HILL, District Judge. This cause is submitted upon bill amended, and supplemental bill, answers, exhibits, and proofs, from which the following facts appear:

The Globe Insurance Company, chartered and doing business under the laws of Illinois, desiring to transact business as insurers against loss by fire in this state, through agencies located in this state, in pursuance of the statutes of this state, on or about the 15th day of April, 1875, complied with said statutes, under the requirements of which said company deposited with the treasurer of this state the sum of $15,000 in the warrants of this state, drawn upon the treasurer, who gave a certificate therefor as required by law, drawing six per cent. interest, the payment of which the statute guaranteed to whoever might be determined entitled thereto as provided by the statute. [Laws Miss. 1875, p. 72.] Whereupon said company, through its duly appointed agents, Messrs. Barrows & Smythe and others, commenced taking risks and issuing policies of insurance against loss by fire within the state of Mississippi, and so continued until March 1, 1876, when said business ceased, and after which time no further policies were issued or business done in this state through said agents. Soon thereafter the company notified the defendant, W. L. Hemingway, the then treasurer of this state, of its intention to cease doing business in this state, and to withdraw said deposit as provided by statute.

On the 27th day of April, 1876, the Globe Insurance Company for certain considerations transferred and assigned said certificate of deposit to the Union Insurance Company, the name of which was afterward changed to the "Firemen's Insurance Company," the present complainant. A part of the consideration of such assignment was that the complainant should reinsure the policy-holders who had taken out policies through the agents so appointed in the state of Mississippi, and doing business under the statutes of this state, and which was accordingly done. Said assignment was made subject to all the legal claims and demands on said fund binding thereon under the statutes of this state. Notice of said assignment was given to Hemingway, as treasurer, about the 29th of May, 1876. The state treasurer, on the 31st of May, 1876, being satisfied that the Globe Insurance Company had become insolvent, in pursuance of the statutes of the state as amended in relation to such insurance company, gave notice by publication in the Clarion, a newspaper published in Jackson, to all persons having claims upon said company, and founded upon losses on policies issued, and for unearned premiums thereon, to the end that the same might be allowed and paid out of said fund as provided by law; and on August 4th, 1876, said treasurer did allow and pay to claimants upon said fund as follows: to Sherman H. Parisot, $2,099.16; to Wm. Mullen, $105.62; to Barrows & Smythe, $240.32; to Morris Bros., agents, $459.57, and to A. L. Davis, $27.19. It further appears that on or about the 27th of May, 1876, a petition was filed by creditors of the Globe Insurance Company in the district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois, to have said company declared a bankrupt, and upon proceedings had thereunder said company was adjudicated a bankrupt [case unreported], and Robert E. Jenkins was duly appointed assignee thereof. That a litigation was afterward had between said Jenkins, as such assignee, and said complainant in reference to said fund, in said district court in which said adjudication was had, which resulted in a conveyance of all the interest which said assignee took in said fund to the complainant.

On May 22, 1876, Peyton S. Davidson, Nicholas Springer, and E. C. Carroll, and on May 27, 1876, Wm. E. & W. B. Hamilton and James La Burge, Jr., respectively instituted their several suits in the circuit court of Warren county, in this state, by original attachments against said Globe Insurance Company, and said Hemingway as garnishee, and to which said Globe Insurance Company interposed its plea of general issue, and said Hemingway made answer as such treasurer that he had in his hands said funds. These several suits were brought to recover the amount of losses alleged to be due upon certain marine policies of insurance issued by the Globe Insurance Company through its agents in the city of Chicago. On November 29, 1876, judgments were rendered in said suits, and against Hemingway as garnishee, in favor of La Burge for $661.40 and costs; in favor of W. E. & W. B. Hamilton for $625.25 and costs; in favor of E. C. Carroll for $1,694.35 and costs; in favor of Nicholas Springer for $662.44 and costs; in favor of said Davidson for $2,175 and costs. On August 16, 1876, complainant filed her bill in the chancery court of Hinds county, against Hemingway, treasurer, and other defendants, with some others whose claims have been compromised and need not be further noticed in the progress of this cause.

The bill charges a combination between Hemingway and his co-defendants to defraud complainant out of her just rights to said fund; charges that Hemingway paid out the sums on the 4th of August to those not entitled, and without proof of their being a lien upon the fund, and in fraud of complainant's rights, and seeks to hold him personally liable therefor; charges that the sums claimed under the attachment suits were not charges upon the fund. The bill prays for the writ of injunction to restrain said Hemingway, as such treasurer, from further proceeding to pay out said fund until the matters in relation thereto should be heard and determined by the court, which writ was duly granted, issued, and served, and is now in force. The bill further prays that upon the hearing, the said contract and assignment made on the 27th of April, 1876, between complainant and the Globe Insurance Company, be held valid and binding; that the legal and equitable rights of the claimants to said fund under the law be determined and settled by the court, and the residue of the fund, after all proper charges are paid, to be paid over to complainant. Hemingway answered the bill, admitting that he had made the payments to Parisot, Barrows & Smythe, Morris Brothers, Davis, and Muller, as charged; but denying all fraud, and insisting that said payments were a lien upon the fund, and properly paid upon legal and proper proof; that in his action in regard thereto he acted in a quasi judicial capacity, and hence was not personally responsible for any mistake of judgment into which he may have fallen. The other defendants answered denying the fraud charged, and insisted that they were respectively entitled to the payments received by them. The attaching creditors also answered denying all fraud, and insisting that the claims upon which their suits were founded were just, and a lien upon said fund. Parisot by cross bill set up a claim for loss paid for salvage of a steamer covered by his policy. After issues were made, and before hearing, the cause was removed to this court. Complainant filed her amended and supplemental bill, which, after reciting the allegations of the original bill, charges that after the filing of the original bill, by fraud and collusion between Hemingway and the plaintiffs in said attachment suits, the said judgments against the Globe Insurance Company and Hemingway, treasurer and garnishee, were obtained, and that the same are void, and constitute no just demand or charge upon said fund as against complainant's rights.

To this bill Hemingway answered, reiterating the statement of his original answer, and denying all fraud in relation to obtaining the judgments in the attachment suits. The plaintiffs in said judgments in attachment, answered the amended and supplemental bill denying all fraud, insisting that said judgments are valid, and a demand, and a legal charge upon said fund, and that the judgments are res adjudicata, and cannot be inquired into in this suit. Complainant has filed her answer to the cross bill of Parisot, and issues joined on the several answers. The pleadings and proofs are unusually voluminous, but the foregoing comprises all that need be stated to an understanding of the questions presented, and argued with ability by the different counsel representing the respective interests involved.

The first question presented is as to the title of complainant to the funds deposited with the treasurer; for if she has no title the bill must be dismissed. Neither of the conveyances under which complainant claims is denied; but it is insisted by defendants' counsel that the assignments were made subject to the claims that might be on the fund under the laws of this state. Whilst a negotiable instrument must be unconditional, such is not necessary to transfer a claim of the kind under consideration. The assignments are good on their face under the state statute, and are certainly good as equitable assignments. It is, however, urged that the first assignment was void under the bankrupt law, and that the second cannot be set up under the amended and supplemental bill. To the first objection it is only necessary to state that no one except the assignee in bankruptcy could maintain this objection, and this, under the sanction of the bankrupt law, he has waived by assigning all the interest he took under the assignment to him, to the complainant.

To the second objection it is only necessary to state that the assignment by the assignee in bankruptcy was but a confirmation of the same title, derived from the same source, and is unlike a title derived from a different person, and of a different character. I am satisfied that nothing is shown to defeat complainant's title to whatever balance may remain of said fund after all the legal claims upon it existing on April 27, 1876, shall have been satisfied, which brings us to the much more difficult question of determining what these claims are, and this involves a construction of the insurance laws of this state, but few of which have received a construction by our supreme courts. Section 2442 of the Code of 1871, reads as follows: "It shall not be lawful for any agent of any insurance company incorporated by any other state than the state of Mississippi, directly or indirectly to take risks or transact any business of insurance in this state without first procuring a certificate of authority from the auditor of public accounts; and before obtaining such certificate, such agent shall furnish to the said auditor a statement under the oath of the president or secretary of the company for which he may act, which statement shall show: 1. The name and locality of the company. 2. The amount of its capital stock. 3. The amount of its capital stock paid in. 4. The assets of the company, including first, the amount of cash on hand, and in the hands of agents or other persons; second, the real estate unincumbered; third, bonds owned by the company, and how they are secured, with the rate of interest thereon; fourth, debts of the company secured by mortgage; fifth, debts otherwise secured; sixth, debts for premiums; seventh, all other securities. 5. The amount of liability due or not due to banks or other creditors by the company. 6. Losses adjusted and due. 7. Losses adjusted and not due. 8. Losses unadjusted. 9. Losses in suspense waiting for further proof. 10. All other claims against the company. 11. The greatest amount insured in any one risk. 12. The greatest amount allowed by the rules of the company to be insured in any one city, town or village. 13. The greatest amount allowed to be insured in any one block. 14. The act of incorporation of the company. 15. The certificate of deposit of the state treasurer, as hereinafter provided. The statement shall be filed in the office of said auditor, together with a written instrument under the seal of the company, signed by the president and secretary, authorizing such agent to acknowledge service of process for and on behalf of such company, consenting that the service of process upon such agent shall be taken and held to be as valid as if served upon the company, according to the laws of the state, and waiving all claim of error by reason of such service, and no insurance company or agent of any insurance company incorporated by any other state shall transact any business of insurance in this state, unless such company is possessed of at least one hundred and fifty thousand dollars of actual capital invested in stocks of at least par value, or in bonds or mortgages of real estate, with double the amount for which the same is mortgaged; and upon filing the aforesaid statement and instrument with the auditor, and furnishing him with satisfactory evidence of such investment as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of said auditor to issue a certificate thereof, with authority to transact business of insurance to the agent applying for the same." Section 2444 provides that such agent, before taking any risks or transacting any business of insurance in this state, shall file in the office of the chancery clerk of the county in which he may desire to establish an agency for such insurance company, a copy of the statement filed with the auditor, which also must be published in some newspaper in the county. Section 2445 requires this statement to be served, filed and published annually. Section 2446 requires that agents of such insurance companies before commencing business in this state should deposit state warrants, or cash, with the treasurer of the state, whose capital does not exceed $250,000, $15,000, and those of larger capital $20,000, and for which the treasurer shall issue his certificate, and which shall remain on deposit as long as the company shall continue to do business in this state, and shall not be withdrawn until all losses upon such life, fire or marine risks shall be adjusted and paid, or adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction in favor of said company, and then not until six months' notice shall have been given the treasurer of an intention of such withdrawal. Section 2447 provides that when such deposit shall have been made, the treasurer shall issue his certificate of deposit therefor, with a statement on its face that the faith of the state is faithfully pledged for the redemption of the same, and bearing interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, payable annually. Section 2450 provides that when a judgment or decree shall remain unsatisfied for the space of thirty days after the rendition thereof, that the plaintiffs may file with the state treasurer a transcript thereof, accompanied with the certificate of the clerk and sheriff of the county; that such judgment or decree remains unpaid, and that the fi. fa. has not been suspended by writ of error or appeal; that thereupon the treasurer shall pay the amount of said judgment or decree, including costs, and credit to the amount of the deposit, to be replaced in sixty days on notice to the agent, provided the treasurer shall not pay out more than the deposit in his hands, and shall not pay over any amount on such judgment or decree which may be stayed by injunction, appeal or writ of error, until the same shall have been finally determined. Section 2451 makes it a criminal offense to violate any of the provisions of the chapter of which these sections compose a part. It was soon found that companies making the deposit could withdraw and leave unearned premiums unprovided for, to amend which the act of 1873, amendatory to the foregoing sections, provided that such unearned premiums should be a charge upon such deposit, and entitled to payment under section 2450. That act further provides that when any such insurance company shall become insolvent, or shall appear so to the treasurer, he shall immediately give notice by advertisement in some newspaper of general circulation for sixty days, notifying all persons holding claims against such company for losses and unearned premiums to present the same to the treasurer duly certified, as required by the first section of the act, which is a certificate from an agent of the company that the policy has been canceled or surrendered to an agent of the company, and showing the amount of the unearned premiums so due. That at the expiration of thirty days from the publication, (which means after the end of the sixty days, and ninety days from the first publication,) he shall proceed to pay the claims against said fund, provided, if the fund is insufficient to pay all, first to losses; and if not enough for all of these, then pro rata among them; if a residue shall remain after payment of losses, then to pay unearned premiums if enough for that purpose; if not, then pro rata upon them, and if enough to pay all these demands, and a surplus remains, to pay the same to the holder of the certificate of deposit.

Another defect in these statutes soon appeared by the agents of the company leaving the state, or absconding, or concealing themselves, so that the process provided for by section 2442 of the Code, above stated, (could not be served); so the act of 1874 [Laws Miss. 1874, p. 16] amended this section, and provided for proceedings by attachment as in cases of foreign corporations and proceedings thereunder, and subjecting the treasurer to the writ of garnishment. I have given this full recital of these statutory provisions because all of them have more or less application to the questions here involved. These statutes form a scheme to a certain end, and must be construed together. That end is to give to insurance companies chartered and doing business in other states an opportunity to establish agencies and do business in this state; but as a protection to our citizens from fictitious or insolvent companies created and doing business in other states, and to give to our citizens an opportunity to examine the law of their creation and their condition in every way, the sworn statement of their condition by their principal officers, with a copy of their charter, is required to be filed with the auditor, and also in the office of the chancery clerk in each county in which the companies by their agents may desire to do business, and where liabilities may be incurred upon policies issued through such agents, that the companies may be sued, judgment obtained, and satisfaction had without the policy-holder having to go out of the state to obtain it; hence, the agreement for service of process, and the deposit to be made with the treasurer, and the mode of reaching the funds so deposited with him; and that those taking risks may know the amount of the risks for which the deposit is liable. In other words, it is to give as far as possible these foreign insurance companies the privileges, coupled with the liabilities, of companies chartered by this state. Such being the case, the deposit is intended only for those who may obtain their policies through the agents appointed and doing business in the state, and under the provisions of our statutes. No assignment or transfer of the fund so deposited can be made so as to defeat the claims upon it for satisfaction of losses or unearned premiums upon the policies issued by such agents as provided by these statutes. Nor can such company revoke the powers of their agents so as to defeat the remedies provided by the statute, although it may for any other purpose.

So that in case such company shall cease to do business in this state, either by withdrawal of agencies or insolvency, any person holding a policy issued through such agent or agents, which has not expired, may cancel the policy or surrender it to the agent, and demand the unearned premium, which I understand to be the amount of premium due for the unexpired term of the policy. The agent is required to estimate and certify the amount due, and that the policy has been canceled or returned, which has the same effect. This certificate is by law made evidence of the cancellation or return, and the amount of the unearned premiums, but if the agent should refuse to do this duty, the policy-holder, I have no doubt, may cancel or tender the return of the policy, and make proof of its value; his redress cannot be defeated either by the failure of the agent to do his duty or by the want of such agent. After, however, all these demands have been satisfied, the fund in the hands of the treasurer is to be returned to the depositor or its assignee. It is the company and not the agent that makes the deposit, although the company acts through her agent, being incapable of any other action. After those are satisfied who have this special lien on this fund, I incline to the opinion that it is liable to other creditors of the depositor or its assignee, but under my view of the right of the parties to this suit the decision of this question is unnecessary.

Let these rules of law be applied to the facts of this case, and first as to the claims paid by the treasurer. It is admitted that the claims of Parisot are not founded upon a policy or policies issued by an agent doing business under the provisions of the statutes in this state, hence, under the construction given to this statute, are not liens or demands upon this fund, and were improperly paid by the treasurer. The claim of Muller is of the same character, and its payment was consequently improperly made. The payment made to Davis was upon a policy issued by Phelan, an agent in Tennessee, who had no authority to do business in this state, and consequently was improperly made. The payment made to Morris Bros. was upon a certificate of Phelan, whose certificate should not have been received as evidence, and there being no other evidence of the facts necessary to entitle any of said policy-holders to this fund, the payment of said claim was improper. The payment to Barrows & Smythe was made upon their own certificate for unearned premiums. The amount which is now shown by the proof to be for fees due them from the Globe Insurance Company was clearly not a claim upon the fund. It does not appear whether their claims for unearned premiums were upon policies issued by themselves or any other agent of the Globe Insurance Company doing business in this state under the statute, nor does it sufficiently appear whether or not the holders of the policies had canceled or surrendered them, as provided by law, to entitle them to these unearned premiums, so that the evidence upon which the payment was made is insufficient, and the payment was improperly made. The result is that complainant is entitled to a decree against each of the parties to whom said payments were made, and who are parties to this cause, for the sums so improperly received by them, reserving, however, to Barrows & Smythe, and to Morris Bros., the right, if they can show by proof before the clerk as master, that any of the sums received by them were for unearned premiums on policies which had been canceled or surrendered by the policy-holders, and which policies had been issued by an agent doing business in this state under the provisions of the statute.

Complainant's counsel insist that she is entitled to a personal decree against Hemingway, the treasurer, and whether she is or not, is a question of no little difficulty. I have no doubt that in all he did he acted in good faith, and did only what he believed to be his duty. The responsible and delicate duties imposed upon him by law are of a twofold character, partly ministerial and partly quasi judicial. The reception and payment out of the fund is ministerial; that of determining the question of insolvency, of to whom payment should be made, when not ascertained by a judgment or decree of some court, is in its nature judicial, and for a mistake on this subject, honestly made and free from fraud, as I believe was the case, I can not see that he should be any more liable than a referee or any other person exercising judicial or quasi judicial functions. The action of the treasurer in such case, it is true, is not that of a court, nor does his decision bind or conclude parties, who are left free to invoke the courts to determine and enforce their rights. No construction of the statutes has been given by the courts to guide him in his action. The complainant was requested to apply to the court to guard its interests, which she declines. The treasurer consulted the law officer of the state, who advised him it was his duty to make payment on the proofs he had. Under these circumstances I do not think the complainant should ask a personal decree against the treasurer, and I decline to make it, especially as the parties to whom the money was paid are able to return it. This brings us to the consideration of the judgments rendered in the attachment proceedings by the circuit court of Warren county. It is conceded that the policies upon which these judgments were obtained, were issued by agents in St. Louis, Missouri, therefore constituted no charge upon the fund, nor do the judgments thereon, unless it be upon the surplus after payment of all the claims provided for by the statute.

It is insisted by complainant's counsel, that the attachments were dissolved by the operation of the bankrupt law, having been sued out within less than four months of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. As against the assignee in bankruptcy this would be true, but this is not a proceeding by the assignee in bankruptcy to set them aside. The complainant claims the fund by a title acquired prior to bankruptcy, and prior to the issuance of the attachments, and not having been a party to these attachment suits, is not affected by them; so that it is unnecessary to consider whether they are or are not valid judgments against the Globe Insurance Company, which is not dischargeable under the law, or is a valid and fixed claim upon the assets of the Globe in bankruptcy. As already held, the title of complainant became fixed upon this fund on the 27th of April, 1876, subject to any prior demands upon it; hence these attachments and the judgments thereon could no more affect complainant's rights than such attachments and judgments would have affected the rights of any other third party, who was a stranger to the liability and suit, and whose property had been seized under the attachments.

The result is that the complainant must be declared entitled to this fund free from these judgments. This leaves but a single question, and that easily disposed of, being the cross bill of Parisot, setting up his claim for the amount claimed to have been paid him for salvage. The policy, under which it is claimed, was not issued through an agent in this state under the provisions of the statute; the claim, therefore, does not attach to this fund, and must be disallowed, and the cross bill dismissed at the cost of the complainant therein. Each of the defendants to the bill will be taxed with the costs of making him a party, and those accruing in his defense respectively, and the remaining costs by the complainant. There being no claims shown to exist upon the remaining funds in the hands of the treasurer having priority to those of the complainant, they will be paid over to her duly authorized officer, attorney, or agent, being first subject to such costs as may be taxed upon the complainant.

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1876.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—DEPOSIT OF TITLE DEEDS—JUDGMENT LIEN.

The plaintiff corporation, holding as security from its debtor certain railroad coupons, which were convertible into lands at the option of the holder, and which were so converted, and the deed taken in the name of the debtor, and not recorded, but deposited, in pursuance of an agreement to that effect by the debtor with the plaintiff, as a substituted security in place of the coupons, was held to be an equitable mortgagee, and to have an equity in the lands obtained for the coupons and embraced in the deed, superior to the lien of a general judgment creditor of the common debtor.

The bill in this case is filed to establish an equitable lien upon certain lands described therein. The material facts are these: The defendant [Jonas] Gise, January 1st, 1874, made a loan of money from the plaintiff, and, after various payments and renewals, the amount became $2,500 on July 15th, 1875, evidenced by two notes, payable in sixty and ninety days thereafter. Upon these notes a judgment was recovered by confession in this court, on November 15th, 1875. An execution was thereupon issued on the 20th, and returned on the 23d of November, 1875, no property found. It appears that Gise, being the owner of certain railroad bonds with coupons attached, deposited the coupons with the plaintiff, as security for payment of this demand. These coupons being convertible into lands at the option of the holder, by an arrangement between the parties interested, these coupons were withdrawn by Gise, and located by him upon the lands mentioned in the bill, with the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant Gise, that the deed from the railroad company, as soon as obtained, should be deposited, and the lands described therein become security for the payment of the debt in lieu of the coupons. Gise obtained a deed from the company, which was deposited with plaintiff in pursuance of the agreement of the parties, and this deed is now held by the plaintiff. This instrument was never recorded. Upon this state of facts the plaintiff claims a lien, in the nature of an equitable mortgage. The defendants, Caldwell, Hamilton & Co., obtained a general judgment, in the district court of Douglas county, against the defendant Gise, October 29th, 1875, for $2,142.40 and interest, and on the 3d day of November, 1875—twelve days before the plaintiff obtained its judgment—filed a transcript thereof in the clerk's office of Nuckolls county, where these lands are situated, and thereby the judgment became, it is claimed, a lien upon the property of the debtor in that county. It appears that the consideration of the note upon which this judgment was obtained, was money loaned in July, 1873, to Gise, by the defendants. This judgment remains unpaid. It is sought by the bill to postpone the lien of this judgment to the equitable lien claimed by plaintiff. The bill alleges notice of this equity of plaintiff, on the part of Caldwell, Hamilton & Co. The answer fully denies notice on the part of the defendants. The plaintiff failed to make any proof to support the allegations of the bill in that regard.

J. M. Woolworth, for plaintiff.

G. W. Ambrose and Clinton Briggs, for Caldwell, Hamilton & Co.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. Counsel have largely argued this cause as if it involved the question whether the English doctrine of equitable mortgages, arising from the mere deposit of title deeds, prevails in the state of Nebraska. It may be admitted, for the purposes of this case, that the deposit of recorded title deeds, without more, will not create an equitable lien against the debtor, or a general judgment creditor of his, and yet the equity of the present cause is with the plaintiff.

The plaintiff corporation held coupons, convertible into lands, as a specific security for its debt. Without the debtor's consent, it could have converted these coupons into lands, and taken the deed in its own name. Both the plaintiff and Gise, however, thought it advantageous to exercise the option of exchanging the coupons for lands. Gise made the selection of the lands, and the deed was taken in his name, but not recorded, and was delivered at once to the plaintiffs, and is now held by them in virtue of an agreement with Gise, made at the time, that the deed should be a substituted security in lieu of the coupons. Gise does not controvert the plaintiff's rights. The defendants, Caldwell, Hamilton & Co., do not dispute the above facts, but contend that their rights, as a general judgment creditor of Gise, without levy or sale, are superior to the plaintiff's. There is no statute of Nebraska which, in terms, gives such effect to a general judgment lien, nor any decision of the supreme court of the state that a judgment lien overrides existing specific equities in lands, in favor of others. The plaintiff's rights, as the equitable mortgagee of the lands, or having an equitable lien upon them, are superior to the rights of a general judgment creditor, who has not become a purchaser under the judgment, in good faith, and without notice of the rights of the equitable mortgagee. Brown v. Pierce, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 205, 217. Decree for the plaintiff.

NOTE. The question, in the foregoing cause, as to the respective rights of the equitable mortgagee and the judgment creditor, was very fully argued, and the following, on that point, is condensed from Mr. Woolworth's brief:

The rule in England is stated by Sir Edward

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Sugden, when lord chancellor of Ireland, in Abbott v. Stratten, 9 Sugd. Dec., 3 Jones & L. 603, 614. He says: "Does such a mortgage take precedence, or not, of the subsequent judgments, however bona fide they may be, and supposing them to have been obtained for valuable consideration, and without notice of the equitable mortgage? I can only say that, ever since I have been in the profession, I have considered that a settled point; and down to the time a question was raised upon it, in Whitworth v. Gaugain, reported in Craig & P. 330, I never entertained a doubt upon the subject; and I have repeatedly acted in this court upon the rule that an agreement binding property for valuable consideration, though equitable only, will take precedence over a subsequent judgment, whatever may be the consideration for it, and whether obtained in invitum or by confession. This is not denied to be so in the case of a purchase, and an equitable mortgage is, pro tanto, a purchase in the strict sense of the term. The agreement (for that is really the question) is, in this court, the mortgage—it is the pledge. The mere legal operation of the instrument goes for nothing; the agreement itself is, in the view of a court of equity, equivalent to the execution of a mortgage. It would be pedantry to go through the cases on this subject, after the full review of them in the case to which I have referred, when it was before Vice Chancellor Wigram. I must, therefore, overrule the master's report, and declare that this is a valid, equitable mortgage, binding on the property as against subsequent judgment creditors."

The case referred to by the lord chancellor, in Whitworth v. Gaugain, 3 Hare, 416, states not only the rule, but the reason of the rule, with that satisfactory fullness and precision for which Vice Chancellor Wigram was very distinguished; and as in his judgment he considers all the arguments which might be in any way alleged, I shall set them out here:

"The more I consider the case, the more satisfied I feel that I stated the general principle correctly, in Langton v. Horton [5 Beav. 9], when I said that a creditor might, under his judgment, take in execution all that belonged to his debtor, nothing more. He stands in the place of his debtor. He only takes the property of his debtor subject to every liability under which the debtor himself held it. First, take the case of an ordinary trust. It could not for a moment be contended that this court would not protect the interest of the cestui que trust against the judgment creditor of the trustee. The judgment of Lord Cottenham, in Newlands v. Paynter [4 Mylne & C. 408], is decisive upon that point, and the other cases cited at the bar prove the same thing. Secondly, take the case of a purchaser for value before conveyance. Lodge v. Lyseley [4 Sim. 70] is an authority, if authority could be wanting, to show that the equitable interest of such a party will be preferred in equity to the claim of the judgment creditor of the vendor. Again, take the case of an equitable charge to pay debts, or legacies, or any other equitable interest, except that of an equitable mortgagee, and I apprehend the right of the equitable incumbrance to be preferred to the judgment creditor of the debtor in whom the legal estate in the property charged might be, will be, as indeed it properly was, admitted. And if such equitable interests are thus protected, upon what principle is the equitable mortgagee to be excluded from the like protection? Unless I misunderstand the report of the case of Williams v. Craddock [unreported] the counsel, as well as the court, were of the opinion that an interest by way of an equitable mortgage was entitled, in this court, to the same protection against judgments as other equitable claimants.

"In the argument of this case both parties referred to, and drew conclusions from, the proposition that, in a court of equity, a purchaser for value, who obtains a conveyance of the legal interest without notice of an equity affecting the specific subject of his purchase, in equity as at law, has a better title to that subject than the mere equitable claimant. The proposition thus admitted, and necessarily admitted by both parties, is pregnant with consequences which go a great way towards deciding the question now before me. If the tenant by elegit is (as was argued) to be considered as a purchaser for value without notice under a conveyance, all trusts and all equitable interests of every description, must be subject to the judgments against the trustee; for a purchaser for value, without notice from a fraudulent trustee, having got the legal estate, will unquestionably be preferred in equity to the cestui que trust; and it appears to me to be impossible, except by a merely arbitrary decision, to distinguish the case of an ordinary trust, or other equitable interest, from the present, in considering merely the effect of a judgment upon it, unless it can be shown that the interest of the equitable mortgagee is, for the present purpose, distinguishable from that of an ordinary cestui que trust. Again, it follows, conversely, that if the equitable interest of an ordinary cestui que trust, or any other equitable interest, is not subject to judgments against the trustee, though executed, then those judgments are not analogous to purchasers for value. In other words, the judgment creditor of a trustee is not a purchaser for value, in the contemplation of a court of equity. The proposition that a judgment creditor is a purchaser for value would prove too much for the defendants' purpose. It would affect all equitable interests alike.

"But it was said that the interest of an equitable mortgagee was distinguishable from that of an ordinary cestui que trust, and other equitable interests (charges, for example, to pay debts and legacies paramount to the title of the debtor), which it was admitted would be preferred in equity—that the interest of the equitable mortgagee was imperfect, that of the cestui que trust perfect. In what respect is the equitable mortgagee imperfect? As between the mortgagor and mortgagee it is absolute and complete. In what respect is it imperfect as between the mortgagee and those who claim under the mortgage, as his creditors by judgment? The interest of the equitable mortgagee is liable to be defeated by a fraudulent dealing with the legal estate, and in that respect, no doubt, it is imperfect. But that is an infirmity to which all equitable interests are subject; and if other equitable interests are to be protected against judgments obtained against the trustee or other party in whom the legal estate may be, why is the interest of the equitable mortgagee to be unprotected? The debt was no more contracted upon the view of the land (if that were material, which I think is not) in the one case than in the other.

"The most plausible way of stating the case in favor of the judgment creditor is by supposing his right to be founded in contract, and not the result of a proceeding in invitum; and this, no doubt, may be true of the case, when the judgment is voluntarily confessed; and I paid the greatest attention to the arguments of counsel on that point. But, admitting that view to be correct, how does it alter the case? The question remains: what was the contract? It was a general contract for a judgment, and the fruits of a judgment; and the original question, therefore—what right does a judgment confer?—remains wholly untouched by the concession.

"If a party contracts specifically for a given property, pays the purchase money, and obtains the legal title, without notice up to the time of obtaining the conveyance, as well as of paying his money, that may give him a right to be preferred to an equitable claim which is prior in point of time. But there is no principle upon which a court of justice can be required to imply that a general contract to give a judgment is a contract to give that which does not belong to the debtor. If the trustee were to confess a judgment, am I to imply that it amounts to a specific contract to give the creditor an interest in that which belongs to the cestui que trust? That appears to me to be the true distinction. In one case a party contracts for a specific thing; in the other he merely takes a judgment; that gives him nothing more than a right to that which belongs to his debtor. The above propositions, which, separately taken, I believe to be unimpeachable, will be found to meet every argument that was addressed to me in support of the defendant's case independently of the late statutes. I am clear that the late statutes make no difference in the case. So far as the judgment creditor claims to be a mortgagee, in writing, under the statute, he is posterior, in point of time, to the plaintiffs. But it was said that the equity of the judgment creditor was equal to that of the equitable mortgagee, and that he has, by the force of the elegit executed, an estate at law in addition to his equitable interest, and therefore it is to be preferred. I need not, after what I have already said, proceed to expose the fallacy of this argument; it takes for granted the whole question in dispute. That the tenant, by elegit, has an estate in that which he may lawfully take (that which belongs to his debtor), I do not deny; but to say that, by force of the elegit, he acquires a rightful interest, in this court, in that which in equity does not belong to his debtor, is taking the whole matter in contest for granted; the whole question being what he may take.

"I can only repeat that it appears to me impossible, except on the most arbitrary distinction, to say that the interests of an equitable mortgagee are not to be protected, and yet that that protection is to be afforded to the interests of an ordinary cestui que trust, and other equitable interests. I do not go into the reasoning of the cases which have been cited; all of them, however, appear to me to support the view I have taken. If my judgment cannot be supported upon propositions which are indisputable in themselves, whether properly applicable to the case or not, no explanation I can give of the cases will at all strengthen the foundation of that judgment. I must hold that the plaintiffs have a right to the payment of their debt out of the estate comprised in the deed."

This case was affirmed by Lord Chancellor Cottenham. 1 Phil. Ch. 728. In Beavan v. Earl of Oxford, 6 De Gex, M. & G. 492, it is held that the judgment creditors were not purchasers within the meaning of St. 27 Eliz. c. 4, and the same rule has been held in many other English cases.

There are many American cases on this subject, but the supreme court of the United States has spoken decisively upon it in Pierce v. Brown, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 205. The court says, at page 217: "Express decision of this court is, that the lien of a judgment constitutes no property in the land; that it is merely a general lien securing a preference over subsequently acquired interests in the property; but the settled rule in chancery is that a general lien is controlled in such courts so as to protect the rights of those who were previously entitled to an equitable interest in the lands, or in the proceeds thereof. Specific liens stand upon a different footing, but it is well settled that a judgment creates only a general lien, and that the judgment creditor acquires thereby no higher or better right to the property or assets of the debtor than the debtor himself had when the judgment was rendered, unless he can show some fraud or collusion to impair his rights. Correct statement of the rule is that the lien of a judgment creates a preference over subsequently acquired rights, but in equity it does not attach to the mere legal title to the land, as existing in the defendant at its rendition, to the exclusion of a prior equitable title in a third person," etc.

As to the deposit of title deeds as security for a debt, the English rule was first enunciated in Russel v. Russel, 1 Brown, Ch. 269, by Lord Loughborough. The other early English cases are Plumb v. Fluitt, 2 Anstr. 438; Ex parte Coming, 9 Ves. 117; Ex parte Haigh, 11 Ves. 403; Norris v. Wilkinson, 12 Ves. 196; Ex parte Mountfort, 14 Ves. 606; Ex parte Coombe, 17 Ves. 370. In Ex parte Hooper, 1 Mer. 9, Lord Eldon regretted the latitude to which it had extended to cover future advances in Ex parte Langston, 17 Ves. 230. Although from the first the judges animadverted upon the doctrine, it has been enforced in England. Some of the most recent cases in which the doctrine has been applied without observation on its propriety are De Rochefort v. Dawes, L. R. 12 Eq. 540; Shaw v. Foster, L. R. 5 H. L. 321. At page 340 Lord Cairns says: "It is a well established rule of equity that a deposit of a document of a title without more, without writing, or without word of mouth, will create in equity a charge upon the property referred to." L. R. 7 H. L. 135.

The same reluctance to admit the doctrine into the jurisprudence of this country was shown by the American courts, but it has received recognition by many of the judges who have dealt with it: In New York, in Rockwell v. Hobby, 2 Sandf. Ch. 9; Chase v. Peck, 21 N. Y. 584; Jackson v. Dunlap, 1 Johns. Cas. 114 (Chief Justice Kent); Jackson v. Parkhurst, 4 Wend. 369. In South Carolina, in Welsh v. Usher, 2 Hill Eq. 166. In Georgia, in Mounce v. Byars, 16 Ga. 469. In New Jersey, in Robinson v. Urquhart, 1 Beasley [12 N. J. Eq.] 523, and Griffin v. Griffin, 18 N. J. Eq. 104. In Wisconsin, in Jarvis v. Dutcher, 16 Wis. 327. In Maine, in Hall v. McDuff, 24 Me. 311. In California, in Hill v. Eldred, 49 Cal. 398. In Mississippi, in Williams v. Stratton, 10 Smedes & M. 418. In Rhode Island, in Hackett v. Reynolds, 4 R. I. 512. In the United States court for Wisconsin, in Wright v. Shumway [Case No. 18,093],—and see Meador v. Everett [Id. 9,376],—the doctrine has been applied. In Pennsylvania, in a series of cases, it has been denied. In Ohio, it has been denied upon the peculiar terms of the recording act as construed by the court in Bloom v. Noggle, 4 Ohio St. 45. In Kentucky, it has been disapproved, but not rejected. Washburn, in his treatise on Real Property (volume 2, 4th Ed. 82), speaks as if in his view the doctrine had recently become established in this country (Id. p. 84, pl. 4).

The following authorities were referred to by Mr. Ambrose and Mr. Briggs as to deposit of title deeds: Brown, St. Frauds, 60; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1020; Coote, Mortg. 222; 2 Washb. Real. Prop. 85. Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1874.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANK SHARES.

Under the legislation of Nebraska, shares in national banks may be taxed, and the tax enforced by distraint against the property of the bank.

J. M. Woolworth, for plaintiff.

J. C. Cowin and J. M. Thurston, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This is a bill by the First National Bank of Omaha to restrain the collection of a tax assessed and levied under the revenue laws of the state, for the year 1873, upon the shares of the shareholders in the bank, and which tax, it is alleged, the collector is about to collect by entering the banking-house of the plaintiff, and seizing its property.

The bill avers that the capital of the plaintiff is $200,000, and that this amount is wholly invested in bonds, issued by the United States; the stock is divided into shares of $100 each, and is valued for taxation at that sum. The object of this bill is to have the whole tax declared void, and to restrain its collection.

The principal ground for the relief asked, is, that the act of the legislature of the state, passed February 27, 1873 [Gen. St. Neb. 1873, p. 938], which provides for the taxation of shares in national banks, is void, for non-compliance with the conditions upon which, under the acts of congress, such taxation by the state, or under its authority, is permissible.

The third section of this act is in these words: "The stockholders of every national bank located in this state, or of any bank incorporated under the laws of the state, shall be assessed and taxed on the value of their shares of stock therein, in the precinct where such bank is located, whether the stockholders reside in such place or not. Such shares shall be listed and assessed with regard to the ownership thereof, subject, however, to the restriction that taxation of such shares shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon any other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of this state, in the county or precinct where such bank is located. The shares of capital stock of national banks not located in this state, held in this state, shall not be required to be listed under the provisions of this act. Each national bank shall furnish to the assessor a full and correct list of the names and residences of its stockholders, and the number of shares held by each, and the assessor shall report the same to the county clerk in his assessment return. The taxes against such shares shall be levied against the holder of the same, in the list of personal property, and shall be paid by the bank."

The revenue law of the state further provides that the value of stock in corporations shall be taxed, and that "in assessing the value of such stock, the actual value, in cash, of all the property that is represented, shall be considered, and no deduction shall be made in such valuation by reason of debts owing by said corporation, unless, as in other cases, such deductions be made from the item of money and credits listed by such corporation."

The plaintiff contends that the act of February 27, 1873, is void, and no tax can be lawfully levied thereunder, because:

1. The act does not provide that the tax imposed on the shares shall not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares of banks organized under the authority of the state.

2. The act in effect provides for the taxation of the capital of the national bank, and not of the shares in the hands of the stockholders thereof, forasmuch as, thereunder, the valuation of the entire property of the bank is to be first ascertained, and the bank itself is to pay the taxes—the name of the stockholder being used merely to give to the proceedings the color of a tax upon the shareholder's interest.

The act of congress, in express terms, allows the states to impose taxes upon the shares of national banks, and the only substantial limitation upon the power of the states is that they shall not subject these shares to taxation to an amount greater than they assess upon their own banks, or upon moneyed capital in the hands of their own citizens.

The first objection above stated to the state enactment is not well taken. The act provides in terms that the stockholders in all banks, state and national, shall be assessed and taxed on the value of their shares therein. This is equivalent to a provision that there shall be no discrimination in favor of the state banks, and against the national banks, and it is not necessary that there should be added a clause that the tax imposed on the shares in national banks shall not exceed that imposed on shares in state banks.

It is next urged as an objection to the state legislation above mentioned, that it in effect provides for a tax upon the capital instead of the shares of the banks, and that as the capital of the plaintiff is invested in United States securities, which are exempt from taxation, the taxation under the law of the state is illegal. By recurring to the act of the state, it will be seen that it does not undertake to tax capital, but only shares, and that this mode is prescribed for shares in both classes of banks. It is settled by the decisions of the supreme court of the United States that, as respects the power to tax, there is a distinction between capital and shares; and that the shares may be taxed, although the entire capital of the bank is invested in United States bonds, and that in the valuation of such shares for taxation, such valuation is not illegal because the assessing officers have not deducted the value conferred upon the shares by the non-taxable United States securities owned by the bank. Van Allen v. Assessors, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 573; People v. Tax Commissioners, etc., of City of New York [4 Wall. (71 U. S.) 244]; Lionberger v. Rouse, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 470.

The above cases are decisive against the objection we are now considering to the act of the state. It does not attempt to discriminate against the national banks, but provides one and the same mode for ascertaining the value of shares in the stock of all corporations, and more than this, the legislation of congress does not require. Lionberger v. Rouse, supra.

The bill does not state that the valuation of the shares in the plaintiff's bank is in excess of their actual value, nor that the valuation of the shares in the State Bank of Nebraska is less than their real value, and states no fact showing that the taxation, which the plaintiff seeks to avoid, is in fact excessive or disproportionate. It is therefore destitute of any substantial equity.

It is alleged on information and belief, that the capital of the banking partnership of Caldwell, Hamilton & Co. has not been assessed for taxation, but it is not stated that this has been intentionally done, nor does the bill negative that this may have been an accidental omission, and hence makes no case entitling the plaintiff to relief against the payment of the taxes in question.

It is, however, insisted that the bank can not be made liable in respect of the taxes on the shares, and that the collector ought to be restrained from making distress of the property of the bank. But the act of the state in terms provides that the taxes on the shares "shall be paid by the bank," and it is competent to make such a provision. National Bank v. Com., 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 354; Lionberger v. Rouse, supra. Undoubtedly the bank could be made liable to pay such taxes by suit, and no reason is seen why the collection may not be enforced by distraint in the same manner as other taxes are collected. The demurrer to the bill is sustained and the bill dismissed. Decree accordingly.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — ACCOMMODATION INDORSER—PAROL EVIDENCE.

[An accommodation indorser of renewal notes given to a bank is entitled to show by parol that he indorsed the notes only upon the cashier's assurance that the bank owed a considerable sum to the maker, who was also engaged in rendering it services, all of which should be set off against the notes, so that defendant would be held for nothing, and that the indorsement was required only because the bank wanted two-name paper.]

[This action was brought by an indorsee of promissory notes against the indorser. The case was heard upon a rule to open the judgment.]

The following facts appeared: In the absence of defendants' attorney, in the summer vacation, the defendants, without legal advice, made and filed their own affidavits, and judgment was given for plaintiff, for want of sufficient affidavits of defence. The court subsequently permitted supplemental affidavits of defence to be filed, which set forth that at the time the notes in suit (which were renewal notes) were indorsed, the defendant, who was on the original notes as an accommodation indorser, refused to indorse the said renewal notes, now sued on. He was thereupon assured by the plaintiff's cashier, that there was due by the plaintiff to the maker a considerable sum, which the cashier then agreed should be set off against the amount of the notes. He further stated that the maker was from time to time rendering services to the plaintiff, and that the value of such services should be set off against the balance of the notes; so that defendant should not be held liable for any part of the notes by plaintiff, but the latter wished to have two-name paper; and that it was upon this express understanding that the defendant indorsed.

R. Schick, for plaintiff.

The affidavit must be read most strongly against the party making it. The promise of the cashier, as stated in the affidavit, was without consideration and void. He had no authority to make such a stipulation.

(McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. Was not the alleged agreement of set-off the real consideration and inducement?)

The facts alleged cannot be shown by parol to contradict the writing.

(McKENNAN, J. If the oral agreement of set-off made by the plaintiff's agent were the consideration of the indorsement, would not a use of the indorsement by the plaintiff, contrary to the stipulation of set-off, be such a fraud on the defendant as to enable him to file a bill to restrain an action at law by the plaintiff against him?)

As a matter of fact the maker was indebted to the plaintiff largely in excess of the note, for another account, and the cashier had no right to agree to apply the set-off against this debt.

(McKENNAN, J. Granted that position as between the maker and the plaintiff, but how does it alter the defendant's equitable right, as between himself and the plaintiff, to have the set-off made as agreed upon?)

A. Sidney Biddle and M. P. Henry (with whom were James and Bartholomew, of Schuylkill county), contra, were not called on.

THE COURT (McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, and CADWALADER, District Judge) ordered that the judgment be opened, and that the case be tried before a jury.

CHECK—ALTERATION OF—INDORSEMENT.

1. Where A. gives his check to B. for $10, and B. raises that to $100 by the addition of a cipher to the ten, and B. then deposits the check with his banker, and his banker in the due course of business collects the check from A.'s banker, each party has a reclamation against the other till it falls upon the party who is to blame in the transaction. The loss must fall finally upon the party who stands nearest in relation to the party who committed the offence.

2. Where a bank, by indorsing the draft which was raised by their depositor and deposited with them, gave it a credit upon which the plaintiff paid, it was held, that there could be a recovery.

At law.

BLODGETT, District Judge. These two cases were submitted to the court for trial without a jury. I have not time to give an elaborate opinion, but from the facts in the case I am satisfied that the plaintiffs ought to recover; mainly from the consideration that I think the defendant bank by indorsing the draft which was raised by their depositor and deposited with them gave it a credit upon which the plaintiffs undoubtedly paid.

The point was made upon the trial that the drawer and drawee of this bank were guilty of negligence, and such negligence as released the defendant by reason of their not using proper precautions to prevent drafts from being raised, the drafts being drawn for $25.23 and raised to $2,500.23, but I think that was an obligation equally upon them. The defendant put this draft in circulation, and it was equally bound with the plaintiffs to see to it that proper precautions had been used to prevent the draft from being mutilated or altered as well as the plaintiffs, the drawees of the draft. I take it that if A. gives his check to B. for $10, and B. raises that to $100 by the addition of a cipher to the ten, and B. then deposits the check with his banker, and his banker in the due course of business collects the check from A.'s banker, that each party has a reclamation against the other till it falls upon the party who is to blame in the transaction. And it was the misfortune of the Third National Bank, in this case, that their depositor, who seems to have been the party who manipulated these alterations in these checks, is not to be found. The loss must fall finally upon the party who stands nearest in relation to the party who committed the offense. I can see no other solution of a difficulty of this kind. It strikes me that the authorities cited on the part of the plaintiffs are sufficiently in point to sustain this view of the case, although, of course, they are like any other case, or nearly every other case, that arises in a court of justice, not on precisely all-fours. Judgment for plaintiffs.

CONSTRUCTION OF BANK CHARTER—POWER TO RECEIVE SPECIAL DEPOSITS—CASE IN JUDGMENT.

1. The Citizens' Bank of Topeka, Kansas, was chartered, with power, among other things, "to carry on the business of receiving money on deposit, and to allow interest thereon, giving to the person depositing credit therefor." Held, that this language did not confer upon the bank the power to receive special deposits.

2. The plaintiff caused an attachment to be levied upon the cattle of a debtor, and subsequently agreed to permit him to drive them to the Indian Territory, the plaintiff assuming the risk of any other creditor attaching the cattle, before they should arrive at their destination, not later than November 27; in consideration of which the debtor executed, with others, a note, which, together with a sum of money, he deposited with the defendant bank, subject to the condition that if the cattle should be attached before they reached the Indian country, by other creditors of the debtor, and before November 27, then the note and money were to be handed back to Johnson, one of the makers. If, however, the cattle were not so attached, then the note and money were to be delivered to the plaintiff. A sham attachment was sued out and levied on the cattle while en route for the Indian country; and thereupon the cashier of the defendant bank was induced to deliver the note and money to Johnson. Held, that the cashier acted in a position analogous to that of a stakeholder; that in so doing he was not acting within the scope of his implied authority; that the bank could not legally undertake such a transaction; it was ultra vires, and therefore the bank was not bound.

Motion for a new trial. In the month of November, 1874, the First National Bank of Manhattan levied an attachment on a lot of cattle belonging to Andrew Wilson, taken for a debt owing by Wilson to the bank. Thereupon Wilson and the Manhattan Bank made an arrangement in substance as follows: The bank was to release its attachment on the cattle, and Wilson was to be permitted to drive them to the Indian country, and the bank to take the risk of any other creditor of Wilson attaching said stock before it arrived at its destination, not later than November 27, and in consideration thereof Wilson was to make a note for the sum of $6,424, with certain other names to it, and this note, together with $750 in money, was to be placed, and was placed, in the hands of J. Thomas, cashier of the Citizens' Bank of Topeka, to be held under certain instructions, and to be paid over to either the Manhattan Bank or to E. Johnson, one of the signers on the note, as the following contingency might determine, to-wit: If the cattle should be attached before they reached the Indian country by Wilson's creditors, and before November 27th, then said cashier was to deliver the note and money back to Johnson. If, however, the cattle were not so attached, then the note and money were to be delivered to the said First National Bank. Under this arrangement the cattle were turned over to Wilson and Johnson; and those parties, in order to cheat and defraud the said First National Bank, while said cattle were en route for the Indian country, got up a sham attachment, and pretended to have the sheriff of Sumner county seize said cattle, and thereon induced Mr. Thomas, cashier of the Citizens' Bank, on the strength of said attachment, to deliver back to them the said note and money. The evidence showed that the attachment was a mere sham; that the cattle were all the time held by Wilson and Johnson, and were safely got into the Indian country; and that Mr. Thomas was warned by the attorney of the Manhattan Bank before delivering the deposit, that such was the case, and was cautioned not to pay the deposit to Johnson or Wilson. The agreement was not in writing, nor did the cashier give any receipt for said deposit, nor was any consideration to be paid the said cashier or the Citizens' Bank. After the delivery of the note and money as aforesaid, and in March, 1875, the plaintiff, the First National Bank of Manhattan, brought this suit against the Citizens' Bank to recover the value of the note and money; and at the April term of this court the case was tried before a jury, and plaintiff obtained a verdict against defendant for $7,200.

G. C. Clemens, for plaintiff.
W. P. Douthitt, for defendant.

FOSTER, District Judge (after stating the facts as above). The question presented by this motion is briefly this: Did Mr. Thomas, the cashier of the defendant bank, act within the scope of his authority as such cashier in this transaction? In other words, did the Citizens' Bank become liable to the Manhattan Bank by reason of the action of said cashier? The defendant bank was organized under an act of the legislature of the state of Kansas. Gen. St. p. 225, § 127. The law gives the power to the bank, among other things, to "carry on the business of receiving money on deposit, and to allow interest thereon, giving to the person depositing credit therefor."

The question resolves itself into two points: 1. Had the bank the power under its charter to receive special deposits? 2. Was this a special deposit?

1. The law is well and definitely settled that a corporation is a creature of the law, and possesses only such powers as the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly or incidentally thereto. Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 636; Perrine v. Canal Co., 9 How. [50 U. S.] 172. The act of incorporation is to them an enabling act; it gives them all the power they possess. Head v. Insurance Co., 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 169. The power to receive special deposits is not expressly given by the law; is it incidental to the powers given? Perhaps I need go no further on this question than to say it is extremely doubtful. There is a line of decision starting with the Essex Bank Case, 17 Mass. 497, which holds it to be one of the incidental powers of a bank to receive special deposits. However, by several late and well reasoned cases of the highest courts of different states, this doctrine is denied or questioned. In Wiley v. First Nat. Bank [47 Vt. 546], it was decided that national banks created under the act of congress have no power to bind themselves by receiving special deposits, and no action can be maintained against the bank for any such deposit left with the cashier and not returned. In First Nat. Bank of Lyons v. Ocean Nat. Bank, the court of appeals of New York very clearly foreshadows its views, and refers to the Vermont decisions approvingly. 60 N. Y. 278. In Weckler v. First Nat. Bank [42 Md. 581], the court of appeals of Maryland held that national banks cannot, under the powers conferred by the act of congress, engage in the business of selling railway bonds on commission. By the act of congress [Act June 3, 1864 (13 Stat. 101)] the powers conferred on national banks are fully as comprehensive as the powers given by the act of the legislature under which that defendant bank is incorporated. The act of congress uses the words "receiving deposits." The act of the legislature uses the words "receiving money on deposit." It would seem that if the former words would not comprehend a special deposit, the latter certainly could not.

2. But was this transaction a special deposit with the defendant bank, within a fair construction of those terms? The object of depositing money, papers, or other valuables in a bank, is safety from loss by theft, fire, or other means. The cashier receives the deposit and undertakes to deliver it on demand to the person making the deposit or his order. There is no risk assumed of delivering it to the wrong person, and no controversy as to who is to receive it. How was it in this case? The purpose of placing this deposit in Mr. Thomas' hands, was not safety alone, but to place it in the possession of a person in whom both parties had confidence and in whose judgment and integrity both parties could rely, judgment sufficient to determine and decide when the contingency should arise which was named in the agreement and to deliver it to the person entitled thereto. The property was beyond the reach of either party, until an uncertain event should occur which was to decide which party was entitled to it, and in determining which party was entitled to the deposit, the cashier was called upon to decide which party was the owner of it—a question about which the parties might and did actually disagree. The cashier occupied very closely the position of a stake-holder, and was compelled to decide who was the winner; and he assumed the liabilities of one occupying that position. It seems to me impossible to hold that in assuming such responsibility he was acting for the bank of which he was cashier, or within the scope of his implied authority, or that by any fair construction of the law the defendant bank could legally undertake such a transaction. It was ultra vires, and the motion to set aside the verdict must be sustained.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF MANHATTAN v. KING WROUGHT IRON BRIDGE CO. et al.

[2 Cent. Law J. 505.][1]

District Court, Kansas. 1875.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES UNDER ACT OF 1875 — MANNER OF REMOVING CAUSE — APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

1. An action was brought in the district court of Kansas, by a bank located in Kansas, claiming to be the assignee of a certain mortgage, against a corporation which was a citizen of Kansas, and also against one King, who was a citizen of Ohio, and also against four other defendants, who were citizens of Kansas. It appeared from the pleadings that the only defendants who retained an interest in the suit, were the defendant corporation and the defendant King. The interest of King consisted in the fact that he was a mortgagee of the defendant corporation, and also the assignee of the mortgages of several of his co-defendants, and that, subsequently to the execution of these mortgages, he had purchased the entire property of the defendant corporation. Held, that the main controversy was between the plaintiff and the defendant corporation, and the controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant King was but incidental to the main controversy, and therefore that the cause was not subject to removal to the federal court, under the act of March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 470].

[Cited in Donohoe v. Mariposa Land Co., Case No. 3,989.]

2. The affidavit for removal, and bond having been filed in term time, but during a temporary recess of the state court, and the record not having been filed in the federal court, held by the state court, a proper case being shown, that it had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. Osgood v. Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. [Case No. 10,604] examined and denied.

Motion to vacate order appointing receiver.

Alfred Ennis and C. M. Foster, in support of motion.

A. L. Williams and Ross Burns, contra.

MORTON, J. The First National Bank of Manhattan, in the state of Kansas, commenced its action against the King Wrought Iron Bridge Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Kansas, and Zenas King, Chas. N. Rix, Geo. F. Parmelee, Stephen French, and Alfred Ennis. King is a resident and citizen of Ohio. The other defendants are residents and citizens of Kansas. The petition alleges that the King Wrought Iron Bridge Co. executed a mortgage (upon real and personal property), to defendants, King, Rix, Parmelee, French and Ennis, to secure to them respectively, different amounts owing by the company to each—as evidenced by separate notes of the company, executed to each—that the note owned by defendant French amounting with interest to over $6,- 000, has been duly assigned to plaintiff and is due, and the action is brought to obtain a judgment against the company upon this note, and to subject the mortgaged property to its payment. The petition alleges that the defendants King, Rix, Parmelee and Ennis refused to join in the action and they are therefore made defendants. The only necessity for bringing them into court is found in the fact that they, too, have an interest as mortgagees in the property mortgaged. They have no interest, and claim none, in resisting the personal judgment against the company, sought by the plaintiff. It is none of their business whether the plaintiff recovers such personal judgment or not. They need not take such personal judgment on their respective claims against the company unless they wish. In fact they need not take judgment at all against the company—even for their pro rata interest in the mortgaged property, unless they choose to formally demand it. But they have such rights under the mortgage, in that property, by way of lien, that they are necessary parties. They occupy the same position precisely as if they were prior or subsequent mortgagees. The plaintiff must bring them into court, and give them an opportunity to set up their respective claims. But when they do this, they are entitled to no affirmative relief, if the plaintiff fails to establish its lien on the property. In the latter case, they simply step out of court, with all their rights against the company unimpaired and unaffected. When A. brings his action against B. to foreclose a mortgage, and makes C. a party, as another mortgagee—if A. fails in his action, or dismisses his suit, C. can not obtain a judgment on his mortgage, against B. So much for the facts as alleged in the petition.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

The defendants Rix, Parmelee and Ennis answer that they had transferred their interest in the mortgage, and their respective claims secured thereby, to the defendant, King, before the commencement of this action, and disclaim all interest. For the purposes of this opinion, the answer of the bridge company may be stated to set up payment as a defense. The defendant French makes default. The defendant Zenas King answers, alleging that subsequent to the mortgage he purchased the mortgaged property of the bridge company (and this is admitted by the plaintiff). He further alleges the assignment to him, by Rix, Parmelee and Ennis respectively, of all their interest in the subject-matter of the action. He alleges that the sale of the property to him by the bridge company was with the consent of the plaintiff and its assignor, French, and denies that plaintiff is the owner of the note sued on. Practically, then, the parties to the action are these: The bank as plaintiff, and the bridge company and Zenas King as defendants. The bank seeking to obtain a judgment against the bridge company on its claim, and to subject the mortgaged property to the payment of that judgment. The bridge company resisting that claim. The defendant King, by his own showing, having merged his mortgage in the legal title, by purchase, but resisting the claim of the bank to any lien upon the property. It seems to me that he has thus placed himself in the position of the purchaser of land subsequent to a mortgage upon it, and that he is only authorized to resist and deny the liability of the land to the debt. On the 29th of April the defendant King files with the clerk of this court his petition, setting forth the substance of the pleadings, alleging the residence of the parties as stated above, and praying that the cause be removed to the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Kansas. At the same time he files his bond with sureties for such removal. The application is made under the act of March 3, 1875. The sureties in the bond justify in the usual affidavit. The petition is not verified by affidavit. Neither the judge nor clerk of this court is applied to, to approve or accept the bond or the sufficiency of the sureties. This court is in regular session at the time (but had taken a recess of three or four days), but its attention is not called to the petition. All that is done in that matter is simply the filing of the papers with the clerk. And it is claimed that this, ipso facto, removes the cause to the United States circuit court. It may be added that no transcript has yet been filed in the federal court, and indeed none has been yet obtained from the clerk of this court. On the first day of May, upon affidavit made that some of the defendants were removing the personal property included in the mortgage, from the state of Kansas, the sheriff was, by the judge of this court at chambers, appointed receiver thereof and took possession. It may be stated, though not material, that the judge and the attorneys for the plaintiff were not, at the time, aware of the filing of the petition and bond for the removal of the cause, stated above.

The defendant King now moves the court to vacate the order appointing a receiver, and assigns the following reasons: 1st. That the affidavit is insufficient. 2d. That the order was made without notice, and that there was not such an emergency shown as authorized such appointment without notice. 3d. That the filing of the petition and bond above referred to, removed the cause to the United States circuit court, and that therefore this court had no jurisdiction to make such appointment.

As to the first two reasons assigned, I will only say that the affidavit seems to be amply sufficient and to show a pressing necessity for immediate and prompt action. It alleges that the defendant King was already engaged in removing the personal property mortgaged, out of the jurisdiction of the court. This is also openly avowed by his attorneys upon the hearing of this motion. It is true that he claims that the chattel mortgage has become void as against his rights as a subsequent purchaser, by certain alleged laches on the part of the plaintiff. But this is denied by plaintiff and constitutes part of the issues to be tried and decided upon the trial of the action—and not to be adjudicated upon the hearing of a motion at chambers or in an interlocutory proceeding. The order can not be vacated for the two causes first assigned. The other reason assigned seems to present more difficulty and calls for an examination and construction of the recent act of congress of March 3, 1875. The second section of said act states when a case can be removed to the federal court. The amount in dispute exclusive of costs, must be $500. A certain class of cases are described, which may be removed, no matter where the residence of the parties may be. It is then provided that any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity, in which certain conditions of residence of the parties exist, and in which they bear certain relations to the actual controversy, may be removed. As to these cases, the first clause of the section provides that the suit must be one in which there shall be a controversy "between citizens of different states." This clause refers to a removal by either party; that is by the whole of what constitutes the one side or the other. The second clause states when a case can be removed by either party less than the whole. There must be in a suit in the state court, "a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully determined as between them." If so, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in the controversy may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States. It is perfectly plain that it is under this second clause of the section that the defendant King claims the right of removal. The mode of removal is thus prescribed: The party desiring to remove the suit shall file a petition in the state court, and with it a bond with good and sufficient surety for entering a copy of the record in the federal court, by its next session, and paying all costs awarded if the removal is improperly made. It is then provided that "it shall be the duty of the state court to accept said petition and bond, and proceed no farther in such suit, and the said copy being entered as aforesaid in the said circuit court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said circuit court."

The cases subject to removal, and the mode in which the removal is to be effected being thus stated, two questions arise, which will be stated here in an order different from that which would naturally occur.

First. If the case is one which is properly removable, have the proper steps been taken by the defendant King to remove it, and at the date of the appointment of the sheriff as receiver, could it be considered as removed? In other words if removable, did this court, at that date, have any jurisdiction to act in the matter? If this court had, between the time when the petition and bond for the removal were filed in the office of the clerk of this court, and the time when the record might be filed in the federal court, no power to proceed with the trial of the issues made in the case, had it or had it not, the power to act during that time, in the preservation of the property, in a case over which it had once acquired unquestionable jurisdiction? And it will be remembered that the act seems to specify the time at which the record is filed in the federal court, as the date at which that court shall proceed with the case.

Second. Is the case one which could be removed? It is believed that but one decision has been rendered in any court of the United States, since the passage of this act, which has given to it a construction—that is by Judge Drummond in the United States district court for the northern district of Illinois. It may seem rash to criticise the opinion of a judge of such recognized learning and ability. One who for twenty-seven years has occupied so prominent a position in the district and circuit courts of the United States. But it seems as though in the event of his opinion being sustained, it would be the imperative duty of congress to make haste to repeal, or at least to materially amend, the statute. The results of the construction given to it by him, could not have been foreseen. In the case of Osgood v. Chicago, D. & V. R. Co. [Case No. 10,604]. Judge Drummond decides that in effecting the removal of cases under that act, the petition need not be sworn to; that the security need not be approved by the judge of the state court, that that court need not take any action on the petition or the bond, and in substance need not know anything at all about those two important papers (the petition and bond) which have the magical effect—though the one be utterly false in fact, and the other totally worthless in a pecuniary point of view—of ousting one court of its acquired jurisdiction without its knowledge, and vesting it in another which has as yet no information of the fact. I do not care to comment upon this further than to say that if this theory of the law is sustained, a new mode for distressed debtors to obtain continuances "over the term" commonly called "staving off cases," is presented to the profession, if they happen to have no scruples as to the professional propriety of adopting it. The filing of a petition alleging a substantial party in a case to be a resident of another state, though intimately known to the judge as his next door neighbor—coupled with a bond embodying the practical principle of "straw bail," is all that is needed. If the case at bar is to be decided as urged by the defendant King, and is a fair exemplification of the workings of the law, it will be unnecessary and even imprudent for the party who desires to obtain a continuance in this novel way, to file a copy of the record in the federal court, for the chase of the adverse party, in his attempt to again impound his escaped cause, will be a more exciting and uncertain one. It does not seem that such results could have been contemplated by congress in framing this act.

In examining carefully the opinion of Judge Drummond referred to, it appears that a copy of the record had been filed in the United States circuit court. This is only disclosed incidentally, and no stress is laid upon that fact in the opinion. I can not follow the construction of the statute given, even by such an able jurist, further than to apply it to just such a case as he had before him. In this case the record is not yet filed in the federal court. The act authorizes that court to "proceed" when the record is filed. Until that time, indeed, it seems difficult to comprehend how that court can have jurisdiction. We unquestionably apply this rule to cases of change of venue, and do not consider the court to which the change of venue is taken as having jurisdiction until the record is received. If it be possible that the mere act of filing these two papers—known only to the clerk and attorney—deprives this court at once of its power to try the cause, I must still cling to the idea that until the record is filed in the federal court, there is as much power in this court to make an interlocutory order, providing for the preservation of the property, and for retaining it within the grasp of whichever tribunal the lot of trying the cause may fall to, as there is to remand a prisoner to custody after ordering a change of venue.

Is the cause one which can be removed? I have stated the nature of the action and the position which Mr. King, the defendant, who desires to remove it, occupies as a party. It seems that the controversy is really between the plaintiff and the bridge company. The defendant King is only brought into court for the purpose of enabling him to set up a lien on the property. If the plaintiff fails to recover a judgment against the bridge company, or even if it fails to subject the mortgage property to its alleged lien, King can obtain no affirmative relief. While upon the other enquiry, I have been embarrassed by the fact that Judge Drummond's opinion, in the case quoted, is so different from that at which I would have otherwise readily arrived, in this he sustains the view I am giving. In that case the plaintiff was a citizen of Massachusetts; the railroad company a citizen of Illinois. Certain judgment and other creditors were made defendants, one of whom filed a cross-bill—and the opinion proceeds to lay down the true rule for deciding whether the status of the parties is such as to make the cause removable, by declaring the true rule to be, to ascertain whether that court had jurisdiction of what may be regarded as the main controversy, and whether the other questions between citizens of the same state are mere incidents of such controversy. In that case the main controversy was between citizens of different states. In this it is between citizens of the same state. It is not at all probable that there will be any controversy in this action between the two courts. The defendant King, after filing in the federal court a copy of the record (or even without such filing, if he deems the transit complete without that step), can renew his motion in that court to vacate the order appointing the receiver. Upon that motion, or upon a motion to remand by the opposite party, that court can express its decisions upon the question of jurisdiction and removal, and I do not doubt that the views of a United States court upon the construction of a United States law, will be regarded as authoritative in the case in which they are enunciated. The motion to vacate the order must be overruled.

STRONG, Circuit Justice. In the court below this was an action brought by [William] Duncan and Brother, partners, to recover the penalties prescribed by the acts of congress relating to national banks, for charging and taking usurious interest on loans made by the First National Bank of Mt. Pleasant to the plaintiffs. At the trial in the district court [Case No. 4,135] evidence was given tending to prove that at different times the bank had made sundry loans to the plaintiffs, reserving and charging therefor interest at the rate of nine per cent. The plaintiffs claimed that interest had been paid at that rate, and that in consequence thereof they were entitled to recover from the banking association twice the amount thus paid. Numerous grounds of defence were taken by the bank, none of which were sustained by the court, and the jury was instructed to return a verdict for the plaintiffs. The record having been removed into this court, and errors having been assigned to the rulings of the district judge, we are brought to a consideration of the defences set up and overruled. It is, however, unnecessary to refer to more than one of them, for if it should have been sustained, as we think it ought to have been, if proved, it is fatal to the plaintiffs' right of recovery.

It appears by the record that at the trial the defendants offered to prove that since the year 1869, and prior to January 1st, 1873, many state banks of issue had been organized in the state of Pennsylvania under the law of the state; that they had carried on business under such organization ever since, and that the rate of interest limited by the laws of the state for these several banks, at the time of their organization and ever since was "such an amount of interest as should be agreed upon between the bank and the borrower, or customer." This offer was made in connection with evidence already given, and other to be offered, showing that the First National Bank of Mt. Pleasant is located in Pennsylvania, and that all the interest charged the plaintiffs for which this action was brought was at a rate agreed upon between the plaintiffs and the defendant bank. The offer was overruled, and it was then renewed in different forms. Among others, the defendants offered to prove "that there is no general statute in Pennsylvania limiting the rate of interest for state banks specifically, but that there had been organized under the laws of the state, in the state since 1869, at least sixteen state banks of issue, which since 1871 have carried on and still carry on business under the said organization and laws, and that by the laws of the state of Pennsylvania all of the said banks are allowed, and have been since 1871, and still are allowed to charge a rate of interest and discount of ten per centum per annum." All these renewed offers were also overruled, and the court charged the jury as follows: "The legal rate of interest in Pennsylvania is six per cent., the rate of discount allowed to banks of issue is also six per cent., and no more. It is true that there are some banks that, by special acts of assembly are allowed to charge more, but these are exceptions to the general laws of the state. Congress deals with general rules, and when it excepts banks of issue under the state laws, it means the general law applicable to the whole state, and relating to banks of issue all over the state. The special acts authorizing banks of issue, if there are any, apply only to the particular banks created by them, or permitted by them to take more than six per cent., and these laws are laws unto these banks only. The general banking laws of Pennsylvania prohibit the taking more than six per cent. discount. The national banking law prohibits a national bank in Pennsylvania from taking more."

This instruction given to the jury, and the rulings of the district court by which the evidence offered was excluded, were erroneous. They were founded upon a misconception of the provisions of the acts of congress under which national banking associations are organized, and exist. The limitations of the rates of interest which such associations may charge and take are such only as are prescribed in those acts. The associations derive no power from the states and they are not subject to restrictions imposed by the states. The rates of interest prescribed by the states for their own institutions or for the public generally, are rules for national banks only so far as they are made such by congress, and only in force of the acts of congress. The national banking act has enacted that any banking association "may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state, territory, or district where the bank is located, and no more, except that where by the laws of any state a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized or existing in any such state under this title." Rev. St. § 5197. The purpose sought to be accomplished by this exception is very evident. It was fully stated in Tiffany v. National Bank of Missouri, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 409, to which it may be well to recur. The supreme court of the United States there said: "It cannot be doubted, in view of the purpose of congress in providing for the organization of national banking associations, that it was intended to give them a firm footing in the different states where they might be located. It was expected they would come into competition with state banks, and it was intended to give them at least equal advantages in such competition. In order to accomplish this they were empowered to reserve interest at the same rates, whatever those rates might be, which were allowed to similar state institutions. This was considered indispensable to protect them against possible unfriendly state legislation. Obviously, if state statutes should allow to their banks of issue a rate of interest greater than the ordinary rate allowed to natural persons, national banking associations could not compete with them unless allowed the same. . . . The only mode of guarding against such contingencies was that which, we think, congress adopted. It was to allow to national associations the rate allowed by the state to natural persons generally, and a higher rate, if state banks of issue were authorized to charge a higher rate. This construction accords with the purpose of congress and carries it out. It accords with the spirit of all the legislation of congress. National banks have been national favorites. They were established for the purpose, in part, of providing a currency for the whole country, and in part to create market for the loans of the general government. It could not have been intended, therefore, to expose them to the hazard of unfriendly legislation by the states, or to ruinous competition with state banks. On the contrary much has been done to insure their taking the place of state banks. The latter have been substantially taxed out of existence." Certainly their circulation has been. We have quoted thus fully from the language of the supreme court, because it bears directly upon the present case and shows the meaning of the act of congress. It shows what indeed seems very plain on the face of the act itself, that national banks are authorized to reserve and take interest on loans made by them at such rates as are allowed by state law to state banks of issue in the states where the national banks are located. In reserving and taking interest at such rates they act within the authority given them, violate no law, and render themselves liable to no penalties.

The learned judge of the district court was of opinion that because it was not shown, or offered to be shown that the state banks of issue incorporated under the state laws, and severally authorized to reserve and take interest at the rate of ten per cent., or at any rate agreed upon with the borrowers, are authorized, by general law, to charge more than six per centum, therefore national banks are not. His charge to the jury was, as has been stated, "Congress deals with general rules, and when it excepts banks of issue under the state laws, it means the general law applicable to the whole state, and relating to banks of issue all over the state." In this opinion we do not concur. It interpolates in the statute words which are not there, and it disregards the plain purpose for which the excepting clause was inserted. The act of congress declares that where, by the laws of any state, a rate of interest different from the general rate shall be limited, or allowed, for state banks of issue, national banks shall be allowed the same. It says not a word of allowance to the banks by general law. Charters offered by special law, granting special privileges to those who accept the offer, are as clearly laws of the state as are the most general enactments. Until recently in Pennsylvania state banks were always organized under special laws applicable solely to each bank. There was no general banking law, and no rate of interest limited by general enactment for banks as such, and as a class. Each bank had its own peculiar privileges though prior to 1869 generally restricted to charging the rates of interest allowed for natural persons. And in many other states all state banking institutions are organized under such laws, and they derive all their powers from such legislation. Whatever authority they exercise under their charters is limited or accorded to them by the law of the state. And if we look to the purpose of congress exhibited in the national banking act (the purpose of which we have spoken), what difference does it make whether state banks are authorized to take more than the interest allowed to natural persons, by special, or by general laws? In either case they would encounter favored rivals, and a destructive competition, against which they could not stand, if they are not permitted to reserve and take interest at the rate accorded to the state institutions. In either case the unfriendly state legislation, and the ruinous competition, against which congress intended to guard, would be equally possible. States might establish banks along side of every national bank, and give them powers against which the national banking associations could not compete. A construction of the act of congress that opens the door to such results cannot be accepted as the true one. It is inconsistent with the letter of the act, and still more with its purpose and spirit.

We hold therefore that the evidence offered by the defendants should have been received. If there are state banks of issue in Pennsylvania, authorized either by general or special law to take interest on loans made by them at such rates as may be agreed upon between them and the borrowers, the defendants have transgressed no act of congress, by taking nine per cent. from the plaintiffs (that have been the rate agreed upon), and they are not liable in this action. The judgment of the district court is reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

NATIONAL BANKS—USURY—RATE OF INTEREST CHARGED BY STATE BANKS.

The several acts incorporating certain state banks, taken in connection with the several banking laws of the state, gave these banks the power to issue; the charters of these banks permitted them to receive on the discount of notes, &c., such an amount of interest as was agreed upon between the customer and the bank. Held, that therefore under section 5197 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, any national bank in Pennsylvania could take and charge the same rate of interest as any state bank of issue is authorized to charge. First Nat. Bank of Mt. Pleasant v. Duncan [Case No. 4,804]. Strong, J., followed.

The plaintiff is a national bank, duly organized and incorporated in 1868 under the acts of congress of the United States providing for the incorporation and regulation of national banks, and is located at Mt Pleasant, in the state of Pennsylvania, where it has been carrying on business since 1868. On the 1st day of October, A. D. 1875, the defendant being then indebted to the plaintiff gave to it in good faith to secure said pre-existing debt a mortgage dated October 1st, A. D. 1875, and duly recorded in the recorder's office of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, in Mortgage Book, vol. 9, page 28, which is the mortgage upon which the above suit was brought.

The indebtedness originated in manner as follows: The defendant, desirous of procuring a loan from the plaintiff, procured his (defendant's) brother, A. O. Tinstman, to endorse defendant's note for him (defendant), and defendant took this note to the plaintiff. Whereupon the plaintiff, knowing the endorsement to be for the accommodation of the maker, took the note, deducted from the face of it the amount of interest agreed upon, to wit, at the rate of nine per centum per annum, and paid to the defendant the balance in money. This note was renewed from time to time at same rate of interest until the mortgage was given on the 1st day of October, 1875, which was given for the amount then due on said loan for debt and interest as aforesaid. The total sum of the said precedent debt, principal and interest, was $8233.79. The rate of interest taken, charged and received by the bank on account of said indebtedness was agreed upon between said bank and said defendant, and was nine per centum per annum, and amounts in the aggregate to the sum of $3134.20, and was so taken by said bank between the 28th day of July, A. D. 1871, and the 1st day of October, A. D. 1875. The defendant admits that plaintiff is entitled to a judgment in this case for $5099.59, being the whole of said principal, less said $3134.20, but the plaintiff claims a judgment for the whole of said $8233.79, with interest from June 4, 1876.

The following named banks of the state of Pennsylvania have from the date of their respective charters, by special acts of assembly, been organized and carrying on business under said charters and acts in the state of Pennsylvania, and said acts of assembly of the state of Pennsylvania herein referred to by title and date of approval shall be considered as though they were each recited at length herein, and may be so regarded for the purposes of this case: An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Manayunk Bank, located in the city of Philadelphia." Approved June 14, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of America." Approved April 27th, A. D. 1870. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the People's Bank of Philadelphia." Approved February 25th, A. D. 1870. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the United States Banking Company." Approved June 2d, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Twenty-second Ward Bank of Germantown." Approved May 17th, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Iron Bank of Philadelphia." Approved May 19th, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Iron Bank of Phoenixville." Approved May 4th, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the State National Bank." Approved June 2d, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Tenth Ward Bank of Philadelphia." Approved March 12th, A. D. 1872. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the City Bank of Scranton." Approved March 20th, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the State Bank of Delaware County." Approved May 19th, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Butchers' and Drovers' Bank." Approved April 27th, A. D. 1870. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Market Bank." Approved April 27, A. D. 1870. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Quaker City Bank." Approved May 23d, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Franklin Bank." Approved April 1, A. D. 1870. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the West End Bank of Philadelphia." Approved November 20th, A. D. 1871. An act entitled "An act to incorporate the Southwark Banking Company." Approved June 2d, A. D. 1871. True copies of three of the charters of these banks are hereto attached as part hereof.

Each of said banks claims the right to issue its own bank notes under the said acts of assembly and the acts of assembly hereinafter referred to; but no one of said banks ever issued its own bank notes, and the defendant claims that under said acts of assembly none of said banks have the right to issue. And the following acts of assembly of the state of Pennsylvania, referred to by title and date of approval, shall be considered as though they were each recited at length herein, and may be so regarded for the purposes of this case: An act entitled "An act for reducing the interest of money from eight to six per cent. per annum." Approved March 2, A. D. 1823. An act entitled "An act regulating banks." Approved April 16, A. D. 1850. An act entitled "An act regulating the rate of interest." Approved May 28th, A. D. 1858. An act entitled "An act to establish a system of free banking in Pennsylvania, and secure the public against loss from insolvent banks." Approved March 31, A. D. 1860. An act entitled "A supplement to an act to establish a system of free banking in Pennsylvania, and to secure the public against loss from insolvent banks, approved March 31, A. D. 1860." Approved May 1, A. D. 1861. And the supplements and amendments to any and all of said acts and all of the aforesaid acts and the various supplements thereto may be copied and added hereto and made part hereof by either party at any time during the pendency of this suit, and the other party shall consent thereto. If the court should be of opinion on the above stated facts that the plaintiff could lawfully take, charge and receive of and from the defendant by agreement between the plaintiff and defendant on such a direct loan interest at the rate of nine per centum per annum then judgment shall be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $8233.79, with interest from June 4, 1876; but if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff could not legally take, charge and receive by agreement as aforesaid interest at the rate of nine per centum per annum, but that the same was usurious, and that the offset of $3134.20 was claimed by the defendant in due time under the act of congress, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of $5099.59, with such, if any, interest it may be entitled to under the above stated facts, either party reserving the right to sue out a writ of error.

For the plaintiff, it was argued that the several acts incorporating the state banks, taken in connection with the several banking laws of the state, gave these banks power to issue. That having the power it was immaterial whether it had ever been exercised. That as the charters of these banks permitted them to receive on the discount of notes, &c., such an amount of interest as was agreed upon between the customer and the bank; that therefore under section 5197 of the Revised Statutes of the United States any national bank of Pennsylvania could take and charge the same. First Nat. Bank of Mt. Pleasant v. Duncan [Case No. 4,804], Strong, J. Plaintiff further contended, that congress intended national banks to be national favorites; that they intended to give them the vantage ground as against state banks. Tiffany v. Bank of Missouri, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 410. It therefore gave to the national bank in each state the power to take, receive, &c., such a rate of interest as by the laws of the state is allowed to banks of issue. It is obvious that the mere fact of the state banks of issue being incorporated, each by a special act, or all under general act, is immaterial, if the power is given to them to charge more than the general rate fixed for natural persons by general law of the state; otherwise the state banks would have the vantage ground.

The defendant claimed that section 5197 referred to the general laws of a state, and not to any special law incorporating and granting any special privilege to one particular bank, and that as the general law, in reference to interest, limited in Pennsylvania the rate to six per cent., a national bank in Pennsylvania could take or charge no more. FIRST NAT. BANK OF NORTH BENNINGTON v. ARLINGTON.

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Feb. 25, 1879.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—RAILROAD AID BONDS SIGNED BY MAJORITY OF SELECTMEN — REGISTRATION — FOLLOWING STATE DECISION — EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS TO TAX PAYERS.

1. In an action against a town in Vermont, on coupons from bonds issued by it in aid of a railroad, it appeared that the bonds were signed by only two of the selectmen of the town, although there were three in office at the time, the statute requiring the bonds to be signed by the selectmen. The highest court of Vermont having held that, under the General Statutes of Vermont (title 2, c. 4, § 2), a majority of the selectmen had as full authority as a full board to issue such bonds under such a statute, this court followed that decision.

2. A provision in the statute, that the bonds should be registered in the office of the town clerk, was held to be directory merely, and a want of compliance with such provision was held not to affect the validity of the bonds.

3. Evidence excluded of declarations made to tax payers before they assented to the issuing of the bonds, which induced them to assent.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

WHEELER, District Judge. This is a motion for a new trial, in an action of assumpsit upon coupons from bonds of the defendant, after a verdict for the plaintiff at the last term, heard at the same time with the motion in First Nat. Bank of North Bennington v. Bennington [Case No. 4,807]. All the reasons urged in behalf of the motion in that case have been urged in this, and are disposed of here upon the same grounds, in the same way. In addition, it is insisted, that the motion should be granted, because but two of the selectmen of the defendant signed these bonds, although there were three in office at that time; because the bonds were not registered in the town clerk's office; and because the defendant's offer to prove, that, before the assent of the tax payers was executed, Mr. Park, to whom the bonds were delivered, as director of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, and who was president of the plaintiff, addressed a public meeting of the tax payers, and said, that, if they did not assent, he should tear up the track of the Bennington and Rutland Railroad, which ran through the town, and in which he had a controlling interest, and they had heard the last whistle, which induced some to assent, was excluded.

In the General Statutes of the state, it was and is provided, in respect to the construction of statutes, that, "all words purporting to give a joint authority to three or more public officers or other persons, shall be construed as giving such authority to a majority of such officers or other persons, unless it shall be otherwise expressly declared in the law giving the authority." Title 2, c. 4, § 2. This has been construed, by the highest court of the state, as giving as full authority to a majority of the selectmen as the full board would have, to issue bonds like these, under a like statute. First Nat. Bank v. Town of Concord, 50 Vt. 257. That construction is sufficient for and binding upon this court, as if it was a part of the statute itself, even if there would be any fair question about it otherwise. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 175; Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 599.

By this act (No. 1) of the Special Session Laws of Vermont, 1867, these towns were authorized and empowered to subscribe for, purchase and acquire, upon the conditions in the act specified, the bonds of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company. The conditions specified were, that no such subscription, purchase or contract should be made, unless the assent in writing thereto of a majority of the tax payers, both in number and amount of tax, should be obtained, to be certified to by the commissioners named in the assent, of which fact the law further provided that their certificate should be conclusive evidence. In this case, the purchase of the bonds of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company was assented to by the requisite majority of the tax payers, as shown by the certificate of the commissioners, and the purchase was made. The purchase of these bonds was within the scope of the corporate powers of the town, as enlarged by the act, and the bonds became the corporate property of the town, which the town was holden to pay for. The bonds of the town in question were issued and delivered in payment for those railroad bonds. So, they were executed and delivered upon a sufficient consideration, if any was required, and however valueless the railroad bonds ultimately turned out to be, and in satisfaction of a debt which the town had become bound to provide for. And the selectmen may have had power, under the provision of the General Statutes of the state which gives them authority to "audit, and, in their discretion, allow, the claim of any person against the town, for money paid or services performed for the town," and to draw orders on the treasury for the sum so allowed, to allow and draw orders for this debt. Title 9, c. 15, § 52. The powers of the selectmen, under this section, are held to be very broad. Dix v. Dummerston, 19 Vt. 262; Hollister v. Pawlet, 43 Vt. 425; Cabot v. Britt, 36 Vt. 349; Burton v. Norwich, 34 Vt. 345. Still, the selectmen would not have power, under that general statute, to issue these bonds, and much more would the treasurer lack power, under any general provision, to issue the coupons. The nature and effect of these instruments is quite different from any they could find any color for executing. So, the authority to issue them must be looked for only in this special act, and, when found, it could be exercised only in the mode provided by the act. The act (section 4), after authorizing the making and issuing the bonds by the towns, with coupons, for the purpose of making any purchase or fulfilling any subscription or contract authorized by the act, or of raising money so to do, provides: "which said bonds or notes shall be signed by the selectmen, and countersigned by the treasurer, of the town issuing the same, and shall be dated, numbered and registered in the town clerk's office of such town. And said coupons shall be signed by said treasurer. And said notes or bonds so made and issued shall create a valid obligation against such town, according to their tenor." This registry of the bonds would not mean a record of them at large, as the word used in other connections and places might indicate, but here, as used in connection with the requirement that the bonds should be numbered and dated, would seem to mean that the number and date of the bonds, with the amount, probably, should be entered of record in the town clerk's office. The object, doubtless, was to afford a place where all interested could ascertain readily the particulars of such bonds. There is no provision requiring the entry of the fact of registry upon the bonds, nor expressly pointing out who should procure the registry to be made. Nor is there any providing that they shall not be binding until registered. As to that, the provision is, that they shall create a valid obligation when "so made and issued." The registration would be no part of making the bonds, for it would have nothing to do with their structure. It would be making the record in the clerk's office. It would have nothing to do with issuing them, literally, for that would be sending them out, putting them into circulation, or delivering them from authority. So, the registration is not any part of what the law requires to make them binding, unless it is impliedly brought in for that purpose from usage, or in some other mode. The law of the state requires the selectmen of towns to keep a record of all accounts by them allowed, and of all orders drawn on the treasury, under the provisions authorizing them to draw orders. Gen. St. tit. 9, c. 15, § 53. Still, it has never been heard to be claimed or thought, that their failure to keep such records would in any manner affect the orders drawn, or their validity. A statute of Kansas required that such bonds should be registered in the municipality issuing them, and in the office of the auditor of state, who was required to certify thereon, among other things, that they had been registered in his office according to law, and provided that they should not bear interest or be negotiable until after delivery and registration thereof. In Rock Creek Tp. v. Strong, 96 U. S. 271, the action below was on bonds of the township issued under this statute, in favor of a purchaser, and the defendant offered to show that they had never been registered in the office of the auditor of state, although his certificate that they had been so registered was endorsed upon them. The auditor of state was not an officer nor an agent of the township, and his certificate could not estop the township from showing the fact. The purpose of the registration must have been the same as of that provided for these bonds. And it would more clearly appear to be a part of the transaction of issuing them, for, they were not, by the law, to bear interest, or be negotiable, until it had been done. Still, the court below, in that case, excluded the evidence, and the decision was affirmed in the supreme court. As the law there required a certificate of the registration to be endorsed upon the bonds and the law here did not, the bonds here, without such endorsement, would stand the same as those there would with it, when there was no registration in fact in either case. The requirement of registration seems to be directory merely, and want of compliance was not made by the terms of the act, and cannot justly be held, to affect the validity of the bonds themselves.

If Mr. Park did say what the defendant offered to prove he said, and it had the effect offered to be shown, there was no accompanying offer to show it was not true, not but that it was said in good faith, in the course of legitimate discussion. Hence, it could not affect the bonds, even if the plaintiff is so situated as to be affected the same as Mr. Park would be.

The motion is overruled and judgment is entered on the verdict.

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Feb. 25, 1879.

ASSUMPSIT — ACTION ON COUPONS OF MUNICIPAL AID BONDS—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATE STATUTE—STATE DECISIONS—AUTHORITY OF NATIONAL BANKS TO HOLD COUPONS.

1. A town in Vermont issued bonds under seal, in aid of a railroad, with interest coupons attached, not under seal. Each coupon contained an express promise by the town to pay, and was payable to bearer, and was signed by the proper officer: Held, that assumpsit was a proper form of action on the coupons.

2. The statute of the state of Vermont, under which the bonds were issued, having been held to be valid under the constitution of the state, by the highest court of Vermont, this court followed such decision.

3. A national bank has, under section 5136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, authority to take and hold and sue upon such coupons.

WHEELER, District Judge. This is a motion for a new trial, in an action of assumpsit upon coupons from the bonds of the defendant, issued in aid of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of New York, under No. 1 of the Special Session Laws of Vermont, 1867, after a verdict for the plaintiff, directed by the court, at last term.

The grounds urged in support of the motion are, that, upon the evidence in the case, the action cannot be maintained, because the bonds are under seal, and, therefore, assumpsit is not the proper form of action; that the statute under which the bonds were issued is contrary to the constitution of the state; and that the plaintiff is without authority under the law to take and hold such instruments and maintain any action upon them.

The statute authorized the issuing bonds or notes, with interest coupons attached, the bonds to be signed by the selectmen, and the coupons by the treasurer, of the towns. The bonds are under seal; the coupons are signed as the statute requires, and are not under seal. Each coupon contains an express promise to pay. It reads: "The town of Bennington will pay to the bearer," &c. It was intended to be separated from the bond, and to be evidence in itself of a debt, and to be paid and taken up as such. It is a negotiable instrument, and, if valid, constitutes a cause of action in the hands of any holder. Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539; Knox Co. v. Wallace, Id. 546. Therefore, a judgment upon one coupon, or a set of coupons, from a bond, is not conclusive between the same parties, or their privies, for or against the validity of other coupons from the same bond, unless the validity of all of them was tried and determined. Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 351. When a coupon is sued, an appropriate action to recover upon it, according to its nature, must be brought. These coupons are, in their nature, simple contracts, and assumpsit, although not the only remedy, for debt would lie, is a proper remedy. It was maintained upon similar coupons in Aurora v. West, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 82.

All questions as to the validity of the statute under which the bonds and coupons were issued arise under the constitution of the state, and not at all under that, or any law, of the United States. There is no federal question involved. This court has jurisdiction because the plaintiff has been organized as a corporation, and exists, under the laws of the United States, and those laws have given jurisdiction of suits by and against it. Rev. St. § 629, tenth. This jurisdiction is concurrent with, and, although independent of, not over, that of the state courts. The laws of the states, under the constitutions of the states, when they do not conflict with the constitution or the laws of the United States, are wholly matters of state concern and subject to state control. Of necessity, the construction given by the highest court of a state, constituted for that purpose, to the constitution and laws of the state, must stand as a part of them. A state would not be sovereign and independent as to a constitution and laws which it could not, by its own appointed tribunals, construe, any more than it would be if it could not adopt or enact them. This right of the states to have their courts of last resort construe their laws, both legislative and organic, has always been conceded. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 175. There never appears to have been any question about the right, nor any about following the decisions, unless they were fluctuating. And the decision of the highest tribunal of a state, maintaining the validity of a statute, under the constitution of the state, is always followed. Pennsylvania College Cases. 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 190; Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U. S. 359; County of Henry v. Nicolay, 95 U. S. 619. The question as to the validity of this statute, under the constitution of the state, has been before, and been determined by, the highest judicial tribunal of the state, and at a general term of the highest court, when all the judges sit together for the consideration of important questions, thus constituting it not only the highest in name, but also in ability, that can be had in the state. It would not be decorous toward, nor in accordance with the great respect entertained for, that court, to examine the grounds of its decision, or do more than ascertain what it was, especially if in favor of the validity of the law. And it was so. Bennington v. Park, 50 Vt. 178; Bank of St. Johnsbury v. Concord, Id. 257. The defendant has no rights in this behalf, except those which the tribunals of its own state, under whose laws it exists, would accord to it. The plaintiff had the right to invoke the aid of the courts of either jurisdiction, but there the right of choice ended, as to both parties. The rule for determination must be the same in each.

The statute (Rev. St. § 5136, seventh) authorizes national banks, of which the plaintiff is one, to exercise all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt, &c. These coupons are doubtless promissory notes, within St. 3 & 4 Anne, c. 9, and of this statute, both of which use the term in the same sense, unquestionably. They are also evidences of debt. The coupons, and the right to sue upon them, are all that are now in question. No intimation of any views concerning the right to take and hold the bonds is intended by this discrimination, however.

The motion is overruled, and judgment entered on the verdict.

Circuit Court, D. Vermont. Feb. 25, 1879.

MUNICIPAL AID BONDS — ASSENT OF TAX PAYERS — AUTHORITY TO WITHDRAW SUCH ASSENT — VALIDITY OF BONDS.

After a majority of the tax payers of a town in Vermont had assented in writing to the issuing of bonds by the town in aid of a railroad, and before the commissioners had certified to that fact, enough of the tax payers to destroy the majority executed in writing a withdrawal of their assent and sent it to the commissioners, without going before them in person. The statute made no provision for dissent after assent. The commissioners disregarded the withdrawal and made the certificate: Held, that such withdrawal did not affect the validity of the bonds and that the decision of the commissioners was final.

At law.

WHEELER, District Judge. This is a motion for a new trial, after a verdict for the plaintiff at the last term, and involves no question not involved either in First Nat. Bank of North Bennington v. Bennington [Case No. 4,807], or in Same v. Arlington [Id. 4,806], heard at the same time with this, except that in this it appears, that, after the required majority, or what the commissioners found to be such majority, had assented in writing, executed as required, and before the commissioners had certified to that fact, some forty of the tax payers executed, in the same manner that the assent was executed, what they called a recantation, notwithstanding their assent, which was shown to, and a copy of it taken by, the commissioners. The withdrawal of this number would leave the number assenting clearly below a majority. It is urged, that, after this, the commissioners had no authority to proceed with making the certificate, and that it was void, and that this would invalidate the bonds.

The provisions of the act, affecting this question, are, that no subscription, purchase or contract shall be made, "unless the assent in writing thereto of a majority of the tax payers * * * shall be obtained," and that, when obtained, the persons named in the assent for commissioners shall be commissioners, who shall append their certificate that a majority have assented, and that any contract made by such commissioners in pursuance of the terms of the assent, and not inconsistent therewith, shall be binding upon the town. There is no provision for any dissent after assent by any person, or for any mode of making such dissent known to the commissioners, if it should arise.

This method of obtaining an expression of the sense and will of the tax payers is treated by the supreme court of the state, in Bennington v. Park, 50 Vt. 178, and National Bank of St. Johnsbury v. Concord, Id. 257, as a mode of voting, in which all those assenting vote for, and all those not assenting vote against, the proposition in the instrument of assent. In that view, when a tax payer had executed the instrument of assent, he had exercised his right of voting and voted on that question. In all deliberative assemblies, each member has the right to change his vote upon any question, at any time before the vote is declared. Perhaps the voters, in this mode of voting, would have the same right at any time before the result should be certified to by the commissioners. They would probably have it, unless the provisions for this method of voting have cut it off. Perhaps the legislature intended, by not providing any mode for changing any votes, that it should be cut off. But, if not, and the right was left, it could only be exercised in some proper mode. None of the dissenters went in person to the commissioners and made known their wish, or claimed any right to dissent. They merely executed an instrument in writing expressing their dissent, and sent that. If a voter in town meeting, or a member of a legislature, should, in absence, after voting on any question, and before the result of the vote should be declared, send, in writing, a change of his vote, probably no notice would be taken of it, however formal and solemn the execution of it might be. He would be required to be personally present, or compelled to leave the subject to stand, so far as he should be concerned, as it was when he was present. State v. Tudor, 5 Day, 329. In that case, Ingersoll, J., said: "I agree most fully, that, by the common law, every vote given in a corporation instituted for the public good, either the good of the whole state, or of a particular town or society, must be personally given. So, also, every vote given by a freeman for his representative, must be given by him in person. There is no deviation from this rule; the authorities on this subject are uniform." Even the right to vote by proxy in private corporations is not a general right, and authority for it must be shown by some law or by-law made pursuant to law. Ang. & A. Corp. § 130. Perhaps, if those desiring to dissent had gone personally to the commissioners, and claimed the right to withdraw their assent, and to take their names or have them taken from the assent, the commissioners would have been bound to heed them, and perhaps not; but, if they would, nothing of the kind was done, nor anything that would be an equivalent for it in fact, and nothing was provided by law that should, in law, be an equivalent. What they sent was, in its nature, mere hearsay. It was authenticated the same as the assent, but the law made the assent so authenticated equal to a vote, and did not make a withdrawal so authenticated equal to a change of vote. There was no law requiring the commissioners to regard, or authorizing them to act upon, the recantation.

Further than this, the law made the decision of the commissioners final; and the supreme court of the state has construed this law as making it final for all purposes, where others are concerned, however erroneously they may have acted in making it. Aldis v. Lamoille Valley R. Co., cited 50 Vt. 281. And, still further, if there was misconduct, or fraud even, of these commissioners, as their recorded proceedings were regular on their face, it would not affect the rights of a bona fide holder of the bonds. East Lincoln v. Davenport, 94 U. S. 801.

The motion is overruled and judgment entered on the verdict.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS—JURISDICTION OF EQUITY TO RESTRAIN ILLEGAL TAXES—FEDERAL JUDICIAL JURISDICTION IN RESPECT OF NATIONAL BANKS.

1. National banks may, by reason of their character as such, sue in the federal courts.

[Cited in Foss v. First Nat. Bank of Denver, 3 Fed. 186.]

2. Where no remedy exists to recover back illegal state taxes when paid into the treasury, equity will restrain their collection, the plaintiff being otherwise without adequate remedy at law; and equity, having jurisdiction in such a case, will determine the validity of county as well as state taxes, embraced in the same collection warrant and levy.

[Cited in Union Pac. R. Co. v. McShane, Case No. 14,382; Third Nat. Bank of St. Louis v. Harrison, 8 Fed. 723.]

3. Taxation by state authority of the capital stock of a national bank, invested in United States securities, restrained.

This was a bill in equity [against the county of Douglas and Edward F. McShane, its treasurer] for an injunction to restrain the collection of taxes levied by the commissioners for the defendant county, on behalf of the state of Nebraska and of the county, upon the capital stock of the plaintiff.

A motion was made by Mr. Woolworth, counsel for the bank, to the court, Mr. Justice Miller presiding, for an injunction, which motion was opposed by Mr. Cowin, counsel for the county, on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

MILLER, Circuit Justice, held:—

1. National banks may, by reason of their character as such, sue in the federal courts.

2. A part of the taxes sought to be restrained being for the state of Nebraska, and the county treasurer being by the revenue law of the state required to pay the same into the state treasury when they are collected, and no provision being made by law for an execution or other proceeding against the state for the recovery of them back if illegally exacted, the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law, and equity will intervene by injunction to restrain the collection of such illegal taxes.

3. When a county treasurer holds one warrant in which he is commanded to enforce payment of both state and county taxes, which for a common reason are illegal, equity, having jurisdiction to restrain the treasurer from enforcing the payment of the state taxes, may proceed to the determination of the validity of the county taxes as well, and restrain them also.

4. The First National Bank of Omaha filed its bill against the county of Douglas and its treasurer, to have it declared that the taxes of 1870 and 1871, levied by the state of Nebraska and the county of Douglas upon the capital stock of the bank, were illegal, and to restrain that officer "from making distress upon the property of the plaintiff, as he threatened to do, and from all other proceedings to enforce the payment" of the taxes. On motion for an injunction the defendant objected to the jurisdiction of the court as a federal court, and also as a court of equity. Held, that there was jurisdiction to entertain the bill and allow an injunction.

Injunction allowed.

NOTE.—Suits by National Banks in Federal Courts: Mr. District Judge Welker, of the northern district of Ohio, in the case of Commercial Bank of Cleveland v. Simmons [Case No. 3,062], has recently decided that a national bank may sue in the United States circuit court of the district where the bank is located, upon notes endorsed to it by the payee, though the defendant is a resident of the same district. The United States circuit court for the eastern district of Missouri, at the March term, 1875 (present Dillon, Circuit Judge, and Treat, District Judge), decided the same point. Taxation of shares in national banks, see First Nat. Bank v. Douglas Co. [Id. 4,799]. DUTY AND RESPONSIBILITY OF A BANK AS A COLLECTING AGENT—NEGLIGENCE—USAGE—CUSTOM—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. A bank which acts as the collecting agent of another bank must use reasonable diligence and care, and if, in consequence of a failure to do so, a loss happens, it is liable.

2. The defendant bank received from the plaintiff bank a sight draft for collection, drawn by the plaintiff on a third bank against funds actually to the credit of the drawer; the defendant received this draft for collection January 10th, and transmitted it directly to the drawee, its correspondent, on the same day; it ought to have reached the drawee in two days; the drawee continued good until January 29th, when it failed; the drawee did not acknowledge the receipt of the draft, and in fact the draft miscarried and never reached the drawee; the defendant made no inquiries about it until February 9th; the plaintiff and defendant both supposed, meanwhile, that it had been paid: the defendant gave the plaintiff no notice of any kind in respect of the draft until February 11th; the plaintiff sued the defendant for its negligent omission to give it notice: Held, that the defendant was liable.

[Cited in Levi v. National Bank of Missouri, Case No. 8,289; First Nat. Bank of Circleville v. Bank of Monroe, 33 Fed. 411.]

3. The usage or custom set up by the defendant, to the effect that it was not required to make inquiries concerning such remittances prior to the receipt of the regular monthly statement of accounts between banks, was not established by the evidence.

4. Under the special facts, the measure of damages was the amount of the draft.

On the day of its date, the plaintiff bank drew the following:

"$5,000. Trinidad, Col., Jan. 9, 1878. Pay to the order of D. H. Moffat, cashier (of defendant bank) five thousand dollars. Geo. R. Swallow, Cashier. To the First National Bank, Kansas City, Mo."

The plaintiff was the correspondent of the defendant bank, and both were the correspondents of the above named bank at Kansas City. Defendant (to the order of whose cashier the draft was payable) received the same, in due course of mail, January 10th, and without delay transmitted it on the same day, for credit and advice, directly to the drawee—the Kansas City bank. When the draft was drawn by the plaintiff it had more than the amount actually on deposit with the Kansas City bank, and it at once credited the last named bank with the amount. According to usage, the defendant, on the receipt of the draft, credited, January 10th, the amount to the plaintiff and charged the amount to the Kansas City bank. This was done in anticipation that the draft would reach the drawee and be duly paid when it arrived. The letter containing the draft which was sent by the defendant to the Kansas City bank would, in due course of mail, have reached the drawee on January 13th, at the latest on January 14th. The Kansas City bank never received the letter containing the draft. That bank continued to do business until January 29th, 1878, when it closed its doors, and afterwards the comptroller of the currency appointed a receiver, and the bank is now in process of liquidation. If the draft had been presented at any time before January 29th, it would have been paid. The Kansas City bank did not, of course, acknowledge the receipt of the draft, since its president testified that it was never received. Singularly enough, another draft for $5,000, drawn about the same time by the plaintiff on the same Kansas City bank, and forwarded for collection through a bank in Pueblo, Colorado, was never received by the Kansas City bank—so its officers testify.

The defendant bank made no inquiries prior to February 9th, 1878, concerning the draft here in question, or why the receipt of it had not been acknowledged by the Kansas City bank. The defendant's officers assumed that it had been received and credited, until February 9th, when, on receiving the monthly statement, or account current, of the Kansas City bank, it learned therefrom that it was not credited with the draft in question. The defendant immediately (February 9th) telegraphed the Kansas City bank that it had, on January 10th, transmitted the draft, which did not appear in their statement just received. On February 10th, the Kansas City bank wrote the defendant that it had never received the remittance. This letter being received by the defendant February 11th, the defendant at once, on that day, notified the plaintiff and charged back the amount to it. Until this, the plaintiff supposed the draft had been paid. The plaintiff objected to the defendant charging back the amount, but the defendant insisted, and refused, upon demand, to restore the credit, or to pay the amount to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff's action is against the defendant to recover the amount, and is based upon the defendant's alleged negligence, as the agent of the plaintiff, in omitting to give the plaintiff notice that the draft had not been credited or received prior to the failure of the drawee. The defendant denies the imputed negligence, and sets up, in its answer, a custom or usage among the banks in Colorado, to the effect that in transmitting bank checks and drafts to correspondents, on whom they are drawn, it was usual and customary to await, for advices, the regular and usual monthly statement, and that such custom or usage did not require the defendant to make any inquiries concerning such remittances prior to the receipt of the regular monthly statement. The replication denies the existence of any such custom or usage, or any knowledge thereof, by the plaintiff.

A jury was waived, and on the trial to the court the facts appeared substantially as above set forth.

Wells, Smith & Macon, for plaintiff.
Sayre, Butler & Wright, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff treats the defendant as its agent to collect the draft in question, and the ground of the action is the alleged negligent omission of duty on the part of the defendant, resulting in loss to the plaintiff. I have fully examined the adjudged cases relating to the duty and responsibility of a bank which undertakes to act as a collecting agent for its customers, or for other banks. They clearly show that the defendant bank ought to have ascertained, within a reasonable time, whether the draft transmitted had been received by its correspondent; and if not, to have advised the plaintiff thereof. The practice of banks to send such checks or drafts directly to the drawee (as in this case), is attended with some obvious additional peril, and does not weaken, if, indeed, it does not increase, the diligence required of the collecting bank in respect to inquiry and notice. The defendant bank allowed an unreasonable time to elapse before it made inquiry concerning the draft, and more than a reasonable time had elapsed before the failure of the Kansas City bank occurred. It was this negligence that caused the loss, since it is established by the evidence that the draft would have been paid if it had been presented at any time before the suspension of the drawee, on the 29th day of January. Here, then, was an unexcused delay for fifteen or sixteen days to make any inquiry, or to give any notice. Aside from the custom or usage pleaded in defence, to be noticed presently, the decisions in England and in this country are uniform, that such delay to make inquiry, and omission to notify the party interested, as occurred in this case, impose a liability, if loss is thereby occasioned.

The alleged custom or usage, in derogation of the otherwise legal rights of the plaintiff, is one which scarcely seems consistent with reasonable vigilance, or the well known practice of business men and banks, to acknowledge promptly the receipt of money remittances. The evidence in this case showed that it was the uniform practice to make such acknowledgments. The defendant claimed that all the banks in Denver and Colorado relied on the monthly statements, and that it was not customary or usual to inquire after remittances in the interim between monthly statements. The evidence failed to show any such custom or usage common to all, or even to the majority, of the banks in Denver. In fact, it failed to show that there was any such uniform usage in the defendant bank, whose business seems to be well regulated. The cashier of the defendant frankly testifies that, if his attention had been called to the fact that no letter of advice had been received, in due course, from the drawee, he would have made inquiries. At all events, the usage of the defendant was, at most, its private usage or mode of doing business. It was not known to the plaintiff, and if it was invariably adhered to by the defendant, it was of such a nature that the plaintiff was not bound to take notice of it. It was shown in evidence that the defendant bank did a very extensive business; and it was claimed by the cashier, on the witness stand, that it was impracticable to look after all the paper sent forward to correspondents for credit in the interval between the transmission of such paper and the receipt of the monthly statement. But the evidence did not sustain this claim. On the contrary, it showed that banks in general were in the habit of so keeping their books as to have their attention called to a failure to receive advices, in order that they might institute the needful inquiries, and that it was the usual practice to make such inquiries unless upon the eve of the time when the monthly statement was due. The fact that the defendant transacts a large business cannot relieve it from the duty of giving due attention to every piece of paper it undertakes to collect. The measure of diligence cannot fluctuate with the amount of business which a given bank may do. And the defendant would not, perhaps, like to be discharged from liability on the ground, judicially declared, that it was not bound to the same degree of care as smaller banks, in transacting the business of its correspondents. I consider the liability of the defendant beyond any reasonable doubt.

Under the circumstances, I regard the rule of damages as equally clear. The plaintiff had more than the amount actually on deposit, subject to draft, in the Kansas City bank. The draft would have been paid if it had been presented in time; if plaintiff had been notified within a reasonable time that the draft had miscarried, it could have protected itself against loss. The Kansas City bank has failed. There was no evidence what dividend, if any, its creditors will receive. The draft in question was drawn in favor of the defendant, and it had, and has, the legal title thereto. The plaintiff, when it drew the draft, credited it to the drawee and charged it to the defendant, and received in turn credit from the defendant therefor. The defendant having the legal title to the draft, will be entitled to prove it as a lost instrument against the Kansas City bank, and to receive all dividends which may be declared. Under these circumstances, the defendant is liable for the full amount of the draft, and will be entitled to hold the draft as its own, or to have a duplicate if it desires. There is no other practicable rule of damages in the posture in which the case stands, and this rule cannot fail to measure the exact loss which may eventually ensue.

NATIONAL BANKS—PRODUCTION OF DEPOSIT BOOKS FOR EXAMINATION.

National banks cannot be compelled by the auditor or probate judge to present for inspection the deposit books of the bank.

[This was a bill in equity by the First National Bank of Youngtown, Ohio, against James B. Hughes, auditor of Mahoning county, and Monroe W. Johnson, prosecuting attorney of Mahoning county, Ohio, praying for an injunction and for other relief.[

The auditor of said county, under section 2782 of the Revised Code of Ohio, issued a process against the cashiers of said banks, requiring them to appear before him to give testimony in reference to persons who were depositors in said banks, and the amount of such deposits, in order to reach such sums for taxation to the depositors, and also a compulsory process to require the cashiers to bring before him for inspection the books of the banks showing such deposits. The cashier appeared in person, willing to testify, but refused to bring the books, under the orders of the board of directors. The auditor, then, under section 2783, made application to the probate judge for such compulsory order, which was duly issued by the probate judge, requiring said officer of the bank to appear before him, and bring with him the books of the bank for inspection and examination. Application was made to the circuit court of the United States for a restraining order against said auditor and prosecuting attorney, under section 5241 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (act relating to United States banks).

WELKER, District Judge. Held, that the officers of national banks cannot be compelled to present for inspection, either to the auditor or probate judge, books showing the deposits of the bank, and, therefore, defendants were restrained from compelling the same to be done.

Injunctions were issued, in accordance with the order of Judge WELKER, to be served by the marshal.

[NOTE. This cause was subsequently heard before Baxter, Circuit Judge, on demurrer, and motion to dissolve the injunction. The demurrer was sustained, and complainant's bill dismissed, with costs (First Nat. Bank of Youngstown v. Hughes, 6 Fed. 737), whereupon complainant appealed to the supreme court. On motion to dismiss, which was granted, Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that it is supposed the books of the banks contain evidence pertinent to the inquiry, and, appropriate measures having been taken to have them produced for examination, the case is in no respect different in principle from what it would be if the evidence was called for in an ordinary suit in a court of justice between individuals. PATENTS — VALIDITY — CONSTRUCTION — EQUITY PLEADING AND PROOFS—ESTOPPEL — EVIDENCE OF USE OF INFRINGING MACHINE.

1. The letters patent, No. 74,068, granted to Valentine Fischer, February 4th, 1868, for an "improvement in machine for forming sheet metal mouldings," are valid.

2. The 4th claim of the patent, namely: "Arranging the female die, G, above the male die, E or F, for the purpose of keeping the female die clear, as set forth," claims the described arrangement of the two dies, so that, having such a lower male die as E or F is, the female die shall be above the male die, and thus be kept clear, resulting in keeping both dies clear, instead of having the female die below, in a position to be clogged and mar the work, even though the upper male die should clear itself.

[Explained in Fischer v. Hayes, 6 Fed. 77.]

3. Where a defendant in a suit in equity puts in proofs to sustain the allegations of his answer, and allows the plaintiff to put in proofs in rebuttal, and proofs in contradiction of the allegations of the answer, without entering any objection on the record that there was no replication to the answer, he is estopped from raising such objection at the hearing.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This suit is brought on letters patent No. 74,068, granted to the plaintiff, February 4th, 1868, for an "improvement in machine for forming sheet metal mouldings." The bill was originally filed against the defendant Wilson alone, on the 19th of May, 1869. He put in an answer and a replication was filed to that answer. Proofs on the part of the plaintiff were taken in February, 1871. Nothing further was done till November, 1873, when the plaintiff closed his opening proofs. The defendant took some proofs in November, 1873. At the April term, 1874, a decree was entered for the plaintiff, by default. On the 13th of May, 1874, a written stipulation, entitled on the original suit, was signed by the solicitors of the respective parties, stipulating that said decree "shall be vacated and the taking of proofs herein be opened;" "that the testimony herein, and in this case as amended by the insertion of Gunther K. Ackerman and John Borkel as defendants, together with said Wilson, shall close by the first day of August, 1874, and that said cause shall be brought to hearing before either judge of this court, and at any place, thereafter, as counsel for complainant shall elect;" "that the bill of complaint herein may be amended by making Gunther K. Ackerman and John Borkel, both of the city of New York, co-defendants with said Henry Wilson, against whom the bill was originally filed;" "that, if said cause, as amended by the insertion of above new defendants, shall not be heard before the October term of this court, and if the defendants shall not answer ready at said term, a decree may be entered in said cause against the defendants herein, those made defendants by amendment, as well as against said Wilson, the original defendant, and that there will be no motion made by defendants to vacate the decree by default, but that an accounting and injunction may be obtained by complainant without opposition by defendants, the accounting against said Ackerman and Borkel dating from the time of the purchase by them of the business of said Wilson, in which the infringing machine or machines were used;" "that no advantage shall be taken, or exceptions made, from the fact that said Ackerman and Borkel were not joint infringers, and that the bill has been amended, making them defendants;" and "that, if at any time after due notice from the defendants of the taking of testimony, the complainant cannot attend for said testimony, or will not consent that defendants go on, then the time for closing proofs shall be extended as many days as the notice covered, or as the defendants may be delayed." An amended bill was thereupon filed, making Wilson, Ackerman and Borkel defendants, and containing all proper averments for a complete bill. It was filed in pursuance of a written consent, entitled in the original suit, and signed by the solicitor for the defendant therein, consenting that it be filed in place of the original bill, without costs, and it was annexed to such consent. A joint answer by the three defendants, to the amended bill, was filed in May, 1875. It was signed by the same solicitor who was solicitor for the defendant in the original suit. No replication to the same was filed. The defendants took proofs in June and July, 1875, and in February, 1876. The plaintiff took rebutting proofs in April, July and October, 1876.

The specification states the invention to be "a new and improved machine for forming sheet metal mouldings." It says: "This invention relates to a new machine for pressing mouldings for cornices, &c., from galvanized or other sheet metal, and consists in so arranging the machine, that but two kinds of dies for all kinds of smooth mouldings that may have to be formed are needed, viz., rounded and square dies. Of the latter, but one set is required for making all sorts of angles, while, of the rounded dies, as many sets must be provided as there are different sized curves to be represented in the mouldings. The dies are easily removed and replaced. The male die is arranged stationary, while the female die is secured to a slide or other reciprocating device. The male or stationary die is underneath the female or movable die, for the purpose of preventing the latter from being clogged or made imperfect by dirt or other foreign matter. The standard of the male die is made concave on one side, to allow the forming of three sides of a square by the apparatus." It further states that the invention consists, also, in the construction and arrangement of the device for moving the upper die. This is not important in the present case. The specification further says: "D is a standard for the lower stationary die. It is, by means of screws or otherwise, firmly secured upon the bar B, and is made in the form of the letter C, that is, concave on one side, as shown in fig. 2. The lower die E, which is a strip as long as the distance between the uprights A, is fitted upon the upper edge of the standard D, so as to firmly remain thereon. This die is conical in cross-section, forming a right angle at the apex, and may be formed on (not fastened upon) the standard D, as part of the same, as it need never be removed. When rounded dies, F, are used, they are laid upon this die E, (as in fig. 3,) they being recessed on their under side for the purpose of fitting the die E. The upper die, G, which is of the same length as the lower die, and which is provided with a concave under side that corresponds to the shape of the lower die, (as in figs. 2 and 3,) is provided, at its upper surface, with two or more projecting pins, a a, which are perforated, and which serve as a means for fastening the die to a pendent bar, H, of nearly the same length as the die." Mechanism is described, by which the bar H is moved down and up, and whereby the upper die is "pressed upon the lower die and raised from the same, as may be desired." The specification adds: "The most difficult mouldings can be formed by this machine, as is indicated by red lines in figs. 2 and 3, the standard D being provided with a concave side, to facilitate the forming of such difficult mouldings, as is seen in fig. 2. The dies can be made of steel or other suitable material, and of suitable thickness." There are seven claims. Only claims 2 and 4 are alleged, in this suit, to have been infringed. Those claims are in these words: "2. The standard D, when provided with one concave side, as shown. 4. Arranging the female die G, above the male die, E or F, for the purpose of keeping the female die clear, as set forth."

The plaintiff's expert, Mr. McIntire, in his testimony given February 7th, 1871, describes a machine for bending sheet metal to form metallic cornices, which was a working machine, and which he had seen in operation at the establishment of Ackerman & Borkel, in Worth street, New York. He says: "Q. 3. Will you look at the model, complainant's Exhibit B, and state what it represents? A. I have examined the model marked complainant's Exhibit B. It represents a machine adapted to bending sheet metal to form metallic cornices. Q. 4. Have you ever seen a machine in operation constructed like said model; and, if yea, when and where and by whom? A. I have seen a working machine in operation at the establishment of Messrs. Ackerman & Borkel, No. —— Worth street, New York city, which was constructed and operated similarly to said model, complainant's Exhibit B. Q. 5. Please look at complainant's Exhibit C, and state what it represents? A. It represents a true, full-sized model of a short section of a bar of solid metal, which I saw used in, and as part of, the working machine which I have before stated I saw in operation at No. —— Worth street." He then goes on to describe the construction and operation of the working machine he so saw in operation. A longitudinal round bar or rod of metal was secured in a ^ shaped longitudinal groove formed at the lower edge of a carriage which reciprocated up and down, and which groove had its apex uppermost. The bar of solid metal, before mentioned, had, in its upper face, a longitudinal concavity. It was secured, with such concavity uppermost, on a table, and the sheet of metal to be moulded was placed immediately over such concavity, and beneath the round rod above. The latter was then moved downward, and forced the sheet of metal into such concavity, the concavity acting as the lower die, and as a female die, and the round rod acting as the upper die, and as a male die. Thus half-rounds were formed in the sheet of metal. In the above operation, it is not alleged there was any infringement of either the 2d claim or the 4th claim of the Fischer patent. After the above operation was performed, the round rod was removed from the lower edge of the reciprocating carriage, and the bar with the concavity, which had before served as the female die, was mounted edgewise, and secured in the platform, so as to present uppermost an edge instead of a concavity, and to make such edge a male die, and the ^ shaped groove in the lower edge of the reciprocating carriage, from which the round rod had been removed, became the female die. The sheet of metal, with the half-rounds so formed in it, was placed over such male die, and the carriage descended, so that the ^ groove moulded the sheet over the male die, and made angular bends in it. In such position the concavity in the lower bar, being at the side, accommodated the half-round bends previously made in the sheet. When so used to make angular bends, the machine embodied the inventions covered by the 2d claim and by the 4th claim of the plaintiff's patent, containing the same arrangement of the female die over the male die that is covered by the 4th claim, and the concave side of the male die being a substantial equivalent for the standard with one concave side, covered by the 2d claim. The foregoing testimony of Mr. McIntire was given before Ackerman and Borkel were made defendants. In November, 1873, it was admitted on the record, by the counsel for the defendant, (Wilson then being the only defendant,) "that the machine mentioned by the witness McIntire, in answer to question 4, had been used by the defendant since the date of the patent upon which this suit was brought, and before the commencement of this suit." After Ackerman and Borkel were made defendants, the plaintiff put in no direct testimony to show that they had ever used the infringing machine.

The defendants now contend, that there can be no decree against Ackerman and Borkel, because, (1) no replication has been filed to their answer; (2) because the use proved is a use by Wilson alone, and not a use by Ackerman and Borkel, or either of them. It is contended, that the evidence taken before Ackerman and Borkel were made defendants cannot be read against them, and that the patent is not, in fact, in evidence against them.

As to the replication, the putting in of proofs by the defendants to sustain the allegations of their joint answer, after such answer was filed, and their allowing the plaintiffs to put in proofs in rebuttal, and proofs in contradiction of the allegations of such joint answer, without entering any objection on the record that there was no replication to such joint answer, estops the defendants from now raising such objection.

As to the other objection, the reference in the stipulation of May 13th, 1874, signed by the solicitor on behalf of Ackerman and Borkel as well as on behalf of Wilson, (and under which Ackerman and Borkel put in their answer,) to the fact that they had bought "the business of said Wilson in which the infringing machine or machines were used," and that the accounting against them was to date from the time of such purchase, and that they were to be enjoined, and that they were not to object that they had not infringed jointly with Wilson, taken in connection with the fact, that, in the joint answer, which is sworn to by Borkel, the machine charged in the bill as infringing is spoken of as "the machine used by these defendants," is sufficient prima facie evidence of the use of the machine by Ackerman and Borkel.

The defendants claim to have shown that the machine used by Wilson, and sold by him to Ackerman and Borkel, embodied the 2d and 4th claims of the plaintiff's patent, before the plaintiff made the inventions. But, the whole evidence of the witness Conolly, taken together, shows that such machine did not embody either of those claims until after the plaintiff completed, and put into the shape of a model, the inventions covered by those claims.

The plaintiff's lower or male die, whether E, forming a right angle at the apex, or F, a rounded die on the upper surface, is of such a form that it cannot be "clogged or made imperfect by dirt or other foreign matter." This being so, it is apparent, that, if the female die is placed above the male die, so that the female die cannot be "clogged or made imperfect by dirt or other foreign matter," the resulting smooth sheet metal mouldings will not have their surface marred by the interposition of dirt or foreign matter between the dies. Mr. McIntire, the plaintiff's expert, testifies, that the state of the art, prior to the plaintiff's invention, was, that, so far as he knows, all machines had been made with the dies so arranged that opportunity was afforded for the collection of dirt, chips, &c., in or about the lower die; that the consequence was more or less injury to the dies, and imperfection in the work produced; that the plaintiff, in fact, arranged the female die, as shown and described, over a male die which had no concavities or surrounding hollows in which any "dirt or other foreign matter" could collect; and that, merely placing the female die over the male die would not effect the objects of the invention, unless the male die were so made and arranged as to afford no chance for the collection of dirt that would destroy the perfection of the work. This testimony is not contradicted. In view of it, and of the fact that the 4th claim claims "arranging the female die, G, above the male die, E or F, for the purpose of keeping the female die clear, as set forth," and, as the object of the invention would not be attained by putting the female die above, and thus keeping it clear, if the male die were one so arranged as to retain dirt or foreign matter in or about it, the proper construction of the claim is, that it claims the described arrangement of the two dies, so that, having such a lower male die as E or F is, the female die shall be above the male die, and thus be kept clear, resulting in keeping both dies clear, instead of having the female die below in a position to be clogged and mar the work, even though the upper male die should clear itself. In this view, nothing is shown that affects the novelty of the 4th claim. In the J. S. Beach patent, though the female die is above, dirt can collect in the working parts of the lower die. The plaintiff's 4th claim is not anticipated by the Seely patent, or by either of the Lamplugh patents, or by the Worthen and Renwick patent, or by the Johnson patent, or by anything else put in evidence. Nor is the novelty of the plaintiff's 2d claim affected by any of the above patents, or by any other evidence.

There must be the usual decree for the plaintiff.

COLLISION — STEAM AND SAIL—DUTY OF STEAMER IN—THOROUGHFARE OF VESSELS AT NIGHT.

[1. The running of a steamer in a thoroughfare of vessels, and in the darkness, with no more precaution than is usual in the daytime, raises an inference that she could have discovered an approaching vessel in time to avoid collision.]

[2. A night of unusual darkness demands extraordinary diligence on the part of a steamer in guarding against collision with sailing vessels.]

[3. Negligence in lying in the track of a vessel gives rise to the same degree of liability for collision as any other fault.]

[This was a libel for collision by Joseph Fish and others, owners of the schooner Sarah Emma, against the steamship Black Warrior (the New York & Alabama Steamship Company, claimants).]

E. H. Owen and E. C. Benedict, for libellants.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

The schooner Sarah Emma and the steamship came in collision in the evening of November 16, 1852, near Barnegat, and, the schooner being sunk by the collision, her owners bring this suit to recover their damages. The wind at the time was about W. by N. The schooner was going about three knots an hour, close-hauled, heading about S. S. W., with lights set, and a competent look-out. The steamer was heading N. by E., bound into New-York, going about nine knots an hour. Each party alleges that the other vessel, at the time she was discovered, was inshore of their own. When the schooner was discovered by the steamer, the steamer's helm was immediately put a-port, and she claims that the schooner improperly starboarded her helm, and thereby threw herself under the bows of the steamer, in the act of hauling further away from her.

The following points were decided by THE COURT: First. That the steamship was running with no more than ordinary precautions, such as she used even in the daytime, and upon her own proofs, was in a thoroughfare of vessels; and she becomes thereby chargeable with the responsibility of proving that she could not have discovered the schooner sooner than she did, and after discovering her, could not, with the exercise of the utmost diligence, avoid her. Second. That the testimony is so balanced as to whether the schooner or the ship was inshore of the other, when the light of the schooner was first seen on the ship, that the court must consider that point undecided by the evidence. But it is proved that the schooner was running close-hauled on the wind, with her sails flat aft, and held that course until the collision, or so near it as to leave her without responsibility for any change of her direction, which might have occurred in the alarm and confusion incident to the inevitable striking together of the two. Third. That the testimony in respect to the state of the atmosphere, whether starlight and moonlight, or cloudy and dark, is so contradictory as to leave it doubtful if the schooner could be discerned a sufficient distance off, without her displaying a light, to be safely cleared by the steamer. Yet, taking the evidence from the ship as most reliable in this particular, and that the night was so obscure and dark as to prevent the hull or sails of the schooner from being discovered more than a quarter of a mile from the steamer, the duty was imposed upon the latter to employ extraordinary diligence in increasing her look-outs, in placing her engine under strict supervision, and so manning the deck that the utmost promptitude might be secured in discovering danger and using the power of the ship to stop her headway and recede from it, or to be turned out of its way when it made its appearance, and that the steamer has failed to show any such preparations on her part. Fourth. That it was the right and duty of the schooner to hold the course she was running when the ship was known to be approaching her, and there is no satisfactory evidence on the part of the steamer that the obligation was not observed by the schooner. The ship had no knowledge of that course until the hull and sails of the schooner came in sight, and then she was heading south by east, and she is not charged by the proofs with deviating from it, other than being southeast at the moment of striking. Her general course was on the wind, and there is no proof that a variation from south and east to southeast, if made, disconcerted any manoeuvre of the steamer, or produced the collision; and the proof that the steamer turned off more east several points, and going in that new direction, then received the blow at right angles, would indicate that the schooner was only east of south, and would corroborate her evidence that she did not change her course until the instant of striking. Fifth. It is plain upon the proofs that the speed of the steamer would have enabled her, by starboarding or porting her helm, when the light of the schooner was first seen, to have gone safely clear of her; and that the collision was caused by allowing the steamer to approach too near her before taking the appropriate measures for keeping her out of the way. Sixth. That the steamer is responsible to the same degree for placing herself, unjustifiably, across the schooner's track, although she thus receives the blow from the latter, and does not inflict one by her direct motion, as she would do, if propelled upon the schooner. Seventh. That the collision cannot properly be adjudged an inevitable accident, because the steamer had notice by the schooner's light, in time enough to avoid her, and the collision was caused by the delay of the steamer to act upon that warning. Eighth. The court does not now consider and determine whether the loss of the vessel was a necessary consequence of the collision, or resulted from the blamable negligence or misconduct of her officers and crew. That particular will be matter of inquiry on the reference to ascertain the damages sustained.

Decree for libellants accordingly, with a reference.

Case No. 4,813a.

FISH v. FOND DU LAC.

[12 Reporter, 295.][1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. July 12, 1881.

FEDERAL COURTS — QUESTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATE DECISIONS.

A federal court, when determining the rights of parties under a state law, will never, in a doubtful case, adjudge the statute to be in conflict with the state constitution, unless sustained by some distinct adjudication of the highest court of the state.

Action by the holders of coupons attached to certain bonds issued by the city of Fond du Lac in payment of a subscription made by the city to the capital stock of a railway company now known as the Northwestern Union Railway Company. The subscription was authorized by a statute (March 21, 1871) of Wisconsin which contained no restriction as to amount [Laws Wis. 1871, p. 841]; the terms, conditions, and amount of the subscription being, however, previously set forth in a written proposition by the company, and approved by a popular vote at an election duly called. It was contended that the statute was in conflict with section 3, art. 11 of the state constitution, as follows: "It shall be the duty of the legislature and they are hereby empowered to provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages, and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments and taxation, and in contracting debts by such municipal corporations."

HARLAN, Circuit Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: In support of the proposition that the act of 1871 is repugnant to the constitutional provision, and therefore void, we are referred to Foster v. City of Kenosha, 12 Wis. 688, decided in the year 1860, and to Fisk v. City of Kenosha, 26 Wis. 23, decided in 1870. (His honor then read from the opinion in the first case, and continued:) I have read somewhat fully from the opinion in Foster v. City of Kenosha, because upon that case counsel for the city mainly rely. Now it is quite clear, to my mind, that the supreme court of Wisconsin has not gone so far as the learned counsel for the city contends that it has. The point there decided was that the legislature could not, constitutionally, confer upon a municipal corporation authority to contract debts, without limit as to amount, as well as without any other restriction as to purposes than the judgment of a common council, sustained by a majority of voters, that the common interest of the municipality will be thereby promoted and secured. The court held that "such unlimited power of taxation, such unrestrained ability to contract corporate indebtedness," embracing, as it did, purposes confessedly non-municipal, was inconsistent with the object and design of imposing upon the legislature the duty of restricting municipal powers "so as to prevent abuses in assessments and taxation, and in contracting debts." That decision by no means justifies the conclusion that the legislature may not authorize a municipal subscription to the capital stock of one designated railroad company, without limit, in one sense, as to amount, but yet to be made only after and in accordance with a formal written proposition by the company, setting forth as well the amount desired to be subscribed, as the terms of the subscriptions, and also after the approval of such proposition by a majority of legal votes cast at an election called and held to pass upon that specific proposition. In the act of March 21, 1871, the purpose of the subscription therein authorized was distinctly stated, namely, to aid in the construction of a railroad in which the city of Fond du Lac had a business or commercial interest; whereas, the charter of the city of Kenosha did not limit taxation and indebtedness to municipal purposes. This difference between the present case and that case is very material. Consequently I do not feel authorized by anything involved or decided in Foster v. City of Kenosha to hold that the legislature of Wisconsin, in passing the act of 1871, transcended the limits by the fundamental law of the state. Nor does the subsequent case of Fisk v. City of Kenosha condemn the act of 1871 as unconstitutional. That case involved a construction of the same section of the charter of Kenosha as the one referred to in Foster v. City of Kenosha, and the court does nothing more than affirm its previous ruling. I do not, therefore, feel obliged, by anything in the decision of the state court, to adjudge that the legislature, in the act of 1871, exercised powers forbidden by the constitution of Wisconsin. In considering this question I have not forgotten what was said by the supreme court of the United States, when required, in Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 128, to determine whether the legislature of Georgia had, in a particular enactment, violated the constitution of that state. The court there said, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall, that "the question, whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the constitution, is at all times a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case." The more recent decisions of the same court justify me, I think, in saying that a federal court, when determining the rights of parties under a state law, will never in a doubtful case adjudge such law to be in conflict with the state constitution, unless sustained in so doing by some distinct adjudication of the highest court of the state. Judgment for plaintiff.

FISH et al. v. The GEORGE THOMAS.

[Betts. Scr. Bk. 561.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 18, 1857.

BOTTOMRY—FREIGHT EARNINGS—ROUND VOYAGE.

[A voyage to a foreign port, there to discharge cargo; thence to another foreign port, there to take cargo; thence to a domestic port, —is continuous with respect to liability of freight moneys to satisfy a bottomry bond given for repairs in the first part of the voyage.]

[In admiralty. Libel by James D. Fish and others against the bark George Thomas and her freight to recover upon a bottomry bond.]

This was a libel upon bottomry bond. The vessel sailed from Boston, bound thence to Havana, there to discharge her outward cargo, and to go thence to Sagua la Grande for a cargo, and thence to a port in the United States. On her outward voyage she was dismasted, and put into Key West for repairs, to cover which this bond was given by the master. The vessel on being sold did not bring enough to cover it, and the libelant claims to recover the balance out of the freight moneys received on the voyage round from Havana to the United States, while the claimant insisted that Havana was to be deemed the terminus of the voyage for which the master had power to bind the cargo and freight.

HELD BY THE COURT: That the voyage was a round one from Boston back to the United States, and the vessel was employed earning freight the entire circuit, and this faculty was one of the interests hypothecated by the terms of the bond. No cessation of liability occurred on the vessel's arrival at Havana. That the libelants were entitled to a decree against the freight as well as the vessel.

[Cited in Greene v. Bishop, Case No. 5,763; French v. Shoemaker, 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 335.]

This was a suit in equity, to rescind a sale and conveyance of lands in the state of Maine. The substance of the pleadings and evidence are so fully stated in the opinion of the court, that it is not necessary to recapitulate them.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a bill in equity, filed by David A. Fisher, a citizen of Massachusetts, against Henry H. Boody, Freeman Bradford, and Joseph Russell, citizens of Maine, to set aside a sale and conveyance of land, on the ground of fraud. The material allegations of the bill, upon which the claim to relief is rested, are, that the defendants, claiming to be the owners of a tract of land in the state of Maine, containing six thousand six hundred and ninety-four acres, known as the 'Bog Brook Tract,' authorized one Nathaniel Miller to make sale of it; that, on the seventh day of August, 1835, the complainant contracted with Miller to purchase one undivided eighth part thereof, at the rate of $4.50 per acre; that, at or near the same time, other persons purchased five undivided eighth parts of the same land; that the complainant received from two of the defendants, Bradford and Russell, a written contract to convey to him what he thus purchased, and paid to them in cash the sum of $1,255.12, and executed three promissory notes for the sum of $836.67 each, one payable in one year, one in two years, and one in three years from the seventh day of August, 1835, and on the ninth day of November, 1835, received the deed of the defendants, purporting to convey to him, in fee-simple, one undivided eighth part of the land; that the defendant paid, at its maturity, the first of his notes, but the others are outstanding. The bill further states, that Miller applied to him, in Boston, to purchase, representing that there were some gentlemen there from Maine, who had a choice piece of timber land, which they offered to sell at a great bargain; that he intended to take part of it, and wished the complainant to take a share, and was desirous of making up a company of his friends, that they might operate on the land, get off timber from year to year, and make a great profit; that Miller exhibited a plan of the land, and stated that the lumber cut therefrom would come to navigation the first season; that, on the complainant's declining to purchase, he induced him to see one Borland, who, he said, had explored the land; and Borland informed the complainant that he had explored it, and found it one of the best tracts of timber land in Maine; that it would yield from four to six thousand feet of choice pine timber per acre, and other timber, such as spruce, juniper, and cedar, to make it average ten thousand feet per acre, and possessed all the advantages of locality and streams to enable those who purchased it to float the timber to market the first season after being cut; that it was a great bargain at $5.50 per acre, and if it could be had at that price, he, Borland, was determined to go into it, to the extent of his ability. That the complainant still declining to purchase, Miller afterwards brought to him a person named Fogg; represented that Fogg had been sent down to explore the land, and he wished the complainant to hear his statement concerning it; whereupon Fogg stated, that the land would average from three and a half to four and a half thousand feet of choice pine timber per acre, and other timber in proportion; that the advantages for getting out lumber were good, and that timber cut therefrom could be floated down to a market the first season.

The bill charges that the land was of no value whatever as timber land, or for the purpose of lumbering, because about all the pine trees of sufficient size to be sawed into boards were wholly unsound and rotten, so much so, that the same could not be got out and manufactured into boards and sold at a sufficient price to pay the expense of the operation, and that this was known to the defendants; that when the defendants contracted to sell, they did not own the land, but only had a right to purchase it at not more than $1.50 the acre, and they knew it was not worth even that price, and obtained this right to buy merely with a view of defrauding some unsuspecting person.

It further charges, that one Lewis L. Miller, having been authorized by the defendants to sell the land, applied to one Cheeseborough to purchase, and they having agreed to have it explored, Miller selected Fogg, and Cheeseborough selected Borland, and sent them down to the land on that business; that Borland and Fogg, in July, 1835, went on to the land, in company with the defendants, Bradford and Russell, and found it wholly worthless for purposes of lumbering; that the defendants, knowing that Borland and Fogg would so report, while coming from Portland to Boston with them in a steamboat, offered to each of them a deed of one undivided eighth part of the land, or a part of the profits, if they would report that the land was well covered with valuable timber, and was a great bargain at $4.50 per acre, and if they would aid and assist in working off a part, or the whole, of the land at that price; that Borland and Fogg agreed to the proposal, Borland, however, reserving the right to acquaint Cheeseborough, secretly, of the worthlessness of the land, which he did, on seeing Cheeseborough; that the defendants gave Fogg a written promise to perform their nefarious contract, and that Borland and Fogg did report, falsely, to Miller, that they had found the land valuable, that it contained a large quantity of choice pine timber, and other valuable timber, and was a great bargain at $4.50 per acre.

The bill further states, that when Borland and Fogg made the above-mentioned representations to the complainant, they were under the corrupt contract aforesaid, with the defendants; and that the complainant, being deluded and influenced by the false and delusive declarations and representations made by Nathaniel Miller, Borland, and Fogg, did, on the same day, conclude a bargain, as above-mentioned. There is another charge in the bill, concerning an incumbrance on the land, which will be noticed hereafter.

This is a succinct statement of the substance of the case made by the bill; and as there can be no doubt a sufficient case is stated, the first inquiry must be, whether it is made out in proof.

It should be observed, at the outset, that the bill does not aver that either of the defendants, in person, made any misrepresentation; the charge is, that the false representations, which misled the complainant, were made through Nathaniel Miller, Borland, and Fogg. We have, therefore, to ascertain from the evidence, not only what each of these persons represented to the complainant prior to his purchase, but also, whether at the times of such representations, each was so connected with the defendants as to render the defendants responsible for his acts in respect to this land. It has been urged, that if a third person, wholly unconnected with the defendants, made fraudulent representations, which induced the complainant to purchase, he is entitled to relief. I will not say a case for relief might not be made, resting on such a basis; but it must be on the ground of mistake, and must be brought within the principles applicable to that head of equity. There can be no responsibility for the fraud of a mere third person, acting without any authority from the defendants. And this bill states no case of mistake. It is true, that in summing up the grounds for rescinding the sale, this language occurs: "And although such gross and palpable fraud has been committed and practised upon your orator, or such gross and palpable mistakes mutually made and committed in regard to the value of said land and timber." But there is nothing in the bill to which these words concerning mistakes can be referred. No mutual mistake is anywhere described, and the averments throughout are of positive and intentional fraud and deception. I assent to the rule laid down by the lord chancellor, in Price v. Berrington, 7 Eng. Law & Eq. 254, that when a bill sets up a case of actual fraud, and makes that the ground of prayer for relief, the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree by establishing some one or more of the facts, quite independent of the fraud, which might of themselves create a case under a distinct head of equity. I return, therefore, to the inquiry, whether Nathaniel Miller, Borland, or Fogg, made to the plaintiff, before the purchase, the representations charged in the bill; and if so, whether he was so connected with the defendants, or either of them, as to give a title to relief on the ground of fraud.

And first, as to Nathaniel Miller. The only evidence of representations made by him comes from himself, as a witness for the plaintiff; and he fails to prove that he made the representations alleged in the bill. He admits that he urged the plaintiff to buy, told him he intended to purchase, and that he and some of his friends, who were to purchase the other parts of these lands, would join the defendant in operating, that is, getting off the timber. But he does not remember telling him it was a choice piece of timber land, or that it was a great bargain, or that great profits could be made. In short, he proves no material representation charged in the bill, even of the most general character, which was not true. It was urged by the plaintiff's counsel, that as he declares he said as much to the plaintiff as he did to others, and it is proved he made some more specific representations to others, and as it is apparent that, from the age of the witness and the lapse of time since the occurrences, his memory was not clear, the court should presume that he did make to the plaintiff, the declarations charged in the bill. But having been carefully interrogated, by a set of very pointed, not to say very leading questions, upon each representation alleged in the bill, and having declared that he did not remember making them, it would be exceedingly dangerous to assume that his subsequent loose statement, that he said as much to the plaintiff as to others, is evidence that he made to the plaintiff the representations charged in the bill. If his memory was not sufficient to enable him to say whether he did or did not make those representations, it was not sufficient to enable him to prove the fact that he made them; and how much he said to others, is quite immaterial.

There is some ground laid by the bill for the inquiry, whether the plaintiff was not influenced by the belief that Miller was to pay, for his eighth of the land, as much as the plaintiff; but I am spared the necessity of investigating this, by the disclaimer of the plaintiff's counsel of all intention to impute to Doctor Miller, any intentional concealment of the fact, that a discount was to be made to him, and by the frank admission, which, indeed, Miller's testimony seems to render necessary, that his client has nothing to complain of in this particular.

I proceed, therefore, to examine, what relation Borland bore to these plaintiffs, at the time when the interview took place between him and the plaintiff and Miller, on the seventh day of August. This was the only interview with Borland, before the plaintiff's purchase, which was concluded on that day. The bill charges, that Borland and Fogg, having been sent to explore these lands by Miller and Cheeseborough, who proposed to purchase them, were bribed by the defendants to make a false report to their employers, and to aid in selling the lands, by making misrepresentations. The answer of each defendant explicitly denies this charge and all connection with Borland, at any time prior to the thirteenth day of August; and they deny that Borland then had any agency for them, or either of them; but they admit that Russell and Bradford then agreed, that if he and his friends should take up the residue of the land, which Miller and his friends should not buy, at the rate of $4.50 the acre, they would give him one eighth of the land. So far as respects the denial of the bribery of Borland and Fogg, by the defendants, to make a false report to their employers, the answers are supported by the testimony of Fogg, taken by the plaintiff, who swears he knew nothing of it, and, so far as he was concerned, it was not true; and this very grave charge is not supported by any proof; nor is there evidence of any relation whatever between Borland and the defendants, prior to the time when the plaintiff made his purchase. That before the interview between himself and the plaintiff, Borland intended to have some connection with the sale of these lands, and hoped, as he declared, to make something out of it, is highly probable. That these plaintiffs had in any way employed him in reference thereto, before the plaintiff made his purchase, or knew that he had busied himself about the sale, or were at any time informed that he had made any representations to the plaintiff, does not appear. In respect to Fogg, the principal evidence in the cause comes from himself; he having been examined as a witness on the part of the plaintiff. His testimony, while it negatives, decidedly, any fraudulent purpose on the part either of himself or of any of the defendants, does clearly prove an employment, by Bradford, to give information to the plaintiff and others concerning these lands. And it shows, at the same time, a direct interest to promote the sale to the extent of one thousand dollars, which he was to receive, in case the sale should be effected for the price of $4.50 the acre. He says there was a written contract between himself and Bradford and Russell to this effect, the manner of obtaining which he thus describes: "I invited Bradford, on the day of the date of the obligation, to walk with me; he talked on various subjects. I told him I expected he was making a great deal of money by this bargain, and I would stay, till it was decided whether they sold, if he would give me $1,000. I told him I could say nothing more in praise of the land than I had already said; but I could blow up the bargain, and would, unless they gave me an obligation for $1,000." A copy of an obligation to Fogg, signed by the defendants, Bradford and Russell, is put into the case by the plaintiff; but it purports to relate to a tract of land materially different in quantity from the one in question, not identified with it by any certain description, and the answers of Bradford and Russell, which in this respect are responsive to the bill, aver that it does not relate to this land. I do not pause upon this; my present purpose being to declare how far there was an employment of Fogg, in behalf of the defendants, or any of them, in reference to these lands, so as to make them responsible for his representations. Nathaniel Miller testifies that Fogg told the plaintiff the land had from three and a half to four and a half thousands of good pine, per acre. Fogg himself declares he made no representation he did not believe to be true; that he gave a correct account of the land, as near as he had been able to learn; that he considered the land a bargain at the price asked; and that he had made his report, and told all he knew about the land, before he was employed by the vendor.

It is necessary, to a correct understanding of the case, to state that the gravamen of the plaintiff's complaint does not respect either the soil, or local position, or even the quantity of timber on the land; but its quality. As to the quantity of timber, though there is some conflict of opinion among the practical lumbermen who have worked on the tract, yet the general result of the evidence is, that the quantity was large; and the plaintiff's counsel explicitly declared, at the bar, that he did not make a question on that point; and the bill states, in terms, that it was the unsound and rotten condition of the pine timber which rendered the land of no value, and that it was in that particular the plaintiff was and continued to be deceived, even for the space of two years after he made his purchase. Indeed, it is only upon this ground the bill can stand, because during the years 1835-36, and 1836-37, the plaintiff and his associates had sufficient means of knowledge of the quantity of timber, and the bill alleges no concealment by the defendants in this particular; and as the plaintiff and his associates continued to operate on the land during both those seasons, and this bill was not filed until August, 1844, it would be impossible to maintain the suit upon the ground of a deficiency in the quantity of timber. The real cause of complaint is, that the quantity of sound merchantable pine timber was not equal to what was represented. Upon this point, the testimony of Miller and Fogg, taken together, is, that Fogg represented there was from three and a half to four and a half thousand of good pine per acre, and that he believed what he said to be true. In point of fact, I think the evidence shows this representation was not substantially correct; a considerable part of the pine timber then standing on the land being more or less decayed. But it is a very material inquiry here, whether this assertion by Fogg was of a matter of fact, or a matter of opinion merely. An honest but mistaken assertion of a fact, to another's loss and his own gain, by a vendor or his agent, may be a constructive fraud; but this principle does not extend to assertions of what are known to both parties to be matters of opinion only. And an assertion may appear to be a matter of opinion, either from its being made in that form, or from the very nature of the thing asserted. It is shown, by the evidence in this case, and I think is so obvious, that it must be taken to have been known to the plaintiff, that a representation of the quantity of sound pine timber standing on the land, was of a matter of opinion. Many persons, of practical experience in such matters, and better acquainted with these lands than one merely sent to make an exploration could be supposed to be, have testified in this cause on this subject. They differ very widely. The result may be summed up in the words of one of the witnesses, who says some lumbermen thought the best and most valuable timber had been cut, and others thought differently. The very representation relied on showed it to be somewhat loose and conjectural; three and a half to four and a half thousand feet per acre, does not convey the idea of a precise statement of a matter of fact. According to the bill, the plaintiff had just before been told by the other explorer, Borland, that the land would yield from four to six thousand feet of choice pine per acre. Such a wide discrepancy between the two persons employed to explore, and to whom the plaintiff resorted for information, must at least have apprised him that they were speaking from loose estimates. It must be observed, that the assertion relates to the quantity of sound timber. This involves, not merely the question how much pine timber was on the land, but what part was sound, and what unsound. The latter is very difficult to be determined, with any approach towards precision, by a mere exploration of the land. No doubt, some estimate may be formed; but the nature of the thing, as well as the very considerable discrepancies among the witnesses, show it to be purely a matter of opinion, upon which honest and skilful men will greatly differ.

I have examined the substantial allegations in the bill respecting the misrepresentations relied on, in order to see what their character was; whether they are supported by the proofs, and how far the defendants are responsible therefor. There are many allegations concerning the representations made to others, which are material only as tending to show, if proved, a general fraudulent purpose on the part of one or more of the defendants, and of Borland. But inasmuch as no representations by the defendants themselves are alleged, and as Borland is not shown to have been their agent, or to have been in any way connected with them before the plaintiff purchased, I have not thought it necessary to detail them. There are also circumstances in the case tending to show, that some of these transactions, with others than the plaintiff, were not conducted fairly by all who were concerned in them. It is very extraordinary that one eighth of the whole tract should have been given to Borland. It is not quite clear to my mind, that the promise to Fogg referred to the sale of another tract of land; it is proved, I think, that Borland deluded some of the other parties; but the great difficulty in the plaintiff's case is, that he does not connect himself with these circumstances, and show himself to have been deluded into making this purchase, by such evidence as will enable me to set aside this conveyance after the lapse of so much time, and after the acquiescence by him which appears; all fraud being explicitly denied by the answers.

This sale was made in August, 1835, and nine years elapsed before the bill was filed. It is true, no statute of limitations is pleaded, and the lapse of time is not specifically relied on in the answer. But I apprehend the true doctrine on this subject is given by Lord Brougham, in Irvine v. Kirkpatrick, 3 Eng. Law & Eq. 24, decided in the house of lords in 1851. "A party, say they, meaning to avail himself of the topic of time, must do it by a plea, and must succeed altogether, or, I suppose they mean to add, fail altogether. I cannot go so far as that. I, too, say that a court of equity will overleap the barrier of time to get at the fraudulent practice. I, too, say the length of time which has elapsed is not a bar to this suit. But that it should not enter into our consideration; that it is to be wholly dismissed; that as a suggestion, it is to have no effect in moulding, as it were, in influencing the frame of mind, in which we shall be when we are to consider the rest of the case, either as a jury upon the facts, or as judges upon the law,—to that proposition I cannot assent. Am I to dismiss that fact from my mind, and deal dryly with all the facts and all the law of this case exactly as if it had occurred three or four years, or as many months before the action was brought? I cannot go that length. On the contrary, I hold it is most material," &c.

This distinction, between a positive bar from lapse of time, and that lying by and acquiescence, which will cause a court of equity to look upon the proofs with some distrust, and to refuse relief unless the delay and acquiescence are satisfactorily accounted for, I consider a most important principle, necessary to be constantly kept in view in wielding the transcendent powers of a court of equity; and it rests upon ample authority, though, in my judgment, it has sometimes not been sufficiently regarded. Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 481; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 153; Piatt v. Vattier, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 416; Stearns v. Page [Case No. 13,339]; Wagner v. Baird, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 234; 1 Madd. 99; Lawrence v. Blake. 8 Clark & F. 504; Hough v. Richardson [Case No. 6,722]. The plaintiff seems to have been quite aware of this difficulty, and has introduced into his bill some allegations designed to avoid it. Their substance is, that by the fraudulent practices of some of the defendants, and of other persons having a common interest with them, the plaintiff and his associates were prevented from discovering the decayed state of the timber until the summer of 1837; and the bill avers, "that he made no discovery of the frauds practised upon him until the fifth day of January, 1839; at which time your orator first discovered and was satisfied, and felt himself able to prove, the many charges set forth in this, his bill of complaint, and has to this time delayed prosecuting the same on account of the poverty the said frauds of the defendants brought upon him, and the hope that his appeals to their justice and equity would save him from the vexation, trouble, and expense of an appeal to this court for redress." This, taken in connection with the facts in the cause, is far from being satisfactory to my mind. It appears that, in the summer of 1837, a large quantity of this timber, taken from the land during the two preceding years by the plaintiff and his associates, was actually sawed into boards; and it is the result of that operation which is now relied on, as showing the worthlessness of the timber. If the plaintiff did not then know that its quality fell so far short of the representations, as to amount to a fraud, he was either guilty of gross neglect, or there was not such a fraud as he relies on. In respect to his first feeling himself able to prove all his charges of fraud in January, 1839, no particular sources of evidence, then first discovered, being in any way indicated by the bill, or appearing in the proof, I can allow no weight to it. Such vague allegations are too easily made to be entitled to any effect. If, at that time, the plaintiff made any particular discovery, the bill should have stated what it was, and why it was not before known, and how it was discovered. Stearns v. Page, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 829. That the delay has arisen from the poverty of the plaintiff, brought upon him by the frauds of the defendants, is not shown. He has paid the plaintiffs less than twenty-two hundred dollars; it does not appear that he lost any considerable sum in the lumbering operations; the evidence tends to show that, in 1835, he was worth about ten thousand dollars, and that he was engaged in other eastern land speculations. His letter to the plaintiff, Boody, written in January, 1838, though it shows he was in want of money, does not indicate poverty; and there is no evidence that this pretence in the bill is well founded. It is not by a statement of imaginary difficulties, or unreal obstacles, that delay is to be accounted for. In this case, I am not satisfied that any thing more substantial is shown.

But this case contains facts still more formidable to the plaintiff's claim than mere delay. From 1837 down to the filing of the bill, lumbering operations have been carried on upon these lands by practical lumbermen, and so large quantities of timber removed, as to affect very materially the value of the land. During this time it has also been injured by fire. In January, 1838, after the timber, taken off by the plaintiff and his associates, had been actually sawed into boards, the plaintiff wrote a long letter to Boody, in which he recognizes his notes as due, and gives assurances of their being paid. And though he does not appear to have been concerned in the profits of the subsequent operation on the land, yet, as late as 1840, he offered to Purrington, one of the witnesses, a permit to cut timber thereon. Here is an amount and kind of acquiescence, and a consequent change in the value of the property, which render the court, through the fault of the plaintiff, unable to restore the parties to their original condition.

There is one other part of the bill which must be adverted to. It is the claim for relief, by reason of an incumbrance on that part of the land purchased of Russell. There can be no doubt that a fraudulent concealment of incumbrances on the land sold may lay the foundation for relief, by a rescission of the sale, even after the execution of a deed of conveyance containing covenants, upon which a remedy might be had at law. But I apprehend that a very different case from the present must be made. The answer of Russell admits that the land was represented, at the time of the sale, to be unincumbered, and that it was his intention to have had an unincumbered title made by the holder of that title; but that the plaintiff, with a full knowledge of the state of the title, proposed to accept a deed from him, and to rely on his removing the incumbrance, which he afterwards did, by paying it off, and taking a discharge of the mortgage. There is nothing in the proofs sufficient to control this; and it is in part, supported by the record evidence. The plaintiff has not suffered any loss, by reason of the existence of the mortgage; nor does he show that he is now exposed to any. I cannot, for this cause, set aside a conveyance made seventeen years ago.

I have not adverted particularly to some more general grounds of complaint contained in the bill. It is certainly true that the defendants were not the owners of the land when the sale was made, having only a right to purchase it on certain terms. It is true, also, that the price at which they sold, was at a very large advance upon that which they were to pay. I am satisfied that a prudent man, who knew the amount and condition of the timber standing on the land, would not have agreed to purchase at the rate of four dollars and fifty cents per acre. But I am not satisfied, that the defendants knew the condition of the timber, nor that the land was worthless for lumbering operations. The fact that practical lumbermen have operated upon it, so many years since 1835, is quite decisive on this point. These and some other circumstances, would have been entitled to a more rigid scrutiny, if the transaction were recent, and the plaintiff had approached nearer, to making satisfactory proof of the more specific charges of fraud in his bill. But, independent of the fraudulent concealment, by the defendants, of the state of the timber, alleged, but not to my satisfaction proved, they do not of themselves afford ground for relief, by reason of fraud; and I have therefore, not thought it necessary more particularly to allude to them. For similar reasons, I have not spoken of some of the points made in behalf of the defendants, and particularly of the defendant Boody. But it may be proper to state, what was conceded by the plaintiff's counsel, that his connection with these transactions was, if any, a mere legal relation, he not having, at any time, actually participated in them.

The bill is to be dismissed; and as to costs, I shall follow, what I understand to be a settled rule, that if a bill charges fraud, which is not proved, and the bill is dismissed, the plaintiff must pay costs.

Case No. 4,815.

FISHER v. CARTER.

[1 Wall. Jr. 69.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 8, 1843.

MONUMENTAL AND TRADITIONARY EVIDENCE.

1. At no time in the history of Pennsylvania, neither before October 13th, 1760, nor since, have islands in her larger rivers been open to settlement on the same terms with fast-land generally. They could be settled only on agreed terms.

[Cited in Jones v. Tatham, 20 Pa. St. 403.]

2. The court speak of acts and monuments, and of judicial and professional tradition viewed as evidence; and, in the absence of more direct testimony, regard them as an authoritative means of ascertaining ancient opinion of fact.

At the junction of the Susquehanna and Juniata rivers in Pennsylvania, stands a very valuable island called, sometimes, "Baskin's" or "M'Elcar's Island," and sometimes "Duncan's Island;"—the subject of the present ejectment. The plaintiff shewed title by residence, improvement and cultivation from 1749 to 1802. In the year last named, the Penns, being indebted to Thomas Duncan, Esquire (subsequently one of the justices of the supreme court of Pennsylvania), for professional services, conveyed this island to that gentleman. These services, the value of which did not exactly appear, were the principal consideration of the conveyance. The defence was, that admitting the plaintiff's ability to recover on other grounds,[1] yet that islands in the great rivers of Pennsylvania had never been open to settlement on what are called common terms; the terms on which lands in general were settled, and by which the plaintiff claimed title in this case. The plaintiff admitted that after October, 1760 (when, as will hereafter appear, the proprietaries took possession of a large amount of this sort of property), islands were not thus open to settlement; but contended that prior to that time they were. And this point it was which was in issue in the case.

It is here necessary to present a view of the juridical history of this subject.

In one case (Carson v. Blazer, 2 Bin. 475; decided in 1810) the supreme court of Pennsylvania decided that the great navigable rivers of the state were never the subject of riparian ownership, but belonged to the commonwealth. In his opinion in that case, Chief Justice Tilghman, speaking of the proprietary, said: "No doubt he retained the entire right of the river and of every thing in the river, in order that he might make such use of it as would be most conducive to the public benefit." Page 476.

In another case (Hunter v. Howard, 10 Serg. & R. 243, 245; decided in 1823),—not absolutely requiring such a dictum,—Mr. Justice Duncan, delivering the opinion of the court (the chief justice being absent), said, that "islands in the great rivers of Pennsylvania, under the provincial government, were never the subjects of appropriation either by office right or settlement. The proprietaries appropriated them to their own use by special warrants." And afterwards: "Thus, from the first settlement of the country, we see, these islands were withdrawn from appropriation." At the time when this sentiment was delivered, his honour was the owner of the island now in suit; and the question in controversy had, at that time, been agitated in regard to it. In a third case (Shrunk v. Schuylkill Nav. Co., 14 Serg. & R. 71, 79; decided in 1826), Chief Justice Tilghman, giving the opinion of the court upon a point respecting rivers, argued against one of the parties' rights, because if he had such rights in the river he "would have a right to the islands also, contrary to universal opinion and practice. These islands," continues the chief justice, "have never been open to applicants under the common terms of office either under the proprietary or state government; but have always been sold on special contract, and for higher prices;" and his honour refers to the case of Hunter v. Howard, last cited, "for a particular account of the manner in which islands have been granted." Chief Justice Tilghman, it is necessary to state, was born in the year 1756, and began the study of the law in the year 1772, in the office of Benjamin Chew, Esquire, then at the head of the profession and afterwards chief justice of Pennsylvania. His father removed from Maryland in 1762, and was, some time subsequently, appointed secretary of the proprietary land-office; a situation which he held with distinguished reputation for several years. Mr. Justice Duncan was born in 1760.

It appeared, on the other hand, that the point now in issue had twice arisen in the inferiour courts of the state; but that the decisions there were in direct contrariety to each other. It had also been twice before the supreme court, but no opinion was given in either case; the point not being in issue in one case (McElear v. Elliott, 14 Serg. & R. 242, 250); and in the other (not reported), where it was in issue, the court not being able to agree. The evidence of documents from the land-office made it plain that after October 13th, 1760, islands were not open to settlement on common terms; but it was not so clear from those records how the case had been anteriour to that date. The records did, however, shew that there was something like instances of the same course of general policy in regard to islands before that year as subsequently. For example: after October 13th, 1760, the proprietaries would not allow an island to be returned on a warrant for fast-land. They exacted, for islands, a price much higher than for fast-land. They did not knowingly permit settlements to be made on islands, but regarded persons who made them as intruders. They gave leases under special restrictions, but did not regard such occupancy as giving a right to pre-emption.

After the Revolution, the same course of policy with regard to islands was carefully continued by the commonwealth. See the act of 8th April, 1785, § 13, and of 6th March, 1793. While the course of policy respecting islands, prior to October 13th, 1760, appeared from the evidence which follows: 1680, June 20th. A return of survey of a certain "island" in the Delaware. This paper was endorsed: "Island in the Delaware." 1684, February 2nd. A warrant to survey another certain "island," and certain meadow-land described. The endorsement, however, had no reference to any island, and was simply "The Meadows at" &c. William Penn died in 1718; and the foregoing two were the only warrants for islands in his time. There was abundant evidence of his care to appropriate manors, or tenths of general surveys. 1754, August 29th. A letter from the secretary of the land-office to Lawrence Groden, Esquire, in which the secretary expresses his surprise that a certain person who, it appeared, kept forcible possession of another island in the Delaware river, against the proprietaries' tenant, could not be taken by the sheriff. "I should be sorry," says the secretary, in speaking of the sheriff, "to be obliged to complain against him to the governour; but I must do it if I cannot get process of court executed. However, let the writ be renewed every court, that it may appear how much he is in fault." 1754, October 17th. The proprietaries having granted to two of their agents, a certain number of acres of good land, and well situated; an island, having, as appeared by the surveyor's draft, two houses upon it, was included in the survey; but it did not appear by the caveat books, that any caveat was made by the persons named in the survey as settlers. In 1770, a caveat by some persons claiming under a former warrant and improvement was dismissed. 1758, November 15th. A warrant requesting the surveyor to make a regular survey of a yet different island, that it might be leased "on such terms as may be agreed on." Surveyed accordingly, "on the proprietaries' account." 1760, March 8th. A warrant reciting, that divers persons had presumed to destroy the timber and commit waste on another island (described) in the Susquehanna, and without any license from "us" had taken upon themselves to clear part of the said island; that the proprietaries were desirous to prevent such waste and spoil being made on the said island for the future, and that the same should be forthwith surveyed and returned "for our use." Warrant of survey accordingly. 1760, May 13th. A lease for three years, by the proprietaries, of an island in the Susquehanna, "surveyed and returned for the use of the said proprietaries." The tenant stipulates, in rict terms, that if he commit any waste, or if he assign the island or his lease without a license in writing from the proprietaries, his lease shall become utterly void. Then came the following warrant from the sons of Wm. Penn; and this document it was (the plaintiff contended) which first withdrew islands from general sale. 1760, October 13th. "Whereas during the life of our late honoured father, William Penn, Esquire, divers orders and warrants were given, &c. to survey or cause to be surveyed to and for his and our use and behoof, the tenth part of all such lands as should be from time to time surveyed and laid out in the several counties of our province. (These tenths composed what are known as "Manors.") And whereas, notwithstanding the said warrants and orders given as aforesaid, and our own repeated orders and warrants &c. since from time to time, they were not executed or observed as they ought to have been, (to our great loss and disappointment:) And we now judge it necessary to revive and renew the said orders: These are therefore to authorize and require you, as soon as conveniently may be, to survey or cause to be surveyed for our proper use and behoof (the tenth part of the before referred to sort of land:) ☞ And that in such future surveys to be made, you take particular care to survey for our own use the several unappropriated islands in the rivers Delaware, Schuylkill and Susquehanna, and the several other rivers and creeks in our own said province, and make returns from time to time of the same premises into our secretary's office for our use agreeable to the said former and this our renewed warrant and orders in that behalf." This warrant was endorsed "A warrant to survey for the proprietaries' use all the islands in the rivers Susquehanna, Schuylkill and Delaware:" and in pursuance of it, 88 islands were surveyed and returned between the years 1760 and 1770. The island now in controversy was among these, and surveyed November 13th, 1760. The surveyor's draft states that the island is called "Baskin's Island," and notes the fact of there being a settlement upon it.

It appeared, further, from the testimony of the deputy secretary of the land-office (who had been connected with that department for thirty-five years) that having been requested by the plaintiff to examine all papers respecting islands in order to give his deposition, he had carefully done so; and that although many patents had issued for islands, he could not find one case where a patent had been founded upon actual settlement. And again, that among the records of the land-office, but separate from its general concerns, are files called "proprietary files," which relate exclusively to the private estates of the Penns; and that among these files he found, when he came into the department, in 1809, all papers, with a single exception, of whatsoever sort, which relate to islands.

Mr. J. Fisher, of Lewiston, and Mr. Randall for plaintiff:

The point before the court has never been decided; nor was it in issue in those cases where we find an expression of opinion from the bench. What has fallen from judges is explained by the fact that notice was not directed to the epoch which is now proved to be an important one. The number of islands granted prior to October 13th, 1760, is comparatively small; for it is matter of common knowledge that the settlement of the state, at that early day, was only along the southeastern part. Ever since October 13th, 1760, or, in other words, since the only time the islands or their history have come to be subjects of notice, we admit what is said. Judges, when speaking on the subject, were speaking in a general way; and we ought not to seek for truth to a certain intent in every particular. It is plain that Chief Justice Tilghman and Judge Duncan cannot be regarded as speaking otherwise than in a general way. They cannot be taken as meaning to make themselves witnesses of a state of things which had passed away several years before either of them was born. They state, at best, what they derived from others; and these, in turn, may have rendered what they had learned but intermediately. How imperfect is such evidence! The speaker may have been unworthy of credit: he may have ill expressed himself; or the hearer may have ill conceived what was well expressed. In short, coming through the open channel of the human mind, all such tradition, even admitting the source to be pure, comes to us with the adulteration of imperfect conceptions, of weak motives; of fancies and foregone opinions; of oblivion and false remembrance, and of those varied springs of errour which must impart themselves to any such mode of transmitting truth. The dictum of Judge Duncan ought not to be cited at all. He could not have meant that his own dictum should decide his own cause. But all these, at any rate, were but obiter dicta: they possess naught of "the solidity of the judgment-seat." How do we find judicial opinion expressed when attention was directed to the point? In one case, the avoidance of any opinion. In two other cases (inferiour courts), one court is in direct opposition to the other: while on the first and only occasion that the point was in issue in the supreme court, there was a divided bench, and no opinion at all. Is the defendant aided by the records from the land-office? We do not deny that the proprietaries could take possession of unappropriated islands prior to October 13th, 1760; though, as we have said, few were so taken prior to that date. Nor do we deny that when once, in any manner, islands had been appropriated, they were subject to whatever terms of tenure or of disposition the proprietaries preferred. But can one case be shewn where a person, settled on an island prior to 13th October, 1760, with an intention of remaining there, was dispossessed because he had not made a special agreement for it? The only case from which such a notion could possibly be induced, is that of the warrant of October 17th, 1754. Now, there, the marks on the draft are the only evidence of settlement at all; and these were probably made by way of description and for the sake of identification. The settlement may have been abandoned; for no mention is made of occupancy. It may have been an Indian residence. It may have been no residence at all; and temporary in its very origin. It may have been made on behalf of the proprietaries. Who can say when, how, by whom or for what it was made? Sixteen years afterwards, to be sure, some caveat was dismissed; but how prosecuted, if prosecuted, or wherefore dismissed we know not. Besides, our occupancy began five years before this. The great warrant of October 13th, 1760, did undoubtedly withdraw islands from common settlement. But it is a renewal of "said orders." What orders? Orders to survey islands? Not at all; but to survey tenths or manor lands. "They (i. e. those orders) were not executed or observed as they ought to have been." All that relates to islands comes afterwards, and is adjectitious. It is a new and substantive order; and this is sufficiently manifest notwithstanding a careless expression towards the end of the warrant; by which a reference intended to apply to manor lands, is made to include islands likewise. It is manifest, we say; for, otherwise, the warrant of October 13th, 1760, is made to recite that William Penn had issued divers orders and warrants to appropriate islands in general; while the evidence shews that only two warrants were issued in his time about islands at all; both of them for single islands; one of which islands. moreover, the return of survey treats just as it does fast land. But the warrant is to survey unappropriated islands. The survey here did not follow the warrant; for the island was certainly appropriated. It was known as "Baskin's Island." The surveyor's draft thus calls it. So obvious was this appropriation that although the survey was made in 1760, no steps were ever taken to dispossess the settlers at all till 1802. The island was then transferred, not for money (for the title was not marketable), but in liquidation of certain professional services whose value don't appear. This fact shews that the Penns did, themselves, regard their title as, at least, doubtful. An island so valuable as this would not, otherwise, have been thus disposed of. Indeed, it is evident that the surveyor misapprehended his authority. His endorsement shews that he regarded his warrant as a direction to survey all islands.

After full argument on the other side, by Mr. M'Cormick, of Harrisburgh, and Mr. Mallery, the charge of the court was delivered by BALDWIN, Circuit Justice. The case of Carson v. Blazer [supra] goes far to decide by implication the one before us. It was there declared that the founder of our state, from motives of an enlarged publick policy, had reserved to himself the ownership of all the larger streams of the commonwealth;—the riparian owner coming but to low water mark. The river includes what is in the river, whether above the water or under it. And it is obvious that if any man might, at his pleasure, have taken possession of all the islands in a stream, he would have had it quite within his power to impede what we are told was the wise design of the proprietary owner. But we can scarcely regard the point as one which has been decided. Let it be examined, then, upon the grounds of historical evidence. Thorough research has been made into the early records of the land-office; and the fidelity of counsel has presented to us every thing, probably, which can be gleaned from that field of inquiry. The evidence from those records is not, we may admit, of the most direct kind. It is not wholly irreconcilable with the notion that islands were open to settlement in 1749: but this is not the natural inference from it. On the contrary: though all islands were particularly taken into possession by the great warrant of 13th October, 1760, and were thenceforth the subjects of peculiar and notorious regard, yet we do not discern any striking change in any matter connected with the disposal of them. Nay, so far as we can compare the history of that sort of property before and after the 13th October, 1760, we find that the general policy in regard to it has been always the same. Then, there is this remarkable fact: that diligent search into all these records does not afford one precedent of an island granted upon common terms, though it does furnish to us many grants of islands. Admit that what is thus stated is, in each instance, but negative evidence. The circumstance impairs not its strength; for the case is one where, under any hypothesis contrary to that which we assume, there could scarcely fail to be positive evidence: and in such a case negative evidence is as strong as any that can be conceived. In truth, it is negative in form merely, not in effect.

In the third place, we have evidence in the external order or disposition of the papers relating to islands. This sort of evidence, the evidence of acts and monuments, is justly deemed of a high order. Any mere assertion that such and such opinions were held, or that such and such facts existed, depends for its credibility upon a variety of circumstances. But an external fact, a course of outward action, performed in observance of an opinion or practice, and testifying to it, indicates a clearness and fixity of idea which can leave but little doubt of its existence. It would, to be sure, be more satisfactory could the defendant shew, affirmatively, that this disposition of things had existed from the beginning; for this would be nearly conclusive. But the presumption from the state of the papers at the earliest date to which we can reach is in his favour. They were found in their present position by the deputy secretary of the land office when he first came into the department; and no effort of the plaintiff's counsel has shewn when any change was made, or that there was, ever, a time when a different state of things from the present existed. Certainly we do know that a course of external practice no where more generally descends than in large state offices. The clerk, on his coming there, finds a practice prevailing: he is trained up in it: he follows it in his gradations upward; and when he is old he will not depart from it. Super-added to all this, are declarations from eminent lawyers of a past day, which accord with what has been already mentioned; and serve both to explain and to confirm it. To be sure, this court is not disposed to regard with favour what an English reporter styles "circuit traditions;" but we are now inquiring what state of facts existed three generations ago; a date beyond that to which the law supposes human memory ever to reach. We are without living witnesses; and in this as in other questions relating to ancient things, what can we do but call to our aid the less perfect lights of tradition? In examining any ancient historical fact, if unable to procure testimony from persons who lived at the very epoch which is the subject of our inquiry, we endeavour to ascertain what has been said by intelligent persons living in the generation immediately or almost next. Such persons, we may grant, are liable to errour; but they are less so than any persons living in a subsequent generation: And we appeal to their declarations, not, of course, as to decisions, from which there can be no appeal, but as to credible witnesses, likely to be informed on the subjects about which they speak. The counsel of the plaintiff has argued against this sort of evidence from the imperfection of the channels through which it comes to us. There would be force in such an argument were the distance great or the links of transmission numerous; but where, as in this case, the witness is separated from the time about which he speaks, only by a single generation, the channel is so short and close that truth may be supposed to reach us in almost the same purity wherewith it issued from the wellhead. It is worth observing too, that the testimony here given is, not as to an opinion, but as to a fact. In regard to the former, it is certainly true, as the plaintiff's counsel argues, that a witness transmits what he understood, or what he remembers, or what he conceives; and there may be great adulteration of truth while its outward shape and seeming is preserved; but the simplicity of notion involved in the existence or non-existence of a fact, admits scarce any variations from truth but in the substitution of another and opposite fact; a matter not to be presumed. The declarations of the late Chief Justice Tilghman the court regards as entitled to particular respect. It has been the just praise of that excellent magistrate that he delivered few dicta; and his statement of any fact (much more of one about which he was so likely, from associations in youth, to be informed) will receive from those who knew him high deference, even though the source of his information be not specially declared. Let it moreover be observed that the chief justice speaks, not only of what he himself thought, but also of that which had been universal opinion—and practice. Indeed, for much of our law we are unable to shew any visible and now existing source. It is tradition attested by monuments; successive judges and sages of the law recording what themselves were taught; was attested by external facts, and was notorious to every one: all consentient in opinion, and so transmitting to the last that which was more perfectly known to the first. We do know, however, that many matters have been solemnly adjudged, of which there is no report; and many statutes have been passed of which there remains not now a record. These remarks apply particularly to the land tenures of Pennsylvania; in regard to which many principles are perfectly settled and have long been, touching whose origin it would probably pass research to discover so much as a dictum.

Upon the whole, while the case does not offer the directest, most connected, and most conclusive testimony that could be desired, we yet possess strong leading facts on which to found opinion; and in regard to things which took place ninety-three years ago, what more ought you to expect? Landmarks remain to us: the connecting links, the cement, the filling up, may naturally have crumbled away in the lapse of a century. And it having passed into maxim, that all evidence is to be weighed according to the proof which it was in the power of one side to have produced, and in the power of the other side to have contradicted, we are of opinion that your verdict should be for the defendant.

The jury were about to give their verdict, when the plaintiff asked leave and was allowed to suffer a non-suit.

FISHER v. CONSEQUA.

[2 Wash. C. C. 382.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1809.

FOREIGN ATTACHMENT IN PENNSYLVANIA — DEMANDS ARISING EX DELICTO—PENDENCY OF ATTACHMENT PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT—DEBT CONTRACTED IN FOREIGN COUNTRY.

1. The plaintiff issued a foreign attachment against the defendant, a merchant of Canton, for the recovery of damages, to the amount of four thousand five hundred dollars, upon a promise made by him, for a valuable consideration, to deliver to the plaintiff a quantity of tea of a certain quality, which promise he had not complied with, but had broken. The law of Pennsylvania of 1705 [1 Laws Pa. p. 58] has received a liberal construction in the courts in the state, so as to extend its remedies to debts contracted in foreign countries, by persons who never resided in the state. The law is remedial, and ought to be so construed as to remove the mischief which is spoken of.

[Distinguished in Clark v. Wilson, Case No. 2,841. Cited in Smith v. Miln, Id. 13,081; Picquet v. Swan, Id. 11,134; Guillon v. Fontain, Id. 5,861.]

2. To constitute such a debt as may be pursued by a foreign attachment, under the law of Pennsylvania, the demand must arise under a contract, without which no debt can be created; and the measure of the damages must be such as the plaintiff can aver, by affidavit, to be due, without which special bail cannot regularly be demanded.

[Cited in Roelofson v. Hatch, 3 Mich. 280.]

3. The remedy by foreign attachment will not lie for demands which arise ex delicto, or where special bail cannot regularly be required.

[Cited in Bausman v. Smith, 2 Ind. 375.]

4. The promise of the defendant to deliver teas of a particular quality, was not complied with, and as the plaintiff swears that the difference between the teas promised and those delivered, amounted to a particular sum, a foreign attachment lies.

5. It is no ground for dismissing a foreign attachment, instituted in this court, that the plaintiff had sued out another attachment against the defendant in a state court, and afterwards discontinued it.

Rule to show cause, why the foreign attachment issued in this case should not be dissolved. The plaintiff showed cause, by filing an affidavit, in which he stated, that he and the defendant, a Hong merchant at Canton, entered into a contract there, by which the defendant, for a full consideration paid to him, agreed to put on board the Pennsylvania packet, as the property of the plaintiff, a cargo of teas of the very first quality, for the Amsterdam market; and if the said teas should not prove of such quality at the sales in Amsterdam, he, the defendant, bound himself to make good all deficiencies. That the cargo so put on board was landed at Philadelphia, and afterwards reshipped to Amsterdam, without having suffered any kind of damage since the purchase; and the plaintiff alleges that he has been informed, and believes that these teas arrived in safety at Amsterdam, and were there landed and storehoused free from all damage. But, upon examination by a sworn officer, they were found, with a trifling exception, to be of the most common and indifferent kinds, and were sold by the East India Company at Amsterdam, for the highest prices that could be obtained, and that the difference between the best price that could be, and was obtained for the same, and that which an equal quantity of the qualities contracted for, according to the rates of sale, at the same time and in the same place and mode, amounted to four thousand five hundred dollars; in which sum, exclusive of interest, the plaintiff avers that the defendant is justly indebted to him. This affidavit being objected to, for not stating positively what the quality of these teas was, at Amsterdam, and the prices for which they sold, the plaintiff filed a supplementary affidavit, affirming that the defendant, Consequa, is indebted to him in the sum of four thousand five hundred dollars, besides interest, upon a promise, made by the defendant, for a valuable consideration, to deliver to the plaintiff a large quantity of teas of a certain quality; which promise he hath not complied with, but hath broken.

Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Dallas, and Charles Ingersoll, for defendant, contended that the plaintiff's demand was for unliquidated damages, and that neither by the custom of London, nor under the act of assembly, passed in 1705, could a foreign attachment lie, except in cases of debt. Cases cited: [Vienne v. M'Carty] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 154, 218, 219; [Respublica v. Lacaze] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 123; [Miller v. Leonard] Id. 237; Privileges of London, 253, 267; Vent. 111; 1 Ld. Raym. 727; Lutw. 421; 1 Ld. Raym. 56; Cowp. 56; 3 Wils. 302; 1 Bac. Abr. 689; [Doane's Adm'r v. Penhallow] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 219; [M'Clenachan v. M'Carthy] Id. 375.

Rawle, Lewis and Morgan, contra, cited Bin. 25; Cowp. 529; 2 Wils. 335; 2 Strange, 1192; 2 Burrows, 1032; Fortes. 197; [Parasset v. Gautier] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 330. They contended, that the 3d section of the act of assembly speaks of the debt or other demands, which enlarges the interpretation of the statute. They admitted, that according to the custom of London, the garnishee must owe a debt to the defendant; but it is not necessary that the ground-work of the attachment should be a debt.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. In deciding the question, whether a foreign attachment will lie in such a case as the present, we shall come at once to the act of assembly, passed in 1705, which first authorized this mode of proceeding, and inquire what is its true meaning, in relation to the point now under consideration? We do not by this, mean to say, that in no instance ought the custom of London, in respect to foreign attachments, to be regarded; it may, and in practice has probably been frequently referred to with advantage. But we should not feel ourselves authorized to extend or to limit this remedy, by rules established under the custom, where such rules are broader or narrower than the law of this state. It must be admitted, that, according to a strict and literal construction of the act of assembly, the foreign attachment is confined to cases of debt; and not only so, but to debts contracted or owing within this state, by persons absenting themselves therefrom. The 3d section, which was much relied upon by the plaintiff's counsel, as extending the remedy to other demands than debt, is in this respect clearly confined to residents about to abscond, or to leave the state, and who refuse to give security to the complainant for his debt or other demand. The nature of the case pre-supposes an inability in a non-resident to give such security. Nevertheless, we find that this law has received in practice a liberal construction, so as to embrace debts contracted in foreign countries, by persons who never did reside here, and who, of course, could not properly be said to absent themselves; and which debts, neither by the terms of the contract, nor by the removal of the debtor hither, could be said to be owing here.

This is a remedial law and ought, upon the soundest principles of construction, to be so extended as to remove the mischief, and to advance the remedy. The mischief, as the preamble informs us, was, that the effects of absent persons were not equally liable with those of persons dwelling on the spot, to make restitution for debts contracted, to the injury of the inhabitants of Pennsylvania. The remedy provided for this evil, was a process by which the property of absentees or absconding persons, found within the province, was rendered liable to make satisfaction. But the same preamble speaks of debts contracted or owing, and it is contended, that the remedy can be extended only to cases of debt. What is a debt? In strict law language, it is a precise sum due by express agreement, and does not depend upon any after calculation to ascertain it. The remedy for recovery of it is by action of debt, and frequently by action of indebitatus assumpsit. But is this the only case within the mischief intended to be remedied by this law? Surely, an inhabitant of Pennsylvania is not less injured by the want of a remedy to recover what is due to him by a foreigner, upon a sale of property, where no price was stipulated, than he would be if a fixed price had been agreed on. In the latter case, the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in a precise sum; and in the former, a sum equal to the value of the property sold, not then, it is true, liquidated, but depending upon the value to be fixed at the trial. The uncertainty of the sum due, does not, in the common understanding of mankind, render it less a debt. A promise, whether express or implied, to pay as much as certain goods or labour are worth, or as much as the same kind of goods may sell for on a certain day, or at a certain market; or to pay the difference between the value of one kind of goods and another, creates, in common parlance, a debt; and the person entitled to performance does not speak of his claim, as for damages, but for a debt, to the amount which he considers himself entitled to. But it is not every claim, that, upon a fair construction of this law, or even in common parlance, can be denominated a debt. For, in the first place, the demand must arise out of a contract, without which no debt can be created; and the measure of the damages must be such as the plaintiff can aver by affidavit to be due; without which, special bail (which the defendant, by giving, may dissolve the attachment) cannot regularly be demanded. It follows, from this, that a foreign attachment will not lie for demands which arise ex delicto, or where special bail could not be regularly required. Although we meet with no adjudged case, in this state, precisely upon the point of this cause, yet enough may be gathered from what has fallen from the judges, to show how this attachment law has been considered in practice. In M'Clenachan v. M'Carthy [supra] the judge says, that "after judgment against the defendant in the attachment, the plaintiff files his declaration according to the nature of the demand. If in debt, no oath is required; if in case, then a writ of inquiry issues, to ascertain the demand." Now, if indebitatus assumpsit were the only declaration upon which the writ of inquiry could issue, it is hardly to be believed that the judge would have used so comprehensive an expression, as that of a declaration in case. It is most obvious, that his mind took a more enlarged view of the remedy, and considered it as embracing other cases than those of debt, strictly so called. So, too, when the court say, in other cases which have been decided, that it is the practice to inquire into the cause of action in a foreign attachment, as in that of bail on a capias, and to dissolve in the one instance where they would not hold to bail; we consider the practice in relation to bail, as so far connected with that of the foreign attachment, that if regularly bail would be required, in matters of contract, the attachment would not be dissolved.

This is a case of contract, by which the defendant binds himself to deliver to the plaintiff teas of a certain quality, and suited to a particular market; and on failure to do so, to pay the difference between teas of such quality, and such as should be delivered. Teas, agreeably to contract, were not delivered; and the plaintiff swears, that the difference amounts to 4500 dollars. Whatever be the difference, the defendant has promised to pay it, and of course is to that amount indebted to the plaintiff; and if he were present, and served with a capias, he would be held to bail, as of course. There is, therefore, upon the principles before stated, no ground to dissolve the attachment.

As to the other ground taken by the defendant, that an attachment against his property, by the same plaintiff, and for the same cause of action, was sued out in the common pleas of this state, and afterwards discontinued, there is no evidence of an intention to harass the defendant, so as to induce this court to dissolve this attachment; which (unlike the case of holding to bail, where the second action still proceeds,) would be tantamount to a denial of any remedy at all, to recover what he thinks himself entitled to. I am not prepared to say, that the rule observed in relation to discharging on common bail, on the ground of vexation, is at all applicable to the case of dissolving an attachment. On this point, however, I give no opinion. Rule discharged.

Case No. 4,817.

FISHER v. CRAIG et al.

[3 Sawy. 69; 1 Ban. & A. 365.][1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July 20, 1874.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT OF COMBINATION—ANTICIPATION—MECHANICAL SUBSTITUTE.

1. Where the patent is for a combination of several distinct parts, a machine not embracing all the parts that go to make up the combination, does not infringe the patent.

2. Where there are two patented machines for hydraulic mining, each having a supply-pipe and a discharge-pipe coupled by a horizontal swivel-joint in combination with a nozzle, connected by a joint which enables the operator to elevate or depress the nozzle, and the claim is for a combination of these several parts for the accomplishment of the same object, the prior machine will be an anticipation of the later, although the joint in the latter is a semi-universal or knuckle metallic joint, while that in the former is made of india-rubber or other flexible material.

3. The metallic joint in the later machine being old, and it having been long in use for the purposes required in the machine in question, it is but a known mechanical substitute in the combination for the flexible joint in the prior machine, and, for the purposes of the combination, must be regarded as the same thing as the joint in the earlier combination.

Bill in equity to restrain the infringement of a patent. The complainant [F. H. Fisher] obtained a patent for an "improvement in hydraulic mining apparatus," No. 110,222, dated December 20, 1870, upon which there was a reissue, No. 5193, dated December 17, 1872. In his specifications he says: "My invention relates to an improved construction and arrangement of that class of hydraulic pipes and nozzles which are used for directing and delivering a stream or column of water against a bank in hydraulic mining. My improvement consists in such an arrangement of the pipe and nozzle that the nozzle can have both horizontal and vertical play, through the medium of two moving water-tight joints, for the purpose of facing it to any desired point of the compass, without shutting off the water or stopping the work of the machine." Again: "Heretofore this class of machines has been made with single joints, so that the discharge-pipe will command only the half of a circle; but by using the two joints I can swivel the nozzle around to any point of the compass, and then command the same amount of circle with the nozzle as the ordinary ball-and-socket joint." After describing his invention he states his second claim as follows: "What I claim, and desire to secure by letters-patent, is * * * 2. The two curved sections, A, B, connected by a horizontal swivel-joint, in combination with a nozzle connected by a semi-universal joint, constructed and arranged substantially as set forth." If there was any infringement it was of this combination. The defendants, as one defense, set up a prior patent to one Allenwood, which had before been assigned to defendants and was then owned by them, and claimed that, as to the points covered by the claim in complainant's patent, it was an anticipation of complainant's invention. Allenwood's patent was for "an improved method of constructing the apparatus for hydraulic operations in mining, washing gold-bearing dirt," etc., being No. 43,468, dated July 12, 1864, upon which there was also a reissue, No. 5255, dated January 28, 1873. The third claim is as follows: "3. The combination of the two working-joints or couplings, D and R, with the discharge-pipe N, and a supply-pipe, A, by means of which both the horizontal and vertical motions are obtained, substantially as and for the purposes set forth." The two curved sections A and B in complainant's machine had two corresponding parts, the supply-pipe A, and curved section C in Allenwood's machine, and those parts in both machines were connected by a swivel-joint. They both had a nozzle connected to the corresponding parts in the two machines by joints which enabled the operator to elevate or depress the nozzle at will, while the corresponding horizontal joints in the two machines enabled him to describe an arc of a circle in a horizontal direction; but the complainant's joint coupling the nozzle to the pipe was a metallic semi-universal or knuckle-joint, while the corresponding joint in the Allenwood machine was a flexible joint of india-rubber, gutta-percha, or other flexible material. Both were used in the same relative position, to accomplish the same purpose in the same way—by elevating and depressing the nozzle.

Benj. Morgan, for complainant.
M. A. Wheaton, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. This is a bill in equity to restrain the infringement of a patent. There has been much discussion on both sides, which, when we come to examine the case closely, seems to be irrelevant to the issues. The main question really is, as to whether the plaintiff's patent in certain particulars is patentable, or whether it has been anticipated by prior inventions. It is not always a question of which is the better machine that arises in a case for the infringement of a patent. The question, as in this case, often is, whether the part of the machine which is claimed to be infringed, as in the specifications claimed and as patented, is patentable.

Now, in order to ascertain that fact, it is necessary to scrutinize the patent, scrutinize the claim, and see what it is that is claimed and patented; because the party is confined to the claim he has made, and the patent which is granted.

A general, cursory view of a whole machine affords very little aid in cases of this kind.

In the case of the Fisher patent, what are the claims made, and what are the points covered by the patent? Is there an infringement upon any of those points? Is the patentee the first inventor as to those particulars which he claims?

The patent sued upon is a reissue. There was a patent at first issued in which there was but one claim presented, and that claim is, substantially, the first in the reissued patent. The reissued patent covers three claims. The plaintiff must have had a patentable improvement in each one of those three particulars in order to be entitled to protection, as to each, and there must have been an infringement of one or the other, or all of those particulars, to entitle him to relief in this case. His first claim, which is substantially the same as in his first patent, is "the swivel-joint, nozzle and pipes, A, B, D, E, combined, as described, with the lever F working through slotted posts f, strap i, lever c, and pawl and ratchet j, k, for the purpose specified." The first claim is a combination of all these elements, these various parts working together in that form. There can be no pretence that there is any infringement of that claim, because there is not a combination of all of those parts found anywhere in the defendant's machine. And there must be the use of the entire combination, a combination of all the parts, in order to constitute an infringement. That this is the settled law, there can be no doubt. Carter v. Baker [Case No. 2,472]; Coolidge v. McCone [Id. 3,186], and cases cited; Gould v. Rees, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 194. Now, all of these parts combined together are not found in the defendant's machine. Several of them are entirely omitted. There can be no pretense, therefore, that this claim is infringed, and I am not aware that it is so contended by complainant's counsel. In fact, counsel have not been very specific in pointing out in their briefs or in the oral argument, the precise claims the infringement of which they suppose has been established.

At the argument, I desired counsel to point out the specific claim infringed, and in what particulars they claimed that there had been an infringement. The argument has been very general on that side, and confined generally to the machine as a whole. I am not aware that they insist that this specific claim has been infringed. If they do, it is certainly very clear that such claim is without foundation.

The third claim is, "the levers C and F, in combination with section B and nozzle E, substantially as set forth." I am not aware that that particular claim is supposed to be infringed. It certainly is not, because that combination is not found in the defendant's machine, and it is a claim for a combination, and the combination is not there. There can be no possible pretense, therefore, that that claim is infringed. That disposes of two out of the three claims. There are but three in this patent. There was but one in the original patent, the first claim in the reissue being substantially the same as that in the original patent, and in the new or reissued patent the additional claims have been added.

Then, if there is any infringement at all, it must be of the second claim, and that claim is "The two curved sections A, B, connected by a horizontal swivel-joint, in combination with a nozzle, connected by a semi-universal joint, constructed and arranged substantially as set forth." That, then, is the combination. If there be any infringement of the patent, it is the infringement of that claim, and it is only necessary to examine that claim for the purpose of determining whether there is any feature of the machine covered by the claim that is properly patented, in view of all the facts, and whether there has been an infringement of that feature of the machine.

It is not claimed that this ball-and-socket joint in defendant's machine, or this knuckle or semi-cylindrical joint in complainant's, or that this swivel-joint in both, is new (illustrating by the models). It is not claimed that any one of these parts is new. The claim is, that this combination is new. If the combination which is embraced in this claim is not new, then the complainant is not entitled to a patent for that feature of the machine.

The defendants have set up in their answer that there has been an anticipation of this part of the plaintiff's machine, and among others, that the Allenwood machine is an anticipation. I would say, with reference to this joint in defendant's machine (showing) that it appears from the evidence to have been frequently used, prior to the issue of complainant's patent. This, in complainant's machine, is not a ball-and-socket joint. It is frequently called a knuckle-joint, and a semi-cylindrical joint: that is, instead of a ball and socket there is a section of a cylinder. A ball-and-socket joint has been frequently used in hydraulic mining machines. There are several prior patents in which it will be found. So the swivel-joints have been used in various forms before; that is manifest.

But this is not a claim for the use of any one of those alone, but for the combination. It is claimed that this Allenwood's machine is an anticipation of this particular combination. It is not claimed that it is in the same form precisely. Now, in this Allenwood machine is found this section here which corresponds to that section in complainant's machine; what Mr. Fisher calls the curved section A. That curved section is found in the Allenwood machine. This is the curved section B, as Mr. Fisher calls it in his machine, and this curved section, corresponding to curved section B, is found in this Allenwood machine.

The swivel-joint is here in Fisher's machine; the swivel-joint is here in the Allenwood, a prior machine. There are those three parts, then, which enter into Mr. Fisher's combination, found in this Allenwood machine (showing). There is the nozzle in complainant's machine, and here is the nozzle in the other machine. There is a joint in the one, and here is a corresponding joint in the other machine, connecting the nozzle with the other parts of the machine: of course a different kind of joint, nevertheless a flexible joint. This nozzle, with this section coupled with some flexible material, such as india-rubber or canvas, or some such flexible substance which joins the two together, and which forms a joint so that the pipe with the nozzle can be operated vertically by elevating or depressing it.

This (showing) is called the Allenwood machine. It is prior in point of time, and it is owned by the defendants. Now, the Allenwood patent has four different claims, and it is an anticipation of the other in several particulars. First, there is "the combination of a discharge-pipe, provided with guides or diaphragms, and the elbow C, connected by a working-joint with the supply-pipe A, substantially as and for the purposes above specified." The second claim in the Allenwood patent is "the combination of two elbows, C and A, with the swiveling joint D." That, then, is precisely the same as the sections A and B in combination with the swivel-joint, in complainant's patent, and this combination is found in both machines; and if this combination described in Allenwood's second claim was patentable, that same combination in complainant's later machine, of course, must be an infringement upon it. Those are both swivel-joints, although of different construction. The third claim in the Allenwood is "the combination of the two working-joints, or couplings, D and R, with the discharge-pipe N, and supply-pipe A, by means of which both horizontal and vertical motions are obtained, substantially as and for the purposes specified." Then fourthly, he claims the combinations of all the parts constituting a new and improved machine.

Conceding this (showing), in the Allenwood machine to be a joint, it is only a different one from this in the Fisher machine; and Allenwood's third claim covers precisely the same parts and same combination of parts as are covered by Fisher's second claim, the only difference being in the material and the construction of the joints. This I will show by reading from the specifications in Mr. Fisher's patent:

"My improvement consists in such an arrangement of the pipe and nozzle that the nozzle can have both horizontal and vertical play through the medium of two moving water-tight joints, for the purpose of facing it to any desired point of the compass, without shutting off the water or stopping the work of the machine." That is precisely what this Allenwood machine does. It has two working-joints, one by which you obtain this horizontal motion, and the other a perpendicular or vertical motion. Now, Mr. Fisher says: "Heretofore this class of machines has been made with single joints, so that the discharge pipe will command only the half of a circle, but by using the two joints I can swivel the nozzle around to any point of the compass, and then command the same amount of circle with the nozzle as the ordinary ball-and-socket joint." He thus recognizes the fact, that the ordinary ball-and-socket joint was in use for that purpose. By using this swivel-joint in combination with the curved sections, A, B (showing), he can get the horizontal motion, and by the other joint he can command the same arc of the circle vertically that he could with the ordinary ball-and-socket joint. Then he says: "I am aware that a discharge nozzle has been heretofore used by Jenkins W. Richards, of Michigan Bluffs, California, in which two joints were made for the purpose of throwing the stream in a circle, but his nozzle proved to be a failure when subjected to the practical test of hydraulic mining."

There is, then, this other machine (Richards), prior also in date to his, but the joints in that are both swivel-joints, and that, the testimony tended to show, did not prove a success; but I read this claim here to show what his idea is, with a view to explaining his combination. That before that time machines were made with one joint, so that the discharge-pipe would command only half of a circle in one direction, but by using two joints he could "swivel the nozzle round to any point of the compass, and then command the same amount of circle with the nozzle as the ordinary ball-and-socket joint." Then in view of that, his second claim comes in: "The two curved sections, A, B,"—here they are in these two (Allenwood's and Fisher's) machines,—"connected by a horizontal swivel-joint, in combination with a nozzle;" —there (showing) they are in both machines. —so far they are identical;—"connected by a semi-universal joint," which is there (showing); this in the Allenwood (showing), is a joint also, which is in the same relative position and answers the same purpose;—"constructed and arranged substantially as set forth." Now, then, all the elements,—these two sections, and these two joints, and the pipe,—are the same in both; all of those are combined in the two machines. They are arranged together relatively, in precisely the same places, and for the accomplishment of the same purposes, in substantially the same mode. This joint in Fisher's machine (showing) is simply a known mechanical substitute for that one in the Allenwood machine. It may be a better joint, and this doubtless is a better machine, and possibly in that respect may be patentable. I am not prepared, and it is not necessary now, to say whether it is or not; but you have all of the elements in the two machines, and combined in the same way and for the same purpose, and the latter must, in this combination, be an infringement of the first; and if there is anything patentable in this (Fisher's machine) that does not exist in this (Allenwood's) in that combination, it is in the construction of this joint; because this (showing Fisher's) is a differently constructed joint from that (Allenwood's); that, if anything, is the only patentable thing in it. If you leave out of Fisher's claim the words "constructed and"—you have the same thing in both machines substantially: "The two curved sections, A, B, connected by a horizontal swivel-joint, in combination with a nozzle, connected by a semi-universal joint, arranged substantially as set forth." The construction of the joint is not claimed.

Now, the idea expressed in Fisher's claim is to make a combination of the two joints instead of one, with the supply pipe and the nozzle, and that is precisely the same as the idea expressed in Allenwood's third claim, and found embodied in his machine, and if there is any difference between the two claims, it is only in the mode of construction and in the material of the joints. But the idea of both claims is to have these five elements or parts combined. This machine, claimed to be an infringement (referring to defendants), has substantially the same combination of similar parts as the other two—complainant's and Allenwood's (showing). Here is the section which corresponds to this, and this to this. Here is the joint which corresponds to these two joints in the Fisher and Allenwood machines. Here is this part which corresponds to this portion. Here is a ball-and-socket joint instead of the semi-cylinder joint in complainant's machine, or instead of the flexible joint in Allenwood's. Now, then, if there is anything in Fisher's combination which is entitled to a patent over that (Allenwood's), it is because Fisher has substituted a better joint before known. It depends merely upon a different construction and material. In other words, a known mechanical substitute has been used in his machine in the place of one of the parts in Allenwood's, which performs the service better. But when we come to that; the defendants also constructed this joint (showing the infringing machine) differently from that of either Fisher's or Allenwood's. So that we have the same elements, the same parts and things combined, and the only difference is in the form or construction of one of the common parts used in the combination.

This, in the complainant's machine is a plain known mechanical substitute for that in the Allenwood machine, that is all, though it is differently constructed. If there is anything in that claim that can be patented, it is the form or construction of the joint, and this, defendant's joint (showing), does not contain that form or construction, but is only another well-known mechanical substitute for Allenwood's joint—a different known substitute for the same thing from that employed by complainant. It seems clear to me, when we come to analyze and compare the claims of the patents relative to these several machines, that the idea of the combination of the two last, complainant's and defendant's, is embraced in the prior one of Allenwood; and if there is any difference, it is in the form and construction of this joint; and if that is patentable, it is not embraced in the defendant's (the infringing) machine, because this is in a different form, differently constructed. In that respect, both of these joints in complainant's and defendant's machines are really but substitutes for this in Allenwood's. Defendant's is but a different known substitute from complainant's for that in Allenwood's machine. This, in defendant's, may be better or worse than that in complainant's, but it is only another known substitute for the same part, in Allenwood's machine. There may be an infringement by either upon that of Allenwood, and still be a better machine, or it may be a worse machine. It may be conceded, for the purpose of this decision, that Fisher used the same combination as Allenwood, and that it may yet have a patentable element in it; but if there is a patentable element in this combination, it is in the form and construction, by substituting a better known joint than this one of Allenwood's; but if so, that particular construction is not found in the defendant's implement. The Allenwood patent is owned by defendants, and is the first machine embracing the combination of the several parts. This, then, in my judgment, is a protection to the defendants in their use of this combination, in the form adopted by them.

My conclusion is, that the second claim in complainant's patent is the combination of these five elements, before mentioned, and that this combination is substantially in the Allenwood machine, the Fisher machine, and the Craig machine. Those five elements are in all, this Allenwood's being an anticipation of the complainant's machine. The latter in this particular is not a different machine, unless that difference consists in the construction of one of these parts. The patentability of it, if any exists, consists in that change in the construction of that joint. If that construction is the only thing patented, then this joint in defendant's machine has a different construction, although this joint is a known substitute for those in both the other machines (showing).

My judgment is that this Allenwood's invention is an anticipation of this machine, so far as this combination and claim is concerned, other than the form of construction, and protects the defendants in the use of this, which is of a different construction. If I am right in this, and that is the conclusion I have reached, after careful and thorough investigation of this case, there must be a decree for the defendants.

Those other combinations, covered by Fisher's patent, may still make the plaintiff's a valuable invention, and it may be patentable in those particulars; but I do not think the defendant's machine an infringement of any patentable portion of that machine that is covered by any claim in the patent and specifications.

Decree for defendants, with costs.

Case No. 4,818.

FISHER et al. v. CURRIER et al.

[5 Law Rep. 217; 1 Pa. Law J. 270.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. June, 1842.

BANKRUPTCY — DEBTOR AIDING CREDITOR IN ATTACHMENT PROCEEDINGS—INSOLVENCY OF PARTNERS—JOINT AND SEVERAL PROPERTY — ACT OF BANKRUPTCY.

1. If a debtor voluntarily aid a creditor in taking his property upon a writ of attachment, or in perfecting an attachment previously incomplete, it is an act of bankruptcy, within the meaning of the statute.

2. Where the partners of a firm are insolvent, and there is sufficient ground for a decree of bankruptcy against any member of the firm, the decree will go against all the members of the firm, and all the joint and separate property of the partners will pass to the assignee.

3. Under the circumstances of this case, it was held, that an act of bankruptcy had been committed by a member of a firm, and a decree was passed against all the members of the firm.

This was a petition to have Gilman Currier and Hambleton E. Smith, of Boston, copartners, under the style of Currier and Smith, declared bankrupts. Three acts were relied upon by the petitioners as constituting acts of bankruptcy. 1. The willingly procuring certain attachments to be made March 17, 1842. 2. The fraudulent transfer of notes as collateral security to prefer a particular creditor, March 17, 1842. 3. A similar transfer, May 4, 1842. Evidence was introduced on both sides as to these points.

William Gray, for petitioners.
Benjamin R. Curtis, for respondents.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. This is a petition to have Currier and Smith declared bankrupts. It is resisted on the ground that they have committed no act of bankruptcy. One act relied upon by the petitioners is an attachment, or rather attachments, of all the stock in trade of the respondents, made on the 19th of March last, on two writs, one in favor of Benjamin Smith, the father; and the other in favor of Benjamin Smith, Junior, the brother of Hambleton E. Smith, one of the respondents. There is some discrepancy in the testimony; but I think the following facts are proved. Currier and Smith are now, and were, on the 19th of March, insolvent. They had been previously pressed for means to meet their engagements, and Currier had gone to Maine for the purpose of collecting debts. During his absence, the pressure upon the firm increased, and it is testified by Wells, their clerk, that they appeared to be in embarrassed circumstances. The appearances of embarrassment were such as to attract the attention of Mr. Frothingham, who was, or assumed to be the agent of Benjamin Smith, who was absent at his home in Duxbury. Frothingham asked Smith, the respondent, what was the matter. He said they were "terribly short." A conversation ensued, in which Frothingham asked him if Currier and Smith did not still owe his father and brother; to which he answered in the affirmative, and Frothingham told him he should cause attachments to be made immediately in their favor; to which Smith made objection, but handed him one of the three notes on which the attachments were made, and copies of the two others which Frothingham immediately carried to Mr. Curtis, and procured two writs upon which the attachments were immediately made. Frothingham had no other authority to make these attachments, than "a general authority, given by Benjamin Smith a year or two before, to keep an eye to his interests here." Mr. Curtis instructed Frothingham, that the actions might be maintained if the plaintiffs should ratify them before any other attachment should be laid, and advised him to send to Duxbury immediately to obtain their ratification. This was after two o'clock. On the same day, Smith, the respondent, wrote to his father to come to Boston and "take care of himself, or secure himself:" and the father came the next morning and ratified the proceedings of Frothingham. Frothingham did not write or send to the father. Benjamin Smith, Junior, was absent at sea, and has not returned, nor been informed of the suit commenced in his behalf. Currier returned from Maine on the 20th of March. The actions were entered at the April term of the common pleas in Suffolk. Currier and Smith employed an attorney, who entered on adverse appearance; but a default was entered about the first of May, and judgment on the seventh of that month. Neither of the respondents have petitioned for the benefit of the bankrupt law, and both resist this application.

The first section of the statute [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)] makes it an act of bankruptcy for a debtor to "willingly or fraudulently procure his goods and chattels to be attached." If a debtor voluntarily aid his creditor in taking his goods and chattels upon a writ by way of attachment, or in perfecting at attachment previously incomplete, he must be deemed to have willingly procured his goods and chattels to be attached, within the meaning of the statute.

There are two things done by Hambleton E. Smith, of very grave import; First, the delivery of the note and copies of notes to Frothingham; and second, writing to his father to come and secure himself.

The first is proved by Frothingham, who is a witness for the respondents, and who alone knows the attending circumstances. His testimony therefore, is very material. He says that appearances were such as to excite his suspicions, and on the 17th of March, he asked Hambleton E. Smith what was the matter. And he replied, they were terribly short; and in answer to another question, he said, that they still owed his father and brother;—and upon further inquiry as to ways and means,—Frothingham was so convinced of their great embarrassment that he told Hambleton E. Smith that he should make attachments for the father and brother before he went to dinner. Hambleton E. Smith said, "Oh no, we can borrow; we can get along;" that it would be the breaking of them up, and would ruin them, and they could borrow. Further conversation ensued, in which Frothingham again said he should put an officer into the store, and Hambleton E. Smith objected and protested. Frothingham told him, if he would show him any thing to alter his opinion he would alter it. Smith did not; but delivered to Frothingham the note and copies of notes, which he wanted for the sole and avowed purpose of making attachments, and which he carried immediately to Mr. Curtis, and caused the writs to be made. At what point of time the note and copies were delivered, and what was then said we are not distinctly informed, for, in the first deposition given by Mr. Frothingham, which purports, in answer to the 12th interrogatory, to state all that was said and done between him and Smith, no mention is made of this most material fact, —and, in answer to the third cross-interrogatory, he testified, that he had stated fully all that passed between him and Hambleton E. Smith. It was not until his second deposition was taken, and the question was pointedly put to him, whether Hambleton E. Smith handed him copies of notes, that the fact was disclosed by him. And it further appears, that Frothingham learned from Hambleton E. Smith the amounts of the debts due to the father and brother, and that Hambleton E. Smith had no knowledge that Frothingham had any agency or authority whatever from the father.

In answer to a question by the respondent's counsel, whether H. E. Smith gave the note and copies willingly; he replied "Not very willingly;" and to a cross-interrogatory, he said, that the reason he said so, was, that Smith was not willing he should take the step he did; and refers to his former depositions for the facts on which he made that statement. Now, considering the position which Mr. Frothingham occupies, as the son-in-law of Benjamin Smith, the father, and one who has voluntarily commenced process for securing to him and his brother-in-law a priority, and having a natural anxiety to accomplish that purpose; and considering that he omitted in his first deposition to state the fact of his receiving the note and copies; and considering also, the testimony of Baker as to his declarations, touching the letter written by Smith to his father, and Frothingham's naked denial of such declarations, and his denial of knowledge who wrote the letter to the father coupled with the fact, that Mr. Curtis advised him to send to the father immediately, and that he did not, but Smith, the son, did,—we are irresistibly led to the conclusion, that his wishes are strongly on the side of the respondents, and that, while he has testified truly, in answer to direct and specific inquiries, he has been reserved as to matters adverse to the respondents, and not drawn out by pointed interrogatories.

Now, from the whole testimony in the case, I think it is fairly to be inferred, that, whatever may have been the reluctance of H. E. Smith, in the first instance, to accede to the views of Frothingham in having an attachment made, yet that in the end and before Frothingham left him, he was so convinced or persuaded as to accede to those views, and voluntarily to lend his aid to carry them into effect. And for that purpose, he delivered him the note and copies, and wrote to his father to come and secure himself. His conduct since has been in perfect accordance with this view, and calculated to secure the priority of his father and brother. It is true that the respondent employed counsel to appear in the actions, but for what purpose is left to inference. The debts were not disputed. There could then have been no object but delay; and what benefit could have been anticipated from that is not explained. One of the actions, that in favor of B. Smith, Jr., was commenced and prosecuted without the semblance of authority, and Frothingham testified, that H. E. Smith had no reason to believe that he had authority; yet the plaintiff's appearance was never called for, and no objection interposed to the suit proceeding to judgment without the plaintiff ever having authorized its commencement or having knowledge of its pendency. Before the ratification of the father, his attachment was incomplete. That ratification was procured immediately by the active interference of the respondent Smith. I am constrained, therefore, after a careful consideration of the evidence, to come to the conclusion, that the aid given by H. E. Smith, in commencing and perfecting the attachments, was an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the statute. But Currier was absent and had no knowledge of these proceedings, or of the attachments until his return on the 20th of March; and it is contended, that he cannot be affected thereby, nor his (separate or joint) property taken without his personal agency or default. Such is not necessarily the law of partnerships; and, in order to see whether it be so under our bankrupt system, we must recur to the statute. The fourteenth section is peculiar, and could not, I think, have constituted a part of the bill as originally framed, or been prepared by the same hand. Its language is dissimilar, and it refers to an order as being provided by the act which is not in terms found therein. I have had much difficulty in satisfying my own mind as to its true construction in some particulars. But, without undertaking to determine what may be the effect of a mere insolvency of a partnership, I think it is clear, that when the partners of a firm are insolvent and there is sufficient ground, either upon a voluntary or adverse petition, for a decree of bankruptcy against any member of the firm, it is the intention of the statute that all the joint stock and property of the company, and also all the separate estate of each of the partners shall be taken. Indeed, the language of the fourteenth section is in this respect clear and explicit. But if it were less so, still in a case like the present, where the decree of bankruptcy is to pass because of attachments of the property of the company, it would seem that such property ought to be taken by the assignee, otherwise these very attachments may remain in force, and the purpose of the law, in pronouncing them an act of bankruptcy, be defeated. The object to be accomplished, being thus settled by the statute, the only question that remains, is the manner in which it is to be attained, that is, the form of the decree. Shall it be against both the members of the firm as bankrupts, or against Smith only as a bankrupt, and pronouncing the firm to be insolvent, and thereupon all the joint and separate property to be taken by the assignee? The statute is in this respect by no means clear. But as one at least of the prerequisites of the decree is the insolvency of both partners; and the order, which is required in the fourteenth section to be "made in the manner provided in the act," must, I think, refer to the decree or declaration of bankruptcy prescribed in the first section; and, as the fourth section provides for a discharge of those only, who have been declared bankrupts, and by the fourteenth section the certificate of discharge is to be "granted or refused to each partner as the same would or ought to be if the proceedings had been against him alone;" and as uniformity in the proceedings will be thus best preserved, I am of opinion that there should be in this case a decree or declaration of bankruptcy against both the respondents. This precludes the necessity of examining the other questions which have been discussed at the bar.

The following decree was thereupon entered: "Order and decree. And now it appearing to the court here, that due notice has been given to all parties and persons in interest pursuant to the order of court, and that, on the seventeenth day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, the said Currier and Smith were merchants and partners in trade, and that they were then and still are owing debts to the amount of not less than two thousand dollars, and that they did then and do still owe, to the petitioners, debts, amounting in the whole to not less than five hundred dollars, and that they were then and still are insolvent, and that the said Smith did, on said seventeenth day of March, willingly procure the goods and chattels of the said partners to be attached; it is ordered and decreed by the court that the said Gilman Currier and the said Hambleton E. Smith be and they are hereby declared and decreed to be bankrupts pursuant to the act of congress, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' passed August 19, 1841."

At a subsequent day the respondents demanded a trial by jury.

FISHER v. HARNDEN.

[1 Paine, 55.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New York. April Term, 1812.[2]

CONFISCATION OF ENEMY'S PROPERTY—EFFECT OF TREATY STIPULATIONS — JUDGMENT OF FORFEITURE BY STATE COURT—JURISDICTION — LIMITATIONS — CLAIMS OF STRANGERS TO THE FORFEITURE—ALIENAGE OF PLAINTIFFS IN EJECTMENT—SPECIAL VERDICT.

1. The judgments of a court not having jurisdiction are not merely erroneous, and valid until reversed, but are void ab initio.

2. The adoption of a treaty, with the stipulations of which the provisions of a state law are inconsistent, equivalent to a repeal of such law.

3. A judgment of a state court in a case where jurisdiction was acquired, not by the common law, but by a statute of the state, which before the rendition of the judgment had been thus virtually repealed by the adoption of a treaty, was held not voidable, but void.

[Cited in The J. W. French, 13 Fed. 918.]

4. In 1780 the ancestor of the lessors of the plaintiff, a British subject, was indicted in the supreme court of New-York, under the act entitled "An act for the forfeiture and sale of the estates of persons who have adhered to the enemies of this state," &c.; and in October, 1783, a judgment of forfeiture against his estates was rendered. The treaty of peace stipulating against any subsequent confiscation, was signed in September preceding. Held that the proceedings were coram non judice, and void.

5. The alienage of the plaintiffs in ejectment cannot be set up to defeat a recovery where their ancestor held the lands at the time of the treaty of 1794. The circumstance of the special verdict's not finding the fact that he held them at that time, not noticed.

6. The act of New-York, entitled "An act limiting the period of bringing claims and prosecutions against forfeited estates," was not intended to bar those against whom the forfeiture had passed, but to bar the claims of strangers to the forfeiture. The mischief apprehended was the loss of deeds, which was to be feared in the case of strangers only, and not of those who claimed under the forfeited title.

T. A. Emmett and P. A. Jay, for plaintiff.

C. D. Colden and E. Williams, for defendant.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice. This is an action of ejectment for lands situate at Granville, in the county of Washington, and within this district. The defendant having pleaded not guilty, a special verdict was found, which contains the following facts: Donald Fisher, on the 1st of January, 1777, was seised in fee of the premises in question, and was in the actual possession thereof, and continued so until the rendering of the judgment hereinafter mentioned. Donald Fisher lived and died a British subject, and had issue the lessors of the plaintiff, who were his only children and heirs at law, one of whom was born in 1776, another on the 23d of April, 1785, and the other on the 23d December, 1787, and all of them are and always have been subjects of Great Britain. Donald Fisher resided at Hebron, in the county of Washington, from 1793 until his death, which happened on the 1st of September, 1798. On the 17th of April, 1780, the grand jury of the county of Charlotte presented an indictment against Donald Fisher, for adhering to the enemies of this state, on which such proceedings were had that afterwards, to wit, on the third Tuesday of October, in the year 1783, the said Donald Fisher not having appeared and traversed the indictment, a judgment was rendered against him by the supreme court of this state, by which it was considered that he do forfeit all his estate real and personal, within this state, to the people thereof. On the 28th of March, 1797, the state of New-York passed an act "for limiting the period of bringing claims and prosecutions against forfeited estates." [Laws N. Y. 1797, p. 162, c. 52.] This act, after reciting that, "whereas the title deeds and other documents relative to forfeited estates were generally carried away by the former proprietors, whose conduct occasioned their forfeiture, and the title of the state as resulting from such forfeiture, was thereby peculiarly liable to be obscured or defeated;" therefore it was enacted, that "no person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, who then had, or should or might thereafter have any estate, right, title, claim, or demand in or to any lands, messuages, tenements, or hereditaments supposed to have been forfeited to the people of this state in consequence of the attainder or conviction of any person or persons for any act or crime done or committed during the late war, and which had been theretofore granted or conveyed to any person or persons by the commissioners of forfeitures, or other person or persons duly authorized for that purpose, on the part of this state, should, after the expiration of five years from and after the passing of that act, and where the estate, right, title, claim, or demand should thereafter accrue, then after the expiration of five years after the same should so accrue, have, prosecute, sue, or maintain any suit at law for the recovery thereof against the right or title so granted by the people of this state as abovesaid." The second section of the act declared, that those who did sue for or make any claim to such lands after the said respective periods of five years, should be utterly barred. And by the 3d section it was provided, "that if any person or persons who should be entitled to sue or prosecute such suit or action, or who had or should have such right or title, should be within the age of 21 years, feme covert or insane; that then such person or persons, his, her, and their heirs and assigns, should or might at any time within five years next after his, her, or their coming to full age, or of sound mind or discoverture, bring, sue, and prosecute such suit or action, and at no time thereafter." The defendant purchased the premises, but it does not appear when, for a valuable consideration, of the commissioners of forfeiture, who were duly authorized for that purpose, as forfeited to and vested in the people of the state of New-York, by and in virtue of the judgment aforesaid. This action was commenced the 5th of December, 1809. The lease, entry, and ouster, as stated in the declaration, are also found by the special verdict. On the argument of this special verdict the defendant resorted to two grounds of defense: 1st, he contended, that while the judgment of the supreme court remained in force and unreversed, the present suit could not be maintained; and, 2dly, if it could, that it was barred by the act of limitation passed the 28th March, 1797 [supra].

In arguing the first point, the counsel for the defendant were not understood as vindicating the judgment against Fisher. It seemed to be admitted by both parties, and such must have been the decision of the court, that it was contrary to the treaty of peace (signed the 3d of Sept., 1783; 6th article, 1 Laws [Bior & D.] 205) between Great Britain and the United States; and the only point in dispute was, whether its being so could be brought into view in this collateral way, or whether its reversal by writ of error were not previously necessary to enable the plaintiff to recover the premises in question; or in other words, whether the judgment were merely erroneous, that is, good and valid, until reversed, or void and a nullity ab initio.

Where a court possesses jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which occurs in the cause, and whether its decision be correct or otherwise, its judgment, until reversed, is regarded as binding. But if it act without authority, its judgments are considered as nullities, and form no bar to a recovery which may be sought, even prior to a reversal, in opposition to them. This distinction runs through all the cases on this subject, and is particularly recognised in the one from the third institute. In the present case it cannot be pretended that the supreme court had any authority to pronounce the judgment which is relied on as forfeiting the property claimed in this action. All its powers, as they regarded these proceedings, were derived not from its constitution or common law, but from an act of the legislature of the state of New-York, entitled "An act for the forfeiture and sale of the estates of persons who have adhered to the enemies of this state, and for declaring the sovereignty of the people of this state in respect to all property within the same." This act, which created the offence, and prescribed proceedings out of the course of the common law, is stated in the judgment itself, as the only source of the jurisdiction. If this act then, were not in force at the time of its rendition, it must have been coram non judice, and absolutely void. Such would have been the case if the law had been previously repealed by the legislature, without any provision as to pending prosecutions. It must be equally so where by a treaty, which is the supreme law of the land, it is provided, that no future confiscation shall be made by reason of the part which any one had taken in the late war. This treaty being as much a matter of record as the law of the state or the present judgment, this court is competent, by its own inspection and attention to dates, to determine whether the authority of the supreme court was not at an end before it undertook to pronounce this judgment. And being of opinion, as has already been perceived, that such was the case, the conclusion is inevitable that the judgment was void from the beginning, and furnishes, although unreversed, no defence to this action.

But if the judgment rendered against the ancestor of the lessors of the plaintiff be no obstacle to a recovery in this action, it is supposed they are barred by the act of limitations, a copy of which appears in the verdict. The lessors of the plaintiffs, on the other hand, contend, that their case is not embraced by the provisions of this act, and that if it be otherwise, two of them at least, on account of their infancy, are within its saving clause. Whether the sense of the legislature in the present case be collected from the title of the act, its preamble, or its enacting words, the court cannot see how the lessors of the plaintiffs are affected by it. Its title is "An act limiting the period of bringing claims and prosecutions against forfeited estates." Now, as the estate of Donald Fisher never was forfeited, the title does not apply to an action brought by his heirs to recover the land belonging to their ancestor. The preamble, which, if it were necessary to resort to it, might in a doubtful case furnish a clue to the meaning of the legislature, discovers an intention to provide for cases of a very different nature. It is in the following terms: "Whereas the title deeds and other documents relative to forfeited estates were generally carried away by the former proprietors, whose conduct occasioned their forfeiture, and the title of the state as resulting from such forfeitures is thereby peculiarly liable to be obscured or defeated, therefore, &c." On this preamble it is sufficient to remark, that it applies only to forfeited estates, and that the mischief intended to be guarded against was not the prosecution of actions for a recovery of property by persons whose estates had been forfeited and sold, but by others whose property might have been sold as belonging to the party whose estate had been forfeited. If the action were brought by the attainted party himself, or his heirs or assigns, no title deeds or documents could be necessary to establish the claim of the state. A valid forfeiture, as they would both claim under the same title, would be all that was wanting; and this being matter of record, might be made out, without difficulty, at any period of time ever so remote. But when strangers to the forfeiture were plaintiffs, then it might be difficult for the public, not being in possession of the deeds relating to the estate of the person convicted, to prove, after some lapse of time, that the property sold in fact belonged to the attainted person, and in such case, a limitation might be reasonable and proper. If no construction favourable to the defendant can be drawn from the title, or preamble of the act, as little will its enacting clause avail him.

The court here disclaims all right or inclination to put on acts of limitation, which are among the most beneficial to be found in our books, any other construction than their words naturally import. It is as much its duty to give effect to laws of this description, with which courts however sometimes take great liberties, as to any other which the legislature may be disposed to pass. When the will of the legislature is clearly expressed, it ought to be followed without regard to consequences. And a construction, derived from a consideration of its reason and spirit, should never be resorted to but where the expressions are so ambiguous as to render such mode of interpretation unavoidable. But whatever may be the intention of the legislature, if such intention be not declared by apt words, no court can be blamed for mistaking it, and giving to the words used their ordinary signification, however wide such interpretation may be from the object which may have been in view. It must be admitted, that if it were intended to bar by this act of limitation suits brought by the parties themselves, whose estates had been forfeited and sold by the commissioners of forfeiture, a very awkward phraseology has been employed. The persons barred by this limitation of five years can be no others than those who had, or might have any estate, right, title, claim, or demand in any lands supposed to have been forfeited in consequence of the attainder or conviction of any person for any act or crime committed during the late war, and which had therefore been granted to any person by the commissioners of forfeitures. Before this act can be brought to bear on any case, there must have been an actual forfeiture by the attainder or conviction of some person, and a sale by the commissioners, of some property supposed to have belonged to such attainted and convicted person, but in fact claimed by some one else. The terms, "supposed to have been forfeited," cannot without violence, when taken in connexion with those which follow, receive any other meaning. They refer to the estate which had been sold where there might be room for supposition and mistake, but not to the fact of attainder or conviction, which must ever be a matter of record and notoriety; and about which, therefore, there could be no doubt or mistake. Thus the lands of A. might easily and innocently be sold by the commissioners under a supposition of their having belonged to, and of their having been forfeited by, the conviction of B. Such cases no doubt must have occurred, and it was no more than right that the parties thus aggrieved should be barred, if, after a reasonable time, they neglected to assert their rights. But in the case before the court there has been no forfeiture by the conviction of any person, which alone would have been a complete defence, but only a sale by the commissioners, and of course the defendant has altogether failed in making out one essential fact to constitute a case for the application of the limitation prescribed by this law.

It has not been pretended that the parties are barred by the general act of limitations, nor do any facts appear on the special verdict, to authorize such conclusion. It was supposed by the plaintiff's counsel, that the defendant might rely on the alienage of his lessors, but although this ground was not taken, yet as the question is presented by the facts which are found, and lest it may be supposed to have been overlooked, the court has no hesitation in saying, that as Donald Fisher held these lands at the time of the treaty of London, in 1794, neither he nor his heirs, devisees, nor assigns can, so far as respects this property, or the legal remedies incident thereto, be regarded as aliens.

Upon the whole, then, as the judgment rendered against Donald Fisher was coram non judice, and therefore void, and as neither the title of the limitation act which has been relied on, nor its preamble, nor its enacting words, apply to a case where there has been no valid attainder or conviction, the court is of opinion, that judgment must be entered for the plaintiff, but that the writ of habere facias possessionem be stayed until the further order of the court.

NOTE. This cause was carried up to the supreme court, and the judgment of the circuit court reversed. It was very fully argued above, but the court gave no opinion on the points here decided. They held that it should have appeared, as the lessors of the plaintiff were aliens, that their ancestor held the lands, that is, that the title was in him at the date of the treaty of 1794. This fact was not found by the verdict, and although nothing was found to show that he had parted with his title, the court refused to presume that it was then in him. Vide [Harden v. Fisher] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 300.

[8 N. B. R. 175.][1]

District Court, S. D. Mississippi. Jan., 1873.

BANKRUPTCY — CONVEYANCE BY BANKRUPT IN TRUST FOR HIS WIFE—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

An assignee filed a bill in equity against the wife of a bankrupt and her surviving trustee, to set aside a conveyance of lands and personal property made by the said bankrupt to trustees, for the alleged consideration of an indebtedness to his wife for land, slaves and other personal property, and money belonging to her. At this time the bankrupt was embarrassed in his pecuniary circumstances. The deed gave no power to the wife to dispose of the property during her lifetime, or by will, after her death, without the consent of trustees. It reserved, however, to the grantor the right, and gave to either of the trustees the power to sell and convey any part of the property without the consent of the wife. Held, that the conveyance was void, the proof not establishing the trust, the evidence further showing that about fifteen years elapsed after the purchase before this attempted conveyance; that the lands mentioned were subject to the payment of the debts of the bankrupt as they stood at the time the petition was filed, subject to his homestead right.

[Cited in Ex parte Anderson, Case No. 351.]

In equity.

HILL, District Judge. This bill is filed by the complainant, as the assignee in bankruptcy of James Henderson, against Emily A. Henderson and her surviving trustee, to set aside a conveyance made by said bankrupt bearing date 25th of October, 1866, and filed for record on the 26th day of October, 1866, by which he conveyed to the trustees therein named the lands and personal property mentioned therein, and which, from the proof, embraced all his property, real and personal, except one hundred and forty-seven bales of cotton, a portion of which was then in New Orleans, and the remainder on the way to that city, for the alleged consideration of an indebtedness to his wife for land, slaves and other personal property, and moneys belonging to his wife, and appropriated by him to his own use; that the said James Henderson was then largely indebted and embarrassed in his pecuniary circumstances, and that said conveyance was collusively and fraudulently made, with the intent to hinder and delay the creditors of said James Henderson from collecting their just demands against him, and therefore void, and that said conveyance upon its face contains provisions in favor of the grantor which render the conveyance void in law as well as in fact.

Mrs. Henderson, by her answer, denies all collusion and fraud, insists that it was made in good faith and for a valuable consideration, being for real estate, personal property and money belonging to her, and received and appropriated by her husband, the grantor, as well as for the hire of her slaves and income of her estate, which it is insisted greatly exceeded in amount the value of the property conveyed to her. On this issue of fact made by the bill and answer, proof is submitted upon which this cause must be decided, as well as upon the validity of the conveyance as shown upon its face.

The last question presented will be first considered. It is claimed for complainant that the terms and provisions of this conveyance are inconsistent with the assumed consideration, namely: a conveyance to the wife or to trustees for her use, in payment of a debt due from the husband to the wife, and shows upon the face of the conveyance that it was a family arrangement, such as the husband could only make in good faith as a provision for his family out of his own means, without any legal claim upon the part of the wife.

The deed purports to convey the property to the trustees for the use of Mrs. Henderson, but gives to her no power of disposition over it during her lifetime, and not by will, without the consent of her trustees, while it reserves to the grantor, and gives to the trustees, or either of them—that is, reserves to the grantor the right, and gives to either of the trustees the power, to sell and convey any part of the property without the consent of Mrs. Henderson, whose means, it is claimed, purchased and paid for this very same property. These restrictions upon the power of disposition of the wife, of her own property, under the laws of this state, are inconsistent with the ideas of a sale to her; but it is insisted for Mrs. Henderson that her privy examination was not taken on the deed proved as to her, and that she is not barred by these restrictions. But whether that was or was not necessary to bind her, she is now a femme sole, claims under the deed, and is bound by its provisions.

The power reserved by James Henderson in this conveyance, to sell and dispose of this property, was evidently intended as a reservation of a benefit for himself, and therefore, upon well established principles, renders the conveyance void. This is still more apparent when it is found that no provision is made for the reinvestment of the proceeds or the continuance of the trust, as to such proceeds, or requiring the grantor to pay over the proceeds to the trustees; so that if this conveyance is not void for the restrictions upon Mrs. Henderson's disposition of that which, it is claimed, is hers, purchased with her own means, it certainly is by reason of the reservation made by the grantor.

If not void upon the face of the conveyance, is it void by reason of a fraudulent intent in the purpose of its execution? The proof shows that Henderson owed at that time about six thousand dollars; that suits were pending against him which he had manifested an unwillingness to pay, and would probably ripen into judgments in December following: this created a motive to place his property out of the reach of an execution. The conveyance of his whole property is an indication of a fraudulent intent, but it is said that this he did not do; that he then owned cotton of more than twice the value of all his indebtedness. This cotton, however, was either then or soon after removed to New Orleans, out of the reach of the process of the courts in which judgments were expected to be rendered, and there is another significant fact, that is, that there is no evidence that a single dollar of the proceeds of this cotton ever went to pay his debts, but was employed in the name of his wife in purchasing supplies for the farm; indeed, James Henderson dealt with and controlled this, together with the whole estate conveyed, except in name, as though the conveyance had not been made up to the bankruptcy, and to his death, and it is difficult to arrive at any other conclusion than that such was the intention and purpose, at the time the conveyance was made, or that it was for any other purpose than to place his property out of the reach of his creditors, and being so, for this reason, the conveyance must be declared void.

But it is insisted that the proof shows that most of the lands mentioned in the pleadings were purchased and paid for with the money of Mrs. Henderson, and that she is entitled in equity to them, as a resulting trust. It is certainly true that when a husband, without any instruction from the wife, uses her money in the purchase and payment of property, and takes the title in his own name, she may, if she so elect, set up a resulting trust to it, or she may treat it as a loan which she will be presumed to have done unless she take steps within a reasonable time to set up her trust after she shall have been informed of its disposition, at least so far as his creditors are concerned, who may have given him credit upon the faith of his owning it in his own name. But to create this resulting trust it must be made clearly to appear that it was her money, and paid at the time of the purchase, if paid at a subsequent time to the purchase the trust cannot be maintained. The proof is too vague and uncertain to establish this trust; and besides, according to the proof, about fifteen years elapsed after the purchase before this attempted conveyance, and nearly twenty years before its operation, and on either ground must be denied.

The result is that the conveyance made on the 25th of October, 1866, must be declared void, and the lands mentioned decreed subject to the payment of the debts of the bankrupt as they existed on the 5th day of December, 1868, when he filed his petition in bankruptcy, but subject to his homestead right, which continues to his widow. Three commissioners must be appointed to allot and set off to her so much of said land as would on the 5th day of December, 1868, have been of the value of fifteen hundred dollars, and not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres, including the dwelling houses and improvements occupied by the bankrupt as a homestead at that time. There will also be a decree entered directing the assignee to sell off the remainder of the land in such tracts as will likely produce most advantageous sale. The proceeds will be brought into court to be applied to the payment of the claims of creditors according to their respective priorities. Mrs. Henderson will be allowed to establish any legal demand she may have against the estate, but such claim must be established by the best attainable proof. It is the duty of the court to examine with scrutiny these old family transactions, that justice may be done.

Case No. 4,821.

FISHER et al. v. LORD.

[6 West. Law J. 137.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1848.

EQUITY JURISDICTION—ENJOINING ACTION AT LAW—TITLE OF COMPLAINANT—ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

[1. A court of equity has jurisdiction of a suit to enjoin the prosecution of an action at law to collect promissory notes, where the complainant shows a prima facie title to the notes, although he is not a party to the action sought to be enjoined.]

[2. The business of a firm was carried on in the name of one partner alone, who, after the other partner had made an assignment under the laws of Maine, sold the partnership goods, and took notes therefor in his own name. His creditors then became parties to the assignment to the extent of $5,000. Held, that these facts showed a prima facie title to the notes in the assignee, such as would give him standing to ask a preliminary injunction to prevent their collection at law by one who, as he alleges, purchased them by collusion, and with knowledge of the facts.]

In equity.

This was a motion to dissolve an injunction, restraining the defendant from proceeding in two suits in the court of common pleas for this county, upon certain promissory notes, amounting to about $3000, which suits had been instituted against Charles S. Darrow, the promisor. The injunction was a temporary one, and was issued upon the bill in this case, which was filed in April, 1848. The answer came in on the 15th of May, 1848, and the defendant thereupon moved to dissolve the injunction, on the ground that the answer denied all right or title to the permanent injunction sought in the bill. The facts as stated in the bill and answer were substantially as follows: Franklin Adams & Co., merchants, of Bangor, made an agreement, Feb. 24, 1845, with Josiah S. Hooke, for doing business under the name of "Josiah S. Hooke," sharing the profits equally; which arrangement continued until September 4, 1846. Franklin Adams & Co. then became insolvent, and assigned their property to the complainants [Fisher & Payne], under the laws of Maine. The creditors of Josiah S. Hooke became parties to the assignment to the extent of $5,000; and the firm of Josiah S. Hooke owned a stock of goods, which Hooke, on the day after, i. e., on Sept. 5, sold to Darrow, for $2,678, taking his notes therefor, on six, nine, and twelve months. Hooke, as the bill alleged, then secretly left the state of Maine, taking the notes with him, to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining the proceeds. In October he entrusted the notes to his brother, Wm. H. Hooke, on whom the plaintiffs made a demand, but he refused to deliver up the notes. The plaintiffs then brought a bill in equity against Wm. and Josiah Hooke, in the state court of Maine, and an injunction was issued Nov. 3, 1846, forbidding Wm. H. to sell the notes or convey them out of the state; and on Dec. 2, a receiver was appointed to collect the notes. Wm. H. on demand refused to deliver the notes; and, the bill alleged further, that Nathaniel Lord, brother of the defendant, combining with the Hookes to defraud the plaintiffs, negotiated for the purchase of the notes, and bought them, in conjunction with Daniel W., the latter being nominally the sole owner, for the sum of $1,100, and a certain debt of no value, due from the insolvent firm of Palmer & Hooke, for $400; that Nathaniel, or the friends of the Hookes, furnished the greater portion of the purchase money; that Samuel Veazie, the father-in-law of Nathaniel, provided the means for that purpose; that all these transactions took place after the injunction, and for the purpose of avoiding the same; and that in September, 1847, Daniel W., at the instigation and with the aid of Veazie, sued Darrow upon the notes in the court of common pleas for the county of Suffolk, in this commonwealth. There were a large number of interrogatories in the bill, which were replied to in the answer; and a quantity of affidavits and other written evidence was introduced on both sides.

Albert W. Payne, of Bangor, and P. W. Chandler, for plaintiffs, in opposition to the motion.

Frederic Hobbs, of Bangor, and S. C. Maine, for defendant, in support of the motion.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court.

The first question was, whether the notes in suit were the property of the complainants or of the defendant. The complainants must make out a prima facie title, in order to sustain their right to an injunction. The respondent objected to the jurisdiction of this court to settle that question, on the ground that the complainants were not parties to the suit at law. But they were as much interested as if they were parties; for if Lord should recover and collect the sum due on the notes, and then prove irresponsible, the amount would be wholly lost to the complainants. The court has jurisdiction therefore, on general principles of equity. There was another difficulty in relation to jurisdiction, and it was that neither the federal nor the state courts can enjoin suits in each other. [Diggs v. Wolcott] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 179; [M'Kim v. Voorhies] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 279. But this was not a proceeding operating upon the state court itself; the respondent was enjoined in personam, and was within the jurisdiction of the court. This objection was not pressed, and from the result to which the court arrived, became of subordinate importance in the present case. The answer of D. W. Lord denied under oath the plaintiffs' title to the notes, the respondent's knowledge of their claims at the time he purchased, and the allegations of combination and collusion. If the answer were to be taken as true, it was obvious that the injunction must be dissolved. But the plaintiffs, by their testimony, had thrown grave doubts over the correctness of the answer, and the answer itself was defective in its details. And the proof, though objected to, was competent on a hearing to dissolve. Proof was given of the alleged partnership, and it was conceded that Franklin Adams & Co. were to share in the profits of the firm of Josiah S. Hooke. They were therefore liable for the debts; the partnership property must go to pay the partnership debts; and would pass to the assignees, under the laws of Maine. The conduct of Hooke, in selling out and absconding, showed that he so understood the relations of the parties. The fact that Franklin Adams & Co. had sued Hooke for their profits, could not affect the rights of the creditors, who were represented by the complainants. These conclusions were sufficient as to the title of the complainants to the notes, on this preliminary hearing.

The respondent contended that he bought the notes, bona fide and without notice of the partnership, and was entitled therefore to hold them against all the world. This conclusion, even if the facts were so, was rather questionable as matter of law, where the notes were purchased after a failure, and for a very inadequate consideration. But the facts which attended the sale threw many shadows over its fairness. Here were all the standard indicia of a design in the sale to defraud creditors, if not of collusion and actual knowledge of it in the purchasers;—(1) a sale soon after a failure; (2) a sale for a very inadequate consideration; (3) between relatives; (4) with circumstances of concealment. The answer, as well as the evidence, shows that Nathaniel Lord, the brother of the respondent, was, in a few weeks after the date of the notes, the prime mover in the purchase, and was then, and is still, interested in certain proportions. The respondent is defending for Nathaniel as well as himself; and is bound by his knowledge and acts. Yet Nathaniel does not come in or ask to come in as a party, nor does Daniel ask to have him; nor does he offer with his own answer any affidavit of Nathaniel to the want of any knowledge, at the time of the purchase, of the claims of the plaintiffs to these notes. It will be seen that the answer, as an answer, is entirely insufficient without this; as the respondent's denial, without it, amounts to little or nothing. He lived in a place remote from the purchase,—took no part in it,—is ignorant of its terms and of the knowledge, Nathaniel, his agent and coparty in interest, then possessed.

To be sure, some testimony of Nathaniel in another cause, and taken by another party, was introduced bearing on this case; but the court felt constrained to say, that the whole weight of the circumstances in the case was against the direct evidence by Nathaniel Lord and Josiah and William Hooke respectively, that the claim of the plaintiffs was not known by them, or by Nathaniel Lord as well as Josiah Hooke, when the purchase was actually made or completed; and that the transaction was not a combination throughout to keep these notes and their proceeds from the creditors of F. Adams & Co., as well as those of the house of J. S. Hooke. Among other suspicious circumstances were the manner of making the respondent a purchaser, without his knowledge of the price, or his giving any authority to buy; the agency of Veazie, another relative of Nathaniel; several important contradictions in the testimony of Wm. and Josiah Hooke and others; the fact that the purchase was not in the line of Daniel W. Lord's business; the loss of so many original letters; the absence of all post-marks to settle dates, while the attempt, supported by affidavits of some of the parties, was made to fix the purchase in October, or before the bill for an injunction on the 3d of November; the looseness of the dates produced, referring to months and not days; the contradiction in them in relation to the "thanksgiving dinner" in November, when in fact it took place in Dec. 3, of that year, after which the notes were still with Josiah S. Hooke; the fact that the first payment was not made till January; the entire absence of the correspondence, originals or copies, as to drawing for a part only on Daniel W.; the institution of the suit in the name of Daniel W. alone, when the interest was in Nathaniel and Daniel W. jointly;—all these circumstances created strong doubts whether the sale could have been till some time after the first injunction, November 3, 1846; and whether both Nathaniel Lord and Josiah S. Hooke as well as William did not know, at the time of the sale, all the material facts which tended to affect the validity of the notes; and they excited strong suspicion and discredit as to the bona fide character of the whole transaction, as set up by the respondent, his agent, and the promisee of the notes. The letters put in subsequently to the hearing did not materially affect these conclusions. Not one letter, written after the 1st of November, bears any date of the day of the month, while all written before, do so. Besides this, and indicating suspicion as to the fairness of the transaction, none of the letters bear now any post-mark or filing, to show when they were written or received.

The court did not therefore feel justified in dissolving the injunction immediately, on so defective an answer, and on such strong circumstances to sustain the right of the plaintiffs to these notes or their proceeds. But as the respondent has the actual possession of these notes and has commenced suits upon them, the court were disposed to let him proceed with those suits, upon filing bonds to pay over the proceeds to a receiver whenever ordered by this court, and to make full indemnity to the plaintiffs for any claim they may establish to the notes, or their proceeds in law or equity, and six per cent. interest on them after collection. This will give the assignees of the creditors of F. Adams & Co., in Maine, all the benefit of the continuance of the injunction and the appointment of a receiver, and will operate no more harshly on Darrow than would a collection from him by a receiver. The court therefore ordered that the injunction be dissolved, upon the respondent's filing a bond to pay over the proceeds of the suits pending in the court of common pleas to a receiver, when he shall be ordered to do so, and to fully indemnify the plaintiffs for any claim to the proceeds, with interest on the money after it is collected; the bond to be approved by a master in chancery; previous to which the bond is to be submitted to the other party; and in case of necessity, the court will further hear the parties thereon. The injunction was ordered to be continued until such satisfactory security shall be filed; and when filed, the temporary injunction is to be considered as dissolved, and the bill will stand for evidence and hearing on the merits.

Case No. 4,822.

FISHER v. The PLYMOUTH.

[2 Int. Rev. Rec. 109.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1865.

ADMIRALTY PRACTICE—JURISDICTION—STATE COURT ATTACHMENT—PRIORITY.

[1. A vessel under arrest by attachment from a state court is entirely withdrawn from the cognizance of the federal courts, whether sitting in the same or a different state.]

[2. A vessel attached by a sheriff on process from a state court in suits by several creditors was subsequently seized by the marshal, without opposition from the sheriff, under libels filed in a federal court by other creditors. One creditor, who had attached in the state court, subsequently filed a libel for part of the same claim in the federal court. The vessel was sold by the marshal subject to the attachments levied by the sheriff. Held, that the creditor had no right to proceed in both courts, and that, so long as the vessel remained subject to his attachment in the state court, she was within the jurisdiction thereof, and beyond the cognizance of the federal court; but that, if it were shown that his attachment in the state court had been discharged or abandoned, he would then have a right to share, according to the order of his priority, in the proceeds in the registry of the federal court.]

In admiralty.

In this case the facts were as follows: Several libels were filed against the brig for pilotage, supplies, &c. The first one was filed on the 20th of July last. The vessel was seized by the marshal, who returned that he had so arrested her, and on the return of the processes, on August 15, defaults were entered against the vessel upon all the libels. On the 16th August a libel against the vessel was filed by the petitioner [Francis Fisher], but no steps were taken to open the defaults already entered. An order of sale was issued in one of the cases, and the vessel was sold under it on the 19th day of August. On the 19th day of July an attachment had been issued out of the supreme court of the state against one Mullen as owner of the vessel. The attachment was given to the sheriff of New York, who, on the same day, attached the vessel. On the 9th day of August, before filing his libel, the petitioner also procured an attachment from the supreme court against the property of Mullen to recover a part of the same claim for which he afterward filed his libel, and placed it in the hands of the sheriff with directions to attach the brig as his property. The sheriff made no opposition to the seizure of the vessel by the marshal, and when the vessel was sold by him the sheriff attended the sale, and by direction of Fisher and of the other attaching creditor, gave notice that the vessel was "sold subject to" those attachments. The vessel having been sold and the proceeds paid into the registry of the court, Fisher now applied by this petition to the court for an order that his claim should be first paid out of the proceeds, alleging that his claim was for a foremast which he had supplied to the vessel while she was in the custody of the marshal, and that as the value of the vessel had been thus enhanced by him, his claim should be first paid. The proceeds of the sale were not sufficient to pay the decrees rendered in the other case.

Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Parsons, for petitioner.

Mr. Benedict and Mr. Donohue, for opposing creditors.

HELD BY THE COURT: That it appearing to the court that on the day of the hearing, the vessel still remained in custody of the sheriff by virtue of the attachment in favor of the petitioner, that fact determines irrefragably that jurisdiction over the subject so situated cannot be exercised in this forum. The vessel when under arrest by judicial process of the state of New York, is as effectually withdrawn from the cognizance of the United States courts in this city, as from that of like tribunals in Ohio or Massachusetts. This doctrine is too emphatically settled under the United States law to be longer open to discussion in its courts. [Ex parte Ransom v. City of New York] 20 How. [61 U. S.] 582; [Freeman v. Howe] 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450. That the petitioner having instituted proceedings in the state court by his attachment, his present application would seem to be strikingly incongruous and inapt practice, as he asks a United States court to assume to force a case out of the possession of a state court possessing rightful cognizance of it, with a view to furnish a party litigant in it with a more acceptable or rapid determination of it, or with some other purpose not in consonance with her arrest in the state court. It matters not if the value of the vessel may have been augmented by labor or materials supplied to her by the petitioner, subsequent to her attachment in the state court. Other parties possessing claims against the vessel would be entitled to prevent the petitioner from collecting in the state court, to their prejudice, any debt not collectible upon the vessel at the time she was arrested on the petitioner's process. New debts accruing to him after her attachment on his warrant, could not be annexed to the one on which that proceeding was founded, without an express judgment of the state court authorizing that act to be done. This court assumes no power to restrain the state tribunal in granting such privilege at its discretion. It interferes in no way directly with the proceedings before the state tribunal. Any direct application by petition to this court to that effect is clearly void and utterly beyond the judicial cognizance, whether made directly or by way of a libel like the one filed by the petitioner. That process can have no legal efficiency otherwise than as against remnants and surplus remaining in the registry here after the satisfaction of the judgment charges in this court upon her ratified by decree herein. That the proceeds would be subject to such judgment charges only in the order of their legal priority. That could only be ascertained in this court in respect to the petitioner's claim, by comparing the times at which the competing creditors respectively arrested the property in satisfaction of their several debts. The Angelique v. The Triumph, Noss. Dec. That the petitioner therefore has no right of relief that can be afforded to him as to the vessel, so long as she remains in the custody or jurisdiction of the supreme court of the state at the suit of the petitioner. But if it be shown that such attachment of the vessel by the petitioner in the state court has been lawfully discharged and abandoned by him, then it is ordered that he may have leave to enter his claim to a share in the distribution of the funds in the registry according to the right of priority attaching to him by law. The petition is therefore dismissed with costs.

APPEAL—REVERSAL ON TECHNICAL GROUNDS.

1. A party is not allowed to complain of a fault committed by him.

2. An appellate court will not reverse a judgment on technical grounds, where substantial justice has been done.

[Approved in Cook v. Gray, Case No. 3,156a.]

Appeal from Pulaski circuit court.

At law.

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, BATES, and TRIMBLE, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of debt brought by the appellee against the appellant in the circuit court of Pulaski county, and comes to this court by appeal. It appears from the record, that the defendant in the court below filed his plea of payment, to which the plaintiff replied; and the defendant refusing to join issue by adding a similiter, a judgment on that account was rendered against him, and he now contends that this judgment should be reversed.

The judgment, although not strictly and formally correct, is certainly substantially good, and ought not to be reversed at the instance of the appellant, who was in fault in not completing the pleadings. Admitting the English practice, in a case like this, to be, to strike out the plea and enter judgment by default, it is not perceived what advantage it has over the practice heretofore adopted by this court in the case of Russell v. Flanakin [unreported], in which a judgment precisely similar was entered. The defendant in refusing to join issue abandoned his defence, and the plea, though not actually, was virtually, stricken out. It is a mere matter of form, and when substantial justice has been done between the parties, this court would be unwilling to reverse the judgment of the inferior court on mere technical objections of a doubtful character. Judgment affirmed.

Case No. 4,823.

FISHER v. RUTHERFORD et al.

[Baldw. 188.][1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1830.

EQUITY—ABATEMENT—DEATH OF PARTY—AMENDMENT—AVERMENT OF CITIZENSHIP—LIMITATIONS—STALENESS OF DEMAND — REFUSAL TO AMEND—APPEAL.

1. A suit in equity does not abate by the death of a co-plaintiff or co-defendant. If one plaintiff and one defendant survive, the suit is open for amendment. The averment of citizenship of a party may be added at any stage of the cause, if the amendment is moved for in a reasonable time after the defect is suggested.

2. If the statute of limitations is pleaded, and plea overruled, it cannot be again put in by the same parties or their privies.

3. The staleness of a demand, or the want of proper parties, is no objection to amend the bill. Where the refusal to amend will put the plaintiff out of court, and the defendant can avail himself of the matter on which he objects to the amendment, on appeal, the court will allow it.

[Cited in Woolridge v. M'Kenna, 8 Fed. 679.]

The complainants in this suit were originally Samuel R. and Myers Fisher, citizens of Pennsylvania, who in 1795 filed their bill against the respondents, citizens of New Jersey. Their claim was founded on a deed from Jane Waldie, as the heiress at law of Joseph Urmston, conveying to them certain proprietary shares of lands in New Jersey, which had been mortgaged by Urmston in 1720 to certain persons, under whom the defendants claimed. The bill set forth the title of Urmston, the mortgage, and the various proceedings which took place, until the defendants, or some of them, took possession of the mortgaged premises, took a seat at the board of proprietors in right of Urmston, located and sold large bodies of land, and received large sums of money, more than sufficient to pay the mortgage debt. The object and prayer of the bill was to establish the right of the plaintiffs to one propriety or twenty-fourth part of New Jersey, in right of Urmston, for a discovery and account of all locations made in virtue of his proprietary right, of sales made, moneys received for payment of the balance, a reconveyance, a right to a seat at the board of proprietors, for an injunction against further locations, and general relief. The bill was served on the defendants, who lived in New Jersey, they appeared and pleaded the act of limitations, this plea was overruled in 1799, and the defendants ordered to answer over; from this decision a writ of error was taken to the supreme court, which was quashed. Vide [Rutherford v. Fisher] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 22. In 1802 and 1803 answers were filed by several of the defendants. In 1803 a rule was entered ordering the plaintiffs to give security for costs and staying proceedings; no replication had been filed. Myers Fisher died in 1819, and in 1825 his executors conveyed to Samuel R. Fisher all the interest of the former to the premises in controversy. Samuel R. Fisher filed a bill of revivor and supplemental bill in 1826, up to which time no proceedings had been had by either party. The defendants, except John Rutherford and John Stephens, had died, and the representatives of some of them lived out of the state. A demurrer was filed to the bill of revivor, for the following causes: (1) That no cause was shown for discovery. (2) That relief was sought as to one of five proprietary rights; which one is not specified. (3) That the bill does not specify what part of the premises is in the possession of each defendant. (4) That there are necessary parties who are not made defendants, and that the heirs of Myers Fisher are not made plaintiffs. (5) That the defendants are not averred to be citizens of New Jersey. (6) That security for costs has not been given. (7) That the proceedings are prolix, indistinct and expensive. In 1827 the demurrer was allowed, whereupon the plaintiffs moved to amend their bills. After argument at April term the court held the motion under advisement, in which state the case has remained till the present time, except that security for costs has been given by the plaintiff.

Mr. Wall, for plaintiff.

The suit has never abated. Samuel R. Fisher, one of the original plaintiffs, and John Rutherford and John Stephens, two of the original defendants, are alive; so that there is an existing suit as to those parties. All the rights of Myers Fisher accrued, on his death, to Samuel R. Fisher, as surviving partner, as well as by the operation of the deed of Jane Waldie to them as joint tenants, and the deed from the executors of Myers Fisher, who had power under his will to make the conveyance. No replication having been filed to the original bill, the cause is not at issue, and is open to amendments. An original bill may be amended by adding new matter which existed at the time of filing it, or bringing in new parties; the amendments, if allowed, are a part of the original bill, and the whole is one record. Hind. Pr. 21. After a bill is revived, amendments may be made as if the original party had been alive, if the matter had existed in his lifetime. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 62. Here the important amendment is, the averment of the citizenship of the defendants to have been in New Jersey at the time of filing the bill. That they were so is admitted, but it is contended that for the want of this averment the court have no jurisdiction of the cause, the amendment is therefore indispensable to enable the court to proceed in the cause; but though the averment is not in the record, the cause is not coram non judice, a judgment rendered on it would not be a nullity. [Kempe's Lessee v. Kennedy] 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 173. The court has jurisdiction of the case, and whenever the objection is made, it is the common practice to direct the averment to be inserted. [Connolly v. Taylor] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 565. So as to an averment of the value of the matter in controversy, though necessary to enable the court to render a judgment, it is but matter of form and may be added after judgment has been arrested. Lanning v. Dolph [Case No. 8,073]. This is the only amendment to the original bill which is asked for. The amendments proposed to the supplemental bill are only as to introducing other parties, and such as are necessary to conform it to the bill as amended. The court will not look to the effect of the amendments any further than to be satisfied that they are allowable according to the rules of the court, and will lead to no injustice to the defendants. Whether there are such parties before the court as are necessary for a final decree, is not a material question in the present stage of the cause, it is always open to this objection, which will not be affected by allowing the amendment.

Mr. Vanarsdale and Mr. Wood, for defendants.

This is a stale demand, brought thirty-one years after the right of Jane Waldie, under whom plaintiffs' claim had accrued, and they are entitled to no indulgence. The suit was abated, and until it is revived, the bill cannot be amended (1 Harr. Ch. 126); the order of revival must precede the application to amend (Mitf. Eq. Pl. 62); the bill of revivor must show good cause for reviving, and that a decree can be rendered against the new parties (Coop. Eq. Pl. 70). But as the court have no jurisdiction for the want of an averment of citizenship, they can make no order in it, but may order it to be stricken from the docket, as was done in [Hylton v. U. S.] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 183; S. P., Dodge v. Perkins [Case No. 3,954]; [Capron v. Van Noorden] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 127; Wright v. Wells [Case No. 18,101]. The plaintiff has no reason to complain, after the suit abated he had his election to revive or bring a new suit; if he is allowed to amend now, he will bring in parties to answer whose ancestors would not be bound to answer if alive. He will revive the suit after it has been abated as to some of the parties twenty-two years, when his only excuse for the delay is, not having complied with the rule for security for costs. This is a hardship on those now sought to be made parties, as they could not move to hasten the cause, while the suit remained abated. They had a right to presume the suit abandoned, when no replication was filed for more than twenty years after the answer put in. There has been such gross laches, that the court will not sustain a bill of revivor, or a supplemental bill, otherwise all the evils against which the statute of limitation was intended to guard will be let in, and we may show that the statute is a bar to the bill of revivor, though it would not be to the original bill (Hollingshead's Case, 1 P. Wms. 744; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 235); and this after a decree to account. A bill of revivor must be brought within six years after the suit abates, if an account is prayed for, as courts of equity will not sustain a bill in any case where there has been laches in prosecuting the claim; if not accounted for, the lapse of time is good ground for dismissing the bill. 3 Johns. Ch. 586. A mortgage cannot be redeemed after twenty years' possession by the mortgagee (2 Sch. & L. 636); the party seeking relief must do it promptly (1 Ves. & B. 246); stale demands will not be enforced (Jeremy, 548; 18 Ves. 196, 286, 180; 2 Vern. 276; Willard v. Dorr [Case No. 17,680]; 2 Ves. Sr. 400; 2 Eden, 169); nor an amendment be allowed after great delay (4 Price, 325; 3 Anstr. 807; S. P. [Elmendorf v. Taylor], 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 168). This is not only a stale, but a hard, ungracious claim, on which a court of equity will act on the same principle as courts of law, in refusing amendments in penal or hard actions, where there has been delay (6 Durn. & E. [6 Term R.] 171; 8 Durn. & E. [8 Term R.] 30); or in qui tam actions (2 Durn. & E. [2 Term R.] 707; 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 228). There can be no decree in this case for the want of proper parties; the personal representatives of the mortgagee, and the assignees of the mortgage must be parties. 2 Freem. 59, pl. 66, 180, 245; 2 Atk. 235; Randall v. Phillips [Case No. 11,555]; [Caldwell v. Taggart], 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 202. The heir also must be a party; Coop. Eq. Pl. 146, 246. If one tenant in common dies, his heirs must be made parties. 11 Ves. 312. The want of proper parties is an objection to the jurisdiction of the court, which must be met whenever the question occurs. [Ketland v. The Cassius] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 368. Jurisdiction depends on the residence of the parties when the suit is brought. [Mollan v. Torrance] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 539; [Connolly v. Taylor] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 556, 565. In this case there were parties in interest residing in New York, who are necessary parties ([Strawbridge v. Curtiss] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 267; [Sullivan v. Fulton Steamboat Co.] 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 450; 5 Johns. Ch. 303), but cannot be brought within the jurisdiction of the court; the consequence of which is, that the bill cannot be sustained, though it is amended according to the plaintiff's motion. This is a fatal objection to the bill, existing when it was filed, which cannot be cured. 1 Ves. Sr. 446. This court cannot proceed against a citizen of New York in any way, as he cannot be brought in by publication or notice. Vide [Mandeville v. Riggs] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 482. If the case cannot be completely decided between the litigant parties, on account of a person whom the process of the court cannot reach, being a party in interest the court cannot make a decree. [Elmendorf v. Taylor] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 167, 168. So if there is a joint interest in such party, and a party to the suit, the court have no jurisdiction. [Cameron v. M'Roberts] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 593, 594; S. P. [Russell v. Clark], 7 Cranch (11 U. S.) 69, 98. The record shows this to be the situation of the defendants to the original bill; the court therefore cannot act upon the case.

BY THE COURT. It has been made a ground of objection to the motion to amend the original bill, that the suit has abated, and must be revived before the bill can be amended, but this objection is not sustained in point of fact. One of the original plaintiffs is alive, in whom the rights of both unite, as well by survivorship as by a conveyance from the executors of the deceased party. Two of the original defendants are also alive. There is therefore a cause in court between original parties, pending and open on the pleadings without an issue, so that the object of the bill of revivor is not to make a new suit, but to add other parties to one which has never abated. The demurrer to the bill of revivor and supplemental bill, pointed to a fatal objection to the jurisdiction of the court over the cause, inasmuch as there was no averment of the citizenship of the defendants in the original bill. As this is an objection always open, and conclusive against any action of the court after it is made, the cause will be coram non judice, unless it can be made to appear on the record that the defendants are citizens of New Jersey. The consequence therefore of sustaining this objection must be, that if there can be no amendment without revival, there can be no revival without amendment, as there will be no proceeding over which the court can exercise jurisdiction. The judgment on the demurrer is not final; had it been in favour of the plaintiff, the defendant would have been ordered to answer over, or plead to the bills, and after a judgment against him, the plaintiff may amend at any time. Where judgment was arrested for the want of jurisdiction in not averring the value of the property in controversy, the plaintiff was permitted to amend by adding the averment. Lanning v. Dolph [Case No. 8,073]. It is the common practice to amend by inserting the averment of citizenship of parties, wherever the want of it is suggested. Connolly v. Taylor, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 565. The averment of value and citizenship are both indispensable to the jurisdiction of the court, yet are mere matters of form, as regards the merits of the case, and will be added, if true, in point of fact. Though the averment is not in the record, and the judgment would be reversed on error, yet it would not be a nullity to be avoided collaterally. Kemp v. Kennedy, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 173. It is too late to object to the jurisdiction after an affirmance in the supreme court and a mandate for execution. Skillern v. May, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 267. So if all parties are aliens, the court may sustain jurisdiction, if no objection is made. Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 264. In this case, there is jurisdiction in fact, as the defendants are citizens of New Jersey, the amendment is no surprise to them, and is in fact mere form, so considered by all parties who, with knowledge of the defect, and the decisions of the supreme court, have suffered the cause to remain in its original form from 1795 till 1826, without suggesting any want of jurisdiction.

It has been objected that the act of limitations has barred the plaintiff of all remedy, so as to prevent the court from affording him any aid in the prosecution of this suit, but so far as respects the matter in the original bill, the judgment of the court on the plea of the statute heretofore filed by the defendants, is conclusive on the parties who pleaded it and their privies. They cannot again set up the same matter as a bar, though it may be done by new parties (not privies to the parties who made the plea) to the original, the supplemental, or bill of revival; as to them the case will be open to all objections arising from any statutory limitation, any rule of equity adopted by analogy, or the staleness of the demand. But in the present stage of the case, we cannot yield to either objection, when made on a collateral question of amendment; they apply to the merits of the cause on a final hearing, or on plea or demurrer, not to a motion to so amend the record as to give the court jurisdiction to hear and determine the merits in some way.

By allowing the amendments, nothing is decided against the defendants; the original bill is not revived or new parties added, all questions as to the right of the plaintiff to revive, or whether there are proper parties to the suit, remain open; parties may be added after the reversal of a final decree, and the cause remanded to the circuit court. Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 99; Caldwell v. Taggart, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 190. It is therefore premature, to now decide upon any matter affecting the right to revive, or as to proper parties, till the court shall have the power to decide these questions on a proper record. A refusal to amend, is fatal to the plaintiff's case without the right of appeal; the supreme court cannot review a motion to amend which rests in the discretion of this court, whereas an appeal would lie on our final decree against him, upon any of the grounds of objection now made to the proposed amendments. It would be hard to place him in this predicament, that he would be debarred of any appeal by our decision on any of the collateral questions which have been made in the argument, while all would be open to the defendant after a final decree. The staleness of the demand has been much insisted on, as a reason for refusing the amendments, but we cannot permit it to prevail. If the lapse of time brings the case, in our opinion, within the act of limitation, we cannot reverse the former judgment of this court; if it does not, then the staleness of the demand cannot be so palpable at the first blush, as to authorize us to throw the plaintiff out of court for this cause on a motion to amend. The judgment on the plea of the statute, is yet open to revision by the supreme court after our decree on the merits, and if we differed from our predecessors on that point, it would be but a decent respect to their memories to leave the question open.

There is, however, one question arising from the lapse of time, on which it is proper to give an opinion, that is, whether the motion to amend was not too late in 1827. This objection would have been a good one, if the plaintiff had delayed making the motion to amend an unreasonable time after the want of jurisdiction had been pleaded or suggested. It escaped the attention of all parties for more than thirty years after the commencement of the suit, when the defendant assigned it as one of the causes of demurrer; the present motion was made immediately after the judgment of the court, and was in due time. We are therefore of opinion, that the plaintiffs have a right to make the proposed amendments, according to the established principles of courts both of common law and equity, and that we are bound to allow them by the provisions of the thirty-second section of the judiciary act "in order to enable us to proceed and give judgment according to the right of the case."

Amendment allowed.

Case No. 4,824.

FISHER et al. v. The SYBIL.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 274;[1] 5 Hughes, 61; 6 Hall. Law J. 509.]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. June, 1816.[2]

SALVAGE—AMOUNT OF.

Liberal compensation must always be made in case of salvage, not only with a view to the value and danger of the thing saved, but for the general interest in promoting exertions in such cases.

[See note at end of case.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of South Carolina.]

In admiralty.

JOHNSON, Circuit Justice. If ever there was a case in which the claimants on a libel for salvage were thrown upon the protection of a court, this is one. There is not a witness to anything that occurred on the ocean, who is not interested in increasing the compensation. Even Dangerfield, the master, to extricate himself from damages and censure, finds his interests coincide with those of the libellant, in making out a justification for abandoning the vessel. However the witnesses may differ in representing the merits of each other, they all, with the exception of one (I mean the Indian seaman, Francis,) concur in making this out a case of great distress, and complete abandonment. The practice of this court permits the individual in such a case, to exhibit his own merits on his own oath, and it is but too evident that most of the salvors have attached much importance to the idea that this is a case of derelict, and that the salvage in such a case must necessarily consist of a large proportion of the goods saved. It is only in the contest for the distribution of this proportion that they disagree, and each one showing too strong a disposition to present himself as the hero of the adventure. Their advocates have ably and ingeniously argued that cases of derelict are cases in which the salvors are peculiarly entitled to a liberal reward; that the courts have manifested the most striking liberality in such cases, generally giving one half, sometimes as far as three fifths, never less than one third. The property libelled being of considerable amount, nearly one hundred thousand dollars in value, it becomes very material to the salvors to maintain this doctrine. But whoever looks into the history of the law of salvage, will find it to be as now acknowledged, in admiralty courts, comparatively of modern origin. Even the meaning of the term "derelict" is now materially varied from what it was originally, and the idea that the salvor is entitled to anything like a de jure compensation, has long since been exploded. In the language both of the civil and common law, "derelict," as applied to chattels, meant a thing voluntarily abandoned, so that the first finder became the lawful possessor, if he reduced it into possession. Such were the bona vacantia of the civil law; in which, in a state of nature, it is evident, whether the thing be found on sea or land, that the individual would acquire an absolute and exclusive interest; but in a state of society, whether he should take it wholly to himself or to the use of his sovereign: or what portion of it he should retain, and with whom divide the residue, must necessarily depend upon the provision of positive law. The barbarous notions in which originated the droit de bris of France, and the royal privilege of wreck in England, have long since, (among the rulers, if not among the people of those countries) given way to the progress of moral, intellectual, and commercial improvement. But there is reason to think that wreck and derelict were anciently confounded. It is perfectly natural for the inhabitant of a sea coast, whose subsistence perhaps from his earliest recollection has been drawn from the ocean, to consider whatever is thrown up by the sea as a bounty from Providence to the first finder. But the possessor of the soil would also put in his claim, and either exclude the casual trespasser, or insist that the bounty was sent to himself, and confer on the finder a portion or compensation as a gratuity. Such at this day is the law of England, with regard to the property of a pirate or enemy cast away on the coast. It is not so easy to find a satisfactory reason for the idea which too certainly has prevailed, that a shipwrecked mariner may be treated as a shipwrecked enemy. Yet in the history of navigation, we may find an apology, if not a justification for this barbarous notion.

The first nautical expeditions were certainly equipped for the purposes of war or plunder. The coasts of France and Great Britain were long infested and devastated by the cruisers of Norway and Denmark. If then every vessel that appeared threatened plunder, slavery and bloodshed, it was natural to consider every vessel that was wrecked as an enemy on whom heaven had executed vengeance. The benign spirit which religion has breathed into modern ethics would assign to an enemy in misfortune the treatment of a friend, but death, plunder and slavery may have been sanctioned by retaliation, and was certainly the law of the victor in that day. I can scarcely admit the disgraceful supposition that afterwards, as commerce extended, and the eyes of men became opened to the necessary distinction between wreck and derelict, the cruel purpose of removing a claimant or a witness could have operated to expose the lives of shipwrecked persons, but there is too much reason to infer from the laws which have been passed for their protection, that some protection was necessary. In the Laws of Oleron, art. 31, it is asserted that this often happened; and as late as the year 1798, in a case which occurred before Sir William Scott,—The Aquila [1 C. Rob. Adm. 37],—we find a magistrate alleging on oath, that the plundering of a wreck is customary on that part of the coast of England where he resided.

For the modern acceptation of the word "derelict" we may very safely take the definition of Sir Leoline Jenkins, as given us by Sir W. Scott: "Boats or other vessels (or, he may have added, any goods washed overboard at sea, or floated away from land) forsaken, or found on the seas, without any person in them, of these the admiralty has but the custody, and the owner may recover them in a year and a day." And such the form of the libel usually filed in such cases, declares it to be, to wit: "found floating to and fro on the high and open seas." Such goods are in the first instance pronounced "derelict" in the restricted sense of the word, to wit: abandoned from fear or necessity. But after the year and day they are considered as pure derelict, as having been absolutely and voluntarily abandoned, so that the sum or portion reserved in the registry of the court becomes a droit of the admiralty. If there is anything in the law of salvage which distinguishes the case of a salvor or "derelict," in the modern acceptation of the term, from any other salvor, I have never been able to discover it. Whether we refer to the reason of the thing, or to adjudged cases, the court appears to possess an equal latitude of discretion in all cases of salvage, and rewards either by adjudging a compensation in ratio or in number, as it thinks reasonable. One general rule, and that alone appears to run through all the cases, and that is "the compensation must be liberal, and that too not only with a view to the value and endangered state of the thing saved, the risk incurred, the skill and labor bestowed, but with a view to the general interests of commerce in promoting exertions in such cases, and to the interests of mankind in rewarding and promoting generous and magnanimous actions. The court undertakes to direct not only the justice but the generosity of the claimant. However the ancient idea that wreck and derelict was the property of the crown may have been exploded in modern times, it is very certain that something like that idea has been preserved in the adjudication, between salvors and claimants, as to the quantum which each shall retain of the thing saved. Such unlimited discretion has always been assumed, as looks very much like acting under the principle that "cujus est dare cujus est disponere." That it is not a mere case of quantum meruit is universally allowed; and why the court should prescribe a rule to the generosity of the claimant under any other idea, is difficult to discover. For the same reason it is that a compensation has been awarded to an apprentice boy instead of his master, and hence perhaps also such liberties are taken with the reasonable rules of evidence as suffer parties to make out their case upon their own affidavits, as they do in some measure in prize cases, which are certainly boons of the government. If the case of "derelict," according to the modern acceptation of the term, be considered, with a view to the reason of the thing, there will be found to be in it no ground necessarily attaching to it a superior claim to all other compensation. It is very easy to conceive a case which cannot come within the definition of derelict, which would rally all the best feeling of the heart around it in support of a reference. Take the case of a vessel whose crew is sick or exhausted, or devouring each other for food; or take the case of a vessel without boat, on fire, or stranded, with her whole crew on board, and in danger every moment of going to pieces, where not only the vessel, but the lives of the crew are saved. In a case of pure derelict, as of a pirate, where the court knows at the time of adjudication, that the residue must be adjudged a droit, and where, of course, it is a mere bounty to the government as well as to the individual, it may very well be conceived that the court would be very liberal in awarding salvage; but when the party himself, the original owner, puts in his claim, and sets up the plea of misfortune, the case is widely different; and traces of this distinction will be found to exist in the ancient sea laws of Europe. Sir. W. Scott, in the case of The Aquila, in considering the question whether a moiety could be claimed de jure by a salvor, has said, that he could find no trace of such a right in the Consolato del Mare. As applicable to the case of derelict, according to the modern meaning, this eminent judge is unquestionably right; but the modern meaning was not probably attached to the word when those laws were compiled, for they are of great and no ascertained antiquity. But in the case of pure derelict, where the other moiety is to be given to the lord and the poor, the one moiety is by the Consolato del Mare given to the salvor (chapter 252,) and hence probably originated the English rule which appears to have existed in a remote period, that the thing saved should be divided by moieties between the salvor and the king. But by the Laws of Oleron, which are of the highest authority in this court of any of the ancient systems, all persons were required to aid and assist in saving shipwrecked goods, "and that without any embezzlement or taking any part thereof from the right owners; but, however, there may be a remuneration or consideration for salvage to such as take pains therein according to right, reason, or good conscience, and as justice shall appoint." Article 29. This article probably laid the foundation of the jurisdiction which this court is now exercising. In the 45th article of the second fragment of the Law of Rhodes it is enacted "that if a ship be surprised at sea with whirlwinds, or be shipwrecked, any person saving anything of the wreck, shall have one-fifth of what he saves." Although this article does not say what is to be done with the residue, yet it evidently relates to a case of restoration, as appears by the next or 46th article, according to which "if any one find a boat, which has broken loose from a ship and drifted to sea, and preserves it safe, he shall restore everything as he found it, and receive one fifth as a reward." Although the counsel in The Aquila argued that one half was the usual and favorite salvage in case of derelict, yet unless they meant to confine themselves to voluntary or to total abandonment, it would rather seem that (in ancient times at least) one fifth was the favorite proportion in cases like the present, or even stronger cases. For shipwrecked effects found on the high sea or "fished up out of the bottom of it," the Ordinance of Louis XIV. allowed a third to the salvor, the remainder to be restored to the owners. Section 45, art. 1, s. 27. If then we compare the ancient sea laws with modern decisions, we find that, except in case of pure derelict, they were hardly as liberal as the courts of admiralty are at the present day; and modern liberality has, I fear, been too much exerted, from a want of attention to the distinction between cases where the residue becomes a droit, and those in which it is restored to the original owner. I cannot think the argument a sound one that salvage in fact falls upon the underwriter who has been paid for the risk; for the spes recuperandi is one of the perquisites of the insurer, and which combines with others to enable him to underwrite at a less premium. Nor can I admit that the compensation to the salvor must be in a certain ratio to the thing saved, or that that ratio is not to be diminished from relation to the amount.

The question to be decided by the court is always one to which no fixed rule can be assigned. How shall the salvor be compensated? is this inquiry. And how is it possible to produce uniformity in the decisions of courts, where the judges are to act on circumstances endless in their variety and combinations, and of which any two men may take different views? Or how is it possible to detach the mind from considering the amount saved both with a view to increasing the compensation as to the claimant on the one hand, and diminishing it as to the salvor on the other? As to the question whether it shall be in proportion or in numero; if the judge, knowing the value of the thing saved, is unrestricted in fixing the compensation, it is immaterial to bind him down to the fixing of it by way of ratio, since it is so easy to bring it to numerical precision. It is true, that it has been most usual for courts to adjudge in proportion: but the reason of that is evident. Courts of justice, perhaps more than any other constituted bodies, will receive a tone in their proceedings from the mores majorum. At a time when commerce was carried on by actual merchandise, it would have been the most simple and natural mode of compensation to make an actual division of the thing saved, if susceptible of division. But at the present day, money, the medium of commerce, expresses the value and all subdivisions of property with a more convenient precision, as it is the standard by which the mind is accustomed to compare the value of things. That such a practice should have prevailed is easily accounted for from this cause. It is evident, that whenever a legislative power undertakes to affix a compensation by way of salvage, it can only do so by assigning a proportion to the salvor. This is done in all the ancient systems of sea laws: and this very naturally led to the practice of assigning a proportion for salvage in the adjudications of the admiralty courts. But under the practice of modern times and the Laws of Oleron, I hold an admiralty court to be at large to decree compensation either numerically or by ratio, as it deems proper. But could I be induced to attach any importance to the idea of derelict abstractly considered I should not adjudge this to be a case of derelict even in the modern acceptation of the term. The vessel was not found derelict upon the ocean, and when she was deserted by her crew, all the witnesses prove an express abandonment of her to Mr. Fisher, or the ship's company of the Margaret. "There she is, make what you can of her." Her actual state of distress then, and the merits and compensation of the respective salvors shall govern my decision, without attaching any technical importance to the epithet by which her state may most correctly be designated. And here while the practice of the courts permits each claimant to make the most of his merits on his own affidavit, it is impossible for the mind to detach itself from the conviction, that the testimony of any man is to be received with due caution, where he swears in his own behalf. And we are naturally led to the consideration of these facts, concerning which there can be no dispute, and these parts of the testimony of each witness which have no immediate bearing upon his own interests, as furnishing the best grounds to form an opinion upon. As to the state of the vessel, the case furnishes satisfactory evidence on all points except two leaks. The main and mizzen masts were gone, with all their rigging, and most of their spars, and in going overboard they had carried with them a part of the bulwark. The long-boat, at the time of the abandonment, though leaky, was fit for use. Afterwards it appears to have been materially injured. Water and provisions she had in abundance, and a ship's company consisting of sixteen persons, all of whom, except one or two (perhaps three) were fit for duty. Her foremast and bowsprit, with all their rigging were perfect; and the hull of the vessel new, stanch, and strong, so much so, that a ship-carpenter of great skill and experience says, "the men ought to be hanged who would have deserted her." Her nautical instruments were in sufficient preservation, her reckoning accurate, and they were at the time of meeting not above three hundred miles from our coast, not above four hundred miles from Norfolk, where the vessel was owned, and about the same distance from Philadelphia and New York, where her cargo was owned. The wind was tolerably fair for the first port, and there was little difficulty in making any port in the whole extent of the American Atlantic coast. On the state of her leaks, the evidence is various and contradictory. When they took possession of her, Fisher says, she had four feet of water in her hold: Jones makes it only thirty or forty inches. Fisher says she made eighteen inches per hour, whereas in port she did not make above seven; but on this point there are three facts in which all concur: 1st, that four hands pumped her dry before 12 at night; 2nd, that only seventy-three bales of her cargo were damaged, and those so little as to sell for above twenty cents per pound; 3d, that the leaks did not cause the abandonment, for they were known when the ship first hailed the Margaret, at which time the captain of the Sybil expressed no idea of abandoning her. Some of the witnesses, indeed, say, that on hailing a second time, Dangerfield declared they had sprung a fresh leak. But Dangerfield in his protest says nothing of the kind, and he would not then have omitted it had it been true. I therefore conclude that the leaks did not very greatly endanger her safety.

We now come to the very material cause of the abandonment, to wit, the state of the rudder; and this indeed was the only cause, —for the protest and the evidence show that before this discovery, the captain was so far from intending to abandon her, that he only requested a supply of cordage and sails from the brig, and upon being informed that they could not spare any, he made sail away on his course. On this point the evidence is also various and contradictory. Dangerfield in his protest alleges that it hung together only by a few splinters; but this is a gross exaggeration. The rudder must have been injured in the gale, and the vessel had been nearly two days working with it in that condition, when she fell in with the Margaret. Besides, the ship-carpenters who have examined it in port agree that it required but little skill, labor, or risk to mend it. Captain Todd thinks that any gentleman then in the court room could have mended it; and several other witnesses agree that it was a very poor apology for abandoning the ship. To this we may add, what is very well known; that the loss of a rudder is by no means fatal, as a ship may be steered by her sails or by a cable, or by both in co-operation.

I now come to the most disagreeable part of this case, to examine the respective merits of the salvors—and first, of Fisher. This gentleman claims salvage on account of personal services; on account of being the owner of the Margaret, and on account of the freight of her cargo, and the sum awarded him by the district court would amount to more than twenty thousand dollars. I have pondered long upon the merits of Mr. Fisher, not uninfluenced by a reluctance at differing very widely from the opinion of the district court, or of underrating the services of any man, especially one of such high pretensions. But really no effort can bring my mind to place this salvor on a pre-eminent footing of merit. I look in vain throughout his conduct to discover one trace of magnanimity or disinterestedness. Nothing appears in it but selfishness. He first claims a very high salvage from the owners, and then in the spirit of monoply finds some pretext or other for excluding his fellow adventurers from sharing the golden harvest. I am far from cherishing the Utopian notion, that pure disinterestedness is to be expected from man. But salvage is not a compensation for what we do for ourselves, but what we do for others. And the man who in the prosecution of selfish views can forget what is due from man to man—I will not add from a brother sailor in a state of distress—comes with a bad grace into this court to lay claim to that liberality which is the acknowledged meed of gallantry and generous sentiments. The compensation of such an one should be limited to mere quantum meruit. I am led to apply these remarks to Fisher from the fol lowing considerations, drawn from his own testimony. 1. It is in evidence that Fisher was bred a shipwright, and his skill, dexterity, and exertions as such, form a chief ground of his claims to compensation. It is also in evidence that when the Sybil approached the Margaret the second time, Fisher came on board, and he and Dangerfield went into the cabin and examined the state of the rudder through the windows. Upon being then consulted expressly with regard to the rudder he told the captain—to use his own words—"that it was in an extremely bad state." Now the contrary of this has been expressly proved, and he himself proved it by repairing it the next day. That he was ignorant of its actual state, and of the means and facility of repairing it, cannot be supposed, whether we consider his skill as a shipwright, or his readiness to go on board immediately and take charge of her with only four men. Then what did moral duty point out to him as the conduct to be pursued on that occasion? Not surely to increase the alarm of the captain by magnifying his danger, but to point out the means by which it could be repaired, and tender his assistance in repairing it. Doing otherwise looks too much like a premeditated design to take advantage of the fears, ignorance and imbecility of the captain, to get possession of the ship. But after getting possession of her and putting her in the partial refitment with which she reached this port, if he had in his subsequent conduct shown that he was at all influenced by considerations drawn from a view to the interest of the owner, this would have operated to remove the unfavorable impression which his conduct respecting the rudder was calculated to produce. Instead of which we find, that when he was but three hundred miles from the American coast, he bore away for Jamaica, distant at least one thousand miles, at a time when those seas are much more exposed to the danger of tempestuous weather than the north coast of the United States. I do not deny that he was justifiable in doing this, for after being in possession of the vessel, they had a right to judge for themselves how far keeping company with the Margaret outweighed all other considerations; but if in their decision, as to their course, the interest of the owners gave way to personal considerations, this certainly lessens their right to demand compensation from those owners. And as the vessel was sufficient to have made the voyage to the United States alone, no one can doubt that the interest of the owners was pretermitted in the attempt to go to Jamaica. I consider Mr. Fisher for these reasons, as a salvor who had nobody's interest in view but his own, and as entitled to compensation in proportion to the incidental advantages resulting to the owners. And here may it not be asked, had the owners any cause to rejoice that the Sybil fell in with the Margaret? Would it not have been for their interest that the ship had not encountered her or any other vessel at sea? She was competent to make the voyage to the United States in all human prob ability, and they might then have repaired her, earned her freight, and escaped the payment of salvage. Certainly no service was rendered them by taking out the crew. And had not the crew been taken out, possessing as they did the competent means of saving their lives, in the effort to do so they would have saved the property. In one view, therefore, Mr. Fisher may be considered as the innocent cause of doing the owners material injury. But it will not do to act upon that view of the case, for the cause of humanity forbids that the captain of the Margaret should have refused on any ground to take the crew of the Sybil on board if requested. It is therefore a case of salvage, but not a case of the highest order. And as no one could have left the Margaret without Fisher's permission, I certainly consider him as the dux facti, and as such ranked above all the salvors. But he cannot lay claim to the credit of having either navigated or commanded the Sybil, or having even discharged the duties of a mate on board of her.

As to the individual merits of the salvors, it is not necessary to remark very particularly on the evidence respecting them. Jones evidently was master and navigator on board the Sybil. However Fisher may have been his superior on board the Margaret, he certainly ranked his former owner on board the Sybil. The whole crew received and acknowledged him as captain. Rice appeared to have acted as next in command, and to have enjoyed an acknowledged superiority. Beech the landsman, a character always sneered at on board ship, did his best, and deserved much credit for having volunteered among the first: not a little in my opinion from a consideration of the doubts and fears which may be reasonably expected to attend a landsman in such an undertaking. With regard to the six colored seamen who belonged to the original crew of the Sybil, some questions of considerable nicety and difficulty arise. 1st. Whether they are to be regarded as salvors, or referred to their original contract with the ship. 2d. Whether if considered as salvors, they shall themselves receive their compensation, or it shall be adjudged to Fisher, or if not to him, to the whole ship's company of salvors. Fisher claims the whole, under an agreement which he sets up as having been entered into by these men to navigate the Sybil for twenty-five dollars per month. It appears that the day after they took possession of the Sybil they hailed the Margaret and inquired if any of the Sybil's crew who were then on board the Margaret "would volunteer" (that was the expression) on board the Sybil. These six men then came on board the Sybil; no agreement was made while yet in the Margaret, but after they are on board the Sybil they make this agreement which is set up by Fisher. I omit here, as I have omitted all along, to make any reference to the evidence of Francis, as I could wish, if possible, to avoid giving weight to any man's testimony except where it makes against himself, or his interests are unaffected by the consequences. But I confess I feel a strong moral repugnance at admitting the claim of Fisher, so far as it is founded upon the services of these men. That he who claims twenty thousand dollars compensation, and who without the aid of these men could never have earned a cent of it, should be enriched, whilst they who never, according to Rice's testimony, voluntarily quitted the ship, and who returned to it expressly as volunteers, should be put off with scarcely enough to buy them a suit of clothes, carries with it something very inconsistent with moral propriety, and I acknowledge that it is with pleasure I lay hold on any ground to get rid of the necessity of making such a decree. The case affords two sufficient grounds. 1st. It is acknowledged that they were called upon to enter as volunteers, and under that idea they came on board the Sybil. No agreement was made for wages on board the Margaret, and whether a parol agreement was made before the written agreement or not, still it was not made till they were in a situation in which every seaman feels that he is not a free agent. The confirmatory agreement made after their arrival in port, is liable to the same objection, and I here explicitly acknowledge that I am not satisfied with the fairness of the one or the other. But there is another ground of objection. Whatever may have been Fisher's situation on board the Margaret, when they entered on board the Sybil, associated with four others, their migration was complete, and they assumed new relations, although they could not have quitted the Margaret without Fisher's consent, yet neither could he, without their consent, have forced them to quit her. When therefore they entered on board the Sybil, they had their rights as well as Fisher, and he could no more lessen their compensation as salvors for his own benefit, than they could his. The agreement, therefore, with the black seamen, if it operated to deprive them of their claim as salvors, enured to the benefit of the company of salvors; but they set up no claim under it, and acknowledge that it was not explained to these seamen that they were to forfeit their claim to salvage.

But here another question arises—are these seamen, as relates to the owners, to be at liberty to depart from their original relation, and assume the new one of salvors? One thing only, can sanction such a departure, and that is, they have not been in default. Their captain, against their will, as Rice testifies, obliged them to quit the Sybil, and he could not afterwards control them to prevent their assuming this new relation. They were freed from their original contract, and at liberty to act for themselves; I shall therefore adjudge them entitled to a compensation by way of salvage. But what is to be done with regard to Perry? He is clearly proved to be an absconded slave, and his owner has lost his services for several years. To this I reply, that whatever may have been my decision, had he been at the time hired out for the benefit of his master, since he was in fact a runaway, his master must receive his compensation and not himself.

One more question remains to be disposed of. The ship had proceeded six hundred miles on her way to Jamaica, when Jones and the crew, without the consent and against the will of Fisher, altered their course in the night and made for this port. Fisher contends that this was an act of mutiny, which worked a forfeiture of the rights of all concerned in it. But it appears to me that this deviation was the first act, unquestionably correct, done by the company of the salvors. Jones was unexceptionably the master, and even if we view Fisher as the owner, which is the highest grade to which he can pretend, his station at sea is inferior to that of the master. There could not be a mutiny then where the master headed the opposition. The ship's company had a right to alter the ship's course for the good of all concerned, and more especially to make an alteration so materially beneficial to the owners of the vessel and cargo. It was the first instance in which Fisher's interest had given way to those of the owners, and this was violently opposed by him. Besides, if this forfeiture had occurred, it would not have been to the benefit of Fisher, but of the owners, and it would be absurd to adjudge that a cause of forfeiture which clearly tended to their benefit.

In the course of the argument, the case of Mason v. The Blaireau [2 Cranch (6 U.

S.) 240] was often cited; and that case was very justly considered as the best standard for governing our decision in this. I readily receive it as such; and think, that when compared with that, the merits of this case are strikingly inferior. 1st. The amount saved was only about two-thirds the present amount. 2nd. The attempt to save the Blaireau was universally acknowledged to to be attended with great danger, almost desperate, such was her leaky and shattered state; here the danger is universally allowed to have been but inconsiderable, as the loss of the masts in fact, in some measure diminished it. The distance navigated there, is stated to have been three thousand miles; true or false, is immaterial, if the court were under the influence of that impression. If the owner's interest had been considered, it need not have been navigated above twelve hundred. Whether the Blaireau was derelict or not, I have before declared, technically immaterial, but I should think it unavailing to contend that Tooles' being on board, could diminish the merit of the salvors. To the merit of saving the property was added the more important consideration of saving human life. Finally, it has been contended, that the owners of the ship in this case ought to be allowed their freight and general average, principally on the ground of their having precipitated a sale of vessel and cargo, so as to deprive the owners of an opportunity of tendering salvage, and proceeding on their voyage. If precipitating sale is any ground of complaint, it is obvious that it can only be made against the district court, and not against the salvor. I am fully aware, that great and unnecessary loss to owners may be produced in such cases, as salvage can be as well ascertained by appraisement as by sale. But if a court has unadvisedly been led to order a sale in such a case, it is as against the salvors, damnum absque injuria. Freight and average can with no propriety be charged upon salvors, as both the freight and the average are equally the result of the efforts in saving the ship and goods. That claim, therefore, must be wholly rejected.

Upon the whole, I shall decree to the salvors the one fourth of the net proceeds of the vessel and cargo, and hesitate while I do so, under an apprehension that I have given too much. This will amount to more than twenty-one thousand dollars; of this sum let four hundred be paid to the pilot boat Opposition, and in the distribution of the balance, I adjudge one third to the Margaret, her freight cargo and crew. The remaining two thirds to be divided into twenty-four parts, and distributed as follows: to Fisher, eight parts; to Beach, one part; to the five free seaman, and the owner of Perry the slave each one part. In distributing the one third assigned to the Margaret, let the sum be also divided into twenty-four parts, sixteen of which are to be divided amongst the owners of the vessel, cargo, and freight, according to their relative value; in which distribution, let the vessel be valued at three thousand dollars, the freight at four thousand, and the cargo at the rate which Fisher himself fixes the value in his testimony, valuing those articles to which he does not testify at the advance proved by him on others. The reason for adopting this mode of fixing the value of the cargo is this: the result is unfavorable to Fisher, but he cannot murmur at it, as it is founded on his own testimony, and Johnson, the owner, being on board, and having consented to the undertaking, is certainly entitled to salvage. In distributing the remaining eight shares of the Margaret's third, it is right that Darrell, the second mate of the Sybil, should participate. He was entered mate to the Margaret, and, what I attach more importance to, he appears to have been desirous of remaining by his own ship. Kennedy is also entitled to some distinction in this division. Let Wilson then have three parts, Darrell one part and a half, Kennedy one part, and the balance be equally distributed among the remainder of the Margaret's crew. The balance of the proceeds must be distributed among the claimants according as they shall prove interest. The claims of freight and average, even as between vessel and cargo, I wholly reject, as the abandonment put an end to the contract, and I consider the salvage paid by the freighters as a substitute for both freight and average. The decree of the district court (that decree awarded fifty per cent. salvage [case unreported]) is thus revised, and anulled so far as it is inconsistent with this decree, and the register will report to this court such evidence relative to interest, as will enable it to make a final order of distribution after paying all costs, which are to be charged upon the entire amount of the sales.

As to the specie, which it appears was taken from the Sybil and saved in the Margaret, I think it not necessary to make any observations respecting it, as it does not appear to me to be at all subject to our jurisdiction. Had any thing improper been done respecting it, we should have enforced such terms upon the salvors as would have been consistent with equity and good conscience; but nothing with this view appears to require the interference of this court.

[NOTE. On appeal, this decree of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion. It was held that under the peculiar circumstances of this case the amount of salvage to be allowed is within the discretion of the court, and that appeals in such cases should be discouraged; but the learned justice remarked that in this case the court was satisfied both with the amount of salvage allowed and the mode of distribution. BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought on letters patent granted to the plaintiffs, as assignees of Thomas J. Flagg, the inventor, September 14, 1869, for "an improvement in suspender-ends." The specification says: "My invention consists of a suspender-end, faced with felt, and combined with buckskin, chamois leather, kid, goat-skin, or other strengthening material. In manufacturing my improved article, I prefer to employ a strong, hard felt, such as is used for the manufacture of bonnets, or such as is used in the manufacture of piano-forte hammers. I paste a sheet of strengthening material to a sheet of such felt by means of wheat-flour paste. I press the composite sheet and permit it to dry. I then cut out the suspender-ends from the composite sheet by means of a cutting-die, whose edge corresponds with the outline of the suspender-ends. I also cut a button-hole in one end of the article by means of a cutting-die of the required form. The article is then sewed with lines of stitching by means of a sewing-machine, the effect of which is to improve the appearance of the article and to combine its members securely. * * * In some cases, I manufacture the articles of two thicknesses of felt, with a layer of goat-skin or kid between them; and, in some cases, a single thickness of felt and a single thickness of chamois leather, with a layer of goat-skin or other strengthening material between the two. In either case, I prefer to conduct the manufacture by first producing a composite sheet by pasting the material together. The faces of the articles may be made of any desired color by using felt dyed of that color. I prefer to employ for my manufacture felt produced without spinning and weaving; but felt produced in part by spinning and weaving will answer the purpose, provided the felting process has been effected so thoroughly that the edges of the articles, when cut, do not ravel. * * * Composite felt suspender-ends, made as above described, have the ornamental appearance and freedom from raveling at the edges of a suspender-end composed wholly of felt, and also the advantage that they do not tend to stain the clothing with which the felt face is in contact, even though the suspender-end be wet with perspiration. They possess, in addition, the advantage incident to the strength of the strengthening material with which the felt is combined. * * * I am aware that suspender-ends have been made of two or more thicknesses of various materials, and therefore I do not claim broadly a suspender-end composed of two materials of every description."

The claim is: "The composite felt suspender-end, hereinbefore described, composed of felt combined with a strengthening material, the same being a new article of manufacture."

The answer substantially admits the infringement by the defendant, by the sale by him, as agent of the American Suspender Company, of suspender-ends composed of felt and leather, constructed as described in the patent. Such infringement is also otherwise proved.

The answer sets up prior knowledge and use of the invention by various persons at the city of New York, particularly one Augustus Pototsky, and others connected with him there, and various persons at Waterbury, Connecticut, particularly one John W. Dayton, and others connected with him there. It also sets up that all the knowledge which Flagg had of the invention was obtained by him from Pototsky, and that Flagg was neither an original nor the first inventor of such invention.

[2] [From 1 O. G. 634.]

The questions involved in such defenses are wholly questions of fact on the evidence, in respect to which the burden rests on the defendant to make good the defenses by satisfactory proof. This he has failed to do as to all the points involved. It is satisfactorily shown that Flagg made the invention himself, and without any comunication of it to him by Pototsky, and that he made it as early as the forepart of October, 1868. This was prior to any invention by Dayton at Waterbury. The defendant has not established that Pototsky knew of the invention before it was made by Flagg, or that Pototsky ever made the invention, or that Pototsky did not first learn of it from or through Flagg. It is enough to state these conclusions. The evidence is voluminous, and no good purpose would be served by a discussion of it in detail.

There must be a decree for the plaintiffs for a perpetual injunction and an account, with costs.

FISK v. UNION PAC. R. CO. et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 6, 1869.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—CITIZENSHIP—SUBJECT-MATTER — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT OF JULY 27, 1868—REMOVAL OF PART OF SUIT—INDEPENDENT OF ACTION OF STATE COURT — MANDAMUS—FILING OF PETITION AND ACTION OF STATE COURT —FEDERAL QUESTION — PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT SUBSEQUENT TO REMOVAL.

1. Where a court of the United States has no jurisdiction of a case, it has no power to make any order in it except to dismiss it for want of jurisdiction.

2. The 12th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79), and the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), and the act of March 2, 1867 (Id. 558), are statutes where the right to remove a case from a state court into a court of the United States is made to depend upon citizenship or alienage.

3. The act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 632, 633), and the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 755, 756), and the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 226, 227), are statutes where the right so to remove a case is made to depend upon subject-matter.

4. The act of July 27, 1868, is constitutional.

5. Under the act of March 2, 1833, and the act of March 3, 1863, and the act of July 27, 1868, the entire suit is removed if any part of it is removed.

[Cited in Whelan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 35 Fed. 864.]

6. The 2d section of the act of July 27, 1868, construed, as to what suits are removable under it, and at whose instance, and what is the mode of removal.

7. The right to remove a cause, under all the acts of congress providing for removals, is a right conferred directly by the act of congress, and is not dependent upon the volition, or action, or non-action, of a state court.

[Cited in Brigham v. C. C. Thompson Lumber Co., 55 Fed. 884.]

[See Hughes v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 18 Fed. 106.]

8. No mandamus from a court of the United States to a state court is necessary, to enforce affirmative action by a state court, to allow a cause to be removed, in an ordinary case of the removal of a cause before judgment; and, therefore, a court of the United States has no jurisdiction to issue such mandamus.

9. Under the act of July 27, 1868, a petition for removal must be regarded as being filed in the state court when it is presented to that court with the proper surety; and, when the proper petition is so presented, with the proper surety, so that that court acts upon the matter judicially, in any way whatever, whether that court accepts the surety or not, unless it puts its refusal upon some valid defect in the petition, or some insufficiency in the surety, it loses jurisdiction of the cause eo instanti.

10. Where, in a petition for removal under the act of July 27, 1868, the defendants petitioning comply with the act, by setting out that they have a defence in the suit, arising under the constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States, that averment must, in the court of the United States, be accepted as true, until it is disposed of on the trial of the case.

11. Where a suit is removed into this court, under the act of July 27, 1868, as respects all the parties to it, and all the subject-matter involved in it, all further proceedings in it in the state court are void: and, although the state court may be proceeding further in it at the instance of a party to it, it is not necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court, that it should make an order staying all proceedings in the suit, by such party, in the state court, and, therefore, such order will not be made.

12. This court will not stay proceedings in a state court which are null and void; and it is forbidden by the 5th section of the act of March 2, 1793 (1 Stat. 334, 335), to stay valid proceedings in a state court.

This case came before the court on a motion, on the part of the defendants, to stay all proceedings on the part of the plaintiff [James Fisk, Jr.], as against any and all of the defendants, in the supreme court of the state of New York.

Edwin W. Stoughton and David Dudley Field, for plaintiff.

Samuel J. Tilden, Charles Tracy, and Clarence A. Seward, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit was originally instituted in the supreme court of the state of New York, by the plaintiff, Fisk, against the Union Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation organized under a law of the United States, and not a banking corporation, and twenty-three other defendants. It is alleged that four other defendants have since been brought in, by proceedings in the state court. The motion now made is founded on the idea that the suit is one now pending in this court, in which the plaintiff who commenced the suit in the state court is plaintiff, and all the defendants who have been made defendants in it, in the state court, are defendants. The suit was not commenced in this court by the service of process of any kind; but jurisdiction over it, if acquired at all by this court, has been acquired by a process of removal, exercised under an act of congress, passed on the 27th of July, 1868 (15 Stat. 226, 227). So far as I am aware, this is the first case which has been brought up in any court of the United States, or in any state court, under this statute. In some respects, this statute differs from all other statutes on the subject of the removal of cases into the courts of the United States, and in some respects it is similar to them.

The first question that arises for consideration upon the motion is, whether this case is in this court—whether this court has jurisdiction of the case. This question necessarily arises, and must be decided at the outset; because, if this court has no jurisdiction of the case, it has no power to entertain the motion that is made, no power to make any order either granting or denying the motion, and no power to make any order whatever in the case, except to dismiss it for want of jurisdiction. Mayor v. Cooper, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 247, 250. The order that is now asked for is not an order outside of the case, but an order in the case. I proceed, therefore, to consider whether this court has jurisdiction of the case. The question of jurisdiction was argued very fully, on the motion, by the counsel for the respective parties. The grounds urged by the counsel for the plaintiff, against the jurisdiction of the court, were: (1) That the whole suit is not in this court; (2) that no part of the suit is in this court; (3) that, under the act of 1868, a suit cannot be removed into this court, except on the petition of all of the defendants in it; (4) that the suit, to be removable, under the act of 1868, must be brought for a liability of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and also for a liability of all the other defendants, as members of such company; (5) that the petition for removal presented to the state court was not properly verified by oath, by any defendant; (6) that the suit was not brought in the state court for any liability, or alleged liability, of said company.

As was well observed by one of the counsel for the defendants, the cases of removal of suits from the state courts to the courts of the United States, provided for by acts of congress since the institution of the government, arrange themselves naturally, and according to the provisions of the statutes, into two classes. One class is, where the right of removal is given by reason of the condition of citizenship or alienage in a party; and the other class is, where the right is conferred by rea son of a subject-matter involved in the suit. The 12th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79), and the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), and the act of March 2, 1867 (Id. 558), are statutes where the right of removal is made to depend upon citizenship or alienage. The act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 632, 633), for the removal of suits or prosecutions brought on account of acts done, or authority claimed, under the revenue laws of the United States, and the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 755, 756), passed during the late Rebellion, for the removal of suits or prosecutions for acts done, or omitted to be done, during the Rebellion, by virtue of authority derived from the president of the United States, or any act of congress, and the act now in question, passed July 27, 1868, are statutes where the right of removal is made to depend upon subject-matter. The authority conferred upon congress to pass such statutes as these three of 1833, 1863, and 1868, for the removal of causes where the jurisdiction depends upon the subject-matter, is conferred by the second section of the third article of the constitution of the United States, which provides, that the judicial power of the United States "shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." That provision has been expounded by the supreme court of the United States, in some memorable cases, and rests upon a solid and secure foundation, with well-defined and well-understood boundaries, making it perfectly clear and distinct how far the authority of congress to confer this jurisdiction upon the proper courts of the United States extends. In view of those decisions, there can be no doubt whatever, that it was within the constitutional power of congress to pass this act of the 27th of July, 1868. It in no respect differs, in principle or character, in its scope, object and purpose, or in the basis on which it rests, from the act of 1833 and the act of 1863 (Mayor v. Cooper, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 247, 254); and, for the purpose of expressing distinctly the views that this court entertains on this subject, I shall proceed to state those views at some considerable length.

The case which settles the principle to which I have referred, authoritatively and distinctly, is the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738. In that case, the act of congress, incorporating the bank of the United States, conferred upon it the capacity to sue in any circuit court of the United States; and the question arose for decision, whether the clause which authorized the bank to sue in the federal courts was constitutional, under the provision of the constitution to which I have referred. The bank had come into the federal court in Ohio, by virtue of that clause in its act of incorporation, and brought a suit in equity against certain individuals, praying relief. The relief was granted, and the defendants appealed to the supreme court. The opinion of that court was delivered by Chief Justice Marshall. The question, as stated by him (page 819), was whether the suit was a case arising under a law of the United States. The objection made against the jurisdiction of the federal court was, that several questions might arise in the case which depended on the general principles of law, and not on any act of congress. In regard to this, the chief justice says: "If this were sufficient to withdraw a case from the jurisdiction of the federal courts, almost every case, although involving the construction of a law, would be withdrawn, and a clause in the constitution, relating to a subject of vital importance to the government, and expressed in the most comprehensive terms, would be construed to mean almost nothing. There is scarcely any case every part of which depends on the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. The questions, whether the fact alleged as the foundation of the action be real or fictitious; whether the conduct of the plaintiff has been such as to entitle him to maintain his action; whether his right is barred; whether he has received satisfaction, or has in any way released his claims, are questions some or all of which may occur in almost every case; and, if their existence be sufficient to arrest the jurisdiction of the court, words which seem intended to be as extensive as the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union, which seem designed to give the courts of the government the construction of all its acts, so far as they affect the rights of individuals, would be reduced to almost nothing." He also says (page 821): "We perceive, then, no ground on which the proposition can be maintained, that congress is incapable of giving the circuit courts original jurisdiction in any case to which the appellate jurisdiction extends." And here I may remark, that whether this power of removing cases from the state courts into the courts of the United States is to be referred to appellate jurisdiction or to original jurisdiction, is of no consequence whatever, on this branch of the case. Such power of removal has sometimes been referred (Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 304, 349, 350) to the appellate jurisdiction, on the ground that, as the suit is not instituted in the federal court by original process, the jurisdiction of that court must be appellate, because it cannot be original. In a case, however, in this court, before Mr. Justice Nelson, decided in July, 1866, of a removal under the act of 1833,—the case of Dennistoun v. Draper [Case No. 3,804]—he speaks of the jurisdiction of this court over a case removed into it from the state court, as "original jurisdiction, acquired indirectly by a removal from the state court." But the name given to the jurisdiction, whether it be called original, or quasi original by way of removal, or whether it be called appellate, is of no consequence. That the jurisdiction exists, to be exercised by way of removal of the case to the federal court, there can be no doubt. The chief justice proceeds (page 821): "We ask, then, if it can be sufficient to exclude this jurisdiction, that the case involves questions depending on general principles? A cause may depend on several questions of fact and law. Some of these may depend on the construction of a law of the United States, others on principles unconnected with that law." He also says (page 822): "The judicial power of the Union extends effectively and beneficially to that most important class of cases, which depends on the character of the cause. On the opposite construction, the judicial power never can be extended to a whole case, as expressed by the constitution, but to those parts of cases, only, which present the particular question involving the construction of the constitution or the law. We say, it never can be extended to the whole case, because, if the circumstance that other points are involved in it shall disable congress from authorizing the courts of the Union to take jurisdiction of the original cause, it equally disables congress from authorizing those courts to take jurisdiction of the whole cause, on an appeal, and thus will be restricted to a single question in that cause, and words obviously intended to secure to those who claim rights under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, a trial in the federal courts, will be restricted to the insecure remedy of an appeal upon an insulated point, after it has received that shape which may be given to it by another tribunal, into which he is forced against his will." This view applies equally to a jurisdiction acquired by removal, because the jurisdiction intended by the constitution, and, as I think, purposely carried out by congress, in the acts of 1833, 1863, and 1868, is a jurisdiction not restricted to the single question which arises under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, but is a jurisdiction under which the cause is transferred to a court of the United States where such question exists as an ingredient in the cause. The chief justice proceeds, (page 823): "We think, then, that when a question to which the judicial power of the Union is extended by the constitution, forms an ingredient of the original cause, it is in the power of congress to give the circuit courts jurisdiction of that cause, although other questions of fact or of law may be involved in it." This view is confirmed by the opinion of the supreme court, in the case of Mayor v. Cooper, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 247, 252. A jurisdiction of that character and extent can, as a matter of course, be given as well by the process of removal as by the original institution of the suit in the federal court, or as by an appeal or a writ of error. Mayor v. Cooper, ut supra. If this were not so, it is perfectly obvious that a plaintiff would always have it in his power, by introducing into his suit, as causes of action, questions of fact or law that did not of themselves arise under the constitution or laws of the United States, and by coupling them with other causes of action arising under the constitution or laws, to deprive the courts of the United States of all jurisdiction of the suit. That result would ensue, if the jurisdiction be restricted to the question which arises under the constitution or laws, unless the incongruity were admitted, or transferring a part of a cause into one court, and leaving the rest of it in another court.

The chief justice then proceeds to say—and I cite these observations of his, because they are quite applicable to the present cause, in many of its aspects: "The case of the bank is, we think, a very strong case of this description. The charter of incorporation not only creates it, but gives it every faculty which it possesses. The power to acquire rights of any description, to transact business of any description, to make contracts of any description, to sue on those contracts, is given and measured by its charter, and that charter is a law of the United States. This being can acquire no right, make no contract, bring no suit, which is not authorized by a law of the United States. It is not only itself the mere creature of a law, but all its actions, and all its rights, are dependent on the same law. Can a being, thus constituted, have a case which does not arise literally, as well as substantially, under the law?" He then proceeds to argue that proposition and demonstrate it very fully. The conclusion arrived at was, that the clause in the act incorporating the bank, enabling it to sue in the courts of the United States, was consistent with the constitution, and was to be obeyed in all courts.

The conclusion at which the supreme court arrived in that case, was cited and applied in this court, by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of Murray v. Patrie [Case No. 9,967], decided in July, 1866. In his opinion in that case he says: "The question of the removal of causes from the state courts to the circuit courts of the United States, was discussed very much in Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 346-350, and no doubt was entertained that it might take place after as well as before judgment. It was again commented upon in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 821-828, and especially by Mr. Justice Johnson, in his dissenting opinion (pages 884-889). Mr. Justice Johnson was inclined to the conclusion, that congress could not confer original jurisdiction upon the circuit courts of the United States, either directly, or by removal from state courts, in cases arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties, &c., inasmuch as the federal court must assume the jurisdiction upon the simple hypothesis that such question had arisen, and that, until such question had actually arisen, and was presented for decision, the case was exclusively cognizable in the state court. This view led the learned justice to maintain, that the question could be brought properly before the federal court, only under the 25th section of the judiciary act, as it could not be ascertained whether the case had actually arisen, till it was heard and decided. The chief justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, held, that jurisdiction could be entertained, when the question assumed such a form that the judicial power was capable of acting on it; that it then became a case; and that the judicial power extended to all cases arising under the constitution, &c." I cite these remarks, to show the view entertained by Mr. Justice Nelson, as to the proper construction of the decision in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S. [supra], and as to the constitutionality of the exercise of the power of removal, and as to the circumstances under which a case arises, so as to be capable of removal.

The same principle was held by Mr. Justice Washington, in the case of Bank of U. S. v. Northumberland Bank [Case No. 931], in which a suit was brought by the Bank of the United States, a corporation created by a law of the United States, under the power, conferred by its charter, to bring a suit in the circuit court of the United States. Mr. Justice Washington held, that the power to bring the suit existed. He uses this language: "That this is a case arising under a law or laws of the United States, is unquestionable. It never could have arisen, if the legislature, in the exercise of its constitutional authority, had not incorporated the Bank of the United States." This view, taken by him in 1821, is the same view which was taken by the supreme court, in the case of Osborn v. Bank of U. S., supra.

I have referred to the three statutes of 1833, 1863, and 1868, as being statutes very much in pari materia upon the subject of removing causes from the state courts, where the jurisdiction depends on the subject-matter, and arises under the clause of the constitution which I have cited. A more particular reference to these statutes will be useful. The third section of the act of March 2, 1833, was, as is well known, passed in consequence of the attitude of nullification assumed by the state of South Carolina at that time. It was passed during the administration of President Jackson. There is one feature about the third section of this act, in which it differs from all the other acts, providing for the removal of causes, that have ever been passed by congress. In all other acts, the party desiring the removal is sent, by express enactment of congress, to take the initiative for the purpose in the state court, by filing a petition in the state court and offering surety there, and, until he has done those acts in the state court, he has no right to enter this court. But, by this act of 1833, in consequence of the hostile attitude assumed by South Carolina, the action toward a removal is entirely confined to action in the federal court; and the act of congress addresses the state court solely by inhibition. It does not send the defendant to the state court to present any petition, or offer any surety, but it acts on the state court only by inhibition, and by a writ of certiorari, or a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, issued by the federal court. It provides that, "in any case where suit or prosecution shall be commenced in a court of any state, against any officer of the United States, or other person, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority, or title, set up or claimed by such officer, or other person, under any such law of the United States, it shall be lawful for the defendant in such suit or prosecution, at any time before trial, upon a petition to the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which the defendant shall have been served with process, setting forth the nature of such suit or prosecution, and verifying the said petition by affidavit, together with a certificate signed by an attorney or counsellor at law of some court of record of the state in which such suit shall have been commenced, or of the United States, setting forth that, as counsel for the petitioner, he has examined the proceedings against him, and has carefully inquired into all the matters set forth in the petition, and that he believes the same to be true; which petition, affidavit and certificate shall be presented to the said circuit court, if in session, and if not, to the clerk thereof at his office, and shall be filed in said office, and the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said court, and shall be thereafter proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in that court; and it shall be the duty of the clerk of said court, if the suit were commenced in the court below by summons, to issue a writ of certiorari to the state court, requiring said court to send to the said circuit court the record and proceedings in said cause; or, if it were commenced by capias, he shall issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa, a duplicate of which said writ shall be delivered to the clerk of the state court, or left at his office by the marshal of the district, or his deputy, or some person duly authorized thereto; and, thereupon, it shall be the duty of the said state court to stay all further proceedings in such cause, and the said suit or prosecution, upon delivery of such process, or leaving the same, as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be moved to the said circuit court, and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein, in the state court, shall be wholly null and void." It is thus put in the power of the federal court to acquire and maintain its jurisdiction completely and entirely by action within itself. The issuing of the writ of certiorari, requiring the state court to send to the circuit court the record and proceedings, seems to be merely a mode of notifying the state court; because, by the fourth section of the same act, provision is made for supplying to the federal court, by affidavit, the absence of certified copies from the state court of the record and proceedings therein. Abranches v. Schell [Case No. 21]. When the process is delivered to or left at the office of the clerk of the state court, the case is thereby ipso facto removed to the circuit court. No return to the writ is necessary; but, when the writ is thus served on the state court, it becomes the duty of the state court to stay all further proceedings in the cause, and any further proceedings therein, in the state court, becomes wholly null and void.

It is quite apparent, that the jurisdiction which congress intended to give, under this act of 1833, where a suit or prosecution is commenced against any officer of the United States, or other person, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, authority, or title set up or claimed by such officer, or other person, under any such law of the United States, is to be such a jurisdiction, that a plaintiff in a state court shall not be able to deprive such officer or other person, who is sued on account of an act done under the revenue laws, of the right to remove the suit into a court of the United States, under this statute, by joining with him in the same suit other defendants who are not sued on account of acts done under the revenue laws. Thus to deprive the federal court of jurisdiction of the case, would be to deprive the officer or person justifying under the revenue laws, of the power to have his rights adjudicated from the commencement by the federal court, and to compel him to follow the case through the state courts in all of its stages, and finally take it, under the 25th section of the judiciary act, to the supreme court of the United States. No such construction of this law has been admitted, so far as I am aware. The manifest intent of this statute, in saying that "it shall be the duty of the said state court to stay all further proceedings in such cause, and the said suit, or prosecution, upon delivery of such process, or leaving the same, as aforesaid, shall be deemed and taken to be moved to the said circuit court, and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein in the state court, shall be wholly null and void," is to remove the suit. The suit goes into the federal court, with all the parties to the suit. Every party to the suit is brought into the federal court when the suit is brought there, and the court, in obtaining jurisdiction of the suit, obtains jurisdiction over all the parties to it. It is plain that this must be the construction of the act of 1833, or it would be mere waste paper. Otherwise, a plaintiff would have it in his power to deprive an officer of the United States, who justified his acts under the revenue laws, from ever removing the cause into the federal court, by joining with such officer, as a defendant, some other person, on other causes of action, no matter how incongruous or irrelevant.

The same principle applies to the act of March 3, 1863. The 5th section of that act provides: "If any suit or prosecution, civil or criminal, has been or shall be commenced in any state court, against any officer, civil or military, or against any other person, for any arrest or imprisonment made, or other trespasses or wrongs done or committed, or any act omitted to be done, at any time during the present Rebellion, by virtue or under color of any authority derived from, or exercised by, or under, the president of the United States, or any act of congress, and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in such court, or, if such appearance shall have been entered before the passage of this act, then at the next session of the court in which such suit or prosecution is pending, file a petition stating the facts, and verified by affidavit, for the removal of the cause for trial at the next circuit court of the United States to be holden in the district where the suit is pending, and offer good and sufficient surety for his filing in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of such process and other proceedings against him, and also for his appearing in such court and entering special bail in the cause, if special bail was originally required therein, it shall then be the duty of the state court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the cause or prosecution, and the bail that shall have been originally taken shall be discharged; and, such copies being filed, as aforesaid, in such court of the United States, the cause shall proceed therein in the same manner as if it had been brought in said court by original process." The section then provides for removing the case by appeal, after final judgment, during the session or term of the court at which judgment was rendered. It provides also for removing the case, within six months after judgment, by writ of error. That was what was done by the process which was issued in the case of Murray v. Patrie [supra], to which I have referred. That was a writ of error issued under this section, within six months after the judgment was rendered in the state court. The section then goes on to say: "and the said circuit court shall thereupon proceed to try and determine the facts and the law in such action." This act thus provides for removing the whole suit, no matter who the parties are, and no matter what relief is sought to be obtained in the suit, provided there is found in the suit, as an ingredient therein, a claim against an officer, or any other person, for any arrest or imprisonment made, or other trespasses or wrongs done or committed, or any act omitted to be done, at any time during the Rebellion, under color of any authority derived from, or exercised by, or under, the president of the United States, or any act of congress. If such ingredient is found in the suit, the whole suit goes into the federal court. If this were not so, then, as in the case of the act of 1833, a plaintiff could deprive a party of all remedy under this statute.

We come now to the act of 1868, under which the proceedings for removal in this suit were instituted. This is an act in which the jurisdiction is founded on subject-matter. The second section of the act provides, that "any corporation or any member thereof, other than a banking corporation, organized under a law of the United States, and against which a suit at law or in equity has been or may be commenced, in any court other than a circuit or district court of the United States, for any liability or alleged liability of such corporation, or any member thereof, as such member, may have such suit removed from the court in which it may be pending, to the proper circuit or district court of the United States, upon filing a petition therefor, verified by oath, either before or after issue joined, stating they have a defence arising under or by virtue of the constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States, and offering good and sufficient surety for entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in said suit, and doing such other appropriate acts as are required to be done by the act entitled, 'An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from state courts,' approved July twenty-seventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-six; and it shall be thereupon the duty of the court to accept the surety, and proceed no further in the suit; and, the said copies being entered as aforesaid, in such court of the United States, the suit shall then proceed in the same manner as if brought there by original process." Under this act of 1868, as well as under the acts of 1833 and 1863, if the suit comes into this court at all, as to any person, it must come as an entirety. There can be nothing of it here, unless the whole of it is here; and, if any of it is here, there can be nothing of it left in the state court. This is necessary, and must have been intended by congress, in the act of 1868, because of the subject-matter, which is the foundation of the jurisdiction of this court, and because, otherwise, it would be in the power, as already suggested, of any plaintiff to deprive a corporation, organized under a law of the United States, which has a defence arising under or by virtue of the constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States, of the power to remove the suit to this court, by simply joining with the claim for relief against such corporation, because of an alleged liability of such corporation, some other right of action against some other defendant in the suit.

The act of July 27, 1866, introduces a new principle, which did not exist under the act of September 24, 1789, in regard to the removal of suits in cases where the right of removal is given because of the condition of alienage or citizenship in a defendant. This act of 1866 provides for the removal, in certain cases, into the proper federal court, of a cause, as against an alien or defendant who is a citizen of a state other than that in which the suit is brought, who petitions for such removal; and it expressly enacts, that such removal, as against such petitioning defendant, shall not be deemed to prejudice or take away the right of the plaintiff to proceed at the same time with the suit in the state court, as against the other defendants, if he shall desire to do so. The power of removal under this act of 1866 is limited, however, to cases where the suit, so far as relates to the alien defendant, or to the defendant who is the citizen of a state other than that in which the suit is brought, is instituted for the purpose of restraining or enjoining him, or is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerns him, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause. It is quite manifest, that the principle introduced by this act of 1866, of proceeding with the suit in the federal court as against the removing defendant, and proceeding at the same time with the suit in the state court as against the non-removing defendants, has no application to the acts of 1833, and 1863, and 1868. Under those acts, if any part of the suit remains in the state court, the whole of it remains there; and, if any part of it goes to the federal court, the whole of it goes there.

The question that now arises for consideration, is as to the proper construction of the second section of this act of 1868. That section provides, that any corporation, or any member thereof, other than a banking corporation, organized under a law of the United States, and against which a suit at law or in equity has been or may be commenced, in any court other than a circuit court or a district court of the United States, for any liability, or alleged liability, of such corporation, may have such suit removed from the court in which it may be pending, to the proper circuit court or district court of the United States, upon taking certain proceedings. Under this provision, and in analogy to the provisions of the acts of 1833 and 1863, it is only necessary that a suit, at law or in equity, shall be commenced in a court other than a circuit court or a district court of the United States, against a corporation other than a banking corporation, organized under a law of the United States, for a liability, or alleged liability, of such corporation. That is all that is necessary, in the first place, to authorize the suit to be removed; and the proper construction of the provision is, that where such a suit is commenced, for such a liability, or alleged liability, if the corporation designated is brought within the act, in other respects, it cannot be deprived of the right to remove the suit, because there are joined in the suit with such cause of action against the corporation, other and additional causes of action against the corporation, which are not for a liability, or alleged liability, of the corporation, or causes of action against other defendants, which do not involve a liability, or alleged liability, of the corporation, or of some member thereof, as such member. Of course, the main point upon which the jurisdiction by removal is made by this statute to depend, is the averment, to be made in the petition, provided for afterward, that the corporation, or the member thereof, as such member, has a defence, arising under or by virtue of the constitution of the United States, or some treaty or law of the United States. But, so far as the cause of action which is spoken of in the section is concerned, it is to be a cause of action for a liability, or alleged liability, of the corporation, or of a member thereof, as such member. If such a cause of action against the corporation appears by the papers in the suit, the case is one within the statute, even though other causes of action are joined, which are not for a liability, or alleged liability, of the corporation. Otherwise, the statute might be nullified, at the will of the plaintiff, by joining all kinds of causes of action, no matter how incongruous.

Such being the character of the suit, the next question is, as to who can institute proceedings for the removal of the suit. This may be done by the corporation, or by any member of it. Where the member petitions for the removal, he must be a member who was a member when the suit was commenced in the state court. The ownership of stock in a corporation is necessary to membership, within the meaning of this statute. Subject to these constructions, the initiative to remove the suit may be taken by the corporation, or by any member of it.

The mode of removal prescribed by the act is, that the petition is to be made by the corporation, or by a member thereof, and is to be verified by oath, and is to be presented to the court in which the suit is commenced, and is to be so presented, either before or after issue is joined, and is to be filed in such court, and is to state the existence of a defence, arising under or by virtue of the constitution of the United States, or a treaty or law of the United States; and the petitioner must offer to such court good and sufficient surety for entering in the federal court, on the first day of its session, copies of all the proceedings in the suit, and doing such other appropriate acts as are required to be done by the act of July 27, 1866, such as, appearing in the federal court, and, if necessary, entering special bail in such court in the cause. The act of 1868 then says: "And it shall be, thereupon, the duty of the court to accept the surety, and proceed no further in the suit; and the said copies being entered, as aforesaid, in such court of the United States, the suit shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process."

In regard to all the acts for the removal of causes, the acts of 1789, 1833, 1863, 1866, 1867, and 1868, the same principle applies, in this particular—that the right to remove is a right which is conferred upon the party directly by the act of congress, and depends in no manner upon the volition, or action, or non-action, of the state court. If this were not so, the statutes would be mere waste paper. Under these acts, where surety is required to be given, the party is required to offer to the state court good and sufficient surety, and the state court is required, if the surety is good and sufficient, to accept it, and to proceed no further in the suit. The state court cannot defeat the right of removal, by refusing to act upon the question at all, or by refusing to accept the surety, unless it puts the refusal to allow the case to be removed, on the ground that the surety is insufficient. Undoubtedly, there is a discretion, a legal discretion, to be exercised by the state court, in respect to the sufficiency of the surety. But it was held by the supreme court, in the case of Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 198, as a definitive disposition of the question, that the right of removal is conferred on a party by the act of congress, and that, although he is required to take certain proceedings, by filing a petition in the state court and offering proper surety, yet, when he has done so, if the state court thereafter proceeds with the case, the case is coram non judice in the state court, and all its proceedings are utterly void. This is, unquestionably, the proper interpretation of the acts of congress, all of which are alike, so far as any action is to be had in the state court to secure a removal. The intention is to secure a removal on a compliance with the statute, without the exercise of the pleasure or will of the state court, in any manner whatever. While the state court cannot, by refusing an order of removal, prevent a party from effecting the removal, it adds nothing whatever to the right of removal, or to the jurisdiction of this court, to procure an order from the state court, allowing the removal, provided, always, that the provisions of the act of congress are complied with. An order refusing a removal cannot prevent a removal, nor can an order granting a removal promote a removal. Neither order can effect the jurisdiction of this court in any manner whatever. The act of 1833, as before remarked, has special provisions, providing for coming into the federal court, and doing every thing there. But, in all the other acts, from that of 1789 down, the principle is plainly written on the face of all the statutes, that, when the petition is filed, verified by oath, stating the things which the statute requires—be it alienage, or citizenship, or a defence arising under the constitution of the United States, or a treaty or law of the United States, or a trespass committed under authority derived from the president of the United States during the late Rebellion, or inability, from prejudice or local influence, to obtain justice in the state court—and when good and sufficient surety is offered for doing what the statute requires to be done, the right of removal is perfected. From that time, the state court can do nothing further in the suit, but accept the surety. The act of 1868 says: "And it shall be, thereupon, the duty of the court to accept the surety, and proceed no further in the suit." It then adds: "And, the said copies being entered, as aforesaid, in such court of the United States, the suit shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process." Now, where a defendant, who has a clear case for removal, files his petition in the state court, and offers proper surety, and obtains from that court an order to remove the cause, it becomes thereupon the duty of the state court to proceed no further in the suit. The case is out of the jurisdiction of the state court, but, at the same time, this court cannot proceed in it, until copies of the proceedings in the state court are entered here. But the plaintiff, in such a case, is not at the mercy of the defendant; because, if the case is a proper one for removal, the plaintiff himself can enter the papers in this court, and the case will proceed here. At a certain stage, the case may be considered as being in neither court, because it is on its transit from the one to the other. The state court is inhibited, by the statute, from proceeding in it, while, at the same time, the federal court cannot proceed in it, because the papers are not yet entered there. Therefore, no difficulty can arise from the failure of the defendant to enter the papers in this court. The sole object of requiring the surety is, that good faith may be observed, and that no defendant shall be allowed to avail himself of the privilege of removal, who is not able to furnish good and sufficient surety for coming into the federal court, at the earliest possible day, and submitting himself to the jurisdiction which he has invoked.

Such is my view of this act of 1868. I have referred to the other statutes, on the subject of removal, because the system is one which has been in operation since the year 1789, and has been acted upon throughout, by congress, on one principle, namely, that the jurisdiction of the federal courts, in cases of removal, shall in no manner depend on what a state court may do, or omit to do.

In the case of Murray v. Patrie, before referred to, a writ of error was issued by this court, under the act of 1863, in pursuance of the provision of that act, that "it shall be competent for either party, within six months after the rendition of a judgment in any such case, by writ of error or other process, to remove the same to the circuit court of the United States of that district in which such judgment shall have been rendered." The words, "writ of error," were used by congress, in that act, in their common law sense; and, when an act of congress says, that it shall be lawful for a party to remove a judgment by writ of error, the expression necessarily implies that the usual course in regard to a writ of error is to be observed. The judgment is to be removed by the writ of error, but it is not removed by the mere issuing of the writ of error. As in the case of all writs of error, there must be a return to the writ of error. In the case referred to, a writ of error was issued by this court, and served upon the clerk of the state court, which was the supreme court of the state of New York. He refused to make a return to the writ, and desired to bring before this court, for decision, the question whether the case was one in which this court had jurisdiction to issue the writ of error, and whether the act of congress was constitutional. For that purpose, an order was made, in the first instance, requiring the clerk of the supreme court of the state of New York, for the county of Greene, in the third judicial district, to show cause why he should not make a return to the writ. The matter was thoroughly argued, and it was on that hearing that Mr. Justice Nelson gave the opinion to which I have referred. As the result of it, he directed that an order should be issued, requiring the clerk of the supreme court of New York to make a return to this court, on the writ of error. The clerk still refused to make the return, and then the question came up, before Mr. Justice Nelson, as to what should be done. On the view that it was necessary that this court should have a return to the writ of error, in order to exercise its jurisdiction in the case, he issued, sitting in this court, a writ of alternative mandamus to the supreme court of the state of New York. I have before me the original writ of alternative mandamus, the allowance of which is signed by him, and bears date on the 16th of October, 1866. That writ was served on the clerk of the supreme court, for the county of Greene, on the 18th of October, 1866. It is addressed to the justices of the supreme court of the state of New York, for the third judicial district, and for the county of Greene, and to the clerk of the county of Greene, and of the supreme court therein, and recites the recovery of the judgment in the supreme court of New York, and that a writ of error has been allowed by this court on the judgment, with a citation and a proper bond, for the removal of the action into this court, to the end that this court may proceed to try and determine the facts and the law therein. It recites, also, that it has been represented to this court, that, after the rendition of the judgment, the state court refused to allow the action to be removed into this court. It then proceeds: "Whereupon, the said circuit court being willing that justice shall be done, you are hereby commanded, that you make due and legal return to said writ, as required by law, and that you do allow said action to be removed and transferred into the said circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, and that you do proceed no further in said case, or, in default thereof, that you and each of you make known" to this court, on a day therein named, "why you and each of you have not done the same." The writ is signed by the clerk of this court, and has upon it the impress of the seal of the court, and its allowance by the court, as before mentioned. To that alternative mandamus the return and answer of the justices of the supreme court was made. The return states, that it is made by way of showing cause why a peremptory mandamus should not issue. It recites all the proceedings in the state court, and sets out all the facts of the case which were deemed necessary to raise the legal questions involved, and then concludes as follows: "Wherefore, the said justices and clerk of said supreme court say, that the said circuit court of the United States has not acquired jurisdiction of the said suit, in favor of said Patrie against said Murray and Buckley, and cannot compel a removal of the same by said writ of error, and a new trial of the same in the said circuit court of the United States." To that return there was a demurrer, and a joinder in demurrer, and then this court gave judgment by a judgment record, which sets out the alternative writ, the return, the demurrer, and the joinder in demurrer, and then proceeds as follows: "Whereupon, all and singular the premises being seen by the court now here, and fully understood, and mature deliberation being thereupon had, for that it appears to the said court, now here, that the said answer and return of the said justices and clerk, and the matters therein contained, are not sufficient in law to quash the said alternative writ of mandamus of the said United States and the said relators, whereupon, the said United States and relators pray judgment, and also a writ of peremptory mandamus, to be directed to the said justices and clerk, commanding them as in said alternative writ is specified: Wherefore it is considered, that a writ of peremptory mandamus do forthwith issue, directed to the said justices and clerk, commanding them, upon pain and peril that shall fall thereon, to remove and transfer into the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, a certain judgment, and the record thereof, now remaining on file in the office of the said clerk, 'describing the judgment particularly,' according to the command of the said former writ of alternative mandamus, and that they do proceed no further in said cause." This judgment record is signed by Mr. Justice Nelson, and also by the clerk of this court, and bears date on the 20th of November. 1866.

The object of that proceeding by mandamus was, to secure a return to the writ of error, on the idea that the jurisdiction of this court, under the act of 1863, on a writ of error, could not be exercised, unless a return was made to the writ of error. The proceeding by mandamus was, therefore, regarded by this court as necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction. So far as the judgment of this court awards a peremptory mandamus directing the state court to remove and transfer the judgment of the state court, and the record thereof, into the circuit court of the United States, it awards a mandamus to remove the suit by a return to the writ of error. That is the point on which the jurisdiction of this court to issue the writ of mandamus in that case depended; and it by no means follows, because the writ of mandamus was a proper remedy in the case of Murray v. Patrie, that it is at all a necessary or proper remedy in an ordinary case of the removal of a suit before judgment, under the statutes to which I have referred. Under those statutes, a writ of mandamus is not a necessary remedy. The case comes here without any writ of mandamus. A writ of mandamus would be a pure matter of supererogation, in any case of the kind, because the fact that the case comes here without any affirmative action by the state court, and that no affirmative action of the state court is necessary, shows that no mandamus from this court is necessary to enforce any such affirmative action of the state court. The inhibition of the act of congress, that the state court shall proceed no further in the cause, is addressed directly to the state court by the act of congress. As the jurisdiction of this court, under the 14th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 81, 82), to issue writs of mandamus, is, as has been determined in numerous cases, by the supreme court of the United States, confined to cases where such writs are necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court, it follows, that it is not necessary, in any case of the removal of a cause from a state court into this court, except, perhaps, the case of a writ of error under the act of 1863, that this court should issue a mandamus to the state court to remove the case, a mandamus not being necessary to the exercise, by this court, of its jurisdiction over the cause.

I have referred, at some length, to this subject of a mandamus, because there are several cases, in the courts of the United States, which seem to regard a writ of mandamus as an appropriate remedy in a case like the present one. But, in my view, it is never an appropriate remedy for a circuit court of the United States, unless it is a necessary remedy; and it is not a necessary remedy, unless it is necessary to uphold the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court. Although what I have said on this subject is, in one sense, not strictly involved in the question now before the court, yet the general subject of the remedy by mandamus, in a case like the present one, is so connected with the order that is asked for on this motion, that I have found it impossible to come to a satisfactory conclusion without considering the entire question.

The opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Barnard, in the state court, on his refusal to allow this suit to be removed to this court, states clearly the grounds of the refusal. He says: "A liability, or alleged liability, of such corporation, or any member thereof," referred to in the 2d section of the act of 1868, "must, I think, be construed as sole liability, or sole alleged liability. It is very manifest, that congress intended to transfer to the federal courts jurisdiction in cases where a corporation, or a member thereof, created by federal laws, is sought to be made liable by reason of its corporate acts, or by reason of acts of members thereof charged as corporate acts. If this action were of that character, the right to removal could not be well disputed. If the sole object of this action was to compel the company to issue to the plaintiff the certain shares of the company, referred to in the complaint, the company would be entitled to a removal of the same. But an examination of the complaint shows that, in addition to this object, the plaintiff seeks to have set aside, and have declared illegal, certain transactions between the company and the Credit Mobilier of America, as frauds upon the stockholders of the company. Certainly, in this aspect of the case, it is not brought to enforce the liability of the company, but to set aside and annul certain transactions of the company, as ultra vires." He then proceeds to put his refusal to remove the case upon the ground that the action was brought to enforce a joint liability on the part of the company and of other defendants. In other words, he places his refusal on the ground, that there are coupled with a claim made by the plaintiff against the Union Pacific Railroad Company, for an account and payment to him, as a shareholder in the company, of his share in the profits and property of the company, other causes of action, against other parties, which are not for a liability of the corporation. He then says, in respect to the verification of the petition for removal, by the treasurer of the company, on its behalf, and by the petitioners Macy and Cisco, for themselves: "The petition and verification thereof as to the Union Pacific Railroad Company are regular. The same may be said as to the defendants Macy and Cisco." Nothing is said, in the opinion, upon the question of surety. The surety is not criticised in any way, as being insufficient. The whole case is put upon the construction of the statute. As to that, as I have already stated, I cannot concur with Mr. Justice Barnard. One other fundamental idea, I perceive, runs through his opinion, which is, that if the case comes into this court as to the company, and as to Macy, and as to Cisco, the case, as to the remainder of the defendants, will be left in the state court, which is, nevertheless, commanded, by the act, to proceed no further in the suit. As to that point, also, as I have already stated, I do not concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Barnard.

It appears by the papers entered in this court, in the cause, by the defendants, that the petition for removal was originally presented to Mr. Justice Cardozo, of the supreme court, on the 31st of July, 1868. The verifications of the petition by the company, and by Cisco and Macy, bear date on the 30th of July. The petition, in all respects, fully complies with the requirements of the act of 1868, so far as the company and Macy and Cisco are concerned, and states, in the body of it, that the petitioners "hereby offer good and sufficient surety, for entering in said circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, on the first day of its session, copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in said suit," &c. Appended to the petition, as entered in this court, is a bond to the plaintiff, in the penalty of $10,000, reciting the suit and the petition for removal, and conditioned as required by the act of 1868. There are two sureties to it, each of whom justifies in the amount of its penalty, and it is acknowledged by the sureties. The bond, affidavits, and acknowledgment bear date on the 31st of July, 1868. On that day, Mr. Justice Cardozo, on the summons and complaint in the state court, and the petition, made an order requiring the plaintiff to show cause, on the first Monday of August following, why the petition should not then be filed and the prayer thereof be granted, the prayer being, that the suit be removed to this court, and that the said surety be accepted by the state court, and that the state court proceed no further in the suit. The petition for removal must have been presented to the state court on or before the 6th of August, 1868, because, among the papers entered in this court, in the cause, is an order, entitled in the suit, made by the supreme court, at a special term held on that day by Mr. Justice Barnard, reciting, that a motion had been made in this action, on due notice, based on the petition of the company for the removal of the cause to this court, under and by virtue of the provisions of the acts of congress in such case made and provided, and that time to file papers in opposition to the motion had been given to the plaintiff, on his application, until the third Monday of August. Some time seems to have been occupied in taking testimony before a referee, to be used on the motion to remove the cause, and it does not appear at what time the motion was finally submitted to the judgment of the court. An affidavit made for, and used on, the motion, states, that the petitioning defendants presented the petition to the state court on the 3d day of August, 1868, "and then and thereupon offered in and to said supreme court good and sufficient surety, in pursuance of said acts of congress." The opinion of Mr. Justice Barnard, deciding the motion for removal, was filed on the 4th of March, 1869. The formal order of the state court on the decision, is dated March 10th, 1869. It makes no reference whatever to the fact that any surety had been offered to the state court. It refers merely to the summons, the complaint, the petition for removal, and sundry affidavits used on the motion for removal, and orders that the prayer of the petition be denied. The copy of the petition and the copy of the bond, which are entered in this court, each of them bears an endorsement that it was filed March 13th, 1869. No other conclusion can be drawn from these facts, than that the bond, as surety, was offered to the state court while the petition was pending before it; and no point is made, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Barnard, as to that fact, or as to the sufficiency of the surety. The petition being, as to its contents, in strict accordance with the act of congress, and being under the seal of the company, with an affidavit of its secretary that such seal is its seal, and was set thereto by him by its authority, and being signed by the treasurer of the company, and being, as Mr. Justice Barnard states in his opinion, verified as to the company, in the form authorized by the state practice, and the allegation in it being, as Mr. Justice Barnard also states, positive and not upon information and belief, a proper case for removal was made out. Under the act of 1868, the petition for removal may be made by the company, or by any one member thereof. The petition in this case was made by the company, and it was also made by Cisco, a member thereof, and by Macy, a member thereof. It shows a suit pending against the corporation, for an alleged liability, within the statute; and it is of no consequence that other causes of action are joined with that cause of action. The complaint in the state court sets forth, that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of six shares of the capital stock of the defendants, the Union Pacific Railroad Company; that the same stand in his name on the books of the company; that he claims to be entitled, as against the company, by subscription, to twenty thousand other shares of its capital stock; and that the directors of the company deny his right thereto, and refuse to give him certificates therefor. He demands judgment, that he may be declared to be a stockholder of the company, in respect to the twenty thousand shares, and to be entitled to an account of all the rights, property, and franchises of the company, at the time he subscribed for the twenty thousand shares, and to be allowed his just proportion thereof; and that, until his rights are fully admitted, and the said accounting be had, and payment be made to him of all to which he may be entitled, the company be restrained, by injunction, from declaring, making, or paying, any dividend or division of any money or property among its stockholders, or any of them. In addition to this claim for a liability of the company, and this prayer for relief against the company, the complaint makes sundry allegations of fact, in reference to other defendants, on which it prays that those of the defendants who are directors, officers, and stockholders of the company, and have participated in the profits of the defendants the Credit Mobilier of America, be declared to be trustees thereof for the company and its stockholders, and held to account for the same; that the company be enjoined from delivering to the Credit Mobilier, and the Credit Mobilier from receiving, any bonds of the United States, or any grants of lands from the United States, or any bonds of the company issued under certain acts of congress; that all contracts made between the company and the Credit Mobilier, and between the company and the defendant Oakes Ames, be declared fraudulent, and be set aside; that the Credit Mobilier return to the company all property, or the proceeds thereof, received at any time by the Credit Mobilier from the company, or under any contract or transfer made by the company; and that the Credit Mobilier be enjoined from dividing any profits, money, or property among its stockholders, until the liabilities of its directors and stockholders to the company and its stockholders shall be, in such action, determined. The petition for removal avers, that the petitioners, who are the company, Cisco, Macy, and three others of the defendants, "have a defence in said suit arising under and by virtue of the constitution of the United States, and the laws of the United States."

I am of opinion, therefore, that a case was made out for removal; that the state court, ipso facto, lost jurisdiction of the case; and that, on the entering of the papers in this court, it can proceed with the suit and with the whole suit. If all the proper papers have not as yet been filed here, the defect can be supplied; but, as far as I am advised, they all have been filed here. The petition for removal must be considered as having been filed in the state court, within the meaning of the act of 1868, when it was presented to the state court with the bond, irrespective of the formal endorsements made on those papers, that they were filed on the 13th of March, 1869; for, otherwise, it would be in the power of the state court to defeat a removal, by making a rule that a petition for removal should never be filed therein, when the state court should refuse to grant its prayer. The act of congress cannot be evaded in that way. It is substantially what South Carolina did, under circumstances which caused the passage of the act of 1833; and New York might do the same. When the proper petition is presented to the state court, with the surety, so that that court acts upon the matter judicially, in any way whatever—and, in this case, such presentation and action took place, as before shown, as early as the 6th of August, 1868—whether the state court accepts the surety or not, unless it puts its refusal upon some valid defect in the petition, or some insufficiency in the surety, it loses jurisdiction of the cause eo instanti.

It was urged, on the motion, that there is, in fact, no defence in this case, arising under, or by virtue of, the constitution of the United States, or any law of the United States, that the defendants themselves have so declared, and that the papers show the fact. There is a decision of this court on that point, made by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the case of Dennistoun v. Draper [Case No. 3,804], to which I have already referred. It was a case of a suit removed from a state court into this court, under the act of 1833. That act requires that, in the petition to this court, the nature of the suit shall be set forth. A motion was made to this court to remand the suit back to the state court. The defendant, in his petition for removal, set forth that he was an officer, acting under the revenue laws of the United States, namely, a cotton agent at the city of New York, appointed by the secretary of the treasury, in pursuance of law, and that he was in possession of the cotton involved in the suit, and which was a replevin suit for the cotton, and held it as captured and abandoned property, under certain statutes of the United States. The motion to remand was founded on the ground that the defendant did not hold the cotton, at the time the replevin suit sought to be removed was brought, as an officer of the revenue laws, or as a person authorized to hold the cotton under such laws, but held it wrongfully, and in violation of the rights of the plaintiffs in it, and was simply a tortfeasor. Upon that point, Mr. Justice Nelson says: "If the petition and affidavit, with the certificate of counsel, failed to bring the cause within the act of congress providing for the removal, it would be the duty of the court, on motion, to remand it; and such order has, also, not unfrequently been entered in cases where it appeared clearly, by the admission of the parties or otherwise, that they were not within the act of removal. But, in cases where the proceedings are in conformity with the act, the removal is imperative, both upon the state and the circuit court; and, if the facts are seriously contested, it must be done in a formal manner, by pleadings and proofs, in the latter court. The question of jurisdiction belongs to the federal courts, and must be heard and determined there. The statute is peremptory, that 'the cause shall thereupon be entered on the docket of said court, and shall be thereafter proceeded in as a cause originally commenced in that court,' and 'shall be deemed and taken to be moved to the said circuit court, and any further proceedings, trial, or judgment therein in the state court, shall be wholly null and void.' It is true, that the plaintiff, after the removal of the cause into the circuit court, has no means, according to the course of proceeding in that court, to raise the question of jurisdiction upon the pleadings; and such disability, doubtless, furnishes some plausibility of reason for the hearing of the question upon motion. But this mode of presenting it, which must be upon affidavits, oftentimes conflicting and irreconcilable, is most unsatisfactory, and should not be entertained unless from unavoidable necessity, with a view to ascertain the appropriate tribunal to hear and determine the cause. I am of opinion that no such necessity exists." He then proceeds to show that the plaintiff can avail himself of the objection to the jurisdiction at any stage of the trial, and that if, when the evidence is closed, it shall appear that the cause is such as not to come within the cognizance of the court, under the act, it will be its duty to instruct the jury that the court has no jurisdiction of the case, and to remand it back to the state court. He further says: "The cause, therefore, in question, was properly instituted in the state court, leaving the only question for consideration, on this motion, as to the legal effect of the removal; and, as to that, I am of opinion, inasmuch as the act of congress has been fully complied with, it is not proper, if it be competent, for this court to determine, upon motion, the disputed jurisdictional facts, involving the right or legality of the removal; and that, inasmuch as the question of jurisdiction involving them cannot be raised upon the pleadings, the proper place to hear and determine them is on the trial, where the plaintiffs will be at liberty to take advantage of the objection." The same view was taken by the supreme court in Mayor v. Cooper, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 247, 254. As the defendants, the company, Cisco and Macy, have complied strictly with the act of 1868, by setting out, in their petition, that they have a defence in the suit, arising under the constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States, that averment must be accepted as true, until it is disposed of on the trial of the case. It cannot be inquired into on the present motion, or even on a motion to remand the cause to the state court.

My conclusion, therefore, is, that the whole of this cause is in this court, as respects all the parties to it and all the subject matter involved in it; and that no part of it is now in the state court. Any proceedings which are going on in the suit in the state court are void. Whether, as is alleged in an affidavit used on this motion, such proceedings are going on, or whether, as is claimed on the part of the plaintiff, whatever proceedings, connected with the suit, are now going on in the state court, are not proceedings in the suit, are not questions now presented.

As this court has jurisdiction of this suit, the next question is, whether the relief asked for by this motion shall be granted. The propriety of the action of this court, either directly upon a state court, or upon a party to a suit pending in this court, has been discussed in various cases arising under the laws of the United States, in the courts of the United States. Under the 14th section of the judiciary act, before referred to, which provides that the courts of the United States shall have power to issue all writs which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law, and in view of the general principles of jurisprudence, this court undoubtedly has power, with a view to the efficient exercise of its jurisdiction in this case, to resort to all means that are proper to enforce its jurisdiction. I refer, on this subject, to the case of Board of Com'rs of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 376, and to the case of Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 166. In the case last cited, a state court in Iowa has issued an injunction to restrain the levying of a tax to pay a judgment recovered by one Riggs, in the circuit court of the United States for Iowa, against Johnson county, in Iowa, on certain bonds issued by that county. After the injunction had been issued, Riggs, by petition, applied to the said circuit court for a mandamus to the parties enjoined, who were officers of the state, to compel the levying of a tax sufficient to pay the amount of the judgment. In opposition to the application, the issuing of the injunction by the state court was set up. Riggs demurred to such answer, assigning, as cause of demurrer, in substance, that, after the rendering of the judgment by the circuit court, the state court had no jurisdiction to prevent him from using the process of the circuit court, by writ of mandamus, to collect his judgment. The circuit court overruled the demurrer and Riggs carried the case, by writ of error, to the supreme court. That court reversed the judgment and sustained the demurrer. It held, that the issuing of the mandamus by the circuit court, was to be regarded as a proceeding necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the circuit court; that a circuit court of the United States can issue a writ of mandamus, in all cases where it may be necessary, agreeably to the principles and usages of law, to the exercise of its jurisdiction; and that it can issue such a writ to an officer of a state. To the same effect are the cases of U. S. v. Council of Keokuk, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 514, 518. The principle of those cases is, that this court has power to issue a writ of mandamus, and to do any other act of a kindred character, when necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction. These cases are all based upon the early case of McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 504, which holds that the power of the circuit courts of the United States to issue the writ of mandamus, while it exists in cases where the issuing of the writ is necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction, is confined exclusively to such cases. In the opinion of the court in that case, delivered by Mr. Justice Johnson, the following language is used: "We are of opinion, that the power of the circuit courts to issue the writ of mandamus, is confined exclusively to those cases in which it may be necessary to the exercise of their jurisdiction. Had the 11th section of the judiciary act covered the whole ground of the constitution, there would be much reason for exercising this power in many cases wherein some ministerial act is necessary to the completion of an individual right, arising under laws of the United States, and the 14th section of the same act would sanction the issuing of the writ for such a purpose. But, although the judicial power of the United States extends to cases arising under the laws of the United States, the legislature have not thought proper to delegate the exercise of that power to its circuit courts, except in certain specified cases. When questions arise under those laws in the state courts, and the party who claims a right or privilege under them is unsuccessful, an appeal is given to the supreme court, and this provision the legislature has thought sufficient at present for all the political purposes intended to be answered by the clause of the constitution which relates to the subject." The case just cited is the one upon which, under the 14th section of the judiciary act of 1789, it has been regarded as settled, that the remedy by a writ of mandamus from a circuit court of the United States, is to be invoked only where it is necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court. Upon this subject, the remarks of Mr. Justice Woodbury, a very discreet and experienced judge, long in public life, in the case of Ladd v. Tudor [Case No. 7,975], are exceedingly apposite. An application was made to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, to issue a mandamus to a state court, to remove a cause therefrom, under the act of 1789, where the plaintiff was a citizen of Massachusetts and the defendant was a citizen of New Hampshire, and where the state court had refused to remove the cause. Mr. Justice Woodbury, in his opinion, says: "It may not be improper to add a few remarks more as to the use of this particular remedy in a case like this. Some doubt might exist, whether a mandamus to a state court from this tribunal, organized under another government, was the proper remedy." He then cites the case, which has been referred to on this motion, of Spraggins v. County Court of Humphries, Cooke, 260, and says that that case seems to countenance the application before him. He also cites the case of Brown v. Crippin, 4 Hen. & M. 173, and says, that, "although the marginal note of that case says that a mandamus would lie from the circuit court, no such opinion was there given; that it is only suggested whether a writ of certiorari might not lie from the circuit court; and that the counsel strenuously contended that no mandamus would lie from the circuit court, and that the latter had no jurisdiction over the case till it actually came there." He then refers to the case of McIntire v. Wood, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 504, and says, that, although that case speaks generally of the power of the circuit court to issue a mandamus, in order to sustain its jurisdiction, and although the decision in the case in Cooke rests on the power of superior courts to enforce their jurisdiction over inferior ones by mandamus, yet it is very questionable whether a case like the one then before him ought to be considered within that principle. He adds: "It is a correct principle between inferior and superior courts of the same government, but difficult to be upheld between courts established by separate governments. If necessary to decide on this, it might require more grave consideration, before sustaining it in cases like this, because, being a mode of redress very likely to lead to jealousies and collisions between the states and general government, of a character any thing but desirable."

It is apparent, therefore, that this one idea runs through all the cases—that the remedy by mandamus will not be exercised by the courts of the United States, except where it is necessary to their jurisdiction. On this principle, in a case of removal like the present, no mandamus is necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court. This principle, embodied in the 14th section of the judiciary act of 1789, is carried, in spirit, into the 5th section of the act of March 2, 1793 (1 Stat. 334, 335), which provides that no writ of injunction shall be granted by a court of the United States, "to stay pro ceedings in any court of a state." This provision was intended by congress to prevent conflicts between the state courts and the federal courts, in cases where such conflicts were not absolutely necessary. Where a case goes up to the supreme court, from a state court, under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, and it is necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the supreme court, that it should issue any particular process, of course it will issue it; and so this court, where it is necessary to issue any process, will do so. It issued a mandamus in the case of Murray v. Patrie [Case No. 9,967], because the issue of the writ was regarded as necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court, with a view to secure a return to the writ of error.

In analogy to this principle, I do not regard it as proper to grant the order asked for in this case. Such an order is not necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court. On the general principles of comity, irrespective of the act of 1793, if this case is a case which the state court regards as still remaining in that court, and this court shall issue an order restraining the plaintiff, under pains and penalties, from proceeding in the suit in the state court, the state court may grant an order to restrain the defendants, under pains and penalties, from proceeding in the suit in this court. While the issuing of no process appropriate to a suit and necessary to properly maintain the jurisdiction of this court, will ever be intermitted by this court, this court will always sedulously abstain from inviting any of those conflicts which have a tendency to arise, under our mixed system of government, between the federal and the state courts. We have proceeded for eighty years with very few of such judicial conflicts, and, with discretion, they may generally be avoided. Entirely irrespective, therefore, of the act of 1793, my judgment is against the propriety of granting the order asked for.

But there is a further ground which seems to me conclusive against the motion. If this cause is, in fact, in the state court, this court is absolutely prohibited, by the act of 1793, from staying the proceedings in the state court. If this cause is not in the state court, every thing that is going on there, in the way of proceedings in the suit, is an utter nullity and it is, certainly, not becoming for this court to stay proceedings which this court declares to be null and void. It would hesitate long before it would stay void proceedings in a state court. The state court, it is to be assumed, regards the proceedings now going on in this court, in this suit, as null and void; but it is not to be assumed that the state court would undertake to restrain the defendants from carrying on such null and void proceedings. It has not done any thing of the kind as yet, and it would, doubtless, regard such a proceeding as outside of its proper province. So far as appears to this court, the action of the state court, in this matter, has been entirely unexceptionable, as respects this court, or any action of this court. The point upon which Mr. Justice Barnard placed his decision in the state court, in this case, is one upon which I am clearly of opinion that he was wrong; but it is a question as to the construction of a statute, on which judges and courts often differ in opinion.

Irrespective of the views already presented, if this suit is an existing proceeding in the state court, this court is inhibited, by the 5th section of the act of March 2, 1793, from granting an injunction to stay such proceeding. The statute uses, indeed, the words, "a writ of injunction;" but the spirit of it is, that this court shall not in any manner stay a proceeding in a court of a state. It is not an inhibition merely against issuing an injunction in the shape of a writ injunction, mandamus, or prohibition, directed to the state court itself, but it has been construed always as an inhibition against staying a party from conducting such proceedings in a state court. Such was the view of this court in the case of City Bank of New York v. Skelton [Case No. 2,739], where this court was asked to stay a defendant from taking further proceedings in a suit which he had brought in a state court. This court says: "There is an impediment to the enforcement of that principle by this court in the case now before it. One of the suits pending, against which the plaintiffs ask relief, is prosecuted in the state court of chancery, and this court is clothed with no power to restrain or interfere with a suit so situated. A court of the United States, in executing a jurisdiction vested in it, may undoubtedly act upon parties who are suitors in a state court in relation to the same subject-matter, so far, at least, as to compel their submission to such judgment as the United States court may render in a case of which it has cognizance. But, even then, it cannot interdict their prosecuting their suit in a state court, much less control any action pending in such court. It is understood that the state courts uniformly adopt the same doctrine in respect to courts of the United States." In the order made in that case, this court declared, that the proceedings in the state court were not within the cognizance of this court, or subject to its control, and, therefore, it issued an injunction merely restraining the defendant from further prosecuting suits brought by him in this court, until the suit in the state court should be decided.

It results, from these views, that, although this suit has been properly removed to this court, and is now pending here, it is not a proper exercise of the judicial power of this court to grant the order asked for. The motion is, therefore, denied.

Case No. 4,828.

FISK v. UNION PAC. R. CO. et al.

[8 Blatchf. 243; 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 77; 3 Alb. Law J. 156; 5 Am. Law Rev. 566.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 13, 1871.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—AVERMENT OF CAUSE SPECIFIED IN ACT OF JULY 27, 1868—TRIAL ON AFFIDAVIT ON MOTION TO REMAND—SEPARATE PETITIONS—OPPOSITION—SUBSEQUENT PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT—OTHER THAN FEDERAL QUESTIONS—PARTIES.

1. Where a petition for the removal of a suit into this court, under the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 226), avers that the suit has been brought for a cause of action specified in the act, the question whether it has been brought for such a cause of action, cannot be tried on affidavit, on a motion to remand the cause. Per Nelson, Circuit Justice.

2. Under that act, all the parties who claim the right of removal need not join in one petition; but they may petition for the removal, as they are served with process, or otherwise brought into court. Per Nelson, Circuit Justice.

[Cited in Pond v. Sibley, 7 Fed. 137.]

3. The application to the state court, on the petition, is ex-parte, no notice of presenting it to the state court need not be given, and no affidavits can be read before the state court, in opposition. Per Nelson, Circuit Justice.

[Cited in Stevens v. Richardson, 9 Fed. 194; Whelan v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 35 Fed. 865; Strasburger v. Beecher, 44 Fed. 213.]

4. When the removal has been initiated, by the presentation of a petition by one or more of the defendants, and a compliance with the act, it is not competent for the state court to take any proceedings in the suit, other than to perfect the removal, as other defendants may appear and present their petitions. Per Nelson, Circuit Justice.

[Cited in Johnson v. Brewers' Fire Ins. Co., 51 Wis. 589, 8 N. W. 297, and 9 N. W. 657; Sharp v. Gutcher, 74 Ind. 364.]

5. The fact, that questions may arise, in the course of the litigation, besides those under the acts of congress, and which depend upon general principles of law, cannot withdraw the cause from the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Per Nelson, Circuit Justice.

[Cited in Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 294; Mackaye v. Mallory, 6 Fed. 751.]

6. Nor can the suit be withdrawn from such jurisdiction, by joining defendants who are not within the limitation prescribed by the statute with those who are within such limitation. Per Nelson, Circuit Justice.

In equity. This case came before the court on a motion by the plaintiff [James Fisk, Jr.] to remand the case to the state court, and on a motion by the defendants to dissolve an injunction which had been granted in the suit, by the state court, on the 17th of July, 1868, before any proceedings had been taken for the removal of the suit. For the prior proceedings in the suit, see Fisk v. Union Pac. R. Co. [Case No. 4,827]. The injunction was one restraining the defendants from removing, or allowing to be removed, from the state of New York, any of the books, papers, money or other property of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or of the Credit Mobilier of America, until the further order of the court.

Edwin W. Stoughton and David Dudley Field, for plaintiff.

Samuel J. Tilden, James Emott and Clarence A. Seward, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BLATCHFORD, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. A bill was filed in this case, in the supreme court of the state, by the plaintiff, against the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Credit Mobilier of America, a corporation of Pennsylvania, and twenty-two other persons. It was filed in the forepart of July, 1868. The precise date is not given, nor is the time when it was served upon the respective defendants. On 3d of August following, six of the defendants, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, John J. Cisco, William H. Macy, Charles A. Lambard, Sidney Dillon and Thomas C. Durant presented a petition to the court to remove the cause to the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of New York, under an act of congress passed July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 226). The act provides, that any corporation, or any member thereof, other than a banking corporation, organized under a law of the United States, and against which a suit at law or in equity has been or may be commenced in any court other than a circuit or district court of the United States, for any liability or alleged liability of such corporation, or any member thereof, as such member, may have such suit removed from the court in which it may be pending to the proper circuit or district court of the United States, upon filing a petition therefor, verified by oath, either before or after issue joined, stating that they have a defence arising under or by virtue of the constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States, and offering good and sufficient surety for entering in such court, on the first day of its session, copies of all process, pleadings, &c., and doing such other appropriate acts as are required to be done by an act of congress passed July 27, 1866 [14 Stat. 306]; and that it shall be thereupon the duty of the court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the suit: and that, the said copies being entered as aforesaid in such court of the United States, the suit shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process.

The petition presented to the supreme court of the state conformed in all respects, substantially, to the provisions of the act. Some question is made on the part of the learned counsel for the plaintiff, whether the suit is brought against the defendants for a liability, or an alleged liability, of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or of any of its members as such; and it is claimed, that a critical examination of the bill of complaint will show this not to be the fact. My examination of it has led to a different conclusion. If it had been otherwise, however, I am of opinion it would not have deprived the defendants of the benefit of the act; that is, if it had not appeared affirmatively on the face of the bill that the suit was against them for such liability. The defendants have averred, in their petition, that the suit has been brought against them for such cause of action; and, if a question is to be made upon the allegation, it must be settled at the trial, and not on affidavits.

The 3d section of the act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 633), provides, that, in any case where a suit is brought, in a state court, against an officer of the United States, or other person, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, it shall be lawful for the defendant, at any time before trial, upon a petition to the circuit court of the United States, setting forth the nature of the suit, and verifying the petition, &c., to remove the suit to that court, and that the cause shall be entered on the docket of that court. This act, like the one before us, has a limitation upon the privilege of removal. The suit must be against a person for or on account of an act done under the revenue laws of the government, or under color thereof. It cannot be doubted, however, that, if no such fact appeared in the declaration, and it was simply for an assault and battery, he could remove the cause, by setting forth in his petition that the suit was for the cause stated in the act; otherwise, the statute could always be evaded by the pleader. I had occasion to examine this third section at large in Dennistoun v. Draper [Case No. 3,804], and refer to the case for my views in respect to its provisions.

The only question in this case arising out of the act of July 27, 1868, that involves any difficulty, is that in respect to the parties claiming the right to a removal. Are all of them obliged to join in the petition, or may they not apply for it as they are served with process, or otherwise brought into court? In my judgment, they need not all join at the time of presenting the petition, but each, or as many as may see fit, may, without waiting, present the petition, and otherwise comply with the requirements of the act. I perceive no well grounded objection to this practice, but, on the contrary, it may be attended with convenience, and can work no prejudice to either party.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff seem to suppose that the solicitor is entitled to notice of the time and place of the presenting of the petition. But this is an error. The act prescribes no such practice, and it is otherwise under all the previous statutes providing for removals. No affidavits can be read before the state court, in opposition. The application on the petition is ex parte, and depends upon the papers upon which it is founded, and, if they are regular and conform to the requirements of the statute, the court has no discretion—the act is peremptory.

I am, also, of opinion, that, when one or more of the defendants have presented a petition and conformed in all respects to the act, and thus initiated the removal, it is not competent for the state court to take any proceedings in the cause, other than to perfect the removal as other defendants may appear and present their petitions. There may, as in the present case, be numerous defendants, and considerable intervals of time between the service of the process, and where it would be expedient that each should be at liberty to take the necessary steps to remove the cause so far as he is concerned and, in the meantime, it would be unfit, and might be a useless waste of time and expense, to all parties concerned, to proceed in the lititgation until the question of jurisdiction was determined.

I agree with the views of the counsel for the defendants, that the fact, that questions may arise, in the course of the litigation, besides those under the acts of congress, and which depend upon general principles of law, cannot withdraw the cause from the jurisdiction of the federal courts. This principle was settled in Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738, and has been recognized as the settled law of the court ever since. Nothing can be added to the conclusiveness of the reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall upon the point, in that case. He observes: "If this were sufficient to withdraw a case from the jurisdiction of the federal courts, almost every case, although involving the construction of a law, would be withdrawn, and a clause in this constitution relating to a subject of vital importance to the government, and expressed in the most comprehensive terms, would be construed to mean almost nothing. There is scarcely any case, every part of which depends on the constitution, laws or treaties of the United States."

For the same reasons, I am of opinion, that the joining of defendants in a suit, not within the limitation, as prescribed by the act, with those who are, cannot be permitted to withdraw the cause from the jurisdiction of the federal courts. If this were admitted, the privilege extended to the parties setting up a right under the constitution and laws of the United States, would, in most, if not in every instance, be defeated. Indeed, if any such principle could be admitted, most of these acts of removal, depending principally upon the subject matter, and intended to secure the interpretation of the constitution and laws of the United States, at the original hearing, to its own judiciary, would be futile and worthless.

The act of 1833, which provides for the removal of suits against an officer of the United States, or other person, for acts done under the revenue laws, could be readily evaded, by joining one or more persons with him not acting in that capacity. If these outside parties are deemed material, or are really material, to a complete remedy in behalf of the plaintiff, they must be regarded as subordinate and incidental to the principal litigation in respect to which the act of congress has interposed the remedy of removal. In this way, the right of the parties to have their defence under the constitution or laws of the United States, tried in the federal courts, is secured, and, at the same time, the remedy of the plaintiff is unimpaired.

It appears, from the papers before me, that a second petition was presented to the state court by all the defendants not included in the first, on the 27th of March, 1869, and the proper order entered for the removal. There appears to have been a full compliance with the terms of the act. It is objected, that the judge before whom the petition was presented, was not sitting in court but at chambers, when the papers were presented and the order of removal made. But, the affidavits before me show that the proceedings took place before the supreme court. It also appears, that the order, duly certified by the clerk of the court, which had been served on the opposite attorneys, was produced before Judge Blatchford, on the return to the alternative mandamus, by the counsel for the defendants in that proceeding, who suggested that the motion for the peremptory writ was inconsistent with that order, and that, if the order was inoperative, the peremptory writ was unnecessary.

The clerk will enter an order in conformity with this opinion, if Judge BLATCHFORD concurs in the result, and will also enter an order, on the motion of the defendants, to dissolve the injunction of July 17th, 1868, granted by the state court.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I concur in the result, that the motion of the plaintiff to remand the cause to the state court must be denied, and the injunction of July 17th, 1868, be dissolved.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—BRINGING IN NEW PARTIES AFTER REMOVAL—FAILURE TO DECLARE AGAINST ALL DEFENDANTS—ELECTION AS TO PROCEEDING AT LAW OR IN EQUITY.

1. A suit was commenced in a state court, and removed into this court under the provisions of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 226). The plaintiff then filed a bill in this court in the suit, naming as a party defendant a person who was not a party to the suit as brought in the state court. The defendants moved, for that reason, to take the bill from the files: Held, that the motion must be granted.

2. The plaintiff also filed a declaration against some, but not all, of the persons named as defendants in the suit as brought in the state court, containing allegations found in the complaint in the suit as so brought, and asking relief thereon which it would have been proper for the state court to grant in the suit thereon, against the defendants liable thereon, such relief being relief properly grantable in this court only in a suit at law. The defendants moved to take the declaration from the files: Held, that the motion must be denied.

[Cited in Railway v. Stringer, 32 Ohio St. 485.]

3. Held, also, that the plaintiff could not be compelled to elect whether to proceed at law or in equity in this court, but that, in addition to proceeding with his suit at law by such declaration, he could at the same time proceed by bill in equity for equitable relief, founded on allegations in substance the same as allegations contained in the original complaint in the state court.

[Cited in La Mothe Manuf'g Co. v. National Tube-Works Co., Case No. 8,033; Thorne v. Towanda Tanning Co., 15 Fed. 291; Schneider v. Foote, 27 Fed. 585.]

This is the suit which was before the court in Fisk v. Union Pac. R. Co. [Case No. 4,827], and again, Id. [Case No. 4,828]. The plaintiff [James Fisk, Jr.], after the denial of his motion to remand the cause to the state court, filed in this court a bill in equity against the persons named as defendants in the suit as brought in the state court, and one other person, and, also, a declaration against some, but not all, of the persons named as defendants in the suit as brought in the state court. Thereupon, the defendants made the motions referred to in the opinion of the court.

Edwin W. Stoughton and David Dudley Field, for plaintiff.

James Emott, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. (1.) As to the motion to take from the files the bill in equity, "because one Davis is named as a party defendant therein who is not a party to the action commenced in the state court and removed to this court." This motion must be granted, in any aspect of the case. If the entire suit, as to all the defendants named as such in the original summons in the state court, was removed into this court, in August, 1868, it was not so removed as to Davis, because he was not named as a defendant in such original summons, nor does his name appear as that of a defendant in the suit, in any of the papers, until the 23d of March, 1869. If the suit is not removed as to any defendant until such defendant petitions the state court for the removal of the cause, then this suit is not removed as to Davis, for the reason that he never has petitioned for such removal.

(2.) As to the motion to take the declaration from the files, "on the ground that it does not include or name as defendants to the action which it purports to commence all the persons who are defendants to the original action, and because it does not conform to the form of the action in the state court." This motion is denied. The allegations contained in the declaration are, in substance, contained in the original complaint in the state court, and the relief asked in the declaration, on such allegations, is relief which it would have been proper for the state court to grant in the suit on such allegations, against such of the defendants as should have been found to be liable thereon. Only such defendants as are sought to be made liable on such allegations are made defendants in such declaration. On the allegations in the declaration the plaintiff asks for such relief as is properly grantable in this court only in a suit at law.

(3.) As to the motion "that the plaintiff be ordered to elect whether he will proceed at law or in equity, by declaration or bill, to discontinue all other proceedings than those which he shall elect, and to continue one suit or action only against the defendants originally sued by him in the state court." This motion is denied. In addition to proceeding with his suit at law in this court by such declaration, he may proceed in this court at the same time by bill in equity, for what is properly equitable relief, founded on allegations to be contained in such bill, in substance the same as allegations contained in the original complaint in the state court.

(4.) As to the motion "that the order to answer said bill and rule to plead to said declaration be vacated." The motion that the order to answer the bill be vacated is granted. The motion that the rule to plead to the declaration be vacated is denied, and the defendants are granted thirty days from the service of a copy of the order to be entered hereon to plead or demur to said declaration.

An order will be entered in conformity with the foregoing decisions.

[NOTE. In March, 1873, an injunction was issued against the Credit Mobilier of America, one of the defendants in this suit, to stay certain proceedings in the state court. See Case No. 4,830.]

INJUNCTION—RESTRAINING PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT—ACT OF MARCH 2, 1793—EFFORTS OF CORPORATION—DEFENDANT TO SECURE ITS DISSOLUTION.

1. A corporation, defendant in a suit in equity, and which might be held liable to respond pecuniarily to the plaintiff, in the suit, and which had made one attempt to procure its own dissolution, was enjoined from taking any proceedings for its own dissolution, or for the appointment of a receiver of its effects, or for the distribution thereof among its stockholders, or any other persons, and from making any distribution or transfer of any of its effects.

[Distinguished in Kessler v. Continental C. & I. Co., 42 Fed. 259.]

2. The provision of section 5 of the act of March 2, 1793 (1 Stat. 334, 335), that a writ of injunction shall not be granted to stay proceedings in any court of a state, has application only to proceedings commenced in a court of a state before the proceedings are commenced in the federal court.

[Cited in State Lottery Co. v. Fitzpatrick, Case No. 8,541; Hamilton v. Walsh, 23 Fed. 420; Wagner v. Drake, 31 Fed. 851; Sharon v. Terry, 36 Fed. 365; Frishman v. Insurance Co., 41 Fed. 449; Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Kuteman, 54 Fed. 551; Abeel v. Culberson, 56 Fed. 333; President of Bowdoin College v. Merritt, 59 Fed. 7.]

3. Under the power given to the federal courts, by section 14 of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 81, 82), to issue all writs which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, it may properly be considered as necessary for the continued exercise of the jurisdiction of a federal court over a corporation, that the corporation should be restrained from taking steps, in a state court, to put itself out of existence.

[Cited in State Lottery Co. v. Fitzpatrick, Case No. 8,541.]

[This was a bill in equity by Lucy D. Fisk, as executrix, etc., of James Fisk, Jr., the original plaintiff in this suit (see Cases Nos. 4,827–4,829), against the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Credit Mobilier of America, and others. It was shown that the Credit Mobilier of America had commenced proceedings in the state court for the purpose of effecting its dissolution. The plaintiff prays for an injunction to restrain said corporation from any further attempts to evade the jurisdiction of the court.]

David Dudley Field, for plaintiff.

James Emott and Albert Stickney, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It appears from the papers that the profits growing out of one of the contracts must have reached those who received them through the medium of the Credit Mobilier of America, as assignee and owner of such contract, so as to make that corporation, as such, liable to respond in this suit to the plaintiff, and to those on whose behalf the suit is brought, and to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, as creditors of such corporation, for such profits, if any defendant is liable so to respond. It also satisfactorily appears, that the Credit Mobilier of America has some property, and that it has made one attempt to procure its dissolution. The property of corporations is held in trust for creditors, and may be pursued by them into whosesoever hands it may come, as well after as before the dissolution of the corporation, unless it may have come to the hands of bona fide purchasers. Hence, the capital stock of a corporation is deemed a trust fund for all the debts of the corporation, and no stockholder can entitle himself to any dividend or share of such capital stock, until all the debts are paid. If the capital stock should be divided, leaving any debts unpaid, every stockholder, receiving his share of the capital stock, would, through a remedy in equity, be held liable pro rata to contribute to the discharge of such debts out of the fund in his hands. Upon the principle, that the property of a corporation is held by its officers in trust, to be applied to the discharge of the legal debts of such corporation, courts of equity interfere to restrain such officers from applying such property to any illegal purpose, and to compel restitution when any illegal application has been made. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1252, 1252a. The pursuit of the stockholders may make it necessary to retain jurisdiction over the corporation. It cannot be permitted, that, after jurisdiction, in this suit, over this corporation has been acquired by this court, the corporation should be suffered to take steps to evade such jurisdiction by procuring its own dissolution.

The provision of section 5 of the act of March 2, 1793 (1 Stat. 334, 335), that a writ of injunction shall not be granted to stay proceedings in any court of a state, has never been held to have, and cannot properly be construed to have, any application except to proceedings commenced in a court of a state before the proceedings are commenced in the federal court. Otherwise, after suit brought in a federal court, a party defendant could, by resorting to a suit in a state court, defeat, in many ways, the effective jurisdiction and action of the federal court, after it had obtained full jurisdiction of person and subject-matter. Moreover, the provision of the act of 1793 must be construed in connection with the provision of section 14 of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 81, 82), that the federal courts shall have power to issue all writs which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions. It may properly be considered as necessary for the continued exercise of the jurisdiction of this court over the corporation in question, that it should be restrained from taking steps, in a state court, to put itself out of existence.

The injunction asked for is proper, to restrain the corporation from taking any proceedings for its own dissolution, or for the appointment of a receiver of its effects, or for the distribution thereof among its stockholders, or any other persons, and from making any distribution or transfer of any of its effects. If this injunction shall at any time interfere with the doing by the corporation of anything which it ought properly to be allowed to do, application may be made to modify it.

PATENTS—BILL TAKEN PRO CONFESSO—PROOF OF DAMAGE—NOMINAL DAMAGES—COSTS.

1. Where a bill is taken pro confesso and the case referred to a master to ascertain the complainants' damages and the defendants' profits arising from infringement of a patent, and the complainants fail to make satisfactory proof thereof before the master, he can report only nominal damages against the defendants.

2. In such case, if the complainants except to the master's report, and their exceptions are overruled by the court, they will be allowed costs to and including the interlocutory decree; but the defendants will be allowed costs thereafter, the one to be set off against the other to the extent of its amount, and the excess to be recovered of the party against whom it exists.

Master's report: This case does not come to the master after a final hearing upon pleadings and proofs, but upon a decree entered under an order taking the bill pro confesso. The decree therefore does not inform the master precisely in what the infringement consists or what particular suspender-ends made and sold by the defendant come within the reference to ascertain the damages sustained by the plaintiffs or the profits made by the defendant. The plaintiffs have produced before the master three several exhibits, marked, respectively, "C," "F," and "Y," alleged to have been purchased from the defendant, and which they claim infringe the patents upon which this suit is brought, and for the manufacture and sale of which and others like them damages are claimed. The infringement is denied by the defendant. Experts have been examined before the master upon this point, and, as is usual in such cases, differ in opinion. It is not deemed necessary by the master to determine this question of difference, for in the view of the case taken by him it is immaterial. The complainants have been unable to show satisfactorily what number of suspender-ends like Exhibits C, Y, and F the defendant has made and sold, and hence no information is furnished upon which any estimate can be made either of the profits, if any, made by the defendant or of any damages sustained by the complainants. The master is compelled, therefore, to report that the complainants are entitled to recover but the nominal damages of six cents.

W. A. Coursen, for plaintiffs.

M. B. Andrus, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. I see no sufficient grounds for interfering with the report of the master in this case, and the plaintiffs' exceptions to the report are overruled. The plaintiffs are entitled to the costs of the cause to and including the interlocutory decree, and the defendant is entitled to recover its costs from and after such decree, the one bill to be set off against the other and the difference to be recovered by the party against whom it exists.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1843.

BANKRUPTCY—RESTRAINING PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURT—COLLECTION OF JUDGMENT—DISCRETION OF THE COURT.

1. A. sued B., and trustees, in October, 1843, in assumpsit, and as no defence existed, B. was, with his consent, defaulted. The cause was then continued for two successive terms, in order to ascertain whether the trustees had any effects, when, no application having been made to take off the default, or to stay the proceedings, a final judgment was rendered against B. on May 26th, 1843, and execution issued on June 22d, 1843, and was levied on the real estate attached. On January 25th, 1843, B. petitioned for the benefit of the bankrupt act, and was declared a bankrupt on March 14th, 1843. C. was appointed his assignee on April 7th, 1843, and obtained from the district judge a writ of injunction to restrain B. from proceeding in his suit, which was dissolved on the application of B. on April 28th, 1843. This bill was then brought, praying the court to set aside the judgment, and to order the moneys levied upon to be paid over to the assignee, and for other relief. It was held, that, as the default was entered before the bankruptcy of B., and was entered without surprise, mistake, or fraud, but with the consent of B., and as no application had ever been made to take it off, that there was no good ground to set aside the judgment.

[Cited in Coggeshall v. Potter, Case No. 2,955; Crapo v. Kelly, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 638.]

2. It was also held, that, as the suit brought in the district court was not identical with the bill in the present case, the decision therein could not be pleaded as a flat bar; but since the relief asked of this court was a matter in its sound discretion, and not of right, that the decision operated strongly to influence it in refusing to interfere in the matter.

3. The doctrine in Ex parte Foster [Case No. 4,960] affirmed.

[Cited in Hubbard v. Hamilton Bank, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 344.]

Bill in equity [by Augustus H. Fiske, assignee, against Lyman Hunt]. The material facts set forth in the bill and admitted in the answer, sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court. A general replication to the answer was put in; but no evidence was taken by either side, and the cause was, therefore, argued upon the bill and answer.

Rand, for assignee.

B. R. Curtis, for defendant.

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. The statement of the material facts in the present case may be thus briefly given. The creditor, Hunt, sued the bankrupt, Healey, in assumpsit, on a writ of attachment, on which real estate was attached, and the trustees were summoned, in the state court of common pleas for Suffolk county, returnable to the October term, 1842; and no defence then existing, the defendant Healey was, with his own consent, defaulted. The cause was then continued to the next January term of the same court, 1843, in order to ascertain, whether the trustees, or some of them, had any effects; and it was again continued, for the same purpose, to the April term of the same court. At the April term, no application having been made to the court of common pleas to take off the default, a final judgment was rendered against the defendant Healey, on the 26th day of May, 1843. In the intermediate time, to wit, on the 25th day of January, 1843, Healey petitioned the district court for the benefit of the bankrupt act, and on the 14th day of March, 1843, he was accordingly declared a bankrupt; and upon the 20th day of the same month, Fiske (the plaintiff) was appointed the assignee of his estate. On the 7th of April, before the judgment was taken, the assignee made an application to the district judge for a writ of injunction against the defendant, Hunt, that he might be restrained from further prosecuting his said suit, which was granted upon a hearing ex parte on the same day. Hunt afterwards made an application to the court to dissolve the injunction, so granted; and upon the hearing of the case, on the 28th of April, 1843, the injunction was dissolved by the district court; and on the 26th of May, 1843, the judgment was entered in the suit in the court of common pleas. No application was made to the court of common pleas, at any time before the judgment, to take off the default, or to stay the proceedings or judgment. An execution was issued on the judgment on the 22d of June, 1843, and by levies thereon the execution was satisfied for about $4463.98. The bill seeks to set aside the judgment as a fraud upon the bankrupt, and to have the moneys and property levied and received upon the execution paid over and reconveyed to the assignee, and for other relief.

The case, then, for the purposes of the argument, stands for consideration upon the following points: (1.) Whether the assignee is entitled to any relief, in a case where, before the bankruptcy, the judgment debtor has voluntarily consented to be defaulted; and of course, where, in a legal sense, he is out of court, and has no day either for appearance or pleading in the court. (2.) Whether it will make any difference in the case, that the judgment has been rendered after the bankruptcy, with a full knowledge thereof. (3.) Whether it will make any difference, that the assignee has full knowledge of the proceedings in the court, where the suit is pending, before the judgment is rendered, and makes no application to take off the default, or suspend the judgment. (4.) Whether the final hearing upon the matter of the injunction before the district court is conclusive upon the point, that the creditor, Hunt, was lawfully entitled to take judgment, and that the assignee, having elected his remedy before the district court, can entitle himself in the circuit court to maintain the present bill.

In respect to the three first points (which may be conveniently considered together,) it is material to be borne in mind, that, in cases unaffected with fraud, the assignee generally, although perhaps not universally, succeeds to those rights, and those rights only, which belong to the bankrupt. His remedy may be more extensive, growing out of the bankruptcy; but his rights are not enlarged. In the present case, there is no pretence to say, that the default, or the judgment was a fraudulent contrivance, between the bankrupt and the creditor (Hunt,) to give the latter a preference, in contemplation of bankruptcy. Such a contemplation, if it had existed, would have been sufficient to have vitiated all the proceedings. Now, is there any ground to suggest, that the creditor (Hunt) proceeded to take his judgment suddenly after the bankruptcy, before the assignee was appointed, or had an opportunity to apply to the court of common pleas to take off the default, or to stay proceedings? That might have presented a very different case. Here the case is one, where no application was ever made to take off the default, or stay proceedings so as to let the party into any defence arising under the bankruptcy, in case the bankrupt should obtain his discharge. The bankrupt and the assignee must, therefore, be deemed to have submitted voluntarily to the judgment, either upon the ground, that they would not be successful in any such application, or that it would not furnish, if allowed, any just ground of defence, under all the circumstances. Now, I must say, that, looking to these special considerations, and to the fact, that the default was by the express consent of the debtor (Healey), it does not strike me, that there is laid in the bill any just ground of relief upon the default and judgment. The assignee and the bankrupt have both voluntarily withdrawn from the court, where the suit was pending, and suffered the judgment to go without opposition. In these respects, it must resemble the case Ex parte Vose [unreported], decided in this court a few days ago, although distinguishable from that in some other particulars.

But I should be unwilling to rest the present case upon this narrow ground, because it seems to me, that the court is called upon, by the frequency of the occurences of this sort, to lay down a rule more comprehensive upon the subject. And it strikes me, that, after the term has passed, at which the default has been entered before the bankruptcy, not by surprise, or mistake, or fraud, but by the voluntary consent, or wilful non-appearance of the party, then, and under such circumstances, as the matter of taking off the default is and must be a matter of sound discretion in the court, where the suit is pending, and not of absolute right in the party, this court ought to be very slow in interfering with that discretion; and unless under extraordinary circumstances, raising some equity, it ought to leave the case to the court where it is pending, to act ex aequo et bono, at it deems suited to the merits of the application. But, at all events, I am prepared to say that where a default has been so entered, and an assignee has been appointed before judgment, and has not, with knowledge of the fact, chosen to apply to the court to take off the default, or to stay the proceedings, that, of itself, ought to be deemed an abandonment of any defence in such suit, and conclusive upon all the creditors whom he represents. Further than this it is not necessary to go, in order to decide the present case; and, therefore, I leave the naked question, whether after a default, which has never been taken off, or has been refused to be taken off by the court, and the judgment has been rendered thereon (without any prohibitory injunction,) any redress ought to be given, either in this court or in the district court in bankruptcy, to be decided, when it shall directly arise in judgment.

Upon the other remaining point, as to the effect of the dissolution of injunction by the district court, there may perhaps be more difficulty. The suit in the district court, and the bill in this court, are not, indeed, throughout, identical in their matter, or their claim for relief. The petition for an injunction, under the circumstances, could go no farther than to ask for an interlocutory degree for an injunction, until it should be ascertained whether there should be any discharge granted to the bankrupt, which could be pleaded in bar of the suit. It was, of course, temporary; and the granting it was not decisive of the merits of the application. But when the court dissolved the injunction, which I am to take, from the statement in the case, to have been a decree upon the merits of the application, and not upon any ground of irregularity, there, by implication, the court must have decided that there was no ground to prevent the creditor from proceeding to judgment in his suit upon the default. Now the present bill asks for relief against that very judgment, and to have it set aside, and to have the moneys and lands levied upon under the execution, to be restored to the assignee. This is certainly far broader relief than was claimed, or could, under the circumstances of the case, have been asked or given upon the petition for the injunction. But then the question still arises, whether in a case, like the present, the relief sought is a matter of right, or in the sound discretion of the court. And if it be the latter only, then whether this court ought to set aside the judgment, and grant the other relief prayed by the bill, after the district court has impliedly sanctioned that judgment by allowing it to be entered. In my judgment, the interposition of the court in a case of this sort is a matter of sound discretion, and not a matter of right in the party. Before the court grants the relief, it should be entirely satisfied that the judgment ought to be set aside, as improperly, or, at least, improvidently obtained; and that the creditor (Hunt) is entitled to no lien or equity in the premises, which should be protected and sustained by the court against the claims of the other creditors. Now, I must say, that I am not able to perceive any solid ground, upon which this incipient claim, or right of priority or lien (call it which you please), created by the attachment, has been displaced, or ought to be displaced. The creditor has but followed out his legal rights to their natural and ordinary consummation. He has obeyed the injunction of the district court, and taken judgment only, when, by the decree of that court, he was definitively informed, that he was at liberty to do so, and that there was not in the judgment of the court, sitting in bankruptcy, any ground to dispute, or to displace, or postpone his legal rights. Now, this was a matter clearly within the jurisdiction of the district court, sitting as a court of equity in bankruptcy, under the 6th section of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9 [5 Stat. 440]. If that decision, coming incidentally under consideration, under the view of this court, in a bill in equity for more general purposes is not, and cannot be pleaded as a flat bar to a bill, as I incline to think that it cannot, still it addresses itself strongly to the discretion of the court, as a matter fit to operate upon its own judgment, in refusing to interfere, where the judgment is founded upon a just claim, and the district court has justified the creditor in entering it.

The cases, which have been cited at the bar in support of the bill, are, in my judgment, distinguishable from the present in leading circumstances. I adhere to the doctrine laid down in Ex parte Foster [Case No. 4,960]; and, indeed, after much reflection upon it since it was delivered, I maintain, notwithstanding some doubts, which have been attempted to be thrown over it by those who have certainly misunderstood its true bearing, or have dissented from it, without condescending to answer its reasoning, that it is founded in the true interpretation of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9 [supra], and upon authorities of the highest consideration and value. But in that case there was not only no default, but the cause was but just commenced, and no pleadings were had, and, indeed, the writ itself was not returnable until April after the petition was filed. Parker v. Muggridge [Case No. 10,743], was a cause of default, and a continuance for judgment under a special agreement, and it was held, that the creditors had a right, under the agreement, to proceed to judgment, and had an equitable lien on the property attached. In Ex parte Cook [Id. 3,152], the judgment itself was obtained before the petition in bankruptcy was filed; and it was held to be a clear case of lien within the protection of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9 [supra]. Ex parte Vose has been already referred to, and, as has been said, approaches very near to the present. So far as it does go, it is against the plaintiff.

The cases, which have been cited from the English courts, to establish the doctrine, that the courts of common law will, after an interlocutory judgment upon default, set it aside in order to allow the bankrupt to plead his discharge, are, it seems to me, founded in good sense and reason. Evans v. Gill, 11 Bos. & P. 52; Duff v. Campbell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 577. See, also, Ex parte Sawtell, 6 Pick. 110; Shearer v. Jewett, 14 Pick. 232; Lovell v. Eastaff, 3 Term R. 554. But they are addressed to the discretion of the court of common law, where the suit is pending, and might have furnished a good ground to that court to take off the default, or to stay the proceedings. But no application was made to the court of common pleas in the present case to take off the default, and final judgment was regularly rendered in the case. There is then no equity, addressed to this court, from the circumstances, upon which it can act upon the judgment. It may be observed too, that the cases cited were to set aside interlocutory judgments; and that, by the late bankrupt act (6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 108), a special provision has been made to meet cases, where final judgments are rendered, and to take from the judgment creditor any more than his rateable proportion of the bankrupt's assets. But the judgment itself is not interfered with. 2 Tidd, Pr. (9th Ed. 1828) p. 570.

The main stress of the argument of the plaintiff is this, that the lien was a conditional one, and not absolute, dependent upon future contingencies at the time when the bankruptcy took place. To that I agree; but then the judgment has been obtained upon that conditional lien, and perfected and made absolute thereby in a regular manner, without any fraud or impropriety on the part of the creditor, and without any surprise or asserted mistake on the part of the bankrupt, or of his assignee. The latter have had full opportunity to apply for relief and to suspend the proceedings in the court of common pleas before judgment, if they, or either of them, had applied to the court for the purpose. Instead of adopting that course, they have silently acquiesced in the judgment, without interposition or objection. The assignee did apply to the district court for an injunction to stay the proceedings and judgment; but the application failed of final success. The circuit court, therefore, is called upon to say, that a judgment, regularly obtained in the proper court, by which the lien became absolute and was perfected, ought now to be set aside, and the execution thereof avoided, not because the judgment is not a just one, but because, if the assignee had interfered in the proper court, the judgment might have been stayed; and, therefore, the circuit court ought not to do for the assignee what he might have done for himself in another court, if he had thought proper to act in the premises. It appears to me, that the present case falls directly within the reasoning of the case Ex parte Vose. The assignee has not interfered at the proper time, or in the proper court, to stay the judgment or to take off the default, and, therefore, he may, in a just sense, be said voluntarily to have withdrawn himself from the suit.

Upon the whole, in every view, in which I can contemplate this case, it is not one in which the assignee is entitled to relief in this court. Bill dismissed without costs.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 8, 1872.[1]

CUSTOMS DUTIES—CLASSIFICATION—SILK NECKTIES.

[Silk neckties imported in 1868 are dutiable at 35 per cent. as "wearing apparel," under the acts of 1861 and 1862 (12 Stat. 186, 555), and not at 60 per cent., as scarfs by similitude, under the act of August 30, 1842, § 20 (5 Stat. 565).]

[Distinguished in Cohen v. Phelps, Case No. 2,964.]

[See note at end of case.]

This was an action to recover duties claimed to be illegally exacted upon an importation of silk neckties made in October, 1868, upon which the defendant [Henry A. Smythe], then collector of the port of New York, had assessed and collected duty at the rate of 60 per cent., under the act of March 3, 1865 [15 Stat. 493], as upon "ready-made clothing of silk." On appeal to the secretary of the treasury, the rate charged was affirmed, but the goods were classified as scarfs by similitude under section 20, act of August 30, 1842. Plaintiffs [Henry G. Fiske and others] contended that the articles were provided for as "wearing apparel and articles worn by men, women, or children," at 35 per cent., under the tariff acts of 1861 and 1862. Evidence was introduced for the plaintiffs, showing that the article "neckties" was known in trade and commerce as gentlemen's furnishing goods, and not as ready-made clothing; that they were not scarfs, which were made in a different way and of different patterns.

Edward Hartley and B. L. Ludington, for plaintiffs.

Noah Davis, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

After argument THE COURT charged the jury that the goods were not under the evidence, and in view of the cases cited, "ready-made clothing," nor could they be liable to duty by similitude, under the act of 1842, because that law affected only non-enumerated articles, and these were enumerated under the title of wearing apparel; hence they were not dutiable as scarfs, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

[NOTE. The defendant Smythe sued out a writ of error on which this judgment was reversed by the supreme court, Mr. Justice Swayne delivering the opinion. It was held that the silk neckties were dutiable at 50 per cent. ad valorem under the provisions of the act of July 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 202), which act imposes a duty of 60 per cent. "on all dress and piece silks," etc., and on all manufactures of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value, not otherwise provided for, 50 per cent. ad valorem. It was held that the neckties were dutiable under this last clause as a manufacture of silk not otherwise provided for. Smythe v. Fiske, 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 374.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. May 10, 1870.

EJECTMENT—WHEN LANDLORD MAY BE MADE DEFENDANT — ANSWER SHOULD STATE FACTS, NOT EVIDENCE—EXHIBIT NO PART OF A PLEADING—DIVORCE — DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY OF THE PARTIES—MINOR DEFENDANTS—HOW JURISDICTION OF ACQUIRED—JUDGMENT IN EJECTMENT—WHEN NO BAR TO ANOTHER ACTION — MESNE PROFITS—SET-OFF.

1. A landlord has no right to apply to be made defendant in an action of ejectment in place of the tenant until the latter files his answer, stating "that he is in possession only as the tenant of another, naming him and his place of residence." Code Or. 226.

2. A defendant in ejectment should state in his answer the nature and duration of the estate he claims in the premises, if any, but not the evidence of it. Code Or. 226, 227.

[1] [Reversed in 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 374.]

3. An exhibit is no part of a pleading in an action at law; a record or instrument should be stated in a pleading either according to its tenor or legal effect.

4. The Oregon act of January 17, 1854, relating to marriage and divorce, which gave the court granting a divorce power to "make such a disposition of the property of the parties" as might appear "just and equitable" under the circumstances of the case, and to "make such disposition of and provision for the children as shall appear most expedient," did not authorize such court to give the property of either parent to the children, except during their minority, and as a means of providing for their nurture and education during such minority.

5. A general guardian cannot voluntarily appear for minor defendants, but they must be served with process, and a guardian ad litem appointed for them, when brought into court.

6. If a verdict for the defendant in an action of ejectment, only states that the defendant is entitled to the possession of the premises, a judgment therein is not necessarily a bar to another action between the same parties for the same property. Code Or. 227.

7. A plea of set-off for permanent improvements made upon the premises in an action for mesne profits, is not sufficient, unless it allege that such improvements were made by the defendant, or those under whom he claims while holding under color of title, adversely to the claim of the plaintiff and in good faith. Code Or. 227.

[This was an action at law by J. B. Fitch against William Cornell, A. R. Tunstall, Jonathan Moore, and Jacob Kline, Jr., to recover the possession of certain real property.]

Joseph N. Dolph and Walter W. Thayer, for plaintiff.

Erasmus D. Shattuck, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. This action was commenced April 16, 1869, to recover the possession of lots 3, 4, 5 and 6, in block 111, in the city of Portland, against George W. Durand, then in the actual possession of the premises. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is a citizen of the state of California, and said Durand is a citizen and resident of Oregon; that plaintiff is the owner in fee-simple of the property sued for, and entitled to the immediate possession thereof; and that the defendant Durand is wrongfully in possession of the same and withholds such possession, to the damage of plaintiff $1,000.

Among the papers in the case is one purporting to be the answer of Durand, and signed by his attorneys, and verified by him on April 27, 1869. The paper is attached to the separate applications of William Cornell and others to be made defendants in place of Durand, the outer one of which is marked "Filed May 3, 1869." I presume it was assumed by the attorney, that this answer being attached to these applications, it became a part of them, and was filed with them. But this is a mistake. It has no connection with them, and ought not to have been attached to them. It comes from another source, and should have been filed before the applications were entitled to be heard. A landlord has no right to apply to be substituted as defendant in place of the party who is in actual possession and sued, until the latter by his answer made and filed in court, declares "that he is in possession only as the tenant of another, naming him, and his place of residence." Code Or. 226. Such slovenly and irregular practices touching matters of this kind are often in after times the cause of innocent parties being involved in unnecessary and expensive litigation, and therefore ought not to be tolerated by the courts. For this reason I call attention to it in this instance. Having done so, I will assume for the purposes of this case, that it was in fact filed, although not so endorsed, by being lodged in the clerk's office, and placed by the clerk among the papers of the case, and that therefore Cornell and others had a legal right to be made defendants in place of Durand, the party in possession.

The answer of Durand admits that he is in possession of the premises, but alleges that he holds such possession as the tenant of William Cornell, S. M. Tunstall and Mary Jane, his wife, Jonathan Moore and Jacob Cline, residents of Multnomah county, in the district aforesaid.

On May 5, 1869, William Cornell, in pursuance of the order of the court making himself and the others aforesaid defendants, in place of Durand, filed an answer to the complaint, which contains the following pleas or defenses:

1. A specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint, except the citizenship of the parties and the possession of the defendants.

2. That the defendant is the owner in fee of an undivided one fourth of the premises, for which he defends. This plea, instead of stopping here, proceeds at length to state the evidence which the defendant claims proves the fact that he is the owner of such undivided interest in the premises. This part of the plea will be omitted here and stated in the evidence.

3. That the plaintiff ought not to have and maintain this action, because in an action heretofore brought by one Jacob Cline to recover the possession of the same premises against John Hulery, in the circuit court for the county of Multnomah, and state of Oregon, in which one Mary Cline, guardian for her minor children Antha, Isabella, Mary Jane and Jacob Cline, was admitted by the order of said court as a defendant in place of said Hulery, as guardian aforesaid, it was on December 5, 1863, by the judgment of said court determined that said Mary Cline, as guardian aforesaid, was entitled to the possession of said premises, and that Jacob Cline take nothing by his said action; and that afterwards the said Jacob Cline appealed from the judgment of the said circuit court to the supreme court of the state aforesaid, and said supreme court, on hearing and consideration of said appeal gave judgment on September ——, 1864, affirming the judgment of the said circuit court, which still remains in full force and effect; and that said judgments of said circuit and supreme courts are conclusive as to the estate in said premises, and to the right to the possession thereof upon said Cline and all persons claiming under him since the commencement of said action, and that the only right or title held by the plaintiff herein, is derived from Cline since said action was commenced.

4. That the defendant and those under whom he claims since November 26, 1862, have made permanent improvements upon the premises, of the value of $1,000, which sum he offers to set-off against any sum that the plaintiff herein may be found entitled to as damages on account of the defendant's occupation of the premises.

The other three defendants filed separate and similar answers, Mary Cline appearing and answering for her ward, Jacob Cline aforesaid. On May 6, the plaintiff filed separate replications to the answers of the defendants. These do not contain, as they should, separate replies to the separate defenses in said answers, of title in the defendants, and a former adjudication of the right to the possession of the premises. As to the plea of title, they deny that the defendants are each the owners of an undivided fourth of the premises, or of any estate or interest therein, and then proceed to reply to the evidence of defendants' alleged title, as set forth in the plea of title in the answer —either denying the facts stated, or the legal conclusions sought to be drawn therefrom. The proper reply to this part of these pleas would have been a motion to strike out for redundancy. As to the pleas of former adjudication, the replications admit that an action was brought in the circuit court aforesaid, by Jacob Cline against John Hulery, to recover possession of the premises in the complaint mentioned, as stated in said pleas, but deny that it was adjudged therein that said Cline take nothing by said action, or that the same was brought for the identical causes as this, or that "all the matters involved in this action were adjudged or finally determined" therein; "and alleges that a true copy of the judgment in said action is hereto attached and marked 'A';" and denies that said judgment of the circuit and supreme court aforesaid, are conclusive as to the estate in said property, or as to the right to the possession thereof upon said Jacob Cline, or those claiming under him as alleged in said pleas.

As to the so-called "Exhibit A," attached to the replications, it cannot be regarded as a part of them. There is no such thing as an exhibit in pleadings, in an action at law. A record or instrument must be stated in a pleading according to its legal effect, or according to the tenor thereof, and its legal operations referred to the court. Gould, Pl. 156–160. The plaintiff by his replication, denies that the action mentioned in this record or so-called "Exhibit A," was brought for the same causes of action as this, and also denies the legal effect claimed for such record by the defendants in their answers. This is sufficient, so far as the pleadings are concerned. The burden of proof is upon the defendants, to show the existence of such a record, and that they have correctly stated its legal effect.

From the evidence it appears:

I. That in 1836, in the state of Illinois, Jacob Cline and Mary Cline were intermarried, and that they continued to live together as husband and wife, until 1862, and that since 1844, they have resided in Multnomah county, Oregon.

II. That on September 26, 1862, Mary Cline commenced a suit against Jacob Cline, her husband, for a divorce from the bonds of matrimony, on account of adultery and harsh and cruel treatment, and for the custody and guardianship of four minor children of said marriage, and for a division of Jacob's property, and an allotment of so much thereof to said Mary, as might be just and equitable under the circumstances; and that Mary was the owner in her own right of one half of the donation claim of 640 acres of said Jacob and Mary, of the value of $2,500; and that said Jacob was the owner of the other half of said donation claim, together with other real property situate in the city of Portland, of the value of $18,000, and of personal property of the value of $5,000, all of which has been acquired since the marriage aforesaid, except $1,500 which Jacob possessed at that time; and that there were then living seven children, the issue of said marriage, four of whom were minors, between the ages of nineteen and seven years.

III. That on November 26, 1862, said circuit court by its decree then given, in said suit for divorce, etc., adjudged and provided, that the parties thereto be divorced from the bonds of matrimony; and that said Mary "have the custody and guardianship of the four minor children of the parties mentioned in the complaint, to wit: Antha, Isabella, Mary Jane and Jacob, and the care and control of their estate during their minority respectively;" and that the defendant's half of the donation claim aforesaid, and lots five and six in block seven, in the city of Portland, then owned by Jacob, be given to and "vested in said Mary, to have and to hold to her own use during her natural life," which real property, according to the statements of said parties in their respective pleadings, was then of about the value of $5,200; and also that certain furniture owned by said Jacob, of the value, according to the statements aforesaid, of about $500, "be given to, and transferred to said Mary, to have and to hold the same to her own use;" and that said Jacob pay to said Mary the sum of $1,500 in money out of the remainder of said property in two payments within the period of six months thereafter; and also "all the right, title and interest of said Jacob in and to lots three, four, five and six, in block 111 in the city of Portland, be and the same is divested out of the said Jacob, and the same is hereby vested in the four minor children of the parties, to wit: Antha, Isabella, Mary Jane and Jacob, as tenants in common, to have and to hold the same with the appurtenances to them and their heirs forever, and the same Jacob is hereby ordered and required to deliver over to the said minors or their guardian, the possession of said property, and said guardian is hereby required to use and apply the issues, rents, and profits of said estate, to the maintenance and education of said minors respectively, according to their interest during their minority, which last mentioned property is the same for the possession of which this action is brought, and which at the date of said decree, according to the statements of the parties aforesaid, was of the value of about $3,600; and further, that the remaining property and pecuniary rights of Jacob not disposed of by said decree, remain to him as if the same had not been made."

IV. That Jacob paid said sum of $1,500 to said Mary, and also the costs of said suit; and that on November 25, 1863, Jacob gave notice of an appeal from the decree aforesaid to the supreme court of the state of Oregon, and that on September 21, 1864, said supreme court, on motion of respondent, dismissed said appeal, without hearing the cause upon its merits, because so far as appears, no transcript thereof was filed by appellant in said court.

V. That on October 8, 1863, said Jacob Cline brought an action in the circuit court aforesaid against John Hulery, to recover possession of the lot in controversy, alleging in his complaint therein, that he was the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the premises, and that the said Hulery was wrongfully in the possession thereof. On the same day Hulery was duly served with process requiring him to appear and answer the complaint by November 9, which he failed to do. On November 14, Cline moved for a judgment against Hulery; and on the same day Mary Cline moved for leave to appear and answer as the landlord of Hulery. Accompanying this latter motion, was the affidavit of Mary to the effect that the property in question belonged to her children, and as their guardian, she was entitled to the possession of the same; and that she had rented it to Hulery, and had no notice of the pendency of the action until the day before, whereupon said circuit court denied the motion of Jacob and allowed the motion of Mary. On November 16, Mary filed an answer to the complaint of Jacob, wherein she denies that he is the owner of the premises and entitled to the possession thereof, and pleads, according to the tenor thereof, so much of the decree in the suit of divorce above mentioned, as relates to the premises in controversy, and that as guardian of the minor children aforesaid, she had rented said property to Hulery, who was then in the possession of the same as her tenant; and that she was applying the rents and profits of said property to the support of said children, in pursuance of said decree.

VI. That the action aforesaid was tried by the said circuit court, without the intervention of a jury, and on December 4, the said court found, as a conclusion of fact, that "Mary Cline is the guardian of the minor children named in the answer, and as such, was at the time of the commencement of this suit, and is by her tenant, the defendant Hulery, in possession of the premises described in the complaint;" and "that the decree, an extract of which is set out in the answer, remains unreversed, and at the date of the answer not appealed;" and that said court also found "as a conclusion of law from these facts, that the defendant Mary Cline, as guardian, etc., and the defendant John Hulery as her tenant, are entitled to the possession of said premises." And afterwards, on December 5, the court aforesaid gave judgment in said action and upon said findings, as follows:

"This cause being submitted to the court upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts, the court finds that the defendant Mary Cline, as guardian, and the defendant Hulery as her tenant, are entitled to the possession of the premises described in the complaint, and it is ordered and adjudged by the court that the defendant Mary Cline, as guardian, and defendant John Hulery as her tenant, do have and hold the possession of said premises, and that they recover of and from the plaintiff their costs and disbursements, to be taxed." And that afterwards Jacob Cline took an appeal from said judgment of said circuit court to the supreme court of the state of Oregon, upon the hearing and consideration of which, it was determined by said supreme court, on September 27, 1864, that there was no error in the record of the proceedings in the court below, and that its judgment "be in all things affirmed."

VII. That in the month of August, 1862, Jacob Cline became and was the owner in fee simple of the premises, and that soon after the decree of divorce aforesaid, Mary Cline, with the knowledge of Jacob, received the rent from the tenant in possession of the same, and after said tenant left the premises she rented them to Hulery aforesaid, and that the use and occupation of the same since November, 1862, has been worth not less than $45 per month, or $520 per annum; and that on December 9, 1868, Jacob Cline and Sarah Ellen, his wife, executed a conveyance of the premises to the plaintiff herein; and that Isabella aforesaid intermarried with one James Campbell in the month of December, 1867, and that afterwards and before December, 1868, she and her said husband duly executed a conveyance of an undivided one fourth in the premises to the defendant Moore; and that Antha aforesaid intermarried with one Peter Cline prior to December, 1868, and afterwards and prior to the last mentioned date, she and her said husband duly executed a conveyance of an undivided one fourth interest in the premises to the defendant, Cornell; and that Mary Jane aforesaid, after the decree of divorce aforesaid, and before the commencement of this action, intermarried with one S. M. Tunstall, one of the defendants herein; and that said Antha, Isabella and Mary Jane had each arrived at the age of majority before the commencement of the action, and that Jacob Cline, Junior, is now aged fifteen years and six months.

Upon this statement of the case, two principal questions arise, and were argued by counsel.

1. Had the circuit court of Multnomah county jurisdiction and power in the suit for divorce between Mary and Jacob Cline, to take the property of the latter and vest it in his children, or any of them? and,

2. Is the plaintiff barred from maintaining this action to recover the possession of the premises by reason of the judgment of said circuit court, in the action of Jacob Cline against Hulery aforesaid.

The answer to the first question depends upon the construction to be given to the statute then in force, entitled—"An act relating to marriage and divorce," passed Jan. 17, 1854, and which took effect on the first of May following. The second and last chapter of the act is entitled—"Divorce and Alimony." After declaring the causes for which a divorce might be granted, and in what court the proceedings should be had, and the mode of them, the act provides as follows:

"Sec. 7. The court in granting a divorce, shall make such disposition of, and provision for the children, as shall appear most expedient under all the circumstances, and most for the present comfort and future well being of such children. * * *

"Sec. 8. In granting a divorce, the court shall also make such a disposition of the property of the parties as shall appear just and equitable, having regard to the respective merits of the parties, and the condition in which they will be left by such divorce, and to the party through whom the property was acquired, and the burdens imposed upon it, for the benefit of children. * * *

"Sec. 10. When the marriage shall be dissolved by the husband being sentenced to imprisonment, and when a divorce shall be ordered for the cause of adultery committed by the husband, the wife shall be entitled to her dower in his lands in the same maner as if he were dead; but she shall not be entitled to dower in any other case of divorce." St. Or. 1855, p. 540.

This act remained in force until June 1, 1863, when it was superseded by title 7, of chapter 5, of the Civil Code, passed October 11, 1862. Code Or. 269. If the act has received a settled construction in the courts of Oregon, it is the duty of this court to follow such construction. But I do not think it can be said to have received such a construction. It contained no provision for an appeal from the inferior courts in which the original jurisdiction was vested, to the supreme court, and therefore its provisions never came before the latter court, and were never directly considered or expounded by it. During the existence of the act, the decisions of the district courts, until the state organization went into operation in 1859, and thereafter the circuit courts, were final in each case. The defendants have produced five decrees of these courts in support of the position that the act authorized the court to give the real property of the parties, or either of them, to the children.

In Horner v. Horner, on September 5, 1855, there was a decree of divorce on the complaint of the wife. The parties were in possession of a donation claim of 640 acres, under the act of congress, each being entitled to one half thereof in his or her own right. The court (Olney, Judge) gave the wife her half of the land, and gave the husband's half to two minor children of the parties. In Shively v. Shively, on June 15, 1857, there was a divorce granted on the complaint of the wife. The parties were in possession of a donation claim, and the court (Olney, Judge) gave the husband his half of the land, and gave the wife's half to the minor children of the marriage. In Fozette v. Fozette, on August 15, 1859, there was a divorce granted on the complaint of the wife, and the parties appear to have been in possession of a donation claim of 640 acres. The court (Wait, Judge) divided the wife's half of the claim between herself and two minor children, but made no disposition of the husband's half. In Soverns v. Soverns, on November 29, 1860, there was a divorce granted on complaint of the wife. The court (Wait, Judge) divided the land of the husband (160 acres) between the wife and one minor child of the marriage. In Stone v. Stone, on August 6, 1859, a divorce was granted on the complaint of the wife. The parties were in possession of a donation claim of 640 acres. The court (Wait, Judge) gave the husband his half of the claim, and divided the wife's half between herself and one infant child of the marriage.

No other instances of the exercise of this power have been shown, and these are confined to one judicial district of the state, the same in which Cline v. Cline [3 Or. 355] was decided. In the other judicial districts, no such construction appears ever to have been given to the act, and only in these comparatively few instances in a period of nine years, in that one. If this state of things is any evidence of a settled construction of the statute by the courts of Oregon, it is against the one claimed by the defendant. I conclude, then, that the question is unsettled, and that this court must construe the act for itself.

The primary object of the statute was to authorize and provide for the dissolution of the marriage relation in certain cases when, on account of the neglect, misconduct or unfitness of one of the parties to it, the other, in the judgment of the legislative assembly, ought no longer to be bound by it. But when a divorce is granted, the parties are not restored to their original condition, and it becomes necessary to provide for and adjust the rights of the parties in and to the property of each other, and to make disposition of and provide for the future custody and maintenance of the minor children of the marriage. This power is merely incidental to that of granting the divorce, and therefore ought not to be extended or applied farther than is necessary and convenient to provide for the altered circumstances of the parties directly consequent upon their judicial separation. Unless a divorce is granted, the court has no power over the property or children of the parties. The power to dispose of the property of the parties is not an unqualified one. Certainly it would not be contended that the legislature intended to give the court power in its discretion to dispose of the property by giving it to the parents of the parties, or to their cousins or strangers, or to charitable uses; nor, it seems to me, could the rights of creditors be prejudiced or excluded by such disposition. In making this disposition, the court is required by the act to have "regard to the respective merits of the parties;" that is, the parties whose property is to be disposed of, are the parties whose "respective merits" are to be regarded by the court in making such disposition. Now, the necessary inference from this clause is, that in disposing of the property the court is confined to the parties whose "merits" it is required to consider in making it. These parties are the parties to the suit—the husband and wife—and not other persons, whether strangers or relations, lineal or collateral. Again, the court in disposing of the property of the parties, is to have regard "to the condition in which they"—the parties to the suit—"will be left by such divorce;" and also "to the party"—one of the parties to the suit—"through whom the property was acquired," and "to the burdens imposed upon it"—the property divided between the parties—"for the benefit of children."

From these considerations I conclude, that section 8, which authorizes the court granting a divorce "to make such disposition of the property of the parties, as shall appear just and equitable," cannot and ought not to be construed as giving power to such court to dispose of such property by giving it to third persons—even if they were the children of such parties. The only disposition of the property which this section authorizes the court to make, is one between the parties to the suit. Whether its power in this respect is absolute or not, is a serious question, but for the purposes of this action it may be admitted to be unlimited.

But it is claimed that, under the clause already quoted from section 7 of the act, the circuit court had power to give the premises in controversy to the minor children of Cline. This clause provides that, "the court in granting a divorce, shall make such disposition and provision for the children as shall appear expedient under the circumstances, and most for the present comfort and future well-being of such children." This power to dispose of and make provision for children, is given to the court by the statute only as an incident to the power to grant a divorce. Therefore, as has been said of the power to dispose of the property of the parties, it ought not to be extended or applied farther than is necessary and convenient for the altered circumstances of the parties directly consequent upon their judicial separation.

During the marriage, the custody of the children belongs to the parents jointly, subject to the ultimate authority of the father as the head of the family, but upon a divorce being granted, it is or may be impossible that this joint custody can be continued. To meet this emergency, the court is authorized to dispose of the children. But it would not be authorized to dispose of them by giving them to a third person, whom it regarded as better qualified than either of the parents. The act was not made to enable the circuit court to interfere with the relation of parent and child only as an incident of the power of granting a divorce, and then only as far as might become necessary on that account. The joint custody of the parents being determined or rendered impracticable by the divorce, the only power of the court in the premises is to provide for the emergency by giving the children to one or the other of them.

This word "children" must be construed to mean minor children. If the children of the parents are of age when the divorce is granted, the court has no power to dispose of them or provide for them. The reason is, they are no longer in the custody or under the control of their parents, nor are the latter bound to maintain them, except under peculiar circumstances arising from poverty and sickness. So with the power to make "provisions for the children" of divorced parties, it must be exercised in subordination to the proposition that the court is only authorized to make provision for their maintenance, so far as the condition and circumstances of their parents warrant and require, and their divorce renders it necessary. Of course under no circumstances, would it be authorized to make provision out of the property of the parties or either of them, for the maintenance of children who are of age, and whom the parents are therefore not bound to support.

Whether, under the authority to make provision for the minor children of Jacob Cline, the court had authority to take the premises in controversy, and give them to such children outright, during their minority, or to their mother in trust for them, may be a question. The act, in some particulars, seems rather to contemplate that the provision shall be made in the usual way, by giving the parent to whom the children are confided, a larger portion of property, to enable him or her to meet the burden of their maintenance, or by imposing upon the property of the other a charge sufficient for that purpose. But the act, so far as it gives the court jurisdiction, does so unqualifiedly. There is no limit or restraint as to the choice of means by which the court shall make this provision, and I am inclined to the opinion that the court, if it appeared "expedient under all the circumstances," had authority to vest the property in the children or their mother, for their use, for that purpose. But as Jacob Cline was not bound to support his children after they became of age, the court had no authority to make any provision out of his property for their maintenance, to extend beyond the time when they would become obliged to support themselves. The circuit court, although authorized to divorce Mary from Jacob, and as between themselves to make a just and equitable disposition or division of their property, and to dispose of and provide for the maintenance of their minor children, had no power to anticipate Jacob's demise, and to make a will for him devising this property to these children—"to have and to hold the same with the appurtenances to them and their heirs forever."

Upon this point it seems to me there is no room for difference of opinion. The decision of the circuit court given in the suit for divorce, so far as it provides that the premises in controversy should be held by, or for the use of the minor children of Jacob, beyond the time when they should become of age respectively, is simply void. Upon any construction that I am able to give the act, the legislative assembly did not intend that a father's property should be arbitrarily taken from him and given to his adult child, or what amounts to the same thing, to his minor child to hold and possess after he becomes of age, because forsooth, in a civil suit for divorce, he was adjudged to have broken his marriage vows, or neglected the duties which they imposed upon him. The two things have no necessary connection; and if the act expressly provided for its being done, it would be so far void. Such a disposition of property amounts to a forfeiture without due process of law, and is beyond the power of the legislative assembly to authorize.

The consequence of vesting the arbitrary discretion in any court to take a parent's land and give it to his or her child, because in the judgment of the court it is expedient or best for the child, is singularly illustrated in the above cited case of Stone v. Stone. There the divorce was granted upon the complaint of the wife for the fault of the husband: The parties owned 320 acres of land apiece, each in their own right. The court, in legal effect, divested each of any right to or interest in the land of the other. As the mother was the innocent party, and the only issue of the marriage was an infant female child, the court very properly gave it to the custody of the mother, but instead of giving the mother a portion of the father's land, to assist her in bringing up the child, or charging it with the payment of some sum of money for that purpose, the court arbitrarily took one half of the mother's land, and gave it to the child forever.

I next proceed to consider the second question as to whether the plaintiff is barred from maintaining this action on account of the previous adjudication in the case of Cline v. Hulery [Case No. 2,897]. The plaintiff Fitch claims under Jacob Cline, and of course is bound by that adjudication as far as Cline, his grantor, is. They are privies in estate. But the judgment in Cline v. Hulery cannot operate as an estoppel against Cline or his grantee in this action, unless it also binds the defendants. Estoppels, to be binding upon either party, must be mutual. Deery v. Cray, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 803. In this case there is no such mutuality. The defendants now before the court were neither parties nor privies to the judgment in the action of Cline v. Hulery. The minor children of Jacob and Mary Cline were not served with process in that action, and the court never acquired jurisdiction of them. Consent will not give jurisdiction as to minors, but the proceeding must be in invitum. No guardian can voluntarily appear for a minor, but he must be served with process and thereby brought into court, and a guardian ad litem then and there appointed for him. Code Or. 146, 151. It seems that Mary Cline assumed that she was the landlord of Hulery, the person in possession, when in fact, upon her own showing, the minor children were such landlords, and she was in some sort their guardian or trustee. It is not even clear there was any person properly before the court in that action as defendant, except Hulery. True, Mary Cline was admitted to defend the action as the landlord of Hulery, in opposition to the motion of plaintiff for judgment against H. for want of an answer. But it is not perceived on what ground the court made this order, as the law authorizing the landlord to be made defendant in the place of the tenant, in an action of ejectment, does so only upon the condition or contingency that the tenant against whom the action is brought shall first answer and plead, "that he is in possession only as the tenant of another, naming him and his place of residence." "Thereupon, the landlord, if he apply therefor, shall be made defendant in place of the tenant, and the action shall proceed in all respects as if originally commenced against him." But Hulery made no answer, of any kind, and the court allowed Mary Cline to volunteer to become a defendant, upon her statement, instead of Hulery's answer, that she was his landlord.

But, for the purposes of this action, it may be admitted that the court had the power to admit Mary Cline to become a defendant, as it did, or that the plaintiff in the action accepted her as such defendant, by proceeding thereafter with the action against her, and still the judgment therein would not have been given between the parties to this action, or those under whom they claim, and therefore the plaintiff Fitch is not estopped by it. The minor children of Cline or their grantees, defendants in this action, do not claim under Mary but under Jacob Cline, and therefore they are not estopped by a judgment in an action between Mary and Jacob; and if they are not estopped, then neither is Jacob or his subsequent grantee.

Again, it may be assumed for the time being that in Cline v. Hulery [supra] the minor children aforesaid became parties to the action by reason of their mother's being admitted as their guardian to become defendant as landlord, and in place of Hulery, and therefore that the judgment given therein is mutually binding upon said children and Cline, and estops either of them or those claiming under them, from asserting or claiming anything to the contrary, and still the plaintiff is not estopped by such judgment from maintaining that he is the owner of the premises in controversy and entitled to the possession thereof.

The action of Cline v. Hulery was brought under section 13 of the Civil Code, which provides, that: "Any person who has a legal estate in real property, and a present right to the possession thereof, may recover such possession, with damages for withholding the same, by an action at law." And also, that the action must be brought against the person in actual possession, or if no one be in such possession, then against the person acting as owner thereof. Code Or. 226.

At common law ejectment was only a possessory action, and a judgment therein did not determine the estate or interest of the parties in the property, and owing to the special fictions which were a part of the action, such judgment, in effect, did not conclusively determine even the right to the possession. But in most of the United States it has long since been provided, that a judgment in an action of ejectment, as between the parties, shall be conclusive as to all the questions actually and necessarily included therein or necessary to such determination. Still the defendant was permitted to plead the general denial or "Not guilty," and the jury to find a general verdict for the plaintiff or defendant. Under such a practice the record would not disclose what estate or interest, if any, the defendant claimed in the premises, and if judgment was given for him, it would not appear whether the jury passed upon his claim or not. The question may have arisen upon the evidence and been passed upon by the jury in favor of the defendant, or the controversy may have been confined to the title of the plaintiff, and the jury may have based their verdict upon the insufficiency of the evidence to support it. Now, if the judgment on the verdict was afterwards pleaded as an estoppel, it would become necessary to ascertain by parol evidence what was proven to the jury and what was or may have been passed upon by them in making up their verdict.

The action given by the Code is simply the common law action of ejectment pruned of its fictions; but the Code goes farther and, by way of remedying the evil above suggested, it provides that "the defendant shall not be allowed to give in evidence any estate in himself or another in the property, or any license or right to the possession thereof; unless the same be pleaded in his answer," with "the certainty and particularity required in a complaint." The complaint must set forth the nature of the plaintiff's "estate in the property, whether it be in fee, for life or for a term of years, and for whose life or the duration of such term."

The jury by their verdict, if it be for the defendant, must find "the estate in the property or part thereof or license or right in the possession * * * established on the trial by the defendant, if any; in effect as the same is required to be pleaded." Code Or. 226, 227.

It also provides that a judgment in ejectment "shall be conclusive as to the estate in the property and the right to the possession thereof, so far as the same is hereby determined upon the party against whom the same is given" and all persons claiming under him, except in certain cases when judgment is given for want of an answer.

As to what is to be considered as having been determined by the judgment of the circuit court in Cline v. Hulery, the Code prescribes the rule as follows: "Sec. 727. That only is deemed to have been determined by a former judgment, decree or order, which appears upon its face to have been so determined or which was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereunto." Code Or. 329.

Now it is manifest that nothing appears to have been determined by this judgment, except that Mary Cline as guardian, was then entitled to the possession of the premises. The court sitting as a jury in its verdict or conclusions of fact, only found that Mary Cline was the guardian of the minor children aforesaid, and as such guardian was in possession of the premises, and that the decree in the divorce suit was unreversed.

On the appeal to the supreme court, the judgment of the circuit court was simply affirmed. For aught that appears in these judgments, both the circuit and supreme court may have been of the opinion that the decree in the divorce suit, so far as it provided that this property should be vested in the minor children after they become of age, was simply void. The most that can be said to have been determined by the judgment, is that the minor children were entitled to the use of the property according to their respective interests until they became of age respectively, and that in the meantime Mary, as their guardian or trustee, was entitled to the possession thereof and to take and receive the rent and profits for the purpose of their nurture and education.

By the act of October 11, 1864, which took effect January 20, 1865 (Code Or. 644), the age of majority for males in this state was fixed at 21 years, and that of females at 18 years. Before the commencement of this action all these minor children, except Jacob, Jr., had become of age. As to these adults, Jacob, Sen., was no longer bound to support them, and the power of the circuit court did not enable it to subject his land thereafter to their support, by the intervention of a trustee, guardian or otherwise. As to Jacob, Jr., his term in an undivided fourth of the premises does not expire until he becomes of age or is deceased.

The plaintiff is the owner in fee and in possession of three undivided fourths of the premises, and in reversion of the other undivided fourth, and has a present right to the possession of the whole in common with the tenant for years of the last mentioned undivided fourth.

The plaintiff is also entitled to recover from the defendants Cornell, Moore and of S. M. Tunstall, each, one fourth of the value of the use and occupation of the premises during the time they have been in possession respectively, and in the case of Tunstall, since his wife Mary Jane became eighteen years of age.

The answers of the defendants also contain a plea of set off for the value of permanent improvements made upon the property by the defendants, or those under whom they claim. But the plea is altogether insufficient, as it does not state that such improvements were made while the parties were holding under color of title, adversely to the claim of the plaintiff, in good faith, but only that they are permanent and valuable. The plaintiff has not replied to the plea, but treated it as an immaterial allegation. On the trial, however, the defendants, without objection from the plaintiff, examined witnesses upon the subject, but I do not think the proof sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the improvements, if any, are either permanent or valuable.

The defendants appear to have paid the ordinary taxes levied upon the property during their occupation, and also some assessments for the improvement of adjoining streets. Although not set up in the pleadings, the parties have stipulated that the amount of these taxes may be deducted from the sum found due the plaintiff for mesne profits.

FITCH et al. v. McGIE.

Ex parte SANGER.

[2 Biss. 163;[1] 2 N. B. R. 531 (Quarto, 164); 2 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 80.]

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. July Term, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCES—JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—SATISFACTION FROM FUNDS IN HANDS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. A judgment by default, and execution upon a note given when the creditor had cause to believe the debtor insolvent, are preferences under the act, and do not give a valid lien upon the property of the debtor, or its proceeds.

[Cited in Beattie v. Gardner, Case No. 1,195; Haskell v. Ingalls, Id. 6,193.]

2. The debtor suffers his property to be taken under legal process, by not defending; he should file his petition in bankruptcy.

3. The court will not order such a judgment to be satisfied from funds in the hands of the assignee.

[This suit was originally brought by William H. Fitch and others, praying that George B. McGie be declared a bankrupt.]

This was a motion by Wm. H. Sanger, execution creditor of the bankrupt, to have his judgment satisfied from the proceeds of sales of property of the bankrupt, taken in execution, and turned over to the assignee in bankruptcy.

Hopkins & Sanborn, for motion.
H. W. & D. K. Tenney, contra.

MILLER, District Judge. In the month of April, 1868, McGie being largely indebted to Wm. H. Sanger, a merchant of New York, upon notes due and payable and some soon to become payable, gave a promissory note payable one day after date, with warrant to confess judgment. Before making the note it was a subject of discussion whether the security should not be a chattel mortgage on McGie's stock of goods; which was advised against by the attorney. Sanger was a business friend of McGie, and would not allow his notes to be protested for non payment. At the date of note McGie complained of dull times and inability to pay other debts, of which Sanger had notice. A summons was issued to recover the amount of the note given in April, and a judgment was rendered in the United States circuit court in November last. By virtue of a fieri facias issued on the judgment, the marshal levied on McGie's stock of goods. Fitch and other creditors then proceeded against McGie in bankruptcy, and in January last he was declared a bankrupt. The marshal, under an order of the court in bankruptcy, delivered over the stock of goods to an assignee. Sanger now applies to the court to be paid the avails of the sale of the goods made by the assignee, claiming a preference by reason of the execution and levy. Prior to the suit Sanger instructed that the goods should be taken possession of, under the impression, no doubt, that execution might be or had been issued in satisfaction of his judgment note, which was payable one day after date.

It is contended that the judgment was obtained in due course of legal proceedings, and that McGie did not "procure or suffer his property to be taken on legal process." An insolvent debtor commits an act of bankruptcy when he "gives any warrant to confess judgment, or procures or suffers his property to be taken on legal process." The warrant to confess judgment was an act of bankruptcy committed by McGie to prefer his friend and accommodating creditor, who knew at the time of McGie's inability to pay his notes to other creditors. And the result shows conclusively that McGie was at the time insolvent to a large amount.

There was no necessity for the suit on the note. Judgment could have been entered without a summons. The warrant to confess judgment cut off defense to the action, and McGie suffered judgment to be taken by default. By the warrant to confess judgment, McGie consented that his property should be levied on, under an execution, and by his default he suffered it to be done. If McGie did not directly procure his property to be taken on legal process, he suffered it to be done. There is a distinction between procuring and suffering property to be taken on a legal process. Either is an act of bankruptcy. The bankrupt act prohibits preferences to be obtained by a creditor, when his debtor is insolvent, or in contemplation of his insolvency, or bankruptcy, by the taking of the debtor's property on legal process, whether the taking be by an act of procurement, or by an act of sufferance on the part of the debtor, where there is an intent on the part of the debtor to give such preference, and the creditor has reasonable cause to believe that the debtor is insolvent. McGie should have prevented the preference to Sanger by means of the levy, by an application for the benefit of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. Knowing himself to be insolvent, he should have pursued the course of equity to all his creditors required by the act. Sanger and McGie both knew that the probable consequence of the judgment note, if pursued, was to give a preference. The object and intent of the bankrupt act is, to require a debtor, in failing circumstances, to subject his property to an equal distribution among his creditors, in proportion to their respective debts. The proceeding in the case falls within the prohibition of this act. There is no essential difference in this case, from a seizure and sale by virtue of a chattel mortgage, or on execution, issued in a judgment by confession. McGie permitted what he should have prevented, and he thereby suffered his goods to be taken on legal process in favor of a friendly creditor, who had at least reasonable cause to believe that his debtor was insolvent.

The application of Sanger for the avails of the sale of McGie's goods is denied.

NOTE. The preference upon a judgment note is not obtained when the warrant of attorney is given, but when the judgment upon it is entered. Golson v. Neihoff [Case No. 5,524]. The sufficiency of the judgment depends upon the knowledge or information the creditor had at the time he made his warrant operative. Id. A creditor who knows that his debtor cannot pay all his debts in the ordinary course of business, has reasonable cause to believe him insolvent, and will not be allowed to secure, by confession of judgment and levy of execution, any preference over other creditors. Wilson v. Brinkman [Case No. 17,794]. Judgments obtained against a debtor at the time insolvent, by creditors who had not reasonable cause to believe him so, are good against the assets. In re Wright [Id. 18,071]. Where bankrupt while solvent gives warrant of attorney to confess judgment, and creditor takes judgment thereupon with notice of subsequent bankruptcy such judgment is good against the assets. Id.

LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS — MORTGAGE OF PROPERTY IN ONE STATE—MONEY PAYABLE IN ANOTHER—THE LAW THAT GOVERNS.

1. Where a mortgage is executed on land in one state for money loaned in another, but which provides that the money shall be paid at the mortgagee's residence in that other state, with a rate of interest that would be void in the state of the mortgagee but not in that of the mortgagor: Held, that the plaintiff might elect to proceed under the laws of the state where the mortgage was recorded and where the whole contract was vaild.

[Cited in Thompson v. Edwards, 85 Ind. 422.]

2. Doctrine of lex loci contractus and lex fori fully discussed.

In equity.

Mr. Duffield, for complainant.
Mr. Lathrop, for defendants.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice. This bill was filed to foreclose a mortgage. When the mortgage was executed, Fitch resided in New York, the defendants in the state of Michigan. On the first of January, 1850, the complainant loaned to the defendants two thousand dollars, to secure which the defendants executed a bond and mortgage on land in Michigan. The sum loaned was to be paid in January, 1856, to the complainant, at his residence in the state of New York, with interest at ten per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually.

In New York the legal interest is seven per cent. per annum, and any per cent. above that sum is usurious, and the instrument is declared to be void. In Michigan there is no penalty for usury, the excess over the legal rate, only, being recoverable.

It is agreed that this proceeding to enforce these securities must be under the laws of New York or the laws of Michigan, whichever shall be held to be the law of the contract. This is the only question in the case, there being no dispute about the facts.

The general rule is, that the contract, in respect to its construction and force, is to be governed by the law of the country or state in which it is to be executed. Kent, Comm. 459; Story, Confl. Laws, § 242. In Van Reimsdyk v. Kane [Case No. 16,871], Judge Story says the rule is well settled, "that the law of the place where a contract is made is to govern as to the nature, validity and construction of such contract," unless it shall appear from the tenor of such contract, it was entered into with a view to the laws of some other state; as where a negotiable note was indorsed in a state different from that in which it was made. Slacum v. Pomery, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 221. Lord Mansfield, in Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burrows, 1077, says, "The law of the place can never be the rule, where the transaction is entered into with an express view to the law of another country." And Kent, C. J., in 1 Johns. 92, said, "The force and effect of the contract must be determined from the contract itself, and not by proof aliunde."

Huberus, in his De Conflictu Legum (volume 2, bk. 1, tit. 3), says, "The general rule is, that contracts are to be interpreted according to the laws of the country where they are made; but if, from the terms or nature of the contract, it appears it was to be executed in a foreign country, or that the parties had respect to the laws of another country, then the place of making the contract becomes immaterial, and the obligation must be tested by the laws of the country where the duty was to be performed." In Champant v. Ranelagh, Finch, Prec. 128, it was decided that a bond executed in England, and made payable in Ireland, carries Irish interest, where no interest was mentioned. Fanning v. Consequa, 17 Johns. 511. In Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burrows, 1077, a bill of exchange drawn in France for money lent there, and made payable in England, was deemed a contract subject to the laws of England, and to bear English interest. In Thompson v. Ketcham, 4 Johns. 285, a note was drawn in Jamaica, made payable in New York, and the supreme court of New York followed the same rule. In Smith v. Smith, 2 Johns. 235, Ruggles v. Keeler, 3 Johns. 263, and Van Schaick v. Edwards, 2 Johns. Cas. 355, the same doctrine was carried out.

A contract is to be construed by the law under which it was made, but if entered into to be performed in another state or place, it is to be treated, generally, as to its force and effect, by the laws of the latter place; and it will be good or bad according to the laws of such place. To this there is an exception in regard to official bonds, taken in pursuance of an act of congress, which are not subject to the local law, but are assumed to have been executed at the seat of the federal government. Cox v. U. S., 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 173; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 77; Bell v. Bruen, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 169; Brabston v. Gibson, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 263; Fanning v. Consequa, 17 Johns. 511; Ruggles v. Keeler, 3 Johns. 263; Thompson v. Ketcham, 4 Johns. 285; Barney v. Newcomb, 9 Cush. 46; Story, Confl. Laws, § 280; Story, Bills, § 147; Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burrows, 1077.

Under the principles laid down in the above authorities, it is insisted that the instrument before us is a New York contract, and that the agreement to pay more than seven per cent. interest is usurious and void; and as the contract binds the defendant to pay the complainant, in New York, interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, semi-annually, and the loan at the end of six years, the argument is presented with great force against the legal rights of the complainant; and this contract, it is urged, is to be governed by the law of the place of performance, and whatever shall be a good defense there shall be good everywhere. This doctrine is laid down in Story on Conflict of Laws, §§ 331, 305, and Story on Bills of Exchange, § 161. And it is admitted, that where a contract is made in one place, payable in another, without fixing the rate of interest, such rate is determined generally by the laws of the latter place. Scofield v. Day, 20 Johns. 102; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 367; Healy v. Gorman, 3 J. S. Green [15 N. J. Law] 328.

And it is admitted by the highest authority, that any interest may be lawfully stipulated for, not exceeding the law of the place where the instrument is payable. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 77; Thompson v. Ketcham, 4 Johns. 285; Robb v. Halsey, 11 Smedes & M. 140.

These concentrated authorities seem to cover the whole ground of controversy, leaving but little for doubt or speculation. Principles are sometimes evolved from the exigencies of society, and grow into favor from their adaptation to the fitness of things. No one can say that both the common and civil law have not been ameliorated and improved by such means. But we are to look to established principles and not to theories in considering the case before us.

The debt is founded upon a bond and mortgage for the payment of two thousand dollars, executed on land in Michigan, by the defendant to the complainant, a citizen of New York, payable in six years at the rate of ten per cent. per annum semi-annually, on the first days of July and January, to the complainant, at his residence in New York.

In 2 Kent, Comm. 460, it is said: "If, however, the rate of interest be specified in the contract, and it be according to the law of the place where the contract was made, though that rate be higher than is lawful by the law of the place where payment was to be made, the specified rate of interest at the place of the contract has been allowed by the courts of justice in that place; for that is part of the substance of the contract. The general doctrine is, that the law of the place where the contract is made is to determine the rate of interest when the contract specifically gives interest; and this will be the case though the loan be secured by a mortgage on lands in another state, unless there be circumstances to show that the parties had in view the laws of the latter place in respect to interest. When that is the case, the rate of interest of the place of payment is to govern." De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 367; Quince v. Callender, 1 Desaus. Eq. 160.

"With respect to the question of usury, in order to hold the contract to be usurious it must appear that the contract was made here, and that the consideration for it was to be paid here. It should appear, at least, that the payment was not to be made abroad; for if it was to be made abroad, it would not be usurious." Thompson v. Powles, 2 Sim. 211.

In reference to the above cited case, Chancellor Kent says (volume 2 of his Commentaries, 461): "According to the case of Thompson v. Powles [2 Sim. 194], it is now the received doctrine at Westminster Hall, that the rate of interest on loans is to be governed by the law of the place where the money was to be used or paid, or to which the loan has reference; and that a contract made in London to pay in America, at a rate of interest exceeding the lawful interest in England, was not a usurious contract, for the stipulated interest was parcel of the contract." This appears to be a liberal relaxation of the rigor of the former rule in the English courts, and it is comformable to the American cases. Story, Confl. Laws, § 305.

In the somewhat noted case of Depau v. Humphreys, 8 Mart. (N. S.) 1, the note was given in New Orleans, payable in New York, for a large sum of money, bearing an interest of ten per cent., being the legal interest in Louisiana, the New York legal interest being seven per cent. only. The question was whether the note was tainted with usury, as it would be, if made in New York. The supreme court of Louisiana decided that it was not usurious; and that although the note was made payable at New York, yet the interest might be stipulated for, either according to the law of Louisiana or according to that of New York. To the same import are the cases of Peck v. Mayo, 14 Vt. 33; and Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 627. In Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige, 615, the court says, "If the contract was not illegal by the laws of the country where it was made, and where the money was loaned, the fact that the drafts were payable in New York would not render them void under our usury laws, except in a case where the loan of the money out of this state was a mere device to evade the operation of the law of this state which was intended as a cover for usury." The doctrine is well established, if a mortgage be executed in Michigan, which is the domicil of the mortgagor, at the legal rate of interest, full effect will be given to the security without reference to the usury laws of any other state, which neither party intended to violate. In Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 78, the court says, "The general principle in relation to contracts made in one place to be executed in another, is well settled. They are to be governed by the law of the place of performance; and if the interest allowed by the laws of the place of performance is higher than that permitted at the place of the contract, the parties may stipulate for the higher interest without incurring the penalties of usury."

By the statute of Michigan, ten per cent. was the legal rate of interest, and this was the amount stipulated to be paid, and constituted a part of the contract; the court cannot presume, therefore, against the fact, that usury under the New York statute was intended.

In Ohio Ins. Co. v. Edmondson, 5 La. 295, 299, 300, the court says, "By the comity of nations a practice has been adopted, by which courts of justice examine into, and enforce contracts made in other states, and carry them into effect according to the laws of the place where the transaction took its rise. This practice has become so general in modern times, that it may be almost stated to be now a rule of international law, and it is subject only to the exception, that the contract to which aid is required, should not, either in itself or in the means used to give it effect, work an injury to the inhabitants of the country where it is attempted to be enforced." Story, Confl. Laws, § 244.

In Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 633, the court said, "I have arrived at the conclusion, that this mortgage, executed here, and upon property in this state (New York), being valid by the lex situs, which is also the law of the domicil of the mortgagor, it is the duty of this court to give full effect to the security."

If no place of payment is prescribed, the contract takes effect as a contract of the place where it is made; and being payable generally, it is payable everywhere. and after a demand and refusal of payment, interest will be allowed according to the law of the place of the contract. But if the place of payment or of performance is different from that of the contract, then the interest may be validly contracted for at any rate not exceeding that which is allowed in the place of payment or performance.

"Whether a contract is usurious or not, depends, not upon the rate of interest allowed, but upon the validity of that interest in the country where the contract is made, and is to be executed. A contract made in England for advances to be made at Gibraltar, at a rate of interest beyond that of England, would nevertheless, be valid in England; and so a contract to allow interest upon credits given in Gibraltar at such higher rate would be valid in favor of the English creditor." Story, Confl. Laws, § 292.

In his Conflict of Laws (section 488), Mr. Justice Story says, "Boullenois has no where to my knowledge, directly and positively treated the question, whether the interest may be stipulated for according to the place of the contract, when payment is to be made in another place where it would be illegal." In section 304a, he says, "If the transaction is bona fide and not with intent to evade the law against usury, and the law of the place of performance allows a higher rate of interest than that permitted at the place of the contract, the parties may lawfully stipulate for the higher rate of interest." No one ever doubted this. The daily experience of every business man shows that a note is legal, if given for a rate of interest fixed by law in any state where it is payable. In Michigan, ten per cent. is the legal rate of interest, and may be recovered.

Mr. Justice Story objects to the principle here laid down, and there is no jurist in America or in England, of higher authority. He admits in section 299, that the phrase "lex loci contractus" may have a double meaning or aspect; and that it may indifferently indicate where the contract is actually made, or where it is virtually made, according to the intent of the parties, that is, the place of payment or performance. And he says, "We have seen that the rule of the civil law clearly indicates this."

No one can suppose that a contract can be distributed into parts, and so made good for the whole, but that the clear intention of the parties may be understood and applied; as where the legal rate of interest stipulated to be paid is higher where the contract is entered into than at the place of payment, the higher rate may be presumed to be within the intention of the parties.

If the transaction is bona fide and not with intent to evade the law against usury, and the law of the place of performance allows a higher rate of interest than that permitted at the place of the contract, the parties may lawfully stipulate for the higher interest. But then the transaction must be bona fide, and not intended as a mere cover for usury. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 65. Mr. Chancellor Kent has correctly laid down the modern doctrine; and he is fully borne out by the authorities. "The law of the place," says he, "where the contract is made, is to determine the rate of interest, when the contract specifically gives interest; and this will be the case, though the loan be secured by a mortgage on land in another state, unless there be circumstances to show that the parties had in view the laws of the latter place in respect to interest. When that is the case, the rate of interest of the place of payment is to govern." 2 Kent, Comm. 460; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 367; Scofield v. Day, 20 Johns. 102; Thompson v. Powles, 2 Sim. 194.

It is agreed that the above loan was made in this manner: "An agent of the complainant, Mr. Loomis, residing in St. Clair county, drew a draft on the complainant, caused the same to be cashed at a bank in the city of Detroit, and paid the proceeds over to said Remer, at said St. Clair; the bond and mortgage were executed at St. Clair, on real estate in said county of St. Clair, and delivered to said Loomis at that place, as the agent of complainant."

It is also agreed, that by the laws of the state of New York, in force at the time of making said loan, and ever since in force, the taking more than seven per centum per annum upon any loan of money was prohibited, and any contract or security made or taken in violation thereof, was by such laws void.

Now, that this was a perfectly fair transaction, understood by the parties, no one can question. The contract was valid under the laws of Michigan, unaffected by any taint of usury. No deception was practiced. The contract can be legally enforced in Michigan; and this suit is now brought to enforce it. There is not a circumstance to show that the parties had in view any other rate of interest than that which was stipulated in the contract. And if that rate of interest cannot be recovered under the laws of New York, no one doubts that it may be recovered in the state of Michigan, where the contract was made. In Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 78, the supreme court says: "If the interest allowed by the laws of the place of performance is higher than that permitted at the place of the contract, the parties may stipulate for the higher interest without incurring the penalties of usury." And the court says, taking eight per cent. in Alabama is no violation of the New York law.

The bond and mortgage are valid under the Michigan law, and the complainant elects, as he has a right to do, that he will proceed under the Michigan statute. And it is difficult to perceive on what ground the defendant can complain that his rights are affected by the usury law of New York. The ten per cent. interest which the defendant agreed to pay, was a part of the contract authorized by the laws of Michigan, and this contract is not supposed to be impaired by an agreement to pay the same rate of interest in New York. The mortgagee claims the ten per cent. interest, under the Michigan law, and this he is entitled to.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov., 1876.

PLEDGE—BILL OF SALE IN MASSACHUSETTS—REGISTRATION—DELIVERY TO PLEDGEE—POSSESSION.

1. By the law of Massachusetts, a bill of sale intended for security operates as a pledge and not as a mortgage, and does not require, or admit of, registration.

2. Delivery to the pledgee may be either actual or constructive.

3. Possession may be kept by an agent, and that agent may be the pledgor.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

In bankruptcy.

R. D. Smith, for petitioner.
T. F. Nutter, for assignee.

LOWELL, District Judge. The petitioner lent money to Rawson & Hittinger, and took from them at the same time the notes of Jacob Hittinger, not a member of the firm, and bills of sale of certain locomotive engines, then in their machine-shop in Cambridgeport, as additional security. Rawson & Hittinger have become bankrupt, and Jacob Hittinger has paid the debt; and the petitioner, acting as trustee for him, asks that the engines or their proceeds be now applied to pay the debt. Jacob Hittinger has become a party to the petition, and submits his rights to the determination of the court.

It was argued in behalf of the petitioner that the bills of sale were mortgages, and that the failure to record them would not, under the circumstances of the case, be fatal to the title of the mortgagee. I take it, however, to be clear, that, by the law of Massachusetts, as of the other states, the bill of sale, intended for security, operated as a pledge and not as a mortgage, and neither required nor admitted of registration: Walker v. Staples, 5 Allen, 34; Kimball v. Hildreth, 8 Allen, 167; and, incidentally, Newton v. Fay, 10 Allen, 505; Drake v. White, 117 Mass. 10. As a general rule, the pledgee must take and keep possession of the chattels, or his title will not be valid against the assignee in bankruptcy. My decision, that a mortgagee had a better title than the assignee in some cases, though he neither took possession nor recorded his mortgage, does not apply to pledges, but turned on the words of a statute, construed with the aid of the rule of the common law of Massachusetts, that the possession of a mortgagor is consistent with the title of the mortgagee. Still, on the question of what is a sufficient taking and keeping, the cases arising under mortgages are in point.

I understand the law to be that there must be a delivery before the pledgee's lien will attach; but the delivery may be either actual or constructive: Meyerstein v. Barber, L. R. 2 C. P. 38; Id. 661; 4 H. L. 317; Young v. Lambert, L. R. 3 P. C. 142. Then, as to keeping possession, it may be kept by an agent, and that agent may be the pledgor. If the circumstances make out a good reason for giving the custody and apparent control to the pledgor, there may not even be evidence of fraud; but, at most, his possession will only be evidence either that the pledge has been abandoned, or that the transaction is covinous. See Sumner v. Hamlet, 12 Pick. 76; Macomber v. Parker, 14 Pick. 497; Hays v. Riddle, 1 Sandf. 248; Way v. Davidson, 12 Gray, 465; Cooper v. Ray, 47 Ill. 53; Martin v. Reid, 11 C. B. (N. S.) 730; Thayer v. Dwight, 104 Mass. 254; Thorndike v. Bath, 114 Mass, 116; Weld v. Cutler, 2 Gray, 195.

On the question of fact, whether possession was taken and kept, there is, unfortunately, a direct contradiction between the only two witnesses to the acts done. The petitioner testifies that, soon after the bills of sale were given, he went to the shop of the pledgors, and in presence of one of them, Michael Hittinger, took possession of every one of the engines, put his hand upon each, and told Michael Hittinger to hold them as his agent, and that if any of them were sold he would give an order for the delivery. Michael Hittinger says that the petitioner came over to the shop, and one engine was pointed out to him, but he did nothing about taking possession, and gave no orders. Supposing, as I do, that the witnesses are equally veracious, I feel bound to give greater credit to the evidence of the petitioner; because he cannot be mistaken, and Mr. Hittinger may have forgotten the circumstances. The petitioner went to the factory, according to his story, with a definite purpose, and must recollect what it was, and what he did in pursuance of it. Both stand before the court unimpeached, and with no serious bias, because the debt has been paid to Mr. Fitz, and he is proceeding for the benefit of a surety; and Mr. Hittinger, on his part, has assigned all his title by his petition and the proceedings in bankruptcy. I can only regret that the parties did not see fit to submit the decision of this question to a jury.

Taking it, as I feel bound to do, that Mr. Fitz's recollection is the more accurate, it seems to me, as matter of law, that his possession was sufficient. I do not consider that a pledgee is bound to remove locomotive engines, and put them into his house or into a warehouse. He might well leave them with the pledgor, to be finished, or even to be sold. There is somewhat more danger of fraud if the pledgor himself is intrusted with the possession, than if a third person was employed; but there is no difference in principle between the appointment of Hittinger and of one of his clerks. It comes back to a question of fraud or good faith. Of course, it is well understood that an assignee in bankruptcy is not a purchaser without notice.

It is argued that there was no sufficient designation of the particular engines pledged. I do not understand the evidence to be undisputed on this point. Mr. Fitz said that the engines mentioned in his bill of sale could be easily picked out from the others; and Mr. Hittinger again differed from him on this point. But this matter is set at rest by the evidence, which I have accepted as accurate, that each engine was in fact designated and pointed out when Mr. Fitz went over to the shop and took possession, which was long before the bankruptcy.

Petition granted.

Case No. 4,838.

FITZ v. The AMELIE.

[2 Cliff. 440.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1865.[2]

SALE OF VESSEL BY MASTER—DISABLED BY PERILS OF THE SEA—LIENS TRANSFERRED TO PROCEEDS.

1. The master is justified in selling the ship as the best thing that can be done for the interest of all concerned, under the following circumstances: When the ship is disabled by perils of the sea, and the master has no means of getting the repairs done in the place where the injury occurred; or, if being in a place where the repairs might be made, he has no funds in his possession, and cannot, on account of the distance or other sufficient cause, communicate with the owner, and is not able to raise the necessary means by bottomry, or otherwise, to execute the repairs; also, if the injuries to the ship are so great that the cost of repairing her would be greater than her value after the repairs were completed; also, if the ship is disabled so that she cannot proceed, and the cost of repairs will amount to more than one half her value, reckoning one third new for old, and the master has no funds, and can neither procure any nor communicate with the owner, and the whole circumstances are such that a prudent owner would decide to break up the voyage.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The circumstances, which create a moral necessity for the sale of the vessel by the master, have the effect to constitute the master the agent of all concerned, and therefore the title of the purchaser becomes complete and absolute.

3. When a ship is thus lawfully sold, any lien upon her is transferred to the proceeds of the sale, which, by operation of law, become the substitute of the ship, in the sense of the admiralty law.

[Cited in Wilson v. Bell, 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 221.]

This was an admiralty appeal in a cause of contract civil and maritime. [The libellant, Charles Fitz, filed his libel in the district court against the galliot Amelie (B. Riviere and others, claimants) for a lien and damages for the nondelivery of a cargo. The district court dismissed the libel (case unreported), and libellant appealed.] The complaint of the libellant was, that on the 13th of March, 1862, he shipped on board the Amelie, then called the Plata, and lying in the port of Paramaribo, certain merchandise to be transported to Boston, and there to be delivered to the libellant. It was alleged that the vessel subsequently departed on the voyage and arrived at the port of destination, but that the master neglected to deliver a large part of the cargo, and failed to render any satisfactory account of the same. The defence of the claimants was, that the vessel arrived at Port au Prince, unseaworthy, and utterly unfit and unable to proceed on her voyage, or any voyage to sea; that very extensive and costly repairs were necessary, before she could be rendered seaworthy; that neither the master nor the owners had any funds or any credit at that port, wherewith to procure the repairs to be made; and consequently, that the master, not being able to procure the funds by bottomry bond or otherwise, to execute the repairs, on the 12th of June following sold the vessel at auction, and that he, the claimant, then and there became the lawful purchaser of the vessel.

The case came before the court upon an agreed statement of certain facts, in substance the following:—

The cargo was received on board the vessel at Surinam, to be transported and delivered as alleged in the libel. The invoice value of the cargo was $8,306.67, and the master signed bills of lading for the same in the usual form. The vessel suffered damage by perils of the sea. The cargo consisted of two hundred and forty-two hogsheads and sixteen barrels of molasses, fifty hogsheads and nine barrels of sugar, and sixteen pieces of old copper. Some of the cargo was also damaged by the perils of the sea, and thirty hogsheads of the molasses were jettisoned for the common safety, and thirty more were intentionally stove in the hold and their contents lost.

It appeared that the vessel put into Port au Prince for repairs, and that she was there twice surveyed and ordered to be repaired. Repairs under those orders were made, to the the extent of $1,000, when it was ascertained that more extensive repairs were required than was at first deemed necessary, whereupon a third survey was called, which resulted in a more thorough examination of the vessel. A sale of the vessel was made, under the recommendation of the third report. The libellant denied the validity of the sale; and the question whether it was rightfully made, under the circumstances, was the first and principal question in the case.

Other questions were discussed at bar, but, under the view of the case taken by the court, it will not be necessary to advert to them in this report.

F. C. Loring, for libellant.
C. W. Loring, for claimants.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. The authority of a master to sell his ship under any circumstances was denied by some of the continental writers upon maritime law, and by some of the early decisions in the courts of the parent country. The reason given for the prohibition was, that such authority, if allowed, would tend to encourage fraud. Tremenhere v. Tresillian, 1 Sid. 452; Johnson v. Shippen. 2 Ld. Raym. 984; Reid v. Darby, 10 East, 143; Abb. Shipp. (5th Ed.) 9; Ekins v. East India Co., 1 P. Wms. 395.

A careful scrutiny of those cases, however, will show that the circumstances in most of them were not such as to justify a sale in any view of the law; and the decision in some of them was placed upon that ground. Subsequent cases have clearly established the doctrine even in that country, that the master in a case of extreme necessity may sell the ship for the benefit of the owners or of all concerned. Hayman v. Molton, 5 Esp. 65; The Fanny & Elmira, Edw. Adm. 117; Milles v. Fletcher, 1 Doug. 231; Idle v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co., 8 Taunt. 755; Freeman v. East India Co., 5 Barn. & Ald. 617; Cannan v. Meaburn, 1 Bing. 243; Read v. Bonham, 3 Brod. & B. 147; Underwood v. Robertson, 4 Camp. 138. Abbott, in his work on Shipping, says the master possesses every power necessary for the employment and navigation of the ship; and he admits that, in a case of extreme necessity, he may sell the ship, but insists that he is bound, before exercising that authority, to try every other expedient to raise money. Abb. Shipp. 9. But the rule is much better stated by Parke Baron, in Hunter v. Parker, 7 Mees. & W. 342, to which special reference is made. He says that the master has by virtue of his employment, not merely those powers which are necessary for the navigation of the ship, and the conduct of the adventure to a safe termination, but also a power when such termination becomes hopeless, and no prospect remains of bringing the vessel home, to do the best for all concerned, and therefore to dispose of the ship for their benefit.

The libellant admits that it is well settled in this country that the master, in a case of necessity, may sell his ship, and the admission is a very proper one in this court, as the point has been at least three times authoritatively decided by the supreme court of the United States. Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 620; New England Ins. Co. v. The Sarah Ann, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 400; Post v. Jones, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 157. Speaking of the authority of the master to sell his ship, Mr. Justice Thompson said in the first case cited, that there can be no doubt that the injury to the vessel may be so great and the necessity so urgent, as to justify a sale. There must be, says the court, this implied authority in the master, from the nature of the case. He, from necessity, becomes the agent of both parties, and is bound in good faith to act for the benefit of all concerned; and the underwriter must answer for the consequences, because it is within his contract of indemnity. All the circumstances must be submitted to the jury, and they must find both the necessity and the good faith of the master in order to justify the sale. The opinion of the court in the second case was delivered by Mr. Justice Wayne, who does not stop to argue the question of authority, as that had been decided in the preceding case, but proceeds at once to the statement of the conditions under which it must be exercised, in order that the sale may be held valid. Those conditions as there stated are, that the master must act in good faith, exercise his best discretion for the benefit of all concerned, and that the sale can only be made upon the compulsion of a necessity, to be determined in each case by the actual and impending peril to which the vessel is exposed, from which it is probable, in the opinion of persons competent to judge, that the vessel cannot be saved. He admits, however, that the necessity for a sale cannot be denied, when the peril, in the opinion of those capable of forming a judgment, makes a loss probable, although the vessel may in a short time afterwards be got off and put afloat. Mr. Justice Grier delivered the opinion in the third case cited; and he affirms that it cannot be doubted that a master in certain cases of absolute necessity has power to sell both vessel and cargo. Such a necessity may be held to exist, say the court in that case, where the vessel is disabled, stranded, or sunk, if it appear that the master had no means, and could raise no funds to repair, so as to prosecute his voyage. Unless the vessel is so disabled that it is rendered unsafe for her to proceed on her voyage, the question as to the necessity of selling her cannot arise. Nothing short of proof of that fact will authorize the conclusion that the authority of the master was so enlarged that he became the agent of all concerned, and that he was clothed with power to determine in their behalf what should be done for their common interest. Prince v. Ocean Ins. Co., 40 Me. 493. When the vessel is so disabled that she cannot proceed on her voyage, and the master has no funds to make the necessary repairs to enable her to proceed, and cannot raise any for that purpose, by bottomry or otherwise, he must determine, in the absence of the owner, what the interest of all concerned requires him to do. His authority in the premises under those circumstances, is not derived from the owner, but is devolved upon him by law, and consequently it is his duty to act according to his best judgment. Sale of the ship is a necessity within the meaning of the commercial law, when under the circumstances indicated, nothing better can be done for the benefit of the owner or those concerned in the adventure. If the voyage be broken up in the course of it, by ungovernable circumstances, the master, says Chancellor Kent, may sell the ship, provided he do so in good faith, for the good of all concerned, and in a case of supreme necessity, which sweeps all ordinary rules before it. 3 Kent, Comm. 173. Neither necessity nor good faith is alone sufficient to make such a sale valid, but both must concur, and must be affirmatively shown by the party setting up the sale. The Henry [Case No. 6,372].

My judgment is, said Judge Story, upon the most careful survey of the authorities, as well as upon the general principles of law, that the master has a right to sell the ship in cases of urgent necessity; and I adopt the argument at the bar, that it must be proved that there was a pressing necessity to justify the sale. The Tilton [Case No. 14,054]. Other courts of the highest respectability have employed the same or similar expressions; but the explanations of Tindal, Ch. J., in Somes v. Sugrue, 4 Car. & P. 282, show to a demonstration that there cannot be in such a case either a legal or physical necessity, and consequently that it is only a moral necessity which is required to be shown, in order that the sale may be held to have been justified. Two decisions of Judge Story in this circuit are also to the same effect. Pope v. Nickerson [Case No. 11,274]; Robinson v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. [Id. 11,949]. Whether the necessity actually exists or not depends upon the circumstances, and so when carefully examined are all the well-considered cases. Gordon v. Massachusetts F. & M. Ins. Co., 2 Pick. 249; The Sarah Ann [Case No. 12,342]; Hall v. Franklin Ins. Co., 9 Pick. 476; American Ins. Co. v. Center, 4 Wend. 51; Peirce v. Ocean Ins. Co., 18 Pick. 83.

Different forms of expression are employed by different courts and jurists in describing the degree or intensity of the necessity which is required to justify the sale. Doubts are entertained whether any of the epithets, so employed, express very fully or definitely the precise idea intended to be conveyed. Perhaps it is not possible to devise any rule which will apply to all cases, but it is believed that some approximation may be made in that direction.

When the ship is disabled by perils of the sea, and the master has no means of getting the repairs done in the place where the injury occurred, or, if being in a place where the repairs might be made, he has no funds in his possession and cannot, on account of the distance or other sufficient cause, communicate with the owner, and is not able to raise the necessary means by bottomry or otherwise to execute the repairs, or if the injuries to the ship are so great that the cost of repairing her would be greater than her value after the repairs were made, or if the ship is disabled so that she cannot proceed, and the cost of repairs will amount to more than half her value, reckoning one third new for old, and the master has no funds, and can neither procure any nor communicate with the owner, and the whole circumstances are such that a prudent owner would decide to break up the voyage, then the master is justified in selling the ship as the best thing that can be done for the interest of all concerned. Such a state of circumstances creates the moral necessity, the urgent necessity, the extreme necessity, the imperious, uncontrollable necessity, described in the decided cases, and authorizes the master to sell the ship, if in his judgment, honestly exercised, the sale will best promote the interest of all concerned. When those conditions, or any class of them, concur, it becomes the duty of the master to decide the question; and if he finds that the disaster will be most alleviated, and the interests of all will be best served by a sale, then it is his duty to act in the premises; and if he makes the sale bona fide as the agent of all concerned, it is valid, and all are bound by his acts. Reference is made by the libellant to certain recent decisions in the admiralty court of the parent country, in which it is supposed that a more stringent rule is laid down, but a careful examination of the cases will show that they do not warrant any such conclusion. Cases referred to are the following: The Eliza Cornish, 1 Spinks, 46; The Glasgow, 1 Swab. 146; The Margaret Mitchell, Id. 386; The Australia, Id. 484; The Bonita & Charlotte, 1 Lush. 252, 261.

The general rule is, says Dr. Lushington, in the case first cited, that the master has no authority to sell the ship, but he adds that, "whatever opinion may have been doubtfully expressed on the subject, it appears to me clear, upon reason and authority, looking at what the law now is, that in case of necessity he must be invested with that power." Borrowing the language of the opinion in the case of Robertson v. Clarke, 1 Bing. 445, he says: "I agree that it is not sufficient to show that the sale was bona fide and for the benefit of all concerned, unless it be also shown that there was an urgent necessity for its being resorted to." The same rule is laid down in the second case, but the same judge says that "the necessity is to be judged by all the circumstances: 1. The state and condition of the vessel. 2. The consequences of not proceeding to sell. 3. The facility of communicating with the owner. 4. The resources of the master, or the total absence of all resources. 5. The power and means of the owner to avert a sale." The third case asserts that it is clear from the authorities that, though in early times the validity of a sale by a master in a foreign port was doubted, yet now it is decided that he has an implied authority in cases of extreme necessity, and in those only. Judgment was also pronounced in the fourth case by the same learned judge, and in that he states that the necessity which the law contemplates is not an absolute impossibility of getting the vessel repaired, but if the ship cannot be sent upon her voyage without repairs, and if the repairs cannot be done except at so great and so certain a loss that no prudent man would venture to encounter it, that constitutes a case of necessity; and he states the rule in the fifth case in the same language as in the first, and borrows it from the same source. Taken as a whole, these cases, I think, confirm the rule as before explained. Applying that rule to the present case, it is quite clear what the result must be. The record shows that the vessel sailed for Boston on the 16th of March, 1862, and that she was stanch and in good repair. Full proof is exhibited that she encountered severe storms, was struck by a heavy sea, and was so badly crippled, injured, and broken that it was with difficulty that she arrived at Port au Prince. Due protest was made by the master, and she was three times surveyed. The first two surveys recommended temporary repairs to enable her to proceed to her port of destination. The surveyors' reports describe in detail the apparent injuries to the vessel, and specify the temporary repairs required to enable the vessel to proceed. They show, when taken in connection with the statements of the protest and the parol testimony, that the vessel as examined upon the outside and with the cargo on board, was very badly stove and crippled, and that she was emphatically disabled from proceeding on the voyage. The second report states that the surveyors recommend that "the vessel be repaired here sufficiently for her to proceed on her voyage to Boston. It being well understood that total and adequate repairs to the damage which the vessel has suffered are impossible in this port." Temporary repairs were accordingly made at the cost of $1,000; but the third report shows that upon taking off the side planking to replace the same by new, as was ordered in the second report, the injuries to the vessel were found to be very much greater than was supposed or could have been known when the prior surveys were made. On the last survey were three competent masters of vessels, Lloyd's agent, and the agent of the New York and Philadelphia underwriters. They all agreed that it was not possible to make the necessary repairs in that port in a proper manner; that even if the necessary materials could be obtained, it would cost, in addition to the $1,000 which had been expended, not less than $3,500 Spanish, and that it would take four months to make the repairs; and they also found that the whole cost of repairs would be more than the vessel would be worth after the repairs were made. Their report I think is sustained by the evidence in the case.

Sale of the vessel was accordingly made on 12th of June, 1862, for the benefit of all concerned, and the claimant became the purchaser for the sum of $407 in gold. Claimant repaired her at a cost of $1,695.31 in gold, and despatched her to Boston. She was libelled here shortly after her arrival, and was sold under the order of the district court. The proceeds of sale amounting to the sum of $2,138.64 remain in the registry of the court. Libellant claims a lien on the vessel for so much of the cargo as was sacrificed for the common benefit, and also for so much of the cargo as has not been delivered. He resists the sale as unauthorized; but I am of the opinion that it was clearly justified within the principles already explained.

The second proposition of the libellant is that the sale, even if necessary and valid, operated only to pass the title of the owner, and that the purchaser took his title, subject to the lien of the libellant; but I am of the opinion that the circumstances which create the moral necessity for the sale of the ship in a case like the present, have the effect to constitute the master the agent for all concerned, and consequently that the title of the purchaser became complete and absolute. The Tilton [supra]; Milles v. Fletcher, 1 Doug. 232; Idle v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co., 8 Taunt. 755.

On this point I adopt the views of the respondents, that the lien when the ship was lawfully sold, was transferred to the proceeds which became by operation of law the substitute for the ship in the sense of the admiralty law. Brown v. Lull [Case No. 2,018]; Sheppard v. Taylor, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 675. Bear in mind that the sale in this case was a sale from necessity; and I am of the opinion, notwithstanding the doubt expressed in the case of The Catherine, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 681, that the purchaser took a full title free of the lien set up by the libellant. Unless such be the law, then the authority conferred to sell in a case of necessity is a mockery, as no prudent man would ever purchase such a title.

Having come to these conclusions, it is unnecessary to decide the other questions discussed at the bar. Decree affirmed. Libel dismissed with costs.

[NOTE. On libellant's appeal the decree of the circuit court was duly affirmed, Mr. Justice Davis delivering the opinion of the supreme court, in the course of which it was held that the sale of a ship becomes a necessity, within the meaning of the commercial law, when nothing better can be done for the owner or those concerned in the adventure. If the master, on his part, has an honest purpose to serve those who are interested in the ship and cargo, and can clearly prove that the condition of his vessel required him to sell, then he is justified. The question is not whether it is expedient to break up a voyage and sell the ship, but whether there was a legal necessity to do it. If this can be shown, the master is justified; otherwise, not. It was held that the facts of this case bring it within these well-settled principles of maritime law, inasmuch as they show that the several surveys of the vessel were made in the harbor of Port au Prince by captains of vessels temporarily detained in port and agents of the American and English underwriters, and that their report established that the cost of repairs necessary would exceed the value of the vessel, and hence they advised that the voyage be broken up, the vessel sold, and the cargo reshipped to Boston. In the face of this, if the master had proceeded to repair his vessel he would have been culpable, being in a distant port with a disabled vessel, seeking a solution of the difficulties surrounding him at a great distance from his owners, with no direct means of communicating with them, and having good reason to believe the copper of his vessel was displaced, and that worms would work her destruction. LIBEL FOR MATERIALS — RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE — BONA FIDE PURCHASER—LIENS—STALE CLAIM.

1. It is too well settled to need the citation of authorities that the lien of a material man is not waived by taking the negotiable paper of the owner or master of the vessel.

[Cited in The Illinois, Case No. 7,005.]

2. The court considers how far a mortgagee is to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice.

3. That it is well settled, a mortgagee for a present valuable consideration, is a bona fide purchaser to the extent of his mortgage interest, but even if no money be advanced at the time the mortgage is made, if upon the faith of the security the mortgagee afterwards advances money, or becomes liable as indorser to that extent, he becomes a bona fide purchaser.

4. Under the circumstances in this case, the claimant should be regarded as a bona fide purchaser, the libel not having been filed until two years after his claim accrued, and one year after the mortgage was given and the advances made.

In admiralty. On the 19th day of August, 1875, libellant [Edmond Fitzgerald], who is the proprietor of a shipyard at Port Huron, furnished a mast to the schooner "H. A. Richmond," for which Scott & Brown, her owners, agreed to pay $225, in two installments of $112.50 each, evidenced by two drafts, one on the captain of the vessel, which was paid, and one upon themselves, which was accepted but not paid. This draft matured September 21st. Subsequently during the same season, the schooner took on two cargoes at Port Huron, and continued passing and re-passing the rivers until the close of navigation. In May, 1876, she was again put upon the lake and river trade, chiefly between points on Lake Huron and Lake Erie. She passed Port Huron and Detroit several times, and continued to make frequent trips, within the jurisdiction of this court, during that season, and in November, 1876, was actually seized by the marshal upon another claim, but was released upon bond. The libel was not filed until September 28, 1877. On September 13th, 1876, James Dewey, the claimant, took a mortgage from Scott & Brown upon the schooner, conditioned to pay all negotiable paper upon which he might then be or might become liable as indorser, and to indemnify him against all loss by reason of such indorsements. This was 13 months after libellant's bill was contracted, and just one year from the time the draft on Scott & Brown matured. Prior to the giving of the mortgage, Dewey had indorsed for Scott & Brown to a considerable amount. And after the mortgage was given he indorsed three notes in the aggregate sum of three thousand four hundred and twenty dollars, all of which he was obliged to take up. On the 28th of April, 1877, the schooner, then being at Hamilton, Ontario, claimant having previously taken possession of her, bought her in upon his mortgage sale, and from that time assumed sole possession and control of her. In May she left Hamilton and was put in trade between the Bruce mines on the river St. Mary, and Detroit. Dewey swears that he received no notice of the claim until July 24th, 1877, when he received a letter from Capt. Fitzgerald, requesting payment. It seems that at the time he took the mortgage, Dewey made every effort possible to ascertain the claims outstanding against the vessel, and Scott testifies that some time in November of that year, he did notify him of libellant's claim, but informed him he had supposed it was settled by his note.

Atkinson & Atkinson, for libellant.
Burt & Burritt, for claimant.

BROWN, District Judge. Defendants' claim that the bill was settled and paid by the acceptance of Scott & Brown, the owners, cannot be maintained. It is too well settled to need even the citation of authorities, that the lien of a material man is not waived by taking the negotiable paper of the owner or master of the vessel. Captain Scott's testimony that these drafts were given in payment for the mast; that he supposed it was paid, and therefore did not constitute a lien upon the boat, is nothing more than his own opinion upon the subject. There was no conversation proven to have taken place at the time the draft was given, indicating any intention on the one to give it, or of the other to receive it, in payment of the bill.

The second defense, that the claim has become stale as against the mortgagee, is better supported by the testimony. How far a mortgagee is to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice, depends much upon the character of the transaction. A bona fide purchaser is one who at the time of his purchase advances a new consideration, surrenders some security or does some other act, which if his purchase were set aside, would leave him in a worse condition than his original position: Johnson v. Graves, 27 Ark. 558. Had Dewey taken this mortgage simply as security for the debt already existing, and made no further advances upon the strength of it, it would be a serious question whether he could be protected as against this lien. Though the question does not seem to have been passed upon directly in any admiralty suit, it has been discussed with great learning and elaboration in several cases where a vendor has sought to enforce his lien upon land, which has been conveyed to trustees for the benefit of creditors or to assignees in bankruptcy, or mortgaged for a prior indebtedness. The decided weight of authority seems to be that in such cases the mortgagee cannot assert his claim as against the vendor's lien: Brown v. Vanlier, 7 Humph. 249; Eubank v. Poston, 5 T. B. Mon. 286; Shanks v. McWhorter, 26 Ga. 315; Shurley v. Sugar Refinery, 2 Edw. ch. 505; Repp v. Repp, 12 Gill & J. 341; Harris v. Horner, 1 Dev. & B. 455; 1 Hill. Mortg. 52; 2 Story, Eq. Pl. 1225–1230.

Were it not for the case of Bayley v. Greenleaf, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 46, I should feel no hesitation in holding that the claimant, by the mere taking of this mortgage, did not stand in a position to test this claim as a bona fide purchaser. That case, however, held directly that the vendor cannot enforce his lien for unpaid purchase money as against trustees for the creditors of the vendee to whom the land has been conveyed, without notice of the lien. The opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in this case has been criticised with great ability by the courts in several of the cases above cited, and were the question to come before the supreme court again, it is at least doubtful whether it would adhere to this opinion; or at least whether it would be adopted so far as to sustain the claim of a mortgagee against the lien of a material man. I see nothing to distinguish his possession from that of an assignee in bankruptcy, against whom it is well settled the lien of the material man will prevail. It is well settled, however, that a mortgagee for a present valuable consideration, is a bona fide purchaser, to the extent of his mortgage interest: The Nevada [Case No. 5,839]; The Key City, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 653; The Columbia [Case No. 3,036]; The Dubuque [Id. 4,110]. But even though no money be advanced at the time the mortgage is made, if upon the faith of the security, the mortgagee afterwards advances money, or becomes liable as indorser, to that extent, he becomes a bona fide purchaser. Ladue v. Detroit & M. R. Co., 13 Mich. 380. That is the position of the claimant in this case. Upon the day the mortgage was executed, he indorsed for Scott & Brown a note to the amount of $1,200; soon thereafter he indorsed two other notes in the aggregate sum of $2,220, all of which he was obliged to take up at maturity. Under these circumstances, I deem it quite clear that he should be considered as a bona fide purchaser. The libel not having been filed until two years after his claim accrued and one year after the mortgage was given, and the advances made, I think libellant's claim must be adjudged to be stale.

The view which I have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to consider whether Dewey gained any additional rights by the purchase made April 28th, 1877, upon the foreclosure of his mortgage. The libel will be dismissed.

SCIRE FACIAS TO REVIVE JUDGMENT — JUDGMENT FOR PENALTY—EXECUTION.

1. A scire facias to revive a judgment is not a new action; and if the original judgment was rendered in Maryland before the 27th of February, 1801, an execution, after the revival of the judgment by scire facias in Maryland, may be issued upon it by the clerk of this court, under the act of congress of that date, section 13 [2 Stat. 104], upon the filing of an exemplification of the record; but the exemplification must be of the whole record in the suit; not of the proceedings upon the scire facias only.

2. When the judgment is for a penalty to be released on the payment of a smaller sum, that sum must be ascertained before the execution can be issued.

Mr. Law, for the defendant, moved to quash an execution issued by this court upon an exemplification of a judgment upon a scire facias in Maryland, under the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801, § 13 (2 Stat. 107), because the scire facias was issued subsequent to that date. The original judgment was in 1799; the judgment on the scire facias was in 1804, in Maryland.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the scire facias was not a new suit; and that the judgment upon it was such a judgment in a suit pending in a court in Maryland on the 27th of February, 1801, as would justify the clerk of this court to issue an execution upon the original judgment thus revived, under the 13th section of the act of 27th February, 1801.

Mr. Law then contended, that if the scire facias was not a new suit commenced after the date of that act, the exemplification should have been of the whole record, including the original judgment and the proceedings which led to it, and not of the proceedings upon the scire facias alone.

Mr. Law also objected that the execution does not pursue the original judgment. It is for a certain sum to be released on the payment of such sum as Leonard Mackall, for whose use the execution is docketed, shall say is due; which is no part of the original judgment.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) quashed the execution, on the ground that the exemplification of the original judgment was not filed before issuing the execution; and because the release was uncertain.

COLLISION—STEAMBOAT AND TOWS ON HUDSON RIVER—NEGLIGENCE OF PILOT.

[A steamboat descending the Hudson river at night, and passing in a narrow place an ascending steamboat having ten boats in tow on hawsers, held in fault for failure of her pilot to observe the tows, and for neglect to slow down or take any of the measures usual, under such circumstances, to prevent collision.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of New York.]

In admiralty.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The libel in this case was filed by the owners of the barge Isabella against the Commerce for a collision on the North river, near Castleton, some ten miles below Albany. The steamboat Indiana was ascending the river on the east side with a tow of ten boats. The Isabella, the one in question, with barge Cleveland, were the last tier, and were connected by a hawser to the tug. There was an intermediate tier of four canal boats, also connected by a hawser, some two hundred feet in advance of the two last. The Indiana had passed Mull Island, and had straightened up on the east side of the river, as near as it was safe for her to go, and had advanced so far that the last tow was opposite or just above the head of the island. The Commerce had left Albany that evening, and was descending the river on the west side, the Oregon following her at a distance of a few hundred yards. The night was not very dark. The Commerce, after passing the Indiana west from seventy to one hundred feet, when about opposite the second tier of tows took a sheer to the east, and thus changing her course, struck the Isabella, which was lashed to the larboard side of the Cleveland, and, of course, nearest the Commerce, sinking vessel and cargo.

The court below was of opinion, upon the proofs, that the Isabella was wholly in fault, being out of place at the time, and far in towards the west shore, and in the track of the Commerce, and dismissed the libel. [Case unreported.] The conflict and obscurity of the proofs on this point have been very much cleared up by the evidence of the pilot of the Oregon, who had charge of that vessel, which has been taken in this court since the appeal. The evidence of the master of the Indiana, and of six of the tows, is very full and explicit, that, at the time of the sheer of the Commerce, the two last tows, the Isabella and Cleveland, were on a line, or nearly in a line, with the tug, which confessedly was as far to the east shore as was safe; and the master of the Cleveland, to which vessel the Isabella was lashed, states that his vessel was about as near the shore as was prudent for him to go. And further, they all agree that there was room enough for the Commerce to have passed west of the tow, and that the sheer was unnecessary, and the direct cause of the collision. These witnesses all saw the sheer, which, indeed, is admitted by the witnesses for the Commerce: and, apprehending a collision in consequence, watched the course of the vessel until it happened. They speak, therefore, with confidence as to the transaction; and, indeed, cannot well be mistaken; and they are fully confirmed by the testimony of the pilot of the Oregon, who also apprehended the collision when he saw the sheer, and kept his eye on the Commerce. The evidence of this pilot, who was first pilot of the Oregon, very much shakes the testimony of Wilson, the second pilot, who was examined on behalf of the respondents in the court below.

The defense set up to justify the sheer is placed on two grounds: (1) That there was a light on the Isabella, and that the pilot of the Commerce supposed, and had a right to suppose, she was a vessel at anchor; and that, being well out in the channel of the river, he made the sheer to pass her on the east side; and (2) that she was so far out in the channel there was not room to pass her on the west side. As we have already said, the testimony of the captain of the tug, and of six of the tows, is very strong to show that the pilot was mistaken as to the room in the channel west of the Isabella. But in addition to this, is the evidence in this case of the pilot of the Oregon, who was looking on, and who passed over the tract just at or near the moment of the collision. And as it respects the light on the Isabella, it was in the hand of the master, who was moving about on the boat at the time, and, under the circumstances, we cannot but be of opinion that if proper attention had been given to the navigation of the Commerce, it would have aided in admonishing the pilot of her position as one of the tows of the Indiana instead of confusing or embarrassing him. The pilot of the Oregon, who had charge of that vessel and who was several hundred feet behind the Commerce, had no difficulty at the time in regarding this vessel with the light as the tow of the Indiana, and apprehended a collision from the moment of the sheer of the Commerce. The channel of the river was only from three to four or five or six hundred feet wide at the place of the collision in which were the Indiana with her ten tows ascending slowly the river—the Commerce and Oregon descending, and in respect to which navigation some embarrassment existed, and yet, the weight of the proof is, that the speed of the Commerce was not checked till the moment of the collision, nor any of the usual precautions taken under such circumstances. The Oregon immediately checked her speed, and took measures to prevent any accident.

[2 Sawy. 434.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. May 26, 1873.

"SETTLEMENT" UNDER DONATION ACT — GRANT— CONDITIONS SUBSEQUENT AND PRECEDENT THERETO — DIVORCE AFTER SETTLEMENT, BUT PRIOR TO NOTIFICATION.

1. A "settlement" under the donation act (9 Stat. 497) consisted of the selection and occupation of a particular tract of the public lands with intent to acquire the same, and due notice thereof to the surveyor-general or other proper officer; but when such notice was given, it related back to the commencement of such occupation, unless the same was prior to the passage of the act.

2. The donation act was a present grant to the settler thereunder, but the completion of "a settlement" upon the tract claimed was a condition precedent to the vesting of any estate or interest in the land, in such settler.

3. From June, 1845, until March, 1851, Dubois and wife occupied a land claim; in June, 1852, Dubois obtained a divorce from his wife, and in September of the same year notified and proved up on such land claim, and subsequently obtained a patent for three hundred and twenty acres thereof: Held, that no right or interest in said land had vested in Dubois or his wife at the date of the divorce, and that thereafter Dubois was only entitled to claim and take a donation as a single man, and that his former wife was not entitled to any share or part thereof.

[This was a bill in equity by Richard Fitzpatrick against Andrew Dubois and others.]

John H. Woodward, for complainant.

Reuben P. Boise, for defendants.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit was commenced on May 30, 1872, and is brought to "declare and establish" the rights of the parties thereto, in and to a certain tract of land, described in the bill as claim 98, containing 321.80 acres, and situated in Marion county, and to procure a partition thereof. The defendants answered the bill, except Dubois, who made default.

On February 17, 1873, the cause was heard and submitted on the bill, answers, replications and proofs. A large portion of the evidence taken in the cause is irrelevant and incompetent, but the material facts are not seriously disputed. They appear to be as follows:

In 1840 the defendant, Andrew Dubois, and Margaret, his wife, were settled upon a land claim of six hundred and forty acres, which included the premises in controversy. In 1843 said Margaret died, and in 1845 said Andrew married one Josette ——, now Josette Jeffries, and thenceforth they two resided on said land claim until March, 1851, when said Josette left the bed and board of said Andrew. On June 9, 1852, said Andrew duly obtained a divorce from said Josette, who in June, 1853, was married to Edward Jeffries, with whom she still lives.

In September, 1852, said Andrew notified as a married settler upon said land claim under section four of the donation act of September 27, 1850, and made proof of the required residence and cultivation thereon, and of his marriage with his first wife, Margaret. On October 31, 1864, the register and receiver issued a certificate for the claim to said Andrew and Margaret. Upon examination of the matter in the general land office, it appearing that said Margaret had died before the donation act, and therefore was not entitled to land under it, the register and receiver, under the direction of said office, issued a corrected certificate in favor of said Andrew as a single man for three hundred and twenty acres, upon which, on June 16, 1868, a patent was issued to him for the premises in controversy.

Subsequently Josette made a claim in the local land office to the one half of said claim, upon the ground that she was the lawful wife of said Andrew from January, 1845, to March, 1852. Thereupon said patent was withheld from delivery, and a hearing of the parties had before the register and receiver, who decided in favor of Josette. This decision was reversed in the general land office upon the ground that, although Josette had an undoubted "right to one half of the claim in her own right, which she could have disposed of in any manner she thought fit," yet she had lost it by abandonment and "disclaimer of any right therein."

The defendants—Hall, Smith and Brown—are American citizens, and in possession of the premises, and claim title thereto as sole tenants in fee, by virtue of sales and conveyances thereof by defendant Dubois in the years 1855 and 1856, as follows: Hall of one hundred acres; Smith of one hundred and seventy acres, and Brown of fifty acres. On May 6, 1872, the said Edward and Josette Jeffries executed a conveyance of the premises to the complainant, who is a subject of Great Britain.

Upon this state of facts, counsel for the complainant maintains that Dubois and Josette, being husband and wife at the passage of the donation act of September 27, 1850 (9 Stat. 497), and then settled upon the land in question, the title thereto vested in them immediately, as tenants in common, subject to the performance of the subsequent conditions of notification and proof of residence and cultivation; and that it being the duty of the husband to notify the surveyor-general of the precise tract claimed under the law, and otherwise comply with the provisions of the act, so as to entitle himself and wife to a patent for the donation, the failure to obtain a patent to the whole six hundred and forty acres settled upon is the fault of the former and not the latter, and the consequent loss must at least be borne by the husband equally with the wife, and therefore she is entitled to an undivided half of the three hundred and twenty acres described in the patent.

On the other hand, counsel for the defendants insists that the performance of all the duties imposed upon the settler by the donation act are conditions precedent to the vesting of title in him, and therefore no estate vests in the settler or his wife until the making of the notification and completion of the four years residence and cultivation required by the act, and that Dubois being a single man when he made his notification, was not entitled to take or claim a donation for his late wife Josette, or any one but himself.

The provisions of the donation act [9 Stat. 497] bearing upon the question are as follows: Section 4 enacts: "That there shall be and hereby is granted to every white settler or occupant of the public lands * * * now residing in said territory, and who shall have resided upon and cultivated the same for four consecutive years, and shall otherwise conform to the provisions of this act, the quantity of one half section, or three hundred and twenty acres of land, if a single man, and if a married man, * * * the quantity of one section, or six hundred and forty acres, one half to himself and the other half to his wife, to be held by her in her own right; and the surveyor-general shall designate the part enuring to the husband and that to the wife, and enter the same on the records of his office."

Section 6 requires: "That within three months after the survey has been made, or where the survey has been commenced, then within three months from the commencement of such settlement, each of said settlers shall notify the surveyor-general to be appointed under this act of the precise tract or tracts claimed by them respectively under this law."

Section 7 requires: "That within twelve months from the survey or the settlement, when the latter is the second in point of time, the settler must make proof before the proper officer 'that the settlement and cultivation required by this act had been commenced; and at any time after the expiration of four years from the date of such settlement, whether made under the laws of the late provisional government or not, shall prove in like manner, by two disinterested witnesses, the fact of continued residence and cultivation required by the fourth section of this act;' and upon such proof being made, such officer shall issue a certificate 'setting forth the facts in the case, and specifying the land to which the parties are entitled.'"

In Chapman v. School Dist. [Case No. 2,607]. this court held that section 4 of the donation act "is a grant in the present and gives the fee simple to every settler who avails himself of its provisions from the date of his settlement; but until the completion of the subsequent conditions of residence and cultivation and proof thereof, it is an estate upon condition—what is known at common law as a base or conditional fee—subject to be defeated or lost by a failure to perform the conditions upon which it is held. But it is an estate in fee, nevertheless, and upon the completion of the residence and cultivation or other conditions, it becomes absolute and unqualified."

Thus far this ruling has been followed, and is, therefore, in this court, the law of this case. According to it the title—the estate in fee in the lands—vests in the settler from the date of his settlement, and the conditions of residence and cultivation are subsequent and not precedent.

But the case does not decide what constitutes a settlement, or whether the notification of "the precise tract claimed" is a condition precedent or subsequent to the taking effect of the grant. Precedent conditions are such as must happen or be performed before the estate can vest or be enlarged; subsequent are such, by the failure or nonperformance of which an estate already vested may be defeated. 2 Bl. Comm. 154.

The case turns upon the determination of this question. For if the settlement, in contemplation of the act, was commenced while Josette was the wife of Andrew, then the right to the donation in equal parts was vested in the settler and his wife, and the subsequent divorce in no way affected it. The act imposed no duty upon the wife in connection with the land. The right to make the location and settlement is given to the husband, and the corresponding duty of performing the conditions is imposed upon him, and if he chose to complete the residence and cultivation and make proof thereof, notwithstanding the divorce, the effect of such compliance with the act enures to the benefit of the wife as well as himself.

In Fields v. Squires [Case No. 4,776] it was held that: "The settlement of a married man is intended for the benefit of his wife as well as himself, to enable her to obtain her equal share of the bounty of the grantor. A married man may occupy less land than the law permits. He may have good reasons for so doing. A particular half section may be deemed of more value than any whole one, open to settlement. In this respect the act commits the interest of the wife to the judgment and thrift of the husband. But he cannot change the law, and elect to take as a single man to the exclusion of the wife. The exclusive power of the husband is confined to the selection and location of the land. In any event, the land embraced in the settlement, whether a whole section or less, is granted to the husband and wife in equal parts."

Mere indefinite occupancy of the public lands did not constitute any one "a settler" nor make a "settlement" thereon under the donation act. Such occupation must be upon a particular tract, having the form or boundaries required by the act, and with the intent to acquire the same.

Neither did residence and cultivation, however commenced or prolonged, bring a party within the purview of the act, so as to vest in him any estate or interest in the land. Notice to the surveyor-general of "the precise tract claimed," was the first act which brought the occupant within the operation of the law. By this means he signified his intention to avail himself of the benefits of the act, and his acceptance of the proffered grant. Thereafter, but not before, the grant was located and confined to the land described in his notification, unless, as was the practice, the settler had leave to withdraw his notification and abandon that location.

This notification by the occupant was what constituted him "a settler," and his occupation thereby became "a settlement" under the act, as well as in fact. Doubtless it should be held to relate back to the beginning of his occupation, or to the passage of the act, when the occupation commenced prior thereto. But without this notification the occupant could never acquire any legal relation to the land, or the government be deprived of its ownership thereof.

In this respect the donation act is unlike the grants in the cases cited by counsel for complainants—namely, Rutherford v. Green's Heirs, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 196; Fremont Case, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 557; Hornsby v. U. S., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 235. In all these cases there was a grant of a specific quantity of land within certain exterior limits to a particular person. The courts held that such grants passed a present interest to the grantee, as against the government, subject to the right of the latter to locate the grant within the exterior limits according to the terms thereof, and the general law upon the subject. In the language of the cases the general gift then became a particular one.

But here the grantee is not named, otherwise than as one included within a description of a class of persons who may take, and the selection and notice to the grantor of the precise tract claimed depended upon the former, and involved in fact his acceptance of the proffered grant.

It follows from these premises that the act of notification is a condition precedent to the vesting in the occupant of any estate or interest in the land.

Apply this conclusion to the case at bar. On June 9, 1852, when Andrew was divorced from Josette, he was a mere occupant of the public lands. Whether he should become "a settler" thereon, and a donee under the act, of the land occupied by him, depended upon his election to notify thereon within the time limited by the act. Josette could not compel him to notify, nor while she was his wife could she receive a donation otherwise than through her husband's acceptance of the proposed grant. But before he notified he had ceased to be a married man, and she was no longer his wife. He was only entitled thereafter to take as a single man. His former wife was now a femme sole, and entitled to become a settler in her own right. Silver v. Ladd, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 226. Although as a matter of fact Dubois did notify as a married man upon the whole section, he had no right to do so, and was finally held by the land department to be a single man, and allowed a donation accordingly.

It is a proposition too plain for argument, that Josette could not, after the divorce, acquire any right or interest in this land as the wife of Andrew. That relation then came to an end, and she could acquire nothing in that character thereafter. Neither did she acquire any such right before the divorce unless Andrew did. But as has been shown, the notification being a condition precedent to the vesting of any estate in the premises in Andrew, he acquired none until September, 1852, some months after the divorce. Josette, never having acquired any interest in the premises, because no estate therein was vested in either her or Andrew prior to their divorce, her vendee, the complainant, has none, and his bill, being therefore without equity, is dismissed.

Case No. 4,843.

FITZPATRICK et al. v. EIGHT HUNDRED BALES OF COTTON.

[3 Ben. 42.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1868.[2]

VOLUNTARY STRANDING—SEAWORTHINESS—MASTER.

1. Where a three-masted schooner encountered a severe storm from the eastward, off Fire Island, in the course of which the mizzen sail was so torn as to make it useless, and it was found impossible to repair it, and the effect of its loss was that the vessel could not be kept up to the wind, but fell off into the trough of the sea, and, about ten o'clock at night, the master ordered the mainsail to be taken in to check her speed, and kept her off before the wind towards the New Jersey shore, hoping that, before he reached it, some change might take place, but the wind and sea increased, and, about one o'clock the next morning, on consultation, it was determined that, inasmuch as an attempt to bring the vessel's head to the wind would cause her to fall into the trough of the sea, and be thrown on her beam ends, when her decks would be swept, and all on board be lost, it was safer to run the risk of beaching her, and, accordingly, she was kept on, and ran ashore about an hour after, and proved a total loss, her cargo being almost all saved: Held, that this was a case of voluntary stranding, and that the owners of the vessel were entitled to contribution from the cargo.

2. A vessel equipped in a manner which renders her competent to encounter the ordinary perils of a voyage is seaworthy.

3. The fact that the mizzen sail of the vessel gave out in the extraordinary storm, and that she had no spare mizzen sail, does not show that she was unseaworthy when she sailed.

4. The master of the vessel acted with due deliberation and discretion, with no unreasonable timidity, with an honest intent to do his duty, and with a fair exercise of skill.

This was a libel [by Philip Fitzpatrick and others against eight hundred bales of cotton and two hundred and eighty eight barrels of molasses] to recover contribution, in general average, for the damage sustained by the libellants by the loss of the schooner George W. Hynson, owned by them, and of the freight on her cargo. Such loss was claimed to have occurred by the voluntary stranding of the vessel by her master. The libel was filed against the cargo, which was saved, and was being transported on the vessel as freight. The vessel was a three-masted schooner. She took on her cargo at New Orleans, and left there for Providence, Rhode Island, on the 28th of December, 1866. On the 21st of January, 1867, at about five o'clock p. m., when she was about fifteen miles south from Fire Island, on the shore of Long Island, she encountered a severe storm from the eastward, and was headed off on a south southwest course. As the wind and the sea increased, an attempt was made to take in sail, and, in taking in the mizzen sail, it was so torn by the wind as to require to be repaired before it could be further used. The other sails were taken in, so that the vessel ran under a two-reefed mainsail, and a jib with the bonnet off. The night was so dark, the weather so cold, the wind so violent, and the sea so high, that, after an attempt by all disposable hands to mend the sail, the effort had to be abandoned about nine o'clock p. m. The effect of the loss of the use of the mizzen sail was, that the head of the vessel could not be kept to the wind and she fell off into the trough of the sea, and was in danger of being thrown on her beam ends. The wind and the sea continued to increase, and life lines were stretched for the safety of the crew, as the sea frequently broke over the deck. About ten o'clock p. m., the master, after consultation with the mate, ordered the mainsail to be lowered, to thus check the speed of the vessel, and kept her off before the wind and the sea to the westward, towards the New Jersey shore. At that time he supposed himself to be from twenty-five to thirty miles distant from that shore, and he had no then present intention of running the vessel on shore there, but hoped that before reaching there, the wind would either go down or shift from the eastward, and allow him to change his course from one towards the shore. Directed by her rudder, proper hands being kept at her wheel, she was kept away from the wind, and out of the trough of the sea, and on a westward course. The wind did not abate or shift, and the sea increased. It was storming, with rain, snow, and hail, and very dark, and, about one o'clock a. m., the master had another consultation with the mate. The occasion of that consultation was, that the vessel had been running before the wind for three hours, and was approaching the New Jersey coast. The result of the consultation was, that, in the then state of the wind and the sea, it was thought to be impossible to do anything else but keep the vessel running to the westward, before the wind and the sea, until she should run upon the beach, for the reason that any attempt to bring her head to the wind would cause her to fall into the trough of the sea and be thrown on her beam ends, when her decks would be swept, and all on board would be lost. It was known to the master that the shore was a sandy beach. Two men were kept at the wheel, and guided the course of the vessel directly before the wind, and towards the beach, until the last moment, so as to prevent her falling into the trough of the sea before reaching the shore, so as to ensure her reaching the shore, and so as to ensure her reaching it bow on, and not broadside on, in which latter event the breakers might have swamped her. The rest of the crew were sent into the rigging. About two o'clock a. m., the vessel neared the breakers, bow on. The men at the wheel left it and jumped into the rigging just as a heavy swell came which lifted the vessel over the outer bar and carried her high up upon the beach, which, when daylight came, was found to be Squam beach. The vessel was secured by an anchor from listing to starboard towards the sea. She ran up so high that, at low water, it was bare ground in shore of the vessel. An arrangement was soon made with the Coast Wrecking Company to save the vessel and cargo for seven per cent. of their value, they to be delivered to the master in New York. After work was commenced under this arrangement, an agent, sent by the owners of and underwriters on the cargo, arrived at the wreck, and sanctioned the arrangement, and concurred in the discharging of the whole of the cargo, and remained there until nearly all of it was discharged. The cargo was all saved, mostly in good order, except thirteen barrels of molasses. The vessel broke up and was lost, despite all proper efforts to save her. After being stripped she was sold, as she lay, for $316. Her value before was about $20,000. The freight and primage on the cargo, if delivered in Providence, would have been $3,902. The agent of the owners and underwriters of the cargo told the master of the vessel, at the wreck, that he was prepared and authorized to sign average bonds for the owners and underwriters of the cargo, and that the freight would be payable, less the cost of transportation from New York to Providence. Without the knowledge of the master or of the agents of the vessel, the agent in New York of the consignees of the cargo received there and forwarded to Providence all of the cargo except 276 bales of cotton, which were seized under the process in this suit. The consignees of the cargo paid the salvage expenses and charges on it. The answer set up, in defence, that the vessel was not seaworthy, or competently manned or commanded for her voyage; that no proper effort was made to pursue her voyage, or to prevent her and her cargo from being wrecked, or to take her into a place of safety; and that the disaster was due to the fault or neglect of the master or the poor condition of the vessel and her equipment. The liability of the cargo to contribute in general average for the loss of the vessel, or of her freight, was denied. The libellants insisted that the case was one of voluntary stranding, constituting a general average loss of the vessel and freight, and entitling the libellants to recover contribution therefor from the cargo saved; and that the vessel was seaworthy, and was properly navigated. On the part of the claimants it was insisted, that the stranding, if excusable, was not voluntary but compulsory, and that the vessel was not properly equipped or competently navigated.

E. H. Owen, for libellants.
C. A. Hand, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is the law of this court, as settled by the supreme court of the United States (Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 331), that the voluntary running on shore of a vessel in a case of such imminent peril that there is no other possible means of preserving the crew, the vessel and the cargo, the stranding being done to preserve the crew, the vessel, and the cargo, followed by a total loss of the vessel and the saving of the cargo, constitutes, on behalf of the vessel, a general average loss, to which the cargo saved is bound to contribute. In the case of Barnard v. Adams, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 270, 303, the same court state the rule to be, that, where there is a danger in which vessel, cargo, and crew participate, and such danger is imminent and apparently inevitable, except by voluntarily incurring the loss of a portion of the whole to save the remainder, and there is a voluntary jettison of some portion of the whole, for the purpose of avoiding such imminent peril, and the attempt to avoid such imminent common peril is successful, the case is one for a general average contribution. It was urged, in the present case, on the part of the claimants, that, to constitute a voluntary stranding, the vessel must be subjected intentionally to an increased peril, and that, where she flees from instant and sure destruction, the election to strand her is a secondary result forced by unavoidable compulsion, and is not voluntary. This is a mistaken view of the law of the federal courts on the subject. In Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby [supra], it is held, that where, in the stranding, there is an intention to place the vessel and cargo, if practicable, in less peril, by an act which, though hazardous, is done to escape from a more pressing danger, and for the common safety, and the salvation of the cargo is accomplished thereby, while the vessel is lost, the case is one of voluntary stranding, in which the cargo must contribute, in general average, for the loss of the vessel. So, too, in Barnard v. Adams [supra], it is held, that where there is imminent peril that the vessel will be driven on shore under such circumstances as to be inevitably wrecked, with loss of vessel, cargo, and crew, and such immediate peril is avoided by voluntarily stranding the vessel at a less dangerous place, and cargo and crew are saved uninjured, but the vessel is lost, the case is one of voluntary stranding, and one for contribution, in general average, by the cargo saved, to the loss of the vessel. In that case, it was urged, that if the common peril was of such a nature that the thing cast away to save the rest would have perished inevitably, even if it had not been selected to suffer in place of the whole, there could be no contribution. But the court overruled this view, and held that there could be no foundation for a voluntary stranding, except the compulsion of necessity to save vessel and cargo or one of them from an imminent peril which threatened their common destruction; that the compulsory choice between the loss of the whole and the loss of a part must exist, to justify the sacrifice of a part for the whole; and that, if the jactus were not indispensable in order to escape the common peril, the master would himself be liable for the consequent loss. In the case of Rea v. Cutler [Case No. 11,599], the doctrine of the case of Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby was applied, and it was held that, where the master adopted a course which seemed to him least perilous, and most conducive to the common benefit, the loss by shipwreck being inevitable, but being capable of being met in more than one way, and with different degrees of peril to life or property, and in so acting the vessel was wrecked, the loss was a ground for general average.

Applying these principles to the facts of the present case, the stranding of the vessel was less perilous than an effort to keep her head to the wind, and to keep her away from the shore. Such an effort, on the evidence, would have caused her to go around no farther than into the trough of the sea, and there was in such a position imminent and apparently inevitable danger that her crew would have been swept away and lost, entailing a loss of vessel and cargo. Under these circumstances, the master adopted the course which was least perilous. He knew that the New Jersey shore was sandy, and afforded a probability of safety, and, after due and proper consultation, he directed the course of his vessel so as to give her and her cargo the benefit of the lesser peril and the chance of avoiding the greater one. There was, of course, a chance that, in not running before the wind, and in keeping off shore, the vessel might in some way have escaped the apparent danger from lying in the trough of the sea, but that chance the master threw away and elected not to take; and in doing so he exercised volition. There was a manifest intention on the part of the master, especially after the second consultation, to place the vessel and cargo in less peril by running the vessel on shore. That act, though hazardous, was done to escape from the more pressing danger, and was for the common safety. It is true that, when the master first began to run before the wind, the New Jersey shore was so far distant that his hope that the wind would die away or change before he should reach the shore was greater than his fear of being cast upon the shore. But, at the time of the second consultation, there was an honest belief that the vessel and cargo and crew would be lost in the trough of the sea, if the vessel were not run on shore, and that there was less peril in running her on shore. Under this state of facts, the will of the master was exercised in avoiding the greater peril of lying in the trough of the sea, and in discarding whatever chance of safety existed in doing so, and in carefully guiding the course of the vessel so as to accomplish the result attained. The case, therefore, was one of voluntary stranding, calling for contribution, in general average, on the part of the cargo saved.

The defence that the vessel was not seaworthy when she left New Orleans is not made out. She was equipped in a manner which rendered her competent to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage. Dupont v. Vance, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 162, 167; 2 Pars. Mar. Law, bk. 2, c. 3, § 2, p. 132. The fact that the mizzen sail gave out in the extraordinary storm the vessel encountered, and that she had no spare mizzen sail, is not enough to make out unseaworthiness at the commencement of the voyage. I see no evidence of any deficiency in her equipment in other respects, or of any want of care or skill in her navigation. The master appears to have been a competent man, and to have acted in the emergency with due deliberation and discretion, with no unreasonable timidity, with an honest intent to do his duty, and with a fair exercise of skill. Lawrence v. Minturn, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 100, 110. The freight, if lost, is to be regarded as a part of the loss to be contributed for. Columbian Ins. Co. v. Ashby, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 331, 344.

There must be a decree for the libellants in accordance with this decision, with a reference to a commissioner, as an auditor, to adjust, and state, and report the average contribution due from the cargo saved. All other questions are reserved until the coming in of the report.

FITZPATRICK et al. v. TROY INS. CO.

[5 Biss. 48.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Wisconsin. Oct., 1857.

INSURANCE STOCK NOTES.

An insurance company has no right to divide its risks and capital into classes, and restrict the liability upon stock notes to the class in which they are placed. The insured has the right to call upon the whole capital of the company and require an assessment upon all the stock notes.

[This was a bill in equity by Alexis Fitzpatrick and others against the Troy Insurance Company.]

MILLER, District Judge. The plaintiffs recovered a judgment against the defendant upon a policy against fire on a store of goods. Upon the return of an execution unsatisfied, a creditor's bill was filed, with a rule for an injunction and for the appointment of a receiver. By the consent of the parties a receiver was appointed, who has filed his bond with sureties and has entered upon the discharge of the duties of his appointment. The receiver returned into court a schedule and inventory of the premium notes and assets of the company; and he has petitioned the court, setting forth that the company was organized with two departments, the farmers' department and the merchants', and that by the charter and by-laws the accounts and policies in each department were to be entirely separate and distinct from each other; and praying instructions as to the manner of making assessments upon the notes in each department for the liquidation of the debts of the company. Section 4 of article 2 of the by-laws is, "That the accounts of each department shall be kept entirely separate and distinct, and no premium note shall be assessed for the payment of any loss except in the class to which it belongs;" and in pursuance of article 9 of the charter, these by-laws are annexed to the policy and are made by reference a part of the contract in form.

These plaintiffs paid a cash premium without giving a note, and did not, therefore, insure on the mutual principle. They have a right to claim of the company the amount of their judgment. They have not, by a note or in any other manner, classed their policy under either department as specified in the by-laws.

The charter was granted and the company was organized under and by virtue of an act entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of insurance companies," passed by the legislature of Wisconsin, and approved February 9, 1850. I do not find in that act any authority for the division of the company into two departments, or its business into classes. The fifth section requires agreements or notes for insurance before the organization of the company, which the corporators certified to under oath, upon submitting their application for the charter. That certificate does not classify the premium notes so received. These notes are required as capital of the company. They are "payable when called for, according to the charter and by-laws of the company, to pay losses and expenses." But this provision does not authorize a classification of the notes. It is not contemplated by the act that there should be the classification as made by the charter and by-laws of this company. One charter, or the incorporation of one company upon each application, was intended. This charter and the by-laws virtually make two companies of separate and distinct interests and liabilities. The law of this state appears to be the same as that of the state of New York. The only decision in that state referred to is the case of Thomas v. Achilles, 16 Barb. 491, in which the court ruled that "a mutual insurance company, organized under the general insurance act, has no right to divide its risks into two classes according to the degree of hazard, and to assess the premium notes only for the payment of losses happening in the class to which such notes belong. The assured has a right to look to the entire capital of the company—that is, the whole amount of premium notes taken—for his indemnity, in case of loss, instead of being limited to the capital of that class of risks in which his policy has been placed. And in case an assessment is made, he has a right to claim that all the premium notes held by the company should be embraced therein."

I adopt this decision as ruling the case and shall instruct the receiver accordingly.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1874.

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION — ACTION IN REM TO RECOVER POSSESSION OF PROPERTY.

1. Where the possession of movable property has been changed, against the right of the true owner, by a maritime tort, or by the breach of a maritime contract, to which the property was subject, the owner may vindicate his title in a court of admiralty by a proceeding in rem.

[Distinguished in Wenberg v. A Cargo of Mineral Phosphate, 15 Fed. 287. Cited in The Director, 26 Fed. 712.]

2. A party who would be the defendant in ordinary cases may often assume the character of libellant in a court of admiralty, in order to bring his case before the court, if the opposite party is in possession of the res, or of a fund in which the libellant has a right to share.

The libel alleged that certain mahogany, of which the five hundred and twenty-eight pieces were a part, was shipped at St. Domingo, in August, 1874, on the American brig Surprise, F. L. Norton, master, to be carried to Genoa, and there delivered, in accordance with the terms of two certain bills of lading, to the libellant, who was the owner thereof; that the master put into Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and there, without right, sold the cargo, and became himself the purchaser; that said Norton had shipped several parts of said cargo to different ports for sale, and among others to Boston, and was about to ship the same hence to London; that the libellant believes said Norton is about to convert the cargo to his own use; that the libellant is willing to pay the freight and other charges, if any, due said Norton, but denies that any thing is due under the circumstances. The prayer was for a restoration of said cargo, upon payment of whatever may be due thereon.

The question of jurisdiction was submitted to the court, without formal pleadings, and was argued by H. C. Hutchins and H. H. Currier, for the libellant, and C. S. Lincolns, for the claimant of the cargo, who was said to be not the master himself, but a purchaser from him.

LOWELL, District Judge. The libellant's case has been excepted to in the outset in a somewhat informal way, by consent of parties, in order to test the jurisdiction of the court. Few decisions have been found by counsel or by me in which a restitution has been ordered by the admiralty of goods found separated from a vessel in circumstances like those set forth in this libel. Undoubtedly, such titles are usually tried in the state courts, excepting when they concern ships, which in this country have been held to be within the cognizance of the admiralty, and which have lately been put on the same footing in England. At the hearing I was much disposed to doubt whether the admiralty replevin, so to-call it, extended fully to cargoes, or what had lately been cargoes, as well as to ships; but, upon further reflection, I am of opinion that the suit may be maintained.

The admiralty has authority to seize and restore to the true owner all goods, or their proceeds, wrongly taken at sea, whether by simple robbery, or under color of a capture as prize of war, whenever and wherever and in whosesoever possession such goods or their proceeds may be found within the territorial jurisdiction of the admiralty court whose power is invoked in the premises: The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 546; Rex v. Broom, 12 Mod. 135; The Hercules, 2 Dod. 353; 1 Kent, Comm. 379. So, in salvage, the owner of the goods upon which there is a lien for salvage may reclaim them in the admiralty, submitting to the court the question of salvage, and offering to pay the amount. In Post v. Jones, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 150, the master of a whaleship wrecked in the Arctic ocean had sold her catchings to the claimants; and the owners of a part of the cargo proceeded in rem against the oil and whalebone, praying to have possession delivered to them of the oil, &c., or its proceeds, if sold, subject to salvage and freight. The supreme court sustained the libel, and ordered the circuit court to divide the proceeds according to the mode pointed out in the opinion.

In the two classes of cases that I have mentioned, the courts of admiralty have a peculiar, and in many respects exclusive, authority. A court of common law cannot deal directly with questions of prize, and probably not with salvage, as I have had occasion to show in another case. Studley v. Baker [Case No. 13,559]. But, upon the whole, I do not see that this consideration will serve to distinguish all those cases from the present. Over some of them the other courts would have had a concurrent jurisdiction; as, for example, the title to a ship or cargo, not involving a point of prize or salvage, but of simple spoliation; and possibly of salvage, if a sufficient tender had been made.

The case of Post v. Jones, ubi supra, bears a strong analogy to this. There, as here, the owners of cargo alleged that the master had sold it in his own wrong, and they reclaimed it; and though some salvage was admitted to be due, yet it hardly seems that, if the case had involved only freight, the jurisdiction would have been lost, since the court has the same jurisdiction of affreightment that it has of salvage, though it is not so nearly exclusive.

A manuscript report of a case before Judge Benedict has been handed me, in which the owner of a cargo which had been put on board a ship for conveyance to South America, and afterwards unladen again in port in consequence of damage by fire, brought a libel, and alleged facts to prove that the libellant was not bound to permit the ship to carry forward the cargo under the circumstances. The learned judge so found, and ordered the cargo to be restored. No question was raised about the jurisdiction.

Judge Betts has expressed the opinion that a person deprived of his property on the high seas, whether with the connivance of the master or agent having charge of it, or not, and without regard to any marine tort having been committed, was entitled to a remedy in the admiralty, because the transaction is of a maritime character: American Ins. Co. v. Johnson [Case No. 303]. If this opinion is sound, it must follow that the jurisdiction would not be ousted by the fact that the cargo had been converted on shore rather than at sea, because, in matters of contract or of title, the place where an act was done is immaterial to the jurisdiction.

It is one of the equitable features of admiralty practice, that the party who would usually be the defendant may often bring the matter before the courts, as in Post v. Jones, where the persons, who would have been respondents in an ordinary salvage suit, were permitted to assume the character of libellants. In short, I am unable to see that Post v. Jones, and other like cases, can rest on any less broad foundation than this, that where the possession of movable property has been changed, against the right of the true owner, either by a maritime tort or by the breach of a maritime contract, to which the property was subject, the owner may vindicate his title in a court of admiralty, not only in personam, which is not doubted, but also in rem.

The reasons for the adoption of the practice may have been that such cases almost always involve maritime questions, and that the remedy in admiralty is more convenient and more adequate, its powers and proceedings being largely equitable. If the owner of the oil in Post v. Jones had been obliged to recover his property, by a proceeding at common law, one party or the other would have run great risk of losing what the supreme court found to be his equitable right. If the sale had been pronounced void, the owner might, perhaps, have recovered judgment on the strength of his legal title, without payment of freight or salvage; or, if the court found that freight or salvage were due and had not been tendered, or insufficiently tendered, they might have been obliged to find against the general owner, notwithstanding his title, on the ground of an undischarged lien in the defendant.

Finding this case to be of a maritime character, and considering the analogies presented by the cases cited, I am of opinion that the jurisdiction is successfully maintained in rem.

SEAMEN ABSENT FROM VESSEL.

Seamen absent from a ship without any fault of their own, are nevertheless entitled to full wages.

[Cited in Highland v. The Harriet C. Kerlin, 41 Fed. 224.]

[See Antone v. Hicks, Case No. 493.]

[This was a libel for wages by five seamen of the Fair American against the ship Fair American and her captain.] It appeared in evidence that these seamen shipped on board this vessel on the 3d of September last, in the port of Philadelphia, to go from thence to the Havanna and back. They all received a month's wages in advance. On the 8th of October, they were captured by a French privateer: these men were taken on board, and the captain and two other of the crew left in the prize. The latter, after some time, recovered possession of the Fair American, and brought her into Charleston. [See

Case No. 1,847.] The five seamen were put on board an American vessel, and arrived here in December last. They immediately went to their ship, and have been there ever since, in the regular performance of their duty, as part of the original crew. The voyage having been defeated by the capture, the cargo has been landed here, and the vessel is taking in freight for another voyage.

The question is whether these men are entitled to wages for the time they were absent from the vessel. It is contended that as this vessel was taken before she arrived at her first port of delivery, the seamen lose their wages. Lex Merc. 100. On the other hand the same book has been quoted to shew that, if a ship be taken, retaken, restored, and afterwards proceed on her voyage, the contract is not determined, and the entire freight becomes due: that wages follow freight, and are also due. This is the first case of the kind which I have been called upon to decide, and I have considered it fully. It will not be contended that these seamen are to blame. They were taken from their ship by superior force, returned to it as soon as they could, and have discharged their duty faithfully since. Molloy says (page 246) "that, if a vessel perishes, or is prevented by an enemy from returning, wages are lost; but if she unlades, they are due." No such loss has occurred here. The marine laws of the Hanse Towns declare that if a mariner fall sick and be left on shore, he shall receive his wages as if he had served out the entire voyage: and this appears just, for he was not in fault. Yet in such a case, additional expense is generally incurred by the hire of a substitute. Here, there was none, for all the duty was done by that part of the original crew that was left on board. In Mahoon v. The Glocester [Case No. 8,970] it is decided that seamen of an armed vessel, who were on shore by the captain's order, should, nevertheless, receive a full share of prize-money, though they were on shore when the prize was made; because they were not in fault. The case was fully argued, and the decision confirmed on appeal. That decision seems to conclude the case before me. I am of opinion, however, that as the first voyage was defeated, these seamen are bound to continue with the vessel till the one now in contemplation be ended; and at the same rate of wages. Let them, therefore, receive two thirds of what is due to them; and let the remainder be paid at the next port of delivery.

FLAGG v. MANN et al.

[2 Sumn. 486.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1837.

WITNESS—INTEREST IN SUIT — REAL PROPERTY — COMPLAINANT MUST SHOW BETTER TITLE THAN ONE IN POSSESSION — ESTOPPEL — EQUITABLE MORTGAGE — EQUITY OF REDEMPTION — PAROL AGREEMENT TO PURCHASE ON JOINT ACCOUNT—STATUTE OF FRAUDS—ALLEGATIONS IN ANSWER—DEED—DELIVERY—JOINT POSSESSION BY TORTIOUS TITLE—RELEASE TO ONE — TRUST BY PAROL—SECURITY—MORTGAGE—DEFEASANCE—PURCHASE WITH NOTICE.

1. On or about June 13th, 1823, Samuel Frye, as guardian of his minor children, under a license of court, conveyed certain premises in Lowell, called the Paddy Camp Lands, to Luther Richardson, in fee. On the 14th of May, 1825, Luther Richardson conveyed these premises, being already subject to incumbrances, to his brother, Prentiss Richardson, by a deed of quitclaim, and upon a secret parol trust for the benefit of Luther. On the 6th of May, 1826, Luther Richardson and his wife, and Prentiss Richardson, executed a deed of quitclaim of the premises to Walker and Fisher, for the consideration of $2000 (as stated in the deed), and on the same day, Walker and Fisher executed a bond for $10,000 to Luther Richardson alone, which recites, that "the above-named Luther Richardson has, by a deed of quitclaim, bearing even date herewith, conveyed to the above-bounden Walker and Fisher, all his right and title, &c.," and then provides, that the obligees shall reconvey the premises to Luther Richardson whenever, within five years from date, he shall repay them such sums of money as they shall expend in discharging incumbrances, and making improvements on the land. At the same time, Walker and Fisher executed to Luther Richardson a lease of a part of the premises for five years, upon the annual rent of one cent during the term, unless the premises should be previously redeemed, according to the provisions of the bond. On or before the 13th of May, 1831, a claim was set up to these premises by the heirs of Samuel Frye, grounded on a supposed invalidity of the guardianship sale thereof at a former period. Shortly after, a parol agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant Mann, to purchase at their mutual expense and benefit, the title of Luther Richardson, and to extinguish the claims of Walker and Fisher, and of the Frye heirs in the premises, on their equal and joint account. This agreement was never abandoned by the parties thereto. And on the 13th of May, 1831, Flagg and Mann, in pursuance thereof, received a conveyance of the premises by deed of quitclaim from Luther Richardson, and also an assignment of the bond of Walker and Fisher. On the 27th of July, 1831, Walker and Fisher conveyed their title in the premises to Mann alone, by a quitclaim deed. Subsequently, the Frye heirs, by deeds of quitclaim, conveyed all their title in the premises to the defendant, Adams. On the 6th of August, 1831, the defendants, Mann and Adams, severally conveyed to each other, by quitclaim deeds, one moiety of the premises and of their respective interests therein. On the 8th of August, 1831, Mann conveyed, by a quitclaim deed, his moiety of the premises to the defendant Fuller, for $40,000, and Fuller, on the same day, executed a mortgage deed of the same moiety to Mann, as security for the payment of four notes, each for $10,000, given for the purchase-money. A bill in equity was now brought, by Flagg, to set aside the deeds of Mann to Adams, and of Adams to Fuller, as made in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff, and for a reconveyance of one moiety of the premises to the plaintiff, upon payment by him of a moiety of the moneys paid in perfecting the title, and for other relief. Held, that Luther Richardson has no interest in this suit, to render him an incompetent witness.

2. The defect in Luther Richardson's original title, on account of the alleged invalidity of the guardianship sale, if such really existed, can be taken advantage of only by the Frye heirs, and others deriving title under them; and that, until the avoidance thereof by them, Luther Richardson must be deemed the lawful owner of the premises.

[Cited in Greely v. Smith, Case No. 5,750.]

3. The defendant, Mann, deriving his title, together with Flagg, from the purchase of Richardson, cannot set up the outstanding adverse title of the Frye heirs, to defeat the equitable rights of Flagg under the purchase on joint account, if Richardson at the time had any title in the premises.

4. The agreement between Flagg and Mann being made for the purpose of protecting themselves against the claim of the Frye heirs, a court of equity will not allow Mann to violate that agreement by interposing the above claim to defeat the rights of Flagg, although the relation would not cause an estoppel at law.

[Cited in Lawrence v. Dana, Case No. 8,136.]

5. The execution of the deed to Walker and Fisher, and the giving of the bond by them to Luther alone, with the assent of Prentiss, amounted to an execution of the secret trust between Luther and Pretiss, and is the same in effect as if Prentiss had first conveyed the premises to Luther, and the latter had then conveyed to Walker and Fisher, taking from them the bond.

[Cited in Hunter v. Marlboro, Case No. 6,908.]

6. Walker and Fisher, and all persons claiming under them, are estopped, at least in equity, by the terms of the bond of Walker and Fisher to Luther Richardson, as above recited, from denying, that all which they took under the deed of Luther and his wife and Prentiss was the right and title of Luther alone.

7. The deed to Walker and Fisher, and the bond by them to Luther Richardson are to be treated as part of one and the same transaction, and to have the same effect as if embodied in one instrument; and that this deed and bond, being merely an attempt to evade the strict rules of law with regard to mortgages, constitute an equitable mortgage to Walker and Fisher for their advances, and not a conditional purchase by them of the premises.

[Cited in Shapley v. Rangeley, Case No. 12,707; Bentley v. Phelps, Id. 1,331; Jewett v. Cunard, Id. 7,310.]

8. Luther Richardson had a clear equity of redemption in the premises at the time of his conveyance to Flagg and Mann, sufficient, at least in the view of a court of equity, to make them tenants in common, and to create between them a privity of title and estate.

9. The parol agreement between Flagg and Mann, for the purchase on joint account of the premises in question, as above recited, coupled with the deed of Richardson to Flagg and Mann, and the assignment to them of Walker and Fisher's bond, created a fiduciary relation between these parties, grounded on privity of title and estate, under which a purchase of an outstanding incumbrance or adverse title by one would be a trust for the benefit of both; and on this account, the agreement, though by parol, is extracted from the statute of frauds of Massachusetts.

[Cited in Barnes v. Boadman, 152 Mass. 393, 25 N. E. 623.]

10. Semble, that the agreement, though by parol, was executed by the passing of the deed, and assignment above-mentioned, even if no actual title passed from Richardson, so as to establish a fiduciary relation between the parties, grounded merely on privity of contract, which was sufficient to make the subsequent purchases of outstanding incumbrances in trust for the joint account, and to extract the case from the statute of frauds.

[Cited in Hunter v. Marlboro, Case No. 6,908.]

[Cited in Digby v. Jones, 67 Mo. 105.]

11. Mann was entitled to one moiety of the premises, which moiety was duly conveyed to Adams, without notice of the title of Flagg.

12. It was not of itself a wrongful act in Mann to take the title from Walker and Fisher, and from the Frye heirs in his own name, as it was his only security to compel Flagg either to abandon those purchases, or, if he insisted on his share, to repay the advances made.

13. The charges of notice of the plaintiff's title in the bill against Fuller are loose and indeterminate, amounting to a mere intimation or suspicion or belief, whereas there should have been an allegation of full notice of the very title and claim of the plaintiff asserted in the bill.

[See Wood v. Mann, Case No. 17,951.]

14. Fuller, at the time of his purchase of Mann, had no notice, actual or constructive, of the title of Flagg.

15. The deed from Mann to Fuller, although a mere quitclaim or release, must be treated as a bargain and sale, or other lawful conveyance, effectual to pass the whole estate, and entitling Fuller to protection as a bonâ fide purchaser without notice to the extent of the purchase-money already paid before notice of the plaintiff's title.

[Cited in Fletcher v. Jackson, 23 Vt. 588.]

[See Wood v. Mann, Case No. 17,951.]

16. Flagg is entitled to one moiety of the premises purchased of Richardson, Walker, and Fisher, and the Frye heirs, and, in default of this, on account of the conveyance to Fuller, to a moiety of the purchase-money, as a substituted fund, deducting therefrom the sums paid by Mann to Walker and Fisher and to the Frye heirs, and other expenses incurred in the premises.

17. For the payment of his moiety of the purchase-money, the plaintiff has a lien on the land conveyed to Fuller, to the extent of the purchase-money which remained unpaid at the time of notice to Fuller of the plaintiff's title.

18. An allegation in an answer, which is not responsive to the bill, is not evidence; and the onus probandi is on the defendant to establish it.

19. If a deed is found in the possession of the grantee, there is a presumption of a due delivery thereof, because then, and not otherwise, it would be in the proper custody.

20. A deed can never be delivered as an escrow to the grantee himself.

21. A court of equity will not yield to technical rules of law, by which the intention of parties may be defeated.

22. When a witness has been cross-examined by a party, with a full knowledge of an objection to his competency a court of equity will not allow the party to raise the objection at the hearing.

23. Where two persons are in possession of lands by an imperfect or tortious title, as by disseisin, a release to one of them will enure to the benefit of both.

[Cited in Pierpont v. Fowle, Case No. 11,152; Myers v. Reed, 17 Fed. 406.]

24. If parties are interested together by mutual agreement, and a purchase is made agreeably thereto, neither party can exclude the other from what was intended to be for the common benefit; and any private benefit, touching the common right, which is secured by either party, will turn him into a trustee for the benefit of both.

25. A disseisor in possession has a lawful estate, which he may alien, and his alienee will have a good title as against all persons not having a paramount title.

26. A question of fact, which is essential to the decision of a case in equity, may be referred to a jury to be tried upon an issue framed for the purpose.

[Cited in Garsed v. Beall, 92 U. S. 694.]

27. A court of equity will often pronounce, that there is an equitable mortgage in cases, where a court of law would be compelled to say there was no mortgage.

[Cited in Bentley v. Phelps, Case No. 1,331; Almy v. Wilbur, Id. 256.]

28. A trust, created by a parol contract, will be enforced in equity against a party, who does not insist upon the defence of the statute of frauds.

29. Courts of equity do not regard the forms of instruments, but look to the intent, and give to the acts of parties that construction, which is consistent with the intent and with equity.

[Cited in Hall v. Speer, Case No. 5,947.]

30. To constitute a conditional purchase, there must be a sale for a valuable consideration between the parties, with a right of repurchase.

31. If a transaction resolve itself into a security, whatever may be its form, and whatever name the parties may choose to give to it, it is in equity a mortgage; and the parties cannot, by any covenant or agreement, limit the rights of the mortgagor, or cut off his equity of redemption after a limited period.

32. The circumstance, that the grantee is not to be let into immediate possession of the estate, affords a presumption of its being a mortgage; so also does the circumstance, that the money paid by the grantee is not a fair price for the absolute purchase of the property conveyed to him.

33. It is not of the essence of a mortgage, that there should be a defeasance; and there may be a defeasance of a deed of conveyance, without constituting a mortgage. The question, whether a conveyance amounts to a mortgage, does not turn on this point.

Bill in equity, to set aside certain conveyances, alleged to have been made in fraud of the rights of the complainant, and for other relief. The bill was brought by Henry Flagg, of Barnstable, in the state of New Hampshire, against Samuel H. Mann, John R. Adams, and Elisha Fuller, of Lowell, in the state of Massachusetts. The following is an outline of the leading facts of the case:

In March, 1823, Samuel Frye, of Danville, in the state of Vermont, being the guardian of his six children, all minors, by his late wife, Polly Frye, obtained a license from the supreme court of Massachusetts, in due form of law, to sell certain real estate belonging to and then in the seisin of the said minor children, situate in Lowell, in the same state. He sold the same estate at public auction, on the tenth of June of the same year, under the license, and on the thirteenth day of the same month executed a deed thereof to Luther Richardson, the purchaser at the sale, in due form of law. The validity of this sale constituted one of the questions in the cause, it being asserted on one side and denied on the other, that previous to the advertisement of the sale, he had not taken the oath prescribed by law, and indispensable to the validity of such a sale. Luther Richardson entered into possession of the premises, and had seisin thereof under and according to his deed; and on the 29th of September, 1824, mortgaged the same to Goodman, Saville & Kent, to secure the payment of $1,229.70; and subsequently, on the 13th of August, 1824, gave them a second mortgage thereof, to secure the payment of $2,850.30. Afterwards, the equity of redemption of Luther Richardson was attached, and subsequently, on the 18th of May, 1825, sold to John C. Proctor on an execution issued in favor of Mellen & Norcross against L. Richardson. While this attachment was pending, on the 14th of May, 1825, L. Richardson conveyed the premises by a deed of quitclaim, to his brother, Prentiss Richardson, for a consideration, stated in the deed to be $3,000. On the 21st of May, 1825, Proctor conveyed his title, acquired under the levy or execution in the equity of redemption of the premises, to Joshua Bennett. On the 6th of May, 1826, in pursuance of a previous negotiation, Luther Richardson and his wife, and Prentiss Richardson, executed a deed of quitclaim of the premises to William W. Walker, and Albigence W. Fisher, for the consideration (as stated in the deed) of $2,000; and on the same day, Walker and Fisher executed a bond for $10,000 to Luther Richardson alone, whereby, after reciting the quitclaim deed to themselves, the mortgages to Goodman, Saville & Kent, the sale of the equity of redemption to Proctor, and the conveyance by him to Bennett, the condition provides, that they shall reconvey the premises to Luther Richardson whenever, within five years from the date, he shall pay, or cause to be paid to them, all such sums of money as they shall pay in discharge of the incumbrances aforesaid, with legal interest, together with such sums as they may expend in betterments and improvements on the premises in that time by the mutual consent of the parties. At the same time, Walker and Fisher executed to Luther Richardson a lease of a part of the premises for five years, upon the annual rent of one cent during the term, unless the premises should be previously redeemed according to the provisions of the bond. On the 19th of September, 1826, Walker and Fisher took an assignment of their several mortgages from Goodman, Saville & Kent, paying them therefor $3,171.87; and subsequently, on the 14th of April, 1827, they took an assignment from the surviving partners, of the other mortgage to Goodman, Saville & Kent. On the 25th of May, 1826, Bennett conveyed to Walker and Fisher, by deed of quitclaim, for the sum of $1,200 (as stated in the deed,) all his right in the premises. So that, in virtue of all these conveyances, Walker and Fisher became the exclusive owners of the premises, subject only to the right of redemption of Luther Richardson under their bond to him, above referred to. Whether this right of redemption had been extinguished or not by the nonpayment of the moneys advanced by Walker and Fisher within the five years, according to the terms of the condition of the bond, was one of the matters in controversy between the parties.

On or before the 13th of May, 1831, it seems, that a claim was set up, by the minor children of Samuel Frye, to the premises, grounded, as has been already suggested, upon the supposed invalidity of the guardianship sale thereof in June, 1823. A negotiation then took place between Luther Richardson on one side, and Flagg (the plaintiff) and Mann (the defendant) on the other side, the object of which was (as the bill asserts) for Flagg and Mann jointly to purchase of L. Richardson his title (such as it was) in the premises (the five years being expired), and also to extinguish the claims of Walker and Fisher and of the Frye heirs in the premises on their equal and joint account. The bill asserts, that Flagg and Mann agreed with each other, that the purchase should be made at their mutual expense, and for their mutual benefit; and also agreed with Luther Richardson, upon his conveying his title in the premises to them, in case the title under the guardianship deed, and under the other conveyances, above referred to, should be found good, so that they might hold the same, to pay the sums due to Walker and Fisher, and also to pay him such part of the sum of $9,000, as should remain after discharging the debts so due to Walker and Fisher. The bill further asserts, that in pursuance of this agreement, Flagg and Mann, on the 13th of May, 1831, received a conveyance of the premises, by deed of quitclaim, from Luther Richardson, with a special warranty against himself and all persons claiming under him; and that they, Flagg and Mann, made a certain promissory note, payable to Luther Richardson, for the sum of $3,500, and which was delivered to one Seth Ames, the counsel of Richardson, to hold for his use in case Flagg and Mann should fail to comply with their agreement; and the better to secure the performance thereof. Though this quitclaim of L. Richardson to Flagg and Mann is admitted to have been formally executed, yet it is denied, by the answer, that it ever became a consummated conveyance between the parties. On the contrary, it is insisted, that it was afterwards wholly abandoned upon facts subsequently ascertained. The agreement also, as stated in the bill, is denied, as to any purchase from the Frye heirs, and as to any engagement to pay the debt due to Walker and Fisher.

On the 27th of July, 1831, Walker and Fisher conveyed their title in the premises to Mann by a quitclaim deed, for the asserted sum of $10,000. The bill charges, that this deed ought to have been made in the names of Flagg and Mann, in pursuance of the agreement stated in the bill, and was fraudulently and secretly taken in the name of Mann alone. This is positively denied in the answer. On the 28th of July, 1831, Samuel F. Frye, and Aaron P. Frye (two of the Frye heirs) conveyed, by a quitclaim deed, all their title in the premises to the defendant Adams. On the 2d of August of the same year, Herman A. Frye and his wife, Mary Frye (she being one of the female heirs,) in like manner conveyed her title to Adams; and on the 4th of the same month, the remaining heirs, viz. Joseph Huse, and Harriot his wife (one of the female heirs,) and Caroline Frye and Adeline Frye, the other female heirs, in like manner conveyed their title to Adams; so that Adams thereby became possessed (so far as by law he might) of the title of all the Frye children in the premises. The bill charges, that these purchases were secretly made by a fraudulent agreement between Mann and Adams, the latter being fully acquainted with the agreement between the defendants Flagg and Mann for their mutual benefit, with an intent to defraud the plaintiff. The answer wholly denies the charge. On the 6th of August, in the same year (1831,) Adams conveyed, by a quitclaim deed, one moiety of the premises, and of all his right and title therein, to Mann; and Mann, on the same day, executed a counter conveyance of all his title to the other moiety to Adams. On the 8th of the same month, Mann conveyed, by a quitclaim deed, his moiety of the premises to the defendant, Fuller, for $40,000 (as stated in the deed,) and Fuller, on the same day, executed a mortgage deed of the same moiety to Mann, as security for the payment of four notes (each for $10,000,) given for the purchase money. The bill charges Fuller with a full knowledge of all the facts at the time of his purchase.

Such is a general outline of the most material facts, which are necessary to a true understanding of the nature and objects of the bill. The prayer of the bill is, that the deeds of Mann to Adams, and of Mann to Fuller, and all other the conveyances of Mann, may be declared void as made in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff; and that upon payment by the plaintiff of one moiety of the moneys paid to redeem the incumbrances on the property, and in extinguishing the claims of the Frye heirs, and perfecting the title to the premises, Mann, Adams, and Fuller may be decreed to convey one moiety of the premises to the plaintiff; or if that cannot be done by reason of any conveyance to bona fide purchasers without notice, that Mann and his confederates (Adams and Fuller) may be decreed to make full compensation for such moiety, or so much thereof as cannot be conveyed, to him; and that such parts of the purchase money as have not been paid, and all securities therefor, may be decreed to be paid and assigned to the plaintiff, until he is indemnified; and then follows a prayer for general relief. Answers were severally put in by Mann, Adams, and Fuller, to which the plaintiff made the general replication. The proofs, consisting of depositions and exhibits in the case, extended to great length. The foregoing outline, together with the summary of the statements and denials in the several pleadings, which is presented in the opinion of the court, will be sufficient for a clear understanding of the case.

A bill against the same parties, and founded on the foregoing facts, had been instituted before the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, but finally dismissed for want of jurisdiction. 14 Pick. 467. The present bill was filed at the October term of this court, 1833. And the cause has been continued until the present term. The ample discussion, in the opinion of the court, of all the points raised at the bar, will render it superfluous, even if it could be done within reasonable space, to present a full view of the very learned and able arguments of counsel. The naked points, taken by the respective parties, were as follow:

For the plaintiff it was contended: 1st. That Luther Richardson, by virtue of the deeds executed by Samuel Frye as guardian of the minor children of his wife Polly Frye, of the lands in question, and his entry thereupon, became seised as owner thereof in fee. 2d. That the contract made between Luther Richardson and Walker and Fisher, and the deed from him and Prentiss Richardson to them, and their bond to him, constituted an equitable mortgage, which a court of equity will recognise and enforce; so that the sums of money advanced by them in procuring an assignment of the mortgages which he had made to Goodman, Saville & Kent, and the release or conveyance of the equity of redemption from Bennett, were in the nature of incumbrances from which Luther Richardson had a right to redeem the land as mortgagor, when he executed his deed to the complainant and the said Mann. And that, therefore, the said deed was a conveyance to them by him of a legal or equitable right of redemption in these lands. 3d. That at the time of the execution of the deed of Luther Richardson to the complainant and the said Mann, the said Richardson had such an equitable or legal right, in the lands in question, as would, according to the principles upon which this court exercises its authority to compel specific performance, have enabled him to compel Walker and Fisher to reconvey to him the lands, upon tender of payment of their advances, interest, &c. And that this right passed to the complainant and Mann, under the said deed. 4th. That by the deed from Luther Richardson to the complainant and Mann under their contract with each other, to obtain the title to these lands for their mutual benefit, they jointly obtained such a title or color of title, as made any purchase by either of them, of any adverse claim or title, to enure to the benefit of both; upon the well-established principle of equity, that where two persons are in possession of an imperfect title, the purchaser of an adverse claim enures to their joint benefit. 5th. That the principle last stated, is an entire answer to any defence on the ground, that Luther Richardson had not acquired a good title under the guardian's deed, inasmuch as he had thereby color of title, and having entered, had actual seisin. 6th. That the deed from Luther Richardson to the complainant and Mann, was absolutely delivered. 7th. That if such delivery to the grantees, were or could have been conditional, nevertheless an inchoate title, or color of title, or imperfect right was thereby created in the complainant and Mann jointly, which neither could secretly abandon, and which would cause any subsequent acquisition of an adverse title by either, to enure for the benefit of both. 8th. That at the time of the purchase of the release, from Walker and Fisher to the said Mann, and of the releases of the minor heirs to the said Adams, and the other acts done by Mann and Adams to perfect the title to these lands; the said Mann fraudulently concealed these proceedings from the complainant, and deceived him into the belief, that he, the said Mann, was endeavoring to perfect the title for his and the complainant's mutual benefit. And, that the proceedings of the said Mann in the premises, were a fraud upon the complainant as a co-tenant with him of the right in equity to redeem, or as jointly interested with him in the right to compel a specific performance, or as having with him an inchoate or imperfect title, to be perfected for their mutual benefit, according to their contract. 9th. That the said John M. Adams and Elisha Fuller had actual and constructive notice of the contract between the complainant and the said Mann, and of the complainant's rights and interest in and to said lands, and to the benefit of any purchases made by the said Mann, or of any releases obtained by him of any adverse titles thereto; and therefore, they became parties to the fraud practised by said Mann, and cannot lawfully set up any claims or titles adverse to those asserted by the complainant. 10th. That the complainant is entitled to have a moiety of the said lands, or of such part thereof, as may not have been sold to bonâ fide purchasers without notice, released or conveyed to him and to have the securities received on any such sales or his proportional part thereof delivered over to him, and to be indemnified for any losses he may have sustained, by reason of being prevented by the acts of the defendants from the possession and employment of these lands; he having been at all times ready to pay his proportional part of the expenses of perfecting the title, and having required of the said Mann an account thereof, that he might seasonably make such payments.

Th defence of Mann and Adams was rested on the following grounds: 1st. That Luther Richardson never derived any valid title to the premises, by reason of the want of the proper oath having been taken by Samuel Frye, the guardian of the heirs of Polly Frye, before he fixed on the time and place of sale. 2d. That the deed from Prentiss and Luther Richardson, to Fisher and Walker, did not, together with their bond to Luther, constitute a mortgage legal or equitable, but that the bond was a mere personal obligation; so that after the expiration of the five years, Luther had no title or right to the land legal or equitable, which did or could pass to Flagg and Mann, by Luther's deed to them. 3d. That the deed from Luther to Flagg and Mann, never was delivered to them as his deed, nor accepted by them as such, but that the agreement of Flagg and Mann to purchase of Luther was conditional, dependent upon his having a good title, and one which should be satisfactory to them. 4th. That by reason of the matters stated in the last two points, Flagg and Mann never had any joint or common interest in the land, nor any such color of title thereto as would give Flagg any right to claim any benefit from Mann's subsequent purchase of Fisher and Walker, or the heirs of Polly Frye. 5th. That there was no agreement between Flagg and Mann, to perfect the title to the said lands, or to do anything further than to purchase Luther's title if he had any, and that it appearing that he had no title, that agreement was at an end before Mann's purchase of Walker and Fisher and of the Frye heirs. 6th. That both Flagg and Mann had abandoned the attempt and expectation of obtaining any title through Luther before Mann's purchase of Walker and Fisher or of the Fryes. 7th. That the attempt to obtain a title through Luther having failed and been abandoned, Mann had a perfect right to act for himself alone, in any new attempt to procure a title to said lands from any other persons. 8th. That Mann never did pretend to Flagg, that he was acting for or with him in the premises, after the return of Goodhue from Vermont, nor was ever guilty of any fraudulent concealment or practice towards the plaintiff. 9th. That the plaintiff never paid any thing for Luther's deed, nor paid nor offered to pay any part of the money paid by Mann for the purchase of the title of the said Walker and Fisher, and the Frye heirs, though the amounts so paid by Mann were stated to him at his request. 10th. That Adams had no notice, actual or constructive, of any of the matters charged against Mann, until after he had taken a conveyance bonâ fide, and for a valuable consideration of half of the land. 11th. That the plaintiff is entitled to no relief; but that if he be, he can only have it upon payment to the party or parties against whom it shall be decreed, of one half of all the cost and expense of obtaining the said titles of Walker and Fisher and the Frye heirs and interest from the times of payment.

The defendant Fuller, adopted the grounds assumed by the defendants Mann and Adams, so far as they were applicable to his defence, and stated the following in addition: 1st. That Fuller is a bonâ fide purchaser of half of the lands, described in the plaintiff's bill, for a valuable consideration, without notice, positive or constructive, of any claim to, or interest therein on the part of the plaintiff, and, as such purchaser, is entitled to the protection and favor of this court. 2d. That the plaintiff is a volunteer, has paid no consideration, and is without right, as against Fuller, in law or in equity. 3d. That the bill on its face is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a decree against Fuller. 4th. That Luther Richardson, at the date of his alleged deed to Mann, and the plaintiff, had no claim to, or interest in the lands in question; and if it were otherwise, Fuller had no notice thereof at the time of his purchase, nor can his title be prejudiced by any thing which has taken place since; nor can vague rumor or even common report, as to the claim of Luther Richardson or the plaintiff, affect Fuller's title, which is supported by the registered deed of Luther Richardson, in contradiction of such rumor and report. 5th. That the transactions alleged to have taken place between Fisher and Walker, and Luther Richardson and Prentiss Richardson, in relation to the conveyance of the lands in question to the said Walker and Fisher, did not give to Luther a right to redeem the said premises as a mortgagor, on the 13th of May, 1831, the date of his alleged deed to Mann and the plaintiff, according to the doctrine of the English court of chancery, much less had the said Luther any such right under the statutes of Massachusetts, or according to the adjudged cases in Massachusetts, and against the policy of the registry acts thereof. 6th. That if the plaintiff acquired any interest in the lands from the deed of Luther Richardson, Mann did not convey it to Fuller, he only conveyed to him such an interest as he had, nor does his deed purport to convey any more. 7th. That as the conveyances from Walker and Fisher and the Fryes were to Mann alone, he had authority to sell in his own name the interest which he thereby acquired, and Fuller is not responsible for the application of the proceeds; and if the plaintiff has any claim, it is not to the land, but to a share of the proceeds or profits, and against Mann, or Mann and Adams. 8th. That Fuller having derived all Mann's interest in the premises, prior to the time of the alleged tender of the money, the tender should have been made to him, if to any one, and not to Mann. 9th. That if the plaintiff had any equity against Mann and Adams or either of them, it was so doubtful, that even if Fuller had had notice thereof, which he positively denies, he was not bound to regard it. 10th. That notice of nothing alleged against Fuller but actual fraud on the part of Mann against the plaintiff, and actual co-operation therein on his, Fuller's part, can affect his title to the lands in question. 11th. That, upon the plaintiff's own account of the matter, and if there was any agreement between him and Mann, it appears to have been an agreement, that Mann should purchase lands at their joint expense, the plaintiff to furnish half the funds, and the land to be sold again, for profit; that the plaintiff advanced no money, and there was no evidence of the agreement, by means of which Mann could compel the plaintiff to execute it; that Mann, therefore, was justifiable in taking the title to himself, both for his own protection and to enable him to make sales; that being thus, at most, but a trustee with power to sell, Fuller's title derived from Mann is good, he is not bound to see to the application of the money, and the plaintiff's remedy, if any, is merely personal, and against Mann alone.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is the case of a suit in equity, and has been argued with great ability and learning on the merits by the counsel on all sides, at the hearing at the present term. The facts are very complicated, the documents very voluminous, and the evidence in various parts in direct conflict. The questions of law, too, involved in the cause, are not a few, and some of them not without difficulty or novelty in their actual application to the circumstances of the cause. I have, therefore, taken time to consider and examine the record; and I shall now proceed to deliver my judgment.

It is obvious, that the whole right of the plaintiff (Flagg) to maintain the present bill rests essentially upon the truth of the allegations in the bill as to the agreement between Mann and himself on or before the 13th of May, 1831, to purchase the premises at their mutual expense and for their mutual benefit, and to perfect the title thereto, and to extinguish the claims (if any) of the Frye heirs, and also the claims of Walker and Fisher. If the agreement was never made, in substance, as it is alleged; or having been made, if it was never afterwards carried into effect by the parties, but was definitively abandoned; then the whole foundation of the plaintiff's case is gone, without mooting any other of the questions raised in the cause. If, on the other hand, that agreement is established, and is a subsisting agreement, then the other questions in the cause must necessarily be discussed and disposed of. In the natural order of the questions, it seems proper in the first place to ascertain, whether any such agreement was made, as is stated in the bill; and if so, whether it has been abandoned. The agreement between Flagg and Mann, as stated in the bill, consists of four distinct parts: (1) To purchase and procure for themselves for their mutual and equal benefit, and at their mutual and equal expense, a complete and perfect title to the premises. For this purpose, (2) to purchase of Luther Richardson his title to the premises, giving him therefor, if his title should be found to be good and sufficient to enable them to hold the same, the sum of $9,000, subject, however, to the deduction of the amount of the subsisting incumbrances thereon; (3) to extinguish the real or pretended title of the Frye heirs to the premises; and (4) to pay the sums due to Walker and Fisher, as subsisting incumbrances thereon. There is also a charge in the bill, that the deed was procured from Luther Richardson, in pursuance of the agreement.

The defendant, Mann, by his answer denies, that there ever was any agreement made between him and the plaintiff to procure for their common benefit a perfect title. But in reference thereto he says, that on the 13th of May, 1831, Flagg, and himself, understanding that Luther Richardson claimed an equity of redemption in the premises in virtue of the obligation of Walker and Fisher, notwithstanding the expiration of the five years, and believing the amount due to Walker and Fisher to be about $6,000 only, and knowing the claim of the Frye heirs, but not knowing or having heard, that Luther Richardson had, before the conveyance to Walker and Fisher, made a conveyance of the premises to Prentiss Richardson, and not knowing or ever having heard, that Samuel Frye, the guardian, had not, before fixing the time and place of sale, taken the oath prescribed by law; but supposing the claim of the Frye heirs to be founded on the want of the notifications of the said sale being duly posted, did verbally agree with each other to offer, and did offer to Luther Richardson, to purchase of him his right and title in the premises, and to give him for the same, when clear of incumbrances, if they should be satisfied with his title, the sum of $9,000, provided a good and clear title were made to them within three years from that time; which offer was accepted and agreed to by him (Luther Richardson). In pursuance of the offer and acceptance Luther Richardson made the quitclaim to them (Mann and Flagg), but did not deliver the same, nor was the same accepted by them as his deed, the said contract being still conditional and incomplete, and his (Luther Richardson's) wife, not having signed the deed, as it was agreed she should. But the deed was left at Mann's office to be afterwards completed and delivered, or withdrawn by Luther according to the election of Mann and Flagg. The deed was not recorded until the 15th of February, 1832, at which time it was procured to be recorded by Flagg, without the knowledge or assent of Mann. Mann by his answer further denies, that he and the plaintiff ever agreed with Luther Richardson to pay to Walker and Fisher any sum or sums of money whatever. But he admits that he and the plaintiff did make their note for $3,500, payable to Luther Richardson, and delivered the same to Ames, to remain in his hands, until they had examined the records of deeds and of probate, and had taken the advice of Samuel Hoar, Esq. respecting Luther Richardson's title to the premises. And if, after such execution, Mann and Flagg should elect to proceed with the negotiation, then the note was to be given up to them, and they were to give their obligation to Luther Richardson, to pay the sum of $9000, whenever he should within three months make to them a good title to the premises free from all incumbrances; otherwise the note and deed were to be given up and the negotiation to be wholly abandoned. Mann has annexed to his answer a copy of the form of the obligation, which, he says, was drafted by him, and approved by Luther Richardson, to be given in case Mann and Flagg elected to proceed with the negotiation. Mann further in his answer states, that he received Mr. Hoar's opinion, a copy of which is annexed to the answer, and is unfavorable to the title of Luther Richardson to redeem Walker and Fisher after the lapse of the five years. He showed it to the plaintiff; and he afterwards examined the records of deeds and of probate; and thereon the 17th of May, 1831, he first ascertained, that a conveyance had been made by Luther Richardson to Prentiss Richardson before the deed to Walker and Fisher; and also that it did not appear on the probate records, that Samuel Frye had, before fixing the time and place of sale, taken the oath prescribed by law in such cases; and that he and Flagg, were, on the 18th of the same month, advised by Isaac Fiske, Esq. whom they consulted, that the want of such an oath was a fatal defect in the title. Upon the opinion of Mr. Hoar and Mr. Fiske so given, Flagg and Mann agreed to abandon the negotiation with Luther Richardson, and did wholly abandon the same; and a few days after he, Mann, gave notice thereof to Luther Richardson, and also notice to Ames, that the note was to be given up. Mann further denies by his answer, that after the 17th of May aforesaid he ever pretended or affected to co-operate, or gave Flagg to understand or believe, that he would co-operate with the plaintiff in measures to extinguish the claim of Walker and Fisher, or of the Frye heirs, or to perfect the title to the premises, as in the bill is alleged. He admits, however, that after the negotiation with Luther Richardson was so ended, he and Flagg and Thomas P. Goodhue, employed one Stephen Goodhue, as their agent, to go to Vermont, for their common benefit, to obtain conveyances of the claims of the Frye heirs; but he wholly failed to accomplish the object, and the attempt was abandoned; and with this, he insists, that all contract and agreement between himself and Flagg, respecting the premises, were at an end.

Such are the statements and denials of the answer in reference to the matter of the agreement between Flagg and Mann, charged in the bill; and so far as they are responsive to the matters charged in the bill, they are of course proper evidence in favor of Mann. The answer admits an agreement to purchase the title of Luther Richardson; but it insists, that it was a conditional purchase to be affected by future inquiries and events. In this respect it is not materially at variance with the allegations of the bill. The matters, which it controverts, are: 1. That there was any absolute delivery of the deed by Luther Richardson to Flagg and himself under the agreement. 2. That there was any stipulation in that agreement to pay Walker and Fisher's demands. 3. That there was any stipulation in that agreement to buy in and extinguish the claim of the Frye heirs for the common benefit of Mann and Flagg. 4. It sets up a positive abandonment of the agreement with Luther Richardson by the consent of Flagg; and as positive an abandonment of a subsequent agreement with Flagg for the purchase of the claims of the Frye heirs. Let us consider these points in their order.

1. The conditional delivery of the deed by Luther Richardson. The execution of the deed being admitted, and the deed found in the possession of Mann, and the allegation of a conditional delivery not being responsive to the charge in the bill, the answer is not evidence of it; but the onus probandi is on Mann to establish it. The suggestion is that the deed of Luther Richardson was imperfect; that it was to be executed by his wife, who was to release her dower; and that it was left in Mann's office as an imperfect instrument, until this was accomplished. Upon the face of the deed it was certainly contemplated, that it was to be signed by the wife. But this would not necessarily establish, that it was an essential ingredient, before it should have effect as to the husband, or that there was not a subsequent waiver of her signature. The case in support of the answer mainly rests on the testimony of John W. Coolidge, who was a student in Mann's office, and who states, that he was present on the 13th of May, 1831, and heard the agreement between Mann and Flagg, and Luther Richardson, who, with Ames, were all present in Mann's office. The papers, then produced and before the parties, were a deed from Luther Richardson, a bond from Walker and Fisher, with an assignment written thereon, to Flagg and Mann, and a note from them to Luther Richardson. The note was delivered to Ames, not to be delivered to Richardson, or to any other person, without the order of Flagg or Mann; and the deed, bond and assignment were left in the possession of Mann. He further states, that Mann and Flagg were to examine the records, and if they should conclude, after the examination and after consulting counsel, to retain the deed and assignment, they were to give a bond to Richardson, conditioned to pay him a certain sum, whenever his title should be adjudged good by the supreme court, and to take up their note lodged with Ames; and if, upon the examination, they concluded not to give their bond to Richardson, the deed and assignment were to be returned to the latter, and the note returned by Ames to them. He further states, that, a day or two after, a bond was partly prepared by Mann (the draft of which he verifies), in pursuance of the agreement, which Luther Richardson took away for examination. About the 22d of the same month of May he learned from Mann and Goodhue, that Mann had discovered the defect in the title of Luther Richardson, from the want of taking the oath at the proper time before the guardianship sale. In November, 1831, he heard Mann ask Luther Richardson, how long it was, after the note was made and left with Ames, when he gave him notice, that his (Luther Richardson's) title was good for nothing, and that they should do nothing more, and requested him to call and take his papers. Richardson answered, it was about a fortnight. The witness farther states, that he understood from the parties, that Luther Richardson's wife was to sign the deed of her husband. The draft of the bond referred to by the witness goes far to corroborate his testimony, as to some material facts. But it leaves the point now under consideration wholly untouched, for the draft is imperfect. There is nothing in it, which leads in the slightest degree to the conclusion, that the deed of Luther Richardson had not been delivered, or that the delivery was conditional.

Without in the slightest degree impeaching the integrity of the witness, there are circumstances in the case, which lead one to suspect, that there may be some errors in his testimony on several points. Upon his cross-examination there is manifestly some hesitation and want of recollection as to circumstances connected with and included in his direct examination. But a more material circumstance, is that in his second deposition he qualifies his former deposition in several important particulars. His first deposition affirms and proceeds on the affirmation throughout, that he was not in the same room with the parties during all their negotiations and conversations; but that he was a part of the time in an adjoining room, and was called into the other room to witness the transactions. In his second deposition, taken about two years afterwards, he expresses a doubt, whether he was not in the same room with the parties during all the transactions. There are, however, other intrinsic circumstances in the case, as well as other positive testimony, which do materially weaken the force of the conclusions to be drawn from Coolidge's testimony. In the first place, it is admitted, that, after the deed was executed by Richardson, it was left in Mann's office with Mann, and the note of Flagg and Mann was delivered to Ames. It is difficult to reconcile these facts with the notion, that the transaction was not then treated as consummated between the parties; that the deed was not treated, as absolutely delivered by Richardson to Flagg and Mann, and the note delivered to Ames as an operative instrument, each of them being liable nevertheless to be rescinded by future events; that is, to speak technically, that both instruments were to be avoided by conditions subsequent, and were not dependent for their original validity upon conditions precedent not yet performed. Neither the deed, nor the note. has ever since been delivered up. The deed remains in Mann's possession and custody, and so far as this fact goes, it affords a strong presumption of an actual delivery in conformity to the terms of the deed. It is common learning, that when a deed of grant is found in the possession of the grantee, it affords a just presumption of a due delivery thereof, because it then, and not otherwise, would be in the proper custody. The answer in effect insists, that the instrument was never delivered as the deed of Richardson, but was a mere escrow. Now, there is a technical difficulty in this suggestion; for an instrument can never be delivered as an escrow to the grantee himself. Co. Litt. 36a, is direct to this point. And though a court of equity will not govern itself exclusively by technical principles of this sort, where the intentions of the parties would be thereby defeated; yet there must be the clearest evidence in such a case, what that intention is, and whether it will be so defeated; otherwise the rule of law must prevail.

The testimony of Luther Richardson, the grantor, is on this point most important. An objection is made to his testimony upon the ground of his being an incompetent witness by reason of his interest in the event of this suit. But I profess myself unable to perceive, what interest, legal or equitable, he has in this suit. He may have a feeling, and undoubtedly has, in favor of the plaintiff. But nothing decided in this suit can be given in evidence in support of any claim on his part; for it is res inter alios acta; and he has, therefore, nothing to gain or to lose by it. Besides; he has been cross-examined by the defendant with a full knowledge of the objection; and after that it is difficult to say, that in a court of equity he can be heard to make the objection. According to Richardson's testimony there was an absolute delivery of the deed and the assignment of Walker and Fisher's bond to Flagg and Mann; for, he says in direct terms, that he assigned the bond to them, and at the same time he gave them a quitclaim deed of the premises. His statement of the agreement between them and himself is as follows: "After various conversations and stating, that a suit was pending instituted by Frye's heirs respecting the title (a fact, which is admitted on all sides to be true), I agreed to sell my right to them for $3500, which was to be paid to me in case my title proved good against Frye's heirs; and a note for this sum was made by them, and deposited in the hands of Mr. Ames; and if the title of the Frye heirs prevailed and mine failed the note was to be given up." He adds, that by the terms of the agreement Flagg and Mann were not to pay any thing, unless the transaction with Walker and Fisher and their bond to him should prove to be a mortgage. He denies, that Flagg and Mann had a right to rescind the contract, until the title should be proved bad by a trial at law. He says, that the bond was not to be given in exchange for the note, but was to be a bond explanatory of the terms of the agreement; and that the note was to remain in Ames's possession, until his title should be settled at law. He annexes a copy of the imperfect bond drawn up by Mann, and handed to him, which contains a part only of the recitals of that referred to by Coolidge. He says, that in June or July, 1831, Mann stated to him that he doubted, whether the title was good for any thing; and about the 10th of August, 1831, Mann informed him, that he did not consider the title worth a quarter of a dollar, and he would have nothing more to do with it. About that time the witness called on Ames with Mann to exchange papers; but Flagg did not agree to it; and no exchange was ever made. He farther adds; "In regard to my title to the said bond, Flagg and Mann were to perfect it at their own expense. There was no time fixed, within which I was to make a good title, because they were to see to that. But I was not to be paid the money until the decision of a court of law, establishing the title. There was nothing agreed upon relative to the term of three years." I observe, at present, that there is nothing in this deposition pointing to any agreement for the purchase of the claim by the Frye heirs between Flagg and Mann, and Richardson. But the only purchase apparently contemplated was the outstanding title in Walker and Fisher.

Ames's testimony as to the transaction is to this effect. That Mann stated, that he and Flagg had made a bargain with Luther Richardson, and were to buy his interest in that estate and were to allow him the price, named in the quitclaim deed ($9,000) from Richardson to them, deducting therefrom such sum as should be found due from Richardson to Walker and Fisher, provided the title should prove good. Richardson did not know the exact sum due to Walker and Fisher; but he stated a sum as being due, which the witness thinks was about $5,500. Mann expressed a confidence, that the transaction between Richardson and Walker and Fisher was a mortgage. Mann was to examine the records at Cambridge, and find out, how much was due to Walker and Fisher. A note for $3,500, being the supposed balance, which was coming to Richardson, was drawn (the witness thinks by himself), and signed by Flagg and Mann, and deposited, for the time, with the witness. It was stated by Mann as the bargain of the parties, that when the amount due to Walker and Fisher was ascertained, that the note should be taken up, and Flagg and Mann's bond should be given to Richardson, conditioned to pay him the balance of the price of the land, provided the title proved good. Richardson, after some doubts, and consulting the witness, finally signed the deed, and the assignment of the bond of Walker and Fisher. The note was not negotiable. The deed and assignment were left on the table (in Mann's office), or taken by Flagg and Richardson for the purpose of having the deed acknowledged by Richardson. It was acknowledged on the same day, as the witness thinks, but is not positive. But when he last saw the deed and assignment on that day (the 13th of May) they were on the table in Mann's office. The next time he saw the deed was in August or September, 1831, when it was handed to him by Flagg. About the time when the information came out, that Mann and Adams had purchased the lands in question of the Frye heirs, Mann and Richardson came to the witness's office to take up the note. Richardson made no objection; and Mann took it away, and returned it again to the witness on the same day, saying, he had concluded to return it, or words to that effect. It does not appear, that Flagg was, at the time, a party to these transactions. The witness adds, that in the latter part of the same month of May, Mann, under an injunction of secrecy, told him of a new and serious difficulty, the discovery, that the oath had not been properly taken by the guardian.

The testimony of Thomas P. Goodhue is, as far it goes, confirmatory of that of Ames and Richardson on this point; and its bearing on other points will hereafter be the subject of comment. He says, that Mann told him, that he thought the transaction of Richardson with Walker and Fisher operated as a mortgage. That on or about the 18th of May, 1831, he was informed by Mann and Flagg, that they were the owners of the Richardson title and interest in the premises, and that they were to pay $9,000, he thinks, in this way. They were to discharge the incumbrance of Walker and Fisher, and to pay the balance to Richardson. On the same day, he was also informed by them of the defect in Richardson's title from the omission of the guardian to take the oath at the prescribed time.

The testimony of another witness, Wood, is very cogent and positive. He says, that Mann told him, that he and Flagg had made the purchase of Richardson, and got their deed, and also an assignment of the bond or mortgage, and that they had agreed to give therefor $9,000. Mann took a paper from his drawer, and holding it up, said, this is our deed from Richardson, and we have given Richardson, for what is coming to him our security for the same, and the security is deposited or put into the hands of Seth Ames. At another time, Mann inquired of the witness, whether Richardson's wife had signed the deed to Walker and Fisher; and Mann said, if she had, it was as well, as if she had signed the deed of her husband to Flagg and himself.

Now, upon this posture of the direct evidence bearing on this point, I confess, that I am reluctantly driven to the conclusion, that it is not satisfactory to establish, that the delivery of Richardson's deed was not absolute, or that it was an imperfect inchoate transaction. Loose, and confidential, and inaccurate, as the whole proceedings were to attain the ends contemplated by the parties, I find no warrant in them to justify the court in saying, that the deed of Richardson was never delivered as a deed, but merely as an escrow. The indirect evidence of the Goodhues, and of Hunt, as well as of some others of the witnesses, does not fortify this part of the case in favor of Mann. But, if it weighs at all, it corroborates the view taken on the other side, that Mann treated the deed, as complete in its delivery, however it might be subject to conditions subsequent. It has also been remarked, and the criticism is correct, that Mann, in his answer to the bill in the state court, has not ventured positively to deny, that the deed was delivered, but has only said, that the said deed and bond were both left in his possession, but as he "then believed and now believes, not delivered" to Flagg and Mann, or either of them, as a consummation of the said conveyance and assignment, &c.

In regard to the second point (2), whether there was any stipulation in the agreement, on the part of Flagg and Mann, to pay Walker and Fisher's demands, I have still more difficulty upon the evidence in withholding my assent, that there was such a stipulation. The extraordinary result would otherwise arise, that a contract, which could only be consummated by establishing a perfect title in Richardson, was wholly dependent for its completion upon the good will of Flagg and Mann. If they did not choose to redeem Walker and Fisher's mortgage (admitting it to be such), or to establish the title of Richardson by a suit against Walker and Fisher, it is plain, that Richardson could never entitle himself to the balance intended to be secured by the note. Richardson had not the means, neither had he, strictly speaking, any right to redeem the mortgage, or to sue Walker and Fisher thereon, after his assignment of their bond to Flagg and Mann. The testimony of Richardson and Ames are full to the purpose of establishing this point; and I cannot but think, that, under all the circumstances, they overcome the denials of the answer. That answer has, indeed, been assailed in many particulars, some of which may come under our notice hereafter.

The next point is (3) whether the agreement between Flagg and Mann contained any stipulation for the extinguishment of the title of the Frye heirs. The answer, as we have seen, denies it. It does, however, admit, that after the defects in Richardson's title, from the want of the guardian's taking the proper oath, and the prior conveyance to Prentiss Richardson, were known to him (Mann), which was about the 17th of the same month of May, Flagg and he, together with Thomas P. Goodhue, did, for their mutual benefit, and at their mutual expense, employ Stephen Goodhue (who was also to have an interest) to purchase up the title of the Frye heirs, and that he went, about the 25th of the same month, to Vermont for that purpose; but he failed in the attempt. It seems, that the object of the intervention of T. P. Goodhue was not to interfere with the rights of Richardson; but to procure a title to the other moiety of the land of the Frye heirs, which had been sold at the guardian's sale to another purchaser. But the answer insists, that, upon the failure of the Vermont expedition, the agreement ended between Mann and Flagg for any joint purchase of the claim of the Frye heirs. If there could be any doubt, as to the point of the intended purchase from the Frye heirs, it would be entirely removed by the concurrent testimony of the Goodhues. Whether that agreement was contemporaneous with the purchase from Richardson, or whether it took place after the discovery of the alleged defects in his title, is not, perhaps, important to the objects of the bill, if the purchase of Richardson was not, at that time, rescinded, and if the agreement to purchase, for mutual account, the claim of the Frye heirs, was not abandoned with the failure of the Vermont expedition.

And this leads me to the remaining point under this head; and that is (4) whether there has been any absolute abandonment, by the consent of all parties, of the purchase from Richardson, and of the intended purchase from the Frye heirs, or of either. Now, in respect to these points, the onus probandi is properly of the defendants, since they constitute matter set up in avoidance of the objects of the bill.

And first in regard to the abandonment of the purchase from Richardson. Unless I am greatly misled, there is no sufficient evidence in the case to establish the fact, that Flagg ever abandoned that purchase. On the contrary, it seems to me, that the current of the evidence, and the acts of the parties, with some few exceptions, show, that Flagg insisted upon the purchase and his rights under it. And, unless some clear and deliberate abandonment is shown, the purchase must, in contemplation of law, be deemed a continuing contract. Unless Flagg did abandon the purchase, it could not be rescinded or repudiated by Mann alone, or by Richardson and Mann together. Richardson wholly denies any abandonment to have been carried into effect; and Mann's return of the note to Ames, after he had received it, shows, that up to that period (which was in the latter part of July, or the beginning of August, 1831), there had been no definitive rescission of it. And none with the consent of Flagg was then accomplished, even if the other parties had been willing. Mann, by his answer, insists, however, that there was a definitive abandonment of the purchase on the 17th of May, 1831, in consequence of Mr. Hoar's opinion, and the other discoveries of the defects in Richardson's title, already alluded to. In this, he is, I will not say, certainly, but in all human probability, mistaken. In his answer to the supplemental bill, he admits, that when the expedition to Vermont was undertaken, the title of Richardson was relied on by himself and Flagg. He says, "Mr. Goodhue left Lowell for the purpose of going to Vermont, I think, on the 25th or 26th day of May, 1831. He went for the purpose of purchasing the title of the Frye heirs to the Paddy Camp lands (the premises in question), with the agreement, that if he did purchase it, it should be for the benefit of said Flagg and myself, so far as he could hold by Luther Richardson's title, and for his and his brother's interest, so far as they might be able to hold it by a quitclaim deed, which Wood had agreed to give them."

The testimony of both the Goodhues goes strongly to show, that there could not, at the time, have been such an abandonment. For, after the failure and return of Stephen Goodhue from the Vermont expedition, there having been in the meantime a discovery by Hildreth's testimony, that the oath had been properly taken before the guardian's sale, Mann told one of the Goodnues, that it was well, that they had not purchased the interest of the Frye heirs, as there was then no necessity for doing so. Indeed, after the discovery of Hildreth's testimony, and before the return of Stephen Goodhue from Vermont, Mann proposed to have a messenger sent to recall him; but it was not done, because they concluded, that he had already effected all he would be able to effect with the Frye heirs. Both of the Goodhues strenuously deny, that they ever had any knowledge, that the purchase from Richardson was abandoned by Flagg and Mann. On the contrary, their testimony leads to the conclusion, that they understood and believed, that the extinguishment of the claim of the Frye heirs was always contemplated to be in aid and not in exclusion of the title of Richardson. Even Coolidge does not pretend, that he ever knew of any actual abandonment of the purchase by Mann and Flagg, although certainly, as he was much in the confidence of the parties, and particularly of Mann, he would have been in a situation probably to have known it, if it had been definitely settled between them. I admit, that there is evidence in behalf of the defendants, which contains statements made in conversations with Mann, in which he (Mann) said, the purchase had been abandoned. But, certainly, his own statements are not either proper or satisfactory evidence in his favor for such a purpose. The testimony of Isaac Fiske seems to me to corroborate the view already taken upon this point; for it shows, that on the 18th of May, Mann, after a knowledge of the defects of Richardson's title, was taking steps to make that title good, and to protect it by an extinguishment of the claim of the Frye heirs.

The testimony of William Heard (the brother-in-law of Mann) is, indeed, in favor of the abandonment. He says, that about the first of June, 1831, he had a conversation with Flagg and Mann, and he asked them, how they came on in purchasing the Paddy Camp lands (the lands in question), to which Mann replied, "We have done with that;" no remark was made by Flagg on that point. Afterwards, in August of the same year, Mann, in his office, handed a bundle of papers to Flagg, and said the papers related to the transactions between him and Flagg and Luther Richardson, and that Flagg was to take up their note, and he called on the witness to take notice, that he had delivered up the papers. Flagg took up the papers, and made no reply. Walker also states, that Luther Richardson, in the latter part of May, 1831, told him, that Mann and Flagg had given up the bargain, as they thought the title was not good for any thing. Fisher says, that in May or July, he cannot tell which, Luther Richardson also told him, that Flagg and Mann had abandoned their purchase of him. But, at another time, he told him, that Flagg was not willing.

It is certainly difficult to reconcile all the testimony on this point of abandonment of the purchase from Richardson. If it is reconcilable at all, it seems to me, that it is so upon the supposition, that Mann's opinion as to the validity and value of the purchase varied at different times, from the different views, which he took, at those times, of the state of Richardson's title, and of the real or supposed defects in it. At some times he had great confidence in the title; at others, he appears to have thought it good for nothing; and he was ready to abandon the purchase. But his mind fluctuated from time to time; and it appears that there never was any final and conclusive abandonment of that title agreed to and acted on by all the parties in interest, Mann, Flagg and Richardson.

In regard to the abandonment of the joint agreement of Mann and Flagg for the purchase of the claim of the Frye heirs, there is still less evidence in favor of Mann's allegations in his answer. The Goodhues certainly did not understand, that there was any abandonment after the failure of the Vermont expedition; and the language of Mann to them, as detailed in their depositions, goes strongly to show, that he never gave up either the intention or the hope of purchasing out the Frye heirs, and that he encouraged them to believe, that a purchase might be effected. They had no notice from Mann, that Flagg had withdrawn from the object. It is plain that the subsequent negotiations of Mann with the Frye heirs were kept concealed from Flagg; and this fact sufficiently shows, that Mann contemplated excluding Flagg from the benefit of the future purchase. But how this can furnish any proof, that Flagg had abandoned his rights, real or supposed, under the agreement, I profess not to be able to comprehend. If the agreement was not abandoned, this conduct of Mann was a meditated fraud on Flagg. If it was abandoned the onus probandi to establish it is on Mann; and it should be by some proofs, clear, determinate, and full; and not by equivocal acts, or language, or intimations. The proofs in the case do not (I regret to say) enable me to give an unlimited confidence to the allegations of Mann in his answer. There are many circumstances, in which that answer is strongly assailed, if not completely overturned by the proofs. Some of these circumstances are to collateral points, on which, therefore, I do not dwell, though in summing up to a jury they might be very important as tests of credibility. After a careful survey of the evidence it seems to me, that the original agreement between Flagg and Mann, as stated in the bill, is fairly made out; that it has never been abandoned by the consent of both parties; and that without such consent it was, under the circumstances, incapable of any abandonment by Mann, operative in point of law to destroy it. Assuming, however, that such an abandonment of it by Mann would have been operative in point of law, if openly, fully, and absolutely made; still I should be of opinion, that until it was so made, the acts of Mann to effect a purchase from the Frye heirs, secretly done, and thereby lulling Flagg into a false security, would, in a court of equity, be deemed a fraud upon Flagg, and would not be permitted to avail Mann as a ground to defeat his agreement.

We are next led to the consideration of another point in the defence, which is directly brought forward in the answer. It is, that the agreement, even if clearly made out in point of fact, is void in law, as a parol agreement respecting the purchase of lands, within the purview of the statute of frauds of Massachusetts of the 10th of March, 1784 (St. 1783, c. 37), which enacts, that no action shall be maintained upon any contract or sale of lands, or any interest in or concerning the same, unless the agreement is in writing. It seems not disputed at the bar, that the present agreement falls within the predicament of the statute, unless it is extracted from it by the fact, that some title was, at the time of the purchase from the Frye heirs, vested in Flagg and Mann under the deed from Richardson to them, or that that deed, connected with the agreement between Flagg and Mann, created per se a fiduciary relation, which would make the purchase by operation of law a purchase in trust for their joint benefit. It is a well known rule of the common law, that, where two persons are in possession of lands by an imperfect, and even by a tortious title, such as a title by disseisin, a release to one of them will enure for the benefit of both. The citations at the bar from Co. Litt. 194, 195, 275–277, are fully in point. But the doctrines entertained on this subject by courts of equity are far more broad and comprehensive. They proceed upon the maxim of general justice, so exquisitely enforced by Cicero: "In rebus minoribus socium failere, turpissimum est; neque injuria; propterea quod auxilium sibi se putat adjunxisse, qui cum altero rem communicavit. Ad cujus igitur fidem confugiet, cum per ejus fidem laeditur qui se commiserit?" Cicero, pro Roscio, Am. c. 40. That maxim is but an exposition of the doctrine, that if a purchase is made by the parties so interested by mutual agreement, neither party can rightfully exclude the other from what was intended to be for the common benefit; and that if one of the parties by private intrigue seeks to obtain without contract, but in violation of his good faith to his co-tenants or partners, a private benefit to himself in things touching the common right, it is a fraud, which shall turn him into a trustee for the benefit of all. Hence it is, that in cases of partnership, a contract made by one partner is deemed to be made for the benefit of all; for there is an implied obligation to act for the common benefit. In Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves. 298, where one partner had secretly for his own benefit obtained a renewal of a lease of the premises, where the joint trade was carried on, Sir William Grant decided, that the lease was a trust for the benefit of the partnership. "It is clear" (said he) "that one partner cannot treat privately and behind the backs of his copartners for a lease of the premises, where the joint trade is carried on for his individual benefit. If he does so treat, and obtains a lease in his own name, it is a trust for the partnership." There is nothing new in this doctrine, for the same point was decided a century before in the case of Palmer v. Young, 1 Vern. 276, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 380. In Carter v. Horne, Id. 7, pl. 13, it was held by the court, that where two persons agree for the purchase of an estate in moieties, neither of the purchasers has a right to secure any private or personal benefit to himself; but whatever is obtained of advantage, in paying off incumbrances, is deemed in equity to be for their mutual benefit and on a mutual trust between them. See 2 Fonbl. Eq. 118. Fawcet v. Whitehouse, 1 Russ. & M. 132, was decided on the same principle, as was also Burton v. Wookey, 6 Madd. 367.

Mr. Chancellor Kent, in Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. 388, 407, applied it to a case in many circumstances resembling the present. His language on that occasion has his usual moral strength, and persuasive cogency of reasoning. "I will not say, however," (said he), "that one tenant in common may not in any case purchase an outstanding title for his exclusive benefit. But when two devisees are in possession under an imperfect title, derived from their common ancestor (the very case before him), there would seem, naturally and equitably, to arise an obligation between them, resulting from their joint claims and community of interest, that one of them should not affect the claim to the prejudice of the other, &c. It is not consistent with good faith, nor with the duty, which the connexion of the parties as the claimants of a common subject created, that one of them should be able, without the consent of the other, to buy in an outstanding title, and appropriate the whole subject to himself, and thus undermine and oust his companion. It would be repugnant to a sense of refined and accurate justice. It would be immoral, because it would be against the reciprocal obligation to do nothing to the prejudice of each other's equal claim, which the relationship of the parties, as joint devisees, created. Community of interest produces a community of duty; and there is no real difference, on the ground of policy and justice, whether one co-tenant buys up an outstanding incumbrance, or an adverse title, to disseise and expel his co-tenant. It cannot be tolerated, when applied to a common subject, in which the parties had equal concern, and which created a moral obligation to deal candidly and benevolently with each other, and to cause no harm to their joint interest." The present case requires the application of principles of far less stringency and comprehensiveness. In the present case the community of interest (if any) arose from direct contract between the parties; and from a direct agreement, not rescinded or abandoned, to purchase the original, as well as the outstanding, title upon joint account. In such a case there would seem to be no room for doubt, that if the parties stood in the relation of co-tenants, or joint owners, a court of equity ought to deem the purchase of an outstanding incumbrance or adverse title by one to be a trust for the benefit of both, if not ex contractu, at all events in foro conscientiae. The case of Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves. 310, 312, was decided upon this latter ground. And let me here remark, that the partnership in that case was dissoluble at pleasure. But still, as it was not actually dissolved, and as no notice was given of the intention to dissolve it, or to seek a renewal of the lease, to the other partner, it was held to be a renewal in trust for the partnership; for it was an attempt to secure clandestinely an undue advantage to the injury of that partner.

Pothier states the same doctrine in a still more general form, as having for its support a just foundation in the principles of natural equity. He denies, that one partner has a right to dissolve a partnership for his own peculiar advantage to the injury of the other partners. The renunciation (or abandonment) of the society (says he) must be made in good faith and at a reasonable time. "Debet esse facta bonâ fide et tempestivè." The renunciation is not made in good faith, when a partner renounces to appropriate to himself alone the profit which the partners had proposed to acquire in contracting that relation. And Pothier applies the doctrine to the case, not of general partners only, but to joint agreements to purchase property on speculation; putting the case of a joint agreement by two booksellers to purchase a library on joint account; where he holds, that one cannot renounce without the consent of the other, and purchase on his own sole account. Pothier, Traité de Société, art. 150. The civil law enforces the same enlightened morality. "At cum aliquis renunciaverit societati, (say the Institutes) solvitur societas. Sed plane, si quis callidè in hoc renunciaverit societati, ut obveniens aliquod lucrum solus habeat, cogitur hoc lucrum communicare." Inst. lib. 3, tit. 26. The same doctrine is fully established and illustrated in the Pandects, of which I will cite a single passage, peculiarly applicable to the very abandonment of the joint agreement for the purchase of the Paddy Camp lands, set up by Mann in the present case. "Item, si societatem ineamus ad aliquam rem emendam, deinde solus volueris eam emere; ideoque renunciaveris, societati ut solus emeres; teneberis, quanti interest meâ." Dig. lib. 17, tit. 2, l. 65, § 4. A wholesome and equitable principle, which by declaring the sole purchase to be for the joint benefit, takes away the temptation to commit a dishonest act, founded in the desire of obtaining a selfish gain to the injury of a co-contractor, and thus adds strength to wavering virtue, by making good faith an essential ingredient in the validity of the purchase. There is not, therefore, any novelty in the doctrine of Mr. Chancellor Kent, notwithstanding the suggestion at the bar to the contrary; and it stands approved equally by ancient and modern authority, by the positive rule of the Roman law, the general recognition of continental Europe, and the actual jurisprudence of England and America.

If then a fiduciary relation did exist between Flagg and Mann, at the time of the purchases from Walker and Fisher and from the Frye heirs, it is clear, and indeed was admitted at the argument, that the purchases by Mann alone must be deemed in equity to be for the joint benefit of both. But the argument is, that this fiduciary relation does not arise from a mere common hope or expectation under the contract of the parties, but from a common interest in the subject-matter of the purchase, then vested and subsisting in the parties. A mere honorary obligation is not sufficient; nor will a parol agreement without a vested interest in the property give a rightful existence to the fiduciary relation.

Passing, for the present, the question as to the fiduciary relation, arising from mere contract, let us proceed to the consideration, whether the deed and assignment of Richardson to Flagg and Mann did convey any equitable title or interest to the latter in the premises. First, it is said, that Richardson derived no title to the premises under the guardian's deed to him in June, 1823, for want of the proper oath having been taken by the guardian prior to his fixing the time and place of sale. It is admitted, that by the decisions in Massachusetts such a defect is fatal to the title. Williams v. Reed, 5 Pick. 480. But it by no means follows that, therefore, the title is utterly void, and that nothing passed by the deed. On the contrary, the deed did pass a title to the premises, defeasible and defective, indeed, as to the Frye heirs, but good, as against all the rest of the world. It was not a void but a voidable conveyance, operative between the parties; and the seisin acquired under it by Richardson gave him a lawful estate in fee, good against all persons, except the minors and those claiming under them. Even a disseisor in possession has a lawful estate, which he may aliene and the alienee will be deemed in rightful possession thereof against all persons not having a paramount title. A fortiori, Richardson had a rightful estate, having entered, not merely under color of title, but under a bonâ fide purchase without notice of any defect of title. The defect could be taken advantage of only by the Frye heirs and others deriving title under them within the time prescribed by the statute of 1819 (chapter 190, § 12). There is nothing in the case of Williams v. Reed, 5 Pick. 480, which impugns this doctrine. On the contrary it is tacitly admitted by that case. Until, then, the title of Richardson under the guardianship deed was actually avoided by the Frye heirs, and his seisin in the premises was ousted under a recovery against him by these heirs, he must be deemed, as to all other persons, to be the lawful owner of the premises, and entitled as such to hold and convey the same by mortgage or otherwise. It seems to me wholly incompetent for Mann, deriving the title together with Flagg by purchase from Richardson, to set up the outstanding adverse title of the Frye heirs, in order to defeat the equitable rights of Flagg, accruing from the fiduciary relation created between them by that purchase, if Richardson had at the time any title in the premises.

The matter of fact, whether the oath was duly taken or not, is, however, in dispute; and upon the actual state of the evidence, if it were, as in my judgment it is not, a point essential to be decided in the present controversy, I should direct it to be tried by a jury upon an issue. I think, that it is not essential; because, in the first place, the actual title of Richardson, supposing it not to be parted with, and, putting out of sight the mortgages, and other incumbrances created by Richardson (which will presently be considered), would, upon his conveyance to Flagg and Mann, be sufficient to create a privity of title and a fiduciary relation between them, such as, upon the doctrine above stated, would raise a trust for their mutual benefit in the purchase from the Frye heirs, supposing the claim of the latter to be valid and unimpeachable. I think, farther, that, inasmuch as the agreement for the purchase from Richardson was made by Flagg and Mann, avowedly for the purpose of protecting themselves against the claim of the Frye heirs, and upon the necessary understanding, that it should be resisted by both, it is not now competent for Mann to violate that understanding, by interposing that claim to defeat the rights of Flagg under that agreement, if it be still a subsisting agreement. I do not here proceed upon any notion of an estoppel at the common law; but upon the principles of courts of equity in depriving a party of the advantages obtained by what they deem a constructive fraud.

But it is argued, that at the time of the conveyance of Richardson to Flagg and Mann, he had not a scintilla of title in the premises; but that he had parted with all his title, whatever it might be, to Walker and Fisher; so that at most his possession of the premises at the time was merely that of a tenant at sufferance. And this leads us directly to the consideration of the state of Richardson's title, with reference to the transactions with Walker and Fisher. The question is, whether the conveyance by the Richardsons to Walker and Fisher, connected with the other papers and circumstances, amounted to a mortgage or to a conditional sale of the premises. It seems admitted at the argument, that it must be one or the other; and therefore, if either be displaced, the other must prevail. This question is to be examined, not with the views, which a court of common law might be constrained to take of it, having reference solely to the jurisprudence, which it is bound to administer; but it must be examined with the enlarged views, which are embraced by courts of equity in recognizing what may be called equitable mortgages. A court of law may be compelled, in many cases, to say, that there is no mortgage, when a court of equity would not hesitate a moment in pronouncing, that there is an equitable mortgage. The case of Kelleran v. Brown, 4 Mass. 444, clearly recognized this distinction in Massachusetts; and, indeed, it pervades the system of equity jurisprudence on this subject. The state of the title of Luther Richardson in the premises, at the time of the transactions with Walker and Fisher, was as follows: It was subject to the two mortgages to Goodman, Saville & Kent. The equity of redemption had been attached, and sold on execution to Proctor, who had assigned it to Bennett. Subject to these incumbrances, the statute equity to redeem the premises against the sale on the execution had been vested in Prentiss Richardson, under the deed of release to him from his brother Luther. See Reed v. Bigelow, 5 Pick. 281. So that, in a legal point of view, all right of the latter thereto was extinguished. The only question, which could arise, would be, whether the conveyance of Luther to Prentiss Richardson was bonâ fide and absolute, or upon a secret trust in favor of Luther.

Now, upon a review of the evidence and circumstances of the case, it is clear to my mind, that the conveyance from Luther to Prentiss Richardson was not a bonâ fide and absolute sale, but was upon a secret trust for the benefit of Luther. It was made after the attachment and before the sale of the equity of redemption upon execution, and was probably designed to cover the equity under the sale from the reach of creditors. Both Luther and Prentiss Richardson, by their depositions, admit the fact, that the conveyance was not absolute. No actual consideration passed between them at the time; and both of them explicitly aver, that the conveyance was upon a secret trust for the benefit of Luther. Now, I admit, that this trust was, or at least might be, within the statute of frauds, and therefore not such as a court of equity would feel itself bound to enforce, if resisted by Prentiss Richardson. See Leman v. Whitley, 4 Russ. 427. But the trust was not utterly void between the parties; but it was, as a matter in conscience, obligatory between them. And if they chose voluntarily to act upon it, and to carry it into effect in the same manner, as if it had been in writing, and possessing a complete legal obligation, I know of no principle of law, which forbids the creation or the voluntary execution of such a parol trust by the parties, although a court of equity might not enforce the execution of it. Because a trust is created by parol contract, it does not necessarily follow, that it may not be enforced in equity. On the contrary, if it be afterwards admitted, and the party does not insist upon the defence of the statute of frauds, a court of equity will decree a specific performance. There are many cases to this effect. But I need not do more than refer to Barrell v. Joy, 16 Mass. 221; Cottington v. Fletcher, 2 Atk. 155; Croyston v. Banes, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 19; Forster v. Hale, 3 Ves. 696, 5 Ves. 308; Attorney General v. Sitwell, 1 Younge & C. Ex. 583, and 1 Fonbl. Eq. 29, bk. 1, c. 3, § 8, and note a; Hampton v. Spencer, 2 Vern. 288a. See, also, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 755, and cases there cited. And trusts, arising or resulting by the implication or construction of law, are, as we all know, expressly excepted from the operation of the statute of frauds. St. 1783, c. 37, § 3. Even if the original transaction between Luther and Prentiss Richardson was not upon a trust, yet it is manifest, that Prentiss, at the time of the conveyance by them to Walker and Fisher, held the title in trust for Luther, and claimed no interest whatsoever in the premises. He states the fact in his deposition, in the most explicit manner, that he then had no interest in the premises; that all his claim under the conveyance made to him by his brother was at that time satisfied; that the transaction with Walker and Fisher was for the sole benefit of his brother, and that he received no consideration whatsoever for signing the deed to them. Indeed, the bond to secure a reconveyance or a redemption of the premises within the five years, being given to Luther alone, demonstrates the truth of his statement in an entirely satisfactory manner. It appears to me, that, in the view of a court of equity (for I do not meddle with the question at law), the execution of the deed to Walker and Fisher, and the giving of the bond by them to Luther alone, with the assent of Prentiss, amounted to a complete execution of the trust between Luther and Prentiss, and is precisely the same in effect, as if Prentiss had first conveyed the premises to Luther, and the latter had then conveyed to Walker and Fisher, taking from them the bond. Courts of equity do not regard the forms of instruments; but they look to the intent, and give to the acts of the parties the construction, which that intent justifies and requires, as far as consistently with general principles it can be done. Here, then, is the case of an executed trust, which is wholly beyond the reach of the statute of frauds. It is plain, too, that Walker and Fisher understood, at the time, that Luther Richardson was the sole beneficial owner of the premises. Their bond recites the conveyance to them as being from Luther Richardson alone. The condition recites, "Whereas the above-named Luther Richardson has, by a deed of quitclaim, bearing even date herewith, conveyed to the above-bounden Walker and Fisher, all his right and title, &c. &c.;" and then the condition provides for a reconveyance to him. It seems to me, that Walker and Fisher, and all persons claiming under them, are estopped by the terms of this instrument from denying, at least in a court of equity, that all, which they took under the deed, was the right and title of Luther Richardson, Prentiss's formal title being extinguished by his joining in the deed; and that they were bound to reconvey all the right and title, which they so acquired. It would be unconscionable for them (and those claiming under them are in the same predicament) to set up the want of any legal title in Luther, in order to defeat the true operation of their bond, if otherwise it would make the conveyance to them a mortgage. If the objection had been stated at the time, it would (as we must all see) have been obviated by a separate conveyance from Prentiss to Luther, or by a recital in the deed, that Prentiss had the formal and Luther the beneficial interest in the premises. I am aware, that it has been said, that the reason for Luther Richardson's joining in the deed to Walker and Fisher was not to convey away his supposed title in the premises, but merely to give validity to his wife's relinquishment of dower in the premises. It appears to me, that the very form and purport of the deed contradict this argument. The deed purports to name Luther and Prentiss as grantors, and they both convey the premises. The name of the wife does not occur except in the common in testimonium clause. The bond, too, as we have seen, recognises the deed, as being a conveyance from Luther of his own right and title. The testimony of Walker and Fisher necessarily admits, that Luther Richardson claimed a right to the premises, as then subsisting in himself. The whole negotiation with them was avowedly on his own account and for his own benefit, and not for his brother Prentiss.

Did, then, the transaction between the Richardsons and Walker and Fisher create a mortgage in the premises? Some things are, to my mind, exceedingly clear. In the first place, the deed to Walker and Fisher, and the bond by them to Luther Richardson, are to be treated as part of one and the same transaction. They were, in my judgment, executed at the same time; and if not, at all events they were intended to be contemporaneous in their object and operation. Neither was to be of any force or validity without the other. The bond must have the same precise effect and construction, as if it were inserted in the body of the deed. If, by being so inserted, a mortgage could be created, it was equally created by its being in a separate instrument. In the next place, no consideration whatsoever was paid by Walker and Fisher to Luther or Prentiss Richardson, on account of the deed, at the time of the execution of it, or has been at any time since. It is true, that there is the consideration of the thousand dollars stated in the deed; but it was purely nominal. No person pretends, that that sum, or any other sum was in fact paid, or intended to be paid. If this were the whole case, the deed would be merely voluntary; and the question of a conditional purchase could never arise; for to constitute a conditional purchase, there must be a sale for a valuable consideration between the parties, with a right of repurchase. A mere gift would not raise the question; and, indeed, there is no pretence in the present case to say, that any gift was intended.

What, then, was the real consideration between the parties? To me it appears plain, that there was an agreement by Walker and Fisher, at the request and for the benefit of Luther Richardson, to pay off forthwith the incumbrance of Bennett on the premises, and thereby to save the equity of redemption from being totally extinguished. On the part of Richardson, there was an agreement to convey the premises to Walker and Fisher, to secure the payment of this advance, and all other advances made by them towards the extinguishment of the antecedent mortgages and all expenditures in improvements, with a right reserved to Richardson of reconveyance upon his repayment thereof within five years. This was the basis of the papers actually executed; and the whole transaction would otherwise be without any just aim or object. Bennett's title to the premises would become in a few days absolute, unless he was redeemed. Richardson was, notoriously, unable to redeem from his own funds, and that inability constituted the ground of the application to Walker and Fisher. It would have been the idlest of forms, and the most useless of contrivances, to shift the title from Prentiss Richardson to Walker and Fisher, if it was the design of all parties, that it should perish in the space of twelve days, without any attempt of redemption. The very nature of the transaction demonstrates to my mind, that the redemption of Bennett by Walker and Fisher was the sine quâ non of the whole arrangement. If there could be the slightest doubt upon this head from reading the testimony of Walker and Fisher, it would be entirely removed by the other evidence, and by admitted facts. Bemis says, that about the time the papers were finishing, Bennett passed in the street, and was called in; and Walker and Fisher requested Bemis to ask Bennett to appoint a time, when they should meet him at Billerica, and pay him the money. He did so; and Bennett appointed the time. And on the day so appointed, Walker, and Fisher, and Richardson, and Bemis, met at Billerica, and the money was paid by Walker and Fisher, and the deed was accordingly executed to them by Bennett. This is as pregnant and conclusive a proof of the real nature of the transaction, as can be desired.

Upon this posture of the case, what ground is there to say, that there was a conditional sale of the premises to Walker and Fisher? They paid nothing to Luther Richardson for any transfer of his right to them. They simply paid, at his request, a subsisting debt due from him to Bennett, and took a transfer from Bennett of his interest in the premises. Beyond this they paid nothing; and upon the reimbursement of this and all other advances, on account of the premises, within five years, the premises were to be restored to Richardson. It was in truth but the transfer of a debt from one creditor to another, with the assent of the debtor, expanding the equity to redeem the estate pledged for it from a few days to five years. It has been said, that the true test, whether the conveyance in this case was a mortgage or not, is to ascertain, whether it was a security for the payment of any money or not. I agree to that; and indeed, in all cases the true test, whether a mortgage or not, is, to ascertain, whether the conveyance is a security for the performance or non-performance of any act or thing. If the transaction resolve itself into a security, whatever may be its form, it is in equity a mortgage. If it be not a security then it may be a conditional or an absolute purchase. It is said, that here there was no loan made, or intended to be made, by Walker and Fisher to Richardson; and that they refused to make any loan. There is no magic in words. It is true, that they refused to make a loan to him in money. But they did not refuse to pay for him the amount due to Bennett, and to take the premises as their security for reimbursement within five years. It is said, that there is no covenant on the part of Richardson to repay the money paid, which should be paid by Walker and Fisher to discharge the incumbrances on the premises. But that is by no means necessary in order to constitute a mortgage, or to make the grantor liable for the money. The absence of such a covenant may, in some cases, where the transaction assumes the form of a conditional sale, be important, to ascertain, whether the transaction be a mortgage or not; but of itself it is not decisive. The true question is, whether there is still a debt subsisting between the parties capable of being enforced in any way, in rem or in personam. The doctrine is entirely well settled; and for this purpose it is sufficient to refer to Floyer v. Lavington, 1 P. Wms. 270, 271; King v. King, 3 P. Wms. 360; Longuet v. Scawen, 1 Ves. Sr. 406; Mellor v. Lees, 2 Atk. 496; Goodman v. Grierson, 2 Ball & B. 278; and Conway's Ex'rs v. Alexander, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 237,—out of many cases. Now, it seems to me clear, upon admitted principles of law, that, upon the payment of the money due to Bennett by Walker and Fisher, Richardson became their debtor for that amount, as it was paid at his request, and for his benefit. It is a common principle, that if A, at the request of B, pays a debt due by him to C, A may recover the amount in assumpsit for money paid to his use, or for money lent and accommodated. In my judgment, that is the very case at bar. If it should be asked, why no personal obligation was given by Richardson, on this occasion, to pay the money, it might be answered, that the whole circumstances of the present case show an extreme looseness in the transaction of business between the parties; and considering, that much of it was done by the advice and with the assistance of counsel, it is not very creditable to the skill and diligence of the profession. The negotiations between Flagg and Mann and Richardson evince a most obstinate carelessness in the draft and execution of important instruments, leaving much to personal confidence, and the imperfect recollections of the parties, as well as that of the witnesses. And there is no ground for surprise in finding the same laxity pervade the arrangements of Richardson with Walker and Fisher. But the satisfactory answer is, that Richardson was poor and embarrassed, and Walker and Fisher relied on the premises for a full indemnity and satisfaction of all their advances, believing that Richardson would never be able to redeem. They were indifferent about the personal obligation, as they possessed an adequate fund in their own hands.

It is well known, that courts of equity lean against construing contracts of this sort to be conditional sales: and, therefore, unless the transaction be clearly made out to be of that nature, it is always construed to be a mortgage. So Lord Hardwicke laid down the doctrine in Longuet v. Scawen, 1 Ves. Sr. 406, and it has never been departed from. The onus probandi, then, is on the defendants to establish it to be a conditional sale. If it be doubtful, then it must be construed to be a mortgage. If we look to the condition of the bond, it is difficult to resist the impression, that it is precisely in its terms such, as would be appropriate, if the conveyance were a mere mortgage, to secure future advances to be made by Walker and Fisher, in discharge of the incumbrances referred to in the recital. The language of the accompanying lease points to the same conclusion. The dwelling house and garden (a valuable part of the premises) were let to Richardson for five years at a nominal rent; a proceeding not easily reconcilable with the notion of a positive purchase; but quite reconcilable with the notion of a mortgage. That lease contains some language not without significance on this subject. The lease is "for the term of five years from this date, yielding and paying therefor the sum of one cent annually, unless the said premises shall be redeemed by the said Luther, agreeably to the provisions of a bond, bearing even date herewith, from Walker and Fisher to said Luther." I do not lay great stress upon the word, "redeem," in this lease, as conclusive in regard to the understanding of the parties, though it is a word peculiarly appropriate to the case of a mortgage; for it is sometimes used as equivalent to "reconvey." See Lawley v. Hooper, 3 Atk. 278. But, certainly, it is not without weight in a case of this nature; and it was relied on by Lord Hardwicke in Lawley v. Hooper, as indicative of a mortgage. But the fact, that Walker and Fisher were not to go into possession of the entire premises, but that Richardson was to retain the possession of a valuable portion for five years, without payment of any rent, is certainly important. It is remarked by Mr. Butler, in his learned note to Co. Litt. 204b, that the circumstance, that the grantee was not to be let into immediate possession of the estate, affords a presumption of its being a mortgage. It is not unimportant also, that, in the very assignment made of the bond by Richardson to Flagg and Mann, the conveyance to Walker and Fisher is expressly described as a mortgage. And, supposing that assignment to be a valid and subsisting instrument, it is not easy to see, how Mann can now be permitted to set up that conveyance as an absolute estate, to defeat the rights of his co-assignee, he having purchased in the title for his sole account.

But, what strikes me as most material in this case is, the allegation by both Walker and Fisher, in their testimony, that notwithstanding the conveyance to them, they did not contract, and were not bound, to pay off any of the incumbrances. If this were true, there would be an end of treating it, as has been already suggested, as a conditional purchase. I have endeavored to show, that they were positively bound to pay off Bennett's incumbrance. In regard to the antecedent mortgages, they positively deny, that they engaged to pay them off. Now, if this be true, it would be impossible to consider this as a conditional purchase, without the grossest injustice. The purchase would be for little less than a tenth of the value of the property; for Richardson would still be personally bound for the payment of those mortgages.

Nay, he would be bound to pay to Walker and Fisher, as the assignees of those mortgages, and now to Mann, as their assignee, the full amount due on those mortgages, notwithstanding the extinguishment of his title in the premises, by the lapse of the five years. Those mortgages, in their view of the matter, are still subsisting mortgages, capable of being enforced at law, and were not to be extinguished by the purchase and assignment to themselves. So, that if this be admitted to be the true interpretation of the whole arrangement, Walker and Fisher obtained property, confessedly worth, in their own opinion, more than $10,000, by the payment, at most, of the sum of $1,200 only, to Bennett. I have not heard any such doctrine contended for at the argument, although it seems to me a natural consequence from the positions assumed. If the mortgages were not agreed to be extinguished by Walker and Fisher, when they took the conveyance, nothing has since been done by the parties to extinguish them. On the other hand, if that transaction was a mortgage, the whole proceedings are in legal operation, exactly what they should be. The debt to Bennett, and the mortgages constitute a subsisting lien on the premises; and they must be paid by Richardson, before he can claim a reconveyance. Now, it has been well remarked by Mr. Butler, in the note above cited (Co. Litt. 204b, note 1), that if the money paid by the grantee is not a fair price for the absolute purchase of the property conveyed to him, it affords a strong presumption, that the conveyance was a mere mortgage. The same suggestion was pointedly made in Conway's Ex'rs v. Alexander, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 241.

On the contrary, if, in opposition to the positive testimony of Walker and Fisher, we are to deem it a part of the agreement at the time of the conveyance to them, that they should pay off the mortgages, having their security for their advances upon the premises, then the same considerations apply to this as to the payment to Bennett. The payments so made were for debts of Richardson, and paid at his request.

I observe, that the assignments of these mortgages to Walker and Fisher speak of the debts as subsisting debts, and the mortgages as liable to be redeemed by Richardson; and Walker and Fisher are authorized to receive the sums due thereon for their own use. But it is said, that it was distinctly understood, that the conveyance should not be a common mortgage; and that the premises should be irredeemable after the five years; and that the shape, which the negotiation took, was for the very purpose of accomplishing this object. Be it so; still if in fact the conveyance was a mere security for advances to be made to Richardson, and the premises were redeemable upon payment of these advances within the five years, in contemplation of law it was a mortgage, whatever name the parties might choose to give to it. Nothing is better settled than the doctrine, that where the conveyance is a mere security, it is a mortgage; and that if it be a mortgage, the parties cannot—by their agreement, that there shall be no equity of redemption after a limited time—change the rights of the mortgagor. The common maxim is, once a mortgage, always a mortgage. The right to redeem is a necessary incident, and cannot be extinguished by a mere covenant, that it shall not be claimed after a limited period. See Goodman v. Grierson, 2 Ball & B. 278; Newcomb v. Bonham, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 313, pl. 13; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1019, and authorities there cited; 4 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) 142, 143. It seems to me, that the shape of the transaction was merely to evade the principles of law applicable to mortgages. Walker and Fisher were willing to make advances to pay Richardson's debts, and to reinstate him in his equity of redemption. They were willing to give him five years to repay the advances and redeem the estate. But they meant, after that lapse of time, to hold the estate, if unredeemed, by an absolute title. This appears to be the manner in which Bemis understood the transaction; and the only mistake in the matter has been a mistake of law. Luther Richardson's own testimony points still more distinctly to the transaction, as being a mortgage in contemplation of law, whatever might have been the understanding of the parties as to its redeemable quality. The negotiation, according to his statement, began in asking a loan, and ended in an agreement to pay off all the incumbrances, taking the conveyance for the repayment within five years. There is an intrinsic difficulty in treating this transaction as a conditional sale, in whatever manner the circumstances are viewed. It seems to be of the very essence of a sale, that there should be a fixed price for the purchase. The language of the civil law on this subject is the language of common sense. "Pretium autem constitui oportet; nam nulla emptio sine pretio esse potest," say the Institutes. Inst. lib. 3, tit. 24. Ulpian, in the Digest, repeats the same suggestion; "Sine pretio nulla venditio est." Dig. lib. 18, tit. 1, c. 2. Now, here is not the slightest proof, in this case, of any sum being agreed on as the price of the purchase. No money was in fact paid; and if Walker and Fisher are to be relied on, none was contracted to be paid; and even the incumbrances were not to be discharged. The money, which was to be repaid on the reconveyance, was only what had been, in the intermediate time, actually paid to discharge the incumbrances, and expended in improvements. If none had been so paid, none was to be repaid. So that not only was there no fixed price; but the premises stood as a mere security for future advances.

Hitherto the case has been considered, upon the question of mortgage or not, upon the footing not merely of the conveyance and bond, but of the parol evidence admitted as explanatory of the intent of the parties. It has been suggested, however, on behalf of the plaintiff, that as the papers, upon their face, taken together, do actually import a mortgage, it is not competent to admit parol evidence to control their legal effect. There is weight in the objection; for, in my judgment, the papers, taken together, do distinctly proclaim the case to be a present mortgage for future advances. But it is unnecessary to consider this objection, as the same conclusion is arrived at upon a full survey of all the parol evidence and circumstances attendant upon the transaction.

It remains to notice another argument, which has been brought forward to prevent the conclusion, that the conveyance is a mortgage. The argument is, that the bond is not between the same parties as the conveyance. The conveyance was by Prentiss and Luther Richardson, and the bond to Luther only; so that it cannot operate as a defeasance; for (it is said) a defeasance must be between the same parties as the deed, which it is to defeat. It does not seem to me, that the question of mortgage or not depends in this case at all upon the point, whether the bond was a technical defeasance or not. There may be a defeasance of a deed of conveyance, which at the same time will not make it a mortgage. On the other hand, there may be a mortgage, although the attendant bond does not technically constitute a defeasance. If the conveyance in the present case had been confessedly a security for a loan, there could be no doubt, that in a court of equity it would have been deemed a mortgage, whatever might be the case at law, though I am not satisfied, that it would have made any difference at law. A court of equity would wholly disregard the form of the transaction, and look to the substance. But the truth is, that, even if the bond had been between the same parties as the conveyance, it would not have constituted a defeasance of the conveyance, technically so called. Lord Coke has given a very correct definition of a defeasance in stating its derivation. It is, says he (Co. Litt. 236b), fetched from the French word, "defaire," i. e. to defeat or undo, "infectum redere quod factum." The true meaning of this language is, that it is to make void the principal deed. Lord Chief Baron Comyns (Com. Dig. "Defeasance," A) says; a defeasance is an instrument, which defeats the force or operation of some other deed or estate; and, that, which in the same deed is called a condition, in another deed is a defeasance. Sheppard, in his Touchstone (page 396), is still more direct. He says; a defeasance is a condition relating to a deed, as to an obligation, &c., which, being performed by the obligor, &c., the act is disabled and made void, as if it had never been done; which differeth only from a condition in this, that this is always made at the same time, and annexed to, or inserted in the same deed. But that is always made in a deed by itself. Mr. Justice Blackstone (2 Bl. Comm. 327, 342) gives the same definition. A defeasance (says he) is a collateral deed, made at the same time with a feoffment, or other conveyance, containing certain conditions, upon the performance of which the estate then created may be defeated or totally undone. So that it is of the very essence of a defeasance, technically so called, that it defeats the principal deed and makes it void ab initio, if the condition is performed. See Mr. Sergeant Williams' note to Fowell v. Forrest, 2 Saund. 47n. note 1. The very distinction was taken, and acted on in Lacy v. Kynaston, 2 Salk. 575, 1 Ld. Raym. 688, 690. The present bond does not declare, that, if the condition is complied with the conveyance shall be utterly void. On the contrary, it is to remain in full validity, and a reconveyance of the title is to be made, which necessarily supposes, that, until the reconveyance, the estate remains at law in the grantees. See Erskine v. Townsend, 2 Mass. 497. Yet no one will for a moment doubt, that it makes no difference as to the question of mortgage, either at law or in equity, whether the condition be, that upon the payment of the money loaned the condition is to reconvey, or that the principal deed is to be void and of no effect. If there could be a doubt, the case of Manlove v. Bale, 2 Vern. 84, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 313, and Erskine v. Townsend, 2 Mass. 403, would completely overthrow it.

It is very clear in this case, that the parties did not contemplate, that the bond to be given should operate as a defeasance; for if it had been so to operate, and the condition had been strictly performed, the estate would have been revested in Prentiss Richardson, and would not have vested in Luther Richardson, contrary to the manifest intention of the parties. The bond was therefore to reconvey to Luther; and in no sense was it a defeasance of the conveyance. But mortgage or not can never depend upon the single point, whether the instrument is a defeasance or not. If a mortgagee were to covenant in the mortgage deed, that, upon payment of the mortgage money, he would reconvey to the mortgagor, it would clearly be a mortgage.[2] If, instead of that, he were to covenant to convey it to such other person, as the mortgagor should appoint, it would not the less be a mortgage. Take the case of a clear trust estate, where the cestui que trust borrows money on a mortgage of the estate, and both the trustee and cestui que trust join in the mortgage conveyance; and the covenant is to reconvey to the trustee, upon the payment of the money by the cestui que trust, it would plainly make no difference, as to its being a mortgage, that the payment was not to be made by the trustee, although the reconveyance was to be to him. The conveyance would still be but a security for a loan; and that is the true test of a mortgage. The same result would arise, if the payment was to be made by the cestui que trust, and the reconveyance was also to be made to the cestui que trust, which I conceive to be the very case at bar. Mr. Preston, in his learned work on Conveyancing (volume 2, pp. 201, 202), has put several cases of mortgages of this nature, where the redemption is to be by the beneficial owner alone, although the conveyance is jointly made by him and another person as the formal legal owner, without the slightest intimation of its not being an inappropriate mode of creating a mortgage. In my view of the matter, then, it is of no consequence, that the reconveyance was to Luther Richardson alone. Nor is it necessary to decide, whether the doctrine is universally true, as laid down in Sheppard's Touchstone (page 397), that to make a deed a technical defeasance, it should be between all the same persons, who were parties to the first deed. A bond, given to a mere stranger to the original deed, certainly ought not to be construed as a defeasance. But a bond given by the grantee to one of the grantors of a deed to defeat and make void the conveyance, if executed at the same time with the conveyance, may possibly (for I do not mean to express more than a doubt) admit of a different consideration.

Upon the whole, without going more at large into this point, though there are many things, which might afford grounds for additional comments, my opinion is, that the conveyance to Walker and Fisher, connected with the bond and other transactions, was a mere mortgage or security for the advances to be made by Walker and Fisher, and not a conditional purchase by them of the estate. In cases of this sort, it is of very little consequence, what the particular language used by the parties is, whether they speak of a loan, or of a purchase, of a mortgage, or of a conditional sale. Courts of equity look to the real nature of the transaction, stripped of all the disguises, which the parties may have thrown around it. My opinion also is, that Luther Richardson had a clear equity of redemption in the premises at the time of his conveyance to Flagg and Mann, sufficient, in a court of equity at least, to make them tenants in common of that equity. I do not say, that the equity was such, as would make them tenants in common of an estate at law. It is sufficient for me to say, that they are so of an estate in equity. The great difficulty, which I have felt in arriving at this conclusion, has arisen from the decision of the supreme court of the state, in the case of Flagg v. Mann, 14 Pick. 467. That case was finally decided upon a mere question of the jurisdiction of the court, under the Massachusetts statute of 1823 (chapter 140, § 2). The court held, that the plaintiff and defendant were not tenants in common of the premises in the sense of that statute, and therefore, that the bill was not maintainable. I have not the slightest disposition to question the correctness of that decision; and, as a point of local law, I should feel myself bound by it. My distress has been with the other views suggested in the very able opinion delivered on behalf of the court on that occasion. It is true, that these views, not being founded upon local law, but upon general principles of interpretation applicable to courts of equity, are not, and cannot from their nature be, conclusive upon this court, in a suit in equity addressed to its general jurisdiction. Still, however, it is impossible not to feel the just weight of that opinion upon every point in litigation in the present cause; and that, if that opinion be correct, the conveyance to Walker and Fisher was not a mortgage, and that nothing passed by the subsequent conveyance from Luther Richardson to Flagg and Mann. After a careful survey, however, of the whole case, as now presented to this court, I have been unable to arrive at the same conclusion. This is to me matter of regret; but judicially I am compelled to follow on this occasion the results of my own judgment.

The other point, however, suggested at the argument by the plaintiff's counsel, is not undeserving of notice. It is, that even if no title in the premises did pass by the deed of Luther Richardson to Flagg and Mann; yet, nevertheless, there was a color of title in him at the time, and that the deed itself, being accepted by Flagg and Mann, and an assignment being taken and notes given, under and in virtue of the parol agreement between them, for the joint purchase from Richardson, these facts did of themselves create a privity of claim and right in the premises, sufficient to establish a fiduciary relation between them. And if such a fiduciary relation actually did exist, then the purchase of Mann, from Walker and Fisher and from the Frye heirs must be treated in equity as a purchase for the joint account of Flagg and Mann. There is great force in this argument; and I am not prepared to say, that it is not well founded.

In the first place, it seems to me clear, that if there had been a written agreement between Flagg and Mann to make the purchase from Richardson, and the purchase had been executed accordingly, while that contract and purchase remained unrescinded, it would have created a privity of contract between them, which would establish a fiduciary relation for all purposes connected with the premises, whatever might be the state of the title. I do not mean here to rely on the doctrine of estoppel, resulting from the joint conveyance to them from Richardson, for I agree with the supreme court of the state in thinking, that there was no such legal estoppel. See Flagg v. Mann, 14 Pick. 481; Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 535. But I proceed upon this, that a written contract to purchase an estate upon joint account does create a fiduciary relation between the parties, as upon a mutual agency for the purposes of the contract, which neither is at liberty to defeat by a purchase on his sole account. It appears to me, that Forster v. Hale, 3 Ves. 696 (same case, on appeal, 5 Ves. 308), fully supports this doctrine; for in that case the purchase was by one partner of a banking-house of a quarter part of a colliery, and the other partners insisted, that it was a purchase in trust on joint account. And they prevailed, upon the mere proof from subsequent letters of that partner, that the purchase was a trust. There was no pretence to say, that there was any title vested in the partnership in the colliery, or that it had been paid for out of the partnership funds. The whole rested upon a fiduciary relation created by privity of contract, established in writing between the parties. In the present case, it seems to me, that although the agreement was by parol, yet having been fully executed by the passing of the deed and assignment and note between the parties, the trust is fully established, so as to extract it from the statute of frauds. If, then, there was, upon the mere privity of a contract executed between the parties, a fiduciary relation created between Flagg and Mann, that relation, in my judgment, was sufficient to make the subsequent purchase from the Frye heirs and from Walker and Fisher a purchase for the joint benefit, independently of the point, whether an actual title in the premises under Richardson was then vested in Flagg and Mann. I do not mean to deny the doctrine, stated at the bar, that a parol agreement by two to purchase lands will not create joint interest by way of trust, if the purchase is made by one in his own name. The authorities are not entirely agreed upon this point, though the weight of opinion may, perhaps, be, that such a case is within the statute of frauds. The case of Riddle v. Emerson, 1 Vern. 108, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 381, rather leans the other way. Lamas v. Bayly, 2 Vern. 627, is more direct in favor of the doctrine; though, upon examining the decree in the register's book, it appears, that the lord chancellor rather proceeded upon the circumstances of the case being too slight to found a decree. Raithby's note 1, Id. Atkins v. Rowe, Mos. 39, is directly against it. On the other hand, Bartlett v. Pickersgill, 1 Eden, 515, 4 East, 577, note b, supports it. In this last case, the lord chancellor said, that, if there had been any fraud used by the defendant to prevent an execution of the agreement, it might have been otherwise. Now, if, by the agreement between Flagg and Mann to purchase from the Frye heirs, Flagg was purposely lulled into a false security, relying on the good faith of Mann, and his privity in interest under the purchase from Richardson, and the negotiation of Mann was designedly kept secret from Flagg, in order to prevent any active competition on his part, there might be great reason for the application of this principle upon the ground of a constructive fraud. However this may be, I do not mean, in the present case, to rely upon any fiduciary relation arising from privity of contract, but upon a fiduciary relation arising from privity of title and estate between Flagg and Mann. In this view of the case, the purchase made directly by Mann of Walker and Fisher, and also the purchase made through Adams of the Frye heirs, must be deemed, so far as Mann is concerned, as made on the joint account of Flagg and himself. But Mann has parted with his whole title in the premises to other persons, to wit, one moiety thereof by his deed to Adams, and the other moiety thereof by his deed to Fuller; and if they are to be deemed, in the sense of a court of equity, bonâ fide purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice of Flagg's title, then they are entitled to hold the premises discharged of all claims of Flagg, except so far as may extend to any unpaid purchase-money. In regard to Adams, there is no unpaid purchase-money; for the conveyance made to him was in consideration of a contemporaneous conveyance by him to Mann of an undivided moiety of another tract of land held by Adams under a title from one Josiah Wood, Jr. In regard to Fuller, there is a considerable portion of the purchase-money still unpaid. Fuller, also, by the same deed, took a conveyance of the undivided moiety in the other tract, which had been conveyed by Adams to Mann.

Now, under these circumstances, there are various questions, which arise for our consideration. In the first place, as Mann was clearly entitled to a moiety of the premises (supposing it to be a joint purchase for himself and Flagg,) he had a right to sell that moiety to whomsoever he might choose, and the sale would be no disturbance of Flagg's rights. And, under such circumstances, notice by the purchaser of Flagg's right would not in the slightest degree affect his own title. Mann has conveyed the whole of the premises by different deeds; one moiety to Adams, and one moiety to Fuller. And the question, which meets us, is, whether Adams and Fuller are to be considered as each taking a moiety of the moiety, which Mann had a right to convey, of the premises; or whether, Adams's deed having been executed on the 6th of August, 1831, two days at least before the date of that of Fuller, he is not entitled to hold the entire moiety conveyed by the deed to him by Mann. My opinion is, that the latter is his true predicament. At the time when Mann conveyed the moiety to him, he had a perfect title thereto; and his deed took full effect. And where a rightful estate is claimed by each of two purchasers, whose titles in other respects are equal (and Adams's deed was recorded on the 8th of August, three days before that to Fuller), the maxim prevails, "Qui prior est in tempore, potior est in jure." In this view of the matter, the question of notice to Adams becomes wholly unimportant; for, notice or no notice, his title is equally protected in law and in equity.

In regard to Fuller, in the next place, there are various questions presented upon the record, and made at the argument. (1) The first is, whether he had, at the time of his purchase, notice of Flagg's title. (2) Another is, whether, if he had no notice, his title is of such a nature (being by mere release) as entitles him to the protection of a bonâ fide purchaser for a valuable consideration in a court of equity. (3) Another is, whether, if he is so entitled, he is not still liable, as to the unpaid purchase-money, to the plaintiff's equity, as a lien attaching thereto. (4) Another is, whether the plaintiff has not, by his own conduct, either ratified the sale to Fuller, or at least disabled himself from now contesting it.

First; as to the question of notice. And here it is material to consider, that notice to affect Fuller must be notice of the title of Flagg under the joint purchase from Richardson; and also notice of the interest asserted by Flagg, as a trust, under the purchase by Mann from Walker and Fisher, and from the Frye heirs. The former is mainly dependent upon written documents; the latter is dependent upon mere oral agreements between the parties, and is properly a result arising by construction of law. I agree also to the criticism suggested at the bar, that it was not a wrongful act on the part of Mann to take the title from Walker and Fisher and from the Frye heirs in his own name; as it was his only security, either to compel Flagg to abandon those purchases, or, if he insisted on his share, to compel him to repay the advances made by Mann. Now, in regard to the joint purchase from Richardson, it is to be observed, that not a scrip of paper was to be found on record respecting it until the 15th of February, 1832. Until that time, no registration was made of the deed of Richardson to Flagg and Mann, or of the bond of Walker and Fisher to Richardson, or of the assignment of that bond to Flagg and Mann; and then the registration, it seems, was made by Flagg. So that there was no pretence of notice to Fuller at the time of his purchase in the preceding August by any registration. The whole title to the premises, so far as any search in the registry would disclose it, was in Walker and Fisher; or, if the guardianship deed was invalid, was in the Frye heirs. Mann was the purchaser from both; and his title was, therefore, as that of the sole legal owner, unexceptionable, unless notice of the trust in favor of Flagg is brought home to Fuller at the time of his purchase from Mann. In examining the charges of notice in the bill against Fuller, it must be admitted, that they are very loose and indeterminate, and hardly such as would stand the scrutiny of a court of equity, upon a demurrer for that cause. The first is a mere general charge, that "the said Fuller, then well knowing all and singular the premises." The next is, that "Fuller had some notice or intimation, or some reason to suspect and believe, that the said Luther Richardson, before the conveyance aforesaid to your orator and said Mann, had some interest or claim to said lands; and that such conveyance had been made to and such agreement had been made between your orator and the said Mann as aforesaid, and that your orator claimed to have some interest in the premises." It seems to me, that a charge so very loose and indeterminate, amounting to a mere intimation, or suspicion, or belief of the defendant, of some claim or interest of the plaintiff, is not such a charge of notice, as is required in cases of this sort. On the contrary, there should be a clear and positive allegation of full notice of the very title and claim of the plaintiff asserted in the bill, so that the defendant may know, with certainty and distinctness, to what he is to answer. The subsequent specifications are open to the like objection. They are too loose and too general in their structure. But it is unnecessary to dwell on this infirmity in the allegations of the bill, because Fuller has, in the most direct and positive manner, denied having had any notice of Flagg's claim and title, or any intimation, suspicion, or reason to suspect or believe in his claim or title at the time of his purchase, or until long afterwards. And in the same explicit manner, he denies all the specifications tending to establish notice, which are asserted in the bill.

Now, upon this posture of the case, it is plain, that these strong and direct denials being responsive to the bill, are conclusive in favor of Fuller, unless they are overcome by very direct and satisfactory evidence on the other side. It is a well-known rule in equity, that, to overcome the positive denials of an answer, responsive to the charges in a bill, there should be the testimony of two witnesses of equal credibility on the other side, or of one witness with strong and stringent circumstances. The question then is, whether such testimony exists in this case? My opinion is, that it does not. I dismiss at once all the suggestions in relation to the rumors, as well as the notoriety, of the supposed purchase of Richardson in Lowell, because they do not bring home to Fuller any presumptions of notice. He did not live at Lowell at the time of the purchase; and if he had lived there, the recollections of the witnesses, as to the exact times of those rumors and of that notoriety (so vitally important in this case), are far too loose to found any confidence in their statements. Indeed, most of the plaintiff's witnesses on this point pretend to no exactness as to times; and this leads me to some distrust of the memory of those, who are more direct in their statements. In its very nature, such evidence, as to times and dates, is open to much question, unless it stands supported by particular fixed facts, to which it may with certainty be referred. Vague reports and rumors from strangers are not a sufficient foundation, on which to charge a purchaser with notice of a title in a third person. See Sugd. Vend. (7th Ed.) c. 17, p. 730; Hewes v. Wiswell, 8 Greenl. 98. And I think, that Lord Hardwicke stated the true doctrine, when, in Hine v. Dodd, 2 Atk. 276, he said that there ought to be a clear, undoubted notice; and that suspicion of notice, though a strong suspicion, is not sufficient to justify the court in breaking in upon an act of parliament; or (as I would add) upon the legal rights of a purchaser.

As to the presumption of notice from the fact, that Mann and Adams and Fuller boarded together in the same house in the summer of 1831, it is impossible to rely upon it without violating the first principles of evidence. Men often board together for a long time in the same house, without any knowledge of each other's business. And there is not the slightest proof, that Fuller ever held any conversations on the subject of the title of Flagg with either Mann or Adams. On the contrary, all three of them expressly deny any such conversations.

As to the particular notice charged upon Fuller by the testimony of Howard, and Wood, and Hobbs, it does not in my judgment outweigh the positive denials of the answer. I cannot but think, that Howard is under some mistake in the matter; for, if the other testimony in the case, even that on the side of the plaintiff, is to be believed, it is impossible, that the title of Richardson, purchased by Flagg and Mann, could, in May or June, 1831, have been treated by any persons, as certain in itself, so as to justify the expression, that they had made a fortune by it; for there was at that time a double cloud upon the purchase, viz. that of the title of Walker and Fisher, and that of the Frye heirs, which must have been quite as notorious as the purchase itself. Besides; if we are to credit Wood's testimony, Fuller's own opinion, as expressed to him, was adverse to the notion, that the conveyance to Walker and Fisher was a mortgage; and, therefore, he could hardly have congratulated Flagg upon having made a fortune by such a purchase. As to Wood's testimony respecting the conversation, which he had with Fuller at Concord, admitting its entire credibility, it does not reach the point, which is indispensable to establish notice of Flagg's title. Nothing appears to have been said about Flagg in the course of the conversation. The sole question was as to Walker and Fisher's title, whether it was a mortgage or not; and to this extent and this extent only it brings home notice to Fuller. But it must also be taken into consideration, that Fuller, in his answer, while he admits the conversation with Wood, utterly denies, that any names were mentioned. He says, that the conversation was very short; that Wood asked his opinion "as to a question of law, which question was stated by Wood in abstract terms, without any names, application, or any intimation, that any such case actually existed; and on said Wood's statement said Fuller gave his opinion readily, that a bond, under the circumstances enumerated by said Wood, could not create a right to redeem in the obligee, such as existed in a mortgagor under a mortgage." So that here there is only one witness at most against the answer, which is directly responsive to a charge in the bill. Then as to the testimony of Hobbs. He speaks to a conversation in a stage coach in August, 1831, between himself and Fuller, Flagg, the plaintiff, being present, as follows: "I asked said Fuller, if the title of said Richardson (to the Paddy Camp lands) was good; and he replied that the title was good for nothing, because the bond of Walker and Fisher to Luther Richardson was not recorded. Said Fuller referred, as I suppose, to a bond, which had been executed by said Fisher and Walker, conditioned to convey said lands to said Richardson on the payment of a certain sum of money." He adds, that although Flagg was present, "Flagg did not take any part in the conversation; and I do not recollect any thing farther, that was said by said Fuller or myself as to the said lands or the title to them." Now, it is not a little remarkable, that the witness says, that he does not recollect, what day of the month of August it was, so that it is impossible to say, whether it was before or after Fuller's purchase; and yet it is brought forward as evidence of notice to him before his purchase; and, what is yet more remarkable, Flagg said not one word of his own title to the premises on that occasion; but he was studiously silent. Why was this silence? Why did he not proclaim his title at this time to Fuller, and insist on his rights? Fuller, in his answer insists, that this conversation was long after his purchase; and he adds, that at that time he had never heard, that the bond had been assigned to Flagg and Mann. And here, again, his answer is responsive to the charge in the bill. It is plain, therefore, that the special notice of Flagg's title, charged upon Fuller, is not established by the testimony of these witnesses in a clear and unquestionable form. And I cannot but think the doctrine of Lord Hardwicke in Hine v. Dodd, 2 Atk. 275, which was so fully approved in Jolland v. Stainbridge, 3 Ves. 478, and Eyre v. Dolphin, 2 Ball & B. 301, and was acted upon by the supreme court of New York (Jackson v. Given, 8 Johns. 105, 107), affords a very important lesson to all judges not to place much reliance upon the testimony of loose conversations or confessions of the party to overbalance his solemn denial of notice on oath in his answer. See, also, Butcher v. Stapely, 1 Vern. 363; Sugd. Vend. (7th Ed.) 730; Pow. Mortg. (by Coventry & Rand) 562, note. So far then as the point of actual notice is concerned, it fails.

We are next led to the consideration of the question of constructive notice. In the first place, it is said, that Mann, Adams and Fuller had a joint interest in the purchases from Walker and Fisher, and from the Frye heirs; and that Mann was the agent of the others in making the purchases, and the knowledge of the agent is in contemplation of law the knowledge of his principals. Admitting the operation of this principle in its full extent, it does not seem to me applicable to the circumstances of the present case. In regard to Adams, it may well be doubted, whether Mann was his agent except for the purchase of the title of the Frye heirs to the estate held by Wood; and that is not in controversy in the present suit. In regard to Fuller, there is no evidence whatsoever, which shows, that he ever had a joint interest in the original purchase from the Frye heirs, or from Walker and Fisher. On the contrary the whole evidence satisfactorily establishes to my mind, that he was a subsequent sub-purchaser.

Then, again, it is said, that Richardson was in possession of the premises or of a part thereof at the time of the purchase by Fuller, which operated as constructive notice of Richardson's title. I admit, that the rule in equity seems to be that, where a tenant or other person is in possession of the estate at the time of the purchase, the purchaser is put upon inquiry as to his title; and if he does not inquire, he is bound in the same manner, as if he had inquired, and had positive notice of the title of the party in possession. The cases cited by Mr. Sugden in his able work on Vendors and Purchasers (chapter 17, pp. 743–748, 7th Ed. 1826), and by my learned friend, Mr. Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries (4 Kent, Comm. 3d Ed. 179, 180), are full to the purpose. See, also, Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 249, 17 Ves. 433; Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. Jr. 440; Hall v. Smith, 14 Ves. 426; Meux v. Maltby, 2 Swanst. 281; Allen v. Anthony, 1 Mer. 282; Eyre v. Dolphin, 2 Ball & B. 301; Powell v. Dillon, Id. 416, 421, and cases there cited; Crofton v. Ormsby, 2 Schoales & L. 595; 4 Kent, Comm. (3d Ed.) 179, 180. But constructive notice of this sort does not extend beyond the title of the party in possession; and the purchaser is not ordinarily bound to know, or presumed to have notice of the title, under which the party in possession claims or derives his own title. That seems fairly inferrible from the language of Lord Eldon in Attorney General v. Backhouse, 17 Ves. 293; and is stated in the broadest terms by Mr. Sugden, in the work above cited (pages 745, 746): "Notice" (says he) "of a tenancy, will not, it seems, affect a purchaser with constructive notice of the lessor's title. Therefore, if a person equitably entitled to an estate let it to a tenant, who takes possession, and then the person, having the legal estate, sells to a person, who purchases bonâ fide and without notice of the equitable claim, the purchaser must hold against the equitable owner, although he had notice of the tenant being in possession." It is true, that the learned author quotes no authority for this position; but his own great experience and acknowledged ability are a sufficient guaranty, that it is well founded. It would be pushing the doctrine of constructive notice to a great degree of extravagance to hold, that the purchaser was bound to know not only the title of the party in possession, but all its derivative sources. Indeed, the American courts seem indisposed to give effect to this doctrine of constructive notice from possession, even in its most limited form. Thus, in Scott v. Gallagher, 14 Serg. & R. 333, the court held, that the possession of a cestui que trust, and the exercise by him of acts of ownership, were not constructive notice to a purchaser of the legal title from the trustee; but that there should be direct, express and positive notice of the trust. This doctrine was probably enforced by considerations growing out of our registration acts, which are designed, and with great justice, to protect purchasers against latent equities. In McMechan v. Griffing, 3 Pick. 149, the court held, that possession of the premises was not, under all the circumstances, constructive notice of the title of the party in possession; that it is not sufficient, that the inference of notice from the circumstances is probable; but it must be necessary and unquestionable. The case of a purchase in fee by a lessee in possession is there put as one, in which no constructive notice of that purchase would be imputed to a subsequent purchaser. It is difficult to reconcile this with what is laid down in Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 249, and many other cases.[3] In Newhall v. Pierce, 5 Pick. 450, it was held, that the single fact, that the grantor was in possession, would not justify the inference, that an attaching creditor had constructive notice, that the grantor remained in possession under his original title, as mortgagor. In Hewes v. Wiswell, 8 Greenl. 94, the whole subject is discussed with great ability, and the conclusion arrived at, that, at most, possession is merely implied notice, which may be rebutted, and in this respect differs from constructive notice, which cannot be rebutted. See Lord Chief Baron Eyre's opinion in Plumb v. Fluitt, 2 Anstr. 438. These cases do, as I think, admonish courts of equity in this country, where the registration of deeds, as matters of title, is universally provided for, not to enlarge the doctrine of constructive notice, or to follow all the English cases on this subject, except with a cautious attention to their just application to the circumstances of our country, and to the structure of our laws. Indeed, even in England, if we may trust to the report of the case Oxwith v. Plummer, as reported in Bacon's Abridgment (Bac. Abr. "Mortgage," E, § 3), and relied on by Mr. Sugden (Sugd. Vend. 7th Ed. p. 746, c. 17), the mere circumstance, that the vendor had been long out of possession, and a party in possession under a covenant from him to convey the title, would not be constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser from the vendor. But assuming, that the possession of Richardson was constructive notice to Fuller of his title in the premises, it was notice only of his actual title, which was that of a tenant at sufferance under Walker and Fisher; and was in no just sense notice of the conveyance of Richardson to Flagg and Mann.

Then, again, it is further argued, that Fuller cannot be treated as a bonâ fide purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, because, at the time of the conveyance by Mann to him, Mann was not seized, and did not pretend to be seized in fee of the premises, nor was he ever in possession thereof, nor did he pretend to any title in the premises; for the deed of Walker and Fisher was then a mere escrow, Mann being at liberty to receive or reject it within thirty days from its date (the 27th of July, 1831). There is no doubt of the general doctrine, that in a plea of a purchase for a valuable consideration, without notice of the plaintiff's title, it is necessary to aver, that the person, who conveyed, was seized, or pretended to be seized, at the time that he executed the purchase deed. That was held by Lord Hardwicke in Story v. Lord Windsor, 2 Atk. 630, and it has been fully recognised down to the present time. See Sugd. Vend. (7th Ed.) p. 757, c. 18. The cases of Wallwyn v. Lee, 9 Ves. 24; Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 252; and Jackson v. Rowe, 4 Russ. 523,—insist, that it should also aver a possession in the vendor. But this proposition must be received with a qualification given to it by Lord Redesdale, that the conveyance purports to be an immediate transfer of the possession at the time of its execution. Mitf. Eq. Pl. (by Jeremy) 275. And indeed possession of a tenant is possession of his landlord within the meaning of the rule, as was said by Lord Eldon in Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 252. But the doctrine, here insisted on, is strictly applicable only to a plea technically so called; and I cannot but think, that it is properly applicable only to cases, where such want of seisin or possession affords presumptive evidence of a defect of title in the grantor to make the grant sufficient to put the purchaser upon inquiry. See Beames, Pl. Eq. 235. But, be this as it may, here the whole merits of Fuller's title are laid open upon his answer. The true question, in all cases of this sort, where the purchaser, in his answer, insists upon the defence of his being a bonâ fide purchaser without notice, is, whether he has acted with good faith, and purchased under circumstances of an apparent right in the vendor to convey. Now, upon the reasoning and circumstances already suggested, Fuller, at the time of his purchase, had no actual or constructive notice of the title of Flagg. The question is, whether he had any notice of any defect in the title of Mann, at the time of the conveyance to him, viz. on the 8th of August, 1831. It is very clear, that Mann asserted, that he then had a complete and perfect title to convey the premises to Fuller; and Fuller paid a very large and apparently full consideration for the purchase of a good title. It is true, that, in a technical sense, Mann had not a complete and entire seisin of the premises at that time under Walker and Fisher, if their deed was then an escrow, though he was entitled thereto at his own absolute option, at any time within the thirty days. The title of the Frye heirs, however, if they had any, was actually vested in him by the deed of Adams to him. And against all the world, except Flagg, the very allegations of the bill admit, that he had a good title. But it appears to me by no means clear upon the bill and answer, that at the time of the conveyance to Fuller, there had not been an absolute delivery of the deed of Walker and Fisher to Mann. The bill explicitly states, that Walker and Fisher did actually convey their title to the premises to Mann by their deed on or about the 27th of July, 1831. The answer of Mann says, that it was an escrow at that time; but that it was actually delivered to him on or about the 8th of August, 1831. But there cannot be a reasonable doubt, that he did then affirm to Fuller, that he was then in the actual seisin of the premises, and that he had a complete title thereto; and that Fuller purchased, trusting to the good faith of Mann In point of fact, the possession of Richardson was a possession as a tenant at sufferance, under Walker and Fisher, and not adverse to them; and on the 10th of August, 1831, there was an admitted perfect title in Mann to convey the premises against everybody but Flagg. Let us put the question, then, whether, setting aside the claim of Flagg—a claim secret and unknown to Fuller—the latter is not absolutely bound by his purchase? Could Fuller, either in law, or in equity, now set up the defence, that Mann's conveyance to him was void and inoperative, by reason of the possession of Richardson, or the title of Walker and Fisher being outstanding upon an escrow, when the conveyance was made to him? I think not; and if so, then it seems to me, that he has a right to insist, that he is, under all the circumstances, to be treated as a purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice, because Mann undertook to convey, and did convey to him, all the title of Walker and Fisher, and of the Frye heirs, in the premises. The seisin of Walker and Fisher, and the possession of their tenant, Richardson, was, if their deed was at the time a mere escrow, a seisin for the benefit of Mann under his contract with them. If a cestui que trust in fee conveys the estate to a purchaser, and the trustee afterwards confirms the sale, and releases to the cestui que trust, or to the purchaser, it seems to me, that such a purchaser is entitled to protection, against any antecedent secret trust, which is unknown to him at the time of the purchase, and the confirmation is operative, notwithstanding, that in a strict sense the cestui que trust was not seised of the estate at the time of his conveyance. But the present case is far stronger; for the title of Fuller was complete, by an absolute delivery of the deed by Walker and Fisher to Mann, on or before the 10th of August, 1831; and there is not, in my judgment, any sufficient proof whatsoever, that, between the 8th and 10th of August, 1831, nor indeed until long afterwards, Fuller had any notice of Flagg's title. After the 10th of August, Fuller was clothed with a complete legal title, and a subsequent notice ought not to affect him. It does not appear to me, therefore, that this objection ought to prevail against Fuller's title.

And this leads me, in the next place, to the consideration, whether Fuller's title, being by a mere deed of release, is such a conveyance as entitles him to the benefit of the plea of a bonâ fide purchaser without notice. This is a point, upon which I have felt very great difficulty; and it was suggested, at the argument, as matter of grave consideration. If the language of the deed had been, that Mann merely released to Fuller all his right, title, and interest in the premises, there might, perhaps, have been more difficulty to found the defence; for then it might, under such circumstances, be construed to convey no more than Mann could rightfully convey, and that the purchaser should take at his peril, subject to all the rights and equities of third persons in the premises. But, here, the language of the deed is, that Mann, in consideration of $40,000, does "remise, release, and for ever quitclaim unto the said Elisha Fuller, his heirs and assigns, one undivided half of a certain tract of land," &c. (describing it) to have and to hold to Fuller, so that neither Mann nor his heirs, nor any other person claiming from or under him, shall have, claim, or demand any right or title to the premises. If this deed were to be construed as a mere release, the objection taken to it at the bar would be well founded; that, as the releasee was not in possession, it was a void conveyance. But we all know, that this is a common mode of conveyance in Massachusetts; and that, where it is for a valuable consideration, "ut res magis valeat quam pereat," a deed of release has been construed to be a bargain and sale, or other lawful conveyance, by which the estate might pass. It was so decided in Pray v. Peirce, 7 Mass. 381; and it was still more elaborately examined and solemnly adjudged in Russell v. Coffin, 8 Pick. 143, 151–154. And indeed, it is but an expansion of the principle laid down in Sheppard's Touchstone (page 82) "that a deed, that is intended and made for one purpose, may enure to another; for if it will not take effect that way, that is intended, it may take effect another way." I am not aware, that a purchase by way of a mere release, like the present, has ever been set up in England as a defence in a case of this sort. The researches of counsel have not discovered any such case; and I am much inclined to believe, that none exists. Still, however, it is not absolutely incompatible with the nature of a release, where, by reason of a privity of estate between the parties, it operates by way of enlarging the estate of the releasee, or of passing the estate of releasor, that it should be a sufficient foundation, if bonâ fide made, for a valuable consideration, and without notice, to support the defence. There may be a difference, where the release is to operate, merely by way of passing a right, or by way of extinguishment. See the different kinds of releases stated in 2 Bl. Comm. 324, 325. The very plea in Wallwyn v. Lee, 9 Ves. 24, which is given in the appendix of Mr. Beames's work on Pleas in Equity, was of a conveyance by lease and release. And certainly it would have made no difference, if the lease, instead of being a contemporaneous act, had been an existing lease in privity of estate. It is true, that in Wallwyn v. Lee, there were covenants, that the releasor was seised of a perfect, absolute, and indefeasible estate in fee simple in the premises. But I am not aware, that any covenant of this sort, or any covenant of general warranty has ever been held necessary to entitle the purchaser to make the defence. It ordinarily affords very conclusive proof, that the purchase is of the whole estate, and not of the mere right or title of the party, whatever it may be. But if it is apparent from the whole transaction, that the purchaser bought the estate under circumstances, which demonstrate, that he had no suspicion of the title not being perfect, as by giving a full price for an unquestionable and unquestioned fee simple, it seems to me, that the absence of any covenants of general warranty ought not to take away from him the common protection. He has, under such circumstances at least, an equal equity with any person claiming under an outstanding and unknown trust; and if so, the legal title, combined with his equity, ought not to be disturbed. In the present case the release of Mann to Fuller must, as I think, be treated as a bargain and sale or other lawful conveyance, upon the doctrine already asserted by the Massachusetts courts, which seems to me founded in sound sense and solid legal reasoning. It was an effectual conveyance to pass the whole estate to Fuller; and, as far as we have any means of knowledge, the title, which actually passed, is perfect as to all persons but Flagg. It steers wide, therefore, of the doctrine in Vattier v. Hinde, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 271. Flagg's title is founded upon a constructive equity, not apparent upon any of the title deeds; and being secret and unknown to Fuller, cannot be allowed to prejudice Fuller's rights.

In this view of the case as to Fuller, the point, as to the supposed acquiescence of Flagg in the purchase, and thereby giving it an indirect confirmation, becomes unimportant to be considered. It appears to me, indeed, that this point cannot upon the evidence be maintained. The doctrine stated at the bar is well founded, that, in order to make such acquiescence binding on Flagg, it should be proved, that he had full knowledge of all the facts affecting his legal and equitable rights; and that, with such knowledge, he did some open unequivocal act confirmatory of or recognising the validity of Fuller's title; or that by his silence the latter was purposely and injuriously misled into the belief, that his title was valid, and that Flagg did not mean to controvert it. In Cockerell v. Cholmeley, 1 Russ. & M. 425, Tam. 445, the master of the rolls said: "In equity it is considered, as good sense requires it should be, that no man can be held by any act of his to confirm a title, unless he is fully aware at the time, not only of the fact, upon which the defect of title depends; but of the consequence in point of law." Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Mer. 362, and Shine v. Gough, 1 Ball & B. 444, 445, are not so direct; but they presuppose the same principle.

The next and last point, under this head, is, as to the purchase money unpaid by Fuller. If his title to the land is to be deemed good and valid, as in my judgment it is, then it is clear, that the plaintiff has the same lien for his share thereof, as he would have had for the like share in the land itself, if it had remained in the hands of Mann. The one fund is but a substitute for the other, with this qualification, that it is the purchase money unpaid at the time, when Fuller had notice of the plaintiff's equity. My impression is, that upon the evidence, that will be found not to have been earlier than October, 1831. It may possibly have been at a somewhat later period. But, that can, if necessary, be more accurately ascertained by the master.

I have thus gone over the main grounds of this extremely complicated cause. Many other incidental topics, both of law and of evidence, were urged at the hearing, which have not escaped my subsequent notice; but which would unnecessarily encumber this voluminous case. It is sufficient to say, that they have had no tendency to shake my opinion upon the merits of the case, or upon the points already discussed.

Upon the whole my judgment is, that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree declaring him in equity entitled to one moiety of the land purchased by Mann of Walker and Fisher, and of the Frye heirs, which was conveyed to the plaintiff and Mann by Richardson's deed to them. That moiety having been sold by Mann to Fuller, the plaintiff is entitled to a moiety of the purchase money, as a substituted fund, deducting therefrom all the sums, which have been paid by Mann on account of the same lands to Walker and Fisher and to the Frye heirs, and all other expenses incurred in the premises.[4] As the conduct of Mann in these purchases, and in the sale to Fuller, was a constructive fraud upon the plaintiff, I incline to think, that the decree ought to be, that Mann should pay the amount, that shall thus be found due to the plaintiff, after the deductions aforesaid, out of the purchase money received by him from Fuller, if sufficient shall have been received for this purpose, together with interest upon the sums so received; and that there ought to be a decree against Fuller for any deficiency in the amount due to the plaintiff, not paid by Mann; for which also there is, and ought to be, as a part of the unpaid purchase money, a lien on the land in the possession of Fuller. These last, however, are matters, which can be properly adjusted, when the cause comes before the court for a final decree. At present, there must be an interlocutory decree, referring it to a master to examine and report to the court, what sum upon the principles above stated is due to the plaintiff, with such explanatory remarks, as he may think proper to bring to the view of the court upon the suggestion of either party.

From what has been already said, the bill will ultimately, though not at present, be dismissed as against Adams. But, from all the circumstances of the case I do not think, that he stands in a predicament to be entitled to costs; for he has been very properly made a party; and indeed he has been so much mixed up with some parts of the transaction, as a dux facti, as to create some doubts, if he was wholly ignorant of the plaintiff's equity.

[4] See Fox v. Mackreth, 2 Cox, 320, 2 Brown, Ch. 400, which seems to have proceeded on similar principles.

The decree was as follows:

This cause came on to be heard upon the original and supplemental suit, before the Honorable JOSEPH STORY, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, and the Honorable JOHN DAVIS, district judge of the district aforesaid, at this present term, in the presence of the counsel on both sides. Whereupon, and upon debate of the matter and hearing, the defendants' answers, and the testimony and proofs taken and read in the said cause, and of what was alleged by the counsel on both sides, the said court doth think fit, and doth declare, that there is full proof of the agreement of the said Flagg and Mann, for the purchase of the right and title of the said Luther Richardson, and also for the purchase of the title of the Frye heirs, in the premises on joint account, as in the said bill is mentioned; and that the said agreement is now in full force, it never having been abandoned by the voluntary consent of both of the parties. And doth further declare, that at the time of the said purchase, from the said Luther Richardson by the said Flagg and Mann in the bill mentioned, the said Luther was seized and possessed of an equity of redemption in the premises, and that the said Walker and Fisher were seized and possessed of the premises in mortgage, and not of an absolute irredeemable estate therein; and that the said Flagg and Mann became entitled to the equity of redemption of the same, under and in virtue of the purchase from the said Luther Richardson, as aforesaid. And doth further declare, that the purchases subsequently made by the said Mann from Walker and Fisher, and from the Frye heirs, ought to be deemed in equity as purchases for the joint account of the said Flagg and Mann, as in the said bill is mentioned, and not for the sole account of the said Mann; and that the said Flagg is, and ought now to be, entitled to the benefit of a moiety of the said purchases, he paying and allowing to the said Mann one moiety of the moneys paid, and costs and charges incurred in the same purchases. And doth further declare, that, inasmuch as the said Mann was, at the time of the sale of one moiety of the premises to the said Adams, fully and absolutely entitled to the said moiety, in his own right, that the conveyance to the said Adams is, and ought to be, deemed free from any equity of the said Flagg therein; but that the said Adams is not, under all the circumstances, entitled to any costs. And doth further declare, that the said Fuller is, and ought to be, deemed a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of the equity of the said Flagg in the other remaining moiety of the premises, and, therefore, is entitled to hold the same free of any equity claim and lien of the said Flagg therein, except as to so much of the purchase money as was unpaid when he the said Fuller had full notice of the said Flagg's equity and claim to the premises, as the same equity and claim are affected in the bill; for all which it is hereby declared, that there is a lien on the premises for the benefit of the said Flagg. And doth further declare, that the said Mann, in the said sale of the premises to the said Fuller, as is in the bill mentioned, without the knowledge or consent of the said Flagg, was guilty of a wrong and constructive fraud upon the rights and equity of the said Flagg, in the premises, and that, therefore, the said Mann is primarily liable to pay over to the said Flagg one moiety of all the purchase money, for which the premises were sold, after deducting therefrom one moiety of the several sums paid by him to the said Walker and Fisher, and to the Frye heirs, for the purchase, assignment, and extinguishment of the interest, right, and title to the premises, and all expenses incident thereto; together with interest upon the same moiety of the same purchase money, from the time when the same was received; if the master shall, under all the circumstances, report any to be due. And the court doth order and decree, that it be referred to Charles Sumner, Esq. appointed a master for this purpose, to take an account of all the moneys received and paid, and expended in the premises; and especially to take an account of all the moneys paid by the said Mann, for the purchases aforesaid, and the expenses incident thereto. And also of all the moneys paid by the said Fuller to the said Mann, and the times when the same were paid, &c.; and whether, and at what time, he had notice of the said Flagg's equity and right in the premises, and what sums now remain due from the said Fuller. And the master is also to report upon all other matters and things, which may be necessary and proper to carry into full effect this interlocutory decree, and especially in regard to interest, &c. &c. And all further orders and decrees are reserved for the further consideration of the court.

[NOTE. For the hearing upon the master's report, see Case No. 4,848.]

this, even if he does not receive a cent of the purchase money.

[Cited in State v. Berning, 74 Mo. 94.]

3. Decretal order passed on the master's report.

This case came on again—see Flagg v. Mann [Case No. 4,847]—to be heard upon the report of the master, which was as follows:

"In pursuance of an order bearing date at the May term of this court, A. D. 1837, whereby it was referred to me, to take an account of all moneys received and paid, and expended in the premises, which formed the subject-matter of the above-entitled cause, and especially to take an account of all moneys paid by the said Mann for the purchases in the said order mentioned, and the expenses incident thereto; and also of all the moneys paid by the said Fuller to the said Mann, and the times when the same were paid, &c., and whether, and at what time he had notice of the said Flagg's equity and right in the premises, and what sums now remain due from the said Fuller; also, to report upon any other matter and thing which may be necessary and proper to carry into full effect the interlocutory decree, and especially in regard to interest, &c., &c.

"I have been attended by the solicitors of all the parties; and the solicitors of the said Mann and Fuller, defendants, having brought in before me an account of the respective sums paid by the said Mann and Fuller, I have, in the presence of the solicitors for the plaintiff and defendants, proceeded to take the said accounts; and I find as follows:

"First. Moneys paid by Mann, &c. On the 8th and 9th of August, 1831, the said Mann paid to Samuel A. Coburn, Esq. for the use of Walker and Fisher, as the price and consideration of their deed to the said Mann of their title to the said land, the sum of ten thousand dollars. On the 6th August, 1831, the said Mann paid to Luther Lawrence, Esq. for the use of the heirs of Polly Frye, and some other expenses incident to the said purchase, the sum of three thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars, being half the price and consideration of their deed of their pretended title and claim to the land in question in this cause, and other adjoining land of equal extent and value, claimed by Josiah Wood, Jr., and of the expenses above referred to, the other half of the consideration for the releases of the Frye heirs, and the expenses aforesaid being paid by John R. Adams, to whom the deeds of the Frye heirs, and of Wood were made. On or about the 8th August, 1831, the said Mann, by release, conveyed a moiety of the premises described in the plaintiff's bill to the said Adams, and Adams at the same time conveyed one half of the Wood lot to Mann in exchange; it being to make them tenants in common of the whole. There was no other consideration. The said defendant, Mann, further claimed to be allowed for his services in the purchase and sale of the land in question in this cause, and for his professional services in the same a commission of five per cent. upon the sums paid for the said land, and upon the sum for which the same was sold to the said Fuller. This claim I have not allowed.

"Second. Time when Fuller had notice of Flagg's equity and right. In my inquiries under this head I have found that the bill of the present plaintiff against Mann, Adams and Fuller, was filed in the supreme court of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, on the 15th February, 1832; that the subpoena was served on all the defendants abovenamed on the 16th February, 1832, the day on which the deed from Richardson to Flagg and Mann was recorded; that the answers of Mann, Adams, and Fuller were sworn to on the 28th of April, 1832; that the bill in the present suit was filed on the 28th of October, 1833. In further proof of notice to the said Fuller of Flagg's equity and right, Benjamin Rand, Esq., of counsel for the plaintiff, referred to the alleged admissions in Fuller's answers, in the supreme court above mentioned, and also in the present cause, now on the files of this court, and to be found at pages 84 and 118 of the printed book containing the pleadings and proceedings in this cause, to which, for the sake of convenience, reference is hereby made; also to the deposition of F. Hobbs, on the files of this court, to be found at page 188 of the printed book above referred to. On a survey of all that has been offered on either side with regard to this point, I find that the said Fuller had notice of the plaintiff's equity and right in the premises on the 16th day of February, 1832, being the date of the service on him of the subpoena under the plaintiff's bill in the supreme court of Massachusetts.

"Third. Moneys paid by Fuller to Mann, and the times when paid. On the 8th day of August, 1831, the said Mann sold to the said Fuller one undivided half of the piece of land in the plaintiff's original bill mentioned, and by him therein claimed, and an undivided half of the piece of land adjacent thereto, of equal extent and value, and claimed by Josiah Wood, Jr., in his original bill now pending in this court. The consideration for the undivided half of both the said parcels was $54,450, which was agreed to be paid by the said Fuller. Of the above sum, the following payments have been made at the times mentioned, viz.: In cash, on the delivery of the deed to Fuller, $5,000. By note negotiable at 60 days, for $5,000, with interest, which was paid at maturity, $5,050. By like note negotiable, at 90 days, for $4,450, with interest, which was paid at maturity, $4,516.75. The residue of the said consideration, being $40.000, was secured to be paid to the said Mann by a mortgage of the undivided half of both parcels of the said land to the said Mann from the said Fuller; a copy of which mortgage is on the files of the court, and is also to be found at page 330 of the printed book abovementioned, to which, for the sake of convenience, reference is hereby made. No notes were given for the moneys mentioned in this mortgage. On receiving the said mortgage, the said Mann gave to the said Fuller a written covenant and agreement, (on the files of this court, a copy of which will be found at page 122 of the printed book abovementioned), whereby the said Mann bound himself to release to the said Fuller, and discharge from the said mortgage parts of the premises mortgaged, in proportion to payments made therefor; to wit, that he would make such releases, until two acres had been discharged, on being paid one shilling for each square foot, and all the residue on being paid twenty cents for each square so released. Of the above sum of $40,000, secured by the mortgage abovementioned, the following payments have been made, and endorsed on the mortgage, at the times mentioned; and the endorsements on the mortgage are as follows, viz.:

October 7th, 1831. Received of Elisha Fuller, twenty-eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars and twelve cents, in part payment of the sum $2827.12 secured on this mortgage, and in consideration thereof, I did yesterday release to said Fuller, sixteen 16962 3-4 feet. thousand nine hundred and sixty-two square feet and three quarters, from the incumbrance of this mortgage.
(Signed) S. H. MANN.

May 2nd, 1832. Received five thousand seven hundred and fifty-five dollars and seven cents, in part of this mortgage. (Signed) S. H. MANN.

Received five thousand dollars by note.

Received fifteen hundred and eighty-seven dollars, in part.
(Signed) S. H. MANN.

Discharged 58,522 feet of land, May 16.

Received four hundred and forty-seven dollars and thirty-one cents, by note.
(Signed) S. H. MANN.

Released 18215 feet, May 24.

"In pursuance of the covenant and agreement above mentioned, on the part of the said Mann, the said sums last above mentioned were applied to redeem certain parts of the premises, and hereinafter stated to be released at the time of the payment, from the mortgage aforesaid; that these applications were made by three deeds of release, executed by the said Mann to the said Fuller, one bearing date October 6th, 1831, and another bearing date May 16th, 1832, and a third bearing date May 24th, 1832, copies of which are hitherto annexed, and marked X. All the land contained and described in the two releases first above mentioned belonged to that part of the premises claimed by Josiah Wood, Jr. The land contained and described in the third release above mentioned party belonged to the premises claimed by Josiah Wood, Jr., and partly belonged to the premises claimed by the present plaintiff; but the relative proportions which belonged to each piece, I have had no means of determining. No other part of the premises claimed by the plaintiff, Flagg, has been discharged from the mortgage above mentioned; and this small portion was discharged, after Fuller had notice of the plaintiff's right and equity in the premises.

"Fourth. What sums now remain due from Fuller? In entering upon this inquiry, it is important to consider, that the interest purchased by Fuller of Mann was an undivided half of two parcels; one known as the Wood lot, and the other claimed by the plaintiff; that the consideration agreed to be paid was on account of the two parcels; and that the mortgage deed for $40,000, already mentioned, applied to an undivided half of both parcels. It has already appeared, that the whole consideration was $54,450;—and that, of this sum, various portions had been paid at different times. Taking into consideration the several sums already paid, and which have been hereinbefore mentioned, and applying them to the reduction of the principal above mentioned, and of the interest thereon accruing, according to the rule laid down by the supreme court of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the case of Dean v. Williams, 17 Mass. 417, I find that the said Fuller owes on the mortgage above mentioned, the sum of twenty-six thousand, one hundred and sixty-four dollars and fifty-one cents ($26,164.51), with legal interest on the said sum from May 24th, 1832. I further find, that the said Fuller, at the time at which he received notice of the equity and right of the said Flagg in the premises, namely, on the 16th February, 1832, owed on the mortgage above mentioned, the sum of thirty-eight thousand, three hundred and eighty dollars and seventy cents ($38,380.70), with legal interest thereon, from the said 16th day of February, 1832.

"The foregoing results seem to exhaust the inquiry with regard to the sums still due from Fuller. Some further facts have, however, appeared before me, to which, at the request of Henry H. Fuller, Esq., I beg leave to call the attention of the court; though, in estimating the sums still due from Fuller, for the purposes of this inquiry, I have not regarded them as important. It appears, that on the 29th March, 1837, by a contract of that date (a copy of which is in the paper hereto annexed), between Josiah Wood, Jr., of the one part, and Samuel H. Mann, John R. Adams, and the said Fuller, of the other part, a settlement by compromise was made of the suit of Wood against Mann and others, on account of the parcel of land adjoining that claimed by the present plaintiff. Another agreement, bearing date on the same 29th March, 1837, (a copy of which is in the paper hereto annexed), was made between the said Mann and Adams, wherein it was agreed that the said Adams should pay the whole amount, which, by the said compromise, was stipulated to be paid to the said Wood, and that the said Mann, in order to secure to the said Adams, the half of the said sum, which ought to be paid by the said Mann, should assign the said mortgage of $40,000, made by the said Fuller, to the said Adams; and that the said mortgage should, when so assigned, be held by Franklin Dexter, Esq., who should not deliver the same unto the said Adams, until the said Mann and Fuller should settle and adjust by themselves, or some referee or referees by them chosen, the amount which ought to be indorsed as paid upon the said mortgage, upon a full hearing between the said Fuller and Mann, taking into consideration the damages and inconvenience sustained by the said Fuller, by reason of the suits of Wood and of the present plaintiff, and all other matters to be alleged, proved, and considered between the said Mann and the said Fuller, which ought to reduce the amount to be paid on the said mortgage by the said Fuller; and when the said sum should be agreed and ascertained, it should be indorsed upon the said mortgage, and should go to reduce the amount which should be payable by the said Fuller, before the same should be delivered to the said Adams. The said Fuller and Mann failing to agree upon the amount which ought to be indorsed as paid upon the said mortgage, the matter was referred, according to the foregoing agreement, to Seth Ames, Samuel A. Coburn, and Jonathan Morse. 2d, all of Lowell, Esquires, who made an award, wherein they decided that an indorsement should be made on the said mortgage, setting forth that the whole sum secured thereby had been paid, except the sum of five thousand dollars, which said sum of five thousand dollars should draw interest from the day of the making of the said award, which was the 18th of April, 1837; and the said Franklin Dexter, Esq., in pursuance of the award aforesaid, indorsed down the said mortgage to the sum of $5,000, with interest from April 18th, 1837. (A copy of which indorsement is hereto annexed, and marked 'B.')

"I have proceeded to ascertain and find the foregoing facts under this head, at the request of the said Fuller, and have hereto annexed to this report, at his request, the state of facts or petition (marked 'A'), in which the said facts, among other matters, are set forth by the said Fuller. I have not regarded the said facts, and the other matters mentioned in the said state of facts or petition, as having any practical bearing on the points of inquiry into which I have been charged to enter, or as affecting the sums which are still due from the said Fuller to the said Mann, so far as the rights of the plaintiff are concerned under the decretal order of this court.

"Fifth. Interest on the purchase money. I have found that the consideration of the undivided half of the two parcels above mentioned, was $54,450; of which $5,000 was paid in cash; $5,000 by a note negotiable at sixty days, with interest, which was paid at maturity; $4,450 by a note negotiable at ninety days, with interest, which was paid at maturity; the remainder, being $40,000, was secured, with interest, by mortgage. I therefore, find that the said Mann is justly chargeable with interest on the purchase money above mentioned.

"Sixth. Moneys due to Flagg from Mann. Deducting the moneys paid by Mann, on account of the premises claimed by the plaintiff, pursuant to the decretal order, I find that there is due from Mann to Flagg, one half of ten hundred and seventy-five dollars, being the balance which Mann received in cash and notes on the delivery of the deed to Fuller, over and above the consideration and expenses of the purchase, hereinbefore stated; also one half of forty thousand dollars, with legal interest on both the said sums from the 8th day of August, 1831; to wit, in the whole, twenty thousand, five hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, with legal interest as aforesaid.

"Exceptions. The draft of the foregoing, being duly exhibited to the respective solicitors of the several parties, the following objections were made by Franklin Dexter, Esq., of counsel for the defendant, Mann:

"First. That the amount paid by Mann to the Frye heirs was $3,500; and not $3,375, as hereinbefore found.

"Second. That the master disallowed the claim of five per cent. made by Mann for commissions and professional services.

"Third. That the master, according to the decretal order, should have found to be due from Mann to Flagg only half the balance of cash and notes above mentioned ($537.50), and that portion of the amount received by Mann on the mortgage, which was applicable to the portion of the Flagg lot, released to the proprietors of the locks and canals.

"Henry H. Fuller, Esq., of counsel for the defendant Fuller, objected,—

"That the master refused to take into consideration the award above mentioned, and the other matters therewith connected, in determining the moneys now due from the said Fuller, so far as the plaintiff is concerned.

"Charles Sumner, Master in Chancery."

The papers referred to in the report are omitted.

The question on the validity of the exceptions was argued by Dexter, for the defendant Mann, and by Rand, for the plaintiff, and by Washburn and Greenleaf, for the defendant Fuller, who objected to the report for not taking into consideration the claims of Fuller, set forth in his petition before the master.

STORY, Circuit Justice. I lay altogether out of the case the claims of Fuller, asserted in his petition. They are not such as could in this stage of the cause come before the master. They constitute, indeed, an equitable claim, which is to be carried into effect, if at all, by an original bill by Fuller against Mann, in some competent court of equity. But Flagg has no connection with them, and if he had, they cannot be asserted under the present bill.

In regard to the exceptions filed by Mann, the first is well founded; and the error has been corrected without objection.

In regard to the second exception; as the conduct of Mann was unauthorized by Flagg, and the sale itself was a constructive fraud upon Flagg, I cannot perceive any ground, upon which the claim of five per cent. commissions on the sale, or any other commission, can be allowed to him. A trustee, doing an act in violation of his trust and duty, ought not, upon principle, to be allowed any thing for his services. They are not, in a just sense, beneficial acts; but must be treated as torts, injurious to the rights of the cestui que trust.

In regard to the third exception, I think the master's report right. It ascertains the sum correctly, for which Mann is responsible to Flagg, according to the intent of the original decree. The sale of Mann was, as I have stated, a wrongful act, and a constructive fraud. By it Flagg has been deprived of his entire right in the premises sued for. By the decree of the court, Flagg is compelled to receive the purchase money instead of the lands. Mann must be deemed liable to Flagg for the purchase money. Flagg has not, by his voluntary election, taken the obligations of the purchaser for the purchase money, or adopted the acts of Mann in the sale. If a man tortiously sells my property, without my consent, he is liable to me for the full value of it at the time of the sale, whether he ever receives a cent of the purchase money, or not.

But the master's report does not touch the point, what, upon the whole case, the final decree ought to be, supposing the report to be accepted. It seems to me, notwithstanding this liability of Mann to Flagg, the court ought not to enforce the rights of Flagg against him, until he has exhausted the other funds, which are within the reach of the court. Fuller is personally liable for the unpaid purchase money to an amount, exceeding the amount due to Flagg; and the land, purchased by Fuller, is subject to a lien for the purchase money. I think, therefore, that the final decree ought to be, that Fuller should be ordered to pay to Flagg so much of the unpaid purchase money as will extinguish Flagg's demand, if he is able to pay it. If he does not pay it within a time to be prescribed by the court, then the land, or so much as is necessary for the purpose, ought to be sold to pay the amount due to Flagg, under an order of the court. If, upon the sale, there is any deficiency, then Mann should be decreed personally to make up that deficiency, besides immediately paying to Flagg the sum of $537.50, admitted to have been received by him, and now in his hands, as part of the purchase money. The decree for the sale should also require Mann and Fuller to join in releasing their title to the land which should be so sold, in such manner and form as the master shall, and they should, direct. Both of them are to be perpetually enjoined against setting up any title thereto, after the sale shall have been made and confirmed by the court. Report accepted.

A further decretal order was passed for a sale of the premises, &c., &c., at the same term, as follows:

Saturday, 30th December. This cause coming on again to be heard before the Honorable Joseph Story, associate justice of the supreme court of the United States, and the Honorable John Davis, judge of the district aforesaid, in the presence of the counsel for the parties, upon the report of the master, Charles Sumner, Esq., to whom it was referred by a decretal order, heretofore made, at the last May term of the said court, to report upon the matters in the said decretal order mentioned, and the exceptions taken to the said report on behalf of the said Mann and Elisha Fuller, respectively, and for further directions: Upon reading the said decretal order and interlocutory decree heretofore made in the said cause, the said report, and the exceptions thereto, and upon debate of the matter, and hearing what was alleged by the counsel for the parties respectively, the said court doth think fit, and doth order and decree, that the exceptions aforesaid to the said report, except the first, which having been allowed and admitted by the parties, had been corrected, be, and the same are overruled, as wholly insufficient, and that the said report, and all the matters and things therein contained, do stand ratified and confirmed. And the said court doth declare, that there is due from the said Mann to the said Flagg, for a moiety of the purchase-money for which the moiety of the premises mentioned in the said interlocutory decree, were sold by the said Mann to the said Elisha Fuller, after deducting from such purchase-money, agreeably to the said interlocutory decree, one moiety of the several sums paid by the said Mann to Walker and Fisher, and the Frye heirs in the said interlocutory decree mentioned, for the purchase, assignment, and extinguishment of their interest, right, and title to the same premises, and all expenses incident thereto, the sum of twenty thousand five hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, with legal interest thereon, at six per cent., to be calculated from the eighth day of August, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and thirty-one, the time of the said sale of the said Mann to said Elisha Fuller, until the same shall be fully paid and satisfied unto the said Flagg. And the said court doth further declare, that inasmuch as it appears that the said Mann, at the time of the said sale by him to the said Elisha Fuller, did receive from the said Elisha Fuller in cash and promissory notes, which were soon afterwards paid to the said Mann, with interest thereon until payment, as a part of the purchase-money upon the said sale, more than sufficient to reimburse to him, the said Mann, all the moneys paid by him to the said Walker and Fisher and the said Frye heirs, and the said incidental expenses; by the sum of one thousand and seventy-five dollars; the said Mann is liable to pay immediately to the said Flagg one moiety thereof, namely, the sum of five hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, with interest, to be calculated thereon at six per cent., from the said eighth day of August, in the year last aforesaid, until the same shall be fully paid and satisfied to the said Flagg; the same being a part of the said sum of twenty thousand five hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents and interest. And the said court doth further declare, that, inasmuch as it appears that the said Elisha Fuller was liable for, and there was due from him to the said Mann, after the said Elisha Fuller had full notice of the claim and equity of the said Flagg in and to the said premises, as a part of the purchase money aforesaid unpaid, a sum exceeding the residue of the said sum of twenty thousand five hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, and interest thereon, to be calculated as aforesaid, there was and is a lien upon the said moiety of the said premises for the purchase money unpaid as aforesaid, to the benefit whereof the said Flagg is entitled, so far as it may be necessary to secure the payment of the said residue, that is to say, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, and the interest thereon at six per cent., to be calculated from the said eighth day of August, in the year last aforesaid, until the same shall be paid and satisfied unto the said Flagg; and that the said Elisha Fuller, on account of the said unpaid purchase money, is liable to pay to the said Flagg so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy unto the said Flagg the sum last mentioned, and interest to be calculated thereon as aforesaid. And the said court doth further declare, that in case the said Elisha Fuller shall fail to pay to the said Flagg the said sum last mentioned, with interest thereon, to be calculated as aforesaid from the said eighth day of August until payment thereof as aforesaid, within the time hereinafter mentioned, the said moiety of the said premises, or so much thereof as may be sufficient therefor, ought to be sold under the order and decree of this court; and the proceeds thereof, after deducting all incidental charges and expenses of such sale, applied towards the payment to the said Flagg of the said sum last mentioned, and interest, to be calculated thereon as aforesaid, before the said Mann shall be required to pay any part of the said last-mentioned sum and interest thereon as aforesaid; and in case the net proceeds of such sale shall be insufficient to pay and satisfy the said last-mentioned sum to the said Flagg, the said Mann ought thereupon to be required immediately to pay and satisfy unto the said Flagg such sum as may be wanting, to supply such deficiency; and the said court doth order and decree, that the said Elisha Fuller, on or before the first Wednesday of June next, do pay and satisfy unto the said Flagg so much of the said purchase-money unpaid as aforesaid, as will be sufficient to satisfy unto the said Flagg the said sum of twenty thousand dollars, and interest, to be calculated thereon as aforesaid, from the said eighth day of August, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and thirty-one, until payment as aforesaid; and that, if the said Fuller shall fail to pay the same sum and interest to the said Flagg on or before the said first Wednesday of June next, the said moiety of the said premises be sold thereupon, immediately, by one of the masters of this court, under the order and decree of this court, he giving due notice of such sale in one or more public newspapers, fourteen days at least before the day appointed for such sale,—and that the proceeds of such sale, after paying therefrom all incidental charges and expenses thereof, be applied towards the payment and satisfaction to the said Flagg of the said sum last-mentioned, and interest to be calculated thereon as aforesaid; and that the said Mann, Elisha Fuller, and all proper parties, as the master shall direct, do join in releasing all right, title, and interest in the said moiety of said premises, or so much thereof as may be sold as aforesaid, upon the confirmation of such sale by this court; and that they be enjoined thereupon, perpetually, against setting up any title or claim thereto. And the said court doth further order and decree, that, if the net proceeds of such sale shall be insufficient to pay and satisfy to the said Flagg the said sum last-mentioned, and the interest thereon, to be calculated as aforesaid, the said Mann do, within thirty days immediately after the confirmation of such sale, pay and satisfy to the said Flagg such sum as shall be then wanting to supply such deficiency. And the said court doth further order and decree, that the said Mann, within thirty days from the date of this decree, do pay and satisfy unto the said Flagg the said sum of five hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, and interest thereon, to be calculated from the said eighth day of August, in the year aforesaid, until payment thereof. And all further orders and decrees in the premises are reserved for the further order of the court.

The object of postponing the sale to so late a period was to avoid the disadvantages of a sale arising from the extreme pressure and the commercial embarrassment of the times; and to bring the whole matter before the court during its next term, if any exigencies should require any variation or alteration of the decree.

Case No. 4,849.

FLAHERTY et al. v. DOANE et al.

[1 Lowell, 148.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1867.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—LIEN—LOSS OF VESSEL — PROCEEDS.

1. The master of a fishing vessel had hired her of the owners for the season, and undertaken to pay the men, certain of whom were hired on wages. The vessel was lost during the season, and parts of her tackle, &c., were saved, and sold in Nova Scotia: Held, that the owners were liable to an action in the admiralty by the men for their wages to the extent of the proceeds of the sale of the wreck.

2. Whether the owners could have been sued personally for the wages if the vessel had returned, and the voyage had proved so disastrous as not to reimburse the great general charges, quaere?

3. But the men would have had a lien on the vessel, and on her remnants, and they can follow the fund into the hands of the owners by a libel, and can recover to the extent of the proceeds of sale which have been remitted to the owners.

[Cited in The Montauk, Case No. 9,717.]

4. A fund arising out of a res upon which seamen have a lien can be followed in the admiralty, though the thing itself has been destroyed, or is out of the jurisdiction.

5. Whether such a proceeding should be in form, a proceeding in rem or in personam, quaere?

[Cited in Snow v. One Hundred and Eighty and Three-Fourths Tons of Scrap Iron, 11 Fed. 519.]

Libel by seamen [Patrick Flaherty and others] against [Valentine Doane and others] the owners of the schooner Edith, for wages said to have been earned on a cod-fishing voyage. The evidence tended to show that the schooner was let to the master by parol, on his undertaking to give the owners one-fourth of the catchings, after deducting the great general charges. The master engaged two or three men on shares, and the remainder, who were the libellants, on wages of three hundred dollars for the season. The schooner was lost on the coast of Nova Scotia, about six weeks after she sailed from home, and parts of her tackle, rigging, and fish were saved and sold by the master in Nova Scotia. The master was to man the schooner; and the owners knew that some men would go on shares and some on wages. A paper was exhibited which purported to be shipping articles, conforming to the act of June 19, 1813 (3 Stat. 2), and made all the crew sharesmen, but it was not proved that the libellants ever signed it; nor did either party rely upon it in evidence or in argument; nor was it denied that these men were entitled to wages pro rata from the master who hired them. The evidence did not show that the men knew of the contract between the master and owners unless such knowledge was to be inferred from the usages of the business.

C. G. Thomas, for libellants.

In The Adelphi [Case No. 80], decided by Judge Sprague, in 1862, it was held that the men have a lien on the vessel in exactly such a case as this. If so they have a personal action against the owners.

S. H. Phillips, for respondents.

The rule in personal actions is the same in the admiralty as at common law, that a plaintiff who founds his demand on a contract with an agent must prove the agent's authority. Here the master could not bind the owners, and their proceeding must fail. Mayo v. Snow [Case No. 9,356]; Webb v. Peirce [Id. 17,321]. These were actions for supplies, but wages follow the same rule.

LOWELL, District Judge. The decisions in the circuit court are, that, where the master of a fishing vessel becomes the owner for the voyage, the general owners are not personally liable for such supplies obtained in the home port, as the master had undertaken to furnish at his own expense. Mr. Justice Curtis, in giving his opinion in Mayo v. Snow [Case No. 9,356], refers to the then unpublished decision of the supreme judicial court, Harding v. Souther, 12 Cush. 307, as not being inconsistent with this doctrine, for certain reasons which he gives; and it is not so, though for a different reason, because, as now appears from the authorized report, the master was not in that case owner for the voyage, as he was shown to be in the case in the circuit court. The supreme judicial court construed a certain paper as not amounting to such charter as would exonerate the owners; and the circuit court construed a certain parol agreement to have that legal effect; but the two were not alike. Mr. Justice Curtis, at the conclusion of his opinion in Webb v. Peirce [Case No. 17,321], expressly reserves his decision concerning the right of seamen to proceed against general owners who have received freight earned on the voyage for which the wages are claimed. This case hardly comes within that reservation, in terms, though it may in principle, as I shall hereafter explain. Here the remnants saved from the wreck were not sufficient to reimburse the owners for the great general charges; and therefore it cannot be said that they have received any thing in the nature of freight. If, therefore, this schooner had arrived safely at home, but had made a bad voyage, so that the owners were not made whole for their actual outlay, I assume that a personal action could not have been maintained against them for wages, according to the authorities which I am bound to follow, for it is admitted that the master was to pay these wages.

There is, however, a ground on which the seamen may recover the whole or a part of their wages. If the vessel had arrived they would have had a lien on her. No case has ever yet decided that seamen, hired by a charterer, lose their lien on the vessel. The contrary was held in The Adelphi [Case No. 80], if the manuscript report of Judge Sprague's decision, produced at the hearing, is accurate, and I have no reason to doubt it. Admiralty liens depend more on services rendered the ship, than on any question of agency. Where the master is charterer and owner pro hac vice, he may impress the vessel with liens for supplies in a foreign port, Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 22; and this, although the material-man knows the master has taken her on shares, and is to victual and man her: The Monsoon [Case No. 9,716]. So, in salvage there is usually no contract; and, where there is one, the courts will often disregard it; the lien rests on benefit conferred to the thing benefited; and in salvage there can be no personal action against the owner unless he shall have accepted the property after the service has been performed. And a master de facto can give a valid bottomry bond.

There being then a lien on the ship, and of course on her remnants, and the wreck having been sold before the libellants had an opportunity to enforce their remedy, they may follow the proceeds into the hands of the owners, and maintain their libel to the extent of what I may call the "assets." Proceedings in rem may be maintained, not only where there is a vessel or other thing which can be arrested by the marshal, but also where there is a fund in the possession of persons within the jurisdiction. In England, actions in personam, strictly so called, fell into disuse (The Clara, Swab. 3); but an efficient substitute was found in the process in rem, which was served by a monition to the owners to show cause; and this was issued even though the vessel were on a voyage, or belonged to the crown, and therefore was not liable to arrest; or even in some cases though the vessel had been totally lost (Coote, Adm. 131, etc.; The Trelawney, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 216, note; The Meg Merrilies, 3 Hagg. Adm. 346; The Stephen Wright, 12 Jur. 732). For this reason causes in the admiralty were always entitled as of a vessel or cargo, &c., for they were always in rem. The action in personam has been revived by the admiralty court act of 1861, but this is only a cumulative remedy, as I suppose, in cases where the old practice is applicable, for that practice was expressly sanctioned by the act of 1854.

The practice is not unknown in this country. We often require notice of the action in rem to be served by a simple monition, where there is no danger of loss by that form of proceeding and it is desirable to save the expense of custody. In prize, the court of the captor's country has jurisdiction, though the captured property has been sold abroad; and this is recognized by the prize act of 30th June, 1864, § 1 (13 Stat. 307). So in salvage and bottomry, in which there is usually no personal action against owners, the suit in rem is not defeated by the conversion of the property into money. In Sheppard v. Taylor, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 675, money paid by Spain for the wrongful confiscation of a ship, and for the loss of freight was permitted to be followed by a libel in personam, not only into the hands of the owners, but also into those of assignees, with notice. Mr. Justice Story, speaking for the court, says (page 711): "Over the subject of seamen's wages, the court has an undisputed jurisdiction in rem as well as in personam; and wherever the lien for wages exists and attaches upon proceeds, it is the familiar practice of that court to exert its jurisdiction over them, by way of monition to the parties holding the proceeds."

This explains the meaning of Mr. Justice Curtis's reservation in Webb v. Peirce [Case No. 17,321], above mentioned, that he will not say that owners who have received freight earned on a voyage are not answerable in the admiralty for wages; for such owners could be held to answer to the extent of the freight, by reason of the lien upon it.

The twenty-third admiralty rule of the supreme court requires all libels in rem to allege that the property is within the district in which the action is brought. No doubt this modifies the ancient practice so far as to establish the locality of certain actions which otherwise might have been brought in any district where the owners were found. But it cannot have been the purpose of the court to take away a right of action founded on the existence of a fund held by persons within the jurisdiction, and thus to overrule Sheppard v. Taylor by indirection, if that case should be called a suit in rem, which I doubt.

It is not necessary to put the rights of these libellants on the doctrine of salvage, that owners who have accepted the saved goods may be proceeded against in personam. The demand is really for wages, and the right to follow the proceeds into the hands of the owners by a libel is the same in both cases. It would be more regular that a full statement of the case, showing how and to what extent the owners are liable, should be made in the libel; but the trifling amount due in this case will hardly warrant the expense of an amendment; and I have not carefully examined the question whether one would be necessary, because the parties have argued the case on its merits, without interposing any technical objections. There is reason to suppose, that after advance wages and supplies have been deducted, but little will remain due to the libellants; but that little must be paid, if the proceeds of sale are sufficient.

Decree accordingly.

District Court, D. California. Nov. 15, 1878.

VOLUNTARY PETITION FILED BEFORE ADJUDICATION ON PREVIOUS INVOLUNTARY PETITION.

Where a petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed, and the debtor, before adjudication, made a composition with his creditors which was subsequently set aside by reason of his inability to carry it into effect, whereupon he filed his voluntary petition, and was duly adjudicated: Held, that the pendency of the first proceeding was no bar to the institution of the second; and that the court would proceed in the latter, and the further prosecution of the former would be stayed.

In bankruptcy.

Naphtaly, Friedenrich and Ackerman, for bankrupt.

J. R. Brandon, Esq., for creditor, Cornelius King.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. On the sixteenth of May, 1878, a petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed against John Flanagan by certain of his creditors, claiming to constitute one fourth in number of all his creditors, and to represent one third in value of his aggregate indebtedness. On this petition the usual order to show cause was issued, and on the same day a petition was presented by the debtor praying that a creditor's meeting be called to consider a composition proposed for their approval. The meeting was accordingly held, the composition was accepted by creditors to the requisite number and amount, and on the first of July the composition was duly confirmed by the court, and further proceedings in bankruptcy stayed.

On the twenty-eighth of August, one Thomas Meany, a creditor of the alleged bankrupt, filed his petition, praying that the composition be set aside. The ground of this application was, that the bankrupt had failed, and refused to comply with its terms by depositing certain notes with the register for the benefit of his creditors.

The reason of this refusal was the fact that one King had, previously to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, levied an attachment upon the whole stock in trade of the alleged bankrupt, which attachment he refused to relinquish, and accept the terms of the composition.

As no adjudication had been made—no assignee appointed, nor assignment made by the register—the lien of the attaching creditor remained unaffected by the bankruptcy proceedings.

This petition was, after several continuances, finally brought to a hearing on the twenty-fourth of September, 1878, on which day an order setting aside the composition was made. Previously, however, to the making of this order, but subsequently to the filing of Meany's petition, viz., on the thirty-first of August, Flanagan filed his voluntary petition to be adjudged a bankrupt. The usual order of reference was made, and on the twenty-third of September he was adjudicated a bankrupt by the register. At the creditor's meeting, called by the register for the election of an assignee, King, the attaching creditor, appeared by his counsel, and objected to the proceedings, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction in the premises by reason of the pendency of the proceedings under the involuntary petition; and that the same not having been dismissed or otherwise terminated, the court would not permit or take cognizance of the proceedings under the voluntary petition.

The question thus presented was certified to the court, argued by counsel, and submitted for decision. It is objected, on behalf of the bankrupt, that King, the attaching creditor, has no standing in court, not having proved his debt in either proceeding. To this it is replied that proof of debt was not made in the present proceeding, because the creditor, by so doing, might be deemed to have come in under it, and to have waived his right to object to it. Technically, the objection of the bankrupt seems to be well taken; but the omission can be remedied, and the rights of the creditor preserved by ordering him to make such proof, and reserving to him the right to make thereafter such objection to the proceedings as he may see fit.

In the view I take of the principal question, such an order is unnecessary, for I shall proceed to dispose of the application on its merits, and as if the attaching creditor were regularly in court.

The ground on which the court is urged to set aside the adjudication, and to dismiss the petition in the voluntary case, is that the whole proceeding is void for irregularity. In support of this position, several cases are cited, and confidently relied on by counsel. The first and most pointed of these is In re Stewart [Case No. 13,419]. In that case a petition had been filed against Stewart by his creditors, and he had, before the return day of the rule, to show cause by an indorsement upon the copy of the petition served upon him, admitted that all the allegations of the petition, except those of fraud, were true. He subsequently, and before the return day of the rule to show cause, filed his voluntary petition, and was adjudged a bankrupt. No reason for this proceeding appears to have been given, and the attorneys for the petitioning creditors moved that the two petitions be consolidated, or else that the adjudication on the second petition be set aside, and the case of the creditors held for trial.

In deciding this motion Mr. J. Duval observes: "It never was intended by the bankrupt act, and no correct rule of practice can tolerate it, that when a creditor has instituted proceedings to force his debtor into bankruptcy the latter should be allowed to become a bankrupt and be adjudicated as such on his own petition before a determination of the creditors' petition. To permit such a practice might work a flagrant wrong upon the rights of the petitioning creditor." The adjudication under the voluntary petition was thereupon set aside and the debtor was adjudged on the creditors' petition. As a general rule of practice the ruling of the learned judge in this case was very possibly correct. But it by no means follows that the right of the insolvent to avail himself of the benefit of the act is in all cases suspended by the filing of a petition against him, or that the court is without jurisdiction to entertain it if filed.

Cases may easily be imagined where it may be indispensable to the interests of the other creditors and to the securing to the debtor the benefit of the act that he should file his voluntary petition. The creditors' petition may be abandoned before adjudication or the allegation of the act of bankruptcy may be untrue, or the creditors may not be the holders of provable debts, or they may not constitute the statutory quorum of creditors. In these and the like cases it might be a great hardship upon the debtor to compel him either to admit allegations which he knows to be untrue, or else to be subjected to the delay and expense of contesting them, and in the mean time to have his right to the benefit of the act suspended and denied. At the termination of the proceedings, if the result be in his favor, his right to file his voluntary petition would of course revive. But it may then be too late to defeat attachments and preferences, and to secure the equal distribution of his assets among all his creditors. The principal object of the act would thus be defeated.

The next case cited is In re Wielarski [Case No. 17,619]. In that case the bankrupt filed a voluntary petition in 1868, on which he was adjudicated, and an assignee appointed. In 1870 he filed a second petition. The same debts were set forth, and the same creditors named in both petitions. Objection was made to the proceeding under the second petition, which objection the register held to be well taken. The matter having been referred to the court, Mr. Justice Blatchford said: "The register is correct; the clerk will enter an order staying proceedings in this matter until the further order of the court. If any good reason exists for going on with this matter, it may be shown to the court." This case, therefore, not only does not decide that the filing of the second petition was wholly nugatory and void, and that the court was without jurisdiction to entertain it, but it clearly intimates that the court would proceed in it if any good reason for doing so should be shown.

The next case—In re Drisko [Case No. 4,090]—appears to have no application to the subject under consideration. It merely decides that a voluntary bankrupt who has contracted new debts since the filing of a prior petition may file a new petition in bankruptcy.

The next case—In re Lacey, Downs & Co. [Case No. 7,965]—also has no bearing upon the present inquiry. It relates merely to the right of a creditor to intervene and prosecute to adjudication when the petitioning creditor fails to appear or proceed with the prosecution.

The above are all the cases cited by the counsel for the attaching creditor. It will be seen that only one of them lends any support to the position he seeks to maintain. I have not been referred by the counsel for the bankrupt to any case where the point under consideration has been decided under the late bankrupt act. But a decision under the former act is cited, which, by the force of its reasoning and the great eminence of the judge by whom it was made, is entitled to the greatest consideration. I transcribe the whole of Judge Conkling's opinion: "I can perceive no sufficient reason why the pendency of the creditors' petition on which no decree of bankruptcy has yet been granted, should be considered a bar to the right of voluntary petition secured by the act to the debtor. The act contains no such limitation of this right. The debtor may have good reasons for wishing to exercise it, notwithstanding the prior prosecution of a petition in invitum. He may be apprehensive that it may be voluntarily abandoned, or he may know that the charges it makes against him are unfounded, and think proper to contest their truth, and thus defeat the petition. I can not see that any injury can possibly be done to creditors by this practice, while in one respect it is advantageous by giving them the benefit of the petitioners' schedules of debts and property without expense." In re Canfield [Case No. 2,380]. These observations appear to me conclusive.

But it is urged that the bankrupt act directs that where the court has refused to accept and confirm a composition, or has set it aside after confirmation, "the debtor shall be proceeded with as a bankrupt." It is contended that under this provision the debtor, after failure to effect a composition, or after it has been set aside by the court, is to be taken and deemed to be a bankrupt, even though no adjudication has been made against him. Whether it is supposed that a formal adjudication must in such a case be made, or whether he is to be considered and proceeded with as a bankrupt without such adjudication, I did not clearly understand at the hearing. But whichever course be adopted, it is claimed that the debtor is, under the circumstances stated, declared by law to be a bankrupt; and it is no longer open to the court to inquire into the truth of any of the allegations of the petition, either in respect to the quorum of creditors, the commission of the acts of bankruptcy alleged, or the existence of the debts alleged to be due to the petitioning creditors.

As a corollary to this proposition, it is urged that, inasmuch as the court is expressly commanded to proceed with the debtor as a bankrupt, that proceeding must be prosecuted, and no other proceeding founded on his voluntary petition can be entertained. It does not appear that the construction of the above-cited provision of the bankrupt act, which this court is urged to adopt, has hitherto received any judicial sanction. It seems to be favored, however, by Mr. Blumenstiel, as demanded by the language, and most nearly conforming to the English act from which it is modeled. Blum. Bankr. 464.

But the correctness of this interpretation is open to serious question. If, upon the failure of a proposal of composition, the debtor is to be at once adjudicated a bankrupt, it must be because the proposal of the debtor for a composition is treated as an admission of the truth of all the allegations in the creditor's petition necessary to procure an adjudication. But can this proposal be so treated?

An honest debtor, against whom a petition has been filed, and who knows himself to be insolvent, may propose or attempt an arrangement with his creditors, although he has not committed any of the acts of bankruptcy (perhaps fraudulent) with which he is charged; and although he knows that the necessary quorum of creditors have not united in the petition. His want of success in effecting the composition can not surely be treated as an admission by him of the truth of allegations which he knows to be false. His proposal for a composition is an admission of his insolvency, and nothing else. Justice seems to demand that, after failing to effect it, it should still be open to him to contest the truth of the allegations upon which it is sought to procure his adjudication as an involuntary bankrupt.

But even if his proposal for a composition could be considered as an admission by him to the extent supposed, it could have no greater effect than his written admission of the truth of the allegations. The provisions of the act which require that creditors to a specified proportionate number and amount shall join in the petition, were not intended solely for the protection of the debtor. Even when he has signed a written admission that the requisite quorum has united in the petition, the court must still "be satisfied that the admission is made in good faith." If it should subsequently appear that it was the result of collusion and fraud, the adjudication may be set aside. In re Duncan [Case No. 4,131].

The dissentient creditors have rights which the statute recognizes and the court will protect. And amongst them is the right to insist that if the debtor, contrary to their wishes and interests, is to be thrown into involuntary bankruptcy, it shall be done only under the conditions imposed by the law. The debtor's admission that those conditions exist is of no effect if the fact be otherwise. It results that even if the proposal for composition could be treated as an admission by the debtor of all the allegations of the petition, it could have no effect to conclude the inquiry as to whether the requisite quorum has joined, because his written admission of the fact, if it does not exist, would be equally nugatory.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the object and meaning of the clause in question were merely that the court, on the failure of the proceedings in composition, should resume the case at the point where its progress was suspended by the proceedings in composition, and that it should be thereafter conducted as if no proceedings had been taken. In other words, that the phrase, "he shall be proceeded with as a bankrupt," should be construed to mean that the case shall be proceeded with as a case in bankruptcy in conformity with the provisions of law. This would also seem to be the reasonable construction of the English act upon which, as Mr. Blumenstiel observes, our own is modeled. The language of that act is: "If it appear to the court * * * that a composition in consequence of legal difficulties, or for any cause, can not proceed without injustice or undue delay * * * the court may adjudge the debtor a bankrupt and proceedings may be had accordingly." That is, the court may so adjudge if a proper case for an adjudication be made out. If this construction of the clause in question be correct, the circumstance that an abortive attempt at composition has been made may be eliminated from this discussion, and the case become the simple one of a filing of a voluntary petition by a debtor against whom a petition in invitum has already been filed, but on which no adjudication has been made. It it is evident that in such case proceedings in both suits can not go on; and it is equally clear that proceedings should be continued in the case in which an adjudication has been made, and in which no questions can arise as to the concurrence of the requisite quorum of creditors, or the commission by the bankrupt of the acts of bankruptcy alleged. There will thus be secured to the bankrupt the benefit offered by the act, and to the creditors the equal distribution of the assets discharged of any attachments which are by the act declared to be dissolved.

The objection of the attaching creditor is overruled, and the register will proceed in the matter of the voluntary petition. The proceedings in the involuntary case will be stayed, unless the petitioning creditors should desire to move for its final dismissal.

The clerk will certify this decision to the register.

Case No. 4,851.

FLANDERS v. ABBEY et al.

[6 Biss. 16.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Feb., 1874.

BANKRUPTCY — JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURT — CHARGING ESTATE OF MARRIED WOMAN.

1. The United States circuit court has jurisdiction of a bill by an assignee to recover money or property of the bankrupt preferentially or fraudulently conveyed.

[Cited in Cady v. Whaling, Case No. 2,285; Sill v. Solberg, 6 Fed. 471.]

2. In Wisconsin a married woman, by simply indorsing a note, does not create a liability which can be enforced against her separate estate, nor one upon which a personal judgment will be rendered against her.

[This was a bill in equity by James G. Flanders, assignee, against Matilda O. Abbey and others.]

Davis & Flanders, for complainant.

I. Where a court of equity has concurrent jurisdiction with a court of law, it will retain jurisdiction of a case if there is not a plain and adequate remedy at law, or if the question of fraud is involved. Smith v. Buchanan [Case No. 13,016]; Buchanan v. Smith [16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 277]; Warren v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. [Case No. 17,194]; Warren v. Tenth Nat. Bank [Id. 17,202]; Garrison v. Markley [Id. 5,256].

II. There was no adequate remedy at law. Will. Eq. Jur. 651; Todd v. Lee, 15 Wis. 365, 16 Wis. 480; Yale v. Dederer, 18 N. Y. 265, 22 N. Y. 450; Phillips v. Graves, 20 Ohio St. 371; Corn Exchange Bank v. Babcock, 42 N. Y. 613.

III. The question of fraud was involved.

IV. The knowledge of the husband is knowledge of the wife in matters pertaining to wife's property when the husband manages it.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for defendants.

HOWE, District Judge. This is a demurrer to a bill in equity brought by plaintiff as assignee of Little & Fyler, bankrupts.

The bill alleges that in February, 1871, Little executed a note for $2,000, and procured it to be indorsed by the defendant, Matilda O. Abbey, the wife of defendant, D. C. Abbey, and "by such indorsement charged her own individual and separate estate for the payment thereof;" that the note was subsequently "passed" to the defendant bank; that within two months of the adjudication of bankruptcy, all the defendants and the bankrupt Little confederated together for the purpose of obtaining a fraudulent preference over the creditors of the bankrupt, and, in execution of that purpose, obtained $2,000 from the sale of property of the bankrupts, and paid the same to the defendant bank, and took up the note; that the bankrupts were at that time insolvent, and that all the defendants knew them to be so; that the note was so paid before maturity; that the defendant bank knew that the money was obtained from the property of the bankrupts; that it was paid to and received by it to prevent its going into the hands of the assignee, for the purpose of obtaining a fraudulent preference and to defeat the provisions of the bankrupt act.

The bill further avers that defendant, D. C. Abbey, was in the employment of the bankrupts when these acts were committed, and was at the same time the agent of his wife in all the transactions; that defendant Matilda "has of her own separate estate, independently of her said husband, certain property and estate in the city of Milwaukee, Wis., which said property and estate, she, the said Matilda, charged with the payment of the note hereinbefore mentioned."

The relief prayed is that the plaintiff may be decreed to be entitled to the said sum of $2,000, and that the defendant bank and defendant Matilda be decreed to pay it to him, and for general relief. Each of the defendants files a separate demurrer.

The causes of demurrer assigned are:

1. That plaintiff has complete remedy at law.

2. That plaintiff has joined several distinct matters in his bill.

3. Multifariousness: that defendant, D. C. Abbey, is not properly a party, no relief being prayed against him.

4. That plaintiff, as to defendant, Matilda, has not stated such a case as can constitute a proper or legal charge upon her separate estate.

I. As to the alleged want of equity in the bill, as against all the defendants. The substance of the bill in this respect is that the acts of the defendants in obtaining from the property of the bankrupts the money and applying it in the payment of the note due to one of them and indorsed by the other, under all the circumstances, was a fraudulent act, both as to the other creditors and as to the bankrupt act itself.

It is a well-settled rule that courts of equity possess a general concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law in cases of fraud cognizable in the latter; and exclusive jurisdiction in cases of fraud beyond the reach of the courts of law. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 184.

In cases of alleged fraud, courts of law and equity have a concurrent jurisdiction, and the party may apply to one or the other, at his option. Goss v. Lester, 1 Wis. 52.

Section 2 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] gives this court jurisdiction of all suits in law or equity, which may be brought by the assignee touching any property or rights of property of the bankrupt, transferable to or vested in such assignee.

This section leaves the jurisdiction as between the two courts as it was at the time of its passage. It does not enlarge the equity powers of the court, but leaves them as they were before. Whenever, then, any proper party would be entitled to invoke the aid of an equity court, the assignee in bankruptcy, by virtue of this section, has the same right, upon the same facts. The allegations of fraud confer the power upon the equity court in both cases.

These principles were applied by Judge Lowell, of the district court of Massachusetts,—Pratt v. Curtis [Case No. 11,375],—in the case of a suit in equity by the assignee of a bankrupt to set aside a voluntary conveyance of land, where the fraud alleged was an attempt to delay and hinder creditors; to a suit in equity by an assignee to set aside mortgages of personal property, where the fraud alleged was a design to give the mortgagee a preference over creditors of the bankrupt, by Justice Clifford in circuit court for the district of Maine,—Scammon v. Cole [Id. 12,432]; to a suit in equity by an assignee to recover the proceeds of goods sold under judgment in a state court against the bankrupt, taken by confession, where both parties knew of the insolvency,—Traders' Bank v. Campbell, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 87. These proceeds were money in the possession of the bank, and a suit at law was a plain, simple and adequate remedy.

I think these cases dispose of the demurrer, and that it must be overruled as to the defendant bank.

II. The demurrer as to the other defendants raises an entirely different question. Is the plaintiff entitled to any relief as to the defendant Matilda and her husband upon the facts stated in the complaint? We have already shown that the foundation for the claim for relief against her is the indorsement by her of the paper of the bankrupts—for their accommodation. It is not alleged that it was in any manner for the benefit of her separate estate, or that she received any consideration for the act. The bankrupts wanted to borrow money. They were unable to do it upon their own credit. She executed no paper or instrument, creating any express charge upon her estate. The bill alleges that she charged her separate estate, "by such indorsement." After the indorsement, and probably because of it, it was taken by the defendant bank. At law, independent of any statute of this state, such an indorsement would be void, creating no liability against the feme covert. The effect of the Wisconsin statute of 1850 (the only one that can affect this question) conferring certain powers upon married women, has been several times before the supreme court of this state. It was finally held, in Conway v. Smith, 13 Wis. 125, that the contracts of a married woman, when necessary or convenient to the proper use and enjoyment of her separate estate, were binding in law.

But the same court held, in Todd v. Lee, 15 Wis. 365, that all her other engagements stood as before the passage of the act, good only in equity. The change from an equitable to a legal estate has not in respect to them enlarged her power, or removed the disability of coverture, but she remains as if still possessed of an estate in equity, without restriction as to her power of disposition.

The only question, then, is: Will the feme covert by the indorsement of this note, create such a debt or incur such a liability that a court of equity will make it a charge upon her separate property? Different rules have been applied to such facts by the leading equity courts of this country and those in England. The English rule has been broader than that usually enforced here. There they have applied the separate estate of a feme covert to the payment of all her debts without inquiry into the purposes for which they were contracted. It was enough to know that she had contracted the liability; the court applied her estate to its discharge as fully as a court of law applied the property of any debtor to the payment of a judgment against him. The courts of New York went very far at one time in the same direction. Without stopping to make any examination of the many cases on this subject, it is sufficient now to remark that a more restricted rule has been generally applied by the courts of this country, and I think the true doctrine is that stated by the supreme court of Massachusetts, in the case of Willard v. Eastham, 15 Gray, 328.

When, by the contract, the debt is made expressly a charge upon the separate estate, or is expressly contracted upon its credit, or when the consideration goes to the benefit of such estate, or to enhance its value, then equity will decree that it shall be paid from such estate, or its income, to the extent to which the power of disposal by the married woman may go. But when she is a mere surety, or makes the contract for the accommodation of another without consideration received by her, the contract being void at law, equity will not enforce it against her estate, without an express instrument making the debt a charge upon it. Upon this point see, also, Yale v. Dederer, 18 N. Y. 265; Peake v. Labaw, 6 C. E. Green [21 N. J. Eq.] 269; Kimm v. Weippert, 46 Mo. 534.

If a court of equity will not enforce the liability created by that indorsement upon the separate estate of this defendant, it will be at once conceded that it will not make any decree against her personally. The only reason given for making her a party, is the fact of this indorsement. It is not alleged that she received the money from the bankrupt's property, with which the note was paid. That was paid to the bank. As no decree can be had against her, it follows that she was improperly made a defendant.

The only reason for making D. C. Abbey a defendant, is that he is the husband of Matilda, and that she could not be sued without joining him in the proceedings.

The demurrer must be sustained as to the defendants Abbey, without costs to either party, plaintiff to amend his complaint within ten days, if he so elects.

FLANDERS v. AETNA INS. CO.

[3 Mason, 158.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1823.

SERVICE OF PROCESS — FOREIGN CORPORATION — GENERAL APPEARANCE—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

A., a citizen of New Hampshire, sued a corporation established by a statute in Connecticut, in the circuit court of New Hampshire; the corporation having entered a general appearance, it was held, that the objection to the service under the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20 [1 Stat. 73], was waived.

[Cited in Clarke v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co., Case No. 2,859; Lee v. Aetna Ins. Co., Id. 8,181; Winans v. McKean R. & Nav. Co., Id. 17,862; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 12 Wall. (79 U. S.) 86; Knott v. Southern Life Ins. Co., Case No. 7,894; Robinson v. National Stock-Yard Co., 12 Fed. 362; Edwards v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 20 Fed. 453; Romaine v. Union Ins. Co., 28 Fed. 639; Spies v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co., 32 Fed. 713.]

This was a suit on a policy of insurance underwritten by the defendants, a corporation established in Connecticut, by a legislative act, and composed of citizens of that state, by which the plaintiff [Thomas Flanders], a citizen of New Hampshire, was insured 3000 dollars on his house, barn, furniture, library, &c. against losses by fire. The defendants had entered a general appearance. A question arose at the bar upon a motion to dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction, the defendants not being a corporation in the state where the suit was brought, and the act of 1789, c. 20, § 11, was cited in support of the motion.

Cushman and Bartlett, for plaintiff.

E. Cutts and Mr. Mason, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. By the judiciary act of 1789, § 11, the circuit court has jurisdiction of suits "between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state." If the case stood singly upon this clause, there would be an end of this objection, for this suit falls precisely within the description. The case of Deveaux v. Bank of U. S., 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 61, has decided, that the jurisdiction attaches in a suit where the corporation, which is a party to the suit, is composed of citizens of the state, in the same manner as if it were against the same persons in their private capacities. In other words, the court will look behind the artificial entity, the corporation, to see who are the persons really parties in interest. But the same section (section 11) goes on to provide, that no civil suit shall be brought before the circuit court "against any inhabitant of the United States by any original process in any other district, than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of the serving the writ." Upon this principle, there may perhaps be difficulty in averring, that the present corporation has any inhabitancy or commorancy at all. But it is averred in the writ, that it is composed of citizens of Connecticut, and of course of persons having an inhabitancy there. The objection would therefore be fatal, if it had been interposed in the first instance. But it has been uniformly held, that this clause does not per se oust the jurisdiction, but is a privilege given to the defendant, of which he may avail himself at a proper time, or which he may waive at his pleasure. The entering of an appearance generally has been held to be a waiver of it, and an admission of a due and effectual service to compel the party to answer. Pollard v. Dwight, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 421; Knox v. Summers, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 496; Logan v. Patrick, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 288; Harrison v. Rowan [Case No. 6,140]; Gracie v. Palmer, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 699. In the present case, a general appearance has been entered, and steps taken towards the trial of the cause, as a cause rightfully in court. I think, therefore, the motion must be overruled. Motion overruled accordingly.

FLANDERS v. THOMPSON et al.

[3 Woods, 9.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov., 1876.

TRUSTS—JUDGMENT CREDITOR OF TRUSTEE — RESULTING TRUST—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

1. A judgment creditor is not a bona fide purchaser who as such is protected against a resulting trust.

2. Where B, holding trust funds, invested them in real estate and took the title in his own name, and was afterwards compelled, by order of court, to convey the property so acquired to the party entitled to the money: Held, that a creditor of B, who had recovered and recorded judgments against him long before the latter took title to the property, could not, under the jurisprudence of Louisiana, acquire a lien thereon superior to the equities of the party with whose money the property had been paid for, and to whom it had been conveyed by order of this court.

W. W. Howe, for petitioner.
Sam'l B. Blanc, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The question presented by this case is whether, under the jurisprudence of Louisiana, a trustee holding trust funds, and against whom there stand recorded judicial mortgages, can pay off such mortgages by investing the trust funds in real estate in his own name, and thus subjecting it to the lien of the judicial mortgages so recorded. The facts were these. In the year 1869 the defendant, Edward Thompson, recovered in the fourth district court for the parish of Orleans, two judgments against one H. S. Bell, amounting in the aggregate to $672, and in the same year had them placed on record in the mortgage office of said parish. Afterwards, in 1874, Bell was appointed assignee in bankruptcy of one J. W. Champlin. Certain assets of the bankrupt estate having come to the possession of Bell, in July, 1875, he invested them in two lots in the city of New Orleans, and took the deed therefor in his own name. These facts having been brought to the notice of the bankrupt court, Bell was in November, 1876, removed as assignee and Benj. F. Flanders appointed in his stead, and Bell was ordered to convey the said lots purchased with the means of the bankrupt estate to Flanders the new assignee, which he did. Thompson, by virtue of his judgments against Bell, recorded in 1869, now claims that he has a lien for the amount thereof on the property purchased by Bell and by him conveyed to Flanders, and that his judgments ought to be first paid out of the proceeds of their sale. Under the general system of equity jurisprudence, a claim so unconscionable and so bare of equity would not be listened to.

The purchase by Bell, with the money of the bankrupt estate, subjected the property, though standing in the name of Bell, to a resulting trust in favor of the bankrupt estate: Perry, Trusts § 128; Trench v. Harrison, 17 Sim. 111; Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 619; McDonogh v. Murdoch, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 367. This same doctrine is recognized in Louisiana: Hall v. Sprigg, 7 Mart. [La.] 244; Rhodes v. Hooper, 6 La. Ann. 357; Giannoni v. Gunny, 14 La. Ann. 632; Livingston v. Morgan, 26 La. Ann. 646. The doctrine has been recognized and applied by the bankrupt court in this case, and Bell, who took the title in his own name to real property purchased with the money of the bankrupt estate has been compelled to convey to the assignee.

Now, the question is, does a judgment creditor of Bell who credited him long before he became assignee or acquired title to the property in question, and who has parted with nothing on the strength of Bell's apparent ownership of the property; does such a creditor stand in any better plight than Bell himself?

A judgment creditor is not a bona fide purchaser who is protected against a resulting trust. Story, Eq. Jur. § 410, note; Burgh v. Burgh, Cas. t. Finch, 28; Ex parte Howe, 1 Paige. 125; Keirsted v. Avery, 4 Paige, 14; Towsley v. McDonald, 32 Barb. 611; Moyer v. Hinman, 13 N. Y. 180; Rodgers v. Bonner, 45 N. Y. 379; Birchard v. Edwards, 11 Ohio St. 84; State Bank v. Campbell, 2 Rich. Eq. 179; Dunlap v. Burnett, 5 Smedes & M. 702; Money v. Dorsey, 7 Smedes & M. 15; Dozier v. Lewis, 27 Miss. 679; Watkins v. Wassell, 15 Ark. 73; Thomas v. Kennedy, 24 Iowa, 397.

But it is claimed for defendant that by the jurisprudence of this state as settled by the Code and the decisions of the supreme court, he in whose name the title is recorded must be held to be the owner as to third persons, and the latter are never required to look beyond the records. This may be true so far as it applies to bona fide purchasers or to creditors who become such after the paper title has passed to their debtor. But, as we have seen, Thompson is not a bona fide purchaser, nor is it claimed that the debt due him was contracted by Bell while the latter held the paper title to the property in question. To yield to the doctrine claimed by defendant would be to overturn the law of resulting trusts which is as firmly established in Louisiana as anywhere else. Livingston v. Morgan, supra, and other cases above cited. The right of the defendant to enforce his judicial mortgage upon the property in question is based on article 3328 of the Civil Code, which declares that "the judicial mortgage may be enforced against all the immovables which the debtor actually owns or may subsequently acquire." It is very clear that Bell never was the actual owner of the property purchased with the funds of the bankrupt estate. He was the apparent owner only. For when the bankrupt court ascertained the facts about his purchase of the property it compelled him to convey it to the bankrupt estate.

The defendant relies upon a number of cases decided by the supreme court of Louisiana, but none of them seem to me to be in point. The case of Tulane v. Levinson, 2 La. Ann. 787, is supposed to be conclusive of the point under discussion. In that case George F. Barney was the owner of a lot. On the 19th of March, 1842, he conveyed the lot by public act to Jacob G. Bartlett. The deed was not recorded in the office required by law in order to give effect to its inscription. A judgment was obtained against Barney on the 28th of April, 1842, and recorded in the proper office on the 3d of May following. The property was sold on an execution issued upon this judgment, and purchased by Tulane, and the court held the title of Tulane was good. Now, in that case the debt on which the judgment was rendered had been contracted while the legal and equitable title was in Barney. Barney was the actual owner. His deed to Bartlett never took effect. Bartlett had an equity and the judgment creditor an equity, and the court merely decided that in such a case the legal title should prevail. In other words, the decision is that when one holding the legal title to property contracts debts which are in suit, and reduced to judgment, his property is liable to seizure on the judgment when obtained unless he has divested himself of title by an effectual conveyance. In the case under consideration, Thompson has not the shadow of an equity. His claim is the naked claim that his judgment recorded years before Bell was ever appointed assignee should be paid out of the funds of the bankrupt estate which Bell had misappropriated.

But it seems to me that the case of Tulane v. Levinson is fairly offset by the later case of Scott v. Hayden, 9 La. Ann. 336. In this case Hayden held the legal title to certain real estate. Hennen had recovered judgment against Hayden and had it recorded, and the question was whether the judgment was a lien upon the share of Mrs. Hayden's succession in the property, the same having been acquired during the community, and nothing appearing upon the record to show that the succession had any interest in the property. The court held that the registry of the judgment created a judicial mortgage on Hayden's share and not on the share belonging to Mrs. Hayden's succession. This case is later than the case of Tulane v. Levinson.

I am unable to come to the conclusion that the jurisprudence of this state would sanction so unjust and inequitable a claim as that set up by the defendant. His claim to be paid out of the proceeds of this sale of the property cannot be allowed.

Case No. 4,854.

FLANDERS v. TRIPP et al.

[2 Lowell, 15.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1871.

PILOTAGE—DISABLED VESSEL.

1. A vessel that is within pilotage ground, but disabled so that she cannot get into port without steam, is not bound to accept the offer of a pilot, or pay his fee.

2. A pilot is not bound to take charge of a disabled vessel for the usual pilot's fee.

[This was a libel in admiralty by John W. Flanders against George F. Tripp and others.] On the 5th of October, 1869, the respondent's ship, General Scott, on her return from a whaling voyage, was forced on shore near her home port of New Bedford, but was got off by her crew, and came to anchor near Round Hill light. The libellant, who was a branch pilot at New Bedford, saw the vessel at anchor, and went from that city with other persons such as usually visit a returning whaler, and was the first pilot that boarded the vessel. He found the mate in command, who informed him that the master had gone to town for a steamer and a pilot, and that the ship was unable to proceed without steam, by reason of an injury to her rudder. Some time afterwards the master came down with a steamer and a pilot, and the vessel was brought up to her wharf in safety. Whether or not the libellant actually served as pilot, or only offered his services and was refused, was the principal dispute of fact; though the extent of the injury to the rudder was not fully agreed.

G. H. Palmer, for libellant. By the laws of Massachusetts, the libellant has earned his fee, whether his services were accepted or rejected. St. 1862, c. 176; Smith v. Swift, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 329; Martin v. Hilton, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 371; Hunt v. Carlisle, 1 Gray, 257; The America [Case No. 289]; Com. v. Ricketson, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 412.

C. T. Bonney, for respondents. This ship was a wreck, and therefore not bound to accept the offer of a pilot. The master had, in fact, engaged a pilot before the libellant arrived.

LOWELL, District Judge. The facts of this case are not far to seek. The libellant boarded the ship in the hope of being the first pilot to reach her; and he was so; but the mate refused to employ him, alleging that the ship was not fit to be navigated by the power of her sails alone, and that the master had gone on shore for a pilot and a tug; which was true. The libellant made continual claim, so to speak; but his right to recover depends not upon a quantum meruit, for he rendered no services at the request or with the consent of the agents of the respondents, but upon his statute right, as being the first pilot to offer.

It is admitted to be the general rule, that the pilot who first offers his services to an inward-bound vessel, of the class mentioned in the law, has the first right, which the master may disregard, but under pain of paying the fee, as a debt recoverable against him or his vessel or owners in a civil suit. St. 1862, c. 176, Sched. 5; Com. v. Ricketson, 5 Metc. [Mass.] 412; The America [Case No. 289]; Ex parte McNiel, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 236. The respondents insist that there is an implied exception of vessels which cannot be navigated by the pilot without further assistance in the nature of a salvage or quasi salvage service. Upon this point I have not been referred to any decisions of the Massachusetts courts, and must therefore decide it upon my best judgment of the true intent of the statute. The better opinion is, that pilots are not bound to take charge of a wrecked or disabled vessel for the established pilotage fee, because such vessels require for their successful navigation more than the ordinary skill, labor, and risk that pilots impliedly contract to give in return for that fee. They may, therefore, decline to act in such cases, if the master insists that he will only pay them wages: The Frederick, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 17. There are many other cases on the subject of pilots as salvors which virtually decide the same point, among the more important of which are Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 108; The Wave [Case No. 17,297]; on appeal [Id. 17,300]; Hope v. The Dido [Id. 6,679]; Lea v. The Alexander [Id. 8,153]; The Jonge Andries, Swab. 226; on appeal, 11 Moore, P. C. 313; Dexter v. The Richmond [Case No. 3,865]; The Hebe, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 530; The Susan [Case No. 13,630].

Some apparent discrepancies in the judgments of different courts may be reconciled by the consideration, that a pilot, once engaged on board a vessel, has become bound to render his best services, and is under an obligation, for the time being, somewhat analogous to that of the master; but before his engagement he is merely an officer appointed by public authority, enjoying a monopoly, and undertaking to render certain specified services, at whatever inconvenience short of imminent danger to his life, for a reward which the governing body has seen fit to prescribe as sufficient to compensate him. Such a person is not to set up the state of the weather, or any consideration of that sort, as making him a salvor; but to say that he is bound by his official position to do something entirely different from the duty which the very nature of the office points out, as, for instance, to tow the ship into port, without further compensation than a pilot's wages, cannot be maintained, and is not supported by the weight of authority. The decision of Judge Betts in The Wave, in which the subject was very fully and ably discussed, was reversed by the circuit court on the single ground that a statute of New York made it the duty of pilots to assist vessels in distress, and provided for an extra compensation, though not for salvage. The Wave v. Hyer [Case No. 17,300]. Two other cases in the same volume recognize the true doctrine that if pilots, not already engaged, are asked to perform duty which is not only pilotage, but something more, they are entitled to more than the pilot's fee. Hope v. The Dido [supra]; Lea v. The Alexander [supra]. What was done with the statute in the former of these cases, which appears to have arisen within the jurisdiction of New York, I do not know. As I find nothing in the statute law of this state that requires pilots to assist vessels in distress, or provides for any special mode of compensation in such cases, I consider that the general rule holds here, that they are not bound to be salvors, without salvage compensation. I am of opinion that the rule is reciprocal, and that as a pilot is not bound to take upon himself the duty of a salvor of a disabled vessel, without the advantages of that position, so a ship which stands in need of a salvage service is not bound to accept the offer of pilotage, if her need is for something more, which the pilot cannot supply. In this case, the General Scott would probably have been safe at her wharf long before the libellant discovered her, had it not been for the disaster which obliged her to anchor and wait for a steamer; and the master had actually engaged both a steamer and a pilot, though they had not yet reached the vessel. Under the circumstances, the offer to pilot the ship was an offer to do what no one could do until the ship was either repaired or taken in tow. If the ship had been coming up in tow, but without a pilot, or if the master had engaged a steamer, but not a pilot, the case might be different. I hold, therefore, that this ship was not bound to accept the offer of a pilot, under the penalty of paying his fee if his services were refused.

District Court, E. D. Virginia. May 7, 1875.

CONSIGNMENT OF GOODS ON SALE—RIGHT OF CONSIGNOR TO EVIDENCES OF DEBT TAKEN FOR THE GOODS—BANKRUPTCY OF CONSIGNEE.

1. A consignment of goods under a special contract, in which the consignee gives his acceptances for their value, payable partly at sight and partly at a future day, and agrees to account for the whole price, to guarantee the sales, and to receive a commission of ten per cent., with other stipulations, making him primarily liable for the price of the goods, falls within the principle of Ex parte White (In re Nevill) 6 Ch. App. 397, and is a consignment on sale, as distinguished from a consignment on del credere guarantee.

2. Though a consignor may reserve a special property in goods consigned until bills of exchange, drawn for their price, are paid to the bill-holders, yet he cannot, in a consignment on sale to a consignee, in which no such special property is reserved to protect bills drawn upon the consignee for their price, reserve a special property in notes and accounts, which the consignee may take for the goods, from persons to whom the consignee may sell them, as against other creditors of the consignee, who goes into bankruptcy.

This case is heard on the petition of B. C. Flannagan & Son against the assignee of R. & H. Chamberlaine, bankrupts, claiming a special property in certain claims and accounts held by the assignee.

The facts of the case are stated by the judge in his decision, which was as follows: During the year 1873, B. C. Flannagan &

[1] [Reported by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Son, manufacturers, of Charlottesville, Va., had dealings with R. & H. Chamberlaine, commission merchants, of Norfolk, in a manure called the Stonewall Fertilizer, under the following contract, made on the 6th of December preceding:

"December 6th. We propose to give you the entire agency for Stonewall Fertilizer, at Norfolk, and for the state of North Carolina, Raleigh excepted, on condition you push the sales and have a proper man to look after it, and to allow you a commission of ten per cent. for sales and guarantee. We to draw on you at sight or short time for $30 a ton. The price to be sold at is $65 in Baltimore. For balance, after paying $30, you to give your acceptances, say payable 1st December, 1873; accounts to be rendered and settlements after the selling season is over. No charge to be made for storage during the season. Any guano left over and not sold is to be at the risk and on our account. Respectfully, B. C. Flannagan & Son.

"Messrs. R. & H. Chamberlaine, Norfolk.

"P. S. We agree to furnish the guano delivered in Baltimore, 100 tons to be delivered in January, 1873, and balance as ordered by you. We will ship in lots to any point you may direct. B. C. Flannagan & Son."

Across the face of the above: "Accepted, December 6th, 1872. R. & H. Chamberlaine."

On the 7th January, 1874, at the solicitation of B. C. Flannagan, R. Chamberlaine met him in Richmond for a conference, when they signed the following paper, which was drawn by Flannagan, and which Chamberlaine with difficulty and reluctance assented to.

"January 7th. Whereas R. & H. Chamberlaine have sold as agents for B. C. Flannagan & Son, their Stonewall guano, during the spring of 1873, according to contract between them, dated December 6th, 1872, to which reference is hereby made; they having guaranteed said sales, and whereas, according to the terms of said contract, the balance due from said Chamberlaine to said Flannagan was due and payable December 1st, 1873, but owing to the failure of planters, to whom said Chamberlaine sold, to comply with their terms of purchase, the said Chamberlaine has found it impossible to meet his said acceptances at maturity, and in consequence some of them have gone to protest. The said Flannagan, in order to assist the said Chamberlaine and give more time for his collection from planters, has this day taken from the said Chamberlaine sundry acceptances, dated this day, and maturing at an interval of ten days running to 130 days inclusive, the proceeds of which he agrees and binds himself to use in payment of said protested acceptances. And as a further assistance to the said Chamberlaine, the said Flannagan agrees that if the said Chamberlaine finds it impossible to meet the said several acceptances, dated January 7th, at maturity, the said Flannagan will further assist him by a renewal of same, and will not allow them to be protested. The said Chamberlaine for his part agrees and binds himself to use all due diligence in collecting from the parties to whom he sold as agent of the Stonewall, and apply all proceeds from said parties strictly to the payment of the said acceptances, dated January 7th. It being understood and agreed that such collections are held by him as agent only, and belong properly to the payment of said acceptances aforesaid, he having sold as agent with the guarantee of payment. B. C. Flannagan & Son. R. & H. Chamberlaine."

The renewed acceptances were, ten of $1,500 each, and one of $1,000. This latter acceptance and one for $1,500, which two were the first to mature, were paid by the Chamberlaines. Those still remaining unpaid are for the aggregate sum of $13,500. The books of the Chamberlaines show that the amount of their actual indebtedness for the fertilizer, on the 27th April, 1874, was $13,143.59, exclusive of interest. They owed the Flannagans $368.09 on a cotton transaction which had no connection wtih the fertilizer. The amount of the outstanding accounts held by the Chamberlaines against planters for the fertilizer, on April 27th, 1874, was $13,974.04. The Flannagans brought an action at law on the acceptances in the summer of 1874. The effect of their suit was such, that in October, 1874, the Chamberlaines filed their petition in bankruptcy; and the suit stands suspended in the court of law. Under a consent order of this court in this case, the assignee in bankruptcy has been allowed to employ an agent for the collection of the debts due by planters for the fertilizer, who has made some collections. The unpaid claims against the planters for fertilizer will be of slow collection, and will not realize, by a considerable percentage, the amount due upon them. The Flannagans now come in by petition, setting forth the two contracts that have been described, and the condition of facts recited, and claiming not only that the Chamberlaines are bound for the amount of the unpaid acceptances, on which they have sued, but that the notes, accounts, and claims which the Chamberlaines held against the planters for the fertilizer, and which have passed to the custody of the assignee in bankruptcy, shall be turned over to themselves for collection; that when collected by themselves the amount realized from these claims shall be credited on the amounts due on the Chamberlaines' acceptances; and that the debt of the Chamberlaines shall be treated as a fiduciary debt, and dealt with as such in considering the petition of the Chamberlaines for discharge. The questions arising upon the two contracts are chiefly important with reference to the petition of the bankrupts for a discharge, though that petition is not yet before the court for hearing.

W. W. Old, for petitioners.
John S. Tucker, for assignee.

HUGHES, District Judge. The questions to be decided are these, viz.: 1st. Were the shipments of this fertilizer under the contract of December 6th, 1872, a mere consignment on a del credere guarantee, or were they on sale? 2d. If on sale, did the shipments pass the whole property in the fertilizer to the Chamberlaines, or was there a special property reserved constituting in favor of the Flannagans a preferred claim upon the proceeds of the fertilizer in the hands of the Chamberlaines?

1st. It is clear that the contract of December 6th, 1872, did not provide for consignments to the Chamberlaines as ordinary factors, for sale on the usual commissions. Nor did it provide for consignments upon the ordinary del credere commission of guarantee. Had it done either of these things, the well-settled law, either of simple or del credere agency, would have clearly determined the rights and liabilities of the parties.

But these consignments were not made upon any sort of implied contract. They were made upon an express contract, definite in terms, written and mutually signed. We cannot therefore go out of such a contract to the law of general consignments, or of del credere agencies, to ascertain the rights and liabilities arising from their own stipulations, of these parties. It is only when there is no special contract that the general law of agency applies between consignor and consignee; for it is always competent for persons in this relation to contract according to their pleasure, and thus vary or restrict, or enlarge, the general liabilities implied by the law in absence of express contract. Story, Ag. § 334.

What were the provisions of the contract of December 6th, 1872? The Chamberlaines were to be responsible for all the sales of the fertilizer which they should make. They were to be themselves primarily responsible. They were to discharge this responsibility by acceptances payable at sight or on short time as to part, and at a future day as to the residue of the price of the fertilizer. They were to have a commission of ten per cent., not on their own sales, but on the price of the article fixed in advance by the consignors. They were, at the end of the season of business, to be credited with so much of the article as should then remain on their hands. They were not to charge storage upon the fertilizer, but if any of it remained on hand after the season was over, they were then to be entitled to storage on such surplus. In the contract, the terms "agency," "guarantee," and "commission" are used, implying that the parties considered that in the transactions about to be made they should hold the relation to each other of principal and agent.

The question is whether this contract constituted the Chamberlaines purchasers of the fertilizer, or merely agents for its sale on a del credere guarantee. If the contract in its terms really constituted them purchasers, the use of words implying that they were agents does not change the fact. "Persons may suppose that their relationship is that of principal and agent, when in point of law it is not." Ex parte White, In re Nevill, 6 Ch. App. 403. If the consignments were a sale, they were a final sale as to the portion of the fertilizer which should be disposed of during the season by the Chamberlaines; and, as to the portion remaining over at the end of the season, they were consignments on "sale or return."

Upon the authority of the case of Ex parte White (In re Nevill), above cited, and of section 215, Story's Agency, about to be referred to, I think the consignments were a sale, and not a shipment on a del credere guarantee. For here the obligation of the Chamberlaines to pay for the fertilizer at a fixed price, and a fixed time, was clearly established by the contract. They were primarily liable to the Flannagans for the fixed price on their acceptances. They might sell to planters at a different price so far as the obligation imposed by the contract was concerned. If the planters were to be liable to the Flannagans at all, they were to be so only secondarily. The Flannagans looked to the Chamberlaines only, and did not know the planters in the whole transaction.

The now well-settled law of del credere guarantee is that the factor is not the primary debtor; that his engagement is merely to pay the debt if it is not punctually paid by the person to whom he sells; that he stands more in the character of a surety than a debtor; and that he is not liable to pay the debt until there has been default by the person who buys from him. Story, Ag. § 215, citing numerous English and American cases. Can it be pretended that the stringent contract of December 6th left the Chamberlaines in the secondary and optional relation to the Flannagans thus described, in respect to the article which they paid for as it arrived with their acceptances? Lord Justice Melish, in Ex parte White (In re Nevill), distinguishes between consignments on del credere guarantee and those on sale in the following explicit language: "If the consignee is at liberty to sell at any price, and to receive payment at any time he likes, but is bound, if he sells the goods, to pay the consignor for them at a fixed price and at a fixed time, in my opinion, whatever the parties may think, their relation is not that of principal and agent. The contracts of sale which the consignee makes with the persons who purchase from him are not contracts made on account of his principal, for he is to pay a price which may be different, and at times which may be different from those fixed by these contracts. He is not guaranteeing the performance by the persons to whom he sells, of their contract with him, which is the proper business of a del credere agent; but he undertakes to pay a certain fixed price for the goods, at a certain fixed time, to his principal, wholly independent of what the contract may be which he makes with the persons to whom he sells; and my opinion is that, in point of law, the alleged agent in such a case is making, on his own account, a contract of purchase with his alleged principal, and is again reselling."

The Flannagans themselves treated the consignments as a sale to the Chamberlaines. After the acceptances, which they received under the contract of December, 1872, had matured, and been protested, they did not treat the Chamberlaines as their debtors on open account, in the direct character of guarantors of the sales which had been made to planters, but they treated them as directly indebted on the acceptances which remained unpaid. If the Chamberlaines had been guarantors only, their liability would not have been fixed until after proper means of collecting the dues from planters had been exhausted. But the Flannagans declined to look to them in that character. They treated them as already indebted, and dealt with the unpaid acceptances as the evidence of their indebtedness.

Even supposing the Flannagans, by the terms of the contract of December, 1872, to have reserved for themselves the option of treating the Chamberlaines either as agents or as purchasers at pleasure, yet, by the contract of January, 1874, they availed themselves of this option, and did elect to treat them as purchasers; for they accepted a novation of new acceptances in place of the old ones for the whole value of the fertilizer not yet paid for. It is true that the Flannagans did, to the latter contract providing for the novation, append a clause in the following words, viz.: "It being understood and agreed that such collections are held by Chamberlaine as agent only, and belong properly to the payment of said acceptances, having sold as agent with his guarantee of payment." But the most that can be claimed for this stipulation in determining the question whether the consignment was upon purchase or guarantee, is that it preserved to the Flannagans the option of electing afterwards, and a second time, whether to rely upon the new acceptances for payment of the moneys due them, or to resort to the notes and accounts due from the planters. Supposing this right of choosing between these alternatives to have been reserved, still, even in that case, the choice of the Flannagans, thus reserved, was made in the summer of 1874, when, instead of going against the planters as first liable to them before the Chamberlaines were so as guarantors, they ignored the planters, and brought suit against the Chamberlaines on their acceptances.

If the Chamberlaines were liable as purchasers, then the Flannagans had a right to sue them on their acceptances. If they were not liable as purchasers, but only as guarantors, then they could have been sued only after the remedy against the planters had been exhausted, on open account.

Upon the whole case, therefore, I am of opinion that not only did the contract of December, 1872, and the transactions of 1873 under it, make the Chamberlaines purchasers instead of agents, but the Flannagans, in the contract of January, 1874, and in the suit brought in the summer of that year, themselves elected to treat them as such, and committed themselves to that view of the contract.

It may be admitted that if the terms used in the writing of January, 1874, had been employed in that of December, 1872, it would have been difficult to resist the conclusion that the consignments made under it were to the Chamberlaines as agents and not as purchasers. But the second contract came too late to have any effect upon the dealings. If the original paper of December, 1872, provided for a sale, and the transactions under it were those of sale and purchase, then the contract of January, 1874, made after all the dealings were over, could not, by any language put into it, change their character already fixed and determined. Nor could the agreement of the Chamberlaines in January, 1874, to apply their collections from the planters to the payment of the acceptances, change the previously fixed fact that they were purchasers, if they really were so. That agreement was a merely voluntary one to comply with an obligation of honor.

2d. Having concluded that the consignments of the Flannagans to the Chamberlaines were made to the latter in the character of purchasers, and not of agents, it is next to be inquired whether the sale was absolute or qualified. The principle of the leading case of Jenkyns v. Brown, 14 Q. B. 496, is that when a consignment is made, and bills of exchange are drawn for the value and bills of lading are sent to a third person to be delivered on payment of the bills of exchange, a sale is made, in which a general property passes to the consignee, and a special property is reserved by the consignor until the payment of the value. In other words, a sale may take place on a consignment, although a special property in the thing consigned be reserved by the consignor.

In the leading case of the Bank of Ireland v. Perry, L. R. 7 Exch. 14, it is decided that where a consignor reserves a special property in the goods consigned, that special property follows the goods in favor of the holder of bills of exchange drawn against them, when the consignee goes into bankruptcy or composition. The principle on which the bill-holder is allowed the benefit of this special property, as against other creditors of the insolvent, is explained by Bispham, in his recent tract on Contracts in Rem, to be that under the original consignment a jus in rem in the goods is acquired by contract, as against the world, by the drawer of the bills in favor of himself and the persons holding the bills for him; and, that being a jus in rem against the world, this special property follows the goods into the hands of assignees or trustees of an insolvent consignee. If this principle be not yet conceded in courts of law, it fully obtains in courts of equity, and must be applied in this court.

I think that the intention of the Flannagans to reserve a special property in the proceeds of the fertilizer sold by the Chamberlaines to planters is too plain to be denied. But was that intention effected? The principle of the two cases just cited is that the consignor may reserve a special property in the goods consigned, for the protection of bills which he himself draws against the goods; but they do not go so far as to hold that he may reserve a special property in favor of himself in bills which his consignee may draw upon sales of the goods which the consignee shall make. Courts of law have scarcely yet recognized the principle of the cases of the Bank of Ireland v. Perry, above cited, and of Ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 345, and courts of equity have not advanced so far as to allow the original consignor to bind the proceeds of goods after they have been received by the consignee and sold to second consignees or purchasers. The law would have allowed the Flannagans to bind the goods in favor of the holder of the drafts drawn by themselves, but it would not follow the sale of the goods by the Chamberlaines and bind in favor of the Flannagans the notes and accounts taken by the Chamberlaines. If the Chamberlaines were not acting in their own right and were responsible, the concluding clause of the contract of January 7th, 1874, would bind undoubtedly the notes and accounts due from the planters in favor of the Flannagans as against the Chamberlaines. But the bankruptcy of the latter has thrown these notes and accounts into the hands of their assignee, subject to the rights of other creditors; and it would be carrying the doctrine of jus in rem too far to hold that the Flannagans have a special property in those notes and accounts, as against general creditors. I am bound to decide, therefore, that the Flannagans have no special property in the notes and accounts due from planters for the fertilizer sold by the Chamberlaines, and that these choses in action are part of the general assets in this cause.

COLLISION — TOWING ON RIVER — UNWIELD AND EXCESSIVE TOW.

[1. [2. A steam boat engaged in towing has no right, in a narrow river like the Schuylkill, to attach three canal boats to each side of her guards, while towing four others behind, and, in case of collision, she must be held blameworthy for so doing.]

In admiralty.

Fish and Hazlehurst, for libellant.

W. G. Smith, for respondent.

KANE, District Judge. The steamer Rappahannock was descending the Schuylkill on the 12th of June last, having a number of canal boats in tow. Three of these were attached on each side of her guards, and four others were towed astern. The steamer with her ten boats occupied a space of 168 feet in length, by 128 feet in breadth. The wind and tide were with her. She had reached the lower part of the river, near the Rope ferry, where the channel having six feet of depth at half tide, extends over some 450 or 500 feet in width. At this time the schooner Ontario was beating up, and in her immediate vicinity. Both did what was in their power to prevent collision; but in the judgment of the experienced ship masters, who favored me with their advice as assessors, a collision had become inevitable. The result was, that the schooner struck one of the canal boats in tow of the steamer, and sunk her; and this libel is filed by the proprietor of the sunken boat to recover his damages.

As no blame is imputable to either party, other than is implied in this statement of the facts, the case would at first seem one of those in which by the maritime law each party bears his own loss. But, viewed more closely, there are circumstances connected with it which might justify the application of a still severer rule against the complainant. I readily agree that some of the rules which are obligatory on ordinary steamers when meeting sail vessels, are inapplicable to steam tugs engaged in towing. The superior control over her movements, which belongs to a steamer, her power to vary or arrest, or even reverse her course at pleasure, and which enable her generally to avoid collisions, do not belong to the steam tug, which gives a secondary impulse to a fleet either attached to her sides or following in her wake. The momentum of the system, of which, under such circumstances, she forms part, may be altogether too great for sudden control. In a case, therefore, where the steam tug had neglected no precaution, I should be unwilling to hold her liable to the same extent or under the same law as a detached steamer.

But to exempt herself from liability on this score, she must be careful not to heighten the risk of herself and others by any want of prudence either in the disposition of her convoy or in the manner of navigating it. The number and size of the vessels which she takes in tow should have careful relation to her power of regulating their movements, and to the nature of the voyage, the number of vessels to be passed or encountered by the way, and the facilities of the particular navigation. On the open bay, or in some of the comparatively unfrequented sounds and inlets of the coast, she may occupy a larger space, and move with less anxious caution, than in the narrow, eccentric and crowded channel of a river like the Schuylkill. Where the voyage is necessarily attended by special hazards, she must sedulously avoid enhancing them. The state of the tide and of the wind are to be regarded, because these may be such as materially to impair her effective power. Where the channel becomes more tortuous or difficult, and other vessels are approaching, she should take that position in the river which may best allow them to pass her, moderate her speed, and stand ready in case of emergency to cast off from her guards and let her whole train of boats pass astern. The steamer in this case, and her train, including the complainant's boat, engrossed a much greater portion of the river than they had a right to. The wind and tide were with them, and the moving mass under their influence as well as that of steam, was undoubtedly too great to be at once arrested or adequately controlled by any action of the steamer's engine.

The captain of the steamer did his best, no doubt, to avert the accident, when he found himself close on the schooner; but it is plain, also, from the evidence, that the schooner could not then escape the collision by any effort of seamanship. Without invoking the rule, therefore, which denies recourse to the libellant where no immediate blame is imputable to the other party, I dismiss the libel on the ground that the steam tow was to blame in spreading itself so widely over the channel.

The gentlemen who heard the case with me, and whose familiarity with the subject of our river navigation gives great value to their suggestions, have communicated to me a few rules, which, if generally observed, may in a great degree prevent such accidents as the one we have been considering. I have, of course, no right to prescribe them as imperative: but they seem to me so reasonable, that, as at present advised, I shall adopt them for my guidance in cases hereafter to arise. They will be appended to this opinion.

The decree of the court is for the respondent, but in consideration of the peculiar circumstances, it will not carry costs.

PER CURIAM. Decree accordingly.

Rules proposed by Captains Gulager and Pedrick, referred to in the foregoing opinion:

We have carefully considered the subject of the collision occurring upon the river Schuylkill, and would respectfully suggest the following regulations, as proper to be observed in the navigation of that river, with the view of diminishing their frequency: 1. That all steam tow boats, bound up or down said river with vessels in tow, be required to keep as near the right hand or starboard shore as their respective drafts of water will permit. By this arrangement vessels bound up the river in tow of a steam boat, will keep nearest the eastern shore, and those bound down to the west; leaving the mid-channel for sailing vessels. 2. That in consequence of the general narrowness of the channel of the Schuylkill, steam tow boats should avoid placing more than one vessel on each side or abeam, but shall tow the remainder astern. 3. That sailing vessels be prohibited from passing between the tow boats so employed and the shore they occupy, as above mentioned. 4. And as it frequently occurs, that several vessels bound in the same direction are obliged to pass near to each other when sailing on opposite tacks, beating to windward in narrow channels, and much damage by collision takes place in consequence of neither vessel being willing to lose ground by giving way; we recommend that the law of the English waters be adopted in such cases, viz: That the vessel on the starboard tack keep her wind, or not alter her course; but the vessel passing her on the opposite or larboard tack, shall if necessary keep away, and pass astern of the vessel first mentioned. Respectfully submitted, C. Gulager. S. Pedrick.

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1847.

AFFREIGHTMENT—PERFORMANCE WITHIN A STATE—LIBEL IN REM FOR REFUSAL TO RECEIVE OR DELIVER CARGO.

1. The master of a New York vessel contracted, at the port of New York, to transport a cargo across the East river to Brooklyn,—a voyage less than a mile in length, but across tide waters. He took a part of the cargo on board, but afterwards refused to take on the residue, or to deliver that already laden. Held, that an action in rem would lie both for the refusal to receive on board and the refusal to deliver; notwithstanding that the contract was made in the home port, and for a voyage of so local a character, and notwithstanding that only a portion of the goods were received on board.

[Cited in Oakes v. Richardson, Case No. 10,390; The Williams, Id. 17,710; Scott v. The Ira Chaffee, 2 Fed. 403.]

2. By the general law maritime, the vessel is bound to the shipper for the performance of a contract of affreightment made with the master, whether by charter-party, by bill of lading, or by parol.

[Cited in The Aberfoyle, Case No. 16; Scott v. The Ira Chaffee, 2 Fed. 403; The Monte A., 12 Fed. 333.]

This was a libel in rem, by William Churchill against the schooner Flash, to recover damages for the non-fulfilment of a contract of affreightment.

The libel alleged that an agreement was made by the master of the schooner with the libellant, to take on board the vessel, at her wharf in this city, a cargo of bricks, thirty-five thousand in number, and to transport them over tide waters,—namely, across the East river to the city of Brooklyn,—for a stipulated freight; that the vessel received on board eight thousand of the bricks; that the master had refused to deliver such part to the libellant, pursuant to the shipping contract; and that he left on the wharf in the city of New York the residue of said cargo, which had been delivered there by the libellant, ready to be taken on board, and had refused to receive and transport them according to the contract of affreightment.

The claimant, who was the owner of the vessel, demurred to the libel upon two grounds:—

1. That the court had not jurisdiction to enforce, in rem, an agreement to take and carry freight.

2. That the master of a domestic vessel had no authority to bind her while in her home port, upon a contract like the one here set up.

The cause now came before the court on the demurrer.

T. B. Scoles, for claimant.

I. The ship is tacitly hypothecated for the obligations contracted by the master, only "when acting in the quality of master, and within the scope of his authority as such." The jurisdiction of the admiralty to proceed against the ship in specie, on the ground that she is security for the merchant who lades goods on board, is altogether denied in England. Abb. Shipp. 161. It is recognized here under certain restrictions, but conceded to be "entirely due to modern invention." The Rebecca [Case No. 11,619]. But all the cases upon this subject are for injuries done to the cargo during the voyage. Cleirac, c. 58, 63, 259. See the cases collected in Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1846), 161, note. No lien exists for a refusal to take the merchandise on board the ship, nor for a refusal to perform the voyage after the merchandise has been taken on board.

II. Conceding that the vessel could be bound for damages arising from a refusal to perform a contract to convey goods, this libel does not show a contract binding upon the owners; and it is only a contract binding upon the owners which creates a lien upon the vessel. The Waldo [Case No. 17,056]; The Casco [Id. 2,486].

1. The libel alleges a contract to transport a quantity of bricks, made with the master, in the home port of the owner, which "is not incident to his general authority as master, nor can it be presumed, under such circumstances, as an ordinary superadded agency." The Tribune [Case No. 14,171].

2. There is, moreover, no allegation in this libel that the contract was made with the knowledge or consent of the owners, nor are any circumstances shown from which the inference can be drawn that it was with their approbation, or that he had any authority to make it, or that they subsequently assented to it. On the contrary, the libel expressly avers that the owners dissented, and refused to affirm or perform the contract alleged to have been made with the master; this is the very gravamen of the complaint.

William Jay Haskett, for libellant, contended that the vessel was bound in rem, both by the failure to deliver the portion of cargo taken on board, and for the failure to perform the contract as to that which was not taken on board. Abb. Shipp. 161, and notes; The Rebecca [supra]; The Phebe [Case No. 11,064]; The Paragon [Id. 10,708]; The Volunteer [Id. 16,991]; The Reeside [Id. 11,657].

BETTS, District Judge. By the maritime law, an affreightment of goods on board a vessel operated reciprocally as a tacit pledge or mortgage of the vessel to the shipper for the conveyance and delivery of the goods according to the contract, and of the goods themselves to the ship to secure payment of the freight earned. Abb. Shipp. 160; 3 Kent, Comm. 162. The lien to the shipper arises alike, whether the contract of affreightment be by charter-party, by bill of lading, or by parol. This principle is fully discussed in the case of The Rebecca [supra]. That case shows very satisfactorily that the obscurity which is to be found in the English system of admiralty law upon this subject is attributable, not to any doubt of the existence of a lien upon the vessel for the performance of the contract of affreightment, but to the fact that the courts of common law in that country have assiduously interposed to restrain the court of admiralty from taking cognizance of the contract. And by a full examination of the continental authorities, both ancient and modern, it is shown to be an established principle of the general law maritime, that the vessel is liable in rem for the performance of the contract of affreightment entered into by the master. See, also, The Phebe [supra]; The Paragon [supra]. These views are fully supported, so far as relates to foreign voyages upon the high seas, by other authorities, which clearly show that the hiring of the vessel, or of any portion of her for a voyage, or an agreement for transportation of goods by her upon the high seas, binds her to the fulfilment of the contract, and this, whether it be evidenced by charter-party, by bill of lading, or by verbal agreement only. The Volunteer [supra]; The Reeside [supra]; The Tribune [supra]; The Waldo [supra]; The Casco [supra].

This principle does not require, as was contended by the counsel upon the argument, that the goods should actually be on board the vessel, to raise the lien. There are, indeed, many classes of liens which rest upon possession, actual or constructive, as their basis. If the basis of a lien claimed upon such contract rested in a figurative possession of the vessel, imparted to the shipper by lading his goods on board, there would be force in the argument, that no lien was acquired until the actual lading of the goods was accomplished. But such is not the principle from which the liability of the vessel is deduced. It is grounded upon the authority of the master to contract for the employment of the vessel, and upon the general doctrine of the maritime law, that the vessel is bodily answerable for such contracts of the master made for her benefit.

Had the undertaking, then, in this case, been for affreightment to the West Indies or to New Orleans, the case would have come within the doctrine of the maritime law, clearly established by the decisions and elementary writers—the contract being a positive contract of affreightment, and not a mere agreement leading to such contract.

It is contended, however, that the present case does not come within the scope of the doctrine above laid down, for the reason that the contract was entered into by the master on behalf of the vessel, at her home port, where, it is urged he has no power to bind the vessel by any such agreement.

The authority of the master, at her home port, to make engagements for a vessel in the course of her ordinary employment, is always implied. To relieve the vessel from responsibility upon such engagements, the dissent of the owner must be shown. Curt. Merch. Seam. 168; Abb. Shipp. 156, 159, and note; General Interest Ins. Co. v. Ruggles, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 400. It is true that this presumed authority has been said not to extend so far as to authorize the master to make a charter of the vessel at her home port. The Tribune [supra]. But if this distinction is sound, it does not affect the application of the principle to the present case, which is a contract to receive and carry cargo under the charge of her master, and not a letting of her out of his possession. If, therefore, this had been a sea-going vessel, and the contract had related to a foreign voyage, the authorities would, in my opinion, leave no ground on which the claimant could contest the liability of the vessel, as well for the refusal to take on board the portion of cargo left behind as for the failure to deliver that which she carried out.

The controversy upon this point is no doubt induced by the peculiar character of the undertaking of the master and of the employment of the vessel. She was, it seems, engaged in the carriage of cargoes from the city of New York to landing places at the city of Brooklyn, running merely across the river or bay, and probably making no trips exceeding a mile in distance. The pleadings, however, present the facts that this was a contract for a maritime service, to be performed by a vessel upon tide waters, and that the master having taken on board a part of the cargo, refused to receive the rest, and also detains on board and refuses to deliver, according to the contract of affreightment, the portion taken on board.

The distance of transportation or the danger of navigation is nowhere declared an element essential to the liability of the vessel upon a contract of affreightment.

An undertaking to carry a cargo to ports or places up the Sound, or to Staten Island or Rockaway, would be subject to the same objection. Neither of these trips would be a foreign voyage. The decisions upon this subject rest upon principles which render them applicable as well to that species of carriage as to any other kind of coastwise navigation. In this court it has been repeatedly decided, that vessels engaged in navigating the Sound, or the tide waters of the harbor, or of the North river, have become subject to the rules of maritime laws, applicable to those engaged in voyages to other states or upon the high seas. This may be regarded as in effect determined, in the recent decision of the supreme court of the United States. Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441. And it is understood, that in so far as the jurisdiction in rem of the admiralty courts is concerned, that court also held, in the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank of Boston, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344 (argued at the same term, but ordered to re-argument upon the question of jurisdiction in personam,) that admiralty jurisdiction, in cases of contract, is not determined in this country as in England, by the mere matter of locality, but obtains wherever the subject-matter of the contract is of a maritime character.

Upon these grounds I think that the libel, upon its face, shows an adequate cause of action in rem. The demurrer is accordingly overruled, with costs.

The cause came again before the court, for final hearing, in January, 1848, and the proceedings then had are reported—The Flash [Case No. 4,858]—under that date.

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1848.

AFFREIGHTMENT—AUTHORITY OF MASTER TO CONTRACT IN HOME PORT — REPUDIATION BY OWNERS—LIABILITY OF VESSEL — MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. The master of a vessel having contracted for the transportation of a cargo, the performance of the contract was interrupted while the lading of the cargo on board was going on, by the death of the master, and by the freezing up of the vessel. The owner repudiated the contract, and refused either to take on board the residue of the cargo or to deliver up that already laden. Held, that the contract was binding upon the vessel and owner.

2. The owner was, under the circumstances, entitled to indulgence for a reasonable time, both to procure a new master and to await the relief of his vessel.

3. Upon the owner's refusal to be bound by the contract, the libellant was entitled to proceed against the vessel for his damages.

4. The libellant could recover damages for the value of the brick laden on board and withheld;—for the cost of transporting the residue from his store-house to the dock;—for any injuries received by them while they lay there awaiting the owner's acceptance;—and for the difference in his disfavor, if any, between the contract price of transportation and his actual expenses incurred in obtaining another mode of conveyance.

[Cited in The Oregon, 55 Fed. 676.]

5. The libellant could not recover against the vessel for injuries received by the property after notice of the owner's refusal to complete the contract, but the vessel was chargeable with the cost of transporting the portion of cargo left behind, to its place of destination.

This was a libel in rem, by William Churchill, against the schooner Flash, to recover damages for the non-fulfilment of a contract of affreightment. The cause was before the court in December, 1847, upon demurrer, and the proceedings thereupon are reported in The Flash [Case No. 4,857], where the substance of the libel is stated. It alleged that the master of the Flash, which was a New York vessel, contracted with the libellant, at New York, to carry a cargo of bricks in the schooner, from New York to Brooklyn; that the master took a portion of the cargo on board, but afterwards refused either to deliver up that portion or to take on the residue. The cause now came up for hearing upon the pleadings and proofs. The facts relied upon as a defence appear in the opinion.

William Jay Haskett, for libellant.

J. M. Cooper, for claimant, contended that the contract set up by libellant was one only binding upon the master personally, but not upon the owner, and, therefore, did not bind the vessel (The David, 1 Rob. 301; Abb. Shipp. 161); and that no breach of contract had been shown, the performance having been interrupted by "the act of God."

BETTS, District Judge. The court has already decided upon the demurrer in this cause, that the contract set up in the libel was one for the non-performance of which the libellant is entitled to a remedy in this court against the vessel herself.

It appears to me that the testimony adduced by the libellant upon the hearing substantiates the material allegations of the libel. The only important ground of defence upon the facts is, that there was no breach of the contract, but only a delay in its fulfilment, arising from "the act of God."

The facts shown in support of this defence are, that while the vessel was engaged in taking on board the cargo of brick, the master was injured by a fall, in consequence of which he died a few days afterwards. During the time he survived and remained on board the vessel, the physicians forbade the loading to go on, because of the injury likely to result from it to him in his enfeebled condition. He was carried round in the vessel, from the place she lay, to the foot of Hammond street, in this city, and there landed. Had the vessel returned to her previous station immediately after landing the master, she might, as the evidence shows, have completed her loading, and have conveyed the entire cargo to Brooklyn, its place of destination, without impediment from the weather; but she delayed several hours needlessly at Hammond street, and was in consequence frozen in at that dock, and thus prevented going on with the execution of the contract until after this suit was commenced. The libellant sent an agent to confer with the owner in respect to the completion of the contract, and on the first interview the owner manifested a disposition to continue and fulfil the undertaking entered into by the master; but upon the second application to him he positively refused to do so.

I do not think the short delay at Hammond street, although followed by the freezing in of the vessel, could have operated as a breach of the contract; and if the owner had proffered a fulfilment on his part, to be made as soon as the vessel could be extricated from the ice (Bowman v. Teall, 23 Wend. 306; Parsons v. Hardy, 14 Wend. 215), I should have regarded him free from liability as for a wilful neglect to perform it. Under the circumstances of the case, he would be entitled to a fair indulgence for time, both to replace the master and also to await the relief of the vessel from her confinement in the ice, had reasonable exertions been used by the owner to complete the undertaking for the vessel. Story, Bailm. § 545a.

But instead of thus offering to complete the agreement as soon as performance should be within his power, the owner repudiated his obligation, and positively refused to fulfil it at any time. This refusal is the gist of the owner's defalcation, and properly subjects the vessel to the consequences of not performing the engagement made by the master. There was no vis major or inevitable accident which released the vessel from proceeding in a reasonable time to complete the undertaking. The owner having taken the ground that he would not perform that engagement at all, the libellant became entitled to proceed against the vessel, and to recover the damages incurred by reason of the violation of the contract already entered upon, and in part executed.

In respect to that portion of the cargo which was taken to the vessel and not received on board, the libellant may rightfully claim the reimbursement of the expenses of transporting it from his storehouse to the ship at the dock from which it was to be laden on board, as well as compensation for any injuries received by the cargo while it lay there awaiting the convenience of the vessel to receive it on board. It must from that time be considered as delivered alongside the vessel, and the shipment, so far as libellant was concerned, must be taken to have been then completed. But it not having been received on the vessel, there may be a question whether the ship is responsible for its value, or for the subsequent expenses incurred in removing or securing it ashore—the libellant having been expressly notified by the owner of the vessel that he repudiated the contract of the master for its transportation. If the libellant elected to leave his property exposed after that notice, the loss consequent upon that exposure must be recovered for against the owner personally, and not by action against the vessel in damages for the violation of his contract of carriage. The damages in that respect, for which the vessel is liable as consequent to the neglect to transport the whole cargo offered the vessel, would be the expense incurred by the libellant in procuring the delivery at the place of its destination of that portion which was left behind, as being incidental to the placing it under the control of the vessel; but not the consequential damages flowing from taking charge of it on land after it was abandoned.

The value of the brick laden on board the vessel, and not conveyed and delivered according to contract at the time the suit was instituted, is a lien upon the vessel, and must be satisfied by her. 3 Kent, Comm. 162, 218. I find it stated, upon the brief of the claimant's advocate, that that part of the cargo has since been delivered according to the agreement. This, however, does not appear upon the proofs, and accordingly the value of that part of the cargo must be inquired into upon a reference, and the libellant must receive compensation for the amount in the final decree.

The FLASH.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 183.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1862.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE.

[A schooner with a cargo of salt, soap, oil, and paper, which had cleared from Nassau for New York, was in fact destined for Charleston, if she could get into that port; otherwise, to New York. She was found off Charleston May 2, 1862, chased five hours at sea, and run into an inlet of that port. Being unable to escape, she was run ashore, and set on fire by her crew. Held, that vessel and cargo should be condemned for attempting to violate the blockade.]

BETTS, District Judge. This schooner and cargo were seized, May 2, 1862, near the coast of South Carolina, off Caper's island, about fourteen miles northerly from Charleston, by the United States bark Restless, and were brought into this port May 12, thereafter, and libelled in this suit May 19. The attachment issued thereon was returned on the 10th of June thereafter, duly served, and no person appearing thereto, and proclamation having been made in open court, interlocutory judgment by default was rendered, according to the practice of the court.

On the evidence before the court it appears that the schooner was chased for five hours at sea by the capturing vessel, and ran into an inlet of the port of Charleston, and, not being able to escape, was run on shore, and set fire to, and abandoned by her own crew, who then all escaped on shore. The Flash was thereupon taken possession of by the boats of the capturing ship, and made subject to these proceedings.

The vessel, as appears by her registry, found on board at her capture, was an American bottom in build, but was registered at Nassau, N. P., in the Bahamas, November 24, 1860, to Mordecai Bethel and Silvanus Bethel, British subjects. Subsequent registers were indorsed upon the registry, April 21, 1862, and Robert H. Sawyer and Ramos A. Menendez were recorded as owners, and John Smith was registered as master, April 19, 1862. The shipping agreement, also found on board, was by the master and crew, for a voyage from Nassau to New York, and back to Nassau, and was dated April 16, 1862, and was between John Smith, master, and the crew named.

The clearance of the vessel and cargo, the latter consisting of salt, soap, oil and paper, were made at the port of Nassau on the 19th of April last; and two bills of lading and one invoice of salt, and a letter of advice for the shippers to the consignee, were on board of the vessel at the time of her arrest. The documentary proofs thus found evince an honest voyage from a neutral port to one of our own ports, with a lawful cargo, in a legal trade.

Upon proof that none of the company of the captured vessel had been arrested on her seizure, or could be produced in court as witnesses in this suit, the court, on motion of the district attorney, ordered that the prize-master, Charles Smith, be examined as a witness in the cause, before the prize commissioners, in preparatorio. He says that he is a citizen of the United States, and was present at the capture of the schooner Flash and cargo; that she was, at the time, attempting to enter the port of Charleston, which was then under blockade; that, when first seen, she was heading off; that she then altered her course inward, and was evidently bound into the port; that she was fired at, and struck in the sails, and was then run on shore, set fire to, and abandoned by her crew in a small boat; and that they took with them all her papers, except her log-book.

Before the close of the proceedings, the master and mate and one seaman of the crew having been sent to this port on board of a United States vessel, were produced as witnesses by the district attorney, and were examined in preparatorio before the prize commissioners. The master and mate testify that the vessel was owned and laden at Nassau, by British subjects, and was destined for Charleston, if she could get into that port, otherwise, to New York; that she had got inside of the blockading vessels before she was run ashore, and had broken the blockade; and that the cargo was to be delivered at Charleston for the account of the shippers. The master of the vessel says that he knew, and that he supposed the owners also knew, of the blockade; and that when they left the vesel they took with them the log-book and all the ship's papers on board, which are now in the hands of the prize commissioners. The seaman Fry says that he supposed the voyage was to New York, according to the shipping agreement.

The evidence is thus made full and satisfactory, that the voyage was undertaken and prosecuted until the capture of the vessel with the intention, on the part of the master and owners, to violate the blockade of Charleston, knowing it to be in force. Accordingly, the vessel and cargo are condemned as forfeited to the libellants.

Circuit Court, W. D. Tennessee. Sept. Term, 1832.[2]

COMPACTS BETWEEN STATES—ASSENT OF CONGRESS — EFFECT — PRIVATE RIGHTS — GRANT BEYOND TERRITORIAL BOUNDARY — WILL PROVED IN ANOTHER STATE AS EVIDENCE.

1. A compact entered into between two states, with the assent of congress, is binding on those states and the citizens of each.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Grants having been made by North Carolina and Tennessee, beyond their boundaries, as admitted in the compact between the states of Tennessee and Kentucky, such grants are void by the compact.

[See note at end of case.]

3. This cannot be considered an appropriation of private property for public use, as the grants, being beyond the limits of the state, could give no right to the land granted.

4. Private rights must always be subject to treaties made between sovereignties, and those rights cannot be interposed to modify or annul such treaties. Indemnity for an injury done, under such circumstances, must be sought by individuals of their respective governments.

[See note at end of case.]

5. A will proved in another state, according to the laws of Tennessee, if recorded in that state, is evidence. The record may be made any time before the will is offered in evidence.

6. Under a joint demise, by the statute of Tennessee, a tenancy in common may be proved.

[This was an action at law by John Fleeger and others against Burgess Pool and others.]

Mr. Washington, for plaintiff.

Mr. Yerger, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action of ejectment is prosecuted to recover possession of two thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven acres of land in Montgomery county, Tennessee, lying south of what is called Walker's line, which is the present boundary line between the states of Kentucky and Tennessee; and north of what is called Matthews' line, which runs in latitude 36 degrees 30 minutes, north, and which by the constitution of North Carolina, is declared to be the northern boundary of the state. The lessors of the plaintiff claim as devisees of Frederick Rohrer, who claims under a grant from the state of Kentucky, dated 24th February, 1796. The defendants claim under certain grants from North Carolina, dated in 1786, 1792, and 1797; also, under grants from the state of Tennessee, dated in 1809, 1811, '12 and '14. And the defendants have proved that possession was taken under their grants about the time of their respective dates, and that the land has ever since been occupied under the same title.

The following articles of compact between the states of Kentucky and Tennessee, have been read, and have a direct bearing in the case:

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirmed in 11 Pet. (36 U. S.) 185.]

"Article 1. The line run by the Virginia commissioners in the year 1779, and '80, commonly called Walker's line, as the same is now reputed, understood, and acted upon by the said states, their respective officers and citizens, from the south eastern corner of Kentucky, to the Tennessee river, thence with and up the said river to the point where the line of Alexander and Munsell, run by them in the last year, under the authority of an act of the legislature of Kentucky, entitled "An act to run the boundary line between this state and Tennessee, west of the Tennessee river, approved February 8th, 1819," would cross said river, and thence with the said line of Alexander and Munsell to the termination thereof, on the Mississippi river, below New Madrid, shall be the boundary line between the two states."

"Article 4. The claims to lands lying west of the Tennessee river, and north of Alexander and Munsell's line, derived from North Carolina or Tennessee, shall be considered null and void, and claims to lands lying south of said line, and west of Tennessee river, derived from Virginia or Kentucky, shall, in like manner be considered null and void.

"Article 5. All lands now vacant and unappropriated by any person or persons claiming to hold under the states of North Carolina or Tennessee, east of the Tennessee river, and north of the parallel of latitude of 36 degrees 30 minutes north, shall be the property of, and subject to the disposition of the state of Kentucky, which state may make all laws necessary and proper for disposing of and granting said lands," &c., "and may by herself or officers do any acts necessary and proper for carrying these provisions into effect; and any grant or grants she may make therefor, shall be received in evidence in all courts of law or equity in the state of Tennessee, and be available to the party deriving title under the same," &c.

"Article 6. Claims to lands east of the Tennessee river, between Walker's line and the latitude of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north, derived from the state of Virginia in consideration of military services, shall not be prejudiced in any respect by the establishment of Walker's line, but such claims shall be considered as rightfully entered or granted, and the claimants may enter upon said lands, or assert their rights in the courts of justice, without prejudice by lapse of time, or from any statute of limitations for any period prior to the settlement of the boundary between the two states; saving, however, to the holders and occupants of conflicting claims, if any there be, the right of showing such entries or grants to be invalid and of no effect, or that they have paramount and superior titles to the land covered by such Virginia claims.

"Article 7. All private rights and interests of lands between Walker's line from the Cumberland river, near the mouth of Oby's river to the south eastern corner of Kentucky, at the point where the boundary line between Virginia and Kentucky intersected Walker's line on the Cumberland mountain, and the parallel of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, heretofore derived from Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, or Tennessee, shall be considered as rightfully emanating from either of those states; and the states of Kentucky and Tennessee reserve to themselves respectively the power of carrying into grant claims not yet perfected; and in case of conflicting claims, (if any there be,) the validity of each claim shall be tested by the laws of the state from which it emanated; and the contest shall be decided as if each state respectively had possessed the jurisdiction and soil, and full power and right to authorize the location, survey or grant according to her own rules and regulations."

This treaty was ratified by the legislatures of the two states, the sanction of congress having been previously given. It appears that Walker's line is about eight miles north of Matthews' line, and that the land in controversy lies between them. It is also proved that the states of North Carolina and Tennessee have always claimed up to the line of Walker, after it was run, as the boundary between those states and the states of Virginia and Kentucky. And that south of Walker's line the state of Tennessee has always exercised jurisdiction, the same as over other parts of the state. And this exercise of jurisdiction would seem to have been acquiesced in by Kentucky, as her jurisdiction was not exercised south of the line. The counties of both states were bounded by it.

The will of Frederick Rohrer is offered in evidence, to which two objections are made: (1) On account of the insufficiency of the certificate and probate to authorize its registration in the state. (2) That said will was registered in Tennessee after the institution of this suit; and therefore can only take effect from the date of registration. This will purports to have been made and published and proved in the state of Pennsylvania. And it is clear, as contended by the counsel for the defendants, that a will or any other instrument to convey lands in Tennessee, must derive its efficacy from the laws of Tennessee. By the act of 1823, c. 31, the legislature of Tennessee authorizes copies of wills made out of the state to be recorded in the county where the land lies, provided they shall have been proved according to the law then in force in the state, as to wills made and executed within the state; and when so recorded shall have the same force and effect as if the original had been executed in this state, and proved and allowed in its courts; and shall be sufficient to pass lands and other estate.

This act does not appear to require that the will or the copy of the will shall be proved in this state, as a will presented for probate would be required to be proved; but that it shall have been proved in the state where it was made and published, in the mode required by the laws of Tennessee. How could a copy of a will be proved in Tennessee, as an original will presented for probate? The probate of this will as made in Pennsylvania seems to be substantially what the law of Tennessee requires, and this is duly certified. This point, however, may be hereafter considered, should the counsel for the defendants bring it before the court by motion.

As to the objection in regard to the registration, we have no hesitancy in overruling it. The registration does not create the instrument, but makes it admissible in evidence; and it has relation back to the proof of the will. Suppose a law of Tennessee required deeds executed in another state for land in this state to be recorded in the county where the land is situated before they can be received as evidence of title, would the registration not have relation back to the execution of the deed? Is not this the rule, under the statute in regard to deeds executed and registered within the state? The will is admitted to be read to the jury.

Another objection is made that the title offered in evidence by the lessors of the plaintiff, shows a tenancy in common and the declaration sets out a joint demise. This objection is obviated by the practice of the courts in Tennessee, under the act of 1801, c. 6, § 60 [Acts N. C. & Tenn. 1715–1813, p. 342], which provides "that after issue joined in any ejectment on the title only, no exception to form or substance shall be taken to the declaration in any court, whatever." 2 Yerg. 227.

The preliminary questions having been considered, we will come to the main point in the case. Walker's line, which by the compact is made the boundary between Kentucky and Tennessee, is not the boundary described in the original charter of the colony by Charles II. and recognized in the constitution of the state of North Carolina. This was at 36° 30′ which is designated by Matthews' line. This then, was the original and true boundary. And this is admitted by the state of Tennessee in the compact, and in the sanctions given by her of that instrument. From these facts it follows that the lands granted to the defendants by the states of North Carolina and Tennessee, and which are involved in this suit, were granted when they were beyond the limits of those states. They had possession and exercised jurisdiction, but this possession and jurisdiction the state of Tennessee has admitted to have been wrongful.

There may be many acts done in the exercise of such a jurisdiction, which of necessity must be considered ever afterwards final and conclusive. But these acts are generally of a temporary character, however much they may affect the rights of individuals, and emanating from the sovereign power de facto, cannot at a subsequent period be reviewed and corrected. But this rule does not apply to a grant made of the soil, which is of itself an act of sovereignty and of a permanent character. A state no more than an individual, can grant that which does not belong to it. If the grants then made beyond the limits of the state conveyed no right, no right was taken or appropriated under the compact. The state making the grant may consider herself bound morally to make some remuneration to grantees for these lands, under the circumstances; but to admit, as the state of Tennessee has admitted in the compact, that the grants were for land beyond her jurisdiction, which must consequently render them inoperative, does in no sense impair the obligation of her contract. The contract though executed, had no legal existence as a title.

But there is another and a higher ground, on which this case may be decided. These states acted in their sovereign capacities in entering into the compact or treaty. The subject was one which peculiarly belonged to the sovereign power; and acting under the sanction of congress, their powers were ample to treat as to their respective limits; and the compact was binding upon the citizens of each. No power can supervise or object to the decision thus made. It is binding as well on the federal as the state courts. The act is one of sovereignty and can only be modified or annulled by the exercise of the same power. And if in the adjustment of boundaries the rights of individuals shall become impaired, they must look to their respective governments for indemnity. It would indeed be a novel principle in the laws of nations, for individuals to object to a treaty of limits and endeavor to annul it, because their interests were not suitably protected. This would be to place private interests above those that are national; and to subject the political power of a state to the counteraction of any one of the elements of which it is composed. The compact is a law to the sovereigns who entered into it, and it is equally a law to their citizens. It regulates the rights and remedies of all who are affected by it.

If these defendants can interpose their rights and render the treaty ineffectual in part, it must become so entirely. Kentucky cannot be called upon to give effect to her engagements, if Tennessee shall disregard hers. By such means then the treaty must fall, and the prosperity, if not the peace of the two sovereignties may be jeoparded. The compact must stand, and effect must be given to its stipulations. We will therefore instruct the jury, that as by the compact between Kentucky and Tennessee, the boundary line of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north, was fixed several miles south of Walker's line, and of the land in controversy; the titles of the defendants were subject to the compact, and can only be sustained under it. That the state of Tennessee, by sanctioning the compact, admitted in the most solemn form that the lands in dispute were not within her jurisdiction nor within the jurisdiction of North Carolina, at the time they were granted; and that consequently, the titles were subject to the conditions of the compact.

Under this instruction the jury found a verdict of guilty against the defendants, and a judgment was entered on the verdict. The cause was afterwards taken to the supreme court by a writ of error, and the judgment was affirmed. Poole v. Lessee of Fleeger, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 185.

[NOTE. After the rendering of the verdict for plaintiffs, defendants moved for a new trial, but the motion was denied, whereupon the cause was taken to the supreme court on writ of error, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed, with costs, Mr. Justice Story delivering the opinion. It was held that the constitutional limitation providing that "no state shall without the consent of congress enter into any agreement or compact with another state" plainly admits that with such consent it might be done; and as in the present instance, that consent has been expressly given, the compact has full validity, and all its terms and conditions are equally obligatory upon citizens of both states. The compact, by necessary implication, admits that the boundary between Kentucky and Tennessee is the latitude of 36° 30′ north, and that Walker's Line is to be deemed the true line only for the purpose of future jurisdiction. In this view of the matter, Mr. Justice Story remarked that "it is perfectly clear that the grants made by North Carolina and Tennessee under which the defendants claimed were not rightfully made, because they were originally beyond her territorial boundary; and that the grant under which claimants claim was rightfully made, because it was within the territorial boundary of Virginia."

[In the matter of the admissibility of the will of Frederick Rohrer, it seems by the record that no exception was taken to the opinion of the court permitting the will to be read; and, as no copy of the will or probate or certificate thereof was contained in the record, the question of its admissibility as evidence was not fully considered. 11 Pet. FLEISHMAN v. The JOHN P. BEST.

[37 Leg. Int. 18;[1] 8 Wkly. Notes Cas. 30; 26 Int. Rev. Rec. 14; 14 Phila. 527.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Dec. 29, 1879.

CARRIERS—FREIGHT PAID IN ADVANCE—FAILURE TO DELIVER CARGO—STOWAGE—SHIFTING BOARDS.

1. One hundred head of cattle were shipped on respondent's steamer, and $2,000 freight paid in advance During a storm eighty-seven head were washed overboard. The underdeck cargo consisted of grain, and the evidence showed that in the lower hold there were no shifting boards, and that in consequence the cargo shifted during the storm, thereby contributing to produce the "list" of the ship. Subsequent to such "list" a number of the cattle were lost, some having gone prior to the "list." Held, the deficiency charged in the stowage of the cargo, arising from the absence of "shifting boards," which are required by the rules and usages of the port of loading, is well founded, and the respondent is responsible for the cattle thus lost after the ship listed.

2. To entitle a carrier to freight the goods must be delivered at the destined port, or no freight is earned.

3. A partial conveyance is not a compliance with the contract; and it is no answer to a denial of freight that the delivery was defeated by calamity. And where the freight has been paid in advance, it may, under such circumstances, be reclaimed. The distinction sought to be drawn between "payment" and "advance" of freight seems to be without support, either in reason or authority.

[2] [The libellant shipped on board the steamer John P. Best, one hundred head of live cattle, to be carried on deck, and delivered at Southampton. The original contract was as follows: "New York, May 16, 1878. Engaged from Messrs. Fleishman, Edelmuth & Goldschmidt per steamship 'John P. Best,' hence to Southampton, a full load of cattle on deck; number optional with captain; not less than one hundred (100) to be shipped, at ninety-five shillings (95), Br. sterling, per head, payable here in cash, without credit or discount, before sailing, with one hundred dollars ($100) gratuity to master, also payable here. Stalls, fixtures, food, etc., for the cattle to be supplied by shippers; ship to furnish water only. Ship not responsible for loss occasioned by stress of weather or any mortality whatever. Ship agrees to supply steerage passage for two men (attendants on the cattle) back from Southampton to New York. John C. Saeger, Agent. Witness: S. Van Pragg."

BUTLER, District Judge. In May, 1878, the libellant shipped on board the John P. Best, then lying in the port of New York, and bound to Southampton, England, one hundred head of live cattle, to be carried on deck. The vessel started on the 16th of May, and on the fourth day out, the 19th, encountered a severe gale, in which all the cattle but thirteen were lost overboard. Sustaining considerable injury, and being in such condition as made the continuation of her voyage unsafe, she returned to Philadelphia, where the libellant attached her, alleging that the loss of his cattle resulted from the "careless, negligent and improper manner of stowing the underdeck cargo, which consisted of grain; rendering the vessel thereby wholly unseaworthy;" that in the lower hold there were no shifting boards, to keep the cargo in position, and that in consequence it shifted, throwing the vessel on her beam ends; by reason of which the deck load of cattle was carried overboard, and eighty-seven head lost. Subsequently the libellant amended his libel, charging unseaworthiness of the vessel in other respects; and claiming to recover, in addition to the loss sustained, on account of the cattle, the further sum of $2,000 and interest thereon,—the freight paid respondent in New York. The respondent's contract to carry on deck, made him responsible for the seaworthiness of his vessel. The libellant assumed all risks usual to a deck cargo; but nothing more. Loss, arising from unseaworthiness of the vessel, the respondent would be liable for. Unseaworthiness is charged in several particulars: First, as respects the stowage of the cargo in the hold; second, the condition of the coal bunkers and their covers; third, insufficiency and inadequacy of the pipes connected with the pumps; and, fourth, the absence of lining in the bilge, necessary to keep the grain from the pumps. The deficiency charged in the stowage of the cargo (as we have seen) consisted in the absence of "shifting boards." This charge, in my judgment, is well founded. The rules and usages of the port of loading, as well as of most, if not all, others in this country (which must be regarded as in the minds of the parties at the time of contracting), require the employment of such boards; and all the experienced seamen who, as witnesses, have spoken on the subject, concur in the judgment, that they are necessary, in stowing grain in bulk. That the master honestly sought to perform his duty in this respect, is not doubted. A foreigner, and unacquainted with our method of stowing such a cargo, he employed an experienced and reputable stevedore of the port, on whom he had a right to depend for compliance with our rules and usages. He is nevertheless responsible to the libellant to the extent of the loss he may have sustained from the improper stowage of the grain. Whether the other charges of unseaworthiness are well founded, is open to doubt; and in the view I entertain of the case, need not be decided.

To show unseaworthiness is not of itself sufficient to entitle the libellant to recover. He must further show that this occasioned his loss. He undertakes to do so by evidence that the ship "listed," either from the shifting of the grain, or from water entering through the coal bunkers, or both these causes combined; and that in consequence thereof, the cattle went over. As a severe storm prevailed at the time of the loss, and the cattle were liable to be swept off thereby, even in the absence of the "list" stated, the burden is on the libellant to prove his allegation. No presumption arises against the respondent from the loss of the cattle. To support his allegation the libellant relies upon the testimony of Thomas C. Douglass, who was in charge of the cattle. This witness testified that the "list" existed, virtually, if not actually, from the time the vessel left the port of New York, growing worse from day to day, and by the 19th had become so bad that the cattle went over, in consequence. If this statement could be accepted, the libellant's case would be complete. But it cannot. To me it seems to be so inconsistent with probabilities, and is so directly in conflict with the testimony of all other witnesses examined on this subject, that I must reject it. I do not mean to disparage, or speak unkindly of, the witness; his statements may be strictly true; but the circumstances are such that I cannot accept them. That the cargo was properly stowed, save in the absence of "shifting boards," to hold it steady, in rough weather, is not open to doubt. Until the vessel had been out for three days there was nothing to disturb the cargo; and all persons on board (except this witness), and the several persons who saw the vessel start out, say she was upright—having no such inclination, as Mr. Douglass states. On the 19th, however, as we have seen, she encountered a severe gale, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The sea swept over her, into her coal bunkers, damaging the wheel house, carrying away skylights, and, as the witnesses say, everything from her deck. According to the clear weight of the testimony the "list" occurred at this time, and not before. All the witnesses on board (with the single exception stated), so testify, and the log (to falsify which no motive existed at that time, for the master was not then aware of any remissness respecting the cargo, or any other matter, bearing on the fact here involved) so states. For some hours previously the cattle had been going over, as a consequence, purely, I think, of the storm; and a large additional number were washed off by the sea which struck the vessel just before the "list" occurred; leaving probably not more than one-third of the number shipped, on board when the vessel settled over. Of this, in my judgment, the testimony leaves little room for doubt. For the cattle thus lost the respondent is not liable. Thirteen only of those remaining were saved; the others being lost during the following night. Is the respondent liable for the loss of these? The absence of "shifting boards" must be regarded as contributing to produce the "list." In the violent action of the vessel the grain shifted, as the log, and other testimony, shows, and assisted, at least, to hold the vessel over. It is not important that the water taken in, may have first caused the inclination. If it did, the shifting of the grain directly after, made the righting of the vessel impossible.

Although it cannot be affirmed that the cattle thereafter lost, would not have been lost, if the list had not occurred, its occurrence certainly increased the danger, and I think, must be considered as contributing to the loss which followed. While my mind is not so free from doubt respecting this branch of the case as that which precedes it, I believe the respondent should be held responsible for the cattle lost after the ship "listed." The number of these is uncertain. I think, however, it may, with reasonable safety, be put at twenty,—being one third of the whole number, less the thirteen saved. This corresponds with the master's estimate. And while it cannot, therefore, justly be complained of by the respondent, it is as favorable to the libellant as the testimony will admit of making it. His witness, Douglass, says fifty had gone over before noon.

As we have seen, the libellant paid the freight on the cattle, amounting to $2,000, in advance; and now demands its return. The rule that a shipper is not bound to pay freight without full performance of his contract by the carrier, is well understood. The goods must be delivered at the destined port, or no freight is earned. A partial conveyance is not a compliance with the contract; and it is no answer to a denial of freight, that the delivery was defeated by calamity. Where the freight has been paid in advance, it may, under such circumstances, be reclaimed. The distinction sought to be drawn between "payment" and "advance" of freight, seems to be without support either in reason or authority. To the rule that a contract for the carriage of goods is entire, entitling the carrier to freight only on delivery, an exception is made in favor of the carriage of live stock, dying on the voyage. The reason for this exception is nowhere stated. It must be found, I think, in the likelihood of such death occurring; and the justice of placing the loss of freight in that event on the shipper. It cannot be referred to the fact that the loss results from an "act of God," for such a basis would abrogate the rule. No greater reason exists for applying the exception to loss of stock from other cause—as from perils of the sea—than to any other cargo. The authorities exhibit no instance in which the exception has been applied to loss from other cause. The rule is subject of course to variation by the terms of a special contract. I find nothing in the contract before me, however, to vary it as respects this case. The respondent must therefore be required to return the freight received on account of the cattle lost on the voyage.

FLEMING v. FOY.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 423.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1834.

WAGER RECOVERABLE AT COMMON LAW.

A wager may be recovered at common law, although the parties have no other interest in the subject of the wager, than that which is created by the wager itself.

Appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace, for $20 and costs against Fleming, founded upon the following writing: "September 24th, 1832. I agree to pay Mr. M. Foy $20 if your colour man did not execute my thre springs of my carrage all to gether moening the four springs. John Fleming. Mr. A. Russell."

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent, but assenting). This is understood to be a wager, and that a correspondent writing was given by Mordecai Foy, and that the two promises were mutual considerations to each other. Mr. Morfit, for the defendant, (the appellant,) contends, that no wager can be recovered at common law, and cites the following cases, to wit:

Smith v. Ary, 3 Salk. 175, in which the court held that indebitatus assumpsit would not lie upon mutual promises. because debt would not lie. But no objection was made upon the ground that the wager was unlawful; or that it was a gaming transaction, although it was for money won at play. The case turned entirely upon the form of action; it is, therefore, rather against the point for which it is cited. Eggleton v. Lewin, 3 Salk. 176 (2 Annae); indebitatus assumpsit for £20, won at cards. Upon a writ of error, "the error assigned was, that a general indebitatus assumpsit would not lie for money won at play; and the greater number of judges inclined that it would; but Holt, C. J., and Pollexfen, C. J. of C. B., that it would not, because there must be some meritorious act as a consideration to maintain such action; it will lie against him who holds the wager, because the law implies a promise to deliver the money to the winner." This case also was decided upon the form of the action, and is against the point for which it was cited. It was before the 9th of Anne, and after the 16th of Car. II., which only prohibited wagers to the value of £100. Amory v. Gilman, 2 Mass. 5, was upon a policy of insurance; and the opinion of the court was, that a policy without interest was void; and the reason is expressed in Goddart v. Garrett, 2 Vern. 269, "that these insurances are made for the encouragement of trade; and not that persons unconcerned in trade, nor interested in the ship, should profit by it." The court expressed no opinion respecting the validity of wagers in general, but confined their remarks to wager policies of insurance. The case, therefore, is not in point. Good v. Elliot, 3 Term R. 693. This was an action upon a wager that Susannah Tye had, before a certain day, bought a wagon belonging to D. Coleman. After verdict for the plaintiff, there was a motion in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that all wagers are illegal where the party has no other interest in the subject-matter of them than that which he chooses to create by his bet. This case is cited for the opinion of Mr. Justice Buller, which was overruled by the three other judges. Mr. Justice Grose said: "In thus stating the proposition, it seems admitted that some cases are legal; and, indeed, it cannot, after the different authorities which have been decided, be doubted;" "and that after the cases which have been determined, to say that this action cannot be maintained, would be to make law and not to interpret it." Mr. Justice Ashhurst said: "As to the general ground, namely, whether an action will lie on any wager, that question does not now appear open to argument, it having been settled by so many authorities, both ancient and modern, particularly in the case of Da Costa v. Jones [Cowp. 729]; and Lord Kenyon, C. J., said, "I have not entertained the least doubt upon this question, from the time it was argued down to the present moment." "Now, in order to know what the law has said upon this subject, let us trace it back, and it will be found, that from the earliest times, the books all speak the same language." And again he says: "From the earliest times, therefore, down to the case of Da Costa v. Jones, there appears to have been no doubt on the subject." And in that case, "Lord Mansfield said, that indifferent wagers upon indifferent matters, without interest to either of the parties, are allowed by the law of this country, so far as they have not been restrained by particular acts of parliament; and the restraint imposed in particular cases, supports the general rule." And again, Lord Kenyon says: "Being bound by former decisions; not having the power to alter the law; not finding any one case against the legality of wagers in general; and finding cases without number, wherein wagers have been held to be good, and that the payment of them may be enforced, I think the wager in the present case good at common law." Robinson v. Mearns, 6 Dow. & R. 26. This was an action for money had and received, brought to recover back a sum of £20, which had been deposited by the plaintiff in the hands of the defendant as stake-holder upon a wager on the event of a horse-race. After the race, there being a dispute between the parties as to which horse had won, the plaintiff demanded his deposit. After verdict for the plaintiff, leave was given to the defendant to move for a nonsuit; and one ground taken was, that the wager itself was illegal and void, and no action could be maintained respecting it. It was admitted that the wager was illegal; and the verdict was sustained "on the ground that it" (the money) "was demanded before it was paid over, the wager itself being illegal." But Holroyd, J., said: "Upon looking into the authorities, it will be found that the right of the party to recover back the deposit paid on a wager, does not depend upon whether the wager be illegal and void, or whether it be won or lost; but upon whether the stake-holder has received it upon an illegal consideration; for if he has, he is bound to refund it." This case, we suppose, is cited because it admits that a wager of £20, upon a horse-race, is illegal; and the conclusion drawn from it is, that all wagers are, at common law, illegal. But no such conclusion can be drawn, because a wager for more than £10 upon a horse-race, is void by the 9 Anne, c. 14, taken in connection with 16 Car. II. c. 7, as decided in the cases of Goodburn v. Marley, 2 Strange, 1159; Lynall v. Longbothom, 2 Wils. 36, and Blaxton v. Pye, 2 Wils. 309. On the contrary, the statute which makes void the wager, is evidence that it was not void at common law.

But it is said that the earliest case cited in Good v. Elliot, was that of Andrews v. Herne, 1 Lev. 33, in the 12th year of Charles II., Anno, 1660, and that prior to that time the law was otherwise. But there is no case to the contrary, and Lord Kenyon says that the law was so from the earliest times. It has also been said, that we took the common law as it existed and had been expounded at the time of the first emigration to Maryland, namely, in the year 1633, the date of the charter, which was twenty-seven years before the case of Andrews v. Herne; so that that case is no authority here. If cases made the law, instead of being merely evidence of the law, this would be true; but a recent case is as good evidence of what the common law, in a like case, was, one hundred years ago, as it is of what the common law now is; and such has been the prevailing opinion in Maryland, whose courts have, up to the present time, considered the decisions of the English courts as evidence of the common law in cases in which it has not been authoritatively adjudged otherwise in the courts of Maryland.

In regard to wagers in general, the cases which have been cited have generally been considered in the United States, as settling the law. This court has so considered them; and in the case of Denney v. Elkins, at May term, 1831, in this court [Case No. 3,790], the law respecting wagers in general was considered as settled; and that case was decided upon that exception to the general rule which condemns wagers against the public policy of the country in regard to the freedom of elections. The general rule is, that a fair wager may be recovered at law. To this rule there are exceptions, as stated in the case of Good v. Elliot, 3 Term R. 693. The wager in the present case, however, does not come within any of the exceptions. Judgment affirmed, with costs.

Case No. 4,862a.

FLEMING v. NORTHAMPTON NAT. BANK.

[62 How. Pr. 177.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 1881.

BANKS—LIABILITY FOR STOLEN SECURITIES—NEGLIGENCE—PROVINCE OF JURY.

[1. Banks who have in their possession collateral security for the payment of loans are called upon to take the same care that good business men or persons or corporations of their class ordinarily take of such bonds. They are liable for want of ordinary care.]

[2. Although there may be found fragmentary evidence in favor of the party upon whom the burden of proof is imposed, yet if the testimony, assuming it to be true, and the inferences which may fairly be drawn therefrom, are, in the opinion of the court, entirely insufficient to authorize the jury to find a verdict in favor of the party upon whom the onus of proof is cast, it is the duty of the court to direct the jury what verdict to render.]

[3. The fact that a watchman employed to guard a bank left at four o'clock in the morning, after which plaintiff's securities were taken from the bank by robbers, is such slight evidence of want of ordinary care that a jury would not be justified in finding for the plaintiff upon that fac alone.]

[This was an action by Emma A. Fleming against the Northampton National Bank to recover the value of certain government bonds held by defendant as collateral security for a loan, and which were taken from its vaults by robbers on the morning of January 26, 1876, after the watchman on duty had left the bank.]

Bates & Hernz, for plaintiff.

Peckham & Tyler, for the bank, moved for a nonsuit at the end of plaintiff's testimony.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. It is now well settled that, although there may be found fragmentary evidence in favor of the party upon whom the burden of proof is imposed, yet, if the testimony, assuming it to be true, and the inferences which may fairly be drawn therefrom, are, in the opinion of the court, entirely insufficient to authorize the jury to find a verdict in favor of the party upon whom the onus of proof is cast, it is the duty of the court to direct the jury what verdict to render. This rule does not imply that the court should weigh the credibility of opposing witnesses, or determine whether the uncontradicted witnesses are to be credited; but conceding to all the evidence offered the greatest probative force which, according to the law of evidence, it is fairly entitled to, the court is to determine whether there is any substantial evidence which can justify a verdict in favor of the party in whose favor the evidence is offered or received. Now, in this case these bonds were left by Mr. Fleming with the Northampton Bank as collateral security for the payment of a loan. It is in proof, or sufficiently in proof, so that there can be no doubt upon the subject that these bonds, together with a very great amount of other bonds and valuable personal property, were taken by robbers from this bank on the morning of the 26th of January, 1876, and by superior force, in the absence of any of the officers or the watchman of the bank; that subsequently this note matured; that payment was tendered and refused; and that demand was made for the bonds.

Now, what is the law upon the subject of bailees of collateral securities? The law is that banks who have in their possession collateral security for the payment of loans are called upon to take the same care that good business men, or persons or corporations of their class, ordinarily take of such bonds. That is, in the old phrase of the law, they are liable for want of ordinary care. It is proper, as was stated by the court in Case of Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 479, that higher obligation of care should be imposed upon banks, which have a very large amount of property and assets, than should be imposed upon private individuals, and therefore use the phrase, "good business people of their class who deal in sureties of this sort and who hold securities of this sort." This being so,—the state of the facts being, as I have stated, that the property was taken from them by superior force,—there is an obligation upon the plaintiff to prove in some way lack of ordinary care; and if he does not prove it, then he has not made out his case. The only proof in this case of any consequence, as it seems to me, is that there was no watchman present; that the watchman went away at four o'clock. This man watched this as well as the other banks in the neighborhood, going on at ten o'clock at night and leaving at four o'clock the next morning. The fact would seem to me to be very slight evidence from which to infer negligence or want of ordinary care, and so slight that a jury would not be justified in finding a verdict for the plaintiff upon that fact alone. It is the important fact which is here presented. I think there is no case made out by the plaintiff, and I therefore direct a verdict for the defendant.

COLLISION—EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

[1. Failure to carry a light does not put a vessel at fault unless the discovery of her position to the colliding vessel was thereby delayed.]

[2. A steamer should stop promptly upon discovering in her course an indistinct object, which may be a sail.]

[3. Testimony of persons who have witnessed dawn and sunset at the place and season involved in the issue, together with that of eyewitnesses to the facts in dispute, outweighs the received opinion of geographers and navigators as to the time of such phenomena and the duration of twilight.]

[In admiralty. Libel by Thomas D. Fletcher and others against the steamer Cubana to recover for damages suffered by the schooner Minerva in a collision.]

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for libelants.

Mr. Blatchford, for claimant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This libel is filed to recover damages alleged to have been inflicted on the schooner Minerva, at sea, on the morning of June 19, 1860, in a collision with the Spanish steamer Cubana. The schooner is an English vessel, belonging to Nova Scotia. The accident occurred about 4 or 4½ o'clock in the morning, in lat. 25° 48′ N., lon. 62° 18′ W. The schooner was under a very light breeze, and was making but little headway at the time. It was the duty of the steamer to have cleared her, and she is liable for the damages caused by the collision, unless the schooner was in fault. The only serious fault which can be charged upon her is that charged in the pleadings, and evidence of the omission to show a light. The question of her duty on this point turns upon the fact whether or not it was dark at the time. The libelant's witnesses insist that it was not, while those on behalf of the steamer assert the contrary. Two witnesses from this city have been called, who swear that they are acquainted with the navigation of the ocean in the vicinity of the place of this collision, and they state that at that season of the year it must have been broad daylight at the time the vessels collided. The court has had some hesitation in accepting this statement, as it is in conflict with the commonly received opinion of geographers and navigators touching the length of time which dawn precedes the morning and twilight follows the setting sun. But as the testimony is positive, and the witnesses say they have personally witnessed the state of the atmosphere in that region and at that season of the year and time of day, the court must accept their testimony as confirming that of those on board the schooner. The mate of the Cubana also says that he saw something on his leebow, a short time previous to the collision, his attention having been attracted to it by a cry from his lookout. He states that it was indistinct, and appeared like a sail. He soon recognized it to be a schooner, then half a mile or a mile off. He immediately changed his course and ordered the steamer to be stopped. He should have stopped her at once, on discovering indistinctly what proved to be the schooner, instead of waiting till she emerged fully into view. This was the only safe course, and would have probably averted the collision. If the evidence had satisfied the court that it was sufficiently dark to have rendered a light on board the schooner available in disclosing her to the steamer at an earlier moment, the court would have apportioned the damage. But though the evidence is not as satisfactory as could be wished on this question, the court is constrained on the whole, to conclude that it was so light that a lantern displayed on the schooner would not have led to her earlier discovery by the steamer. Decree for the libelants, with a referee to compute the damages.

MAINTENANCE—ACTION FOR—PLEADING.

1. An action will lie for maintenance in this country.

2. In the declaration it is necessary to allege the pendency of a suit, in what court pending, together with time, place, and circumstances, so as to show the maintenance.

[Error to Conway circuit court.]

Before CROSS and YELL, Judges.

CROSS, Judge. The record in this case shows that the plaintiff in error [Frederick Fletcher] brought an action of trespass on the case against the defendant [William Ellis], in the Conway circuit court, and in his declaration alleged "that the said plaintiff and one Alexander Rogers, were indebted to Daniel Gilmore in a large sum of money, namely, in the amount of fifty-five dollars, upon which said Gilmore had brought suit and obtained judgment, and sued out execution against the plaintiff and the said Rogers, and the plaintiff avers that he and Rogers had, in the county of Conway, sufficient goods and chattels to have satisfied the execution, and the plaintiff avers that the defendant being an evil disposed person, fond of encouraging litigation and fomenting strife, and wishing to harass, impoverish, and distress the plaintiff, did, on the first day of October, 1834, at the county of Conway, and within the jurisdiction of this court, maliciously persuade and procure the said Daniel Gilmore, by offering him to pay all costs and charges, and to see his debt made secure, to have the plaintiff's body taken in execution; and by reason of the defendant's procurements by his several offers and promises as aforesaid made, the plaintiff's body was taken in execution." It also appears that the defendant filed a demurrer to the declaration, which was sustained by the court. The writ of error is prosecuted to reverse the judgment sustaining the demurrer.

A mere glance at the declaration will show that it has been drawn by an extremely careless pleader. The object of the action doubtless was, to charge the defendant for a maintenance, which is defined to be an officious intermeddling in a suit depending in a court, with which the person so intermeddling has nothing to do, by assisting the plaintiff or defendant in the prosecution of such suit. Co. Litt. 368; 2 Inst. 213. The court is not designated in which the suit was pending, nor is the time or place alleged when and where the execution issued or into whose hands it came. The allegation is in relation to the maintenance, that the defendant offered Gilmore to pay costs and charges, and to see that his debt was secured. Between a mere offer to assist and assistance, there is certainly a material difference, for without the latter, the maintenance is not committed at all. So far as anything can be collected on the subject from the declaration, it seems that at the time the offer was made to pay costs and see the debt secured, an execution was rightfully in the hands of an officer of some kind, and the plaintiff and Rogers had a sufficiency of property in the county to satisfy it. If so, the defendant's offers were made in relation to a matter over which neither he nor Gilmore had any control, as the officer was legally bound in the first place, to levy on and dispose of the property in satisfaction of the writ, notwithstanding the plaintiff in execution might have instructed him to arrest the body of the defendant.

That an action lies in this country for maintenance, we entertain but little doubt. Yet it certainly would be necessary, in order to sustain such an action, to allege not only the pendency of a suit, but designate the particular court in which it was depending, together with time and circumstances, none of which requisites exist in the case before us. Indeed, there is scarcely a single requisite stated necessary to constitute a maintenance, and we have seldom had occasion to examine a declaration in which there was so frail a cause of action set forth. Judgment affirmed.

FLETCHER et al. v. MOREY.

[2 Story, 555.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1843.

EQUITABLE LIEN FOR ADVANCES — BANKRUPTCY—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE—ACT OF 1841—EQUITY JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS — MORTGAGE—FRAUDULENT INTENT.

1. The bill, in this case, asserted an equitable lien against certain shipments, and the proceeds thereof, in the hands of the assignee of James Read & Co. as security for advances made by the plaintiffs, under an agreement with James Read & Co. by which Read & Co. were authorised to make drafts on the plaintiffs in payment for merchandise, the said merchandise being pledged and hypothecated to the plaintiffs as collateral security for their advances. It was held, that the lien was good.

2. So, also, duties and charges upon the shipments having been paid by Messrs. Read & Co.; it was held, that they were not to be deducted from the value of the shipments, or the proceeds in the hands of the assignee, except in respect to such goods as came into the hands of the assignee, charged with those duties, since the bankruptcy.

3. The assignee in bankruptcy takes the property and rights of the bankrupt, subject to all the liabilities and with all the rights, that would attach to them in the hands of the bankrupt; the only exception is in case of fraud.

[Cited in Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 248.]

[1] [Reported by William W. Story, Esq.]

4. Where a lien, or equitable claim, constituting a charge in rem, is a matter of agreement, it will be enforced in equity, not only upon real estate, but also upon personal estate, or money in the hands of a third person; and against the party himself, or his personal representatives, or persons claiming under him, or assignees in bankruptcy.

5. The proviso in the second section of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9 [5 Stat. 440], embraces all liens, equitable and legal, which are valid by the lex loci contractus, and is not restricted to such as can be enforced by state laws.

6. An equitable lien is valid by the laws of Massachusetts, although no remedy for its enforcement is provided by the state jurisprudence.

7. The equity jurisdiction and equity jurisprudence administered in the courts of the United States are coincident and coextensive with that exercised in England, and are not regulated by the municipal jurisprudence of the particular state, where the court sits.

[Cited in Gindrat v. Dane, Case No. 5,455.]

8. Liens and mortgages of personal property are perfectly good, as between the parties, and against creditors, although the possession remain with the owner or mortgagor, if there be no fraudulent intent. The same rule applies to sales of personal property.

Bill in equity brought by Edward Fletcher, James Alexander, Charles Kerr, Charles Dashwood Bruce, Christopher Pearse, and Charles Philip Fletcher, of London, England, merchants and copartners negotiating under the style and firm of Fletcher, Alexander & Co., bring this their bill against George Morey, of Boston, as assignee of the joint estate and effects of James Read & Co. The bill sets forth, in substance, that on or about the thirtieth day of December, 1840, James Read, of Boston, in Massachusetts, and Horace Hall, of Charlestown, in New Hampshire, merchants and joint partners negotiating at Boston aforesaid under the firm of James Read & Co., applied to Thomas B. Curtis, the duly authorized agent of the plaintiffs on that behalf, and requested him as the said agent, to grant unto them a letter of credit upon the usual terms and conditions, and thereupon the said Curtis being thereunto duly authorized, did grant unto them a letter of credit bearing date on the thirtieth day of December, 1840, addressed to the plaintiffs by their said partnership name and style, of which the following is a true copy: "Boston, December 30, 1840. Messrs. Fletcher, Alexander & Co., London. Gentlemen: This letter will be forwarded to you by Messrs. James Read & Co., a firm of the first standing in this city. These gentlemen have orders now in progress of execution towards which they would like a credit with your good selves. Believing that I cannot introduce to you better correspondents, I hereby request that you authorize such parties as they may advise you, to draw on their account for sums not exceeding ten thousand pounds in all. Drafts drawn in payment for goods to be shipped after the reception of this letter to be accompanied by bills of lading, and merchandise so purchased and shipped from Liverpool to be forwarded through your house there. Your ob't serv't (Signed), T. B. Curtis. For £10,000." That at the same time that the said letter of credit was granted, the said James Read & Co. entered into a contract in writing with the plaintiffs, of which the following is a true copy: "Boston, December 30, 1840. Received the original of the annexed letter of credit for ten thousand pounds, in consideration whereof, we, James Read & Co., do hereby agree with Messrs. Fletcher, Alexander, & Co. to provide in London, previous to the maturity of the bills, sufficient funds to meet the payment of whatever may be negotiated by virtue thereof, with commission, on the same one per cent. and also to give security here for the same at any time previous thereto, if required by them or their agent, and all property, which shall be purchased by means of the above credit and the proceeds thereof, and the policies of insurance thereon, together with the bills of lading, are hereby pledged and hypothecated to them as collateral security for the payment as above promised, and held subject to their order on demand, with authority to take possession and dispose of the same at discretion for their security or re-imbursement. For all payments, settlements and recoveries in the United States, growing out of this credit, the pound sterling is to be calculated at the current rate of exchange, existing at the time of such settlement. Interest to be charged at the rate of six per cent. per annum. (Signed) James Read & Co." And the said James Read & Co. having signed the said contract, and delivered the same to the said Curtis, and having received from him the said letter of credit, proceeded to act thereon, and from time to time through their duly authorised agents in that behalf, drew bills on the plaintiffs in London, which were accepted and paid by them under the said letter of credit; and funds to pay the same were duly provided by the said James Read & Co. until the twenty-sixth day of March, 1841, when the said letter of credit having been altogether used and executed, and bills amounting to the sum of ten thousand pounds sterling, mentioned therein as not to be exceeded, having been drawn, the said James Read & Co. applied to the plaintiffs' said agent, and desired to renew or extend the said letter of credit and their said contract with the plaintiffs, so as to enable them to continue to use the said letter of credit, and thereupon, by mutual agreement between the said James Read & Co., and the plaintiffs' said agent, the following endorsement was made upon the said letter and signed by the plaintiffs' said agent, namely: "Boston, March 26, 1841. It is agreed that this letter of credit shall continue in force for one year from its date, and for any sums not exceeding ten thousand pounds at any one time, unless sooner annulled. T. B. Curtis, Attorney for Fletcher, Alexander & Co." And at the same time the following endorsement was made on the said contract by the said James Read & Co.: "Boston, March 26, 1841. The credit for which this obligation was given being extended per endorsement on the annexed copy thereof, we agree that the obligation shall be binding in like manner for such extension, say for any sum not exceeding at any one time ten thousand pounds sterling. James Read & Co."

That after the said letter of credit had been enlarged by the endorsement aforesaid, the said James Read & Co. proceeded to, and did authorize certain persons doing business under the mercantile firms of W. B. Huggins & Co., Cratts & Stell, and Knauth & Storrow, to purchase merchandise for them, and draw bills of exchange on the plaintiffs for the price thereof, and charges and expenses thereon, and having duly advised the plaintiffs thereof, and requested them to accept the same, they, pursuant to the said letter of credit extended as aforesaid, and relying on the said written contract of the said James Read & Co., and the hypothecation and promise of a specific lien therein contained, did accept bills of exchange drawn by the said mercantile firms, to pay for merchandise purchased by them for the said James Read & Co. That the said James Read & Co. have wholly failed to comply with their said promise to the plaintiffs to provide in London previous to the maturity of the said bills of exchange sufficient funds to meet the payment thereof together with the plaintiffs' commission thereon, and on the twenty-third day of April, 1842, by a decree of the district court of the United States, within and for the said district of Massachusetts, the said James Read & Co., upon their own petition, were duly declared bankrupts, and George Morey, Esquire, of Boston, aforesaid, was duly appointed their assignee; so that it is now wholly beyond the power of the said James Read & Co. and their assignee, to provide funds as aforesaid, nor do they, or either of them intend or expect so to do. That of the merchandise purchased as aforesaid and paid for by bills of exchange drawn as aforesaid, some has already reached the hands and possession of the said James Read & Co., whereof some has been sold, and the proceeds thereof remain in their hands, or have come to the hands of their assignee, in the form of bills of exchange or promissory notes, or in some other form, so that the same can be identified and specified; and some thereof still remain in their hands, or the hands of their assignee, unsold. And some of the said merchandise so purchased and paid for, as aforesaid, having arrived in this country after the said James Read & Co. had become insolvent, and had filed their petition to be declared bankrupts, the plaintiffs' said agent applied to them in behalf of the plaintiffs, to perform their said contract by delivering to him the bills of lading of such property as had not yet been received by them, and thereupon the said James Read & Co. did endorse and deliver to the plaintiffs' said agent the bills of lading of merchandise, which the said James Read & Co. had then received. That of the said merchandise so purchased and paid for as aforesaid, the bills of lading of some part have come to the hands of the said Morey as assignee, and of a part the bills of lading have not yet arrived, but the whole of the residue of the said merchandise is soon expected to arrive and to come to the hands of the said assignee. That on or about the twenty-fifth day of March, 1842, the plaintiffs, by their said agent, applied to the said James Read & Co., and requiring of them that all property purchased by virtue of the said letters of credit, or the proceeds thereof, if sold, should be placed in the possession of the plaintiffs' said agent, for the plaintiffs' security, in compliance with the contract aforesaid, and the said James Read & Co. admitting that they were bound to do so by their contract aforesaid, did hand to the said agent an invoice of the said merchandise then remaining unsold, and also a list of all unsettled accounts of the sales of the said merchandise, which had been sold, but by reason of their having petitioned for a decree of bankruptcy as aforesaid, refused to permit the said plaintiffs' said agent to take possession of the said merchandise. That the said Morey had actual notice before his appointment to the said trust, of the plaintiffs' lien on the said merchandise and bills of lading, and express and particular notice thereof very soon after his said appointment, and was requested to permit the plaintiffs to take possession thereof pursuant to their rights under the said contract of James Read & Co. with the plaintiffs, but the said Morey as such assignee refused and still refuses so to do.

The bill concludes with a prayer, that the court will be pleased to declare that the plaintiffs are justly entitled to and have a lien on all the said merchandise and the proceeds thereof, and the bills of lading therefor, as collateral security for the faithful performance by the said James Read & Co. of their said contract with the plaintiffs, or for such further and other relief as the nature of the case may require and to your honors may seem meet, &c.

The answer admits, generally, the facts stated in the bill relative to making and extending the letter of credit, and to the bankruptcy of the defendants, and the appointment of the defendant as assignee of the firm of James Read & Co.; it also admits, that upon application by the plaintiffs, the defendants did deliver up to the plaintiffs six bills of lading of merchandise, but he submits, that they had no right or authority so to do; and that the said delivery and endorsement were null and void.

The bill annexes a schedule of certain merchandise shipped by Fletcher, Alexander & Co. to James Read & Co., and a schedule of merchandise received and sold, and the proceeds of which were disposed of by James Read & Co. previous to their going into bankruptcy, and asserts that no part thereof has come to the possession or control of this defendant, except certain sums of money, which were due and owing to the said James Read & Co. on the said seventeenth day of March, on account thereof, which have not yet been collected, and certain merchandise received by this defendant since that time, which are set forth in an exhibit, and which conform to the exhibit annexed to the plaintiffs' bill. The bill further alleges, that the defendant to his knowledge, information and belief, received no formal notice of any claim of the plaintiffs to the said merchandise, or the proceeds thereof, until after the twenty-third day of April last, when he was appointed assignee as aforesaid, and that no formal demand has been made upon him for an account or delivery thereof, or otherwise, unless the filing of the said bill of complaint was such demand. But that the said Curtis and his solicitors did before and after this defendant's appointment as assignee, as aforesaid, and before the filing of the said bill, have one or more casual conversations with this defendant, in which they alluded to the possibility of their making such a claim and filing such a bill, but the same were not understood by this defendant as meant for or intended to be formal demands or in the nature thereof, nor as legal notices that such claim would be attempted to be enforced. That no part of the merchandise purchased by means of bills of exchange drawn under the said letter of credit and the extension thereof, was purchased by the said plaintiffs or from them, but that the same was purchased by various persons, acting as agents, or under the directions of the said James Read & Co. and for their sole account, and that these persons, in order to reimburse themselves for the said purchases, drew bills on the said plaintiffs, in pursuance of the orders of the said James Read & Co. That the merchandise, so purchased, was forwarded to the plaintiffs at Liverpool to be shipped to the said James Read & Co. at Boston, and the said plaintiffs voluntarily and of their own accord, parted with the possession of the said merchandise, and consigned the same to the said James Read & Co., and suffered the same to go into their absolute possession, and to be sold or disposed of at their pleasure, without any claim or notice of any title, interest or lien of the said plaintiffs in or upon said merchandise or any part thereof.

The defendant denies, that the said plaintiffs have, or are entitled to have, in law or in equity, any lien upon the said goods and the proceeds thereof, or any right, title or interest in or to the same, and claims, that such of said merchandise as was in the hands of the said James Read & Co. at the time of the filing of their said petition, and such as has since come to the possession of them, or of this defendant, and the proceeds of all such merchandise theretofore sold, are vested in this defendant, as the assignee of the estates of the said James Read & Co., free from and divested of all liens, claims, or demands whatsoever, in favor of the plaintiffs, and that he claims so to hold them for the benefit of the creditors of the said estate, and to be disposed of according to law. And this defendant further says, that, with regard to the goods on hand on the said seventeenth day of March, the said James Read & Co. had paid or given bonds for the payment of the duties thereon; with regard to those received since that time, this defendant has paid the duties thereon, and this defendant claims to be reimbursed for all the duties so paid or secured to be paid upon said goods, and for all expenses of freight, storage, truckage, and other incidental expenses, incurred in or about said goods, if it should be held that the plaintiffs are entitled to the same. Whereupon this defendant respectfully prays, that he may be hence dismissed and allowed his costs.

The following statement was, by consent, made a part of the case: "The letter of credit and the agreement for a lien, which was co-extensive with it, expired in December, 1841; after which time, all the drafts mentioned in the bill were drawn and accepted. The said Read & Co., and Thomas B. Curtis, were ignorant, that the letter of credit expired at that time, and acted on the belief, that it had not expired; and it is presumed, that the plaintiffs were also ignorant of the fact when they accepted the bills. This fact was not known to the counsel in the case, when the bill and answer were filed, and they may be taken as amended accordingly. C. P. & B. R. Curtis, for plaintiffs."

The cause was set down for a hearing upon the bill and answer.

STORY, Circuit Justice. It does not appear to me that there is any real difficulty in the present case. The bill asserts an equitable lien against certain shipments, and the proceeds thereof, in the hands of Mr. Morey, as assignee in bankruptcy of Messrs. Read & Co., under an agreement stated in the bill, and admitted by the answer, as security for advances made by the plaintiffs under the same agreement. I say under the agreement, because, although the acceptances and advances were, in fact, made after the time stipulated in the renewed agreement for a prolongation of the original credit (in which I suspect the words "from its date" are inserted by mistake instead of "from this date"); yet it is agreed by the parties in the additional statement introduced into the case, that, in point of fact, the parties on both sides acted upon the supposition that the renewed agreement actually covered these very acceptances and advances, and that the terms of the original and renewed agreements were fully intended to apply to all the shipments made in precisely the same manner and to the same extent, as if they had been positively included therein. Under such circumstances, in a court of equity, the case stands precisely in the same predicament as if the written agreements did cover them; for, in equity, that is deemed to be done, which the parties intended to do, and which ought to be done.

Now, before proceeding to the points more directly in judgment, it is proper to remark that it is a perfectly well settled principle in equity, that the assignee in bankruptcy takes the property and rights of the bankrupt in the same plight and condition, and with all the equities attached thereto, in the same manner as the bankrupt himself held them. I recollect at present but one exception to the doctrine, and that is in the case of fraud. The general rule was laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Brown v. Heathcote, 1 Atk. 160, 162, and it has been constantly adhered to ever since. I need not cite the authorities at large. Many of them will be found referred to in a recent opinion, which I had occasion to deliver in the case of Mitchell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673] at the last October term of the circuit court at Portland. See, also, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1224, 1411.

This then being the established principle, the first question which arises in the case, is, whether there is any equitable lien, or right, or claim, under the agreement, which ought to be enforced specifically in equity against the shipments made to and for Messrs. Read & Co., or the proceeds thereof, so far as they can be distinctly traced in the hands of the assignee; and upon this point, I entertain no doubt whatsoever. In equity there is no difficulty in enforcing a lien or any other equitable claim, constituting a charge in rem, not only upon real estate, but also upon personal estate, or upon money in the hands of a third person, whenever the lien or other claim is a matter of agreement, against the party himself, and his personal representatives, and against any persons claiming under him voluntarily, or with notice, and against assignees in bankruptcy, who are treated as volunteers; for every such agreement for a lien or charge in rem constitutes a trust, and is accordingly governed by the general doctrine applicable to trusts. The cases of Farr v. Middleton, Finch, Prec. 174, 175; Collyer v. Fallon, 1 Turn. & R. 469, 475, 476; and Legard v. Hodges, 1 Ves. Jr. 478,—are fully in point. In the case of Collyer v. Fallon, 1 Turn. & R. 469, Sir Thomas Plumer (the master of the rolls) said, "The argument on his side (the plaintiff's) has been, that whenever parties contract with respect to a subject-matter, that subject-matter is thereby bound. I assent to the principle when rightly understood; but it is a principle which must be received with qualifications. Contract with respect to a given matter binds the property as between the parties to the contract; but it does not affect the rights of third persons, or bind the property in reference to any claim which they may have upon it, unless they either have notice, or are volunteers. This limitation of the proposition is stated explicitly by Lord Loughborough in the very passage which was relied on (1 Ves. Jr. 478). 'Whatsoever,' says he, 'is the agreement concerning any subject real or personal, though in form and construction merely personal and suable only at law, yet, in this court, it binds the conscience;' that is to say, the conscience of the parties to the agreement, and of those who claim under them, either with notice or without consideration. For his lordship adds: 'This maxim I take to be universal, that, wherever persons agree concerning a particular subject, that in any court of equity, as against the party himself, and any claiming under him voluntarily or with notice, raises a trust.'" See, also, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1228, 1229, 1231, 1249, note. So that, as a matter of trust directly growing out of, and provided for by, contract, the present case falls directly within the principle above stated. The goods and the proceeds thereof are expressly, by the agreement of the parties, "pledged and hypothecated" as collateral security for the advances. But then it is suggested, that in the proviso of the second section of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 4, there is no saving of any liens, except such as are valid by the laws of the state respectively; and it is added that, by the laws of Massachusetts, where the bankruptcy took place, no equitable lien exists, or can be enforced in cases of this sort. My opinion is that the terms of the proviso in the second section embrace all liens, equitable as well as legal, which are valid by the state laws. I am yet to learn, that an equitable lien may not exist in Massachusetts, and is not valid between the parties in this state. It is no answer to say, that no remedy is provided for the enforcement of such liens by the state jurisprudence in the state courts. That does not show, that no such liens exist; for many cases of acknowledged trusts no remedy at present exists in the courts of this state; but that does not show, that they have no existence or validity. Trusts in assignments, and in last wills and testaments, and equitable rights, growing out of partnerships, were, until a comparatively recent period, without any means of being enforced in the state courts of this state. But has any one ever doubted, that, by the law of Massachusetts, such trusts were always valid? There is not, I believe, any remedy now in the state courts to enforce the lien of a vendor for the purchase money of an estate sold by him, even when expressly stipulated for; but yet in Gilman v. Brown [Case No. 5,441]; Id., 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 255, the supreme court entertained no doubt, that such a lien, when express or implied, was valid, and might be enforced in the courts of the United States possessing equity jurisdiction, although not remediable in the state courts. In short, it has been long since settled in the courts of the United States, that the equity jurisdiction and equity jurisprudence administered in the courts of the United States are coincident and coextensive with that exercised in England, and are not regulated by the municipal jurisprudence of the particular state, where the court sits. This was expressly decided in Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212, 220, and U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108.

But the proviso in the second section of the bankrupt act of 1841 does not limit the rights of parties to the liens created and supported by the laws of the states. It merely recognizes and preserves their validity. It was by no means intended to affect any of the equitable liens or other equitable claims of parties arising under their contracts, where the contracts themselves were, by the lex loci contractus, valid; as there can be no question, that this was, as between the parties themselves. The fullest jurisdiction is given by the bankrupt act both in the district court and the circuit court, in equity, in all matters touching the bankruptcy; and, of course, that jurisdiction must be, and is to be, exercised according to the general principles applicable to courts of equity. The objection, therefore, is untenable. Assuming, that the state courts have no power to enforce the lien, or equitable claim or charge arising under the present agreement, it is still capable of being specifically enforced in this court under its general equity jurisdiction, as well as under its particular jurisdiction conferred by the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 6, § 8. It is a valid agreement between the parties, and not prohibited by the laws of Massachusetts.

But it is said, that the agreement, if enforced, will operate as a fraud upon the creditors of Reed & Co. under their bankruptcy; and indeed, that an agreement of this sort, so far as respects creditors, is void, as against the policy of the law, and in derogation of the rights of creditors. Now, it is not pretended, nor even suggested, that any fraud was, in fact, contemplated by the parties, or any of them, upon the creditors. The transaction was bonâ fide, for a valuable consideration, and for future advances, to promote the commercial business of the firm of Read & Co., and not to withdraw any of their existing funds from their creditors. No insolvency or bankruptcy, or failure in business was then contemplated by either of the parties. It was as fair and honest a commercial transaction, in its origin, and progress, and consummation, as was probably ever entered into. How, then, it is against the policy of the law, I confess myself unable to perceive, unless we are prepared to say, that taking collateral security for advances, upon existing or future property, on the part of a creditor, without taking possession of the property at the same time, or when it comes in esse, is per se fraudulent. Possession is ordinarily indispensable at the common law to support a lien; but even at the common law, it is not absolutely indispensable in all cases. This is shown by the recent case of Dodsley v. Varley, 12 Adol. & E. 632, where goods had been sold and deposited in the warehouse of a third person for the vendee; but still it was understood between the parties, that the vendee was not to remove them, until payment therefor; and it was held by the court, that, although the warehouse must be considered as the vendee's warehouse, and he in the actual possession of the goods, yet, "consistently with this, the vendor had, not what is commonly called a lien determinable upon possession, but a special interest, sometimes, but improperly, called a lien, growing out of the original ownership, independent of the actual possession, and consistent with the property being in the vendee." What is this, but allowing the existence of an equitable lien, notwithstanding the possession of the goods is parted with, good between the parties, and good as to all persons, not claiming under the vendee, as bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice? But I take it to be clear, that not only liens, but mortgages of personal property are perfectly good and supportable between the parties, and against creditors, where there is no fraudulent intent, and the poss ssion remains, in the owner or mortgager of the property, and is consistent with the deed and the arrangements made between the parties. That was one of the points decided in the case already alluded to, of Mitchell v. Winslow [supra]. There is a long line of authorities, that in cases of sales of personal property, conditional or absolute, the transfer or conveyance is not void, even though the possession remains with the vendor, if that possession is consistent with, and a part of, the arrangements intended by the parties in the transfer or conveyance. So that the possession of the property by Messrs. Read & Co., in the present case, is not, in my judgment, a badge of fraud, or against the policy of the law, or in any manner to be deemed inconsistent with the just rights of their creditors; and, therefore, the agreement is binding and valid to give a lien or equitable charge upon the property in the hands of the assignee, fit to be enforced in the present suit.

In respect to the other point, suggested at the bar, whether the duties, paid by Messrs. Read & Co. upon the importation of the goods, are to be allowed for and deducted from the value thereof, or of the proceeds in the hands of the assignee, there does not seem to be any ground for the deduction; at least not, unless in respect to such goods, if any, as came into the assignee's hands charged with those duties, since the bankruptcy. The goods previously imported by Messrs. Read & Co., and the proceeds thereof, were to be chargeable with the advances; and it seems to me, that the intention of the parties was. that Messrs. Read & Co. should exclusively bear all the charges of their own importation under the agreement, the duties, as well as the freight and other charges.

These, I believe, are all the points, which it is necessary to notice in deciding the present case. A decree will be entered accordingly for the plaintiffs; and, if necessary, it will be referred to a master to ascertain the amount due to the plaintiffs, and the amount of the property or its proceeds now in the hands of the assignee, which is affected by the equitable lien or charge, growing out of the agreement.

PATENTS—VALIDITY — CONSTRUCTION OF CLAIM—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The letters patent granted to Addison C. Fletcher, June 8th, 1869, for an improved government revenue stamp, are valid.

2. The claim of said patent, namely, "A postage or revenue stamp, having a portion of its surface composed of thin or fragile paper, or other suitable material, loosely attached, and on which a portion of the design or other matter is printed, substantially as and for the purpose or purposes set rorth," is limited to a stamp on which the flap is loosely attached to the face of the main body of the stamp, and has a portion of the design imprinted upon it, and is not infringed by a stamp wherein the design is printed on the main body of the stamp, and a portion of the printed stamp is loosely attached to an unprinted slip of paper attached to the back of the main body.

In equity.

Treadwell Cleveland, for plaintiff.
Calvin G. Child, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity which is based upon the alleged infringement of letters patent [No. 91,108] which were issued to the plaintiff [Addison C. Fletcher] on June 8th, 1869, for an improved government revenue stamp. The defendant [Joseph Selden] is a collector of internal revenue in the state of Connecticut, and, as such collector, under the authority and by direction of the commissioner of internal revenue, sold and used, prior to the date of the bill, the tax-paid spirits stamps, the rectified spirits stamps and the wholesale liquor dealers' stamps which the commissioner has directed shall be used. The three classes of stamps are made in the same way. The plaintiff's invention is described in the specification of his patent, as follows: "My invention consists in providing the stamp with a flap or flaps covering a portion of its face, and arranging the vignette, design, or printed matter on said stamp to extend over the flap or flaps and remaining or uncovered portion of said face or body of the stamp. By this application of my invention, as applied to an adhesive stamp, whether for internal revenue or other purposes, said stamp may be cancelled by tearing off the flap or flaps, which, if necessary, may be preserved as evidence of the cancellation; or, where not required to be preserved, the flap or flaps may either be torn off and thrown away, or be so mutilated by the act of cancelling, as heretofore practised on postage stamps, (which, and other adhesive stamps, my invention is equally applicable to,) as that it will be impossible to use the same stamp over again without detection of the fraud. Referring to the drawing, a is the main body of an internal revenue stamp, of the paper ordinarily used, having mucilage or other adhesive matter on its back, and having secured to its face, for a portion of its length or area, an outer piece of tissue or other thin paper or flap, b, which is loose from the main body, excepting where joined to it, as at c, and which has impressed on it a continuation of the vignette or design, that is seen, in part, on the remainder, or uncovered portion of the main body. A stamp thus constructed may be cancelled by simply tearing off the flap, b, which may be separately preserved as evidence of the cancellation, or, in case of a postage stamp, for instance, it may be so mutilated by the ordinary method of cancellation, as to make the use of the stamp again, without detection of the fraud, impossible. The flap, b, being made of thin or bibulous paper, the portion of the design upon it is protected from being effaced by chemical agents, in consequence of the fragile or peculiar nature of such paper, while the body, a, may be made of comparatively stout paper, or, especially, where it is desired to preserve separate evidence of the cancellation, the flap, b, which is the portion torn off in cancelling, may be made of stout paper, and the main body, a, of thin or bibulous paper. In fig. 2 of the drawing, the same principle of construction is shown, but the body, a, represented as having duplicate flaps, b, b, on the face of the stamp, which, in some cases, may be preferred to one." The claim is as follows: "A postage or revenue stamp, having a portion of its surface composed of thin or fragile paper, or other suitable material, loosely attached, and on which a portion of the design or other matter is printed, substantially as and for the purpose or purposes set forth."

The stamps which are used by the defendant are made in the following manner: The body of the stamp is composed of a piece of paper of one thickness, upon which is impressed the printed matter of the stamp. A slip of red blank paper is attached to the outside edge of the back of the body of the stamp. This slip is about one-third of the length of the body of the stamp, and is of the same width. When the stamp is to be used, it is placed upon that part of the head of a barrel which has been previously covered with paste, is secured to the barrel by tacks, is varnished, is cancelled by a stencil plate, and, in certain cases, which it is not necessary to specify, the portion over the red slip and which is not attached to the barrel in consequence of the intervention of the slip, is cut out and is preserved. The blank slip adheres to the pasted surface of the barrel.

The questions in regard to the patentability and novelty of the plaintiff's invention are found in his favor. The question of infringement is the important one in the case, and depends mainly upon the extent of the plaintiff's invention, as described and claimed in his patent. The learned expert for the plaintiff understands the gist of the invention to consist in a revenue stamp having the characteristics, that one of its sides is adapted to be pasted to an article, and the other side is printed over its entire substance substantially, and that a certain portion of the printed face is so loosely attached to the portion which is to be pasted, that the loose portion may be torn or cut away, and leave over the area torn or cut away a layer of paper pasted to the stamped article. As thus understood, it is immaterial whether the flap is attached to the back or to the face of the main portion of the stamp, or whether the flap is a printed or a blank piece of paper.

Without controverting the position that this was the gist of the invention, I am of opinion that such was not the extent of the invention as described and claimed in the patent. An examination of the specification will show, I think, that the grant which the plaintiff received was much less broad than the invention is now claimed to have been, and that the patent cannot, even with the aid of the principle of liberal interpretation, properly include a stamp of two thicknesses of paper, one piece printed and the other unprinted, it being only necessary that the unprinted piece should be attached to the stamped article, and that the printed part should be loosely attached to the unprinted piece. In the specification the patentee says that his invention consists in providing the stamp with a flap or flaps, which are clearly described. The flap, upon which is impressed or printed a part of the vignette, design or printed matter, is loosely attached to the face of the main body of the stamp, upon the back of which is the mucilage or adhesive matter, and the flap, thus loosely attached, covers a portion of the face of the body of the stamp. Two particulars are indispensable, if the descriptive part of the specification clearly describes the invention. The flap must have a portion of the design imprinted upon it, and it must, also, be loosely attached to the face of the main body of the stamp. The claim, also, in substance, specifies the same particulars. It is for a stamp having a portion of its surface composed of some suitable material, on which portion a part of the design or other matter is printed, and which portion is "loosely attached." Loosely attached to what? The plaintiff construes these words to mean that the printed portion is loosely attached to any other portion of the stamp, and if, therefore, it is loosely attached to a flap, or to any unprinted portion of the stamp which adheres to the stamped article, such loose attachment satisfies the claim. But, in the descriptive part of the specification, the loosely attached portion, which is the flap, has the two characteristics which have been mentioned, one of which is that the portion is loosely attached to the face of the main body of the stamp. The words "loosely attached" must, then, mean, loosely attached to the face of the body of the stamp.

In the defendant's stamp, the design is printed upon the main body of the stamp, and a portion of the printed stamp is loosely attached to an unprinted slip of paper upon the back of the main body. The flap of the defendant's stamp is unprinted and is attached to the back of the main body of the stamp. The whiskey stamps are an entirely different article from the plaintiff's stamp, as described, and can be included within the patent only by giving to the words "loosely attached" a meaning which they obviously did not have in the mind of the inventor when the claim was drawn. The whiskey stamp is a modification of the inventor's idea, which had not occurred to him when he drew his specification, which was so limited in its terms as not to include the stamps of the defendant.

The bill is dismissed.

JURISDICTION—SUIT BY ASSIGNEE OF PROMISSORY NOTE—CITIZENSHIP OF ASSIGNOR.

Where the assignee was on a promissory note, the declaration must show that the assignor, by his citizenship, had a right to sue in this court. If this be not done, the declaration is demurrable.

At law.

Mr. Scoby, for plaintiff.

Walpole & Walpole, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought by the assignee of the notes against the maker, payable to George Fletcher, sen., who assigned them to the plaintiff. In the declaration there is no allegation of the citizenship of the assignor of the plaintiff, and if he were a citizen of Indiana, at the time of the assignment, under the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], this court has no jurisdiction of the case. In such a case the assignee cannot sue in this court, unless the assignor could have brought suit in it on the note assigned, and this he could not have done, if the assignor was a citizen of Indiana. In the declaration, to give jurisdiction to the court, the citizenship of the assignor should have been alleged. The demurrer which has been filed to the declaration must, therefore, be sustained.

FLETCHER v. UNITED STATES.

[1 Hayw. & H. 186.] [2]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 4, 1844.

CRIMINAL LAW—EFFECT OF PRIOR CONVICTION AND NOLLE PROSEQUI.

A prior conviction and nolle prosequi upon a sufficient indictment at common law, though insufficient under the statute, is a bar to a subsequent prosecution on a new indictment sufficient under the statute, for the same offence.

At law. In error to the criminal court.

The prisoner [Henry Fletcher] was indicted for an assault and battery by shooting a pistol with intent to kill Elizabeth Fletcher, and was convicted.

Walter Lenox and James M. Carlisle, for prisoner.

Philip R. Fendall, for the United States.

On the trial of this cause the prisoner offered the record of a former trial and verdict of guilty and of an entry of a nolle prosequi in the case in the rendition of said verdict, no judgment having at any time been pronounced by the court on said verdict, as appears by the record of said trial and verdict of guilty and nolle prosequi, made a part hereof. The prisoner proved by Elizabeth Fletcher, a competent witness in the cause, that the prisoner was the same person tried and found guilty by the jury in the case, of which the said record is made part, and that the said prisoner is a free negro, and that the facts of this case, and of the case of trial and verdict of guilty offered in evidence are the same, and so admitted by the district attorney, and the witness is the same. Whereupon, the prisoner, by his counsel, having pleaded "autrefois convict," asked the court to instruct the jury that the prisoner under his said plea and the said record is entitled to an acquittal; which instruction the court refused to give. To which refusal the prisoner excepted. The former indictment is as follows:

"The jurors of the United States for the county aforesaid, upon their oaths present, that Henry Fletcher, late of the county aforesaid, free negro, on December 19, 1842, with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, in and upon one Elizabeth Fletcher, in the peace of God and the said United States then and there being, unlawfully did make an assault by shooting and discharging at the said Elizabeth Fletcher a pistol loaded and charged with gunpowder and thirty-one leaden shot, and her the said Elizabeth Fletcher then and there did beat and wound and illtreat, with intent her the said Elizabeth Fletcher then and there to kill, and other wrongs and injuries to the said Elizabeth Fletcher then and there did to the great damage of the said Elizabeth Fletcher, and against the peace and government of the United States.

"2d count. And the jurors aforesaid do further present, that the said Henry Fletcher, late of the county aforesaid, free negro, on the 19th day of December, 1842, with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, in and upon the said Elizabeth Fletcher, in the peace of God and the said United States then and there being, unlawfully did make an assault, and her the said Elizabeth Fletcher then and there did beat, wound and illtreat, with intent her, the said Elizabeth Fletcher, then and there to kill, and other wrongs and injuries to the said Elizabeth Fletcher then and there did, to the great damage of the said Elizabeth Fletcher, and against the peace and government of the United States."

On which indictment the jury brought in a verdict of guilty.

The words "contra formam statuti" being accidentally omitted in the indictment, the prisoner's counsel affirmed him ready to receive the judgment at common law (fine and imprisonment), but objected to his being sentenced to the penitentiary under the statute. This objection was admitted; and the district attorney entered a nolle prosequi. The cause coming on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the criminal court and on the bill of exceptions therein set forth, and the questions of law thereon arising having been argued by counsel, and considered by the court, it was decided that the criminal court erred in refusing to give the instructions prayed, for, as appears by the bill of exceptions, the prior conviction and nolle prosequi are a good and sufficient bar to this prosecution, the former conviction being upon a sufficient indictment at common law, though insufficient under the statute; and the cause, was remanded, with directions to arrest the judgment thereon, and discharge the prisoner.

FLETCHER v. UNITED STATES.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June 4, 1844.

CRIMINAL LAW—EFFECT OF PRIOR CONVICTION AND NOLLE PROSEQUI.

Held, that a prior conviction and a nolle prosequi therein were a good and sufficient bar to a second prosecution for the same offense.

In error to the criminal court.

[This was an indictment by the United States against Henry Fletcher for assault with intent to kill.]

Walter Lenox, for prisoner.

Philip R. Fendall, for the United States.

The jury rendered a verdict of guilty as indicted, and the prisoner was sentenced by the court to imprisonment and labor. The prisoner pleaded autrefois convict. The prisoner, through his counsel, submitted the record of a former trial and verdict of guilty, and of an entry of a nolle prosequi in the case on the rendition of said verdict, no judgment having at any time been pronounced by the court on said verdict. The prisoner having pleaded autrefois convict, and asked the court to instruct the jury that the prisoner, under the said plea and the said record, is entitled to an acquittal, which instructions the court refused to give. The prisoner thereupon excepted, and prayed the court to sign and seal his bill of exceptions.

On argument by counsel on the questions of law, and being duly considered by the court, it is thereupon considered by the court that the said criminal court erred in refusing to give the instructions prayed by the traverser, as appears by the bill of exceptions, and the court, being of opinion that the prior conviction and nolle prosequi therein referred to were a good and sufficient bar to the prosecution, do order and adjudge that the cause be remanded, with directions to arrest the judgment thereon, and that the prisoner be discharged.

FLINN et al. v. The LEANDER.

[Bee, 260.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. 1808.

DERELICT—VESSEL CONTAINING SLAVES—FRAUDULENT CONCEALMENT OF TWO NEGROES BY SALVORS.

1. A vessel with slaves on board but no white person, considered as derelict, and one third given as salvage.

2. The captain and owner's share thereof declared forfeited, for fraudulent concealment of two of the negroes. Such share enures to the owners of the derelict.

BEE, District Judge.

The brig Norfolk, on the 19th of March last, 250 miles from this port, to which she was bound, fell in with the Leander; and on the afternoon of the third day arrived with her in Charleston. The Leander had 56 slaves on board, but no white person. In the evening of the 19th two of the slaves died. The wind was east, and the ship was standing eastward. From her manner of steering, and from a piece of a torn sail which looked like a white flag, she appeared to be in distress. On approaching the vessel, the negroes invited them to come on board, and an interpreter was afterwards found who explained their wish more clearly. Captain Marson then agreed to send on board five hands, with nearly one half of his provisions. The negroes told these men that all the white people had died; but, after their arrival in port, part of a journal was found by which it appeared that the crew had been driven, or thrown, overboard; two had been killed. The negroes said that eight or ten vessels had fallen in with them, without assisting them. That they had been boarded by one, who took away six or seven slaves, under a promise of supplying the rest with provisions; which, however, was not done. It appeared that the Leander was tight, and her rigging good, but she had no sails. It was evident from the last entry in the logbook that no reckoning had been kept for a month; from whence it was reasonably inferred that the negroes had been for that time in possession. Such is the evidence given by the claimants; and the nature of the case admits no better. It seems credible, and I must act upon it, in fixing the compensation due to the crew of the Norfolk. There being no white persons on board, and the slaves being regarded as cargo, I must consider the Leander as derelict: but she does not seem to have been in any immediate danger. She was in tight condition, had on deck provisions for eight or ten days, and more in her hold. They had fallen in with many vessels, the Norfolk actually took charge of them, and would have been assisted, if necessary, by a schooner called the Success bound to Boston: the services of the latter were declined, because they were not wanted. Indeed, from the prevalence of easterly winds at this season, it is highly probable that the Leander would have drifted on shore. This happened in the case of the Priscilla, and in that of the St. Peter; both within the knowledge of this court. The Leander actually arrived in port on the third day after she fell in with the Norfolk. No tempestuous weather seems to have threatened the vessel or the slaves, within that space of time. Nevertheless, considerable service was rendered; and it has been proved that the ship and cargo are worth nearly sixteen thousand dollars. I shall under all the circumstances adjudge one third of the net proceeds of this property by way of compensation. In other cases of derelict, attended with greater danger and exertion, I have sometimes given one half. But this is no general rule; every case must be judged of according to circumstances.

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and Geo. C. Hazleton, Esq.]

It appeared, in a subsequent proceeding, that the captain and owners of the Norfolk had concealed two slaves, part of this cargo; from which it was contended that they had forfeited their share of salvage; and that the forfeiture enured to the owners of the Leander, not to the other salvors. The judge said that the case of Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240, was conclusive upon both points, and decreed accordingly a forfeiture of that part of the salvage, to the owners of the Leander.

PRACTICE—DEPOSITIONS—MODE OF TAKING.

In common law actions in the federal courts, depositions may be taken pursuant to the state law or the act of congress, as parties may elect.

[Cited in Randall v. Venable, 17 Fed. 166; M'Lennan v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 22 Fed. 199.]

This was a common law action, in which depositions were taken and certified on behalf of the plaintiff [Charles L. Flint] in conformity to the provisions of the statute of the state regulating the practice and procedure in the state courts. The defendant [the board of commissioners of Crawford county] filed a motion to suppress, stating several grounds of objection, based upon the failure of the notice and procedure to conform to the requirements of the act of congress relating to taking testimony by deposition.

John T. Voss, for the motion.
J. D. Campbell, opposed.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. The motion to suppress must be denied. In common law actions in the federal courts, where, under the provisions of the act of congress, a case arises in which testimony may be taken by deposition, the parties may follow, in respect to the manner of taking them, either the provisions of the state law or of the act of congress, as they may elect. Since the notice and certificate in this case conform to the provisions of the state statute, I hold that the depositions may be read in evidence. Such has been the practice, so far as I know, in the circuit from the earliest period. Prior to the act of 1872 (Rev. St. 914), it is probable that the practice may have rested upon the rules of court adopting the state regulations as to taking and certifying depositions; but that act is broad enough to sanction the practice where the local regulations do not conflict with any special provision of the acts of congress on the subject. Motion denied.

COPYRIGHT—EDITION OF THE BIBLE—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

[Complainant alleged that his edition of the Bible contained new and original chapter headings, marginal notes, and Greek readings; that it was copyrighted, and the proper notice published in each volume; and that defendant was infringing the copyright. Defendant filed affidavits denying all the equities of the bill. Held, that there was nothing to identify the parts in which copyright was claimed, the notice being insufficient for that purpose; wherefore the injunction should be denied.]

[This was a bill in equity for the alleged infringement of a copyrighted edition of the Bible. Heard on motion for a preliminary injunction.]

The bill alleged: (1) That plaintiffs had printed or caused to be printed and published in the German language, and now owned, an edition of the Holy Bible, entitled "Die Illustrierte Familien-Bibel;" that said work contained a special table of contents, with headings of chapters and columns, and copious marginal notes, and Hebrew and Greek readings, collected, compiled, and translated expressly for said work, and formed a new and original compilation and arrangement which had never before appeared in print; that plaintiffs had copyrighted said work, which had always been published with the proper notice thereof prescribed by act of congress. (2) That defendant had also printed and published in German an edition of the Holy Bible of the same size (quarto) as plaintiff's edition, entitled "Neue Illustrierte Familien-Bibel," containing almost verbatim et literatim the table of contents, headings of chapters and columns, and marginal notes and Hebrew and Greek readings of plaintiffs' edition, and using almost exactly the same mode of arrangement and paging; that defendant's edition contained on the title page, substantially the same words as that of plaintiffs'. (3) That the table of contents of defendant's edition, pages 4–8, was the same in wording and arrangement as that of plaintiffs' pages 12–16; that the headings of columns, and headings of chapters, marginal notes and Hebrew and Greek readings of plaintiffs' edition, were copied literally in that of defendant's, with the exception of a few pages, even to the repetition of typographical errors.

The bill prayed (1) for an injunction restraining defendant from printing or publishing any of the copyrighted part of the plaintiffs' edition; (2) the destruction or delivery to plaintiffs of copies of defendant's edition still in his possession; (3) an account of the profits made on such copies as had been sold; (4) general relief.

Defendant averred by affidavits filed that defendant's title page was composed expressly for his edition; that it was the result of original labor, and not taken from that of plaintiffs, from which it greatly differed; that the text of defendant's edition had not been copied from that of plaintiffs' but prepared from electrotyped plates, and that the proof-sheets had been corrected and collated with other editions; that the table of contents, and headings of chapters and columns, and parallel references, marginal and Hebrew and Greek readings used by plaintiffs were not made for his edition, but had been used the former in whole, the latter in greater part in other editions, printed long before that of plaintiffs'; that in certain specified chapters in the Book of Revelations, the Apocrypha, etc., the headings of chapters and columns of plaintiffs' edition had been taken literally from older editions.

E. L. Perkins, for plaintiffs.
S. C. Perkins, contra.

THE COURT held that there was nothing to identify or distinguish the parts in which complainants claimed a copyright, the mere notice of copyright obtained in each book not being sufficient; and that, as defendant's affidavits denied the equities of the bill, an injunction could not be granted on a preliminary hearing. Injunction refused.

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS — PROTECTION AGAINST VIOLENCE—SOLDIERS CARRIED UNDER COMPULSION—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. The owner of a steamboat who, undertakes to transport a passenger thereon, for hire, is bound to exercise the utmost vigilance and care in maintaining order and guarding such passenger against violence which may reasonably be anticipated, or naturally be expected to occur, in view of the number and character of other passengers on board.

2. His obligation, in such respect, is the same, even though such other passengers are soldiers, carried on compulsion.

3. The rule of damages, if the carrier is guilty of negligence, which causes a personal injury to the passenger, stated.

[Cited in King v. Ohio & M. Ry. Co., 22 Fed. 417.]

[This was a suit for damages by John Flint against the Norwich & New York Transportation Company.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge (charging jury). There are a number of facts, touching this interesting and important case, which is now finally to be submitted to you, about which there is no serious dispute. The plaintiff, a physician, residing in Boston, left his home, for New York, on the 6th of June, 1864. Before leaving, he purchased a through ticket, called a coupon ticket, by which he became entitled to a passage from Boston to Worcester, over the Boston and Worcester Railroad; from Worcester to Norwich, over the Norwich and Worcester Railroad; from Norwich to New London, over the Northern Railroad; and from New London to New York, through the Sound, on one of the defendants' passage boats. He passed safely over the route from Boston to New London, where he arrived not far from half-past ten or eleven o'clock, in the evening, left the cars, and proceeded on board of the defendants' boat, the steamer city of Boston, which was then lying at the dock, with steam up, ready to start as soon as the passengers by the train, with their luggage, and some express freight, should be taken on board. The plaintiff, with other passengers, one of whom was a lady under his charge, went upon the main deck of the steamer, through her after starboard gangway. He proceeded, with the lady, through or along with a crowd of passengers, passed up the stairs, to the upper saloon, and, after some little time, leaving the lady, returned to the main deck, and went to the ticket office, to receive his state-room key, to which his ticket entitled him. He obtained the key, and proceeded to return from the ticket office to the upper saloon, by the proper route. When he had gone a short distance from the ticket office, and before he had reached the stairs, a loaded musket fell from the hands of a soldier, or non-commissioned officer, or was thrown down, and was discharged as it fell, and the ball passed through the foot of the plaintiff, just back of the toes, shattering the bones, and causing a dangerous wound, from which he suffered severely, for a long time. Finally, to save his life, as advised by his surgeons, he was compelled to have his foot amputated. He suffered for a period of nearly three months, and incurred expenses, in a city distant from his home. His activity and capacity for business and professional usefu'ness have been more or less permanently impaired. He claims that this injury, with all its serious consequences, was the result of a breach of duty on the part of the defendants, and, to recover proper damages therefor, he has brought this suit. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff, and it is now for you to say, whether or not, on the whole evidence, the claim of the plaintiff is well founded. The rules of law, which you are to apply as tests to this evidence, I will refer to particularly hereafter.

As I have already stated, before the arrival of the train which brought the plaintiff to New London, the steamboat was at the dock, with steam up, ready to start, when the passengers, the luggage, and the express freight from the train should all be on board. She had been lying there for some time. Between nine and ten o'clock, an hour or more before the train arrived, a detachment of United States soldiers, from Fort Trumbull, about sixty-three in number, with several non-commissioned, and two commissioned officers, went on board, and were there when the train arrived. Some fourteen to eighteen of these soldiers were armed with muskets, loaded and capped, and furnished with bayonets. They were detailed as guard over the rest, who were unarmed. Witnesses, called by the defence, state, that this detachment was placed on the main deck, forward of the engine room; that armed sentries were stationed, to keep them there; that a sentry was placed on each side of the engine room, to prevent them from going aft; and that two sentries were stationed at the forward starboard gangway, and one at the head of the stairway leading from the forward part of the main deck to the cabin below. Some of these witnesses say, that a sentinel was also placed at each of the two ladders which led from the forward part of the main deck to the saloon deck above. This was substantially the condition of things on the boat down to, or near to, the time when the train which brought the plaintiff arrived. On this train came a large number of passengers, among whom were about one hundred and fifty soldiers, in a detachment, under the command of officers, and who were ultimately marched on board, at the forward gangway. By the same train came, also, about a dozen or twenty soldiers, travelling, apparently, as ordinary passengers. These also went on board, but whether by the forward, or the after, gangway, it may be proper for you to consider, in deciding upon the conflicting evidence touching the condition of things on the after part of the deck, where, and at the time, the passengers were coming on board, and getting their tickets and state-room keys. The train having arrived, the plaintiff proceeded on board, by the proper entrance. Here the duty of the defendants toward him, as a passenger, commenced. They undertook to transport him, for hire, and were bound to secure him a safe passage, so far as that could be done, by the exercise of due care on their part. This was a duty imposed upon them by their contract, and by law. The precise rule of duty to which they are to be held, and which you are to apply to the evidence, in deciding whether or not they are liable in this action, is this: The defendants were bound to exercise the utmost vigilance and care, in maintaining order, and guarding the passengers against violence, from whatsoever source arising, which might reasonably be anticipated, or naturally be expected to occur, in view of all the circumstances, and of the number and character of the persons on board. Now, the plaintiff has testified, and has called a number of witnesses, who, he claims, substantially concur to the same points, that, immediately upon stepping upon the boat, he found himself in a dense crowd of persons, many of whom, like himself, were civilian passengers from the train, but among whom were a number of soldiers, some of them armed, who were boisterous, some evidently intoxicated, quarrelsome, profane, and exhibiting more or less disposition to rudeness and violence, by scuffling and jostling one another and the civilians. The plaintiff claims, that the evidence touching this part of the case proves, that this disorder and uproar continued for from fifteen minutes to half an hour, until he returned from the upper saloon to seek his key, and until the discharge of the gun by which he was wounded; that, during all this time, no efforts were made, by the servants of the defendants, to quell this disturbance; and that it finally terminated in this injury to him. Now, if all these facts are, in your judgment, substantially proved, you will have a right to infer negligence on the part of the defendants, and hold them liable. If disorderly men, armed with loaded muskets, were in the space through which the passengers had to pass, it was the duty of the defendants to see that they were removed before the passengers came on board, or that the latter were notified of the danger, or that adequate protection was furnished. If armed and boisterous and quarrelsome soldiers rushed into the space referred to, after the passengers had begun to come on board, and produced and continued an uproar there, it was the duty of the defendants, through the officers and hands of their boat, to make every effort to quell the disturbance, and protect their passengers from violence and danger, and to call upon the military officers to enforce discipline.

But the defendants gave a very different version of the events of that night. They claim to have proved, by their witnesses, that the space where the passengers from the train came on board was clear, at least of soldiers, when they arrived; that there was no soldier, armed or unarmed, upon that part of the boat, at that time; and that, if any soldiers came in with, or among, the passengers, as they were pressing on to the boat, they were few in number, unarmed, and travelling as ordinary passengers, and behaved as peaceably as the civilians did. They further claim, that they have shown, by their witnesses, that, soon after the passengers got on board, one of the unarmed recruits, from Fort Trumbull, undertook to pass the sentry on the port side of the engine room, and was repulsed; that he repeated the attempt, and again failed; that he finally returned, with several of his companions, and overpowered the sentinel; that then he, or they, rushed aft, near to or into the space where the passengers came on board; that several of the guard followed, when a scuffle ensued, near the saloon stairs, between the insubordinate recruit or recruits, and the pursuing guards; and that it was in this brief, or, as the defendants claim, momentary, struggle, that the gun by which the plaintiff was shot was dropped, or thrown down.

Now, it is for you to say which of these versions is correct. As I have already said, if disorderly soldiers, armed with loaded muskets, occupied the space where the passengers came upon the deck, and no notice was given to the passengers of that fact, so that they might avoid the danger; or, if such soldiers rushed in upon that space, while the other passengers were coming on board, and securing their keys or tickets, and conducted himself in a quarrelsome and disorderly manner for a considerable time, during which the plaintiff was shot, without any effort on the part of the officers or crew of the defendants to suppress the disorder and protect the passengers, or induce the military officers to do so, and the plaintiff was injured in consequence, then you have a right to hold the defendants liable. If, on the other hand, the version given by the defendants' witnesses is the true one, then you will proceed to another inquiry, that is, whether, in this aspect of the case, the defendants did exercise their utmost vigilance and care, in maintaining order, and guarding the passengers against violence, from whatever source arising, which might reasonably be expected to occur, in view of all the circumstances, and the number and character of the persons on board. If they did this, or if it was done by the military, the defendants are not liable. If such vigilance and care were not exercised, and the plaintiff was injured in consequence, then the defendants are liable, and your verdict must be for the plaintiff.

And here it is proper that I should notice a circumstance set up by the defendants. They say, that they had no alternative but to take these soldiers from Fort Trumbull, who caused, as they assert, this disturbance, and this injury to the plaintiff; and that they were compelled to take them on this boat, by military coercion. You may assume that fact as proved, but this will not vary the liability of the defendants under the present circumstances. They took the plaintiff as a passenger, voluntarily, after this detachment was on board, and without notice to him; and their obligations to him were just the same, whether they took the Fort Trumbull troops voluntarily, or under compulsion. Those troops were on board long before the plaintiff was, the defendants knew the fact, no notice was given to the plaintiff, and they were bound to take such precautions for the protection of the civilian passengers, as were demanded by the rule I have laid down. They say that they did take them, or see that they were taken; and that the presence of the armed sentinels, at the points stated by the witnesses, to keep the soldiers in their proper place, was all that the highest vigilance and prudence required. The guard was not under their command, and the only apparent additional precautions that the defendants could have taken, that occur to me, (you will say whether they could have taken others,) would have been to apply to the military officers to have the sentries increased in number, or to place men, officers of the boat, or hands, under their own control, at the passages, to support the armed sentries, in case of difficulty, and to act as an additional guard, and to quell any violence that might occur, as a more secure protection to the passengers. I do not say that this was, or was not, their duty. It is for you to determine. It is exclusively for you to say what their duty was—whether the condition of things on board of the boat, before the train arrived, required them, in anticipation of its arrival, to take these, or any other precautions, beyond what were taken; and, consequently, whether their neglect to do so was a remissness in their duty, and a neglect of their legal obligations, as I have laid them down. If the defendants discharged their duty, within the rule I have submitted to you, your verdict must be for them. If they failed to do so, and if the injury to the plaintiff is fairly attributable to that failure, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff.

If you find for the plaintiff, you will assess the damages at such a sum as will, in your judgment, compensate him for the necessary expenses he has actually incurred in his sickness and cure, and in providing himself with artificial limbs; for the loss of time and income from his profession, during his illness; for the permanent injury inflicted upon him; and, so far as money can compensate him, for the pain he has suffered. You will give the whole evidence a careful consideration, apply to it the rules of law, as I have laid them down, and return such a verdict as your judgment may dictate.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, for $10,000.

[NOTE. Subsequently, the defendants moved for a new trial (Case No. 4,874), which was denied.]

Case No. 4,874.

FLINT v. NORWICH & N. Y. TRANSP. CO.

[7 Blatchf. 536.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Sept. 20, 1870.[2]

EVIDENCE—OBJECTION TO TESTIMONY AS A WHOLE—INCOMPETENT IN PART—RES GESTAE.

1. Where evidence admitted on trial at law was objected to only as a whole, the admission of it will not, on a motion for a new trial, be regarded as erroneous, if the testimony, as a whole, was admissible for the purposes for which it was offered, although part of it, if specifically objected to, ought to have been excluded as incompetent.

2. Where the question involved in a trial is, where certain officers of a detachment of soldiers were, on board of a steamboat, at the time of a disturbance among the soldiers, and whether they were doing anything, and what, for the preservation of order, evidence as to what was said in conversation between two military officers in uniform on board of the steamboat, at the time, and as to where such conversation occurred in reference to the place of the disturbance, is competent to show the identity of the officers and their connection with the detachment of soldiers, and also to show the time occupied in the conversation, as bearing on the question of the duration of the disturbance, and also to show the character and extent of the disturbance. The conversation is admissible, also, as a part of the res gestae.

[See note at end of case.]

The plaintiff [John Flint], on the 6th of June, 1864, at Boston, purchased passage tickets which entitled him to passage by railroads to New London, and thence to New York on a steamboat run by the defendants [the Norwich & New York Transportation Company], as common carriers of passengers and freight. He arrived at New London at about eleven o'clock in the evening, and, with other passengers, was received on board. For an injury sustained while on board of the defendants' steamer, the city of Boston, bound for New York, the plaintiff brought this action on the case, which came to trial upon the defendants' plea of not guilty, and the plaintiff had a verdict for $10,000 damages. See Flint v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. [Case No. 4,873]. The defendants now moved for a new trial, on the sole ground that certain evidence offered by the plaintiff and objected to by the defendants, was improperly received.

The plaintiff gave evidence tending to prove that, when he came upon the after deck of the steamer, by the usual place for entrance, there were a number of soldiers in the service of the United States on that deck; that some of them were armed with muskets loaded and capped; that some of them were "crazy drunk;" that they were noisy and quarrelsome, using profane and indecent language, and pushing each other and the passengers about the deck; that one of them, with arms, in particular, struck the hat of a civilian passenger down over his eyes, by a severe blow given without provocation; that said soldiers remained upon the said after deck, in substantially the same condition, for about half an hour; and that finally, in a struggle between some of them, one of the said muskets was thrown down upon the deck and discharged, and the ball passed through the plaintiff's foot, producing a very severe injury. The defendants gave evidence tending to prove that—in pursuance of general orders from the United States adjutant general's office, at Washington, and an order made by the officer in command at Fort Trumbull, requiring that recruits and men fit for duty, belonging to the 14th regiment of infantry, army of the United States, rationed and equipped for field duty, should leave the post of New London that evening to join their regiment in the field, and requiring the quarter-master of the post to furnish the necessary transportation—a detachment of the said 14th infantry, consisting of sixty-three enlisted men, among whom were a sergeant and two corporals, accompanied by two lieutenants in said regiment, left the said fort under the command of said officers, and, with their regimental band, marched on board of the defendants' said boat, and were stationed on the forward deck by their officers, at about half past nine o'clock in the evening of that day; that eighteen of said men were detailed by their officers as a guard; that said guard were armed with muskets loaded and capped, and furnished with bayonets, and the remainder of said detachment were unarmed; that sentinels were also selected from the said guard and stationed. to confine the detachment to the forward deck and to prevent their going on shore; that, soon after the said passengers from the said railroad came on board, one of the unarmed recruits from Fort Trumbull attempted to pass the sentinel on the port side of the engine room and was repulsed; that he repeated the attempt and again failed; that he finally returned with several of his comrades and overpowered the sentinel; that they then rushed aft near to the place where the passengers came on board, and several of the said guard followed, when a struggle ensued near the saloon stairs, between the insubordinate recruits and the pursuing guards; and that, in the struggle to arrest these men, a musket was snatched by one of them from the hands of one of the guard, and was thrown violently upon the deck and discharged, by which the plaintiff was shot. For the purpose of proving the condition of affairs on said deck, the extent and character of the disturbance, the condition and situation of the officers and soldiers on board, and the manner in which they discharged their duty prior to and at the time when the plaintiff received his injury, and as evidence of the length of time between the beginning of the disturbance and the firing of the shot, and for the purpose of showing a failure on the part of the officers of the said soldiers to keep them in proper order and repress disorder amongst them, (it being admitted that there were no persons on board directly charged with the care of preserving order and repressing disorder among said soldiers other than their officers,) the plaintiff offered in evidence the testimony of three persons who were passengers on said boat, who testified, that, after they had gone down to the dining saloon and were at the table, a man in military uniform, whom they supposed to be a sergeant, came into the saloon, and saluted an officer in uniform, whom they supposed to be a lieutenant, and who was sitting at the table with another officer, whom, from his uniform, they supposed to belong to the navy, and said to him, "There is a row on deck and I cannot suppress it;" that the officer who was addressed, replied, "Mind your orders;" that the person supposed to be a sergeant said, "I am afraid some one will be hurt;" that the officer replied, "You have your orders, mind your orders;" that the person supposed to be a sergeant then retired; and, that, after a few minutes, he came down again into the saloon very hurriedly, and very soon after the report of a gun had been heard by one of the witnesses, and, addressing the same officer, said, "For God's sake, come up, a man has been shot." The case made for this motion stated as follows: "To the admission of this evidence for all the purposes for which it was offered, the defendants objected, and particularly for the purpose of showing the condition of affairs upon the deck of said boat just prior to and at the time the plaintiff received his injury." But the court overruled the objection on all the grounds, and admitted the evidence.

Linus Child, Richard H. Dana, Jr., and Simeon E. Baldwin, for plaintiff.

Lafayette S. Foster and Jeremiah Halsey, for defendants.

Before WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and SHIPMAN, District Judge.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. It was conceded, on the argument of this motion, by the counsel for the defendants, that the general question, whether a common carrier of passengers is liable for an injury received by one passenger through the negligence or from the misconduct of a fellow passenger, is not raised by this motion or involved therein. Nor does the case now before us disclose upon what grounds, either of law or fact, the verdict for the plaintiff in this case was rendered. It must, however, have necessarily proceeded upon some neglect of duty or violation of obligation to employ the utmost care and diligence that the plaintiff might be carried safely to his destination.

Against what possible injuries the defendants were bound to adopt precaution; what dangers they were bound to foresee and guard against in advance; whether, in these days, in which the means of carriage are customarily furnished on a large scale and are used by many hundreds together, owners of steamboats and proprietors of railroad lines are under obligations to have at command a force adequate to the protection of passengers against possible assaults and injury from other passengers, and, therefore, should be prepared in advance to furnish such protection, even against the just presumption that their passengers will be orderly, keep the peace, and do each other no harm; and, especially, whether the presence of a detachment of soldiers received as passengers, under the ordinary command of proper officers, ought to have suggested to the defendants that there was any danger whatsoever that other passengers would be injured, and so required them to provide special defence or protection to such other passengers—are, it may be, questions of interest to carriers of passengers. It would seem that, in respect to such a detachment, the presumption of obedience and subordination should obtain, and that a common carrier would not be bound to anticipate the contrary. On the other hand, if a carrier has already received a company of soldiers, or a party, whether soldiers or not, whom he finds to be "crazy drunk," (to use the language of the case before us,) and who become riotous and disorderly, so as to menace danger to other passengers to thereafter arrive for carriage, a different question arises. The case, as made for the purposes of the motion, is not very distinct upon that point; but if, before the train on which the plaintiff and other passengers arrived, such a condition of the soldiers had already become manifest, the duty of the defendants to adopt such precautions as were in their power to restrain them, for the protection of the plaintiff and such other passengers, would seem obvious. And if, after their arrival on board, disorder and violence arose among the soldiers or among any passengers, it is no harsh rule that holds it to have been the carrier's duty to use such means as he had, or, by ordinary care, might have had, for the protection of the peaceable. The evidence which was objected to and was received, was, if pertinent at all, applicable to this view of the duty of the defendants. The rule of liability prescribed by the court is not stated in the case before us, but, as it was not excepted to, it must be assumed, for all the purposes of this motion, to be the correct rule, and I have made the foregoing suggestions for the sole purpose of seeing whether, under any rule of liability, the evidence so given was competent in its nature and relevant to the question.

Assuming that the defendants, when the disorderly conduct of these soldiers began, became bound to employ their means diligently for the protection of other passengers, the question for the jury was, did they do so? and, if not, did their negligence in this cause the injury to the plaintiff of which he complained? It was pertinent to this question to inquire how many riotous persons there were, how long the disturbance continued, and to what extent it was carried, and, as especially bearing on the question of due diligence, how far the officers of the soldiers, whose plain duty it was to use every means which even military law would warrant to preserve order, were in the actual discharge of that duty; for, under any view of their own duty to be diligent, the defendants had a right to rely upon and take the aid of such officers, and, until it appeared that such aid was withheld or inefficiently furnished, a jury might well conclude that the defendants were themselves excused from any interference. In this view, then, was the evidence in question competent and relevant?

The objection on the trial was not to any parts of the testimony of the witnesses, but to the whole; and it would not now be just to the plaintiff, or conformable to the rule of law governing the subject, to permit the defendants to divide the testimony into parts or sentences, and argue as to one or more, that it or they are not competent. If, on the trial, the defendants had objected to a part or portion of the testimony, the plaintiff might have waived it. If it were claimed that the words of the sergeant addressed to the officer in the cabin were not competent evidence, as against the defendants, of the fact which he stated, still, if the testimony apart from these words was admissible, the objection must fail. In short, if the whole testimony, as an aggregate, was admissible for the purposes for which it was offered, then it was properly received, although specific parts of it might have been pointed out which it would have been the duty of the court to exclude. Counsel should make their objections in such case specific, so that the adverse party may have an opportunity to waive what is objectionable, and so that the court may have its attention called specifically to the precise point which counsel propose to urge, in any stage of the cause, to the testimony offered.

Another preliminary observation should be made, in view of the arguments presented on the motion. The objection which was made is itself of a somewhat equivocal meaning. The defendants objected to the admission of the evidence for all the purposes for which it was offered. This, it is argued by the plaintiff, means simply a general objection to the evidence for the purposes for which it was offered, and is not a specific objection that the evidence is not admissible for any of the purposes for which it was offered, and, hence, that if the evidence was admissible for any one of the purposes for which it was offered, (other than to prove the condition of affairs on deck, which was particularized,) the objection was not well taken and should be overruled. Although the form in which the objection is stated is somewhat equivocal, I am inclined to think its import, as intended and understood, was particular and not general. The plaintiff had stated several purposes for which he offered the testimony, and, when the defendants said they objected to its admission for all the purposes for which it was offered, they meant for each or any of these purposes, and they added their particular specification of the purpose to show the condition of affairs on deck, because they laid special stress upon that point. I admit that the language is not the best chosen to convey the idea, but, on a motion for a new trial, a rigid technical criticism ought not to have much weight, if the court are satisfied that there was error operating to the prejudice of the party objecting.

I shall deal with the objection, therefore, as if it were made distinctly and consecutively, to the admission of the testimony for each of the purposes specified by the plaintiff, as each purpose was separately announced.

Reverting to the questions in issue, it was material, or certainly relevant, to show the character of the disturbance on deck, whether formidable or slight, to show its duration, and whether any and what efforts were made to repress it, or to protect passengers from injury therefrom, and, as connected with this last, whether the officers of the detachment were using their power and means for the purpose. Indeed, it was not denied, on the argument of this motion, that these were relevant and proper subjects of inquiry; and these are the precise purposes for which the testimony was received. If, then, the testimony bore on these matters, and was, in its nature, competent, the objection was properly overruled.

1. There was evidence that a detachment of soldiers, in command of two lieutenants, a sergeant and two corporals, were on the boat, and that a conflict between some of the men and others who had been selected as a guard, was in progress; and that it began shortly after the other passengers came on board. At a time plainly concurrent with the disturbance, a person in uniform, with stripes on his arm, descends from the very place of the disturbance, near the saloon stairs, into the saloon, and, with the form of military etiquette, salutes a man in military uniform, which, in the judgment of the witnesses, was that of a lieutenant, the latter replies to him in manner and terms of military authority, and the former yields obedience, but again returns and invokes the aid of the other. Now, all this is not conclusive evidence that these were officers of the disorderly soldiers; but the uniforms, and the evident relation between them, testified by acts as well as words, were circumstances which were proper to be submitted to a jury on that question of identity. If a witness had been produced, and had testified that he saw a person, in the uniform of an officer, give orders to the detachment, which they obeyed, it would not be conclusive evidence that such person was an officer, or that he had, in fact, any authority; but it would tend to show both. Transactions which, in all probability, would not take place unless certain other facts existed, are evidence oftentimes from which such other facts may be inferred; and the affairs of life are to be judged of according to their usual and natural signification.

When, therefore, proof has been given that a detachment of soldiers and their officers are on board the steamer, and persons are pointed out, in the uniform of officers, acting toward each other as such, and, in reference to the soldiers, giving and obeying commands, although not in the very presence of the soldiers, there is, certainly, a presumption that they are the officers, because it would be unnatural, and against the ordinary course of human experience, to think otherwise. Although the witnesses had no actual knowledge other than what they witnessed, the transaction would, certainly, aid the jury in determining whether they were officers of the detachment, because, in the absence of counter evidence or explanation, it was grossly improbable that they were not. I have no hesitation in saying that, upon the question of the identity of the officers, and their connection with the detachment of soldiers, the testimony was proper for the consideration of the jury. It follows, that it bore distinctly on the question—where were such officers, and were they doing anything, and what, for the preservation of order, the repression of the violence, and the protection of peaceable passengers?

2. It was of some materiality, under the rule of duty resting on the defendants, above stated, to show how long the disturbance continued before the plaintiff was injured, because, in view of the other evidence as to the number of men engaged therein, the jury were to consider whether the defendants made suitable endeavors, by the means then in their power, to suppress it. If the acts of the supposed sergeant and lieutenant were any evidence of the condition of things on deck, then, clearly, his coming and departure, and the subsequent report of the gun, were evidence, slight, I admit, and of very little importance, but yet evidence, that the duration was somewhat greater than the time thus consumed in these acts of the sergeant, at least, that it began before he came down, and continued during his interview and afterwards, until the report of the gun was heard.

3. Did the transaction legitimately tend to show the condition of things on the deck? Clearly, in the view above taken, it tended to show that the soldiers were left without the care of the lieutenant. For, if the jury should be satisfied that the supposed sergeant and lieutenant were officers of this detachment, then they necessarily must find, first, that such lieutenant was doing nothing personally for the promotion of order, and that temporarily, at least, the men were left without the presence of either him or the sergeant; and this to some extent appertained to the condition of affairs on deck.

But, more than this, the entire transaction was of significant import touching the extent and character of the disturbance there; for, there was other proof of the fact of disturbance and that it was caused by the soldiers. Pending the disturbance, their chief non-commissioned officer comes to his superior officer, expresses his inability to deal successfully with it, and invokes his aid in suppressing it. It is refused, and he returns, and soon after hurries in evident excitement down the stairs and implores assistance in terms of despair. It seems scarcely possible to doubt the significance of these acts, or their relevancy, if competent. An illustration alike in kind and only differing in that its competency and relevancy may be more strikingly obvious, may be suggested. A company of disorderly persons enter a house and begin a disturbance, and women and children come rushing from the house in evident fright and screaming for aid. This would be evidence that what was enacted within was of a character and extent calculated to create alarm and awaken apprehension of danger. It would not, perhaps, be proof of particular acts, and, possibly, their declarations might not be used to fix guilt upon particular individuals, but, of the general fact that the disturbance, the existence of which was otherwise proved, was of such proportions or extent as to excite and alarm, and so to call for interference to stay or suppress it, it would clearly be competent evidence.

4. It is strongly urged that the declarations of the sergeant to his superior are not evidence as against the defendants, and should not be received. I have already observed that the declarations were not objected to as such. The objection was general, to all the testimony. But I do not think it necessary to dispose of that objection by any technical answer. In my judgment, the declarations were admissible, as indicating, first, the relation of the sergeant to his officer—not as a mere declaration, but as an act of subordination; second, as showing the alarm and fright of the sergeant and a state of mind indicating need of assistance; and, finally, the whole transaction was a part of the res gestae, in such sense that the jury might properly be permitted to hear it. His declarations were not, upon their own isolated and separate credit, to be received as evidence of the facts he stated, but the facts to be inferred do obtain credit from the circumstance that, in the situation in which he was placed, in the fright and alarm under which he spoke, and in the condition of things on deck already proved, he did make such utterances to his superior officer. Declarations, when part of the res gestae, bear the character and have oftentimes the force of acts, and, still oftener, are used as proper evidence, giving character and explanation to other acts. Mr. Starkie says, with singular pertinency to the declarations now in question: "If the declaration has no tendency to illustrate the question, except as a mere abstract statement, detached from any particular fact in dispute, and depending for its effect entirely on the credit of the person making the declaration, it is not admissible; but, if any importance can be attached to it as a circumstance which is part of the transaction itself, and deriving a degree of credit from its connection with the circumstances, independently of any credit to be attached to the speaker, then the declaration is admissible." This describes the testimony in question. The connection of the whole with the circumstances of the case, gives it credit and significance, not as the isolated act or statement of the sergeant, but as a narrative of occurrences in their connection with the principal events, receiving significance and inviting belief. Confining myself to the single question presented on this motion, I am constrained to say that the motion for a new trial must be denied.

[NOTE. In affirming the judgment of the circuit court, the supreme court (Mr. Justice Bradley delivering the opinion) referred to the opinion of the circuit court as being sufficiently full upon the subject. It was held that the evidence showing the manner in which the military officers attended to their duty during the disturbance, etc., was admissible as part of the res gestae. Norwich Transp. Co. v. Flint, 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 3.]

Case No. 4,875.

FLINT v. ROBERTS et al.

[4 Ban. & A. 165.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. March, 1879.

PATENTS—REISSUE—ANTICIPATION—INFRINGEMENT.

1. Reissued letters patent No. 7,254, granted to George T. Flint, as assignee of Orange N. Hart, August 8th, 1876, for an improvement in hot-air furnaces, held to be for the same invention as that described in the original patent, No. 92,822, granted to the said Hart July 20th, 1869.

2. The invention described and claimed in the reissue was not anticipated.

3. The defendants infringe by using the invention in connection with an improvement patented by another.

4. While the complainant would not be permitted to use the improvement in connection with his invention, the defendants cannot use the complainant's invention in connection with their improvements.

In equity.

West & Bond, for complainant.

W. B. Phelps, for defendants.

NELSON, District Judge. This suit is brought by complainant, to recover for an alleged infringement by the defendants [Oliver N. Roberts, and others] of patent, reissue No. 7,254, for an improvement in hot-air furnaces.

The complainant is the assignee. The patentee in his specifications of the original patent, No. 92,822, describing his invention states, inter alia, that it "consists in the novel construction and arrangement of the fire-box and smoke flues whereby I obtain a large radiating surface." He then describes in detail: "* * * At the back end of a fire-box A, I put an escape flue W, for the passage of the flame and smoke. This flue increases in width from the fire-box upwards, and is about twice the width of the fire-box at its widest part. At the centre of this flue I place a V-shaped diaphragm L to divide the ascending flames. On the top of the flue W, I locate a rectangular drum C, open at its lower side and divided at its middle by a horizontal partition D. On top of the front end of the fire-box I place another rectangular drum E * * *. The drums C and E, I connect by a series of horizontal flues or pipes BB' * * . In the drum C, the lower flues B open below the partition D, and the upper series B' above the partition." In describing the operation of the furnace, the specifications state: " * * The flame and smoke pass along to the back of the fire-box and up through flue W (being divided or spread in their ascent by the diaphragm L), into the lower portion of the drum C, where they are stopped by partition D, and caused to pass back through flues B to the drum E, and from thence along through the flues B' to the upper portion of drum C and into the smoke stack * * *."

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[Drawings of reissued patent No. 7,254, published from the records of the United States patent office.]

The following claim is made: "No. 2. The combination of the furnace or fire-chamber, constructed as herein described with the air heating devices consisting of the drums C E, flues B and B' with the stationary diaphragm D and deflector L all constructed and arranged substantially as described."

In the reissue he claims: "1. The combination of the drums C E B and B' having division partition D" (diaphragm), "and constructed and arranged as described with the fire-chamber of a furnace or heater substantially in the manner and for the purposes set forth." "3. In combination with a drum and furnace substantially as described, the deflector L arranged in the exit flue W as and for the purposes set forth."

The third claim in the reissue is the second claim in the original patent, and contains the deflector L, which in the specifications is stated to be used for the purpose of dividing flames. It is manifest this deflector is only necessary when the drum of the radiator over the flue is wider than the fire-box and flue. The radiator is an entire and distinct device, and the patentee on a reissue is entitled to add a claim for the drums forming the radiator in combination with the fire-box. It is fully warranted by the description in the specifications and drawings, and, being his original invention, can be claimed in the reissue. Morris v. Royer [Case No. 9,835]; Hoffheins v. Brandt [Id. 6,575]; [Battin v. Taggert] 17 How. [58 U. S.] 83; Woodward v. Dinsmore [Case No. 18,003]. It is a device capable of being placed on or taken off of any fire-box of its length, having an escape flue for the flames equal to the opening of the rectangular drum C at its lower side. The reissue, therefore, in my opinion, is for the same invention as the original, and valid.

There has been no anticipation of Hart's improvement in furnaces. The locomotive-tubular boilers are of an entirely different structure, and have no resemblance to the radiator used by Hart. The fact that they have tubes, surrounded by water, through which the products of combustion pass for the purpose of generating steam, does not affect the validity of this patent.

The date of Hart's invention is October 5th, 1867. This is established by the evidence, so that the Bartlett patent is the only exhibit of the defendants which is prior in date. All other exhibits set up to anticipate the invention are out of the case. The defendants have taken no testimony in respect to this exhibit, but from the evidence of Dean, an examiner, at one time, in the patent office, and complainant's witness, there is nothing in this patent to sustain the position of the defendants.

An examination of the two models, and the specifications, and the description of the operation of the two machines, show that the defendants use the Hart invention in connection with the Henderson improvement. The most careless observer could not fail to detect this. The front part of the Henderson radiator is a formal alteration of Hart's. He makes the head drum over the flue of the furnace, narrower at the base, so as to bring the lower row of the series of pipes or tubes on a line with the products of combustion as they pass up into the drum. This construction performs substantially the same function as the deflector L, and enables the lower tubes to take a portion of the flame and smoke passing up.

Henderson, however, has added a rear extension of tubes and an extra drum at the end, almost, if not quite, a duplicate of Hart's, so that he divides the ascending flames from the fire-box, passing a portion of the products of combustion through his extension, which reunites with the portion passing through the front tubes at the smoke-pipe or chimney. He increases the radiating surface to twice the length of the same length of stove used by Hart. And it is claimed that, by dividing the currents of flame, they being forced to unite again from opposite directions, the heat is increased, and the soot will be consumed, and thus prevent the clogging of the tubes and filling up of the chimney.

Whether this is true or not it is unnecessary to determine, but upon the testimony of the expert, and an examination of the Henderson patent, I am of the opinion that he has taken the invention belonging to the complainant, and has thus infringed his patent. [McCormick v. Talcott] 20 How. [61 U. S.] 405; Forbes v. Barstow Stove Co. [Case No. 4,923]. While the complainant would not be permitted to use the Henderson improvement in connection with his radiator, it is also evident that the defendants cannot use the Hart radiator in connection with their extension, which they now do.

Decree will be entered in favor of the complainant, and a reference to the clerk, as master, to ascertain damages.

NUISANCE—LIVERY STABLE IN CITY—INJUNCTION AGAINST THREATENED NUISANCES.

1. A livery stable in the residence portion of a city is not, as a matter of law, necessarily to be considered as a nuisance to the improved property adjoining or near it.

2. Where the facts stated in the bill showing that the erection and use of a livery stable would be a nuisance to the adjoining property were denied by the answer, a preliminary injunction to restrain the erection of a building to be used as a livery stable was refused.

[Cited in Keiser v. Lovett, 85 Ind. 243; Julia Building Ass'n v. Bell Telephone Co., 88 Mo. 262.]

On motion for an injunction. The bill alleges, in substance, that the parties are owners of adjacent premises, in block 1,014, between Ewing and Garrison avenues, on Locust street, in the city of St. Louis—the premises of complainant being occupied solely for residence purposes, and those of the defendants having been acquired by them only recently, for the purpose of the erection thereon of a public livery and sale stable. It is alleged that the property fronting on Locust street, for many blocks east and west of the defendants' property, is occupied and used for residence purposes, and that it has been, to that end, handsomely and expensively improved—there being no erection upon the street within the boundaries indicated which are, or have been, used for business or manufactures. It is alleged that, well knowing the established character of the neighborhood, and its occupation and use for residence purposes, the defendants, having bought the property adjoining that of complainant, have announced their intention to erect thereon a public livery stable; that in such stable will be kept great numbers of horses and vehicles; that there will be stored in it, for purposes of feed, large quantities of hay and other combustible materials; that the presence of so many horses in such a stable will cause great noise, the generation of offensive odors, the congregation of swarms of flies, and will attract numbers of improper and disreputable characters; and that, by reason of the said matters, the value of complainant's premises will be irreparably damaged, they will be rendered unfit for residence purposes, and the dwelling which stands thereon will be rendered untenable by complainant, or any one who might otherwise be desirous to occupy the same. It is alleged that the livery stable of defendants is to be constructed with board floors, and that the stamping of horses thereon, and the rolling of vehicles on the same, by reason of the close proximity of the stable to the dwelling of complainant, will cause any occupant great and interminable annoyance, uneasiness, and disquiet, and render it impossible for any person or family to occupy said dwelling without great physical discomfort and inconvenience, and that the presence of combustible materials so near the said dwelling will cause every occupant of said dwelling grave fears and anxiety by reason of the increased danger and peril from fire.

It is alleged, also, that the mere beginning of the stable has greatly diminished the value of complainant's property, and that he is advised that the maintenance of such stable will be prejudicial to the health of the residents within its immediate neighborhood. It is alleged, further, that the eastern wall of defendants' stable will be built so as to immediately cover the western wall of complainant's dwelling, and will be extended to the sidewalk on the north, so as to cut off the light and view westward from complainant's said premises, and that defendants have actually begun the erection of their building, and announce their purpose to complete the same. As a further ground of relief, the bill alleges that the defendants have begun the erection of their building, and will complete the same, for unlawful purposes of extortion and blackmail, and that they have purchased the lot now occupied by them with the expectation that, upon their announcement of their intention to build a livery stable, or upon the completion of the same, the property owners in the immediate neighborhood will be compelled, from motives of self-protection, to unite and buy the defendants' lot at a price to be fixed by defendants, greatly in excess of what they paid and of the real value of said premises. It is alleged, furthermore, that in other neighborhoods devoted to residences the defendants have bought property, and, having announced their intention to build a public livery stable, and having begun the same, have been bought off by the property owners of the neighborhood, at an exorbitant advance over and above the price paid for the property by the defendants; and that, even in the present instance, the defendants have indicated that what they might ultimately do would depend upon the action of the owners of the property in the neighborhood. The bill alleges that the defendants have been notified to desist from the erection thus begun by them, but that they persist in continuing the work already begun. The bill prays an injunction and general relief. In support of the bill, the complainant has filed numerous affidavits.

The defendants answer, under oath, in which they admit the ownership, as alleged, of lots in block 1,014, on Locust street; that the defendants are erecting a brick building thereon, adjoining the plaintiff's property, to be used as a livery and boarding, but not, as alleged, a sale stable; deny that the complainant is in actual possession of the adjoining building, but only in possession by his tenant; deny that the neighborhood is fixed in its character as a residence neighborhood, and set forth various trades that are carried on in said block 1,014—among them, on Olive street, a large livery stable, two meat shops, and other shops; deny that the building they are constructing will be a nuisance, or that the business to be carried on therein will in any way constitute a nuisance, and they put in issue every averment to that effect in the bill. They aver that they have purchased and paid for the land occupied by them in good faith; that they have employed an architect, who stands well in his profession, to design the building in such a manner that defendants shall reside in the second story, and so as to suppress all noises and be free from all nuisances averred in the bill. They aver, further, that Thomas P. Russell, for thirty years previous to March, 1878, carried on the business continuously in the same building on Franklin avenue, in a residence portion of the city. Their change from that place was occasioned by the expiration of his lease; that his son was admitted as a partner some years previous to 1878. They aver that they bought and paid for the ground now owned by them with the intention of pursuing their trade in a lawful and proper manner, and that they propose only to enjoy the lawful use and control of their own land, and in no manner to interfere with the rights of others; that the said livery stable, when constructed, will not be a nuisance, nor carried on in any way so as to interfere with the complainant, and they will carry it on in a proper and lawful manner; that their business, when so conducted, is a useful and necessary calling, and they deny all the imputations in the bill against their good faith. Numerous affidavits were filed in support of the answer.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The prayer of the bill is "that the defendants be perpetually enjoined by the decree of the court from further proceeding with the erection of said livery stable upon the said lot, and from the use and occupation of said premises for the purposes of a public livery stable, and for general relief." The present application is for a special preliminary injunction restraining the defendants from making such erection, and from so using the said premises.

The questions which may finally be involved in the merits of the case are of very great importance, as they arise out of the point where two plain principles of law meet. The one is that every owner of private property may make any lawful use of it which he sees proper. The other is that private property must be so used as not to injure the property of his neighbor, or invade the just rights of the public. St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. Cas. 642.

The essential groundwork of the bill in this case is, that the proposed erection of a livery stable on the lot in question, and its use for this purpose when erected, will constitute a nuisance to the plaintiff's adjoining property. The bill can have no other foundation. On a street, and in a locality such as this portion of Locust street is, many erections can readily be imagined that would be extremely objectionable to the owners of residences, such as a meat market, a green-grocer's establishment, or, indeed, a store building or a business house of any kind. But the general law of the land does not limit the rights of ownership by the tastes and wishes of one's neighbors. Possibly, under the charter provisions, the municipal authorities might be invested with more power, in the nature of police regulations, over the uses to which private property may be put, than can be exercised by the courts under the general law; but it is conceded that the city authorities have not undertaken to regulate the erection or use of livery stables. It is, therefore, clear that this application must rest upon the proposition that the livery stable proposed to be erected and used by the defendants is, and will be, in the legal sense of the term, a "nuisance." To be a nuisance it must be something which unreasonably and sensibly interferes with the comfort and enjoyment of life or property—which may be by noises, noxious and offensive smells, injurious gases, the collection of flies and insects, and the like. The books abound in cases where nuisances of this kind are held actionable at law, and where, when the fact is ascertained, either by a verdict or by admission in the pleadings, or from the essential and unavoidable character of the trade or occupation, that the thing or matter complained of is a nuisance, courts of equity have interfered by injunction.

Counsel have referred to a number of adjudications in which the legal rights of the proprietors of livery stables and those of the adjoining or near proprietors have been considered by the courts. The principal cases are the following: Aldrich v. Howard, 7 R. I. 87, 8 R. I. 246; Burditt v. Swenson, 17 Tex. 489; Dargan v. Waddill, 9 Ired. 244; Kirkman v. Handy, 11 Humph. 406; Coker v. Birge, 10 Ga. 336; Harrison v. Brooks, 20 Ga. 537; Morris v. Brower, 1 Anth. N. P. 368. The judgments in these cases concur in establishing this doctrine, viz., that a livery stable in a town or city is not per se—that is, necessarily and unavoidably—a nuisance, but it may be or become a nuisance, and this depends upon its location, as respects the property near by, and the manner in which it is built, kept, and used. The foregoing observations are well illustrated by Aldrich v. Howard, 8 R. I. 246, where it was decided that a livery stable may be a nuisance, notwithstanding it was properly built, properly kept, and was in a location as fit as any in that part of the city. The court say: "It has been held, in other cases, that a stable in a town is not necessarily and per se a nuisance; yet if it is so built or so used as that it destroys the comfort of persons owning and occupying adjoining premises, creating such an annoyance as to render life uncomfortable, then it is none the less a nuisance that it is well kept, carefully built, and as favorably located as the town will admit."

This principle, that a livery stable is or is not a nuisance according to circumstances, is decisive of the present application for a preliminary injunction. The stable is not yet erected—its erection has just been commenced. The complainant seeks relief by injunction against an apprehended mischief and nuisance. The principles upon which the courts of equity proceed in such cases are well settled, and are thus clearly stated by Lord Chancellor Brougham in the case of Earl of Ripon v. Hobart, 3 Mylne & K. 169, 179: "If the thing sought to be prohibited is in itself a nuisance, the court will interfere to stay irreparable mischief, without waiting for the result of a trial; and will, according to the circumstances, direct an issue, or allow an action, and, if need be, expedite the proceedings, the injunction being in the meantime continued. But where the thing sought to be restrained is not unavoidably and in itself noxious, but only something which may, according to circumstances, prove so, the court will refuse to interfere until the matter has been tried at law, generally by an action, though in particular cases an issue may be directed for the satisfaction of the court where an action could not be framed so as to meet the question." I consider the principles thus laid down as to the time or stage at which equity will interfere as founded on the soundest of reasons; and they have been approved by the supreme court of Tennessee in Kirkman v. Handy, supra, which refused to prevent the erection of a livery stable upon a lot adjoining the plaintiff's, "on Cherry street, in one of the best neighborhoods in the city of Nashville." In Coker v. Birge, 9 Ga. 425, an injunction against the erection was granted, but it was for the reason that, no answer having been filed, the allegations of the bill that the stable would be a nuisance were admitted; but when this was denied, the same court, in the subsequent case of Harrison v. Brooks, refused such an injunction. In Burditt v. Swenson, supra, the livery stable having been found to be a nuisance by the verdict of a jury, the court awarded a perpetual injunction.

No case has been referred to in which the erection of a livery stable has been enjoined where the fact that it would be a nuisance was denied, and where it had not been ascertained to be such by an appropriate judicial inquiry, before the injunction was awarded. And, so far as my researches have gone, Lord Brougham is entirely correct in his statement in the Earl of Ripon's Case, supra, "that no instance can be produced of the interposition by injunction in the case of an eventual or contingent nuisance." Cleveland v. Citizens' Gaslight Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 201; Duncan v. Hayes, 22 N. J. Eq. 25; Rhodes v. Dunbar, 57 Pa. St. 274; Wood, Nuis. § 789. The difficulty in thus interfering is greatly increased, if not insurmountable, when it is the use to which the structure is to be put, and not the intrinsic nature of the structure itself, which forms the basis of anticipated grievance. Duncan v. Hayes, 22 N. J. Eq. 25.

That the parties may not be misled, it may be well to add that we deny the injunction on the ground that the answer having denied the fact that the building, when erected and used as proposed, will be a nuisance to the property in the neighborhood, and the case being one in which the question of nuisance or no nuisance depends upon circumstances hereafter to be ascertained, it is, therefore, not one in which it is proper to issue the writ asked at this stage of the controversy. The filing of the bill may not, however, prove to be eventually useless, since "it is generally good policy," says Mr. Wood (Law of Nuisance, § 790), where there are strong reasons to believe that the thing will be a nuisance, to institute proceedings to stay its progress, particularly if its erection involves large expenditures, as in such cases the party cannot be charged with laches, nor can acquiescence in any measure be imputed to him, and the diligence used by instituting the proceedings, operating as a notice and protest against the use of the property in the manner contemplated, strengthens the plaintiff's equities when he asks for an injunction after the use of the property actually proves injurious." The defendants now proceed at their peril, and if it shall be hereafter found by a jury, or otherwise judicially ascertained, that the stable in this place, as used by them, does interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of the neighboring property, they cannot complain if they are then perpetually enjoined from the further use of it for the purpose for which it was designed. Injunction denied.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July Term, 1869.

PRIORITY OF INVENTION—SIMILARITY.

1. A patent for an improvement in a wagon reach, consisting of an upward curve, whereby, in turning, the forward wheels are allowed to pass under the reach, combined with an extension of the ordinary sway-bar, so arranged upon the hounds that it will still form a support for the reach, can not be sustained when it is proved that a carriage fitted with a reach which had a bend allowing the wheels to pass partly under, and with a circular sway-bar or wheel by which the reach would be sutained in all positions, had been in use for several years.

2. Increasing the curve in the reach, or diminishing the diameter of the wheel, would allow it to pass completely underneath, as in the plaintiff's patent; and this is a change which would naturally suggest itself to any mechanic, and cannot be the subject of a valid patent when the substantial invention had been previously in use.

3. The circular sway-bar would have performed the same office as the plaintiff's improved extended sway-bar, had the wheel passed beneath the reach, and the plaintiff's patent for the curved reach having failed, his claim for the improved sway-bar must fail with it.

4. The name by which any structure or part is designated is immaterial.

This action was a suit at law for infringement. The parties waived a jury, and the cause was by consent tried by the court.

L. L. Bond, for plaintiff.
S. A. Goodwin, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. The plaintiff claims, by virtue of a patent, dated the 15th of October, 1867 [No. 69,789], an improvement in a wagon reach, and the allegation is that the defendant, who also has a patent, dated the 27th of October, 1868, violates the patent of the plaintiff.

The specifications attached to the plaintiff's patent describe the particular manner in which the reach is made, and declare that the object of the invention is so to construct the reach that the vehicle with which it is used can be turned in the least possible space, and so that the wheel can never strike against the reach; and this object, it is said, is accomplished by the peculiarity of the form of the reach, the peculiarity being by giving it a turn or curve upward at the point where the wheel would strike an ordinary reach, which is always straight.

The claim of the plaintiff consists of two parts. He claims, First, a curved or bent reach, when so constructed that the line of draft is the same as in a straight reach, and so that the reach rests on and is supported by the sway bar, as in the ordinary reach, substantially as described in the specification; and secondly, he claims a curved reach —referring to the drawing A in combination with the iron E of the sway bar, when such iron is extended, and so constructed as to furnish a support for the reach in all positions, substantially as and for the purpose mentioned.

This last claim consists of the extension of the ordinary sway bar upon which the reach rests, which bar is usually placed upon hounds, as they are termed, round and forward, so that the reach shall rest upon the sway bar, when the forward wheels of the wagon pass under the reach and are placed at right angles with the hind wheels.

The question is, whether this patent can be sustained, in view of the evidence which has been produced before the court. No question was made, and, of course, none can be made, that if the plaintiff's patent is sustainable, the defendant's wagon or reach infringes, and therefore the only question is whether the plaintiff's patent can stand.

I am of opinion that it is not sustainable in point of law, under the facts which have been adduced.

The position taken by the counsel of the plaintiff as to the first claim, was that it was not a broad claim for a bent reach, but that it was a claim for a bent reach under certain conditions, one of which was that the line of draft must be the same as in a straight reach, and another that the curve must be so returned to the straight line that the reach will rest on the sway bar and be supported by it, and thirdly, that it must be so curved that the wheels must not strike against it. Taking that view of it, can the claim be sustained?

It was in evidence that a wagon or carriage had been used for many years, manufactured as early as 1854 or 1855, in which the reach had a bend or curve upward, so as to admit of the forward wheels passing under the reach to a certain extent, when the carriage was in the act of turning, and with a sway bar, or what is sometimes called the fifth wheel of the wagon, forming an entire circuit, resting upon the forward axle and upon the hounds.

It is true that in this carriage the forward wheels could not pass entirely under the reach, but it is clear to my mind that when the idea is once presented of a curve or bend in the reach, so as to admit of the forward wheel passing to a certain extent beneath the reach, that you have got the substantial invention of the plaintiff, so far as concerns the reach, because the idea once being suggested that by a curve in the reach the wagon or carriage is permitted to make a sharper turn by the forward wheels going partially beneath the reach; all you have to do is to make the bend greater or the forward wheels smaller, and you accomplish to all intents and purposes the object stated by the plaintiff. That is to say, by elevating the curve more or diminishing the circumference of the forward wheels, either, or by both combined, you cause the forward wheels to pass completely under the reach, and with this carriage before us as it was, bodily in court, and which had been in existence some fifteen or sixteen years, it was not possible to say that a man could have a patent simply by making the curve greater in the reach or diminishing the circumference of the forward wheels of the carriage. There is the idea. There is whatever of invention there is, and it is a mere mechanical expedient to change the structure either of the reach or of the forward wheels.

Again, so far as the sway bar is concerned. In that carriage thus having existed for so long a time, there was this circular sway bar, sometimes called the fifth wheel, and it was clear that if the wheel was lessened so as to pass beneath the reach, or the curve increased, that the reach would rest upon the sway bar as the carriage was turned and as the wheels passed beneath the reach. It is because the idea is apparent in the carriage that was manufactured some fifteen years ago, of the effect of the curve in the reach, that the first claim of the plaintiff's patent cannot be sustained. In that the reach passed from the axle of the hind wheels in a straight line toward the axle of the forward wheels until it came to a curve, and then there was a sweep upward and it came down to a straight line and was so continued on to the axle of the forward wheels.

The idea in the first claim of the plaintiff was in that carriage, and to make the forward wheels go beneath was simply a change which any mechanic could make and which would naturally suggest itself, if that was the desideratum, to any mechanic looking at the construction of the carriage.

Then, as to the second claim. The plaintiff constructs his wagon with what he calls a fifth wheel, that is, a circular piece of wood, iron, or of any other material, (of course it may be so constructed) passing over hounds and on the forward axle, and outside of and concentric with that, what he terms a sixth wheel, which constitutes a sway bar, also passing over the hounds and on the forward axle, and upon which the reach rests as the wagon turns, in the manner suggested by this model, which is a perfect resemblance of the plaintiff's wagon.

The question is, what is the difference between the structure of this and the one which was referred to in the testimony, and which, it was established, has been in existence for fifteen or sixteen years? Of course, what this circular piece of wood, of iron, or of other material is called is immaterial; calling it a sway bar does not change the nature or form of the thing itself, and in that carriage which was constructed long before the plaintiff's there was the equivalent to all intents and purposes, as it seems to me, of what the plaintiff calls the sway bar; that is to say, there was a circular piece of wood or iron. There was in this, which is a representation of the carriage, what the draughtsman has called a sway bar; it, perhaps, may not have been called so by the man who constructed the carriage, but it is clear that it would perform the functions of a sway bar precisely as in the plaintiff's wagon, if the wheels passed beneath the reach, so that the question arose in my mind, and it was the only one about which I had any doubt in the case, whether this could properly be the subject of a patent; whether the invention was of such a character that it could be considered patentable; and on the whole, when comparing it with the carriage already referred to, I could not perceive that there was any material difference in the structure of the two things. In this wagon of the plaintiff, it passes around, the wheels go beneath the reach, and of course, the reach rests upon the sway bar. The same office would be performed by this circular piece of wood or of iron, as the case may be, in the carriage, if the wheels went beneath the reach, and then the only point that could possibly arise was, whether changing the form of the structure of the reach or of the forward wheels of the wagon so as to permit them to go under the reach was a matter of invention and patentable as such, and for the reasons that I have already given it seems to me that it was not, and therefore that the second claim must fail as well as the first.

In looking at this case I am struck with the facility with which patents are obtained, because it would be incomprehensible to me if the officers in the patent office had known of the existence of such a carriage as that which was proved, with the reach as there constructed, they could have granted a patent in such a case as this, and while it is perfectly just that every real, genuine invention devised by any one should be protected; still it is not just to the public that mere changes of form should have the protection of the law. Perhaps there is reason to believe they are not sufficiently rigid on this point in the patent office. It is true that, the officers there being the persons to whom the law intrusts the examination of inventions and the granting of patents, the courts are liberal in the construction which they give to patents, with a view of protecting any possible right which a party may have. But to allow a person by a mere change in the structure of a machine, such as would suggest itself to any mechanic, to acquire a monopoly for that change, and the shield and protection of the law would be an abuse of the law itself.

The finding in this case will be for the defendant.

Case No. 4,878.

The FLORA.

[1 Biss. 29;[1] 3 Chi. Leg. News, 130.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct. Term, 1853.

ORIGIN OF ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION ON WESTERN WATERS.

1. The admiralty jurisdiction on the western lakes and rivers is not limited to cases within the act of February 26, 1845 [5 Stat. 726].

2. The district court may resort to the act of September 24, 1789 [1 Stat. 73], to sustain its jurisdiction.

In admiralty. In this case the libel alleged that a scowboat, of the burthen of sixty tons, the property of the libellant, was engaged in carrying earth from the excavation of the Chicago harbor, on the waters of the western shore of Lake Michigan, and upon that lake and the navigable waters thereof; that on the 14th of June, 1853, the boat was lying alongside the north pier of the Chicago harbor, and while there was run into and sunk by the brig Flora, a vessel licensed and enrolled, etc., of about two hundred tons burthen, and then bound on a voyage from a port in Michigan to Chicago, loaded with lumber. The objection was taken that the boat sunk was not licensed and enrolled for the coasting trade, and was not employed at the time in business of commerce and navigation between ports and places in different states and territories, upon the lakes and navigable waters thereof (all of which was admitted), as required by the act of February 26, 1845 [supra], and that the court had no jurisdiction of the case.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. The ninth section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 76) gave to the district courts cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The tenth section gave the same jurisdiction to the district court of Kentucky. The case of The Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 428, was a libel filed in the district court of Kentucky for wages earned in a voyage from a port in that state up the Missouri river and back again to the port of departure. It was a voyage throughout, several hundred miles above the ebb and flow of the tide, and the supreme court of the United States held that the decree of the district court, dismissing the libel for want of jurisdiction, was right, because the contract was not a maritime contract "upon acknowledged principles of law."

In The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443, the supreme court overruled the decision in the case of The Thomas Jefferson; that is, the court decided that the district court, in point of law, had jurisdiction of the matter contained in the libel in that case, and should have proceeded to an adjudication of the rights of the parties, and that the supreme court ought to have so held in 1825. If this was correct, then the adjudication of the district court of Kentucky would have been right, if so made under the tenth section of the law of 1789. There was no other law conferring general admiralty jurisdiction upon that court. And this section shows that the later decision is the true one, because congress, after granting general admiralty jurisdiction to the district courts in the section immediately preceding, in this confers the same jurisdiction upon the district court of Kentucky, and yet the geographical position of Kentucky was of course well known to congress. The second section of the act of March 3, 1819 [3 Stat. 502], establishing the district court of Illinois, gave it the same jurisdiction as the district court of Kentucky had by the act of 1789. Of course then, under the ruling of the supreme court, it had general admiralty jurisdiction over all the navigable waters within the district, and could have taken cognizance of a case like The Thomas Jefferson before the passage of the act of 1845. If, then, it had general admiralty jurisdiction prior to the act of 1845, how could that act "confer a new jurisdiction?" The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 451. The supreme court, in Fretz v. Bull, Id. 466, ruled in accordance with the principles of the case reported in the same volume, and already referred to, that the district court had jurisdiction in admiralty for a tort on the Mississippi above tide-water (The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, Id. 458); this was not under the law of 1845, and consequently the admiralty jurisdiction of this court would not be confined to the limits and restrictions contained in that law in cases arising on the Mississippi and its tributaries, but we must refer to the act of 1789 as our guide. Does it not follow, if there is no other admiralty jurisdiction on the lakes than what is conferred by the act of 1845, that this court must adjudicate differently when it has cases in admiralty before it on the Ohio or Mississippi, and on the waters of Lake Michigan? For example, in the one case the parties are entitled to a jury, and in the other not. Is there, then, that perfect equality which is referred to, "not only in the laws, but in the mode of administering them"? The court compares the acts of 1789 and 1845, and declares that the jurisdiction under both laws is confined to vessels enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and the act of 1845 extends only to such vessels when they are engaged in commerce between the different states and territories. Is this strictly correct? Certainly the jurisdiction under the act of 1789 is not so restricted. Is there no admiralty jurisdiction on the lakes except what is brought within the act of 1845? Suppose a vessel is engaged in commerce between one of the states and Canada, is it not within the admiralty jurisdiction of this court if it enters the harbor of Chicago? We have Canadian vessels here daily in our season of navigation. It may happen, too, that a vessel from Europe may visit us, owned in England or France; such a vessel is not enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and is it for that reason alone beyond the jurisdiction of this court? Again, does the word state or territory, in the act of 1845, mean a foreign country? It seems to me clear that the act intends to speak only of the states and territories of the United States, because it refers to vessels and steamboats enrolled and licensed under their authority. The case of foreign vessels has been mentioned, because this court has not unfrequently had such cases before it, and considerable difficulty and embarrassment have been felt in acting upon such cases under the law of 1845, as well as in cases where the vessel was enrolled and licensed under the law, but employed at the time not in business of commerce and navigation between ports and places in different states and territories of the United States, but between one of the states and Canada, a foreign country. In the act of 1789, the jurisdiction of the district court is to include all seizures under the laws of imposts, navigation or trade of the United States, where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen within the district, and stress is justly laid on this clause by the court in the case of The Genesee Chief. We are beginning to have considerable foreign commerce in some of the ports of Lake Michigan, and it is not improbable that seizures may be made here. Is this law not still in force, or can there be no seizures unless the vessel is of twenty tons burthen or upwards, as is expressed in the law of 1845? It has been generally supposed that the act of 1845 was passed by congress under the influence of the decision in the case of The Thomas Jefferson and subsequent cases founded on it, and with a view to avoid those decisions. It may safely be affirmed if congress had thought the supreme court would make the decision that was made in the case of The Genesee Chief, the law of 1845 would not have been enacted. If the district courts already had general jurisdiction in admiralty on the lakes, why did congress pass a law extending their jurisdiction? It should rather have been entitled an act limiting their jurisdiction. If the law of 1845 supersedes the law of 1789, then clearly, in this district and in all others that border on the lakes, and also possess navigable waters other than the lakes, there must be, in some respects, two different modes of administering admiralty law.

I confess, in view of these considerations, and many others that might be urged, I do not well see how we can administer admiralty law on these lakes, in many cases, without resorting to the law of 1789; and yet, to hold that to be in force, as well as the law of 1845, leads to difficulties, which are apparent from an examination of the opinion of the court in the case of The Genesee Chief.

From the foregoing considerations, even if I were obliged to resort to the law of 1845 to sustain the jurisdiction of the court, I should be disposed to give it an extremely liberal construction, and to hold, whenever in a case of collision, either craft is within that law, and the circumstances bring it within the admiralty jurisdiction upon general principles of the maritime law, that this court can take cognizance. This case is within that rule. The Flora comes strictly within the provisions of the act of 1845. I therefore think the court has jurisdiction, and the motion to dismiss the case must be overruled.

NOTE. This is believed to have been the first case declaring the doctrine that the admiralty jurisdiction of the district courts, upon the western lakes and rivers, did not depend upon the act of Feb. 26th, 1845, and it is printed, unchanged, from the original manuscript of Judge Drummond.

The question of admiralty jurisdiction of the western lakes and rivers has since been much discussed, and it is believed that a historical view of the rulings of the supreme court may be of interest.

It had long been the doctrine that admiralty jurisdiction extended only as far as the ebb and flow of the tide, and did not exist at all upon the western lakes. The Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 428; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 324; The Orleans v. Phoebus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175; Waring v. Clark, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441; New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344. See, also, The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443; Fretz v. Bull, Id. 466; Walsh v. Rogers, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 283; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 195.

In the case of Jackson v. The Magnolia, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 296, the supreme court held that the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States extends to cases of collision upon navigable waters, although the place of such collision be within the body of a county, and above the flux and reflux of the tide, and this by virtue of the judiciary act of 1789, and not from the act of 1845. This ruling was made by a divided court, three of the justices dissenting, and Justices Daniel and Campbell delivering elaborate opinions, protesting against the doctrines asserted by the majority, as a usurpation on the part of the judiciary and a violation of rights reserved by the constitution.

The case of Allen v. Newberry, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 244, decided that admiralty had not jurisdiction of a contract for shipment of goods between ports of the same state.

In Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 48, jurisdiction was sustained in a case of collision on the Yazoo river two hundred miles above its confluence with the Mississippi, Justices Campbell and Catron dissenting.

The admiralty jurisdiction is not taken away by the fact that the collision or other tort was committed within the body of a county.

If the collision occurred on those navigable waters which empty into the sea, or into the bays and gulfs which form a part of the sea, the maritime courts have jurisdiction. The Commerce, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 574.

The Eagle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 15, is a leading and well considered case. The court there ruled that the district courts can take cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty jurisdiction upon the lakes and waters connecting them, the same as upon the high seas, bays, and rivers navigable from the sea; that it is not necessary, in a libel on the lakes, to bring the case within the act of 1845; but on the contrary, this act, instead of being an extending and enabling act, as was intended, having become, in consequence of the decisions of this court, inoperative, must be regarded as obsolete and of no effect; and that the saving clause, as to the concurrent remedy at common law, is also of necessity useless and of no effect. It was further held, that the ninth section of the judiciary act of 1789, conferring upon the district courts exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty jurisdiction, "including all seizures under laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, within their respective districts, as well as upon the high seas," is also inoperative.

In Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 583, and The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 411, the question of state jurisdiction was fully discussed.

In the case of The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 555, some of the previous decisions are discussed. The rule is laid down that the act of 1845 is a limitation of the powers granted by the act of 1789, as regards cases arising upon the lakes and navigable waters connecting said lakes, and sums up the doctrines as follows: 1. The admiralty jurisdiction, to which the power of the federal judiciary is by the constitution declared to extend, is not limited to tide-water, but covers the entire navigable waters of the United States. 2. The original jurisdiction in admiralty exercised by the district courts, by virtue of the act of 1789, is exclusive, not only of other federal courts, but of the state courts also. 3. The jurisdiction of admiralty causes arising on the interior waters of the United States, other than the lakes and their connecting waters, is conferred by the act of September 24, 1789. 4. The admiralty jurisdiction exercised by the same courts, on the lakes and the waters connecting those lakes, is governed by the act of February 3, 1845. District Court, E. D. Michigan. June Term, 1877.

MARINE TORTS—ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. The master of a scow took possession of a lighter, having no authority therefor, and used her in carrying wood off the shore of Lake St. Clair to the scow, but neglected to return her: Held, the court of admiralty has jurisdiction, and the scow is liable in rem for the conversion.

[Cited in The Ella B., 24 Fed. 508.]

2. Though originally seized in a fish pond staked off from the Detroit river, yet as the scow employed the lighter in its service upon navigable waters she is liable.

Libellant, being the owner of a lighter, averred that the master of the scow had, without authority, seized and used his lighter and neglected to return her, though requested so to do. He claimed $60 damage, and also the rental value of the lighter from the time of seizure, April 15, 1875, to the filing of his libel. Exceptions were taken to the jurisdiction on the ground that the facts did not constitute a lien upon the scow by the admiralty law. The principal allegations in the libel were denied in the answer, and it was claimed that the lighter had been detained by a ship carpenter, who had been directed by the libellant to put certain repairs upon her. The facts were that while the vessel was in a sunken condition the claimant applied to a brother of libellant for permission to use the lighter in carrying off wood to the scow. This the brother, Wallace Lemaire, granted without authority. The claimant used her two or three days only; left her lying near the lake shore where she pounded and became leaky. It was agreed, on demand made by libellant for the lighter, that she should be left at a ship carpenter's to be repaired. After this was finished the carpenter refused to deliver her to libellant, who filed this libel to recover her value.

Geo. W. Moore, for libellant.

H. A. Swan, contra.

BROWN, District Judge. The principal question discussed upon the argument related to the jurisdiction of the court. The libel sounds in tort, and it was strenuously insisted by claimant's advocate that no lien attached to the scow for the conversion of the lighter, both parties conceding that claimant took possession of her without authority from the owner. Cases of spoliation and damage are of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. These include illegal seizures or depredations upon vessels or goods afloat. Every violent dispossession of property on the ocean is, prima facie, a maritime tort, and as such belongs to the admiralty jurisdiction. Benedict, §§ 310, 311. And the owners of a vessel are liable for torts committed by the master in the course of his employment.

There can be no doubt that if this were a case of contract—that is, if the agent of whom the claimant hired the scow, and whom claimant in good faith believed to have authority to loan it, had in fact possessed that authority, a libel in rem could have been sustained for the use of the lighter. A person furnishing a small boat or a lighter for the use of a vessel has as valid a lien upon her as though he had furnished an anchor, a compass, a chronometer, or any other of the articles usually denominated materials. In the case of The Dick Keys [Case No. 3,898], Mr. Justice McLean held that, where the master of a steamboat, on her behalf, agreed to pay $20 per day for the use of a barge, a libel might be maintained against the steamboat for the amount. Mr. Parsons says (2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 148): "If a barge is necessary to a steamboat, its hire to it will be regarded as material furnished for its equipment;" citing Amis v. The Louisa, 9 Mo. 621; Gleim v. The Belmont, 11 Mo. 112; The Kentucky v. Brooks, 1 G. Greene, 398,—cases which fully sustain the text of the learned commentator.

Now, upon principle, it is difficult to say why, if an action in rem will lie for the use or value of property lawfully obtained, a similar action will not lie for the use or value of property unlawfully obtained; in other words, where the wrong is greater, the remedy should not be less. The general rule with regard to torts seems to be, that the owners and the vessel are liable for all the acts of the master done in the execution of the business in which he may be employed, by which third persons are injured, whether the injury was occasioned by the unlawful acts or by the negligence or want of skill of the master. Dias v. The Revenge [Case No. 3,877]; Dean v. Angus [Id. 3,702]; The Martha Anne [Id. 9,146]. The principle underlying these decisions is that, for torts committed in the business of the master as such, or in which the ship is the active, the injuring or the benefited party, the injured party has his remedy as well against the vessel as against her owner and master. The mere fact that the person committing a tort is master of a vessel, of course, does not make her liable; but, if it be an act done in pursuance of his business as master, or is beneficial to the vessel, she becomes liable in rem. The English cases hold that the vessel is not liable for a willful collision. This doctrine, however, is denied in the case of Ralston v. The State Rights [Id. 11,540], where a libel was sustained for running down the libellant's vessel, done by the express direction of the master of the colliding vessel.

It is further insisted in this case that, locality being the test of jurisdiction in cases of tort, the injury was not done upon navigable waters, but that the lighter was seized within a fish-pound staked off from the river. I do not regard this fact as material. In the case of Plummer v. Webb [Case No. 11,233], a libel was sustained for the abduction of a minor son upon a voyage upon the high seas. Mr. Justice Story observed: "Here it is true that the tortious act, or cause of damage, might be properly deemed to arise in port; but it was a continuing act and cause of damage during the whole voyage; it was in no just sense a complete and perfected wrong until the departure of the vessel from port, and it traveled along with the parties as a continuing injury through the whole voyage, and terminated only with the death of the son at sea." See, also, Sherwood v. Hall [Id. 12,777]. In the case of The Yankee v. Gallagher [Id. 18,124], the court held that, "if the tortious act originates in port, and is not a perfected wrong until the vessel leaves the port, it is a continuous act, and travels with the tort-feasor and the injured party during the whole voyage, and comes within the jurisdiction of the admiralty upon the principle that, if the thing be done on the high seas and brought to land, it is appropriate to a court of admiralty to decide the question as a maritime tort." In this case the libellant had been seized in the city of San Francisco by a vigilance committee, and carried on board the bark and landed in the Sandwich Islands. In the case at bar, admitting that the fish-pound was not navigable water, the lighter was taken to the scow then lying in navigable waters, and was used by her there, and I think the case falls within the authorities above cited.

No willful misconduct or wrongful purpose on the part of the claimant need be shown; for the gist of the action is the use of the lighter by the vessel, and I hold that it makes no difference whether the claimant became possessed of her by a contract, or by an act which was technically a conversion. The exception to the jurisdiction must therefore be overruled.

Ouillette, the owner of the scow, took possession of the lighter without authority from the libellant. After he had her for some time, and she had been injured either by Ouillette's negligence in allowing her to pound upon the bottom, or by becoming leaky, libellant went to Ouillette and demanded that the lighter should be returned to him in good order. Ouillette then put her into the hands of a carpenter, who repaired the damages done her, and also made some alterations and repairs on her at the request of the libellant. When libellant went to the carpenter to demand her, he refused to give her up, either until the repairs put upon her by Ouillette's directions were paid, as libellant says, or until libellant would release Ouillette from all liability, or would clear Ouillette of the law, as the carpenter says. As it is clear that libellant offered to pay for the repairs which he had ordered, and the carpenter did not detain her upon that ground, his further detention of her must be attributed to Ouillette, notwithstanding his statement that the carpenter detained her without authority from him. It was the duty of Ouillette to see that the lighter was returned, and no excuse for the nonperformance of that duty, not attributable to the libellant, can be accepted.

There is considerable conflict with regard to the value of the lighter; but, upon all the testimony I think that $45 is as much as she is worth. There must be a decree for the libellant for this amount, with interest.

Case No. 4,881.

The FLORENCE.

[13 Eng. Law T. (N. S.) 613.]

District Court, E. D. New York. 1866.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—FORFEITURE BY MISCONDUCT.

1. Where a mate of a vessel, having a dispute with the master about the rate of his wages, on leaving the ship took the ship's chronometer with him, and retained it in order to force a settlement of his claim, until compelled to give it up by the police: Held, that this was an act of misconduct which should cause a forfeiture of wages.

2. Forfeiture of wages is not given merely as a compensation to the owner for actual loss suffered by the seaman's misconduct; it is enforced also by way of punishment.

In admiralty. This action was brought by Frederick Munderloch against the barque Florence, to recover wages due to him for services as mate on board the barque. There were some immaterial questions about the rate of wages at which he was employed, as he had not signed articles; but it appeared that, after the dispute arose as to the rate of wages, the libellant was discharged, and, on leaving the ship, he took the vessel's chronometer with him to his boarding house, and refused to give it up till the amount which he claimed was paid. The master was compelled to apply to the police, and by their aid he recovered the chronometer without any loss to the ship. On this ground a forfeiture of all the wages was claimed.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This proceeding cannot be deemed other than an act of gross misconduct on the part of the libellant. He was not an ignorant sailor, but an intelligent chief mate. He was at the time in sole charge of the vessel, and in the position of a trustee. He is presumed to know, and must, in fact, have known, that the law gave him a perfect security, for any sum justly due to him, and that the court of admiralty stands always open to adjudicate upon such demands with promptness, and in the liberal spirit of the maritime law, and he deliberately undertook to decide for himself the question between him and the master, and to compel payment of his claim as he made it, by removing and unlawfully detaining a portion of the property committed to his charge. Such an act should not be allowed to pass unnoticed in a court where violations of duty far more venial in character, when committed by seamen, are constantly punished by forfeiture of wages. But it is contended here that no wages can be declared forfeited to the owner, for the owner sustained no loss, inasmuch as the chronometer was regained by the police, and returned without expense. This defence cannot prevail according to the view which I entertain of the law applicable to such cases. I am of opinion that it is the law of the sea, as well for the quarter-deck as for the forecastle, that any unlawful appropriation of any part of the vessel, her tackle, apparel, or furniture, or of the cargo, will, in a court of admiralty, be visited with forfeiture of wages, either partial or total, according to the circumstances of the case, whether actual pecuniary loss to the owner by the act be proved or not.

I am aware that expressions can be found in books of high authority which seem to countenance the idea that forfeiture is but a compensation allowed to the owner for his loss to prevent circuity of action. I am also aware that in most of the reported cases of embezzlement, the amount of the forfeiture has been limited to a sum sufficient to compensate the owner for the loss resulting from the unlawful act. A careful examination of the cases satisfies me, however, that the view here taken is sustained by good authority, and rests upon principles well settled. No such limit as is contended for by the libellant is suggested by Lord Tenterden in his statement of the law of forfeiture. "It seems," he says, "that neglect of duty, disobedience of orders, habitual drunkenness, or any cause which will justify a master in discharging a seaman during a voyage, will also deprive him of his wages." Abb. Shipp. pt. 4, c. 3, § 4. The language used by Chancellor Kent is: "Whatever unjustifiable conduct will warrant the act of the master in discharging a seaman during the voyage, will equally deprive the seaman of his wages." 3 Kent, Comm. p. 198. In the case of Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 267, Chief Justice Marshall declares that forfeiture of salvage reward by embezzlement, and forfeiture of wages for embezzlement, rest upon the same ground. But it has never been supposed that the forfeiture of salvage was limited to the amount of loss sustained by the owners of the property; nor do I understand that forfeiture of salvage for this offence has been inflicted as a method of compensating the owners for the damage sustained by them in the loss of their property. The distinction in the law of forfeiture here involved is clearly alluded to by Lord Stowell in the case of The Baltic Merchant, Edw. Adm. p. 93, and was more distinctly announced by Judge Story in Cloutman v. Tunison [Case No. 2,907]. In the latter case, which was a case of absence without leave, the learned judge, while he finds that there was no statutory desertion, nor desertion under the maritime law, inflicts a partial forfeiture, and deems the owner entitled to withhold part of the wages due, "not merely as a compensation for the loss of the services of the second mate during the period, but something more —as a just admonition to officers having such high and responsible duties devolved upon them, and designedly departing from them." This view has been followed by the learned judge of the southern district of New York, who, in Scott v. Russell [Case No. 12,546], inflicted a partial forfeiture "by way of correction and amends," and "with a view to operate as a proper check to seamen, rather than to compensate the owner." "The forfeiture authorized by law in cases of this nature," says Judge Story, in a case of insubordination, "is not given to the owner as a mere boon, but is designed to operate primarily as a warning penalty upon seamen for misconduct." The Mentor [Id. 9,427]. It is in accordance with this view of the maritime law that forfeitures are inflicted for insolence, for petty plunder of esculents, &c.; for it cannot be supposed that in such cases the amount of pecuniary damage sustained by the owner is to be computed, and its compensation the object of the decree. Forfeiture is inflicted in these cases "for the good of the service," to adopt an expression of Judge Story in one of the cases cited. The power to withhold part of the wages is given by the maritime law, in order the better to secure faithfulness and efficient service from an ignorant, unreliable, irresponsible class of men, and this power, when exercised in a proper case, with caution, and a due regard for the weaknesses and temptations of this unfortunate class, a court of admiralty will always sustain. If such be the reason of the law of forfeiture, and such its application by the courts, I see no reason for excluding a case like the present from its operation. It comes within the letter of the law, as declared by Lord Tenterden, Chancellor Kent, and perhaps within the more restricted language of Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Blake, 1 Lush. [1 W. Rob. Adm. 74]. The act of the libellant was one calculated to put at considerable risk a valuable article. The ship was already cleared, and might well have been detained by his action. The master was put to the trouble of obtaining the assistance of the police, so that the case might well have permitted a deduction from the wages upon the ground of compensation for a "supposed loss," as has been done in some of the adjudged cases. I prefer, however, to place my decision upon the ground that the act was one of gross misconduct in a chief officer; a method of procedure calculated, if encouraged, to put every owner at the mercy of the crews to which he is obliged to intrust his property; an offence to be classed with the offences of insubordination, insolence, theft, and the like, and like them to be visited with the maritime penalty of forfeiture. I do not, however, think it necessary, in this case, to cast upon the libellant all the expenses of this proceeding in addition to the loss of his wages, and shall, therefore, allow him a portion of his demand. His claim is for $75. I allow him $25, but it must be without costs.

FLORENCE MANUF'G CO. v. BOSTON DIATITE CO.

[1 Ban. & A. 396;[1] 1 Holmes, 415; 6 O. G. 728.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Sept. 3, 1874.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—PORTABLE TOILET MIRRORS.

The claim of the patent was, "As a new article of manufacture, a hand or portable toilet mirror, constructed substantially as described, of a base-piece, B, with its handle-extension piece or stiffener, C, glass, A, and outer back and handle, D, made of any suitable composition or cement, substantially as specified." The specification described the mirror, as being constructed, by first using a base-piece of wood or other suitable material, preferably of similar contour to the glass designed to be mounted on it, and elongated at one end, with a strip of metal or other stout material at its back, to form a stiffener for the handle of the mirror: Held, that the patent was not infringed by making and selling hand-mirrors, in other respects like those described in the patent, but having no base-piece of wood or other suitable material behind the glass designed to be mounted on it, and having no extension from such base-piece into the handle.

[This was a bill in equity by the Florence Manufacturing Company against the Boston Diatite Company to enjoin infringement of letters patent No. 92,942, granted to W. U. Dudley and Lawrence W. Clark.]

E. W. Bond, for complainant.
T. W. Clarke, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This suit is founded on the letters-patent granted to Dudley & Clark, assignees of W. U. Dudley, July 27, 1869, for an improved hand-mirror. The mirror was constructed by first using a base-piece of wood or other suitable material, preferably of similar contour to the glass designed to be mounted on it, and elongated at one end, with a strip of metal or other stout material at its back to form a stiffener for the handle of the mirror. The base-piece, with its handle extension or stiffener, is laid face downward on a mould, and a composition of any suitable plastic material, in sufficient quantity to cover the back and extend beyond the edges of the base-piece and surround the handle-stiffener, is applied; then an upper mould of suitable configuration, and with its interior embellished with any ornamental devices, is pressed down on the plastic composition, thus making a smooth finished ornamental outer back and handle. The advantages claimed for his new manufacture by the patentee are, that the handle and back of the mirror are "smooth finished, and may be highly ornamental, impervious to damp, exempt from warping, with its consequent liability of fracturing the glass, and preservative of the wooden or other base-piece, which may be of a cheap and rough construction; and that by its end extension, with strengthening-strip at the back, gives not only a general stability to the whole article, but especially stiffens the handle at its junction with the back or body, where it is naturally weakest or most liable to break."

The claim is: "As a new article of manufacture, a hand or portable toilet-mirror, constructed, substantially as described, of a base-piece, B, with its handle-extension piece or stiffener, C, glass, A, and outer back and handle, D, made of any suitable composition or cement, substantially as specified."

Defendant made hand-mirrors, in other respects like those described in the Dudley patent, but having no "wooden or other base-piece of suitable material" behind the "glass designed to be mounted on it," and having no extension from such base-piece into the handle. In the smallest and weakest part of the handle two nails of iron were embedded in the plastic compositions, which formed the entire frame and handle of the mirror; but they did not extend behind the mirror, or form any base or support for the glass or the frame behind or around it.

This is clearly no infringement of the Dudley patent. The practice of moulding a plastic material around a skeleton, or partial skeleton, of a material of greater rigidity is as old as any thing known in the arts, was practised by the Assyrians in moulding bronze, and has been in common use to the present day. Hand-mirrors date back to an equally remote antiquity. Hand-mirror frames, moulded from a plastic composition of papier-maché and other plastic compounds, were well known before the date of Dudley's invention. Frames for pictures and photographs of a plastic composition of shellac and other substances, moulded and ornamented, were well known and described in Merrick's patent of Dec. 16, 1868, for his new composition of matter. The patentable matter in Dudley's patent must, therefore, be found, if found anywhere, in his new composition of a base-piece, with its extension or handle stiffener, with the other elements in his combination. Without such combination there would have been no new article of manufacture. It is not every new article put upon sale in the market which is a new article of manufacture. If one were to substitute a Claude Lorraine glass for the plate with its stiffened back in the Dudley hand-mirror, it would be a new article of commerce, but not a new manufacture.

In the case of Clark v. Scott [Case No. 2,833], Judge Blatchford held that hand-mirrors made of cement, applied in a plastic state and afterward hardened, and having embedded in the cement, and concealed from view, two flat wires or strengtheners, made of metal, which run from the body of the mirror part through the neck and into the handle, and which serve to strengthen and stiffen the article, particularly at the junction of the handle with the body, were infringements of the Dudley patent. But this was upon the ground that he found in those mirrors the base-piece, the handle-extension piece or stiffener, the glass and outer back and handle of cement. He says, "The defendant's wires act as a base-piece or support for the glass, and the wires extend through the neck and in the handle as stiffeners." But in defendant's mirrors there is no base-piece or support for the glass, and no substitute or equivalent therefor. He makes a hand-mirror with a moulded frame of plastic compound, and he re-enforces or strengthens the handle with metallic rods. There was nothing new in this before the date of the Dudley patent. Bill dismissed.

[Holmes, 235.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug., 1873.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—CITIZENSHIP—ACT OF MARCH 2, 1867.

Under the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558), a suit brought in a state court may be removed to the United States circuit court, by a defendant who is a citizen of a different state from that in which the suit is brought, although there are other defendants who are citizens of the state in which it is brought.

[See note at end of case.]

Motion by the plaintiff to dismiss a suit at law for want of jurisdiction. The plaintiff was a citizen of Massachusetts; of the defendants, one was a citizen of Massachusetts, one of Connecticut, and one of New York. The suit [see Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Singer Manuf'g Co., Cases Nos. 4,884 and 4,885] was originally brought in the supreme judicial court of the state of Massachusetts, whence it was removed and entered in this court by the foreign defendants, under the act of congress of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558), which provided for removal of suits "in which there is controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit was brought and a citizen of another state." All the formal proceedings for the removal and entry in this court, required by the act of 1867, had been duly taken, and the only question on this motion was, whether or not that act applied to a suit in which a citizen of the state in which the suit was brought was defendant together with non-resident defendants. Petitions of the foreign defendants for removal of the suit had previously been denied by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts.

E. R. Hoar and A. L. Soule, for plaintiff.

The case has not been properly removed from the state court.

I. The act of March 2, 1867, applies only to cases in which all the plaintiffs are citizens of one state, and all the defendants are citizens of some other state or states. The act provides for removal of a suit "in which there is controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state." Under the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 73), § 12, the language of which is: "If a suit be commenced in any state court * * * by a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought, against a citizen of another state," &c., it has been uniformly held, that, to authorize a removal, all the defendants must be citizens of some other state or states, than that in which the suit is brought. And where there are several defendants, all must join in the petition. Smith v. Rines [Case No. 13,100]; Beardsley v. Torrey [supra]. The same doctrine as to removal has been laid down under the act of 1867. Cooke v. State Nat. Bank (Sup. Ct. N. Y.) 1 Lans. 494; Peters v. Peters, 41 Ga. 242; Ex parte Andrews, 40 Ala. 639; Bliss v. II. If the act is to be construed as applying to a case in which one of the defendants and the plaintiff, are citizens of the state in which the suit is pending, it is submitted that the act is unconstitutional. It provides for the removal of the whole cause, with all the parties. But by the constitution (article 3, § 2) the judicial power extends only, in this behalf, to controversies between citizens of different states. The construction claimed by the defendants presupposes a jurisdiction in the United States courts, of controversies between citizens of the same state; and a power in those courts to oust the state court of jurisdiction in controversies between citizens of the state, at the request of citizens of some other state, even against the will of both plaintiff and defendant, citizens of the state in whose court the suit is instituted. The construction of the judiciary act (section 11) by the United States supreme court, is the construction of language substantially the same.

B. R. Curtis, J. G. Abbott and Elias Merwin, for defendants.

The suit was brought by a citizen of this state; the petitioning defendants were citizens of another state; the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeded five hundred dollars; and the necessary petitions, affidavits, and bonds were made and filed before the trial. All the requirements of the United States statute were thus apparently fulfilled.

I. The United States statute of 1867 in question was designed to, and does in terms, clearly provide for the removal of suits, for cause, upon the petition of a foreign defendant, although there are other parties defendant who are citizens of the state where the suit is brought. This is apparent from the language of the act itself, and from the previous legislation upon this subject. The judiciary act [of 1789 (1 Stat. 73)], c. 20, § 12, confined the right of removal to suits commenced "by a citizen of the state in which the suit was brought against a citizen of another state;" and also required that the petition for removal should be filed by the defendant at the time of entering his appearance. This provision applied only to a suit between a citizen of the state in which the suit was brought and a citizen of some other state, and did not apply to a case where a resident defendant was also a party. The act of 1866, c. 288 (14 Stat. 306), for the first time, made provision for the removal of a suit to the federal court by a non-resident defendant, although a citizen of the state where the suit was brought was also a defendant therein. That act made two changes in the previous law: 1. It allowed the cause to be removed to the federal court so far as the non-resident defendant was concerned, "if the suit was one in which there could be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerned him, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause," but left the suit in the state court, so far as it related to the resident defendant; and, 2. It allowed the petition for removal to be filed at any time before the trial, instead of requiring it to be filed with the defendant's first appearance, as in the judiciary act. To provide what was supposed to be a more impartial tribunal for non-resident defendants in every case, congress passed the act of March 2, 1867, to supply the obvious deficiencies of the statute of 1866, and to allow a non-resident to remove the cause to the federal tribunal, whenever he had reason to believe that, from prejudice or local influence, he would be unable to obtain justice in the state courts, although there were other co-defendants who were residents of the state in which the suit was brought. The statute of 1867 cannot be confined to those cases where non-residents are the only defendants, without violating its language and intent.

(a) It is an act "to amend the act of 1866." The purpose of the act of 1866 was to provide for a removal of suits in behalf of non-resident defendants in those cases in which resident parties were also defendants. The obvious purpose of the statute of 1867 was to add another case to those which might be removed by non-resident defendants, although resident parties were also defendants. Neither the act of 1866, nor the judiciary act (section 12), is repealed by the statute of 1867. All subsist, and each provides for a distinct case.

(b) Under statute of 1789 (§ 12), non-residents (if the only parties defendant), can now remove a case to the federal tribunal, under the provisions of that act, without affidavit, and without the cause of local prejudice. If the statute of 1867 is also to be confined to the same class of cases (where all the defendants are non-residents), then, as it requires cause and affidavit for removal, it is a restriction upon the right of removal as originally given by the statute of 1789,—a result which is obviously absurd.

(c) The peculiar phraseology of the statute of 1867 fairly admits of no other interpretation. The language is, that "when a suit is now pending, or may hereafter be brought, in any state court, in which there is controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state," &c. The language of the statute of 1789 was, "if a suit be commenced by a citizen of the state, &c., against a citizen of another state," &c.; but here the striking phrase is, "where a suit is now pending . . . in which there is controversy between a citizen," &c. It is enough, however the parties may be distributed as to citizenship, if in the suit there is controversy between a citizen of one state, as plaintiff, and a citizen of another, as one of the defendants. The statute does not limit the right of removal to the case where a citizen of one state, as plaintiff, and the citizen of another state, as defendant, are the only parties to the controversy. St. 1868, c. 255, § 2 (15 Stat. 226); Johnson v. Monell [Case No. 7,399]; Fields v. Lamb [Id. 4,775]; Sands v. Smith [Id. 12,305]. The decision of Blatchford, J., in Bixby v. Couse [Id. 1,451], and other similar decisions, proceed upon the mistaken assumption that the statutes of 1789 and 1867 are substantially alike, overlooking the radical change which the latter statute makes, and was intended to make.

II. The constitution provides (part 1, art. 3, § 2) that "the judicial power shall extend to . . . controversies between citizens of different states." The constitutional right of the non-resident to have his controversy determined in the forum contemplated by the constitution cannot be defeated by the fact that others not entitled to go into that forum have been joined with him. Fisk v. Union P. R. [Id. 4,828]; Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738; Railway Co. v. Whitton's Adm'r, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 270; Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 282.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The second section of the third article of the constitution extends the judicial power of the United States to controversies "between citizens of different states." There are no words in this grant of judicial power restricting it to controversies in which citizens of different states are the sole parties. Nor are there to be found any words of limitation which would deprive congress of the power to confer upon the federal courts jurisdiction over a judicial controversy between citizens of different states arising in a suit or case, although all the persons constituting the party on one side of the case were not citizens of states different from the states of which the persons composing the other party to the suit or case were citizens. The judicial controversy contemplated by the constitution is not limited to one in which citizens of different states are exclusively interested. The grant of jurisdiction is not over "suits" or "cases" between citizens of different states, but over "controversies" between citizens of different states. Whenever, therefore, a case or suit is pending, in which there is involved a judicial "controversy" between citizens of different states, the case is one coming clearly within the terms of the constitutional grant of judicial power, although in the same case there may be a controversy between citizens of the same state. In all the debates in the convention which framed the constitution, it seems to have been admitted by all the members of the convention that the jurisdiction of the national judiciary should embrace every subject which might endanger the national peace, by reason of the relations of the respective states to each other, and of their citizens to the citizens of other states. Before the conclusions of the convention had been reduced to the form of a written constitution, a resolution had unanimously passed the convention, "That the jurisdiction of the national judiciary shall extend" (among other things) to "questions which involve the national peace or harmony."

"Nothing," says Mr. Justice Story, "can conduce more to general harmony and confidence among all the states than a consciousness that such controversies are not exclusively to be decided by state tribunals, but may, at the election of the party, be brought before the national tribunals." "And if justice should be as fairly and as firmly administered in the former as in the latter, still the mischiefs would be most serious, if the public opinion did not indulge such a belief. Justice, in cases of this sort, should not only be above all reproach, but above all suspicion. The sources of state irritations and state jealousies are sufficiently numerous, without leaving open one so copious and constant as the belief or dread of wrong in the administration of state justice." "Probably (he subsequently remarks) no part of the judicial power of the Union has been of more practical benefit, or has given more lasting satisfaction to the people. There is not a single state which has not at some time felt the influence of this conservative power; and the general harmony which exists between the state courts and the national courts in the concurrent exercise of their jurisdiction in cases between citizens of different states, demonstrates the utility, as well as the safety, of the power. Indeed, it is not improbable that the existence of the power has operated as a silent but irresistible check to undue state legislation, at the same time that it has cherished a mutual respect and confidence between the state and national courts, as honorable as it has been beneficent."

This clause in the constitution was intended to protect citizens of different states from danger of injustice in the state courts, through local influence or prejudice. An interpretation is contended for, which would take from congress forever the power to legislate so as to bring under its protection citizens of other states, whenever the nature of the controversy required or permitted the joinder with them, as parties, of persons who were citizens of the same states as the person or persons composing the opposite party. Such a construction would manifestly impair the end which the clause was designed to attain. The basis of the Union is in the constitutional provision that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states." It is essential to the upholding of any government that it should possess the power and the means of executing its own provisions by its own authority. To secure the inviolable maintenance of that equality of privileges and immunities guaranteed by the constitution to the citizens of the Union, it may be necessary, whenever a controversy arises in which one state, or its citizens, are opposed to another state, or its citizens, (whether the controversy be, or be not, exclusively confined to different states or the citizens of different states), to commit it to that tribunal, which, having no local attachments, will be likely to be impartial between the different states and their citizens, and which, owing its official existence to the Union, will never be likely to feel any bias inauspicious to the principles on which it is founded. How far congress will exercise this power of legislation must depend upon the state of the country, and such considerations as to the necessity for such legislation as have heretofore, or may hereafter, affect its action. Manifestly, thus far, congress has never deemed it necessary to exhaust the legislative power conferred upon it by this clause of the constitution. The twelfth section of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 79) authorized a removal to the circuit court of the United States, by a defendant, of any suit commenced in a state court against an alien, or by a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought against a citizen of another state, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars. Under this section, it was held, that a cause could not be removed except upon the petition of all the defendants; that to bring the case within the act, all the plaintiffs must be citizens of the state in which suit is brought, and all the defendants must be citizens of some other state or states. Smith v. Rines [Case No. 13,100]; Hubbard v. Northern R. Co. [Id. 6,818]; Beardsley v. Torrey [Id. 1,190]; Ward v. Arredondo [Id. 17,148]; Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 267. These cases all turned on the construction of the words used in the eleventh and twelfth sections of the judiciary act, not on the construction of the clause of the constitution conferring judicial power. As the eleventh section of the act of congress, in prescribing the jurisdiction of the circuit court, had limited it to cases "where the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state;" and the twelfth section had limited the right of removal to the circuit court to a "defendant in any suit commenced in a state court against an alien, or by a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought against a citizen of another state;" the courts held these expressions to mean that each distinct interest should be represented by persons all of whom are entitled to sue, or be sued, in the federal courts. In the language of Chief Justice Marshall: "That is, where the interest is joint, each of the persons concerned in that interest must be competent to sue, or liable to be sued, in those courts."

The modification of the jurisdiction conferred by the eleventh section, subsequently made by the act of February 28, 1839, it is not necessary here to consider. Then followed the act of July 27, 1866 (14 Stat. 306), entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from the state courts." This act applies to suits "commenced in a state court against an alien, or by a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought against a citizen of another state." It contemplates suits in which the plaintiff is a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought, and in which there are several defendants, some residing in the state in which the suit is brought, and some, either aliens or citizens of a state other than that in which the suit is brought. "If the suit, so far as relates to the alien defendant, or to the defendant who is the citizen of a state other than that in which the suit is brought, is, or has been, instituted or prosecuted for the purpose of restraining or enjoining him, or if the suit is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy, so far as it concerns him, without the presence of the other defendants as parties in the cause, then, and in every such case, the alien defendant, or the defendant who is a citizen of the state other than that in which the suit is brought, may, at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause, file a petition for the removal of the cause, as against him, into the next circuit court of the United States to be held in the district where the suit is pending." Upon the filing of this petition and giving the security required by the statute, the state court is to proceed no further in the cause as against the defendant so applying for its removal. But "such removal of the cause, as against the defendant petitioning therefor, into the United States court, shall not be deemed to prejudice or take away the right of the plaintiff to proceed at the same time with the suit in the state court, as against the other defendants, if he shall desire so to do." Before the passage of this act, no removal could be made in the causes to which the act applies, because all the defendants were not entitled to petition for removal, and the courts had decided that unless it was removable as to all, it was not so as to any. After the passage of the act of 1866, in certain cases the alien, or non-resident, defendant could have the cause removed as to him, while it was allowed to proceed in the state courts as to the resident defendants. But, as in the judiciary act, the right of removal was limited to the alien, or non-resident, defendant, and does not extend to the plaintiff.

Next followed the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558), upon which the right of removal in this case is claimed. This act provides "that where a suit is now pending, or may hereafter be brought, in any state court in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state, . . . such citizen of another state, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, if he will make and file in such state courts an affidavit stating that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that from prejudice or local influence he will not be able to obtain justice in such state court," may have the cause removed to the circuit court of the United States. This act purports to be an amendment of the act of July 27, 1866. It differs from all previous legislation of congress upon the subject of removal of suits in this respect; the previous acts referred to "suits between citizens of different states," which expression the courts had construed to be limited to suits in which all the persons constituting the party plaintiff were citizens of other states than those of which all the persons composing the party defendant were citizens, as we have before seen. The act of 1867, for the first time, uses the broader expression of the constitution, and refers to suits "in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state." It differs also from the prior acts in relation to removal, by using, as to the plaintiff, the language of the eleventh section of the judiciary act, instead of the language of the twelfth. The plaintiff may or may not be a resident of the state in which the suit is brought, and the right of removal of the suit is given to the non-resident citizen, be he plaintiff or defendant. The change of the form of expression from suits between citizens of different states to suits in which there is a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state, was evidently made advisedly, and for the purpose of extending and enlarging the right of removal, not of limiting it, as would be the effect if the construction contended for were admitted. The only conditions requisite to the right of removal under the act of 1867 are: that in the suit pending in the state court there shall be a controversy between a citizen of the state in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another state; that the matter in dispute shall exceed the sum of five hundred dollars, exclusive of costs; that the citizen of such other state, either plaintiff or defendant, shall make and file the affidavit required by the statute; and that he shall give the requisite surety for appearing and entering the case in the circuit court at the proper time, with the copies of the papers in the case. Johnson v. Monell [Case No. 7,399], opinion of Mr. Justice Miller; Sands v. Smith [Id. 12,305]. These requisites to the right of removal all exist, and have been complied with in the present case. The motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction is therefore overruled.

Case to stand for trial.

[NOTE. The petition of the foreign defendants for removal of the suit to the circuit court of the United States was denied by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, to which decision an exception was taken, and the case taken to the supreme court of the United States on writ of error. In the meantime, it seems, the cause had been removed to the circuit court by the foreign defendants, and was heard August 18, 1873, as given above, on motion by plaintiff to dismiss for want of jurisdiction. Argument was had on the writ of error to the state court in the supreme court of the United States in January, 1874, and a decision rendered in March (Mr. Justice Clifford delivering the opinion), in which it was held that "either the non-resident plaintiff or non-resident defendant may remove the cause under the last-named act, provided all the plaintiffs or all the defendants join in the petition, and all the party petitioning are non-residents, as required under the judiciary act, but it is a great mistake to suppose that any such right is conferred by that act where one or more of the plaintiffs or one or more of the petitioning defendants are citizens of the state in which the suit is pending, as the act is destitute of any language which can be properly construed to confer any such right unless all the plaintiffs or all the defendants are non-residents and join in the petition." The judgment of the state court denying the petition for removal was affirmed. Case of Sewing Machine Companies, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 553.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 29, 1870.

EQUITY JURISDICTION — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACTS — REMEDY AT LAW—PROPER AND NECESSARY PARTIES.

1. Where an association of companies licensed another company under letters patent for a specific royalty, with a proviso that if the fee were not paid the license might be revoked, but that if a license at a lower rate should be granted to any other party, the fee should be correspondingly reduced: Held, that the rights of the parties to such an agreement were purely legal rights.

2. If the case justifying the reduction of the license fee should arise, the licensee would be no longer bound to pay the original fee, and so long as he paid or tendered the reduced fee the parties granting the license could not revoke it. Any attempt to do so would be idle and nugatory.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus and opinion are from 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 329, and the statement is from 8 Blatchf. 113.]

3. Upon the payment or tender of payment of the reduced rent, the licensee's continued right to use the licensed inventions becomes perfect and unimpeachable.

4. Courts of equity lend their aid to parties standing in a trust relation, for the construction of wills, trust deeds, etc., in aid of executors and trustees, but no such jurisdiction exists, entitling parties to ordinary contracts to ask an interpretation of such contracts.

[Cited in Cookingham v. Ferguson, Case No. 3,182; Baker Manuf'g Co. v. Washburn & Moen Manuf'g Co., 18 Fed. 174.]

5. The apprehension that the licenser will deny the rights of the licensee to use the licensed invention, or that the former threatens to give notice of his election to terminate or revoke the license, does not justify the latter in an application to a court of equity for an injunction.

6. One holding title upon condition, must perform the condition at his peril, and, on a dispute arising on a question as to whether the conditions are performed, or even as to the true import of the stipulations, he cannot come into a court of equity to have those questions settled in order to save him from the consequences of a mistake in fact or of a misconstruction of the contract.

7. Where the objection for want of proper parties defendant was not made by demurrer, plea, or answer, it should be held too late if the rights and interests of the defendant are so far several and distinct from the parties not joined, that a decree can be made granting the relief sought without affecting the rights of the absent parties.

8. Where, however, a final decision can not be made between the parties litigating without directly affecting and prejudicing the rights of others not made parties, the court can not proceed.

9. The objection, in such a case, can be taken at the hearing, and it may, and ought to be raised and acted upon by the court itself.

10. Where the case can not be decided between the parties to the record, it will not avail to suggest that the absentees are beyond the jurisdiction of the circuit court or have such residence or citizenship that to make them parties would defeat that jurisdiction.

11. Where the suit was brought by a licensee against one only of three companies who were joint owners of the patents and joint grantors of the license, the purpose of the suit being to obtain a reduction of the license fee: Held, that the rights of the absent companies inseparably connected with the right of the defendant were the very subject in controversy, and would be directly affected by the result of the suit.

[Cited in Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Singer Manuf'g Co., Case No. 4,885; Brigham v. Luddington, Id. 1,874; Alexander v. Horner, Id. 169; Land Co. of New Mexico v. Elkins, 20 Fed. 546.]

12. The case is not like many actions brought against one of two or more parties jointly liable to pay money, in which the whole may be collected from either.

13. It is not possible to decree as to the present defendant, that an abatement of a possible one-third of the license fee should be made without prejudice to the rights of the absent companies, because the interest and property of the three corporations is essentially joint, and the court can not, in this action, settle the respective shares of the respective corporations.

14. A decision, not upon pleadings and proofs, but a decision or opinion on a motion for an injunction, can hardly be claimed to settle a question of identity between two machines, though it may have force as an admission of the complainant that there was an infringement.

In equity. The complainant was a corporation, created under or by virtue of the laws of the state of Massachusetts, and doing business in that state. The defendant was a corporation, created under or by virtue of the laws of the state of New York, and doing business in that state. On the 20th of February, 1868, the Singer Manufacturing Company, the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company (a corporation created by or under the laws of the state of Connecticut), and the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company (a corporation created by or under the laws of the state of Massachusetts), were the owners of certain letters patent for inventions in sewing machines, or parts thereof, or improvements therein, and particularly numbers 346 and 414, granted to Allen B. Wilson, dated respectively January 22d, 1856, and December 9th, 1856, relating to the apparatus for feeding to the needle the material to be sewed. Being such owners, the three corporations last mentioned, on the 20th of February, 1868, entered into an agreement with the complainant by which they, according to their respective rights and powers, severally authorized and licensed the complainant to manufacture, use, and vend for use, the inventions above mentioned, including a large number of patents which were described by their numbers, dates, names of patentee, &c., so far as the same, or any of them, were contained in certain specimen sewing machines, deposited, &c., marked, &c., and in the form in which said inventions were embodied in said specimen machines, and not otherwise, except that one of such machines might also be made with a drop-feed. The agreement declared that the patent rent should be five dollars for each and every sewing machine which should be made or sold under the license by said licensee while the license remained in force, and that the prompt payment thereof should in all cases be adequately secured by said licensee. Besides various other stipulations, not material to be stated, the licensee (the complainant) agreed to render to the licensers, or to such persons as they should appoint to receive the same, quarter-yearly, from January 1st, 1868, a true and full account of all sewing machines made or sold by it, verified by oath, and, on or before the 10th of July, October, January, and April, of each successive year, to pay said licensers, or their duly authorized receiver, the said patent rent for each and every sewing machine made or sold by said licensee during the last preceding quarter year, which should not have been before paid for; but it was further provided, that, for each machine actually exported for use in foreign countries, and not returned to the United States, the patent rent to be paid to the licensers should be two dollars, instead of five dollars, for each machine. It was further agreed as follows: "No other license for a drop-feed shuttle sewing machine, using two threads, is to be granted by said licensers, under the before mentioned patents, at a less patent rent per machine, without a corresponding reduction in the patent rent hereby reserved;" and, also, that said licensers "reserve the right, at their option, to terminate this license, upon thirty days' written notice thereof, for breach of any of the agreements herein contained on the part of said licensee." There were other provisions and stipulations in the agreement, not material to the right understanding of the matters in controversy.

The bill of complaint alleged the making of this agreement, and the payment by the complainant of the patent fee stipulated by the terms of the agreement down to the 1st day of October, 1868, and that, on that day, the licensers, in consideration of $20,000, authorized and licensed the Davis Sewing Machine Company, a corporation or firm doing business at Watertown, in the state of New York, to manufacture, use and vend for use the invention described in letters patent issued to one Johnson, upon sewing machines, not exceeding fifty thousand in number, of the kind and like the one deposited with the licensers, and marked "Davis Sewing Machine," and no others, to be built at their shop in Watertown aforesaid; and that the licensers agreed with the last named company that they would not, while the said agreement remained in force, and was performed on the part of the Davis Sewing Machine Company, make any further claim of license fees from that company, under any other patents which they then owned or controlled, or might thereafter own or control, for making or selling sewing machines like said specimen Davis machine. The bill further stated that the said Davis machine was "a drop-feed shuttle sewing machine, using two threads;" that the licensers had, before the 1st of October, 1868, applied for and obtained, from the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York, a decree enjoining the Davis Sewing Machine Company against making or selling sewing machines substantially like the said specimen Davis machine, because the same infringed said letters patent numbered 346 and 414; that the licensers, intending to defraud the complainant, by keeping it in ignorance of the terms of the said license, concealed the same and the terms thereof from the complainant, who could not obtain such information till November, 1869; that the complainant had paid to the licensers, for machines made and sold since October 1st, 1868, at the said rate of $5 for each machine not exported, and $2 for each machine exported, amounting to $63,912, as patent rent on 13,211 machines, whereas, in truth, the licensers were entitled, under the said license to the complainant, as modified by the granting of the aforesaid license to the Davis Sewing Machine Company, to the sum of forty cents only on each of said machines, amounting to $5,284.40; that, in November, 1869, the complainant paid to the receiver appointed by the licensers, the sum of $19,758, which was claimed by said receiver and said licensers to be due on machines made and sold prior to the 30th of September, 1869; that the same was paid by the complainant, believing and protesting that the same was not due or owing, but because the licensers, through their receiver, threatened that, unless the same was paid, they would give notice of the termination of said license, and publish abroad the statement that the same was terminated, and the rights of the complainant thereunder forfeited; that the complainant was, at the time of making the said agreement, and still was, engaged in the business of manufacturing sewing machines for sale, and selling them in various parts of the United States, and in Europe, employing a large capital therein, invested partly in land and buildings, and partly in stock, tools, and machinery; that the requirements of the business of selling sewing machines were such, that the retailers of said machines were obliged to invest a large amount of capital in machines and in the notes and obligations of purchasers; and that any interruption of the sale of machines manufactured by the complainant, arising from any fear on the part of the public that said machines were made or sold in violation or infringement of the rights secured to any other parties by letters patent, would be productive of great and ruinous loss and injury, not only to the complainant, but to those persons who had purchased machines from the complainant to sell to others, of which persons the number was very large. The bill prayed a discovery, and that the defendant be ordered to reduce the patent rent reserved in the license to the complainant, to the sum of forty cents for each machine made or sold under said license after the 1st of October, 1868, and that the defendant account for and pay to the complainant the sums received by the licensers under said license, to which they were not entitled, and that the licensers might not claim or demand any other or further sums than at the rate of forty cents, and that an injunction issue to restrain the defendant, its servants, agents, and confederates, and each of them, from giving notice during the pendency of the suit, of their option, purpose, or election to terminate said license, and from attempting to collect license fees, or patent fees, from the complainant. The bill stated, as a reason for not making the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company, and the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company, parties, that those corporations were not citizens of, or created by, the laws of the state of New York, and that this court, sitting for the southern district of New York, had no jurisdiction over them, or either of them.

The defendant, by answer, denied many of the allegations of the bill, and especially that the said specimen Davis sewing machine was "a drop feed shuttle sewing machine, using two threads." It averred, that the licensers had never, since the date of the complainant's license, licensed any drop-feed shuttle sewing machine at a less patent rent than that reserved by the terms of the complainant's license, and that, although the said Davis Company made and sold sewing machines like said specimen Davis machine, from the 1st of October, 1868, till the 1st of December, 1869. such manufacture and sale were of no detriment or injury to the complainant's business; that the sum of $20,000, paid by the Davis Company, amounted to more than $5 for each domestic, and $2 for each exported machine, on all machines it made during the continuance of the license to it; that, if the Davis machine should be held to be a "drop-feed shuttle sewing machine," within the meaning of that phrase, as used in the complainant's license, the granting thereof was a mistake, from the effect of which the defendant was entitled to equitable relief at the bar of this court; that the licensers' counsel advised them that such license to the Davis Company was so framed that it did not include or license a drop-feed machine, and they believed such advice to be correct, and they then believed and still believed and averred that such specimen machine did not contain the drop-feed, or any feed substantially like it, or what was known or usually called the "drop-feed;" that the licensers considered, in fixing the price, only what was a fair consideration for the use of the needle-feed, in a needle feed machine under the Johnson patent, not at any time supposing or having the least idea that the Davis machine was a drop-feed machine or would ever be so regarded; that, at the time the license was given to the Davis Company, the term "drop-feed," as applied to sewing machines, was well understood by all persons engaged in the manufacture and sale of sewing machines; and that the feeding device contained in the specimen Davis machine was not, as understood by persons engaged in the trade and by all the parties to the said Davis license, a drop feed. The answer admitted that, prior to the 1st of October, 1868, the defendant and its associate licensers obtained an order for an injunction under the reissued patents for a feeding apparatus, Nos. 346 and 414, and stated that, on the 1st of December, 1869, the licensers procured the cancellation of the Davis license. "having heard that it was obnoxious to the complainant," and the defendant and the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company made a contract with the Davis Company to make and sell to the last named company sewing machines like the specimen Davis machine; that this was done, not because they believed the Davis machine contained a drop-feed, but for the purpose of avoiding any possible conflict on the subject, or ground of complaint on the part of the complainant; and that the profit on each machine to be so made and sold to the Davis Company, after deducting a fair manufacturer's profit, would exceed, upon each machine, the sums of five dollars and two dollars, respectively, payable according to the terms of the complainant's license, and was more advantageous to the defendant than to permit the Davis Company to work under a license reserving those sums as license fees. There were other denials and other averments in the answer, but what is above stated exhibits the issues of fact chiefly discussed. There were a denial that the complainant was entitled to the specific relief sought, and the general denial that the complainant was entitled to an injunction or an account, or to any relief.

The proofs taken related chiefly to the question whether the feeding apparatus in the specimen machine mentioned in the license to the Davis Company was a "drop-feed," to the circumstances and the belief under which that license was given, and to the questions whether the term "drop-feed," as known and used among those who manufactured, sold or used sewing machines at the time the license to the complainant was given, had acquired a meaning which would include the feeding apparatus contained in such specimen machine, and whether that feeding apparatus was a needle-feed in fact or in name, as distinguished from a drop-feed. There was great conflict of evidence on the question, whether, in the specimen machine, the needle performed, in whole or in part, the work of feeding, or moving the material sewed to the place required to receive the successive stitches, the other part of the apparatus, called the "helper," being merely auxiliary thereto, or whether the helper, in truth, performed the work of feeding. The machines produced as examples of the drop-feed as used by the complainant, and various others conceded to be drop feed machines, contained a serrated horizontal bar, lying beneath the plate of the machine, on which the material to be sewed was placed, and a smooth pressure-foot was placed above, which rested upon such material. The pressure thereon was a spring, which yielded as occasion required. In the operation of the machine, as the stitches were successively made, and as the needle was completely withdrawn from the material, the serrated surface of the bar was raised through a slit or opening in the plate on which the material was placed, and its roughened or serrated surface was forced against the under surface of the material, held down by the pressure-foot, and then the bar was moved forward the distance necessary for the length of the stitch, carrying with it the material, whereupon, as the needle descended, the bar dropped below the plate. and was drawn backward, to be in readiness to rise again as the next stitch was made and the needle withdrawn, and again to press the material against the pressure-foot and move it forward as before. In the specimen Davis machine, the feeding of the material was effected while the needle was in the material and in the act of withdrawal therefrom, the needle itself, as it was withdrawn, moving in the direction in which it was desired to move the material before the needle should descend again to make the next stitch. A perpendicular bar, called a "helper," was placed and adjusted nearly parallel with the motion of the needle, so that its lower end pressed upon the cloth, holding it firmly down upon the plate while the needle descended, and moving forward, as the needle ascended, in the same direction as the motion forward of the needle in its ascent, such forward motion of the needle and of this perpendicular bar being the same. The forward movement of the material being accomplished. the lower end of this perpendicular bar was raised and moved to its former position, very near to, and, it being grooved, partly surrounding the needle, and pressed the material upon the plate, while the needle again descended to make another stitch, and then the ascending needle and the perpendicular bar moved forward again, and so on, successively, the motion forward of the lower end of the bar corresponding, in time and distance, with the forward movement of the ascending needle, and the bar, at the end of each forward movement, rising and returning to its former position near to and partially surrounding the needle. In the testimony, there was much conflict on the question, whether, in such Davis machine, the needle in fact moved the material, the perpendicular bar acting only as an auxiliary or helper, by keeping the material smooth and even during the process, or whether both the needle and the helper assisted in the moving of such material, or whether the helper was the chief and only useful instrument in the movement of the material, its motion being made to coincide with the forward motion of the needle while being withdrawn.

Ebenezer R. Hoar and Augustus L. Soule, for complainant.

Edwin W. Stoughton, George Gifford, and Solomon J. Gordon, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. Three principal questions were discussed on the hearing of this cause: (1) Whether a case is made entitling the complainant to any relief in this court, as a court of equity? (2) Whether the relief sought can be granted in a suit to which the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company and the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company are not parties? (3) Whether the proofs establish that the defendant and the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company and the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company have given such a license to another company, as entitles the complainant to a reduction in the patent rent or license fee originally stipulated to be paid in the agreement mentioned in the bill of complaint?

(1) Upon the first of these questions, I find great difficulty in sustaining the present suit. The rights of the parties to the agreement by which the license was granted to the complainant are, under that agreement, purely legal rights; and what those rights were, when the suit was brought, was dependent, as a matter of strict law, upon the facts, and did not result from any equities which existed apart from or beyond those purely legal principles.

By the express terms of the agreement, if the parties granting the license to the complainant have licensed to any other party the use of a drop-feed shuttle sewing machine using two threads, at a less patent rent or license fee than the rent or fee reserved in the complainant's license, then such last-named rent or fee is reduced; and the complainant is no longer bound to pay the rate originally stipulated. So long as the complainant pays or tenders the reduced fee, the parties granting the license cannot revoke it. Any attempt to do so will be idle and nugatory.

Viewed as an action to obtain a decree establishing in the complainant's favor the future right to enjoy the license on paying the reduced rent or fee, the complainant has no need of the assistance of any court. The rule that a court of equity will not interfere when there is full, complete, and adequate remedy at law need not be invoked. Nor is it essential to rely upon the 16th section of the act of congress of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 82), which declares, that "suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, in any case where plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law;" for, here, the complainant has the remedy in its own hands, and can assert, exercise and maintain its rights without invoking the aid of a court of law or equity. If the fact be as alleged in the bill, that the said parties granting the license to the complainant have granted the specified license to another at a less rate, it is only necessary for the complainant to pay, or, if payment be not accepted, to tender, the reduced rent, and the complainant's continued right to use the licensed inventions is perfect and unimpeachable.

On what ground, then, can the power of this court be invoked for the protection of the complainant in the future use of these inventions?

The complainant has no need of a discovery. The bill of complainant avers, that it has already discovered the facts upon which the right to use the invention at a reduced rent or fee arose. The instrument alleged to work that result is annexed to the bill, and the whole endeavor in this suit has been to prove that such instrument, by its true meaning and effect, is a license to a third party to use the specified invention, and thereby to reduce the complainant's license fee.

There is no doctrine akin to the principles upon which bills quia timet are sustained, that will avail the complainant. Nothing is to be apprehended from the lapse of time or the loss of evidence. That is not suggested in the bill. The complainant can bring the matter to an immediate test by standing on the agreement, and insisting upon and acting according to the legal rights secured thereby, and the written license granted to the third party is known and susceptible of proof at any time.

The complainant cannot be disturbed in the use of the inventions; for, if the fact be as alleged, the other parties cannot restrain such use, or collect more than the reduced rent or license fee. The complainant's defence is perfect without resort to a court of equity.

Nor has the complainant a right to come into this court to obtain a construction of the contract made with the defendant, and the companies associated with the defendant. Courts of equity do, it is true, lend their aid to parties standing in a trust relation, and entitled, by reason thereof, to the peculiar protection of a court of equity, having special jurisdiction of trusts, as, for example, for the construction of wills, trust deeds, &c., in aid of executors and trustees charged with trusts; but no such jurisdiction exists entitling parties to ordinary contracts to ask an interpretation of such contracts. Indeed, the complainant here does not claim, or even admit, that the agreement is of doubtful meaning, but proceeds upon the fact that the defendant and the other associated companies deny that they have given any license to use the invention mentioned in the agreement; and the appeal to this court is, that the court decide whether the act mentioned in the agreement has been done. Neither party denies, that, if a license has been granted at a less rate than was stipulated in the agreement with the complainant, the right of the latter to a reduction is clear, according to the terms of such agreement. In saying this, I do not overlook the allegation by the defendant, that, if the license granted to a third party is in fact a license to use the specified invention, it was a mistake as to which the defendant is entitled to relief. I am now dealing with the case of the complainant. The allegation of such mistake, even if made before the bill was filed, did not warrant the complainant in coming into court to obtain a decree in negation of any such allegation. It will be enough for the complainant to assert and exercise its legal rights, and, if the defendant and the other companies attempt to restrain the continued use of the inventions licensed, put them to their proof of mistake, and, as I think, to the proof of a very different case from that which, in that respect, is set up in this answer, and proved by the testimony.

The allegations in the bill would seem designed to assimilate the case to suits brought to remove a cloud upon title, by its statements, that any fear on the part of the public that said machines were made or sold in violation of the right secured to any other parties by letters patent, would be productive of great and ruinous loss and injury to the complainant, and also to those persons who had purchased machines from the complainant to sell again. What has already been said seems to me sufficient to meet this view; and I am not aware that an apprehension that the defendant will deny the right of the complainant to use the licensed invention, or the fact that the defendant and the other associates threaten to give notice of their election to terminate the license, justifies an application to the court for an injunction. In that respect, each of the parties has a legal and equitable right to insist upon the agreement according to its proper meaning; and the defendant's denial that any act has been done entitling the complainant to a reduction of the license fee, in no wise hinders the complainant in the exercise of the rights secured by the license. If the defendant and the other companies should hereafter slander the complainant's title, and if no adequate redress therefor can be had at law, a case will be presented, which, to say the least, is not here presented.

The complainant has made a contract, by which, if the other contracting parties have granted to another the right of using the licensed inventions at a less rent or fee than the complainant agreed to pay, a reduction is wrought in favor of the latter by its very terms. The complainant avers that such license has been given, and that thereby the fee or rent is reduced. The defendant denies that such license to a third party has been given. The parties are in conflict upon that question. What, then, does the complainant ask, and why does it ask it? Because it is not certain that it can establish its title to a reduction, can it attempt an experiment in this court, through which it will be protected against the loss of the privilege if it fail to prove such title? If the fact be as is alleged, the complainant requires no protection. If the fact be not as alleged, the complainant is entitled to no protection. It is bound to pay a rent or license fee. It differs with those who gave the license as to the amount which it is bound to pay. The other parties are entitled to terminate the license if the rent which is payable be not paid, and there is nothing inequitable in the assertion, or in the exercise, of that right. No rule of equity is involved in such a controversy. Its determination depends solely upon a question of fact, upon the ascertainment of which the legal rights of the complainant are clear, according to its own view of the subject.

It would be a novel experiment, if a tenant were to come into a court of equity alleging that he had paid or otherwise satisfied, or been discharged from, the rent reserved in his lease, but that his landlord denied the fact of such payment or discharge of the rent, and threatened to declare his election to terminate the tenancy pursuant to the option reserved in the lease, and thereupon to ask the court, upon proof of the facts alleged by the tenant, to adjudge that such rent is paid, satisfied, or discharged, and enjoin the landlord against declaring such election. The court would be bound to say: Upon the facts stated by you, your possession cannot be disturbed, and, if the landlord declares such election and brings ejectment, you are in no danger. So, here, the right of the defendant and the other companies to terminate the complainant's license, if the sums due for fees are not paid, is a clear legal right. Its exercise is according to the stipulations expressly assented to by the complainant, and was distinctly contemplated when the agreement was made. There is, therefore, nothing inequitable in the assertion of the right or the threat to exercise it, and it would, as it seems to me, be an unwarranted interference with their legal rights were this court to suspend its exercise.

The complainant's position is not unlike that of any other who holds title upon condition—he must perform the condition at his peril—and not unlike that of a contracting party who will be unable to enforce the contract against the other party unless he has on his part performed its stipulations. On a dispute arising on a question whether the conditions are performed, or even as to the true import of the stipulations, they cannot come into a court of equity, to have those questions settled, in order to save them from the consequences of a mistake of fact, or of a misconstruction of the contract. So, here, I think a bill to determine the meaning of the license to the complainant, if that were doubtful, which is not claimed, or to ascertain whether the defendant and the other associated companies have done the act upon which the right to a reduction of the license fee arises, and thereupon to decree that the complainant is only bound to pay the reduced rent, cannot be sustained. For that purpose it is wholly unnecessary, and such a determination is not called for by any view of the office and jurisdiction of a court of equity. The suit is, in substance, an endeavor to obtain the advice of this court, to enable the complainant to act with safety in his dealings with the defendant and the other parties to the license, in a matter depending solely upon legal principles, in order that it may not omit the payment of the stipulated rent or license fee, until it has been here adjudged that such payment is not necessary to the preservation of the license.

(2) The objection, that the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Company and the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company are not made parties to this suit, was not made by the defendant by demurrer, plea, or answer. If, therefore, the rights and interests of the defendant are so far several and distinct from those of the other two companies, that a decree can be made granting the relief sought without affecting the rights of those two companies, the objection should be held to be too late. Story v. Livingston, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 359, 375, and cases there cited; Segee v. Thomas [Case No. 12,633]. On the other hand, where a final decision cannot be made between the parties litigating without directly affecting and prejudicing the rights of others not made parties, the court cannot proceed. The objection can be taken at the hearing, and it may, and ought to be, raised and acted upon by the court itself. And, where the case cannot be thus decided between the parties, it will not avail to suggest that the absentees are beyond the jurisdiction of the circuit court, or have such residence or citizenship that, to make them parties, would defeat that jurisdiction. Mallow v. Hinde, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 193; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 152, and cases therein referred to, and in the notes; Story v. Livingston, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 375, 376. The decision in the case of West v. Randall [Case No. 17,424] is in no conflict with these cases.

This was the rule before the act of congress of February 28, 1839 (5 Stat. 321), which provides, that "where, in any suit at law, or in equity, commenced in any court of the United States, there shall be several defendants, any one or more of whom shall not be inhabitants of, or found within, the district where the suit is brought, * * * it shall be lawful for the court to entertain jurisdiction, and proceed to the trial and adjudication of such suit, between the parties who may be properly before it; but the judgment or decree * * * shall not conclude or prejudice other parties, not regularly served with process * * * and the non-joinder of parties who are not so inhabitants * * * shall constitute no matter of abatement, or other objection to said suit." But the effect of the statute, and of the 47th rule of the supreme court in equity, containing a similar provision, have been considered by the supreme court, and it is held by that court, in the language of Mr. Justice Nelson, in Coiron v. Millaudon, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 113, 115, that it is well settled, that neither the act of congress of 1839, nor the 47th rule of the supreme court, enables the circuit court to make a decree in a suit in the absence of a party whose rights must necessarily be affected by such decree, and that the objection may be taken at any time, upon the hearing or in the appellate court. In that case, the absent parties were out of the jurisdiction of the court, and that was assigned in the bill as a reason for not making them parties, but the excuse was held unavailing. In Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 130, this statute was declared to be no more than a legislative affirmance of the rule previously established, and not to touch the principle, that the court could not adjudicate directly upon the right of a party not actually or constructively before the court; and the case of Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 425, in effect affirms these decisions. The decision in Northern Indiana R. Co. v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 15 How. [66 U. S.] 233, as stated by Mr. Justice McLean, was to the like effect, when there, also, the reason for not making an absent party a defendant was, that to make such party a defendant would oust the jurisdiction. These cases seem to me to require that I should decline to make the decree prayed for.

In Greene v. Sisson [Case No. 5,768], on demurrer to a bill, the court held, that, notwithstanding the act of 1839, the circuit court could not proceed in a suit in the nature of a bill to redeem, and for a relinquishment of a mortgage interest, unless all the parties beneficially interested in the mortgage were parties, and that their being out of the jurisdiction did not obviate the difficulty—citing, also, Hagan v. Walker, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 36, and Wilson v. City Bank [Case No. 17,797]. Shields v. Barrow, already referred to, was a bill to rescind a contract, and it was held that it could not be rescinded in part, so as to set it aside as to the parties before the court, and leave it in full force as to persons not parties to the suit; and that if, in any case, that could be done, it must be a case in which the rights of those before the court are completely separable from the rights of those who are absent. In the case of Coiron v. Millaudon, supra, where it was sought to set aside a sale of mortgaged premises made in proceedings in insolvency, and the purchasers were defendants with others, but the mortgagees were not parties, the court held that, as setting aside the sale might affect their interests, they were indispensable parties.

In this suit, the complainant seeks, not to rescind the agreement in question, but to alter and change its otherwise import and obligation, by reason of alleged acts of the contracting parties done since its execution. In principle, this is the same as if, by reason of facts alleged, it was sought to rescind it altogether. The three corporations granted to the complainant the license to use certain inventions upon certain specified terms and conditions, and the complainant agreed to pay to these corporations, for this license, a specified rent or license fee. The right to terminate the license in case such rent or fee was not paid was reserved, and was to be at the option of the latter. This court is now asked to decree a modification of that agreement, to declare that, by reason of subsequent events, a less rent or fee only is payable, to order the defendant to reduce such rent, and to enjoin the defendant and its agents, servants, and confederates, and each of them, from giving the notice, during the pendency of the suit, of their option or purpose to terminate the said license. Such relief cannot be given without directly affecting the absent parties, any more than the agreement could be declared completely rescinded. It touches their property and rights under the license. It would disable the three to assert the right reserved to them to terminate the license, or to proceed thereafter against the complainant for infringing the patents. The rights of the absent companies, inseparably connected with the right of the defendant, are the very subject in controversy. The case is not like many actions brought against one of two or more parties jointly liable to pay money, in which the whole may be collected from either, and in which, contemporaneously with the foregoing decisions, the courts have held that the action could be sustained against those who are within the jurisdiction. There, a recovery establishes the obligation of the defendant to pay the debt, and only leaves the question of contribution to be settled without prejudice to the absent parties by reason of the judgment. Here, the object and effect of the decree sought, is to destroy the right of the three companies to enforce their agreement, and assert their rights to the inventions in question as against the complainant.

If it were possible to decree that, as to the present defendant, an abatement from a possible one-third of the license fee should be made without prejudice to the right of the three corporations to terminate the license if the residue be not paid, there might be some plausibility in the claim to such decree; but the interest and property of the three corporations under the agreement is essentially joint, and the court cannot, in this action, settle the respective shares of the several corporations therein.

(3) These considerations render it unnecessary, and perhaps improper, that I should discuss the proofs taken upon the contested question of fact chiefly discussed on the hearing, whether such a license has been given by the three corporations as entitles the complainant to a reduction in the stipulated patent rent or license fee.

If it had appeared, that, upon proofs, such as have been produced in this case, it had been adjudged by Mr. Justice Nelson, that the specimen machine, the making and sale of which was licensed by these corporations to the Davis Sewing Machine Company, was an infringement of A. B. Wilson's patent for the four-motion feed, called also the "drop feed," I should greatly hesitate to act upon a different view of the subject, but should prefer to rest upon the opinion of that greatly esteemed and experienced judge as an authority. A decision not upon pleadings and proofs, but a decision or opinion on a motion for an injunction, can be hardly claimed to settle the question. Its influence in this case is rather to be derived from its force as an admission by the three corporations that it was such an infringement.

But, if that be conceded, it does not follow, by necessity, that the Davis machine contains what has ever been, or is now known as, a "drop feed;" and there is much evidence to the contrary. It would be going a great way to say that every feeding apparatus which infringes the Wilson or Fitzgerald patent is, ex vi termini, a drop feed. I do not, however, intend to go any further, nor to express any opinion upon the question, whether, upon all the proofs, the complainant has shown that the three corporations have granted a license for a drop-feed shuttle sewing machine or not. Entertaining the opinions I have expressed, I could make no decree based upon the affirmative of that question. And I think it just to leave both the parties to their legal rights, unaffected by a decree herein based upon any decision of that question.

For the reasons stated, the bill should be dismissed.

FLORENCE SEWING MACH. CO. v. SINGER MANUF'G CO.

[4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 348;[1] 8 Blatchf. 177.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 4, 1871.

INJUNCTION — MONEY PAID INTO COURT BY COMPLAINANT—EQUITABLE LIEN OF DEFENDANT.

A. licensed B. to use sundry patents at a specified fee, with a proviso that if a license was granted to any other party at a less rate, the fee to be paid by B. should be proportionately reduced, and with a further proviso that upon the failure of B. to pay such royalties as were due, A. might terminate the license. B., claiming that A. had granted a license at a lower rate to C., filed a bill to obtain a reduction of the fee, and to enjoin A. from terminating the license; and, pending the suit, obtained an injunction upon the condition of depositing in court the amount of license fees in dispute. The court dismissed the bill for want of equity and proper parties, and thereupon each party moved that the fund in court be paid over to it. Held that, although the money belonged to the complainant, he had received such protection from the injunction as to give to the defendant an equitable lien upon the fund, and that the court would retain it until the final determination of the controversy by a proper tribunal.

This was a motion arising out of the case of Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Singer Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 4,884], under circumstances fully set forth in the opinion of the court.

Ebenezer R. Hoar and Augustus L. Soule, for plaintiffs.

Edwin W. Stoughton and George Gifford, for defendants.

Before WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and BLATCHFORD, District Judge.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff is a licensee of three associated companies, namely, the defendant, the Wheeler and Wilson Manufacturing Company and the Grover and Baker Sewing Machine Company. By the terms of the license, the plaintiff agreed to pay a license fee or royalty of five dollars for each machine made and sold in the United States, and two dollars for each machine exported; and, under the license, the plaintiff was making and selling machines to such a number, at the time when the bill herein was filed, that the amount of fees payable at the specified rates was nearly twenty-five thousand dollars a quarter, or nearly one hundred thousand dollars a year, payable in quarterly payments, on rendering quarterly accounts of the machines manufactured and sold in each quarter. The license contained a provision, that the associated companies should not license the making of a dropfeed shuttle sewing machine using two threads, at a less patent rent, without a corresponding reduction in the patent rent thereby reserved; and, also, a reservation to the licensers, of the right to terminate the license, at their option, on thirty days' notice, for any breach of the agreement by the plaintiff.

The bill of complaint herein alleges, that the licensers gave such a license to a third party as operated to reduce the plaintiff's rent or fee to forty cents for each machine; that the plaintiff has paid to the said associates $63,912, since the right to the reduction arose; and that the larger part thereof was paid in ignorance of the fact, and the residue under a protest that it was not due, but was paid in order to prevent a revocation of the license, which was threatened, and which would, as the plaintiff alleged, be very injurious to its business. The bill prays a decree establishing the plaintiff's right to a reduction in the rent or license fee, and directing a repayment of the sums overpaid, and that the defendant be enjoined from giving notice of an option to terminate the license, and from attempting to collect the sums reserved as rent or license fee by the terms of the license.

After the filing of the bill, the plaintiff applied to this court, by motion, for an injunction, pendente lite, to restrain the defendant according to the prayer of the bill, having offered, in the bill, to deposit with such receiver as the court should name, all such sums as the patent rent, under the terms of the license, would amount to, for each quarter which should expire during the pendency of this suit, at the times when the same would fall due, the said sums to be held by such receiver subject to the order of this court, and to await the final decree in this suit. Thereupon, on the 8th of January, 1870, the court ordered that an injunction issue, restraining the defendant, until the further order of this court, from giving notice to the plaintiff of a termination of the license, and from attempting to collect license fees or patent rent thereunder, on condition, "that the plaintiff deposit with the clerk of this court all moneys which shall become due under said license, according to the full patent rent reserved therein, on or before the tenth days of each and every January, April, July and October, * * * said moneys to be deposited by the clerk with the United States Trust Company, * * * on interest, to the credit of the suit, and subject to the order of this court." An injunction was issued in pursuance of such order, addressed to the defendant, enjoining such defendant as in the order directed; and, in performance of the condition prescribed in the order, and under a subsequent modification thereof reducing the rate of fees, the plaintiff has paid to the clerk of this court, from quarter to quarter, sums which, including the quarter ending on the 1st of October, 1870, amount to $76,793, which is now on deposit, at interest, as directed.

The cause was brought to a hearing upon pleadings and proofs, and, in December, 1870, the decision of the court thereon, was made—Florence Sewing Mach. Co. v. Singer Manuf'g Co. [Case No. 4,884]—that the bill should be dismissed on two grounds—first, that no case was made appealing to the jurisdiction of a court of equity, or requiring the interference of the court to determine the rights of the parties; and, secondly, that the relief sought by the bill could not be granted in a suit to which the Wheeler and Wilson Manufacturing Company and the Grover and Baker Sewing Machine Company were not parties. The court, therefore, declined to pass upon the merits of the controversy, and the question whether the license fee or rent payable by the plaintiff has been affected or reduced by the acts of the associated companies since the license was granted, remains wholly undetermined. Upon the publication of the decision of the court, and before a final decree has been settled and entered, the plaintiff has applied for an order that the money paid to the clerk, and now on deposit as above stated, be repaid to the plaintiff; and, on the other hand, the defendant has made a cross motion or application, asserting title to the money as in truth the proceeds of the use of the patents covered by the license, and profits made by such use by the plaintiff during the period in which the defendant has been, by the injunction of the court, restrained of its legal right to revoke the license, and that, the plaintiff having failed to establish, in this suit, the right to a reduction of the rent or fee, the defendant is entitled, according to the just construction of the condition upon which the plaintiff took the injunction, to have the money paid over for the use and benefit of the defendant and the companies thus associated with the defendant, in satisfaction, pro tanto, of their claim to license fees while the court has held them in restraint, and thereby protected the plaintiff in the use of their patents.

The question presented by the circumstances above detailed and by the motion of the parties respectively, is novel and embarrassing. So far as we have derived aid from counsel, and so far as my examination has extended, it is without precedent. The money was undoubtedly paid to the clerk, and made subject to the order of the court, in the expectation that the court would, in this suit, determine, by its final decree, upon the pleadings and proofs, whether the plaintiff was still bound to pay the full license fees or rent reserved to the defendant and the other associated companies, or whether, on the other hand, the plaintiff was entitled to retain the license on paying the reduced rent which the plaintiff insisted was alone due, and in the expectation that the money, paid in, would thereupon be paid over to the defendant, for the use of the associated licensers, or would be apportioned between them and the plaintiff, according to such rights as were found to arise out of an adjudged reduction of the license fee.

The money paid in was the money of the plaintiff. However true it is, that it was the precise amount of the license fee reserved to the associated companies for the use of their patents, and, in a sense, may be the fruit or proceeds of the use of their property, presumptively earned in such use, and even derived therefrom, by the plaintiff, by a use of their patents against their will, still, the money itself was the plaintiff's money, and the plaintiff, in paying it over under the order made upon a voluntary offer to pay it, did not admit for a moment that the money was due to the defendant and the other associates, but was acting throughout in denial of their right, and was earnestly insisting that they were largely overpaid at the time the bill was filed; and the money was offered to be paid, and was in fact paid, in confidence that the court would retain it, not suffering it to pass to the defendant, or to the defendant and the other companies, unless it should be adjudged due under the license.

It is equally clear, that the defendant did not suppose, and could not suppose, that paying the money to the clerk, ex vi termini, gave the defendant and the other associates a title to the money, or that, if the court should adjudge that the plaintiff's license fee had, by the acts of the defendant and the other associates since the license was granted, been reduced to forty cents for each machine, the plaintiff would not be entitled to an order of the court, (after proper computation,) for the repayment to the plaintiff of the whole or of a considerable part of the money. To this may be added the further suggestion, that, if the court had decided the question between the parties on the merits either way, and the decree had been appealed from, it cannot be doubted that the party appealing would have insisted that no order disposing of the fund should be made pending the appeal.

The court having declined to determine the controversy on the merits, the plaintiff re-asserts title to the money, claiming that the purpose for which it was paid has failed, while the defendant insists, that, as the plaintiff has failed to establish a right to a reduction of the fee in this suit and by a decree herein, the defendant is entitled to the money, as prima facie due upon the face of the license, and that the condition, on which the restraint was imposed, should be construed to mean, that the money should be paid to the defendant for the use of the associates, if, in and by this suit, such right to a reduction was not decreed in the plaintiff's favor; and that, to hold otherwise, is to lend the aid of the court to a great injustice, in this, that, but for the interference of the court by injunction, the plaintiff would have been, by revocation of the license, prevented from using the patents, or would, by action, have been compelled to pay the associates the very money now in question. Obviously, this last suggestion assumes that the defendant could have successfully revoked the license, or have compelled the plaintiff to pay the whole rent originally reserved—the very claim which this court declined to determine, and which this court cannot now assume in the defendant's favor. Yet, it is equally obvious, that the consideration upon which the plaintiff offered to pay the money, and for which the plaintiff did pay the money to the clerk, has not wholly failed. The plaintiff did thereby obtain an injunction, and restrained the defendant from interfering with the use of the patented inventions, and from attempting to collect the license fee or rent, and did thereby secure to itself the uninterrupted use of the inventions and such profit as might accrue therefrom.

In this conflict of claim, so peculiar and so complicated, the essential inquiries are—why was the money paid to the clerk of this court?—what protection to the defendant was intended thereby?—what purpose was to be effected?—and, from the answer, it must be determined what equitable rights result from the payment.

The technical suggestion, that, because the money was paid in by the plaintiff, in the suit, it became so identified therewith, that, when the court declines to decide the merits and dismisses the suit, the money goes out of court with the plaintiff and ceases to be subject to any order of the court, save the formal order of repayment, is not quite satisfactory. There is, it is true, a species of logical sequence in the suggestion, but it largely overlooks the enquiries last above suggested and the equities which may result from the very facts, that the plaintiff offered to pay in the money in order to obtain the protection which the injunction gave, and that the defendant was required to submit to the restraint, suffer the uninterrupted use of the patents, and forego all attempts to collect the money; and the suggestion further assumes, that the money was subjected to no order of the court which does not, in this suit, determine the title to the license fees or patent rent and the amount payable from the plaintiff.

The defendant and the associated companies held the agreement of the plaintiff for the payment of the license fees stipulated therein. They also had the unquestionable right to terminate the license if the amount of fees actually due or accruing were not paid. The plaintiff was actually using their inventions for its own profit. As to the company made defendant here the plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and could not be sued upon the agreement, for the collection of the money, in this district. In this posture of the parties, the plaintiff, alleging that, at that time, the defendant and the other associates were overpaid, and claiming that the license fees had, by acts subsequent to the license, been largely reduced, asked that the defendant be put under injunction, forbidding the revocation of the license, which revocation was the clear legal right of the defendant, if the plaintiff could not establish a right to a reduction, forbidding the defendant from bringing an action to collect the fees, which were as clearly due, as a legal right, if the plaintiff could not establish the title to a reduction, and even restraining the defendant from bringing an action to test the plaintiff's claim to a reduction. As a necessary incident, the plaintiff secured to itself the uninterrupted use of the licensed inventions and, what was deemed of great importance to the plaintiff, the opportunity to prosecute the litigation without hazard of losing the license, or losing any right to the money paid, if it established its right to a reduction. That is to say, the plaintiff would hold on to the license, whether right or wrong in the litigation, and not lose its claim to the money, if successful. For these by no means inconsiderable advantages to the plaintiff, and summary disadvantages wrought to the defendant, the plaintiff offered and accepted the condition of paying the money to the clerk, subject to the order of the court. To what end? Was it that the defendant should, by the very acceptance of the condition and the payment of the money, gain any equivalent for the advantage gained by the plaintiff and the disadvantage wrought to the defendant and the other associates? Was it that the money should be brought within convenient reach and be, by the very transaction, made subject to the defendant's claim to license fees?

Again, the plaintiff is a corporation, presumptively dividing its gains among its shareholders. No allegation is made here that it was not, nevertheless, perfectly solvent and able to pay all the fees which had accrued, at whatever rate may be finally established, and it might not be assumed, as a presumption, that it would not be able to pay all that should accrue during the litigation. But, on the other hand, the defendant had a right to insist, on behalf of the associates, that no risk whatever should, by the action of the court, be cast upon them; that the plaintiff ought rather to be required to pay the money to them, in reliance on their solvency and ability to refund, if it should be determined that the license fee was reduced; that the accruing quarterly payments were very large and the duration of the litigation very uncertain; that the defendant and the other associates ought not to have their hands tied, and be restrained of the opportunity to test their legal rights, to find, after, it might be, years of litigation, that the plaintiff, (though without any fraud or dishonesty,) in the fluctuations and vicissitudes which affect the prosperity of business of every sort, had become unable to pay the large arrears which would accrue if the defendant was right in the claim to the full license fees reserved. In this view of the subject, was not the defendant to derive some benefit from the payment of the money to the clerk, as a security and protection against the possible loss of what should be due at the termination of the litigation? The offer by the plaintiff, the condition imposed by the court on granting the injunction, and the paying of the money, ought not to be permitted to operate as a delusion. They were certainly not so intended. The proceeding against the defendant was wholly in invitum. Some protection to it against the possible consequences of restraining the assertion of its alleged legal rights was intended. A consideration was offered and accepted for the immunity granted, pendente lite, to the plaintiff. It is not the fault of the defendant that the plaintiff came into this court without a cause of action which warranted an appeal to the court, as a court of equity, or came into a court in which the relief could not be granted for want of necessary parties. For all the purposes of these motions, the decision that the plaintiff did so come must be taken to be correct. The plaintiff chose voluntarily so to come, and, so coming, subjected the money to the order of the court, for the protection and benefit of the defendant, who was in constant resistance of the plaintiff's endeavor.

What, in equity, is the result? I cannot resist the conclusion, that the circumstances gave to the defendant an equitable lien upon the fund—not a lien created by the license—not a lien or title established by any decision that the whole fee or rent reserved by the license is payable—but a lien resulting solely from the paying in of the money for the security and protection of the defendant, and as the consideration upon which the plaintiff obtained and accepted an actual benefit, and placed the defendant at disadvantage and in a condition of risk or hazard. This protection and security the defendant ought not to be required to relinquish, for the mere reason, that it turns out that (according to the views governing the decision the court has made) the plaintiff ought not to have come into this court at all in the form and manner it came, and had no case for any injunction. To order the payment of the money to the plaintiff, on the ground that, although the bill be dismissed, the merits are undecided, is to make the error the court were invited, by the offer of the plaintiff, to commit, the ground for accomplishing the precise injustice against which the condition of granting the injunction was intended to guard. The equities of the defendant seem to me analogous to the rights which would have arisen in its favor, if the condition of granting the injunction had been a pledge of money or other security for the payment of whatever sums might accrue to the defendant and the other associated companies pending the injunction. If the pending suit ascertained and settled the amount due, the disposition of the money would be simple and convenient. But it would by no means follow, that, if that litigation failed to settle the question on the merits, the pledge could be withdrawn, the plaintiff having had the benefits of the injunction in the meantime.

For these reasons, I conclude that the court ought not to order the repayment of the money to the plaintiff. The defendant has acquired an equity which arose not out of the license, nor out of the mere litigation of the questions raised by the bill of complaint, but out of facts arising after bill filed, and proceedings collateral to the issues therein—proceedings intended to be protective of the defendant, and conservative of the rights of the plaintiff. Such an equity has not been lost. It can still be preserved and protected, and I think there is no want of power in the court to preserve and protect it.

It does not follow that the defendant is entitled to an order that the money be paid to the defendant, as the amount, or on account, of license fees accrued, nor as payable according to the proper construction of the condition on which the injunction was granted. That condition did not contemplate the disposition of the money except upon some ascertainment that the defendant and the other associated companies were entitled to receive from the plaintiff the whole or some part of the fees or rent reserved in the license. Such ascertainment has not been made, and, to direct the payment to the defendant, would, in substance, be, to determine the question between the contestants, on this motion, which, on the pleadings and proofs in the suit, the court declined deciding.

If, in fact, the condition prescribed in the order had been, that the plaintiff pay in the accruing fees or rent at the rate prescribed in the license, to be paid over to the defendant for the benefit of the associated companies, if the plaintiff should not prevail in the suit, then it might be regarded as a consequence consented to, and of which the plaintiff could not afterwards complain, but the order does not so read, and the submission of the disposition of the money to the order of the court shows that that order must proceed upon some future ascertained right.

What, then, shall be done with the money? If the court refuse an order for the payment to either of the parties, shall it remain on deposit indefinitely? If I am correct in the views I have expressed, that question may, perhaps, be answered by another. Suppose, as a condition of granting the injunction, the court had required a pledge, as security, in terms, for the payment of whatever fees or rent should accrue and be of right payable pending the injunction, what would be done with the pledge, on the dismissal of the present bill of complaint? The plaintiff ought not to be permitted to withdraw the pledge. The defendant ought not to be permitted to appropriate the pledge, while the amount of fees or rent of right payable is in contest and undetermined.

I admit that the case is novel, and the condition of the fund, and, perhaps, the relation of the court to the fund, is peculiar. But it seems to me that, until, in some appropriate proceeding, either at law or in equity, the question between the parties is determined, this court can make no order disposing of money now held for the defendant's security. Whether that determination shall be had in this court—whether the disposition of the money has not, by its payment to the clerk, been so submitted to its jurisdiction that such a determination may be had here, on grounds which were wholly inapplicable to the suit which was brought by the plaintiff—whether the defendant should proceed at law to establish its right to rent or fees according to the terms of the license, and then apply, in a summary form, for the order which would give effect to the deposit as a security for their payment—whether such an adjudication in any court of competent jurisdiction would not warrant such summary application—and whether the equitable lien which, in my opinion, the defendant has acquired, may be executed by a suit in the nature of a foreclosure of any right or equity of the plaintiff—are questions upon which we are not here called upon to express an opinion. There is no doubt that, on the determination of the question in dispute, this court has power and jurisdiction to give effect to the deposit of the money as a security and apply it as the rights of the parties may then require

The motions should be denied.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The plaintiffs, licensees from the Grover and Baker Sewing Machine Company, the Wheeler and Wilson Manufacturing Company, and the Singer Manufacturing Company, under patents held by those companies, filed the bill in this suit against the latter company alone. The substance of it was, that, by reason of acts done by the licensers, the plaintiffs were, by the terms of their license, entitled to have the license fee of five dollars for each machine not exported, and two dollars for each machine exported, contracted to be paid by the license, reduced to forty cents for each machine; that the plaintiffs, on such view, had everpaid the licensers by more than $58,000, up to the filing of the bill; and that the licensers threatened, if the plaintiffs refused further to pay according to the rates specified in the license, to terminate the license, by notice, under a clause therein to that effect. The plaintiffs offered, in the bill, to deposit with a receiver the future patent fees to accrue at the rates reserved in the license, as they should become due thereunder, "the said sums to be held by such receiver subject to the order of the court, and to await the final decree in this suit." The bill averred, that the licensers other than the defendants, were, one of them a Connecticut corporation and the other a Massachusetts corporation, and they were not made parties because this court would have no jurisdiction over them, the plaintiffs being a Massachusetts corporation and the defendants a New York corporation. The bill prayed that the defendants be ordered to reduce the patent fee reserved in the license to forty cents for each machine, and to account with the plaintiffs for, and pay to them, the sums received by the licensers under the license, to which they were not entitled, and that the defendants be restrained from giving notice, during the pendency of this suit, to the plaintiffs, of their option to terminate the license, and from attempting to collect patent fees from the plaintiffs, until the further order of the court.

On the filing of the bill and after a hearing on notice, an order was made by the court, that an injunction issue restraining the defendants, until the further order of the court, from giving notice of a termination of the license and from attempting to collect patent fees thereunder, on condition that the plaintiffs deposit with the clerk of this court all the moneys which should become due under the license according to the full patent fees reserved therein, quarter yearly, as provided in the license, said moneys to be deposited by the clerk with the United States Trust Company in the city of

New York, on interest, to the credit of this suit, and subject to the order of this court.

When such order was presented to the court to be settled and signed, it contained the following clause, which the court struck out before signing it: "And it is further ordered, that, in case complainants fail to recover in this suit, they shall pay to the defendants an amount sufficient to make them receive seven per cent, per annum on the sum or sums paid to the clerk as herein directed, from the time of such payment or payments to the time when the injunction hereby ordered shall be dissolved, and that the same shall be added to and taxed in the costs to be taxed for the defendants."

An injunction in conformity with this order as so settled and entered, was issued and served on the defendants. Subsequently, the rates of payment were, for future machines, fixed, by order of court, at three dollars for each machine not exported, and one dollar for each machine exported, as being, by agreement of the licensers and the plaintiffs, the full license rates for future machines, if the plaintiffs were not entitled to the reduction claimed by them. Under these orders the plaintiffs have paid to the clerk of the court the sum of $76,793, which is on deposit, on interest, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, in the United States Trust Company, to the credit of this cause, and subject to the order of this court.

Meantime the cause went to final hearing on pleadings and proofs. The conclusions of the court in the cause were: (1.) That the plaintiffs did not require the aid of a court of equity to exercise or maintain the rights asserted by their bill, but their remedies were complete, both offensive and defensive, without such aid, to resist an attempt to stop their working under the license, or to defend a suit for license fees already paid, or to bring a suit to recover back license fees overpaid; (2.) That the relief asked could not be given without directly affecting the two licensers who were not made parties to the suit, and that, therefore, it could not be given, as respected the defendants. On these two grounds, the conclusion of the court was, that the bill must be dismissed, the merits of the controversy not having been considered or disposed of.

The case being thus ready for the entry of a final decree on such decision, the plaintiffs now apply to the court for an order that the clerk pay to them the moneys so deposited by them with him, together with all interest which has accrued thereon. The defendants also apply for an order that the clerk pay to them such moneys and interest.

The court did not, by its decision, dispose of the merits of the controversy raised by the plaintiffs in their bill. So far as any action of this court is concerned in respect to such merits, the controversy is exactly where it was when the bill was filed, and before the injunction was issued or any of the money was deposited. The object of depositing the money was to secure the licensers against loss, in case the court should, on the merits, decide that the licensers were still entitled to fees at the license rates, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the reduction claimed. The money deposited was the plaintiff's money and continued to be such until the court should decide, on the merits, that the licensers were entitled to it under the license. To award the money now to the defendants would be to decide the merits in favor of the defendants. This the court has declared it cannot do in this suit. The case stands as if, as a condition of the granting of the injunction, the plaintiffs had given a bond, with sureties, conditioned to pay to the defendants, if the court should, in this suit, decide, on the merits, that the licensers were entitled to them, the full license fees provided for by the license. On such a decision as has been made in this case, there could be no recovery on such bond.

The view urged on the part of the defendants is, that the money was deposited subject to the right of the plaintiffs to show affirmatively in this suit a better title to it than the title of the licensers; that the money, when deposited, became, prima facie, the money of the licensers, subject to such right of the plaintiffs: that the plaintiffs have failed to establish such right; and that, therefore, the money must go to the defendants. This view is not sound. The money was deposited subject to the determination of the title to it. It has not been established, on the merits, that the plaintiffs owe it to the licensers under the license. The title to it has not passed from the plaintiffs, and has not passed to the licensers or to the defendants. If it had been established in this suit that the plaintiffs owed it to the licensers, it would have gone to the defendants, on such determination. A contrary determination would have carried it to the plaintiffs by a title reposing on such determination.

The suggestion that the money was, under the order of the court, deposited with the clerk to the credit of the suit, and that, as the defendants have been successful in dismissing the bill, they must, therefore, have the money, is not warranted by the action of the court. The money was not deposited by the plaintiffs with the clerk to the credit of the suit, in the sense claimed, nor did the order of the court direct that it should be so deposited. It directed that the clerk should deposit the money with the trust company to the credit of the suit, meaning that the money should be deposited in the trust company in the name of the suit, so as to be easily identified and drawn against. So, also, the action of the court in striking out from the order, as proposed for settlement, the clause before referred to, indicates an intention to retain absolute control of the ultimate disposition of the money, and an absence of intention that a mere failure by the plaintiffs to recover in the suit should confer on the defendants any rights in respect of the money to be deposited.

There is another view which is conclusive against an award at this time of the money or any part of it to the defendants. The court has held that it can make no decision on the merits between the parties to this suit without affecting and prejudicing the rights of the two co-licensers who are not made parties. It thus has decided that it cannot recognize the defendants as representing, in this suit, such two co-licensers. Therefore, it cannot now award to the defendants such share of the money as belongs to such two co-licensers, and it has no means of determining, and no right to determine, in the absence of such two co-licensers, as parties to a controversy respecting the money, what such share is, and it cannot award such share to such two co-licensers, as long as they are not parties to such controversy. As respects such share of the money as might belong to the defendants, the court cannot determine that question in the absence of the two co-licensers, any more than it can determine the merits of the suit in such absence. Besides, it has decided that the interest and property of the three licensers under the license are essentially joint, and that it cannot, in this suit, settle their respective shares under the license. It follows, that it cannot settle in this suit, as it now stands, the share of the defendants in the money in the court, so as to award to them that share.

The case is not presented to the court in the view that the defendants are entitled to the whole or a part of the money as compensation for the damages sustained by them, or by the licensers, by the issuing of the injunction. If it were, it would be a sufficient answer to the claim to say, that the court could no more, in this suit, settle the amount of such damages, as respects the defendants, or their co-licensers, or all the licensers jointly, without the presence of such co-licensers, than it can settle the merits of the controversy without such presence. The interest of all the licensers under the license being joint, the defendants can have sustained no separable or severable damages through the operation of the injunction, which this court can ascertain or award, unless it has all the licensers before it.

Thus far, the question only of the claim of the defendants to receive the money has been considered. But many of the views stated are equally conclusive against the claim of the plaintiffs now to be paid the money. It was deposited on the plaintiffs' own offer, to secure the licensers against loss, in case they were in fact entitled to fees at the license rates, and in case the plaintiffs were not in fact entitled to the reduction claimed. As the plaintiffs obtained, through and by means of the deposit of the money, as a condition precedent, the granting and continuance of the injunction restraining the defendants from terminating the license, and from bringing suit for the patent fees, and have gone on working under the license, and enjoyed the consideration for which the money was deposited, the good sense of the transaction, and good faith towards all parties, require that the money should be regarded as having been deposited subject to a decision as to the title to it by a competent tribunal, whether this court or some other court. To award it now to the plaintiffs, would be to decide the merits of the suit in favor of the plaintiffs. It has not been established that the plaintiffs do not owe it to the licensers under the license. Although it is still the money of the plaintiffs, because it was their money when deposited, and the title to it has not passed to the defendants or the licensers, still it is subject, in the hands of this court, to the equitable claim and right, on the part of the defendants and the licensers, not to have it paid to the plaintiffs until it is properly established that the plaintiffs do not owe it to the licensers under the license.

Under these views, the fund may be held by this court, although brought into it as an incident of this suit, notwithstanding the suit is discontinued or the bill dismissed. It will be so held, subject to be disposed of on a proper application showing a state of facts demanding its disposition. It is not for this court to suggest in what tribunal, whether this or another, the adjudication as to the title to the money is to be made, or by what form of suit or proceeding, or what will be regarded by this court as sufficient warrant for disposing ultimately of the money. It can only declare, that it holds the money on the terms above stated, subject to the showing of a title to it by the plaintiffs or the licensers, as being or not being license fees due under the license.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the motions of both parties should be denied.

In admiralty. Various proceedings were taken against the brig Florenzo in the port of New-York, which were brought before the court upon the following pleadings: Two libels were filed on the 7th of September, 1827, by different parties of her crew, to recover wages earned on her last voyage. On the same day the court ordered these suits to be consolidated. Process of attachment was issued in them, returnable on the 25th of September, under which the vessel was arrested. A petition was subsequently filed by a material man, praying to be paid out of the proceeds of the vessel. There was no dispute as to the services rendered by these parties; and the amounts due to the libellants and to the petitioner were decreed to be paid them.

The United States subsequently filed a libel of information against the vessel, claiming her condemnation and forfeiture to the United States. The collector had previously seized the brig as forfeited under the provisions of the act of December 31, 1792 (1 Stat. 287), entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," the 16th section of which enacts, "that if any ship or vessel heretofore registered, or which shall hereafter be registered as a ship or vessel of the United States, shall be sold or transferred, in whole or in part, by way of trust, confidence or otherwise, to a subject or citizen of any foreign prince or state, and such sale or transfer shall not be made known in manner herein before directed, such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, shall be forfeited." The manner of making known such sale or transfer is prescribed by the 7th section, and is by giving up the certificate of registry to be cancelled. The libel alleged a transfer of the Florenzo, in whole or in part, by way of trust, to an alien, within the meaning of the act, namely, to one Pettit, without making known such transfer in the manner prescribed by the act, and claimed a forfeiture of the vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture.

Against the libel of the United States two claims were interposed. One was put in by Whitehead Cornell, as owner, alleging a bona fide purchase by him of the vessel on the 1st of September, 1827, by a regular bill of sale therefor, from George Marsden, her master, an American citizen, and at that time her registered owner, for $2,500, without knowledge or notice on the part of the claimant of any cause of forfeiture existing at the time. It was insisted for this claimant that Marsden was the real owner in his own right, or, if not, that the claimant's case came within the proviso to the 16th section of the act referred to, which is, "That if such ship or vessel shall be owned in part only, and it shall be made to appear to the jury before whom the trial for such forfeiture shall be had, that any other owner of such ship or vessel, being a citizen of the United States, was wholly ignorant of the sale or transfer to or ownership of such foreign subject or citizen, the share or interest of such citizen of the United States shall not be subject to such forfeiture, and the residue only shall be so forfeited."

Upon the question whether the vessel belonged to Pettit or to Marsden, it appeared in evidence, that in September, 1826, the vessel was registered in the name of one Weathersby, and in November, of the same year, in the name of Marsden; but Weathersby testified that he transferred the vessel and cargo, by a bill of sale, for $3,700, to one Arnold, who was a partner of Pettit, and an alien also, and that afterwards, at the request of either Arnold or Pettit, he made a bill of sale to Marsden, but that no part of the consideration moved from Marsden; and it was proved that he had not the means to purchase a vessel of the price of the Florenzo. Marsden, though cited to appear, could not be found; but it was proved by several witnesses that his statements as to his interest in the vessel, subsequent to her alleged purchase from Weathersby, were contradictory, he at one time alleging that he was her sole owner, at another time that he was part owner, and at another time that she belonged to Pettit and Arnold. Arnold testified that he and Pettit advanced money to Weathersby on the security of the brig and her cargo; that he afterwards, in October, 1826, by Weathersby's consent, and with his advice, sold the brig, without the cargo, to Marsden, for $2,500, and that Marsden paid him one-half, namely, $1,250, but whether Pettit received the other half he did not know; and that he had previously taken Marsden's note for $4,000, to be given up on payment of the $1,250. The register in Marsden's name was in November. The bill of sale from Weathersby to Marsden was not produced on the trial.

Upon the question of the bona fides of the sale from Marsden to Cornell, it was proved that at the time of the sale the brig was in the possession of the sheriff of New-York, under a fi. fa., to satisfy the claim of a judgment creditor of Pettit, and that the mate of the brig informed Cornell of the fact, who replied, "that it was nothing to him." The only payment made by him on the purchase was his promissory notes for $2,500, which were accepted by Marsden, to whom he was a stranger, without inquiry. Cornell purchased the vessel immediately on her return from a long voyage, without examination or inquiry into her condition, and without going on board of her. It was matter of consultation among the parties concerned in the sale and purchase, how the brig might be kept from forfeiture, and it was suggested between them that a bona fide transfer to an American citizen might save her.

The second claim was made by Samuel Candler, as a judgment creditor of Pettit. He proved that on the 23d of August, 1827, he caused a writ of fi. fa., issued in his favor on a judgment rendered in the supreme court of New-York for $5,501 08 against Pettit, to be levied by the sheriff of the city and county of New-York on the brig, as the property of Pettit. He averred that the brig was then the property of Pettit, and was, as such, lawfully arrested and held by the sheriff under his fi. fa. at the time of her seizure by the United States marshal. It was insisted for this claimant, that the title acquired by the United States under a forfeiture, dated from the time of its completion by a judgment of forfeiture by a competent court, and not from the time of the commission of the act inducing the forfeiture; that, at all events, the United States could not usurp the possession of a vessel, already in the custody of the law under state process; and that it belonged exclusively to the state courts to decide whether the execution of the claimant could be satisfied out of the vessel or not.

Robert Tillotson, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

George Brinckerhoff, for Cornell.

Robert Sedgwick, for Candler.

BETTS, District Judge. There is no controversy concerning the first libel pending against this vessel, and the claim of the seamen and of the material man must be allowed.

The second libel is filed by the United States. It claims a forfeiture of the vessel and of her equipments, for a violation of the act of congress of December 31, 1792 (1 Stat. 287), entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," the 7th section of which prescribes certain formalities in the transfer of American registered vessels to aliens, which are not now in question, and the 16th section of which makes any transfer to an alien, by way of trust or otherwise, without the formalities prescribed in the 7th section, a cause of forfeiture. The libel alleges a transfer of the vessel, in whole or in part, to one Pettit, an alien, in such manner as to cause her forfeiture within the meaning of the act.

Two claims are interposed: One on the part of Whitehead Cornell, who asserts that he acquired the vessel by a bona fide purchase of her on the 1st of September, 1827, from George Marsden, the then owner, and he produces a bill of sale in support of his title. Although the evidence is not in all respects free from doubt, yet I am satisfied the weight of it proves that Marsden was not at the time the owner of the brig in his own right, but that, being an American citizen, he took the nominal title in his name, to hold her in trust for Pettit, or for Arnold and Pettit, both of whom were then aliens. This brings the case within the words of the statute, and the vessel must be declared forfeited, so far as the claimant, Cornell, is concerned, unless he brings himself within the proviso to the 16th section of the act. It is plain, however, from the language of the proviso, that it applies only to the case of joint-owners of a vessel, one of whom admits an alien to an interest in the vessel, without the privity of his citizen co-owner. The substance of the provision is, that if it appears that the other part owner was ignorant of the transfer to the alien, his share shall not be forfeited, but the residue only. He will not lose his interest in the vessel, by the misfeasance of his associates, to which he was not party or privy. Without this proviso, his interest would not be protected, because an absolute forfeiture of a vessel transfers the entire interest in her to the government, without regard to the claims of parties who did not participate in the cause of forfeiture. This is invariably so in respect to vessels confiscated for violations of the revenue laws.

Two things are necessary to protect the claimant under the proviso to the 16th section. First, he must be a part owner (The Margaret, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 421), and, secondly, he must be such part owner at the time of the commission of the act which produces the forfeiture. But the claimant makes title to the whole vessel. He does not allege that he acquired a share in her, which the proviso might protect from the forfeiture incurred, because of the ownership of an alien in common with him, but he claims that he is the bona fide owner of the entire vessel. In the second place, he does not allege any interest in the vessel at the time of the commission of the act which produced the forfeiture. He acquired his alleged title subsequently. Clearly, then, he is not protected by the proviso to the 16th section, even if he had proved himself to have been a bona fide purchaser, without notice of any cause of forfeiture existing at the time of his purchase.

But there are forcible reasons to question the bona fides of the sale to Cornell. If he had not full knowledge of the situation of Pettit in respect to the brig, he had sufficient notice to put him upon his guard, and, if he then neglected to make proper inquiry, the law deals with his claim as if it were acquired with knowledge of the facts which reasonable inquiry would have disclosed. The Ploughboy [Case No. 11,230]; The Mars [Id. 9,106]. Cornell and Marsden stand, therefore, in the same position before the court, and the vessel must be decreed to be forfeited, so far as their rights are concerned.

A second claim is interposed on the part of Samuel Candler. He alleges that he is a judgment creditor of Pettit, and that, at the time of the seizure of the brig by the United States, she was in the lawful possession of the sheriff of the city and county of New York, under a fi. fa. issued on a judgment rendered in his favor by the supreme court of New York.

It is not necessary, in this case, to decide whether the interest in the vessel which Pettit may have acquired was a subject of seizure and sale by the sheriff on a fi. fa. For, supposing it were, that will be of no avail, if the claim of title to the brig by the United States, from the time of the commission of the offence which caused the forfeiture, be upheld; for, in that case, all title, of whatever nature, of all persons, which was not saved by the proviso, was divested out of them, and became vested in the United States. A judgment of forfeiture is necessary to effectuate the title of the government, but, when declared, it dates back, by relation, to the time of the commission of the offence, and consequently overrides all intermediate titles, however acquired. Against this general doctrine the position is taken, that where no specific mode of effectuating the forfeiture is prescribed by statute, it has no other effect than at common law, where the title to the thing forfeited does not become complete until judgment of forfeiture is pronounced by a competent court. This is no doubt the common law doctrine, and the principle, to the extent above indicated, has the support of Judge Winchester, and of Chief Justice Marshall, Mr. Justice Story and Mr. Justice Washington. U. S. v. The Anthony Mangin, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 356, note; U. S. v. 1,960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; The Mars [Case No. 9,106]. These cases suppose that relation, being a fiction of law, should not be allowed to work an injury to any one, and therefore should not override the title of an innocent purchaser intermediately acquired; that if the forfeiture, which must often be secretly incurred, be indissolubly attached to the property, so as to divest the title of a purchaser without notice, great injury would result to the commercial interests of the country; and that the mere attaching of a forfeiture as a punishment to a statute offence, does not exclude the common law doctrine of forfeiture, unless the statute distinctly so provides.

The weight of authority is, however, the other way (U. S. v. 1,960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 338), and the distinction between forfeitures at common law and under a statute is established. The words of the statute are held to be imperative, making the forfeiture the necessary consequence of the offence, and dating its operation from the commission of the act. The same doctrine is laid down by the supreme court of this state. Fontaine v. The Phoenix Insurance Co., 11 Johns. 293; Kennedy v. Strong, 14 Johns. 128. The tenor of English adjudications is to the same effect. Roberts v. Wetherall, 1 Salk. 223; Roberts v. Withered, 5 Mod. 195; Robert v. Witherhead, 12 Mod. 92; Wilkins v. Despard, 5 Term R. 112. It has been for years the settled construction of acts of congress which declare the absolute forfeiture of property as consequent to an offence committed therewith, that a judgment of conviction shall take effect, by relation, as of the time when the forfeiture was incurred. U. S. v. 1,960 Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398; U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 338. Congress has not seen fit to change or interfere with this construction. Without, therefore, speculating upon what might have been the rule most consonant with equity when the question first arose, it is the duty of this tribunal, as the subordinate court, to administer the law as it is interpreted by the supreme court, and, accordingly, whatever property Pettit acquired in this vessel by the sale to him, was, because of his alienage, divested eo instanti, and was vested in the United States by force of the statute. I shall accordingly hold that no interest of Pettit subsisted in the brig, which could be the subject of levy and arrest under the execution of the claimant, Candler.

It is further contended by the claimant, that the brig was in the custody of the law under the state process; that jurisdiction accordingly attached to the state court, to determine the legal effect of the execution and the character of the interest of Pettit; and that, to pursue the case in this court, would be to create a conflict between the judicial authorities of the state and of the United States. Under our system of federal and state governments, questions may arise rendering inevitable a conflict of judicial powers between their respective judicatories. Each will sedulously avoid encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the other, and, if the difficulty must be encountered, it will no doubt be met in a spirit of mutual forbearance and conciliation, and neither will attempt, except in most urgent extremities, to resist or counteract the authority of the other. When the same remedy may be had by litigant parties under either jurisdiction, there can be no occasion for any collision of powers, because the subject matter, if not transferable from one court to the other, by way of error or appeal, will naturally be left to the disposal of the one first acquiring cognizance of it. Such was the case of The Robert Fulton [Case No. 11,890]. The libel in this court was by material men, to enforce a lien on the ship for materials and labor supplied her in this port. She was a domestic vessel, and the lien was one under a state statute. The vessel was held under a prior arrest for a like demand, by process from a state court. There was no ceding to the authority of the state court, but the United States court decided in effect, that, as both tribunals were administering relief by virtue of the same law, the one first having possession of the subject matter could rightfully retain it. There was, moreover, a special fitness in that case, in the forbearance of the federal court to interfere, inasmuch as, in the state tribunal, the property would be held sequestered for the common benefit of all lien creditors, whilst in admiralty the decree would have regard to no other parties than those litigant before the court. That case does not, in any aspect, supply a formula for the present one, the proceedings in the two tribunals being now diverso intuitu, not looking to a common purpose or a common method of attaining it. In the state court, the proceeding seeks to satisfy an execution in favor of a single judgment creditor, out of the vessel, as being the property of a judgment debtor. In this court, the action demands the entire proprietorship of the vessel, under a title anterior to any supposed interest of the judgment debtor in her, which title is confirmed by an act of congress. Jurisdiction over this demand belongs appropriately to the United States court, and, if a suit were brought upon it in the state court, that court, if competent to take cognizance of it, would not be bound to do so by lending its support to the enforcement of a penal law of the United States. U. S. v. Lathrop, 17 Johns. 4.

If the levy of a writ upon a vessel, under such circumstances, in a suit between individuals, could retain in a state tribunal authority to pass upon the title to the vesesl as against the government, an easy means might be afforded, not only of evading a punitive law of the United States, but also of counteracting the national polity, which exacts that ships enjoying the privileges of American bottoms shall be the property of American citizens. In the municipal tribunals, a ship might, in all respects, be dealt with as a chattel interest, in which an alien could have a right of property, and that interest might be pursued irrespective of the navigation laws; and the government, if it litigated there, might be subject to hindrance and embarrassment in enforcing the policy upon which its commercial regulations are founded.

Moreover, the proceeding in the state court could not have prevented a different party from arresting the vessel in the same or in another court, or from taking her out of the possession of the sheriff by a writ of replevin or of detinue. The title or ownership was not in contestation under the levy. A purchaser under a sale on execution takes, by force of the judgment awarding the writ, no more than the interest of the defendant in the chattel. The judgment does not assume to determine that any legal interest of the defendant exists in the chattel. In the present case, the attachment of the vessel in behalf of the United States, on the claim of a full title to her, older in inception than the supposed interest of the defendant in the execution, creates no competition of jurisdiction between the two courts. A conflict of authority would only arise, in case the court out of which the execution issued should consummate a sale under it, by ordering the vessel to be put into the possession of the purchaser. This case is in no position for such a procedure, and there is no legal impediment to the arrest and condemnation of the vessel, as demanded by this libel.

If the possession of property by a state sheriff, under a fi. fa., is to exclude the marshal from taking possession of it in execution of the laws of the United States, it might be made the means of preventing the revenue laws, including the laws against smuggling, from being enforced against vessels or their cargoes. An arrest by a sheriff, under state process, in behalf of a friendly creditor, might thus, by connivance, be made to exempt the guilty property from seizure under the process of this court. This difficulty, however, does not arise in this case. The sheriff levied the execution on the 23d of August, and, on the 31st, an informer gave notice to the custom-house that the brig had incurred a forfeiture. She was immediately seized by the United States' officers, and has since remained in their charge. The sheriff proceeded to sell the cargo, but did not attempt to sell or hold the vessel. He made no objection to her passing into the custody of the marshal, and he now interposes no claim to her possesion. It may be inferred from this, that the execution is satisfied, or that the levy under it is abandoned, leaving the brig within the sole power of this court. The claimant, by acquiescing in the seizure, by his notice to the custom house, and by putting in his claim here, is precluded from questioning the jurisdiction of the court over the subject matter.

I shall therefore decree the condemnation of the vessel. The claim of Candler must be dismissed, with costs. The seamen and the material man are first to have their claims and costs out of the fund in court. The forfeiture does not avoid their rights.

Decree accordingly.

NEUTRALITY ACTS.

The steamship F. was libelled as forfeited for an alleged violation of the 3d section of the neutrality act of April 20th, 1818 (3 Stat. 447). On the trial of the case, it was claimed, on behalf of the government, that the vessel and her cargo, consisting of arms and munitions of war, were really owned by agents of insurrectionists in the island of Cuba; that the vessel was to proceed with her cargo to Vera Cruz; that there vessel and cargo were to be transferred by the nominal owner to persons acting for such insurrectionists; and that thence the vessel was to take the cargo to some point off the coast of Cuba, and land it on shore by the use of rafts made out of lumber found on board of the steamer, towed by a steam launch also found on board. Held, that such facts, if made out, did not establish a violation of the 3d section of the act of April 20th, 1818. The landing of a cargo contraband of war, on the shore of the country of one belligerent, at a point not blockaded, is not an act of hostility against the other belligerent.

[Cited in The Carondelet, 37 Fed. 802. Applied in U. S. v. Trumbull, 48 Fed. 107; The Itata, 56 Fed. 517.]

This was a suit against the steamship Florida for an alleged forfeiture incurred under the 3d section of the act of April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 447), in that she was fitted out to commit hostilities against the government of Spain. Francis Darr appeared as claimant of the vessel, and denied the allegations of the libel, and the cause was heard on pleadings and proofs.

H. E. Davies, Jr., Asst. Dist. Atty. and J. B. Craig, for the United States.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Admitting that persons acting as agents of the insurrectionary party in Cuba were the real owners of the vessel and her cargo of arms and munitions of war, and that the transaction of the borrowing, by Darr from Castillo, of the money wherewith the vessel and her cargo were purchased, was a sham, and that the vessel was to proceed with her cargo to Vera Cruz, and there vessel and cargo were to be transferred by Darr, their nominal owner, to persons acting for the insurrectionary party in Cuba, and that thence the vessel was to take the cargo to some point off the coast of Cuba, and land it on the shore by the use of rafts made out of the lumber on board, towed by the steam launch on board, through shallow water, to the shore, and that Darr and such real owners of the vessel and cargo had an intent to do all this in fitting out the vessel, and putting her cargo on board, still a violation of the 3d section of the act of 1818 is not thereby made out. A vessel fitted out with intent to do this, is not fitted out with intent to cruise or commit hostilities, within the sense of that section. If so, then every vessel fitted out to run a blockade, with a cargo of munitions of war, is necessarily fitted out, within the sense of that section, to commit hostilities against the country whose forces have instituted the blockade. To land a cargo contraband of war on the shore of the country of one belligerent, at a point not blockaded, is no different an act in its quality of being an act of hostility against the other belligerent, from the running of such a cargo through a blockade into a blockaded port; and the latter act is no act of hostility against the blockading power.

There is no satisfactory evidence that the vessel was furnished, or fitted out, or armed, or attempted to be furnished, or fitted out, or armed, with intent that she should be employed to cruise or commit hostilities, in the sense of the 3d section of the act, in the service of the insurrectionary party in Cuba, against the government of Spain. There is no evidence that she was intended to do anything more than transport her cargo to the coast of Cuba, and cause it to be landed there on rafts, by the aid of the steam launch on board. To do this was no violation of the 3d section of the act, which is the one on which the libel is founded.

The libel is dismissed.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—FALSE DESTINATION AND OWNERSHIP.

1. Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for an attempt to violate the blockade.

2. A false destination and a false ownership of the vessel were alleged on her papers.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The libel charges that this vessel and cargo were captured as prize by the United States vessel-of-war Matthew Vassar January 11, 1863, at sea, near Little River inlet, off the coast of South Carolina. The prize was arrested in this port, in the hands of the prize commissioners, by the marshal, on process of attachment and monition, February 2, 1863, and his return of the process, with certificate of due service and of public notice, was made and filed in court February 24, thereafter; whereupon, on motion of the district attorney, a decree of default was rendered against the prize and all persons interested therein.

The proofs returned by the prize commissioners consist of depositions in preparatorio, given by the master and the mate of the vessel, and also the ship's papers found on board of her at the time of her capture, identified by the testimony of the prize-master.

The vessel, when arrested, was carrying the British flag, and had a certificate of British registry, dated at Nassau, N. P., December 4, 1862, to R. N. Menendez, of that place, indorsed January 2, 1863, as transferred to H. R. Saunders, of that place, merchant. The clearance was for Beaufort, N. C., then an open port, and the vessel was arrested while running into Little River inlet, a blockaded port on the North Carolina coast. The master testifies that he was the owner of the vessel and of all the cargo; that he bought the vessel in Nassau from the firm of Sawyer & Menendez, in December, 1862, and she was delivered to him there by one of that firm; that he is a native of North Carolina, and resident in that state; from which he came to Nassau the same month; that he knew that the ports of North Carolina were under blockade, and that the one he was attempting to enter was so at the time of the capture; that his real voyage was from Nassau to any port of North Carolina he could get into, and thence back to Nassau; and that the vessel was American-built.

It is unnecessary to pursue the detail of testimony further. The adventure was a flagrant, undisguised effort to break the blockade and carry on an illicit trade with the enemy, with property belonging wholly to an enemy, and under papers representing a false destination and a false ownership of the vessel.

A decree of condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo is ordered to be entered.

COLLISION—DOUBT AS TO VESSEL AT FAULT—REVISION BY CIRCUIT COURT—SPEED IN EAST RIVER.

1. Where, on an appeal, in a suit in rem in admiralty, for a collision, the question, on the proofs, was a close one, as to which vessel was in fault, this court refused to revise the decision of the district court.

2. A speed of nine miles an hour, in the East river, in a crowd of vessels, is an unreasonable speed.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, against the steamship Florida, to recover damages for a collision between her and the barge Owen Gorman, while the latter was in tow of the tug New York, in the East river. [Case unreported.] After a decree for the libellant, the claimants appealed to this court.

John E. Burrill, Jr., for libellant.

Charles Donohue, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The Florida had left pier No. 4 in the North river, and was bound for the Novelty Works, at the foot of Twelfth and Thirteenth streets, in the East river. The tug, with several barges in tow, the Gorman being the farthest from her on the larboard side, was also going up the East river, some distance ahead of the Florida, the latter being somewhat nearer the New York side. The witnesses on the part of the barge insist, that when the Florida overtook the tug, although there was sufficient room on either side for her to have passed clear, she passed so near to the Gorman that her wheel struck the stern of the Gorman and occasioned the damage complained of. The witnesses on the part of the Florida insist, that when she reached within some two hundred feet of the tug, the latter suddenly sheered towards the New York side and produced the collision. The question is a close one on the proofs, and I am not inclined to revise the conclusions arrived at by the court below, which held the Florida in fault. It appears that there was a sloop at the point of collision, between the Florida and the New York shore, and she had to pass between this vessel and the tug, and it may very well be that, in attempting to avoid the sloop, to which she was quite close, she unconsciously inclined towards the tug. The river, was, as usual, filled with vessels, and great care was necessary, in moving in any direction, to avoid a collision. The Florida was going, as admitted by her hands, at the rate of nine miles an hour, which, in the place, and under the circumstances, I am inclined to think was an unreasonable speed

Mr. Hallett, Dist. Atty., contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. At the trial of this case, which was an action to recover back duties alleged to be illegally exacted, the plaintiff offered in evidence a paper purporting to be a protest, but not signed. It was annexed by a wafer to an affidavit, which was signed and sworn to by one of the consignees, and both papers were annexed to the entry. I was of opinion at the trial, that this was not a sufficient protest, under the act of Feb. 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), which requires "a protest in writing, signed by the claimant." I remain of the same opinion after consideration of the question, and of the argument submitted on behalf of the plaintiff. This is not a question of interpretation of the writing. If it were, the three papers would be considered as parts of the same transaction, and each might aid in interpreting the others. It is simply a question whether the protest was signed. I can no more take the signature of one of the consignees to the affidavit, to be a signature of the protest, than I can take the signature of another of the consignees to the importers' oath on the back of the entry, or the name of the consignees' firm in the entry, to be a signing of the protest. They all exist on papers attached together, but neither is there, as a signature of the protest. Each is manifestly put on the paper for a distinct and particular purpose, and this purpose has no reference to or connection with the protest. These signatures must have been there, and with the same intent, and answering the same end, if the protest had never been in existence. The plaintiff's counsel has given very good reasons for believing, that the want of a signature to the protest, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, could be of no practical importance. But it is a statute requirement, which I have not power to dispense with, whether, in the particular case it be important or otherwise. The motion for a new trial is overruled.

FLOWER v. PARKER et al.

[3 Mason, 247.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1823.

GARNISHMENT — JUDGMENT IN STATE OF SUSPENSION—EFFECT ON SUBSEQUENT SUIT FOR SAME DEBT.

Judgment in a trustee process against the defendant as garnishee of the plaintiff, is no defence in a suit for the debt, if the plaintiff in the original trustee process has, by his neglect to comply with the local laws, put his judgment in a state of suspension, so that execution can no longer issue upon it, and it cannot be revived by a scire facias.

Assumpsit. The cause came before the court upon a statement of facts as follows:

"At the January term of the court of common pleas for the county of Suffolk and state of Massachusetts, one Silas P. Tarbell and Joseph Eveleth, who were copartners in business, commenced an action of assumpsit on an account annexed to the writ, against the said [William D.] Flower, as surviving partner of one Finley, and summoned said Parker and Stevens (who were then and are now copartners) as the trustees of said Flower. At the time said writ was issued, said Flower was an inhabitant of, and resident within, the city of New Orleans in the state of Louisiana, and has been so ever since. No service of said writ was ever made on said Flower, or any other person as his attorney, the return of the officer on the writ mentioning, that said Flower resided out of the state so that no service could be made upon him. The said writ was dated November 19, 1817, and was served the same day on said [Ebenezer] Parker and Stevens as trustees of said Flower, by reading the same to them. The said action was continued two years upon a suggestion, that the defendant was out of the commonwealth, and at the July term of said court of the next year, judgment on default was rendered against said Flower, who had never appeared to defend said action nor any one for him. The said Parker and Stevens as trustees were also defaulted, and judgment was rendered in the usual form for the sum of three hundred and ninety dollars and twelve cents, damages, and costs taxed at ten dollars, to be levied on the goods, effects, or credits of said Flower in the hands or possession of said Parker and Stevens. It is further agreed, that said Tarbell and Eveleth never filed a bond in the clerk's office of the court of common pleas, or ever made any such bond, conditioned to repay to said Flower the whole, or any part of the amount of said judgment, within one year from the condition thereof, in case said Flower had brought an action thereon within said year against said Tarbell and Eveleth, and had obtained judgment for such repayment. It is also further agreed, that said Tarbell and Eveleth have never taken out execution on the said judgment recovered against said Flower as principal, or against his goods, effects, or credits in the hands of said Parker and Stevens as trustees. But said judgment has never been annulled or reversed by any process of error. It is also agreed, that said Parker and Stevens have never paid over to said Tarbell and Eveleth the amount of said judgment, or any part thereof, but still have in their possession property sufficient to respond the same and no more, if by law they are compellable so to do. The said Tarbell and Eveleth now claim to be creditors of said Flower, as such surviving partner, according to said judgment. But said Flower denies that he owes to said Tarbell and Eveleth, or that he ever owed them, any sum of money."

H. G. Otis, Jr., for plaintiff, contended, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover upon these facts. 1. The plaintiff is not bound by the judgment against him on the foreign attachment. A judgment may be conclusive, if the court has jurisdiction, and its jurisdiction is always open to inquiry. The plaintiff was not a resident of Massachusetts at the time of the trustee process, and he never was amenable to the jurisdiction of the court of common pleas. He never appeared in the suit, and therefore was not bound by it. [Mills v. Duryee] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 484–486; 1 Mass. 407; 4 Mass. 303; 7 Mass. 439; 8 Mass. 274; 9 Mass. 464–467; 12 Mass. 270; Kirb. 119; 1 Caines, 472; 5 Johns. 40; 8 Johns. 197; 13 Johns. 204; 15 Johns. 121; 11 Mass. 488; 1 Camp. 163; 9 East, 194. 2. The judgment in the trustee process is not now binding on the defendant. I agree, it originally bound the property in his hands. But the plaintiff in that suit omitted to make it effectual, by giving the bonds required by law, so that he never took out execution and cannot now do it. No scire facias lies in his favour by our laws. It lies only where defendant lives within the state, not where he lives without it. The right therefore under the judgment in the trustee suit is gone for ever by the neglect of the plaintiff. Act 1797, c. 50; 1 Mass. Laws, 555; Act 1783, c. 57, § 1; 1 Mass. Laws, 140; Id. 164; Id. 464, § 6; 15 Mass. 473; 16 Mass. 324.

Morse & W. Sullivan, for defendants, contended, that the judgment in the trustee process bound both the plaintiff and defendants, and has still a subsisting judgment. The plaintiff was a party. The service upon the trustee was service upon the principal, and the trustee might defend for him. This is not the case of a lien merely, but an attachment. The judgment binds the property in the defendant's hands absolutely; and it may now be revived against him. There is no reason, why a scire facias at common law may not issue against him. There is no difficulty in framing it, so as to meet the case. 1 Mass. 117; 3 Johns. 20, 86; 6 Term R. 1.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The whole of this case turn upon the question, whether the trustee process, upon which Tarbell and Eveleth obtained judgment against the goods, credits, and effects of the plaintiff in the hands of the defendants, is now a subsisting judgment, capable of being revived and enforced against the defendant; if so, it binds the property in his hands; if not, then the plaintiff has a right to recover. The question turns principally upon the true construction of the trustee act of this state (Act 1794, c. 65), sometimes called the "Foreign Attachment Act," and of the act of 1797 (chapter 50), regulating the issuings of executions on judgments, against defendants living out of the state. It is not necessary to go into a minute examination of the trustee act. It is sufficient to say, that it authorizes a writ or process to be issued against the debtors of persons, who are not inhabitants of the state, and in case of judgment against the principal and trustee, whether they appear or not, the act in express terms declares, "that the goods, effects, and credits of the principal in the hands and possession of his trustee, &c. at the time such writ was served upon him or them, shall stand bound and be held to satisfy such judgment as the plaintiff shall recover against the principal." The act further authorizes a trustee, having goods, effects, or credits of the principal in his possession, "to appear in his behalf and in his name, plead, pursue, and defend to final judgment and execution." In the present case neither the principal nor trustee appeared, and judgment passed against them both, by default.

That the judgment personally binds the plaintiff in this case, so that it can be revived, as conclusive against him, by a scire facias, or by action of debt, is more than I am prepared to admit, at the present moment. The judgments of no state courts can bind, conclusively, any persons who are not served with process, or amenable to their jurisdiction. No legislature can compel any persons, beyond its own territory, to become parties to any suits instituted in its domestic tribunals. If they voluntarily make themselves parties, that is quite a different business. But the principle seems universal, and is consonant with the general principles of justice, that the legislature of a state can bind no more than the persons and property within its territorial jurisdiction. As to the plaintiff, I should have difficulties in allowing this judgment to possess any validity, whatsoever, binding him personally, or concluding any of his rights. But as to the defendant and the property attached in his hands, it is far otherwise. The judgment operated in rem, and created a lien, which the defendant had no authority to resist. Payment under that judgment would have been a good discharge to him from the debt, not merely in Massachusetts, but, upon principles of national comity, in any other place.

The question then arises, whether the lien, thus created by the judgment in rem, has been discharged, or extinguished. If that judgment can no longer be enforced; if it is de facto defunct and cannot be revived; if in short there is no remedy now existing, by which Tarbell and Eveleth can obtain any satisfaction under it from the defendant; then it must be considered as discharged, so far at least, as to revive the right of the plaintiff to assert his claim to payment of the debt, and to take from the defendants the trustee judgment, as a defence.

This brings me to the consideration of the act of 1797 (chapter 50). That act provides, that in cases of judgments obtained by default against defendants, who are absent, or are not inhabitants or residents within the state, "execution or writ of seisin shall be stayed and not issue forth, until the plaintiff or demandant shall have given bond with one or more sureties in double the value of the estate or sum recovered by such judgment to make restitution, and to refund and pay back such sum as shall be given in debt or damages, or so much as shall be recovered upon a suit therefor to be brought within one year next after entering up the first judgment, if upon such suit the judgment shall be reversed, annulled, or altered." No such bond was ever given by Tarbell and Eveleth, and consequently no execution ever issued on the judgment by default in the trustee process. If execution were now allowed to issue without giving bond, it would issue against the very terms of the act. If a bond were now given, it would be against the very spirit of the act, for such bond would be of no legal effect, as more than one year has elapsed since the first judgment was given, and it is only within that period that the plaintiff can bring a suit to reverse the first judgment. By the state laws (Act 1783, c. 57, § 1), if a party neglects for the space of one year, next after obtaining judgment, to take out execution, he is no longer entitled to it, but is put to his scire facias, and that scire facias must be served personally on the adverse party, or a copy left at his last and usual place of abode within the state, or if he was at no time an inhabitant or resident within the state, by leaving a copy with his tenant, agent, or attorney (Compare Act 1783, c. 57, with Act 1797, c. 50, § 3). It has been suggested that these provisions may be applied to the present case. But it is clear that they apply only to cases of judgments obtained by the ordinary process of our courts in suits at common law, where the adverse party is the original debtor, and not to the extraordinary process of the trustee act. The form of the scire facias contained in the act of 1784 (chapter 28) shows the true construction. The form of executions and the scire facias against trustees under the trustee process are specially prescribed by the act of 1794 (chapter 65). The sixth section of that act declares, that when any execution, issued under the act, (which embraces a capias against the principal, and a fieri facias against his goods and estate, as well as a seizure of the property in the possession of the trustee) shall be returned not fully satisfied, &c. &c. "the plaintiff may sue out against the trustees, &c. a scire facias in due form of law, requiring the defendants, in such writs of scire facias named, to show cause (if any they have), why judgment for the sums remaining unsatisfied should not be rendered against them." The scire facias is, by the very terms of the act, to issue only upon an execution returned unsatisfied. If no execution has issued, a scire facias is unprovided for. The present judgment then is in a posture, in which no execution can issue upon it, without a revivor, for more than a year has elapsed since the rendition of the judgment. No scire facias against the principal and trustees is provided for; and no scire facias, unless after execution issued, against the trustees. The judgment then so far as it respects the present defendant, as trustee, is in a state of legal suspension, and can be no longer enforced as a lien or demand against him.

It is suggested however that a process may be devised by analogy to a scire facias at the common law, by which the judgment may be revived. I know of no such process, nor of any authority in any of our courts to devise one for this purpose. The trustee process is an extraordinary and peculiar process, and not to be extended by implication. We may see from cases, like the present, the danger of attempting to give it effect against non-residents, at least beyond the boundaries (sufficiently large,) which the state laws have already prescribed. The state courts have confined their construction of the act to cases, substantially within its purview. In Patterson v. Patten, 15 Mass. 473, the court considered it a sufficient bar to a scire facias against a trustee, that no execution had been sued out on the judgment.

The cases of Perkins v. Parker, 1 Mass. 117,[2] and Wood v. Partridge, 11 Mass. 488, are distinguishable. In neither of them was the process against a non-resident principal; and it does not appear that judgment in those cases were not in such a state, that an execution or scire facias might issue against the trustees. If the present question had been directly litigated in the state courts, I should, as a point of local law, bow to their decision, although it might not meet the entire approbation of my own judgment. As no such decision exists, my opinion is, that the lien by the judgment against the trustee is gone by the neglect of the plaintiff to give bonds and take out his execution in due season, to keep it in a state capable of revival. If hereafter it should be revived by any means devised by the ingenuity of the profession, my opinion is, that the recovery in the present suit will constitute a sufficient defence to protect the defendant from a second payment. PRIZE—GOODS FOUND ON ENEMY'S SHIP—BRINGING IN OFFICER OF CAPTURED SHIP—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE OF NEUTRAL CHARACTER.

1. All goods found on board of an enemy's ship, are presumed to be the property of the enemy, unless a distinct neutral character is impressed upon, and accompanies them.

[Applied in The Lilla, Case No. 8,348.]

2. It is a great irregularity for the captors not to bring in the master, or some principal officer of the captured ship, and this, combined with other circumstances, will sometimes induce a condemnation to the United States

[Cited in U. S. v. The Lilla, Case No. 15,600.]

3. Indulgence to captors, who had released the master from motives of compassion.

4. If the shippers in a hostile ship neglect to put on board any documentary evidence of its neutral character, they will not be allowed the benefit of further proof. See The London Packet [Case No. 8,474]; The Frances, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 348; The Betsy [Case No. 1,364].

[Cited in Shattuck v. Maley, Case No. 12,714.]

This was the case of a British vessel [the Flying Fish (Coulson, master)] captured on a voyage from London to Trieste, by the private armed schooner David Porter, Fish commander. Though the cargo was very valuable, there was no paper found on board, which declared its national character or proprietary interest. The only papers produced were the ship's register, the manifest, cocquets of the shipments, and bills of lading. The latter did not state on whose account or risk the shipments were made, and, with a single exception of a consignment to order, they were all consigned to persons at Trieste, whose national character was not even surmised.

G. Sullivan and G. Blake, for captors.

STORY, Circuit Justice (after reciting the facts). Under these circumstances, there can be little doubt, that the property must be deemed hostile. It is a general rule of the prize law, that all goods found on board of an enemy's ship, are presumed to be the property of the enemy, unless a distinct neutral character is impressed upon and accompanies them. "Res in hostium navibus praesumuntur esse hostium donec contrarium probetur." Locc. lib. 2, c. 4, n. 11; Gro. de J. B. lib. 3, c. 6, § 6; Bynk. Quest. Jur. Pub. lib. 1, c. 13; 2 Voet ad Pand. p. 1156, § 5. If a neutral will ship his goods in an enemy's ship, he is bound to send with them such documents, as shall clearly evince their neutral character. If he neglect so to do, he justly incurs the penalty of forfeiture. Any other course would subject the prize tribunals to endless impositions and frauds; and enable the enemy, by suppressing the documentary evidence of his ownership, to obtain in all cases the benefit of further proof, and to evade the just rights of cruisers. In the present case, considering the number of shipments, it is almost incredible, that there should not have been some invoices and letters of advice on board; and it is quite as difficult to believe, that the whole cargo was neutral. The only possible explanation is that asserted to have been made by the master, that the invoices and letters were transmitted by land to Trieste; and this, if true, affords an irresistible presumption of the hostile character of the cargo.

Under these circumstances, I should not have felt the slightest hesitation in pronouncing a decree of general condemnation, if it had not been for a very great irregularity on the part of the captors. I refer to the omission to bring in the master or mate of the Flying Fish. The only witnesses, brought in and examined on the standing interrogatories, were one seaman and the cook, neither of whom has spoken, nor could in the nature of things be presumed to speak, to the ownership of the cargo. It is matter of surprise, that, at so late a period in the war, captors should have been so ignorant of their duty, as to suppose, that they were at liberty to discharge the officers of the ship, without any examination before the prize court; or so negligent, as to suppose every frivolous pretence would authorize them to omit it. It is an imperative rule of the prize court, that the master or other principal officer of the captured vessel, should be examined in preparatory, to testify to the proprietary interest of the vessel and cargo. This rule, so indispensable to the regular execution of judicial authorities, is one of the last, which this court has been disposed to relax, since a reasonable time has elapsed after the war, to enable the captors to understand the nature of their duties. The rule is also enforced, in the most positive manner, by the president's instructions accompanying the prize commission. The absence, therefore, of the regular evidence, cannot but awaken suspicion; and, in some cases, would induce the court to apply heavy penalties against the captors. Cases have even occurred in this court, in which this omission, combined with other circumstances, has afforded such a conclusive presumption of fraud, that condemnation of the property has been adjudged in favor of the United States. In the British prize courts, the omission has been reproved in a very severe manner, and sentence of condemnation has been withheld, even in the clearest cases, until it has been supplied, or satisfactorily accounted for. The Speculation, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 293–296; The Anna, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 373, 385f, note a.

The affidavits, brought in by the captors to account for this omission, disclose a very humane motive, but certainly form no legal justification or excuse. The master, or chief officer, ought to have been left on board of the prize, and it was a great irregularity to remove both of them. Taking it, however, as a case of compassion, I am disposed to adopt a more indulgent course, than I should otherwise have pursued. In no event should I have allowed further proof; for the owners of the property, whether neutral or hostile, had, by suppressing, or omitting to put on board, any documentary evidence of property, completely forfeited all title to relief. The most, that could in their favor have been allowed, would have been to suspend a decree for a year and a day, to give opportunity for proof of any misconduct on the part of the captors in dismissing the master. Having no doubt that the property in the present case belonged to British subjects, I shall condemn the whole as good prize to the captors.

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1879.

COSTS.

1. A libel having been dismissed with costs, the clerk taxed for filing and entering "claim," "answer," "appearance" and "consent" twenty-five cents each: Held, that the clerk was entitled to only ten cents each, and could not charge as for "making a record."

2. The clerk taxed five oaths at ten cents each, and five jurats at fifteen cents each: Held, that the charge for the oath did not include the jurat, and the charges were correct.

3. A charge of $3 for the attendance of the clerk on the justification of sureties was correct, as being a reasonable compensation for the service.

4. A clerk's fee of fifteen cents for making up the costs on the bonding of the vessel was proper.

5. A charge of $9.50 as for taking depositions by a commissioner was correct, although it appeared that the witnesses appeared before the commissioner and were sworn, and then by consent of the proctors the examination of the witnesses was written down, but not by the commissioner or in his presence, and the witnesses were then brought before him and sworn to the depositions, and he made the customary certificate.

[Cited in Kelly v. The Topsy, 45 Fed. 487.]

6. An item of $50 paid to a notary public for taking depositions was correctly allowed, although he was a clerk of the proctor of the claimant.

7. The charge of $2.50 a day allowed to the marshal, by statute, for "expenses of keeping vessels," does not include wharfage, and a bill for wharfage paid by the marshal, for the vessel, while she is in his custody, can be properly taxed as a disbursement.

[This was a libel by the Newark Transportation Company against the schooner F. Merwin for damages resulting from a collision between the schooner and the steamboat Novelty, in New York Bay. The steamboat was adjudged wholly in fault, and the libel against the schooner was dismissed, with costs. Case No. 10,369.]

W. R. Darling, for libellant.

R. H. Huntley, for claimants.

CHOATE, District Judge. In this case, in which the claimants have obtained a decree dismissing the libel with costs, the libellant has appealed from the clerk's taxation. The clerk allowed twenty-five cents each for filing and entering "claim," "answer," "appearance" and "consent." The fee bill (Rev. St. § 828) allows for "filing and entering every paper," ten cents. Libellant insists that ten cents only should be allowed for these items, and in this I think he is correct. The additional charge of fifteen cents appears to have been made under that clause of the fee bill which allows the clerk for "making any record" fifteen cents a folio, but there was no record made upon the filing and entering of these papers which is not fully and aptly described under the terms "filing and entering." It is objected to the item for "consent," that no such paper was filed. The allowance of this item by the clerk indicates that he found such a paper on file, or evidence in his books that such a paper had been filed. Of course, if this was not so, the allowance of any fee therefor is improper. The same remark applies to the item of ten cents for "entering order of approval," which is objected to on the same ground. The item for "drawing claim and stipulation" is correct, if the papers were drawn by the clerk; otherwise not. The item "6 acknowledgements," twenty-five cents each, is correct, there appearing, by the record, to have been that number of acknowledgements. The charge for "5 oaths at 10 cents and 5 jurats at 15 cents," is objected to, on the ground that the fee of ten cents for administering an oath includes the service of the clerk in making the certificate of the administration of the oath—the jurat. I think the charge is correct. The fee bill allows ten cents for administering the oath. It allows fifteen cents for "making a certificate." The two services are distinct and are both here rendered. The item "attending on justification one day, three dollars," is also correct. This is a commissioner's fee for a service rendered by him in conformity with a general rule of the court requiring the testimony upon the justification of sureties to be taken before a commissioner. And it has been held that where the court calls on an officer of the court to render services, for which no fee is by law established, he is entitled to a reasonable compensation,—The Alice Taintor [Case No. 196],—and the fee here charged is reasonable in amount and established by long usage. The item of fifteen cents for "making up the costs" on the bonding, is also proper. It became necessary for the clerk to make up for the parties a statement of the costs at that time and for this as a "certificate" or a "record" he is entitled to the fee.

The item of $9.50 paid to the commissioner for taking depositions of witnesses, is objected to, on the ground that the services thus charged for were not rendered by the commissioner, that the witnesses were merely sworn before him, but that no such service was rendered. I understand the point to be that the witnesses were sworn before the commissioner and then by consent of the proctors for the two parties, the testimony was actually written down not by or in the presence of the commissioner, and the witnesses were afterwards brought before the commissioner and sworn to the depositions as made, and he made thereon his customary certificate. If this was so, I think the commissioner was entitled to his regular fees for taking and certifying the deposition, in the absence of an express stipulation between him and the parties waiving the same in whole or in part. The item of fifty dollars paid to the notary public Bowers for taking depositions is objected to on the ground that he was acting in the matter as clerk or amanuensis for the claimants' proctor. It appears that besides being a notary he was also attorney's clerk to claimants' proctor. It is claimed by libellant's counsel that the understanding was that to avoid the expense of taking the depositions before a commissioner, they should be taken down by the proctors themselves and sworn before a notary; that in pursuance of this understanding, the libellant's proctor wrote down his examination, and claimants' proctor employed his clerk, who was also the notary, to write down his. There was, however, no written stipulation to this effect, and as the depositions were apparently taken by and sworn before the notary, and the parties do not agree that there was such a stipulation or understanding, the court cannot take notice of it. The fact that the notary happened to be the clerk of one of the proctors did not disqualify him to act as notary upon the consent of the parties, nor disentitle him to his just fees therefor. This disbursement is duly vouched for and properly allowed.

Objection is made to an item of $130.50 included in the marshal's bill, for "wharfage," on the ground that under Rev. St. §§ 823, 829, no such charge is proper. Section 823 provides: "The following and no other compensation shall be taxed and allowed to attorneys * * * marshals * * * except in cases otherwise expressly provided by law." Section 829 regulates the fees of the marshal, and contains the following clause: "For the necessary expenses of keeping boats, vessels, or other property attached or libelled in admiralty, not exceeding two dollars and fifty cents a day." It is insisted that this charge for wharfage is to be deemed a charge for an "expense of keeping" the vessel. Section 823 refers in terms only to compensation, and not to expenses or disbursements of the officer, incurred by him in the discharge of his duties. Section 829, however, does restrict, within certain limits, many of those items or kinds of expense and disbursements which the officer is likely to incur in the performance of his duty, and actual disbursements beyond those limits must, of course, be disallowed, where they fall within the description of the kind of expenses thus limited; but as to expenses and disbursements not provided for in section 829, and necessarily incurred by the marshal in the performance of the duties of his office, I see nothing in either section to forbid his being reimbursed such expenses as without any legislation and upon general principles of law he would be entitled to, as for money paid out at the request and for the use of another. It appears to me that the "expense of keeping," here referred to, is the expense which the marshal is put to in maintaining the actual custody of the vessel under his process, and that what he may have to pay for "wharfage" or the use of a berth for her to lie in, in safety, is not properly to be considered such an expense. The marshal as the actual custodian of the vessel, especially if the owner or master leaves her, would be bound to use reasonable efforts to protect the vessel from danger, while in his custody, as, for instance, to move her in case of fire, or to use proper endeavors to put out a fire. No express provision is made for his taxing such disbursements, but I think that such disbursements may properly be taxed, if reasonable in amount and necessarily incurred; and wharfage belongs rather to this class of expenses than to the expense of "keeping" the vessel. This and the other small items in the marshal's bill are properly allowable, if duly vouched for.

Let the costs be re-taxed in conformity with this opinion.

FOCKE et al. v. LAWRENCE.

[2 Blatchf. 508.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1852.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—PROTEST—INVOICE VALUATION AS DUTIABLE VALUE—PLACE OF SHIPMENT AND PURCHASE.

1. A protest against the payment of duties must point out specifically the particular omission or irregularity complained of, or it will not be available in an action to recover back the duties. The doctrine of the cases of Pierson v. Lawrence [Case No. 11,158] and Pierson v. Maxwell [Id. 11,159] applied to the protests in this case.

[Cited in Cornett v. Lawrence, Case No. 3,241; Wilson v. Lawrence, Id. 17,816; Crowley v. Maxwell, Id. 3,449.]

[See Bangs v. Maxwell, Case No. 841.]

2. A collector is not bound to take the invoice valuation of goods, supported by the owner's oath on the entry, as their dutiable value.

3. A collector is justified, in the absence of written notice of a different state of facts, in assuming the place of shipment of goods, as stated in the entry invoice, to be the place of their purchase, and the date of the invoice as the time of their purchase.

[Approved in Crowley v. Maxwell, Case No. 3,449.]

This was an action [by Julius Focke and Francis Boult] to recover back an alleged excess of duties and a penalty, paid to [Cornelius W. Lawrence] the collector of the port of New York. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court.

Elias H. Ely, for plaintiffs.

J. Prescott Hall, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. The plaintiffs, merchants of Liverpool, shipped at that port three invoices of iron, in March, April and May, 1849. They took the owner's oath upon the invoices before the American consul at Liverpool, and swore that the iron was charged at the prices paid on actual purchase. On entry at New York, in May and June following, the invoice value was raised by the appraisers to the market prices of the iron at the dates of the respective invoices, and duties were exacted by the collector on that valuation, with the addition of a penalty. The importers subjoined to each entry a written protest against the additional duty. The language of two of the entries was, "claiming to enter the iron at actual and invoice cost." That of the third was, "claiming to enter it according to the sworn invoice."

The case differs from that of Pierson v. Lawrence [Case No. 11,158], in this, that the plaintiffs were residents of Liverpool, and shipped the iron there on their own account. Their contracts of purchase were made with the manufacturers in Glasgow, October 30th, and November 1st, 1848, for future delivery, and the iron was all delivered at Liverpool in March and April, 1849. The plaintiffs offered no evidence against the correctness of the appraisers' valuation, taking the time of shipment as the time of purchase.

The plaintiffs urge, as in the case of Pierson v. Lawrence [supra], in avoidance of the appraisement, First, that the invoice, verified by the owners' oath, is conclusive proof of the purchase-price of the goods; secondly, that the course pointed out by the acts of congress, to be pursued on the appraisement of imports at the custom house, was not conformed to in this instance; thirdly, that no legal order to appraise was made. They also claim that the contracts of purchase were entered into in October and November, 1848; that the increased valuation and the imposition of the additional duty and penalty were all carried out at the custom house in obedience to a circular from the secretary of the treasury, and not by regular appraisement and the observance of the requirements of the revenue acts; that a part of the purchase was in praesenti, the plaintiffs having the right to an immediate delivery of the iron; and that, in that respect, this case is distinguishable from that of Pierson v. Lawrence, and from that of Pierson v. Maxwell [Case No. 11,159], where the purchases were prospective.

The plaintiffs proved, in this case, that an advance in the price of iron at Glasgow took place between the dates of the contracts of purchase and the shipments of the iron, but there does not appear to have been any distinct proof of the time or amount of that advance, nor of the market value of the iron in Glasgow at the period of the contracts, otherwise than by the testimony of a broker resident at Liverpool. These facts are stated in this opinion, not as the basis of the judgment of the court, but that the case may appear substantially as presented to the court.

Our decision is placed essentially upon the terms of the protests. The plaintiffs cannot go beyond or out of those, with their objections to the exaction of duties. If they supposed that the officers of the customs had committed any irregularity in ascertaining the dutiable value of the iron, or if they desired more formal action on the part of the collector, the protests should have called his attention to the particular omission or irregularity complained of. In the case of Barker v. Lawrence [Case No. 991], cited by the plaintiffs' counsel, in which the duties paid were recovered because of an irregular appraisement, no question was raised by the defendant as to the sufficiency of the protest.

The presumption is, that the duties were levied according to law, and the collector is not personally subject to an action unless he exacts them against the protest of the importer, "setting forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the payment thereof." Lawrence v. Caswell, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 488. This is demanded by the statute, and it is a wise safeguard to a public functionary who exercises a very delicate and difficult trust, while it at the same time affords every reasonable protection to the rights of the importer. This court has repeatedly expressed its purpose to adhere to the language and spirit of this requirement of the law; and, applying that provision to this case, it is clear to our minds, that the plaintiffs have not shown that the collector violated any right set up by their protests, and which was secured to them by law. The protests import that the plaintiffs claimed the invoice charges to be conclusive evidence of the purchase-price and market value of the goods, but they give no intimation to the collector that the purchases were at a time different from the dates of the invoices, or that the market prices at the periods of purchase were different from what they were at the times of the shipments or at the dates of the invoices.

It is a great misapprehension to suppose that the collector is bound to take the entry of goods at the valuation of the invoice, supported by the owner's oath. His duty is directly the contrary. The 16th section of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 563), directs the collector to cause goods subject to ad valorem duties to be appraised, and specifically enacts that it shall be the duty of the appraisers, or of the collector, by all reasonable ways and means in their power, to ascertain, estimate and appraise the true and actual market value and wholesale price of the goods, at the time purchased, and in the principal markets of the country whence the same shall have been imported into the United States, "any invoice or affidavit thereto to the contrary notwithstanding." To enable the importer to avoid the penalty of twenty per cent., when the appraisement exceeds the invoice value by ten per cent., the eighth section of the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), permits the importer to make an addition to the entry price. That provision goes upon the assumption that the invoice price in no way determines the value of the goods.

If the plaintiffs were entitled to enter the goods at their market value at the place where purchased (Maxwell v. Griswold, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 242; Greely v. Thompson, Id. 225), still, the collector was not bound to know that the place of the purchases was different from that of the shipments, nor, more especially, that the times of the purchases were different from the dates of the invoices, unless he was expressly notified of such facts by the protests. It does not appear that he or the appraisers had any notice whatever of such facts. A verbal notice would be of no avail, even if the court might be authorized to imply one, for the plaintiffs would be excluded from all advantage under it by the express provisions of the act of February 26, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), which require it to be in writing.

We adhere to the judgment rendered in this case at the last term, finding that the plaintiffs, by their protests, point to no fact which in law can invalidate the appraisement, and also that, by the entries and the invoices, the collector was justified in taking the place and times of shipment as those of the purchases of the goods in question.

Judgment for the defendant.

FOGARTY v. GERRITY.

[1 Sawy. 233; 4 N. B. R. 450 (Quarto, 148); 5 Am. Law Rev. 163.] [1]

District Court, D. California. July 23, 1870.

RESIDENCE OR PLACE OF BUSINESS MUST BE WITHIN DISTRICT TO GIVE COURT JURISDICTION.

Where a petition had been filed against certain parties praying that they be adjudged bankrupts, and on the return day they appeared and with their own consent were so adjudged; and subsequently another creditor moved the court to dismiss the proceeding on the ground that the bankrupts had never resided or carried on business in this state: Held, that the court was without jurisdiction and that the proceedings should be vacated and set aside.

[Explained in Re Bergeron, Case No. 1,342. Cited in Re Mendelsohn, Id. 9,420; Re Jonas, Id. 7,442; Re Austin, Id. 662; Re Donnelly, 5 Fed. 786; Allen v. Thompson, 10 Fed. 124.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Edward Fogarty and James Gerrity.]

J. Naphtaly, for petitioning creditor.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. On the twenty-seventh of May, 1870, a petition was filed on behalf of I. D. Fish & Co., of New York, praying that the above named parties be adjudged involuntary bankrupts. On the return day of the order to show cause the alleged bankrupts appeared and consented to the adjudication, which was accordingly made and the matter referred to the register.

A motion is now made on behalf of one P. D. Casey, an attaching creditor, that the adjudication be set aside and all proceedings in bankruptcy vacated on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction over the case.

In support of this motion various affidavits were read, from which it clearly appears that the alleged bankrupts have never conducted any business within this district, nor had any place of business established therein as distinct from their place of residence. That they reside in the state of New York, where they have a notorious place of business, and that they arrived in this city about April 12, 1870, some six weeks prior to the filing of the petition against them. On this state of facts it is evident that this court would be without jurisdiction to entertain a petition in voluntary bankruptcy presented by the bankrupts. By the 11th section of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 517], a debtor desirous of availing himself of the provisions of the act, is required to apply by petition "addressed to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided or carried on business for the six months next preceding the time of filing such petition, or for the longest period during such six months." Under this and a somewhat similar clause, in the act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], the district courts have frequently declared themselves without jurisdiction to entertain the petition, make an adjudication or grant a discharge where it appeared that the application had not been addressed to the judge of the proper district.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 5 Am. Law. Rev. 163, contains only a partial report.]

In the Case of Kinsman [Case No. 7,832], the late judge of the southern district of New York, the objection appears to have been made on the part of creditors.

In the Case of Little [Case No. 8,391], the discharge of the bankrupt was opposed by creditors, and refused; the court declaring that "the question, whether the petition was filed in the proper district, was a question of jurisdiction." The discharge was refused "for want of jurisdiction in the court to grant it." In another case, the register to whom the matter was referred, of his own motion, after examination of the petitioner, refused to adjudicate, for the same reason, and his decision was sustained by the court. In re Magie [Id. 8,951].

In the Case of Walker [Case No. 17,061], a creditor filed a petition similar to that preferred in the case at bar, to vacate all proceedings in the cause, for want of jurisdiction, averring that the bankrupt had not resided in the district for the greater part of the six months next preceding the filing of the petition. The court (per Lowell, J.) held, on the facts, that the residence was established, but no doubt seems to have been entertained, that if the facts had been otherwise, the prayer of the petition must have been granted.

The thirty-ninth section, on which proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy are founded, does not, like the eleventh section, designate the district judge to whom the petition of the creditor shall be addressed. It provides, that "any person residing and owing debts aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall—(the various acts of bankruptcy are then enumerated, and the sentence continues)—shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed, shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors," etc.

The succeeding section provides, that "upon the filing of the petition authorized by the next preceding section, if it shall appear that sufficient grounds exist therefor, the court shall direct the entry of an order," etc.

The forty-first and forty-second sections provide for further proceedings, and for the final adjudication, that the debtor is a bankrupt. These proceedings are to be taken in the court in which the creditor's petition has been filed; but in which of the district courts the petition is to be filed, the act does not in terms declare. It cannot, I think, be contended that any of the district courts, at the election of the creditor, can entertain the petition; for, in such case, it might be filed and the debtor cited to appear in a remote district, where he has never resided nor carried on business; where he has no property, and where none of his creditors live. The inconveniences, and the opportunities for collusion which would thus be presented, make it evident that such could not have been the intention of congress.

It may, with more plausibility, be urged that the court to which the petition is to be presented, is the court of the district in which the act of bankruptcy has been committed. But the objections to this construction are insuperable. The alleged act of bankruptcy may have been committed in a district where neither the debtor nor any of the creditors reside or carry on business. It may have been done by the debtor while temporarily passing through a district remote from his residence or place of business, or even while traveling through various districts. To compel him to appear to answer before the court of the district in which he happened to be when the alleged act was committed—to oblige all the creditors whose places of residence may be distant, to appear before the same tribunal, to appoint an assignee in that district to take possession of the property, no part of which might be found within it, would be productive of intolerable hardships and vexations.

Moreover, if the jurisdiction to entertain the petition is deemed to be given exclusively to the court of the district where the act of bankruptcy has been committed, cases might often occur where no court would have jurisdiction. For the fraudulent payment, gift sale, conveyance or transfer might have been made out of the limits of any district; as for example by a passenger on a voyage by sea to or from this place and an eastern port.

The fifth clause of section 39 numerates as an act of bankruptcy the making of any assignment, gift, sale, etc., of estate, property, rights, etc., either within the United States or elsewhere, with intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors. Under the construction we are considering no court could take jurisdiction of an act of bankruptcy of this description if committed without the limits of the United States.

That this construction of the act was not contemplated by the supreme court, is evident from the language of the sixteenth order in bankruptcy. It provides that where two or more petitions shall be filed against the same individual in different districts, the first hearing shall be had in the district in which the debtor has his domicil.

If petitions could be filed only in the court of the district in which an act of bankruptcy had been committed, the general order referred to would afford no means of determining in which court the first hearing should be had. The terms of this general order indicate that where several petitions are filed against a debtor, one of them at least will have been filed in the district of his domicil, and it may fairly be inferred from the tenor of the order that the supreme court understood that proceedings against a debtor to procure an adjudication of involuntary bankruptcy, were like those instituted by himself to obtain an adjudication of voluntary bankruptcy, to be had in the court of the district in which he has resided or carried on business for the preceding six months, or for the longest period thereof. And this construction seems not only reasonable, and less objectionable than any other which can be suggested, but most in accordance with the other provisions of the act.

It has been said that the scope and purpose of the thirty-ninth section are to oblige insolvent debtors to take the benefit of the bankrupt act, and thus to insure an equal distribution of their estates under its carefully framed provisions. Bump, Bankr. 128, and cases cited.

By the thirty-ninth section he can be compelled to do what by the eleventh he is permitted and invited to do. The fact that in one case the adjudication is demanded by a creditor, and in the other is asked for by the bankrupt, ought not reasonably to affect the determination of the question as to what tribunal has jurisdiction over the case. The only case cited where the question we are considering has arisen, is that of In re Palmer [Case No. 10,680], in the southern district of New York. In that case the debtor, against whom a petition had been filed in the southern district, resided and carried on business in the northern district of New York. The learned judge of the southern district dismissed the proceedings for want of jurisdiction.

It is urged, that inasmuch as the bankrupt has assented to this proceeding, the objection cannot be raised by a creditor who has intervened. But consent cannot give jurisdiction —and that the question is one of power and jurisdiction in the court is evident—nor can it make any difference whether the proceeding is voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy. In the one case the petition is filed by the bankrupt, and in the other by a creditor. But in either case it must be addressed to the court authorized by law to take cognizance of the case, and to none other. Nor can it even be said in this case that the parties have submitted to the jurisdiction. One creditor has invoked it, and the bankrupts have not objected. But all other creditors are parties to and bound by the proceeding. If it be sustained, their ordinary remedies against the debtors will be suspended—the whole of his property will pass into the hands of an assignee, and they will be obliged to come into this court to prove their debts, enforce their liens, adjust their accounts, and receive the dividends—and their unsatisfied claims may be forever barred by the discharge of the bankrupt.

They have, therefore, a clear right to be heard, and to resist the proceeding, on the ground, that the court is without jurisdiction. My opinion is, that, under the facts of the case, the court has no jurisdiction. and that the adjudication and other proceedings in this cause should be set aside and vacated.

SEAMEN — LIABILITY FOR LOSS BY NEGLIGENCE — LIMITATION ON DUTY OF OBEDIENCE.

[1. Where the mates and crew of a vessel discharge ballast into a lighter or barge so carelessly as to load her on one side, and cause her to sink, they are liable to the owner for the loss.]

[2. Mariners are not required to obey all orders unconditionally; but it is their right and duty, when they believe that work is being done in an improper or dangerous manner, to call their officers' attention thereto, and remonstrate with them. If they fail to do so, they are liable with the officers for a resulting loss.]

[3. When the fault or negligence is not clearly fixed on any particular one connected with the ship, all must contribute in the ratio of wages.]

In admiralty.

Mr. Peters, Jr., for complainant.

J. Ingersoll, for respondents.

PETERS, District Judge. At Norfolk in Virginia, the ship was discharging stone ballast. A flat bottomed scow was used as a lighter to convey the ballast to the strand. The ballast was thrown into the scow from buckets, in which it had been hoisted out of the hold. These were borne to and off the side of the ship; both mates, at times, assisting. They were discharged into the scow lying alongside at random, and their contents left to find their own position in the scow, or part to fall into the sea, as chance directed. No pains or care were taken to trim the scow, which had a considerable list towards the ship's side, and was so left, with about six inches free-board, when the mate, second mate and all hands went to dinner. After their meal, they proceeded to discharge the ballast in the mode which had been previously pursued. Three buckets being (after dinner) emptied into the scow, she began to take in water; and not till then did the mate (who commanded in the captain's absence) direct measures to be taken for trimming the ballast in the scow, though a hand might have been spared for that purpose from the commencement of her lading. She went down and was lost soon after the discharge of the third bucket. The mate's idea was that the scow, before any danger occurred, could be turned round so that the off side might receive more ballast, and settle her on an even bottom. He viewed from time to time her situation; and so did the second mate, and most, if not all, of the crew, though generally engaged at the tackle fall. No apprehension of danger was expressed on going to dinner, or at any other time, by any person. The second mate and some of the crew who were witnesses (under releases, from claim of contribution) now declare, that the scow was injudiciously laden, and that a hand should have been kept in her constantly to trim the ballast. Being asked why they did not remonstrate at the time against the mode taken to lade the scow, they replied, that "the mate was in command; and they had no right to interfere; especially as he had high notions of his authority." He appeared to have been a strict, and therefore not a favorite, officer.

The respondents set up a claim to the value of the scow lost, against the mate solely. The complainant's counsel contended that it was either a loss by unavoidable accident, for which neither the mate nor crew were responsible; or, if gross negligence appeared, or misfeasance, there should be a general contribution. It was difficult to determine whether the mate was solely amenable and in fault; though I had no doubt as to the injudicious mode of lading the scow, which should have been more carefully attended to, as it was the first attempt to load this lighter. If the second mate or any of the crew had deemed (as the former said he had) this mode of lading the ballast uncommon, or dangerous, it was their duty to have represented the matter to the mate. If they had so done, and he had persisted, it would indubitably have been at his sole risk. By not thus representing or protesting against it they took their share of risk and responsibility. It is a mistaken notion among mariners (many of whom are disobedient enough in plain cases) that they are compelled unconditionally to obey all orders. This is not seldom an affectation of strict duty; and they obey orders evidently wrong, or perceive in silence ruinous omissions when the consequences are exposures of officers they dislike. But this is a nice and dangerous game. If a casualty producing loss occurs, they share in the retribution; notwithstanding such insidious obedience, and hypocritical delicacy. They are bound by a superior duty, to guard the property of the owner. The law thus reconciles obedience with justice, by making it their duty to remonstrate and warn on proper occasions, before they obey, under the penalty of sharing the consequences. But if they give due warning and information they are free from participation in retribution for loss. Thus it has often been decided here,[1] in cases of bad stowage, bad ropes, or other defective tackle and furniture. Their remonstrances are not to be considered as impertinent interferences, but just and warrantable exercises of their rights and duty.

In the case in question, no warning or opinion was given; and the whole were thus inculpated. An officer may err in judgment, without perceiving the consequences. It is the interest as well as the duty of those who must respond with him to the owners, at least to endeavor to set him right. If he persists in error, it is solely at his own peril. There have been cases of exception to this rule, attended with special circumstances. If, in this case, the lighter had been (as was alleged but not proved) rotten and incompetent, the owner or his agent must have suffered the loss. The officers and crew would not have been liable to contribution, unless they, or some of them, knew the circumstance, and failed to warn or remonstrate to the master or mate, who in such cases, may be ignorant of the deficiency. The general contribution is first regarded. Strong circumstances must exist to charge an individual; and those of this case do not seem to be so strongly marked as to warrant an exception. At least, doubted whether the proof amounted to error in judgment or culpa negligentia. But being clearly of opinion that there had been misfeasance; and no warning or protest, I deem it right to retribute the owner by general contribution. This must be made in the ratio of wages. The master and the whole of the ship's equipage, must contribute. Where the fault is not clearly fixed on an individual, the obligation of the whole to retribute the owner predominates;

[1] See Wilson v. The Belvidere [Case No. 17,790], for the general duties of mates; Crammer v. The Fair American [Id. 3,347], as to claims of exceptions from contribution; Mariners v. The Kensington [Id. 9,085]; and Wilson v. The Belvidere [supra], as to the duty of seamen to remonstrate.

and prevails against any allegation of innocence, as to any one or more of the officers or crew. This may bear hard on the faultless; but it is the policy of the maritime law, thus to compel the innocent to watch, and bring to retribution or punishment, those who are really chargeable with negligence, delinquency or crime. This obligation arises out of a peculiar necessity, appropriate to those of this occupation, who, from the nature of their employment, are thus made sponsors for each other.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBT—PROMISSORY NOTE HELD AS COLLATERAL SECURITY—CONSIDERATION.

F. offered for proof against the bankrupt's estate three promissory notes signed by C., to his own order. The assignee appeared before the register and objected to the allowance of the notes. On the hearing before the court, the evidence showed that the notes were accommodation notes, delivered to F. as collateral security for an existing debt, before they were due, and without notice of any infirmity or defense; that not being paid at maturity, they were protested, and due notice given to the indorsers. The only question before the court was whether the notes, being delivered to F. as collateral security, were open to the defense of want of consideration on the part of the bankrupt. Held, that want of consideration to one who becomes a bona fide holder for value before a note becomes due is no defense, and that the notes in question should be admitted to proof.

[See Bank of Columbia v. French, Case No. 867.]

In bankruptcy.

CLARK, District Judge. Before the register, Fogg Bros. offered for proof against the bankrupt, three notes, all signed by Wm. H. Crawford, payable to his own order, and by him indorsed; and also by the bankrupt, and others. The first of these notes was dated January 10th, 1872, for one thousand dollars. on five months. The second, January 22d, 1872, for one thousand dollars, on five months. The third, February 21st, 1872, for one thousand dollars, on five months. The assignee [W. W. Stickney] appeared before the register and objected to the allowance of the notes against the estate of the bankrupt, and thereupon an issue was framed and transmitted to this court. Upon hearing had before the court, it appeared that these notes were accommodation notes, for the benefit of the maker, Crawford; that he delivered the same to Fogg Bros. as collateral security for an existing debt, before they were due, and without notice of any infirmity or defense, and not being paid at maturity, the notes were protested, and notice given to the indorsers.

The only question before the court was, whether the notes, being delivered to Fogg Bros. as collateral security, were open to the defense of want of consideration, on the part of the bankrupt. In New Hampshire, it has been repeatedly held, that notes pledged as collateral security are open to the same defense as they would be in the hands of the payee. Williams v. Little, 11 N. H. 66; Fletcher v. Chase, 16 N. H. 39; Bank v. Kent, 15 N. H. 579; Rice v. Raitt, 17 N. H. 116. But in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 15–22, 14 Curt. Dec. 166, the subject of the transfer of notes was fully considered, and a different doctrine was held. In delivering the opinion of the court, Justice Story remarked, "establish the opposite conclusion; that negotiable paper cannot be applied in payment of, or as security for, pre-existing debts, without letting in all the equities between the original and antecedent parties, and the value of such securities must be essentially diminished, and the debtor driven to embarrassment in making sale thereof, often at a ruinous discount." In the same case, and also in Watson v. Tarpley, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 517, it was held, that the decision of a state court could not control the decision of the United States courts as to the commercial law, and this court feel bound by the decision of the United States supreme court, rather than by the decisions of the state court.

It is well settled, that the want of consideration is no defense to a note against one who becomes a bona fide holder for value, before the note is due. This is so even in New Hampshire, if the holder had no notice of the invalidity of the note. Perkins v. Challis, 1 N. H. 254; Peck v. Maynard, 20 N. H. 183. Other authorities hold, that it is not any defense or bar, that the note was known to the holder to be an accommodation note, between the other parties, if he takes it for value, bona fide, before it comes due. Story, Bills, 230, § 194, and authorities cited; Brown v. Mott, 7 Johns. 361. There was no proof in this case that Fogg Bros. had any notice of any want of consideration for the notes.

The only question then would seem to be, did the Fogg Bros., holding the notes as collateral security, hold them for value? Chitty says, if a bill or note be indorsed as a collateral security, that is an adequate consideration to enable the party to sue thereon though he advance no new credit on the bill or note. Chit. Bills, 85; Heywood v. Watson, 4 Bing. 496. Story says, every person is, in the sense of the rule, treated as a bona fide holder for value, not only when he has advanced money or other value for it, but when he has received it in payment of a precedent debt, or when he has a lien on it, or has taken it as collateral security for a precedent debt; or for further, as well as for past advances. Story, Notes, 231, § 195, and authorities cited. Guided by these considerations and authorities, I think the creditors may prove their debts in this case for the notes and interest, with costs of protest, as stated by them in their proof before the register.

NONSUIT—OF RIGHT BY PLAINTIFF AND WITHOUT PREJUDICE—IN APPELLATE COURT—APPEAL IN ADMIRALTY—JUDGMENT ON THE MERITS.

1. In cases at law, as in chancery or admiralty, the prosecuting party could of right become nonsuit in the original court, on payment of costs, at any time before the case was ready and opened for trial, and some pertinent evidence offered, so that the merits could be ascertained and decided; but after that, he could not become nonsuit so as not to be barred, unless the opposite party consented, or the court for sufficient reason gave leave. Such reason might be surprise, or unexpected absence either of witnesses or counsel.

[Cited in Carr v. Gale, Case No. 2,435.]

2. Formerly a nonsuit could be of right by the plaintiff at any time before judgment, and now in some states at any time before verdict. But the first gave undue advantage to plaintiffs over defendants, and is not the law now in England. Nor can this court order a nonsuit, unless as a penalty for not obeying some rule. If the plaintiff object, and has offered any evidence proper to be weighed by the jury, the corresponding test is in each the same.

[Cited in Jackson v. Waldron, 5 Fed. 246.]

3. In an appellate court, after a case is entered, the original plaintiff, who is appellant, and recovered judgment below, but not for so much as he desired, cannot become nonsuit without prejudice on payment of costs, if the defendant object. But when the appellant declines to prosecute his appeal further, the court should give judgment on the merits.

[Cited in U. S. v. Humason, 8 Fed. 73; Johnson v. Bailey, 59 Fed. 673.]

4. This course is proper on an appeal in admiralty, and in all other appellate courts, where a judgment can be rendered in chief on the merits.

5. It is especially proper in such cases, if the evidence is in writing, and comes up with the case, as the court has full means then to render judgment on the merits, if the plaintiff declines to prosecute the appeal further. But if the evidence does not come up in writing in the record, or has not yet been filed in the appellate court, the judgment below must be the guide, and be affirmed. It is prima facie right till shown to be wrong.

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

This was a libel brought originally July 23, 1846, in the district court for salvage for assistance rendered to the vessel called the Robert G. Shaw, while stranded and in distress. [Case unreported.] A decree was given in favor of the libellant [Peter Folger] for $275, November 17th, 1846, and an appeal claimed from it, by the libellant to this court, on account of the smallness of the salvage allowed. The appeal was entered here, May term, 1847, and towards the close of the term in June, 1847, the libellant moved that he have leave to discontinue his prosecution entirely, by a dismissal of the case without prejudice to his bringing another action elsewhere.

Mr. Crowninshield, for libellant.

Mr. Fletcher, for respondent.

Before the opinion was pronounced, at an adjourned session in September, 1847, the counsel stated that the case had been arranged, but they wished to hear the opinion of the court.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. A court of admiralty differs in various respects from a court of law in its forms of proceeding, as well as in its principles of decision. But it has rules of practice, though more flexible, and to sustain them can award costs, and should against a party guilty of a false clamor, or in fault either in preliminary or final proceedings. See Deshon v. Medora [Case No. 3,820], and cases in Burnham v. Rangely [Id. 2,177]; 2 Bac. Abr. "Court of Admiralty," E. When it ought to do more and bar other suits, by rendering judgment in chief between the parties as well as awarding costs, is the chief question in the present case, and is not without difficulty both in theory and practice. Certain it is, that there is one test where such a judgment cannot be rendered. There would be some absurdity involved in giving a final judgment as if on the merits, when the case had not proceeded so far as to exhibit the merits either in the pleadings or evidence. What judgment must then be rendered in such cases, when either party has neglected or refused to proceed so far as to exhibit the merits? Manifestly, if it be the plaintiff, the judgment should be a nonsuit, or discontinuance, or dismissal of the case, varying in form, but not in substance, all being, in such preliminary stages of the action, but a mode of punishing the plaintiff merely by costs for his neglect to proceed, or for his apparent false clamor. Jac. Dict. "Nonsuit"; 3 Bl. Comm. 295; Gilbreth v. Brown, 15 Mass. 178; 5 Dane, Abr. 676. See the form of entry, Cro. Jac. 213; 5 Bac. Abr. "Nonsuit," A.

It is true, that nonsuits and dismissals may be on the merits at times, but then they are rendered on a different state of facts, and usually in a different stage of the proceedings, the case having gone forward so far, that the merits can be ascertained and properly settled. The presumption is, however, that all nonsuits and dismissals are formal, in order to mulct negligence in costs; and they imply merely a failure to prosecute, an unwillingness to proceed further in this action, rather than necessarily a want of merits. Apsden v. Nixon, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 467; Burnham v. Webster [Case No. 2,179]; Greely v. Smith [Id. 5,749]; Minor v. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 74. When they are designed as a bar and are voluntary by the plaintiff, they should be in the form of a retraxit, and thus stipulate to prosecute no further in another suit. 5 Coke, 58; Bac. Abr. "Nonsuit," A. Under certain statutes in England, judgments in later stages of a cause may, also, be "as in case of a nonsuit" (see 14 Geo. II. c. 17, § 1; 1 Dowl. Pr. Cas. 561); in case the plaintiff, for neglect to be ready or comply with various orders of the court, is punished by a nonsuit and costs, and compelled, if he sues further, to begin his case de novo (see 13 Car. II. c. 2; Oldham v. Burrell, 7 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 26; 2 Tidd, Pr. 730, 785, and cases cited; 2 Chit. Cas. 283; 2 H. Bl. 219; 5 Bac. Abr. "Nonsuit," A). But there is no judgment on the merits so as to prejudice or bar another suit.

In chancery the entry in like circumstances is, that the bill is dismissed. Yet the effects of all of these are the same when under like circumstances; and if they happen before the merits can be ascertained, they are allowed on payment of costs, and are no bar on the merits. The books of practice are rather meagre as to the form adopted in admiralty, under similar circumstances. But as the libel there is a substitute for the writ and declaration at common law, and for the bill in chancery, I see no reason why it may not be abandoned, or discontinued in a like stage of proceedings with the others, and with a like effect. Whether it be called a nonsuit, or discontinuance, or desertion of the cause, is immaterial; but it should operate as a mere discontinuance, if at a time when the merits are not developed, and cannot be ascertained. I have assumed as the guiding principle, it being the only one conceivable by me, that the precise stage, in which the discontinuance should be allowed without a judgment on the merits, and as a matter of right if claimed by the prosecuting party, is any progress in the cause, which has not yet furnished means to the court for a correct final decision.

Another proof showing this to be the best test is, that where a cause has advanced to that extent in a court of law, or has become ready and opened for trial on pertinent evidence, but the trial is not yet closed, the court, before which it is thus proceeding, cannot nonsuit the party without his consent. He has then become entitled to a hearing and decision by a jury on the pertinent evidence he has offered. But, in most cases, if no evidence is offered by the plaintiff, and objections in law appear on the record which are fatal and final, the court can order him to be nonsuited on the merits; and a nonsuit should then operate as a bar to another action. Tidd, Pr. 796; 1 Wend. 376; 2 Greenl. 5; 2 South. [5 N. J. Law] 851. So if the plaintiff makes out no case, before a rebuttal by the defendant. 3 Greenl. 97; 1 Pick. 328; Conk. Pr. 275. But if there be any evidence to be considered, it is improper for the court to dispose of the case on the merits by nonsuit, unless the plaintiff consent, but rather must submit the evidence to a jury, with appropriate instructions. Rose v. Learned, 14 Mass. 154; 17 Mass. 249; [Doe v. Grymes] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 469; [Crane v. Lessee of Morris] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 598; 13 Johns. 334; 6 Pick. 117; 2 Bin. 248, 254; 4 Vt. 363; Anonymous [Case No. 475]; Huidekoper v. McClean [Id. 6,852]; Doe v. Grymes, supra; D'Wolf v. Rabaud, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 497. There are some qualifications of this rule (8 Mass. 336; 17 Mass. 1), that need not be now examined. This rule proceeds on the ground, that when a plaintiff appears once and enters on the trial of his case, having offered pertinent evidence, he is entitled to go on, and, if he can, obtain final judgment upon the merits, unless he assents to withdraw, and be put out of court without such judgment. Watkins v. Towers, 2 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 275; 2 Tidd, Pr. 798; 2 Adol. & E. 166; Doe v. Grymes, supra; Ward v. Mason, 9 Price, 291; 13 Price, 222; 2 Bing. 258; Grahame v. Harris, 5 Gill & J. 489. This illustration furnishes the true clue for the corresponding proposition, when the plaintiff has a right to become nonsuit, without prejudice to the merits. It is where the action has reached such a stage, that the defendant cannot be obliged by the plaintiff to let the latter go out of court without some final judgment on the matter itself, which is in dispute.

Each party should have somewhat similar rights in respect to such a subject; and the great inquiry is, when the plaintiff must be compelled to stop to exercise this power, as a right of withdrawing, without being barred from bringing another action? That is the precise question here; when that stage must be considered as reached? The rules of practice do not seem to be entirely uniform on this point, and have become more rigid in modern times than anciently. But I apprehend that the principle which must govern it, is that before indicated, and which is, that this act must be done at some period before the merits can be ascertained for a final judgment, or the plaintiff is not entitled to do it as a right. Thus it seems plain, from the great current of the cases, and it is reasonable in principle, that a party, if he pleases, on paying costs, should abandon his suit, and a nonsuit be permissible, after every continuance before trial, on a call of the case to see if the parties are in readiness for trial. Then the plaintiff is demandable in court and does not choose to appear, and there is nothing yet by which the merits can be ascertained. 3 Salk. 244, 245; Haskell v. Whitney, 12 Mass. 48. Formerly a nonsuit used to be common during the trial and before verdict. Steph Pl. 130, 313; 3 Bl. Comm. 376. Once it could be even after a verdict, if the court took time to consider on the case. Id.; 1 Inst. 139, C. The test as to the time then was before a final judgment (Steph. Pl. 130); and the plaintiff might be nonsuit even after a verdict, if he did not like the amount of damages given by the jury (5 Mod. 208; Co. Litt. 139b). But this practice held out too great an encouragement to repeated and vexatious suits, and gave an advantage to a plaintiff which the defendant did not enjoy, of a prolonged litigation, and new and various experiments and trials. In the hands of wealth and power, exercised against moderate means, it would be likely in time to break down any antagonist. Consequently now, it is forbidden by statute in England in such cases (2 Hen. IV.; Bac. Abr. "Nonsuit," D), though it is still allowed sometimes as a favor after a special verdict, which is considered a mere finding of facts which are further to be considered by the court (3 Leon. 28). So after that statute passed, a nonsuit was for a time allowed after a demurrer. Co. Litt. 139. But I find no modern cases of allowing a nonsuit, as a matter of right, after a special verdict or a demurrer joined, and I doubt the propriety of them in principle. Cro. Jac. 35.

The true test seems to be the progress in the case, so that the court have means to decide on the merits. The defendant then has rights, and may well insist on a final judgment, to avoid further expense and litigation. Thus it often happens in the supreme court of the United States. on an appeal, that the court, when one side does not appear, proceed to hear the other, and render judgment on the merits. U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 626. And by the 30th rule of that court, either party can claim a hearing and decision on the merits. 1 How. 30, pref. Because in that court no new testimony or pleadings generally take place, and the case is in a state to be heard and decided on the merits whenever it is entered. Looking to this condition of things as the general test, whenever it exists, whether in a court of original or appellate jurisdiction, it settles the question, when of right the plaintiff can be nonsuit or not. Hence it is according to several decisions, strengthening that test. customary, before trial, to allow a nonsuit at the assizes as a right; but not at or after the trial is begun, by offering evidence. 6 Mart. [La.] 678; 8 Mart. [La.] 20; Cree v. Roll, 3 Salk. 246; Semb. Creswell, J., in 5 Man. & G. 590, and 6 Scott, N. R. 631. Nor is a discontinuance allowed, except for special cause after a rule for judgment on a demurrer or on pleas, for like reasons; as then the merits can be decided on, and the defendant then has gone far enough to claim final judgment on the controversy. Turner v. Turner, 1 Salk. 179. So it has been held to be too late for the plaintiff to claim a right to be nonsuit, without consent of the defendant or leave of the court, after a submission of a case to referees. even though no testimony has been put in at that time. 12 Mass. 49. Because neither party, after such submission, is demandable in court till a report is made, and either may proceed ex parte, if the other declines, and have a report made. It seems also, by some cases, to be too late, if the defendant is ready to enter on the trial, with his evidence present, and then the plaintiff proposes a nonsuit as a right (2 Rolle, Abr. 131), while in other states the plaintiff is allowed to become nonsuit, at any time before the verdict is read by the clerk (3 McCord, 559; 4 Watts, 308; Wooster v. Burr, 2 Wend. 295; 5 Dane, Abr. 677). In others, it is limited to any time before the trial itself (Haskell v. Whitney, 12 Mass. 47), and is not allowed after the verdict is returned, though not recorded, unless then allowed by leave of the court, for good cause (Locke v. Wood, 16 Mass. 317; 6 Ham. [Ohio] 144; 1 Overt. 476; Veazie v. Wadleigh, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 61). In some states it is granted before the verdict is recorded. Hunt v. Morris, 6 Mart. [La.] 677.

I think, however. the readiness for the trial, the call of the case, the expiration of the notice, and the introduction of any pertinent evidence, is, as before intimated, the true punctum temporis, when the right of the plaintiff to become nonsuit ceases, and that of the defendant begins for a final judgment; because, then, the parties have agreed in court, that final proceedings shall be had, then there is a presumed readiness for them, then they have begun, and means are before the court to settle the merits. Both parties then stand on an equality; neither is taken at disadvantage then, by requiring judgment on the merits, unless special and good cause be assigned to the court for leave to become nonsuit; and then, so far as regards the defendant, a nonsuit by the plaintiff, at pleasure, as a right, is more vexatious; as then the mere costs are usually an inadequate remuneration for the expense of another preparation, and then a decision on the merits, if desired by the defendant, is practicable in most cases, without being subjected to another action and preparation. It will be seen, that this test requires the case to have been opened to the jury. and some pertinent evidence submitted, if it be a trial on the general issue; or that the pleadings be closed if ending in a demurrer, so that the merits can be judged of understandingly upon them. 2 Madd. 389; 13 Ves. 168, note; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 456. So in chancery, the evidence must be to some extent filed or published; and by like analogy, in admiralty, in the court where the original proceedings are instituted, the evidence must be put in, so far as to enable a decision on the merits to be made. See cases, supra. Applying this principle to the present case, this motion could be easily disposed of, if no appeal had taken place. and the cause was still pending in that court. It probably would not be contended, that after a hearing and judgment in the district court a nonsuit was permissible as a matter of right in that court. All the analogies heretofore referred to, as well as principle and precedents, forbid it. [Veazie v. Wadleigh] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 61.

The next and last inquiry is, whether this case being now in an appellate court, this principle does or does not apply to it? and how far, and under what circumstances or stages of the appeal, this principle applies? As a matter of fact, the present motion is made after pertinent evidence has been put in concerning the merits, and a decision had on it. But it was not put in before us, the appellate court, and of that evidence itself, as put in below, we have had no hearing so as to decide the merits on it. But though not hearing the evidence below, we have, as some guide to the merits, the judgment there rendered on it. This seems quite sufficient proof, at least prima facie, as to the merits after a full hearing, and after the appeal from it here is proposed to be abandoned. In reply to this it is said, that, in a technical appeal like this, where both the facts and law are open to re examination, the former judgment is vacated or annulled by the appeal itself. Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 54; Conk. Pr. 157; [Yeaton v. U. S.] 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 281; Bank of U. S. v. Swan, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 68. Appeals in admiralty do suspend the sentence below. Hall, Adm. 101; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 317. And it is lawful to make new allegations and proofs on leave, in the appellate court. The San Pedro, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 132, 141; The Venus, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 113; The Edward, Id. 261; Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 281; The James Wells v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 22; La Conception, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 235. No matter what is the form of the appeal, whether as in England by claiming what are called "apostles or brief letters" of dismission of the case, and declaring that the record will be transmitted (2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 438); or as here, usually viva voce, though at times, in writing, the result must be the same. See, further, as to the mode of appeal in admiralty cases, The San Pedro, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 132. Even the property follows the case to the circuit court, but not to the supreme court. The Collector, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 194; The Grotius [Case No. 5,844]. After an appeal to the circuit court, no order about it can be made by the district court. The Collector, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 194. But the original proceedings are all before the appellate court. The Santa Maria, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 431. Generally the evidence below is reduced to writing, and forms a part of them, and is before us with them. But the decree below is not dead to all purposes, but rather suspended while the appeal is pending; and if the claim is founded on a statute, which is repealed before the decree below is affirmed, the claim must fail. U. S. v. Preston, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 57. And in cases which go to the supreme court on a division of opinion below, the court below retains the cause; and before a decision of the questions carried up. may allow a discontinuance of the cause, and the questions fall with the discontinuance. [Veazie v. Wadleigh] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 62. There had been no verdict or judgment either in the court below or above in this case, or the discontinuance would have been too late as a matter of right. Id. 61, semble. Where an appeal is by writ of error, and in cases at common law, whether in the United States courts or state courts, or in England, the proceedings are usually regulated specially by statutes, and rest on them and other principles peculiar to such cases, and not like appeals in admiralty, as the present case is. See, on them, Act Cong. Sept. 24. 1789 [1 Stat. 84], §§ 22, 24; The Antelope, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 132. But those cases not being like this, need not be examined in detail. Supposing the appeal to operate here, as is contended, so as to supersede the judgment below, the case begins again in the appellate court on the old pleadings, evidence and preparation, unless leave is granted for new ones. La Conception, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 235. And the decision is all which remains to be considered and announced in the appellate court, when no motion is made for new pleadings or new proof.

Now it does not seem to me to be consistent with principle, that a case, standing here with pleadings completed, evidence taken, and all things ready for argument and final decision, should, undecided on the merits, be abandoned by the payment of costs, without the consent of the defendant, when, after so much expense and delay, he asks a final judgment upon the merits. In such case, the merits are likewise susceptible of being ascertained and settled, which is not the situation of things before pleadings are finished and evidence put in. In my view, then, a defendant, under such facts and in such a stage of the cause, has a right to object to a dismissal of the cause, or a discontinuance, unless by the judgment of the court on the merits, or perhaps a leave granted by it for a discontinuance for strong reasons. Nor can the plaintiff complain justly of this, when he has, without asking a discontinuance, advanced so far as to spread the merits of his claim before the appellate as well as the inferior court. It follows, therefore, that if an appeal like this be entered, and then refused to be proceeded in, the pleadings and evidence being all completed below and brought up here, or if not so, being all completed here, the judgment must generally be in chief, when the respondent insists on one upon the merits.

There are ample means for deciding on the merits then, and by analogy to the practice at common law, judgment cannot, in that advanced stage of the proceedings, be allowed as a nonsuit, dismissal, or any mere discontinuance, so as to enable the plaintiff again, as a matter of right, to harass or vex the respondent with new pleadings, new evidence, and new preparations throughout, with a prospect of such imperfect remuneration as exists in an ordinary bill of costs. I speak now of the right on general principles. But for strong reasons shown, this can be departed from, of course, by leave of the court. If the court see that they have no jurisdiction over the appeal, or the original cause, then they would not, in fact, promote mere litigation, by allowing the plaintiff to dismiss the cause, so that a new action can be brought where the proceedings would be valid. 1 Lil. Abr. 473. They would of course allow it in such a case in any stage. But there is no such reason assigned here for asking leave to have this cause dismissed without prejudice. It is important to discriminate what may be done as a discontinuance for special reasons and by leave of the court, from what can be so done as a matter of right. The former will be allowed, when the latter does not exist; and in very advanced stages of the case, if the reasons be strong. Cro. Jac. 35. Thus in such cases it was once customary to grant it after demurrer joined, or a verdict on a writ of inquiry. Sid. 84; 1 Salk. 178; Carth. 81; Boucher v. Lawson, Cas. t. Hardw. 200; 3 Lev. 440; Henderson v. Williamson, 1 Strange, 116. If granted after a special verdict, it is "a great favor," unless the defendant consents. Price v. Parker, 1 Salk. 178. What will constitute good reasons in chancery for leave to dismiss a bill without prejudice, may be seen in Mayor, etc., of Gloucester v. Wood, 3 Hare, 148. They may be surprise, absence of witnesses, or accidental absence of counsel. Haskell v. Whitney, 12 Mass. 49.

Supposing, then, that the evidence had come up in this case, as is usual in courts of appeal, in questions in admiralty as well as in chancery (and perhaps in appeals by writ of error also, when operating as a supersedeas, and the necessary matter appears on the record to enable the appellate court to decide on the merits), I entertain no doubt, that a nonsuit should not be permitted without judgment on those merits in bar to another suit, unless the defendant consent, or the court for some good reason, not yet assigned in this case, grant leave to do it. There may be something in the organization of some appellate courts, which may vary the mode of carrying such judgment into effect, but still it ought to be rendered, and the nonsuit not be otherwise allowed at so late a period unless on the merits. The general current of the precedents in such courts accords with this view. Thus in appeals by way of writ of error, but when not operating as a supersedeas, and not prosecuted in the court above to a decision, they are treated as new proceedings, and a party may be nonsuit, before the assignment of error, and costs are all that the respondent can ask or expect, as the former judgment stands in full force, unimpaired and unsuspended. 1 Sid. 255; 2 Rolle, Abr. 130; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 324; The Neptune, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 609; 5 Bac. Abr. "Nonsuit," C. So, if after an appeal is entered in the house of lords, neither party appears, all which the court can do, generally, is to dismiss the case for want of prosecution, and here it was without costs. The defendant claimed nothing else. Sherburne v. Middletown, 9 Clark & F. 72. So, if the respondent appear and not the appellant, and ask a dismissal of the appeal and costs for want of prosecution, it will be granted. In such case he asks nothing else, and virtually waives all beside that. Sherburne v. Middletown, 9 Clark & F. 72: Scanlan v. Usher, 8 Clark & F. 561. This practice arises probably from the fact, that the house of lords does not issue executions, and the judgment below is not superseded. But in some cases, where the affirmance did not appear to require an execution, the affirmance took place on motion, in the manner asked by the defendant here. Fraser v. Gordon, 3 Clark & F. 720. In like manner in this court, on an appeal in admiralty, though suspending the judgment below, if after duly entered, it is not prosecuted, and the defendant only asks costs, it might be proper only to give costs, and to enter no judgment on the merits when none is asked. 1 Hagg. Adm. 267. But if the defendant objects and asks judgment on the merits, after the case has gone so far as to be ready for a decision on them, it is very questionable whether the court will not give such a judgment. We can issue execution if necessary; and there are some proofs, grounds and data, on which to render judgment on the merits. The proceedings, which suspended or vacated the judgment below being abandoned, there ought to be judgment in chief renewed there or here. Certainly the court will not then allow leave to withdraw the case by dismission without prejudice; and lose all which has been done, except upon the strongest reasons assigned, showing the justice or necessity of it to effect what is right and legal. I regret that more cases in point, or strongly analogous, have not been presented nor found in the short time this cause has been under examination. But as I understand, that much property and the adjustment of accounts with several parties and insurance offices are tied up until this question is disposed of, I have given to it the best consideration in my power consistent with the emergency. My conclusion on the whole is, that the appeal here having been entered by the plaintiff, it could not be dismissed as if the original libel was nonsuited on payment of costs merely, provided the evidence in the court below had come up, as is usual, or been taken down in writing there, and presented here, so that the merits of the case could be decided in this stage of the proceedings in this particular cause. For then we should have full means of settling the merits before us, at the time of the proposed nonsuit. The defendant also asks it, and no good cause has been assigned for granting special leave to discontinue the original bill in this late stage of the cause. But it is now said, that none of the evidence in the court below was in writing, or filed either there or here before this motion, though it has been done since. Conceding this to be the true state of the case, we had no means, when this motion was made, to decide understandingly on the merits, looking only to the evidence; none had yet been placed before the appellate court. 2 Tidd, Pr. 996.

But there is another aspect of the case, standing thus, which may enable the appellate court to enforce the merits, and which has been merely glanced at before. It is, that the merits have been fully examined in the court below on the evidence and law; and though the judgment there rendered is appealed from, yet it is prima facie right until shown to be wrong. See Fuller v. Colby—Mass. Dist.; to be printed in next volume—[Case No. 5,149]. Hence by abandoning the attempt to have that judgment altered in this court, the presumption is, without other cause shown, that the judgment below is correct. The cause being in an appellate court by regular entry, we may be bound in such case to take the judgment below as our guide for the merits, when nothing else is shown as to them, and render one for the same party and sum as there, if the case be not prosecuted here by the appellant. I see no objection to this on principle, if the defendant does not object, it being as to the plaintiff all which he has recovered after one full hearing and trial, and more than he now chooses to attempt further to recover in this appellate tribunal, after putting the respondents to greater delay and costs. In the supreme court of the United States, if one party does not appear to argue a cause, the other has a right to proceed and ask for judgment on the record, and the court will hear him and give it. Siglar v. Haywood, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 677. And by several rules of that court when one party, after an entry of an appeal or writ of error, does not pursue it, the other side is entitled either to have the case dismissed, or to ask an affirmance of the judgment below. Rules 19, 30, 43; 1 How. pref. There is no difficulty as to forms any more than principle, in this appellate court pursuing such a course. Thus, where a cause is carried to the higher court by a writ of error, and where the latter has operated as a supersedeas, the judgment is sometimes rendered in a like way in the appellate court, as a judgment in chief, to carry into effect the decision before made in the court below. At other times the judgment is to reverse and amend or reform that given below. The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 562; Craig v. Radford, Id. 600. Again, frequently the case has to be remanded to be further tried below, according to the principles laid down in the appellate tribunal. [U. S. v. Robeson] 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 328; [Harrison v. Nixon] Id. 539. This last is where a jury is used below, and not in the court above. But that causes no embarrassment in this case here, this being an admiralty case, and of course triable in neither by a jury. If the judgments in such cases are reversed, the higher court, as before shown, can often render the judgment, which ought to have been rendered by the inferior tribunal; and in such case it does. See Choteau's Heirs v. U. S., 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 146; Yel. 117, 118; 2 Durn. & E. [2 Term R.] 657; 1 Bos. & P. 30; Carth. 181. And if it reverses the decision below, it will give to the successful party the costs he was entitled to there. 9 Clark & F. 818. If it affirm that decision, it will render judgment in chief to that effect, and enforce it with additional costs and interest.

Here the judgment can, therefore, be one affirming the decree below, because the appeal from it, though entered here, is not prosecuted. This principle was laid down in The San Juan Nepomuceno, 1 Hagg. Adm. 267; The Elizabeth, Id. 226. To be sure, there, no affirmance of the decree below was asked; but judgment was given that the appeal was deserted and for costs; and the operation of such a judgment, whether a bar of another action or not, does not seem to have been agitated. So in all the cases of appeals from the judgments of justices of the peace, and formerly from county courts to the supreme courts in New England, where, as in admiralty cases here, both the law and fact were tried over again, if the parties pleased and a discontinuance of the appeal, or failure to enter it, as well as a neglect to prosecute it after entered, were followed by a judgment in chief, if the opposite side desired it, taking the judgment below as the guide. The case was very common, when the appeal was not entered to file a complaint and a copy of the judgment below, and have that affirmed, with costs.

In cases in admiralty, where such an appeal is made and not entered, the judgment or decree in the appellate court is, as just shown in other appeals, against the libellant in chief for having deserted his appeal. Dunl. Pr. 323; The Montgomery v. The Betsey [Case No. 9,734]; 1 Hagg. Adm. 226. Or the case may be remitted to the court below for further proceedings there. And it surely can be and should be in chief, if desired by the respondent, and if rendered in chief, the judgment below is the only and the true guide. It would be very extraordinary that such a judgment in chief can be rendered here, when the appeal is not entered, which seems to be well settled, and cannot be, after it is entered and not prosecuted.

If the original libellant then declines to prosecute his appeal further in this court, the judgment below will be affirmed; as no reason appears why the libel should be allowed to be discontinued without a decision on the merits, merely on the payment of costs, in this advanced stage of the proceedings.

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1844.

DEED—PROOF OF SEAL—ACKNOWLEDGMENT—ACTION OF DISSEISIN—INADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION.

1. An action of disseisin is authorized and regulated by the statute of Indiana.

2. Where there is doubt whether an instrument has been sealed, the fact is properly referable to the jury.

[Cited in Re Phillips, Case No. 11,098.]

3. Persons acquainted with parchment patents may be examined as to the traces of a seal. If it was the intention of the grantor to seal the instrument, any forcible indentation on the parchment, though it be not wax, wafer or a scrawl, may be a seal.

4. The person who took the acknowledgment was permitted to state, from his uniform practice in taking acknowledgments, he could not have taken it, in the case under consideration, had no seal been attached to the instrument.

5. Unless the inadequacy of consideration be so gross as to strike every person with a presumption of fraud, it is not evidence of unfairness.

[At law. Action by Follett's heirs against C. Rose.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of disseisin, given and regulated by the statute of Indiana, and is brought to recover a tract of land adjoining to the town of Terrehaute. The claim originated under the act of congress of the 5th of March, 1816, which granted bounties in land to certain Canadian volunteers. A military warrant which was issued to Follett, the ancestor of the plaintiffs, was laid upon the land in controversy, on which a patent was issued to him the 26th of October, 1816. Proof was made that the plaintiffs were the heirs at law of the patentee. The possession of the defendant was admitted. The defendant offered an instrument written on the back of the patent, which purports to be a confirmation of a previous deed, as well as a conveyance of the land patented, to ——, under whom the defendant claims. To this paper the plaintiffs object, because it has no seal, which is essential to the validity of a conveyance. On the part of the defendant it is insisted, that a seal was attached to the instrument when it was executed, and that by some accident it has been removed. Several witnesses were examined on this point, after inspecting the parchment, in the presence of the jury. One of the witnesses states, that, on a close examination, he finds some trace of a wafer seal on the parchment. That the place where he thinks this seal was attached, opposite the signature of the grantor, is different from any other place on the back of the patent, as it has the appearance of having had attached to it a wafer. Other witnesses, on examination, cannot see any evidence of a seal ever having been attached.

Ebenezer Hoskiss, before whom Follett and wife made the acknowledgment of the deed, among other things in his deposition says, "that he has not the least possible doubt, from his manner of doing business, and from his actual knowledge of what was necessary to constitute a deed, he being an attorney of the supreme court of the state of New York at the time, and for three years previously, that at the time of acknowledging and proving said deed by Follett and wife, the seals were duly attached to their names on said deed, and that since that time they have been lost off by time and accident; and further, this deponent is confident and thinks it morally impossible that said deed should have been thus acknowledged and sworn to by said Follett and wife without the seals being duly attached to the same. That had the seals not been on when said deed was presented he would, beyond doubt, have affixed them to it." A motion was made to overrule the above statement in the deposition as incompetent. But the court refused the motion, on the ground that the fact whether the instrument was sealed or not, was a matter for the jury. That the statements of the witness in regard to the seals were founded on his official action, from which his inferences were drawn, and that the jury must judge from the whole relation. The witness gives his reason for saying, with great confidence, why the instrument was sealed. A witness to the execution of an instrument may not be able to recollect the signing and delivery of the deed, but from his uniform practice in such cases he is enabled to say, that he could not have signed the instrument as a witness until it was executed by the obligor. Hoskiss was not a subscribing witness, but in regard to the sealing of the instrument he is within the rule. From his uniform practice in such cases, he is confident the seals were on the parchment when he took the acknowledgment. This evidence is fit to go to the jury, that they may give it, and the circumstances with which it stands connected, that weight which it should have.

To rebut this evidence, the plaintiffs introduced a certified copy of said instrument from the record of deeds of the proper county, from which it does not appear, that when recorded, which was the same year of its date, there were seals attached to it. There seems to be no controversy as to the execution of the other instruments under which the defendant claims; nor that the defendant is invested with the fee, if the above deed be valid. The principal point, as you will observe, gentlemen of the jury, turns on the fact, whether the instrument which purports upon its face to be a deed of conveyance, was a sealed instrument at the time it was executed. If it was not, the fee remains in the plaintiffs as the heirs of the patentee. You will examine the parchment to see if you can perceive any traces of a seal. The patent, as you perceive, is of an oily substance, to which a wafer, though made wet and pressed, would not strongly adhere. And this would especially be the case, where the pressure was made only by the hand.

From the words used on the face of this instrument, it purports to be a deed; and where this is the case, the solemnities required by law, such as signing, sealing, delivery, &c., in the absence of proof of the omission, is presumed. 17 Mass. 488; 3 Mass. 399; 10 Mass. 105; 11 Mass. 227. To suppose that the party, in such instances, complies with the rules of law, is merely to suppose he acts reasonably. The fact of sealing will be presumed, where no mark or impression on the parchment or paper appears, if the attestation notice the solemnity to have been complied with. But, there is no such fact stated in the attestation of this instrument. Wax or wafer is not essential, or a scrawl, to make a seal. An impression on the parchment or paper, with an intent to make a seal, is sufficient. If the witness saw the obligor sign, coupled with the circumstance of a declaration incorporated in the instrument, stating it to be sealed by him, it was held sufficient to warrant the jury in presuming that the deed had been regularly sealed and delivered. 7 Taunt. 521; Matth. Pres. Ev. 39.

The deed, it seems, was recorded the same year it bears date, and no seal appears upon the record. This is relied on by the plaintiffs as rebutting evidence. The jury will consider it as such, and give to it the weight that shall be proper. If, upon the whole, you shall come to the conclusion that the instrument was not sealed, you will find for the plaintiffs. Such an instrument is essential to pass the legal title out of the ancestor of the plaintiffs. The consideration paid was one hundred and forty dollars. This, it is insisted, is inadequate. But inadequacy of consideration does not invalidate a contract, unless it be so gross as to strike every one with a presumption of fraud. In this case there are no circumstances which authorise the inference of fraud. Under the occupying claimant law of Indiana, the occupant, should your decision be against him, will be entitled to compensation for his improvements, and must account for the rents.

The jury found the defendant not guilty.

FOLSOM et al. v. MARSH et al.

[2 Story, 100;[1] 6 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 175.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1841.

COPYRIGHT—ABRIDGMENT—LITERARY PROPERTY—OFFICIAL LETTERS—PIRACY—DEFINITION OF "BOOK."

1. An abridgment, in which there is a substantial condensation of the materials of the original work, and which requires intellectual labor and judgment, does not constitute a piracy of copyright; but an abridgment consisting of extracts of the essential or most valuable portions of the original work is a piracy.

[Applied in Lawrence v. Dana, Case No. 8,136. Quoted in Story v. Holcombe, Id. 13,497.]

2. An author of letters or papers of whatever kind, whether they be letters of business, or private letters, or literary compositions, has a property and an exclusive copyright therein, unless he unequivocally dedicate them to the public, or to some private person; and no person has any right to publish them without his consent, unless such publication be required to establish a personal right or claim, or to vindicate character.

[Cited in Bartlett v. Crittenden, Case No. 1,076; Stephens v. Cady, 14 How. (55 U. S.) 531; Richardson v. Miller, Case No. 11,791. Followed in Rice v. Williams, 32 Fed. 440.]

3. The government has, perhaps, a right to publish official letters addressed to it, or to any of its departments, by public officers; but no private person has such a right, without the sanction of the government.

4. To constitute a piracy of an original work, it is not necessary that the whole or the larger part of it should be taken; but it is only necessary that so much should be taken as sensibly to diminish the value of the original work, or substantially to appropriate the labors of the author.

5. Where A. published a "Life of Washington," containing 866 pages, of which 353 pages were copied from Sparks's "Life and Writings of Washington," 64 pages being official letters and documents, and 255 pages being private letters of Washington, originally published by Mr. Sparks, under a contract with the owners of the original papers of Washington,—it was held, that the work by A. was an invasion of the copyright of Mr. Sparks.

[Cited in Little v. Gould, Case No. 8,394.]

[6. Cited in Harper v. Shoppell, 26 Fed. 519, to the point that a "book," within the meaning of the copyright statute, is not necessarily a book in the ordinary and common acceptation of the word, but may consist of a single sheet, as well as of a number of sheets bound together.]

Bill in equity for piracy of the copyright of the writings of Washington. The bill in substance stated, that Jared Sparks was the author of a work entitled, "The Writings of George Washington, being his correspondence, addresses, messages, and other papers, official and private, selected and published from the original manuscripts, with a life of the author, notes, and illustrations, by Jared Sparks," consisting of 12 volumes, of all of which the copyright was duly taken out, the term of which copyright has still more than eight years to run. That the plaintiffs, Charles Folsom, Thomas G. Wells and Lyman Thurston, printers and publishers, under the style of Folsom, Wells and Thurston, had assumed a part of the risk and responsibility of publishing the said work, and that being in the receipt of large sums, the proceeds of the sale of the said work, Bela Marsh, Nahum Capen, Thomas B. Webb, and Gardner P. Lyon, booksellers, under the firm of Marsh, Capen and Lyon, and Charles W. Upham, all well knowing that the said Sparks held such copyright, and that the said Fulsom, Wells and Thurston, were interested as aforesaid, and deliberately, after due notice, intending to infringe upon the said copyright, at Boston, on August 5th, 1840, and at divers times before and since, without the allowance or consent of the orators, or either of them, published, and exposed to sale, and sold, a book in two volumes, entitled "The Life of Washington in the Form of an Autobiography, the narrative being to a great extent conducted by himself, in extracts and selections from his own writings, with portraits and other engravings," consisting of 866 pages, which they still continue to expose to sale, having had due notice, and well knowing, that the same is a copy from, and an infringement and piracy of, the said Life and Writings of George Washington so published by the plaintiffs. That 388 pages of the said piratical book are copied verbatim et literatim from the said work compiled by the said Sparks, consisting of matter published originally by the said Sparks, under his copyright, and which had never before been published or printed, and which the said Sparks had the exclusive right and privilege to print, publish, and sell. And that many other parts of the piratical work are infringements of the said Sparks's said copyright, whereby the plaintiffs have sustained great damage, and that the said Marsh, Capen and Lyon still threaten to continue to print, publish and sell, copies of the said piratical work. In consideration whereof, the plaintiffs pray that the defendants be decreed to render an account of the copies of the said piratical work, which they have sold, and to pay over the profits thereof to the plaintiffs; to surrender and deliver up all the copies on hand, and the stereotype plates of the said work, to an officer of the court, to be cancelled and destroyed; to pay the plaintiffs their costs, and that they be restrained by injunction from selling or exposing to sale, or causing to be exposed to sale or sold, or otherwise of disposing of any copies of the said piratical work, and for such other relief as shall seem meet, or as equity shall require.

The answer stated as follows: That the defendants, not confessing or acknowledging any of the matters and things alleged in the bill, are informed and believe that the said complainants are the publishers of the said Life and Writings of Washington, as alleged by the complainants, and that the said Sparks is author thereof. But that they totally deny that the said Sparks has, or has heretofore had, any copyright, whereby he is entitled to any exclusive publication of the said writings, correspondence, addresses, messages, and other papers. That the defendants did, on August the 5th, 1840, publish and sell, and before and since have, without the allowance and consent of the plaintiffs, published and sold copies of the said work, in two volumes, entitled a "Life of Washington, in the Form of an Autobiography," but that the said work is not a copy from, nor a piracy of the said work, by the said Sparks. The defendants deny that any part of the said work, published by the defendants, is copied verbatim et literatim from any portion of the said work by the said Sparks, to which he has any exclusive right and privilege to print, or publish, or sell. But they aver, that they have, in the work published by them, made such use as they might lawfully do, of the writings, correspondence, messages, addresses, and other papers, by George Washington, printed in the work compiled by the said Sparks, and that they have copied many pages of the said writings, from the original manuscript thereof, and from printed works, printed and published before the publication of the said work by the said Sparks, and that they have made such use thereof, as they might do in a work entirely distinct from and independent of the said work by the said Sparks, and they allege, that the said work published by them, is entirely a distinct and independent work from the work by the said Sparks.

The general replication being filed, the cause was referred to George Hillard, Esq., master in chancery, to ascertain and report the facts to the court. His report in substance stated as follows: The work, of which the plaintiffs are the proprietors, is comprised in twelve octavo volumes, varying in length from five hundred and forty to five hundred and ninety-two pages, and containing in the whole six thousand seven hundred and sixty-three pages, including one hundred and fifty-eight pages of index in the twelfth volume. The first volume consists of an original life of Washington by Mr. Sparks, one of the plaintiffs, and the remaining eleven, of the writings and correspondence of Washington, with editorial notes and illustrations by Mr. Sparks. The work, of which the defendants are the proprietors, is in two volumes, duodecimo. The first volume consists of four hundred and forty-three pages, including forty-one pages of glossary and index. The second volume consists of four hundred and twenty-three pages, including thirty-five pages of glossary and index. The whole amount of pages of the two volumes, is, therefore, eight hundred and sixty-six, including seventy-six pages of glossary and index. I find the whole number of pages in the two volumes of the defendants' work, which correspond with the passages in the plaintiffs' work, and are identical with them, to be (discarding fractions) three hundred and fifty-three. Of these pages, three hundred and nineteen have never appeared in print before the publication of the plaintiffs' work, and I accordingly report them to have been copied by the defendants from the work of the plaintiffs. The remaining thirty-four pages have appeared before, in various other publications, with the variations hereinbefore stated. In view of these variations, and also in consideration of the fact, that these passages in the defendants' work, generally speaking, differ in punctuation and other typographical peculiarities from the same passages as contained in works, other than that of the plaintiffs, I find that these thirty-nine pages were taken by the defendants from the plaintiffs' work, and none other. The whole of these three hundred and fifty-three pages, in the two volumes of the defendants' work, are taken from the last eleven volumes of the work of the plaintiffs. Of the three hundred and nineteen pages, above mentioned, which are in the work of the defendants, and which have not been published in any other work than that of the plaintiffs, I report sixty-four pages to be official letters and documents, and two hundred and fifty-five pages to be private. Of the remaining thirty-four pages, I report fifteen pages to be private, and nineteen pages to be official. Under the head of "official" letters and papers, I class the following: Letters addressed by Washington, as commander-in-chief, to the president of congress. Official letters to governors of states and speakers of legislative bodies. Circular letters. General orders. Communications (official) addressed as president to his cabinet. Letter accepting the command of the army, on our expected war with France. All others I class as "private."

The cause was argued upon the master's report, (no exception having been filed thereto,) by Mr. Robbins and Willard Phillips for the plaintiffs, and by R. Rantoul for the defendants.

The points made by the defendants were as follows:

I. The papers of George Washington are not subjects of copyright. 1. They are manuscripts of a deceased person, not injured by publication of them. 2. They are not literary, and, therefore, are not literary property. 3. They are public in their nature, and, therefore, are not private property. 4. They were meant by the author for public use.

II. Mr. Sparks is not the owner of these papers, but they belong to the United States, and may be published by any one.

III. An author has a right to quote, select, extract or abridge from another, in the composition of a work essentially new.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is one of those intricate and embarrassing questions, arising in the administration of civil justice, in which it is not, from the peculiar nature and character of the controversy, easy to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion, or to lay down any general principles applicable to all cases. Patents and copyrights approach, nearer than any other class of cases belonging to forensic discussions, to what may be called the metaphysics of the law, where the distinctions are, or at least may be, very subtile and refined, and, sometimes, almost evanescent. In many cases, indeed, what constitutes an infringement of a patented invention, is sufficiently clear and obvious, and stands upon broad and general agreements and differences; but, in other cases, the lines approach very near to each other, and, sometimes, become almost evanescent, or melt into each other. So, in cases of copyright, it is often exceedingly obvious, that the whole substance of one work has been copied from another, with slight omissions and formal differences only, which can be treated in no other way than as studied evasions; whereas, in other cases, the identity of the two works in substance, and the question of piracy, often depend upon a nice balance of the comparative use made in one of the materials of the other; the nature, extent, and value of the materials thus used; the objects of each work; and the degree to which each writer may be fairly presumed to have resorted to the same common sources of information, or to have exercised the same common diligence in the selection and arrangement of the materials. Thus, for example, no one can doubt that a reviewer may fairly cite largely from the original work, if his design be really and truly to use the passages for the purposes of fair and reasonable criticism. On the other hand, it is as clear, that if he thus cites the most important parts of the work, with a view, not to criticise, but to supersede the use of the original work, and substitute the review for it, such a use will be deemed in law a piracy. A wide interval might, of course, exist between these two extremes, calling for great caution and involving great difficulty, where the court is approaching the dividing middle line which separates the one from the other. So, it has been decided that a fair and bonâ fide abridgment of an original work, is not a piracy of the copyright of the author. See Dodsley v. Kinnersley, 1 Amb. 403; Whittingham v. Wooler, 2 Swanst. 428, 430, 431, note; Tonson v. Walker, 3 Swanst. 672–679, 681. But, then, what constitutes a fair and bonâ fide abridgment, in the sense of the law, is one of the most difficult points, under particular circumstances, which can well arise for judicial discussion. It is clear, that a mere selection, or different arrangement of parts of the original work, so as to bring the work into a smaller compass, will not be held to be such an abridgment. There must be real, substantial condensation of the materials, and intellectual labor and judgment bestowed thereon; and not merely the facile use of the scissors; or extracts of the essential parts, constituting the chief value of the original work. See Gyles v. Wilcox, 2 Atk. 141.

In the present case, the work alleged to be pirated, is the Writings of President Washington, in twelve volumes, royal octavo, containing nearly seven thousand pages, of which the first volume contains a life of Washington, by the learned editor, Mr. Sparks, in respect to which no piracy is asserted or proved. The other eleven volumes consist of the letters of Washington, private and official, and his messages and other public acts, with explanatory notes and occasional illustrations by the editor. That the original work is of very great, and, I may almost say, of inestimable value, as the repository of the thoughts and opinions of that great man, no one pretends to doubt. The work of the defendants is in two volumes, duodecimo, containing eight hundred and sixty-six pages. It consists of a Life of Washington, written by the learned defendant, (the Rev. Charles W. Upham), which is formed upon a plan different from that of Mr. Sparks, and in which Washington is made mainly to tell the story of his own life, by inserting therein his letters and his messages, and other written documents, with such connecting lines in the narrative, as may illustrate and explain the times and circumstances, and occasions of writing them. Now, as I have already said, there is no complaint, that Mr. Upham has taken his narrative part, substantially, from the Life by Mr. Sparks. The gravamen is, that he has used the letters of Washington, and inserted, verbatim, copies thereof from the collection of Mr. Sparks. The master finds, by his report, that the whole number of pages in Mr. Upham's work, corresponding and identical with the passages in Mr. Sparks's work, are three hundred and fifty-three pages out of eight hundred and sixty-six, a fraction more than one third of the two volumes of the defendants. Of these three hundred and fifty-three pages, the report finds that three hundred and nineteen pages consist of letters of Washington, which have been taken from Mr. Sparks's work, and have never been published before; namely, sixty-four pages are official letters and documents, and two hundred and fifty-five pages are private letters of Washington. The question, therefore, upon this admitted state of the facts, resolves itself into the point, whether such a use, in the defendants' work, of the letters of Washington, constitutes a piracy of the work of Mr. Sparks.

It is objected, in the first place, on behalf of the defendants, that the letters of Washington are not, in the sense of the law, proper subjects of copyright, for several reasons: (1) Because they are the manuscripts of a deceased person, not injured by the publication thereof; (2) because they are not literary compositions, and, therefore, not susceptible of being literary property, nor esteemed of value by the author; (3) because they are, in their nature and character, either public or official letters, or private letters of business; and (4) because they were designed by the author for public use, and not for copyright, or private property. Now, in relation to the last objection, it is most manifest, that President Washington deemed them his own private property, and bequeathed them to his nephew, the late Mr. Justice Washington, through whom the late Mr. Chief Justice Marshall and Mr. Sparks acquired an interest therein; and, as appears from the contract between these gentlemen, annexed to the report, the publication of these writings was undertaken by Mr. Sparks, as editor, for their joint benefit; and the work itself has been accomplished at great expense and labor, and after great intellectual efforts, and very patient and comprehensive researches, both at home and abroad. The publication of the defendants, therefore, to some extent, must be injurious to the rights of property of the representatives and assignees of President Washington. Indeed, as we shall presently see, congress have actually purchased these very letters and manuscripts, at a great price, for the benefit of the nation, from their owner and possessor under the will of Mr. Justice Washington, as private and most valuable property. That President Washington, therefore, intended them exclusively for public use, as a donation to the public, or did not esteem them of value as his own private property, appears to me to be a proposition, completely disproved by the evidence. Unless, indeed, there be a most unequivocal dedication of private letters and papers by the author, either to the public, or to some private person, I hold, that the author has a property therein, and that the copyright thereof exclusively belongs to him. Then as to the supposed distinction between letters of business, or of a mere private or domestic character, and letters, which, from their character and contents, are to be treated as literary compositions, I am not prepared to admit its soundness or propriety. It is extremely difficult to say, what letters are or are not literary compositions. In one sense, all letters are literary, for they consist of the thoughts and language of the writer reduced to written characters, and show his style and his mode of constructing sentences, and his habits of composition. Many letters of business also embrace critical remarks and expressions of opinion on various subjects, moral, religious, political and literary. What is to be done in such cases? Even in compositions confessedly literary, the author may not intend, nay, often does not intend them for publication; and yet, no one on that account doubts his right of property therein, as a subject of value to himself and to his posterity. If subsequently published by his representatives, would they not have a copyright therein? It is highly probable, that neither Lord Chesterfield, nor Lord Orford, nor the poet Gray, nor Cowper, nor Lady Russell, nor Lady Montague, ever intended their letters for publication as literary compositions, although they abound with striking remarks, and elegant sketches, and sometimes with the most profound, as well as affecting, exhibitions of close reflection, and various knowledge and experience, mixed up with matters of business, personal anecdote, and family gossip.

There is no small confusion in the books, in reference to the question of copyright in letters. Some of the dicta seem to suppose that no copyright can exist, except in letters which are professedly literary; while others again recognize a much more enlarged and liberal doctrine. See Gods. Pat. (Ed. 1840, London) pp. 327–332; Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 403, 405, 426, 427; Perceval v. Phipps, 2 Ves. & B. 19, 24, 25, 28. Without attempting to reconcile, or even to comment upon the language of the authorities on this head, I wish to state what I conceive to be the true doctrine upon the whole subject. In the first place, I hold, that the author of any letter or letters, (and his representatives,) whether they are literary compositions, or familiar letters, or letters of business, possess the sole and exclusive copyright therein; and that no persons, neither those to whom they are addressed, nor other persons, have any right or authority to publish the same upon their own account, or for their own benefit. But, consistently with this right, the persons to whom they are addressed, may have, nay, must, by implication, possess, the right to publish any letter or letters addressed to them, upon such occasions, as require, or justify, the publication or public use of them; but this right is strictly limited to such occasions. Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 415, 419. Thus, a person may justifiably use and publish, in a suit at law or in equity, such letter or letters as are necessary and proper, to establish his right to maintain the suit, or defend the same. So, if he be aspersed or misrepresented by the writer, or accused of improper conduct, in a public manner, he may publish such parts of such letter or letters, but no more, as may be necessary to vindicate his character and reputation, or free him from unjust obloquy and reproach. If he attempt to publish such letter or letters on other occasions, not justifiable, a court of equity will prevent the publication by an injunction, as a breach of private confidence or contract, or of the rights of the author; and a fortiori, if he attempt to publish them for profit; for then it is not a mere breach of confidence or contract, but it is a violation of the exclusive copyright of the writer. In short, the person, to whom letters are addressed, has but a limited right, or special property, (if I may so call it), in such letters, as a trustee, or bailee, for particular purposes, either of information or of protection, or of support of his own rights and character. The general property, and the general rights incident to property, belong to the writer, whether the letters are literary compositions, or familiar letters, or details of facts, or letters of business. The general property in the manuscripts remains in the writer and his representatives, as well as the general copyright. A fortiori, third persons, standing in no privity with either party, are not entitled to publish them, to subserve their own private purposes of interest, or curiosity, or passion. If the case of Perceval v. Phipps, 2 Ves. & B. 21, 28, before the then vice chancellor (Sir Thomas Plumer), contains a different doctrine, all I can say is, that I do not accede to its authority; and I fall back upon the more intelligible and reasonable doctrine of Lord Hardwicke, in Pope v. Curl, 2 Atk. 342, and Lord Apsley, in the case of Thompson v. Stanhope, Amb. 737, and of Lord Keeper Henley, in the case of Duke of Queensberry v. Sheffeare, 2 Eden, 329 (cited 4 Burrows, 2329), which Lord Eldon has not scrupled to hold to be binding authorities upon the point in Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 403, 414, 415, 419, 426, 427. But I do not understand that Sir Thomas Plumer did, in Perceval v. Phipps, deny the right of property of the writer in his own letters; and so he was understood by Lord Eldon in Gee v. Pritchard; who, however, said, that that case admitted of much remark. Indeed, if the doctrine were otherwise, that no person, or his representatives, could have a copyright in his own private or familiar letters, written to friends, upon interesting political and other occasions.

or containing details of facts and occurrences, passing before the writer, it would operate as a great discouragement upon the collection and preservation thereof; and the materials of history would become far more scanty, than they otherwise would be. What descendant, or representative of the deceased author, would undertake to publish, at his own risk and expense, any such papers; and what editor would be willing to employ his own learning, and judgment, and researches, in illustrating such works, if, the moment they were successful, and possessed the substantial patronage of the public, a rival bookseller might republish them, either in the same, or in a cheaper form, and thus either share with him, or take from him the whole profits? It is the supposed exclusive copyright in such writings, which now encourages their publication thereof, from time to time, after the author has passed to the grave. To this we owe, not merely, the publication of the writings of Washington, but of Franklin, and Jay, and Jefferson and Madison, and other distinguished statesmen of our own country. It appears to me, that the copyright act of 1831, c. 16, § 9, [4 Stat. 436], fully recognizes the doctrine for which I contend. It gives by implication to the author, or legal proprietor of any manuscript whatever, the sole right to print and publish the same, and expressly authorizes the courts of equity of the United States to grant injunctions to restrain the publication thereof, by any person or persons, without his consent.

In respect to official letters, addressed to the government, or any of its departments, by public officers, so far as the right of the government extends, from principles of public policy, to withhold them from publication, or to give them publicity, there may be a just ground of distinction. It may be doubtful, whether any public officer is at liberty to publish them, at least, in the same age, when secrecy may be required by the public exigencies, without the sanction of the government. On the other hand, from the nature of the public service, or the character of the documents, embracing historical, military, or diplomatic information, it may be the right, and even the duty, of the government, to give them publicity, even against the will of the writers. But this is an exception in favor of the government, and stands upon principles allied to, or nearly similar to, the rights of private individuals, to whom letters are addressed by their agents, to use them, and publish them, upon fit and justifiable occasions. But assuming the right of the government to publish such official letters and papers, under its own sanction, and for public purposes, I am not prepared to admit, that any private persons have a right to publish the same letters and papers, without the sanction of the government, for their own private profit and advantage. Recently the Duke of Wellington's despatches have (I believe) been published, by an able editor, with the consent of the noble duke, and under the sanction of the government. It would be a strange thing to say, that a compilation involving so much expense, and so much labor to the editor, in collecting and arranging the materials, might be pirated and republished by another bookseller, perhaps to the ruin of the original publisher and editor. Before my mind arrives at such a conclusion, I must have clear and positive lights to guide my judgment, or to bind me in point of authority. However, it is not necessary, in this case, to dispose of this point, because, of the letters and documents published by the defendants, not more than one fifth part are of an official character.

Another and distinct objection urged on behalf of the defendants, is, that congress have purchased the manuscripts of these letters and documents, and they have become public property, and may be published by any one. An answer, in part, has been already given to this objection. Congress have, indeed, authorized the purchase of these manuscripts from the owner and possessor thereof, and paid the liberal price of 25,000 dollars therefor; and they have thus become national property. But it is an entirely inadmissible conclusion that, therefore, every private person has a right to use them, and publish them. It might be contended, with as much force and correctness, that every private person had an equal right to use any other national property at his pleasure, such as the arms, the ammunition, the ships, or the custom houses, belonging to the government. But a reason, which is entirely conclusive upon this point, is, that the government purchased the manuscripts, subject to the copyright already acquired by the plaintiffs in the publication thereof. The vendor took them subject to that copyright, and could convey no title which he did not himself possess, or beyond what he possessed. Nor is there any pretence to say that he either did convey, or intended to convey, to the government, the property in these manuscripts, except subject to the copyright already acquired.

The next and leading objection is, that the defendants had a right to abridge and select, and use the materials which they have taken for their work, which, though it embraces the number of letters above stated, is an original and new work, and that it constitutes, in no just sense, a piracy of the work of the plaintiffs. This, in truth, is the real hinge of the whole controversy, and involves the entire merits of the suit. It is certainly true, that the defendants' work cannot properly be treated as an abridgment of that of the plaintiffs; neither is it strictly and wholly a mere compilation from the latter. So far as the narrative goes, it is either original, or derived (at least as far as the matter has been brought before the court) from common sources of information, open to all authors. It is not even of the nature of a collection of beauties of an author; for it does not profess to give fugitive extracts, or brilliant passages from particular letters. It is a selection of the entire contents of particular letters, from the whole collection or mass of letters of the work of the plaintiffs. From the known taste and ability of Mr. Upham, it cannot be doubted, that these letters are the most instructive, useful and interesting to be found in that large collection.

The question, then, is, whether this is a justifiable use of the original materials, such as the law recognizes as no infringement of the copyright of the plaintiffs. It is said, that the defendant has selected only such materials, as suited his own limited purpose as a biographer. That is, doubtless, true; and he has produced an exceedingly valuable book. But that is no answer to the difficulty. It is certainly not necessary, to constitute an invasion of copyright, that the whole of a work should be copied, or even a large portion of it, in form or in substance. If so much is taken, that the value of the original is sensibly diminished, or the labors of the original author are substantially to an injurious extent appropriated by another, that is sufficient, in point of law, to constitute a piracy pro tanto. The entirety of the copyright is the property of the author; and it is no defence, that another person has appropriated a part, and not the whole, of any property. Neither does it necessarily depend upon the quantity taken, whether it is an infringement of the copyright or not. It is often affected by other considerations, the value of the materials taken, and the importance of it to the sale of the original work. Lord Cottenham, in the recent cases of Bramwell v. Halcomb, 3 Mylne & C. 737, 738, and Saunders v. Smith, Id. 711, 736, 737, adverting to this point, said: "When it comes to a question of quantity, it must be very vague. One writer might take all the vital part of another's book, though it might be but a small proportion of the book in quantity. It is not only quantity, but value, that is always looked to. It is useless to refer to any particular cases, as to quantity." In short, we must often, in deciding questions of this sort, look to the nature and objects of the selections made, the quantity and value of the materials used, and the degree in which the use may prejudice the sale, or diminish the profits, or supersede the objects, of the original work. Many mixed ingredients enter into the discussion of such questions. In some cases, a considerable portion of the materials of the original work may be fused, if I may use such an expression, into another work, so as to be undistinguishable in the mass of the latter, which has other professed and obvious objects, and cannot fairly be treated as a piracy; or they may be inserted as a sort of distinct and mosaic work, into the general texture of the second work, and constitute the peculiar excellence thereof, and then it may be a clear piracy. If a person should, under color of publishing "Elegant Extracts" of poetry, include all the best pieces at large of a favorite poet, whose volume was secured by a copyright, it would be difficult to say why it was not an invasion of that right, since it might constitute the entire value of the volume. The case of Mawman v. Tegg, 2 Russ. 385, is to this purpose. There was no pretence in that case, that all the articles of the encyclopedia of the plaintiffs had been copied into that of the defendants; but large portions of the materials of the plaintiffs' work had been copied. Lord Eldon, upon that occasion, held, that there might be a piracy of part of a work, which would entitle the plaintiffs to a full remedy and relief in equity. In prior cases, he had affirmed the like doctrine. In Wilkins v. Aikin, 17 Ves. 422, 424, he said: "There is no doubt, that a man cannot, under the pretence of quotation, publish either the whole or a part of another's book, though he may use, what in all cases it is difficult to define, fair quotation." In Roworth v. Wilkes, 1 Camp. 94, Lord Ellenborough said: "A review will not, in general, serve as a substitute for the book reviewed; and even there, if so much is extracted, that it communicates the same knowledge with the original work, it is an actionable violation of literary property. The intention to pirate is not necessary in an action of this sort; it is enough, that the publication complained of is in substance a copy, whereby a work vested in another is prejudiced. A compilation of this kind (an encyclopedia) may differ from a treatise published by itself; but there must be certain limits fixed to its transcripts; it must not be allowed to sweep up all modern works, or an encyclopedia would be a recipe for completely breaking down literary property." The vice chancellor (Sir L. Shadwell), in Sweet v. Shaw, 1 Jur. (London) 212 [3 Jur. 217], referring to the remarks of Lord Ellenborough, cited by counsel, said: "That does not mean a substitute for the whole work. From what you state, suppose a book to contain one hundred articles, and ninety-nine were taken, still it would not be a substitute." And in this very case he granted an injunction, being of opinion, that there was primâ facie, at law, an invasion of the plaintiffs' right; not only an injury, but also a damage to the plaintiffs, in copying from several volumes of Reports, published by the plaintiffs, although eleven only had been copied verbatim, but a considerable number of what were called "abridged cases," were, in truth, copies of the plaintiffs' volumes, with little, or trifling, alterations. It is manifest, also, from what fell from Lord Chancellor Cottenham, in Saunders v. Smith, 3 Mylne & C. 711, that he entertained no doubt, (although he did not decide the point,) that there might be a violation of the copyright of volumes of Reports, by copying verbatim a part only of the cases reported. Much must, in such cases, depend upon the nature of the new work, the value and extent of the copies, and the degree in which the original authors may be injured thereby. In Lewis v. Fullarton, 2 Jur. (London) 127 [3 Jur. 669], 2 Beav. 6, Lord Langdale, in the case of a topographical dictionary, held, that largely copying from the work in another book having a similar object, was a violation of that copyright, although the same information might have been (but, in fact, was not) obtained from common sources, open to all persons. On that occasion, he said: "None are entitled to save themselves trouble and expense, by availing themselves, for their own profit, of other men's works, still entitled to the protection of copyright;" and, accordingly, in that case, he granted an injunction as to the parts pirated, although it was admitted, on all hands, that there was much which was original in the new work.

In the present case, I have no doubt whatever, that there is an invasion of the plaintiffs' copyright; I do not say designedly, or from bad intentions; on the contrary, I entertain no doubt, that it was deemed a perfectly lawful and justifiable use of the plaintiffs' work. But if the defendants may take three hundred and nineteen letters, included in the plaintiffs' copyright, and exclusively belonging to them, there is no reason why another bookseller may not take other five hundred letters, and a third, one thousand letters, and so on, and thereby the plaintiffs' copyright be totally destroyed. Besides; every one must see, that the work of the defendants is mainly founded upon these letters, constituting more than one third of their work, and imparting to it its greatest, nay, its essential value. Without those letters, in its present form the work must fall to the ground. It is not a case, where abbreviated or select passages are taken from particular letters; but the entire letters are taken, and those of most interest and value to the public, as illustrating the life, the acts, and the character of Washington. It seems to me, therefore, that it is a clear invasion of the right of property of the plaintiffs, if the copying of parts of a work, not constituting a major part, can ever be a violation thereof; as upon principle and authority, I have no doubt it may be. If it had been the case of a fair and bona fide abridgment of the work of the plaintiffs, it might have admitted of a very different consideration.

I have come to this conclusion, not without some regret, that it may interfere, in some measure, with the very meritorious labors of the defendants, in their great undertaking of a series of works adapted to school libraries. But a judge is entitled in this case, as in others, only to know and to act upon his duty. I hope, however, that some means may be found, to produce an amicable settlement of this unhappy controversy. The report of the master must stand confirmed, and a perpetual injunction be awarded, restraining the defendants, their agents, servants and salesmen, from farther printing, publishing, selling, or disposing of any copy or copies of the work complained of; the "Life of Washington," by the Rev. Charles W. Upham, containing any of the three hundred and nineteen letters of Washington, stated in the report of the master, and never before published; and that it be referred to a master, to take an account of the profits made by the defendants, in the premises; with leave for either party to apply to the court for farther directions.

Case No. 4,902.

FOLSOM v. MERCANTILE MUT. INS. CO.

[8 Blatchf. 170.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 1, 1871.[2]

MARINE INSURANCE — RETROACTIVE POLICIES — "LOST OR NOT LOST"—DEFENSES—CONCEALMENT.

1. A policy of marine insurance on a vessel was issued March 1st, 1869, insuring her from January 1st, 1869, to January 1st, 1870. The policy did not contain the words, "lost or not lost." The vessel was lost by the perils of the sea, February 2d, 1869, neither insurer nor insured knowing of the loss when the policy was issued: Held, that the loss was covered by the policy.

[See note at end of case.]

2. Where, as a defence to a policy of marine insurance, it is alleged that the insured concealed from the insurer material facts within his knowledge when he applied for the insurance, the defence is one that must be made out affirmatively by the insurer.

[See note at end of case.]

3. A party applying for insurance is not bound to communicate to the insurer intelligence known to the insurer, nor the expectations, opinions or speculations of such party, based upon facts known to the insurer.

4. In this case, although it appeared that intelligence of the loss of the vessel could have reached the insured before the policy was issued, if her master had sent such intelligence by telegraph, it was held that the omission of the master to do so did not vitiate the policy.

[At law. Assumpsit by Benjamin F. Folsom against the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company.]

Charles M. Da Costa, for plaintiff.
Townsend Scudder, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an action, tried before the court without a jury, to recover the sum of $3,000, on a policy of marine insurance. The policy was issued to the plaintiff, March 1st, 1869, on the schooner B. F. Folsom, for the sum of $3,000, from January 1st, 1869, to January 1st, 1870. The policy valued the vessel at $35,000. It did not state who the master of the vessel was.

or what voyage she was upon. The rate of premium was expressed to be 12 per cent, net. The policy contained this written clause: "Privileged to cancel at the expiration of six months; pro rata premium to be returned for time not used, no loss being claimed." The words "lost or not lost" were not contained in the policy.

The vessel had sailed from Boston for Montevideo and Buenos Ayres, on the 6th of January, 1869, with John Orlando as her master. She was a three masted schooner. She was disabled at sea on the 13th of January, losing two of her masts, and her entire hull, except a part of her bow, going under water. Her crew remained on her for 20 days and nights, the vessel being kept from sinking by the buoyancy of some lumber which formed part of her cargo. Her crew were taken off from her by a Bremen vessel, bound to Bremen, and were landed at Bremerhaven on the 18th of February. The schooner was totally lost through the perils of the sea. On the 20th of February, John Orlando, the master of the schooner, wrote and mailed, at Bremerhaven, a letter to the plaintiff, (who was one of the owners of the schooner,) at Philadelphia, announcing the loss of the schooner. This letter reached the plaintiff in due course of mail, after March 9th, bearing, when it reached him, a Bremerhaven postmark of February 20th and a New York postmark of March 9th. The master wrote a second letter, from Bremerhaven, to the plaintiff, at Philadelphia, on the 26th of February, giving fuller particulars of the loss. This letter reached the plaintiff in due course of mail, after March 14th, bearing, when it reached him, a Bremerhaven postmark of February 27th, a New York postmark of March 14th, and a Philadelphia postmark of March 14th. The master had no money with which to prepay for his passage to the United States or for a telegraphic despatch to his owners, and was a stranger in Bremerhaven. His owners had no friends or credit there. Prepayment of a telegraphic despatch to the United States was required. The master obtained a passage from Bremerhaven to the United States, on an American steamer, by giving an order on the plaintiff for the passage money. He noted his protest against the loss of the schooner, before the United States consular agent at Bremerhaven, on the 18th of February, informed that officer of the loss of the vessel and of the arrival of the crew, and applied to him for assistance. He and his crew were furnished with a boarding place by the consular agent. He did not communicate with the plaintiff or with any of the owners of the schooner by telegraph.

On the 22d of February, there was published in the daily public newspapers in the city of New York and in the city of Philadelphia, (the defendants being located in New York and the plaintiff residing in Philadelphia,) a telegraphic despatch in these words: "Liverpool, Feb. 21. Orlando, from Balt. for Buenos Ayres, lost at sea; crew saved and landed at Bremerhaven." This despatch, as so published in Philadelphia, was seen by the plaintiff before he applied to the defendants to effect the insurance in question. The despatch, as published in New York, was cut out from one of the newspapers by a clerk in the employ of the defendants, at their office in New York, and pasted, on the 22d of February, in a scrap book, with 17 other items of marine disasters which were pasted therein on the same day, such scrap book being regularly kept by such clerk, as a record of disasters. Over the despatch in question, in the book, was written, in large letters, the word "Orlando." The plaintiff made application in person to the defendants to effect the insurance in question, and did not call their attention to the despatch or to its publication. At the time he so made application he knew that John Orlando had sailed in the schooner as her master, and also from what port and on what voyage she had sailed. In the shipping register used by the defendants at the time of issuing the policy, the existence of a bark called the Orlando, a whaler, was noted, but no schooner Orlando was noted. Such bark had in fact been owned, within two or three years before the date of the policy, by a person who was the partner of the plaintiff, but the plaintiff did not, at the time the policy was issued, know in what trade such bark was. Such shipping register contained the name of the schooner B. F. Folsom and her rating and the name of J. Orlando as her master.

The proper proofs of loss were duly furnished, and, if the plaintiff is entitled to recover, his proper claim is $3,000, with interest from May 7th, 1869.

The defendants contend, that, as the vessel was lost when the contract was made, March 1st, and the words "lost or not lost" are not found in the policy, the insurance never took effect, and the plaintiff cannot recover. This view would be sound if the vessel had been lost before January 1st, 1869. But, by the policy, the risk expressly taken is from January 1st, 1869, to January 1st, 1870. It is a risk for the whole of that period. It covers a loss during any part of that time. The premium paid was for the whole time. If the vessel was safe and in being on the 1st of January, 1869, the defendants guaranteed her safety from that time. The inception of the contract in this case was not the 1st of March, 1869, but the 1st of January, 1869. As the vessel was safe on the 1st of January, 1869, she was within the terms of the contract, so that the defendants took the risk upon her. If this were not so, the defendants would be enjoying the premium for the two months from January 1st to March 1st, and yet be running no risk for that time. 1 Phil. Ins. § 925; 1 Arnould, Ins. § 20; Hammond v. Allen [Case No. 6,000]. In the present case, it is not shown that either party knew of the loss when the policy was issued, and I am of opinion that the policy must be construed as covering any loss which occurred after January 1st, 1869, although before March 1st, 1869.

It is urged, as a defence, that the plaintiff concealed from the defendants material facts known to him. The concealment alleged is, that he did not inform the defendants, before the policy was issued, that the name of the master of the schooner was John Orlando, and that she had sailed for Montevideo and Buenos Ayres, and that he, the plaintiff, had seen in the newspapers the published despatch as to the loss of the Orlando. Conceding that the facts thus alleged to have been concealed were material, yet the defence of concealment is one that must be made out affirmatively by the underwriters. The defendants have not shown that the plaintiff did not, before the policy was issued, communicate to them the fact that the name of the master of the schooner was John Orlando, and that she had sailed for Montevideo and Buenos Ayres. In the absence of such evidence, it must be assumed that the defendants were advised of these facts. As to the despatch about the Orlando and its publication, the defendants knew of it and had a copy of it in their disaster book. In view of this fact, and of the knowledge the defendants had as to who was the master of the schooner and as to what voyage she was upon, it cannot be regarded as a concealment of a fact material to the risk, that the plaintiff did not call the attention of the defendants to the despatch or to its publication. They had already seen it, and the fact that he had seen it cannot be regarded as a material fact. With the despatch, the fact of what voyage the schooner was on, and the name of her master, the defendants had all the information of material facts which the plaintiff had. He was not bound to communicate to the defendants intelligence known to them, or his expectations, opinions or speculations based upon facts known to them. 1 Phil. Ins. §§ 574, 575, 603; 1 Arnould, Ins. §§ 207, 211.

No evidence is given to show that the premium stated in the policy was fixed without reference to any of the three facts so alleged to have been concealed, nor can the court say, in the absence of all evidence, that it is reasonably probable that, with a knowledge of such three facts, the defendants would have declined the risk, or asked a higher premium than that at which the policy was effected. No evidence is given to show whether the rate of premium stated in the policy was a high rate or a low rate,—a rate indicating a great risk, or a rate indicating an ordinary risk. There is nothing to raise the legal presumption that the name of the master and the voyage were not communicated, so as to relieve the defendants from the necessity of giving direct negative evidence to establish that such two facts were not communicated, and to throw on the plaintiff the necessity of giving affirmative evidence that such facts were communicated. Arnould, Ins. § 213.

The plaintiff had no information tending to show any disaster to the schooner, except what was contained in the despatch relative to the Orlando, if that can be regarded as such information. But, it is urged, on the part of the defendants, that the plaintiff must be presumed to have had knowledge, on the 1st of March, of the actual loss of the schooner before that day, because information of the fact could have been communicated to him by telegraph, by the master, from Bremerhaven, before the policy was issued. It is claimed that it was the duty of the master to communicate intelligence of the loss, by telegraph, to the plaintiff, as soon as he arrived at Bremerhaven; and that it is shown that such information by telegraph could have reached the plaintiff at Philadelphia as early as the 22d of February. But this view is contrary to the decision of the supreme court in the case of General Interest Ins. Co. v. Ruggles, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 408. In that case, the vessel was in fact wholly lost and destroyed at the time the insurance was effected, but the fact of the loss was not known to her owner, and such ignorance arose from the designed omission of the master to advise the owner of the loss, in order that the insurance might be effected, and the result of such conduct of the master was, that intelligence of the loss had not reached either the owner or the insurers at the time of the underwriting. But the court held, that, as the loss did not occur through any misconduct of the master's before the happening of the loss, and as, at the time of the misconduct of the master, in suppressing intelligence of the loss, he was not the agent of the owner for any purposes connected with procuring the insurance, and as the agency of the master ceased with the loss of the vessel, so that there was no legal obligation resting on him to communicate information of her loss to her owner, the policy was not vitiated. The decision in that case fully covers the present case.

The absence of any evidence, on the part of the defendants, to show any concealment by the plaintiff of any fact material to the risk, joined with the fact that ordinary prudence on the part of the defendants, in insuring by a time policy running back for two months, would naturally lead them to enquire what voyage the vessel was upon, imposing the necessity of a truthful answer, leads to the conclusion that nothing is shown to impeach the good faith of the plaintiff. Underwriters, in assuming the risk of a loss that may have happened before the date of the policy, assume a hazardous undertaking, and charge a proportionate premium, and must be presumed to inquire as to all obvious matters which may affect the taking of the risk at all or the rate of premium. Their protection is in their own hands, by rejecting such risks or charging adequate premiums therefor.

I find for the plaintiff, for the sum of $3,000, with interest from May 7th, 1869.

[NOTE. This cause was afterwards heard on motion of defendants for a new trial, which motion was denied (Case No. 4,903), and on writ of error the case was taken to the supreme court, where the judgment of the circuit court was duly affirmed, Mr. Justice Clifford delivering the opinion, in the course of which it was held that the omission of the words "lost or not lost" from the policy of insurance sued upon does not affect the plaintiff's right of recovery, it being sufficient to make a policy retroactive if it appeared by the description of the risk and the subject-matter of the contract that the policy was in fact intended to cover a previous loss. In reference to the attempt made at the trial to set up the defense that plaintiff concealed material facts from the defendants at the time the policy was issued, the learned justice remarked that the circuit court found that the charge was not sustained by the evidence, "which is all that need be said upon the subject, as it is quite clear that the trial by the circuit court, where the trial by jury is waived as in this case, is not the proper subject of review in the supreme court." Case No. 4,903.

FOLSOM v. MERCANTILE MUT. INS. CO.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 9, 1871.[2]

MARINE INSURANCE — APPLICATION AS EVIDENCE FOR DEFENDANTS—CONCEALMENT—TRIAL BY COURT—SPECIAL FINDINGS.

1. In an action at law on a time policy of marine insurance on a vessel, tried before the court, without a jury, after the plaintiff had rested his case at the trial, the defendants offered in evidence a paper purporting to be an application presented to the defendants, requesting them to effect the insurance covered by the policy. The court excluded the paper, on the ground that the application was merged in the policy, and that there was no plea in the case that the policy was obtained by any fraud or by any misrepresentation, and that the offer of the paper was not preceded, or accompanied, or followed, by any offer to put in evidence, or by any putting in evidence of, any such misrepresentation: Held, that the exclusion was proper.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The absence from the application of any statement as to where the vessel was when the application was made, or as to the port from which she had sailed, or as to the voyage on which she was bound, or as to who was her master, had no tendency to show that the plaintiff did not, when he made the application, communicate to the defendants the facts referred to, or answer truly all questions put to him in regard thereto.

[See note at end of case.]

3. Where this court, after the waiver of a trial by jury, tries a case without a jury, it is not required to make a special finding upon the facts.

[This was an action of assumpsit by Benjamin F. Folsom against the Mercantile Mutual Insurance Company on a policy of marine insurance on the schooner B. F. Folsom, issued to the plaintiff March 1, 1869. A jury was waived, and the cause tried by the court, resulting in a verdict for plaintiff for the sum of $3,000 (Case No. 4,902), and is now heard on defendant's motion for a new trial.]

Charles M. Da Costa, for plaintiff.

Townsend Scudder, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is an action on a time policy of marine insurance, on a vessel, tried before the court, without a jury. After the plaintiff had rested his case, at the trial, the defendants offered in evidence a paper purporting to be an application presented to the defendants, requesting them to effect the insurance covered by the policy. The plaintiff objected to the introduction in evidence of the paper, on the ground that the application was merged in the policy, and that there was no plea in the case that the policy was obtained by any fraud, or by any misrepresentation. The court rejected the paper, on the ground that the evidence was inadmissible at that stage of the case. The defendants excepted to the ruling. At the close of the testimony on the part of the defendants, they renewed their offer to put the application in evidence. The objection on the part of the plaintiff to its introduction was renewed, and the court rejected it as inadmissible, and the defendants excepted. They now move for a new trial, on the ground of an alleged error committed by the court, in excluding the application as evidence.

It is urged, for the defendants, that the application was the written contract, by which the defendants agreed to issue for a certain premium, and the plaintiff agreed to take, a policy of insurance, on the terms and conditions agreed upon therein. Such contract, however, must be evidenced by the policy itself. The policy must control, in this action, in case of any difference between its provisions and those of the application. In point of fact, however, a comparison of the application with the policy shows that the provisions of the two do not differ. As to any terms or conditions contained in the application, which might be in the nature of warranties or representations, it is not contended, on the part of the defendants, that there was any misrepresentation, on the part of the plaintiff, by setting out untruly any fact contained in the application. The offer of the application in evidence was not preceded, or accompanied, or followed, by any offer to put in evidence, or by any putting in evidence of, any such misrepresentation.

[2] [Affirmed in 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 237.]

It is further urged, that the application was admissible, because it did not show, on its face, where the vessel was when the application was made, or from what port she had sailed, or on what voyage she was bound, or who was her master. But the policy itself contains none of these things. The absence of them from the application has no tendency to show that the plaintiff did not, when he made the application, communicate to the defendants the facts referred to, or answer truly all questions put to him in regard thereto. As I held, in my opinion deciding the cause,—Folsom v. Mercantile Ins. Co. [Case No. 4,902],—it was for the defendants to show, affirmatively, that the facts referred to were concealed by the plaintiff, and were material to the risk; and they gave no such proof. Moreover, the application, which was in form one for a time policy, contains no blanks for any information as to the voyage of the vessel, or her whereabouts at the time of the application. It contains, as does the policy, a blank, not filled, for the name of her master, but it appeared, on the trial, that the defendants knew the name of her master at the time the application was made. Moreover, the policy, being a time policy, contains, as does the application, a warranty as to the ports and places the vessel should not visit or use. It was not claimed that she was lost while in a forbidden place, or on a forbidden voyage; and, therefore, any statement of her voyage or whereabouts was immaterial.

I am satisfied, for these reasons, that the application was properly excluded, as being entirely irrelevant to the case.

It is also urged, as a ground for a new trial, that it appeared that, in fact, the plaintiff concealed from the defendants, when he applied for the insurance, and at all times before the policy was issued, facts known to him, which were material to the risk; and that the court erred in refusing to rule, as requested by the defendants, in accordance with certain propositions of law made to the court by the defendants. In regard to the question of concealment, and the requests to rule, proposed by the defendants, I carefully considered the views urged on the part of the defendants, in giving my decision in the case, after it was tried,—Folsom v. Mercantile Ins. Co. [Case No. 4,902],—and no new views on the subject are now presented. The conclusions I arrived at are fully stated, with the reasons therefor, in such decision, and I have not been able to satisfy myself that they are erroneous.
