That the law in question is unwise and unjust—that it is repugnant to the spirit of the constitution, and of the civil rights bill, both of which contemplate the equality of all persons before the law, and the equal protection of the law to all—I have no doubt. At the same time, I am not satisfied that it violates the letter of either. Unless it did so, I would not feel justified in declaring it to be unconstitutional.

As respects intermarriage between the white and black races, it is very certain that such a connection would rarely occur but for the influence of the former over the latter—an influence resulting from the superior education and intelligence of the whites, and the subordinate position so long held by the colored race. For such unnatural marriages, the whites are mainly to blame, and this may furnish some excuse, if not a justification, for punishing them alone, as a means of prevention. The learned counsel of petitioner has referred me to a newspaper report of a decision lately made by the circuit court of the United States in San Francisco, as supporting this application for a writ of habeas corpus. It is the case of Ho Ah How v. Nunan [Case No. 6,546], sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. Without attempting to analyze the facts of the case, it seems to me they are so wholly different from the present as to render the decision of the court therein wholly inapplicable.

As before stated, I regard the acts of the Texas legislature as being unjust in its discrimination against the white race, and as contrary to the spirit of the constitution; but inasmuch as it relates to a subject over which the state has complete and exclusive control, and because I doubt whether it can be properly held to be a violation of the letter of the constitution, or of any law made in pursuance thereof, the application for the writ of habeas corpus must be refused.

NOTE. The opinion of Judge Duval in the case of Ex parte Brown, above referred to, was as follows: "So far as I have been able to discover, there has been no law passed by the state of Texas since the abolition of slavery prohibiting marriage between the white and black races. The only question, therefore, presented before me is, whether this act of 1858 is now in force and operative? My conclusion is, that it is not, for the following reasons, among others: Because it was passed in the interest and for the protection of slavery before the institution had been abolished, and when the negro was not a citizen of the United States, and because it fixes a penalty upon the white persons alone. It is a prohibition based solely upon color, and operating on the white race alone. To say that this statute is now in force would be as it seems to me, to disregard the effect of the 14th and 15th amendments of the constitution of the United States, and the first section of the civil rights bill. I think it infringes on both. It is unfair and unequal in its operation, because it would visit a heavy penalty on a white citizen and none whatever upon a colored citizen for doing a certain act. Marriage between the two races is wholly abhorrent to my sense of fitness and propriety, and I presume it would be no violation of the constitution and laws of the United States—inasmuch as marriage is but a civil contract to be regulated by the laws of the several states—were the state of Texas now to pass a law forbidding such marriages, under penalties extending to both races alike. But until this is done, I think the matter must be considered as one of taste merely, and left for its control to the potent influence of public opinion."

FRANCONET v. The F. W. BACKUS.

District Court, D. Michigan. 1852.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — SOURCES — HIRING CREW IN DOMESTIC PORT—PRESUMPTION.

1. The jurisdiction of this court in cases of admiralty does not rest upon the statute of 1845 [5 Stat. 726], but upon the constitution of the United States. It is not limited to tide waters, but embraces the lakes and navigable rivers, through which commerce is carried on between different states, or with a foreign nation.

2. When a vessel of the United States is duly enrolled and licensed, and has been engaged for years between Detroit and Buffalo, although she may have been for a short time at a foreign port, still the presumption is that her crew were hired in a domestic port.

[In admiralty. Suit by John Franconet against the propeller F. W. Backus.]

WILKINS, District Judge. This is a libel for seaman's wages, promoted by the first engineer of the propeller. The important exhibits in the libel are as follows: "That at the time of the contract for which suit is brought, and wherein the alleged services were rendered, the said vessel was and continued to be enrolled, and licensed and engaged in the business of navigation and commerce, between the ports of Detroit and Buffalo: that the libelant was employed on said boat by the agent thereof, by and for the year beginning and ending at the close of navigation in each year: that for years previous to the close of navigation of 1851, the libelant, as engineer of said vessel, rendered appropriate services in that capacity: that at the close of navigation in the year 1851, he entered upon the fulfillment of another year's services upon said vessel, and continued in that capacity until about the 17th day of December, and that he was to receive the sum of $550 per year." All these exhibits in the libel, with the exception of the last, are fully admitted and conceded in the answer filed by the intervening claimant; and even the last is conceded in a modified form by the reduction simply of $50 on the year's salary. The answer stating: "That the libelant had been employed on said propeller by respondent at the close of navigation of 1851, as first engineer for a year thereafter, and was to receive for his services in that capacity, not the sum of $550, but the sum of $500—and that, under said contract, the libelant did enter upon the performance of the services for the year for which he had been employed." These admissions in the answer obviate the necessity of any inquiry into the proposition raised in the argument, based upon the supposition that the contract with the libelant was entered into at Malden, in Canada West, and consequently constituted no lien on the vessel. The intervening claimant negotiated with the prior owners of the vessel, in March, 1852, at Malden, for the controlling interest in the same, while the vessel was moored in that foreign port, but the bargain was perfected at Detroit. And there is no proof that the antecedent contract with the libelant was originally made in Canada, and such a fact will not be inferred in contradiction to the admission of the answer, from the circumstance of the vessel being temporarily at Malden, a foreign port, it is true, but a port intervening between Detroit and Buffalo, and embraced within the coasting trade of the lakes as defined in the act of congress. The jurisdiction of this court, in cases of admiralty, does not rest upon the statute of 1845, but upon the constitution of the United States, and is not limited to tide waters, but embraces the lakes and navigable rivers, through which commerce is carried on between different states, or with a foreign nation. At the time the constitution was framed, but little was known as to the extent and character of the Northwestern lakes, and in conferring admiralty and maritime jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States, it was technically understood to embrace only those waters characterized by the ebb and flow of the tide. But in The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443, the supreme court of the United States have decided that these lakes are, as great inland seas, embraced within the spirit of the constitution, and that the maritime jurisdiction of the federal courts as to them does not depend upon the old common law technicality. Whether, then, the contract with the libelant, was made in Canada or not, a fact that does not appear, the vessel, being licensed under the statute of the United States, and enrolled as sailing from Detroit to Buffalo, and for years so engaged, is subject to the law governing maritime contracts, and the presumption is, that her officers and crew were duly engaged in her service in a domestic port.

On the pleadings, then, we hold that the libelant is entitled to the year's wages; that his salary as engineer commenced in the fall of 1851; that his wages constitute a lien on the vessel; and that the intervening claimant purchased the vessel, subject to such lien. By the testimony, he voluntarily left the vessel, being discharged on the 16th of September, 1852; he is therefore to receive his wages, up to that time; or—which amounts in calculation to the same thing—a year's wages, deducting two months and half, or about $100. Th only point, then, presented by the pleadings, on which there is a difference of opinion between the parties, is, as to the amount of salary for which the vessel was made liable to libelant. One of the former owners of the vessel, Theodore S. Park, swears that the contract with the libelant for the year 1851–2, was $550; that it had been $500 the year before, but the owners had raised it $50 for the year 1851–2. In contradiction to this, Capt. Langly testifies that while he navigated the vessel, the libelant repeatedly stated his wages at $500, and the clerk, Fitzhugh, in making out his bill at the time of his discharge, allowed him only $500, and to which libelant made no exception at the time. This all may be so, and yet it does not contradict the testimony of the former owner, who may have raised his wages to the amount stated, without at the time apprising the libelant, and I am more inclined to rely on the statement of the old owner as to this fact, than the evidence of Capt Langly or the clerk. Enter decree, then, as follows:

Nine months and a half, at the rate of $550 per year.....	$435 41½
Credit by payments.....	236 00
Decree for libelant, balance....	$199 41½

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1870.

COLLISION OFF POINT JUDITH — STEAMER AND SCHOONER—SPEED IN A FOG—CHANGING COURSE BLINDLY.

1. The steamer F., bound from New York to Portland, while running at the rate of seven or eight knots an hour, in a thick fog, collided with and sank the schooner M. C. T., near Point Judith. On board of the schooner, a fog horn was blown at intervals of half a minute, and the steam whistle of the F. was heard for some half an hour before the collision. Immediately before the collision, the helm of the schooner was ported and the wheel of the steamer was put hard a-starboard. Held, that the speed of the steamer was too great.

[Cited in The City of Panama, Case No. 2,764.]

2. As the schooner was crossing the course of the steamer from starboard to port, the proper manoeuvre for the steamer would have been to port her wheel instead of starboarding it, and, as she starboarded blindly, in ignorance of the true course and position of the schooner, and, as it turned out, erroneously, such change of her course was a fault.

In admiralty.

Scudder & Carter, for libellant.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This libel is filed on behalf of the libellant and the other owners of the schooner Mary C. Terbell, and of her crew, and of the owners of her cargo, to recover the sum of $27,000, as the value of the schooner and of her cargo and pending freight, and of other property on board of her, lost by the sinking of the schooner through a collision between her and the screw steamer Franconia, on the 9th of June, 1868, between 7 and 8 o'clock, a. m., during a thick fog, at a point about three miles south south-east from Point Judith. The schooner was on a voyage from Boston to New York. The steamer was bound from

New York to Portland, and had left New York at about 4 o'clock p. m. of the day before. The steamer struck the port side of the schooner, just aft of the fore rigging, nearly at right angles, and cut into her several feet, and she very soon sank.

The libel alleges, that the schooner was sailing by the wind, on a north-west course, with the wind west by south; that she had, for several hours previously, been on her port tack, steering in a north-westerly direction, and not changing her course, until about half a minute before the collision, when her master, observing that the steamer was bearing directly down upon him, and that a collision was imminent, and with the view of escaping it, if possible, ordered his helm to be ported, which was done; and that the schooner, in consequence, had changed her course about one point before the collision.

The answer avers, that the speed of the steamer at the time was only about half her usual rate, and was at a rate only sufficient to enable her to make her course, and that, when the vessels would have cleared, the schooner changed her course across the head of the steamer.

It is contended, on the part of the steamer, that the wind was about south-west by south, and that the schooner was, therefore, sailing about west, which would be making her course, and that she changed some eight points, so that she was heading north at the time of the collision; that the steamer, whose proper course was about east, kept it, and so struck the schooner at right angles; and that, if the schooner had not changed her course, the steamer would have passed safely to the northward of the schooner. As the steamer struck the schooner on her port side, at about right angles, if the schooner was at the time heading north, the steamer must have been heading about east. The proper course of the steamer, at the place of collision, was about east, and, therefore, if the schooner was in fact heading to the north, the steamer could not have materially changed her course to port. If, however, the schooner had been heading to the north-west and changed one point by porting, that is to north-west by north, the steamer, to have hit her at right angles, must have been heading about north-east by east, a change of about three points from east, by starboarding.

The testimony on the part of the schooner is, that her sails were trimmed by the wind and that her sheets were hauled flat aft. This last fact is confirmed by the pilot of the steamer. The testimony of those on the deck of a sailing vessel, and in charge of her sails and her helm, as to the shape of her sails, and the course of the wind, is much more reliable than the testimony of those on board of a steamer coming from a direction which makes the wind at least three points abaft the beam of the steamer. On the whole evidence, I can have no doubt that the course of the schooner, before she ported, was north-west, and that she was on her port tack, sailing within about five points of the wind, under a three or four knot breeze.

The master of the schooner was on deck, and there was a man at the wheel. The steam whistle of the steamer was heard on board of the schooner for some half an hour before the collision. The sound came from off the weather bow of the schooner. The master of the schooner kept blowing a fog horn constantly, at intervals of half a minute, nothing being visible. Suddenly, he saw the bows of the steamer about five points off his weather bow, that is, in a direction about west by south. He immediately blew his horn again, and went into the cabin and brought out a musket and fired it off. He then directed the man at the helm to port it, which was done. He called the rest of his crew from below. They came up hurriedly and lowered the schooner's boat, from the davits at her stern, and it had scarcely reached the water before the steamer struck the schooner. The lower part of the steamer near the water was visible first to the master of the schooner, the fog being thicker above. He says, that, before he ordered his helm to be ported, he saw the steamer, and noticed that she was swinging towards his bows, that is, towards the north. That is the way she would have swung, if she had been running, at the time, on a starboard helm. The testimony of the pilot of the steamer is, that the steamer was running at a speed of between seven and eight knots an hour; that the first notice he had of the proximity of the schooner, was hearing something like a man halloing; that right immediately, about two seconds after, he heard something just like a board slap in a sail, which was probably the report of the musket; that the lookout sang out to him, that there was a noise on the starboard bow, something like a whistle, fog horn; that he and a man who was in the pilot house with him immediately hove the wheel of the steamer hard a-starboard; that the steamer's engine was immediately stopped and reversed; and that they then saw the schooner coming out of the fog, across the bow of the steamer, and went into her and sank her. He also says, that, when he first saw the schooner, she was about a point on the starboard bow of the steamer. The pilot of the steamer, and the man who was with him in the pilot house, do not say anything, in their testimony, as to the effect in fact produced on the course of the steamer by putting her wheel hard a-starboard. The latter says, that he and the pilot put it hard a-starboard before the collision. For the steamer, from being on a course east, to have hit, at right angles, the schooner on a course north-west by north, would have required a change in the course of the steamer, by starboarding, of not over three points. That the steamer did starboard is admitted. That she swung to port, by starboarding, I have no doubt. She starboarded because the noise was reported to be on her starboard bow. In fact, the schooner was crossing the bow of the steamer, from the steamer's starboard side, to the steamer's port side. Therefore, porting, and not starboarding, was the proper manoeuvre for the steamer, and, if she could have seen the schooner, she would have ported. She starboarded blindly, in ignorance of the true course and position of the schooner, and erroneously, as it turned out, and it was a fault in her to do so. On the evidence, if she had not starboarded at all, but had merely stopped and reversed her engine, the chance is that she would have cleared the schooner, by passing under her stern, or would have struck her a glancing blow, and, probably, with less damage.

But there was another and more grievous fault on the part of the steamer. She was running at too great speed. The evidence of her pilot is, that he had been hearing fog horns all along in the morning; that, about two minutes before the collision, a fog horn on his starboard bow had passed him; that he heard another fog horn on his starboard bow, about a minute before the collision; and that, within ten minutes before the collision, he had heard a fog horn on his port bow. He was at the spot where all the coasting vessels coming from the eastward, through the Vineyard Sound, enter Long Island Sound, off Point Judith. Yet he plunged on, at a speed so great, that, as this schooner, after having given all proper warnings of her position, loomed up through the fog, he could not stop or sufficiently diminish the headway of his steamer, to enable him, by the retardation of her onward movement or the divergence of her course, to avoid crushing against her and sending her to the bottom.

The collision was due to the two faults, on the part of the steamer, which have been pointed out, and there must be a decree for the libellant, with costs, with a reference to ascertain the damages.

District Court, N. D. New York. May, 1871.

POSTPONING PROOF OF DEBTS—VOTING FOR ASSIGNEE—TRANSFER OF DEBTS—POWER OF ATTORNEY.

1. Although the proof of a debt in due form has been regularly filed with the register, and by him entered as satisfactory, yet if fraud in relation thereto is offered to be shown, the register may receive such proof before the election of assignee.

[Cited in Re Strachan, Case No. 13,519.]

2. If several creditors sell and assign their debts to one assignee after they are proved in bankruptcy, they have no further business in court, and though the proceedings be carried on in their names, the actual owner must control the debts, vote upon, and receive the dividend thereon, and can cast but one vote.

3. If a power of attorney is given to a firm, and not to either member of it, one member alone is not authorized to vote upon it in the choice of an assignee.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Manassa Frank.]

[2] [I, Benjamin G. Baldwin, one of the registers of said district, do here certify, that in the course of the proceedings in said matter before me, certain questions arose pertinent to the said proceedings, and were desired by counsel to be certified to the court. At an adjourned first meeting of creditors, held on the thirtieth of March last, for the election of an assignee, E. M. Holbrook appeared as attorney for petitioning creditor, and S. A. Beman appeared with letters of attorney from sundry creditors, proofs of whose debts had been filed and entered at a previous meeting; and S. Foote also appeared with letters of attorney from several other creditors whose debts had also been before proved and proofs filed. Mr. Holbrook also had letters of attorney from several creditors, proofs of whose debts had been filed by Mr. Beman, revoking their former letters of attorney given to Mr. Beman and G. A. Seixas, Esq., appeared from New York as counsel with Mr. Beman, and in behalf of the creditor firm of Eldridge, Dunham & Co. of New York, proofs of whose debt had been filed by Mr. Beman, and moved that sundry debts, represented by Mr. Holbrook and by Mr. Foote, be postponed for investigation before the assignee, and be not voted upon; and charged that since the adjournment of this meeting, which was held on the third of March, then current, the brother and friends of the bankrupt, acting in his interest, had been to see the various creditors, and represented to them that the estate of the bankrupt would not pay fifty cents on the dollar of his indebtedness, and had made persistent efforts to induce them to compromise and stop these proceedings in bankruptcy; and that they had already succeeded in buying up, perhaps with the bankrupt's money, a large number of the debts now represented by Mr. Holbrook and Mr. Foote, some before and some since proof was made in this proceeding, and which, he charged, was done for the purpose of controlling these proceedings and influencing the election of an assignee, and was, therefore, in fraud of the bankrupt act, and was a sufficient reason for postponing such debts and not allowing them to be voted upon, and he proposed to prove such charge by reading affidavits and making oral proof. Said Holbrook & Foote objected to such postponement, and insisted that nothing had been done in fraud of the bankrupt act; that the financial troubles of the bankrupt were destroying his health and mind, and that his friends, on that account, had examined carefully into the situation and value of his estate, and had offered the creditors to advance the money and pay as large a per cent. upon their debts as they believed could be realized upon a settlement in bankruptcy, with the hope that his mind might be relieved, and he be enabled to resume business; that several of the creditors had accepted the proposition made, and sold and assigned their debts before proof was made to Delos McCurdy, who, as such assignee, had made proof of the same in due form and filed with the register, and several who had made proof of their debts and had the same filed, had also sold and assigned them, and said Holbrook & Foote insisted that the proof of both such classes of debts, being in due form and regularly filed with the register, and by him entered as satisfactory, they cannot now be postponed, but should be voted upon and may be investigated before the assignee hereafter. I decided that, inasmuch as the offer was to show that the whole proceeding, in reference to the sale and transfer of such debts were in fraud of the bankrupt act, I would hear the proof, and if Messrs Holbrook & Foote desired to make proof in opposition, I would give them reasonable time to prepare the same, to which ruling said Holbrook & Foote excepted, and desired that the same should be certified to the judge. The counsel then agreed that the meeting should be adjourned to hear such proof, and that they would serve copies of affidavits upon each other, and the meeting was thereupon adjourned to the twenty-first day of April at one p. m. At such adjourned meeting the same counsel appeared as before, and affidavits were read and arguments made in support of the respective positions of counsel, and, after hearing the same, I decided that the proofs did not sustain the charge of fraud upon the bankrupt act, and that, as all the proof of debts on file was in due form, and nothing appeared to excite suspicion of their want of validity, I would proceed to receive votes for the election of an assignee upon all the debts represented, to which decision and ruling the counsel in favor of the postponement of debts excepted, and desired the same to be certified to the judge.

[Before proceeding to vote, it was agreed by all the counsel that certain debts represented by Mr. Holbrook and by Mr. Foote, proofs of which had been filed by the creditors, were assigned to and now owned by Delos McCurdy, in addition to the debts proved by him as assignee, and that such of those creditors as had issued letters of attorney to Messrs. Beman & Brennan, had issued new letters of attorney to Messrs. Magone & Holbrook, or either of them, and said Holbrook & Foote claimed the right to give one vote upon each of such debts in the name of the assignor, to which Mr. Seixas and Mr. Beman objected, and I sustained the objection, deciding that when a creditor sold and assigned his debt after it was proved in bankruptcy, he had no further business in court; that, although the proceedings must be carried on in his name, the actual owner and assignee must control the debt, vote upon it and receive the dividend, and that I should, therefore, receive only one vote from Mr. McCurdy or his attorney, and should decline receiving any vote from Mr. Holbrook or Mr. Foote upon those debts represented by them, and which were assigned to Mr. McCurdy, to which decision and ruling Mr. Holbrook and Mr. Foote excepted, and asked that it be certified to the judge.

[Thereupon I proceeded to take the vote for assignee, with the following result, viz.: Eight creditors, whose debts amounted to four thousand and twenty three dollars and thirteen cents, voted for Daniel F. Sofer of Malone, Franklin county, New York. Five creditors, whose debts amounted to nine thousand nine hundred and two dollars and thirty-eight cents, voted for Charles E. Clark, of Ogdensburg, New York. Nineteen claims, assigned after proof, amounting to twelve thousand two hundred and twenty-eight dollars and ten cents, were excluded from being voted upon, under my ruling aforesaid. One debt of one hundred dollars and seventy-seven cents proved, was not represented, and one debt proved of two hundred and five dollars and twenty-one cents, represented by Mr. Beman, but the letters of attorney produced, although addressed to Mr. Beman individually, contained authority in the body of it to his law firm of Beman & Brennan, not to either of them, to vote, and the other partner not being present, I declined to receive a vote upon that debt. There was no choice of an assignee, no one receiving a greater part, both in value and number of votes, and there being opposition, I certify the result into court.] [3]

HALL, District Judge. Upon consideration of the report of B. G. Baldwin, Esq., one of the registers of this court, dated May second, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, by which it appears that in the proceedings before him for the choice of an assignee herein, sundry questions arose and were desired to be certified for the opinion and decision of the judge of this court, but which were temporarily decided and passed upon by the said register, and that, under the decisions of the register, the creditors of such bankrupt proceeded to the selection of an assignee; that on taking the votes of the creditors who had proved their debts, and were present or represented at the said meeting for the choice of an assignee, it appeared that there was no choice of an assignee by reason of the failure of a majority in number and value of such creditors to vote for the same person as assignee; and, also, upon consideration of the affidavit and statement presented in connection with such report of the said register, It is now ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the several decisions of the register upon questions so certified by him, and the other questions arising in the course of such proceedings, as stated in his report, be, and the same hereby are approved and confirmed; and that Charles O. Tappan, Esq., of Potsdam, in the county of St. Lawrence, counsellor at law, be, and he is hereby appointed assignee of the said Manassa Frank, in these proceedings, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 5, 1879.

REMOVAL OF CAUSE TO FEDERAL COURT—JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP—PRACTICE—COUNTER CLAIM—SECTIONS 639, 914, REV. ST.

1. The test of jurisdiction is not the citizenship of the parties at the time a contract is made or broken, but at the time the action is commenced.

2. Where a suit is brought in a state court in which a counter claim might be interposed and the suit is removed into the circuit court, the same counter claim may be set up in that court.

On motion for a new trial. The action was brought in the supreme court of New York on a lease and was removed into this court.

P. J. Joachimsen, for plaintiff.

B. C. Chetwood, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. Citizenship of the parties at the time of making the lease, or at the time of the breach of its covenants, is not the test of jurisdiction, but citizenship at the time the suit was commenced. The suit, being a suit at law, if a counter claim could be set up in it in the state court, and a judgment be had by the defendant against the plaintiff for a sum of money due under the instrument on which the suit was brought, the same counter claim may be set up and the same judgment had in the suit when removed into this court. The suit when removed is to proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought here by original process. Rev. St. U. S. § 639. A counter claim being proper in a suit in a state court, it is made proper here by section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It is an incident of bringing a suit subject to removal, that the plaintiff submits himself to the jurisdiction of this court in respect to a counter claim. The process of removal is sufficient process to give this court jurisdiction over the person of the plaintiff to award a judgment against him for the counter claim. Motion denied, and judgment ordered.

Circuit Court, D. Colorado. June 18, 1883.

FIRE INSURANCE—PREPAYMENT OF PREMIUMS—WAIVER—OBJECTIONS TO PROOFS OF LOSS.

[1. The agents mailed a policy to the insured, without requiring prepayment of the premium, merely inclosing therewith a bill in their own names for the amount. The insured did not tender payment until some 15 days later, and after a loss had occurred. The policy contained a condition that it was not to take effect until payment of the premium; but the agents were accustomed, with the company's apparent acquiescence, to deliver policies without prepayment, and they testified that they were personally liable to the company for the premiums. Held, that the delivery of the policy was a waiver of prepayment, and that the company was bound to pay the loss.]

[See Bang v. Farmville Ins. & Banking Co., Case No. 838.]

[2. Objections to proofs of loss, not made when the same were served, but first brought forward at the trial, will be considered as waived.]

[These were two actions by Henry Frankle and others against the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company and the Insurance Company of North America, respectively, to recover insurance on a stock of goods.]

Decker and Yonley, for plaintiffs.

George W. Allen and Stuart Brothers, for defendants.

Frankle, one of the plaintiffs, testified that he had nothing to do in procuring these policies. He produced the policies, which were introduced in evidence; also identified the proofs of loss that were also introduced. He gave the letter of the agents showing the transmissal of the policies from Leadville on May 6th, and the envelope showing that they arrived there the same day. Inclosed with the policies was a bill for the premium, $40, showing that the amount was then due. There was not the least intimation in letter or bill of any credit. The policies were for one month. He said that the fire occurred on May 19th; on May 26th he sends the check of Frankle & Butler, on a Denver bank, to Streeter & Lee, Leadville, for $40, the premium. No excuse was given for this delay of from twenty-one to twenty-two days in forwarding the check, or for their sending their check, and that on a Denver bank. Butler, the other plaintiff, testified that the conversation concerning the taking of the policies was had with him in the store at Denver; that Downing, Lee and himself were the only persons present. That nothing was said about giving time for the premium. That the policies were to be for one month from the date of policies that expired on the 5th of May, and the rate was to be eight per cent. (There was no showing that the company ever had any knowledge of any agent, here or elsewhere, having at any time violated these conditions of the policy.) Did the agents have any authority to give any credit for the premium, or to insure any one without the payment of the premium as stated in the policy? The authorities are all to the effect that the burden of proving the authority of the agent lays upon the insured. Wood, Ins. §§ 17, 396, 397. In this case, however, the evidence is all one way. If we take the testimony outside of the policy, there is no conflict as regards the fact that no such authority was possessed by Streeter & Lee or any other agent. Marvin v. Wilber, 52 N. Y. 270; Bush v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 63 N. Y. 531. A party is conclusively presumed to have knowledge of the contents of his contract. Wade, Notice, § 43; 8 N. Y. 271; 2 Corp. 597; 7 Taunt. 646; 9 Wend. 209. But if it could be held that they did not have knowledge, plaintiffs would be in no better situation. This company offered to insure plaintiffs on certain conditions named in the contract. That was the only proposition they have made, and they had the right to fix their own terms. The plaintiffs had no knowledge of this condition, then they must say they did not assent to it. If they did not assent to it, then there is no mutuality in the contract, and consequently, upon their own showing, they are suing on a contract they cannot enforce. Let us say that there was an unconditional delivery to these plaintiffs of the contracts by the agents, and a credit of thirty days extended for the payment of the premium from the date of delivery, what result have we? Simply this: That the plaintiffs knew at the time they received the policy that the agent was acting in open and avowed disregard of and disobedience to the instructions of his principal. That he had no right whatever to deliver it or even to attempt to waive any of its conditions. Can they claim that such is a valid delivery? We have no knowledge of any court claiming the right to disregard a restriction, even if it is shown to be unreasonable. Holladay v. Dailey, 1 Colo. 466.

We feel satisfied that this court will never render a judgment against us until plaintiffs' counsel can show: First. That a man is not bound with the knowledge of the contents of his own contract. Second. That a party can assent to a condition of a contract without having knowledge of its provisions. Third. That mutuality is not necessary in a contract. Fourth. That a party seeking to recover on a contract can be heard to say that its obligations and conditions are not mutual. Fifth. That a party can be heard to say that he made a contract even to the last act, viz. the delivery of the same, and, after it is delivered as a valid and binding obligation on both parties, for the first time became acquainted with its provisions. Sixth. That a party dealing with an agent, and having full knowledge of his power and the extent of his authority, can come into a court of justice and admit that he knew the agent was violating his authority in delivering the contract, and had no authority to do so, and still claim that such delivery confers on him rights as a valid delivery.

In considering this case, there are certain classes of authorities that cannot enter into its determination. We may describe them as: First. Those where the authority of the agent is not shown either in the conditions of the policy or a notice printed on the policy. Second. That class where there was a notice printed on the policy, but no condition in it, in which case the assured might prove, perhaps, (1) that he did not see the notice prior to the waiver; (2) and possibly it might be held that, as it was simply a notice, and no part of his agreement, that he might prove it was false in fact, and that the agent did have authority. Cases falling within either of these classes are not authority here on the question of waiver. If we suppose the agents had the authority, is there any reason for saying that this policy was delivered as and for a contract of insurance? On questions of delivery the intention of the parties must at all times prevail. The intent is derived from the act and words used, and all connected facts. There is no pretense made by the plaintiffs that they were ever given credit for one moment by any words that were used. Hicks v. Goode, 12 Leigh, 479; Bowen v. Bowen, 18 Conn. 539; Gray v. Blanchard, 8 Pick. 284; Spalding v. Hallenbeck, 30 Barb. 298; Shinn v. Roberts, 20 N. J. Law, 435; Thomas v. Record, 47 Me. 500; Fraser v. Davie, 11 S. C. 56, headnotes; Inman v. Western Fire Ins. Co., 12 Wend. 452; Marland v. Royal Ins. Co., 71 Pa. St. 393; Bradley v. Potomac Fire Ins. Co., 32 Md. 108; 5 Durn. & E. [5 Term R.] 695; Lynn v. Burgoyne, 13 B. Mon. 322; 1 Allen, 294; Catoir v. Thompson v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 252; Klein v. Insurance Co., Id. 91.

Before McCRARY, Circuit Judge, and HALLET, District Judge.

HALLET, District Judge. May 5, 1882, plaintiffs were merchants at Leadville, and a policy of insurance on their stock in trade, which they held of defendant, expired by limitation. Streeter & Lee were defendant's agents at Leadville, and Mr. Lee, of that firm, applied to plaintiffs to renew the policy. This application was made at Denver, probably on the 5th of May, if we may determine the fact from the circumstance that the policy was sent to plaintiffs on the next day. Some discussion took place at that time between Mr. Lee and plaintiffs' representative, touching the rate of insurance, which defendant intended to increase from six per cent., the rate previously paid, to eight per cent., the rate to be charged. Plaintiffs' representative was unwilling to pay eight per cent., and Mr. Lee would accept no less. The discussion resulted in an agreement by plaintiffs' representative to take a policy for one month at the increased rate, which would afford time to investigate the subject, and ascertain whether insurance could be obtained for less premium. With that understanding the parties separated, and on May 6th, Streeter & Lee mailed from Leadville the policy on which this suit was founded, addressed to plaintiffs at Denver. They inclosed with the policy a bill for the premium, in which plaintiffs were set down as debtors of Streeter & Lee for the amount. Plaintiffs received the policy in due course of mail, but did not remit the premium to Streeter & Lee until after the goods were destroyed by fire, which occurred on the twentieth day of the same month of May. Streeter & Lee refused to accept the premium, and defendant claims in this action that by its terms the policy was not to take effect until the premium should be paid. And inasmuch as the premium had not been paid at the date of loss the defendant is not bound.

It is expressly declared in the policy that it "shall not take effect before the premium is paid," and the question is how far the plaintiffs are subject to this provision. The right of the defendant to limit the authority of its agents, and to demand the premium on a policy before it shall assume any risk, is not doubted. But it seems that defendant's agents are in the habit and practice of delivering policies without payment of premiums, and apparently with the knowledge and consent of defendant. That course is practiced in Denver and Leadville, and if we may rely on some general knowledge of the business, we may add that the practice is quite general among insurance companies in this country. Defendant's agent at Denver states that he holds himself personally responsible to the company for premiums due on policies so issued, and the circumstance that in this instance the bill for premium was made out in the name of Streeter & Lee is evidence to show that they had adopted the same view. The bill is for money due Streeter & Lee, general fire insurance agents, and the company is not mentioned, except in describing the policy. These agents are selected with special reference to the important duties they are requested to perform on behalf of the company; security for good conduct in office is usually required of them; and it is not reasonable to believe that they will constantly violate instructions from their principals. The position in which they are placed, subject to dismissal at any moment, forbids any such conclusion. Insurance companies can secure obedience from their agents whenever they demand it. The pretense that this policy was delivered without authority from the defendant is not to be considered. While professing to give insurance only on payment of the regular premium therefor, defendant does, in fact, give out many policies on a short credit. If the premium is paid before loss it is cheerfully accepted—as well the part which is applicable to the time since the date of the policy, in which, according to its own construction of that instrument, it was not liable for loss, and the remainder which was not applicable to the future life of the policy. But when loss occurs before the premium is paid, the clause in the policy relating to its payment is invoked to protect the company from liability. Courts are not bound to recognize double dealing. That some of them have felt inclined to do so may be a matter for regret, but in the court to which we look for correct principles, the rule for which we contend is fully established. Miller v. Life Ins. Co., 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 285. In that case defendant sought to escape all liability upon a clause in the policy of insurance very similar to that on which defendant relies in this case, and the court was of the opinion that the contract was complete on delivery, without payment of the premium. So, also, it is held that an agreement to insure is binding before a policy has been made or delivered, and before the time for paying the premium arrives. Commercial Mut. Marine Ins. Co. v. Union Mut. Ins. Co., 19 How. [60 U. S.] 318; Insurance Co. v. Colt, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 560. And generally it should be said and maintained as a sound and wholesome rule of good conduct and fair dealing that upon a promise of indemnity supported by any consideration whatever, the company shall be bound, whatever may be concealed in a labyrinth of conditions and exceptions to defeat its operation. It is easy enough to withhold the policy until payment of the premium, and that course of dealing will deceive no one. But the delivery of the policy imparts indemnity in a way which most men will accept without question. We think that the contract between these parties was complete when the policy was delivered, and the defendant is liable on it.

Objection is also made to the proof of loss, that it does not meet the requirements of the policy. But it comes too late at the trial. The rule is that objections existing at the time of the service of the proof of loss, if not then made, will be regarded as waived. Peoria Marine & Fire Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 18 Ill. 553. Deducting the premium and interest thereon from the date of the policy, the judgment will be for the amount of the policy with interest from the time when it became due under the terms of the policy.

In another action by these plaintiffs against the Insurance Company of North America the facts are similar, and the like judgment will be entered.

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1875.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—EVIDENCE.

Creditors alleged, as an act of bankruptcy, that the alleged bankrupt, being possessed of a stock of goods worth about $7,500, sold it to his wife for about $5,000; that he afterwards claimed to have lost the $5,000; and that the sale was made with intent to delay, defraud and hinder his creditors. The only evidence offered, to prove the allegations, was proof of a statement by the bankrupt himself that he had so sold the goods, it being a part of the same statement that he had received the $5,000 and lost it. Held that, if the statement was good to prove the fact of the sale, it also proved the fact of the loss, and that, in the absence of any other evidence, no act of bankruptcy was established.

[This was a petition to have Philip Franklin declared a bankrupt.]

A. Loring Cushing, for creditors.
Charles Wehle, for debtor.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The only act of bankruptcy alleged is, that the debtor sold a stock of goods worth about $7,500, to his wife, for about $5,000; that he afterwards claimed to have lost the $5,000; that the sale was made by him with intent to delay, defraud and hinder his creditors; and that he claims he owes only about $4,500, but is unable to pay his creditors in full, and, because of the loss of the $5,000, will not be able to pay more than 25 cents on the dollar of his indebtedness. The petition alleges that the debtor was possessed of a stock of goods of the value of about $7,500, but no passing of any such goods from the possession of the debtor to that of his wife is shown, nor any possession of them by the wife, nor the fact of any sale. It is not shown that, if there was a sale, it was not for full value, or that there was any fraudulent intent in it. The only evidence of any sale is the statement of the debtor to that effect. But it was part of the same statement, that he had received the $5,000 and lost it. The statement, if good to prove one fact, is good to prove the other. It is not otherwise shown that the debtor had the $5,000. The petition, while alleging that the debtor sold the goods for $5,000, does not allege that he did not lose the $5,000. It only alleges that he claims to have lost it. It is not shown that he did not lose it. If there were any evidence that he had the $5,000, other than his own statement, put in evidence on the part of the creditors, that he had it and lost it, he might properly be called upon to show, by his own oath, the circumstances of the loss. As it is, the creditors have proved that the debtor sold goods for $5,000 and lost the money casually or by robbery. That is no act of bankruptcy. No intent to defraud by the sale is shown. The petition is dismissed, with costs.

FRANKLIN v. HEISER et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 2, 1869.

CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—RECOVERY OF STOLEN BONDS—REWARDS.

Where H. made a written agreement with F., that, in case F. could recover certain bonds fraudulently obtained from H., he would pay $3,000, and the police notified H. that the bonds had been recovered, and were subject to his order, and they did not pass through the hands of F.: Held, in a suit brought by F., against H., to recover the $3,000, that it was incumbent on F., in order to show that he recovered the bonds, within the meaning of the agreement, to show that the police recovered the bonds through information furnished by F., and that it was not enough for F. to show that he sent communications on the subject to the police before the bonds were recovered, it appearing that the police had received other communications on the subject, as well as one from H., before the bonds were recovered.

This was an action of assumpsit, tried before the court without a jury. The plaintiff [Benjamin Franklin] was a detective police officer in Philadelphia. The defendants [Henry A. Heiser, Jr., and others] composed the firm of Henry A. Heiser's Sons, of New York. The declaration averred, that $15,000 worth of United States five-twenty bonds had, prior to the 24th of November, 1868, been feloniously abstracted from the possession of the defendants; that, on that day, the defendants agreed with the plaintiff, in consideration that he should undertake to recover the bonds, that they would, in the event of the recovery of the same by the plaintiff, pay to him the sum of $3,000, and that, in the event of the recovery by him of a less amount than the whole of the bonds, they would pay him in the proportion that the amount recovered should bear to the whole sum of $15,000; and that he did recover all of the bonds for the defendants. The contract between the parties was in writing, as follows: "Philadelphia, Nov. 24, '68. We hereby agree, that, in case B. Franklin, Esq., or assigns, can recover fifteen thousand of 5/20 U. S. 6% bonds, fraudulently obtained from us by J. A. Marsh, we will pay three thousand dollars, and that, in case he returns any amount of the above described bonds, we will pay in the same proportion. Henry A. Heiser's Sons." The bonds were recovered, all of them, at Memphis, Tennessee, where Marsh was arrested. The defendants obtained all of them, but none of them passed into, or out of, the hands of the plaintiff. One of the defendants went to Memphis, from New York, after the arrest of Marsh, and obtained the bonds, after four days' efforts there, from parties who had them in possession, and by the payment of $4,000. The plaintiff was not at Memphis. He started to go there, and had reached Paris, Tennessee, when he learned that Marsh had been arrested at Memphis, and had been taken to New York by officers from Memphis, and that he, Franklin, had passed them on the way. He retraced his steps, and overtook them in Indiana, and accompanied Marsh to New York, reaching there two days after the defendant who obtained the bonds had reached Memphis. That defendant had left New York for Memphis three days before he reached Memphis, having learned, by a telegraphic despatch to the defendants, from the police of Memphis, that Marsh had been arrested, and that the bonds had been recovered, and were subject to the order of the defendants, less reward and expenses. This despatch reached the defendants, at New York, on the same day that the plaintiff learned, at Paris, of the arrest of Marsh. On the 23d of November, the day before the agreement was made with the plaintiff, the defendants authorized the New York police to offer a reward of $5,000 for the recovery of the bonds. A telegraphic despatch from the police of New York, to the police of Memphis, giving Marsh's name, and age, and a description of his person, and stating the amount and character of the bonds he had abstracted, and the reward, reached the police in Memphis on the 24th of November, before the agreement with the plaintiff was made. The defendants themselves, on the 25th of November, at half-past 11 o'clock a. m., sent from New York, to the police at Memphis, a telegraphic despatch, as follows: "Marsh left Philadelphia, by evening train, on 23d. He started for house of J. Ferguson, his uncle, in your city. Arrest him, and hold him till arrival of B. Franklin, Philadelphia detective, who leaves to-day." The plaintiff made no communication to the police of Memphis until 7 o'clock p. m., on the 25th of November, when he sent a telegraphic despatch to them from Philadelphia. He left Philadelphia, for Memphis, at 11 o'clock p. m., the same day. In addition to the written agreement, the defendants furnished the plaintiff with $500, to defray the expenses of himself and of Marsh's brother, who was to accompany him, to Memphis. This sum, or so much as should not be expended, the plaintiff was to retain in any event.

Charles M. Da Costa, for plaintiff.
John E. Burrill, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the facts in this case, I think it is incumbent on the plaintiff, in order to show that he recovered the bonds, within the meaning of the written agreement, to show that the police of Memphis, who notified the defendants that the bonds had been recovered and were at Memphis, subject to their order, less reward and expenses, recovered them through information furnished by the plaintiff. It was easy, if the fact was so, for him to have done this, by producing the testimony to that effect of the police officers of Memphis, who arrested Marsh and obtained the bonds. No explanation is furnished on that subject by the plaintiff, except merely to show that he sent the despatch of November 25th, from Philadelphia, and several despatches afterward from various places on his way to Memphis, which gave a description of Marsh, and particulars as to when he left Philadelphia and Cincinnati for Memphis, and as to the number of his ticket, and which were received by the police of Memphis before Marsh's arrest. The case would be different n the absence of the despatch from the police of New York, of November 24th, and of the one from the defendants of November 25th. The action, therefore, so far as it is founded on the special contract, fails.

There are in the declaration counts for work and labor, &c., being the common counts. But, on the evidence, the plaintiff was to be entitled to nothing but the $500 he received, unless he should recover the bonds or some of them. Therefore, he can recover nothing in this suit, on a quantum meruit, for the services he rendered.

I find for the defendants.

GARNISHMENT.

A judgment debtor is not liable to be attached as a garnishee under the foreign attachment act of Rhode Island.

[Cited in Smith v. Miln, Case No. 13,081; Thomas v. Woolridge, Id. 13,918; Henry v. Gold Park Min. Co., 15 Fed. 650.]

[Cited in Burnham v. Folsom, 5 N. H. 567; Williams v. Boardman, 91 Mass. 571.]

This suit was removed from the state court under the act of congress. The garnishees made a disclosure in substance as follows: At September term, 1821, of the supreme court of Rhode Island, Ward & Goodale recovered judgment against them for $1.378.87 damages, and $61.59 costs of suit. Previous to the issuing of the execution on that judgment, the original writ in the present case was served on them. Afterwards execution issued on the judgment returnable to the next term, and on that execution they paid $195.34 in part of the judgment; and the supreme court ordered execution to stay for the residue of the judgment to abide the decision of the circuit court in this suit. The sum of $195.34 was the amount of the counsellor's and attorney's fees in the original action of Ward & Goodale against them. That previous to the judgment the garnishees had entered into arbitration bonds with Ward & Goodale to refer the cause, and to pay in a certain manner stated in the bonds the sum for which judgment should be entered upon the award of the referees. The question for the court was whether the garnishees were entitled to be discharged upon a disclosure which depended on this point; whether a judgment debt was attachable under the foreign attachment act of Rhode Island.

Thomas Burgess, for garnishees.

Mr. Tillinghast, for plaintiff.

The former cited Laws R. I. Dig. 1798, p. 208; 2 Mass. 91; 3 Mass. 121; 4 Mass. 238; 7 Mass. 152; 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 313, note. The latter cited Pollard v. Dwight, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 421.

STORY, Circuit Justice. By the foreign attachment act of Rhode Island (Dig. 1798, p. 208, § 4), if the garnishees are discharged upon their disclosure, the suit is to be dismissed against the principal, as well as against the garnishees. The question is whether a judgment debt, on which execution may presently issue, is liable to be attached on a foreign attachment. My opinion is, that it is not. The cases cited from the Massachusetts Reports are directly in point upon the construction of an act of that state, substantially like that of Rhode Island. My judgment proceeds not upon these cases alone; but upon the principles which they contain, which seem to me founded in law and general justice. Suit dismissed.

WITNESS—JOINT DEFENDANT IN DEFAULT.

In a joint action of debt upon a promissory note, if one of the defendants suffer judgment to go against him by default and a writ of inquiry be executed, he is not a competent witness, upon the issue joined by the other defendant.

Debt against Lewis Hipkins and Bartholomy Rochford upon their joint promissory note. Judgment was rendered against Hipkins by default, and a writ of inquiry executed.

On the trial of the issue against Rochford, his counsel, Mr. Taylor, offered to examine Hipkins as a witness for Rochford; and cited Chapman v. Graves, 2 Camp. 333, note; Ward v. Haydon, 2 Esp. 552.

THE COURT (nem. con.) rejected the witness; because the action being joint, the judgment must be joint; and if, upon the trial of the issue against Rochford the verdict should be in his favor, there can be no judgment against Hipkins.

RESPONDENTIA—CONDITION PRECEDENT—CONSTRUCTION.

1. In a respondentia bond for 10,000 dollars, on goods on board of the brig S. from Boston to St. Petersburg and back, there was a clause, that the brig was to have on board, on both passages, the amount lent in goods. There was also a memorandum, executed at the same time, but not referred to in the bond, that the bills of lading should be indorsed to the lenders as collateral security. The brig was lost upon the return voyage, having goods on board of the value of 9,000 dollars only. The lenders sued the bond, and claimed payment of the 10,000 dollars, because the full amount of goods was not on board, and because the bills of lading were not indorsed to the lenders. It was held, that these acts were not conditions precedent, the omission of which was sufficient to justify a recovery in toto; but the lenders were entitled to recover the difference in amount, between the sum lent and the sum on board at the time of the loss.

2. How instruments of respondentia of this sort are to be construed.

This was an action on a respondentia bond and agreement, to secure to the libellants the sum of 10,000 dollars, loaned by them upon the outward and homeward cargoes of the brig Somers, bound from Boston to Copenhagen and St. Petersburg, and back to a port of discharge in the United States. The brig and cargo were totally lost upon her homeward voyage; and the libellants claimed a return of the whole amount loaned, upon the ground, that the stipulations, contained in the bond and agreement, were not complied with on the part of the respondent [Tobias Lord]. The material facts, as proved on the trial, and the points taken by the counsel in argument, fully appear in the opinion of the court.

J. T. Austin, for libellants.

A. Peabody, for respondent.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a suit in admiralty in personam, upon a respondentia bond and agreement. I do not recite the form of the bond and agreement, but shall advert to such parts only as have been adverted to in the argument. The bond is dated in June, 1825, in the penalty of 20,000 dollars, to secure the re-payment of 10,000 dollars lent "upon the specie, goods, wares, and merchandise, laden or to be laden on board the brig Somers, of Boston, &c. bound from Boston to Copenhagen and St. Petersburg, at and from thence back to a port of discharge in the United States, with the usual liberty to touch and trade for refreshment on the outward and homeward passages." The condition of the bond is, that if the vessel shall do and shall proceed on the voyage, &c. and end it at or before the expiration of six calendar months, the casualties of the seas excepted, "having on board the stipulated amount in value, in specie or merchandise, as the case may be, on the respective passages outward and homeward," and if the said Lord, his heirs, &c. shall and do, within sixty days next after the end of the voyage, pay the 10,000 dollars, with the stipulated interest; or if, during the voyage, a loss of the ship by fire, enemies, men of war, or other casualties, shall unavoidably happen, and the said Lord, his heirs, &c. shall account for and pay a just and proportionable salvage on all said specie, goods, wares, and merchandises, of the said Lord, on board of the said vessel, and on all other goods, specie, wares, and merchandise, which he, his heirs, &c. shall therefrom acquire during said voyage, and shall ship on board the said vessel, and shall not be unavoidably lost as aforesaid, then the obligation to be void. There is a separate memorandum, under the seals of the parties of the same date, indorsed on the back of this bond, upon the special terms of which I do not at present comment, it being sufficient to state, that there is an express stipulation, that the bills of lading of the goods on the voyage, out and home, shall be indorsed to the Franklin Insurance Company, as collateral security for the loan. The brig went upon the voyage, and upon her return voyage was, together with her cargo on board, totally lost by the perils of the seas. It is admitted, that upon the return voyage, goods short of the value of 9,000 dollars were put on board, being the proceeds, though not the whole proceeds, of the outward cargo. The libel demands the payment of the whole 10,000 dollars, upon two grounds; first, that on the outward as well as homeward voyage, there was not on board the stipulated sum of 10,000 dollars on account of the borrower; and, secondly, because there was a breach of the agreement in not indorsing the bill of lading, on either voyage, to the libellants, nor a consignment to them on the homeward voyage, according to the agreement. These are contended to be breaches of the contract, which subject the borrower to the full penalty of the bond; or more properly to that, as security for the re-payment of the 10,000 dollars.

If this were a case pending on the common law side of the court, and proper pleadings were interposed, it would undoubtedly be necessary for the defendant (Lord) to show a strict compliance with the terms of his bond in order to save the forfeiture. Whether in such a court, in a hearing in equity, after the forfeiture was found, the party might not obtain just relief according to the real intention of the parties to the contract, I do not pretend to decide. In a court of equity he would certainly be entitled to such relief, and nothing would be decreed to the libellants but what, ex aequo et bono, they are fairly entitled to. The construction of the meaning and terms of the contract would be, or at least ought to be, the same in both courts. A court of admiralty, within the sphere of its jurisdiction, acts upon the principles of a court of equity, and administers its remedies accordingly. So far as the claim proceeds upon the non-compliance with the stipulations in the memorandum, it is certainly not a case even at common law for the enforcement of a strict right to the 10,000 dollars. That memorandum constitutes no part of the condition of the bond, not being referred to, or incorporated into it, either in terms or intention. It is an auxiliary, but collateral and independent, agreement. It sounds in covenant, and in covenant only, and the parties can recover, for breaches of it on either side, only to the extent of the damage and injury done to them. A court of common law would give it no farther operation. It is certainly not entitled to a more favorable view in a court of equity. It is very clear in this case, from the answers and evidence, that there was no intentional and fraudulent omission to deliver the bills of lading, or to withhold the consignment. A bill of lading was in fact delivered of the outward cargo, but it was, obviously by mistake, not properly indorsed. There is no question, that it was the intention of all parties, that the libellants should have a complete lien on the cargo during the whole voyage, as security for the loan. In this respect it differs from the case of Busk v. Fearon, 4 East, 319, and the right to enforce this lien would, in the most ample manner, be recognized in a court of admiralty. If there had been a fraud practiced upon the libellants, I, as one, would have gone far to give the most complete relief. And if now it could be shown, that the omission had damnified the libellants, to the extent of that injury, they ought to receive compensation. But no damage has been shown; and indeed, as to the outward cargo, as it was consigned to the supercargo for sale and returns, an actual lien would have been of no serious avail.

Then, as to the other stipulation, that on both voyages there shall be 10,000 dollars on board. It is denied that there was not an entire compliance with the stipulation on the outward voyage. The fact is, that Mr. Lord put on board a cargo to this amount, purchased and belonging to himself. Afterwards, and before the vessel sailed, his son, a young man, without property, and dependent upon him, expressed a desire to have one fourth part interest in the cargo. The father assented, that he might, if he wished. Nothing further was done by the father. But in consequence of this conversation, a clerk in the store, without the knowledge of the father, made out the heading of the invoice, three quarters for the father and one quarter for the son. The bills of lading had been already made out in the name of the father alone, and signed by the master, and were never altered. No charge was made in the books of the father against the son; no security was given by him for the amount, and nothing afterwards occurred between the parties to confirm the bargain. Under these circumstances, which are testified to in a manner which commands belief, I cannot say, that any interest in the cargo passed to the son. He made no payment, gave no security, had no credit on the books, and received no delivery; and the bargain, if it were one, was merely in fieri, and unexecuted; for until payment, or security, or credit given, the father must be deemed the legal owner against all persons. He was the original owner, and purchaser, and shipper, and his interest could not pass by so loose a proceeding as that insisted on. In short, the natural interpretation of it is, that the father intended not so much to part with any property in the shipment, as to allow his son a quarter part of the profits, or charge him with a like proportion of the loss of the voyage. There were some subsequent proceedings after the loss of the vessel, from which it is attempted to be shown, that there was a fraudulent endeavour to suppress the real facts on this point. I do not think it is established in evidence; and if it were, it would not overcome the strength of the other facts, as they have been proved by testimony which I must deem unexceptionable.

We may then pass to the consideration of the remaining part of the case. The defendant has paid into court a sum equal to what he supposes to be the deficiency of value on the return voyage, and the interest; and the only question is, whether the stipulation is absolute, so as to compel him to pay the residue of the 10,000 dollars. The clause in question is found in the condition of the bond. It is argued, that it constitutes an essential part of the condition, on compliance only with which the penalty is saved. If it does not require this interpretation, it is argued, in the next place, that it operates as a warranty, and in this view is equally conclusive upon the party. I am of opinion, that if it does not operate as a condition, it ought not to be held as a warranty from the nature of the stipulation itself, as well as from the effect of the explanatory memorandum. The latter sounds only as a mutual covenant on the same subject matter; and there is no reason to give a broader construction here for any purposes of justice. Then let us see, how it stands on the letter of the bond, as a condition. It is found in one only of the alternative clauses in the condition of the bond; for there are two, one of which looks to the entire completion of the voyage by the parties, the other to the failure of the voyage by some of the accidents provided for. The performance of either alternative saves the bond. The clause, "having on board the stipulated amount in value, &c. on the respective passages," &c. is found only in the former, and not in the latter. If we take it then in the connexion in which it stands, as a qualification of the first alternative, as the casus foederis has not arisen by the performance of the voyage, it has no bearing upon the defendant. He is saved by the other alternative, a loss having occurred which was absolutely total. To reach the argument of the libellant, it is necessary for the court to insert the same clause in the latter alternative, or to bring it down to the latter as a distinct clause, applicable to both. Whatever reason there might be to do so, for the purpose of adjusting equities between the parties, there is none why a court should studiously aid one party in enforcing a penalty against another, when it did not stand necessarily in the letter of the bond. At common law I am of opinion, that the rigid construction, now contended for, could not and ought not to prevail.

But I am not willing to rest this case upon this mode of reasoning. The contracts of bottomry and respondentia are mercantile contracts of long use and frequent application, and entitled to be expounded, at least in a court of admiralty, in a liberal manner, so as to meet the intentions of the parties, and to subserve the cause of general justice. We may call in aid the laws and usages of other nations to assist in the interpretation, as containing the general sense of the commercial world on the subject. My opinion is, that upon general principles, a contract of respondentia, under circumstances like the present, is to be considered as a contract to risk so much of the amount lent, as shall be covered by the property on board. If goods to the full amount of the loan are on board, the whole loan is at risk; if a less amount, then the risk is pro tanto. I cannot understand it as a rational interpretation of the object of the parties, that unless all is risked, none shall be risked. They may, indeed, so stipulate; but it is not to be inferred from the general terms of a contract, which speaks only of the value intended to be put on board, and kept on board during the voyage. Great inconveniences might otherwise arise. A party hires 10,000 dollars to proceed to a foreign port for sales and returns, stipulating that there shall be this amount on board. Now it may turn out, that the goods come to a falling market, and the proceeds are less than the shipment. Is he, in such a case, to pay the whole respondentia premium for the homeward as well as the outward voyage, although no risk is run upon the latter? Suppose half of it is lost by a peril of the seas on the outward passage, is the condition then to be understood to be broken on his part, and an obligation created to pay the whole amount borrowed, with the interest, because, by the very perils taken by the lender, the property is less than the amount stipulated, for the rest of the voyage out, as well as home? It appears to me unreasonable to put such a construction upon such contracts, drawn up by mercantile men, and of course dealing in those loose and inaccurate expressions, which the haste and necessities of business excuse, if they do not justify. It appears to me far more just to consider the stipulation, as to value, to be a covenant, that the amount shall be on board during the voyage; and that if it is violated to the prejudice of the lender, then he shall receive compensation. But that as to the amount on board, the risk is to be run, and the maritime interest so far shall be earned. A different course would be as inconsistent with the promotion of good faith, as of public convenience. Suppose the risk is run, and the voyage terminated successfully; is it to be endured, that at the end, the borrower may come forward, and demand a total discharge from all the maritime interest, because at some time during the voyage, there was a small deficiency of the value? It would be immaterial, whether it was a deficiency of ten dollars or five thousand. In either case, if the understanding of the contract is, that the value on board is an absolute condition or warranty, the principle would operate a discharge of the borrower. Such cannot, it appears to me, be the fair interpretation of such a contract; and least of all of one which stipulates, in the event of loss, for a proportionable salvage. The doctrine of the French law conforms to that which I have stated, and I consider it, in the absence of all opposing authority, evidence of the rule generally held by the mercantile world. In a case of this nature, the doctrines supported by such men as Valin, and Pothier, and Emerigon, are entitled to great weight. Emerigon lays down the principle in the following terms: "Where the borrower is unable or unwilling to ship goods to the value of the sum borrowed, the contract, in case of loss, shall be diminished in proportion to the goods shipped, and shall only be valid as to the surplus, for which the borrower shall pay interest according to the custom of the place where it was executed, together with the principal. If the ship arrive safe, there shall be no more due than common interest, and not maritime interest on the excess above the value of the goods shipped." See Hall's Emerig. Mar. Loans, p. 149; 2 Valin, lib. 3, tit. 5, art. 14; 15 Poth. h. t., note 39; Commercial Code of France, bk. 2, tit. 9, art. 329; 2 Emerig. Cont. Grosse, p. 495, c. 6, § 1. I adopt this doctrine, and follow it on the present occasion. Upon these principles, the cause will be referred to a commissioner to ascertain whether anything is due to the libellants more than what has been paid into court. If anything is due, the libellants are entitled to a decree for the amount, with costs; if not, the libel is to be dismissed, without costs, for the defendant. Decree accordingly.

ESTATE OF FRANKLIN SAV. FUND SOC.

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May 27, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—INSTRUCTION TO ASSIGNEE—DISPUTABLE RIGHTS.

Where no question of disputable right exists, assignees in bankruptcy cannot obtain the instruction of the court, whether to do a proposed act, which, if proper on their part, would be within their own discretion and power on the administration of their trust.

In equity.

BY THE COURT. The amount due by the bankrupt corporation to the depositors, is believed to be $859,000, with accruing interest. The available assets in the actual possession and control of the assignees are estimated by them at $520,000, or about 60 per cent., which is, perhaps, however, a high valuation. I understood one of the assignees to say, in court, that he considered it too high. Assuming its correctness, the probable deficit would be $339,000, or nearly 40 per cent. without any computation of interest. The deficit may be much greater. It is important, therefore, to consider the recourse of the assignees in bankruptcy to other property, which is in the nominal ownership or control of the defaulting treasurer of the bankrupt company.

This property, as he estimates it, is of the value of $284,000. The amount of his debts to others than the company has been very differently stated by him at different times. He now states the amount of those other debts to be, $42,437, of which he represents $25,900 to be unsecured. But $4,200 of the unsecured, and $12,000 of the secured amounts, together $16,200, are alleged to be due to one of the persons whose neglect of duty, when directors of the company, is considered by the assignees to have enabled the treasurer to abstract the funds. The past relations of other alleged creditors may also be such as to render them responsible, in whole or in part, for his defaults. All the claims included in the $42,437 will probably, more or less, for various reasons, require scrutiny. From the papers exhibited, it may be inferred that his estimate of the value of the property as $284,000 is partly speculative and prospective, requiring for its realization two years or more of time, with favorable contingencies. Independently of any rebate for loss of interest from delay, the estimate, being his own, may be very high. But the dependency must, at worst, be very valuable.

The assignees appear to assume that this treasurer's present liability for his embezzlements and other breaches of trust, is only for the amount of the anticipated deficiency of the assets now in possession. Arithmetically, as between the assignees and the depositors, this may not be an incorrect way of considering the matter, because the greatest value of all the property in this person's nominal ownership, as yet discoverable, appears to fall short of the smallest estimate of such deficiency. But, as between the assignees and himself, his legal and equitable relation is altogether different. It is that of primary responsibility for the whole original amount of the funds abstracted, and for the gains and profits, or for interest if the gains and profits cannot be discovered. Under the auxiliary jurisdiction of the circuit court, a suit in equity in that court has already been instituted by creditors against him and others, in which the assignees may become complainants if they have not already done so. In the present stage of that suit, the bill is amendable, as of course, in the clerk's office. The amount of his primary liability, if the assignees limit their demand to the monies fraudulently abstracted with legal interest, is already ascertained by his own written admissions in his examinations in bankruptcy. The lowest primary amount is the sum of the unpaid deposits, less only the few dollars which were on hand at the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. He is not entitled to any credit for pretended investments when made, because none were made honestly in the name of the company. The decree in equity will be primarily for the full pecuniary amount. He will be entitled from time to time to reasonable credits for nett cash when realized by the assignees. But this will not prevent them from issuing execution in the mean time, on the decree, for the unpaid part of the sum primarily due. Such a primary decree will not, nor will, under proper equitable direction, such an execution, preclude the complainants from obtaining, under proper amendments and adaptations of their bill, the further specific relief to which they may be equitably entitled. The property in question may be classed under three heads: (1) Property traceable as investments, products or substitutes of the funds abstracted by him: (2) Property acquired with funds of uncertain source: (3) Property which was acquired by him before any of his embezzlements, or is otherwise provable to have been acquired with funds not of the bankrupt company. Under the first head, all the investments, products or substitutes which are traceable, however often or variously changed in form, or name, can be followed and reclaimed. Under the second head, if, through confusion or obscurity caused or promoted by acts or omissions of the wrongdoer, the tracing or ascertainment becomes difficult, all doubts ought to be resolved against him, as the party putting out the light, or otherwise occasioning the difficulty. Every legal and equitable presumption is against such a party. On this principle the injunctions in the pending suit in equity were granted in a general form. Under the third head, the ultimate remedy is by execution only. But the property cannot be put out of reach of an execution. With reference to his debts to other creditors, the case may be considered under the same three heads, but not in the same order of succession. Under the third head, and perhaps also under the second, the recourse of the assignees against such portions of the property as cannot be considered investments or products of, or substitutes for, funds of the company, will be to give to the pending suit the form, in this part of it, of a creditors' bill. As to such property, they will sue therefore, as well on their own behalf, as on that of such of his other creditors as may become parties to the bill, and may establish their respective demands. Under the first head, as to property acquired originally or derivatively with funds of the company, the exclusive right of the assignees cannot be impaired by the existence of the other debts. But, in order to simplify the litigation, the assignees may, as complainants, be willing, perhaps ultimately, to waive, even in this respect, their strict rights. In favor of the fraudulent party himself, these rights of course cannot be waived. Nor can the concession be made by the assignees in favor of his other creditors, unless on reasonable and equitable conditions. But, under such conditions, property which cannot, as between the assignees and this defaulter, be considered his estate, may perhaps be so treated in favor of other creditors, by way of concession, to promote equality and promptness of distribution. In the meantime, the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], would, if there were no injunction, prevent any preferential disposition of his property for the benefit of such other creditors. If he should attempt it, proceedings in bankruptcy against him could be instituted so as to frustrate the attempt. The papers exhibited by the assignees, indicate that he has already threatened, or proposed, such a preferential disposition. This will, under a properly framed amendment of the bill, furnish an additional reason for continuing the injunction till the final hearing of the cause.

The final hearing cannot be long deferred, because the proofs will probably consist almost wholly of admissions by defendants in their own examinations heretofore taken. The assignees now report that this treasurer of the bankrupts has fully recognized his liability for any deficiency which may be ascertained to exist, and has proposed "to mortgage or assign to them his individual property to meet the same." By "his individual property" is meant of course the property and effects of which he is the nominal owner. In the report of the assignees, they proceed to describe the offer, which appears, by their description of it, and by the suggested form of a deed annexed, to be very different in substance from what the introductory words above quoted might seem to import. It is in essential respects objectionable. He proposes a trust only "to secure the payment of any deficiency that shall be ascertained in the assets of the corporation bankrupts to pay all obligations due by the same." This language of the proposed deed is, to say the least, extremely equivocal on the question whether a primary liability on his part, or only an eventual accountability would be secured. The question whether the trust would be available at all, until the assignees shall have themselves fully accounted for assets already in their possession, would thus be open to litigious contention.

Again, there is to be a compulsory postponement for two years of the definitive execution of the proposed trust. This would be repugnant to the nature of the trust vested in the assignees. They may, indeed, in their discretion, postpone its execution as to subjects requiring delay. But they should not surrender their discretionary power. Their general duty is to make the assets available with the least possible delay. Moreover, the deed provides that the trust is to be saddled, for the two years, with an irrevocable agency of the defaulting treasurer himself. This may, perhaps, not have been intended. The intention may have been only to bind him to render service in such an agency, if it should be required of him by the assignees. If so, the language used would need careful reformation. But I do not think that they ought even to be authorized to delegate any authority whatever to him.

A peculiarly objectionable provision, also proposed, is that which would, on the execution of the deed, release him absolutely from his indebtment and liabilities. If this man, however guilty, should make all the atonement in his power, future forbearance on the part of the assignees might not be improper. If he should make an unconditional assignment or mortgage, of all his nominal and actual estate, for the equal benefit of all his creditors, forbearance might be accorded, unless other frauds be hereafter discovered. But the forbearance ought to be discretionary on the part of the creditors represented by the assignees. I think, however, that such property, nominally his own, as he may effectually transfer, might be credited absolutely to him at once, on account of his debt, at a certain valuation; and this valuation might reasonably be a liberal one. But a release of the excess of the debt, without receiving any equivalent, ought, when we regard the manner in which the debt was incurred, to be considered out of the question. The moral objections are insuperable. But, independently of them, such a release would be impolitic. It would probably embarrass the recourse of the assignees against the company's former directors for neglect of their duty. Such directors might object, that the release was of the party who, having used the funds which were abstracted, was primarily liable. His son, and his nephew, in whom respectively the legal estate in parts of the property is vested, would, on their executing the proposed deed, be also released from all demands of the assignees. For this the reasons may be sufficient.

Another proposed provision to which I have already, in part, alluded, is that, of the property valued by him, as above, at $284,000, certain portions which he values at $48,000, shall be set apart for the preferential security of the other creditors whose debts he now computes at $42,437. Under this head a separate trust is proposed. Objections to the complexity of this part of the plan are answered in the report. They will not be considered here. The substantial objection is different. It is the preferential character of the proposed security for the exclusive benefit of those other creditors. I have already suggested that, so far as their demands can be established as valid, they ought perhaps to stand on a footing of equality. But why they should be preferred, to the exclusion of the assignees, no reason has been suggested.

Some other objections it is not necessary to specify. They would be consequent, in principle, upon those which have been stated.

The assignees report the proposed arrangement, expressing "their willingness to close with the proposition;" and ask the court's "instruction whether or not they shall accept the same." Here they mistake, I think, the judicial function of which they invoke the exercise. This court of bankruptcy is legislatively made a court of summary equitable jurisdiction over them, and over their trust. Therefore, independently of any special provisions of the bankrupt act, the court could, by way of direction to them, as trustees, decide any question of legal or equitable right, which could be contentiously discussed for opposing interests. But here no such question properly arises. The assignees have power, on their own responsibility, to perform the act in question, unless it would involve a breach of trust. A trustee cannot obtain the direction of a court of equity as to the mere administration of his trust, in matters within his own discretion or power. But assignees in bankruptcy are not simple trustees. They are also in a certain sense, officers of the court of bankruptcy. Therefore, to prevent misconception, I state the objections which suggest themselves. So much for the general question.

The question may next be considered under the bankrupt law. The 17th section enacts that the assignee may, under the direction of the court, submit to arbitration any controversy arising in the settlement of demands against the estate, or of debts due to it; and may, under such direction, compound and settle any such controversy by agreement with the other party as he thinks proper, and most for the interest of the creditors. There is no other provision of the act which can be cited on the question, and this provision does not apply to it. There is no suit or demand against the estate, and no controversy whatever as to a debt due to it. On the contrary, the report of the assignees expressly affirms that the treasurer unqualifiedly admits his liability for the debt. The only question is an undefinable one, which they seem to apprehend may arise in making available their judicial recourse for an indisputable demand. If the enactment of the seventeenth section applied at all, it would be necessary for the assignees to take unequivocally upon themselves the direct responsibility of recommending the arrangement, as in their opinion, a proper one. This they have not done; and they seem to have advisedly omitted doing it. If they had certified their opinion that it would be proper, and I had been able to take cognizance of the question, I could not have concurred in their opinion.

I do not think, on the mere ground of expediency, that the additional protracted and complex trusts proposed would be likely to relieve the estate from litigations, or to expedite its distribution. I see no reason that a decree in the present suit in equity may not be speedily obtainable. There will, in the mean time, be every facility for occasional interlocutory directions. Nevertheless, it would, of course, be highly expedient that the purposes of that suit should be attained through a proper submission of the guilty defendant. I have already intimated to what extent the assignees, upon his making such imperfect atonement as may still be in his power, might be justifiable in according future forbearance to him. But they should not allow him to impose arbitrary conditions upon those who are sufferers from his delinquencies. Nor should he exact compensation for rendering to the sufferers any service within his power.

It is to be recollected that the questions which have been considered, are entirely unconnected with the collection, disposal, or distribution of the assets now in possession, which are of the estimated value of $520,000. It was admitted, on the argument, that such collection, disposal or distribution of them could not be facilitated or expedited by the proposed arrangement, if it had been carried into effect. I have only to add, that if the estimate of $520,000 is too high, or too low, there should be a reappraisement, in order that the unfortunate creditors may not have incorrect expectations. The assets consist mainly of securities whose value does not, like that of merchandize or stocks, depend upon fluctuations of a sensitive market; and there will, under efficient administration, be no danger of sacrifice.

[2 Flip. 291;[1] 11 Chi. Leg. News, 114.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. Nov. Term, 1878.

TOWING—COLLISION—EVIDENCE—LACHES—RELATION BETWEEN TUG AND TOW—CONFLICT OF EVIDENCE.

1. Where a collision occurred between a propeller that was aground on the St. Clair Flats and a tow that was bound up, the propeller was condemned for not exhibiting a proper light and the tug because it failed to stop. The schooner that was towed was adjudged faultless.

2. Looking to the business of towing as ordinarily conducted upon the lakes, the relation between the tug and the vessel towed is that of master and servant. The tug furnishes her own crew, regulates the length of the line and the movements of the vessels, the order in which the tow shall be made up, and determines the number of the tow, irrespective of the wishes of the master of the vessel towed. Each vessel is liable to third parties for her own negligence; no further, but in certain events they may be jointly liable.

3. Where there has been no change of ownership the libellant is not debarred of his action if he commences his suit within the time prescribed by the statute of limitations; and there is no laches because two years' time has elapsed since the collision.

4. The general rule, that where there is a conflict of evidence with regard to what has taken place upon a vessel, the testimony of her own master and crew shall be believed in preference to that of an equal number of witnesses observing her movements from another vessel, does not apply to the exhibition of a light.

The propeller Colorado, while on a trip from Buffalo to Chicago ran aground on the north bank of St. Clair river, at about 8 p. m., on the 15th of November, 1873. This was in a bend or bayou of the channel, at some distance from the range of lights on the flats to the place where the ship canal enters. Lying there with her stern out slightly in the channel, and though having a space of between 300 to 600 feet on her starboard side, she was run into by the tug Frank Moffat while ascending the river, having in tow the schooner Sunrise, at about 4 a. m. of the morning of November 16. When the tug struck the Colorado she drew along upon that vessel the Sunrise, which also struck the propeller on her port quarter, inflicting serious damages. The collision was brought about by the negligence of the tug, for if she had ported at a proper distance she would have safely passed. The tug endeavored to fasten the blame on the propeller; insisting that she displayed no light.

F. H. Canfield, for libellant.
Geo. E. Halliday, for respondent.

BROWN, District Judge. I am satisfied there is no fault to be imputed to the schooner. The line connecting her with the tug was only 120 to 125 feet in length, and as the tug did not check until very close to the propeller, the utmost vigilance and activity on the part of the schooner in porting, would not have enabled her to clear the propeller. There is no evidence that any warning was given by the tug, although the mate swears that he thinks he told the watchman to go and sing out to them. With a longer line and with an earlier observation of the propeller on the part of the tug, the schooner might have ported in time to avoid her, but, under the circumstances of the case, it was obviously impossible.

It is also claimed that the tug was acting simply as the agent of the schooner, and that the schooner is solely responsible for the negligence of the tug. There are a number of English cases cited, as lending countenance to this doctrine, but upon a careful examination, I find they do not sustain it to the extent claimed. In The Duke of Sussex, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 270, the action was brought against a tug for damage occasioned by the vessel in tow colliding with another vessel. It was held that the vessel in tow, having a licensed pilot on board, and no error or negligence being established on the part of the crew of the tug, she could not be held liable. Following the general rule in England, that a vessel is not liable for a collision occasioned by the act of a licensed pilot, it was held that as the steam tug only executed the orders of a pilot on board the vessel, and was guilty herself of no negligence, she could not be held responsible. To the same effect is The Duke of Manchester, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 470. In The Gypsey King, Id. 542, Dr. Lushington states the English law as follows: "Now I have, upon former occasions, already expressed my opinion, that a vessel in charge of a licensed pilot, whilst in tow of a steam tug, is, under ordinary circumstances, to be considered as navigated by the pilot in charge; that if the course pursued by the steam tug is in conformity with his directions, and a collision takes place, the pilot is responsible, and not the owner of the vessel or of the steam tug. If, on the contrary, the steamer disregard the directions of the pilot, and the collision was occasioned by her misconduct, the owners of the ship would, in that case, be responsible in this court, as for the act of their servant; and they must seek their redress against the owner of the steam tug in some other action."

There is no case, however, even in England, holding directly that a steam tug, controlled by her own officers and men, would not be liable if she herself were guilty of negligence in bringing about the collision. In the case of Smith v. The Creole [Case No. 13,033], the principal American case supposed to support the English doctrine, Mr. Justice Grier observed, "When canalboats or other like vessels are towed by steamboats, it is usually under a contract which puts the towed vessel wholly under the direction and control of the officers of the steamboat. In such cases the steamboat would be liable for any collision occasioned by the negligence or want of skill of her officers, but when the steam power has been hired to tow larger vessels in or out of port, the contract is different, and creates a different state of responsibility. The towboat in such case, is the servant of the ship, and in the exercise of its physical power, is bound to obey the orders of the master or pilot who has command or control of the ship. If the towboat obeys the directions of the pilot or the master of the vessel, he is responsible for the consequences. If the ship is brought into collision with another vessel, by the unskillfulness or disobedience of orders of the officers or hands on the towboat, its owners are liable to the owners of the vessel or person who employed them, but not to third parties."

I think this and later cases, holding the principal responsible instead of the servant, proceed upon the hypothesis that the negligent act on the part of the tug was committed in obedience to orders from the officers of the ship, and are not founded upon the general relation between them of master and servant.

The rule which governs this case is laid down in Sturgis v. Boyer, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 123, and repeated in The Maria Martin, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 44, in the following language: "Where the officers and crew of the tow, as well as the officers and crew of the tug participate in the navigation of the vessel, and a collision with another vessel ensues, the tug alone, or the tow alone, or both jointly, may be liable for the consequences, according to the circumstances, as the one or the other or both jointly were either deficient in skill, or culpably inattentive or negligent in the performance of their duties. See, also, The John Frazer, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 184; Sproul v. Hemmingway, 14 Pick. 1; The Belknap [Case No. 1,244].

As the business of towing is conducted upon the lakes, I regard the relation between the tow and the tug as that of master and servant. The tug engages usually for a lump sum, to tow the vessel from one point to another. She furnishes her own crew, pursues her own course, regulates the length of the line, the movements of the vessels, the order in which the tow shall be made up, and determines the number of the tow, usually irrespective of the wishes of the master of the vessel. It is true, the vessel in tow has certain duties also to perform, she must keep a careful lookout, follow in the wake of the tug, have her lights properly burning at night, and do all she can to avoid a collision in case of danger. In the performance of these services, the tug is plainly a "contractor" within the definition of that word. Shear. & R. Neg. § 87. In such cases each party is responsible for his own negligence. If, by the negligence of the tug, the tow is drawn off her course, the tug is responsible. If, by the negligence of the vessel she sheers out of her course, she is alone liable. It is a case where both participate in the movements of the tow, and both are concerned in its direction. I think all of the cases where the tug has been exonerated, have been those where the act of negligence committed by her was in obedience to an order given by an officer in charge of the vessel. In such case the vessel would clearly be liable and the tug exonerated.

The objection that the lien has been lost by the laches of the libellant, in failing to bring his action within a reasonable time, is untenable. The collision occurred the 16th of November, 1873, and the action was commenced on the 10th of November, 1875; about two years after the cause of action arose. Had the tug in the meantime been sold and passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser, without notice of this claim, I should have held the lien lost. But where no change of ownership has taken place, I see no reason why the libellant should be debarred of his action if he commence his suit within the time prescribed by the statute of limitations.

The liability of the propeller depends solely upon the question whether she was exhibiting a proper light at the time of the collision. On the one hand her crew swear that the usual anchor light was displayed upon the flagstaff, and that there was also a globe lantern standing upon the companion way in such a position that it could be seen by a vessel approaching from behind; but their testimony is not of the most trustworthy nature, as all but one man seem to have been below at the time of the collision. On the other hand, the master, mate, lookout, and engineer of the tug, all swear that no light was displayed; and two of them, at least, saw the propeller at some distance; were intently watching her to find out what she was, and would certainly have seen a light if it had been exhibited. I do not think the general rule, that when there is a conflict of evidence with regard to what has taken place upon a vessel, the testimony of her own master and crew shall be believed in preference to that of an equal number of witnesses observing her movements from another vessel, applies to the exhibition of a light. This is a matter about which none of the crew can speak with any certainty, except those who were on deck, and even they might very easily overlook the extinguishment of a light, while the crew of an approaching vessel, keeping a proper lookout, could hardly fail to discern a light, if one exhibited. The night of the collision was a cold one, and I deem it not at all improbable that the oil might have become congealed and the light either have been extinguished or become so dim it could be seen but a short distance off. There is also evidence tending strongly to show that, after the collision occurred, a light was run up on the flagstaff of the propeller—a thing which would probably not have been done had there been a sufficient one already. At the time of the collision, there was also complaint made by the crew of the tug to the master of the propeller, that she was lying there without a light, and some one remarked that it was a pretty time of night to put up a light. Upon the whole, I think the evidence preponderates in favor of the theory that the propeller was not exhibiting a proper light at the time of the collision. While the absence of such a light in a bright moonlight night would probably not have occasioned a collision, considering that the night was a dark one, though not cloudy, I cannot say it did not contribute to the collision in this case. Indeed, I think it very improbable that it would have occurred if a proper light had been exhibited. A fault proven to have been committed is presumed to have contributed to the collision, and the want of a proper light has always been considered a fault of the gravest description. I think it should require a clear case to satisfy the court that it did not aid in bringing it about. The Thomas Lea, 3 Asp. 260; The Victoria, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 49; The Saxonia, Lush. 410; The Olivia, Lush. 497; The Indiana [Case No. 7,020]; The St. Charles, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 108; The Osprey [Case No. 3,763]; Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 55; The Ariadne, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 475; 1 Pars. Shipp. 550. I must therefore hold the propeller to have been in fault.

I think the tug was also clearly in fault. The evidence is uncontradicted that the propeller was seen some time before the collision occurred. The mate says: "I could see something looming up before me in the dark. That is the first intimation I had of it. I called the watchman's attention to it and he said it looked like the broadside of a barn. Then I saw that we were getting pretty close to her, and checked her down and stopped her; put my wheel a-starboard. I saw it was my only chance of not striking her. I took it to be a small vessel of some kind, I did not know what. I was so close to her I saw it was the only thing I could do. * * * Not more than half a minute elapsed from the time I saw the Colorado to the time I checked the speed of the tug; may be not that long. If I had known that it was a propeller, I don't know that there was anything to prevent me from porting my wheel, and clearing her, but I did not have my lights ranged and could not tell, and so I starboarded my wheel. If that had been a vessel sailing up the river I would have put my wheel to starboard."

John Hiller, the watchman, says: "Mr. Edwards called my attention to this black spot, or something dark, it looked to him, and asked me if I knew what it was, and I supposed it to be, when I first saw it, a bunch of rushes. I passed some queer remark about it; said it looked like the side of a barn or something in a joking way, and I stood forward with him; in a few minutes our light shone on the propeller's stern so we could see it, it looked like a sail, the stern did, to me. Mr. Edwards checked the boat down immediately and I made the remark that I thought it was a small boat, a fishing boat or yacht of some kind; it looked like a small sail. Mr. Edwards checked the boat down and put his wheel starboard, and stopped her soon after he checked her, * * * I don't think she could have been more than 100 or 150 feet from the propeller when she was checked down, probably further; I could not say exactly."

John Thomas, the engineer, says: "My first knowledge was a bell rung and I got out of bed to see what was the matter, as I usually do when we go over the flats. I looked out and I could not see anything but a white glimmer, which I thought was a sail, so we checked the engine back very slow. I told the second, he was standing by the engine, to check her slow, and by and by we got a bell to stop, and by that time we ran alongside. * * * It could not have been a very long time after we got the bells to check before we got the bell to stop; I could not tell exactly. It might have been half a minute or it might have been close on a minute for aught I know."

The master of the propeller testifies that the propeller could have been seen three or four lengths of herself without lights. To the same effect is the testimony of the first engineer.

I think it evident from this testimony, that the mate and lookout of the tug must have discovered the propeller very soon after passing the range lights at the bend, and at a distance of from 800 to 1,000 feet. Failing to discover exactly what it was, and mistaking it, perhaps, for a bunch of rushes, it was nevertheless incumbent upon them at once to stop until its character had been determined. If a steamer makes an object or hears a hail ahead of her, the character or position of which the officers are unable to fix, it is their duty to stop until the doubt is resolved. The Hypodame, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 216. She has no right to plunge blindly forward and encounter dangers, the magnitude of which she is unable to discern. This applies with even greater force to a tug, since she is unable to back or to use any extraordinary efforts to avoid a collision, without endangering a collision between herself and her tow.

I think it quite probable there may have been a mistake in the range lights at the head of the canal, and that not only the starboarding of the tug, but the grounding of the propeller may be attributed to that. Although it is denied by the officers of the propeller, it is perhaps the most probable solution of her getting aground, and of the otherwise inexplicable movement of the tug. But the question of fault does not hinge upon this. It was the duty of the tug at once to stop when she made out the dark object ahead of her. Instead of this, she kept on for some considerable time, and apparently did not even check until the lights of the tug reflected back from the stern of the propeller, developed the fact that it was a vessel. The tug then first checked. Even then, prompt porting might have avoided the collision. Certainly the tug cannot claim the excuse of a wrong order given in a moment of imminent peril, since by her negligence in failing to stop, she had brought herself into that predicament. There must be a decree apportioning the damages, and referring it to a commissioner to assess and report the same.

FRANZ & POPE KNITTING-MACH. CO. v. BICKFORD.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. 31, 1879.

PATENTS—VALIDITY.

Letters patent No. 99,426, dated February 1, 1870, granted to William Franz and William Pope, and reissue patent No. 7,368, dated January 20, 1868, granted to Thomas Crane for improvements in knitting-machines, found to be valid.

In equity.

Strawbridge & Taylor and B. F. Thurston, for complainant.

Frost & Coe, for defendant.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The bill in this case is founded upon five several patents. At the argument, however, the complainant limited its claim to recover to two of these patents—viz., reissued patent No. 7,368, to Thomas Crane, dated January 20, 1868; patent to William Franz and William Pope, No. 99,426, dated February 1, 1870. I am satisfied by the proofs in the case that the complainant is entitled to a decree affirming the validity of these patents, and that the defendant is shown to have infringed the second claim of patent No. 7,368 and the fifth claim of patent No. 99,426. Let a decree, therefore, for an injunction and an account be prepared accordingly.

Decree: And now, to wit, October 31, 1879, this cause having been heard upon pleadings and proofs and argument of counsel for the respective parties, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that letters patent of the United States, reissue No. 7,368, dated October 31, 1876, to Thomas Crane, assignor to the above-named complainant, for improvement in knitting-machines, and letters patent of the United States to William Franz and William Pope, No. 99,426, dated February 1, 1870, for improvements in knitting-machines, are good and valid. That the title to said letters patent and each of them is duly vested in said complainant, and that said letters patent are infringed by the said defendant as to claim 2 of said reissue No. 7,368 and claim 5 of said patent No. 99,426. That the defendant, Dana Bickford, his servants, workmen, agents, clerks, and attorneys, be perpetually enjoined and restrained from making, using, or vending any knitting-machine or apparatus described and claimed in said reissue No. 7,368, claim 2, and original letters patent No. 99,426, claim 5, or either of them. That the complainant do recover of the defendant, Dana Bickford, the profits and gains made and received by him in consequence of the infringement and violation of the exclusive rights of the complainant under said reissue No. 7,368, dated October 31, 1876, and said original letters patent No. 99,426, dated February 1, 1870, together with the damages the said complainant has sustained thereby, together, also, with the costs of prosecution of this cause against said defendant. And this cause is referred to Robert N. Willson, Esq., as master, to compute, ascertain, and assess said profits, gains, and also the damages to the said complainant and to take the proofs thereof and report the same to the court, with leave to the complainant to move the court upon notice to increase said profits and gains and damages that may be assessed and reported by said master.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—WANT OF DEFENSE.

When the validity and infringement of the letters patent are supported by statement of facts admitted by defendant, who also admits the want of any valid defense, the judgment must be for complainant and decree accordingly.

In equity.

Strawbridge & Taylor, for complainants.
John R. Bennett, for defendants.

BUTLER, District Judge. And now, March 15, 1881, this cause having been brought to final hearing, proofs on the part of the respective parties having been taken and closed in said cause, the said cause having been submitted to the court upon the statement of the plaintiffs' case by counsel for complainants and the statement by defendants' counsel admitting the want of any valid defense to the said case on the part of said defendants, and admitting the validity and the infringement of the several letters patent mentioned as in the bill of complaint stated, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that reissue letters patent No. 7,368, dated October 31, 1876, to Thomas Crane, assignor to the above-named complainants; letters patent No. 105,187, dated July 12, 1870, to William Franz and William Pope; letters patent No. 123,687, dated February 13, 1872, to William Franz and William Pope; letters patent No. 102,529, dated May 3, 1870, to William Franz and William Pope; letters patent No. 99,425, dated February 1, 1870, to William Franz and William Pope; all for improvements in knitting-machines, are good and valid; that the title to said letters patent in each of them is duly vested in said complainants, and that said letters patent are infringed by the said defendants and each of them; that the defendants and each of them and their servants, workmen, agents, clerks, and attorneys be perpetually enjoined and restrained from making, using, or vending any knitting-machines or apparatus described and claimed in said letters patent or either of them; that the complainants do recover of defendants the profits and gains made and received by them in consequence of the infringement and violation of the exclusive rights of complainants under said letters patent and each of them, together with the damages the said complainants have sustained thereby, together, also, with the cost of prosecution in this case against said defendants. And this case is referred to Robert N. Willson, Esq., as master, to compute, ascertain, and assess said profits and gains, and also the damages to the said complainants, and to take the proof thereof and to report the same to the court.

Case No. 5,062.

The FRANZ SIGEL.

[14 Blatchf. 480.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 11, 1878.[2]

COLLISION—BETWEEN STEAM VESSELS.

The steamboat W. had the steamboat S. off her starboard side and the courses of the two vessels crossed. The pilot of the W. saw that the S. must encounter a cross tide, and that it would affect her movements. He made no allowance for this and did not give the S. sufficient room. A collision ensued between the two vessels. Held, that the W. was wholly in fault.

[Cited in The Fred W. Chase, 31 Fed. 95.]

This was an appeal from a decree of the district court [of the United States for the Southern district of New York], in a suit in rem, in admiralty, dismissing the libel. [Case No. 5,311.] About noon of July 19, 1871, the steam propeller Franz Sigel, of ninety tons burden and seventy-five feet in length, having on board a cargo of sugar and so loaded as to be a little by the head, was on her way up the East river, at a slow rate of speed, from Prentice's stores, Brooklyn, below Bridge street, to the foot of Gold street, Brooklyn, above Bridge street. The weather was fair, the tide strong ebb and the wind fresh down the river. The course of the Sigel was under the Brooklyn shore, not far from the ends of the piers, so as to avoid the strength of the tide. She had been long employed as a steam lighter in the harbor of New York and was well known. Her course at the time was the one she usually took when employed as she then was, with an ebb tide and such as those engaged in similar business were accustomed to take under like circumstances. The George Washington, a side-wheel steamboat running on a ferry between Oliver street slip, New York, and the foot of Bridge street, Brooklyn, was at the same time on a trip from New York to Brooklyn. The distance between the two slips is about one mile and the Brooklyn slip is further up the river than that on the New York side. The ebb tide in the East river strikes the New York shore above Corlears' Hook and then sets across to a point near the foot of Gold street, Brooklyn. From there it follows down the Brooklyn shore to a tight dock, known as "Long Dock," situated next above the ferry slip and but a short distance from it. This dock extends into the river about ten feet beyond the ferry slip, and about seventy feet beyond the docks above, between it and Gold street. When the tide reaches this dock it strikes off with great force toward the New York shore. This movement of the tide is regular and well understood by all engaged in business upon the river in that vicinity. Skilful navigators always make their calculations to counteract its influences. Upon leaving her New York slip, the Washington headed up the river, under the New York shore, until she reached a point some distance above her Brooklyn slip, when she rounded to and commenced crossing the river, relying upon the wind and tide to carry her down abreast her slip by the time she was ready to enter it. This was proper navigation and the course usually pursued under like circumstances of wind and tide. After the Washington had rounded to and while she was still under the New York shore, her pilot discovered the Sigel on his starboard side, two or three piers below the bridge street slip. He then gave two blasts of his whistle, which were not heard on the Sigel and were not answered. The river at that point is about two thousand feet wide. The Sigel kept her course, and, when she was about abreast the ferry slip, the engine of the Washington was stopped, she being, at the time, near the middle of the river and heading so as to enter her slip. Nothing more was then done to arrest her progress and she went ahead under the influence of her former headway and the force of the wind and tide upon her port broadside. After the Sigel had passed the ferry slip, she struck the cross tide which set out from Long dock. This took her bodily out into the river and turned her bow somewhat off her true course. The Washington was then above the Sigel and above her slip. On striking the cross tide, the full power of the engine of the Sigel was put on, and she was forced through the strength of the current and straightened upon her course. Her pilot, then discovering that there was danger of a collision, rang his bell to stop and back, but, before stern way could be got on her, she struck the Washington on the starboard side, just forward of the wheel, producing the injury complained of. As soon as the pilot of the Washington saw that the Sigel was being carried out by the tide, he, for the first time, rang his bell to stop and back, but, before the headway of the boat was stopped, the collision occurred.

Welcome R. Beebe, for libellants.
Henry T. Wing, for claimants.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. Upon the facts, I am clearly of the opinion that the collision was caused solely by the fault of the Washington. She saw the Sigel off her starboard side, and the courses of the two vessels crossed. It was the duty of the Sigel, therefore, to hold her course, and of the Washington to keep out of her way. The pilot of the Washington saw that the Sigel must encounter the cross tide, and that, with her speed and load, it would necessarily affect her movements. It was his duty, therefore, to make the necessary allowances for this, and to see that the Sigel had sufficient room to do whatever was required. That he failed in this, is evident from the fact, that, as soon as the Sigel took the sheer, he rang his bell to back, and only between three and four turns of the wheel had been made before the collision occurred. In the meantime, the Sigel had overcome the force of the current and straightened herself up on her course. I agree entirely with the district judge in the views which he took of the case [Case No 5,311], and a decree may be prepared dismissing the libel with costs.

FRASER, In re. See Case No. 5,068.

Case No. 5,063.

FRASER et al. v. HUNTER et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1838.

BOUNDARIES—EVIDENCE—EXTENT OF POSSESSION—LOCUS IN QUO—PARTIES—PROOF—JOINT ACTIONS.

1. When the question is upon a disputed boundary line, the court will not permit hearsay evidence to be given that a particular object (such as a spring), was on the land of one of the parties.

[Applied in South-West School Dist. v. Williams, 48 Conn. 508.]

2. The possession of a person claiming title without definite metes and bounds, will not, in law, be deemed to extend beyond the actual possession proved.

3. A husband, who has conveyed all his estate to a trustee for the sole and separate use of his wife, may join with her in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and in law would be entitled to the damages recovered, although in equity he might be considered as receiving them in trust for the separate use of the wife.

4. A deed of bargain and sale by a person not in possession conveys no title.

5. There must be actual possession by the plaintiff, of the locus in quo, at the time of the supposed trespass.

6. The plaintiff must prove every abuttal set forth in his declaration. Boundaries may be proved by hearsay.

7. All the plaintiffs must have a right to recover, or none can recover. There must be a joint cause of action.

Trespass quare clausum fregit.

Mr. Brent, for plaintiffs [A. R. Fraser and W. S. Alexander and wife], offered to prove by a witness, that some years ago, Simon Summers, an old and legal surveyor of the county of Alexandria, who is now dead, showed the witness a line of Chapman's land, under whom the defendants [Alexander Hunter and Robert Ball,] claim to hold, at or near Hall's Spring, and stated to the witness that Hall's Spring was on the land of the Alexanders; to which evidence the defendants objected, and THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), refused to permit the same to be given; to which refusal the plaintiffs took a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiffs offered in evidence a trust deed, dated April 20, 1807 (under which the plaintiffs claim), from the plaintiff W. S. Alexander to Baldwin Dade (the father of Mrs. Alexander, wife of W. S. Alexander, and one of the plaintiffs), conveying "all his right, title, and interest in any lands lying between the lines north six west, and north seventeen west, supposed to be the west boundary of Howison's patent," without describing his claim by metes and bounds; and contended, that as they had proved Mrs. Alexander's possession east of the disputed line, such possession was evidence of his possession up to the line north seventeen west, including the land in dispute.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, was of opinion that as the deed did not describe the lands conveyed by W. S. Alexander to Mr. Dade, by metes and bounds, his possession could not be considered as extending beyond his actual possession proved. Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 442.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, was of opinion that the deed should go to the jury with such parol evidence as had been given.

The plaintiffs, however, gave subsequent evidence of acts of possession, by cutting wood for fuel and other purposes, on the disputed lands, by the son of the plaintiff Walter S. Alexander, about sixteen years ago, and then THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), permitted the deed to be read in evidence to the jury.

THE COURT also permitted the following question to be asked of the plaintiffs' witness, Mrs. Zimmerman: "Do you know, by general reputation, any of the lines, or boundaries, or corners, of Mr. Walter Alexander's land?" She answered, "No;" but said that Hall's Spring was generally reputed to be on Alexander's land; but THE COURT said that that was not admissible evidence. They, however, permitted her to be asked whether Hall's Spring was generally called "the head of long branch," that being one of the calls of Robertson's patent. See Leland v. Wilkinson, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 317; Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 412.

THE COURT also permitted the declarations of the plaintiff W. S. Alexander, to be given in evidence by the defendants, although he had conveyed all his estate to a trustee for the sole use of his wife, (who is also a plaintiff,) it being an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and not a real action; and the damages, so far as his wife is to participate in them, will, at law, become the property of her husband, although in equity he might be considered as a trustee of them for her separate use.

Mr. Taylor, for defendants, moved the court to instruct the jury, that upon the plaintiffs' evidence they cannot recover. 1. Because one of the plaintiffs, by their own showing, has no interest. After his deed to Dade, W. S. Alexander was only the agent of Dade, and of his wife, and in that character cannot maintain an action for a trespass; and if an improper party is one of the plaintiffs, it is a misjoinder, and there must be a nonsuit. 1 Chit. Pl. 54; Goodtitle v. Morgan, 1 Term R. 758. 2. Because the plaintiffs have not proved possession at the time of the supposed trespass. Com. Dig. 377, tit. "Trespass," B. 3; Wells v. Prince, 4 Mass. 64; Stuyvesant v. Tompkins, 9 Johns. 61; Dunham v. Stuyvesant, 11 Johns. 569; 5 Dane, Abr. 553, 554; Wilde v. Cantillon, 1 Johns. Cas. 123; Graham v. Peat, 1 East, 244.

R. J. Brent, contra, admits that if there has been a misjoinder it is fatal. But this is not a misjoinder, because in all actions to vindicate the rights of the wife against a stranger, the husband must be joined, although he has no personal interest in the event of the suit. Cookson v. Castline, Cro. Eliz. 96; Weller v. Baker, 2 Wils. 423.

The deed of trust for the benefit of the wife cannot be set up to defeat her right of action. She as cestui que trust has a right of action for a trespass upon her possession, and her husband "must be joined for conformity." Hopkins v. Ward, 6 Munf. 38; Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 59; Smith v. Lorillard, 10 Johns. 347; Catteris v. Cowper, 4 Taunt. 547; Ewen v. Burnett, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 53; 7 Com. Dig. 510, tit. "Trespass," B. 2. Possession alone is sufficient to support the action against a mere wrong-doer. Graham v. Peat, 1 East, 246. Mrs. Alexander is one of the heirs at law of the deceased Baldwin Dade, the trustee, and is also the cestui que trust, and is therefore properly made one of the plaintiffs; and if she is entitled to sue, her husband must also be made a plaintiff. Brotherson v. Hodges, 6 Johns. 108; 1 Saund. note g; 2 Tuck. Bl. Comm. 218; Harper v. Charlesworth, 4 Barn. & C. 574; Catteris v. Cowper, 4 Taunt. 546; Ellicott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 442. To constitute actual possession, it is not necessary that there should be any fence or inclosure on the land. Id.; Ewen v. Burnett, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 52; Lessee of Sicard v. Davis, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 139, 140; Jackson v. Lunn, 3 Johns. Cas. 118; Hunt v. Wickliffe, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 204; Alexander v. Pendleton, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 462; Jackson v. Wheat, 18 Johns. 44; Ricard v. Williams, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 105; Lessee of Clarke v. Courtney, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 354, 356.

Mr. Brent proposed to ask young Mr. Alexander (who had testified that about sixteen years ago he had gone upon the land now in dispute and cut wood upon it), whether, at the time of his going upon the land in dispute he did so under a claim of title by his father and mother up to the line N. 17 west, the supposed west line of Howison's patent; but

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra,) refused to permit the question to be asked, because no title was shown by metes and bounds up to that line, and therefore there can be no constructive possession to that line.

Mr. Coxe in reply, as to the defendant's motion to instruct the jury that the plaintiffs cannot recover upon their evidence, contended that the plaintiffs must prove all their abuttals, which they have not done. Martin v. Kesterton, 2 W. Bl. 1089; 5 Dane, Abr. 594; 2 Salk. 453; 2 Chit. 388, note n; Bull. N. P. 89. The deed from W. S. Alexander to Dade, under which the plaintiffs claim, is only of his interest in any lands in Howison's patent lying between the lines north 6 west, and north 17 west; and bounded on the north by Mason's land, on the west by the Glebe, and on the east by Custiss's land. There is no evidence that the locus in quo is in Howison's patent, nor is that patent located on the plat. There is no evidence that it is bounded on the north by Mason's land, nor on the west by the Glebe, nor on the east by Custiss's land. It is admitted that possession alone will maintain trespass against a mere wrongdoer; and the plaintiffs, if they can recover in this action, must recover upon their possession alone, for they have not made out a title. There is no evidence of any possession by Fraser; and as all must have a joint cause of action, or none can recover, it is evident that the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action. Besides, there is no evidence that Alexander was in possession at the time of his deed to Dade. And a deed of bargain and sale without possession in the bargainor is void. There is no evidence of possession until about the year 1822, and the deed was made in April, 1807. Peters v. Condron, 2 Serg. & R. 83; Wickham v. Freeman, 12 Johns. 183. Mr. Alexander had no possession at the time of the supposed trespass, and therefore is improperly made a plaintiff in the cause. Starr v. Jackson, 11 Mass. 519; 15 Petersd. Abr. 148.

As to the abuttals, Mr. Brent cited Roberts v. Karr, 1 Taunt. 497, and Durgin v. Leighton, 10 Mass. 56.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the plaintiffs could not recover upon the evidence, for the reasons stated in the argument of the defendant's counsel. The plaintiffs became nonsuit, acquiescing in the opinion of the court.

FRASER v. WELLER et al.

[6 McLean, 11.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1853.

EJECTMENT—STATUTE OF MICHIGAN—SPECIAL PLEAS—DEMURRER—NEW TRIAL.

1. The ancient forms of the action of ejectment having been modified by the statute of Michigan, and a new mode provided, that mode must be pursued.

[Cited in Hyatt v. Challiss, 55 Fed. 268.]

2. Special pleas in this mode are not allowed. A demurrer, on this ground, must be sustained to a special plea. The statute gives a second trial, as a matter of course, if the motion be made to set aside the first judgment within three years.

3. A new trial thus granted, which vacates the judgment, the party cannot bring a new suit in this court. Having sought the special remedy under the statute, in the state court, he cannot abandon it.

[Cited in Cunningham v. City of Milwaukee, 13 Wis. 123.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[This was an action at law by Alice Fraser against Charles Weller and others.]

Mr. ——, for plaintiff.

Mr. Hawkins, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of ejectment. In addition to the general issue, Weller, the defendant, pleaded that the grantor of the plaintiff had heretofore instituted an action of ejectment against the defendant for the same premises, in which a trial was had, and a judgment rendered for the defendant in the state court. To this plea the plaintiff replied, that the said judgment had been set aside and a new trial granted. The defendant demurred to this replication; and assigned as cause of demurrer, that the Revised Statutes of 1846 abolished the ancient forms in the action of ejectment, and authorized a statutory action; and that by section 35 it is declared that the judgment in the action should be conclusive. But that the thirty-sixth section authorized the court to grant a new trial, under certain circumstances, and declared that not more than two new trials shall be granted. The statute provides that the defendant, in the action of ejectment, may demur, or plead the general issue and give special matter in evidence. No special pleas, therefore, can be allowed. The demurrer to the plea is, therefore, sustained.

THE COURT intimated that the special remedy given by the statute must be pursued. The first judgment in ejectment is final, unless within three years a motion is made to set aside the judgment, and the costs of the first trial are paid. This motion was made within the time limited, and the costs were paid, so that the judgment was vacated, under the statute. And the question arises whether under such circumstances, the suit may be brought in this court. If the first judgment had not been set aside, under the statute, it would have been final. It was set aside without cause, on the motion being made within the time limited. The judgment was vacated under the statute, which was a part of the proceeding authorized; this being done, the party is not at liberty to resort to this tribunal. It would be a fraud upon the law. For aught that appears, the first judgment could not have been set aside, except under the provisions of the statute. This remedy having been claimed under the statute, the party is bound to go on with another trial. Having set aside the bar to another suit, he does so, under an obligation to pursue the special remedy under the statute. He cannot claim the remedy in part, to his advantage, and then abandon it to the injury of the other party.

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1848.

PARTNERSHIP—NOTE SIGNED WITH FIRM NAME AFTER DISSOLUTION.

At law.

Mr. Smith, for plaintiff.

Mr. Powell, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an action of assumpsit. The defendants pleaded non-assumpsit, and that the note was signed by Goodwin as a partner of Wolcott, in both their names, when they were not partners. By the eighth section of the Revised Statutes of 1845, it is provided, that in "actions upon contracts, expressed or implied, against two or more defendants, alleged to have been made or executed by such defendants, as partners, or joint obligors or payers, proof of the joint liability or partnership of the defendants," etc., [shall not in the first instance be required to entitle the plaintiff to judgment], unless a plea be filed under oath, denying the execution of the instrument by the defendants. The oath is appended to this plea. It appears the defendants were formerly partners, but that their partnership had been dissolved before the execution of this note. Non-suit.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug., 1871.

SEAMAN'S WAGES—WHALING VOYAGE.

1. The stipulation which was introduced some years since into the usual form of shipping articles for whaling voyages, that the owners shall have the right to ship catchings home, on freight, is beneficial to both parties, and is valid.

2. When such catchings had been shipped home, and the owners in good faith and in the exercise of their best judgment had kept them, unsold, hoping for a rise in the market, held, they were not bound to account for them at their value when they arrived.

3. Whether, after receiving such catchings, they would not be bound to stop any charges for interest on advances to the seamen, quaere?

[This was a libel for wages by John Frates and others against Edward W. Howland.]

The thirteen libellants were part of the crew of the ship Cornelius Howland, on a whaling voyage, which was prosecuted mainly in the Arctic Ocean. The ship left New Bedford in November, 1867, and returned in May, 1871, having shipped home by other vessels the oil and bone taken in the seasons of 1868 and 1869, most of which remained unsold at the return of the vessel. The shipping papers contained an article which was introduced into these contracts about fifteen years ago, and is now printed in all of them, as follows: "It is understood and agreed that the master shall have the right to ship catchings home or elsewhere at any time during the voyage, and that the net proceeds, after deducting freight, insurance, and expenses incident to the sale and settlement of the same, shall bear interest from and after the sale until the termination and making up the settlement of the voyage." And that if the ship herself earns freight, it shall be divided proportionately in like manner with the catchings. It was proved that the season in the Arctic Ocean was so short, and the distance from New Bedford so great, that this kind of whaling could not be prosecuted to advantage from that port without the power of shipping home the catchings, which enabled the vessel to follow the business for several successive seasons before returning home. Upon the articles, the lay of each seaman below the rank of boatsteerer was entered as the three hundred and fiftieth; but the pleadings set up, and it was admitted to be true, that every one signed an additional paper, which was annexed to the articles, by which it was agreed that if he should satisfactorily perform his duties on board the ship, and return in her to New Bedford, there should be paid to him, after deducting seventy-five dollars, but not deducting any charge for fitting, discharging, or interest on the home bill, the difference between the lay mentioned in the articles, and a much better one mentioned in this contract. The questions argued at this time were, whether the owners were bound to account for the catchings which had been sent home at their value when they arrived, which was much greater than it was at the return of the ship; and whether the crew were bound to submit to the deduction of seventy-five dollars, in accordance with the special contracts. The catchings had been kept on hand for a rise in price.

G. H. Palmer and C. T. Bonney, for libellants.

The catchings were sent home for sale, and should have been sold within a reasonable time, or at all events credited within a reasonable time, so that they might bear interest.

The stipulation that seventy-five dollars shall be deducted from the agreed lay is void.

E. L. Barney, for respondent.

The owners of the ship may exercise their best judgment in deciding upon a sale. The object of the shipment is not so much for sale, as for enabling the vessel to continue her voyage in the best manner. The owners may be likened to trustees, who are bound to exercise their best discretion. The seventy-five dollars is instead of the usual charges.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

LOWELL, District Judge. I am not aware of any law which requires the original contract of seamen in the whaling service to be in writing; because the voyage is not "foreign" within the act of 1790 [1 Stat. 145]; Taber v. U. S. [Case No. 13,722]; The Atlantic [Id. 620]; Curt. Merch. Seam. 60. But the statutes of April 4, 1840 [5 Stat. 370], and July 20, 1840 [5 Stat. 394], which concern the treatment of seamen on a voyage, and their discharge, and even the shipment of men in the course of the voyage, as well as the return of seamen to the home port, are applicable to this branch of business. Bates v. Seabury [Case No. 1,104]; The Antelope [Id. 484]; The Louisa A. [Id. 8,530]. So that if there is a written contract, as there always is and should be, the act of 20th July, 1840, requires a true copy of it to be taken by the master; and this is, for all consular purposes, conclusive evidence of the contract, and regulates the dealings between the parties in the course of the voyage; and men shipped during the voyage, if shipped at a consular port, have the right to require a compliance with the eighth clause of the act. In this case the paper signed by the foremast hands did not state their contract truly; and although there may have been no necessity that the men should sign articles, yet it was fraudulent conduct on the part of the agent to induce them to sign two different contracts, one of which only, and that the false one, was furnished to the collector and carried on the voyage. So far as the parties are concerned, the objections to such a course are many. A seaman might be disabled, or might be discharged at a foreign port by consent, and the consul could not know how the settlement should be made with him. The reason given in the argument, that the owner in case of desertion would be bound to pay the forfeited wages to the United States, and wished to deceive them, does not recommend itself very strongly to the consideration of a court of justice. It was testified that owners sometimes promise a slightly increased lay, on conditions like those found in this contract, as a premium for good conduct; and I do not know that there is any objection to this, if done in good faith, and if the original lay is a fair and honest one agreed to by the parties. But the same intelligent witness who spoke of this custom, had never heard of any such difference as that between one three hundred and fiftieth and one two hundred and tenth, nor of any real lay as small as the former. It is plain that the shipping articles are a mere fiction in this particular.

Under these circumstances, I must, of course, construe these special contracts, made for the exclusive benefit of the owners, most strongly against them, and set aside any conditions that may be oppressive.

Both parties have agreed, that, for the purposes of this case, the lays mentioned in the special contracts are to be the basis of settlement; but the men dispute the deduction of seventy-five dollars. It appears that this was in lieu of certain charges, which are said to be usual; namely, for fitting and discharging the vessel, and for interest and insurance on the advances. Judge Sprague has repeatedly disallowed all of these charges excepting interest; and I do not see how I can allow them, unless it shall appear that some changes in the shipping articles or in the course of trade have changed the aspects of the question, which I neither affirm nor deny, for I am not informed upon the matter. I should be glad to have all question of charges carefully examined before the assessor, if the parties are willing to assume the burden. See Lovrein v. Thompson [Case No. 8,557]; Bates v. Seabury [Id. 1,104].

The other question is one of great importance and of some difficulty. The evidence shows, and the libellants admit, that what is now article 9 of the ordinary contract, authorizing the master to ship home oil and bone, is useful and advantageous to all parties, if, indeed, it is not essential to the prosecution of the particular sort of enterprise undertaken in this case; and I have recognized its validity in former cases. The decision of Judge Sprague, that under the older form of contract all such shipments were at the risk and expense of the owners, may have led to the change. But the question now arises for the first time, whether the owners are bound to sell the oil and bone on its arrival. It has been repeatedly decided by my predecessor, and by me, that the owners must account for the oil brought home, on its arrival, and cannot wait for changes of market. The main reason for this decision is, that the seamen cannot wait the issue of the mercantile enterprise after their own part in it is ended. Their right is to wages regulated by the catch, and these wages are payable on the return of the vessel. The owners retain the property in the oil, and need not sell it, if they account for it at the cash value. Under the ninth clause, the oil and bone are to be shipped home for sale; but is there any time at which the sale must be made short of the return of the vessel, or other termination of the voyage? Upon reflection, I am not able to fix any time short of that. The main purpose of this clause appears to be to exclude the conclusion that the owners are bound to get the oil home at their own expense; for there is coupled with the agreement that they may ship oil on freight, the further stipulation, that if their vessel earns freight in a similar way the seamen shall share it. The owners have a certain quantity of oil which they might, perhaps, bring home, but which it is convenient to send home. I should probably hold that they were bound to insure it, and that, if lost, they must account for its value. But when it reaches home, it seems to me they may hold it as part of the proceeds of the voyage, if in good faith and in the exercise of their own best judgment they deem it wise for all parties to do so. It is not a consignment; and the seamen would, perhaps, have no right to order the owners to sell or not to sell; though this I do not decide. If instructions were sent on, the owners would be likely to follow them, because the seamen could not then complain of the result. When the market is falling, as has now been the case for five years, the result of holding is most unfortunate. But on a rising market it would be different, and I must fix some definite and absolute rule. Either they must always sell, or they may always control the latter. I cannot see my way to the decision that they must do the former. The argument was much pressed, that one consideration operating with the seamen to accept article 9 as part of their contract was, that a fund was thus put into the owners' hands to stop the charges of interest and insurance upon the advances. I admit that there is force in this argument; and it may be that the interest and insurance on advances, if otherwise valid, ought to cease from the time that the owners have in their hands any oil or bone from which they might have reimbursed themselves, if they had chosen to do so. This is one of the points which may come up hereafter. Interlocutory decree for libellants. Wages to be assessed.

Case No. 5,067.

FRAYSER et al. v. RUSSELL.

[3 Hughes, 227.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. April, 1878.

EQUITY—POWER TO ENJOIN COLLECTION OF TAXES.

Though it is true that courts of equity of the United States cannot enjoin an officer of the United States from collecting a tax, yet there are circumstances under which such collecting officers may be enjoined from claiming moneys of citizens and levying for them as if for taxes.

[Cited in Kensett v. Stivers, 10 Fed. 527.]

[In equity. This was a bill for an injunction by L. H. Frayser & Co. against Otis H. Russell, United States collector of internal revenue for the Third district of Virginia.]

The original bill set out the following case: "Your complainants, L. H. Frayser & Co., show to the court that they are engaged in manufacturing tobacco in the city of Richmond, in the state of Virginia, and were so engaged prior to and on the 3d of March, 1875, and ever since. That on the morning of the day last mentioned they had in their factory 15,001 pounds of tobacco, which they had manufactured and placed in boxes according to the usage of their business; that they had sold the same to be shipped to purchasers, stamped according to law, and accordingly they applied to the proper officers of the United States at Richmond for the stamps to put on said boxes according to law, bought, paid for the same, and placed them upon said boxes, and then according to contract shipped the same, and placed said tobacco out of and beyond their control. That after the said tobacco was so shipped, and had so passed from under their control, the said Otis H. Russell, collector as aforesaid, named above as defendant, informed them that he claimed on behalf of the United States an additional tax of four cents per pound, amounting to the sum of $604.04, and required and demanded of your complainants payment of the same, upon the ground that on the night of the 3d of March congress had passed an act [of 1875 (18 Stat. 339)] imposing that additional tax; but your complainants no longer had said tobacco. They had lawfully parted with the same, after they had complied fully with all the requirements of the revenue officers of the United States, and paid the cost of stamps provided by law to be put upon said tobacco; and not only in compliance with the law had those stamps been sold to your complainants, but also in accordance with specific instructions of the commissioner of the revenue of the United States, who had directed (prior to that time) the collector to sell the stamps at certain rates, which complainants paid, till further orders, and no such further orders were received by said collector till after your complainants had shipped their tobacco as aforesaid. That the contract under which they shipped said tobacco required them to ship it stamped according to law, both contracting parties well knowing what the cost of stamps was. With this contract they complied, and the other parties were bound to them only for the amount paid for said stamps. If, then, there is any additional sum to be paid on said tobacco by your complainants, it will necessarily entail a loss to that extent upon your complainants, while, if demanded of them while the tobacco was unsold, the fact that the additional sum was to be paid would properly have been provided for in said contract, so that in any event, under the facts stated, it would be inequitable and unjust to require your complainants to pay a tax on tobacco which they don't own and which they had parted with, after complying with all the requirements of the law, and the regulations of the department controlling such cases. Your complainants are advised that while they have no right to institute any suit to restrain the assessment or collection of any tax of the United States, they insist that the tax assessed upon said tobacco, while in their possession and their property, has been fully paid, and that the revenue laws of the United States do not contemplate that the United States officers shall continue to assess upon property which has passed from the possession of the original owner, or rather upon him, a tax in addition to that which has already been assessed and paid according to law. They insist that this is no assessment of a tax upon property; that it is simply an arbitrary demand upon them for a sum of money which they are not bound to pay, because they have not the property so assessed, and in so doing the collector is arbitrarily and illegally and inequitably perverting the authority given him by law, and using the same to oppress and harass your complainants. And they further state that the said Russell, collector as aforesaid, is threatening to levy, or cause a levy to be made, upon the property of your complainants for the amount of $604.04, as aforesaid, and unless enjoined will proceed to do so to the great injury of your complainants. To the end, therefore, that your complainants may be relieved in the premises, they pray that the said Russell, collector as aforesaid, be made defendant to this bill and answer its allegations; that he be enjoined from proceeding to levy upon the property of your complainants, or either of them, or from collecting in any way said sum of money or any part thereof, and also to enjoin any other officer of the United States from so proceeding. And may it please your honor," etc. An injunction was temporarily awarded under this bill and was afterwards made perpetual.

H. H. Marshall, for complainants.
L. L. Lewis, U. S. Atty., for collector.

After the final order, the United States, by Mr. Lewis, filed a bill of review, on which the court delivered the following opinion:

HUGHES, District Judge. The bill and bill of review sufficiently show that after certain manufactured tobacco had been properly stamped at the rate of twenty cents per pound, and then sold and transferred to purchasers by the manufacturer, an additional four cents per pound were demanded by the collector, and a levy upon other property of the manufacturer threatened for this four cents. The injunction complained of in the bill of review was granted to prevent such a levy.

It is true that the collection of a tax by an officer of the government cannot be enjoined, and that all taxes due must be paid, and that the person paying them, when wrongfully levied, must resort to a suit against the collecting officer for the recovery of them. And if the collector here had in the first instance required stamps to the extent of twenty-four cents per pound to be placed upon the tobacco mentioned in the bill, and on a refusal to do so by the manufacturer had threatened to seize that tobacco, and in this attitude of the affair a bill of injunction to restrain him had been brought, the court might not have granted the injunction.

But in this case the proper tax had already been paid by the manufacturer, and he had sold and delivered the tobacco on which the tax was due. As to him the matter had been terminated, and he had passed from his ownership the tobacco which had been taxed. The collector's demand upon him afterwards for four cents a pound, which he called an additional tax, was a demand for what this court has solemnly and finally in another case adjudicated not to be a tax. See Salmon v. Burgess [Case No. 12,262]; affirmed in 97 U. S. 381. Besides, the course for the collector to pursue, even if this latter four cents had been a proper demand as a tax, was marked out to him by section 3371 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The collector did not take the course directed by law in a case where "the proper stamps" had not been used, and the proper tax had been "omitted to be paid." His threatened levy was for what was not a tax; and it was threatened to be made in a manner which set at naught the provisions of section 3371. It was a clear case for the exercise of the restraining power of the court; and was not a case falling either within the letter, or spirit, or intention of section 3224.

There was another ground on which the court felt authorized and impelled to grant the injunction. A case was before it at the time, in which it had become its duty to pass upon the question whether the payment of the tax of twenty cents a pound upon manufactured tobacco, which was required by the law as it stood until 9 o'clock p. m. on the 3d of March, 1875 (the payment having been made in the early part of that day), discharged the tobacco thus stamped of all taxes imposed by laws then in force. This question had been raised by the collector against numerous manufacturers in Richmond, and a multitude of suits were impending, all turning upon this question of law. Although this fact did not appear in the pleadings, yet it was well known to the court, and its desire to prevent a multitude of suits turning upon a question of law then about to be adjudicated, furnished a strong inducement to the court to enjoin the collector from making the levy then threatened. Thus, not merely with reference to the rights of the complainant in the bill, but also as a measure of sound public policy, the court was justified in granting the injunction; and the bill of review will be dismissed.

For like reasons the bills of review in the cases of A. M. Lyon & Co., John K. Childrey, and Robert W. Oliver will be dismissed.

COURTS—JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP—PROBATE MATTERS.

1. Under an application for the transfer of a probate case to the federal court under the act of 1875 [18 Stat. 470], held, that after a decree in the probate court was made the application was too late.

2. All those connected with the suit on each side must be citizens of different states from those on the other side.

3. A federal court has no jurisdiction of a probate matter.

[Cited in Reed v. Reed, 31 Fed. 52; Smith v. McKay, 4 Fed. 354.]

Motion to remove the matter of the probate of the will of A. D. Frazer from the probate court of Wayne county, Michigan, to the United States circuit court. The probate court had made a decree admitting the will to probate, from which contestants took an appeal to a higher state court. Thereupon the proponents made this motion.

W. Jennison, for proponents.

H. M. Duffield, contra.

SWAYNE, Circuit Judge. The case was fully and ably argued before me upon both sides. I have examined it with care, and my conclusions are as follows:

1. Aside from other objections, the application for the removal of the case to the federal court was made too late. It should have been made before the decree of the probate court was entered, and the appeal taken to the higher state court. Thereafter the right of removal was at an end; the delay was fatal. Such an application cannot be made to an appellate court. Stevenson v. Williams, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 572; Vannevar v. Bryant, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 41; Lowe v. Williams, 94 U. S. 650. There was no waiver of this objection by the proponents. The order for the issue of a writ of certiorari to bring up the full record was made by the federal court sua sponte. The proponents were in nowise actors touching its issue.

2. The proponents are all citizens of Michigan. There were six contestants in the probate court. Four of them were citizens of Michigan, and two of other states. All of them appealed to the state circuit court. The four who were citizens united in one appeal, and the two not citizens in another. The latter only petitioned that court for the removal of the case, and gave the requisite bond. The only question presented in the appellate court was as to the mental capacity of the testator, and the validity of the will. The court directed the same issue to be made upon each appeal as if they were separate cases. Upon an application to the supreme court of the state for a mandamus to vacate an order of consolidation made by the state circuit court, it was held that the two appeals constituted inherently and necessarily but one case, and must necessarily be tried together, and that hence no order of consolidation was needed. This was obviously correct. The case, as presented, was a unit and indivisible. The question to be tried was a single one, and affected alike all concerned, by whomsoever raised. The result must necessarily be final and dispose of the entire controversy. Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland, 236.

If the removal was well made, the anomaly will follow that each court may try the validity of the will at the same time independently of the other, in the absence of indispensable parties, and opposite results may be reached. In one court, the will may be held valid, and invalid in the other, and for this state of things there can be no remedy. For the purposes of this case it may be conceded that the 12th section of the act of 1789 [1 Stat. 79], and the acts of 1866 and 1867 [14 Stat. 306, 558], re-enacted in the Revised Statutes of the United States (section 639, cls. 1, 2, 3), are not repealed by the act of 1875 [18 Stat. 470].

(a) The case was not removable under the section first named, because it was always held under that provision that all the plaintiffs must be citizens of the state where the suit is brought, and all the defendants citizens of other states. Dill. Rem. Causes, 17, 18.

(b) Nor under the act of 1866, because it is not a suit brought "for the purpose of restraining or enjoining" the contestants. Nor can there be "a final determination of the controversy so far as concerns" them, "without the presence of other defendants in the cause." Shields v. Barrows, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 130.

(c) Nor under the act of 1867, commonly known as the "Prejudice and Local Influence Act," because the removal was not applied for upon either of those grounds, and neither was alleged by the petitioners.

(d) The act of 1875: This act contains two clauses proper to be considered. It declares (1) that "any suit" * * * "in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states," etc., "either party may remove said suit into the circuit court of the United States." Further: (2) "And when in any suit," etc., "there shall be a controversy which is wholly between citizens of different states, and which can be fully decided as between them, then either one or more of the plaintiffs or defendants actually interested in such controversy may remove said suit to the circuit court of the United States," etc.

Viewing the first of these extracts in the light of the past adjudications, and in the absence of any expression from the supreme court, I feel constrained (whatever might be my judgment under other circumstances), to hold that the term "party" is collective, and means all the plaintiffs and all the defendants, and that all on each side must be "citizens of different states" from those on the other side. See Dill. Rem. Causes, 29, 30. This latter construction of the phrase "party" derives support from the second paragraph quoted. In regard to that paragraph it is sufficient to say that this "controversy" is not "wholly between citizens of different states," and cannot be "fully determined as between" the parties before the court. There are other contestants whose presence is indispensable. They are not, and it is believed cannot be, present as parties in this litigation in the federal tribunal.

3. A federal court has no jurisdiction in cases of proceedings to establish a will. In Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10, the supreme court said: "There are, it is true, in several of the decisions of this court, expressions of opinion that federal courts have no probate jurisdiction, referring particularly to the establishment of wills, and such is undoubtedly the case under the existing legislation of congress."

By this ruling I am bound, and it is conclusive of the case. See, also, Broderick's Will, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 504; Du Vivier v. Hopkins, 116 Mass. 125; Yonley v. Lavender, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 276; Tarver v. Tarver, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 174; Fouvergne v. New Orleans, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 470; [Adams v. Preston] 22 How. [63 U. S.] 473, 478. Whether the proceedings here in question is a "suit," within the meaning of the several removal acts, is a question not necessary to be considered. Cause remanded.

Case No. 5,069.

FRAZER v. CARPENTER et al.

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. Oct. Term, 1840.

WITNESS — COMPETENCY OF MAKER OF BILL OF EXCHANGE IN ACTION BETWEEN HOLDER AND INDORSERS—RELEASE OF COSTS — IMPEACHMENT OF BILL—BILL AS EVIDENCE.

1. In an action between the holder of a bill of exchange and the acceptor, the bill is evidence, under the general money counts. So it is evidence between the holder and a remote indorser.

[See Benjamin v. Tillman, Case No. 1,304.]

2. There is a privity between the holder and the other parties to the bill, which enables him to sustain an action of indebitatus assumpsit against them.

3. In an action between the holder and the indorsers, the maker of the note, the defendants having released their costs, is a competent witness to prove that the note, after it was signed by him and passed out of his possession, was altered in a material part.

4. But he is not competent to impeach the note by any facts, within his knowledge, at the time the note was made.

5. His testimony must be limited to facts subsequent to his agency in the formation and negotiation of the note.

Mr. Frazer, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Buell & Witherell, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This suit is brought by the plaintiff as the indorsee and holder of a note against the defendants [Carpenter, Palmer and Mack] as remote indorsers. To a count on the indorsement are added the common money counts. In the course of the trial a question was raised whether the note is admissible in evidence for the plaintiff as indorsee against the defendants, who are remote indorsers, under the general money counts. Where a bill of exchange was drawn by defendant and others, on the defendant alone, in favor of a fictitious person, and the defendant received the value of it from the second indorser, it was decided that a bona fide holder, for a valuable consideration, might recover the amount of it, in an action against the acceptor for money paid, or money had and received. Tatlock v. Harris, 3 Term R. 174; 1 East, 102; 3 Bos. & P. 560.

If a bill of exchange be drawn in favor of a fictitious payee, and that circumstance be known as well to the acceptor as to the drawer, and the name of such payee be indorsed on the bill, an innocent indorsee, for a valuable consideration, may recover on it against the acceptor, as on a bill payable to bearer. Minet v. Gibson, 3 Term R. 481; 1 East, 434; 1 H. Bl. 569. In the case of Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 277, the court say—in all cases where the bill can be used as evidence, either against the parties, or against third persons, the same legal presumption arises of its having been given for value received, as exists in relation to a deed expressed to be given for a valuable consideration. And in the case of Page's Adm'r v. Bank of Alexandria, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 35, the court remark—there are certainly cases in which a promissory note, or an indorsement of such note, may be offered in evidence, against the maker or indorser, under a count for money had and received, and if unconnected with other circumstances may be sufficient proof, in itself, to charge the defendant. An action of debt will lie by the payee or indorser of a bill of exchange, against the acceptor, where it is expressed to be for value received. Baborg v. Peyton, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 385. The indorsee of the payee of a negotiable note can maintain an action for money had and received against the maker of the note, upon the proof of the note and indorsement. Penn v. Flack, 3 Gill. & J. 369; Young v. Adams, 6 Mass. 189; Wild v. Fisher, 4 Pick. 421. The indorsement of a cash note, of which the maker had notice and undertook to pay, establishes a privity of contract between indorsee and maker, and is legal proof of money held by the maker to the use of the holder. Ramsdell v. Soule, 12 Pick. 126; Cole v. Cushing, 8 Pick. 48. So money had and received lies by the holder of a note made payable to bearer. Pierce v. Crafts, 12 Johns. 90; Cruger v. Armstrong, 3 Johns. Cas. 5; Grant v. Vaughan, 3 Burrows, 1516.

To maintain assumpsit there must be a privity between the parties, but it may be a privity in fact or in law. Between each party to a bill or negotiable note, and every other party, there is a sufficient privity in law; and each party liable to pay, is held responsible as for so much money had and received to the use of the party who is, for the time, the holder and entitled to recover. State Bank v. Hurd, 12 Mass. 172. Ellsworth v. Brewer, 11 Pick. 316. The holder of a negotiable note, whether by delivery or indorsement, is entitled to recover under the money counts. Olcott v. Rathbone, 5 Wend. 490; Ainslie v. Wilson, 7 Cow. 662; Butler v. Wright, 20 Johns. 367. A greater array of authorities might be brought to bear upon this point, but it is not deemed necessary. The above would not have been cited had not the late decisions in England established a different rule. We will now advert to some of those decisions.

In the case of Waynam v. Bend, 1 Camp. 175, Lord Ellenborough held, that a promissory note is evidence under the money counts only, as between the original parties to it. And the same rule has been followed by Lord Chief Justice Tenterden, in the case of Bentley v. Northouse, 1 Moody & M. 66; Exon v. Russell, 4 Maule & S. 507; Thompson v. Morgan, 3 Camp. 101. In the case of Eales v. Dicker, 1 Moody & M. 324, in an action by the indorsee against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, Mr. Justice Littledale said—I am decidedly of opinion that the bill is not evidence of money had and received by the acceptor to the use of the holder. And Mr. Chitty says, in his Treatise on Bills, (Ed. 1839) 595, it seems now to be settled, that the plaintiff can in no case recover under the count for money had and received, unless money has actually been received by the party sued, and for the use of the plaintiff. And he cites Barlow v. Bishop, 1 East, 434, 435, and Waynam v. Bend, 1 Camp. 175. The cases cited above, from 1 Camp. and 1 Moody & M., on which great reliance is placed, are both nisi prius cases. They are, undoubtedly, entitled to great respect, as having been decided by very learned and distinguished lord chief justices of the king's bench. But those decisions are not, as has been shown, conformable to previous decisions given by judges equally distinguished for their learning and ability. And, unless we labor under some misconception, these later decisions are not altogether consistent with some cases since decided in England.

In the case of Pownal v. Ferrand, 6 Barn. & C. 439, Lord Tenterden, and the other judges, held, that the indorser of a bill being sued by the holder, and having paid him part of the sum mentioned in the bill, might recover the same from the acceptor, in an action for money paid to his use. This recovery, it is true, was placed upon the peculiar circumstances of the case. The plaintiff having been forced to pay the money, in the language of the court, like a stranger, whose property, being on the premises, was distrained by the landlord for rent, is obliged to redeem his property, may recover on the money count. But suppose the plaintiff, on being applied to by the holder of the bill, had paid the full amount, for which, as indorser, he was liable; could he not, on the same principle, have recovered from the acceptor, on the money count? The payment of what he is legally bound to pay, without suit, could not, in any respect, weaken his right. Nor could it have been weakened by paying the whole amount of the bill instead of a part of it. And would not the indorser, in this view, stand in the same relation to the acceptor, as the holder of whom he received the bill. It was equally the duty of the acceptor to pay the bill to the holder as the assignee of it, as to the indorser who has taken it up. This change in the holder of the bill, could have no effect on the obligation of the acceptor. He was bound, and equally bound, to both parties. The assignee in purchasing the bill paid for it a valuable consideration, and the indorser in taking it up did the same thing. The indorser then, having taken up the bill is the holder, having the same rights and remedies as when the bill was first assigned to him. Now on what ground may he recover the amount of the bill from the acceptor? Whether as indorser or assignee of the bill he has paid for it the sum which the acceptor is bound to pay. And bound to pay it to him as the holder of the bill. Is not the consideration paid for the bill money paid on account of the acceptor, and for his use? And is not the bill evidence of this? In the above case Lord Tenterden remarks —"the law is, that a party, by voluntarily paying the debt of another, does not acquire any right of action against that other; but if I pay your debt because I am forced to do so, then I may recover the same; for the law raises a promise on the part of the person whose debt I pay to reimburse me." And the case of Exall v. Partridge, 8 Term R. 308, is referred to as sustaining this principle. The plaintiff, in that case, put his goods on the premises, knowing that he thereby placed himself in a situation to have his goods distrained for the rent; they were distrained, and, to redeem them, he had to pay the money sued for, and which the court held he might recover on the general money count.

A surety places himself in a situation in which he is compelled to pay the debt of his principal, and the sum thus paid he may recover from his principal on the general count. Now, in principle, does this case differ from the one in Term Reports? By placing his property on the premises it became subject to the demand of the landlord for rent, and the plaintiff thereby became the surety of the tenants. It was, in effect, the same as giving the property in pledge for the payment of the rent. Having paid the money to redeem his property, he might well recover the amount from the defendants, as money paid to their use. Every indorser of a bill is a surety for the drawer or the acceptor, and may be compelled to pay it. Pownal et al., in the above case, became the sureties of Ferrand, the acceptor; and, having paid a part of the bill, it was properly considered as so much money paid for the use of the acceptor.

The right of the plaintiff, then to recover, depends not upon the peculiar circumstances of the case, but upon the fact, that being legally bound to pay, he has paid a sum of money which the defendant owed, and which he was bound to pay. And this principle applies to all cases of suretyship, where money has been paid by the surety, whether the plaintiff was bound as indorser or otherwise. The right of the owner of the property distrained, to recover, rested not alone upon the fact of his having paid the rent for the defendants, but upon that fact, coupled with the fact of the obligation he was under to pay it, to redeem his property. And this obligation arose from his voluntary act in placing his property on the premises. The right, then, of the plaintiffs to recover, in the cases of Exall v. Partridge [supra] and Pownal v. Ferrand [supra] rested upon a general principle. And this principle was directly in conflict with the decisions referred to, that a bill of exchange is not admissible in evidence, under the money counts, in behalf of the holder against the acceptor. And this upon the ground that there is no privity between the parties. In the case of Pownal v. Ferrand, Mr. Justice Littledale seems to have felt the pressure of this view, for he says that for some time he entertained considerable doubt whether the plaintiff, as indorser, in that form, could recover. Mr. Justice Holroyd took the broad, and, as we believe, the correct ground. The defendant, "he says, as acceptor of the bill, was liable in the first instance to pay it. If he had performed his duty, the plaintiff would not have been called upon by the holder; but, as an indorser, he was liable to be called upon to pay the whole or part; he was called upon, and was actually compelled to pay part." "It is said the plaintiff, by making this payment, was only remitted to his remedy upon the bill; but I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action, upon the same principle upon which a surety is entitled to recover money from his principal. I think that a party is not bound to resort to the original engagement, unless it be by deed, but that he may, at his election, found his action upon the original engagement, or bring indebitatus assumpsit for money paid." Except through the original engagement, where is the privity? A voluntary payment would not maintain the action. And if the privity is derived through the original engagement, it extends equally to the indorsee who has paid for the bill and become the holder, as to the indorser who has taken it up and become the holder. Each has paid the same sum for the bill. And as it regards the right to maintain the action for money paid, the bill being due, it can not be material whether it was purchased or taken up by the holder, before or after it became payable. Lord Tenterden having decided the action could not be maintained on the general counts, except as between the immediate parties to the bill, seems driven, of necessity, in the case of Pownal v. Ferrand [supra], to make a distinction between it and an ordinary case where the holder of the bill sues the acceptor. But the distinction he draws, is one of circumstances, and not of principle. In the case of Wilson v. Coupland, 5 Barn. & Ald. 228, these facts were proved: The defendants being indebted to Taillasson & Co., in the sum of £768, upon the balance of accounts, of money had and received; and Taillasson & Co. being indebted to the plaintiffs in a much larger amount, transferred this demand to the plaintiffs, and which the defendants agreed to pay them. On this state of facts the court held, Abbott, Chief Justice, afterwards Lord Tenterden, that the plaintiffs could recover the amount under the general count for money had and received. Now, here no money passed between the parties. The debt was due to Taillasson & Co., and the defendants agreed to pay it to the plaintiffs. There was no privity except through the promise of the defendants. And does not the acceptor of a bill promise every holder to pay it at maturity?

In the language of the supreme court, in the case of Raborg v. Peyton, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 385, we think "it is very difficult to perceive how it can be correctly affirmed that there is no privity of contract between the payee and acceptor. There is, in the very nature of the engagement, a direct and immediate contract between them. The consideration may not always, although it frequently does, arise between them; but privity of contract may exist, if there be an express contract, although the consideration of the contract originated aliunde. Besides, if one person deliver money to another for the use of a third person, it has been settled that such a privity exists, that the latter may maintain an action of debt against the bailee. And it is clear that an acceptance is evidence of money had and received by the acceptor for the use of the holder. It is the evidence of money paid by the holder to the use of the acceptor. A privity of contract, and a duty to pay, would seem, in such case, to be completely established; and wherever the common law raises a duty, debt lies." If the contract thus establish the privity and a duty as between the holder of the bill and the acceptor, the same privity and duty must exist between the holder and any prior indorser of the bill whether immediate or remote. We, therefore, think that, under the money counts, this bill is admissible in evidence.

The defendants then offered the maker of the note to prove that after its execution it had been altered in a material part without his consent or knowledge. To his competency, as a witness, the plaintiffs' counsel objected. The general rule is, says Chit. Bills, (Ed. 1839) 653, that it is no objection to the competency of a witness, that he is, also, a party to the same bill or note, unless he be directly interested in the event of the suit, and be called in support of such interest, or, unless the verdict, to obtain which his testimony is offered, would be admissible evidence in his favor in another suit. Bent v. Baker, 3 Term R. 27; Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, 7 Term R. 601; Smith v. Prager, Id. 62; Jones v. Brooke, 4 Taunt. 464.

So far as regards the amount of the note the witness seems to have no preponderance of interest for the one party over the other, to this action. But this does not hold in respect to the costs of this suit. Should the plaintiff fail in this action the witness would not be liable to him for the costs; but should he succeed he is liable to the defendants for the costs. On this ground, therefore, he is incompetent. But a release from the defendants being presented, this objection to the witness is removed. In the case of Walton v. Shelley, 1 Term R. 300, the court, after a full and most able and elaborate consideration of the question, held, that a person is not a competent witness to impeach a security which he has given, though he is not interested in the event of the suit. But this decision was afterwards overruled in the case of Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, above cited, and is not considered as law by the English courts. It has been adopted, however, by the supreme court. In the case of Bank of U. S. v. Dunn, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 55, the court held that no person, who is a party to a negotiable note, shall be permitted, by his own testimony, to invalidate it. And the same rule was sanctioned in the case of Metropolis Bank v. Jones, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 14. In many of the state courts this rule has been sanctioned. Haughton v. Page, 1 N. H. 60; Churchill v. Suter, 4 Mass. 156; Warren v. Merry, 3 Mass. 27; Jones v. Coolidge, 7 Mass. 199; Winton v. Saidler, 3 Johns. Cas. 185; Wilkie v. Roosevelt, Id. 206; Coleman v. Wise, 2 Johns. 165; Skilding v. Warren, 15 Johns. 270. Some doubt as to the rule was suggested by the judges in the case of Powell v. Waters, 8 Cow. 669, but no decision was given. Stille v. Lynch, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 194; Allen v. Holkins, 1 Day, 17; Baring v. Reeder, 1 Hen. & M. 175; 2 Bin. 154; 2 Desaus. Eq. 224; Bank of Montgomery Co. v. Walker, 9 Serg. & R. 236. The purpose for which the witness is called is not to show that the note was void in its creation, but that its validity has been destroyed by a subsequent alteration. An alteration after it had been signed by the witness. In the case of Baker v. Arnold, 1 Caines, 258, the court held that an indorser of a note was a competent witness to prove the indorsement was made after the note was due. Judges Thompson and Livingstone held the indorser was not a competent witness, under their decision, in the case of Winton v. Saidler [3 Johns. Cas. 185], cited in 1 Caines, 267, which adopted the rule of Walton v. Shelley. But Judge Kent, and two other judges, held otherwise. In his opinion, Judge Kent said—I do not think the decisions of this court go so far as to warrant a rejection of the indorser in the present instance. In those cases the maker of the note in the one, and the indorser in the other, were offered to prove the note to have been usurious. Those witnesses were, therefore, called to invalidate the paper they had signed. So in the case of Walton v. Shelley, the indorser, who was rejected, was called to prove the note void by reason of usury. And he further remarked, that he could wish to see the rule of witnesses being incompetent, on grounds of policy, rendered manageable by being reduced to limits susceptible of definition and certainty. To do this, he says—we must adhere strictly to the cases which produced the rule, and exclude only the witness who was called to impeach his own paper, by showing it to have been immoral, or illegal, when he put his name to it. The same rule is sanctioned in the following cases: Warren v. Merry, 3 Mass. 27; Barker v. Prentiss, 6 Mass. 430; Webb v. Danforth, 1 Day, 301; Hubbly v. Brown, 16 Johns. 70; Myers v. Palmer, 18 Johns. 167. The indorser is not a competent witness, in a suit against the maker of a promissory note, to prove that the note was originally drawn for the indorser's accommodation, and thereby enable the maker to set up a discharge by the holders' giving time to the indorser. For, though a party to negotiable paper may be received to prove subsequent facts to discharge it, yet he is not competent to show that the instrument was not, in truth, what it purported on its face to be. Bank of Montgomery Co. v. Walker, 9 Serg. & R. 236.

A party to a negotiable instrument may testify to facts which do not prove it to have been originally void. Wendell v. George, 1 R. M. Charlt. 51. The plaintiff declared as an indorsee of a promissory note, drawn by Foster Charlton, payable to the defendant; Lord Mansfield admitted the drawer to prove that the date had been altered. 2 Esp. 708. And in the case of Dickinson v. Prentice, 4 Esp. 32, Lord Kenyon admitted the drawer to prove, in an action by the holder against the acceptor, that the acceptance was a forgery. His lordship said the objection went to the credit of the witness, and not his competency. In an action on a note by the payee against the surety, the principal is a competent witness; and his testimony is admissible to prove facts happening after its execution, to discharge the surety. Freeman's Bank v. Rollins, 1 Shepley [13 Me.] 202. The payee of a note, in a suit between the assignee and the maker, is a competent witness to prove upon what terms the assignment was made, if called by the maker; their interests being adverse. Stone v. Vance, 6 Hammond [Ohio] 248. The payee of a note, who has indorsed it with a saving of his own liability, is a competent witness to prove an alteration in the note since its execution. Parker v. Hanson, 7 Mass. 470. An indorser is a good witness in an action by an indorsee against the maker to prove that the note was, after the indorsement, fraudulently put into circulation. Woodhull v. Holmes, 10 Johns. 231. Where a note, before it became due, was paid to the payee by the maker, who took a receipt in full, and the note was afterwards, before it became due, indorsed by the payee and by the indorsee to the plaintiff, who was informed of the payment before receiving the note, it was held that the plaintiff took it subject to such payment, and that the first indorsee was a competent witness to prove the payment of the note. White v. Kibling, 11 Johns. 128. In the case of Sillding v. Warren, 15 Johns. 270, it was held that one of the makers of a note was competent to prove that the plaintiffs who sued the indorser were not bona fide holders, and thereby defeated their action. Such subsequent fact, however, must not involve the turpitude of the witness. Hubbly v. Brown, 16 Johns. 70. Under this rule it has been held that a second indorser is competent to prove that the third indorser had said that he had received and discounted the note on usurious interest. Powell v. Waters, 17 Johns. 176.

The great and governing principle in the case of Walton v. Shelley, and the other cases cited, is, that an individual, whose name appears upon a negotiable instrument, is not a competent witness to prove that it was not a bona fide instrument, at the time it was made. That he shall not be permitted to prove any fact which conduces to show that the bill or note was not what it purported to be when it received its signature. And this rule is founded upon public policy. It is deemed as incorrect in morals as in policy, that a person whose signature gives credit to a negotiable instrument should not only practice a fraud upon every holder of it, but be a witness to prove the fraud. That he should, by an exhibition of his own turpitude, destroy the value of the instrument in the hands of an innocent holder. But this rule is limited to the transaction in which the witness was a party. He may prove facts which subsequently transpired, though they should conduce to defeat the action of the plaintiff. But these must be facts in which he had no agency; and in reference to which, as regards the trial on hand, he can have no direct interest. Under this view the witness now offered, showing a release from the defendants, may be examined as to the alteration of the note after it was executed by him and passed out of his possession. The verdict in this case can not be given in evidence in any case either for or against the witness. He is responsible to the plaintiff as the maker of the note, whatever may be the result of this trial. That the maker of the note, as between the holder and the indorsers, is a competent witness, the defendants having released him from costs, all the authorities establish. And the only question is—what facts may he prove? These must be subsequent to his agency in the making and negotiation of the instrument, and it is not perceived that any other limit can be imposed.

The witness was examined, and other witnesses, but the jury not being able to agree upon their verdict, they were discharged, and the cause was continued.

Circuit and District Courts, E. D. Virginia. May 6 and June 5, 1874.

JURISDICTION IN BANKRUPTCY—SETTLEMENT OF PARTNERSHIP ACCOUNTS.

It is too great a stretch of the jurisdiction of a bankruptcy court to take a fund from the estate of a decedent not in bankruptcy to pay the debt of a partnership firm not in bankruptcy, in which decedent was partner, on the single ground that the bankrupt himself was a partner of that firm; and the bankruptcy court will not entertain a petition praying such a thing, but will leave the petitioner to his remedies in the state courts.

In bankruptcy. W. G. R. Frazier and T. B. Starke entered into a written agreement, on the 3d of June, 1871, by which Starke agreed to lend him $2500 for three years as a fund with which Frazier was to purchase outfit and apparatus for a photographic establishment, and to secure upon this property by deed of trust the payment of the money advanced by Starke. Frazier was to go on with the business and to divide the profits with Starke, and was to make no debts, and draw no drafts, but was to buy for cash alone. On the 1st July following, Starke having advanced the money, Frazier executed a deed of trust on the photographic property to secure the $2500 loaned, but they substituted a different contract in one particular in this deed from the one which had been agreed upon a month before. The difference was this, that, instead of providing for a division of the profits of the business between Frazier and Starke, the deed stipulated that Frazier should pay to Starke 12 per cent. interest per annum upon the loan. Frazier thereupon went on with the business in his own name; and in buying fixtures, made a debt to E. & H. T. Anthony & Co. of $658.92, between 7th July and 23d December, 1871. These creditors did not know then, or for three years after, of any agreement having been made between Starke and Frazier to divide profits, and they gave credit individually to Frazier. The business was conducted from the beginning in Frazier's individual name. Two years after Frazier had commenced business, to wit, in March, 1873, Starke died, and of course is not capable of explaining how the contract of 3d June, to divide profits, became in July a contract by which he was to receive 12 per cent. on his loan. During all the period of Frazier's business, there was no pretence on his part, and no thought, on the part of the public, or of these creditors, Anthony, that there was a partnership. Frazier went on in his own name with his photographic business, until October 3d, 1873, when he was adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition, having paid nothing to Starke or his estate either in the form of interest or profits. Sale of the property embraced in the trust deed was made in October, 1873, under the order of this court; $500 of the proceeds have been paid for rent, and two notes each for $1000 are on deposit in bank to the credit of this cause.

HUGHES, District Judge. The creditors, Anthony, now claim for themselves and other creditors the right to be paid their debts out of the two notes, on the ground that Starke was a partner of Frazier, and that this fund accruing to his estate, now in custody of this court, is chargeable with these debts. The counsel of Frazier were not authorized by the documents accompanying it to admit, in the statement of facts submitted to me, that the agreement of the 3d June, 1871, "was not abrogated before the death of said Starke in 1873;" and I do not accept that part of the agreed statement of facts as true. I conceive that the provision of the deed of trust giving Starke 12 per cent. as interest was a substitute agreed upon by both parties to the stipulation of 3d June, 1871, by which Starke was to take half the profits.

It is not proved that Starke's estate is insolvent. It is not denied that, if there has been such a firm as Starke & Frazier, the firm is solvent. Neither the estate of Starke himself nor the supposed firm of Starke & Frazier are in bankruptcy; and this court has therefore no jurisdiction over the estate of the one or the assets of the other. The property conveyed by Frazier to Starke's trustee is no part of the estate in bankruptcy, and but for the petition of Mary C. Starke, administratrix of T. B. Starke, improvidently preferred here, praying it to do so, this court would most probably not have assumed jurisdiction over the property conveyed by Frazier's trust deed. Now that a sale has proved that the bankrupt's estate had no interest in that property, this court declines longer to continue its jurisdiction over it.

It is unnecessary to decide whether a partnership existed between Starke and Frazier, or to decide, 1st. That a mere agreement, never carried into effect, to share profits, did not in this case constitute a partnership; and 2d. If it did create one, yet that the stipulation of the trust deed by which Starke was to receive 12 per cent. interest was an abandonment of the agreement to share profits. Starke's estate is not insolvent nor in bankruptcy. The estate of the alleged firm of Starke & Frazier, if such firm ever existed, is not in bankruptcy. Only Frazier himself is in bankruptcy; and as it is not pretended that the two notes, of $1000 each, are part of his estate in the custody of this court, the creditors of Frazier have no right to a decree for the payment of their claims out of those notes; certainly not on the agreed statement of facts signed by counsel, which by silence on the subject concedes that Starke's estate is solvent and that the hypothetical firm of Starke & Frazier is solvent.

It would be too great a stretch of the jurisdiction of this court to take a fund from the estate of a decedent not in bankruptcy to pay the debt of a partnership firm not in bankruptcy, on the single ground that the bankrupt himself was one of that firm.

If there was such a firm, and the creditors of this bankrupt have a claim against it, the local courts are open for the assertion of that claim, and the firm as well as the decedent's estate (for all that appears in the agreed statement of facts) are solvent and responsible for the debts of the firm. Starke being dead and unable to explain the terms on which the business of Frazier really went, it would have been proper to take the deed of trust, which is the last instrument executed between Frazier and himself, as indicating those terms, if there had been doubt on this point, which I have not. A decree may be taken for the delivery of the two notes of $1000 each to the administratrix of Starke.

This decree was affirmed, on appeal, on the 5th June, 1874.

BOND, Circuit Judge. This cause coming on to be heard upon the petition, agreed statements of facts, and answer, and having been argued by counsel, it is thereupon ordered that the petition be dismissed for the reasons well set forth in the opinion of the district judge, with costs.

Mr. Youngs, for plaintiff, said the practice was to find a cent, without any evidence, the default having admitted something to be due.

THE COURT instructed the jury that they might and ought to find the smallest possible sum due, which was one mill, being the smallest money of account known in the United States. Verdict accordingly.

BANKRUPTCY—DEATH OF DEBTOR—ABATEMENT.

Where a debtor dies between the time of the serving of the rule to show cause and his adjudication as a bankrupt, the proceedings will be abated.

[Cited in Adams v. Terrell, 4 Fed. 801.]

In bankruptcy.

Messrs. Watson, Wood & Weir, for the rule.

Mr. Stoner and Mr. Swoope, Dist. Atty., contra.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. On the 4th of April, 1873, a creditors' petition was filed [by Frazier & Fry] against John V. McDonald, alleging several acts of bankruptcy. To this he filed a denial on the 12th of April, 1873, and demanded a trial by jury, which was ordered. On the 28th of May, 1873, and before a jury trial could be had, his executors, by counsel, came into court and suggested his death as having occurred on the 22d of that month. At their instance a rule was granted on the petitioning creditors to show cause why the petition and all the proceedings thereunder should not abate.

The question presented for our consideration is, does the death of McDonald terminate the proceedings in a court of bankruptcy?

Judicial legislation is a dangerous encroachment upon the constitutional rights of congress. Without its employment I cannot extend the provisions of the bankrupt law beyond the present status of this case. Realizing the justice of such an application to its existing features, I have tried to find authority for it in some one or more of its sections, but have not been able to do so. To apply the broad principles of equity practice to an act of legislation, comprehensive in its terms and designed to meet every possible contingency in the affairs of the debtor, is the exercise of a doubtful authority, and should be avoided by the judiciary.

Were this a voluntary proceeding the statute provides for it by declaring, in the twelfth section [Act 1867; 14 Stat. 522], that if the debtor dies after the issuing of the warrant, the proceeding may be continued and concluded in like manner as if he had lived. In such cases he had already been adjudicated a bankrupt, and complete jurisdiction over his person and property had been acquired by the bankrupt court, and there is no good reason why it should be transferred to another forum. In a proceeding by the creditors there is no such provision; the attitude of the party is wholly different; the process is simply inchoate; he has not been declared a bankrupt; he denies all the acts of bankruptcy charged in the petition, and demands that their truth or falsity may be determined by a jury. These are analogous to torts in an action at law, suits for which abate on the death of the party. Even if we thought that the twelfth section applied to cases of involuntary bankruptcy, it could not apply here, for no warrant has issued, and could not issue until after an adverse finding by the jury, and a decree of adjudication. Many of the clauses in the involuntary sections of the bankrupt law are penal in their nature. With what propriety can you visit these upon a representative man, upon the executor, who is the appointee, and, post mortem, the legitimate representative of the dead man, or upon the administrator, who obtains none of his powers from the decedent, but is appointed by, and derives all the authority from, the register of wills?

In construing this act of congress, I can give it no other interpretation, and as this is a question of the first impression, I suggest an early appeal, that it may be definitely settled in this circuit. The rule is made absolute.

BANKRUPTCY OF PARTNER — ADMINISTRATION OF INDIVIDUAL AND PARTNERSHIP ASSETS.

[In the matter of Alexander Frear, a bankrupt.]

[2] [I, John Fitch, one of the registers of said court in bankruptcy, do hereby certify that in the course of the proceedings in said cause before me, the following question arose pertinent to the said proceedings, and was stated and agreed to by the counsel for the opposing parties, to wit: Brown, Hall & Vanderpoel, for the bankrupt; Martin & Smith, for Bauendahl & Co.; Matthews & Bretts, Chapman, Scott & Crowell, and S. T. Freeman for various creditors, also Richard J McCurdy, in person, and for Aldrich, McCurdy & Co. I deem it the duty of the register in deciding questions involving the construction of the bankrupt act, to examine the question presented in all its bearings; examine the authorities applicable to the case, and give an opinion in the matter upon the law of the case, which will enable the district judge to decide the case by revising or affirming the opinion of the register. This course lessens the arduous duties of the district judge, and relieves him of some of the most difficult and laborious part of his duties. On the 19th day of February, A. D. 1868, the above named petitioner filed his individual petition in the prescribed form (No. 1), praying that he might be adjudged by the court to be a bankrupt and have a discharge from all his debts provable under the bankrupt act. There is no reference in the petition to copartnership debts, but the schedules annexed show the petitioner was a member of the late copartnership firm of Alexander Frear & Co., which was dissolved more than six months prior to the filing of said petition, and a large number of debts contracted by said copartnership are set forth in said schedules, including the debt to Bauendahl & Co., and the other creditors who have proved their claims.

[The petitioner has been duly adjudged a bankrupt, and at the meeting of creditors, Bauendahl & Co. presented against the estate of said petitioner, proof of a debt which was contracted by the said firm of Alexander Frear & Co.; to this the attorney for the petitioner objected, upon the ground that copartnership debts could not be proved herein, and urged that the indebtedness sought to be proved was a debt of the said firm of Alexander Frear & Co., and not his (the petitioner's) debt within the meaning of the bankrupt act. The attorney for said Bauendahl & Co. insisted that the fact, that others were liable with the petitioner on this debt, made no difference, that the copartnership of Alexander Frear & Co., being dissolved, the debt was the joint and several debt of the persons who composed said copartnership, that the creditor could enforce its collection from the individual property of the petitioner, and that proof of it should be received, and that a creditor has a right to prove the same. The following question of law arises thereon: Where a person who was a member of a late copartnership, files his individual petition under the bankrupt act, praying for a certificate of discharge from all his debts, can all his creditors prove their claims against him, or are his individual creditors alone entitled to come in and prove their claims? Section 19 of the bankrupt act, approved March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 525], allows a party to prove any debt he may have against a petitioner, but the proof of the claim or debt does not by any means conclude the petitioner, or any of the petitioner's creditors; he, or they, may contest the claim so proved upon any legal ground authorized by law. The act expressly allows the petitioner to object to all debts barred by the statute of limitations, yet such a claim, if proved, and not objected to by the petitioner or a creditor, must be allowed by the court, and the assignee must receive it as a claim entitled to its share of the dividend; the same rule applies to a debt which by a state law may have been discharged by a state insolvent law, which as between the citizens of the same state is binding and effectual in the state courts, and also United States courts, but not as between citizens of different states. 3 Seld. [N. Y.] 300; Kelley v. Drury, 9 Allen, 27; Baldwin v. Bank of Newburgh, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 234, 239; Worthington v. Jerome [Case No. 18,054].

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 123, contains only a partial report.]

[2] [From 1 N. B. R. 660 (Quarto, 201).]

[My view of the case is this, that any claim that the creditor could prosecute and recover as against the petitioner in a suit in the district court, can be proved and must be allowed in the proceedings in bankruptcy, as the law makes the proceedings a suit of the debtor against his creditors, merely reversing the manner of proceedings. This brings up the question: Could the creditor sue for and recover in the district, or circuit, court the debt or demand he now seeks to maintain against the objection of the petitioner? It must be allowed, as the same rule of law in regard to the debts that can be allowed in bankruptcy must govern at the circuit; as I conceive it to be plain, that, if the claimant could not obtain a judgment upon the claim, he cannot participate in the proceeds of the petitioner's estate. By the law of this state, a partner is liable personally for the debts of the copartnership to the entire indebtedness of the firm; the debt of the firm is as much the debt of the individual as of the firm, and after the property of the firm or corporation is exhausted, and there still remain claims or debts unsatisfied, the individual property of the members of the firm or copartnership can be taken in execution to pay the firm debts. Therefore, I hold that debts due by a firm are so far the debts of each member of the firm, that any creditor of the firm can prove their debts due them from the copartnership as against any member of the firm; whether he petition as an individual, or as a member of a firm, or of a late firm; the petitioner is liable both as an individual and as a copartner; is jointly as well as severally liable upon a contract, whether made as an individual or as a member of a firm.

[The discharge of the petitioner would not in any manner affect the claim of the creditor against the members of the copartnership; their claim against the others would remain the same, but should there be any money paid upon their claim, it would reduce the amount due upon the debt, by the amount so paid; the bankrupt would be discharged from the debt. It operates the same as the death of a bankrupt with no estate. The ground taken by Brown, Hall & Vanderpoel, for the bankrupt, would not only defeat the intent of the framers of the bankrupt law, but would render the discharge of the petitioner worthless, as he would remain indebted upon all the copartnership debts which constitute most of his indebtedness; also rendering most of the discharges in this district already granted, worthless, and laying the foundation for endless litigation. The bankrupt law is analogous to the insolvent law of this state, known as the two third act; by that act a discharge cuts off all debts, copartnership as well as individual. The supreme court, in the wording of the form of the petition, evidently intended that the petitioner should be discharged from all his debts, individual as well as otherwise. The provisions of the bankrupt law contemplate the entire discharge of the petitioner; no reservations are made, no partial discharge provided for; all claims of whatever nature are provable. Where an action at law, or in equity, could be maintained against a petitioner, the claim upon which said action could be maintained can also be proved subject to the same defence as in a court of law.

[By section 4 of the bankrupt act, the register is empowered to take proof of debts, "and all" depositions of persons and witnesses taken before said register shall be reduced to writing, be signed by him, and filed in the clerk's office of the district court, as part of the proceedings. Section 5, bankrupt act. By section 8 of the bankrupt act, "any creditor whose claim is wholly or in part rejected may appeal," &c. By section 11 of the bankrupt act, the petitioner in his petition must state his "willingness to surrender all his assets for the benefit of his creditors." His schedule must contain a full and true statement of all his creditors. Why require this to be done unless his creditors could prove their debts against his estate? The "sum due each creditor, also the nature of each debt or demand," must be stated. It is not probable that congress would have required the petitioner to set forth the name of each creditor, the amount and consideration of each debt, unless the holder and owner of the debt could prove the same, and share in the proceeds of the estate; "also to annex an inventory of all his assets, both real and personal." The estate of a petitioner may consist of every imaginable piece of property, held jointly with others, and his interest therein must be taken by the assignee. All debts due by the petitioner may be proved, and he will be discharged from them, be they individual or copartnership debts. By section 13 of the bankrupt act, a creditor who has proved his claim may request the judge to require the assignee to give bond, &c. Section 14 of the bankrupt act vests in the assignee all the bankrupt's property, including copartnership effects. By section 14 of the bankrupt act, the petitioner is compelled to make a transfer to the assignee of his assets; and any interest in any copartnership is an asset. If an attachment should have been issued against the property of the petitioner, and a levy made upon the property of the petitioner, and that property have been an interest in a copartnership, such attachment, if made within six months, would be set aside, and the assignee in bankruptcy would take the effects, be they copartnership or otherwise.

[For the reasons above given, and upon a careful review of the law applicable to this case, I held that the debt was provable, and allowed the claim to be proved as a debt against the estate of the bankrupt. Brown, Hall & Vanderpoel, attorneys for the petitioner, objected, and asked that the same should be certified to his honor, the district judge.] [3]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The debt in question is provable, whether there are any assets of the copartnership or not. If there are any such assets, they must be administered according to the provisions of section 36 of the act, and so must the assets of the separate estate of the bankrupt.

PARTY—EXAMINATION OF WITNESS—COUNSEL—CERTIFICATE OF REGISTER.

1. The only parties to bankrupt proceedings are the bankrupt and the creditors.

2. A witness in bankruptcy proceedings cannot take the opinion of the judge, on a certificate by a register, or be represented by counsel, except in a proceeding against him for contempt.

[Cited in Re Feinberg, Case No. 4,716.]

3. Where a witness, called for examination under the twenty-sixth section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 529)], objected to being examined, on the ground that there was no authority to examine a witness under the act unless there was a question in controversy to be settled by testimony, and not until after the examination of the bankrupt himself, but, without insisting on the objection, submitted to an examination, and the register certified the question, involved in his objection, to the court: Held, that the objection was frivolous.

[Cited in Re Stuyvesant Bank, Case No. 13,582; Re Comstock, Id. 3,080.]

4. After the witness had waived his objection, there was no question to be certified, and the register should have refused to give a certificate.

[This was a proceeding in the matter of Michael W. Fredenberg, a bankrupt.]

[2] [I, James F. Dwight, one of the registers of said court in bankruptcy, do hereby certify, that in the course of the proceedings in said cause before me, the following questions arose, pertinent to the said proceedings, namely:

[Facts. On the 27th of January, one Henry Manheims, who had been regularly summoned as a witness herein by an order dated January 22d, made on the application of the assignee herein, was before the register for examination. The witness had appeared in obedience to said summons on the 23d inst., had been sworn, and his examination had commenced. By agreement between the assignee and witness, the examination had been continued and adjourned until the 27th inst. And at the commencement of the examination this day, the said witness objects to being examined, "because there is no authority to examine a witness in any matter unless there be a question in controversy to be settled by testimony, and not until after the examination of the bankrupt himself." Counsel for witness and the assignee being heard, the register overruled the objection, and decided that the witness may be examined as prayed for by the assignee. Whereupon the witness prays that the question may be certified to the judge for decision, under the provisions of section 6 of the act, whether he shall be examined. Without standing upon the objection, the witness submitted himself to examination, which was concluded. The bankrupt himself has not been examined. An assignee has been chosen and is duly qualified. The assignee has obtained an order for the examination of the bankrupt himself, but the bankrupt could not be found within the district, although he has received no permission to depart, from the register.

[In my opinion the objection of the witness is not a valid one. Section 26 of the law provides that "the court may, on the application of the assignee in bankruptcy, require the bankrupt, upon reasonable notice, to attend and submit to an examination on oath, upon all matters relating to the disposal or condition of his property," &c. "And the court may, in like manner, require the attendance of any other person as a witness," &c. There is no restriction in the statute as to the circumstances antecedent to the examination of a witness, and the provision of this section seems clear to me; otherwise, in the case of the death or absence of a bankrupt, the assignee or creditor would be unable to gain information sought for, concerning the bankrupt's property and disposition. I think the witness, Henry Manheims, was properly under examination.

[Which said facts and opinion of register are respectfully submitted, this 13th day of January, 1868, for the decision of the judge.] [2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In answer to the question certified in this case, I reply:

1. The question is certified on the prayer of the witness, under section 6 of the act. The register might properly have refused to certify the question. It is only a party to the proceedings before the register, who can take the opinion of the district judge on a certificate of the register, on a matter arising in the course of such proceedings, or upon the result of them. The word "party" means the bankrupt or a creditor of his. It does not mean a witness who is not the bankrupt or a creditor of his.

2. I notice, from the certificate of the register, that the witness was represented before the register by counsel. The certificate speaks of the "counsel for witness." This is an anomaly. It can only lead to confusion and delay. It is only parties, the bankrupt or a creditor, who are entitled to be represented by counsel, either before a register or the court, unless where a witness is made a party to a new and collateral proceeding, by being cited to answer for an alleged contempt.

3. The register was correct in his decision, that the witness was properly under examination.

4. The register certifies that the witness, without standing on the objection, submitted himself to examination. Section 7 of the act provides, that, if any person examined before a register refuses or declines to answer, the judge shall have power to order such person to pay the costs thereby occasioned, if such person be compellable by law to answer, and such person shall also be liable to be punished for contempt. The objection made by the witness in this case was so entirely frivolous, that, if he had not submitted to an examination, the case would have been a clear one for the imposition of costs and for punishment for contempt. The objection made was, that there is no authority to examine a witness in any matter under the bankruptcy act, unless there be a question in controversy to be settled by testimony, and not until after the examination of the bankrupt himself. The twenty-sixth section of the act, under which section the witness in this case was summoned, requires him to submit to an examination on oath upon all matters relating to the disposal or condition of the bankrupt's property, to his trade and dealings with others, and his accounts concerning the same, to all debts due to or claimed from him, and to all other matters concerning his property and estate and the due settlement thereof according to law. In addition to this, the court can compel the giving of testimony by witnesses, in the taking of evidence, under section 38 of the act. The objection made by the witness was wholly without foundation, and the fact, that he himself was unwilling to stand upon it, showed that he regarded it as untenable.

5. Although the objection was made, yet, by submitting to an examination, which the register states was concluded, the witness waived the objection, and after that there was no point or matter, within the meaning of section 6 of the act, to be certified by the register, and he ought on that ground to have refused to certify the question.

It was proved that William Harriott, one of the seamen, had been detected with part of the stolen goods, and that he alone was liable, no proof appearing against the others. It was admitted that all would have been chargeable, if none, in particular, could have been criminated. One hundred pieces of nankeen were missing, of which only three were found upon Harriott. The rest of the crew must necessarily have been privy to, or concerned in the loss of the remainder. I decree, therefore, that they all contribute, pro rata, to make up this loss.

The YORK RIVER.

[7 Ben. 367.] [2]

District Court, E. D. New York. June, 1874.

COLLISION IN EAST RIVER—TUG AND TOW — VESSELS MEETING—NAVIGATING MIDDLE OF RIVER.

1. The tug W. was towing an oil-scow by two hawsers astern, around the Battery, from the North river into the East river, when she saw coming down the East river, near the piers on the New York side, the two tugs S. and Y., with two barges, the S. being ahead and towing the barges on a hawser, and the Y. being alongside of the inshore barge. Off pier 7, East river, was a drilling machine at anchor, about 700 feet out from the piers. As the W. was coming round the Battery, she headed outside the drilling machine, but she determined to pass inside of it, and headed inside of it. The S. and the Y., with their tow, were inside of it. The tide was flood. The W. passed the other tow in safety, and the W. and the S. passed each other in safety, but the oil-scow and the port barge struck each other nearly head on, not far from the middle of the channel between the drilling machine and the piers. Both the W. and the S. gave one whistle and ported before the collision, and just before the blow all three tugs stopped. The owners of the oil-scow filed a libel against all three tugs to recover the damages caused by the collision. The W. interposed a defence separate from the other two tugs: Held, that, although the tugs were none of them navigating in the middle of the East river, as required by statute, yet inasmuch as each of them saw the approaching tow in time to take the necessary steps to clear, the collision was not the result of their position in the river, but was the result of faulty navigation on the part of one or the other of the tugs, where they were.

[Cited in The Columbia, 29 Fed. 719; The Britannia, 34 Fed. 558; The Senator D. C. Chase, 46 Fed. 876.]

2. Under the single whistle blown by the W., the S. and Y. had the right to rely to the last moment upon her power to pass in accordance with that single whistle, and were not bound to have stopped sooner.

[Cited in The Maryland, 19 Fed. 556; The Susquehanna, 35 Fed. 324.]

3. The S. and the Y. and their tow were not at any time outside of the middle of the narrow channel between the drilling machine and the piers, and there was room enough for the oil-scow to have passed as the W. did, if she had been in line with the W. The W. was in fault, in that she did not, after she had determined to pass inside of the drilling machine, take measures to bring the oil-scow directly astern of her, so that the two tows might be parallel with each other; that she ported her helm too late, and was solely responsible for the collision.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for the Wilson.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought by the owners of an oil-scow to recover the damages caused by a collision which occurred in the East river on the 20th day of August, 1873. The oil-scow was one of a class of vessels used in transporting petroleum oil in bulk about the harbor of New York. She was sixty feet long, twenty-two feet wide, and contained 23,630 gallons of oil in bulk, equally distributed in twelve tanks. This scow was being towed from the North to the East river by the steamtug Frederick M. Wilson, upon two hawsers some ninety feet long, the tide being strong flood and the weather clear. There was, at the time, moored in the East river, a drilling machine, at work upon a reef there situated, and occupying, with its anchors, chains and buoys, a considerable space in the river. The locality of the machine is admitted to have been opposite New York pier No. 7, and 640 feet distant from the end of the pier. As the Wilson, with the oil-scow astern, passed around the Battery, she took a course between this drilling machine and the New York piers, and, when about opposite to it, encountered the tugs General Sheridan and York River coming down the East river with two light barges in tow—the General Sheridan towing ahead by two hawsers of from twenty to twenty-five fathoms in length, and the York River towing alongside and inside of the barges. In passing, the tows came in contact, the oil-scow striking the port barge of the down tow nearly head on, whereby the oil-scow was cut into some six feet, and her cargo lost.

To recover the damages thus sustained, the owners of the oil-scow now bring this action against the three tugs above mentioned.

In support of the charges of fault, which the libel and the several answers of the tugs contain, a mass of evidence has been presented. An attentive perusal of it in the light of the careful arguments of the respective advocates, has rendered it clear to me that the Wilson is responsible for the accident in question.

Her fault consisted in attempting to pass between the drilling machine and the New York piers, and by the approaching tow, without getting the scow she was towing in such a position as would enable her to keep the scow upon the right side of the passage between the drilling machine and the New York piers.

When she passed pier 2, her course led across the course which the down tow was then pursuing; and when she determined to pass the drilling machine upon the inside, it was clearly incumbent upon her to maintain a position in the flood tide which would enable her to drag the scow through the passage upon the east side of it. Nothing is disclosed by the evidence calculated to prevent her from so doing, and yet she allowed her scow to get in contact with a tow which was not to the east of the middle of the passage. It is indeed shown that she ported her helm before the vessels struck, but she ported too late, and was then unable to haul the scow clear of the course of the down tow.

This opinion in respect to the navigation of the Wilson in her passage inside the drilling machine renders it unnecessary to consider the further charge against her that she should have kept outside the drilling machine, and was in fault for taking a course inside the machine.

Charges of fault are also made against the tugs Sheridan and York River, the principal of which is that they made a sheer out from the piers, and thus prevented the Wilson from passing them in safety. This charge, it should be noticed, is not to be found in the libel, and it is not sustained by the proofs. On the contrary, it satisfactorily appears that the down tow was at no time outside of the middle of the passage, and was expecting and endeavoring to pass to the right of the Wilson and her scow, which course was in accordance with all the signals given by the tugs.

Another charge made against the Sheridan and the York River, earnestly insisted on by the libellants and somewhat less earnestly by the Wilson, is a failure to stop when the Wilson approached, so as to give her time to haul the scow past the bows of the down tow. It is conceded that the tugs did stop, and that the Sheridan sheered sharply to port before the two barges came in contact; but it is insisted that this should have been done sooner. I am unable to see how fault in this respect can be imputed to the tugs of the down tow. All the vessels were in plain sight of each other; there was abundant room for the Wilson to pass with her scow outside of the down tow. The whistles blown by each tug indicated an intention and ability to pass to the right. The down tow was moving very slowly, and the tugs in charge of it had, as it seems to me, the right up to the last moment to rely upon the power and ability of the Wilson to keep the scow behind her, and thus to pass them to port, as her whistle indicated her intention to do.

One other point, and that made by the scow against all the tugs, remains to be noticed. It is that of navigating in violation of the statutes of the state of New York, which require all steamboats passing up and down the East river to be navigated as near as possible in the centre of the river.

That none of these tugs were navigating in the centre of the river is clearly shown, but their course in that respect, if in violation of the statute, was not the cause of this collision. They all saw each other in time to pass in safety where they were. There was abundant room for them to pass in safety, and the accident is in no way attributable to the fact that they were not in the centre of the river, but because of faulty navigation where they were. The violation of the statute referred to, if any such existed, was not the cause of the accident.

Inasmuch as no fault is charged upon the scow, the libellants are entitled, of course, to recover of some one or of all the tugs proceeded against; the conclusions above stated require a determination that she is entitled to recover of the Wilson alone.

A decree will accordingly be entered in favor of the libellants as against the Wilson, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount, and the libel as against the Sheridan and York River will be dismissed with costs.

SHIPPING—LIEN FOR SUPPLIES—CREDIT—DISCHARGE—DEPARTURE.

[1. Supplies were furnished a vessel in her home port on a credit of six months on condition that satisfactory paper be given to secure the price, and were charged against the vessel in libellant's original sales books. Held, that he had a lien therefor, and that the price became payable at once on the refusal of the owner, being insolvent, to give other than his own note therefor.]

[2. The departure of a vessel from port on Sunday on a trial trip, after which additional work is done, and again secretly Sunday night at half past 12 o'clock, will not discharge a material man's lien.]

[This was a libel in rem by William A. Freeborn and others against the steamship Falcon for materials for repairs furnished in the home port.]

BETTS, District Judge. The libellants set up a lien upon the ship for $3,355.05, the amount of a bill of sheathing metal sold by them to the owner and applied to the vessel in this port in the winter of 1857. She was a domestic vessel refitting in her home port for service as a tug and freighter in the coasting trade. The fact that the materials were furnished by order of the owner of the steamer at the place and times and at the prices charged by the libellants, and also that the balance demanded in this action is due and unpaid, is not denied by the answer. The defence is placed upon the denial that the term of credit has yet expired, and also that the libellants acquired a lien for the debt, and further that if one was primarily created, the claimants assert that it was lost to the libellants by the departure of the vessel from this state before service of process in this cause was made. The owner of the ship became avowedly insolvent after the contract with the libellants was entered into, and the evidence conduces strongly to prove that he was so when he purchased the materials supplied the ship. At all events, there is no reliable proof that he had credit in the market at that time upon which he could have made the purchase. The sheathing was sold on a credit of six months, to be secured by negotiable paper, and after the metal had been delivered the libellants applied twice at the owner's place of business for the paper, but, before the owner could be seen personally, he assigned the ship, with the residue of his property, to the claimants for the benefit of his creditors, and then refused to give other than his individual obligation for the debt, alleging that the libellants agreed to receive his promissory note payable in six months in satisfaction of the sale. He was examined as a witness in behalf of the claimants on the hearing, and testified that he never engaged to give any further security for the undertaking than his individual note. The clear weight of evidence is with the libellants on that point, and shows that the credit of six months agreed to in the sale was on condition that satisfactory paper to secure the debt should be furnished by the purchaser, and that when called for by the libellants the owner offered his own note alone and refused to give an endorser, or other security of a reasonably satisfactory character. The original sales books of the libellants were also produced, and proved the sheathing, as delivered by them, was charged to the steamship, and not to the owner alone. I have no doubt upon the proofs that the purchase price was originally a lien upon the vessel, and that the failure of the owner to fulfil the condition of his credit rendered the debt payable instanter, and that accordingly the action has not been instituted prematurely.

The other branch of the defence is equally unsustainable, which is that the lien was discharged by the departure of the steamer twice from this port before suit brought upon the lien. She first left the port at 9 a. m. on Sunday morning, and ran outside the Hook merely on a trial trip, to make proof of the sufficiency of her machinery, and ascertain whether she was in condition for the business of towage, to which she was destined. She required and received additional work upon her machinery on or after the trial excursion. The next time she went out of the port was secretly on Sunday night, at half past 12 o'clock. She took out no tow or passengers or cargo, and returned within a day or two, about the 9th of March, and was arrested in this action the 18th. The application of the libellants for the paper engaged to be furnished them had been made repeatedly at the owner's office, down to the time of her departure, and they had no notice she was intending or prepared to leave the port immediately. Neither of these acts of the ship can avail as a discharge of the lien. Each was done under circumstances preventing the libellants intercepting her departure, the first being on a day when no process for her arrest could be obtained or employed, and the second, if not so absolutely dies non juridicus, was secretly, and at dark of night, and palpably in fraud of the rights of the libellants, and therefore void as a defence to the action upon the lien. District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. July 6, 1844.

BANKRUPTCY — PETITION ENURES TO BENEFIT OF ALL CREDITORS — DISCONTINUANCE — RE-OPENING — REASONABLE TIME.

1. The application of a creditor to have his debtor decreed a bankrupt, in invitum, enures to the benefit of all the creditors, any of whom may come in, within a reasonable time, and prosecute the petition.

[Cited in Re Roberts, 71 Me. 393.]

2. Proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, and subsequently discontinued on account of a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors. Seventeen months afterwards, certain creditors, who had claimed under the assignment, applied to have the discontinuance removed and the proceedings re-opened: this was not within a reasonable time.

This was an application by the Schuylkill Navigation Company to re-open the proceedings in bankruptcy against Freedley and Wood, which had been discontinued by leave of court.

It appeared that Freedley and Wood were citizens of Montgomery county, in Pennsylvania, and that on the 3d of June, 1842, certain of their creditors had commenced proceedings in this court to have them declared bankrupts, but, in consequence of an arrangement between the parties, a discontinuance thereof was entered, by leave of court, on the 15th July, 1842. In compliance with this arrangement, Freedley and Wood, on the 28th June, 1842, had made a general assignment, to S. L. Kirk and W. C. Ludwig, of all their individual and partnership property, to pay their individual and partnership debts "agreeably to the fourteenth section of the bankrupt law of the United States" [Act 1841; 5 Stat. 448]; it being therein provided, however, that no creditor or creditors should be entitled to snare under the assignment, unless, within three months from the execution thereof, he or they should furnish the assignees with a statement of his or their claim, and should covenant to execute a release on receiving the share or shares to which he or they should be entitled thereunder. Notice of this assignment was published in the newspapers in Montgomery county and in Philadelphia, at which city the Schuylkill Navigation Company had their principal place of business, and the assignees proceeded to sell the property and collect the debts. On the 21st July, 1843, the assignees filed their account in the court of common pleas of Montgomery county, and it was referred to an auditor to report distribution. In September, 1843, the auditor was attended by the parties interested, and, among others, by the solicitor for the navigation company, who presented a claim for $1066.66, which was allowed by the auditor; but, on exceptions filed to the report, this allowance was reversed, first by the common pleas of Montgomery county, and afterwards, on appeal, by the supreme court of Pennsylvania. On the 28th December, 1843, the navigation company obtained in this court a rule on Freedley and Wood and their assignees to show cause why the discontinuance should not be stricken off.

Tilghman and Sergeant, for the navigation company.

Mulvany and Mallery, for Freedley and Wood, and for assignees.

[1] [Reported by William H. Crabbe, Esq.]

Mr. Tilghman, for the navigation company.

The discontinuance should not have been entered without full notice to all parties in interest, instead of which many were wholly unaware of it until it was effected; but even under these circumstances, had the assignment been carried out really, as it professed to be, in the spirit of the fourteenth section of the bankrupt law, it would not have been complained of: this has not been the case. Under the decisions on the exceptions to the auditor's report, the navigation company have been deprived of their share, and are driven to this proceeding as their only means of relief. This court allowed the discontinuance on the faith of that assignment being executed; it has not been executed, and therefore the discontinuance was obtained by misrepresentation and technical fraud, which vitiates everything connected with it. Morris' Estate [Case No. 9,825].

Mr. Mulvany, for Freedley and Wood.

The navigation company were not parties to the original proceedings; they did not appear at the return of the process, they claimed under the assignment, which estops them from disputing its validity, and now, after some eighteen months have elapsed, they come in and ask to re-open the whole matter. Their application is entitled to no favor. Innocent third parties are interested that this application should be dismissed. On the faith of the discontinuance in this court, the real estate of Freedley and Wood has been sold, and if these proceedings are re-opened, the purchasers' titles are destroyed.

Mr. Sergeant, for the navigation company, in reply.

The discontinuance should only have been entered by consent of all parties interested. The petitioners alone, in an involuntary application, have no right to discontinue the proceedings; the ground of such an application is that the debtor has committed an act which gives every and any creditor the right to petition, but as only one petition can be pending at a time, every creditor is a party to it, whether named or not. Ex parte Calender [Case No. 2,307]. The discontinuance was conditioned that the assignment should be according to the terms of the bankrupt law, as contained in its fourteenth section, but the proviso in the assignment is contrary to that law, especially in requiring the account within three months. The application to strike off the discontinuance was made as soon as the decision of the supreme court was known, and the company discovered that they had no other remedy.

RANDALL, District Judge. On the 3d June, 1842, Eckel, Spangler, and Raiguel, Ludwick and Kneedler, and Frederick Liebrandt, filed their petition in this court, setting forth that they were creditors of Freedley and Wood, of Montgomery county, to an amount exceeding five hundred dollars, and praying the court, for the causes therein stated, to declare the said Freedley and Wood bankrupts. The court appointed Monday, the 11th July, 1842, to hear the application; and appointed a commissioner to take testimony in support of the allegations contained in the petition. On the 15th July, 1842, no answer to the petition having been filed, or any testimony returned, the petitioners applied for, and obtained, leave to discontinue the proceedings; the respondents having, on the 28th June, 1842, executed a voluntary assignment to S. L. Kirk and Wm. C. Ludwick, reciting the proceedings in bankruptcy, and "a desire to deliver up to trustees all their property, real and personal, to be distributed as provided for in the bankrupt law." The assignees were both bonâ fide creditors of Freedley and Wood, which firm was insolvent, though each of the partners, in his individual capacity, was entirely solvent.

The assignees, having accepted, proceeded to execute the trust, and made sales of valuable real estate of the individual members as well as the joint property of the firm. Their accounts were, in due time, filed in the court of common pleas of Montgomery county, and referred to an auditor for distribution. The Schuylkill Navigation Company appeared before the auditor, and claimed the sum of $1066.66, due to them by Freedley in his individual capacity, at the time of the assignment. It was objected before the auditor that the assignment contained a proviso that no creditor should be allowed any share of the assets or estate, thereby assigned and transferred, who did not hand in his claim to the assignees within three months from the execution of the assignment, and also execute an agreement covenanting to deliver a full and absolute release to the assignees, on receiving his share of the estate assigned, and that this had not been done by the navigation company. The auditor, for reasons stated in his report, allowed the claim of the company. To this allowance exceptions were filed by the assignees, and, on the 21st December, 1843, the court of common pleas sustained the exceptions, which decision was subsequently affirmed by the supreme court. On the 28th of December, 1843, the navigation company presented their petition to this court, setting forth the proceedings in bankruptcy and the assignment, and praying a rule upon the assignees, and upon Freedley and Wood, to show cause why the discontinuance should not be stricken off, and the proceedings re-opened.

In answer to the rule, it is, among other things, objected, that the Schuylkill Navigation Company were not parties to the original proceedings, and they cannot, therefore, compel a prosecution of that petition against the will of the petitioners; and, also, that this application comes too late to be granted by the court. I think there is no weight in the first objection. The application of a creditor to have his debtor decreed a bankrupt, in invitum, enures to the benefit of all the creditors, any of whom may come in and prosecute the application, if he thinks proper. If it were not so, each creditor to the requisite amount might present a separate application, and each prosecute his own, if successful, at the expense of the estate, fearing that the first petitioner might compromise with the debtor, or, by collusion, neglect to prosecute his application. But a creditor seeking to come in and prosecute, must do so within a reasonable time, and not, as in the present instance, upwards of seventeen months after the proceedings have been discontinued, after the law under which they were commenced has been repealed; and after having claimed, in the state courts, under the very assignment which is now sought to be invalidated. This last fact alone, might perhaps be a bar to the present application. Ex parte Shaw, 1 Madd. 598.

It has been urged that the purchasers of the real estate are interested in the decision of this question, and that, as they have paid their money on the faith of the decision of this court discontinuing the proceedings, they should be protected. It is certain that it would be attended with much danger if the security of titles founded on judicial proceedings could be invaded by the exercise of an arbitrary and uncontrolled discretion of the courts over their own records. Catlin v. Robinson, 2 Watts. 380. But I apprehend that all acts performed under the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction are, as to most third persons, perfectly valid. Thus a purchaser at a sheriff's sale under an execution, issued upon a judgment erroneously or fraudulently obtained, cannot be compelled to relinquish the property, even though the judgment be afterwards reversed. Sims v. Slacum, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 300.

The titles of the purchasers, however, do not, in my opinion, depend upon the decision of this motion. If the assignment is not in opposition to the provisions of the bankrupt law, then, according to Dudley's Case [Case No. 4,114], and the Anonymous Case [Case No. 467], the debtor had a right to make an assignment, without preference, to a bonâ fide creditor without notice, at any time before a decree of bankruptcy. If, however, the proviso in the assignment, requiring a presentation of claim within three months, and a covenant to release on receiving a share of the estate, gives a preference to any creditor or class of creditors, over the others, then it is an objection apparent on the face of the title, of which the purchaser was bound to take notice, and, under such circumstances the assignees could convey no title. Whether there be such a preference it is not necessary for me, at this time, to give an opinion. It may not, however, be improper to refer the parties to the Cases of Aspinwall [Case No. 592] and J. B. Bowen [unreported], decided by the circuit court of this district, an examination of which may lead to an amicable settlement of this controversy on just and equitable terms. Upon the ground that the application comes too late, the rule is discharged.

INCOME TAX—SALARY OF STATE JUDGE.

1. The United States cannot impose a tax on the salary of a judge of the superior court of the city of New York, by imposing a tax on such salary as the income of such judge.

2. It makes no difference that the salary of the judge is fixed by the board of supervisors of the county of New York, or that it is payable out of the treasury of the city of New York.

At law.

Edward Fitch, for plaintiff.

L. W. Emerson and Noah Davis, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is an action brought by the Honorable John J. Freedman, one of the justices of the superior court of the city of New York, to recover back the sum of $162.37, exacted from him by the defendant [Francis Sigel], as collector of internal revenue for the ninth collection district of New York. This exaction was, in form, a tax on the income of the plaintiff, but that income consisted solely of his salary as a judge of one of the most important judicial tribunals of the state—a court of record, having a wide range of jurisdiction, and wielding an important part of the judicial authority of the commonwealth. The sum in question was nothing more or less than a tax upon the plaintiff's salary, as a judge of a state court. The amount was paid under protest, and it is conceded that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, if the tax in question was not warranted by law. The sole question now to be determined is, whether this assessment on the salary of the plaintiff was legal.

The plaintiff claims, that the illegality of this tax is conclusively settled by the case of The Collector v. Day, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 113. That case involved the validity of a tax upon the salary of the defendant, Day, as judge of the court of probate and insolvency for the county of Barnstable, in the state of Massachusetts. In that case, the salary was fixed by a statute of the state, and was payable directly out of the state treasury. The supreme court held, that it was not competent for congress to impose the tax then in question upon the salary of a state judge. It is obvious, that that decision must control the question now presented for consideration, unless the latter can be distinguished, by some essential feature, from that determined by the supreme court in the case cited.

The defendant insists, that the present case is distinguishable from that of The Collector v. Day, in the following particulars: (1) In that case, the salary of the judge was fixed directly by a statute of the state, while, in the present one, the salary of the plaintiff was fixed by the board of supervisors of the county of New York. (2) The salary of Judge Day was payable directly out of the state treasury of Massachusetts, whereas, the salary of the plaintiff was payable out of the treasury of the city of New York. (3) The court of probate and insolvency for the county of Barnstable, Massachusetts, could not properly be termed a local court, and its judge a local officer; whereas, the superior court in question was purely a local court, belonging to a class of tribunals known only to the cities of New York and Buffalo, the justices of which are purely local officers. I will briefly consider these points raised by the defence, in the order above stated.

First. As to the body entrusted with the power of determining the amount of salary. In the one case, that body was the legislature of the state, and in the other, the board of supervisors of the county, acting under a statute of the state, expressly conferring that power upon them. For reasons, wise and salutary, no doubt, the legislature of New York, after creating the superior court, and conferring upon it extensive jurisdiction, saw fit to leave the amount of the salaries of the judges to be determined by the board of supervisors, and conferred upon the latter authority to that end. But, I apprehend that this circumstance does not, in any manner, affect the nature of the office of the judges of that court. They are still judicial officers of the state, wielding that part of the sovereign power of the state committed to their jurisdiction. Their salaries constitute their sole compensation, and, when once fixed, cannot be reduced during the terms for which they are respectively appointed. The same reasoning which led the supreme court, in the case of The Collector v. Day [supra], to hold the tax illegal, applies, with equal force, to the present case. In both cases, the judges exercise the judicial authority of the state, and represent its sovereignty in that behalf. Of what importance is it that amount of salary is fixed by the legislature itself, or by another body, acting under the authority conferred by the legislature? If a state were to create a commission for the purpose, and with the power, of fixing the salaries of all its judicial officers, would that circumstance change the nature of the judicial office, or materially affect its character, as one of the instrumentalities by which and through which the state exercised one of its sovereign powers? I apprehend there can be but one answer to these questions. The manner in which a state chooses to determine the salaries of its judicial officers, neither changes the character of the tribunals over which they preside, nor the relation of these officers or offices to the state, or to the federal, government. The agency which the state chooses to employ for the purposes of determining the amount of its judges' compensation is a purely incidental matter, wholly of its own concern, the exercise of which in no way changes or affects the relation which the two governments bear to each other. The line which marks and limits the constitutional power of each remains the same, unvaried by the incidental manner in which each, or either, may choose to exercise its acknowledged and unquestioned authority.

Second. As to the immediate source from which the salary is derived. In the case of The Collector v. Day [supra], the salary of the defendant was paid directly from the state treasury. But, suppose the legislature of Massachusetts had seen fit, after creating the courts of probate and insolvency for its respective counties, to make the salaries of each judge payable out of the treasury of the respective county over which his jurisdiction extended. Would that circumstance, purely a matter of legislative regulation and discretion, within the undoubted power of the state, have changed, in any essential particular, the nature or powers of the judicial office of the judge of those courts? To assert such a proposition would be to maintain that the sovereign power of a state depends upon the manner in which it exercises its discretion, in the details of its administration, and the distribution of its public burthens. The right of congress to tax the judicial offices of a state, certainly, cannot depend upon the mode by which the state may choose to raise the revenue applied to the support of such offices, or the sources from which it may choose to draw that revenue. These are mere incidents in the exercise of undoubted state power, in no way affecting the federal government, nor having any tendency to enlarge the power of the latter over subjects which are otherwise beyond its reach.

Third. As to the alleged local character of the office held by the plaintiff. On this point, the argument in behalf of the defendant signally fails. The courts of probate and insolvency of Massachusetts are courts of a more local character and limited jurisdiction than the superior courts organized by the state of New York. The latter are clothed with no inconsiderable part of the general judicial power of the state, with none or only partial limitations as to subject-matter of litigation, while the former are courts of limited and inferior jurisdiction, whose range of judicial authority is narrow, and touches only a very limited number of subjects. It is obvious, therefore, that this alleged difference, by which the defendant seeks to withdraw the present case from that of The Collector v. Day, has no solid foundation.

Without pursuing the subject further, I am entirely satisfied that the present case is within the reason and authority of The Collector v. Day; and judgment must, therefore, be rendered for the plaintiff.

BANKRUPTCY — FRAUDULENT PREFERENCES—BILL BY ASSIGNEE TO RECOVER ASSETS — RIGHTS OF CREDITORS ON FAILURE OF ASSIGNEE TO ACT.

A confessed a judgment in favor of his wife, and executed a conveyance to B, of certain real estate, who afterwards re-conveyed it to A's wife, with the fraudulent purpose and intent, as it was alleged, to defraud A's creditors. He was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt, and one of his creditors filed a bill in equity alleging the above facts. The defendants interposed the statute limitation of two years, provided for in the second section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 518)] against the relief prayed for. Held, that if the charges made in the bill be true, and were known to the assignee, it was his duty to have filed the bill so as to subject the land, and other property which has been fraudulently covered up by the proceedings, to the payment of the debts and demands proven against the estate, and if he (the assignee) refused, any creditor who had proved his debt had a right to apply to the court for an order directing proceedings to be taken for that purpose; that when the proceedings are for the benefit of secured creditors mainly, they should defray the expenses of the suit; that the bill was filed too late, and must be dismissed at the cost of complainant.

F. Johnson and J. A. P. Campbell, for defendants.

HILL, District Judge. This bill is filed by complainants [Freelander & Gerson], who have proved their judgment as creditors of said Thos. R. Holloman, in bankruptcy, against M. C. Cheatman, his assignee in bankruptcy, and against said Holloman as executor of his late wife, Rebecca A. Holloman, her children, Mary A. and others, also against John B. Aikman, praying to have declared null and void a judgment confessed by said Thomas R. in favor of his wife, said Rebecca A., and deeds of conveyance, executed first by said Thomas R. to said Aikman, and from him to said Rebecca A., all in 1866, and done without consideration, and with the fraudulent purpose and intent to defraud the creditors of said Thomas R., and especially of complainants. The answers admit the transactions but deny the fraud. A large number of witnesses have been examined on both sides, and the proof submitted, a very large portion of which need not be considered in any point of view, and none of it under the conclusions to which, after a careful examination of the questions, I have arrived.

The grounds upon which the relief is sought by the bill are, that the judgment confessed by Thomas R. Holloman, in favor of his wife, was fraudulent and void; that complainants' judgment was soon thereafter rendered and enrolled, and thereby became a lien upon the property, real and personal, subject to execution; that the conveyance of the lands mentioned by him to Aikman, and from him to his wife, was without consideration, fraudulent and void, and that these lands were subject to the payment of his judgment; that in 1868 Thomas R. filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy, and in his schedules falsely omitted to place these lands on his schedules; that he was in 1869 discharged from his debts; that Cheatman, the assignee, in ignorance of the facts, or from a disposition to aid Holloman, neglected to take proper proceedings to have this judgment and these conveyances declared void, and the property sold for the payment of the debts of said Thomas R., according to the priority of those holding liens and demands thereon.

To the relief prayed for in the bill, the defendants interpose the statute of two years limitation, provided in the second section of the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 518]. This is the first time the application of this section of the bankrupt law has come before me, and is one of no inconsiderable importance in the collection and administration of bankrupt estates, and although the last question discussed by counsel will be first considered, as if held to apply to the relief prayed for, will dispose of the cause without further inquiry.

If the charges made in the bill be true, and had been known to the assignee, it was his duty to have filed the bill so as to subject the land and any other property which had been fraudulently covered up by the proceedings mentioned to the payment of the debts and demands proven against the estate; and if he refused to do so, any creditor who had proved his debt had a right to apply to the court for an order directing proceedings for that purpose to be instituted, which the court, if satisfied that such proceedings should be instituted, would, upon such terms as to costs, etc., as would have appeared right, have so ordered. ceedings are mainly, if not entirely, for the benefit of secured creditors, they should defray the expense of the proceeding, and no more of the burthen be imposed upon general creditors than the ratable portion of interest in the assets sought to be recovered, as if they were for the general creditors the circumstances might be such as would require those applying to defray the expense in the first instance, to be refunded upon recovery out of the proceeds. The complainants in this case did not pursue this course, but made the assignee a party defendant. He was certainly a necessary party, and as it is a proceeding in equity the court will consider him as a co-complainant for the purpose of considering the question presented.

The fourteenth section of the act of 1867, in treating of the powers and duties of the assignee in bankruptcy, contains the following provisions: That upon the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of the assignee the title to all the property, real and personal, rights and credits, and rights of action, owned or held by the bankrupt at the time of filing his petition to be declared a bankrupt, ("including all property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors,") "shall, in virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of the assignee be at once vested in the assignee." Thus it will be seen that the assignee is not only vested with all the rights of property, credits and rights of action held or owned by the bankrupt at the time of filing his petition, but such rights to property as the bankrupt may have had before making any fraudulent disposition of the same, and which, by his fraud, he may have estopped himself from recovering. In other words, the assignee in all such cases is substituted as the agent and representative of the creditors, and may recover anything which they could have recovered had the bankrupt law never been in operation.

The policy of the bankrupt law is to make a speedy adjustment and settlement of every question connected with the bankrupt's estate. It is expected, and is the duty of all interested in the bankrupt's estate, immediately upon his being so declared, to examine into its condition, and to give all information and aid in its recovery and settlement. With this purpose, and to give quiet and repose to all concerned, and which is one of the prime objects of all statutes of limitation, the second section provides that "no suit at law or in equity shall in any case be maintainable by or against such assignee, or by or against any person claiming an adverse interest, touching the property and rights of property aforesaid, in any court whatsoever, unless the same shall be brought within two years from the time the cause of action accrued, for or against such assignee: provided, that nothing herein contained shall revive a right of action barred at the time such assignee is appointed."

The constitution of the United States conferred upon congress the power to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and when congress, in pursuance of this power, passed the bankrupt act, it at once superseded all laws in conflict with it. The bankrupt's estate, and every thing and right connected with it upon the bankruptcy at once passed under the control and operation of the bankrupt law. After that the rights of those in interest may be contracted or enlarged, as congress in its wisdom may provide. This provision in the second section provides that all rights of action barred upon the appointment of the assignee shall remain barred, whether in favor of or against the assignee, and give both to the assignee and those claiming an adverse interest to any property claimed by the assignee in the adverse possession of others, or claimed by others, to property in the hands or under the control of the assignee, two years in which to commence proceedings in equity or at law for its recovery. This is a separate and independent provision, and has no connection with any state statute on the subject; it may extend or may contract the time provided in the state statutes of limitations. Thus, if at the time of the appointment of the assignee but a few days remained of the time necessary to complete the bar, the time would be extended; or if the statute had just commenced running, and under the state law would have ten years to run, as in case of actions of ejectment to recover real estate, it would be complete within two years.

This act, unlike the state statutes, makes no exceptions in favor of married women, infants, absence, or for concealment of cause of action, and thus congress having complete power over the whole subject had the right to provide, and such provision is in accordance with the policy of the law, and is a rule which it is the duty, not only of this, but of all other courts, to apply when a case is presented to which it is applicable.

It will be observed that the statute of limitations, under the bankrupt law is limited to actions and suits respecting rights to property held adversely by or against the assignee. Applying this provision of the law to the facts in this case it will be found that the real estate intended to be recovered was held adversely to the rights of the assignee at the date of his appointment, and he must be considered as the complainant, which appointment was made on the 22d of September, 1868, consequently the law was complete on the 22d, or at least on the 23d of September, 1870; the complainant's bill not having been filed until the 8th of August, 1871. The result is that the bill must be dismissed, at the cost of the complainant.

I must acknowledge my obligation to the able counsel on both sides for the exhaustive presentation of the question, now presented and considered for the first time, and one of so much interest to all parties concerned in bankrupts' estates. I am glad that it is a case in which, if I have come to a wrong conclusion, I may be corrected by appeal in the circuit and supreme courts of the United States.

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1870.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—VAGUE SPECIFICATIONS—RECEIVER—DISCHARGE.

1. Where the discharge of a bankrupt was opposed on the ground, that he had omitted certain property from his schedules, such property having been conveyed by him, by a conveyance which was claimed to have been fraudulent, and it appeared, that, after such conveyance, and before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, a receiver of the property of the bankrupt had been appointed by a state court: Held, that whatever title the bankrupt had in the property, after the conveyance, had vested in the receiver, and there was no false swearing, by reason of his not having inserted it in the schedule of assets.

2. A fraudulent conveyance, within the meaning of section 29 of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 531)], must be a conveyance made as required by section 35, within four or six months before the filing of the petition by or against the debtor.

[Cited in Re Cretiew, Case No. 3,390; Re Pierson, Id. 11,153; Re Hannahs, Id. 6,032; Re Wolfskill, Id. 17,930; Re Carrier, 47 Fed. 444.]

3. A specification of objection to the discharge stated that, since the passage of the act, the bankrupt had destroyed books, documents, papers and writings, with intent to defraud his creditors. Another stated that he had removed or caused to be removed, books, stationery and papers from this district, with intent to defraud his creditors. Another specification was, that he, or some person in his behalf, had procured the assent of certain creditors to his discharge, and influenced their action, by a pecuniary consideration: Held, that they were too vague to be triable.

[In the matter of Robert H. Freeman.]

This case came up on a hearing on specifications of opposition to the bankrupt's discharge.

Robert Jackson, for bankrupt.

Vernam & Wilcox and J. S. Ridgway, for creditors.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. As to the first specification, whatever interest the bankrupt may have had in the property referred to, after the conveyance of it to E. Wolcott & Co., March 21st, 1868, was, at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed, vested in the receiver appointed by the state court, and not in the bankrupt. There was, therefore, no false swearing, in not inserting such property in the schedule of assets. The fact of the transfer to Wolcott & Co. was set forth in the schedules with sufficient particularity, and there was certainly no wilful false swearing in respect to the property. Nor was there, within the second specification, any concealment of the property referred to.

The fourth specification is, that the bankrupt made a fraudulent conveyance of the said property, to Wolcott & Co., being the said conveyance of March 21st, 1868. The petition in bankruptcy was filed December 31st, 1868. The conveyance referred to in section 29, as a "fraudulent" conveyance, means a conveyance which is declared by the bankruptcy act to be a fraud against such act—a conveyance which the act declares to be void. This requires the conveyance to be one made, as required by section 35, either within four months, or within six months, before the filing of the petition by or against the debtor. As the conveyance in question was not made within six months before the petition in bankruptcy in this case was filed by the debtor, it is not a "fraudulent" conveyance, within the clause of section 29 which speaks of "any fraudulent payment, gift, transfer, conveyance or assignment." The fourth specification is founded on this clause and, therefore, fails.

It is not established, under the sixth specification, that the bankrupt, "in contemplation of bankruptcy," as the specification says, or "in contemplation of becoming bankrupt," as section 29 says, made the conveyance in question, for either of the purposes set forth in the clause of section 29 under which the specification is drawn. The meaning of the expression, "in contemplation of becoming bankrupt," as used in that clause, was defined by this court in the case of In re Goldschmidt [Case No. 5,520]. Within that definition, it is not established, in this case, that the debtor, when he made the conveyance in question, contemplated committing an act of bankruptcy, either by filing a voluntary petition, or by doing some one of the things which is declared by section 39 to be the commission of an act of bankruptcy. The specification is not sustained.

The third specification is, that, since the passage of the act, the bankrupt has destroyed books, documents, papers and writings with intent to defraud his creditors. The seventh specification is, that he removed, or caused to be removed books, stationery and papers from this district, with intent to defraud his creditors. The eighth specification is, that he, or some person in his behalf, has procured the assent of certain creditors to his discharge, and influenced their action, by a pecuniary consideration. These three specifications are too vague to be triable and are overruled.

A discharge will be granted when the register shall have certified conformity.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1855.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—PROSPECTIVE ADOPTION OF STATE STATUTES BY CONGRESS—IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

1. Whether congress can adopt, prospectively, laws subsequently to be passed by a state upon a particular subject, quaere; but the act of January 14, 1841 (5 Stat. 410) does not adopt subsequent state laws imposing restrictions and conditions on imprisonment for debt.

[Cited in Howe v. Freeman, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 578.]

2. The act of the legislature of Massachusetts, passed May 21, 1855, and entitled "An act to abolish imprisonment for debt and to punish fraudulent debtors," does not abolish imprisonment for debt, and is not adopted by any act of congress so as to affect process out of this court.

[Cited in Hanson v. Fowle, Case No. 6,041.]

[In the matter of Watson Freeman, marshal of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The creditor in an execution which issued out of this court at the last term has obtained a rule on the marshal to show cause why he has not levied the same on the body of the debtor, pursuant to the exigency of the writ and the order of the creditor. The marshal has shown for cause, the act of congress of February 28, 1839 (5 Stat. 321), which enacts, "that no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any state on process issuing out of a court of the United States, where by the laws of such state imprisonment for debt has been abolished; and where by the laws of a state, imprisonment for debt shall be allowed under certain conditions and restrictions, the same conditions and restrictions shall be applicable to the process issuing out of the courts of the United States; and the same proceedings shall be had therein as are adopted in the courts of such state." Also the act of January 14, 1841 (5 Stat. 410), which requires the above act to "be so construed as to abolish imprisonment for debt, on process issuing out of any court of the United States, in all cases whatever, where by the laws of the state in which the court shall be held, imprisonment for debt has been or shall be abolished." Also a law of the state of Massachusetts, passed May 21, 1855 [Gen. Laws Mass. 1855, p. 90, c. 444], entitled "An act to abolish imprisonment for debt and to punish fraudulent debtors."

Assuming that congress can adopt, prospectively, future legislation of the several states abolishing imprisonment for debt, the first inquiry is whether imprisonment for debt has been abolished in the state of Massachusetts within the meaning of the act of congress quoted above. On examining this law of Massachusetts, we find, though it declares imprisonment for debt is abolished, it expressly allows a creditor to imprison his debtor upon complying with certain conditions prescribed by the act; and this, not by way of punishment of the debtor, but as a remedy to enforce payment of the debt. That this is a proceeding to be taken by a creditor at his election, to be prosecuted, or discontinued at his pleasure, in which he is treated as one party, and the debtor as the other party, and the sole object of which, if no charge of fraud is filed, is to enforce payment of the debt, is clear; and no charge of fraud need be filed. The debtor is liable to be arrested if the creditor make oath and prove to the satisfaction of a magistrate, that he has reason to believe and does believe that the defendant has property not exempt from execution, which he does not intend to apply to the payment of the plaintiff's claim. This does not even imply any fraud. It would be difficult to say that it implies any breach of any legal duty. For the debtor may intend to apply his property to pay another just debt, or to pay the two pro rata; or he may even have formed no intention on the subject, and yet be, within the act, liable to arrest. While, therefore, the act does in terms say, it abolishes imprisonment for debt, and punishes fraud, it does in equally clear terms, allow an execution to be levied on the body of a debtor, guilty of no fraud, to enforce payment of a debt. We are of opinion, therefore, that imprisonment for debt has not been abolished in the state of Massachusetts, within the meaning of the acts of congress. But it is true, that this law of Massachusetts does allow imprisonment, under certain restrictions and conditions, and this renders it necessary to inquire whether the act of congress has adopted those restrictions and conditions, and made them applicable to the process of this court. By the third section of the process act of 1828 (4 Stat. 278), which was applicable to all the states except Louisiana, it was provided that "writs of execution and other final process, issued on judgments and decrees and the proceedings thereupon, shall be the same in each state respectively, as are now used in the courts of such state." Under this act, as well as under the prior acts of 1789 (1 Stat. 93) and 1792 (1 Stat. 275), though they were held to include in general, all the regulations incident to process, yet it was also held that there were certain regulations made by state laws concerning their process, which were not intended to be adopted.

In Palmer v. Allen, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 550, it appeared that the law of Connecticut did not allow a debtor to be committed to jail on mesne process, without a mittimus granted by a magistrate. The marshal had committed a debtor to prison, under the authority of a writ of capias and attachment issuing out of a court of the United States held in Connecticut, without obtaining a mittimus from a magistrate. The supreme court said, "But it is equally clear to this court, that the law above alluded to, commonly called the process act, does not adopt the law of Connecticut, which requires the mittimus in civil cases. This is a peculiar municipal regulation, not having any immediate relation to the progress of a suit, but imposing a restraint on their state officers, in the execution of the process of their courts, and is altogether inoperative upon the officers of the United States in the execution of the mandates which issue to them." This decision related to a state law concerning mesne process. In Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1, this decision is examined, and though some other reasons are suggested in support of it, the ground stated in the opinion of the court is not impugned. Bank of U. S. v. Tyler, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 366, brought under review the effect of the insolvent laws of the state of Kentucky upon a debtor committed on an execution issuing from a court of the United States; and a similar question arose in Duncan v. Darst, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 301. In these cases the court held that the discharge under the state laws was inoperative. In Boyle v. Zacharie, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 648, it was decided, that though in Maryland, an injunction operated as a supersedeas of an execution, this regulation did not apply to executions issuing out of the courts of the United States. And in McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 9, it was held, that a state law, which authorized the sheriff to discharge a debtor from imprisonment, in default of payment of prison fees, did not justify his discharge by the sheriff from a jail to which he had been committed by the marshal, on an execution issuing out of a court of the United States. The results of these decisions and the principles on which they have been made, may be stated as follows: (1) That the adoption of state laws of proceeding, by congress, though general, does not include all state laws concerning process. (2) That among others not included, are those which are addressed to state courts and magistrates, accompanied with grants of power which enable them to execute such laws, which powers the courts of the United States do not possess and cannot exercise.

Another view must here be adverted to, which bears directly on the main question we are now considering. It is thus expressed by Mr. Justice Story, in U. S. v. Knight [Case No. 15,539]: "Hitherto the judicial construction of the acts of congress, which have adopted state laws, touching writs and processes, and the proceedings thereon, has uniformly been that they applied to the state laws then in force. To this effect are the decisions in Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 4; Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, Id. 51; and Beers v. Haughton, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 329. I must confess that I entertain very serious doubts whether congress does possess a constitutional authority to adopt, prospectively, state legislation on any given subject. For that, it seems to me, would amount to a delegation of its own legislative power. And I think my doubts strengthened by what fell from the supreme court in Wayman v. Southard [supra], and Bank of U. S. v. Halstead [supra]. At all events I should not be disposed to give such a construction to any act of congress, unless it was positively required by its words and its intent." See, also, Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Philadelphia, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 299. Whether the last clause of the act of February 28, 1839, by its language and its intent, does positively require such a construction as would amount to an adoption prospectively of the legislation of the states, modifying their laws concerning imprisonment for debt, but not abolishing it altogether, is the question to be here decided. Looking at the language of the act, it will be found that, construed grammatically, a part of it points to laws of the state thereafter to exist, whether passed before the act of congress or not, and a part of it points, solely, to the then existing proceedings under those state laws. For it first says, "When by the laws of a state, imprisonment for debt shall be allowed," &c.; that is, shall be after the passage of this act, whether by virtue of laws now existing or hereafter to be passed. This would apply to state laws in existence when the act passed, and might also include those subsequently passed. "And the same proceedings shall be had therein, as are adopted in the courts of such state." This points to then existing proceedings. The more grammatical construction of the language of the act does not enable us to pronounce with certainty, whether congress did or did not intend to adopt the future legislation of the states on this subject. The next congress had its attention called to the question of the construction of this act; and as already stated, by the act of January 14, 1841, they enacted that this act should be construed to abolish imprisonment for debt, where by the laws of the state "it has been, or shall hereafter be abolished." They are silent concerning the other part of the act, which provides for modifications of such imprisonment. We think this silence has a strong tendency to show, that it was not intended to adopt, prospectively, the state laws on this subject. Considering the doubts to which the language of the act in question was calculated to give rise,—considering, also, that such prospective adoption of state legislation, was a clear departure from the settled course of congress on this subject,—we can hardly doubt, that if it had been the intention of congress to apply this new principle of legislation, to the case of subsequent modifications of the state laws concerning imprisonment, having the subject directly before them, they would have so declared, with the same clearness, as they do in respect to future state laws for its abolition.

Nor should it be lost sight of, that it is, practically, a very different matter, to adopt prospectively, state legislation concerning the abolition, or concerning the modification of imprisonment for debt. It may be assumed, with some degree of safety, that if a state really and entirely abolishes imprisonment for debt, the process of the courts of the United States will be as effectual as the process of the courts of the states. Not so, if the right of the creditor is modified and restricted; for it may well be, and is so in this case, that those modifications and restrictions will be accompanied with sanctions and safeguards which the courts of the United States are incompetent to apply. This law of the state of Massachusetts, while it restricts the right of the creditor, and imposes on him new conditions, also provides, in the same connection, and as part of the same system, for highly penal proceedings against debtors, viewed merely as instruments for enforcing payment; these latter are of great practical importance, and if the conditions and limitations imposed on the creditor were adopted, while the penal proceedings against the debtor were rejected, it is clear that a system of law to compel the payment of debts differing very widely from that enacted by the state, would be brought into operation. These penal enactments are not only found in the same law, and make part of the same general system with the restrictions upon imprisonment, but the proceedings under them are part of the same course of proceeding taken to enforce the judgments of the courts. And if a judgment creditor in the courts of the United States were deprived of recourse to them, he would be placed upon a different and far less advantageous footing, than a judgment creditor in a state court. Yet it is certain that none of these parts of the law of Massachusetts can have been adopted by Congress. In Gwin v. Breedlove, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 29, it was held that the process act of 1828 had not adopted similar provisions of state laws, though in existence when that act was passed; because the courts of the United States cannot execute the criminal laws of the states. A fortiori, as to such laws, passed after an act of adoption. Whether the provisions of this law of Massachusetts, exclusive of those of a criminal nature, are necessarily addressed exclusively to state officers, and are not capable of being executed by the courts of the United States, we do not deem it necessary to decide. It is to be noted, that the law of Massachusetts does not make any change in the process of the state courts, but only in the proceedings of state officers in its execution. Nor is anything to be done by any court, as such, to vary the execution of process. There can, therefore, be no proceedings in any court of the United States in conformity with this law. Whether a judge of a court of the United States, or a commissioner appointed to take affidavits, &c., could be held to be in place of the state magistrates, and exercise the powers conferred by this law on the latter, are questions not unattended with difficulty, and which we do not find it needful to decide. Independent of this consideration, we are unable to declare that congress has adopted the law of the state of Massachusetts, now in question; and consequently, it is the duty of the marshal to levy this execution, without regard to that law.

We have considered this case as if it were an execution on a judgment at law. In point of fact it is upon a decree in admiralty. By the sixth section of the act of August 23, 1842 (5 Stat. 518), the supreme court are authorized to regulate and alter the forms of writs and other process used in the district and circuit courts. Under this authority they made and promulgated a rule for regulating proceedings in admiralty (December, 1850), which contains the following clause: "And imprisonment for debt, on process issuing out of the admiralty court, is abolished in all cases where, by the laws of the state in which the court is held, imprisonment for debt has been or shall be hereafter abolished, upon similar or analogous process issuing from a state court." This has no reference whatever to modifications and restrictions upon imprisonment. It is confined to its abolition. If this rule alone governs the case, it is decisive. If it does not, and upon that we give no opinion, it certainly has a strong tendency to show, that, in the opinion of the supreme court, no law was in existence adopting prospectively state laws, which should in any manner modify imprisonment for debt. If they had not so considered, it is very improbable that the rule would have stopped where it does. We have thought it proper, not to rest our opinion on this rule, but upon grounds applicable to all executions issuing out of this court, that suitors and officers may know what, in our judgment, the law requires of them, under all such executions.

ADMIRALTY—APPLICATION TO SET ASIDE SALE BY DEFAULT.

[An application will not lie to set aside a sale by default in admiralty, where it is not entitled in the same cause, and it does not appear that the promovents were parties or privies to that action.]

In admiralty.

Mr. Laforge, for the motion.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, opposed.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

The propeller was libelled for wages by one Johnson, and her owners not appearing, she was ordered to be sold by default, and was accordingly sold by the marshal at auction for $2,000. Some time elapsed before the sale was completed, but after the money had been paid, and the bill of sale given, the present application was made to set aside the sale because of the irregularity in carrying the decree of sale into execution, and gross inadequacy of price accepted on the sale, and fraudulent and covinous acts and purposes in procuring the condemnation and sale of the vessel.

HELD BY THE COURT: That the allegations upon which the application is founded are strongly contradicted, and the court would not consider it consistent with a safe administration of justice to set aside the sale, upon the evidence, if this proceeding were otherwise unexceptionable. But the proceeding is wholly irregular. The proceeding is neither by nor against any party interested in the subject of it, or between whom any effective decree could be made, whatever may be the merits of the case. The motion is not entitled or made in the cause in which the decree was rendered and the sale made, nor does it appear that the promovents in the matter were parties or privies to that action. They have, therefore, no legal capacity to invoke these proceedings to review a judgment, by summary motion in another case. Motion denied, with costs.

Case No. 5,084.

FREEMAN et al. v. BAKER.

[Blatchf. & H. 372.] [1]

SEAMAN'S WAGES — ACT JULY 20, 1790 — SUIT IN PERSONAM — DISCHARGE BEFORE DELIVERY OF CARGO — LEAVING VESSEL FOR REASONABLE CAUSE — FORCIBLE RETURN — SUFFICIENCY OF ANSWER.

1. The sixth section of the act of congress of July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 133, 134), prescribing the time and manner in which seamen may prosecute suits for wages, has reference to actions in rem only, and not to actions in personam.

2. The right of a seaman to sue in personam for his wages, is perfect as soon as the period of his service is completed.

3. If the seaman is discharged before the delivery of the cargo, his right to sue in personam for his wages is perfect from the time of his discharge.

4. A seaman who goes ashore, without the intention of deserting, to apply to an American consul for redress for alleged cruel treatment on board, leaves the vessel for reasonable cause, and does not incur a forfeiture of wages.

5. If a seaman who absents himself from his vessel is afterwards forcibly brought back, and returns to his duty, that is a condonation of his offence and a remission of the forfeiture of his wages; and a stipulation in the shipping articles that it shall not have such effect, will be held to be void.

6. An answer, averring, in general terms, that a vessel was supplied with a medicine-chest according to law, is not, of itself, sufficient evidence to discharge a master from his liability for a physician's bill for attendance upon a sick seaman.

7. An express promise by a sick seaman to pay the amount of such a bill, is without consideration and void.

[Cited in The Ben Flint, Case No. 1,299.]

This was a libel in personam for seamen's wages [by John Freeman and Nicholas Nelson], against [Hiram Baker] the master of a vessel. The vessel arrived at New-York, her port of final discharge, on the 18th of March, 1833. The libellants were discharged on the 19th, and commenced this suit on the 22d. The cargo was not unladen until the 26th. The answer set up a dilatory exception, that the suit was not authorized under the provisions of the 6th section of the act of congress of July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 133, 134)—1st. That it was premature, because, by that act it is provided that, "as soon as the voyage is ended, and the cargo or ballast be fully discharged at the last port of delivery, every seaman or mariner shall be entitled to the wages which shall be then due according to his contract; and, if such wages shall not be paid within ten days after such discharge, or if any dispute shall arise between the master and seamen or mariners, touching the said wages, it shall be lawful" to proceed in the manner directed by the act, provided that nothing therein contained "shall prevent any seaman or mariner from having or maintaining any action at common law for the recovery of his wages, or for immediate process out of any court having admiralty jurisdiction, wherever any ship or vessel may be found, in case she shall have left the port of delivery where her voyage ended before payment of the wages, or in case she shall be about to proceed to sea before the end of the ten days next after the delivery of her cargo or ballast;" 2dly. That the suit was irregular, because the act provides that, except where immediate process is allowed, "it shall be lawful for the judge of the district where the said ship or vessel shall be, or in case his residence shall be more than three miles from the place, or of his absence from the place of his residence, then for any judge or justice of the peace, to summon the master of such ship or vessel to appear before him, to show cause why process should not issue against such ship or vessel, her tackle, furniture and apparel, according to the course of admiralty courts, to answer for the said wages; and if the master shall neglect to appear, or, appearing, shall not show that the wages are paid or otherwise satisfied or forfeited, and if the matter in dispute shall not be forthwith settled, in such case the judge or justice shall certify to the clerk of the court of the district, that there is sufficient cause of complaint whereon to found admiralty process, and thereupon the clerk of such court shall issue process against the said ship or vessel, and the suit shall be proceeded on in the said court, and final judgment be given according to the course of admiralty courts in such cases used." It was contended that these provisions of the act had a general application to suits in personam as well as to suits in rem; that such a construction was necessary to effect the object congress had in view, which was, to prescribe the time at which wages should be deemed payable, and the mode of their recovery; and that, therefore, every species of action by which wages might be recovered, fell within the regulation.

The answer contained, also, a defence upon the merits, and claimed to set off against the amount of wages due the libellants, sundry items, the only disputed one being the amount of a physician's bill at St. Jago de Cuba. It appeared that the libellants took the yellow fever, on ship board, at that port, and, at their request were attended by a physician from on shore, upon an express promise by them to pay his bills. After their recovery, his bills were paid by the master, and they subsequently admitted to a shipmate their indebtedness therefor to the master. The answer averred generally, that the vessel was provided with a medicine-chest and every thing else required by law for the health and healing of the crew on the voyage. No evidence was offered under this allegation. It was contended that the master was exonerated from any further charge on account of the sick seamen, by the provisions of the 8th section of the act of congress of July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 134), and by those of the act of March 2, 1805 (2 Stat. 330), which enact that vessels of a certain description "shall be provided with a chest of medicines, put up by some apothecary of known reputation, and accompanied by directions for administering the same; and the said medicines shall be examined by the same or some other apothecary, once at least in every year, and supplied with fresh medicines in the place of such as shall have been used or spoiled; and in default of having such medicine-chest so provided, and kept fit for use, the master or commander of such ship or vessel shall provide and pay for all such advice, medicine or attendance of physicians, as any of the crew shall stand in need of, in case of sickness, at every port or place where the ship or vessel may touch or trade at during the voyage, without any deduction from the wages of such sick seaman or mariner." The answer alleged, also, a tender to the libellants, before suit brought, of the amount due to them, deducting the physician's bill and some undisputed items, and claimed to be discharged from costs accordingly.

The answer further alleged, as to Freeman, one of the libellants, that he had forfeited his wages by desertion. An entry in the log-book was produced, made by the mate on the day on which Freeman absented himself, asserting that he left without leave, and absented himself for more than forty-eight hours at one time. The shipping articles, also, were put in evidence, containing a stipulation, "that if any of the said crew disobey the orders of the said master or other officer of the said vessel, or absent himself at any time without liberty, his wages due at the time of such disobedience or absence shall be forfeited; and in case such person or persons so forfeiting wages shall be reinstated or permitted to do further duty, it shall not do away such forfeiture." The evidence upon the other side contradicted in some respects the entry in the log, and showed that Freeman left the vessel at Messina, to lay before the American consul a complaint for his cruel treatment by the mate; that his lodgings on shore were but a short distance from the vessel, within sight of the master and crew, who knew the reason why he had left the vessel; that the master caused Freeman to be forcibly carried on board by the police; and that he afterwards went peaceably to work, and did full duty during the residue of the voyage.

Edwin Burr and Erastus C. Benedict, for libellants.

David D. Field, for respondent.

BETTS, District Judge. It is urged, on the part of the respondent, that the provisions of the 6th section of the act of congress of July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 133), apply equally to suits in personam and to suits in rem; and it is argued that such a construction must be given to that section, in order to effectuate the general intent of congress. The statute has, in its terms, reference only to proceedings in rem; and, if its language be susceptible of a broader import, so as to be made applicable to all other forms of suit, there ought to be very manifest and urgent reasons for giving it such effect, to induce the court to depart from its letter and plain purpose. The act varies the maritime law under which seamen acquire a right to prosecute in admiralty, and, instead of enlarging and rendering more efficacious the remedies they before had by that law, modifies and restricts their remedies in a very important particular. Before the statute, a sailor could immediately attach the vessel for his wages, when the voyage was ended, or whenever he was entitled to an advance. The act, with a view to protect the interests of ship-owners and merchants, now requires that the seamen shall wait ten days after the voyage is ended and the ship is unladen, and that then he shall summon the master to show cause, before he is entitled to arrest the vessel by admiralty process. As the regulations of the statute are in restraint of the privileges of seamen, and do not create a right to sue in this court, (that right having been coeval with the institution of the court itself,) but abridge the right, in this particular, in favor of the merchant, the operation of the act should, by well-settled principles of interpretation, be limited by the courts to the identical case specified in it. The act has, accordingly, been accepted in this court as having regard to proceedings in rem alone; and that application of it is corroborated by the explicit reservation, in the statute, of the right of the seaman to an action at common law, where the right of action accrues as soon as the wages are due. When the remedy is pursued against the master or owner individually, no reason is disclosed by the act, indicating that congress intended to place seamen on a footing different from other suitors, or to provide their debtors with any further privileges in admiralty than are possessed by other parties defendants at common law. There would, however, be reasons of weight for preventing mariners from arresting a vessel so abruptly. They might thereby, often interrupt and put at hazard vital operations in navigation and commerce, or at least impose heavy expenditures and losses upon shipowners, which they would never be able to reimburse. It would, therefore, be a provident safeguard, to place under careful restrictions this method of procedure against a ship; and the act wisely provides, that before this advantage can be had, the sailors shall give the master or owner an opportunity to satisfy their wages, and that then they shall not be permitted to seize the vessel without showing, before a proper magistrate, probable cause for the proceeding. There seems to be no reason why the act should be carried further by construction than to ensure the fulfilment of that main object. It will, accordingly, not be held to apply to actions in personam prosecuted in admiralty. The arrest of the master or owner, and holding him to bail, when the voyage is ended, would interpose no impediment to the preparation of the ship for further employment, or to her pursuing the one then on hand, and would be a reasonable privilege to seamen against transient or non-resident masters or owners. The libellants, therefore, commenced their suit correctly in this case, without waiting ten days after the completion of the voyage, and without summoning the master to show cause, provided, however, the voyage was ended when the suit was instituted; because, a sailor acquires no right of action for his entire wages until the period of his service is completed.

The statute specifies some particulars which evince the termination of the voyage—as, that the vessel is at her last port of destination, and her cargo or ballast is fully discharged. But I think it is a mistake to suppose that congress contemplated making the full discharge of the cargo or ballast an absolute and inflexible requirement or pre-requisite to the completion of a voyage. The terms of the act are, that the wages shall be due as soon as the voyage is ended, and the cargo or ballast be fully discharged at the last port of delivery. It is obvious that a voyage may be ended, to all legal intents, without the arrival of the vessel at her last port of delivery. The misadventure or sale of the vessel, the abandonment of the voyage by the owner, the transshipment of the cargo at sea, the discharge of the seamen at an intermediate port, with or without their consent, as also acts of hostility or restraint by foreign powers, may terminate the voyage elsewhere than at the last port of delivery; and it cannot be supposed that congress meant to designate the arrival of the vessel at her last port of delivery as the only event which could end the voyage and entitle the seamen to their wages. So, with regard to the other provision of the act, respecting the full discharge of the cargo or ballast, it is not to be intended that congress has left it to the option of the owner when he will unlade his vessel, or whether, indeed, he will ever fully discharge the cargo or ballast. No time is limited by the act, within which he is required to do either. Instances undoubtedly occur, in long and unfortunate voyages, where the arrears of wages exceed the value of the vessel and her cargo, and it would be to the interest of the owner to suffer both to perish in port, if he could thereby excuse himself from the payment of wages. It follows, then, that neither the ending of the voyage at the port of discharge, nor the delivery of the cargo, should be regarded as conditions precedent to the right to sue for wages; and the courts ought not to interpret the act as expressing, with invariable certainty, the circumstance necessary to compose a mariner's right to sue for his wages. The statute should rather be understood as fixing a period beyond which wages cannot be withheld from a sailor, whatever stipulations to the contrary may be inserted in his contract. This motive alone would sufficiently call for the enactment of the law.

In the present case, the clause of the statute adverted to has been incorporated in the shipping articles. The seamen engage that they shall not be entitled to, and will not demand their wages until the arrival of the vessel at the last port of discharge, and her cargo delivered. But this covenant can have no further or other effect than the statute, the words of which it adopts. The contract must be expounded as if it rested upon the statute alone. The law benignly shields mariners from the effect of agreements into which they may be drawn, beyond what strictly appertains to a shipping contract; and the obligation of the statutory provision, as against them, cannot be enlarged by any stipulations into which they may be drawn, unless the purport of those stipulations is fully and fairly explained to them, and an additional compensation is allowed, entirely adequate to the new obligations imposed.

The Minerva, 1 Hagg. Adm. 347; The George Home, Id. 370; The Prince Frederick, 2 Hagg. Adm. 394. The right of action of the libellants was perfect when this suit was commenced, although the cargo was not fully unladen. The obligation to postpone their demand of wages until the delivery of the cargo, was correlative to their obligation to remain with the vessel until that time, the wages being the consideration for the bargain for the services. Having been separated from the vessel by the act of the master, and with their own consent, both their service and the time for which their wages are to be estimated, ceased. Their release or acquittance from the performance of their contract, imparts the same rights to them that they would have possessed had it then ended according to its terms, and by full performance on their part. The preliminary objections are, accordingly, overruled.

The defence of a forfeiture of wages applying to Freeman, one of the libellants, will be next considered. Admitting that the entry produced from the log-book is regular, it appears to me, that a forfeiture cannot be maintained in this case, because Freeman left the vessel, for a reasonable cause, not clandestinely or with the intention of deserting, and because there was a subsequent condonation of the offence and remission of the forfeiture, had any been incurred, by the act of the master in taking him back to service. Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1829) 464, 468, 472, note. The stipulation in the shipping articles, which has been set up as working a forfeiture of wages, would, on the interpretation now claimed, extend as well to every act of disobedience, however harmless and trivial, and to every truant absence beyond the moment of leave granted, as to acts of insubordination and of flagrant desertion of the vessel; and it requires no comment to show, that if such a stipulation were enforced to the letter, no seaman would have a legal remedy for wages left him, but must depend upon the generosity of the owner and master, whether his services should be compensated or not. Had it not been notorious that the principles upon which courts of admiralty administer the law in respect to the engagements of seamen, would prevent any construction of the shipping articles, so destructive of their rights, the legislature would, without doubt, have interfered for their protection against their own contracts, as they have shielded them already in matters of less vital consequence to their interests, and would have left them under the security of judicial authority. Abb. Shipp. 464, 468, 472, and cases cited in notes. The courts, by interpreting and executing the stipulations of seamen, in consonance with the subject matter to which they relate and with the character of the parties entering into them, have effectuated an adequate guardianship over seamen, without depriving the owner and master of any just rights. Such stipulations are considered as nothing more than penalties held over the seaman in terrorem, and under which nothing more will be awarded to the owner or master, than an indemnity for injuries sustained by the misbehavior of the seaman, and nothing more imposed on the seaman than a punishment, by way of fine, for his misconduct. In that way, the courts are able to regulate the amounts chargeable against seamen by force of such covenants, conformably to the demerits of each individual case. The Mentor [Case No. 9,427]. The ground of defence taken upon this point is, accordingly, overruled.

The remaining inquiry is, as to an allowance against the libellants of the physician's bills at St. Jago de Cuba, which were paid by the master. By the maritime law, all charges for medicines, nurses, physicians, &c., furnished to or provided for a seaman, during the progress of a voyage, when his disability is not the immediate consequence of his misconduct, are imposed on the vessel. Jus Marit. Hans. (Ed. 1667, Hamb.) tit. 14, arts. 1, 2, pp. 72, 73; Laws of Oleron, arts. 6, 7; Laws of Wisbuy, art. 18; Harden v. Gordon [Case No. 6,047]. This principle of the maritime law has been eulogized by distinguished writers for its practical wisdom and its enlightened humanity; and eminent judges in this country have questioned the policy of the change made by statute on this subject, and have favored the limitation of the act of congress to the strictest reading of its letter. Walton v. The Neptune [Id. 17,135]; Swift v. The Happy Return [Id. 13,697]; 3 Kent, Comm. 184, 185; Abb. Shipp. 145, 146. The course of this court has not been to compare the act of congress with the law which it supersedes, in view of their relative adaptation to the interests of navigation or of seamen; but, receiving the statute as the only existing law on the subject, it has endeavored to carry the statute into effect according to its fair import and policy. In remitting the master to the responsibilities imposed by the maritime law, on his failure to obey the directions of the act, congress admit, by strong implication, that that law has full force, except in so far as the statute interferes with and modifies it. When, therefore, a master attempts to shield himself from the obligations of the maritime law with respect to sick seamen, it is incumbent on him to show, by very clear and satisfactory proofs, that he has complied with every requirement of the statute in that respect. The statute substitutes a new provision for sick seamen, under particular circumstances and conditions; and, before a master can claim its application, he must give satisfactory evidence that he has fulfilled those circumstances and conditions. Harden v. Gordon [supra]. If the answer could be received as evidence for the respondent in this respect, it is expressed in terms so loose and equivocal as to leave room to doubt whether the requisitions of the statute have been complied with by the master. It gives the opinion of the master that he had done what was enjoined by the law, but does not set forth the facts so that the court may determine how far they correspond with and satisfy those requirements. An answer of this description is of no other avail than to admit the respondent to support its allegations by testimony aliunde. None such is offered; and, as the case is presented to the court, there is not only a want of proof that the vessel was furnished with a medicine-chest and directions in the mode pointed out by the statute, but there is an absence of all legal evidence that any medicine-chest was on board.

Nor can the engagements of the libellants to pay the physician's charges avail the respondent. The agreement was without consideration, and was made under the exigencies of a dangerous and alarming malady. Agreements of sailors with a master, on board of a vessel, in derogation of their rights and interests, are seldom regarded in courts of admiralty, especially when those engagements have relation to other matters than the terms and limits of their shipment. A higher objection still remains to promises of this character. The master would, by them, discharge himself of an obligation imposed upon him by positive law, and which the interests of humanity and commercial policy require should be fulfilled on his part with fidelity. This part of the claim of the master against the libellants is, accordingly, rejected. The residue of the accounts, which is undisputed, is allowed.

The offer made by the respondent, before suit brought, to pay the wages, deducting the physician's bills, cannot avail to excuse him from costs. Decree for libellants, with costs.

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 8, 1837.

SEAMAN—SHIPPING FOR PART OF VOYAGE—SUIT FOR WAGES.

Where a seaman, shipped for a part of a voyage, is discharged, at the termination of his engagement, without payment of wages; if he makes every exertion to follow up the vessel, and, immediately he meets her, commences suit against her, his lien for wages is not destroyed though the vessel has made one or more voyages since his discharge.

This was a libel for wages. The libellant [Edmund Freeman] shipped on board the schooner Jane [William J. De Wolf, master], at New York, in December, 1836, for a voyage to Washington, North Carolina. On the 11th February, 1837, he was discharged at Washington, without payment of wages, and the schooner immediately sailed from that port. It was proved that the libellant followed the schooner to New York, and from there to Philadelphia, where he found her and immediately commenced suit. It was also proved that the schooner had made at least two voyages between New York and Philadelphia before she was attached in this suit, and since the libellant had been discharged. The respondent's counsel abandoned all other grounds of defence which had been taken, and relied on the fact that the vessel had made several voyages since the cause of libel accrued.

Mr. Shoemaker, for respondent.

HOPKINSON, District Judge, decreed for the libellant, for the whole amount of wages demanded.

FREEMAN v. PEROT et al.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Jan., 1811.

BILLS AND NOTES—ACCEPTANCE AND PROTEST—PAYMENT—DISCHARGE.

The defendants accepted a bill of exchange, for the honour of the first endorser, the bill being under protest, agreed to pay any person authorized to receive the money, and to give a discharge; this acceptance did not bind the defendants to pay, without the holder putting his name on the bill, or giving, as required, an indemnity to the defendants.

This was an action upon a bill of exchange, drawn by G. on the defendants, at sixty days, in favour of Joseph and Samuel Darrell, which came by endorsement to the plaintiff [Joshua Freeman]. The bill was presented in due time for acceptance, and was noted; and when at maturity, the defendants accepted it for a part of the sum, and accordingly it was protested. The defendants then accepted for the balance, for the honour of the Darrells, the endorsers, and to pay to any person authorized to receive the money, and to give a discharge. It was proved that the plaintiff, before the presentation of the bill, left Philadelphia, but gave to Mr. Worth an order on the defendants to pay him the amount of the bill, whose receipt, the order stated, would be a full discharge. The defendants, upon the production of this order, refused to pay, without an endorsement of the plaintiff's name on the bill; but agreed to dispense with that, upon receiving a bond of indemnity, which Worth refused to give.

Mr. Rawle, for defendants, objected, that without such indorsement, the defendants were not bound to pay; that the protest was not regular, as it stated that it was made at the request of Mr. Worth, who does not appear, on the face of the bill, to be authorized to make it; and of course, the drawer and endorser might, on that ground, resist the claim of the defendants, if they had paid. He objected, also, that there was no protest for non-acceptance. Cases cited: 3 Term R. 761; Beaw. Lex Merc. 459, 456; Chit. 116; 1 Esp. 112; [Gorgerat v. M'Carty] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 144.

Mr. Dallas, for plaintiff, cited Chit. 24, 25, 26; Kyd, 99; Marcus, 71.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). Before the defendants could be compelled to pay this bill, the plaintiff's agent should have shown himself authorized to place him in a situation to maintain all the rights to which he was entitled. This bill was accepted only in part, and was protested for the residue. The acceptance, supra protest, was for the honour of the payee; and although proof of payment might possibly be sufficient in an action against the person for whose honour the bill was partly accepted, upon a count for money paid to his use, yet, as the defendants, would have a right to sue all the endorsers above them, for whose honour it was accepted, as well as the drawer, such proof would not be sufficient, in an action against the drawer or such endorsers, if there had been any. As to them, at least, he must sue as endorsee. But in this case, the plaintiff was the last endorsee, and he has neither endorsed it in blank, nor to his agent. It was contended by the plaintiff, that the endorser who pays to a subsequent endorsee, may sue the drawer, or his endorser, upon proving payment. This may be so; but in that case, the endorser may strike out all the subsequent endorsements, and appear as the last endorser on the bill. In this case, the defendants could not have so appeared, without an endorsement by Freeman; and his name is not on the bill. It was further insisted, that Worth had an implied power, from the order, to make the endorsement. This may be questioned, but need not be decided; because, if he had, he ought to have offered to make it, when it was demanded by the defendants, and the want of it made the ground of their refusal to pay. The verdict, therefore, must be for the defendants.

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION—PRACTICE IN EQUITY.

1. Homestead exemption must exist and be claimed at the time the writ comes to the officer's hands. A defendant, moving onto property thereafter cannot hold it exempt as a homestead.

2. A creditor's bill having been filed, and a receiver appointed the court will direct the assignment of such property to the receiver.

MILLER, District Judge. The judgment in this case was rendered against Norman Stewart on the 6th of July, 1854.

By the answer to the supplemental bill, it appears that lot 3 in block 4 in the town plat of Dell Creek was formerly owned by Francis M. Stewart, and it was given by him in the spring of 1854 to the said Norman Stewart, on condition that he would build a house thereon and improve the same. The title to the lot is now in Norman Stewart and was in him at the time of filing the supplemental bill.

The execution issued upon the judgment against Norman Stewart on the 18th of July, 1855, twelve days after the rendition of the judgment. If the marshal had levied upon this lot and the building then in process of erection, there is no question but the levy and sale would be good; for by the law (Rev. St. 1849, p. 542, § 65), lands, tenements and real estate holden by any one in trust or for the use of another, shall be liable to debts, judgments, decrees, executions and attachments, against the person to whose use they are holden. Defendants then had an equitable interest in the lot and building subject to sale, and also the subject of a bill in equity for the perfection of the title before a sale by the marshal. It could not have been then claimed under the exemption law, for the defendant was not in the actual occupancy of it as a homestead. He was not then a householder in the occupancy of the premises within the meaning of the exemption law. By the law the lien of this judgment attached to the defendants' interest in this lot, and it was also subject to levy and sale upon the execution, as I before stated, and it might have been levied under that execution, before the defendant had moved upon it. The question arises now, in regard to the remedy of the plaintiff and also the rights of the defendants under the exemption law. The defendant moved into the house in September, 1855, after the return of the execution nulla bona. The original bill was filed November 23, 1854. Subpoena was served November 29th. December 5th, injunction was allowed, and served on the 19th. A receiver was appointed January 6, 1855. The supplemental bill was filed May 7, 1855.

In his answer the defendant says: "In my absence in the pinery, he (Francis) had deeded the lot to my wife. On my return, shortly after, I got a deed of it. I first saw it in the spring. I returned from the pinery in April last, the middle or latter part. My wife has since executed a deed to King and he to me, the last of April or first of May."

The use and object of the judgment creditor's bill is to discover assets and to render the equitable property or interests and the choses in action of the defendant subject to his debts. In other words, it is to compel a defendant to do that which he in honesty to his creditors should do fully and freely to the officer serving the execution. If the defendant had turned out his interest in this house and lot to the marshal, subject to his right of exemption, the question as to the right would have been raised upon a motion to set aside the levy; and it would have been raised just as effectually and as favorably to the interests of the parties as it is now by the defendant's refusal to assign it. The question then arises out of the occupancy by the defendant and his family, before the filing of this bill.

I have remarked that the judgment was a lien on the defendant's interest, which was subject to levy under the execution by the marshal. The defendant cannot conceal from the officer property which he was not occupying and then, in answer to the bill, say that "since the officer served me with the execution I have moved on the property, and I now claim it for my homestead exemption." To allow this, would be sanctioning a fraud upon the plaintiff. The homestead, by the law, must be claimed when the levy is made. When the levy might have been made, the defendant had not placed himself in a position to claim the exemption. The claim of exemption must have relation to the time when the execution was in the marshal's hands. No return of the property is made by the defendant to the marshal, or even in his answer to the original bill, and when a bill is filed expressly to have this lot and house appropriated by a decree of this court to the plaintiff's debt, it is too late for the defendant to interpose a claim of exemption.

Whether a defendant can dispose of his estate and property, reducing it to the exemption limit, and then successfully claim an exemption, I shall not now determine. The case of Brackett v. Watkins, 21 Wend. 68, is opposed to such a proceeding. The court will instruct the master that this house and lot is to be assigned to the receiver.

NOTE. See, further, as upholding the text, Upman v. Second Ward Bank, 15 Wis. 449. If the judgment debtor sells the land, held as a homestead, or ceases to use it, the lien attaches and it may be sold to satisfy the judgment. Hoyt v. Howe, 3 Wis. 752. FREEMAN'S NAT. BANK v. SMITH.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 21, 1875.

CORPORATIONS — VOLUNTARY DISSOLUTION — NEW YORK STATUTES—INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY —MEETINGS—DEATH OF STOCKHOLDER.

1. Under the statute of New York (2 Rev. St. pp. 467, 468, §§ 58–66), providing for the voluntary dissolution of corporations, it is necessary, on the presentation of the petition for dissolution, that an order should be entered calling on all persons interested, to show cause against the prayer of the petition at a time not less than three months from the date of the order. If this be not done, the proceedings are invalid.

2. Under section 5122 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it is necessary that a petition by a corporation in voluntary bankruptcy should be authorized by a vote of a majority of the corporators at a legal meeting called for the purpose.

3. Where the owner of stock in a corporation dies before such meeting is held, leaving no will, and no administration on the estate is granted before the corporation is adjudged bankrupt, there is, as to such stock, no corporator.

4. Such meeting is not one of the meetings of stockholders, provided for in section 21 of the statute of New York, in regard to the formation of corporations (Act Feb. 17, 1848; Laws 1848, c. 40, § 21, p. 59), and it is not necessary it should be called in the manner prescribed by said section.

[This was a bill for an injunction by the Freeman's National Bank of Boston, against C. Edgar Smith, assignee in bankruptcy of the Pensacola Lumber Company. An application was made in the district court to have the order adjudicating the Pensacola Lumber Company a bankrupt vacated, on the ground that the corporation was dissolved at the time that it presented its petition in bankruptcy. This application was denied. Case No. 10,959.]

Thomas M. North, for plaintiff.

William R. Darling, for defendant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. Upon the question of the jurisdiction of the supreme court of New York, to make the order dissolving the Pensacola Lumber Company, I agree with the learned district judge, and for the reasons which he has assigned. It is only after the notice required by the statute, that the proper judicial authority of the court to pronounce a judgment of dissolution arises. In the presentation of the petition, the statute does not merely permit, but absolutely requires, an order to be entered calling upon all persons interested, to show cause against the prayer of the petition at some time and place not less than three months from the date of the order. So far, the only power, even of a discretionary character, to be exercised by the court, is the fixing of the time and place and person for the making of the proper inquiries. Upon the coming in of that report, the judicial power of the court is to be exercised. If it shall appear to the court that the corporation is insolvent, or that, for any reason, a dissolution thereof will be beneficial to the stockholders and not injurious to the public interests, a decree of dissolution is to be made. 2 Rev. St. N. Y. pp. 467, 468, §§ 58–66. The inquiry concerns not only the parties who are interested in the corporation, but also the public at large. For this reason, especially, is it necessary that a complete compliance should be exacted, with all the preliminary conditions upon which the power of the court to pronounce a dissolution is by the statute made to depend. The provisions in respect to notice stand in the place of the ordinary process or other proceeding for the commencement of a suit, and, until they are complied with, the authority of the court to act judicially on the subject-matter of the petition does not arise. In this case, it appears affirmatively, that, almost immediately upon the presentation of the petition, an order of dissolution was pronounced, instead of an order to show cause, as required by the statute. For this order there was no authority by law, and it was, in my judgment, invalid for all purposes.

Assuming this conclusion to be well founded, the next question is as to the validity of the adjudication in bankruptcy. The adjudication is assailed upon the alleged ground that the petition was presented without proper authority. The statute (Rev. St. § 5122) requires a petition of an officer of a corporation, duly authorized by a vote of a majority of the corporators at any legal meeting called for the purpose. In this case, the corporation was such as the act includes, and the petition was made by an officer of the corporation, and was made in pursuance of a resolution adopted at a meeting of which all the living corporators had notice, and which was called for the purpose expressed in the notices, of acting on the subject of the bankruptcy, and which was attended, in person or by proxy, by all the living corporators, save the owner of one share, out of the 760 shares into which the capital stock was divided. The resolution, moreover, received the assent of all the corporators present and represented at the meeting. The owner of 190 shares of the stock, one J. D. Gardiner, had died on the 14th of February, twelve days before the meeting. He left no will, and administration had not been granted on his estate when the adjudication in bankruptcy took place. So far, therefore, as that part of the stock was concerned, there was no corporator, for, no one but the legally constituted representative of the deceased could make title to the shares, and no such representative then existed. It must, therefore, either be declared to be the law, that the death of a stockholder in a corporation suspends its power to take the necessary steps to go into bankruptcy, or that the language of the statute is satisfied when the word "corporator," as therein used, is taken in its primary and obvious sense, and as meaning the persons who are legally entitled to that character. It is, of course, plain, that neither Mrs. Gardiner, the widow, nor Mr. Gardiner, the son, of the deceased corporator, his next of kin, became corporators or stockholders upon his death; and, therefore, no action or assent on their part is of any weight in determining the question presented to the court, although neither of them, nor the absent stockholder, Knight, has raised any objection to the proceeding. It seems to me, that the sensible and just construction of the statute is the primary and obvious one, that only existing corporators are within the contemplation of the statute. Otherwise, this very important power of a corporation is made dependent upon the accident of the life or death of the owner of a single share of stock.

It is claimed, that the twenty-first section of the New York act authorizing the formation of manufacturing corporations (Act Feb. 17, 1848; Laws 1848, c. 40, § 21, p. 59), prescribes the mode of calling stockholders' meetings, and that its provisions were not complied with in respect to the meeting in question. But, the answer to this is, that the stockholders' meetings referred to in the section cited, are those held for one of the purposes specified in the section, which has no relation to stockholders' meetings in general. The named purposes are, to increase or diminish the amount of capital stock, to extend or change its business, or to avail itself of the privileges or provisions of the act. Neither of these purposes includes or is equivalent to the object or purpose of the meeting in question, and, of course, the provisions of the section have no application in the present case.

The grounds above stated cover substantially the argument on which the motion for an injunction was urged. I should have gone over them more at length, but that the interests of the parties on both sides require, and they have requested, a speedy decision. I have, therefore, considered the matter upon its merits, and have not inquired whether the bill is to be deemed to be founded upon the supervisory power of this court over proceedings in bankruptcy, under section 4986 of the Revised Statutes, or whether it is sustainable on the ordinary grounds of equitable jurisdiction, upon the facts alleged in this case. The injunction asked for must be denied, and the temporary injunction must be dissolved.

Case No. 5,090.

The FREE STATE.

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. April, 1873.[2]

COLLISION — STEAMER AND SAILING VESSEL—CONSTRUCTION OF ARTICLES 13 AND 16 — RISK OF COLLISION—OBLIGATION TO SLACKEN SPEED.

1. A propeller descending the Detroit river at her usual speed, made the green light of a scow very nearly dead ahead, and about the same time the red light of a steamer a little upon her port bow; the steamers exchanged single whistles and passed each other to the right; while passing the ascending steamer the propeller starboarded to avoid the scow; when very near the propeller, and about one and a half points on her starboard bow, the scow ported, and threw herself across the propeller's course, and thereby came into collision with her and was sunk. Held, the scow was in fault for changing her course, and that the propeller was not in fault for failing to slacken speed before the scow exhibited a red light. A propeller meeting a sailing vessel in a clear night with plenty of sea room, is under no obligation to slacken speed so long as the sailing vessel is apparently keeping her course, and no danger is apparent.

[See note at end of case.]

2. The words "risk of collision" are not used in the same sense in articles 13 and 16 of the collision act; in the latter they apply only to cases of manifest danger of collision, and the obligation to slacken speed under article 16 was not intended to be contemporaneous with the duty of porting under article 13.

3. The cases upon the subject of speed reviewed and criticised.

Libel for collision, by August F. Ludwig and others, against the propeller Free State, the Western Transportation Company, claimant. The collision occurred between three and four o'clock in the morning, on the 17th day of August, 1870, in the Detroit river, just above Amherstburg, in Canada, and between the main land and the head of Bois Blanc Island. The scow was bound up with a load of building stone. The propeller was bound down, also loaded. The weather was fair, and it was a good night to see lights. The scow had the wind free, and a little over her port quarter. The propeller struck the scow on the port side, a little forward of the main rigging, crushing her in and causing her to sink almost immediately. The specific faults with which the propeller was charged were five in number, and were as follows: 1. Want of proper lights. 2. No lookout. 3. Did not keep her course and pass on port side. 4. Did not slacken her speed. 5. Not fully equipped. The answer denied the faults charged, and that the collision was caused in any manner by fault or negligence on the part of the propeller, and claimed that the same was caused solely by fault and negligence on the part of the scow, and specified the following: 1. That the scow had no lookout. 2. She did not keep her course. 3. Officers and crew not at their proper posts, &c.

The following opinion was delivered by the district court (LONGYEAR, District Judge):

"There is no pretense that the first, second, and fifth charges of fault against the propeller, and the first and third against the scow, are sustained by the evidence. The case, therefore, stands for decision on the remaining charges only: The law governing the case is found in articles 15, 16, and 18 of the act of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 60, 61), as follows:

"'Article 15. If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such a direction as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship.

"'Article 16. Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse; and every steamship shall, when in a fog, go at a moderate speed.'

"'Article 18. Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course,' etc.

"The mere fact of collision between a steam vessel and a sailing vessel is, as a general rule, prima facie evidence of fault and negligence on the part of the steam vessel, it being made her duty, by article 15, to keep out of the sailing vessel's way; provided always, however, that the sailing vessel is herself without fault. In such cases, therefore, unless it shall appear that the collision was in fact the result, in whole or in part, of fault on the part of the sailing vessel, the steam vessel must bear the loss. Hence it becomes important, in this case, in the first instance, to inquire into the charge of fault made against the scow. By article 18, it was the duty of the scow to keep her course, and the charge of fault made against her is that she did not do so. By the evidence adduced on behalf of the scow the following facts are established: After entering Detroit river, the scow kept up along nearer to the Canadian (her starboard) bank. Just after passing Amherstburg the steamer Jay Cooke passed the scow on her starboard side, or betwen her and the Canadian bank. As the Jay Cooke was passing her, the scow came up (starboarded) one point, or thereabouts, in order, as the witness said, to give the Jay Cooke more room. After the Jay Cooke had passed, the scow ported, in order to get into the wake of the steamer. It was while she was sailing under this port order that the propeller came down upon her. When the collision became inevitable, the scow's helm was put hard aport, and the collision occurred. Here, then, by her own showing, were at least two changes in the scow's course. Did these changes, or either of them, occur after it had become the duty of the scow to keep her course? And, if so, did such changes cause, or contribute to, the collision? I think the proofs show that the propeller had been made from the scow before the Jay Cooke passed; at all events, she was made aware of the approach of the propeller when she and the Jay Cooke exchanged signal whistles, which occurred just as the Jay Cooke was passing the scow, and, of course, before the latter had ported to get into the Jay Cooke's wake. The proofs further show that when the two steamers blew their signal whistles, the propeller and scow were not to exceed a half a mile apart, and were probably considerably nearer than that; and that when the scow ported, the distance between them was only some 300 to 400 feet. From these facts, it is clear that the proximity of the two vessels was such that the duty of the scow to keep her course had attached before she had made either of the changes mentioned.

"Now let us see what effect these changes had in bringing about the collision. The proofs on the part of the propeller show that the scow was first made from the propeller at or about the time the Jay Cooke was passing the scow, and that then the scow showed to the propeller her green or starboard light. This must have been after the scow had starboarded to give the Jay Cooke more room; because, owing to a bend in the river between the two vessels, and their position in the river, the starboarding of the scow would have the effect to shut in her red and open her green light to the propeller. It also appears by the proof that the propeller's course was laid to avoid the scow, while the latter was under the starboard helm, and still showing her green light; and I think the conclusion irresistible that, but for the scow's porting as she did, the propeller would have gone entirely clear of her, and there would have been no collision. The propeller, of course, had the right to pass the scow on either side she chose, and, in laying her course, she had the right to presume the scow would keep her course.

"From the above premises two things are apparent: 1. That, if the scow had kept the course she was on when the Jay Cooke overtook her, and had not starboarded as she did (and there is nothing to show that such starboarding was at all necessary to avoid collision with the Jay Cooke), the propeller would not have been misled as to the scow's ultimate intentions, and would have had no excuse for attempting to pass her on her starboard side. 2. If, after the scow had starboarded, she had then kept her course, there would have been no collision, and hence that the immediate cause of the collision was the scow's porting as she did. In arriving at the above conclusions I have found it unnecessary to resort to that portion of the testimony on the part of the propeller in relation to the situation of the two vessels in the river, and relatively to each other, which was so ably and severely criticised by the learned advocate for the libellant. As to the movements of the scow I have drawn my conclusions solely from the libellant's own testimony, and have resorted to the testimony on the part of the propeller only for the purpose of ascertaining when the scow was first made from the propeller, what light of the scow was then seen, and what action on the part of the propeller was predicated thereon.

"Having found that the scow must be held responsible for the immediate cause of the collision, it remains to inquire into the conduct of the propeller, and see if she was guilty of any fault which contributed to the result. The speed of the propeller, as we have seen, was nine miles an hour. Confessedly she did not slacken that speed until the collision was inevitable, and then it did no good. Risk of collision was clearly involved from the time the propeller first made the scow, and therefore her failure to slacken speed was clearly a violation of article 16. As to when the duty to slacken speed begins in such case, see opinion in The Milwaukee [Case No. 9,626], recently decided in this court. Where a vessel thus violates a positive rule of law, and a collision ensues, it will be presumed that such violation of law contributed to the collision, unless the contrary be made clearly to appear. These rules were enacted to prevent the loss of life and destruction of property by collisions upon the water, and the only way to make them effectual is to insist on their rigid enforcement. There being nothing in the case to rebut the presumption above spoken of, the propeller must be held responsible for not slacking her speed as required by article 16. Considering that it was in the night, or, at best in the dim twilight of the morning, and in a narrow channel, through which lay the pathway of the entire commerce of the lakes, and consequently thronged with vessels passing and repassing most of the time, both night and day, as it actually was to a considerable extent at the time in question, the speed of the propeller was clearly too great for prudent and safe navigation, so much so as to constitute a fault on general principles, and for which she would be held liable independently of article 16. "Decree dividing damages."

From this decree an appeal was taken by the claimant to the circuit court.

H. B. Brown, for claimant and appellant.

The scow was clearly in fault for not keeping her course. Articles 15 and 18. If a sailing vessel keeps her course and a collision ensues, the steamer is, prima facie, in fault; but if she does not keep her course, she is in fault, unless she can bring herself within article 19. If the scow does not keep her course, she has no right to question the propriety of our order to starboard—the steamer has the right to adopt such measures as she may choose to get out of the way. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 101; The Ariadne [supra].

There are but five exigencies in which the obligation to slacken speed arises, neither of which existed in this case: (1) When running in a fog, or in hazy or smoky weather. McCready v. Goldsmith, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 89; The Northern Indiana [supra]; The Colorado [Case No. 3,028]. (2) When meeting vessels in a narrow channel or river. Ward v. (4) When approaching a vessel whose position or movements are uncertain. The Louisiana v. Fisher, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 1; The James Watt, 2 W. Rob. Adam. 271; The Birkenhead, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 75; Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 48. (5) When the approaching vessel does something that indicates a departure from the rules of navigation, or a misunderstanding of the signals. All the cases holding vessels in fault for too great speed fall within one of the above classes. Not one can be found which holds a steamer in fault for maintaining her usual speed when no danger is apparent.

Geo. B. Hibbard, on the same side.

The district court erred in finding the propeller in fault for too great speed.

(1) There was no "risk of collision" until the scow committed her fault, and therefore no obligation to slacken speed. Certainly the propeller was not bound to anticipate an infraction of the statute by the scow.

(2) The burden is upon the scow to show that the collision was not owing to her fault in changing her course, and if she cannot establish this, she cannot recover for any injuries she may sustain. Clapp v. Young [supra]; The Bay State [Case No. 1,149]; Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 441, 465.

(3) There was no obligation to slacken speed until danger of collision was apparent. "Risk of collision" is determined when one vessel changes her course sufficiently to pass clear of the other. The Jesmond & The Earl of Elgin, L. R. 4 P. C. 1; The Wenona [Case No. 17,411].

(4) The officer of a steamer has a right to assume that others will obey the rules of navigation, and is bound to assume that a sailing vessel will not change her course.

(5) There being no fleet of vessels, a speed of nine miles an hour, coming down the river, was not excessive—certainly it was not a fault as to the scow.

(6) The scow has no right to commit the fault she did, and then, upon a mere conjecture, call upon the propeller for contribution.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge. The grounds upon which the libellants demand an affirmance of the decree are that the Free State starboarded and ran into the Meisel after the latter had ported and showed her red light, and that the speed of the propeller was, under the circumstances, unlawful. In reference to the first, the district court found the facts against the libellant. We agree that the evidence shows the starboarding on the part of the propeller was before or nearly cotemporaneous with the porting of the Meisel, and that such movement on the part of the latter caused the collision. We shall not discuss the evidence upon this point. The facts will be stated only for the purpose of showing the reasons why we differ from the learned judge of the district court in reference to the application of the rule of law which requires a steamer in difficult navigation, or where, from any cause, there is "risk of collision," to slacken her speed.

The following facts, substantially stated in the opinion of the district court, are all which are necessary for the purposes of the present judgment. The Meisel was coming up the river between Malden and Bois Blanc Island, and near the Canadian shore. The propeller

Free State, well equipped, manned and lighted, with lookout, and officers well placed, was coming down somewhere near the center of said channel, at full speed. At the same time the steamer Cooke came up between the Meisel and the Canadian shore, and exchanging with the propeller the usual signals for so doing, they passed each other to the right. The Meisel, as the Cooke passed between her and the shore, starboarded, and then, if not before, displayed alone her green, and shut out from the Free State her red light. The wind was over the larboard quarter of the Meisel, and she had a clean run before her, in the course which the display of her green light indicated, of over half a mile. No other vessel was in the vicinity, and there was nothing to induce a suspicion on the part of the Free State that she would not run out the course upon which she had just entered, in circumstances rendering such duty imperative. As the Cooke passed the Free State, and while the Meisel was displaying her green light, indicating, as she was actually running, a course to the northwest, directly across that of the Free State, the latter, as was not only her right but her duty, starboarded, in order to pass the Meisel. While the ships were in this position, and in such close proximity as to make a collision inevitable from the movement, the Meisel ported, and displaying her red light to the propeller, ran across her bows, and was sunk so quickly as to result in loss of life. The instant the red light was opened to the Free State, every effort was made to arrest her progress. The morning had so far advanced that vessels could be seen a mile away. The atmosphere was clear, so that lights were in no way obscured. All the conditions of navigation were favorable for safety. It presents but the common case of a descending vessel meeting a ship without a circumstance to excite fear of collision. If the duty of slackening speed exists, it is only because the rule is universally applicable in all circumstances contemplated in article 13, even though the ships in fair weather meet in the open sea. Such a rule, counsel contend, the district court administered in this case, and more fully explained and illustrated in the case of The Milwaukee [supra]. It is insisted that both judgments, when taken in connection with the facts in this record, construe articles 13 and 16 of the act of 1864 [13 Stat. 60, 61] as imposing upon all steamships meeting end on, or nearly end on, the duty of both porting and slackening speed cotemporaneously. As a necessary result of such a rule, it is agreed a like duty is imposed upon all steamers meeting a sail vessel in circumstances demanding a change of course in order to avoid them. From this construction of the rules and all its consequences in practical navigation we are compelled to dissent. We can discover in the facts as we have stated them, no duty on the part of the Free State to slacken her speed, until the unfavorable presentation of the red light of the Meisel immediately under her bows suddenly prompted the attempt. As everything possible in the circumstances was then done, we hold her to be without fault.

So far as the practical administration of this principle is concerned in The Milwaukee [supra], we found no fault. In that case, from facts apparent to both masters, the courses were doubtful. It is with the argument, and some of the reasons of the judgment only, which we disagree. In the opinion of the district court, too, in this cause, we find it said the collision happened in the night, with the channel crowded with vessels. No such facts appear in the record before us, otherwise we should promptly affirm the decree. We think, in the application of this rule, there would be little difference between the district court and this. The necessity for the present discussion arises from the judicial argument in The Milwaukee, its citation in the present case in the opinion below, and its citation by counsel as a precedent here. It, by no means, follows that the learned district judge gave it any such extension.

Article 13 is as follows: "If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other." Article 16 provides that "every steamship when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse, and every steamship shall, when in a fog, go at a moderate speed." It is argued that the former provides the helm shall be put to port when vessels are meeting end on, so as to involve risk of collision; and, as article 16 uses like language in describing the cases when speed shall be slackened, both duties must be performed at the same time. Literally and irrespective of the former condition of the law, and of the exigencies of navigation, this is a logical conclusion. We think, however, this cannot be the meaning of these rules.

Upon principle we should have no doubt whatever in reference to their meaning. But in view of the history of their adoption by congress, we should deem the decision of the privy council, reversing the judgment of Sir R. Phillimore in The Jesmond and The Earl of Elgin, L. R. 4 P. C. 1, obligatory.

This act is but an adoption of the English rules sanctioned by act of parliament. They have sprung from much mutual consultation and political conference in both countries, and were intended to create a system common to the commerce of each. All the leading maritime powers of the world have adopted them. Were there much greater doubt than we apprehend exists as to their meaning, we have confidence the supreme court would follow for the sake of harmony the decision of the privy council. It is at all events the duty of this court to do so. In that case the Jesmond and Elgin were meeting end on, and in the night, going at full speed. The former obeyed article 13, and ported. The Elgin, when so near that the movement inevitably produced the collision, starboarded, and was sunk so suddenly as to drown a large portion of her crew. Sir R. Phillimore held that article 16 imposed the duty of slackening speed at the same time, and in the same circumstances in which article 13 required the helm to be ported. He divided the damages therefore, upon the ground that the Jesmond was running at too great speed. His judgment was reversed upon appeal. There was full argument and consultation with the nautical advisors, and the rule clearly announced that where article 13 is obeyed, and there is nothing in the known conditions to lead either side to suspect a departure from it by the other, there is no duty to slacken speed, and article 16 has no application. It is said that article applies only where some known fact, or one which ordinary care might discover, indicates danger. It is with much emphasis said the risk of collision mentioned in it does not include those unexpected violations of law by an approaching ship which a good seaman would not anticipate, in the supposition that there was an experienced master in command.

The following decision, although not cited in The Elgin, is a full precedent for the judgment. The condition of the law, when it was decided, was substantially the same as after the statutory adoption of the rules in reference to porting and slackening speed. The Rob Roy, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 191. The Rob Roy ran down the Unicorn, going at full speed until she was in such close proximity that the attempt to stop was useless. The green light of the Unicorn being extinguished, and the red light hid on account of her course, she was mistaken for a sail craft. The Rob Roy ported as she should have done had the vessel been what the light indicated. Dr. Lushington excused the Rob Roy for not slowing her speed, because, he says, the lights which the Unicorn displayed indicated it was safe not to do so.

The following American decision, made since the adoption of the rules of 1864, is equally pointed,—The Scotia [Case No. 12,513]: A sail vessel, in the night, was sunk by a steamer proceeding at full speed. The collision was caused by illegal lights and faulty movements on the part of the sail vessel. About a half million was involved, and the case obtained an elaborate examination. Judge Blatchford, for reasons too extensive to reproduce, held that articles 16 and 13 prescribed the duties of the parties. He says, "The Scotia kept on at 13 knots an hour," and subsequently that he "can discover no fault on her part." He says, in different circumstances he would have found the Scotia in fault for not slowing or stopping when she first discovered the light of the Berkshire, but the improper light on the latter made it proper for the Scotia to port when she did. On appeal, Judge Woodruff, affirming the decision of the district court, although differing with some of its reasoning in other respects, approved fully the portions we have quoted. He says: "The law before the statute was that declared by it; and therefore the rule as to slowing would be the same under the one as the other." He inquires: "Ought she to have slackened her speed sooner than she did?" Proceeding to answer the query, he says: "Whether the light she saw was on a steamer or on a sailing vessel, no duty to slacken speed or change the course of the Scotia arose until there was reason to apprehend a collision." "The suggestion that it was her immediate duty to slacken speed when she saw the light, assumes what in the first instance is not to be assumed. If she saw the light and observed it diligently, without having reasonable ground for apprehending a collision, no duty to slacken speed, or even to change her course, was created." He illustrates at length the policy of the rule which authorized the Scotia to act with confidence upon apparent indications, without any assumption that there was, or would be, any violation of law on the part of the approaching ship.

To these literally applicable and pointed decisions many may be added which, by their necessary assumption of the rule, are equally efficient in its support. It was not intended to change the "rule of the road," so far as any duty in this case was concerned, by the adoption of these articles. The regulations they establish are as old as steam and the modern improvements in navigation. The introduction of colored lights wrought no difference in their principle. They, by a certain indication of courses, made their application more easy. For all time since the matter came under judicial discussion it has been law, when vessels were meeting end on, to port the helm and go ahead with confidence. It is law, equally familiar and equally old, that when vessels of any kind are approaching each other, under circumstances which in any degree indicate to an experienced seaman risk of collision, they must slacken their speed, and, if necessary, stop. This statute being but a reiteration of these principles, must by the most familiar rules of interpretation be read in reference to them. They will be held to modify them only so far as their plain and express provisions compel.

That the old so-called "Golden Rule" of porting and passing to the right was established before the act of 1864. See St. John v. Paine, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 582; The Nimrod, 15 Jur. 1201; Story, Bailm. 611; The Duke of Sussex, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 274. The Rose [2 W. Rob. Adm. 1] lays down the rule stringently,—1 Pars. Adm. 569, and note 4, —and fully affirming the rule, see New York

Co. v. Navigation Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 461, citing some of the leading English and American judgments. The supreme court says the rule is well established. That when approaching each other in circumstances indicating danger of collision, it was the duty of steamers to slow before the adoption of article 16, is abundantly shown by decisions which are immediately cited for a slightly different purpose. Save in the case of The Elgin and Jesmond, The Rob Roy, and The Scotia, before cited, and a few others, judges have seldom taken pains affirmatively to assert the truism that vessels passing each other, where there are no apparent circumstances to indicate danger, need not slacken their speed. But this has been so universally assumed, the law should be deemed at rest.

In order to establish old maxims it is by no means necessary, and is often difficult, to produce cases where the precise point has been raised and adjudicated. In Calton v. Bragg, 15 East, 223, Lord Ellenborough said: "It is not only upon decided cases, where the point has been passed upon but also from the continued practice of the court, without objection made, that we collect the rules of law." In Smith v. Doe, 2 Brod. & B. 598, Lord Eldon, with much spirit, replying to what had been said at the bar, answered: "That the most enlightened judges who ever sat in Westminster hall always gave the greatest weight to what had obtained in practice." And see 1 Bl. Comm. 68; Ram, Legal Judgm. 12; Bennet v. Watson, 3 Maule & S. 1; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539; U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32; Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 257. A long list of concurring judgments, therefore, which necessarily involve a proposition, are as efficacious for its support as if it were affirmatively ruled.

A very large majority of all the decisions in reference to collisions, both English and American, assumed as well as settled this principle, that actual perceived danger alone demands the duty of slackening speed. The Cognac, Holt, Rule Road, 133: Two vessels approached end on. The one followed the rule and ported, but the other suddenly starboarded, and brought about the collision. Dr. Lushington pronounced against the offending ship, although the other was proceeding under full steam; no criticism whatever was made upon the rate of speed. The Concordia, Holt, Rule Road, 142: So far as this question is concerned, the facts are substantially the same as those in The Cognac. For a faulty starboard movement, the Concordia was condemned for the whole damage, although the other vessel was proceeding with rapidity up to the moment of the collision. The Mary Sandford [Case No. 9,225]: The argument is full to sustain the rule. The Wenona [Id. 17,411]: Justice Woodruff reversed the judgment of the district court, where a schooner with misleading lights, and which made a faulty starboard movement immediately preceding the collision, was run down in the night by a steamer going at full speed. In a judgment admirable for its clearness he demonstrates the legal right of the master of the Wenona to proceed in the confident presumption, not only that the schooner's lights were properly placed, but that she would pursue the course they indicated. The facts are so strikingly like those before us, that the judgment in the one case would equally apply in the other. In Lown. Col. 59 et seq., is an intelligent analysis of most of the leading cases where ships have been condemned for too great speed. His citations and comments abundantly show that the duty of slackening speed is dependent alone upon the exigencies indicating danger. The America [Case No. 281] is another instance of the condemnation of a vessel for a faulty movement in the immediate presence of an approaching ship, when both were proceeding at the usual rate, without any intimation of a fault on that account. New York Trans. Co. v. Philadelphia Steam Co., 22 How. [63 U. S.] 461. A steamer was coming up the Delaware with unabated speed, and ported in order to pass a tug with a tow attached by a hawser. The latter improperly starboarded, and a collision ensued. The supreme court held the steamer did its whole duty if she slowed and endeavored to stop as soon as she discovered the improper movement.

These few judgments are referred to simply to illustrate a mode of argument which may be successfully pursued through nearly all the great mass of decisions where ships at full speed have come into collision, and one has been condemned in the entire damages for sudden faults which could not be anticipated by the other. That those which are most illustrative have been selected, is not supposed. In the brief time allowed for the purpose, it is accidental if they are so.

A long list of judgments illustrating the circumstances in which it is the duty of a steamer to slow, and demonstrating, we think, satisfactorily that they wholly exclude those contained in this record, has been analyzed in the instructive and thorough argument of the respondent's counsel. It has greatly aided the court. The length of our judgment prohibits what we had intended—its literal adoption. The perusal of these cases, with attention challenged to the argument that all of them with more or less force assume, that some affirmative evidence of danger must be present in order to impose the duty of decreasing speed, will result in a concession of the position: The Louisiana, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 1; The James Watt, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 271; The Birkenhead, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 75; Nelson v. Leland, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 48; Ward v. The A. Rossiter [Case No. 17,147]; Hall v. The Buffalo [Id. 5,927]; McCready v. Goldsmith, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 89; The New York, Id. 223; The Bay State [Case No. 1,148]; The Northern Indiana [Id. 10,320]; The St. Charles, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 108; The Louisiana [Case No. 8,537]; The Electra [Id. 4,337]; The City of Paris, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 634. We have examined these judgments, and can say with conndence, they fully sustain the argument which tne learned counsel has deduced from them. They show that if we hold in this case it was the duty of the Free State to slow, where every condition before her promised perfect safety in full speed, the judgment will stand without a fellow, unless it finds one in those which have been overruled. Benedict, Conkling, Parsons, Abbot, Angell on Carriers, in laying down the general rule, treat the judgments sustaining it in the same mode. If there be one elementary principle better established than another, we should say it is that which authorizes a seaman, having complied with every rule of navigation, in the absence of all indications of danger, to proceed with unabated speed, in full confidence that others would also perform their duty.

The obligation on the part of the Meisel to keep her course is as imperative as that of the Free State to keep out of her way. The statutory rules themselves, and the judgments already referred to in reference to the speed of the steamer, clearly affirm it. We add, however, a few adjudications more particularly discussing the precise duty. They all deny the right of this sail craft to return to her former course, after having selected another, immediately in front of an approaching steamer. The Wenona, before cited, goes quite beyond the necessities of this case. The Scotia [Case No. 12,512]; The Argus [Id. 521]; Whitney v. The Empire State [Id. 17,586]; Wakefield v. The Governor [Id. 17,049]; The Bridgeport [Id. 1,860]; St. John v. Paine, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 557; The Oregon v. Rocca, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 570; The Scotia [Case No. 12,513]; The Queen [Id. 11,502].

The Potomac, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 590, held a steamer faultless which was running nine miles an hour with no abatement of speed until just before the collision, although a sail vessel was run down, which suddenly changed her course and crossed her bows. The case is much like the present. See New York & L. U. S. Mail S. S. Co. v. Rumball, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 372; Baker v. City of New York [supra]; The R. B. Forbes [Case No. 11,598]; Amoskeag Manuf'g Co. v. The John Adams [Id. 338]; Camp v. The Marcellus [Id. 2,347]. These judgments and numerous similar ones also establish what results necessarily from the rule itself, that if the sailing vessel must keep her course, and it is the duty of a steamer to avoid her, the mode in which this is to be done is not to be closely criticised. The selection is wholly for the latter.

Having fully approbated the construction which authorized unabated speed in the circumstances of this case, we desire to call special attention to the conditions in which alone such a rule will be administered. The utmost diligence will be demanded in order to discover the earliest indications of danger, and prompt precautions required to avoid their consequences when known.

As we understand article 13, it is a duty to port before any risk of collision has accrued. It would be a fault for which a steamer could be condemned if she waited until there was actual danger, such as is required in article 16. They, by no means, contemplate the same circumstances, or prescribe duties to be performed at the same time. The former is to be understood as if it read as follows: "If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, if their respective courses were continued, the helms of both shall be put to port, before any such risk is incurred, so that each may pass on the port side of the other." See The Nichols, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 656, which decides, the porting must be so early that no danger is incurred. If the rule had been so worded, it never would have occurred to Sir R. Phillimore that there was any analogy between it and article 16. The one would have commanded the duty of porting before any risk of collision arises; the latter that of slowing only where the risk has actually arisen. But the practical and judicial meaning of article 13 is precisely as if it so read, and it is therefore impossible that the two duties, that of porting and that of slowing, under the 16th article, can be contemporaneous. Such a result is deduced only by a mere literalism wholly overlooking the substantial mandate to port long before the exigencies arise which call for the duties demanded by article 16. This interpretation reconciles the rules and warns masters that they must port their helms at such safe distances, and accompanied by such watchfulness and care as would render wholly inapplicable the act of slowing their engines.

The Sunny Side [Case No. 13,620], just decided by this court, is an application of the same principle, for the justification of a sail vessel which, keeping her course under the rule, ran down and sank a tug. Both judgments are necessary for an understanding of the qualifications with which we would like to see the rule administered. A large number of experienced experts have been examined since the argument, and without exception old masters of sail vessels as well as steamers pronounce the suggestion of a duty to slow in such circumstances a novelty. It is one which is not performed on the one hand, or expected or desired on the other. All with great strength of preference declare in favor of holding both parties inexorably to the rules, and authorizing neither to anticipate a departure by the other until actual present peril demonstrates that further adhesion is beyond all question dangerous. It is said a large majority of all collisions result from a too hasty decision that exigencies demand a deviation.

In the general principles of law we have announced, we have much confidence. Whether another tribunal in a disposition to divide a misfortune may not so criticise the conduct of the Free State as to impute some fault, we are less certain. But believing there is no greater discouragement to able officers, and no greater injustice to liberal owners who compensate them than those hypercritical judgments which demand a standard utterly impossible in practical navigation, and which are always announced in the interests of those but for whose wrongs the losses complained of would never occur, we have brought the steamer's conduct in this case to such a test only as we believe old and able mariners having a love for and a pride in their profession, would sustain. The ruling we make has the sanction of many such. Decree reversed and libel dismissed.

[NOTE. On appeal of libelants the decree of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court, Mr. Justice Hunt delivering the opinion. After reviewing the facts, it was held to be a rule of law that where two steamers are meeting each other end on, or nearly so, where there is plenty of sea room, and at a considerable distance from each other, it is not the duty of either to stop, reverse, or to slacken. The duty of each is to pass on the port side, and the rate of speed is not an element in the case. The Free State, 91 U. S. 200.]

PRACTICE—CUSTODIAN'S FEES.

The marshal is entitled only to his actual necessary expenses for ship-keeping, which must be established by vouchers or otherwise to the satisfaction of the court.

Motion to retax the marshal's charges for ship-keeper's fees. The Free Trader was seized upon attachment, remained in the custody of the marshal for 53 days, and was then sold by him. By the return of the marshal it appeared he had charged $106 custodian fees, being at the rate of $2 per day. No vouchers were filed showing payment of the amount, and no agreement by which the marshal was obligated to pay the same.

WILLSON, District Judge. The act of congress of 1853 [10 Stat. 161], in relation to the fees of the marshal for keeping vessels and other property, is perfectly clear. The marshal is, by this law, entitled to receive from the fund in court the actual necessary expenses he has paid, or obligated himself to pay, and no more. His claim is like any other claim or lien on the fund in court; it must be established by vouchers or otherwise to the satisfaction of the court, and cannot be paid except by order of the same. Let the claim for ship-keeper's fees be referred to the clerk to compute the amount paid by the marshal for keeping the schooner.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—APPRAISEMENT OF ASSETS IN EXCESS OF 50 PER CENT. OF CLAIMS.

1. Where a voluntary bankrupt, after January 1, 1869, applied to the court upon his petition and schedule, before the day of first meeting of creditors, to have his assets appraised and determined as being in excess of fifty per cent. of provable claims, etc., held, the application must be denied, no debts appearing to have been proved, and no present action of the kind asked could affect the question of the bankrupt's discharge.

2. Section 33 [act of 1867 (14 Stat. 533)] should be construed, in relation to the word "assets," as if it read, "The proceeds of the bankrupt's property in the hands of the assignee, and subject to be divided among his creditors, must be equal to fifty per cent. of claims," etc.

Phelps & Taber, for bankrupt.

NELSON, District Judge. The solicitors for the bankrupt have presented a petition to this court claiming that the amount of the assets assignable under the bankrupt law are equal to fifty per centum of the provable claims against the estate of the bankrupt, and ask that appraisers be appointed by the court to ascertain the value of the assets of the bankrupt, for the due and just protection of his rights in the premises.

This application is based upon the petition and schedules of the debtor, on file, which give a list of his debts, and the value of his estate, in accordance with the provisions of the bankrupt act, and is made for the purpose, as is alleged, of showing the bankrupt to be one of the class of persons entitled to a discharge when applied for, under the second clause of the 33d section of the bankrupt law. This section, as amended July 27, 1868, reads as follows: "In all proceedings in bankruptcy commenced after the 1st day of January, 1869, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to fifty per centum of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as the principal debtor, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors, to whom he shall have become liable as principal debtor, and who shall have proved their claims, be filed in the case, at or before the time of the hearing of the application for discharge."

It is impossible, at the present stage of the proceedings in this case, to ascertain what are the assets of the bankrupt, and whether they are equal to the amount required, so as to bring him within the 33d section. There is no evidence before us that any claims whatever have been proved against the estate. The earliest period designated in the warrant issued upon the adjudication of bankruptcy, at which time creditors are summoned to prove their debts, has not yet transpired. No assignee has been appointed whose duty it will be to possess himself of all the bankrupt's estate; and the bankrupt, under the 19th section, cannot, as yet, apply for a discharge. It would seem, therefore, that there was no necessity for the court, at present, to make any inquiry as to the assets of the estate.

The solicitors for the bankrupt, however, claim that the estate can now be readily appraised, or at least that portion of it which is stated in the schedules, and which, under the bankrupt's surrender, is in possession of the register. They believe a fair appraisement will show this portion of the estate fully equal to fifty per centum of all provable debts. Even if such was the case, we do not see how it could influence the question of granting a discharge to the bankrupt.

The 33d section, before the amendment referred to above, declared that in bankruptcy proceedings commenced after one year from the time the act went into operation, "no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets do not pay fifty per centum of the claims against his estate, unless," etc. The plain and obvious meaning of "assets" in this section, was the proceeds of the debtor's property which are applicable to the payment of his debts. The subject-matter of this section points to this signification of the word. Nothing else could pay debts. It may be true that in other portions of the act the word "assets" has been used in a more enlarged sense, but, in this section, it clearly is not synonymous with "estate." The amendment of July, 1868, although more favorable to the bankrupt, has not changed the meaning of "assets," and, according to our view, the section as it now stands, is to be construed as if it read: "The proceeds of the bankrupt's property in the hands of the assignee, and subject to be divided among his creditors, must be equal," etc. In bankruptcy proceedings commenced before January 1, 1869, discharges are granted without reference to the assets of the bankrupt. If no debts have been proven, or if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, the discharge can be granted upon application made after the expiration of sixty days from the adjudication of bankruptcy.

The supreme court of the United States declare a bankrupt to have "no assets" when the assignee makes oath that he has "not received or paid out any moneys on account of the estate." See Form 85. The adverse proposition must also be true, and a bankrupt has assets, when the assignee has received or paid out moneys on account of the estate; if the moneys received or paid out equal fifty per centum of the claims proved against the estate, upon which the bankrupt is liable as principal debtor, a discharge will be granted upon the proper application. We do not think that any relief can be given now, and deny the prayer of the petition.

SEAMAN—VERBAL AGREEMENT AS TO WAGES—EFFECT.

A vessel employed on the Lakes, between Chicago and the port of Sarnia, in Canada, having shipped a seaman on verbal promise of certain wages, and no shipping articles having been signed, the seaman may leave the vessel at any time; and having drawn the full wages promised, and not demanding more before leaving, the seaman cannot recover a larger amount.

In admiralty.

Emmons & Hamilton, for libellant.
James MacAllister, for claimant.

MILLER, District Judge. This vessel was employed in trade between the port of Sarnia, in Canada, and the city of Chicago, in connection with the Grand Trunk Railroad. On the twenty-fourth day of May, 1870, at Chicago, the libellant shipped on board as first mate on verbal contract with the master, at seventy dolars per month, no shipping articles being signed. Libellant continued in service on board, drawing his wages from time to time as he wanted money, until the thirty-first day of October following, when he left the vessel at Milwaukee, having drawn his full wages at the rate of seventy dollars per month, and not making demand for any larger sum. The vessel was on a trip from Sarnia to Chicago, when libellant left, having notice to return on board as the vessel was ready to put out; he declined or neglected to appear, and the vessel had to be navigated to Chicago without a first mate, where the master was obliged to procure another in his place. It is contended on behalf of the libellant that not having signed shipping articles in a printed or written contract, he was at liberty under the law to leave the vessel at pleasure, and demand the highest rate of wages.

By the act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service, approved July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 131), every master of "any ship or vessel of the burthen of fifty tons or upwards, bound from a port in one state to a port in any other than an adjoining state, shall, before he proceed on such voyage, make an agreement in writing or in print with every seaman or mariner on board such ship or vessel," etc. By the tenth article of the act, in addition to the several acts regulating the shipment and discharge of seamen, approved July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), "all shipments of seamen made contrary to the provisions of this and other acts of congress shall be void, and any seaman so shipped may leave the service at any time, and demand the highest rate of wages paid to any seaman shipped for the voyage, or the sum agreed to be given him at his shipment." The general scope of this act relates to vessels bound on a foreign voyage, but the tenth article above quoted extends to and includes all shipments of seamen. Even if these statutory provisions did not embrace seamen shipped on vessels employed in the lake trade, they should be enforced by the courts as correct principles of maritime law. This vessel at the time of the shipment and service of the libellant, was employed in trade with a foreign port. Libellant had drawn his full wages promised him at the time of his shipment, and left at his pleasure. He took advantage of the right extended to him under the act of 1840. Before leaving the service he had not demanded or given notice that he claimed a larger amount. Libellant had a lawful right to leave the service at Milwaukee, and having received the full wages up to that time as promised him at his shipment, he could not maintain this libel for a larger amount, if he had proven himself entitled to it, which he did not. If the master was put to inconvenience by libellant's leaving the service, it was his own fault in not complying with the law. It is the duty of every master navigating the Lakes to have his seamen sign shipping articles, specifying the ports or places to which his vessel trades, and the trip or season for which they are shipped, and the wages to be paid. In cases of such neglect every legal intendment will be taken against the master and owners. It is not the fault of the seaman that shipping articles are not signed, but of the master. It does not appear that libellant is legally entitled to any larger amount of wages than he received before leaving the service; and this libel must be dismissed.

COLLISION—BURDEN OF PROOF—ANCHOR WATCH.

Where a vessel breaks from her moorings, and comes into collision with another vessel also at anchor, the burden of proof is on the former to show vis major, or inevitable accident. The injured vessel held not to be in fault for omitting to set an anchor watch.

[Cited in The Chickasaw, 38 Fed. 363.]

In admiralty.

Daniel T. Sullivan, for libellants.
Milton Andros, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. On the twenty-fourth of January, about midnight, the barquentine Fremont, then lying at anchor in the harbor of Port Townsend, broke from her moorings and was driven by the wind against the schooner Alice, inflicting upon her considerable damage. The vessels remained in contact until late in the afternoon of the succeeding day, when they were separated by the aid of a steamer.

Both vessels were in a proper and usual place of anchorage. Their distance from each other on the evening before the accident was from one-quarter to one-half a mile. The harbor is not a dangerous one, though severe gales are sometimes experienced. The holding ground is good. Under these circumstances, the burden of proof is on the Fremont to show that the collision occurred without fault on her part.

On this point a single authority will be sufficient. In the case of The Louisiana [3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 164], the supreme court says: "The collision being caused by the Louisiana drifting from her moorings, she must be liable for the damages consequent thereon, unless she can show affirmatively that the drifting was the result of inevitable accident, or a vis major, which human skill and precaution and a proper display of nautical skill could not have prevented." I have been unable to discern in the evidence produced on the part of the claimants any satisfactory grounds for considering that the collision was caused by either a vis major or inevitable accident. Undoubtedly the wind blew with some violence. But it is equally beyond doubt that the ground tackle on board the Fremont would have been abundantly sufficient to hold her if used seasonably and with proper skill.

She had but one, and that probably an insufficient, anchor down. The scope of chain paid out would seem to have been sufficient if the witnesses of the claimant are to be relied on. It appears, however, that she came to anchor on the evening of the 24th, with the intention of getting under way about midnight, when the tide would serve. There were no indications of an approaching storm. It may be presumed that the master, aware that he would have to weigh anchor in a few hours, did not pay out more chain than he thought absolutely indispensable. He was first aroused about ten minutes before the vessels came together by hearing the noise of the chain passing through the hawse pipes. He came on deck and continued to pay out chain for some minutes, but it was not until within a very short distance of the Alice and too late to prevent the collision that he succeeded in letting go his best anchor. From some expressions of the master of the Fremont subsequently to the collision it would seem that he attributed the accident to the insufficiency of his smaller anchor, of which he was previously aware. As to the admissibility of such declarations, see The Potomac, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 584; The Enterprise [Case No. 4,497].

On this evidence I do not, however, lay much stress. But it is plain that in the absence of any vis major, or irresistible violence of the elements, the accident must have been occasioned by the want of due care, caution and skill on the part of the Fremont. Whether that consisted in not having out an anchor of sufficient size, or in not paying out enough chain originally, in not giving her more chain when she began to drag, or in not having her best bower ready to let go at a moment's notice, it is immaterial to inquire—for it is evident that by the skilful and timely use of the appliances at his command, the master of the Fremont could have avoided the accident.

It is contended that the Alice was also in fault in not having an anchor watch set. That it would have been practicable for a seaman keeping an anchor watch on deck to have done any thing to avert or modify the effects of the collision, is by no means shown. The only expedients suggested as proper to have been adopted are hoisting the jib and sheering the vessel by shifting her helm. But the first operation, even with all hands on deck, would probably have required more time than the suddenness of the danger allowed. And whether the second would have had any beneficial effect depended upon whether the tide was running with sufficient strength to act upon the rudder—a point which the evidence leaves extremely doubtful. I am not, however, disposed to deny that if the Alice neglected any usual and proper precaution, and omitted anything which either positive law or maritime usage requires, it will be for her to show that the neglect in no degree contributed to the accident. But the proofs fail to establish any general custom or rule of navigation which requires an anchor watch to be set on small vessels when lying in a harbor. The practice of the masters seems to be various. If the weather is threatening, or the anchorage dangerous, the watch is usually set. But if there be no reason to apprehend danger, and when the crew being in port have been working all day, it is not uncommonly dispensed with. Under circumstances closely analogous, the learned judge of the Southern district of New York came to the conclusion that a schooner was not in fault in not having an anchor watch. The Clara [Case No. 2,788].

I see nothing in the case at bar to distinguish it from the numerous cases in the books where a vessel insufficiently moored drags her anchors, and collides with another vessel securely anchored and in a proper place. Unless under very exceptional circumstances the colliding vessel is in such cases uniformly held liable.

A decree in favor of libellants must be entered.

Cook & Fenner, for defendants.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. The bill in this case was filed to enjoin the excavation of gold from land alleged to be the property of the complainant. The bill was met by defendants with a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that the complainant was not a citizen of the state of New York, as alleged in the bill, but was a citizen of California at the time; and that therefore the complainant could not sue the defendant, who is also a citizen of this state, in this court. A motion was then made on behalf of the complainant, for the issue of an injunction; which was resisted upon the ground that pending the plea to the jurisdiction, the court could take no further proceeding in the cause. To enjoin an alleged irreparable mischief is the object of the present proceeding. No defect of jurisdiction appearing on the record, the proper mode to avail of it is by plea. It is contended, however, that the filing of the plea has the effect of arresting all further proceedings in this court, and that it can make no order in regard to the injunction until the plea is disposed of. That the court cannot grant a perpetual injunction or hear an argument upon it, is evident. It will direct an immediate argument of the plea; and in a case of irreparable mischief alleged and not denied, it can issue a temporary injunction to stay the mischief until the obstacle interposed by the defendant's plea shall be removed. It cannot be that, assuming the fact averred in the plea may be true, the court must remain passive and permit the mischief to be wrought, because its jurisdiction has been questioned.

The case is simply this: The complainant in his bill has made the proper averments of citizenship to give jurisdiction to the court. So far, then, as the record is concerned, the jurisdiction of the court is perfect. The effect of such averments is to impart, prima facie, jurisdiction; and it is incumbent on the defendant who would impeach that jurisdiction for causes dehors the record, to do so not only by allegation but proof. Until this be done, the prima-facie jurisdiction derived from the record authorizes the court to retain the suit in such position as to enable it to preserve the rights of the respective parties in statu quo until the intervening obstacle to a decision on the merits is disposed of. An immediate opportunity will be afforded to the parties, the one to sustain, the other to falsify it. The issue, arising as it does in an equity suit, might be tried by the court. Such seems to have been the course pursued in the case of Shelton v. Tiffin, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 163. But as it is within the power of the court to inform its conscience by the verdict of a jury, the facts establishing the citizenship of plaintiff either in New York or this state, will be referred to a jury. Various cases have been cited; all, however, were common injunctions in which pleas or demurrers were filed. Even in such, the court have always speeded the trial of the issue raised by the demurrer or plea, in order to promptly reach the injunction. In an anonymous case (2 Atk. 113) it is said, "Where defendant has put in his plea to plaintiff's bill, the plaintiff cannot move for an injunction to stay defendant from proceeding at law till the plea, by some means or other, is removed out of the way; all that the plaintiff can do is, to move that the plea may be accelerated; which the court did." In Cousins v. Smith, 13 Ves. 166, Lord Erskine plainly indicates, he would have removed a demurrer, under similar circumstances, by ordering it to be argued immediately. In Humphreys v. Humphreys, 3 P. Wms. 395, the court said, upon motion of an injunction to stay, &c., after a plea put in, there can be no motion for an injunction; but, at the instance of the plaintiff, it was ordered that the plea should come on for argument the next day, and if overruled the plaintiff might move at the same time for an injunction.

If, therefore, a motion shall be made by the plaintiff to accelerate the removal of the plea, the court will direct the immediate trial of the issue raised by it. If no immediate disposition of it can be made, it will issue such order as will maintain the parties in statu quo until such is made.

The issue of citizenship was submitted to a jury; who having returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the following order was placed upon the minutes of the court:—

Whereas, heretofore, a trial was had in above action in this court, on the law side thereof, before a jury impaneled for said trial, on the 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th days of June, 1858, upon the following issue: Whether John Charles Fremont was at the commencement of this action, viz., on the 8th day of May, 1858, a citizen of the state of California. And, whereas, the plaintiff and defendants appeared by their respective counsel, and evidence was adduced by both parties in reference to said issue at said trial; and, whereas, the said issue was duly submitted to the jury so impaneled as aforesaid, and thereafter said jury did render a verdict in the words and figures following, namely: "The jury in this case unanimously agree that John Charles Fremont was not, at the commencement of this suit, on the 8th May, 1858, a citizen of the state of California. San Francisco, June 17, 1858."

Now, I do hereby certify that said verdict was found as aforesaid; and I further certify it is satisfactory to me.

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. Term, 1861.

OIL-MINING RIGHTS — BILL FOR PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION.

1. Deeds, however apparently formal, must be interpreted upon a view of the whole paper, and in subservience to what appears to be the scope of them, especially when it appears, as it often does in the United States, that the instrument is the production of an ignorant scrivener who has used legal terms without exact knowledge of their legal import. The technical rules of the old English books must be applied with intelligence; and only after an examination of the whole deed.

2. In cases of obscure instruments, especially on motions for a preliminary injunction, a court may inquire into the actual state of the knowledge which the parties to it had upon the subject of it; and where it involves questions of science, may refer to the state of public knowledge or that of learning at the time the deed was made.

3. Where the meaning of a deed is not absolutely clear, and the rights of the party claiming under it are disputed, a preliminary injunction will not be granted to restrain a person acting in violation of alleged rights, unless it is plain that irreparable injury is likely to be suffered. And where the defendant is laying out his own money in such a way that the complainant, if his construction of his deed be true, can ultimately get the benefit of it all, and where the defendant has not received from his outlay any return as large as the outlay itself, the injury will not be regarded as irreparable.

Bill for injunction, the case being thus: In the beginning of the present century, a stream was discovered not far from Meadville, in Crawford county, Pennsylvania, upon the surface of which, as of the smaller rivulets running into it, a species of oil frequently flowed; and to such an extent in some places, that when a candle was applied to the surface, the oil would ignite and blaze in a lambent flame on the creek itself. The people in the neighborhood of the stream, which was now called "Oil Creek," were aware of this peculiarity of the water; but the population thereabouts, was sparse in those days, and no great deal of mineralogical science was applied to the subject. The schoolmaster called it a "phenomenon," and this was regarded by the learned as a full and lucid explanation of the matter. The Indians, it is said had known this peculiarity of the stream, and applied the oil to surgical purposes, in the cure of external injuries or sores. The early white settlers used it in the same way, and also for different domestic or farm purposes. It flowed along with the water—on its surface—but the descent of the water being rapid, and the stream itself shallow, the only mode in which the people could get the oil separated from the water was by making little ditches or pits along side of the creek, and drawing off a certain amount of water of the stream into them. This being left in a state of stagnation, the oil would soon collect in a coagulated form on the surface; when the women would go out, and inserting blankets under the water, raise them and secure the oil; the blankets being porous enough to let the water flow through them, but sufficiently close to retain, till they could empty it, the thicker substance of the oil. Enough oil was obtained in this way, to make it worth while for the farmers and others in the neighborhood occasionally to go through this somewhat laborious process of getting it; but the oil never became in those days a subject of much value or of any commerce. Sometime, however, in the spring of 1858—the date is important—a person named Edwin Drake, residing at Titusville, a town on this creek, conceived that the oil must be a mineral substance, some way connected with coal formations; and that it probably came from a great depth below the creek, and through some fissures in the rocky formation, from coal strata on the adjoining lands, and therefore that it could be far better got by boring on the lands themselves. His conjecture proved to be right, and led the way to a branch of industry which in five years has, in western Pennsylvania, become an immense one, covering whole regions from Lake Erie to the Ohio, with operations in what is now called "petroleum" or "rock oil."

[In the case here reported,—which was a bill in equity to restrain certain persons from boring on some lands for this oil,—Drake was examined as a witness, and his account may deserve perpetuation. It was in these words: "That some time in the forepart of 1858 the deponent entered upon the lands which are the subject of this bill, for the purpose of gathering oil, and developing the same; that he, at great expense, during that and the following year, sunk, by boring, the first well that was known for obtaining oil in that region of the country; that this method was wholly unknown previous thereto; that in consequence of this, and the want of proper implements to operate with, and the necessity of obtaining new patterns for these, and especially for iron pipe for driving to the rock, a very great expense was incurred, amounting at least to $4,500, in establishing the first well; that this proved successful in obtaining large quantities of oil."] [2]

In November, 1855—that is to say, two years or more before the discovery and labors of Drake, as thus recorded, the defendants, being then owners in fee of 160 acres of land on Oil creek, including a certain island particularly well situated for gathering oil in the old way—while the complainants owned 105 acres on the same creek, adjoining this tract of 160 acres, but lower down on the creek than the defendants', made to the complainants a deed, somewhat peculiar in its expression. It ran thus: "The said parties of the first part," (the now defendants) "do hereby lease and by this indenture have leased to the said parties of the second part," (the now complainants) "their heirs and assigns, for the full term of ninety-nine years, all the oil or paint on or being on any of the lands," &c. (of the defendants), "with the privilege of"—the deed went on rather oddly to say—"of going on to and of taking away all or so much of the oil or paint at any time and at all times, as is consistent with the pleasure or interest of the said parties of the second part, on the following described lands only, viz.:" (Here followed a description of certain lands of the defendants.) "Reserving to the said parties of the first part" (that is to say, to the now defendants, who had large mill works near this land), "their heirs and assigns, the right and privilege at all times to pass over and repass with teams, wagons, sleighs, carts, sleds, or any other vehicle, to and from their mills, over said ground or lands, together with all ground or land necessary for yard and mill privileges and mechanical purposes: And the said parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns," the deed proceeded, "are not in any case to approach with their work or excavations so as to endanger or obstruct in any manner their mills, races, dams and ponds, or to impair or obstruct their lumbering and mechanical business as they do now or may hereafter exist."

It was made plain enough in behalf of the complainants, that between the date of the deed just mentioned and the time of Mr. Drake's discovery, the defendants never attempted to claim any oil on or about this tract of 105 acres—the tract on the upper part of the creek—but that in May, 1860, finding that Mr. Drake had discovered a new mode of getting at the oil, and of making a great subject of commerce out of it, they too, by numerous workmen and under-tenants had been sinking wells and carrying away the oil also; although, as yet, all the oil that they had got had not paid off the cost of sinking the wells. The complainants—citizens of Connecticut, who were largely engaged in boring for oil—finding that the defendants were interfering with the monopoly of the substance which they had got through Mr. Drake's discovery, now filed a bill, praying an account for the oil that the defendants had already got from the 160 acres, and an injunction against taking any more, in any way, and especially by the process of boring wells. The bill alleged that the complainants had expended large sums of money in the development of the oil on the 160 acres, and of the means and methods of obtaining it from the land, by reason of which the premises aforesaid, and the right and title thereto, and interests therein of the complainants, had been greatly increased in value; so that they were now believed to be worth $100,000 more than before such expenditure and development; that the rights and claims of the complainants were acknowledged until the expenditure was made, and the development had resulted in increasing the value. It complained in substance, further, that respondents occupied the 160 acres to the exclusion of complainants, and had excavated and bored numerous wells thereon, and taken the oil therefrom, "thereby" preventing complainants from taking and using it, and preventing the same from oozing and flowing down the creek from the tract of 160 acres to that of the 105 acres below it and belonging to complainants. The testimony showed that the respondents had bored wells, and had a large number of hands employed in boring others. But there was no evidence that they have meddled with or sensibly affected the flow of the oil down the creek, or the collection of it by complainants, either on their own land or on the island. Nor was there any proof that the oil raised from the upper works, flowed in any way, either above or below the surface, to the lands below, of the complainants, or to the island where they were permitted to enter and make pits: whatever might be the inference which a geologist, on looking at the soil, would draw if the wells were very numerous, and near to the stream.

Mr. Church, for complainants, rested strongly on the general expressions of the deed, and on the old and technical rules as given in Coke, Shepherd's Touchstone and other books, about interpreting them; citing authorities very fully. This he said was a deed of indenture, leasing for ninety-nine years "all the oil and paint lying on or being on any of the lands," &c. It was therefore an original conveyance, absolute in character during the time limited therein. The grant of the oil is complete and explicit. It conveys a corporeal right; and, by the terms of the deed, is assignable. The language of the deed in Caldwell v. Fulton, 7 Casey [31 Pa. St.] 475, is, "the right and privilege of digging and taking away stone coal, to any extent, the grantee may think proper to do, or cause to be done, under any of the land now owned and occupied by the said grantor, provided, nevertheless, the entrance thereto, and the discharge therefrom, be on the foregoing described premises;" that is, on a certain 16 acres granted in fee by the same deed. The supreme court of Pennsylvania held that this was a grant of the coal corporeal, and not of a mere privilege incorporeal, and was exclusive of the grantor. The grant here is of "all the oil on any of the lands of the grantors, in," &c. The instrument is that of the grantors, and is to be taken most strongly against them. The restriction, if a restriction is meant in the words—"With the privilege of going on and taking away all or so much of the oil or paint, &c., on the following described lands only"—is repugnant to the preceding grant, and void. The first expression is plain in its meaning; the later words are ambiguous. Under those circumstances the latter, even if they were apparently restrictive, would be inoperative; for certainty previously expressed, is never to be restrained by subsequent ambiguity. But, by a slight straining, we can reconcile these different parts, and are bound to do so, if we can in any way. "An exception in a deed," says Shepherd's Touchstone, 75, "must be of something separable from that which is before expressed." And hence the words subsequent to the lease or grant, of "all the oil on any of the lands," should be made to apply—as they can be made to apply—to gathering it on that part whereon the right to the use for lumbering business is reserved to the grantors. In fact, this later clause being new, means something new; something by way of addition to that already granted. "With," in this connection, means "in company with"—"as an appendage." The later words are in fact disjointed from the earlier and complete grant: and they refer to the later part of the subject spoken of; that is to say, to the rights reserved about lumbering. This mode of construction will harmonize the apparently conflicting parts of the instrument. The fact that the plan of raising oil by wells had not been discovered in November, 1855, when the deed was made, is unimportant. The deed is to be interpreted by its plain words; according to what it says; and who shall declare that it was not in view of the very purpose of trying the experiment, which Drake did try, that the grant was obtained? The discovery was made soon after the deed. The conjecture made by Mr. Drake, as to the source of this oil, was one natural to be made; and certain to be made by some one, as the region along this stream became, as it was rapidly becoming, populous, rich and enlightened. It does violence to the words to restrict them to the old way of getting oil by blankets. How was a right to get oil from the creek, in a blanket, a grant of "all the oil and paint lying or being on any of the lands," &c.? Whatever the deed does or does not mean, it is impossible to say that it means nothing more than that the complainants might practice the old fashioned and half savage operation of the blanket. It is a dangerous rule—one, certainly, having no place among Blackstone's—by which to construe deeds, to speculate upon the supposed state of the scientific knowledge of a purchasing party. It would be a pre-eminently dangerous one in regard to the purchase of mining rights, where science is constantly advancing from conjectures to certainties, and enterprise is continually based upon speculation—upon "inklings"—which the purchaser carefully conceals. The present plaintiffs are citizens of Connecticut, and probably made the purchase under scientific counsel, and with a strong suspicion of what has turned out to be a fact. Assuming that this part of his case had been made out, Mr. Church argued without difficulty in favor of an injunction.

McCalmont & Kerr, for respondents, contended that the deed was too obscure for a court to interpret it in this form of proceeding, and in a way which would be so injurious to the defendants; as the grant of an injunction would plainly be.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The instrument on which this controversy arises is anomalous in character. It is the work of a conveyancer ignorant of legal forms, and wholly unlearned in the law. It does not profess to sell or convey absolutely all the mines of paint or petroleum lying in or under the 160 acres. If it had done so, the title to the minerals would necessarily include a right to enter on the land of the grantor to take them away. A lease for years is a contract for the use of lands or tenements; and although it may be for a full consideration paid down, and reserve no rent to be paid in future, yet it contemplates a temporary use of the thing leased, whether it be a farm or a mine, and a return of the possession thereof to the owner or reversioner. Suppose it was a lease for one year to "take at all times so much of the oil as is consistent with his pleasure or interest," would this confer an absolute title to all the oil, whether taken within the year or not? The great and governing rule in the construction of all contracts or deeds is to ascertain the intention of the parties, and this must be by a careful examination of the whole instrument. This is more especially necessary in a country where every man is his own scrivener, and freely uses legal terms without a knowledge of their true or precise legal import. It is no doubt a just rule of construction, that restrictive words, repugnant to an absolute grant or sale of a thing, may be construed to be inoperative, because they contradict the clearly expressed terms of the deed, as to the nature and extent of the estate granted, and render it ineffectual for the purpose clearly intended by the parties. But we must first examine the whole instrument, all its parts, and each provision or covenant contained in it, to ascertain the intention of the parties, before this rule can apply. We should ascertain the nature of the thing which is the subject of the grant, and the state of knowledge of the parties. The rules of construction adopted with regard to leases or conveyances of coal mines or other solid mineral substances, may have little application to this newly discovered mineral liquid. There would be no necessary contradiction in the terms of a lease of coal mines, that the lessee might take all the coal, or so much as he pleased, under a tract of 100 acres, while it prohibited his entry on all but 10 acres for the purpose of sinking the shafts for his mines. It may be true that wells sunk on the 105 acres or on the island, might or might not drain the oil from the whole 160 acres. As to this fact, the parties have furnished no evidence whatever, and it is probably a fact not yet ascertained or known. We must have reference, in interpreting this obscure paper, to the state of knowledge of the parties, and of the whole country, with regard to the subject matter of this contract, and the mode in which this mineral oil was obtained. When the instrument was executed, the only method known by which the oil could be obtained, was by digging trenches, and raising the oil by blankets from the water. The natural flow of the creek would carry the oil on its surface from the lands of the respondents to those of the complainants, which were lower down; unless the oil was arrested above. That part of the 160 acres called the island was conveniently situated for making the trenches to gather the oil as it came down. Recalling, as the reporter's statement gives it to us, and as the affidavits disclosed it, the knowledge of the parties and the people on the subject of this contract, and the fact that till the time of Drake's discovery the oil had found its way to the surface through chance fissures in the strata under the stream, and that it was not till 1858 that boring to find the source of the oil was practised—much of the difficulty in the construction of this instrument, by reason of apparent contradiction in its covenants, vanishes.

It is not necessary, however, nor perhaps proper to express any conclusive opinion as to the construction and effect of this instrument before the final hearing. It is sufficient, for the purpose of the present motion, to say:

1. That it is, at least, doubtful whether the complainant's deed conveys in absolute estate all the oil under the respondent's lands, or only a license for a term of years to collect what flowed on the surface of Oil creek; or whether parties could be said to contract about a subject matter of which both were wholly ignorant. Caldwell v. Fulton, 7 Casey [31 Pa. St.] 479, cited by Mr. Church, has no similarity to the present. It is no doubt true, that minerals beneath the surface may be conveyed as corporeal hereditaments, and thus severed in title from the surface soil; and there is no doubt that livery of seizin is unnecessary either here or in England since the statute of uses and the introduction of deeds of bargain and sale. But it might nevertheless be a sufficient reason for construing an instrument to take effect as a grant of an incorporeal hereditament, which requires no livery of seizin, that it contains no apt technical words to grant, bargain, or sell absolutely a corporeal hereditament, or an unsevered portion of the grantor's land.

Since that decision, a court, administering the law of Pennsylvania, might be justified in construing a grant of "the full right, title and privilege of digging and taking away stone coal to any extent" from the land of the grantor, as an absolute bargain and sale of the coal to the grantee. But we must construe the deed before us ex visceribus suis; having reference to the peculiar nature of the subject matter and the knowledge of the parties with regard to it. With these facts in view it is at least doubtful whether the parties intended by this anomalous instrument to grant anything more than a license for a term of years to take all of the oil floating down the creek, and to use the island for that purpose, in consideration of the grantee's license to them to have a mill race over their land. A final decision of this question must be reserved till a final hearing of the case.

2. There is no evidence to support the charge of the bill, that wells bored by the respondents prevent the oil from flowing down the creek, or that they have interfered in any way to arrest such flow or hinder the enjoyment of any of the complainants' right on the island. We do not know, and are not informed by the pleadings or evidence, that the oil taken from the rocks above would ever have flowed (above or below the surface) down to the island, or to the one hundred and five acres below.

3. The oil taken by defendants thus far has not compensated the expense and trouble of boring the wells. An injunction now would compel the respondents to cease their business and discharge a large number of hands. It would inflict a certain injury on the respondents, while the benefit to the complainants, like their title, is uncertain. If they recover on final hearing, the new wells will be a benefit to them, and not an irreparable injury. Injunction refused.

FRENCH v. EDWARDS et al.

[4 Sawy. 125.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. Nov. 27, 1876.

CONVEYANCE PENDENTE LITE—JUDGMENT—ESTOPPEL—SUPPLEMENTAL ANSWERS—CALIFORNIA CODE CIVIL PROCEDURE.

1. Where in an action to recover land, the plaintiff conveys to a stranger the premises in controversy, pendente lite, under the Code of Procedure of the state of California, the action may be prosecuted to judgment in the name of the original party; and such conveyance cannot be set up by way of supplemental answer to defeat a recovery of the possession.

[Cited in Elliot v. Teal, Case No. 4,389.]

2. F. sued E. to recover land, and there was a trial and judgment for defendant. Afterward F. conveyed the same land to V., who sued E. to recover the same. E. set up as a defense by way of estoppel the prior judgment against F. and the subsequent conveyance to V., and the court found the matter of estoppel, and gave judgment for defendant on that ground. Afterward the said first judgment in F. v. E. was reversed on writ of error, and the case remanded for a new trial. V. in the meantime conveyed to R. When the case of F. v. E. was again called for trial, E. moved for leave to file a supplemental answer, setting up the conveyance to V. and his subsequent conveyance to R.; that the action was then prosecuted for the sole benefit of R., and by way of estoppel against any recovery for the benefit of R., the said judgment in V. v. E. Held, That the vacation of the judgment in F. v. E. after the judgment in V. v. E., which was based upon the first judgment, removed the matter of estoppel, and that the judgment in V. v. E., constituted no defense to the action.

3. Supplemental answers are in the nature of pleas puis darrein continuance under the former practice, and like such pleas, should be interposed at the first opportunity after coming to the knowledge of the parties.

4. Where pending an action matter has arisen constituting a good technical, though an inequitable defense, which, the defendant having notice, has for several years neglected to plead, one trial having intervened, the court after such delay, in the exercise of its discretion, will, on the ground of laches, refuse leave to file a supplemental answer setting up such matter as a defense.

5. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. § 367, construed.

Action to recover land. The complaint in the action was filed November 8, 1866. A trial by jury having been had, and a verdict found for defendants [Thomas Edwards and others], judgment on said verdict was entered April 26, 1867. Afterward on September 26, 1867, the plaintiff, [Ira G.] French, conveyed the premises in controversy to one Robert H. Vance, who soon after, on November 4, 1867, commenced in his own name, an action in the state court of the Sixth judicial district, against the defendants in this action and other parties, to recover possession of the premises. The defendants herein, in their answer to Vance's complaint, set up as a defense the said former adjudication in their favor in this action of April 26, 1867; the said subsequent conveyance to Vance; that said conveyance was Vance's only title, and that said matters ought not to be again litigated. The case was tried, and the issue on this defense was found by the court for the defendants. As a conclusion of law, the court found that the "plaintiff is estopped from maintaining this action by the verdict and judgment entered in said circuit court in said action of French v. Edwards [unreported], and that said verdict and judgment are a bar to said action herein." Judgment for defendants was accordingly entered upon said finding April 18, 1868. Vance, however, established his title, and recovered as to those defendants who were not parties to this action, or did not plead the matter of estoppel. Afterward on April 12, 1870, French, by writ of error, removed said judgment of April 26, 1867, to the supreme court for review, and thereupon said court, at the October term, 1871, reversed said judgment and remanded the cause for a new trial (13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 516), the judgment reversed being the same set up and established as a bar to said action in said case of Vance v. Edwards [unreported]. Upon the return of the case to this court, the defendants, on August 20, 1872, by leave of the court, filed a supplemental answer, setting up a conveyance of the title to them, by deed executed since the last trial, upon a sheriff's sale, in pursuance of a judgment rendered for taxes levied on said premises. At the September term of this court, 1872, the case was again tried, and some of the issues found upon which judgment was again rendered for defendants, on October 30, 1872. This judgment was also reversed on writ of error at the October term, 1874, and the case again remanded with directions to proceed in conformity with the opinion of the court (21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 150), which was afterward construed as requiring the court to proceed and try the other issues, and in other respects to proceed in such manner as according to its judgment justice may require. [Ex parte French, 91 U. S. 425, 426.] The case having been returned to this court, and subsequently set for trial, when the case was called on February 8, 1876, the defendants, in pursuance of notice previously given to plaintiff's counsel, on January 26, 1876, moved the court for leave to file supplemental answers: (1) That since the commencement of this action, to wit: on September 27, 1867, plaintiff conveyed the premises in controversy to R. H. Vance, hereinbefore mentioned, and that his estate has consequently terminated, and he has now no right to a judgment for the possession; (2) that since the commencement of this action the plaintiff conveyed the premises in controversy to said Vance, as aforesaid; that Vance afterward brought his action against these defendants, the action hereinbefore set out, and the matters between said Vance and defendants were adjudicated in said action between said Vance and these defendants; that Vance afterward conveyed to one Reynolds, with knowledge of said prior adjudication, who is now the party in interest for whose benefit this action is being prosecuted, and that he is estopped by said judgment in Vance v. Edwards [supra], from further litigating the matter. The plaintiff opposed the motion for leave to file said supplemental answers on the grounds: (1) That the matters sought to be set up came to the knowledge of defendants so long ago, at least, as April 18, 1868, when said judgment in their favor, now sought to be set up, was rendered in the said case of Vance v. Edwards, and during all the intervening time of some eight years they have neglected to set up these defenses, although there has since been one trial and appeal to the supreme court; (2) that the matters alleged in said several proposed supplemental answers do not in either case, constitute a defense to said action, and are, therefore, irrelevant and immaterial.

John H. McKune and J. W. Armstrong, for the motion.

Houghton & Reynolds, contra.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. As to the matter set up in the first supplemental answer—the conveyance to Vance since the commencement of this action—it is settled by the decisions of the supreme court of California that this is no defense to the action under the statutes of California. Section 34 of the act concerning conveyances authorizes the owner of land in the adverse possession of another to convey it "with the same effect as if he was in the actual possession thereof." And section 16 of the practice act, in force at the time of the conveyance to Vance, provided that "an action shall not abate by the death or other disability of a party, or by the transfer of any interest therein, if the cause of action survive or continue. In case of death or other disability of a party, the court, on motion, may allow the action to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest. In case of any other transfer of interest the action may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action." Under these provisions of the statute, the supreme court of California has settled the construction that in an action to recover the possession of land, the action may proceed in the name of the original party, after a conveyance to a stranger pendente lite, and that such conveyance is no defense against a recovery of possession. Moss v. Shear, 30 Cal. 474, 475. The change in the common law, by which a party out of possession is authorized to convey his lands, rendered this change in the practice necessary, otherwise it would often happen, as was the case in Moss v. Shear, and, as is the case in this action, the statute of limitations would bar an action by the grantee before he could have an opportunity to bring his action, or even before the conveyance to him. If the pending action could not be continued in the name of the original party, or the grantee be substituted, the title might be cut off by the statute even while the litigation is going on. Without such a provision in the Code of Procedure, the owner of lands in the possession of another, would lose much of the advantage of the provision of the statute allowing him to convey while out of possession.

This is a very important consideration in this state, where the statutory period is extremely short. According to my judicial experience and observation, the only cases in which attempts have been made to set up a conveyance to strangers to the suit pendente lite, to defeat a recovery, have been cases where the defendants have been in a position to avail themselves of the statute of limitations, in case they could defeat the pending action in the name of the grantor, and compel the grantee to bring a new action. Be this as it may, the questions now under consideration depend upon the provisions of the state statute referred to, and that construction is settled by the highest court of the state, and is controlling in this court. Tioga R. Co. v. Blossburg & C. R. Co., 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 137.

The change of the language in section 4 of the old practice act, when carried into the new Code, does not in my judgment affect the question. The case is governed by the other provisions cited. But if it did, the change cannot be construed to apply to cases already pending, wherein a party would be liable to lose his right of action altogether under the statute of limitations if his right to recover in the pending action be cut off, and he be compelled to bring a new suit. Besides, section 4 doubtless refers to the commencement of a suit, not to its continuance after it has been properly commenced.

As to the said judgment in the case of Vance v. Lincoln [38 Cal. 586], sought to be set up as an estoppel in the second proposed supplemental answer. It will not be necessary, under the view I take, to consider how far that judgment could under any circumstances affect this action. It is enough to say that the first judgment in this present action, which was adjudged in that case to estop Vance from relitigating the title, has since the entry of that judgment been itself vacated on appeal, and if it ever could be an obstacle, it no longer stands in the way of an inquiry into the merits of his title. The judgment in Vance v. Lincoln [supra], cannot stand in the way, for it is only evidence that at the time of its entry there was a judgment in existence which estopped the parties from further litigation. It does not touch or affect subsequent changes in the condition of things. Since that time there has been a change, and the judgment upon which the judgment in Vance v. Lincoln proceeded has been vacated. The reversal of that judgment is not merely a destruction of the evidence upon which the case of Vance v. Lincoln was tried, but a change in the state of the facts themselves. The record in Vance v. Lincoln shows that the judgment proceeded alone on the estoppel of the prior judgment in this case, which has since been set aside, and we are now proceeding to try the case again in pursuance of the mandate of the supreme court.

The record in the case of Vance v. Lincoln is conclusive evidence that, at the time of its entry, Vance was estopped from further litigating the title to the land in controversy, while the record in this case now in progress is also conclusive evidence that, since the judgment in that action, the estoppel therein adjudged has been annulled and removed, and that there is nothing to preclude an examination into the title of Vance and his grantees, and especially nothing to preclude such examination in this particular action.

But these matters now sought to be set up in supplemental answers necessarily came to the knowledge of the defendants some eight years before they offered to set them up, for the judgment in Vance v. Lincoln, in which they were determined in their favor, bears date April 18, 1868. More than four years after that time, this case was tried again, and has since been to the supreme court and returned for another trial; yet no effort was made to set up these defenses till the present motion, notice of which was given in the latter part of January, 1876. A supplemental answer is in the nature of a plea puis darrein continuance under the old practice, which it was necessary to plead at the first opportunity, and before the next continuance, and could only be pleaded at a later date by leave granted by the court in its discretion, upon showing a satisfactory excuse for the negligence. The ends of justice, I think, require the same rule to be applied in the case of supplemental answers, and this very case affords a striking illustration of the propriety, not to say the necessity, of such a rule. Both of the defenses sought to be set up, if they could, under any circumstances, be regarded as valid defenses, are purely technical and without substantial merit; and upon the hypothesis that the plaintiff or his grantee really has the title, it would work a transfer of the property of the plaintiff or his grantee to the trespasser upon his rights, and therefore be grossly inequitable if they should prevail. Upon the first defense, if this action should be defeated, the right of action of Vance, the grantee of French, and Reynolds, his grantee, is barred by the statute of limitations, and Vance, as shown by the said judgment in Vance v. Lincoln, never was in a position to maintain an action in his own name till his action was barred or might have been barred. If the second defense should prevail, then the plaintiff and his grantors will lose their land, no matter how good their title may be, without ever having had an opportunity to have their title in fact finally adjudicated. Thus, in either event, the defendants, by wrongfully taking possession of plaintiff's property and skillful and adroit management of pretended defenses, would, after putting the plaintiff to the trouble and expense of years of litigation, in process of time not only defeat his action, but actually, by this iniquitous process, acquire the title to his property. That defenses which are liable to work such results are entitled to no favorable consideration at the hands of a court of justice, needs no argument to demonstrate, and such are the proposed defenses in this case. That plaintiff has some ground, at least, to prosecute this action, may, for the purposes of this motion, be inferred from the fact that Vance actually established his title and recovered, in said case of Vance v. Lincoln, against those defendants who were not in a position to avail themselves, or did not avail themselves, of the estoppel of the first judgment entered in this case, and, so far as the record shows, was only defeated as to the defendants in this action by being precluded by the said judgment in this action from any investigation of their title. In the first trial, which took place before I had the honor to preside in this court, the plaintiff was defeated by a tax deed which the supreme court held to be void. On the second trial he was defeated by a purely technical defense, which this court reluctantly sustained. The supreme court reversed the judgment upon a point which, doubtless, fairly arose on the record, but which did not occur to counsel in this court, was not suggested at the trial, and, consequently, was never passed upon or considered by this court, while the only point decided by this court, and intended by the court and counsel who tried this case to be presented by the record to the supreme court, was not considered at all by the appellate court. The same point, however, was decided in another case by the supreme court at the same term in the same way as by this court in this case. Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 63. I do not regret, however, that the counsel on appeal and the supreme court found a point upon which the judgment could be reversed as to this technical defense, and the case remanded for retrial upon its real merits. I think, however, after so many years' neglect on the part of the defendants to set up their proposed technical and inequitable defenses, in view of all the circumstances of this case, that, even conceding them to be good defenses, if they had been set up in time, which I do not in fact admit, the court in the exercise of a sound discretion, is fully justified in denying leave to file these supplemental answers at this late date on the ground of laches.

The motion for leave is therefore denied, both on the ground of laches and the ground that the matters sought to be set up do not constitute defenses to the action.

[NOTE. Subsequently, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. Case No. 5,098.]

Case No. 5,098.

FRENCH v. EDWARDS et al.

Circuit Court, D. California. Oct. 7, 1878.

CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT—SALE UNDER SATISFIED JUDGMENT VOID—JUDGMENT—ESTOPPEL—TRUST ESTATE—EXECUTION SALE — RECOVERY OF ENTIRE LAND BY CO-TENANT — AMENDING RETURN —TAX SALE—PRESUMPTION—TRUST.

1. Under the statute of California of 1850 (St. 1850, p. 454, § 293), authorizing an entry of judgment upon confession without action, the statement required must be signed by the party in person; and a judgment entered upon a statement signed by the defendant's attorney in the case, is void.

2. Where the judgment under said act was entered upon a statement signed by two of the defendants in person, and by the attorney of the third, held, that the consent of those signing was only that judgment might be entered against all; and as there was no authority to enter judgment as to the third party, the judgment was unauthorized and void as to all.

3. Where an execution is issued upon a judgment and returned satisfied, and the judgment creditor afterwards assigns the judgment to one of the principal judgment debtors, a sale of the co-defendants' property upon a second execution, issued at the instance of the assignee of the judgment, is void.

4. French sued Edwards to recover land, and there was a trial, and judgment for defendant. Afterwards, French conveyed the land to Vance, who sued Edwards to recover the same land. Edwards set up as a defense, by way of estoppel, the prior judgment against French, and subsequent conveyance to Vance, and the court found the matter of estoppel, and gave judgment for defendant solely on that ground. Afterwards, said first judgment in French v. Edwards, was reversed on writ of error, and the cause remanded for a new trial; whereupon French, having amended his complaint, Edwards, in his answer thereto, alleged a conveyance from Vance to Reynolds with notice of Vance's judgment; that Reynolds is now prosecuting this action for his own benefit, and in turn set up, by way of estoppel, the said conveyance to Vance, and judgment in Vance v. Edwards [unreported]. Held, that the vacation of the judgment in French v. Edwards, after the judgment in Vance v. Edwards, which was based solely on the first judgment, removed the matter of estoppel, and that the judgment in Vance v. Edwards constituted no defense to the action.

5. A tract of land was conveyed to Vance, Sneath, and Melvin, "Trustees of the Sutter Land Company," an unincorporated association of more than thirty persons, Vance and Sneath being members. A judgment for a debt of the association having been recovered in an action to which all the members individually, including Vance and Sneath, were parties defendant, all of whom appeared, an execution was issued thereon, and the said land sold. Held, that Vance and Sneath had an undivided interest in both the legal and beneficial estate in the land, and that their interest at least passed by the sale.

6. The holder of an undivided interest in land under the laws of California may recover the entire land, as against all parties, except his cotenants.

7. Under a decree for taxes, the sheriff sold a large tract of land, and made a return that he sold to the "highest bidder," where the law required a sale of the smallest quantity that any party would take and pay the taxes and costs. Six months were allowed by law for redemption, at the expiration of which time the sheriff executed a deed, which recited a sale to the highest bidder. In an action by the grantee on the tax deed to recover the land, it having been held that the sale appeared upon the face of the return and deed to be void, the ex-sheriff, six years after the sale, by direction of the court, amended his return showing a valid sale, and afterwards executed a new deed corresponding with the amended return. Held, (1) That the original return was made in the regular course of the sheriff's duty, and was the proper and only record evidence of the mode of sale, and that it showed a void sale from which there was no necessity to redeem. (2) That the owner of the property was not bound to ascertain the mode of sale from any other source, and had a right to rely upon the truth of the record thus made. (3) That the ex-sheriff could not, years after the expiration of the time for redemption, amend his return so as to show the sale to be valid, which before appeared upon the record to be void, and thereby and by his reliance upon a false record cut the owner off from his right of redemption.

8. The presumption of a reconveyance of lands conveyed in trust, after it becomes impossible to execute the trust, arising under the conditions of this case as stated in French v. Edwards, 21 Wall [88 U. S.] 147, is a conclusive presumption.

[This was an action at law by Ira G. French against Thomas Edwards and others for the recovery of certain land.]

John Reynolds, for plaintiff.

J. H. McKune and J. W. Armstrong, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff has title unless it has been cut off in some one of the several modes suggested by defendants. None of the defendants claim title except Lincoln, who claims through a sale and sheriff's deed under a judgment for taxes. He has no other title. If this fails, then he, as well as the other defendants, claims that the title is outstanding in other parties.

1. The Milliken title relied on by defendants is manifestly void. The judgment by confession entered in 1850, under which Milliken purchased at sheriff's sale, conceding the proceeding to be in due form in other particulars, was not entered upon a statement made by the defendants as required by the statute. St. 1850, p. 454, § 293. The statute evidently contemplates a statement signed by the party in person against whom judgment is authorized to be entered without action. In this case one of the defendants did not sign the statement, but it was signed by a person purporting to sign as his attorney. Those who did sign consented to a judgment against all, not against themselves alone. This point has been decided by the supreme court of the state in a case arising under the same statute. Chapin v. Thompson, 20 Cal. 687. But if valid, an execution was issued and returned satisfied. That satisfied the judgment. Some six months afterwards the plaintiff assigned the satisfied judgment to one of the principal defendants, who thereupon had another execution issued, and sold thereunder the interest of his co-defendant in the premises in controversy to Milliken. Such a sale under a satisfied judgment could not affect the title. It does not appear that the holders of the Milliken title themselves even claim any interest in the land.

2. As to the matter set up as res adjudicata. The defendants in this case had judgment in 1867. Afterwards the plaintiff, French, conveyed to Vance, who brought suit to recover the premises against the same defendants. They set up as one defense by way of estoppel the said judgment recovered in this case in 1867, and the court held the plaintiff to be estopped by said judgment. Afterwards French sued out a writ of error upon the said judgment in this case of 1867, and it was thereupon reversed at the December term 1871. 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 506. The case having been remanded to this court for new trial numerous other proceedings were had, and the plaintiff, having in 1877 amended his complaint, the defendants in their answer thereto alleged that Vance, since the said judgment in Vance v. Edwards [supra], had conveyed to Reynolds, who took with notice of said judgment; that the action is now being prosecuted for the benefit of said Reynolds, and then set up in turn as one defense the said judgment in Vance against these defendants by way of estoppel against further litigation herein, which judgment rested solely on the former judgment in this case which had in the meantime been reversed as stated; and this is the matter adjudged now relied on. The question on this point is precisely the same as when presented to this court on motion for leave to file a supplemental answer setting up the Vance judgment. I am entirely satisfied with the view I took on that motion, and content myself with referring to the decision then rendered. French v. Edwards, [Case No. 5,097.]

As to the Martin and Lynch trust. I regard the decision in this case, reported in 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 150, where the facts are fully stated, as indicating the opinion of the supreme court to be that the presumption arising upon the facts stated is an indisputable or conclusive presumption. It must have been evident to the court that there had in fact been no reconveyance, and the court would scarcely have sent the case back on that point under these circumstances, if it had not deemed the presumption conclusive. The presumption in this class of cases is either conclusive or useless; and if useless, it might as well not be indulged. The ends of justice in such cases, doubtless require the presumption; but if so, they require it to be indisputable. I shall therefore act upon that view. I have, however, at the request of the defendant, and upon testimony admitted against the objection and exception of the plaintiff, found the fact upon the evidence that no reconveyance was actually executed. It is a fact in the case, and the defendants are entitled to have it found in this special verdict, so that they may have the benefit of it, if I have misapprehended the views of the supreme court as to the character of the presumption arising in the case.

4. As to the alleged Sutter Land Company trust. The Sutter Land Company was an unincorporated company, consisting of more than thirty members. A conveyance of the larger portion of the premises in controversy had been made to Vance, Sneath and Melvin, as trustees for the Sutter Land Company. In 1858, one Pettitt brought an action against the members of the Sutter Land Company for a debt due from the association, making all the members individually parties, and all answered. Vance and Sneath were two of the trustees, and were also parties defendant to the suit as members of the company. A judgment was obtained and a large portion of the property standing in the names of Vance, Sneath and Melvin, sold under an execution issued upon the judgment. All the title acquired under these proceedings became vested in the plaintiff before the commencement of this suit. Two of the three parties vested with the legal title, Vance and Sneath, and all the beneficiaries were parties to the suit. There being no corporation, Vance and Sneath had undivided interests in both the legal and equitable title to the land which was sold, as well as in the part unsold, and, at least, their interest in the part sold, passed by the judgment and sale, and this is sufficient in this state to enable the successor to their interest to recover against all the world except their co-tenants. I think, also, under such a state of facts the entire legal title which was vested in Vance and Sneath, and the entire beneficial interest in the whole, passed. Vance's interest, also, in the part not sold under the execution, passed to plaintiff by subsequent conveyance.

The evidence shows that the enterprise of the Sutter Land Company was long since abandoned, and, although Sneath and Melvin and the secretary of the company were examined as witnesses by defendants, it does not appear, nor am I aware, that any of the association now claim title for themselves, or that they ever have since the sale under said judgment, claimed any interest in said premises; and none of the defendants connect themselves with that title.

5. As to the tax title. After the reversal of the judgment by the decision reported in 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 506, on the ground that the tax deed originally executed is void upon its face, the defendant, Lincoln, on June 11, 1872—more than six years after the sale and return—procured an ex parte order of the state district court directing the ex-sheriff to amend his return to the order of sale in the tax sale, so as to show that the sheriff sold the least quantity of land that any party would take and pay the taxes and costs, instead of showing a sale to the highest bidder, as the return was originally made; and the ex-sheriff thereupon amended his return in accordance with said order.

On the same day he executed and delivered to Lincoln another deed in which he recited the facts as stated in the amended return.

The defendants thereupon filed supplemental answers setting up the title thus acquired by defendant, Lincoln, through the corrected return and new deed, since the former trial. Plaintiff claims on the one hand, that when the sheriff made his return, executed and delivered his deed in accordance therewith, and went out of office, his power was exhausted; and that even if he could amend his return by stating omitted acts, and make a new deed supplying corresponding defects, he could not amend by falsifying facts before returned, and make a new deed reciting facts inconsistent with his recitals in his first deed. On the other hand it is insisted that the return can be amended so as to correct errors in any particulars, and new deeds be made correct in fact in their recitals at any distance of time; and many authorities are cited to sustain this view.

The current of authorities undoubtedly sustains the general proposition maintained by defendants where no new rights will be gained or lost by the amendment. But there are facts in this case that do not appear to have been considered in any of the cases brought to my attention by defendants' counsel. Under the statute of California affecting the question, the owner of real estate sold under a judgment for taxes, had a right of redemption; but the time within which he was called upon to exercise it was extremely short—it being only six months. In this case, as in most others of the kind, the owner did not appear in the tax suit in any part of the case; and the whole proceedings from beginning to the end, including the sale and making of the first return and the deed and the amendment of the return and execution of the new deed, were without the presence of the owner. The return by the officer of his proceedings at the tax sale was made in the proper and ordinary course of his duty.

The act of 1851, concerning sheriffs, in force when the tax sale in question was made, provides that: "A sheriff to whom any process, writ, order or paper shall be delivered, shall execute it with diligence," etc., "and shall return it without delay to the proper court or officer with his certificate indorsed thereon of the manner of its service or execution." St. 1851, p. 191, § 6. The act of 1864, relating to sales under judgments for taxes, provides, that a copy of the decree, "duly certified by the clerk, shall authorize the sheriff to sell the property therein described, and such copy, when executed and returned by the sheriff, shall be filed with the other papers as a part of the judgment roll." St. 1863-64, p. 400, § 1. See, also, practice act then in force, section 212.

Thus, it was a part of the official duty of the sheriff to make a certificate, and indorse it on the process, of the manner of its execution; and the process in this case by express provision of the statute was a certified copy of the decree, which when returned with the certificate of the mode of execution was under the express provision of the statute to be "filed with the other papers as a part of the judgment roll." It was intended by the statute to become a part of the authentic public record of the proceedings for the information and security of all interested in them. This record was necessary not only for the purpose of informing the owner of the fact of sale, but of its terms, in order that he might know whether it was necessary to redeem under the law to preserve his property; and if so, what amount it would be necessary to pay to effect a redemption. This record, with the certificate of sale, are the authentic, official, and only means provided by law to furnish this information, and the facts stated in this record the owner of the land was entitled to rely upon as true.. It may be, if the sheriff had omitted to make any return other than to make the certificate of sale, and in due time the deed, that the want of a return would not have been fatal, the certificate and deed being correct and in due form. If this is so —but it is not necessary to decide the point now—having made a return, he was bound to speak the truth. The return being made became a part of the record of the case of which parties interested were bound to take notice, and upon which they were entitled to rely. If all the proceedings were regular, the owner was, perhaps, bound to know that a sale would be made, but he was not required to be present in person, and was not bound to know the terms upon which the sheriff actually sold otherwise than from the record made of it by the officer in his return as required by law, and for the purpose of giving this information.

In this case the sheriff made a return, which, as we have seen, formed a part of the public judgment record; and that record, the proper and only place to go for information, informed the world and the owner of the property sold, that the sheriff had sold a tract of land one mile long by half a mile wide which was in fact laid out into a city, and in part occupied as such, to the highest bidder for the sum of one hundred and seventy-five and forty-two one hundredths dollars. The owner consulting that record, and this is the only notice he is presumed to have had, was informed that the sale was an absolute nullity on its face; and that there was nothing from which he was called upon to redeem. If he examined this record, and so concluded, he judged rightly, for the supreme court so held in this very case on a former writ of error. If years afterwards, and after the expiration of six months from the sale, the ex-sheriff can amend his return, and his deed made in pursuance thereof, showing a valid instead of a void sale, the owner relying on the false record by this act loses the right of redemption. The purchaser, it is true, loses the benefit of his purchase; but he is necessarily present at the sale at which he himself buys, and knows the actual terms of sale. He also has notice by the record of the false return, and he can call upon the sheriff to correct it in time. If it be not corrected, and the record is permitted to speak a falsehood till the six months expires, it operates as a fraud—though doubtless, unintentionally—upon the owner by which he loses his property; and the purchaser by having notice by the record of its falsity without requiring its seasonable correction, is in some sense a party to the fraud.

If, under such circumstances either must suffer, it should be the purchaser, rather than the owner, whose loss by the error is usually vastly the greater. If either must be remitted to the responsibility of the sheriff in an action for a false return, it should be the party who knows, or is bound to know, the record to be false, rather than the one who does not. That a return can not be amended to the injury of any party was held in Newhall v. Provost, 6 Cal. 86. Freeman v. Paul, 3 Greenl. 263, 264, is in point. For the very reason that it would cut off a redemption, the court refused to permit the amendment of a return by showing, in accordance with the facts, the execution of a process three days earlier than appeared by the return. So, in Thatcher v. Miller, 13 Mass. 273, the court refused to allow a return to be amended where an injury would have resulted. See, also, 45 Mo. 116; 29 Vt. 332. In Thatcher v. Miller the court observes: "For an officer to undertake, six years after a defective return, to know with certainty the performance of a particular duty, when he is daily and hourly performing similar duties upon different persons, is more than can be expected, however strong his memory. In the cases cited, where amendments have been permitted, there was something in the record by which the correction could be made." And this language was quoted by the court with approbation in Means v. Osgood, 7 Me. 148, cited by defendants' counsel. In the case now under consideration, McClatchy, the ex-sheriff, was examined. He could not remember this particular sale, and only testified as to what was done at the sale from his recollection of what his custom was at tax sales. He did not even state that he was personally present at the sale, and the first return was made by a deputy, who would seem from the return to have made the sale; and he was not examined.

Even defendants' authorities recognize the principle stated as in Gilman v. Stetson, 16 Me. 124; Means v. Osgood, 7 Me. 147. The cases cited by defendants, are generally cases, such as where a summons, for instance, has been regularly served, but the return is defective. In such case the party has had his notice by the actual service of the process upon him, not by the return. The return is to enable the court, and others interested, to see that jurisdiction has been acquired. The party is bound to act upon the service made, and not upon the evidence furnished to the court. He has had the legal notice, and no injury is done him by correcting the record, so as to show the fact. He has had his opportunity to appear and defend. But in this case the owner was not bound to attend the sale in person, or to know the mode or form of the sale, except as he got it from the record, which the law requires the officer to make of his acts at the sale. The acts at the sale are not matters of record, except as they are made so by the return, and the owner gets his notice from that return, and not from a service on, or notice to, him personally At least, he is not bound to get it elsewhere; and there is no presumption that he gets it from any other source. If, relying on the official record, which is the only notice he is presumed to have, he is misled by a falsehood in the record, and thereby fails to redeem because the record shows nothing to redeem from, he is injured by the amendment of the record after the time of redemption is past, when it is too late to protect himself. In the other case where the service of the process is duly made, the party served has the proper legal notice, and he is not injured by the amendment showing the fact. This is the plain distinction between the two classes of cases. It does not matter that the party injured is a party generally to the action. The court has no more right to arbitrarily injure him than a stranger. The term, "not a party to the action," in some of the cases cited by defendants' counsel is loosely used. The question is, or should be, will anybody be injured by the amendment. In the case of a party, the amendment is allowed, not because he is a party, but because being a party, and duly notified, he has all the opportunity to which he is entitled, and he is not in fact injured by making a correct record of matters already within his knowledge. Returns are only allowed to be amended by courts in furtherance of justice. The amendment of a return, after a right of redemption is lost, by a party relying upon the false return, would certainly not be in furtherance of justice. It is true, that it is the duty of the owner by statute to make reasonable efforts to ascertain if there is any tax against him, and if so, to pay it, and thus avoid a sale of his property; but we are looking at the question in its legal aspect, and every citizen is entitled to stand upon his strict legal rights. No one familiar with the operation of the tax laws and sales, in this state at least, I apprehend, can doubt that it is for the interest of the citizen—and such interest is the interest of the public upon the whole, as well as of the individual citizen and the interest of justice—that in one-sided proceedings, without actual notice to the owner to divest his title to real estate for non-payment of taxes, the officer should be held to a rigid compliance in all important particulars with the statute upon the subject, and so the authorities in this state all hold; and that the official records of these proceedings, of which the public is bound to take notice, should be required to speak the truth, so that those interested shall not be misled to their injury. Our tax laws are complicated, and different taxes, and parts of taxes, are payable at different times. The taxpayer is required to hunt up his taxes, and seek the tax gatherer, instead of the tax gatherer seeking the taxpayer, or even notifying him individually of the tax against him.

These circumstances, together with careless assessments, especially of real estate—sometimes to wrong parties, to unknown owners, to different persons, and the like—render it difficult, if not next to impossible, for the citizen of average intelligence even, to know when he is through paying taxes for any given year. Under all these difficulties, and where officers charged with the execution of the law, and whose special duty it is to thoroughly familiarize themselves with their provisions, often themselves commit errors, it is not remarkable that honest citizens, absentees, women, and children, inheritors of estates of deceased persons often absent, who would willingly pay their taxes, and who endeavor to do so, sometimes make slips, and receive the first notice of an unpaid tax from the dealer in tax titles, when, with deed in hand, he demands possession of their property already sold, and the time of redemption expired. Where the period allowed for redemption from a tax sale is only six months, the time of redemption is so short as to make the right itself little less than a delusion—a right in name rather than in substance. One who has failed to find and pay the tax in time to prevent a sale would scarcely be likely to learn of the sale within six months afterwards, unless he should chance to require an examination of the title for the purpose of a mortgage or sale. Even then, professional searchers of records and experts sometimes fail to make the discovery. One can hardly have occupied a seat upon the bench, or have been a practicing attorney long in this state, without having cases of tax sales and deeds brought to his attention, wherein the taking of the property by the purchaser would be little short of downright plunder, effected under the forms of law.

Parties are not likely, willfully, or knowingly, to allow property of large value to be thus sacrificed without redemption. There is usually positive ignorance, or misapprehension, which, to a great extent, takes away actual culpability.

While no sympathy is due to the man who knowingly or willfully evades the payment of his share of the public burdens, or from culpable negligence fails to pay his taxes levied for the support of the government which protects him, it is, perhaps, upon the whole, fortunate, that the carelessness or ignorance of those charged with the execution of the tax laws, so often leaves an avenue of escape to the really honest, though unfortunate delinquent. At all events the interests of justice manifestly require the proceedings in tax cases to be in the strictest conformity to law in all essential particulars. I know nothing of the character of the delinquency in this particular case; but one rule must be established for all falling within the same legal principles. I think the amendment of the return and execution of the second deed under the conditions of this case so as to cut off the right of redemption not made in furtherance of justice, and that it was unauthorized by law. It may well be questioned whether a tax levied in solido, upon a whole tract of large extent laid out into city lots, and in part actually occupied as such, like this, and owned by a large number of different persons, as appears from the findings was the case here, is valid. And the character of the levy appears upon the face of the judgment roll. But under the view I take upon the points discussed, it will be unnecessary to consider the points made upon the invalidity of the proceedings prior to the sale.

The original complaint was filed in this case soon after the cause of action accrued, November 8, 1866, twelve years ago. Special findings have been prepared presenting fully all the facts upon which the rights of the parties depend. Should there be any error in the conclusions of law drawn from the facts, the appellate court will be able to reverse or modify the judgment, and render such final judgment as the rights of the parties may require without any further trial in this court, thereby ending a long, tedious, expensive, and troublesome litigation.

Under the view I take, there is no title in any of the defendants, and no outstanding title to any portion of the premises which are specifically stated in the findings of fact to be in the possession of the several defendants therein named, other than the lots excepted in the judgment ordered, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment. There must be a judgment for plaintiff in accordance with the order appended to the findings.

FRENCH v. FIRST NAT. BANK.

[7 Ben. 488; [1] 11 N. B. R. 189.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1874.

PLEADING IN EQUITY—INTERROGATORIES AND ANSWERS—CORPORATION.

1. A bill in equity was filed against a corporation praying for a discovery, and praying that the corporation might, "upon the several and respective corporal oaths of its proper officers, agents and servants, &c.," answer such interrogatories "as by the note hereunder written they are respectively required to answer." The corporation answered under its corporate seal, declining to answer the interrogatories, and the plaintiff excepted to the answer: Held, that a corporation must answer a bill in equity under its common seal, and not on oath.

2. As the note in this case did not require the corporation, but its president, cashier and agent, to answer, the corporation was not bound to answer.

3. Under this bill, the officers of the corporation could not be compelled to answer the interrogatories, because they were not parties; but they could be made parties, in order to obtain a discovery from them.

[Cited in Kelley v. Mississippi Cent. R. Co., 1 Fed. 567.]

4. The plaintiff might apply to amend his bill accordingly.

[This was a bill in equity by Stephen B. French, assignee in bankruptcy of William Adams, against the First National Bank of the city of New York.]

S. L. Gardner, for plaintiff.

Peabody & Baker, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The defendant is a corporation, and is the sole defendant. The bill prays for relief, and avers facts which lay a foundation for a discovery, and prays a discovery. A corporation must answer a bill under its common seal, and not on oath. This is well settled. Bronson v. La Crosse R. Co., 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 283, 302. The bill in this case prays that the corporation "may, upon the several and respective corporal oaths of its proper officers, agents and servants, according to the best and utmost of their several and respective knowledge, remembrance, information and belief," answer "such of the several interrogatories hereinafter mentioned and set forth, as by the note hereunder written they are respectively required to answer." The note appended to the bill does not require the defendant to answer any of the interrogatories, but says: "The president and cashier of the defendant, and its agent, surnamed Brown, are severally required to answer the interrogatories." The corporation has answered under its corporate seal. In its answer it states that it declines to answer the interrogatories. The plaintiff now excepts to the answer, "for that the said defendant hath not, to the best of its knowledge, and to the best of the knowledge, remembrance, information and belief of its officers and agents, answered and set forth, whether," &c.

Under the rules of equity practice established by the supreme court, a defendant is not bound to answer any interrogatories except such as, by the note at the foot of the bill, he is required to answer. In the present case, the note does not require the defendant to answer any of the interrogatories, but only requires its president and cashier, and its agent, Brown, to answer them. But the bill could be amended so as to require the defendant to answer them. Yet this would probably be of no use, for, as corporations answer under seal, and without oath, a discovery on oath could not be compelled from the corporation, except through the medium of such a discovery from its agents and officers, and by making such agents and officers parties defendant. Fulton Bank v. New York & Sharon Canal Co., 1 Paige, 311; Brumly v. Westchester Co. Manuf'g Soc., 1 Johns. Ch. 366.

Under this bill the officers and agents of the defendant cannot be compelled to answer the interrogatories under oath, because they are not defendants. The equity rules (41 to 44) clearly import that no one but a defendant can be compelled to answer the interrogatories in a bill. Officers of a corporation may be made parties defendant to a bill against the corporation, in order to obtain a discovery from such officers. Angell & A. Corp. §§ 674, 675; Story, Eq. Pl. § 235; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1501.

There is nothing in Kittredge v. Claremont Bank [Cases Nos. 7,858 and 7,859], which conflicts with these views. The plaintiff can, if he desires, so amend his bill as to require the defendant corporation to answer the interrogatories. It may then answer them under its seal, and without oath. But its answer must be stated therein to be made according to the knowledge and information and belief of its officers, ascertained from all proper sources of information.

The exceptions are overruled, with costs, with leave to the plaintiff to apply on notice for permission to amend the bill by adding new parties and otherwise.

FRENCH v. FIRST NAT. BANK.

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 1875.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY IN VIOLATION OF THE BANKRUPTCY ACT—COURSE OF BUSINESS.

A., living in Sag Harbor, was doing business with a bank in New York, depositing with and drawing drafts on the bank. On January 6, 1871, there was a debit balance against him on the books of the bank. The bank wrote him a letter on that day, telling him that his account was overdrawn, and that, if he could not send them money to meet this overdraft and drafts which they had refused to pay, he must send them securities on which they could make him a loan to keep his credit good. This letter the bank sent by a special messenger, and, on the 7th of January, A., having received the letter, gave the messenger securities amounting to $1,527.39, which he delivered to the bank on the 11th. Previous to the receipt of the securities by the messenger, other remittances had been received by the bank from A., and items were also in their hands, which were afterwards credited to A., so that, including all such items, at that time, the balance of his account at the bank was in his favor. The bank subsequently responded to him for that balance and for the $1,527.39. Bankruptcy proceedings were commenced against A. on January 21, 1871, and an assignee having been appointed, he brought suit against the bank to recover back the $1,527.39. Held, that the transaction was not in violation of the bankruptcy act, and that the bill must be dismissed, but without costs.

This was a bill in equity filed by the complainant [Stephen B. French], as assignee in bankruptcy of William Adams, of Sag Harbor [against the First National Bank of the City of New York], to set aside a transfer to the defendant by Adams of certain bills, checks, &c., which the complainant alleged to have been made within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy on January 21, 1871, contrary to the provisions of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The evidence shows that, at the close of business on the 5th of January, 1871, the bankrupt had a debit balance against him on the books of the defendant, of $1,868.35. On the 6th of January the defendants paid drafts drawn on them by the bankrupt, to the amount of $119.65. This made a debit balance against him on such books, of $1,988, at the close of business on the 6th of January. The defendants then wrote to him the letter of the 6th of January, which was sent to him by the special messenger, saying: "Your account with us is overdrawn about $2,000 and we have refused payment of about $3,000 more of your drafts. It requires full $5,000 to make you good. If you are short of money, so that you cannot send that amount by the bearer, you must send by him some bonds, notes, &c., that we can make you a loan on and save you from further discredit." The special messenger, with this letter, left New York on the 6th and arrived at Sag Harbor the same evening. Meantime, on the 7th, after the messenger had left, a remittance of $1,115.94, which had been sent by the bankrupt to the defendants on the 5th, arrived, and was credited by the defendants to the bankrupt, in account, on the 7th. They also credited him on the same day with $589.52, as the proceeds of $533.50 gold. On the same day they paid drafts drawn on them by him to the amount of $150.32. This left a debit balance against him, on their books, at the close of business on the 7th, of $433.86. But, the testimony of the cashier of the defendants shows that they had in their custody on the 7th the item of $140, coupons, afterwards credited in account on the 11th, and the item of $533.41, Hunt, afterwards credited in account on the 14th. The bankrupt was, therefore, not really indebted to them at all at the close of business on the 7th. As the result of their sending the special messenger, he obtained at Sag Harbor, on the 7th, the package containing the items which he delivered to the defendants on the 11th, and which they credited in account on that day, at $1,527.39. Whatever might have been the proper conclusion, as to this $1,527.39, if the bankrupt had not remitted the $1,115.94, which he did remit on the 5th, in the regular course of business, and which, on the evidence, must be regarded as having come to the hands of the defendants before the $1,527.39 was placed in the hands of the messenger, it is apparent that the $1,527.39 came to the hands of the messenger at a time when the bankrupt was not indebted to the defendants, but when they were liable to respond to him for the sum of $239.55. They subsequently responded to him for the $1,527.39 and the $239.55, and for a further item of $35 collected for his account on the 18th, being a total of $1,801.94.

I see, therefore, nothing in the transaction as to the $1,527.39 which the plaintiff can impeach as in violation of the provisions of the bankruptcy act. All the other remittances made by the bankrupt to the defendants appear to have been made in the ordinary course of business dealings between the parties, and there is no evidence of any intent on the part of the bankrupt, in respect to them, to give any preference to the defendants, even though at times his account may have been overdrawn, because he was constantly drawing on them and they were constantly paying drafts of his and receiving remittances from him, and they paid ten drafts of his after the 7th of January, namely, five on the 9th, two on the 14th, two on the 17th and one on the 18th. The bill must be

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1853.[2]

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES — REGULATION — SERVICE OF PROCESS ON AGENT—VARYING PROVISIONS OF STATUTE BY CONTRACT — JURISDICTION.

1. By a law of Ohio, all foreign insurance companies which, through an agency, do business in the state, are held amenable to the process of the state.

[See note at end of case.]

2. All such companies are liable to be sued, and a service on their agents shall bind the companies which they represent.

3. It would be unjust and impolitic, to require the injured insured to sue the companies in the state or country where they are located. There is one agency, if not more, in Cincinnati, from a London (England) office.

[Cited in Runkle v. Lamar Ins. Co., 2 Fed. 12.]

4. Parties can not, by a contract, agree upon a limitation different from the statute, within which suit shall be brought, or the right to sue be barred.

[Cited in Riddlesbarger v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 392.]

[Cited in Amesbury v. Bowditch Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 72 Mass (6 Gray) 605; Eagle Ins. Co. v. Lafayette Ins. Co., 9 Ind. 448.]

5. This would be in conflict with the law and its policy. Jurisdiction of corporations attaches, in the courts of the United States, from the place where their business is done.

[Cited in Stillwell v. Empire Fire Ins. Co., Case No. 13,449.]

6. Where a suit is founded on the record of a judgment, in which the court has jurisdiction, no error in the proceeding can be considered. Nor in such a case can nil debit be pleaded.

At law.

Smith, Fox & French, for plaintiffs.

Gregory & Orth, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of debt, on a judgment rendered in the commercial court of the city of Cincinnati; there are also counts in the declaration, on a policy of insurance. The policy of insurance was entered into in the city of Cincinnati, on certain property of the plaintiffs [French, Strong & Fine], by the defendant, to the amount of $2,500, which was lost by fire. A judgment was obtained, before the commercial court, in Cincinnati, for the amount of the policy. The defendants pleaded nil debit to the 2d, 3d, and 6th counts. And further to the 1st, 2d, and 3d counts, that they are founded on the same contract or policy of insurance. And that it was and is, a parcel of said contract, that no suit or action of any kind, should be brought against said defendant for the recovery of any claim on the policy, in a court of law or chancery, unless brought in six months after the loss. To the 4th and 5th counts, the defendant pleads nul tiel record. And further, to the 4th and 5th counts, defendant says, it is a corporation under the laws of Indiana, the principal place of business being at Lafayette, in said state. That the officers and directors are citizens of Indiana, and were, &c. That defendant was not served with process. That its agent living in Cincinnati for the purpose of making contracts of insurance, was not otherwise served, than by leaving a copy of the summons at his residence, by which the suit in Ohio was commenced. To the plea of nul tiel record the plaintiffs joined issue. And they demur to the pleas to the 1st, 2d, and 3d counts. And as cause of demurrer they say, that the matters pleaded in bar are in conflict with the law of the state, which is the law of the forum. Defendant joins in demurrer.

Among other conditions there is annexed to the policy the following: "It is further hereby provided, that no suit or action of any kind against the company, for the recovery of any claim upon, under or by virtue of the policy, shall be sustainable in any court of law or chancery, unless such suit or action shall be commenced within the term of six months next after any loss or damage shall occur; and if any such suit or action shall be commenced against the company after the expiration of six months, next after such loss or damage shall have occurred, the lapse of time shall be taken and deemed as conclusive evidence against the validity of the claim, thereby so attempted to be enforced." The plea in bar is founded on the above limitation of six months. This is not a condition on which liability is to attach. It does not affect the contract, but the remedy. A condition subsequent, for the payment of money, after the liability is fixed, by which the payment is barred, is a singular condition. It is nothing less than an act of limitation, of six months. A statute of limitation is founded upon public policy. A contract is void if made against the policy of the law. But this limitation in the policy is not only opposed to the policy of the law, but in fixing a different time from the statute, is in conflict with it. Can parties, in all contracts, make a statute of limitations for themselves, which shall bind the courts? There is no more reason why this should be done, in a policy of insurance, than in any other contract. Such a contract might well require notice of a loss, within a limited time, in order that the underwriters may inquire into it; but such is not the nature of the above limitation. The diligence required is, after the loss or damage shall have occurred, not to fix the liability, but to recover the money. By another clause the insurers are not liable to pay, until sixty days after proof of the loss—but the limitation of six months runs from the time of the loss. It may not be within the power of the party to prove the loss within six months, but if suit be not brought within that time, the agreement bars a recovery.

This is an attempt to discharge or bar a right of action, before the right occurs. It is a well settled principle, that a release can only operate upon an existing claim—a present right. Co. Litt. 265; 4 Mass. 688; 7 Mass. 155; 15 Mass. 110; 4 Pick. 368. Why has a condition or an agreement in a policy, providing that all disputes arising under it shall be referred to arbitration, been held to be void? Because it is an attempt to oust the jurisdiction of the courts. 2 Arn. Ins. 1245; 1 Phil. Ins. 23, 587; 5 State Rep. 134; 1 Wils. 129; 4 Watts 41; 6 Har. & J. 413. In 15 Mass. 110, the court say: "No cause can be found to show, that a party may be restrained by way of estoppel from maintaining an action, although it be in violation of an executory contract." An agreement for a valuable consideration or under seal, not to sue for a limited time upon a cause of action accrued or to accrue, can not be pleaded in bar to a suit, if brought before the period expires. 5 Blackf. 126; 6 Blackf. 283; 19 Johns. 133; 11 Pick. 159. Is there any difference as to the legal effect, between such an agreement, and one that suit shall not be brought, after the time limited? What is the nature of the contract of insurance? The underwriter takes the risk on his own terms, and agrees to pay the damage should a loss occur. Annexed to the policy, though not constituting an essential part of it, is an agreement, in the event of a loss the assured shall bring suit in six months or be barred. What is the consideration of this agreement? It is without consideration, unless it be considered as a part of the contract, under which the liability arises. Where a policy provided that the insured should not abandon, until six months after notice of capture to the underwriters, it was held the right to abandon accrued on the condemnation. 10 Johns. 273. If a mortgagor stipulate that his mortgage shall be irredeemable, he may still be let in to redeem. 1 Vern. 192. And if he agreed not to redeem after six months, would he be estopped? The time specified in the statute of limitations is as much a part of the policy of the law as the act itself. It is a matter of law, and cannot be changed by the contract of parties. If they may shorten the time expressed in the act, they may extend it; or they may, by their agreement, annul it. This, it appears to me, they cannot do. It would be a dangerous power. The law was not made for particular cases, but it is founded in a general policy, and applies equally to all contracts, as specified in the act.

Several other questions are made in the case. It is insisted that the corporation is not amenable to process in Ohio. This, as a general principle, can not be controverted, but the question is, is not the insurance company, though established in Indiana, under a law of that state, amenable to the process issued in this case, under the circumstances? By the Ohio act of 1847 [Laws Ohio 1847, p. 17], it is provided that "where the principal office of such insurer is located out of this state, in all suits instituted by virtue of this act, the service of process upon the agent of such insurer for the time being, in the county in which such contract shall be made, shall be as effectual, as though the same were made upon the principal. By the general statute, leaving a copy at the residence of the party, is service. Under the act of 1851, it is provided that the summons may be served, on the president or other chief officer, or any clerk, secretary, treasurer, director, or agent, of such foreign corporation or body politic, by the sheriff, and when so served, the said corporation shall be considered in court for judgment or decree against it. Under the above acts, the suit was brought in the commercial court of Cincinnati, against "the president and directors of the Lafayette Insurance Company," the corporate name being "The Lafayette Insurance Company." And this misnomer is now made an objection. It is too late to take advantage of this variance—it should have been pleaded in the commercial court. The description of the judgment, in the declaration, is substantially good. The insurance company, by establishing an agency at Cincinnati, came into the state, not by virtue of its original act of incorporation, but under the law of Ohio. It could come in under no other conditions. The agency was established with a view to profit, and having realized the contemplated advantages, it can not claim exemption from the liabilities imposed. The agent opened an office in the city—made insurance upon property binding the corporation. In fact he discharged, so far as regards insurances, the corporate functions of the company; and this the act of Ohio permitted, on the conditions that the company should be amenable, through its agent, to the courts of Ohio, on any contract of insurance. For this purpose the Ohio act substantially sanctioned the exercise of the corporate powers within the state. The condition imposed was just, and it was accepted by the corporation, and the suit in the commercial court was brought on a policy issued by the agent. There are several corporations of other states doing business, under similar circumstances, in Cincinnati. And there is one agency from a corporation of London, making insurances in the city. Would it be politic in the state of Ohio to permit these agencies to do business within it, and leave its citizens to seek redress by suit against the company in any other state or country, wherever it may be located? This would be unjust as well as impolitic. We have no doubt that the state of Ohio had a right to prescribe the conditions on which the defendant might do business in the state, and in coming into the state for that purpose, the conditions attach.

We think the judgment of the commercial court is conclusive as to the rights of the plaintiffs, as well to the service of process as to the amount of damages. The judgment comes before us as evidence, and the court having jurisdiction, no errors in the proceeding can be objected to collaterally. In regard to the question of jurisdiction made in the pleading, that some of the stockholders are citizens of Ohio, it is only necessary to remark that the law is now settled that the state which granted the charter, and within which the corporation does its business, determines its right to sue in this court, and not the citizenship of the stockholders, as was formerly held. And we think the late decisions on this subject have established the true principles on which jurisdiction, in cases of a corporation, should be sustained. The former rule to take jurisdiction from the citizenship of the stockholders, defeated, in many cases, the object of the law, in authorizing suits to be brought between citizens of different states in the courts of the United States. The corporators having united to accomplish certain purposes, appoint their agents to manage the concern and bind the stockholders, without regard to their citizenship. Formerly the stockholders were required to be citizens of the same state, or at least that no one of them should be a citizen of the same state as the other party, as that would defeat the jurisdiction of the court. On this ground, suits by or against corporations were frequently defeated for want of jurisdiction, while the fact of citizenship had no influence upon the merits of the case or the powers of the corporation. It was an objection—a technicality, without substance, and very often defeated an important right. This action being mainly founded on the judgment of the commercial court, which we think was conclusive, the other points made in the case have been considered, as they were earnestly discussed. Judgment on the record.

[NOTE. On writ of error, the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by the supreme court. Mr. Justice Curtis delivering the opinion, in which it was held that the state of Ohio may properly require a corporation created in another state to submit to proper conditions before doing business in that state; and these conditions must be deemed valid and effectual by other states, and by the supreme court, provided they are not repugnant to the constitution or laws of the United States, or inconsistent with those rules of public law which secure jurisdiction and authority of each state from encroachment by all others. In this case the condition provided that the agent of the foreign corporation should also be deemed its agent to receive service of process in suits founded on its contracts. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. PATENTS — DATE OF GRANT — DATE OF FOREIGN PATENT—REISSUE — EFFECT OF COMMISSIONER'S ACTION—DESCRIPTION AND CLAIM— SURRENDER AND REISSUE—ART—PROCESS.

1. The provisions of section 8 of the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 120], and of section 6 of the act of 1839 [5 Stat. 354], as to when a home patent shall bear the date of a foreign patent, relate only to such patents as are applied for here, after the issue of the foreign patent. Where, therefore, an application for a patent was made in this country in April, 1838, and acted on in that month, but a patent was not actually issued until June 20, 1840, at which time the patent was dated, and a foreign patent was obtained in August, 1838. Held, as the application here was before the foreign patent, that the grant of the patent here was under the general enactments of the act of 1836, and its term was properly from its date.

2. In cases of reissue, the action of the commissioner has more than prima facie influence in finally deciding the question of identity of invention.

[Cited in Hussey v. Bradley, Case No. 6,946.]

3. The patentee need not describe and claim, in the specification of a reissue, either in words or idea just what he described and claimed in his original.

4. There may be more than one reissue of the same patent; and it is for the public interest that the surrender and reissue should be allowed to follow each other as often as the inventor is content to be more specific or more modest in his claims.

5. The surrender and reissue, no matter how often they recur, are reciprocal—each in consideration of the other—and form together but a single act. If a reissue is invalid for want of authority to make it, the surrender is ineffective for want of authority to accept it.

6. The specification of the reissued patent must describe the same invention, and the claim can not embrace a different subject-matter than that which he sought to patent originally; but, unless the correction contemplated by the statute is narrowed down to a mere disclaimer, the

7. An art is entitled to protection, as well as the machinery or processes which the art teaches, employs, and makes useful.

8. The duplicate drawings, required by section 6 of the act of 1837 [5 Stat. 193], are unnecessary until the patent issues, and need not accompany the application.

9. There is no act that requires the jurat to an application for a patent to be dated.

This was a bill in equity filed [by Benjamin B. French, Adam J. Glossbrenner, and John M. Broadhead] to restrain the defendants [Henry J. Rogers, Josiah Lee, Zenas Barnum, and others] from infringing letters patent [No. 1,647] granted to Samuel F. B. Morse, June 20, 1840, reissued January 25, 1846, and again June 13, 1848 [No. 117]; also letters patent [No. 4,453] granted to him April 11, 1846, and reissued June 13, 1848 [No. 118]; and also letters patent [No. 6,420] granted to him May 1, 1849—all for inventions relating to electro-magnetic telegraphs.

Amos Kendall, George Gifford, St. George T. Campbell, and George Harding, for complainants.

Wm. M. Meredith, R. H. Gillett, Wm. Schley, and Peter McCall, for defendants.

KANE, District Judge. This case is before us on final hearing upon the pleadings and proofs. Professor Morse, under whom the complainants hold, has three patents: the first dated June 20, 1840, reissued after surrender on January 25, 1846, and again reissued after a second surrender, on June 13, 1848, which has been referred to in the argument as the "magnetic telegraph patent"; the second, dated April 11, 1846, also reissued on June 13, 1848, referred to as the "local circuit patent"; the third, dated May 1, 1849, referred to as the "chemical patent." The bill charges that the respondents have infringed all three of these patents; the answer denies the infringements, and controverts the validity of the patents.

I. The objections to the validity of the first patent, that for the magnetic telegraph, are stated in the defendants' brief as follows:

"1. That it does not run from the date of Morse's French patent.

"2. That the commissioner of patents had no authority in law to reissue a second time.

"3. That the claims set out in the first reissue are broader than the claims in the original patent; and the claims in the second reissue are broader than those of either of its predecessors; and are not for the same invention."

1. The first of these objections founds itself upon the fact, that Mr. Morse had obtained a patent in France for this same invention twenty-two months before his patent issued here; and it asserts that under the second proviso of the sixth section of the act of 1839, his American patent should in consequence have been limited to the term of fourteen years from the date of the French patent; and that not having been so limited, it is void.

This objection was fully met in the argument of the complainants. Mr Morse's application for a patent in this country was made in April, 1838, and was filed and acted on in the patent office before the 10th of that month; his French patent bears date the 18th of August following. There is, therefore, no room for the questions which were argued so elaborately, of the proper interpretation of this proviso in the sixth section of the act of 1839, and the eighth section, second clause of the act of 1836, which was also invoked, in any possible bearing upon the case of Mr. Morse. The proviso of 1839 must be interpreted by reference to the enacting words of the section which it limits; and the provisions of both the sections relate only to such patents as are applied for here, after the issue of a foreign patent. But Mr. Morse's application here was before his patent abroad—in nowise after it—and his American patent was granted, therefore, under the general enactments of the act of 1836, not under any special proviso or exception whatever, and its term runs properly from its date.

We do not see the justice of the criticisms upon his application, that the jurat affixed to it is without date of day or month; and that the drawings which accompanied it were not in duplicate. There is no act that requires the jurat to be dated at all; and the supplementary provision of the sixth section of the act of 1837, that "the applicant shall be held to furnish duplicate drawings," though directory in its terms, is not a condition; and it has obvious reference, in point of time, to the issuing of the patent, and not to the filing of the petition for it. Such has heretofore been the interpretation of the patent office, announced in the official circulars for the instruction and guidance of inventors; the practice founded on it is both reasonable and convenient; and no act of congress appears to conflict with it. If Mr. Morse's patent is invalidated on this ground, more than half the modern patents for mechanical inventions must probably fall with it.

2. The second objection to the patent is that the act of congress makes no provision for a second surrender and reissue. The thirteenth section of the act of 1836, which provides, in certain cases, for the surrender of a defective patent, and its reissue in an amended form, regards the new patent as substituted for the old one, with just the "same effect and operation in law" as if the specification had been filed first in the form which it takes in the reissue. It is difficult to see why, if the original patent could be amended, its substitute, having all the legal attributes of the original, can not be amended, also.

There is nothing in the words of the act, or in the policy which it proclaims, that limits the correction of errors to such as may have been the first discovered. On the contrary, if it be true, as we have supposed in determining the recent case of Batten v. Taggart [Case No. 1,107], that the patent is granted to the inventor in consideration of some benefit to be derived by the public from his disclosures, and that the reissue is in consideration of some more full or more accurate disclosure than that which he had made in his original specification, or some renunciation on his part of an apparently secured right—it is for the public interest that the surrender and reissue should be allowed to follow each other, just as often as the patentee is content to be more specific or more modest in his claims.

Besides, it might not be safe to assume too readily, that the act was intended to withdraw altogether, from the officers of the executive department, the power to accept a surrender and grant a reissue, which they had before, and which would sanction a second reissue quite as readily as a first. The act might, perhaps, be regarded more justly as affirming the propriety of the usage which had obtained under the former laws, and had been repeatedly recognized by the courts (Morris v. Huntington [Case No. 9,831]; Grant v. Raymond, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 220; Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 315), and as prescribing in addition the conditions and incidents which should attach to it thereafter in certain cases. It is hardly to be supposed that the merely clerical error of an engrossing subordinate, or the accidental inadvertence of the commissioner himself, is not capable of being rectified or supplied now, just as it was before the passage of the act. And yet, the construction, which regards this section as superseding the implied power of the commissioner, might lead to this; since the act makes no provision for correcting such mistakes on the part of the patent officers.

Still further: it must, as we think, be conceded, that if the commissioner's power to reissue is so restricted by the act as to be exhausted by a single exercise, his power to accept the surrender must be equally restricted, and equally transitory. And the argument then resolves itself only into another form of the question, whether the patent was for any purpose a valid one as it stood after the first reissue; because, if the second reissue was invalid for want of authority to make it, the second surrender was ineffective for want of authority to accept it—and so the patent stands as if it had not been surrendered the second time. The surrender and the reissue, no matter how often they recur, are reciprocal—each in consideration of the other—and forming together but a single act between the parties. It would be unconscientious to retain the consideration, while denying the validity of the grant. See Woodworth v. Hall [Case No. 18,017].

3. We pass to the third objection, the supposed variance in the reissues. From the course of some parts of the argument on this point, it might be inferred that the objects as well as the import of the thirteenth section of the act of 1836, had been misapprehended by the learned counsel for the respondents. It is not the meaning of the law that the patentee who applies for a reissue must, at his peril, describe and claim in his new specification, either in words or idea, just what was described and claimed in his old one. His new specification must be of the same invention, and his claim can not embrace a different subject-matter from that which he sought to patent originally. But, unless we narrow down the correction which the statute contemplates till it becomes a mere disclaimer, it is not possible, in any case, to frame a correct specification, which shall not be broader than the one originally filed. To supply a defect, to repair an insufficiency, is to add—either directly, or by modifying or striking out a limitation; in either form, the effect is to amplify the proposition; in the case of a specification under the patent laws, it is to amplify the description and enlarge the claim.

There are few things more difficult, even for well educated and practiced lawyers, than to describe a new invention clearly, and point out the principle which distinguishes the subject of it from all things known before. And as inventors are rarely experts either in philology or law, it has long been established as a rule, that their writings are to be scanned with a good degree of charity. But it is easy to abuse this liberality to the purposes of fraud. The public has rights to be guarded also; and these exact, that the patentee's specification shall set forth his invention so fully and definitely that it can not be readily misunderstood.

It is the purpose of the statute to reconcile this seeming conflict; and it effects it by allowing the inventor to amend the mistakes he has honestly fallen into in his description and claim of title, as soon and as often as he discovers them. And there is the more reason for this indulgence, since under the act of 1836, § 7, the specification is reviewed by the commissioner before the patent issues, and is very often modified in accordance with his suggestions, or to obviate objections made by him to its original form. He may be supposed to know, therefore, better than any one else but the patentee himself, what the invention was for which the patent was sought at first; and he may also know whose inadvertence, accident or mistake it was, that made the first specification inoperative or invalid. It is not absolutely impossible that it may have been his own, as certainly it had his implied concurrence.

And this consideration furnishes a strong argument for the rule, that the commissioner's action, in ordinary cases of reissue, shall have more than a prima facie influence in finally deciding the question of identity of invention. Whatever be the extent of the rule; whether it leaves nothing open for discussion before the court, but the issue of fraud —as appears to have been the undivided opinion of the supreme court, in the Case of Stimpson, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 404—or whether we permit ourselves to except from it as we did in Batten v. Taggart [supra], in cases in which the invention claimed in the reissued patent is obviously different from that claimed in the original; or whether, with Judge Story, in Allen v. Blunt [Case No. 216], and in Woodworth v. Stone [Id. 18,021], we hold the grant of the amended patent to be "conclusive as to the existence of all the facts, which by law are necessary to entitle the commissioner to issue it; at least, unless it is apparent, on the face of the instrument itself, without any auxiliary evidence, that he was guilty of an excess of authority; or that the patent was procured by a fraud between him and the patentee." Whatever be the rule, or its limitations, the propriety of the reissue in the case before us can hardly claim a judicial review. There is no want of jurisdiction, either apparent on the face of the proceedings, or asserted by the evidence; and there is no fraud imputed, or justly imputable.

Nor is there any flagrant diversity of claim. After a repeated and careful examination of the three specifications, with their respective claims, fully aided by the acumen of highly ingenious counsel, we have not found a material difference of import between any of them. The order in which the subjects of claim are marshalled is not the same throughout; a phrase is more concise in one, in another more popular; in one, a scientific term, or a general expression, takes the place of the descriptive or defining language, or the detailed particulars of another; in a word, they are unequal as specimens of artistic writing, and a close examination may detect defects in the two first, which are repaired in the last. But they all describe the same thing essentially; and we should find it easier to argue that neither the first nor the second specification could be rightfully regarded as "inoperative or invalid," for want of precision and clearness, than that there was an important variance in the second from the first, or in the third from either. These observations form the answer to the third objection.

Mr. Morse's patent of 1840, in all its changes, asserts his title to two distinct patentable subjects; the first, founded on the discovery of a new art; the second, on the invention of the means of practicing it.

1. That he was the first to devise and practice the art of recorded language, at telegraphic distances, by the dynamic force of the electro-magnet, or, indeed, by any agency whatever, is to our minds plain, upon all the evidence. It is unnecessary to review the testimony for the purpose of showing this. His application for a patent in April, 1838, was preceded by a series of experiments, results, illustrations, and proofs of final success, which leave no doubt whatever, but that his great invention was consummated before the early spring of 1837. There is no one person, whose invention has been spoken of by any witness, or referred to in any book, as involving the principle of Mr. Morse's discovery, but must yield precedence of date to this. Neither Steinheil, nor Cooke and Wheatstone, nor Davy, nor Dyer, nor Henry, had at that time made a recording telegraph of any sort. The devices of the first three were merely semaphores, that spoke to the eye for the moment—bearing about the same relation to the great discovery now before us, as the Abbé Sicard's invention of a visual alphabet for the purpose of conversation bore to the art of printing with movable types. Mr. Dyer's had no recording apparatus, as he expressly tells us; and Professor Henry had contented himself with the abundant honors of his laboratory and lecture-room.

When, therefore, Mr. Morse claimed, in his first specification, "the application of electro-magnets" "for transmitting, by signs and sounds, intelligence between distant points;" and "the mode and process of recording or marking permanently signs of intelligence transmitted between distant points;" and when in his second specification he claimed "the making use of the motive power of magnetism, when developed by the action of currents of electricity as a means of operating and giving motion to machinery, which may be used to imprint signals upon paper or other suitable material," "for the purpose of telegraphic communication;" characterizing his invention as "the first recording or printing telegraph by means of electro-magnetism;" and when in his third—after again describing his machinery and process, he once more characterized it in the same terms, and claimed "as the essence of his invention, the use of the motive power of the electric or galvanic current (electro-galvanism, as he now terms it), however developed, for making or printing intelligible characters, signs or letters, at any distance;" through these several forms of specification claiming and renewing his claim of property in the same invention, as it seems to us; and claiming in each and all of them no more, as it also seems to us, than he was justly entitled to claim; he declared the existence of a new art, asserted his right in it as its inventor and owner, and announcing fully its nature and merits, invoked in return the continued protection of the laws.

From this time his title was vested as patentee of the art, and other men became competitors with him only in the work of diversifying and perfecting its details. He himself used the stylus, to impress paper or parchment, or wax-coated tablets, it may be: though he sometimes made a colored record by the friction of a pencil; another substitutes a liquid pigment, or stains his paper with a chemical ink; the next perhaps stains his paper beforehand, and writes on it by decomposing the coloring matter; and another yet, more studious of originality than the rest, writes in a cyclovolute, instead of a straight line, and manufactures his ink as he goes along, by decomposing the tip of his stylus on a chemically moistened paper. They are, no doubt, all of them inventors; as was the man who first cast type in a mold, or first bent metal in the practical semblance of a grey goose-quill, or first devised sympathetic ink, that the curious in letter writing might vail their secrets from the profane. All these toiled ingeniously and well, to advance or embellish a pre-existing art. But they had no share in the discovery of the art itself, and can no more claim to share the property, which its discovery may have conferred on another, than he who has devised some appropriate setting for a gem can assert an interest in the gem itself.

Yet, admitting, for the sake of argument, that Mr. Morse's leading invention is correctly designated as a new art; and that he has sought to patent it accordingly, by a compliance with all the requisitions of the statute—it is still contended, and with much of elegant research into the radical meaning of the term, that an art, as such, can not be made the subject of a patent. But interpreting language as men use it around us, and as it reflects ideas, the question can hardly be regarded as doubtful. The constitutional provision under which our patent laws are framed, looks to the promotion of "useful arts." The act of congress places "a new and useful art" among the discoveries it proposes to protect, and assigns to it the first place on the list. The statute of 21 James I, c. 3, from which the patent system of England has grown up, speaks only of "new manufactures." Yet the judges of that kingdom find a warrant, in this limited expression, for sustaining patents for an art, and even for the renewed discovery of an art that had been lost. See the Hot-Blast Case [Household C. & I. Co. v. Neilson], Webst. Pat. Cas. 683, 717, and Mr. Webster's note at page 718, and the case Wright's Patent, Id. 736, and the cases grouped in Hind. Pat. 77, 102.

Indeed, the author whose treatise we have cited last, asserts with much emphasis that it is the art, and nothing else, which is the characteristic subject of every privilege granted by a patent under the statute, page 92. And it may be noted, as not without interest, that in just accordance with the spirit of the English law cases, the English patents of Cooke and Wheatstone, Davy and Bain, claim property in the arts, for which their mechanical devices are respectively adapted; not indeed in so many words, but in language as unequivocal as that employed by Mr. Morse.

Nor can we see that there is any reason of policy, which should deny protection to an art, while extending it to the machinery, or processes, which the art teaches, employs, and makes useful. Why should the type, or the ink, or the press itself, be dignified beyond the art, to which they minister in such humble subordination, and without which they are rubbish? Will you patent the new product, and the new elemental means, and the new process by which they act, and then debate whether you may patent the art? You have patented it already.

We are aware, of course, that it has been held in some cases under the English patent law, that the art to be patented must have some reference to a manufacture. See Hind. Pat. ut supra. But while such a deduction might be legitimate from the words of the statute of James, it would be obviously otherwise under the more liberal phraseology of our act of congress. And even in England, it must be apparent to every one who has watched the progress of their patent system, that this limitation is practically disregarded already, and that it is to be repudiated so soon as it shall interfere with the protection of an important invention.

Yet in truth, there are few discoveries of practical moment to the daily concerns of man, even in the lapse of many years, that are not more or less directly connected with some department of manufacturing industry and skill. The convex lens, the steamboat, the iron road on which cars are propelled by the friction of driving-wheels—some of these may be so indirectly connected with manufactures—or, rather, they are associated so intimately with the leading pursuits and interests and enjoyments of all of us—as to make it difficult to refer them to the category of a particular manufacture. Would it not be strange, if, on this account, they were excluded from the benefits of the patent system? If we go back to the early story of our race, and mark the stages of its long and difficult advances, from language, the first exponent of thought, to letters, its first record, and from letters to printing, which first diffused letters, widely, though slowly, among men; and from printing to the telegraph, the electric register of thought, spreading its fibers of sympathy over the intelligent world, and making it throb simultaneously everywhere, as with the pulsations of one heart; who will say that the transition between these epochs, that signalize the moral and intellectual progress of mankind, should not be marked by a memorial as stately as the first clipping of a cut-nail, or the compounding of a new variety of liquid blacking; or that the men, to whom we owe them, should not be dealt with as liberally, or at least as justly by the state?

2. The second general subject of Mr. Morse's patent of 1840 includes many particulars; all of them interesting and valuable in connection with the claim we have just been considering. Taken together, they give a practical form to his leading invention, and guard it from the imputation of being a mere abstract notion—a principle resting in idea. Taken singly, some of them appear to us to be new; as his alphabet (claim 5), his combined series (claim 4), by which the electric current from one battery, before entirely expending itself in its lengthened circuit, is made to set another battery in action, from which another circuit traverses to a battery still beyond—and so onward; his adaptation of clock-work to the recording cylinder (claim 2), and others, are only new, as they are elements of a novel combination. There is no proof before us, that any of the devices, which Mr. Morse has claimed in this patent, whether as independent inventions or parts of a combination, are not really his as far as he has claimed them. It is unnecessary to discuss them in detail, for they are all substantially protected, as appliances of the art which is the great subject of his patent.

II. The second patent of Mr. Morse is for what has been termed his "local circuit." To understand the questions which arise upon this, it is necessary to refer back to the apparatus which he had patented before, and to explain in general terms its principle and modes of operation. I shall attempt to do this in popular language, without stopping to consider very carefully the varying niceties of scientific nomenclature.

It is well known that a current of galvanic electricity, while passing along a wire that has been wound spirally around a bar of soft iron, communicates to the iron a certain degree of magnetic virtue, and that the iron loses this magnetic character again as soon as the electricity ceases to pass along the wire that surrounds it. It is also well known that the electric fluid may be passed along a wire of great length, and yet retain, when at the farthest extremity of the wire, a sufficient degree of energy to impart this occasional magnetism to the iron, and to make it capable, for the time, of attracting any small body of iron that may be near it. If such a small body of iron be made to form the extremity of a nicely-balanced lever, it is plain that while the one extremity of the lever is attracted toward the temporary magnet, the other extremity will be moved in the opposite direction; and if to this other extremity we affix a pencil, or stylus, this will press upon whatever surface may be interposed in the way of its motion, and may either mark the surface, or, if it be of a yielding nature, indent it. It is plain, also, that when the bar of soft iron ceases to be magnetic, in consequence of the electric fluid ceasing to pass around it, the lever will take its original position, and the stylus cease to press upon the resisting surface.

If, now, we suppose that surface to be moved uniformly below the stylus, it is obvious that the surface will be marked with a straight line, and that this marked line will be interrupted during any intermission of the electric current, so as to form a broken series of straight lines, or if the electric current passes and intermits, in rapid alternation, a series of dots or points. These broken traces of the stylus, the lines and dots, constitute the alphabet of Mr. Morse—a certain succession of either or a certain combination of the two being arbitrarily chosen to indicate a particular letter.

The galvanic battery generates the electric fluid continuously, whenever the two extremes or poles of the battery are connected with a suitable conducting medium—such as a metallic wire, water, or with the earth itself—along which conductor, as it is called, the electric fluid may pass between one pole of the battery and the other, thus performing what is termed an "electric circuit."

Let us now extend a continuous wire from one of the poles of the galvanic battery to a distant point, taking care that it shall not be intermediately in contact with the earth, or with any other good conductor of electricity; and let us, at a distant point, pass a wire in a spiral coil around a bar of soft iron, and thence lead it back again into the other pole of the battery, or avail ourselves of the earth itself as a part of the circuit. It is obvious from what we have said before, that the electric fluid passing from the battery, along the wire, around the occasional magnet, and back to the battery—and then at appropriate intervals of time interrupted in its circuit—will cause the stylus to make its trace of lines or dots, or in other words, its alphabetical record, at the distant station.

It only remains then, to devise a mode of interrupting and renewing at pleasure, the flow of the electricity; "breaking and closing the circuit," in the language of the experts. This is done by dividing the wire near the battery, and then arranging a simple finger-key, which, when struck or pressed upon by the finger, brings a short metallic conductor into intimate contact with the two ends of the divided wire, and thus restores the continuity of the circuit while the pressure continues on the key. This may serve as a rude explanation of Mr. Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph, in its simplest form.

It was found, however, during an early period, that though the electric current was still appreciable after it had passed over a great length of wire, yet in traversing the very long circuits that were required to include distant telegraphic stations, it ceased to impart a sufficient degree of energy to the temporary magnet to work the stylus effectively. To meet this difficulty, Mr. Morse resorted to the simple device of employing a series of batteries, distributed over his line of telegraphic communications, with as many shorter circuits, each operating, by means of a magnet at its extremity, to control the movements of a small lever, that opened or closed the circuit of the battery beyond. The last battery gave efficiency to the recording apparatus at the distant station. This formed the combined series of Mr. Morse's first patent.

It is easy to see that the intermediate magnets of the combined series, besides opening and closing the circuits, might be also made to act as recording magnets, by merely adapting to them the stylus with its appendages; and that there would thus be as many stations of telegraphic communication as there were batteries and minor circuits. But there still remained this objection to the combined series, that it could only be worked in one direction, and that it was necessary, therefore, to have two complete lines of wires, with their batteries and magnets, in order to establish a reciprocating communication.

To dispense with this duplication of machinery and expense was the object of Mr. Morse in the invention which is the subject of his second patent. It had been found that the magnetism excited by the electric coil was capable, at the end of an almost indefinitely extended circuit, of giving motion to a delicately adjusted lever, but that this was the apparent limit of its dynamic power. A single wire might be employed then, without intervening magnets, by connecting it at the extremities with electro-magnets, of great sensibility of mechanism, and employing the force of those magnets merely to open short local circuits, from which local circuits the degree of magnetic energy adequate to the purposes of the recording apparatus could be derived.

But the electric current, after passing over a long wire, does not exert a uniform dynamic energy. However carefully insulated at first, the wire becomes, after a time, more or less exposed to atmospheric action, and the fluid is more or less dissipated in consequence. The posts on which it is supported become conductors during storms of rain, and carry off the fluid to the earth. Under other circumstances the electro-magnetic phenomena are exaggerated at the receiving station by atmospheric electricity from the regions through which the conducting wire has passed. The batteries, too, do not always generate the fluid with the same rapidity. In a word, the current at the extremity of the circuit is irregular.

And besides all this, it is found that the magnetism induced in soft iron by the electric current, though truly occasional, does not absolutely cease at the instant of breaking the circuit; but seems to linger in the iron for an appreciable interval of time afterward, with an intensity which, though slight, bears an apparent relation to the intensity of the current that produced it. This of itself would interfere greatly with the very rapid operation of the telegraph, if the lever were left to withdraw itself from the magnet, to which it serves as an armature, by the force of gravity alone. A small spring is therefore connected with the machine, of sufficient strength to overcome the attraction of this lingering or continuous magnetic force, but not sufficient to resist the attraction of the magnet when the circuit is closed.

Now it is apparent that under the varying circumstances that influence the magnetic energy at the further extremity of the circuit, the adjustment of this spring must not be uniform. If its tension were just that which would neutralize or barely overcome the continuous magnetism induced by an electric current of small intensity, it would not draw back the armature when the inducing current had been in greater force; and on the other hand, a stronger spring, adapted to the case of a powerful current, would oppose a controlling resistance to the magnetism induced by a feeble one. The "adjustable receiving magnet," described in Mr. Morse's second patent, meets perfectly the conditions of this difficulty, and enables the operator, by the mere touch of a finger on an adjusting screw, to regulate the tension of the spring, and adapt his apparatus to the circumstances of the moment.

The main line, thus arranged, with its delicate receiving magnet, and its short recording circuit at each extremity, made no provision for intermediate or collateral stations. But, as it had been found desirable in practice to distribute the batteries, in which the electric fluid was generated, over different parts of the line, so as to reinforce the energies of the current in its progress, it was almost an obvious suggestion to connect at these several points a receiving magnet of adjustable character, either with the main line or with the battery, forming part of it, and to attach to this receiving magnet a local registering circuit, or a branch circuit, leading to one or more collateral stations.

Such I understand to be Mr. Morse's local or independent circuit. His patent of 1840, as reissued in 1848, claims it in these words: "The employment in a certain telegraphic circuit, of a device or contrivance called the 'receiving magnet,' in combination with a short local independent circuit or circuits, each having a register and registering magnet, or other magnetic contrivances for registering, and sustaining such relation to the registering magnet, or other contrivances for registering, and to the length of circuit of telegraphic line, as will enable me to obtain, with the aid of a main galvanic battery and circuit, and the intervention of a local battery and circuit, such motion or power for registering as could not be obtained otherwise without the use of a much larger galvanic battery, if at all."

That the local or independent circuit, as we have described it, and as it is more accurately and, perhaps, more intelligibly set out by Mr. Morse, in his specification, was original with him, can not be seriously questioned. The devices referred to in the patents of Cooke and Wheatstone, and Davy, are at best imperfect modifications of the combined series of Mr. Morse's first patent; one of them not improbably borrowed from it. The adjustable receiving magnet, the indispensable and characteristic element of the local circuit patent, no one has claimed but himself.

It is only to make the first approach to a controversy on this point, to prove to us that Professor Henry had, as early as 1828, made the "intensity magnet," with which the scientific world is now familiar—or that he afterward, and before Mr. Morse's first application for a patent, had illustrated, before his class at Princeton, the manner in which one circuit could operate to hold another closed or to break it at pleasure—or that he had foreseen the applicability of his discoveries to the purposes of a telegraph. The question is not one of scientific precedence; and if it were, this is not a forum that could add to or detract from the eminent fame of Mr. Henry. It is purely a question of invention applied in a practical form to a specific use; and so regarded, it admits of but a single answer.

In passing from the questions of originality and identity of invention that have been raised in the cause, without a more detailed review of all the testimony, there is occasion, perhaps, for an explanatory remark. It is this: the decree of a judge finds its appropriate and only justification in the facts proved before him, not in theories, however ingenious, or the less speculative inferences of other minds; and where the essential facts of a case are as clearly established as they are here, it would be unprofitable as well as painful to discuss the particulars of variance between the witnesses. There is no place in which the evidence of scientific men, upon topics within their own departments of knowledge, is more to be desired than in this court, when sitting for the trial of patent causes; and the opinions also of such men, when duly supported by reasonings founded on ascertained fact, must of course be valued highly. But it is a mistake to suppose that, even on a question of science, opinion can be dignified here or elsewhere with the mantle of authority. Still less can we allow it to avail us here, when it assumes contested facts, or volunteers to aid us in determining the most important written instruments.

These remarks are not dictated by a spirit of unkind or uncourteous commentary on the depositions before us. We know that when opinion is active, it is not always easy to limit its range. There is, besides, very much of accurate scientific history, and of just and well-guarded deduction from it, in these two volumes of exhibit. But it must be confessed also, that there is to be found here and there not a little of imperfectly considered dogma, as well as something of doubtfully regulated memory—and it has seemed to us, in this case, as well as in some others, that the toil and expense and excitement of litigation might have been moderated perhaps, if the appropriate tone and province of testimony had been more exactly understood by some of the witnesses.

The objections which have been taken to the terms of the reissue of Mr. Morse's patent of 1846, may be answered by a simple reference to that part of our opinion in which we have considered the arguments of the same character that were urged under the patent of 1840.

It is beyond controversy, that the local circuit patent has been infringed upon at some of the stations of the respondents' line; and it is the opinion of the court, that it is also violated whenever the branch circuit of Mr. Rogers is employed. We have not been able to see the asserted difference in principle between the two devices. Both are equally well described as branch or as local circuits. They have the same purpose; they effect it by the same instrumentality, even in appearance to a great degree, and they seem to vary only in this: that the one derives its electric fluid from a battery placed within the line of the main circuit; the other from a battery placed without it. The change may be for the better; or it may not—if it be, it is patentable as an improvement; but it can not be used without Mr. Morse's license, until after his patent has expired.

III. The third patent is for the chemical telegraph. We do not propose to enter on the discussion of this. The subject of it is clearly within the original patent of Mr. Morse, if we have correctly apprehended the legal interpretation and effect of that instrument. We will only say, that we do not hold it to have been invalidated by the decision of the learned chief justice of the District of Columbia, on the question of interference. The form of the two machines before him was not the same; and the leading principle of both having been already appropriated and secured by the magnetic telegraph patent of 1840, nothing remained but form to be the subject of interference.

The counsel for the complainants will be pleased to prepare for the consideration of the court, the draught of a decree in accordance with the prayer of their bill.

ADMIRALTY—DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDS OF SALE OF VESSEL—PRIORITY.

[1. Where demands against a vessel are of like character, without intrinsic priority of privilege, as for advances, repairs, materials, labor, etc., the parties are to be classed in payment out of the proceeds in the order of bringing their suits, while creditors holding the higher privilege, as seamen, pilots, and bottomry lenders, are to have priority without regard to time of bringing their suits, where the validity of their claims is conceded or decreed.]

[2. To impound a fund in admiralty until a decision can be had upon the validity of a contested claim, the creditor must have sued out attachment or pleaded his lien to an antecedent action. The presentation of a bottomry bond and petition under it is not sufficient.]

[3. Questions as to the validity of bottomry claims will not be entertained on motion and notice.]

[4. Creditors having obtained decrees against the proceeds of a vessel, where bottomry creditors come in and arrest the fund, may make themselves parties and contest the bottomry claims.]

[These were libels in rem by Charles F. French and others against the bark Superb.]

BETTS, District Judge. Various libels have been filed by different parties against the vessel, and she has been sold under decrees obtained thereon, and the proceeds are now in court. Application is made for the direction of the court as to the order of priority to be observed in distributing those proceeds. It is only necessary that the court shall lay down the general principle which is to govern the clerk and parties in drawing the funds from the registry and apportioning them on the respective decrees; and I shall not, therefore, go over the pleadings to determine in what class the several demands are to be ranged.

When the demands are of like character, without intrinsic privilege, the parties are to be classed in the order of bringing their suits. Accordingly, creditors for advances, repairs, materials, labor, etc., supplied the vessel, are to be paid each in full in the order of commencing their suits. Creditors holding the higher privilege, as seamen for wages, pilots, and bottomry lenders, are to have a priority of payment out of the fund, without regard to the time their suits were instituted, provided the validity of their claims is conceded by the other parties or is decreed by the court. But if demands of that character are in contestation, then they are not to be regarded if presented only by way of petition. To impound the fund until a decision can be had upon the validity of the claim, the creditor must have sued out his attachment and placed the fund under its control, or at least have pleaded his lien to the antecedent action. If the fund stands attached on any demand of that character, no distribution can be had until the attachment is regularly discharged, on the hearing upon the merits in the suits which may be in contestation, or on motion because of the invalidity upon its face of the alleged lien, or because of some irregularity in enforcing it. A creditor holding a bottomry bond cannot stay the distribution to the creditors of an inferior degree, merely by presenting his bond and petitioning under it. He should at least have come in by answer to their suits, or, which is the regular course, have arrested the vessel or her proceeds, so that the other creditors could have the opportunity to take issue upon his claim and have its validity determined by the court. Such questions wi l not be entertained on notice and motions merely. If, after decrees rendered in favor of any of those parties, bottomry creditors come in and arrest the fund, it is competent for those having obtained decrees to make themselves parties and contest the validity of the bottomry demand. These principles will determine whether the fund is now in a situation which allows of an immediate distribution to any of the parties having obtained their decrees. It is sufficiently indicated already that the prosecuting creditors are not to take pro rata upon their debts, but have a right to full payment in the order of their respective actions, subject only to the stay by any bottomry demands which have actually attached the fund.

JUDGMENTS — COURTS OF STATES IN REBELLION—DEBT FOR SLAVES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW —OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

[1. A judgment of a state court of Georgia, rendered in a civil suit between citizens of the state during the war of the Rebellion, is valid as between the parties.]

[2. The provision of the Georgia constitution of 1868 (article 5, § 17), that the courts shall have no jurisdiction to enforce a debt, the consideration of which was a slave or slaves, or the hire thereof, is void, as impairing the obligation of contracts, so far as it relates to contracts made before the emancipation proclamation.]

This was an action of debt [by Jefferson C. French against Lewis Tumlin] on a bond conditioned for the payment of a judgment obtained by one Chisolm (whose assignee plaintiff was) in the inferior court of Cass (now Bartow) county, November 25th, 1861, but stipulating that "if the state convention, to be held in December, 1867, or any state legislature, shall pass any resolution, ordinance, act, or law that shall relieve defendant from his constitutional and legal liability to pay said judgment, or any part thereof, then defendant is to be relieved and discharged from complying with said obligation in the same way and manner, and to the same extent, that he is relieved and discharged from the payment of the judgment," &c. Defendant pleaded among other things that there was no consideration for the bond, because the judgment therein mentioned was utterly void, being rendered while the sovereign authority of the state was displaced and its constitutional government overthrown, and whilst its functions were usurped by a spurious and revolutionary government; and that said judgment was rendered by and under said spurious and revolutionary government, and was for the price and purchase-money of slaves, and for no other cause; that plaintiff took said bond with notice of these facts, and that he paid no value for the same, &c. To this plea there was a replication and to the replication a special demurrer, but these are not necessary to notice in the view taken by the court.

Akin, Hammond & Son and Mr. Dougherty, for plaintiff.

Mr. Bleckley, for defendant.

ERSKINE, District Judge. The obvious intention of the plea is to show that there was no consideration for the making of the bond; and, under the Code, want of consideration is a good defence. The object and design of the other matters stated in the plea are, that the judgment is a nullity, because it was rendered in this state whilst the rightful government was overthrown, and its place usurped by a spurious authority; but if not void for that reason, then it was void because it was rendered upon an undertaking which cannot be recognised or enforced in this court, the price and purchase-money of slaves. The other branches of the plea may be passed over for the present. It is to the substantial elements alone of the plea that the court must look in giving judgment.

There is nothing indicated in the plea going to show that the defendants, or either of them, in the action brought by Chisolm in the inferior court of Cass (Bartow) county, had no notice of the action, or that they questioned the jurisdiction and had their plea overruled, and had no further remedy, or that for good reasons they did not appear and defend. And I find nothing in the record before me which states, or from which it can be inferred, that defendants in that suit were not citizens of Georgia, and one or both of them resident of Cass county, when the proceedings were instituted.

Had the inferior court, pending the action in 1861, jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter of the suit brought by Chisolm against Fields and Tumlin, and if so, was the judgment for the purchase-money of slaves valid? and if valid, then can this court recognise it now, and if necessary enforce it? Neither of these inquiries is free from embarrassment. I learn that these or similar questions now stand for argument on error or appeal before the supreme court of the United States. And had they not risen here, during the progress of a trial at bar, I would have deferred judgment and awaited the decision of the supreme court. But as they are directly presented by the pleadings, I will pass upon them—not with hesitancy in the performance of a duty, yet not without diffidence in my ability to perform it well. I shall be as brief as possible in my remarks.

Looking to the first specific clause in the plea, that the judgment rendered on the 26th of November, 1861, was void, for the reason that it was pronounced during the Rebellion, I refer to the case Cuyler v. Ferrill [Case No. 3,523]. A suit had been instituted in 1862 or 1863, by certain heirs, through guardians, in the so-called superior court of Chatham county, in this state, to partition land. One of these heirs was a citizen of Alabama, the other of Georgia; but Dr. Cuyler, another heir, was a citizen of Pennsylvania, and, at the time the suit was pending, a surgeon in the national army. He was notified, in accordance with the statutory laws of Georgia, by publication, to appear and defend. He did neither. The court ordered the property, as it could not be equitably divided, to be sold, and Cuyler's share of the proceeds invested in Confederate bonds, which was done. The other heirs received their moiety in Confederate treasury notes. After the war, Cuyler filed his bill against Ferrill, who had purchased the property, and the other heirs, to set aside the proceedings. And I decreed them to be, so far as they concerned Dr. Cuyler, utterly null and void, because that tribunal had no jurisdiction of him or his estate. But as to the position of those heirs who had voluntarily sought the aid of that court, I declined to express any opinion. Had it been a point absolutely necessary for decision, I apprehend that I would have been warranted in holding that they or their guardians (as the case might be) were by their own voluntary act estopped from denying the validity of the proceedings in the so-called superior court. In 1868 the supreme court of the United States, in Texas v. White, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 700, said: "It is not necessary to attempt any exact definition within which the acts of said state (Texas) government must be treated as valid or invalid. It may be said, perhaps, with sufficient accuracy, that acts necessary to peace and good order among citizens, such, for example, as acts * * * providing remedies for injuries to person and estate, and other similar acts which would be valid if emanating from a lawful government, must be regarded in general as valid when proceeding from an actual though unlawful government." I think that the court meant to employ the term "remedies" in the ordinary legal and judicial sense, and did not intend to confine it to the redress of torts and injuries alone, but that it should also apply to the enforcement of contracts. I do not think that the judgment is void for the first special cause alleged in the plea.

The next fact stated in the plea is, that the judgment was for the price and purchase-money of slaves and for no other cause whatsoever. Is the judgment invalid for this reason? The opinions which I have always entertained on the subject of slavery—the buying and selling of human beings like sheep in the shambles—must be here laid out of view; for it is the duty of the judge to declare the law of the case before the court, and to forget, while discharging his official duties, his own private opinions. Time will not permit me to give a full exposition of my views on this question. Therefore, in brief, if the contract was for the price and purchase-money of slaves, and that contract was the immediate subject of the action upon which the judgment of the 25th of November, 1861, was founded, the judgment, when rendered, was, in the opinion of this court, valid. But it is said that even if valid then it is not so now, or if valid now it cannot be recognised, or (if necessary) enforced by this court; and the first paragraph of section 17, art. 5, of the state constitution of 1868 is referred to. It is as follows: "No court or officer shall have, nor shall the general assembly give, jurisdiction or authority to try or give judgment on or enforce any debt, the consideration of which was a slave or slaves, or the hire thereof." The word "judgment" is not in this paragraph, but it is necessarily included in the term "debt," a judgment being but a debt of record—a chose in action—and in this state negotiable by endorsement or written assignment like bills or promissory notes; but the transferee takes it "subject to the same equities and defences as the original plaintiff in judgment was." This provision of the constitution has been before the supreme court of the state on more than one occasion. The leading case, however, is Cobb v. Shorter, 39 Ga. 285. The opinion of the court (Warner, J., dissenting) was delivered by Chief Justice Brown. Shorter, as bearer, sued Cobb upon a promissory note made in 1861, and payable twelve months thereafter; the note was given for slaves, and the court below dismissed the action for want of jurisdiction, and the supreme court of Georgia affirmed the judgment.

I here remark that it was in accordance with certain acts of congress that the state convention was called. A constitution was framed and submitted to congress, and certain portions of it were stricken out by congress. But the provision which I have just read was allowed to remain. On this matter the chief justice in his opinion says: "But it is the constitution as amended and approved by the congress of the United States, by virtue of their authority as the conquering power, to dictate a form of government to the conquered, which is accepted by the people of the state as an act of obedience to the conqueror, and not as a matter of will or sanction." He afterwards says, "that congress is presumed to have sanctioned every word and line of it which, upon examination, congress did not, while amending it, require to be stricken out or changed." From these propositions the chief justice draws the following corollary: "The state has not pretended to destroy the obligation of this class of contracts. She has simply said, with the sanction of congress in forming her new government, that her (the state's) courts shall have no jurisdiction to enforce them." In Luther v. Borden, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 42, the court said that "it rests with congress to decide what government is the established one in a state. For, as the United States guarantee to each state a republican government, congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a state, before it can decide whether it is republican or not." This question is wholly political, its determination belongs exclusively to congress, and, therefore, it is in no wise judicial in its nature. And it must not be forgotten that the executive, judicial, and legislative departments of the United States, though co-ordinate branches of the government of the nation, are, in their powers and functions, separate and distinct. In rejecting certain provisions in the constitution of the state, or in allowing that relating to the inhibition placed upon the courts to take jurisdiction of debts, the consideration of which was a slave or the hire thereof, congress did not, I apprehend, in any wise mean to interfere with the constitutional powers and functions of the judiciary department of the government, any more than the judiciary would assume to control the admission to congress of senators or representatives. I cannot think otherwise than that congress intended to leave the interpretation and construction of that provision in the state constitution exclusively and absolutely with the courts. This provision does not declare that contracts for the purchase of slaves shall be void, but that the courts shall not have jurisdiction or authority to enforce them. Does it, then, contravene any portion of the 10th section of the 1st article of the constitution of the United States, which declares that "no state shall pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts?" In the case of Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 414, the court said, that "the constitution and laws of a state, so far as they are repugnant to the constitution of the United States, are absolutely void." And in Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 277, the court, Mr. Justice Field delivering the opinion, declared certain parts of the constitution of the state of Missouri null and void, because they were in contravention of the 1st and 2d clauses of this section.

I will now endeavor to ascertain and determine whether this provision in the state constitution impairs the obligation of contracts. For this purpose the case of Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 535, may be relied upon, containing, as it does, a clear and exact exposition of this most important subject. Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is also settled that the laws which subsist at the time and place of the making of the contract, and where it is to be performed, enter into and form a part of it, as if they were expressly referred to and incorporated in its terms. This principle embraces alike those which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement. Without the remedy, the contract may indeed, in the sense of the law, be said not to exist, and its obligation to fall within the class of those moral and social duties which depend for their fulfilment upon the will of the individual. The ideas of validity and remedy are inseparable, and both are parts of the obligation, which is guaranteed by the constitution against invasion. It is competent for the states to change the form of the remedy or to modify it otherwise, as they may see fit, provided no substantial right secured by the contract is thereby impaired." Applying these citations to the provision in the state constitution now under consideration, it will become obvious that it is in direct conflict with the 10th section of the 1st article of the constitution of the United States; indeed, it is not only an impairment of the obligation of the contract, but a denial of all remedies. And, in the language of Mr. Justice Swayne, "A right without a remedy is as if it were not. For every beneficial purpose it may be said not to exist." Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 554. If contracts, entered into previously to the promulgation of the president's proclamation of emancipation, the consideration of which was the price and purchase-money of slaves, were then valid under the laws of the United States and of the state of Georgia, the aid of the courts must be given, if demanded, to enforce them. But if such contracts were invalid, the provision in the state constitution is mere surplusage. There must be judgment quod recuperet on this plea.

FRENCH v. TUNSTALL.

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. July, 1832.

PLEADINGS — GENERAL DEMURRER — JUDGMENT — DEBT OR COVENANT.

1. On a general demurrer, unless for misjoinder of actions, judgment must be given for the plaintiff, if there is one good count in the declaration.

2. Debt or covenant is the appropriate remedy on a writing obligatory.

Appeal from Chicot circuit court.

[This was an action at law by Robert W. French, assignee of Joseph Henderson, against Thomas T. Tunstall.]

Before JOHNSON and CROSS, Judges.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The declaration contains two counts. The first is the common count in an action of assumpsit for money lent and advanced by the plaintiff to the defendant. The second is also in the form of a count in assumpsit, upon a promissory note under seal. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the declaration, which was sustained by the court, and judgment rendered in his favor, from which the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

If the declaration contains one good count, a demurrer to the whole declaration will not be sustained, unless there is a misjoinder of actions. The first count is in assumpsit, and is clearly a good and valid count. It is equally clear that the second count is also in the form of a count in the action of assumpsit. It is true that the cause of action set out in the second count will not support an action of assumpsit; debt or covenant being the appropriate action upon a writing obligatory. But because the second count is faulty and defective, and might have been reached by a general demurrer, it does not follow that it is a count in debt, although it states a cause of action for which debt is the appropriate remedy. We are of opinion, then, that there is no misjoinder of actions, notwithstanding the second count is palpably defective, and sets out no cause of action for which assumpsit will lie. The first count being good, the demurrer to the declaration should have been overruled. The case of Judin v. Samuel, 1 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 43, is, in principle, analogous to the present case. The declaration contained three counts. The first was in trover for bills of exchange, and the second and third counts, after stating the delivery of the bills to the defendant, in order that he might get them discounted for a certain commission, and his having got them discounted, stated that he converted and disposed of the money to his own use. The defendant demurred generally, on the ground of a misjoinder of tort and contract; the subject of the two last counts being matter of contract; but the court held, that, on a general demurrer, as all the counts were in the form of tort, judgment must be for the plaintiff if any one count was good. We think the principle decided in the above case is decisive of the case now before the court. Judgment reversed.

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

ACTIONS—DISCONTINUANCE—REINSTATEMENT—ENTERING APPEARANCE ON DOCKET OUT OF COURT.

1. The court will not reinstate an action of replevin which has been discontinued, at a preceding term, for want of the appearance of the defendant, unless the omission to enter the appearance was by neglect of the clerk.

[Cited in Reiling v. Bolier, Case No. 11,671.]

2. An appearance cannot be entered upon the docket, out of court.

Mr. Hall, for defendant, moved to reinstate this action of replevin, it having been discontinued at the last term by the non-appearance of the defendant. The defendant's affidavit stated that Mr. Caldwell, ever since the death of Mr. Bates, had acted as the counsel of his executors. That the writ, in this cause, was returnable to the last term. That Mr. Caldwell was specially employed to defend it, and that the defendant was, until otherwise informed by Mr. Wallach, under a firm impression that Mr. Caldwell had entered his appearance for him. That just before the court, upon hearing that his impression was erroneous, he desired Mr. Hall to enter his appearance, and was assured that he had done so. Mr. Hall made affidavit, that after the adjournment of the court, in June, and before the expiration of the term, he called at the clerk's office, and, upon finding that no appearance had been entered for the defendant, "he ordered his appearance," "and supposed, until the beginning of this term, that it had been done."

Mr. Key, for plaintiff.

Mr. Hall, for defendant.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to reinstate the cause, saying that an appearance could not be entered in the office; and the clerk was not bound, upon such a verbal order, to make the entry in court, at the adjourned session of the court, although it was, in law, the same term. The court has uniformly refused to reinstate such cases unless the omission to enter the appearance was by neglect of the clerk, and referred to the case of Williamson v. Bryan, at April term, 1823 [Case No. 17,751], and several other cases in this court.

FRENCH v. The VICTORIA.

District Court, D. New Jersey. Aug. 7, 1874.

COLLISION BETWEEN SAILING VESSELS — SAILING RULES—DIVISION OF DAMAGES.

1. The Hazel Dell and Victoria—two sailing vessels close hauled and having the wind on different sides—were beating up a narrow inlet against a head wind, when a collision took place. Held, that by the 12th and 17th articles of the rules and regulations for preventing collisions (13 Stat. 58) it was the duty of the Hazel Dell—the wind on her port side and being the overtaking vessel—to give way and to keep out of the way of the Victoria.

2. Whilst by the 18th article the Victoria, under ordinary circumstances, was entitled to hold her course, she was bound by the 19th article, from the special circumstances of the particular case, to depart from the rule in order to avoid the immediate danger.

3. The evidence brought the case within the principles of The Maria Martin, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 31, and the damages caused by the collision should be divided equally between the libellant and respondent.

In admiralty.

A. Flanders, for the Hazel Dell.

Elias L. Boudinot, for the Victoria.

NIXON, District Judge. This is a libel in rem by Hiram E. French, master of the schooner Hazel Dell, for himself and owners, against the schooner Victoria, to recover damages for a collision. The libel sets forth that on the 6th of September, 1873, at about 8 o'clock in the morning, the schooner Hazel Dell, in proceeding from the port of New York, in ballast, to the port of Tuckerton, New Jersey, entered the inlet of Little Egg Harbor; that the captain and all the crew were on deck and observed the Victoria with all her sails set sailing up the said inlet towards the Hazel Dell, and thereupon the captain and others of the crew called several times loudly to the crew of the Victoria and desired them to keep clear of the Hazel Dell; that although there was sufficient room for the Victoria to pass she kept on her course with the wind and tide, and with violence ran foul of and on board the Hazel Dell, breaking her boom, tearing her mainsail, and damaging her yawl boat; that at the time of the said collision it was impossible for the Hazel Dell to get out of the way of the Victoria, because she was properly on her way and on her starboard tack; had just gone about to avoid collision and had not gathered way; that there was room enough for the Victoria to steer clear of and pass by the Hazel Dell, and that the damage was caused by the captain of the Victoria not heeding their calls and making proper efforts to avoid the collision. John Rose intervenes as owner, and answers, acknowledging the collision at the time and place stated in the libel, but alleges that it occurred without fault of those in charge of the Victoria, and entirely from the negligence and unskilfulness of those in charge of the Hazel Dell. He states the collision to have occurred as follows: The schooner Victoria was beating up Little Egg Harbor inlet, at or about 8 o'clock in the forenoon of the 6th day of September, 1873, and having both the wind and tide ahead or adverse. The schooner Hazel Dell entered the inlet after the Victoria, and sailed up the said inlet astern of her. The Victoria having reached a very narrow place in said inlet known "as the Point of Sods," where the channel is about two hundred feet wide, was sailing across the same, having her port tacks aboard (that is to say, heading towards the right hand side of the channel on her way up the same,) and was close hauled to the wind when the Hazel Dell sailed close up to her under her port quarter, and thereby forced the Victoria to go almost aground before changing her tack in order to avoid a collision with the Hazel Dell head on; that the Hazel Dell, after thus driving the Victoria almost ashore, and when it became necessary for the Victoria to go about to avoid going on the breakers, which were at that time right under her bows, did not change her course as it was her duty to do, but kept on the same and came nearly abreast of the Victoria on her port side, and so close to her as to leave no room for the Victoria to turn without coming foul of the Hazel Dell. Those in charge of the Victoria being in this perilous condition in which they were placed entirely by the fault of those navigating the Hazel Dell as aforesaid, took all the precaution possible to avoid a collision consistent with safety to their vessel, and went about, put the helm hard to starboard, and endeavored to avoid a collision by letting the Victoria pay off before the wind and go clear of the Hazel Dell and astern of her, but the Hazel Dell having placed herself in the position above described it was impossible for those in charge of the Victoria to avoid a collision of the jib-boom of the Victoria and the after lash of the mainsail of the Hazel Dell.

I have carefully examined the testimony taken and am of the opinion that if the captain of the Victoria when he first became aware of the danger of a collision had put his helm a starboard, slackened his peak and raised his centre board, he would probably have passed to the stern of the Hazel Dell; and that the collision occurred because he kept his course too long before he tried that method to avoid it. I am further of the opinion that if he had put his helm hard a lee and brought the Victoria into the wind no damage would have been done. The case, therefore, turns upon the single question whether the Victoria was entitled under the circumstances to hold her course. And this question is determined by the provisions of an act, entitled "An act fixing certain rules and regulations for preventing collisions on the water," approved April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 58), and which was only the adoption by congress of the "Rules and Regulations" promulgated by order in council, January 9, 1863, issued under and by virtue of the British "Merchant Shipping Amendment Act" of 1832. The articles applicable to this case are the 12th, 17th, 18th and 19th; the first and second named referring to the duties of the Hazel Dell; the third to the Victoria, and the last, under special circumstances, to both. The 12th article prescribes, that "when two sailing ships are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then if they have the wind on different sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard, except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close hauled and the other ship free, in which case the latter ship shall keep out of the way." I find no evidence to bring the case before me within the exception. Both vessels were close hauled, beating against the wind, in a narrow channel, were crossing so as to involve risk of collision, having the wind on different sides, and the Hazel Dell having it on her port side. By the 17th article "every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of said last mentioned vessel." Both parties admit that the Hazel Dell was the overtaking vessel; that she entered the inlet some time after the Victoria, and was about passing her when they came in contact. By the express terms of both of the above articles, it was undoubtedly the duty of the Hazel Dell to give way, and to keep out of the way of the Victoria. It was not for her to assume that the Victoria would change her course, for the 18th article says, "that where one of two ships is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the 19th article." The rule of the road did not oblige, or even allow her to change, unless it became necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. The Hazel Dell, therefore, is not entitled to any compensation for the damages which resulted from the collision, unless it can be made to appear that there was something in the relative situation of the vessels, and wilfulness or want of skill in the management of the Victoria, which contributed to the accident, and which takes the case out of the general rules and brings it within the provisions of the 19th article. That article is in the nature of a proviso to save special cases, and prescribes that "in obeying and construing these rules due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the above rule necessary in order to avoid immediate danger."

What is the correct interpretation of this article? Does it mean that when any special circumstances exist rendering a departure from the rules necessary in order to avoid danger, the parties may or must depart from them? If it were an open question in this court I should be inclined to say that it was a privilege accorded and not a command to be obeyed; that it allows either one or the other of the parties, in those emergencies, where adherence to the rules must result in collision, to depart from them, and to adopt such methods as good seamanship would suggest, to escape the imminent peril, but that even in such cases no obligation rests upon the party not in fault to depart from the rules in order to avoid what seemed at the moment to be the certainty of a collision. And I find on examination that I am sustained in this view by Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Eliza v. The Orinoco, reported in Holt, Rule of Road, 98. In his address to the elder brethren, after quoting the 19th article, he said: "Now, according to my view of that section, it is an exemption of persons who would otherwise be under obligations to obey the previous sections. In omitting so to do, viz., the effect of it would be this, that though they were directed to keep their course, yet if there was imminent danger, they would be justified in not keeping their course, provided they had a chance thereby of avoiding the certainty of a collision. But it does not appear to me this is a directory section at all, that tells parties they are to do this or that, or anything else; but they are released from the severe obligation of complying with all the terms of the previous sections, and they are released from that obligation by circumstances which would render obedience to them conducive to peril, while by deviation, they might escape from that peril."

But this does not seem to be the construction given to the article by the supreme court. It was held in the case of The Maria Martin, 12 Wall. [79 U. S.] 31, that even flagrant fault committed by one of two vessels approaching each other from opposite directions does not excuse the other from adopting every precaution required by the special circumstances of the case to prevent a collision. Mr. Justice Clifford delivered the opinion of the court affirming the decree of the circuit court, which had divided the damage equally between the libellant and respondent on the ground that both parties were in fault, and as illustrating his view of the meaning of the 19th article he said: "Errors committed by one of two vessels approaching each other from opposite directions does not excuse the other from adopting every proper precaution required by the special circumstances to prevent a collision, as the act of congress prescribes that in obeying and construing the prescribed rules of navigation due regard must be had to the special circumstances rendering a departure from them necessary in order to avoid immediate danger."

Accepting this as the meaning, the only remaining inquiry is, whether the Victoria, although entitled to keep her course by the 18th article, was nevertheless inexcusable because she did not depart from it under the pressure of impending peril? She did depart from it at the last moment, but procrastinated too long to keep from coming in collision. When at the distance of about thirty or forty feet, and when, as the captains of both vessels agree, there was a certainty, without a change of course, of striking the Hazel Dell about midships, the helm of the Victoria was put to the starboard, whereby she bore away aft of the hull, but came in contact with her yawl boat and the end of her main boom, breaking the latter and tearing the mainsail. If this action had been taken sooner it is probable that she would have passed to the stern of the Hazel Dell and avoided her altogether. But that was not the departure from the rule which it seems to me good seamanship demanded. Why was not the Victoria put in stays? That was the most obvious movement which the circumstances of the vessel suggested. The case really appears to be this: that the captain of the Victoria knew enough of the rules of the road to know that he was entitled to his course, and that it was the duty of the Hazel Dell to keep out of the way. He had the slower craft, which is always an irritating fact to an ambitious captain, and he resolved in his own mind not to yield an iota of his strict legal rights to his more fortunate rival. This resolution was adhered to in the face of immediate danger, and until the collision was inevitable. According to the principle of The Maria Martin, supra, he ought "to have adopted every proper precaution required by the special circumstances to prevent a collision," without reference to the ordinary rules of navigation, and I think he came short in this respect in not porting his helm and bringing his vessel into the wind.

I have not overlooked the reasons which the captain of the Victoria has given for not doing so, viz., that he was so near the shore that there was danger of his getting on the breakers. The weight of the testimony was against this view of their situation. He acknowledged that he had gone about and had run at least two or three lengths of his vessel before the collision took place. Other evidence located them nearer the middle of the channel. But considering the daylight, the calm weather, the state of the wind and of the tide, there appears from his own admissions, room enough to have brought the Victoria in stays without peril. It hence results that the owner of the Victoria should equally divide the damage caused by the collision with the Hazel Dell, which was also in fault. This view of the case renders it unnecessary for me to consider whether the claim of the respondent for damages for the detention of his vessel should be allowed. That question will properly arise when the defence prevails, and when the judgment of the court fixes no blame on the management of the defendant's vessel.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1823.

BANKRUPTCY—ARREST ON DEBT DUE BEFORE DISCHARGE.

An insolvent debtor, arrested for a debt due before his discharge, can only be relieved by the court, or a judge of the court, before whom the process is returnable.

A writ of habeas corpus was issued to bring up the body of Mudd, who was arrested on a ca. sa. issued by a justice of the peace for a debt under $50. It was suggested, upon the return, that all the debt except $8 was due before his discharge under the insolvent act, and the court was now moved, under the tenth section of the act, to discharge him upon his paying the $8 and interest and costs. The execution was, under the act of congress of the last session (1st March, 1823), returnable before the justice. 3 Stat. 743.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to discharge him, because, by that section of the act, the power to discharge, in such cases, is given only to the court, or a judge of the court, to whom the execution is returnable.

DEMURRER—TO SUPPLEMENTAL COMPLAINT—NEW YORK CODE—ADDITIONAL DAMAGES CLAIMED.

1. The Code of Civil Procedure of New York does not authorize a demurrer unless it is to the whole complaint or to a separate cause of action alleged in the complaint.

2. Where a supplemental complaint has been served alleging matters arising since the complaint which increase the plaintiff's damages but do not change the cause of action, a demurrer to such supplemental complaint will be stricken out.

On motion to strike out a demurrer. Defendant [Charles R. Coster] was collector of internal revenue and seized a still and other property of the plaintiff [Frederick Frericks] for alleged violations of the internal revenue law. The information was dismissed by the district court and a certificate of probable ["reasonable"] cause was refused, and this action was brought to recover damages for the wrongful seizure. Plaintiff by permission of the court filed a supplemental complaint alleging that the judgment and order of the district court were taken up by defendant for review [Case No. 15,166], and affirmed by the supreme court [106 U. S. 160, 1 Sup. Ct. 169], and that defendant had been put to additional expense thereby. The defendant demurred to the supplemental complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Edward Salomon, for the motion.

Elihu Root, Dist. Atty., and H. E. Davies, contra.

WALLACE, Circuit Judge. The demurrer interposed by the defendant is not to the whole complaint or to any separate cause of action alleged in the complaint, and is, therefore, an unauthorized pleading. Code, § 492. The supplemental pleading of the plaintiff which is thus demurred to does not take the place of the original complaint; it avers facts arising since the original complaint which increase the plaintiff's damages but do not change his cause of action. It is a pleading in addition to the original complaint but not one in place of it, and is authorized by section 544 of the Code of Procedure. Motion granted.

[NOTE. Subsequently, the defendant moved this court for a certificate of probable cause of seizure, which was refused. Frericks v. Coster, 22 Fed. 637. A petition was filed in the court of claims by Frericks against the United States. Judgment was given for the plaintiff (21 Ct. Cl. 16), which was affirmed by the supreme court (U. S. v. TRADE-MARKS—INFRINGEMENT—INJUNCTION.

1. The plaintiffs had a right to use, as a trade-mark, in connection with packages of a medical preparation put up and sold by them, and known as "Hamburg tea," the words "J. C. Frese & Co., Hopfensack, 6, Hamburg," in an oval. The defendant had, at one time, sold his article of Hamburg tea in packages, with a label containing the name of "J. C. Frese & Co." Although he claimed to have discontinued the use of such label, held, that he had rendered himself liable to an injunction in that respect.

2. The plaintiffs also made a claim to the color of the wrappers and notices and directions tied up with the wrappers, and also to the general size and appearance of the packages in which they had been accustomed to sell their Hamburg tea, independently of such trade-mark or label. The defendant's packages were of the same size and general shape as those of the plaintiffs, and the color of the envelopes and of the printed notices and directions for use, tied up with the envelopes, was nearly the same; but the labels on the plaintiffs' packages contained, in a plain round label, the words "J. C. Frese & Co.," and, embossed in an oval, on an oblong white label, the words "J. C. Frese & Co., Hopfensack, 6, Hamburg," while the defendant's labels contained, in a round white label, the name "Ed. Bachof & Co.," and, on an oblong white label, embossed in an oval, "Ed. Bachof & Co., No. 39, Hamburg." Held that, on this branch of the case, a preliminary injunction must be refused.

In equity.

Edwin M. Wight, for defendant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The plaintiffs have been, for a long time, accustomed to put up and sell a medical preparation known as "Hamburg tea," and have used, in connection with it, as a trade-mark, the words "J. C. Frese & Co., Hopfensack, 6, Hamburg," in an oval, applying it more commonly on a white label, in raised characters. I consider that their right to the use of this trade-mark, to distinguish the Hamburg tea sold by them, is established. It is shown that the defendant did, at one time, sell his article of Hamburg tea in packages, with a label containing the name of "J. C. Frese & Co.," and also with another white label bearing a strong general resemblance to the white label of the plaintiffs. Although he claims to have discontinued the use of these labels, he has, nevertheless, rendered himself liable to an injunction in that respect.

The plaintiffs, however, present a larger claim. This is to the color of the wrappers and notices and directions tied up with the wrappers, and also to the general size and appearance of the packages in which they have been accustomed to sell their Hamburg tea, independent of the trade-mark or label which has been already spoken of. The defendant's packets are of the same size as those of the plaintiffs; but this is because the quantity is what a purchaser usually desires. The general shape is the same; but this arises from the physical properties of the compound, which would most readily take that shape in being tied up for sale. The color of the envelopes, and of the printed notices and directions for use, tied up with the envelopes, is nearly the same, and might mislead, but for the printed or stamped label. Those on the plaintiffs' packets contain, in a plain round label, the words "J. C. Frese & Co.," and, embossed in an oval, on an oblong white label, the words "J. C. Frese & Co., Hopfensack, 6, Hamburg." The defendant's labels with equal distinctness, contain, in a round white label, the name "Ed. Bachof & Co.," and on an oblong white label, embossed in an oval, "Ed. Bachof & Co., No. 39, Hamburg." I am by no means clear, that, as the case stands, the plaintiffs have made out any appropriation to their own exclusive use of the colored wrappers and form of packages employed. On the contrary, in these particulars, I am inclined, upon the proofs, to the conclusion that both plaintiffs and defendant have employed the common method used in Germany for putting up medicinal teas. Nor do I find, nor have I been referred to, any case, in which, on such resemblances alone, apart from names or labels containing imitative matter, it has been held that an injunction would lie. These questions, however, it is not necessary, in this stage of the cause, to decide. To a preliminary injunction the plaintiffs are not, on this branch of the case, entitled. Neither party has any exclusive right in the article known as Hamburg tea, which appears to be a compound known in the German books of medicine; nor do the plaintiffs at present appear to have any special right in respect to the form, size and color of the packages, the labels upon which are sufficient to distinguish, even to a careless observer, the one from the other.

A preliminary injunction must issue against the defendant, restraining him from the use of the name of "J. C. Frese & Co.," and from that of the trade-mark, or label, "J. C. Frese & Co., Hopfensack, 6, Hamburg," on packages of Hamburg tea, and the residue of the injunction asked for is denied.

[NOTE. Subsequently, this injunction was made perpetual, and a further injunction granted in accordance with the prayer of the bill. See Case No. 5,110.]

B. openly used such style of package and firm name to put up Hamburg tea. He then discontinued the use of the firm name, but continued to use the exact form and style of package, substituting his own name merely for that of the firm on the labels: Held, that, with the proper parties before the court, B. ought to be restrained by injunction from such use of the plaintiffs' symbols.

[Cited in Hostetter v. Adams, 10 Fed. 843; Coats v. Merrick Thread Co., 36 Fed. 327.]

In equity.

Edwin M. Wight, for defendant.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been heard on bill, answer, replication, proofs and argument. The bill is brought by Christel F. H. Frese alone, claiming to stand upon rights acquired by a firm to methods of identifying their wares, of which he alleges himself to be now the sole member. The defendant does not admit any right to the orator, but leaves him to his proof. The proof shows Edward George Schroeder to be a member of the firm equally with the orator, and, whatever right it does show in respect to the matter of the bill, it shows to belong to the firm. As the case stands, the orator has no right to be protected in this form, and, if it should proceed to a decree, the bill would have to be dismissed. But, the bill is brought in the firm name and right, and has been litigated in that right, and the want of the other member is a defect that can be cured by amendment. Lewis v. Locke, 41 Vt. 11. Under such circumstances, where a case appears to be meritorious, it is not usual to proceed to a decree without affording an opportunity to amend upon some terms. Story, Eq. Pl. § 236. This consideration makes it necessary to inquire into the merits of this case.

The orator's firm have not any patent on the compound called "Hamburg Tea." The manufacture and sale of that article are open to all persons. Nor is it in the bill directly alleged, nor does the bill appear to proceed on the ground, that this name was appropriated and used by them to identify their production. So, for aught that appears, all persons are at liberty to apply that name to their own manufactures. The proof shows clearly that the name of the orator's firm has long been used in this business, and that the wares of the firm, of this sort, came to be known by it. It also shows, that this firm is a successor of the former one. Whether it is or not is a question of fact, and this fact could be and has been established by parol proof. The trade-marks of the firm were partnership property, and would pass to the successors. Colly. Partn. (6th Ed.) § 117, note. The defendant does not claim the right to use the firm name of the orator's firm, nor their registered trademark, and there is no question made about those. But the orator claims that his firm and their predecessors have long been accustomed to pack this article in long cylindrical packages, with pink wrappers, and to have a crimson paper of directions, and yellow ones of warning, tied in with each package, and their firm name printed across a white label within a circle pasted across the ends of the string, and the same embossed with the words "Hamburg, Hopfensack, 6," on another white label pasted on the package, so that the package, by its form and colors, would be at once known by its general appearance, without taking time to read anything on it; and that their wares have come to be well known as theirs by the appearance of the packages. They have the exclusive right to sell their wares as their own, and no other person has any right, by any means, to palm off any other wares than theirs as theirs. And, if any person does utter any other wares than theirs as theirs, an action at law would lie. And, whenever there is danger that this would be done so often as to occasion multiplicity of suits, or so as to work irreparable injury, a court of equity would interfere by injunction. The orator's proof shows that the firm has long used this style of package. It also appears, that the defendant at first openly used the style of package and firm name; that, in obedience to warning, he discontinued the use of the name on the outside of the package; and that, under the pressure of legal proceedings, he has stopped the use of that altogether, and that of the words "Hopfensack, 6," but that he still continues the exact form and style of package, substituting his own name merely for that of the firm, on the labels. The exact question is, whether this is a simulation of his wares for those of the orator's firm, calculated to have them pass for the orator's firm's wares. Probably, no mere form of a package would ever alone amount to a representation, capable of deceiving, that the wares contained in it were those of any particular make. But, when the form of these packages, the color of the wrappers and papers done up with them, and the form and color of the labels, are considered all together, it is quite apparent, that, when they had been so long used by the orator's firm for holding this particular compound when offered for sale, the mere appearance of the packages would amount to a representation, that they contained that article, of that manufacture. It is equally obvious, that the very slight changes made by the defendant in the general appearance of his packages used by him now, would not put the general public purchasing such articles on their guard; and that the use of such packages for a similar article would amount to a forcible representation, that it was the same article that the orator's firm had been accustomed to pack in that way. And, when the mode in which the defendant commenced using such packages, and the various steps by which he has been brought to his present method, are considered, there does not seem to be any fair question, but that his use of them now is for the purpose of passing off his wares for those of the orator's firm. Upon this view of the case, it seems, that, with the proper parties before the court, the defendant should be restrained by injunction from making the use he does of these symbols.

Let the cause stand, with leave to the orator to move for an amendment, if he shall see cause, within thirty days; otherwise, let a decree be entered, dismissing the bill of complaint, with costs, but without prejudice.

[2] [Motion to amend bill. This cause has been further heard on the motion of the orator for leave to amend the affidavit of A. v. Briesen, solicitor, in support thereof and briefs of counsel. From the whole case it appears that the firm of J. C. Frese & Co. consisted of two members. This cause was brought by one member, in the name of the firm, without joining the other member. The whole litigation has been carried on with reference to a right of the firm to protection and relief against the defendant; and it has been carried on in precisely the same manner that it would have been if the other member had joined in the bill as an orator, so far as has been made to appear or is claimed. The cause of action that has been litigated is exactly the same that the bill will cover if the amendment is allowed and made. It is urged in opposition that the court has no power to permit an amendment to be made that will change the cause of action. This is considered to be true when the amendment would bring in a cause of action not before involved; and that is the sense in which the remark of the supreme court of Vermont, in Lewis v. Locke, 41 Vt. 11, quoted in the defendant's brief, was used. A necessary amendment always changes a cause of action in another sense, as when it changes what would be no cause of action to a good one, or one that the proof will not support to one that it will, or one imperfectly described to one well described. In this case the cause of action in the name of the firm is well set forth, but the firm itself is not properly described and represented. The amendment will cure that imperfection, which is precisely what was done in the case cited. And it may be done at this stage of the cause. Tremaine v. Hitchcock, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 518. It is also argued that the orator should not be favored because he seeks to restrain dealing in the well-known compound involved called "Hamburg Tea." But that is not the relief sought, nor that to which the firm is thought to be entitled; but it is that the defendant shall not pass off tea of this sort, of his own or others' manufacture, for that of the orator's firm. This is not claiming any monopoly, nor fostering one, but is merely claiming and protecting a right of that firm that is common to all persons. On the whole, it is considered that the amendment should be allowed, but that the orator should recover no costs of the proceedings in the cause while it was so situated that it could not proceed to a final decree in his favor; and the defect was one of which he must have had knowledge, although probably he had no knowledge of its effect. Let an order be entered granting leave to amend the bill of complaint by permitting said Johann Siegmund Schroeder to appear as a party complainant therein in his right as a member of the firm of J. C. Frese & Co. at any time before the 15th day of May, 1878; and, upon such appearance, let a decree be entered for the orators according to the opinion hereinbefore filed, with costs to the orators after the appearance; and if he does not so appear, let a decree be entered dismissing the bill of complaint with costs, but without prejudice.

[Decree: This cause having come on to be heard upon the bill of complaint herein, the answer of the defendant, E. Bachof, the replication of the complainants to such answer, the amendment to the bill of complaint duly entered in the order-book, and the proofs—oral, documentary, and written—taken and filed in said cause, and the same having been argued by counsel for the respective parties, and it appearing that the firm of J. C. Frese & Co. is exclusively entitled to the style and arrangement of packages mentioned in the bill of complaint for containing the medical compound known as "Hamburg Tea," manufactured and sold by said firm, and also to the exclusive use of its registered trade-mark, mentioned in said bill of complaint, and that the defendant has infringed the rights of the complainants by manufacturing, using, and selling what purports to be "Hamburg Tea," in packages of substantially the same style and arrangement as those to which the complainants' firm, of J. C. Frese & Co., is exclusively entitled, and also by applying to said packages the complainants' said registered trade-mark: Now, therefore, in consideration thereof, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, and the court doth hereby order, adjudge, and decree as follows, viz.: (1) That the said complainants do recover of the defendant those costs and charges and disbursements in this suit—to be taxed—which accrued after Johann Siegmund Schroeder has been made a party complainant herein in his right, as a member of the complainants' firm of J. C. Frese & Co. (2) That the said complainants do recover of the defendant the damages which the complainants have sustained by, and compensation for, the manufacture, use, and sale by said defendant of medical or other goods contained in packages made in imitation of the style and arrangement of complainants' packages, set forth in the bill of complaint, or resembling the same so nearly as to be calculated to deceive. (3) That the said complainants do recover of the defendant the damages which the complainants have sustained by, and compensation for, the manufacture, use, and sale by the defendant of medicinal or other goods contained in packages to which the complainants' registered trade-mark No. 1,946, or substantially the same, or so nearly resembling it as to be calculated to deceive, was affixed. (5) That the said master, on such accounting, shall have the right to cause an examination of said defendant, and of other witnesses, to be had ore tenus or otherwise, and shall have the right to order the production of the books, vouchers, and documents, and other memoranda of said defendant, his agents, servants, and attorneys; and that the said defendant and other necessary witnesses attend for such purpose before said master from time to time, as such master shall direct. (6) That a perpetual injunction be issued in this suit forthwith against the said defendant, restraining him, his clerks, agents, servants, attorneys, and workmen, and all claiming or holding under or through him, according to the prayer of the bill of complaint for such injunction, but in accordance with the opinion filed in this cause.][2]

James L. Onderdonk, for defendant.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been heard on the motion of the complainant to have the defendant's proofs ordered to be filed, and for an attachment to compel payment of the examiner's fees. Equity rule 82 requires a master to file his report whether his fees are paid or not, and provides for an attachment to compel payment. There is no rule requiring an examiner to file testimony taken by him, without payment of his fees. Doubtless he has a lien as against the party for whom testimony is taken, upon the testimony, for his fees; and, in addition to that remedy, he may proceed by application to the court for an attachment to compel payment. Caldwell v. Jackson, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 276. The other party can have no greater, if as great, right to the testimony. In this case, the other party claims that the testimony shall be put on file, not for the purpose of establishing his case, but that it may be overruled as showing a defence. It is doubtful whether he has any right to the testimony for that purpose, but, if he has, it must be subordinate to the right of the examiner to have his fees first paid. To order the testimony filed without payment to the examiner would cut off one of his remedies, and it may be a very useful one. If the party who has caused the testimony to be taken is willing or prefers to have his cause heard without it, the opposite party does not seem to have any just cause for complaint. If, however, he deems the testimony of sufficient value to him to be paid for by him, he may be entitled to have it filed on making the payment. But that is not his position on this motion. Here he asks to have it ordered on file without making payment, that it may be overruled as constituting a defence. That he does not appear to be entitled to. Motion denied.

Case No. 5,112.

FRESH v. GILSON.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1838.[2]

INDEBITATUS ASSUMPSIT — CONTRACT UNDER SEAL — ACTION AGAINST DEFENDANTS NOT PARTY TO THE CONTRACT.

The plaintiff cannot recover in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, for work and labor done under a contract under seal, unless the whole work has been done according to the contract; nor in an action against three defendants, upon a contract under the seal of one defendant only; unless the contract was made for the benefit of all the defendants, and the work performed according to the contract.

[See note at end of case.]

The defendants [Riah Gilson and others] had a contract with the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company for making culvert No. 116, in section No. 150; and the plaintiff [W. H. Fresh], by a written contract under his seal and that of Gilson, one of the defendants, undertook to do the work, by the 4th of July, 1833, at a less price as to part of the work, and at the contract price as to the residue. This contract was given in evidence by the plaintiff. The defendants gave evidence tending to show that, according to a stipulation in that contract, Midler, one of the defendants, (not Gilson, who had signed and sealed the contract,) not being satisfied with the progress of the work, some time in July, 1833, came and declared the plaintiff's contract to be abandoned, and proceeded to finish the work before the 21st of December, 1833. The defendants attempted to prove the amount which they had been obliged to pay to complete the contract; the vouchers produced were disputed at every step, and the plaintiff took four bills of exception to the admission of evidence.

Brent & Brent, for plaintiff.

Mr. Bradley, for defendants.

THE COURT, at the motion of Mr. Bradley, the defendants' counsel, instructed the jury, that if they should find from the evidence that there was an agreement under seal between the plaintiff and the defendants for the execution of the work and labor for which this action is brought, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, would have added, "unless they should also be satisfied by the evidence that the plaintiff had performed the work according to his agreement."

THE COURT also instructed the jury, at the instance of the defendants' counsel, that if they should find from the evidence, that the plaintiff performed the work and labor for which this action is brought, under a sealed agreement between the plaintiff and Riah Gilson, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, would have added, "unless they should be satisfied by the evidence, that the plaintiff had done the work according to the written contract; and that the contract was made by Gilson for the benefit of all the defendants and with their consent, and that they recognized it."

To these instructions the plaintiff also excepted, and took his bills of exception. Verdict and judgment for defendants.

[NOTE. This judgment was reversed by the supreme court, Mr. Justice Daniel delivering the opinion, in which it was held:

[1. Liability for the acts of others may be created either by a direct authority given for their performance, or it may flow from their adoption, in some instances from acquiescence in those acts. But presumptions can stand only whilst they are compatible with the conduct of those to whom it may be sought to apply them, and must still more give place when in conflict with clear, distinct, and convincing proof.

[2. Wherever the rights of a party, founded upon a deed, are dependent on the terms and conditions of that deed, the instrument thus creating and defining those rights must be resorted to, and must regulate, moreover, the modes by which they are to be enforced at law. These identical rights cannot be claimed as being derived from a different and inferior source. If the deed be in force, all who claim by its provisions must resort to it.

[3. When the contract contained in a deed has been varied or substituted by the subsequent acts or agreements of the parties, thereby giving rise to new relations between them, the remedies originally arising out of the deed may be varied in conformity with them. An action upon the deed would not be insisted upon or permitted, because the rights and obligations of the parties to the suit would depend on a state of things by which the deed had been put aside. 16 Pet. BANKRUPTCY—AMENDING PETITION—LACHES.

[It was the design of the bankrupt law that proceedings in bankruptcy should be summary, —that they should go on without delay; and, where an order to show cause was denied on the day the petition was filed because it appeared on the face thereof that the bankrupt resided out of the jurisdiction, the petitioners cannot, after a delay, without sufficient excuse, of nearly a year, have the petition amended so as to show that the bankrupt did in fact reside within the jurisdiction, especially when the bankrupt law was repealed in the meantime.]

[2] [Reversed in 16 Pet. (41 U. S.) 327.]

CHOATE, District Judge. The petition in this case was filed Aug. 31, 1878. Two creditors joined in the petition. The petition averred that for a period of six months next preceding the date of the filing of the petition the alleged bankrupt resided in East Orange, New Jersey. The order to show cause was refused because it appeared on the petition itself that the court had no jurisdiction. A memorandum to this effect was endorsed on the petition on the same day on which it was filed. Nothing more was done in the matter till Aug. 21, 1879, when the two petitioning creditors presented another petition to the court, showing that the alleged bankrupt in fact resided in the city of New York during the necessary period of time to have given this court jurisdiction of the case, if it had been so averred in the petition, and praying to be allowed to amend their petition. This petition is supported by an affidavit of the bankrupt tending to prove the fact now alleged as to his residence. The bankrupt apparently favors the action of the petitioning creditors in attempting to revive these proceedings. Upon this petition, notice was ordered to be given to all the creditors of the alleged bankrupt to show cause why the amendment should not be allowed. Upon the return of the order to show cause, a creditor appeared and objected to the amendment, and the petition was dismissed for laches in making the application, but with leave to renew. The motion is now renewed on the affidavits intended to excuse the delay on the ground that both of the petitioners have been sick a large part of the time since Aug. 31, 1878, and one of them out of the country a part of the time, and their attorney had been so pressed with business that he was unable to attend to the matter earlier. The excuses are wholly insufficient, and do not account for the delay. The only proper inference to draw from the papers is that the petitioning creditors really abandoned the proceeding, and that for some reason that has recently become operative with them they desire now, with the approval of the debtor, to revive it.

It is still urged that, as no particular injury is shown to have resulted from the delay to any other creditor, the general principle which favors amendments to conform pleadings to the facts should be applied in this case. I think not. It was the obvious design of the bankrupt law that proceedings in bankruptcy should be summary; that upon the filing of the petition the case should go on without delay, by the appointed series of meetings, hearing, and other steps to the end of distributing the estate among the creditors, and the discharge, or refusal of discharge, of the debtor. It never was intended that petitions should be filed and the commencement of proceedings here used for other purposes merely to obstruct creditors in pursuing their remedies elsewhere, without giving them, with reasonable promptness, that relief which they have in bankruptcy. While there might be shown peculiar circumstances which had prevented and would excuse the diligent prosecution of a petition by creditors, yet to permit an abandonment of it for eleven months, and then its revival after the repeal of the bankrupt law, would virtually be entertaining an application now to put a debtor into bankruptcy. This is what is really asked in this case under the form of amending the petition. Any creditor who examined this record would have a right to assume long before the eleven months had expired that the proceeding was abandoned, and to act on that assumption in his treatment of the debtor. The relief asked would not be a proper exercise of the discretionary power to allow an amendment, because the creditors have most unreasonably failed to proceed according to the obvious intent and purpose of the bankrupt law, and especially since the law has been repealed, because to grant the amendment would in effect be to entertain jurisdiction of a case not in reality commenced while the law was in force. Petition dismissed.

FREVALL v. BACHE.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1838.

DEPOSITION—FILING INTERROGATORIES AND CROSS INTERROGATORIES—NOTICE.

A commission to take a deposition in a foreign country may issue for the plaintiff ex parte by order of the court, or of a judge in vacation, if the opposite party does not file his cross interrogatories, provided his interrogatories shall have been filed ten days before the rule day; and it is not necessary to give notice to the opposite party of the filing of the interrogatories; nor is it necessary that the party or the commissioner should give notice to the opposite party of the time and place of taking the deposition in a foreign country. But it must appear that the commissioner took the oath annexed to the commission.

Mr. Key, for defendant [Franklin Bache, administrator of J. Dabadie], objected to a deposition of one Fournier, taken under a commission to D. C. Croxall, the United States consul at Marseilles, in France, because (1) the commission was issued ex parte without notice to the defendant of an application for the commission, or of the filing the plaintiff's interrogatories; (2) because it was enclosed in an envelope directed to the chief judge of the court, when, by the commission the commissioner was required to "send the same to the judges;" and (3) because it does not appear that the commissioner took the oath annexed to the commission as he was required by the commission to do. On the 17th of May, 1837, the plaintiff [Peter E. Frevall] filed his interrogatories, more than ten days before the rule day, which was the first Monday in June. On the 23d of June, more than five days after the rule day, the plaintiff filed a petition for a commission, which was ordered, and on the 8th of July was issued to Daniel C. Croxall, Esq., United States consul at Marseilles. On the 16th of November, the commission was returned with the deposition in an envelope, directed "To the Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge of the Circuit Court for the County of Washington, District of Columbia." By the Maryland act of 1785, c. 72, § 14, the parties have a right to be present at the execution of all commissions for taking evidence, &c. For this purpose, the opposite party must have notice. It is also required by the dictates of natural justice.

R. S. Coxe, contra. The 26th rule of equity practice for the circuit courts of the United States, says, "All testimony taken under a commission, shall be taken on interrogatories and cross-interrogatories filed in the cause, unless the parties shall dispense therewith, which interrogatories shall be filed in the clerk's office ten days previous to a rule-day; after which the defendant shall be allowed five days to file his cross-interrogatories, unless he waives his right." The act of Maryland is applicable only to commissions executed in that state. In the case of Grant v. Nailor, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 224, 231, one of the objections overruled by the court was, that there was no notice of the time and place of executing the commission; and no cross-interrogatories were filed.

Mr. Smith, the deputy clerk of this court, stated that the practice, ever since the rule of the supreme court, had been to file the interrogatories ten days before a rule day; and if the opposite party does not file cross-interrogatories within five days thereafter, the commission issues upon the order of the court, or of a judge in vacation, without notice of the motion.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, stated that such also was the practice in Maryland.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled Mr. Key's two first objections, but rejected the deposition because it did not appear that the commissioner had taken the oath annexed to the commission.

PRACTICE IN BANKRUPTCY—STENOGRAPHIC REPORT OF TESTIMONY.

A bankrupt, on examination before a register under section 26 of the act [14 Stat. 517], cannot require the register to have his testimony taken down in common writing, when the assignee furnishes a stenographer to take it down and desires to have it so taken.

In this case the bankrupts [Daniel Frey and others] appeared before the register for examination under section 26 of the act, and the counsel for the assignee proceeded to have the examination taken down by a stenographer, whereupon the attorney for the bankrupts objected, stating that if the counsel for the assignee would afterwards supply him gratis with a copy of the testimony he would withdraw the objection, but otherwise he would not. He insisted that the register must have the testimony taken down in common writing, so that the questions and answers might be plainly seen, to enable him to cross-examine the bankrupts. The register over-ruled the objection, and the question was certified to the court. The register, in his certificate, said: "The question substantially is, whether any party may, at his will, forbid stenography upon the trial and compel common writing. I think not. The art of swift writing is too valuable, too prevalent and too well recognized by law and by the courts, for this."

NATIONAL BANKS—MORTGAGE TO SECURE FUTURE ADVANCES—PAYMENT OR DISCHARGE—INTENTION OF PARTIES.

1. A mortgage of $11,000, taken by a national bank to secure an indebtedness for firm notes and renewals thereof previous to the date of said mortgage, is not rendered illegal or void by the act of congress as being taken for future advances, by reason of the bank delivering the notes secured by the mortgage, shortly after its execution, to the bankrupt to prove in a copartnership settlement in a state court.

2. The acceptance of memorandum notes, with the minor son of the bankrupt as endorser, by said bank, in place of said notes delivered to the bankrupt, for the purpose specified, and renewal by said bank of said memorandum notes, for several months, for said bankrupt, leaving the original $11,000 of the indebtedness due on said renewal notes, is not payment or discharge of the mortgage taken to secure the original indebtedness of same amount.

3. The act of the party at the time of giving the new notes and renewals, and not his intention or understanding, is to prevail in a legal controversy wherein substitutions, renewals, or extensions are claimed as payments of the original discounts or indebtedness secured by the mortgage.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Henry A. Freyvogel.]

By SAMUEL HARPER, Register:

The assignee having sold encumbered property divested of encumbrances, the matter has been referred to me to ascertain liens and report distribution. The claimant upon the fund is Dominick Ihmsen, trustee for the City National Bank of Pittsburgh, who seeks to be paid the amount of four promissory notes made by the bankrupt to the order of, and endorsed by, John M. Freyvogel, the first dated March 30, 1875, for $4,000, the second dated April 8, 1875, for $2,600, the third dated May 11, 1875, for $2,443.33, and the fourth dated June 23, 1875, for $1,900; and all at four months, the aggregate amount being $10,933.33. It is claimed that these notes are secured by a mortgage given by the bankrupt, on the real estate sold by the assignee, dated February 2, 1875, for the payment of $11,000 in one year, "which amount is as collateral security for certain promissory notes held by the City National Bank which were discounted and renewed before date hereof for said H. A. Freyvogel, as will appear more fully on reference being had to said in part recited obligation."

The bond and mortgage are dated February 2, 1875, nearly two months prior to the date of the first note claimed on, and consequently the notes there described are not the notes now outstanding. The notes described in the bond are as follows: One dated October 19, 1874, for $2,000; one November 27, 1874, for $4,000; one December 5, 1874, for $2,600; and one January 8, 1875, for $2,433.33,—and all having four months to run. At the date of the mortgage the City National Bank held the four notes just described, which were made by the firm of W. J. Anderson & Co., of which the bankrupt was a partner, and endorsed by the bankrupt. The firm was then dissolved and proceedings were pending in the state courts for the settlement of its accounts. An arrangement was effected between the bank and Freyvogel, by which the latter executed the mortgage referred to and gave his individual notes, endorsed by his minor son, of even date, amount and time to run of the notes then held by the bank—which latter notes were to be surrendered to him. A large mass of testimony was offered, which I have labored in vain to put to some practical use. The question presented and urged with great zeal by the assignee's solicitor is, that the circumstances surrounding the mortgage constitute a new loan and that the new mortgage upon the faith of which the loan was contracted, is void under the provisions of the act of congress approved June 3, 1864, known as the "National Bank Act" [13 Stat. 107]. The 28th section (now section 5137 of the Revised Statutes) limits the real estate that may be held by a national bank, as follows: "First. Such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business. Second. Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted. Third. Such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings. Fourth. Such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees, or mortgages held by such association, or shall purchase to secure debts due to said association. Such association shall not purchase or hold real estate in any other case or for any other purpose than as specified in this section; nor shall it hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage, or hold the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it for a longer period than five years."

If the first position of the counsel be correct, the second must as a matter of course follow. If the facts show the transaction to be a new loan, they must also show that the debt, then existing, was paid; but the very first step in the transaction negatives such an idea. The preceding negotiation had for its object the securing of the debt for which the bankrupt was liable, and the testimony does not disclose a syllable as to an intent on the part of either the bank or Freyvogel to negotiate for the payment of that debt. It is true that Freyvogel testifies that it was his understanding that when he gave the mortgage and the new notes that the old ones were paid, but that it is only his understanding. He desired to use the old notes in his equity case against his partner, Anderson. The bank desired to have them paid, but Freyvogel was unable to pay them, and the mortgage security was agreed upon, and when given, the old notes were given up to him for the purpose for which they were desired. The mortgage itself negatives the idea of a new loan, and shows the fact of a subsisting debt. It reads "which amount is as collateral security for payment of certain promissory notes held by the City National Bank which were discounted and renewed before date hereof for said H. A. Freyvogel." And to the same effect is the bond: "which amount is payable to said trustee as collateral security for the payment of the following promissory notes, being renewals and discounts before the date hereof and on the respective dates of the same in favor of said Henry A. Freyvogel, the original endorser on said notes."

The mortgage speaks of notes "discounted and renewed," and the bond of "renewals and discounts," and both that such renewals and discounts were before the date of the bond and mortgage. It is true, that in neither the bond or mortgage are the notes described as those of W. J. Anderson & Co., as should have been the case, but the mortgage describes them as having been discounted and renewed "for said H. A. Freyvogel, the original endorser on said notes." It is very evident, however, that the bond and mortgage refer to, and describe the old notes, and not the new notes substituted for them. The old notes were made by the firm of W. J. Anderson & Co., to the order of H. A. Freyvogel, and by him endorsed, and it was perfectly proper for the mortgage to say that the notes had been discounted for the bankrupt, as the presumption is that the last endorser is the person for whom such obligations are discounted, and it was undoubtedly correct for the bond to say that the notes were "in favor of H. A. Freyvogel, the original endorser." Neither of these expressions could apply as well to the new notes, as they were made to the order of John M. Freyvogel. The conclusion is irresistible that the mortgage was given to secure the old notes, and not for the purpose of securing a new loan made at the time. The bankrupt, however, testifies very positively that it was his understanding that the transaction paid the old notes, and that he gave his bond and mortgage under those conditions. A personal knowledge of many years of Mr. Freyvogel, satisfies me that he was thoroughly conscientious in his testimony, but on some points he is flatly contradicted by the witnesses for the bank, some of whom —Ihmsen, Callery and Maginn, notably—I have intimately known equally long, and whom I am convinced testified fully as conscientiously. The bankrupt does not, however, detail any facts to sustain the idea of payment; nothing but his understanding and intention. Evidence of the intention of the parties at the time of the discounts, to consider the new notes as renewals of former notes preceding them in the series, is not admissible; for the question was one of fact, whether or not, they were renewals, and not what the parties intended or considered. Appeal of Bank of Commerce, 8 Wright [44 Pa. St.] 423. Hence the intention of the parties is not to govern the controversy, but the facts occurring at the time the transaction occurred. As already shown, the mortgage was taken to secure the old notes, an existing indebtedness. The bankrupt himself admitted the mortgage to be but security. That it paid the debt is not even pretended. Then, did the new notes pay the debt? Certainly there was no agreement expressed that they should have that effect. The existing debt having been secured by the mortgage, the old notes were surrendered by the bank to Freyvogel, that he might have the use of them in his equity suit against his partner, and the new notes were given as a mere matter of form; they were called "memorandum notes"; they were numbered and marked by the bank to correspond with the numbering and marking of the old notes. It is not pretended by the bankrupt that these notes paid the old ones. He merely alleges that when he gave the mortgage and new notes, he understood it to be payment. Both mortgage and notes entered into the payment, yet, as we have seen, the mortgage was unquestionably given as security for the old notes. There is nothing in the fact as detailed in the testimony, to warrant the understanding of the bankrupt as to the effect of the transaction.

Proof has been given of the various transactions with the bank when the memorandum notes fell due, and it is strongly urged that the facts show payment. When a note fell due, another was offered to the bank, discounted, and the proceeds placed to the credit of the bankrupt, who then lifted the matured note by his check. And this is claimed to be payment. But such a claim is not supported by authority. On the contrary, all the authorities show it to be renewal. In Hartly v. Kirlin, 9 Wright [45 Pa. St.] 54, affirming the court below, the judge used this language: "It is difficult to define exactly what a renewal is; so far as our opinion goes, we consider it an extension of credit—a new loan of the same credit formerly given—an agreement not to require to pay the due note by other funds, but for a consideration to extend the time of payment of the old debt, by fixing a new period, through a new note, for its payment. The old debt, not being paid except in form, no new fund passing into or out of the bank, lives again in the new, because by an actual payment it has never been ended." This language is appropriate to this case. There was only the form of payment by applying the proceeds of the new to the lifting of the old note—the debt all the time remaining unpaid. The substance of payment was never realized. When the mortgage was given, Freyvogel was indebted to the bank about $11,000, and that indebtedness has never been satisfied, and it is perfectly clear that nothing in the national bank act forbids the bank taking a mortgage securing for such a debt. The mortgage is clearly within the second clause of the 28th section of that act. The debt to secure which it was given was certainly "previously contracted," and the property was as certainly mortgaged to the bank "in good faith," thus fulfilling all the conditions of the law. Nothing, therefore, but the payment of the debt would discharge the security. There is no pretense that the debt was ever paid in substance, and nothing short of a positive agreement between the parties that the new notes should operate as payment, can discharge the debt. No such agreement is alleged.

Some testimony has been offered on the subject of usury, but as the fund in the assignee's hands is not sufficient to pay the debt when reduced by deducting the usurious interest, it is not necessary for me now to make any calculation to determine the actual amount of the debt. Should the bank seek to prove for the defect, the testimony will control the liquidation. I find that the bank is entitled to the whole fund.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE OF DEBTOR—FAILURE TO KEEP BOOKS OF ACCOUNT.

1. The fact that the bankrupt failed to keep proper books of account in a business which has been entirely closed out, there being no debts due to nor owing by him, arising out of such business, will not prevent a discharge.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is an application for the discharge of the bankrupt. The only specification of which any proof is offered that requires any consideration, is that the bankrupt, since March 2, 1867, being a merchant or tradesman, kept no books of account. It appears that prior to April, 1874, for a short time, the bankrupt was engaged in the business of buying and selling tobacco and cigars, and that in that business he kept no books of account. But it further appears that that entire business is closed out, there being neither debts due to him nor owing by him which arose out of that business. The case is therefore exactly like the case of In re Keach [Case No. 7,629], in which Judge Lowell held that the failure to keep books in such a case did not prevent the granting of a discharge. I entirely concur in the reasoning on which that decision was rendered. It further appears that very many years before the bankruptcy, the bankrupt was engaged in some business from which there may be some uncollected claims still due to him, but the evidence does not show the business was continued after the 2d of March, 1867. Discharge granted.

FRIEDLANDER et al. v. JOHNSON et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. Mississippi. May Term, 1875.

HUSBAND AND WIFE — CONVEYANCES BETWEEN—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—TRUSTS.

1. If a husband borrow or use his wife's money or estate for his individual purposes, he becomes equitably indebted to her, and may secure her by payment, pledge, or in any other proper way.

2. A statute of Mississippi declares that "if the husband shall purchase property in his own name with the money of his wife, he shall hold the same only as trustee for her use; but such trust shall be void as against creditors of the husband, who contracted or gave credit in consequence of his possession of such property, without notice of the trust." Held, that this statute could not avail a creditor of the husband when the wife's property had once stood in the husband's name, but had been conveyed by him to a third person, who purchased in good faith and who had made a bona fide conveyance to the wife for a valuable consideration.

3. A creditor of the husband, in order to have the trust raised by the statute declared void in his favor, must show that credit was given by him to the husband in special and specific reliance on that particular trust property.

[Cited in McClung v. Steen, 32 Fed. 376.]

4. When either the money or any other assets of one person are used by another to purchase property in his own name, a resulting trust arises in favor of the party with whose means the purchase is made.

In equity. This was a creditor's bill brought to subject a certain plantation, of which the legal title stood in the name of Elizabeth Johnson, to the payment of a judgment recovered by the complainants [Friedlander & Gerson] against her husband, Robert G. Johnson. The defendants, Johnson and wife, were married in 1853, having previously entered into a marriage settlement by deed inter partes, whereby all the property of the wife was conveyed to a trustee for her separate use, leaving her free as if she were unmarried, and sole and perfect owner, to lease, alien, encumber, devise or bequeath the same, or any part thereof, according to her own will and pleasure. The defendant Robert G. Johnson, at the time of his marriage with his wife Elizabeth, had no property, while she was the owner of a plantation, a number of negroes, and a considerable estate, valued altogether at from twenty-five to forty thousand dollars. After the marriage, the husband took charge of the property and conducted its business in his own name. A few years after the marriage, when it became evident that his wife would bear him no children, the husband conceived the design of getting his wife's property in his own name, so that it should not go to her relations at her death. In pursuance of this design, he purchased in 1856 the plantation now in question, from one George W. Hogan, for ten thousand dollars, and took the title in his own name and paid for it out of the proceeds of his wife's separate estate. In February, 1866, Mrs. Johnson entered into partnership with one Howard, an inmate and protégé of the family. The evidence was conflicting whether he had any means, but its weight tended to show that he had considerable at that time. It was clear that the business of the concern was quite large in amount. At the time of the formation of the partnership, Johnson conveyed to Howard the plantation in question for twelve thousand dollars, secured by the two notes of Howard for six thousand dollars each. One of them was paid by advances to Johnson, the other still remained outstanding in 1868, when the partnership business was closed, and the plantation was conveyed to Mrs. Johnson by Howard, and his remaining note for the purchase money given up to him. The note thus surrendered to Howard had been appropriated to Mrs. Johnson by her husband, in consideration of the large amount of her property which he had converted to his own use. The note was surrendered to Howard contemporaneously with the delivery of the deed by him to Mrs. Johnson for the plantation in question, and was the consideration therefor.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. A clearer equity of a wife has rarely been shown in a court of justice. Unless prevented by some technical rule from having her rights, so far as the property in question is concerned, she must prevail in this suit.

Technical law is cited to show that a resulting trust could not arise in favor of Mrs. Johnson, when her husband originally purchased the property from Hogan. But she does not stand on a resulting trust. She has the legal estate, and does not seek the benefit of any such trust. The complainants have come into the court to press an equity which they claim to have against Mrs. Johnson. They come subject to the rule that he who asks equity must do equity. Whether Mrs. Johnson had or had not a resulting trust, which she could have enforced, is not material. Her money or her property went to the purchase of this plantation. She was equitably entitled to be repaid or secured out of her husband's estate. He placed Howard's note in her hands for this purpose; with this note she acquired the legal estate in the land. Surely her equity to keep it is greater than the complainants' equity to take it from her.

It is well settled that if a husband borrow or use his wife's money or estate for his individual purposes, he becomes equitably indebted to her, and may secure her by payment or pledge, or in any other proper way. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1404–1415, and Sykes v. Chadwick, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 141. This is all that was done in this case.

We are met, however, by the statute of Mississippi, which declares that "if the husband shall purchase property in his own name with the money of his wife, he shall hold the same only as trustee for her use; but such trust shall be void as against creditors of the husband, who contracted or gave credit in consequence of the possession of such property, without notice of the trust." Code, § 376. The complainants claim the benefit of this law. They allege that the property in question, though purchased with the wife's money in 1856, stood in the husband's name until 1866, and that they gave him credit on the faith of his ownership thereof, without notice of the trust. This plea cannot avail the complainants unless they can prove that the conveyance to Howard was a fraudulent one, intended to cheat them. For, if the conveyance to Howard was valid, then the title of Mrs. Johnson is unimpeachable, if she was equitably entitled to the note of Howard, which her husband transferred to her. From the evidence in the case, it would have been difficult for the complainants to attack the title of Howard. Johnson may have sold the property to him because he was largely in debt, and in order to have its proceeds in more manageable shape in case of being pressed by his creditors. But there is no evidence that it was not sold for its full value, or that Howard did not purchase it in good faith. If this was the case, there was no law to prevent its sale. The bankrupt law, if it would have affected the transaction, had not then been passed. At all events, the complainants never did attack it, although they recovered judgment against Johnson in November, 1866, and failed to collect anything thereon.

But, aside from this consideration, it is questionable whether the statute referred to can fairly be quoted by the complainants in their favor. By the decisions of the supreme court of Mississippi, it would seem that a reliance on property thus situated, namely, purchased with the wife's money, in order to give the husband's creditors a priority over the wife, must be a special and specific reliance, giving actual credit to that particular property. Thus, in Butterfield v. Stanton, 44

Miss. 26, it is laid down with regard to the statute in question as follows:

1. "That it is exceptional and almost penal, as to the wife, in declaring a trust to her use void, in the contingency stated. This statute ought therefore to be strictly construed.

2. "Though the statute declares the trust void as to a class of creditors, it creates no lien on the property. The property thus subjected to their debts is bound only as other property, there being no lien until one is obtained by judgment, mortgage or otherwise. There is none per se.

3. "The trust provided for in this statute is available to the wife except as to those creditors giving credit on account of this particular property. To benefit creditors, the contract of credit ought, therefore, to be based upon it, and it ought in some way, to be defined or distinguished by the parties at the time of the credit. It should be definitely made to appear that the particular property was the occasion of the credit."

Now, in the present case, Johnson, at the time the complainants gave him credit for their present claims against him, was in possession of other property to a large amount, and was producing large annual crops which were disposed of through the agency of the complainants as his commission merchants. It cannot be pretended that they gave any such special credit to the particular property in question, as is mentioned and required in the foregoing abstract of the decision referred to. On the contrary, in March, 1861, when the complainants were taking security from Johnson for his then indebtedness to them, amounting to over $12,000, they took from him a trust deed on other property standing in his name, together with certain slaves, and did not take any lien on the property in question. It is true, they say that they supposed that the latter property was included in that trust deed; but this is denied by Johnson, and no evidence is offered to sustain the statement.

As to the position that a resulting trust only arises when actual money of another is used in the purchase of property, and not when other assets are so used, it has no foundation in reason or authority.

The plea that the wife gave her consent to the use of her slaves and other property, in purchasing property in her husband's name, cannot avail in this case, because, even if she did give such consent, and if she was bound by it (which under her peculiar circumstances may be doubted), she, at any rate, became a creditor of her husband to the amount thus appropriated, and this was a good consideration for the note of Howard, which she received, and with which she obtained the deed for the property which she now holds.

In any point of view in which the case may be considered, we are always met by the wife's equity standing out in bold relief, and dominating every claim which the complainants may assert in their favor.

Bill dismissed.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE OF DEBTOR—NOTICE OF APPLICATION—LOST RECORDS.

1. The loss of proofs of debt which have been filed is the misfortune of the bankrupt, and he cannot be legally discharged until they are supplied.

2. A creditor who has proved his debt is entitled to notice by mail of an application for a discharge, and he cannot be prejudiced by the loss of his proof from the files.

3. Where proof of debts have been lost a general notice of the meeting under the petition for discharge to all creditors named in the schedule, stating that if they have theretofore filed proof of debt, it will be necessary for them to supply it as it has been lost, is not sufficient. Such lost records must be supplied under sections 899, 900, Rev. St.

In bankruptcy.

Before T. J. Lathan, Register:

On the 22d day of May, 1878, the creditors elected an assignee in said matter, to whom was delivered the proof of debts on file at that date. These, together with such as have come to his hands since his appointment, are so mislaid that he cannot find them, nor his book in which the same are entered. The only record to be had of the proven debts is that of those in hands of the undersigned, which is only partial. I may add that the number of debts proved is small, and the assignee reports no assets whatever. The bankrupt has filed his petition for discharge. Under section 5109, Rev. St., no creditors are required to be notified of the day to show cause, except such as have proved their debts; but in the case now certified, not having a perfect list, I am unable to know whom to notify. This difficulty, however, could be only obviated by giving notice to all the creditors in the schedule. But this would not remove another serious defect in the proceedings; the creditors who had previously filed their debts, on receiving the notice unless they desired to oppose the discharge for cause, would conclude it unnecessary to give the matter further attention.

It is useless to point out the inconsistent result that would follow. I respectfully recommend the following course: At the bottom of the usual notice of the meeting under the petition for discharge to let the following note be added: "If you have heretofore filed your proof of debt in this case, it will be necessary for you to supply it, as the same has been lost." And let these notices be sent to all the creditors named in the schedule.

I would further suggest that the time under these notices be five days longer than usual, viz.: fifteen days.

HAMMOND, District Judge. The course suggested by the register will not answer the purpose. It goes on the assumption that all the creditors of the bankrupt are, as a matter of fact, mentioned in his schedules, and notice to them will be notice by mail to all "who have proved their debts," as the statute requires. Rev. St. § 5109. Now it is possible that the bankrupt may have left off his schedules the name of some one or more of his creditors by misadventure, or it may be, designedly in the case of some creditor known to be hostile; and as some creditors of this kind may have proved their debts, under the plan above suggested, they would receive no notice by mail. The statute (section 5109) provides for a publication of a notice of any application for discharge, which seems designed to protect the creditors against a discharge without notice; but this kind of notice will not bind a creditor who has proved his debt, nor can he be prejudiced by the loss of his proof from the files. Having proved his debt, he is entitled to notice by mail. The loss of these papers is the bankrupt's misfortune, and until they are supplied he can no more be legally discharged than he could be if other material points, or the whole of the record, were lost. Lost records are supplied in this court under the provisions of the Rev. St. §§ 899, 900. That the proofs of debt are a part of the record there can be no doubt. In re Emison [Case No. 4,459]; Anon. [Id. 460]. The clerk will certify this opinion to the register.

FRIEDMAN v. GOODWIN et al.

[1 McAll. 142.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. July Term, 1856.

LAND GRANT—LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENT—NAME OF GRANTEE — ADMISSION OF CALIFORNIA AS A STATE—VOID ACT VALIDATED BY SOVEREIGN.

1. The title to the premises in dispute was in the United States, until the admission of California into the Union.

2. Intermediate the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the admission of California into the Union, no military officer of the United States could make any alienation of the public land.

3. On the admission of California into the Union, she became the proprietor of the land in dispute.

4. The sovereign may, although an individual can not, render valid a void act.

5. The name of a grantee is not essential to the validity of a deed. A grant may be made to classes of persons, if sufficiently designated by descriptio personarum.

[Cited in Durham v. Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 22 Fed. 471; Salem Capital Flour Mills Co. v. Stayton Water-Ditch & Canal Co., 33 Fed. 153.]

6. The act of the legislature of this state, approved May 18, 1853 [Laws Cal. p. 219, c. 160], was a legislative grant.

7. Where a grant made by government refers in general terms to a certainty, it is the same as if the certainty had been expressed in the grant, though it be not matter of record, but lie in averment by matter in pais.

This cause came on to be heard on complaint and general answer, upon an agreed statement of facts in the nature of a special verdict by consent of parties. It is in haec verba:

1st. That the premises sued for are situated upon the navigable tide-waters of the Bay of San Francisco, in the state of California, which bay is an arm of the sea, in which the tide regularly ebbs and flows; that the said premises are within the limits of the water-line front of the city of San Francisco, as defined in and by a certain act of the legislature of the state of California, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain property of the state of California," passed March 26, 1851 [Comp. Laws Cal. 767], and were below usual high-water mark at the time California was admitted into the Union, and so continued below high-water mark, and covered by water, at the date of the passage of the said act of the California legislature.

2d. That by virtue of a sale, made in accordance with an act of the legislature of the state of California, passed May 18, 1853 [supra], entitled, "An act to provide for the sale of the interest of the state of California in the property within the water-line front of the city of San Francisco," as defined in and by the act entitled, "An act to provide for the disposition of certain property of the state of California," passed March 26, 1851, and certain mesne conveyances, the plaintiff became seized of all the right, title, and interest in the premises, on the 18th February, 1854, which the state of California had on the 20th October, 1853, the date of the commissioners' sale, in and to the premises sued for, and still continues so seized. The said acts of March 26, 1851, and March 18, 1853, are contained in the published statutes of California, and are hereby made a part of this special verdict, with the same effect as if said acts were herein set forth. That the defendants have been in the adverse possession of the premises since the —— day of December, 1855, and now hold the same.

On the 27th day of September, 1849, a lease by deed was made by Captain E. D. Keyes, of the 3d regiment of artillery of the U. S. army, and then commanding officer of the post at San Francisco, Upper California, to Theodore Shillaber, of certain lands then and ever since known as the "Government Reserve," of which the premises sued for in this action are a part. The lease is then set out in totidem verbis. (It is only necessary to understand that the lease was made by the officer above named to the said Theodore Shillaber, for the term of ten years.) On the —— day of December, 1849, the said lease was by a writing thereon, approved and ratified by Brevet Brigadier General Bennett Riley, governor of California; and afterwards, Alexander H. H. Stuart, secretary of the interior, under the seal of his department, made the following indorsement, to wit, "I hereby ratify and confirm the within lease, on the part of the United States." The said Shillaber afterwards, by deed bearing date on the 11th day of April, 1851, assigned the said lease, and conveyed all his right under the same to the leased premises, to Joseph C. Palmer, Charles W. Cook, George W. Wright, and Edward Jones, who constitute the firm of Palmer, Cook & Co. On the 26th day of March, 1851, the legislature of California passed an act entitled, "An act to provide for the disposition of certain property of the state of California" [Comp. Laws Cal. 764]; which said act is hereby incorporated in this special verdict, with the same effect as if fully set forth. The lands sued for in this action are above the value of two thousand dollars, and are part of the lands mentioned in the second section of said act as "the property known as the 'Government Reservation';" and, by a series of intermediate conveyances, the defendants are invested with and seized of all the title which Palmer, Cook & Co. derived from the said lease to Shillaber and the assignment thereof to them, and the said act of the legislature of California, passed March 26, 1851, for an unexpired term, beginning on the —— day of December, ——, and ending on the —— day of December, 1847.

It is hereby stipulated that the foregoing statement shall be taken and accepted as the special verdict of a jury in this action, and shall be entered on the record as such. And the court shall determine the law arising thereupon, and enter judgment for plaintiff or defendants, as it may determine the law.

Crittenden & Inge, for plaintiff.

Lockwood & Wallace and C. H. S. Williams, for defendants.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff sues in ejectment for certain premises described in his complaint, and rests his title upon the rights acquired under a sale made of the premises sued for, under and by virtue of an act of the legislature of the state of California, passed on the 18th day of May, 1853, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the interest of the state of California in the property within the water-line front of the city of San Francisco, as defined in and by the act entitled 'An act to provide for the disposition of certain property of the state of California,' passed March 26, 1851" (Comp. Laws Cal. 767). The defendants rely for the defense of their title, on an act of the same legislature, passed previously, on the 26th March 1851 (Comp. Laws Cal. 764). The superiority of title depends upon the solution of two questions: 1. In whom was the title to the disputed premises on the 26th day of March, 1851, at which time the elder title of the defendants accrued? 2. What was the legal effect of that upon their title?

On the ratification of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the title to the premises passed from Mexico to the government of the United States. In the latter it remained during the territorial existence of California. The lease executed by Captain Keyes during that existence, approved by General Riley, and subsequently ratified by A. H. H. Stuart, secretary of the interior, could divest no title from the United States, and consequently could transfer none to Theodore Shillaber, under whom defendants claim. The lease, for all purposes of conveying any title, was still-born at its birth. The title remained in the United States; and on the admission of California into the confederacy on an equal footing with the original states, the title passed, under the operation of that admission and of the constitution of the United States, to the state of California, where it remained until the 26th day of March, 1851, at which date the act under which the defendants claim was passed.

What is the legal effect of that act? It is well to remark, in limine, that all objections urged against the title of defendants on account of non-payment of rent, or by reason of the failure of the lessees to comply with any other condition of the lease from Captain Keyes, are disposed of by the fact that they are not claiming title under it. They claim title from the state under the legislative grant of March 26, 1851. To that, then, we are to look for the source of it. If the state of California, as the court believes, had the title to the premises in dispute vested in her, and if she transferred it to the defendants, or to those under whom defendants claim, then the purchase under the sale by virtue of the subsequent act of the legislature of this state on the 18th day of May, 1853, by the plaintiffs, gives their title no standing against that of the defendants. The act of the legislature to be considered, is entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain property of the state of California," passed March 26, 1851 (Comp. Laws Cal. 764). The first section describes the boundaries of the lots in relation to which it is intended to legislate. The second section grants the use and occupancy of all the land described in the first section, to the city of San Francisco for the term of ninety-nine years; save as therein afterwards excepted, being those lands which have been sold by the authority of the ayuntamiento, or town or city council, or by any alcalde of the said town or city, at public auction, in accordance with the terms of the grant known as Kearney's grant to the city of San Francisco; or which have been sold or granted by any alcalde of the said city of San Francisco, and confirmed by the ayuntamiento, or town or city council, thereof, &c. There are certain terms annexed to the grant, to which it is unnecessary to refer. This second section closes with the following words: "The property known as the 'Government Reserve' is exempt from the operation of this act; except that any estate held by virtue of any lease or leases, executed or confirmed by any officer of the United States on behalf of the same, shall be and the same are hereby granted and confirmed to the lessees thereof; and the written instrument whereby such lease or leases was made shall, in all actions brought by the lessees for the recovery of the lands so demised, be sufficient evidence of title and possession to enable the plaintiff to recover." It is upon this last clause that defendants rely. The construction contended for by plaintiff is, that the confirmation by the act is limited to "any estate held;" and that no estate was held under the lease, it being void; that nothing in fact was confirmed, and therefore the lessee took nothing by the legislative grant. It is true, that an estate in land means, in strict legal parlance, such interest as the tenant hath therein; but the word "estate," when used in a statute, or instrument other than a deed, and calling for such meaning, is to be deemed as passing the land itself. The statute, speaking of the estate (referring to the lands described), declared that they are hereby granted; evidently referring to those lands. But, turning from this logomachy, or war of words, there are other and less verbal arguments which suggest the unsoundness of the construction urged by the plaintiff's counsel. It would impute gross ignorance to the legislature, not to award to them the knowledge of the utter impotency of any attempt by an officer of the government to alien any portion of the land the property of the United States, without the authority of an act of congress. That the president with the heads of departments combined could not so have done, must have been known to them; and it is reasonable to consider that the legislature had a full knowledge that no interest by any unauthorized act of the officer could have been conveyed, and that large and extensive improvements had been made in good faith by individuals, and therefore they determined, in the distribution of the property, to save the rights of the occupants by a confirmation without which they would have had no legal existence. It is to be observed that the act does not stop at the point where the estate is confirmed, but proceeds to declare that the "written instrument" by which such "lease or leases were made shall, in all actions brought by the lessees for the recovery of the lands so demised, be sufficient evidence of title and possession to enable the plaintiff to recover." Now, although a private individual may not, the sovereign may confirm that which was originally void; and in this case the legislature has given vitality to the written instrument, so far as to constitute it, by their creative faculty, sufficient evidence of both title and possession, with the avowed purpose that he may recover the lands. This would seem to show clearly their intention to do what was attempted to be done, and to grant the lands at least for the terms mentioned in the leases. If this written instrument is made by the legislature a muniment of title sufficient to enable the party to recover the land, such legislative action is equivalent to a grant. The grantees who were to take, were those who held by virtue of any lease or leases executed or confirmed by any officer of the United States on behalf of the same. The defendants bring themselves strictly within this class, and answer to the descriptio personarum. They hold by virtue of a lease executed in behalf of the United States, executed by one of the officers thereof, ratified by another, and confirmed by a third.

It is true that no grantee is named in this law; and it is equally true that a grant is void for uncertainty, where the grantee is not sufficiently designated to distinguish him from all others; and when such designation cannot be gathered from the grant, it cannot be supplied by parol testimony. Thus a grant to the heirs of A., in being, is void; for non-constat who are the heirs of a living person. If the word "heirs" is to be construed "children," then, what children? Are those in esse at the time of the grant only to take; or were after-born to be included? Was the grant to take effect immediately, or after the death of grantor? If no children survived A., would his brothers and sisters take? There are no means of ascertaining from the face of the grant the intention of the grantor. In such case, therefore, the grant is void for uncertainty in the designation of the grantee.

Admitting this rule in its fullest extent, it by no means results that a grantee must be named. "The names of persons at this day are only sounds for distinction's sake, though it is probable they originally imported something more; as some natural qualities, features, or relations; but now there is no other use of them but to mark out the individuals we speak of, and to distinguish them from all others; and therefore in grants, which are to receive the most benign interpretation, and most against the grantor, if there be sufficient shown to ascertain the grantor and grantee, and to distinguish them from all others, the grant will be good." Bac. Abr. tit. "Grant C." If they (the grantees) are so designated as to distinguish them from all others, the grant would be good without a name at all; and the mistake of a name in such a case would not vitiate. Hall v. Leonard, 1 Pick. 27. Again, parol evidence, though inadmissible to vary or contradict the terms of a deed, is competent to show the situation of a party in relation to things and parties around him; thus, if the language of a written instrument is applicable to several persons, parol evidence is admissible of any intrinsic circumstance to show what person or persons were intended. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 288. In the interpretation of a grant, another rule prevails. Where a grant made by government in general terms refers to a certainty, it is the same as if such certainty had been expressed in the grant, though it be not matter of record, but lie in averment, by matter in pais or in fact.

There is no doubt that the grant in this case comes within the principles of the foregoing authorities. In the grant there is a descriptio personarum who are to take. The defendants have brought themselves within that description, and are entitled to a verdict. Upon consideration whereof, after hearing counsel for the respective parties, we adjudge that defendants are not guilty.

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. April Term, 1877.

BANKRUPTCY—EXEMPTION UNDER STATE LAW—SETTING APART SPECIFIC GOODS.

1. Where no property is claimed by a bankrupt under the specific exemptions of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], his claim for an allowance must stand upon the exemption granted by the laws of the state.

2. Under the law of Georgia which exempts personal property of the value of one thousand dollars in specie, the bankrupt is not entitled to money the proceeds of articles sold by the assignee.

3. In this case the bankrupt set apart and claimed certain specific goods as exempt. The assignee took no notice of the claim, but mixed the goods claimed with others and sold all indiscriminately, and afterwards allotted to the bankrupt out of the proceeds one thousand dollars. Held, that the assignee mistook the law. All the bankrupt was entitled to was the proceeds of the specific goods claimed and set apart by him.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Joseph Friend.]

This was a petition to review the decree of the bankrupt court on exceptions to the assignee's allowance of exemptions.

Clifford Anderson, for petitioner.
R. E. Lester, contra.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. On examination of this case, I am of opinion that the assignee erred in setting apart to the bankrupt one thousand dollars on a specie basis (or eleven hundred and twenty-five dollars currency) in money, which accrued from the sale of his goods.

As no property was claimed by the bankrupt under the specific exemptions of the bankrupt act, his claim for an allowance must stand upon the exemption granted by the laws of the state. This, as to personal property (which is the only kind of property here in question), is "personal property to the value of one thousand dollars in specie." Const. Ga. art. 7. But the articles must be specifically claimed (Code, 2003); and if money is claimed, it is to be invested under the direction of the ordinary, in such articles as the applicant may desire—and in no case will the allowance of cash, without such investment, be a valid exemption (Code Ga. § 2016a; Smith v. Turnley, 44 Ga. 243). It is probable that the bankrupt court would not feel bound to superintend such investment, but, without it, would allow an exemption of money on hand. But this was not on hand. The money set apart is the proceeds of sales made by the assignee. The bankrupt should have specifically claimed the articles he desired before their conversion, unless deprived of an opportunity of doing so.

In this case the bankrupt did specifically claim certain goods which he set apart and separated from his other goods. The assignee took no notice of this separation, but mixed the goods together and sold them indiscriminately. The assignee then allotted to the bankrupt, out of the proceeds of sale, one thousand dollars in cash on a specie basis, as before stated. In doing thus he mistook the law. The bankrupt was entitled to the specific goods set apart and claimed by himself, if they did not exceed in value the amount of one thousand dollars in specie, and to those goods alone. The assignee having sold the entire stock, the bankrupt is only entitled to the proceeds of the specific goods set apart by himself. He cannot claim any advantage from the fact that the assignee improperly mixed the goods together. That would be unjust to the creditors. They have as much right to complain of the mixture as the bankrupt has. The assignee was the common agent of both parties; or rather, he was the agent of the law, and neither party ought to be prejudiced or advantaged by his act. I do not find any sufficient proof of fraud to deprive the bankrupt of his right to have property exempted under the law.

The decree of the district court [case unreported], and the decision of the register affirmed thereby, are reversed, and the matter is referred back to the assignee to ascertain (as near as can be done) the actual proceeds of the property claimed and set apart by the bankrupt (not to exceed one thousand dollars in specie), and to pay the same to him, and amend his schedule accordingly. The costs of this petition for review to be paid out of the general assets of the bankrupt estate.

ASSIZE OF BREAD.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace for a penalty incurred under the 5th section of the by-law of the 17th of April, 1806 [Wash. Corp. Laws, 30], for offering for sale bread of insufficient weight. By the 4th section, it was the duty of the mayor, or register, to ascertain and publish in the last week of every month the cash price of superfine flour; and the price so published was to be the standard by which the weight of bread was to be regulated for the month succeeding, according to the rule prescribed in the 3d section. This price not having been ascertained and published in the last week of the month preceding the supposed offence, THE COURT reversed the judgment.

JURISDICTION IN ADMIRALTY—PETITORY SUITS—SUIT BY PART OWNER.

1. The admiralty has jurisdiction over petitory suits.

[Cited in The Comet, Case No. 3,050; Grigg v. The Clarissa Ann, Id. 5,826.]

2. A part owner may sustain such a suit against a merely fraudulent possessor, without joining the other part owners; and if they do not appear, or object, and the libellant establishes his title, the court will decree the possession to him.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maine.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a petitory action to try the title of the libellant to one half the schooner Friendship. It is objected that the court has not jurisdiction. But I consider that question settled for this circuit by the case of The Tilton [Case No. 14,054]. It is also insisted that it is admitted by the libel, that one Peter Hardy is the lawful owner of one half of the schooner, and that he is not before the court. But he might have appeared, if he had chosen to do so, and the utmost effect of his non-appearance is, that the court might conclude that he has no desire to have the claimant Haskell deprived of the possession of the vessel. The Valiant, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 64.

Upon the proofs, it appears, in substance, that Haskell, the claimant, obtained his apparent paper title to one half the vessel through a forged bill of sale; and that the libellant is the true and lawful owner thereof. And the question is, whether the other part owner, by failing to appear, can prevent his co-owner from trying his title as against a mere wrongdoer, and having established it, whether the court will not, as against that wrongdoer, decree the possession to the libellant. I am of opinion that it will try the title, and dispossess the fraudulent possessor, even in the absence of the other tenant in common. He has no interest in this dispute, and there is no reason for requiring him to be made a party to it. He may have no wish to have the possession changed; for he may be willing that whichever of these parties may be the true owner of a moiety should possess and manage the vessel. But I cannot presume from his mere silence, that he desires a fraudulent possession to continue, and if he did, I am not prepared to admit that it ought to affect the action of the court. If this were a cause of possession, he, owning a moiety, would have an equal right to the possession if he chose to assert it. But it is a petitory action. The decree divests only the fraudulent and unlawful possession of the claimant. The real part owners will stand wholly unaffected thereby, as respects the employment of the vessel. This objection is overruled.

The decree of the district court [case unreported], establishing the title of the libellant to one moiety of the schooner, and decreeing the possession to him, is affirmed.

FORFEITURE—COASTING ACT OF FEBRUARY 18, 1793—PROCEEDING ON A FOREIGN VOYAGE.

Under the 8th section of the coasting act, 18th February, 1793, c. 8 [1 Stat. 305], a coasting vessel is not forfeited for proceeding on a foreign voyage, if such vessel has not actually left the port, from which she intended to proceed on a foreign voyage. The forfeiture does not attach, until the vessel has quitted such port, with an intent to proceed on such foreign voyage.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

This vessel being an enrolled vessel, licensed for the fisheries, at the custom-house at Ipswich, was, on Saturday, the 8th of October, 1808, sold by her former owners, John Dexter, and James Andrews, to the claimant [Samuel Plummer]. The bill of sale was made out by the collector of the port of Ipswich, and the enrolment and license of the vessel, were, on the same day, surrendered to him, but no new papers were, at that time, taken out. On the same day, the vessel was removed from a place, called "Chebacco River," in said Ipswich, by Plummer, to a place within the limits of the same town, called "Plumb Island River," into which Ipswich river empties; and in the latter river, vessels belonging to the port usually lie. On the afternoon and evening of the same day, the schooner was loaded with a full cargo, by means of gondolas, which brought the same from a place in Newbury, called "Old Town Bridge." About twelve or one o'clock of the same night, the schooner was discovered by a revenue boat belonging to the custom-house at Newburyport, and was immediately hailed twice or thrice, and no answer, or an unsatisfactory one, was returned. At this time, the schooner had her foresail up, and was in motion. There was some contrariety of evidence, as to the point, whether her anchor was weighed, or not; but the weight of evidence was, that it was weighed. Eight persons were found on board. The vessel was fully loaded, and appeared equipped for a voyage. On going on board, the revenue officers receiving no satisfactory information respecting the destination of the vessel, and finding no papers on board, seized her, and on the next day carried her to Newburyport. At the time of the seizure, it appeared that there was very little wind, and that it was about half ebb tide; and in order to go to sea, it was necessary that the vessel should pass Ipswich bar, where, at high water, there is ten feet of water; and at half tide, about five feet. The schooner, it was said, when loaded, would draw eight feet. On the Monday following (the 10th of October) the claimant, accompanied by one Joscelyn Hildrupp, (who, on the night of the 8th of October, appeared on board as master,) went to the collector, at Ipswich, and by deceptive representations, and concealment of the seizure of the schooner, obtained a temporary enrolment and license in the claimant's name, for the coasting trade, and also obtained a permit for Newburyport, on the manifest presented by them, which was sworn to before the collector, and signed by Hildrupp with the name of Joseph Hildrupp, instead of Joscelyn. It seemed conceded on the whole evidence, that at the time of the seizure, the schooner was actually within the limits of the port of Ipswich.

The libel, or information, contained several allegations of forfeiture. 1. For a departure from the port of Ipswich without a permit, or clearance, founded on the 3d section of the act of 9th of January, 1808, c. 8 [2 Stat. 453]. 2. For taking on board sundry goods and merchandize, without a permit from the collector of the port, founded on the 2d section of the act of April 25, 1808, c. 66 [2 Stat. 499]. And 3. For proceeding on a foreign voyage from the port of Ipswich, without first giving up her enrolment and license, and without being registered by said collector for said voyage, founded on the 8th section of the act for enrolling and licensing vessels in the coasting trade and fisheries [Act Feb. 18, 1793, c. 8 (1 Stat. 305)].

G. Blake, for the United States.
Wm. Prescott, for claimant.

STORY, Circuit Justice (after stating the facts and the allegations). Upon the argument, the two first allegations are abandoned, and the attorney for the United States rests the cause altogether upon the third, and with great propriety, as the supreme court have already settled the only questions which could arise on the two former allegations against the construction, on account of which they were originally introduced into the libel.

It has been contended, on the part of the claimant, that the 8th section of the act alluded to, does not work a forfeiture, unless the vessel has actually performed a foreign voyage, and returned to the United States; and that part of the section which alludes to the forfeiture of goods imported in such vessel, is supposed to fortify this construction. It is certainly true, that by returning with a cargo to the United States, a vessel which contravenes the provision of this section, subjects the imported cargo to forfeiture. And so it has been adjudged by the supreme court, at February term, 1812. But this increase of forfeiture in a certain event, by no means proves that no forfeiture could accrue, without the return to the United States from a foreign voyage. The reason of affecting the return cargo was, without doubt, to take away the strongest temptation to an illicit employment of the vessel, by subjecting every thing to forfeiture which was connected with the voyage. The language of the statute is clear and explicit, and cannot, without manifest violence, be brought to the construction contended for.

I rely as little upon the suggestion, that the vessel was not subjected to forfeiture, because her enrolment and license were surrendered; although no register was taken out. The counsel for the claimant has assumed, that the words "and being duly registered," are used as mere idle words, and in no distinct connexion, and therefore are to be rejected as surplusage. It is true, that I can perceive no sufficient reason, why a register should in such case be required, when it is very certain, that in no other case a register is absolutely necessary. Without a register, a vessel in foreign trade is not entitled to the privileges and benefits of a ship of the United States; but in other respects she is recognised by law. She may sail with a sea letter, or certificate of ownership. But it is sufficient for me, that the words of the statute are so; and when the legislature have expressly enacted a provision, the court have no other duty but to interpret it according to its genuine sense. Vessels engaging in the coasting trade and fisheries, engage upon the terms and conditions of the law, and are bound to comply with them.

But the main difficulty remains, did the Friendship "proceed on a foreign voyage?" It is contended by the attorney for the United States, that she did so proceed, although the vessel was not without the limits of the port of Ipswich; that "to proceed on a voyage," does not imply leaving a port; but may be satisfied with breaking ground, and sailing in a port, with intent to pursue such a voyage. And he relies upon the analogous case of an insurance from one port to another port, where the voyage commences on the breaking ground with intent to sail. Perhaps it may be answered, that in cases of insurance, an intent to deviate is not a deviation, and that sailing on a voyage with such an intent does not constitute the fact, until the vessel has actually passed the dividing or deviating line. But another answer is, that the cited case is of contract, where the intent of the parties is to prevail; and the law construes the risk, as commencing with the first inception of the voyage; in order more fully to effectuate the manifest intention of the parties. Policies of insurance are always liberally expounded for the benefit of trade. But the case is otherwise as to penal statutes. It is a maxim long since settled, that the construction of such statutes is to be strict; and a maxim so sanctioned by ages, and by the reason of things, I do not feel at liberty to disturb, upon supposed inconveniences. Sitting here to dispense justice, I am not at liberty to narrow the law, to suit any class of prosecutions. When the legislature speak directly, we must expound their acts according to their natural meaning, and obey their injunctions.

It does not, indeed, appear distinctly in evidence, which way the vessel was sailing, when seized; and if it be true (which has not been contradicted) that she could not pass the bar at the ebb tide; or if it be true, (which has been strongly sworn, even on the part of witnesses introduced by the government), that the sole object of moving the vessel was to prevent her grounding, and to get her into deeper water in the channel, it might be doubted, if there was a commencement of any voyage. But I confess, that the other facts in the case powerfully impress my mind with the belief, that the whole transaction was fraudulent, and that the intention was to violate the laws. The time, the place, the manner, and the conduct, of the business, equally show, that it was not fit to meet the day; and if the vessel had been seized without the port, it would not have been easy to remove the presumption of a foreign voyage.

But let us return to the construction of the act. The point is, not what the legislature might, but what they have, provided. At the time of the passing of this act, there was no prohibition of trade, and there was no necessity of jealously watching vessels while lying in port. The object of the act was, to prevent vessels engaged in the coasting trade and fisheries from becoming the medium of the introduction of smuggled goods, under the security and cover of their license. The words of the act are, "If any ship or vessel shall proceed on a foreign voyage," &c. Had the section stopped here, perhaps the construction of the attorney for the United States would have been very strong; but in the same sentence the legislature explain what they mean, by adding, "without giving up, &c., to the collector of the district comprehending the port, from which she is about to proceed on such foreign voyage." Such foreign voyage then is, to proceed from the port; not to commence within it; and the same expression is again repeated in the proviso.

The 32d section of the same act may throw some light on the subject. That provides that a licensed vessel shall be forfeited with her cargo, if found employed in any other trade, than that, for which she is licensed. Now if the Friendship had not given up her license, she would have been liable under this section; and, if the attorney for the United States be right, under the 8th section also. But I presume that the legislature intended the 8th section to apply to all cases, where a foreign voyage was pursued under any circumstances; and the 32d section to all cases, where the trading was in port or coastwise, when it was unauthorised by the license. I am somewhat confirmed in this construction by the language of the first and second sections of the act of 9th January, 1808, c. 8 [supra], which requires, that vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries should give bonds not to proceed to a foreign port, but to reland their cargo in the United States: and of the 3d section of the same act, by which the proceeding to a foreign port subjects the vessel and cargo to forfeiture. And by a subsequent act (March 12, 1808, § 1 [2 Stat. 473]) the same bonds are required of vessels, which are not registered, licensed, or possessing a sea letter. By these sections the legislature manifestly require a proceeding to a foreign port before a forfeiture is incurred. Now if the legislature did not declare a licensed vessel forfeited under the embargo acts, until she had actually arrived in a foreign port on a foreign voyage, but suffered her departure on giving bonds, it would seem that it hardly contemplated that a foreign voyage was actually in progress while the licensed vessel was within our own ports. I do not, however, rely upon these acts, because, being passed on temporary occasions, they can hardly be considered as connected with the general system of our laws.

But what is the allegation in the libel? That the said vessel did "proceed from the said port of Ipswich upon a foreign voyage, without first giving up her enrolment and license, &c., and without being registered for said voyage." The plea is, "that the said vessel did not proceed from said port of Ipswich, &c., on any foreign voyage." Now it is undoubtedly true, that mere surplusage does not vitiate, and that an immaterial averment may be rejected. But it is also true, that when an averment is of substance, and is more specific than is necessary, and cannot be rejected without a fatal defect, it must be proved as laid (1 Chit. Pl. 231, 233); and penal actions in this particular are subject to as great, and formerly to greater, nicety, than others. In Rex v. Stevens, 5 East, 244, Lord Ellenborough said, that he did not find any authority in the law, which warranted him in rejecting any material allegation in an indictment or information, which is sensible and consistent in the place where it occurs, and is not repugnant to any antecedent matter. Now the allegation, that she did proceed from the port of Ipswich, is material. It was certainly material to state, that she proceeded from some place, or was at some place; for otherwise it would be impossible to know, to what offence the party was to answer, and he could hardly be enabled to produce evidence to defend his property from forfeiture, as every proceeding of the vessel, during the whole existence of the license, might equally come under review. In a case like the present, it would be peculiarly necessary, as no foreign voyage is alleged to have been completed to any foreign port.

If, then, the place be material to be laid, it should be proved as laid. In the Attorney General v. Moyer, Bunb. 260, the illegal importation was laid in the information in London, and the evidence showed it to be at Cowes, and the court held the variance fatal. If, however, I could get over this objection (on which I do not decide), and if I could also overlook various other errors and irregularities of form in the libel, I could not easily persuade my mind to adopt the construction adopted by the court below. For the opinions of that court I entertain every respect, because I know they are well considered and carefully weighed: But sitting here, it is also my duty to exercise my own judgment, and to decide accordingly. It is to be remembered, that this section of the act is highly penal. That the intent of the act, nay, the language of it, may be fully satisfied, without this rigorous construction. That it is the actual proceeding, and not the attempt to proceed, on a foreign voyage that is punished. That the great object of that act is, to secure the revenue of the United States from frauds, and to prevent a foreign trade from being carried on under color of a coasting license. With such considerations I cannot but interpret the law, as requiring, that the evidence of a foreign voyage shall at least be manifested by a departure from the port before the forfeiture attaches.

The decree of the court below [case unreported] is, therefore, reversed, and the property is to be restored to the claimant; but I shall certify reasonable cause of seizure. Decree reversed.

[This was a libel in admiralty against the schooner Friendship and cargo (Thomas Watkins, claimant).]

G. Blake, for the United States.

B. Whitman, for claimant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The schooner Friendship and cargo were, on the 24th of April, 1809, libelled for taking on board goods and merchandise without a permit, contrary to the second section of the act of 25th April, 1808, c. 66 [2 Stat. 499]. Since the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of The Paulina v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 52, which declared that no forfeiture accrued for a violation of said section, but the only penalty was, a denial of a clearance, the information has been abandoned, and the only ground of controversy is, whether the court ought to grant a certificate of reasonable cause of seizure.

Upon the hearing of the cause, it appeared that the schooner, with a cargo of fish on board, was taken possession of at Provincetown, by the collector of Barnstable district, on or about the 20th of December, 1808. Her cargo was laden without a permit, and without being under the inspection of any revenue officers. It is quite clear, that the collector originally took possession of the Friendship and cargo, without an intention of seizure under the 2d section of the above act, and with an intention to detain the same under the authority given by the 11th section of the same act. As late as the 15th of February, 1809, the collector does not appear to have changed this intention; for a letter from him of that date, declared the property still detained under the 11th section aforesaid. Subsequently to this time, and about the middle of April, 1809, the collector made application to the district attorney on the subject, and by his advice and consent, the schooner and her cargo were eventually libelled. A great deal of evidence has been introduced to fortify, or to rebut, the presumption, that at the time of the detention, the schooner and cargo were bound on an illegal destination. I lay the whole of it out of the present case, because it can be material only in a suit, in which the right or propriety of that detention comes in controversy, which is not strictly the present case; for the seizure is the only question here, which the parties have chosen to litigate; no question as to damages has intervened.

Now it has been solemnly adjudged in U. S. v. Riddle, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 311, that a doubt as to the true construction of the law is as reasonable a cause for seizure, as a doubt respecting the fact. The 2d section of the act before us has been a vexata questio; judges in different districts have held opposite opinions, and until last February term of the supreme court, the question was still floating. Now the court in the case of The Paulina, which settled the doctrine, deemed it proper to certify, that there was reasonable cause of seizure. They therefore held in effect, that this act was so doubtful in construction, that collectors acting upon it ought to have the benefit of the certificate. Since then, the facts in the present case show a lading without a permit, which is all the act was supposed to require to fix the forfeiture, I hold myself bound by the decision, which I have stated, to certify that there was reasonable cause of seizure.

Whether the detention, before the seizure made to support the filing of the information, will or ought to be protected by the certificate, I will not decide. If the claimant had, in the court below, put in contest the time of seizure, or had at this term moved for a special certificate, and agreed that it should avail pro tanto, I should have been disposed to grant it. If he will now move for it, after the 1st of March, 1809, I will restrain the certificate to that time, and leave him to his general remedy for the injury, if any, of the previous detention.

On motion, certificate restrained to 1st March, 1809.

TREASON — CONSTITUTIONAL DEFINITION—INSURRECTION TO RESIST EXECUTION OF A LAW — TRIAL IN ANOTHER COUNTY — PARDON — PROCLAMATION TO DISPERSE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—CONFESSION—NEW TRIAL.

[1. Congress has no power to change in any way the crime of treason, as defined in the constitution (article 3, § 2), and its power is limited to fixing the punishment thereof. Therefore, the fact that congress, in the sedition act (1 Stat. 596), and in the act relating to rescue, and obstruction of process (1 Stat. 117, § 23), has created misdemeanors which may include acts amounting to treason, cannot be considered a legislative definition of "treason," whereby those acts cease to be punishable as such. It is for the courts alone to determine what is treason, within the meaning of the constitutional definition.]

[2. It was not, however, the intention of congress, in passing these acts, to innovate on the constitutional definition of "treason," for there may be rescues, and obstructions of process, as well as combinations and conspiracies to raise an insurrection, merely for the purpose of effecting a private purpose, possibly to injure individuals, and therefore without that intent to destroy the government which is essential to constitute treason by the levying of war.]

[3. Opposing, by force of arms, an act of congress, with a view of defeating its efficacy, and thus defying the authority of the government, is levying war against the United States, and constitutes treason.]

[Cited in Charge on the Law of Treason, Fed. Cas. Append.]

[4. The fact that nearly the whole of the county in which the alleged treason is charged to have been committed has been in a state of insurrection, and is at the time of the trial occupied by a military force, presents a case of "great inconvenience," which, under the judiciary act (1 Stat. 88, § 29) will justify the court in holding the trial of a capital case in another county.]

[5. Quaere: Whether the indictment is not a part of the trial, in such sense that, if the statute requires the trial to be had in the county where the crime was committed, the indictment must not also be found in that county; and whether if, after the indictment is found in a different court, a special court were to be appointed to be held in the county of the crime, the court could, by any process known to the law, order the indictment to be transferred into that court.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Dow, Case No. 14,990.]

[6. Where it is contended that a proclamation by the president, ordering the people to disperse, operates as a pardon of all offenses committed prior to the proclamation, such alleged pardon must be pleaded, in order that defendant may take advantage of it.]

[7. Such proclamation does not operate, even when it is obeyed, as a pardon of offenses already committed.]

[8. In a trial for treason, where the overt act has been proved by two witnesses, it is proper to go into evidence to show the course of the prisoner's conduct at other places, and the purpose with which he went to the place where the treason is laid; and, if he went with a treasonable design, then the proof of treason is complete.]

[Cited in Charge on the Law of Treason, Fed. Cas. Append.]

[9. In a trial for treason, a voluntary confession made by the prisoner on his preliminary examination may be received in corroboration of matters already testified to by two witnesses; but, as to matters not thus testified to, it must be disregarded.]

[10. The court has power in criminal, as in civil, cases to grant a new trial; but the new trial can only be granted in favor of the prisoner, and not to his prejudice.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Cornell, Case No. 14,868; U. S. v. Keen, Id. 15,510; U. S. v. Gibert, Id. 15,204.]

[11. A new trial should be granted where it appears that one of the jurors, before the trial, had used expressions to the effect that the prisoners ought to be hung, and that the community would not be safe unless they were hung.]

[Distinguished in Hollingsworth v. Duane, Case No. 6,618. Cited in U. S. v. Hanway, Id. 15,299.]

[12. In a capital case tried in a federal court in a different county from that in which the crime was committed, it is no ground of new trial that the record does not show that "great inconvenience" prevented the trial from being held in the county, the court having in fact decided that such was the case.]

[This was an indictment against John Fries for treason against the United States.]

IREDELL, Circuit Justice (charging jury).[1] Gentlemen of the Grand Jury: The importance of the duties you are now called upon to fulfil, naturally increases with the increasing difficulties of our country. But however great those difficulties may be, I am persuaded you will meet them with a firm and intrepid step, resolved, so far as you are concerned, that no dishonor or calamity (if any should await us) shall be ascribable to a weak or partial administration of justice.

If ever any people had reason to be thankful for a long and happy enjoyment of peace, liberty and safety, the people of these states surely have. While every other country almost has been convulsed with foreign or domestic war, and some of the finest countries on the globe have been the scene of every species of vice and disorder, where no life was safe, no property was secure, no innocence had protection, and nothing but the basest crimes gave any chance for momentary preservation; no citizen of the United States could truly say that in his own country any oppression had been permitted with impunity, or that he had any grievance to complain of, but that he was required to obey those laws which his own representatives had made, and under a government which the people themselves had chosen. But in the midst of this envied situation, we have heard the government as grossly abused as if it had been guilty of the vilest tyranny; as if common sense or common virtue had

[1] By the act of July 9, 1798 [1 Stat. 580], provision was made for the registering of the number and the measurement of the windows in each house, for the purpose, however, not of laying a tax upon the windows themselves, but of obtaining an approximate valuation of the house, which was the real subject of taxation. Understood in the cities, the progress of the excise officers, charged as they were with this somewhat inquisitorial duty, was regarded with indifference; but in the interior, and particularly in the north-eastern corner of Pennsylvania, the treatment which they received was far different. At first the matter appears to have been given up to the women, who treated the invaders of their fire-sides with every species of indignity, resisting, as the trial will show, the measurement of their windows by all the domestic artillery; but in a short time the discontent spread itself throughout the whole population, and the result was that the execution not only of this particular law, but of the process of the United States in general, was entirely frustrated. A proclamation was forthwith issued by the president, which is subjoined; and then, either finding himself, on the spur of the moment, unable to muster sufficient force to compel submission, or yielding to the suggestions that to dispel a state disturbance, state militia would be most serviceable, he directed a demand to be made on the governor of Pennsylvania.

By the President of the United States of America: Proclamation. Whereas, combinations to defeat the execution of the laws for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses within the United States, have existed in the counties of Northampton, Montgomery and Bucks, in the state of Pennsylvania, and have proceeded in a manner subversive of the just authority of the government, by misrepresentations to render the laws odious, by deterring the officers of the United States to forbear the execution of their functions, and by openly threatening their lives. And whereas, the endeavours of the well-affected citizens, as well as of the executive officers, to conciliate a compliance with those laws, have failed of success, and certain persons in the county of Northampton, aforesaid, have been hardy enough to perpetrate certain acts, which, I am advised, amount to treason, being overt acts of levying war against the United States, the said persons, exceeding one hundred in number, and armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, having on the seventh day of the present month of March, proceeded to the house of Abraham Lovering, in the town of Bethlehem, and there compelled William Nicholas, marshal of the United States, and for the district of Pennsylvania, to desist from the execution of certain legal processes in his hands to be executed, and having compelled to discharge and set at liberty, certain persons whom he had arrested by virtue of a criminal process, duly issued for offences against the United States, and having impeded and prevented the commissioners and assessors in conformity with the laws aforesaid, in the county of Northampton aforesaid, by threats of personal injury, from executing the said laws, avowing as the motive of these illegal and treasonable proceedings, an intention to prevent, by force of arms, the execution of the said laws, and to withstand by open violence the lawful authority of the government of the United States. And whereas, by the constitution and laws of the United States, I am authorized, whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed in any state, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by powers vested in the marshal, to call forth military force to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and I have accordingly determined so to do, under the solemn conviction that the essential fied from our country; and those pure principles of republicanism, which have so strongly characterized its councils, could only be found in the happy soil of France, where the sacred fire is preserved by five directors on ordinary occasions, and three on extraordinary ones—who, with the aid of a republican army, secure its purity from violation by the legislative representatives of the people. The external conduct of that government is upon a par with its internal. Liberty, like the religion of Mahomet, is propagated by the sword. Nations are not only compelled to be free, but to be free on the French model, and placed under French guardianship. French arsenals are the repository of their arms, French treasuries of their money, the city of Paris of their curiosities; and they are honoured with the constant support of French enterprises in any other part of the world. Such is the progress of a power which began by declarations that it abhorred all conquests for itself, and sought no other felicity but to emancipate the world from tyrants, and leave each nation free to choose a government of its own. Those who take no warning by such an awful example, may have deeply to lament the consequences of neglecting it. The situation in which we now stand with that country is peculiarly interests of the United States demand it. Wherefore I, John Adams, president of the United States, do hereby command all persons being insurgents as aforesaid, and all others whom it may concern, on or before Monday next, being the eighteenth day of this present month, to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes: and I do, moreover, warn all persons whomsoever, against aiding, abetting or comforting the perpetrators of the aforesaid treasonable acts, and I do require all officers and others, good and faithful citizens according to their respective duties and the laws of the land, to exert their utmost endeavours to prevent and suppress such dangerous and unlawful proceedings. In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at the city of Philadelphia, the twelfth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand, seven hundred and ninety-nine, and of the Independence of the said United States of America the twenty-third. By the President, John Adams. Timothy Pickering, Secretary of State. Philadelphia, Friday, March 22, 1799.

War Department, March 20th, 1799. Sir:—To suppress the insurrection now existing in the counties of Northampton, Bucks and Montgomery, in the state of Pennsylvania, in opposition to the laws of the United States, the president has thought it necessary to employ a military force, to be composed in part of such of the militia of Pennsylvania, whose situation and state of preparation will enable them to march with promptitude. The corps of militia first desired on this occasion are the troops of cavalry, belonging to this city, and one troop from each of the counties of Philadelphia, Bucks, Chester, Montgomery and Lancaster. These troops, I have the honour to request your excellency will order to hold themselves in readiness to march on or before the 28th instant, under the command of Brigadier General Macpherson. I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect, your excellency's most obedient and humble servant, James McHenry.

His Excellency, Gov. Thomas Mifflin.

The response was as follows:

Sir:—The secretary of war has this moment communicated to me the president's intention to employ a military force, in suppressing the insurrection now existing in the counties of Northampton, Bucks and Montgomery, with a request, that the troops of cavalry belonging to this city, and a troop from each of the counties of Philadelphia, Bucks, Chester, Montgomery and Lancaster, may be ordered to hold themselves in readiness to march, on or before the 28th inst., under the command of Brigadier General Macpherson. You will, therefore, immediately issue general orders for complying with the president's request; and communicate by express, with the commanding officers of the several corps. As soon as the troops are ready to march, you will make your report to me; sending the returns of the officers, from time to time, as you receive them. I am, sir, your most obedient servant, Tho. Mifflin. Philadelphia, March 20th, 1799. 3 o'clock P. M. To Peter Baynton, Esq. Adjt. General of the Militia of Pennsylvania.

The legislature of the state being then in session, and having received the president's proclamation, under cover of a message from the governor, put it in charge of a committee, who reported as follows:

The committee to whom was referred a message from the governor respecting a proclamation of the president of the United States, announcing the combination to defeat the laws for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses, which has existed in the counties of Northampton, Montgomery and Bucks report, that they have had the said message under their serious consideration, and find cause of deep regret, that combinations to defeat the laws of the United States, have a second time made their appearance in the state of Pennsylvania; that such combinations are repugnant not only to the pure principles of republicanism and the spirit of our constitution, but also highly dishonourable to the character of a portion of the citizens of our state. That laws tending to lay the heaviest burthen on the most opulent part of the community, should be opposed by those on whom it operates lightest; proves that the opposition has arisen from ignorance, or the most dark and malignant designs. Your committee cannot hesitate to express, with the most lively sensibility, their entire disapprobation of such unwarrantable conduct, tending to the dissolution of our government, and subversive of the principles of tranquility and good order, and it is the duty of every good citizen to discountenance such treasonable combinations, yet, as the general government has sufficient power to compel obedience to the laws, and the president has, in his proclamation, determined so to do in this instance, and has not thought the aid of the state necessary. The committee offer resolutions: Resolved, that this house will, when required, co-operate with the general government, with alacrity and promptitude, to suppress unlawful and treasonable combinations to defeat the execution of the laws of the United States, but as no such co-operation is now required, this house consider their interference at present as wholly unnecessary.

A motion was made by Dr. Logan, and seconded by Mr. Eyre, to add the following resolution to the report of the committee.

Aurora (Friday), March 25th, 1799. Resolved, that the governor be, and is hereby requested to cause full and due inquiry into the causes of the said riots, and to make special report to this house, thereupon, and particularly of any circumstance which may be alleged or discovered, tending to show the origin of the same in the agency of foreign incendiaries, or critical. Conscious of giving no real cause of offence, but irritated with injuries, and full of resentment for insults: desirous of peace, if it can be preserved with honour and safety, but disdaining a security equally fallacious and ignominious at the expense of either; still holding the rejected olive branch in one hand, but a sword in the other—we now remain in a sort of middle path between peace and war, where one false step may lead to the most ruinous consequences, and nothing can be safely relied on but unceasing vigilance, and persevering firmness in what we think right, leaving the event to Heaven, which seldom suffers the destruction of nations, without some capital fault of their own.

Among other measures of defence and precaution which the exigency of the crisis, and the magnitude of the danger suggested to those to whom the people have entrusted all authority in such cases, were certain acts of the legislature of the United States, not only highly important in themselves, but deserving of the most particular attention, on account of the great discontent which has been excited against them, and especially as some of the state legislatures have publicly pronounced them to be in violation of the constitution of the United States. I the seditious views of domestic traitors. On the question, will the house agree to the said resolution? The yeas and nays were as follows: Yeas, 27. Nays, 45.

The following is a translation of a manifesto in the German language, issued to the inhabitants of the counties of Northampton, &c., by General Macpherson, the officer in command—which gives a general view of the object with which he was charged.

William Macpherson, Brigadier General of the Armies of the United States, Commander of the Troops Ordered to Act against the Insurgents of the Counties of Northampton, Montgomery, and Bucks, in the State of Pennsylvania:—To the People of the Aforesaid Counties. Fellow Citizens:—Being ordered, by the president of the United States, to employ the troops under my command, or, according to circumstances, further military force, to procure submission to the laws of the United States, and to suppress and disperse all unlawful combinations which have there been made to obstruct the execution of the aforesaid laws, or any of them, by main force or power; I, therefore, have thought it proper to inform the people of the said counties, and all others whom it may concern, of the danger to which they expose themselves by combining in unlawful proceedings, or giving any assistance or encouragement to those who are concerned therein; and likewise to represent to them, how just it is to submit to the laws in general, but, particularly to those against which they have opposed themselves in the most violent manner. It cannot be unknown to you, my fellow citizens, nor to any part of the people of the United States, that submission to the laws, constitutionally made, is absolutely necessary for the support of the government; and that in a republic, where laws are made by general consent, this consent must be manifested by the majority of such persons as have been appointed for that purpose by the people in general, according to the constitution. The whole mass of the people cannot meet together to make laws, as it is clear, in places where a debate takes place, there will always be a difference of opinion, and that, therefore, no decision can ever take place unless the voice of the majority prevails. The people of the United States were so well convinced of this truth at all times, that, since their first settlement in this country, they suffered themselves to become governed by assemblies, which they chose themselves to represent their persons; and, whenever it was necessary, they compelled by force of arms everybody to submit to the laws made by a majority in such assemblies. The federal government is as well a government of the people, as freely chosen by them to represent them, and to make laws for their benefit, as the governments of the respective states. It was established and ordained by the people themselves, as is expressly declared by the constitution, "To form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." In order to obtain these great and desirable ends, for which the first articles of confederation were found to be altogether insufficient, they gave congress several powers specified in the constitution.

From the nature of the government, sometimes doubts may arise, and have already arisen, whether some of these powers authorize congress to make certain laws; nevertheless, there is a regular and lawful manner to decide such questions when they occur, to which all good citizens should resort, and submit to them without reserve. But, in the present case, no such doubt has ever been entertained, nor can it take place; because, in the constitution, it is expressly declared (article 1, § 8) "that congress" shall have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The constitution giving this power to congress, that body has to decide when and in what manner it shall be exercised, and this decision must be expressed by a majority; and when this is once expressed, it must be obeyed, or else the constitution must fall, and with it, all good government, law and order, must be annihilated, and discord, civil war and anarchy must follow thereupon, where, without government, all things would be overturned and plunged into confusion. The act against which the present treasonable opposition is made, is that for laying and collecting a tax for the common defence and general welfare of the United States, therefore an act which congress is expressly authorized by the people to make; yea, on the least consideration, it is plain, that it is as necessary and equitable in itself, as agreeable to the constitution, and even favourable to those people who now oppose the execution thereof. Nobody has denied, nor can anybody deny, that the United States, at the time the act was passed, was threatened with the resentment of a very powerful, very ambitious, and very revengeful nation, and are so yet. From what this resentment originated, or whether it might have been obviated by a different course of conduct, are only accidental questions. The main question is, whether we should submit to those humiliations which that nation has heaped upon us, and subscribe to the scandalous conditions demanded of us, or prepare ourselves for resistance and the defence of our rights, as it becomes a free, independent nation. With respect to this question, which congress was obliged to decide upon, according to its duty "To provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States," there was no difference of opinion, or at least, there was none declared. All agreed that we should not submit to what France proposed, but prepare for our defence in case she should attempt to carry them by force. The only question was, deem it my duty, therefore, on this occasion, to state to you the nature of those laws which have been so grossly misrepresented, and to deliver my deliberate opinion as a judge, in regard to the objections arising from the constitution. The acts to which I refer, you will readily suppose to be what are commonly called the alien and sedition acts. I shall speak of each separately, so far as no common circumstances belonging to them may make a joint discussion proper.

I. The alien laws, there being two. To these laws, in particular, it has been objected: 1. That an alien ought not to be removed on suspicion, but on proof of some crime. 2. That an alien coming into the country, on the faith of an act stipulating that in a certain time, and on certain conditions, he may become a citizen, to remove him in an arbitrary manner before that time, would be a breach of public faith. 3. That it is inconsistent with the following clause in the constitution (article 1, § 9): "The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person."

With regard to the first objection, viz.,

in what manner we should prepare, and how far these preparations were to go. Who were to decide this question? the majority or the minority? A majority, and a large majority of the people's representatives, chosen by themselves according to the constitution, made the decision, and resolved upon the manner of proceeding which has been observed. This manner of proceeding required money, and in order to obtain that a tax became necessary. If a different manner of proceeding had been adopted, money and the tax would nevertheless have been necessary; because it is impossible to defend the country in any way, or to make preparations for the defence thereof, without money. Even if there had been any base enough to propose a submission to the conditions of France, and the proposal had been agreed to, nevertheless, money and taxes would have been necessary; because France demanded of us before all things, the loan of many millions of dollars, and gave us to know that their further demands would be in proportion to our ability to pay. In order to raise this unlimited tribute, we should have been obliged to submit to much heavier taxes than congress has now laid for our defence. They certainly afterwards pretended to give up this demand; but, after all, so doing was only the consequence of our resistance and our preparations, and these preparations had already rendered the tax necessary. In laying this tax, congress paid the greatest attention to the situation and wants of the people, and distributed it in such a manner, that the burthen almost totally falls on the richer part, and the poorer class are greatly screened from the effects thereof. It is laid on lands, dwelling houses, and slaves; but as there are no slaves in this state, the whole tax falls upon the lands and dwelling houses. The lands are to be taxed exactly to their value, be the owner who he may, but the dwelling houses are appraised at a different rate. The poor man, whose house, out-houses, and lot, not exceeding two acres, are worth less than an hundred dollars, has nothing to pay; and if it were worth one hundred, the tax would be only twenty cents. According to the same rule, other houses of a higher value pay as follows:—

If $200	40 cents
300	60
400	80
500	100

From which you will perceive, my fellow citizens, that the house-tax is according to the value of the house, at 20 cents to $100; but for houses from $500 to $1000 value, the tax rises for each $100, 30 cents; so that a house of the value of $600 will have to pay six times 30 cents, or $1 80 cents.

If worth $700 pays	$2 10 cents
1000	3 00

At this rate, the rich man, with a house rated at $1000, has to pay three times as much of the tax as the poor man whose house is rated at one half that sum, viz., $500; and thus the tax operates progressively to the most costly houses and opulent people, until the value of their houses is taxed in proportion five times as high as those of their poorer fellow citizens, whose houses are worth only from $100 to $500. A house worth $100 pays 20 cents, which is only the one fifth part of one per cent. of its value; a house worth $30,000 pays $300, which is one whole per cent. of its value, and consequently five times as much in proportion as the other.

Hereby, my fellow citizens, you must be convinced that an opposition to this tax in our counties is not only contrary to the constitution, the laws, and every principle of good government, but in itself is inconsistent and ridiculous, as the tax which is opposed is the most easy on the poorer citizens, whom they irritate to opposition. Many of their houses, however, would have no tax to pay, and very few more than one dollar each, for very few of their houses will be rated at more than $500. It is true they will be subject to a land tax, but the tax on houses must first be deducted from the whole quota of the state, and what is then deficient will be laid upon the land. The houses in this state will probably pay the greatest part of the tax, perhaps the whole, and in that case no tax will be laid upon the land; and those whose houses are rated at less than $100, will be exempted from the tax. As a further proof of the attention of congress to the wishes and accommodation of the people, they have, during the last session, repealed that part which required a statement of the windows of each dwelling-house, and which, as it afterwards appeared, was more disagreeable than necessary and useful. Therefore, no further account of the windows has been demanded. To ascertain the value of the lands and houses was a difficult matter, and connected with a great deal of expense; but when once done, need not be repeated. Great pains were taken, and the most effective measures employed, to select people of good character, who understood the business well, and whose interests were equally involved with their fellow-citizens, to have the business accurately executed.

Besides, this act is not perpetual, being only for one year, and will not be continued, unless the public good demands it, and not otherwise than with the consent of the people through their representatives; as for those who have in so treasonable a manner opposed the execution of such lawful, necessary, and, for that part of the citizens who were the least able to pay taxes, indulgent law, there can therefore be no excuse; the bad consequences which they draw upon themselves by their criminal conduct, they cannot impute but to their own blindness, obstinacy and malice. On the contrary, every necessary step will and must be taken to bring them, and all others who have aided and abetted them, to submission, and trial by due

"That an alien ought not to be removed on suspicion, but on proof of some crime." It is believed that it never was suggested in any other country, that aliens had a right to go into a foreign country, and stay at their will and pleasure without any leave from the government. The law of nations undoubtedly is, that when an alien goes into a foreign country, he goes under either an express or implied safe conduct. In most countries in Europe, I believe, an express passport is necessary for strangers. Where greater liberality is observed, yet it is always understood that the government may order away any alien whose stay is deemed incompatible with the safety of the country. Nothing is more common than to order away, on the eve of a war, all aliens or subjects of the nation with whom the war is to take place. Why is that done, but that it is deemed unsafe to retain in the country, men whose prepossessions are naturally so strong in favour of the enemy, that it may be apprehended they will either join in arms, or do mischief by intrigue, in his favour? How many such instances took place at the beginning of the war with Great Britain, no body then objecting to the authority of the measure, and the expediency of it being alone in contemplation! In cases like this, it is ridiculous to talk of a crime; because perhaps the only crime that a man can then be course of law, in order that their punishment may serve as an example to others, and prevent the like crimes in future. The necessity of employing arms against a number of our fellow-citizens is painful, but the consequences must be imputed to those whose traitorous conduct has produced the present disturbances, and not to government, who, according to their most sacred duties, are obliged to maintain order and enforce obedience to the laws. But all those who return quietly to their homes, and abstain from any participation in these unlawful acts, either through open aid or secret abetting, counsel, or information, shall obtain the utmost protection to their persons and property. Every precaution shall be taken that the march of the troops shall not be troublesome to the citizens; all subsistence shall be punctually paid for, and the strictest discipline observed. Let me, therefore, my fellow-citizens, warn and entreat you, as you love your country, and estimate the happiness concomitant of liberty, order and peace; as you wish to avoid the necessity of human bloodshed, which is as much repugnant to my wishes, as to those of the president; as you abhor the horrors of a civil war, and the crimes and punishments of traitors, let me conjure you to shut your ears against the counsels of those malicious persons who would lead you to destruction, in order to satisfy their ambition, while they screen themselves from the punishment due to their crimes; who try to seduce you to take up arms against the laws and government of your country, and to involve yourselves in a contest as hopeless as it is criminal, against the whole power of the United States; who speak to you of peace and liberty, while they are kindling civil war; who complain of expenses, while they are forcing the government to augment them, in order to suppress sedition and revolt; and who plume themselves upon being republicans, while transgressing the most essential principles of republican government; to wit, obedience to the laws made by the decision of the majority. Therefore I forewarn you not to aid or abet those violaters of the law in any manner, so that you may avoid a participation of their crimes, and the consequent punishment.

Given under my hand and seal, at head quarters, April 6th, 1799. Wm. Macpherson. By order of the Governor. Jonathan Williams, Aid de Camp.

This manifest was accompanied with a letter from the Rev. Mr. Helmuth, a Lutheran minister of Philadelphia, conspicuous for his piety and zeal.

To the people of Northampton County: Friends and Brethren in the Faith: Excuse my addressing these lines to you; where there is fire, everybody is bound to extinguish it, and the clergyman is no more to be blamed for lending his aid than any other citizen. I am depressed with anxiety on your account. I know the consequences of conduct like yours; many of you will doubtless be apprehended and confined, some perhaps will pay the forfeit with their lives. You know it is the duty of the clergy of the city to warn such miserable persons, and prepare them as much as in their power for the awful change; my heart was much oppressed. I thought, alas! perhaps the same circumstances as those of 1794 will again occur; perhaps other thoughtless people will fall into the same wretched situation, because they were ignorant, and were deluded, and what would be your feelings if you had to witness their sorrow and anguish, their agonies of death? You should have warned the miserable creature; he would then perhaps have been saved; but you neglected to warn him, and are, therefore, responsible for the destruction of him and his. Such were the melancholy reflections that induced me to write you these few lines. I trust that you will think, when you read this, as you may in all truth: This man is sincere in his wishes for our welfare—why then should we think it improper in him to send us this advice? If he even should now and then say some things that are not perfectly agreeable to us, we will still take it in good part, for perhaps he is in the right, perhaps we have been deluded, we may have been deceived: If such be your thoughts, you will soon find them perfectly correct. You have hitherto entitled yourselves to the character of industrious and religious citizens of the Union, and most of the Germans still deserve that praise; but, sorrowful to relate, you have suffered yourselves to be spurred on to the most abominable injustice, to actual rebellion against the government you yourselves have chosen. How happy it is that your number is but small amongst the serious, and that the far greater part of them view your inconsiderate conduct with detestation! You all know that government cannot exist without taxes; at least your Bible would so instruct you; read Romans, xiii. 1–7; read it attentively. Do but reflect seasonably on your conduct. Even the holy passion week have you profaned with the works of actual rebellion. You have undertaken to oppose a tax which is as favourable to the country people as any tax can possibly be; for the rich inhabitants of the cities pay by far the greatest proportion of it; you have undertaken to oppose a tax which never would have been made had not the government been necessitated to make defensive preparations against the attacks of the French; a nation that aims at the overthrow and destruction of all religion, against a people that would scarcely have dared to attack and plunder us, if they had not been certain that they had their advocates amongst us. You do not consider the dreadful consequences of such opposition as you have made; I will therefore inform you of some of them. In the first place, an army of several thousand men will be marched into your neighbourhood; you well know that, in spite of every possible attention of commanding officers, charged with, is his being born in another country, and having a strong attachment to it. He is not punished for a crime that he has committed, but deprived of the power of committing one hereafter to which even a sense of patriotism may tempt a warm and misguided mind. Nobody who has ever heard of Major Andrè, that possesses any liberality of mind, but must believe that he did what he thought right at the time, though in my opinion it was a conduct in no manner justifiable. Yet how fatal might his success have proved! If men, therefore, of good character, and held in universal estimation for integrity, can be tempted when a great object is in view, to violate the strict duties of morality, what may be expected from others who have neither character nor virtue, but stand ready to yield to temptations of any kind? The opportunities during a war of making use of men of such a description are so numerous and so dangerous, that no prudent nation would ever trust to the possible good behaviour of many of them. Indeed, most of those who oppose this law seem to admit that as to alien enemies the interposition may be proper, but they contend it is improper, before a war actually takes place, to exercise such an authority, and that as to neutral aliens, it is toexcesses will be committed by an army. You will be more or less prevented from following your usual occupations, and yourselves and families will be put in the greatest terror and apprehension. 2dly. The army will cost money, and this money the government will have to raise by new taxes, for which you must thank your own opposition. The Western Expedition in 1794, cost a million of dollars; from this you may judge what expense you will bring on yourselves and fellow-citizens by your scandalous insurrection. 3dly. If you make any farther opposition, you will necessarily be treated as rebels, and before a month has passed, many of you will be in prison. They will be torn from their wives and children, and some will probably suffer an ignominious death. Alas! my heart bleeds for you. You have been told a thousand falsehoods. You have been told that the militia approved of your violence, and would not march against you. But you have been wrongfully deceived. For my own part, I have heard many speak of your conduct, but I have not heard one approve of it; your best friends, (if those are your best friends who agree with you in political opinion,) say, the occurrences in Northampton are very unjustifiable; the insurgents must be subdued; what would become of us if everybody was to create an insurrection? This is the substance of what is thought and said of your conduct—and you may depend upon it, that the government could, at a very short notice, muster upwards of twenty thousand men, if such a number were necessary, who would willingly march against you. Every one cries, shame! shame! upon you. I beseech you to mark well the character of those men who have enticed you to this insurrection. Are there not many of them who spend more money at the taverns in the course of a few evenings, than their whole tax amounts to? Honest Christian men will never advise to rebellion, but more especially against a government which has scarcely its equal under the sun. No, they are wicked, restless men, who have deceived themselves and you. It is your misfortune that you have suffered the habit to grow upon you, of scandalizing government; of cursing, instead of blessing it; and then indeed there are enough to be found, who, having particular ends in view, will scheme with you; persons who wish for your friendship on election days, in order that they may get a lucrative office under the very government that they blaspheme. When matters come to extremities, these deluders know perfectly well how to slip their necks out of the halter, and let the deluded suffer; these, who in comparison with the former, are innocent, will be left to bake, as their deceivers have brewed. Think of me, when you experience this sorrowful truth. Alas! you have been most scandalously deceived: from my soul I pity you. But what is now to be done? Listen, and take my advice. It is possible, that the marshal will be sent with an armed force to seize the wretches who opposed him in arms. For God's sake, do not let yourselves be prevailed upon to abet those rebels; for, should you be found in their company, you will certainly be punished with them. Rather endeavour to persuade them to deliver themselves up to the proper authority, (and this would be the wisest course they could pursue;) but if they will not do so, give the marshal every assistance he may require, for it is your duty. Take my advice. Affection for you, and the impulse of conscience, have compelled me to write you this letter. If you follow my counsels, you will do well; if not, I have done my duty. Be assured that I remain your friend, J. Henry Ch. Helmuth. Philadelphia, March 28th, 1799.

The view taken by the opposition generally of the "insurrection," may be gathered by the following notices in the Aurora.

(Tuesday) March 12, 1799. The public attention has been engaged for two or three days by some occurrences that have taken place in Northampton county, in this state. Efforts are making to magnify these occurrences into a terrible and bloody conspiracy against the government, &c. We shall, therefore, briefly state such facts as have been communicated to us on this subject. It is a well known circumstance, that in the schedule made out for the appreciation of the house tax, passed at the session of congress before the last, there was a column set apart for registering the number and measurement of the windows in every house, although no tax had been laid on windows. This circumstance caused a considerable degree of discontent throughout all parts of the Union; in some places the assessors were induced to desist from the admeasurement, and a member of congress in the last session, suggested the omission entirely of that measure, which was generally supposed by the people to be intended as the basis of a future tax. In Northampton county, while a person was in the act of measuring the windows of a house, a woman poured a shower of hot water over his head; in other places they were hooted at, and every expression of odium made use of, but no other violence done than the hot water war carried on by the female. Several of the assessors were intimidated from pursuing the duties for which they were appointed, and complaints were laid against several persons, who had uttered their dislike for what they called the window tax. The matter was taken up by the executive committee of the Union, and the marshal of this state district was directed to arrest several persons for a violation of the law. The marshal proceeded to the different places where the people reside, arrested them, and took bonds for their appearance at an inn in Bethlehem; all the accused appeared agreeably to appointment, except three out of seventy persons. The order of the marshal was to bring them to this city, and they were preparing to set out for Philadelphia, when a body of the people, some on horseback and others on foot, several of them belonging to the volunteer uniform corps, ap-tally inadmissible. To be sure the two latter instances are not quite so plain; the objection I am considering belongs equally to them all; for if an alien cannot be removed but on conviction of a crime, then an alien enemy ought not to be removed but on conviction of treason, or some other crime showing the necessity of it. If, however, we are not blind to what is evident to all the rest of the world, equal danger may be apprehended from the citizens of a hostile power, before war is actually declared as after, perhaps more, because less suspicion is entertained; and some citizens of a neutral power are equally dangerous with the others. What has given France possession of the Netherlands, Geneva, Switzerland and almost all Italy, and enables her to domineer over so many other countries, lately powerful and completely independent, but that her arts have preceded her arms; the smooth words of amity, peace, and universal love, by seducing weak minds, have led to an unbounded confidence, which has ended in their destruction, and they have now to deplore the infatuation which led them to court a fraternal embrace from a bosom in which a dagger was concealed.

peared, and demanded the liberation of the prisoners. The prisoners remonstrated in vain, and insisted on proceeding to Philadelphia, relying upon the laws, but the people that were collected, were not to be diverted from their purpose; the persons were set at large, and the marshal has returned to Philadelphia. It is but justice to the marshal to say, that he has conducted himself with propriety in the whole of this business, and the persons that were first arrested behaved with the utmost propriety and deference for the constitutional authorities. We are informed that a body of volunteers are to be called out and marched into Northampton county, but we cannot believe that such a measure can be deemed either necessary or wise. The discontents in Northampton county were directed against the window admeasurement; the same discontents have prevailed elsewhere. No tumult has arisen, or violence has been done to any person but what was done with the hot water, and as to the rescue of the persons arrested, there are means more effectual to bring them to justice, than by the odious means of an armed military force, which can answer no other purpose than to stir up new jealousies and harass the public mind. The offence of such a measure is among the least considerations on this occasion, and possibly there may be found some unfledged Alexander, desirous of burning up some of the flourishing towns, in the course of such an expedition, in order to give spirit and energy to the military movements.

(Friday) March 22, 1799. On Wednesday Herman Hartman, Adam Stephan and Henry Skanweiller, of Millerstown, Northampton county, arrived in town and delivered themselves up to the marshal, who conducted them to Judge Peters; before whom they entered into recognizances for their appearance at the next circuit court of the United States. These men were amongst the most violent opposers of the law in Northampton county, and we are informed that others of the principal rioters are on their way to this city for the purpose of making the like submission. Messrs. Hartzen, Horn, and Kern, members of the legislature, arrived in town from Northampton. The report of these gentlemen we gave in yesterday's Aurora. Whence is this precipitation on the part of the government of the United States, to march a body of troops against the people of Northampton and Bucks? Are those people in arms against the government? No one will dare to say they are. Whence, then, it may be again asked, such precipitation? When the disturbance took place in Western Counties, what was the conduct of the late President Washington? He first conferred with the governor of the state on that subject, then sent commissioners to expostulate with the deluded citizens, and to endeavour to bring them to their duty, and not till all failed did he resort to military force. He was not of the opinion that men like himself were first to be tossed upon the bayonet, and afterwards instructed in their duty. He was not of the opinion that our laws, like those of Draco, ought to be written in blood, and that disobedience to them should subject the offender to immediate military punishment. He was not of the opinion that the lives of his fellow citizens were of such little consequence, that they were to be taken away when their only crime might be ignorance or misinformation. He was not of the opinion that the state government should be treated with contempt, and that no consultation with its executive should be had. It is true that in a despotic government, where there are no citizens, but all are slaves, and where force and not reason is the alphabet of instruction, in such a government, indeed, it would be incongruous to argue the people into obedience. The logic of the bayonet is there the only one employed, and it is applied with promptitude. Is there any analogy between such a government and ours? If not, why such a similarity of measures? No republican can justify the conduct of those people who resisted the marshal in the execution of his duty; it was highly reprehensible, and ought to be punished. But has any endeavour yet been made by the administration to arrest the transgressors? Has the civil power proved inadequate to the object? Has the language of reason been addressed to the offenders? No, not by the administration. It has been employed, and with effect too, by private citizens; but it was a private and not a public voice that proclaimed it. Tranquility and submission are the consequences. Even Fries has declared his readiness to submit, and to take his trial whenever summoned thereto; and yet we hear of nothing but military movements. And for what purpose let Timothy Pickering declare.

Mr. Wolcott, then secretary of the treasury, in a letter to Frederick Wolcott (2 Gibbs' Life of Wolcott, 230), however judicious may be his views as to the tumult itself, certainly does not want as to raciness of sentiment as to the materials upon which the tumult was to act.

"There is a paltry insurrection here, which I am inclined to think will be subdued without difficulty. It may, however, be nursed into something formidable. Pennsylvania is the most villainous compound of heterogeneous matter conceivable. Though there are many good men and good things, yet as a state it is bad in the extreme. The governor is an habitual drunkard. Every day, and not unfrequently in the forenoon, he is unable to articulate distinctly. The efficient powers of the government are exercised by Judge McKean and Dallas. Of these men I can sincerely say that I believe them to be as vile as Porcupine represents them. What lies in their power towards promoting rebellion against the government, they will effect. McKean pretty openly supports the United Irishmen. One or two rascals who assaulted Brown and were committed by the mayor, were immediately released by the judge."

partisans not nominally French citizens, but completely illuminated with French principles, electrified with French enthusiasm, and ready for any sort of revolutionary mischief! Are we to be guarded against the former and exposed to the latter? No, gentlemen. If with such examples before their eyes, congress had either confined their precaution to a war in form, or to citizens of France only, losing all sense of danger to their country in a regard to nominal distinctions, they would probably justly have deserved the charge of neglecting their country's safety in one of its most essential points, and hereafter the very men who are now clamorous against them for exercising a judicious foresight, might too late have had reason to charge them, (as many former infatuated governments in Europe may now fairly be charged by their miserable deluded fellow-citizens), as the authors of their country's ruin. But those who object to this law seem to pay little regard to considerations of this kind, and to entertain no other fear but that the president may exercise this authority for the mere purpose of abusing it. There is no end to arguments or suspicions of this kind. If this power is proper, it must be exercised by somebody. If from the nature of it, it could be exercised by so numerous a body as congress, yet as congress are not constantly sitting, it ought not to be exercised by them alone. If they are not to exercise it, who so fit as the president? What interest can he have in abusing such an authority? But on this occasion, as on others of the like kind, gentlemen think it sufficient to show, not that a power is likely to be abused (which is all that can be prudently guarded against), but that it possibly may, and therefore to guard against the possibility of an abuse of power, the power is not at all to be exercised. The argument would be just as good against his acknowledged powers, as any others, that the legislature may occasionally confide to him. Suppose he should refuse to nominate to any office, or to command the army or navy, or should assign frivolous reasons against every law, so that no law could be passed but with the concurrence of two-thirds of both houses! Suppose congress should raise an army without necessity, lay taxes where there was no occasion for money, declare war from mere caprice, lay wanton and oppressive restraints on commerce, or in a time of imminent danger trifle with the safety of their country, to gain a momentary breath of popularity at the hazard of their country's ruin! All this they may do. Does any man of candour, who does not believe everything they do, wrong, apprehend that any of these things will be done? They have the power to do them because the authority to pass very important and necessary acts of legislation on all those subjects, and in regard to which discretion must be left, unavoidably implies that, as it may be exercised in a right manner, it may, if no principle prevent it, be exercised in a wrong one. If the state legislatures should combine to choose no more senators, they may abolish the constitution without the danger of committing treason. If to prevent a house of representatives being in existence, they should keep no law in being for a similar branch of their own, deeming the abolition of the government of the United States cheaply purchased by such a sacrifice, they may do this. They have the same power over the election of a president and vice president. What is the security against abuse in any of these cases? None, but the precautions taken to procure a proper choice, which, if well exercised, will at least secure the public against a wanton abuse of power, though nothing can secure them absolutely against the common frailty of men, or the possibility of bad men, if accidentally invested with power, carrying it into a dangerous extreme. We must trust some persons, and as well as we can, submit to any collateral evil which may arise from a provision for a great and indispensable good that can only be obtained through the medium of human imperfection. At the same time it may be observed, that in the case of the president, or any executive or judicial officer wantonly abusing his trust, he is liable to impeachment, and there are frequent opportunities of changing the members of the legislature, if their conduct is not acceptable to their constituents.

The clause in the constitution, declaring that the trial of all crimes, except by impeachment, shall be by jury, can never in reason be extended to amount to a permission of perpetual residence of all sorts of foreigners, unless convicted of some crime, but is evidently calculated for the security of any citizen, a party to the instrument, or even of a foreigner if resident in the country, who, when charged with the commission of a crime against the municipal laws for which he is liable to punishment, can be tried for it in no other manner.

The second objection is, "that an alien coming into the country, on the faith of an act stipulating that in a certain time and on certain conditions, he may become a citizen, to remove him in an arbitrary manner before that time, would be a breach of public faith." With regard to this, it may be observed, that undoubtedly the faith of government ought, under all circumstances, and in all possible situations, to be preserved sacred. If, therefore, in virtue of this law, all aliens from any part of the world had a right to come here, stay the probationary time, and become citizens, the act in question could not be justified, unless it could be shown that a real (not a pretended) overruling public necessity to which all inchoate acts of legislation must forever be subject, occasioned a partial repeal of it. But there are certain conditions, without which no alien can ever be admitted, if he stay ever so long; and one is, that during a limited time (two years in the case of aliens then resident; five in the case of aliens arriving after), he has behaved as a man of a good moral character, attached to the principles of the constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same. If his conduct be different, he is no object of the naturalization law at all, and consequently no implied compact was made with him. If his conduct be conformable to that description, he is no object of the alien law to which the objection is applied, because he is not a person whom the president is empowered to remove, for such a person could not be deemed dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States, nor could there be reasonable grounds to suspect such a man of being concerned in any treasonable or secret machinations against the government, in which cases alone the removal of any alien friend is authorized. Besides, any alien coming to this country must, or ought to know, that this being an independent nation, it has all the rights concerning the removal of aliens which belong by the law of nations to any other; that while he remains in the country in the character of an alien, he can claim no other privilege than such as an alien is entitled to; and consequently, whatever risk he may incur in that capacity, is incurred voluntarily, with the hope that in due time, by his unexceptionable conduct, he may become a citizen of the United States. As there is no end to the ingenuity of man, it has been suggested that such a person, if not a citizen, is a denizen, and therefore cannot be removed as an alien. A denizen in those laws from which we derive our own, means a person who has received letters of denization from the king, and under the royal government such a power might undoubtedly have been exercised. This power of denization is a kind of partial naturalization, giving some, but not all of the privileges of a natural born subject. He may take lands by purchase or devise, but cannot inherit. The issue of a denizen born before denization cannot inherit; but if born after may, the ancestor having been able to communicate to him inheritable blood. But this power of the crown was thought so formidable that it is expressly provided by act of parliament, that no denizen can be a member of the privy council, or of either house of parliament, or have any office of trust, civil or military, or be capable of any grant of lands from the crown. Upon the dissolution of the royal government, the whole authority of naturalization, either whole or partial, belonged to the several states, and this power the people of the states have since devolved on the congress of the United States. Denization, therefore, (in the sense here used,) is a term unknown in our law, since the right was not derived from any general legislative authority, but from a special prerogative of the crown, to which parliamentary restrictions afterwards were applied. So much so, that if an act of parliament had passed, giving certain rights to an alien with restrictions exactly similar to those of a denizen, I imagine he would not have been called a denizen; because the royal authority was not the source from which his rights were derived. As to acts of naturalization themselves, they are liable in England, by an express law to certain limitations, one of which is, that the person naturalized is incapable of being a member of the privy council, or either house of parliament, or of holding offices or grants from the crown. Yet I never heard, nor do I believe that such a person was ever called a denizen; for which, as there is no foundation in precedent, or in the constitution of the United States, I presume it is a distinction without solidity. Fixed principles of law cannot be grounded on the airy imagination of man.

The third objection is, "That it is inconsistent with the following clause in the constitution, viz.: 'The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on said importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person.'" I am not satisfied, as to this objection, that it is sufficient to overrule it, to say the words do not express the real meaning, either of those who formed the constitution, or those who established it, although I do verily believe in my own mind, that the article was intended only for slaves, and the clause was expressed in its present manner to accommodate different gentlemen, some of whom could not bear the name slaves, and others had objections to it. But though this probably is the real truth, yet, if in attempting to compromise, they have unguardedly used expressions that go beyond their meaning, and there is nothing but private history to elucidate it, I shall deem it absolutely necessary to confine myself to the written instrument. Other reasons may make the point doubtful, but at present I am inclined to think it must be admitted, that congress, prior to the year 1808, cannot prohibit the migration of free persons to a particular state, existing at the time of the constitution, which such state shall, by law, agree to receive. The states then existing, therefore, till 1808, may (we will say) admit the migration of persons to their own states, without any prohibitory act of congress.—This they may do upon principles of general policy, and in consistence with all their other duties. The states are expressly prohibited from entering into an engagement or contract with another state, or engaging in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger, as will not admit of delay. The avenues to foreign connection being thus carefully closed, it will scarcely be contended, that in case of war, a state could, either directly or indirectly, permit the migration of enemies. If they did, the United States could certainly, without any impeachment of the general right of allowing migration, in virtue of their authority to repel invasion, prevent the arrival of such. And as such invasion may be attempted without a formal war, and congress have an express right to protect against invasion, as well as repel it, I presume congress would also have authority to prevent the arrival of any enemies, coming in the disguise of friends, to invade their country. But, admitting the right to permit migration in its full force, the persons migrating on their authority must be subject to the laws of the country, which consist not only of those of the particular state, but of the United States. While aliens, therefore, they must remain in the character of aliens; and, of course, upon the principles I have mentioned, be subject to a power of removal, in certain cases recognized in the law of nations; nor can they cease to be in this situation, until they become citizens of the United States; in which case they must obey the laws of the Union as well as of the particular state they reside in. But, gentlemen argue as if because the states had a right to permit migration, the migrants were under a sort of special protection of the state admitting it, lest the United States, merely to disappoint the purpose of migration, should exercise an arbitrary authority of removal without any cause at all. It would be just as consistent to say, that if such migrant was charged with a murder on the high seas, or in any fort or arsenal of the United States, he should not be tried for it in a court of the United States, lest the court and juries, out of ill will to the state, should combine to procure his conviction and punishment, in all events, to defeat the state law. The two powers may undoubtedly be made compatible, if the legislatures of the particular states, and the government of the United States, do their duty, without which presumption, not an authority given by the constitution can exist. They surely are more compatible than the collateral powers of taxation, which, under each government, go to an unlimited extent, but the very nature of which forbids any other limitation than a sense of moral right and justice. If we skepticize in the manner of some gentlemen on this subject, suppose each legislature should tax to the amount of 19s. in the pound; each has the power; but is such an exercise of it more apprehended than we apprehend an earthquake to swallow us all up at this very moment? All systems of government suppose they are to be administered by men of common sense and common honesty. In our country, as all ultimately depends on the voice of the people, they have it in their power, and it is to be presumed they generally will choose men of this description: but if they will not, the case, to be sure, is without remedy. If they choose fools, they will have foolish laws. If they choose knaves, they will have knavish ones. But this can never be the case until they are generally fools or knaves themselves, which, thank God, is not likely ever to become the character of the American people.

Having said what I thought material as to the alien laws, upon the particular objections to them, I now proceed to discuss the objections which have been made to what is called the "Sedition Act," one of which equally applies to the alien laws as well as to this. But I think it proper previously to read the law itself.

The objections (so far as I have heard them) to this act, are as follows: 1. (And this applies to the alien law also.) That there is no specific power given to pass an act of this description, though in the particular specific powers given, there is authority conveyed as to other offences specially named. 2. That this law is not warranted by a clause in the constitution, conveying legislative authority, which, after designating particular objects, adds: "And to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other power vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."—Because it is not necessary and proper to pass any such law in order to carry into execution any of those powers. 3. That, admitting the former positions are not maintainable, yet the exercise of this authority is incompatible with the following amendment to the constitution, viz.: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the full exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

With regard to the first objection, I readily acknowledge, that soon after the constitution was proposed, and when I had taken a much more superficial view of it than I was sensible of at the time, I did think congress could not provide for the punishment of any crimes but such as are specifically designated in the particular powers enumerated. I delivered that opinion in the convention at North Carolina, in the year 1788, with a perfect conviction, at the time, that it was well founded. But I have since been convinced it was an erroneous opinion, and my reasons for changing it I shall state to you as clearly as I am able.

It is in vain to make any law unless some sanction be annexed to it, to prevent or punish its violation. A law without it might be equivalent to a good moral sermon; but bad members of society would be as little influenced by one as the other. It is, therefore, necessary and proper, for instance, under the constitution of the United States, to secure the effect of all laws which impose a duty on some particular persons, by providing some penalty or punishment if they disobey. The authority to provide such is conveyed by the following general words in the constitution, at the end of the objects of legislation particularly specified: "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." A penalty alone would not in every case be sufficient, for the offender might be rich and disregard it, or poor, though a wilful offender, and unable to pay it. A fine, therefore, will not always answer the purpose, but imprisonment must be in many cases added, though a wise and humane legislature, will always dispense with this, where the importance of the case does not require it. But if it does, from the very nature of the punishment, it becomes a criminal, and not a civil offence; the grand jury must indict, before the offender can be convicted. This general position may be illustrated by a variety of instances under the Penal Code of the United States, which have, I believe, never been objected to as unconstitutional, though there have never been wanting penetrating and discerning members who were ready enough to take exceptions where they found any plausible ground for them. I shall enumerate a few. In the act entitled, "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States" (1 Swift's Ed., p. 100 [1 Stat. 112]), among other crimes specified, are the following: Murder or larceny in a fort belonging to the United States. Misprision of felony committed in any place under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Stealing or falsifying a record of any court of the United States. Perjury in any court of the United States. Bribing a judge of the United States. Obstructing the execution of any kind of a process issuing from a court of the United States. In the collection act (volume 1, p. 237 [1 Stat. 175]) it is provided, that in all cases where an oath is by that act required from a master or other person having command of a ship or vessel, or from an owner or assignee of goods, wares, and merchandize, his or her factor or agent, if the person so swearing shall swear falsely, such person shall, on indictment and conviction thereof, be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court, before whom such conviction shall be had, so as the fine shall not exceed one thousand dollars, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed twelve months. In the act laying duties on distilled spirits (volume 1, p. 324 [1 Stat. 208]), in the 39th section, it is provided as follows: "If any supervisor, or other officer of inspection, in any criminal prosecution against them, shall be convicted of oppression or extortion in the execution of his office, he shall be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, or both, at the discretion of the court; and shall also forfeit his office." These instances deserve great consideration; because I believe no candid man will deny that these provisions were constitutional exercises of authority, within the scope of the general authority conveyed, though not specially named as objects which it should be competent for congress to provide for. And they certainly derive weight from the consideration, that the principle of them (which I believe was the case) was never objected to, though the expediency of some of the provisions may have been.

In further illustration of this subject, I shall state a case which was determined in this court, — U. S. v. Worrall [Case No. 16,766], — where there was an indictment against the defendant for attempting to bribe Mr. Coxe, the commissioner of the revenue. The defendant was found guilty, and afterwards a motion was made in arrest of judgment, assigning, together with some technical objections, this general one, that the court had no cognizance of the offence, because no act of congress had passed creating the offence and prescribing the punishment, but it was solely on the foot of the common law. The very able and ingenious gentleman who is the reporter of that case, and was the defendant's counsel in it, in the course of his argument, makes the following observations, part of which are remarkably striking and pertinent to my present subject: "In relation to crimes and punishments, the objects of the delegated power of the United States are enumerated and fixed. Congress may provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States; and may define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations. Art. 1, § 8. And so, likewise, congress may make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers of the general government. But here is no reference to a common law authority. Every power is matter of definite and positive grant; and the very powers that are granted cannot take effect until they are exercised through the medium of a law. Congress had undoubtedly a power to make a law, which should render it criminal to offer a bribe to the commissioner of the revenue; but, not having made the law, the crime is not recognized by the Federal Code, constitutional or legislative; and consequently, it is not a subject on which the judicial authority of the Union can operate." So far the observations of the defendant's counsel. Judge Chase, who on that occasion differed from Judge Peters as to the common law jurisdiction of the court, held, that under the 8th section of the first article, which I am now considering, although bribery is not among the crimes and offences specially mentioned, it is certainly included in that general provision; and congress might have passed a law on the subject which would have given the court cognizance of the offence. Judge Peters was of opinion, that the defendant was punishable at common law; but that it was competent for congress to pass a legislative act on the subject.

I conclude, therefore, that the first objection is not maintainable.

With regard to the second objection, which is, that this law is not warranted by that clause of the constitution authorizing congress to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers specially enumerated, and all other powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof; because, it is not necessary and proper to pass any such law, in order to carry into execution any of those powers—it is to be observed, that, from the very nature of the power, it is, and must be, discretionary. What is necessary and proper, in regard to any particular subject, cannot, before an occasion arises, be logically defined; but must depend upon various extensive views of a case, which no human foresight can reach. What is necessary and proper in a time of confusion and general disorder, would not, perhaps, be necessary and proper in a time of tranquillity and order. These are considerations of policy, not questions of law, and upon which the legislature is bound to decide according to its real opinion of the necessity and propriety of any act particularly in contemplation. It is, however, alleged, that the necessity and propriety of passing collateral laws for the support of others, are confined to cases where the powers are delegated, and do not extend to cases which have a reference to general danger only. The words are general, "for carrying into execution the special powers previously enumerated, and all other powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof." If, therefore, there be anything necessary and proper for carrying into execution any or all of those powers, I presume that may be constitutionally enacted. Two objects are aimed at by every rational government, more especially by free ones: 1. That the people may understand the laws, and voluntarily obey them. 2. That if this be not done by any individual, he shall be compelled to obey them, or punished for disobedience. The first object is undoubtedly the most momentous; for, as the legitimate object of every government is the happiness of the people committed to its care, nothing can tend more to promote this than that, by a voluntary obedience to the laws of the country, they should render punishments unnecessary. This can never be the case in any country but a country of slaves, where gross misrepresentation prevails, and any large body of people can be induced to believe that laws are made either without authority, or for the purpose of oppression. Ask the great body of the people who were deluded into an insurrection in the western parts of Pennsylvania, what gave rise to it? They will not hesitate to say, that the government had been vilely misrepresented, and made to appear to them in a character directly the reverse of what they deserved. In consequence of such misrepresentations, a civil war had nearly desolated our country, and a certain expense of near two millions of dollars was actually incurred, which might be deemed the price of libels, and among other causes made necessary a judicious and moderate land tax, which no man denies to be constitutional, but is now made the pretext of another insurrection. The liberty of the press is, indeed, valuable—long may it preserve its lustre! It has converted barbarous nations into civilized ones—taught science to rear its head—enlarged the capacity—increased the comforts of private life—and, leading the banners of freedom, has extended her sway where her very name was unknown. But, as every human blessing is attended with imperfection, as what produces, by a right use, the greatest good, is productive of the greatest evil in its abuse, so this, one of the greatest blessings ever bestowed by Providence on His creatures, is capable of producing the greatest good or the greatest mischief. A pen, in the hands of an able and virtuous man, may enlighten a whole nation, and by observations of real wisdom, grounded on pure morality, may lead it to the path of honour and happiness. The same pen, in the hands of a man equally able, but with vices as great as the other's virtues, may, by arts of sophistry easily attainable, and inflaming the passions of weak minds, delude many into opinions the most dangerous, and conduct them to actions the most criminal. Men who are at a distance from the source of information must rely almost altogether on the accounts they receive from others. If their accounts are founded in truth, their heads or hearts must be to blame, if they think or act wrongly. But, if their accounts are false, the best head and the best heart cannot be proof against their influence; nor is it possible to calculate the combined effect of innumerable artifices, either by direct falsehood, or invidious insinuations, told day by day, upon minds both able and virtuous. Such being unquestionably the case, can it be tolerated in any civilized society that any should be permitted with impunity to tell falsehoods to the people, with an express intention to deceive them, and lead them into discontent, if not into insurrection, which is so apt to follow? It is believed no government in the world ever was without such a power. It is unquestionably possessed by all the state governments, and probably has been exercised in all of them: sure I am, it has in some. If necessary and proper for them, why not equally so, at least, for the government of the United States, naturally an object of more jealousy and alarm, because it has greater concerns to provide for? Combinations to defeat a particular law are admitted to be punishable. Falsehoods, in order to produce such combinations, I should presume, would come within the same principle, as being the first step to the mischief intended to be prevented; and if such falsehoods, with regard to one particular law, are dangerous, and therefore ought not to be permitted without punishment—why should such which are intended to destroy confidence in government altogether, and thus induce disobedience to every act of it? It is said, libels may be rightly punishable in monarchies, but there is not the same necessity in a republic. The necessity, in the latter case, I conceive greater, because in a republic more is dependent on the good opinion of the people for its support, as they are, directly or indirectly, the origin of all authority, which of course must receive its bias from them. Take away from a republic the confidence of the people, and the whole fabric crumbles into dust. I have only to add, under this head, that, in order to obviate any probable ill use of this large and discretionary power, the constitution, and certain amendments to it, have prohibited, in express words, the exercise of some particular authorities, which otherwise might be supposed to be comprehended within them. Of this nature is the prohibitory clause relating to the present object, which I am to consider under the next objection.

4. That objection is, that the act is in violation of this amendment of the constitution, 3 Swift's Ed. p. 455, art. 3 [1 Stat. 21]. "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

The question then is, whether this law has abridged the freedom of the press? Here is a remarkable difference in expressions as to the different objects in the same clause. They are to make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press. When, as to one object, they entirely prohibit any act whatever, and, as to another object, only limit the exercise of the power, they must, in reason, be supposed to mean different things. I presume, therefore, that congress may make a law respecting the press, provided the law be such as not to abridge its freedom. What might be deemed the freedom of the press, if it had been a new subject, and never before in discussion, might indeed admit of some controversy. But, so far as precedent, habit, laws, and practices are concerned, there can scarcely be a more definite meaning than that which all these have affixed to the term in question. We derive our principles of law originally from England. There, the press, I believe, is as free as in any country of the world, and so it has been for near a century. The definition of it is, in my opinion, no where more happily or justly expressed than by the great author of the commentaries on the laws of England, which book deserves more particular regard on this occasion, because for near thirty years it has been the manual of almost every student of law in the United States, and its uncommon excellence has also introduced it into the libraries, and often to the favourite reading of private gentlemen; so that his views of the subject could scarcely be unknown to those who framed the amendments to the constitution: and if they were not, unless his explanation had been satisfactory, I presume the amendment would have been more particularly worded, to guard against any possible mistake. His explanation is as follows: "The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state. And this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this, is to destroy the freedom of the press: but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequence of his own temerity. To subject the press to the restrictive power of a licenser, as was formerly done, both before and since the Revolution, is to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man, and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controversial points in learning, religion, and government. But to punish (as the law does at present) any dangerous or offensive writings, which, when published, shall, on a fair and impartial trial, be adjudged of a pernicious tendency, is necessary for the preservation of peace and good order, of government and religion, the only solid foundations of civil liberty. Thus the will of individuals is still left free: the abuse only of that free will is the object of legal punishment. Neither is any restraint hereby laid upon freedom of thought or inquiry: liberty of private sentiment is still left; the disseminating, or making public, of bad sentiments, destructive of the ends of society, is the crime which society corrects. A man (says a fine writer on this subject) may be allowed to keep poisons in his closet, but not publicly to vend them as cordials. And to this we may add, that the only plausible argument heretofore used for the restraining the just freedom of the press, 'that it was necessary to prevent the daily abuse of it,' will entirely lose its force when it is shown (by a reasonable exercise of the laws) that the press cannot be abused to any bad purpose, without incurring a suitable punishment: whereas, it never can be used to any good one when under the control of an inspector. So true will it be found, that to censure the licentiousness is to maintain the liberty of the press." 4 Bl. Comm. 151

It is believed that, in every state in the Union, the common law principles concerning libels apply; and in some of the states words similar to the words of the amendment are used in the constitution itself or a contemporary bill of rights, of equal authority, without ever being supposed to exclude any law being passed on the subject. So that there is the strongest proof that can be of a universal concurrence in America on this point, that the freedom of the press does not require that libellers shall be protected from punishment. But, in some respects the act of congress is much more restrictive than the principles of the common law, or than, perhaps, the principles of any state in the Union. For, under the law of the United States, the truth of the matter may be given in evidence, which at common law, in criminal prosecutions, was held not to be admissible; and the punishment of fine and imprisonment, which at common law was discretionary, is limited in point of severity, though not of lenity. It is to be observed, too, that by the express words of the act, both malice and falsehood must combine in the publication, with the seditious intent particularly described. So that if the writing be false, yet not malicious, or malicious and not false, no conviction can take place. This, therefore, fully provides for any publication arising from inadvertency, mistake, false confidence, or anything short of a wilful and atrocious falsehood. And none surely will contend, that the publication of such a falsehood is among the indefeasible rights of men, for that would be to make the freedom of liars greater than that of men of truth and integrity.

I have now said all I thought material on these important subjects. There is another upon which it is painful to speak, but the notoriety as well as the official certainty of the fact, and the importance of the danger, make it indispensable. Such incessant calumnies have been poured against the government for supposed breaches of the constitution, that an insurrection has lately begun for a cause where no breach of the constitution is or can be pretended.[2] The grievance is the land tax act, an act which the public exigencies rendered unavoidable, and is framed with particular anxiety to avoid its falling oppressively on the poor, and in effect the greatest part of it must fall on rich people only. Yet arms have been taken to oppose its execution; officers have been insulted; the authority of the law resisted; and the government of the United States treated with the utmost defiance and contempt. Not being thoroughly informed of all particulars, I cannot now say within what class of offences these crimes are comprehended. But as some of the offenders are committed for treason, and many certainly have been guilty of combinations to resist the law of the United States, I think it proper to point your attention particularly to those subjects. The provisions in regard to the former, so far as they may at present be deemed material or instructive, are as follow: (Here the passages referred to were read.)

The only species of treason likely to come before you is that of levying war against the United States. There have been various opinions, and different determinations on the import of those words. But I think I am warranted in saying, that if, in the case of the insurgents who may come under your consideration, the intention was to prevent by force of arms the execution of any act of the congress of the United States altogether (as for instance the land tax act, the object of their opposition), any forcible opposition calculated to carry that intention into effect, was a levying of war against the United States, and of course an act of treason. But if the intention was merely to defeat its operation in a particular instance, or through the agency of a particular officer, from some private or personal motive, though a higher offence may have been committed, it did not amount to the crime of treason. The particular motive must, however, be the sole ingredient in the case, for if combined with a general view to obstruct the execution of the act, the offence must be deemed treason. With regard to the number of witnesses in treason, I am of opinion that two are necessary on the indictment as well as upon the trial in court. The provision in the constitution, that the two witnesses must be to the same overt act (or actual deed constituting the treasonable offence), was in consequence of a construction which had prevailed in England, that though two witnesses were required to prove an act of treason, yet if one witness proved one act, and another witness another act of the same species of treason (as for instance that of levying war), it was sufficient; a decision which has always appeared to me contrary to the true intention of the law which made two witnesses necessary—this provision being, as I conceived, intended to guard against fictitious charges of treason, which an unprincipled government might be tempted to support and encourage, even at the expense of perjury, a thing much more difficult to be effected by two witnesses than one. An act of congress which I have already read to you (that commonly called the sedition act) has specially provided in the manner you have heard, against combinations to defeat the execution of the laws. The combinations punishable under this act must be distinguished from such as in themselves amount to treason, which is unalterably fixed by the constitution itself. Any combinations, therefore, which before the passing of this act, would have amounted to treason, still constitute the same crime. To give the act in question a different construction, would do away altogether the crime of treason as committed by levying war, because no war can be levied without a combination for some of the purposes stated in the act, which must necessarily constitute a part, though not the whole, of the offence.

Long, gentlemen, as I have detained you, for which the great importance of the occasion, I trust, is a just apology, it will be useful to recollect that, ever since the first formation of the present government, every act which any extraordinary difficulty has occasioned, has been uniformly opposed before its adoption, and every art practiced to make the people discontented after it; without any allowance for the necessity which dictated it, some seem to have taken it for granted that credit could be obtained without justice, money without taxes, and the honor and safety of the United States only preserved by a disgraceful foreign dependence. But, notwithstanding all the efforts made to vilify and undermine the government, it has uniformly risen in the esteem and confidence of the people. Time has disproved arrogant predictions; a true knowledge of the principles and conduct of the government has rectified many gross misrepresentations; credit has risen from its ashes; the country has been found full of resources, which have been drawn without oppression, and faithfully applied to the purposes to which they were appropriated: justice is impartially administered; and the only crime which is fairly imputable is, that the minority have not been suffered to govern the majority, to which they had as little pretension upon the ground of superiority of talents, patriotism, or general probity, as upon the principles of republicanism, the perpetual theme of their declamation. If you suffer this government to be destroyed, what chance have you for any other? A scene of the most dreadful confusion must ensue. Anarchy will ride triumphant, and all lovers of order, decency, truth and justice be trampled under foot. May that God, whose peculiar providence seems often to have interposed to save these United States from destruction, preserve us from this worst of all evils! And may the inhabitants of this happy country deserve his care and protection by a conduct best calculated to obtain them![3]

April 30.—Mr. Lewis preferred the following motion to the court in writing.

And now the prisoner, John Fries, being placed at the bar of this court, at the city of Philadelphia, being the place appointed by law for holding the stated sessions thereof, and it being demanded of him if he is ready for his trial for the treason in the indictment mentioned, he moves, ore tenus, that his trial for the same offence may not be proceeded on here, and that the same may be had in the county in which the same acts of treason in the said indictment mentioned are laid, and where the offence therein mentioned is alleged to have been committed.

Mr. Lewis stated this motion to be founded on an act of congress entitled the "Judiciary Act," passed 24th September, 1789, § 29 [1 Stat. 88]: "That in cases punishable

[3] The publication of the charge was elicited by the following note.

Philadelphia, May 15, 1799. Sir:—The grand jury of the circuit court of the district of Pennsylvania have heard with great satisfaction, the charge delivered to them, on the opening of the court. 'At a time like the present, when false philosophy and the most dangerous and wicked principles are spreading with rapidity, under the imposing garb of Liberty, over the fairest countries of the Old World—they are convinced, that the publication of a charge, fraught with such clear and just observations on the nature and operation of the constitution and laws of the United States, will be highly beneficial to the citizens thereof. With these sentiments strongly impressed on their min's, they unanimously request, that a copy of the said charge may be delivered to them for publication; especially for the information of those, who are too easily led by the misrepresentations of evil disposed persons, into the commission of crimes, ruinous to themselves, and against the peace and dignity of the United States. Isaac Wharton, Foreman, J. Ross, Edward Pennington, Philip Nicklin, Joseph Parker Norris, Benjamin W. Morris, Thomas M. Willing, Robert Ralston, John Craig, Samuel Coates, David H. Conyngham, John Perot, James C. Fisher, Daniel Smith, Gideon Hill Wells, William Montgomery, W. Bulkley.

Honourable Judge Iredell.

To the Gentlemen of the Grand Jury of the United States, for the District of Pennsylvania. Gentlemen: I receive with great sensibility the honour of this address, from gentlemen whom I personally respect so much. Believing, as I have long done, that the constitution and laws of the United States afford the highest degree of rational liberty which the world ever saw, or of which perhaps mankind are capable, I have seen with astonishment and regret, attempts made in the pursuit of visionary chimeras, to subvert or undermine so glorious a fabric, equally constructed for public and private security. It cannot but be extremely pleasing to me that the sentiments on this subject I delivered in my charge, should meet with your entire approbation; and as you are pleased to suppose the publication of them may be of some service in correcting erroneous opinions, I readily consent to it, considering your sanction of them as giving them an additional value, which will increase the hope of their producing a good effect. James Iredell. Philadelphia, May 15, 1799.

with death, the trial shall be had in the county where the offence was committed; or where that cannot be done without great inconvenience, twelve petit jurors at least shall be summoned from thence." He stated the advantages resulting from this section to the accused to be, that a man might be tried by his peers, where he is known, and where there can be no difficulties to procure witnesses in his behalf. This inestimable right, he said, was one of the grounds of complaint to the United States, which promoted their separation from the mother country, and this was one cause of her taking up arms. This advantage, congress had held in just estimation, and upon this, no innovation was to be admitted; on which account, the most pointed and positive terms were used, and the divisions of vicinage reduced to counties. But nevertheless, he observed, this rule had an exception, which was where "manifest inconvenience" occurred, twelve jurymen were to be summoned from that county, and therefore before the court could consider themselves authorized to proceed to the trial in that place, their honours must be well satisfied that trial could not take place in the county of Northampton without "manifest inconvenience." These words did not refer to the inconvenience the judges might feel in travelling, or the time spent; but an inconvenience arising from some cause which congress did not foresee at the time of the passing of the act. The trouble and inconvenience to the judges could be no greater than to the prisoners, whom the government had brought to this city.

Mr. Lewis said he was aware of an objection which would be raised to the force of the section above quoted, founded on a subsequent law passed March 2, 1793, § 3 [1 Stat. 333], which directs that a judge of the supreme court, with a district judge, "may direct special sessions of the circuit courts to be holden for the trial of criminal causes, at any convenient place within the district, nearer to the place where offences may be said to be committed, than the place or places appointed by law for the ordinary sessions." The places appointed by law for the state of Pennsylvania are, York Town and Philadelphia. This, he presumed, must refer to causes of a civil nature, or to criminal acts of a less grade than what is peremptorily required in the act first quoted from, to govern "cases punishable with death." The same act says, that trials in capital cases should be elsewhere, and not at the stated places, unless manifest inconvenience attend it. And what, he asked, was the great inconvenience in the present case? Was there any objection of a nature to render it improper or impossible to try the prisoner in that county? It was true that a considerable number of persons in that county had been misguided, but was it to be inferred thence that all were? or that a fair trial could not be had there? No doubt an able and impartial jury might be obtained in that place, and therefore an impartial trial could be had. In bad times, with corrupt judges, if ever such a time and such judges should unhappily be in this country, the section of 1789 would form a protection to the citizen against any innovation of his privilege, and prevent their dragging him from his family and friends to a distant part, where he might be unknown, to be tried. Surely it could not be urged that the safety of the United States, or the protection of the court, made it necessary to try this cause in Philadelphia. The prisoners might have been confined in the jails of that county; the troops of the United States were even now remaining there, to protect the law. The vicinity of that spot to the witnesses who beheld the transactions was an additional argument for the plea. Some, to be sure, had come to the city; others perhaps might come forward; sickness or age might operate to prevent some coming. It was also inconvenient to the prisoner in preventing his neighbours or relatives affording him that comfort which they might wish. But all this, he said, was immaterial; the law was definite, and nothing could supersede its mandate. Here was a list of ninety-eight witnesses, furnished the prisoner by Mr. Attorney, who were to appear against him, and hence the necessity of time and opportunity being allowed the prisoner to examine that numerous train of evidence, and to prepare to controvert them.

Mr. Lewis then referred to a similar motion which he made before the court, respecting a person tried for high treason in the Western Insurrection, in 1795, for which he referred to [U. S. v. Hamilton] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 18. The motion was then rejected, but upon different grounds than could possibly be now urged. Judge Wilson stated it as the opinion of the court, the plea being made at a previous court, that the circuit court, at which the prisoner was to be tried, was so near, that there was not time to send to the witnesses and bail, on account of the great distance of the county from the city, as they were subpoenaed to attend at the next session. The reason was, that the supreme court could not order a special session to over-rule the stated session, and therefore the inconvenience was great and manifest; but no such excuse could hold good in the present case: the mandatory language of the former clause must be obeyed. Further, he observed that a man might be charged with the crime of treason, and committed for that crime, or bound over, if the case would allow it; yet it was impossible to know that he would be indicted for treason by a grand jury; and no court held previous to the indictment could say whether it was a case punishable with death, or a misdemeanour, and therefore the time to move the plea was the present time, after the indictment was returned, and when the defendant was arraigned for trial, and till then the motion would be inapplicable. He observed that he considered this motion of considerable importance to the prisoner, and not to him only, but to every citizen of the United States: this was the security of his rights, and those of every man in the court, and therefore he hoped the justice of the court would grant the plea.

Mr. Sitgreaves said he had not been able to distinguish whether this motion had been preferred to the court as a matter of unqualified right, or whether it was merely an application, as a matter of favour in this particular instance; but he would attempt an answer to both. With respect to the 29th section of the judiciary act, if the first part of the paragraph was to stand alone, without a qualification, it would be a positive direction, and would not bear an objection, yet there would be a difficulty arise how it could be executed: But it was not so. At the time that law was passed, there were stated places, as well as stated times, for holding the federal courts; there was no provision whatever for holding them elsewhere than the appointed place, although the judges had special powers to alter the time of holding them: whether that reason, or some other, excited the legislature to put the discretion as to place in the judges also, he could not tell, but although the first direction is positive, an alternative is immediately introduced: twelve jurors summoned from the county where the crime was committed, may suffice, at the discretion of the court, and this second branch of the rule is to avoid what the court may judge a great inconvenience, against which no general rule of common law can provide. In order to prevent any misinterpretation, and remove the embarrassments which a wrong use of the law of 1789 might produce, the provision of March, 1793, still more defines that discretion, without making any material alteration: that says, "the court might be held at any convenient place within the district, nearer to the place where the crime was committed than the place for holding the stated session." Certain it is that this provision does not require it to be held in the same county; indeed it is extremely questionable, whether the court have authority to remove it there; they may nearer the place, but the word "nearer" excludes the place itself; if the place was intended, the phraseology would be more accurately inserted. He would now remark that no place nearer the scene of insurrection than this city could have been selected, and here the discretion of the court had fixed it. The law must have been made for one of two reasons: either for the facility of public justice, or to favour the prisoner. Respecting the first, the crime was committed, not in one county only, but in three adjoining counties, and, therefore, agreeably to the arguments of the gentleman, the trial must be held in three counties, by three juries, and the witnesses be harassed to appear three times; but even if the court should determine upon one of those counties for the trial, which was to be selected?

Mr. Lewis questioned the propriety of this argument, since it appeared all the cases of treason except one (in Bucks) happened in Northampton county, and no inconvenience could accrue from holding the trials at one place.

Mr. Rawle said that he should produce evidence to prove the crime of treason committed in the three counties.

Mr. Sitgreaves proceeded to state, that, as the act of 1793, as well as 1798, left a discretion for the court to determine according to existing circumstances, and not according to any known definite principles of law, it would be impolitic, if not illegal, to hold the court in the county, this city being, agreeably to one argument, next to one of the counties, and on the other view, the stated place for holding the courts, the arguments must fall, and the motion be rejected. Philadelphia, he said, was as near to the place where the crime was committed as the court-house of that county, and here, it was probable, the purposes of public justice could be most completely answered. If, then, the argument was not supported on public convenience, it must be the convenience of the prisoner which the gentleman aimed at; but he had failed to show any such thing, and therefore had precluded any answer. He had argued for the comfort of the prisoner; having his neighbours about him, &c.; but it must be observed that the residence of the prisoner was in Bucks, whereas the crime was committed in Northampton, and there he must have been tried, if the decision should turn in favour of his arguments. Now, Philadelphia was as much an adjoining county to Bucks as Northampton, and therefore as much his vicinage, and each place of holding the courts at about equal points of distance from his residence. Even if it was held in Northampton county, it would neither facilitate the trial nor be of advantage to the person. Another question he would suggest was, whether this application was made soon enough? It was nearly, or quite a week, since the indictment was given to the prisoner, and it was a much longer time since he was committed: if it was proper that any application should be made to the court, either as a matter of right or of favour, it ought to have been made in due time, so as not to delay or defeat the question of public justice. It would be unnecessary to say that the question was fully determined in the year 1795, and if it was a matter of law, and as such mandatory, every case which was then decided on was a case of mis-trial, and the whole court and counsel must have been guilty of a great dereliction. But he believed it was asked of the court at that time, not as a matter of right, but of favour, and it appeared by the report quoted, that if the favour could have been granted, it would, but the decision was against the possibility of it, and certainly stronger reason would have weighed for it then than now, on which account there is now, at least, equal grounds for refusing it.

Mr. Rawle observed, that while he professed as much humanity as any gentleman in court, yet as counsel for the prosecution he felt as much desire for the just execution of public justice. He could scarcely persuade himself that the gentleman who moved the court could be serious, at this late period of the business; after seven days had elapsed since the indictment was found, after all the inconveniences of a preparation for trial had been incurred, this new, this additional inconvenience of summoning the witnesses and jurors to another place, could not be either to the advantage of the prisoner, or agreeable to a just construction of the law adverted to. The law of March, 1793, does not apply to a case which the offence first charged would make capital so as to affect life. The question seriously was, Mr. Rawle said, whether granting the motion would not deprive the country of the power of prosecuting the trial at all, or even after full proof of the guilt of the prisoner, it would not prevent the court from passing sentence. The act read by Mr. Sitgreaves gave the judge the power to hold courts throughout his whole district,—2 Laws U. S. 226 [1 Stat. 333],—but the act of 1789, which fixed the place, only gave the court power as to times of holding special sessions,—volume 1, p. 51 [1 Stat. 75]. The 29th section of that act was very ambiguously worded, because the fifth section of the same act had put it out of the power of the court to remove as to place. Whatever, then, was the intention of the legislature, the courts had not power to effect a change, and as when an act failed in explaining the intention, the intention could not be carried into execution, to remedy the inconvenience of the court being bound in all cases as to place, the clause of 1793, p. 226 [supra], was passed.

Mr. Rawle contended that a special court was more than an adjourned circuit court: it was a substantive court of itself, held for special purposes, and could not issue certiorari for any other court; if, therefore, a special court was to be held for this trial, it must begin de novo: a new grand jury, a new petit jury, must be called; the witnesses must be summoned anew, which would be a bad precedent, besides a great delay. The impropriety was evident: after a bill had been found, and the prisoner had seen a list of the jury and witnesses; after having had time to calculate its chances, at the seventh day of the proceeding, he came forward to remove the trial! If the prisoner had not had time to inquire into the character of the jurors or witnesses, some other reason would have been given; but as nothing of that kind had been attempted, and as the inconveniences of delay and removal were so manifest, he trusted the court would not accede to the motion.

Mr. Dallas declared that it was not the design of the counsel for the prisoner to try experiments by the present motion; they conceived that he had a right to be tried in the county where the crime was charged: the act of congress was mandatory, unless "manifest inconveniences" should appear. He conceived that distance could not be an inconvenience, because the act contemplated the possibility of crimes being committed in Alleghany as well as in Chester county. Nor could time. The importance of a capital trial was not to be so played with. Congress designed that an impartial trial should be had in all cases, without regard to such trivial objections. He was sure the honourable court would not consider their personal inconveniences as meant, and therefore should not mention it. Mr. Dallas wished it to be observed, that the crimes were recently committed, and public justice had not been long suspended; and, even if the present motion was acceded to, the hand of public justice might shortly give the blow, by appointing an early special session. It was not certain, before the court sat, that a bill would be found for high treason, merely because the parties were bound over for high treason; and therefore the prisoner might not be able to meet that charge. Again, the time since the bill was found and the party informed, and served with the enormous list of ninety eight witnesses, has been very short. It was Wednesday last, seven days only, two of which must be left out, Thursday having been the fast-day, and Sunday intervening. Many of these witnesses and jurors he had never seen nor heard of, and it was necessary he should have time to inquire who they were. There had been no catches on the part of the prisoners. It would be an easy thing for the court, at this time, since all the parties were upon the spot, to bind them over to appear again. In the case read by Mr. Lewis, Judge Wilson expressly declared, that there was a desire in the court to comply, but the difficulties were insurmountable. With respect to the other cases, the mandatory language of congress imposed a necessity on the officers of justice, where it was possible. The clashing of courts, he presumed, could not be held up for excuse at this time. He did not know how much time the present circuit might consume; but as the supreme court would not meet until August, no doubt there could be a period for the business of a special court spared during the recess; but if the period should be filled up, in the August session arrangements might be made to hold one. With respect to the holding of district courts, Mr. Dallas observed, that the law—volume 1, pp. 49, 50 [1 Stat. 74]—allowed a discretion as to the places of holding them; page 51 gives discretion, as to the circuit court, to the judges of supreme court with respect to time. These provisions respected all cases alike within the jurisdiction of those courts; but the subsequent act referred to made an exception with regard to cases of a nature highly criminal, or capital. Certainly, then, if ever the congress meant there should be a trial at all in the proper county, one like the present must come under that intention. The language of the two acts—volume 2, p. 67 [1 Stat. 88], and volume 2, p. 226 [1 Stat. 334],—Mr. Dallas observed, was different. The first declared that cases punishable with death should be tried in the county, &c. The second, that special circuit courts may be holden nearer the place where the offences may be said to be committed than the place of the ordinary sessions. But, one thing was worthy of notice. The first relates only to offences punishable with death, while the other is worded as crimes only, of whatever nature. Cases of insurrection and rebellion must have been in view of the legislature; and in them it would be very probable that part of more than one county would combine, and they could have excepted such cases if it had been meant so to do. It was farther said, that part of the crimes were committed in two counties, and therefore the prisoner had deprived himself of the common law vicinage. This was not clear. The vicinage where the offence was committed would, at any rate, have it in their power to declare what they had seen of the conduct of the prisoner. As to the stage at which the application was made, no loss of time had been felt; and if it had, it would be extremely severe, if it was in the power of the court to order it otherwise, so that the prisoner in so important a case should be injured thereby. On the whole, he trusted, unless manifest inconvenience should appear, that the court would grant the motion.

Mr. Lewis said, it was strange, mischievous, and unfounded doctrine that this application had not been made in time. Three clear days from the notice of the indictment being allowed by law to the prisoner, he was not bound to answer the indictment until yesterday. The trial did not then proceed, and he appeared this day; but, in his sincere opinion, from mature reflection, two, three, nor four days, should have weight with the court, because the act of congress was binding upon them, whatever the learned gentleman had advanced to the contrary. He had a right to demand it; and if their honours, the judges, proceeded to hold the trial in any but the right place, they, and not the prisoner, would offend. Mr. Attorney had supposed, if this was granted, all which had been done would be null and void. Grant this for a moment. Did Mr. Attorney or John Fries direct the proceedings of the grand jury, &c.? Certainly the attorney. In this Mr. Lewis believed he had done strictly right; here was the proper place for the issue to be joined; but Northampton is the proper place for the trial of that issue. It was objected, because it was said the crime was committed in three counties. But, suppose it were in three or thirty counties, the overt act in the bill is laid in one county only, and there only does the law support the claim for trial. The two laws referred to are unnecessary in capital cases, if they do extend to them at all, because the first law makes ample provision not only as to time,—page 51 [1 Stat. 75],—but as to place,—page 67 [1 Stat. 88],—and is not superseded by the other. With reference to the law of 1793, p. 227 [1 Stat. 335], which says, that criminal causes may be tried nearer to the place where the offences were said to be committed, the argument was taken up by Mr. Sitgreaves to mean "nearer to the county"; hence he says that Philadelphia county is the adjoining one of the insurgent counties. In the indictment, Bethlehem is mentioned as the "place." Now, the law directs a special session to be held nearer to Bethlehem than is Philadelphia; that act does not say whether it shall be held in or out of the county, but near the place. The gentleman appeared to have thought he was in another place, and not at the bar, in his view of the discretionary power of the court, which would leave it to be regulated according to the ebbs and flows of the passions of the judges, or the temper of the times; but he should recollect this discretion was of a legal, and not of a political nature, which the necessity of the case called for. All that must be considered to operate on the question is, whether justice cannot be done between the United States and the prisoners, if the trial is held in the county of Northampton; if it can, we rise to claim this as the right of John Fries, and nearly allied to the interests of every citizen.

Judge IREDELL said it was held by Judge Hale, that an indictment was part of the trial; if so, he should be glad to be told what they were to do with the present indictment, if the trial was to be removed? If so, the prisoner must be indicted as well as tried in the county. Foster, 235, 236. Another question would be, could the court order the dismissal of the indictment?

Judge PETERS could not see how part of the proceedings of this court could be transferred to a special court, and therefore how it could be removed to the county, and while a doubt remained, it would never do to renovate a criminal case of so much importance. He could not see the force of the reasoning in favour of the removal. He thought that, however humanity ought to lean towards the prisoner, still the proceedings of the court ought to ensure justice to the United States, and to the prosecution, and therefore that public justice ought to be as well guarded as the prisoner's convenience; a fair and impartial trial ought to be had, which he was certain could not be held in the county of Northampton, and if he were now applied to, in his official capacity, to take the necessary steps for that event, he would refuse.

Mr. Rawle said there were opportunities enough for a motion like this to be made before a bill was found, after the parties were bound over. The accused ought to be preparing for trial from his first commitment, to remove all the inconveniences which delay, until after the proceedings were going on, would occasion; it appeared to him to amount to a technical trap, laid to involve difficulties. It was well known that the prisoner could not wait till it was too late to obtain many privileges to which he was entitled by an earlier attention to his interests, of which the present was one. With respect to the difficulties his honor, Judge IREDELL, had mentioned on the indictment, they were too serious and important to be dispensed with.

Judge IREDELL delivered his opinion in effect as follows:—With regard to the lateness of the application, as it does not relate to the merits of the defence, I think the arguments in favor of the motion preponderate, and that no advantage should be taken from the prisoner without full ground. It is evident that, in this case, a number of circumstances might be mentioned which would render a trial inconvenient in the county of Northampton. I am inclined to think with the counsel for the prisoner, that the court have the power to order a special court to be held there if they should think proper, and therefore I should not scruple to admit it, if all concurrent circumstances admitted its prudence. The question then is, whether, according to the legal discretionary power of the court, this court think it their duty to admit the force of the motion. When these offences were first known to have been committed, and when the gentleman with whom I have the honor to sit was in that country, it was possible for a court to have been ordered there for the trials, but it appeared to those with whom the power rested, to be improper. And why?—The president in his proclamation had publicly declared that the lawful authority of that county could not be carried into execution without the aid of a military force. Would it not therefore have been improper for us to order a special court to be held at that place? If a special court could not have been held there, the only thing to be done was to bind the parties over to this court. There are two very important difficulties in the way of this motion; I say important, because they are such as no gentleman of the law can be perfectly clear upon. First, whether, if we order a special court, we can order, by any process known to the law, this indictment to be transferred to that court. This is a doubt stated by Judge Wilson, of the supreme court, at the time of a former motion alluded to; and I am inclined to think this was a great reason which guided the decision; otherwise a doubt would not have been intimated. If this cannot be done, what would be the consequences of the removal of the case? If this indictment were to be taken there, with a doubt in point of law on it, a motion might be made after trial for a new trial; that not being regular, part having been held in another place. Whether this would be moved or not, I cannot say, but I know at best it is doubtful. The court therefore ought to proceed in the clearest manner not to run the risk of defeating the prosecution of a cause so important. It is the great desire of this court to do the most impartial justice between the public and the prisoner, and not from private humanity on the one hand, or resentment on the other, to lean either way. As to the common law principles of vicinage, there are advantages and there are disadvantages attending it. The advantages are, that the parties are known by, and know their jurors and witnesses, that their characters may be viewed, and the most impartial justice done. But if nearly one whole county has been in a state of insurrection, can it be said that a fair trial can be had there? We may at least presume it could not, because the President of the United States ordered a military force there, to enforce the execution of the laws. It was by this military force that the prisoners are now convened in this city, and I have reason to believe, from the opinion and knowledge of the judge with whom I now act, that it would be exceedingly improper to hold the trials there. It was hinted that troops are still there, and they could promote the execution of justice; but what sort of justice is that of the sword? If they would operate at all, it would be by intimidation, and this would be to the prejudice of the prisoner, and in no respect in his favor. This consideration alone, in my opinion, would make it "manifestly inconvenient" for a trial to be held there. With respect to the principles of common law, the gentlemen well know that the venire may be changed, that is, that parts of the jury may be summoned from other counties. I do not know whether there is a power in the courts to change the venire in England in a criminal case, but I know that in some difficult cases, where partiality was to be apprehended, an act of parliament has been passed to remove the trial. This was done respecting the rebellion in Scotland, for the manifest reason of partiality. This proves that we ought not to look to one side only, but to both, and then form our determination.

Upon the whole, I am clearly of opinion that, as the motion could not be granted without running the risk of these uncertainties, but certain inconveniences, it would not be expedient to allow it, and therefore the trial must go forward.

Indictment in the Circuit Court of the United States of America, in and for the Pennsylvania District of the Middle Circuit. The grand inquest of the United States of America, for the Pennsylvania district, upon their respective oaths and affirmations, do present that John Fries, late of the county of Bucks, in the district of Pennsylvania, he being an inhabitant of, and residing within the said United States, to wit, in the district aforesaid, and under the protection of the laws of the said United States, and owing allegiance and fidelity to the same United States, not having the fear of God before his eyes, nor weighing the duty of his said allegiance and fidelity, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, wickedly devising and intending the peace and tranquillity of the said United States to disturb, on the seventh day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine at Bethlehem, in the county of Northampton, in the district aforesaid, unlawfully, maliciously and traitorously did compass, imagine and intend to raise and levy war, insurrection and rebellion against the said United States; and to fulfil and bring to effect the said traitorous compassings, imaginations and intentions of him the said John Fries, he, the said John Fries, afterwards, that is to say, on the said seventh day of March in the said year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, at the said county of Northampton in the district aforesaid, with a great multitude of persons, whose names at present are unknown to the grand inquest aforesaid, to a great number, to wit, to the number of one hundred persons and upwards, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, that is to say, with guns, swords, clubs, staves and other warlike weapons, as well offensive as defensive, being then and there unlawfully, maliciously and traitorously assembled and gathered together, did falsely and traitorously assemble and join themselves together against the said United States, and then and there, with force and arms, did falsely and traitorously, and in a warlike and hostile manner, array and dispose themselves against the said United States, and then and there, with force and arms, in pursuance of such their traitorous intentions and purposes aforesaid, he, the said John Fries, with the said persons so as aforesaid traitorously assembled, and armed and arrayed in manner aforesaid, most wickedly, maliciously and traitorously did ordain, prepare and levy public war against the said United States, contrary to the duty of his said allegiance and fidelity, against the constitution, peace and dignity of the said United States, and also against the form of the act of the congress of the said United States, in such case made and provided. William Rawle, Attorney of the United States for the Pennsylvania District.

The prisoner having been set to the bar, pleaded not guilty.

The petit jury impanneled, consisted of the following gentlemen: William Jolly, City. Samuel Mitchell, Bucks. Richard Leedom, do. Anthony Cuthbert, City. Alexander Fullerton, City. John Singer, City. William Ramsay, Bucks. Samuel Richards, City. Gerardus Wynkoop, Bucks. Joseph Thornton, City. Philip Walter, Northampton. John Rhoad, Northampton. Some difficulties arose as to the two latter gentlemen being qualified, they being Germans, and not sufficiently understanding the English language: however, it was agreed that any difficulties of that nature might be explained to them, and it was urged that they would understand many of the witnesses better than others, several of those being Germans also, and could not speak English, on which account Mr. Erdman was sworn for interpreter.

Mr. Sitgreaves opened the trial as follows: Gentlemen of the jury:—By the indictment which has been just read to you, you perceive that John Fries, the prisoner at the bar, has put himself on trial before you, on an accusation of having committed the greatest offence which can be perpetrated in this, or any other country, and it will devolve on you to determine, according to the evidence which will be produced to you on the important question of life or death. It is the duty of those that prosecute, to open to you, as clearly as they are able, those principles of law which apply to the offender, and then to state to you the testimony with which the accusation is supported. This duty has devolved upon me, and I hope, while I regard my duty as accuser, I shall do it in such a way as shall do no injustice to the prisoner. However, if I should be incorrect, there are sufficient opportunities for me to be corrected by the vigilance which the counsel engaged on behalf of the prisoner will use, and the order which the court will observe. These are sufficient to correct any mis-statements, but I will use my utmost endeavours to be guilty of none.

The prisoner is indicted of the crime of treason. Treason is defined in the constitution of the United States (section 3, art. 3) in the words following: "Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." This crime appears to be limited to two descriptions: the one, levying war against the United States, and the other adhering to its enemies. With respect to the latter branch of the description, there will be no occasion for any explanation, or to call your attention in the least to it, because it is not charged upon the prisoner; he is charged with having committed treason in levying war. This expression, phraseology, or description as adopted by our constitution, is borrowed from a statute of Great Britain, passed in the reign of Edward III., which has, ever since it passed, commanded the veneration and respect of that nation, almost equal with their great charter: it is considered as a great security to their liberties. Indeed the uniform and unanimous consent given to this statute, through a great lapse of time, by the most able writers on law; its never having undergone the least alteration amidst the most severe scrutinies, and its adoption into the constitution of the United States, without the least amendment, are sufficient encomiums to prove its worth. I shall state to you, as far as is necessary to the present application of that statute, the most able and judicious expositions, but without recurring to a variety of authorities which might be quoted.

The crime of treason, as it has been laid down by those writers, generally allowed to be the most able on law, whose accuracy is unquestionable, is the highest crime that can possibly be committed against the good government of a nation, and a considerable inroad into the libertics of a subject. In discussing this crime, I shall only recur to the notes which I have taken, and my own knowledge of the law; if that statement should be inaccurate, there are sufficient opportunities for amendment in the course of this trial. Treason consists in levying war against the government of the United States: it may confidently be said not only to consist in joining or aiding the hostile intentions of a foreign enemy; nor is it confined to rebellion in the broad sense in which that word is generally understood; or in the utter subversion of the government and its fundamental institutions: but it also consists in the raising a military force from among the people for the purpose of attaining any object with a design of opposing the lawful authority of the government by dint of arms, in some matter of public concern in which the insurgents have no particular interest distinct from the rest of the community. This is the best description of the crime of treason, as it relates to the matter before you, which I am able to give. A tumultuously raising the people with force, for the purpose of subverting, or opposing the lawful authority of the government, in which those insurgents have no particular interest distinct from the people at large. Agreeably to the division made in the definition of treason by Lord Hale. it must consist both in levying war, and in levying war against the government of the United States. Respecting levying of war, it is to be understood, agreeably to the most approved authorities, that there must be an actual military array. I mention this because I think it proper to be particular in so essential and important an inquiry, and because I think we shall prove to you that this was actually done by the prisoner. Another thing I wish you to bear in mind is, that war may be sufficiently levied against the United States, although no violence be used, and although no battle be fought. It is not necessary that actual violence should take place, to prove the actual waging of war. If the arrangements are made, and the numbers of armed men actually appear, so as to procure the object which they have in view by intimidation, as well as by actual force, that will constitute the offence. It must be war waged against the United States. This is an important distinction. A large assemblage of people may come together; in whatever numbers; however they may be armed or arrayed, or whatever degree of violence they may commit, yet that alone would not constitute treason; the treason must be known; it must be for a public and not a private revenge: it must be avowedly levying war against the United States; if people assemble in this hostile manner only to gratify revenge, or any other purpose independent of war against the United States, it will only amount to a riot; but if it is an object in which the person has no particular interest, this constitutes the offence of treason. There are a variety of instances which might be produced in order to illustrate this definition of the law, but it is not necessary to turn to them. Suffice it to say that it is the intention or end for which an insurrection is raised, which constitutes the crime. This of course you will have in mind when the testimony is gone into. I will just observe, as applicable to this case, that one instance which is defined, of the crime of treason, is, to defeat the operation of the laws of the government; any insurrection, I will be bold to say, to defeat the execution of the public laws, amounts to treason. Having given you this explanation of treason, so far as I suppose it is connected with the present awful occasion, I shall now proceed to state the amount of evidence we mean to produce, in order to prove that the unhappy prisoner was guilty of that high crime.

It will appear, gentlemen, from the testimony which will be presented to you, that, during the latter months of the year 1798, discords prevailed to an enormous extent throughout a large portion of the counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery, and that considerable difficulties attended the assessors for the direct tax in the execution of the duties of their assessment. It is not in the nature of this inquiry to explain for what purpose, or by what means, the opposition was made: it is not necessary to say whether the complaints urged were well or ill founded, because it is a settled point that any insurrection for removing public grievances. whether the complaints be real or pretended, amounts to treason, because it is not the mode pointed out by law for obtaining redress. It will then be sufficient to show you that discontents did exist, and that in various townships of those counties: that in several townships, associations of the people were actually formed, in order to prevent the persons charged with the execution of those laws of the United States from performing their duty upon them, and more particularly to prevent the assessors from measuring their houses: this opposition was made at many public township meetings called for the purpose; in many instances resolutions were entered into, and reduced to writing, solemnly forewarning the officers whose duty it was to execute the laws, and these, many times accompanied with threats if they should perform that duty. Not only so, but discontents prevailed to such an height, that even the friends of the government in that part were completely suppressed by menaces against any who should assist those officers in their duty. Repeated declarations were made, both at public as well as at private meetings, that if any person should be arrested by the civil authority, such arrests would be followed by the rising of the people, in opposition to that authority, for the purpose of rescuing such arrested prisoners. It will appear to you farther, gentlemen, in the course of evidence, that, during those discontents, indefatigable pains were taken by those who were charged with the execution of the laws, to calm the fears, and to remove the misapprehensions of the infatuated people; for this purpose, they read and explained the law to them, and informed them that they were misled into the idea that the law was not in force, for that it actually was; at the same time warning them of the consequences which would flow from opposition; and this was acompanied with promises that even their most capricious wishes would be gratified on their obedience. The favour was in many instances granted, that where any opposition was made to any certain person executing the office of assessor, in some townships proposals were made for the people to choose for themselves, but notwithstanding this accommodating offer, the opposition continued. After having shown to you the general extent of this combination and dangerous conspiracy, which existed in all the latitude I have opened to your view, we shall next give in evidence full proof that the consequences were actual opposition and resistance: in some parts, violence was actually used, and the assessors were taken and imprisoned by armed parties; and in others, mobs assembled to compel them, either to deliver up their papers, or to resign their commissions; that in some instances they were threatened with bodily harm, so that in those parts, the obnoxious law did remain unexecuted in consequence of this alarm. Seeing that the state of insurrection and rebellion had arisen to such a height, it became necessary, in order to support the dignity, and indeed the very existence of the government, that some means should be adopted to compel the execution of those laws; and warrants were in consequence issued against certain persons who had so opposed the laws: these processes being put into the hands of the marshal of the district, were served upon some of them: in some instances, during the execution of that duty, the marshal met with insult, and almost with violence: having, however, got nearly the whole of the warrants served, he appointed head quarters for these prisoners to rendezvous at Bethlehem, where some of them were to enter bail for their appearance in the city, and others were to come to the city in custody, for trial. It will appear to you, that, on the day thus appointed for the prisoners to meet, and when a number of them had actually assembled agreeably to appointment, a number—parties in arms, both horse and foot, more than an hundred men, accoutred with all their military apparatus, commanded in some instances by their proper officers—marched to Bethlehem, collected before the house in which were the marshal and prisoners, whom they demanded to be delivered up to them, and in consequence of refusal, they proceeded to act very little short of actual hostility, so that the marshal deemed it prudent to accede to their demands, and the prisoners were liberated.

This, gentlemen, is the general history of the insurrection. I shall now state to you the part which the unfortunate prisoner at the bar took in those hostile transactions. It will appear that the prisoner is an inhabitant of the township of Lower Milford, in the county of Bucks; that some time in February last, a public meeting was held at the house of one John Kline in that township, to consider, in relation to this house tax, what was to be done; that at that meeting certain resolutions were entered into, and a paper signed; (we have endeavoured to trace this paper, so as to produce it to the court and jury, but have failed;) this paper was signed by fifty-two persons, and committed to the hands of one of their number: John Fries was present at this meeting, and assisted in drawing up the paper, at which time his expressions against this law were extremely violent, and he threatened to shoot one of the assessors, Mr. Foulke, through the legs, if he did proceed to assess the houses. Again, the prisoner, at a vendue, threatened another of the assessors, Mr. S. Clarke, that, if he attempted to go on with the assessments, he should be committed to an old stable, and there fed on rotten corn: we shall further prove that, upon its being intimated by some of them to Mr. Chapman, principal assessor, that if they might choose their own assessors, things would go on quietly, he directed that they should do so; but still they continued in opposition to the law, and would not choose an officer at all. A general meeting was called to read and explain the law to the people, and thus remove any wrong impressions and misapprehensions: the principal assessor was at that meeting; but the rudeness, opposition and violence, used by the people, prevented him from doing so, which was an evident proof that they did not want to hear the law, and that they understood enough of it to oppose it: thus the benevolent intentions of that meeting were frustrated. We shall farther show you that the assessor of Lower Milford was intimidated so as to decline making the assessments, and that the principal assessor, together with three other assessors, was obliged to go into that township to execute the law; that they proceeded in the execution of their duty during a part of the day of the 5th of March last, without any impediment; that, at eleven o'clock in the morning, Mr. Chapman met, at the house of Jacob Fries in Lower Milford, with the prisoner, when he, the prisoner, declared his determination not to submit, but to oppose the law, and that by the next morning he could raise 700 men in opposition to it: that, upon Mr. Chapman telling him that many houses were assessed, the prisoner flew into a violent passion, absolutely declaring that it should soon be in this country as it was in France. We shall farther show you that, at another time during the same day, the prisoner met with two of the assessors, Mr. Rodrick and Mr. Foulke, whom he warned not to proceed in the execution of their duty, accompanied with threats that if they did, they would be hurt; and left them in a great rage. Farther, he proceeded to collect parties, with whom he went in search of those men, and attacked them in executing their duty; one of them escaped, but the other he took; but not having got Mr. Rodrick, who appeared to be a particular object of resentment, he let Mr. Foulke go, telling him he would have them again the next day. He told Mr. Clarke that if he had met with Rodrick, he would not have let him go so easy, and declared to him solemnly and repeatedly, that it was his determination to oppose the laws. We shall farther show you that, after having discharged Foulke, he proceeded to collect a large party in the township, in order to take the assessors the next day. Accordingly, on the day following, a numerous party—to wit, about fifty or sixty, the greatest part of whom were in arms—collected together, and pursued the assessors, and not finding them in that township, pursued them into another, in order, not only to chase them out of the township, but generally to prevent them executing their duty. This party collected, not only many of them in arms, but in military array, with drum and fife, and commanded by this Captain Fries and one Kuyder: Fries himself was armed with a large horse pistol. Thus equipped, they went to Quaker Town, in order to accomplish their purpose, where they found the assessors, two of whom they took, but Rodrick fled. Fries ordered his men to fire at the man who fled, and a piece was snapped, but did not go off. Fries did then compel Foulke to deliver up to them his papers, but not finding in them what they expected, they were returned; but at the same time exacting a promise that he, the assessor, should not proceed in the valuation of the houses in Lower Milford. Fries was in many instances extremely violent against this law, and peremptory in his determination not to submit to it, as will appear by the evidence.

When they left Quaker Town, they met with a travelling man who expressed some good will towards the government, and for that expression they maltreated him very much, and expressed their general dislike to all who supported the same principles. During the time they were at Quaker Town, intimation was received that the marshal had taken a number of persons prisoners in consequence of opposing the execution of this law, whereupon a determination was formed among these people to go and effect their rescue; and the people of Milford were generally invited to assist in this business. When they were going, the party halted at the house of John Fries, and then a paper was signed, by which they bound themselves volunteers to go upon the execution of this design. This paper was written by the prisoner at the bar, and signed by him and the rest; therein they engaged to go and rescue the prisoners who had been arrested by the marshal. On the morning of the next day, twenty or more of them met at the house of Conrad Marks, in arms, to go on with their design. John Fries was armed with a sword, and had a feather in his hat. On the road, as they went forward, they were met by young Marks, who told them that they might as well turn about, for that the Northampton people were strong enough to do the business without those from Bucks county. Some were so inclined to do; but at the instance of Fries and some others, they did go forward, and actually proceeded to Bethlehem. Before the arrival of these troops, a party, going on the same business, had stopped at the bridge, a small distance from Bethlehem, where they had been met by a deputation from the marshal, whom he had prevailed on to go and meet them, in order to advise them to return home. They agreed to halt there, and send three of their number to declare to the marshal what was their demand. It was during this period that Fries and his party came up; but it appears that when they came, Fries took the party actually over the bridge, and that he arranged the toll with the man, and ordered them to proceed. With respect to proof of the proceedings at Bethlehem, it cannot be mistaken; he was there the leading man, and he appears to enjoy the command. With the consent of his people, he demanded the prisoners of the marshal; and when that officer told him that he could not surrender them, except they were taken from him by force, and produced his warrant for taking them, the prisoner then harangued his party out of the house, and explained to them the necessity of using force. And that you should not mistake his design, we will prove to you that he declared, "that was the third day which he had been out on this expedition; that he had had a skirmish the day before, and if the prisoners were not released, he should have another that day. Now, you observe," resumed he, "that force is necessary, but you must obey my orders; we will not go without taking the prisoners; but take my orders, you must not fire first; must be first fired upon; and when I am gone, then you must do as well as you can, as I expect to be the first man that falls." He further declared to the marshal, that they "would fire till a cloud of smoke prevented them seeing one another." And, executing the office of commander of the troops, which at that time overawed the marshal and his attendants, he harangued the troops to obey his orders, which they accordingly did, and the marshal was really intimidated to liberate the prisoners; and then the object was accomplished, and the party dispersed, amidst the huzzas of the insurgents. After this affair at Bethlehem, it will be given you in evidence, that the prisoner frequently avowed his opposition to the laws, and justified that outrage; and, when a meeting was afterwards held at Lower Milford to choose assessors, the prisoner refused his assent to the accommodating object of the meeting, and appeared as violent as ever.

These are some of the points we mean to prove before you. I shall, therefore, at present, proceed to introduce our testimony.

I arrived at Bethlehem on the evening of the 6th of March, 1799. We had heard that there was a party of men would collect, for the purpose of rescuing the prisoners who were there in custody of the marshal; in consequence of that, I went to assist the marshal, and, if possible, prevail on the people to desist. I was one of the judges of the court of common pleas for the county of Northampton. About ten o'clock on the morning of the 7th, two men, with arms, arrived at the tavern where we were; who, when inquired of by the marshal as to their intention in coming armed, appeared to be diffident about an answer; after first saying that they came upon a shooting frolic, one of them said they were coming in order to see what was best to be done for the country. After that, came in several others, armed and on horseback, two of them in uniform, with swords and pistols. The two first men were placed with the marshal in a separate room, in order to await the issue. At this time a considerable number of people had assembled. The marshal first went and spoke to these men as to their intention; I also walked out for the same purpose, requesting them to withdraw, and not appear in arms in order to obstruct the process of the United States laws. They answered, that they were freemen, and might go where they pleased with their arms. I told them that they ran great risk by appearing in arms for such a purpose as I feared they were come. They came in a number, but I don't know how many particularly, as they mixed among the crowd. We requested them to deliver up their arms; but they refused. I also, at the same time, told one of them that it would be best for him to surrender himself, and not oppose the process; the others gave me answer, that they had come to accompany their friend, and to see that no injury was done to him. After this I returned into the lower back room of the house; by this time there were a number more collected round the house, but mostly armed. I don't recollect whether it was before these three men arrived, or not, that the marshal had sent off four men of his posse in order to meet the men with arms who were coming forward; and after we were up stairs three men arrived as a deputation from the armed body, making inquiry as to the intention of the marshal in taking these prisoners; with these three men, the four deputed by the marshal had returned from the armed body that was on the other side of the bridge, in order to learn the marshal's object. The marshal assured them of the legality of the process, and reasoned with them as to the consequences of opposition, or threats to him, or preventing him from executing his duty; but I believe he liberated the two men that were first put in confinement, and returned them their guns. During the time that these two men were in confinement, we examined their guns, and found them loaded. I was pretty much in the lower part of the house, backwards, and there was much of the proceedings of these people I did not see, in the front of the house; but I endeavoured to converse with as many as I knew, informing them of the badness of their conduct, and the consequence of it; but it appeared to be to no effect. About one o'clock I think I first saw what was called the main body of this armed force, marching up the street. A party of horse, preceding the foot, came riding up two abreast; I am not certain whether they had their swords drawn, but I believe they had; and then followed the foot, marching up in Indian (single) file. When they came up, the foot marched twice round the tavern, and placed themselves in front of the house, where they stood some time drawn up in single rank; I believe they were riflemen; they continued there till the rescue was effected. During this time I frequently heard that the prisoners were demanded by them, and they insisted on their release.

Cross-Examined.—I did not hear this demand made, but I heard in the house that it had been made; I also heard that they intended to force their passage up stairs. I observed a party coming up stairs, particularly one, whom I did not know, pointing a rifle up the stairs, as though levelling it at some particular person. The people appeared very noisy in the lower part of the house, all this time; I frequently heard the cry of "deliver up the prisoners," and it appeared to come from the party at the foot of the stairs. During the affair, I am not certain whether it was previous to this or not, I looked out and saw six or eight men at the foot of the stairs, and the prisoner on the stairs conversing with the marshal; while I was standing there, an old man came running in from the front door, and called for Captain Fries in German, telling him there was his sword (offering it); I think he called three different times, on which I observed the prisoner wave his hand and tell him to wait, it was not quite time yet; shortly after the prisoners were given up. I was not by to be able to hear the conversation between the marshal and the prisoner. Fries was going backward and forward among the men, as though he had command, and I saw him marching into the town in front of the footmen. After the prisoners were delivered up, the principal part of the men marched off. They did not take the prisoners with them. I heard two or three men in the back room say that they must see the prisoners, and insisted they should be let go before they would leave. These prisoners were arrested for combinations and misdemeanours. There was, among the company in the lower room, a man who declared himself very violently; he said if the damned Stamplers[4] had only fired a shot, we would have showed what we could do. He really expressed a wish that it had been done. The words were spoken in German. There were twelve or fourteen of the horse in a military dress, as well as armed: I believe there were none of the foot, except that about ten or twelve had cockades of blue and white, blue and red, &c. They had shot pouches, particularly the rifle company, and I believe all who had guns. The man who was first disarmed had a powder horn in his pocket: his piece was a common fowling piece, the others were mostly rifles, as far as I could perceive from the window. I did not count the number, but there appeared about an hundred, or rather above that number. The whole crowd assembled, I think, could not have been less than four hundred. I think that the marshal had with him for his posse comitatus to arrest these people fourteen or fifteen persons. I believe there were eighteen or nineteen prisoners. I understood that releasing the prisoners was the object they had in view, both from themselves and from several persons with whom they had conversed on the subject.

William Barnett.—I was summoned to attend the marshal on the seventh of March at Bethlehem, as one of his posse. I came there about eleven o'clock in the forenoon: I was there but a very little time, when I understood there were some men coming with arms: the marshal then appointed four of us to go out and meet them, in order to prevail upon them not to come into the town. We went on about a mile from Bethlehem, and crossed the Lehigh, and there we met a party of horsemen: they were armed. I did not know any of them, but understood they were from Northampton county, near about Millarstown. When we came up to them, we asked them for their commanding officer. They made answer that they had no officers; they were all commanders. We then told them what our errand was—to try to prevail upon them not to go on any farther; but they did not seem to mind it much. We were with them but a very little time, before a company of riflemen came up, who were armed as well as the others. We told them our errand, but they did not seem to mind us. We then returned, and came on with them to the bridge of the Lehigh, where we halted. There we talked with them a great while, but still they wanted to go on. We told them we came from the marshal, and asked them what they wanted by going into Bethlehem with their arms. They said the marshal had two of their men that had come to Bethlehem under arms, and had put them under guard, and they wanted them, and they would have those two men set at liberty. As I found that they were determined to go, I asked if they would not allow that if any had done wrong, they ought to suffer for it: They agreed that they ought, but they should not be taken to Philadelphia, but have their trial in Northampton county. When we found that they were determined to go on, we agreed that they had better send two or three men over to the marshal, and not to go bodily. This they agreed to, and appointed three men to go, and sent them over. There was some stipulation that I should return the men safe; they were afraid these three men would be confined also; but we promised them that we would see them safely returned. We then all went over together to the tavern at Bethlehem, where the marshal was. They spoke to him, told him what their business was, and he gave the two men up to them. When they were given up, we went back with them, in order to go to where we had left the remainder of the men. Going down through Bethlehem, we met a party of horsemen, and we stopped them: they were armed; part of them were light horsemen; and part were other horsemen: they all had swords or some arms or other. The light horse had their swords drawn. We told them that they had better go back, and not go up into the town; but they seemed very anxious to go up. One of them made answer something like this: "This is the third day that I was out, I had a fight yesterday, and I mean to have another today if they do not let the prisoners clear." To the best of my knowledge the prisoner was the man who said so; I never saw the man before, but I took notice of him then. He had a sword. This was a distinct body from those we had left at the bridge; these were others who had come up during the time we were gone. I let them know that the two persons whom they had demanded were liberated; and the three men who went with us told them this also. The horsemen did not wait one moment, but hurried on: they all then marched up town, and formed right in front of the tavern; I returned with them. After they were formed there, I was among them, and talked with them a great deal, but could not do anything with them: if there were ten or twelve that agreed to be moderate, the others would all insist upon it, that they would have the prisoners, all of them. We were there for nearly or quite two hours. This man, whom they called Captain Fries, came out and mentioned to his men that he would now have the prisoners, if any of them would go into the house with him: he had been in backward and forward several times. He said he should go foremost. He told them that he would ask the favour of them, that they were none of them to fire first, if they went in. He mentioned to them likewise, that there were some armed men on the stairs belonging to the marshal. I did not expect he would go in: I was talking to some men there, when I looked round and saw some of the men at the door: he said he would go foremost: he signified, talking in German, that he should get a blow or a stroke: the nearest translation was, "I shall get it."—I looking round, saw the men going in at the door, and I followed them in: they were armed men. I did not see the prisoner after he had spoken those words. I got in, between the men and the stairs, at the foot of the stairs: they halted there, I got in there, in order to keep them back from going up stairs: I was there but a few minutes, when I saw the prisoners coming down stairs. Captain Fries said, when he told the men to come forward, that if he did get it, they should not be scared; they then must do as well as they could: he said he expected to get some stroke; he told them they must take care of themselves: I do not recollect that he said they should shoot, yet I recollect something he said; I think it was "slay, strike, or do as well as you can." The prisoner at the bar went before, and he rather wished the men to follow him.

Cross-Examined.—When I went out at the request of the marshal, it was to speak to these people, and they told me their object was to obtain the liberation of the two men belonging to their party. The crowd began to disperse immediately on the release of the prisoners.

John Barnett.—On the 7th of March in the morning early, just as I got up, the deputy marshal handed me a summons, to be at Bethlehem at 10 o'clock, to aid and assist the marshal in executing the laws of the United States. About 10 o'clock I arrived at Bethlehem. I was there but a very short time, when somebody came in, and said he had met twenty men at one place, ten at another, &c., walking towards a tavern, on the road, about three or four miles from Bethlehem; I cannot recollect its name. The marshal, and others agreed that they thought it would be best to send three or four men to meet them, and to stop them on the road: it was then to be decided who should go. I mentioned that I thought John Mohollan and William Barnett could do more with them than anybody else. They were agreed upon, as was Christian Roth (or Rote) and another, but Isaac Hatsel went in his place. This was, conformably to agreement, two Federalists and two Anti-Federalists. They went and met them; I remained at the house. They were not gone very long, indeed I think it was just as they were getting upon their horses; there were two men, arrayed, and with arms; one had a rifle, and the other a smooth-bore piece. When they were come into the yard, the marshal went down into the yard to them, and talked to them; what he talked to them, I did not hear. However, he took their arms away from them, and carried them up stairs, and put them by themselves. Directly after that, there were five or six horsemen came. The marshal and Judge Henry went down to meet them; they asked them what they came there for: they said, they only came there to be Shankwyler's bail: and Judge Henry then asked them what they did with their arms? They said they did not mean any harm with them. They then got off their horses, and went into a room with the judge and the marshal; what they said there, I do not know, for I did not hear them. Presently after, there came up a troop of horse, and behind them there were two companies of riflemen. They marched up right into the yard, and formed before the door of the tavern. There were about fifty riflemen, and the light-horse had their swords drawn. On a rough calculation, I suppose there were one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty armed men, and about sixteen or seventeen of the marshal's posse. After they had formed a line in the yard about fifteen or twenty minutes, Captain Jarrett arrived when they gave three huzzas. He then went into the house and talked with the marshal; the marshal requested him to get the men to withdraw. He professed he would. He had arrived from Philadelphia, whither he had been to give bail. After this, Jarrett staid at the tavern about two hours. The men kept regular order, and never separated. The marshal appointed four of us, me and three others, to keep the guard of the stairs, armed with pistols, two at the bottom and two at the head. I served my time, and the second time I was ordered on guard by Capt. Henry Snyder; I staid on the platform at the turn of the stairs, when Fries, the prisoner, came up to me, and wanted to go up stairs. I told him that he could not be permitted to go up stairs without the marshal's leave. I then asked him what he wanted? He answered that he wanted to see the marshal. I told him that I expected he could see him, and told some men at the head of the stairs to call the marshal out of the room. He came out, and I then told him these two gentlemen wanted to talk to him. He said I should let them pass. As Fries was the first man, I let him pass on between me and the other guard. The other man wanted to go up, but I told him that one at a time was enough, and that when the other had done, he would be permitted to talk to him too. Fries then went up and told the marshal what he came for; he replied that he was come for the release of the prisoners. I stood close by them when they were talking. The marshal made answer that he could not give them up to him; he then told the marshal that he would have them. Well, then, said the marshal, you must get them as well as you can; for he said it was out of his power to deliver them up; he dared not do it. Fries then told the marshal that he had a skirmish yesterday, and he expected to have another one to-day; he then said to the marshal, "As for you, marshal, I will vouch that none of my men will hurt you, but as for the other company, I will not." With that, both of them marched off. I remained on guard. A little while after this, I saw the men coming in at the door, and they got into the entry, with arms. I did not know one of those who came in except Fries; he returned with those armed men. He had a sword in his hand, but I think it was in its scabbard. When they got into the entry, they were pressed upon by the posse, who soon got them clean out of the door. I then got off guard. The language of the men was, that they would have the prisoners. I could not hear many of their expressions, because I was chiefly up stairs; but I heard them say they would not leave the ground till they had the prisoners. The marshal at this time had gone back into the room. Before the prisoners were released, I was relieved. When they made the second attempt, I was up stairs, looking out of the window. These prisoners were at this time up stairs in a room by themselves. About sixteen or eighteen prisoners were there. I believe there was not any kind of acquaintance or friendship between Fries and any of the prisoners. The prisoners said they did not wish to be rescued by those people; they said that they knew none of those people that were before the door. If they had done anything wrong, they said they were willing to go anywhere to take their trials. The minister, and the Lehigh people were all there.

Cross-Examination.—I saw them point their guns towards the window often enough. No violence offered to any person, besides what was offered to the marshal.

Christian Winters.—I was summoned on the 7th of March to go up to Bethlehem, and I went accordingly; when I came there, which was about 11 or 12 o'clock—about the middle of the day—the first man that I saw come there armed, was one Keiser; another, I think his name was Paul, came with him to the tavern; the marshal went out, and brought them into the house, and took them up stairs: I was on guard at that time, and with another, I was set to stand guard by them. (The rest of the testimony of this witness was similar to that of the preceding.)

Christian Roths.—On the 7th of March, I was summoned to go to Bethlehem, but did not know what it was for. About 11 o'clock I got to Bethlehem; when I came, Mr. Eyerly came to me, and told me some men were coming there to rescue the prisoners; I thought it not possible, but he told me it was certain. When we had been there about three hours, there came two men on horseback, and had their arms, whereupon Mr. Marshal, myself, and Mr. Philip Sheitz went down and asked them what they were about. They told us they were informed that there were a number of men met there to-day, so they said they came there to see how they came on: they did not say what they heard they were to meet for. We took them and put them into the house under guard, and took their arms from them. I then thought there was something in what Mr. Eyerly had mentioned to me. I then made an observation to Mr. Eyerly if he did not think it proper that one or two men should go and prevent these people coming. Mr. Eyerly told the marshal of it, and he thought it would be proper that some men should go. I agreed that if no one else would go, I would go by myself. I do not know who spoke to the others; but I, Judge Mohollan, Major Barnett, and ——, went out. We met them within a mile of Bethlehem. I did not know a single man of them; but Judge Mohollan and Major Barnett spoke to them first; but I did not understand what they said. I went farther back, to the rear: I said to them, "What in the world are you about, men? you will bring yourselves into great trouble." One of them said, "We don't know you;" I mentioned, "If you know me or not, you will thank me for it." I said, "If you do not do as I advise you, you will be sorry for twenty years after this;" so there was one of them that levelled his gun at me: said I, "Little man, consider what you are about; don't be too much in a hurry:" then some of his comrades pushed him back. Then that man hallooed out, "March on; don't mind this, people." I do not know his name. They then marched on to the bridge, and there we stopped them again. They then agreed amongst themselves that they would send three men with us to the marshal, to see if they could get the two prisoners we took at first, liberated, and gave their honor that none of them should come over the bridge with arms. We then went with these three men to the tavern at Bethlehem. They then went to the marshal, and agreed with him, and the two prisoners were discharged; but he set down their names. I do not recollect their names. When these two men were discharged, we went to go back with them again; but when we came to the lower end of Bethlehem, there was that company and another coming on, and there was no stopping them again. The bridge is about half a mile from Bethlehem. These two men went with us, I think; but I am not sure. I endeavoured to stop them, to reason with them, but they would not: and I then told them if they were determined not to hear, they might do as they pleased. As I came back to Bethlehem, I went up stairs to Mr. Eyerly and the marshal. The men paraded before the tavern, and there I think they were for two hours. I suppose one hundred and twenty men, or upwards, were drawn up. I saw those two men that were first kept prisoners mix along with these people. The light horse were armed, and with their uniforms. They had not their swords drawn till they came near to the tavern; then they drew their swords, a great number of them. Before we started from the bridge, we asked them again what they were about. They told us that they were informed that they had taken a number of prisoners, and that they would take them to Philadelphia, and put them in jail there; and no bail would be taken for them. We asked them what prisoners they meant. They mentioned one name only that I recollect, which was one Shankwyler. They mentioned that they would not suffer Shankwyler to be put to jail in Philadelphia; they mentioned that they would give bail ten double for him, or that they might put him in jail in our own county, and try him in our own county. I saw one Schwartz come up into the room where the marshal was No one abused, threatened, or insulted Mr. Eyerly that I know of. I heard no threats against any one.

Colonel Nichols, the Marshal.—Some time between the 20th and 26th of February, the warrants I now hold in my hand were given to me by the attorney of the district, with orders for me to go to Northampton county to execute them. I set out on the 26th, and after serving some subpoenas on the road, in order to get some evidence, I got to Nazareth on the 1st of March; next morning, Mr. Eyerly and myself went into Lehigh township to serve some warrants upon some persons who had given their opposition to the house-tax law. I think we got twelve of them that day; the others were not to be found. I think there were five of them, however they came in afterwards. We then returned to Bethlehem, and there met with Col. Balliott. We went then to Macungy township, and there we met with no difficulty till we went to the house of George Syder; I had a subpoena on him: he and his wife insulted us very much; his wife began abusing us first, and he came out with a club, and would by no means be persuaded to receive it, I suppose not understanding it: I gave it to a Mr. Schwartz, a neighbour, who undertook to deliver it to him. We then proceeded to Millarstown, a few miles farther: on the way we stopped at the house of the Rev. Mr. Buskirk, where we left our horses, and walked into the town, to the house of George Shaeffer, to serve a warrant on him; but were informed that he was not in town. We returned to the tavern, about the centre of the town, and there we saw a considerable number of people assembled. Mr. Eyerly and myself walked over to Shankwyler. As we walked out, many people ran after us, and many ran past us, and getting into the house, filled the long room. There appeared to be about fifty men. Near the house in which Shankwyler lived, we concluded it was bad policy to ask for him, for by that means it was not likely we should find him. And therefore, as Col. Balliott knew him, I got him to point him out to me; but upon observing me, he withdrew into the crowd; I followed him, and laid hold on him, and told him he was my prisoner, in the name of the United States. I told him I was the marshal of the United States for the Pennsylvania district. He retreated towards his barn. He afterwards called out that he would not hurt the marshal, but Eyerly and Balliott were damned rascals: after this the people called out to each other "Schlaget! schlaget!" (strike! strike!) This seemed to be the general voice of the people. David Shaeffer seemed to be a prominent character. I told them the consequence of their attempting to strike: I had a pair of pistols, and finding the danger we were in, I pulled open the buttons of my great coat, that I might, if necessary, get a ready gripe at them: whether they saw them or not, I cannot say, but when they found that I was determined not to suffer these people to be abused, they were then a little quiet: they, however, pulled the cockade out of Mr. Balliott's hat, and I believe would have done more violence to him, had they dared. I called on Shankwyler to go with me to Bethlehem, and thence to Philadelphia; but he swore he would not: I told him the consequence of resisting the authority of the United States, that it would be ruin to him; he declared and swore he would resist; he would not submit, be the consequence what it might. I told him it would ruin his interest and family; he said he would do it, if it was to the destruction of his property, and children. However, he finally agreed to meet me at Bethlehem, but never promised to submit, or surrender himself as prisoner. He spoke a good deal about the stamp act, and the house tax; that seemed to be the bone of contention, and he said he had fought against it, and would not submit to it now; I told him he appeared to be too young to have fought on either side during the war: he then said his father had; he then added that there were none in favour of those laws but Tories, and officers of government. I told him that, as to Tory, that could not apply to me; that I had had a share in the Revolution; and that I was as fond of liberty as any of them. We came away, and as we came out, Mr. Eyerly and Mr. Balliott came out of the door, they huzzaed for liberty: I told them that I should join them in that, if they would huzza for liberty of the right kind; but this was licentious liberty. We then went with a constable to arrest Adam Stepham, Herman Hartman, and Daniel Everly. When I returned, I was informed that the rescue of the prisoners at Bethlehem was intended. This was on the 6th of March. I could scarcely conceive it possible; I thought it was somebody for their own diversion had raised it merely to alarm us, until we got to Bethlehem, where we got that night. There we were informed that the report was serious, and that it would be attempted by a body of armed men. On which I consulted with Judge Henry, Mr. Balliott, Mr. Eyerly, Mr. Horsefield, and General Brown. I had taken a bond of the Lehigh people, with sureties for their appearance. I sent Mr. Weed over the mountain to arrest Ireman, the minister, and John Fox, which he did. Seeing this matter very serious and important, I requested General Brown to remain at Bethlehem, as he had very great influence in that county: he said he was so near home, that he should go home, as he had been so long from his family. I then asked him to return in the morning, but he seemed to think there was no necessity for it, and did not. I then consulted what steps it would be necessary to take; I had seen an attorney, and told him I was ordered to call a posse comitatus in case of necessity, and also that I was ordered that they should not be an armed force; I then spoke to Judge Henry, expecting that he could call out armed men, but he told me he could not, for he had received similar instructions. We then concluded to call about twenty men. He called this posse from the neighbourhood of Bethlehem and Easton; about eighteen of them came in. About 10 or 11 o'clock two men riding into the yard, dismounted, and placed themselves opposite the door, by the side of each other; one of them had a long smooth bore gun, and the other a rifle. Some people in the house went out to speak to them, and asked them what brought them there: they seemed to be at a loss for an answer; I think one of them said they came out on a shooting frolic. I then asked them what they meant to shoot: they did not know, not could they explain the object of their coming. I asked them what they meant to do: one of them said they meant to do what was best for the country. I then supposed that they would all come in by straggling parties, and therefore thought it was the best way of making the business easy to lead them into the house, which I did, and put their arms into the garret. Shortly after, three horsemen, armed, and, I think, in uniform, came into the yard with Shankwyler; I went and spoke to them, and some went with me. I asked Shankwyler if he was come to deliver himself up; he answered no. I asked him what he came for, if he did not come to surrender himself; he answered that he came to see his partner: on farther inquiry, I found he meant his accuser. By this time the people were collecting very fast, and some persons mentioned that there was an armed force down by the bridge. On consulting with the gentlemen who were with me, it was agreed that a few men should be sent to speak to them, and warn them of the danger they were in, if they persisted in the measure which we supposed they intended. It was accordingly agreed that four gentlemen should go, which they did, and in a little time returned with three of their force, as a deputation from them to speak to me. I asked them what was meant by this armed force, and what they intended by it: they answered me that they wanted to prevent my taking the prisoners to Philadelphia. I told them that could not be, nor must it be attempted; they had much better go back, and tell the people to go to their respective homes. I think they asked me particularly for the two men who had first been made prisoners; I forget whether I gave them up then, or some short time after; however, they were given up, and their guns were given up to them: they were both loaded, and one of them was putting a new flint into his gun in the yard, before I went out to speak to them. The same gentlemen who went down to speak to them at the bridge, went down to them again, and, a short time afterward, we observed that they were coming up in force, up the street, Mr. Mohollan riding with the foremost of them, and speaking to them: the horsemen, such as had swords, had them drawn: the infantry marched with trailed arms. The prisoner at the bar was at the head of the infantry, with his sword drawn: the horse marched into the yard, and formed in front of the house; the infantry marched round the house, and the captain, with the leading file, came in at the upper gate. I had a great deal of conversation with different persons among them, who seemed to take a lead. They were all strangers to me; I told them the consequences of their attempting to rescue the prisoners; I told them they might rest assured that things of this kind would be severely punished by the government; that it would be considered a high offence, and that every insult offered to me, would be an insult to the United States. I had a good deal of conversation with the prisoner at the bar, without knowing that he was Captain Fries, till he made himself known to me. I remonstrated strongly against the measures, and told them the consequence, but they seemed regardless of it, and seemed determined that I should give them up. They spoke generally of the prisoners. During this conversation, he was without his sword. The substance of the conversation was, he demanded of me the prisoners; I refused to give them up, and told him the consequences of his demands. On his still insisting, I told him that he and those about him would be severely punished for this conduct, that he would surely be hanged. He said they could not be punished; he said something to the effect that the government were not strong enough to hang him, for that if the troops were brought out, they would join him. His reason was, that he was opposed to those laws—the alien law, the stamp act, and the house-tax law; and said they were unconstitutional. He also spoke of bringing people charged with crimes to Philadelphia to be tried as an oppressive thing; they had no objection, he said, to be tried in their own courts, and by their own people. We parted, and met in the crowd two or three times, for the house was much crowded; he still demanded of me the prisoners; I told him I could not give them up; I told him I was commanded to bring them to Philadelphia; he insisted upon having them, and I that he should not. He then went and talked to his people, and came to me again. He told me that if I did not give them up, he would not answer for the consequences; he told me that he would not hurt me; he was the oldest captain in the rank, but he would not answer for them that were with me; that he took command of the whole by rank. By this time Captain Jarrett came in, and by this time there was much noise and huzzaing. I was told that this noise was on account of the arrival of Captain Jarrett: I wished him pointed out to me in confidence, that, as he had come to submit to the laws, he would be able to persuade others to do the same. He was shown to me; he had a pair of pistols in his hand. He showed me that he had entered into recognizance for his appearance. I then begged him to use his influence in persuading the people to disperse, and go to their respective homes, and told him what would be the consequence if they did not. His answer was that he had no influence; that he could do nothing. After this, I consulted with Judge Henry and others, what was best to be done; it seemed to be their opinion that I had better submit, and give up the prisoners; I told them I would not do it; I would immediately march the prisoners to Philadelphia, and if the armed mob thought proper to take them from me, they might; it would then be their act, and not mine; I went to them and told them to prepare for march immediately, for that we would set off to Philadelphia. The Lehigh prisoners said they would not do so, they would not expose themselves to so much danger; but if I would suffer them to go to their homes, they would meet me in Philadelphia on the Monday or Tuesday following. I met Mr. Fries about the foot of the stairs, and he still persisted in his demand of the prisoners, that I must give them up.

Cross-Examination.—I do not think he had a sword at that moment. I refused, and went into the back room, and a person whom I did not know, told me, that if I did not give them up, I should not be hurt, but the lives of Balliott, Eyerly, and Henry were in danger. This was not an armed man. I did not like to expose the lives of those men, so I gave up the prisoners. Fries came in directly, and said I had not given up Ireman, the minister. I told him I had; he then went out, and came in again, and said he was without. He then mounted and went off. I did apprehend that the lives of those gentlemen would be in danger if I refused the prisoners.

Philip Schlaugh.—When I was at Bethlehem, which I expect was the 7th of March, the first I saw was that the company was ordered in rank, and when that was done, this Fries was in the entry of the house, where he was speaking loud. I inquired who that was; they said it was Captain Fries. He said they who were the greatest Tories in the last war, were the head leaders now; then I went out of the house, and he went up to the marshal, and when he came out again, he went up to his company, and told them, "Well, brothers, I went up to the marshal, and asked him about the prisoners, and told him I would have the prisoners, but the marshal told me he dare not give them up willingly; I tell you, brothers, we have to pass four or five sentries, but I beg you not to fire first on them, till they first fire upon us; I shall be the foremost man; I shall go on before you, and I expect I shall get the first blow." Then he turned himself round. Mr. Molhollan and others begged him that he would not go on in this matter; they would rather go and speak to the marshal that he should deliver up the prisoners willingly, if they would absolutely have them. The men, when he told them this, followed him. He then said to them, "You must not fire first; but if they do fire upon you, then I will order you to fire too, and help yourselves as well as you can." I did not wait till the prisoners were released, for when I heard this, I thought there was going to be warm work, so I got upon my horse, and rode off to Easton as fast as I could.

Joseph Horsefield, Esq.—I live in Bethlehem; am a justice of the peace there, and was there on the 7th of March. Shortly before the last general election, the spirit of discontent and opposition was sensibly felt in the county of Northampton; there were different meetings called in different parts of the county; among others I was informed there was one at which the militia officers were particularly to attend, which I understood was intended to prepare a ticket for the election. At that meeting, sundry resolutions were passed, which appeared in public prints; among others, one was that petitions should be formed to obtain a repeal of the alien and sedition laws, and the land-tax act. I was informed that the captains of the militia companies were to be served with a copy of each of these petitions; I was likewise informed that this was done, and a five-penny-bit each paid freely for a copy, though the Germans love their money so well. I think the people were told that the petitions merely contained a request for the repeal of the house and land-tax law. I have seen none of them. On the election day, the people pretty generally collected, and, at least in the district where I had a right to vote, the spirit of opposition against the measures of government was so universal, that a friend of government, by saying one word in favor of it, was ready to be abused; and I understood it was so in every election district in the county; and the county in general gloried that they had gained the day. Nothing material occurred, to my knowledge, from that time till the marshal arrived there. The spirit of opposition which had begun before the election, daily increased before the marshal arrived. The marshal arrived at Bethlehem about the 3d of March. I, having some personal acquaintance with that gentleman, waited on him, when he told me he was sent to the county on business for the United States, and desired me to inform him where several persons resided, against whom he had precepts from the district judge. I acquainted him. He then went to Nazareth, and returned again about the 5th, telling me he had summoned a number of persons in Lehigh township, and that they were to be at Bethlehem on the 7th. On the 6th, I was informed he had returned from Millars town, and on the 7th in the morning I went up to town, when he told me that he expected there would be some disturbance that day, and also told me that he had issued summonses for the posse comitatus. Between 10 and 11 o'clock the posse came; I think they were about fourteen in number. A considerable number of people from the neighborhood of Bethlehem had collected unarmed. Mr. Dixon arrived from Emaus about 11 o'clock, and informed the marshal that, on his way, he met with a number of people collected at a tavern called Reiter's, in arms, both horsemen and footmen, about six miles from Bethlehem, and that he met a number on the road partly armed, partly unarmed. About half past eleven, two men arrived at Bethlehem armed, from that quarter; they were disarmed, and sent up stairs into a room; about the same time a number of persons arrived from Lehigh township, who were also sent up stairs by the marshal in a room by themselves; they were about eleven in number. I was present when Mr. Eyerly spoke to these prisoners, telling them that an armed force was formed with intention to rescue them; the prisoners answered that they by no means wished it; that they would submit to go with the marshal, rather than be rescued. In about an hour, I was looking out of the window up stairs, and saw riding into the yard a number of horsemen, besides some footmen; I said to the marshal I thought it was best for us now to go down and see these people. I went down and asked one of them what was his name; he answered Daniel Shaeffer. He had a sword at his side, and two pistols; next to him on horseback was Henry Shankwyler; next to him was another horseman accoutred in the same manner, whose name was Philip Daesch; there were also John Dillinger and Jacob Cline, not in uniform, but with swords in the scabbard. I asked them what they wanted: we are all civil people, and have no arms, was my observation to them. Dillinger, who seemed to speak for them, said that yesterday the marshal had taken Shankwyler and some other of their neighbours prisoners; that they were come to see Shankwyler's partner (accuser). The marshal told them that the United States was the accuser of Mr. Shankwyler. Dillinger, said he thought it was not right that he should be taken to Philadelphia. The marshal said that the judge had ordered it so. I told him that I thought they were unacquainted with the government of the United States, and I thought they were in a very critical and dangerous situation; that the United States in less than twenty days could muster 10,000 men, which power I thought they could not withstand, and that it was best for them to surrender the prisoners to the marshal, and go home. They said that Shankwyler and the others were their neighbours, and that they would wait and see what should become of them. They did not mention the other names. I asked whether any more armed men would be there; Jacob Cline answered, fifty more. With that we went into the house. After dinner the people collected very fast, and Dillinger began again to speak in behalf of Shankwyler. The marshal told him it could not be otherwise, go he must; Shankwyler answered that he had a family to take care of, and that he would not go. With this, the marshal and myself walked up stairs, and there saw a great number of armed people round the house, I think one hundred and twenty or thirty, and about two hundred and fifty unarmed. I suggested to the marshal that my suspicions were very gloomy; that I doubted whether he would succeed in taking off the prisoners, for I had quietly heard among the people that were in the house, and out of doors, that nothing should satisfy them but the delivery of the prisoners: in front of the house was drawn up a number of men armed. I went up stairs, and there I perceived several times, guns pointed up to the window of the second story, at which I began to feel very disagreeable. Mr. Eyerly, Mr. Balliott, Mr. Henry and the others were occasionally at the windows, though I do not recollect Eyerly being at the window, but the others were: I walked down stairs, and there saw men armed close before the door, pressing in; I pressed through them, and heard two men say if Henry, and that damned Eyerly, and that damned potgutted Balliott were there, they would tear them to pieces; this man did not attempt to come into the house. I thought this was bad news, and I walked back again, and proceeded my way up stairs, and desired Mr. Levering (the tavern-keeper) to close the bar, thinking there was madness enough without stimulating it, which was immediately done. I desired the marshal not to protract the delivery of the prisoners to the law. Mr. Mohollan and several others there pushed them back, but just then I heard some of the officers say, "Boys, in the ranks! in the ranks!" I looked out of the window again up stairs, and there I saw a second pressure, to come in at the door; some of the men who were in the ranks, thumped their guns upon the ground, and jumped, pronouncing some unintelligible shrieks, savage-like shrieks. I begged the marshal, for God's sake, to deliver up those men up stairs, for the rescue was perfect, in my opinion: the closing of the men would be only butchering, and I had no doubt the government of the United States would not let its dignity be trampled upon in this way. The marshal still continued to hesitate. By this time a number of persons had got into the house, adorned with large three-coloured French cockades. The posse staid up stairs at this time: I then worked my way down stairs again, in order to be ready for a jump. By this time I understood that the prisoners were delivered. After the prisoners were gone about ten minutes, there was not a single armed man in, or about the house: some of the neighbors who had collected were still there, some of whom were approving, and others disapproving of the conduct of the insurgents, but in my opinion, the majority were approving. I never saw the prisoner till I came down to this place, but I frequently heard the name of Captain Fries called. Mr. Balliott looked out of the window, but stepped back again pretty quick, afraid of the muzzles of the guns.

John Mohollan, Esq., after describing the preliminary proceedings to the same effect as the preceding witnesses, proceeded: Having met with those horsemen before we came back to the bridge, we returned with them, and all made a halt in the yard. I spoke all I could to dissuade them from the purpose about which they came, but all to no purpose. I had no answer that I could understand, for they generally spoke in German or broken English, which I could not understand. I always understood, generally, that they wanted the prisoners, and that they wished to give in security, and let them be tried in the county: that if they had done anything that was wrong, it was right they should suffer, but that it was not right to take them to Philadelphia. I heard Major Barnett say this, who interpreted what they said in German. After being a considerable time engaged with people as actively as I could, but it appeared to be but to little purpose, I then went up stairs with a view to take something; as I was returning, the stairs were so crowded I could not easily get down. Coming down, I saw a person whom I understood to be Captain Fries, and the marshal standing talking to him. I believe it was the prisoner at the bar. I heard them talk a few words; the marshal said that they were not doing right, and that they must suffer: but I cannot recollect anything particularly that was said, but I observed that he often made a demand of the prisoners, but that he should not be hurt; that he would be answerable for himself and the company, that none of his men should hurt him that day, but that he would not be answerable for any others that did not belong to his company. I think he repeated this twice. I was there but a few minutes. I made some observations to the men, advising them to consider what they were about, for I considered it dangerous, and very wrong to proceed in this way. At this time there was a noise in the entry: I was afraid something had happened, so I went down, but I do not recollect seeing Fries the whole day afterwards. There was a great deal said, but none of them spoke to me in English.

Jacob Eyerly.—As to what happened on the seventh of March, I am not able to say much. I was out with the marshal the day before, when he served the process. As we heard that the rescue was intended, it was agreed to send express to Easton, in order to obtain the posse to aid him in the execution of his duty: they accordingly arrived between ten and eleven o'clock, to the number of fifteen or sixteen. Mr. Dixon of Emaus told us, that he had seen about twenty armed men at Reiter's tavern, and some at another tavern, besides some on the road, and that he understood from them that they were coming to rescue the prisoners. It was then agreed to take these prisoners, who had surrendered, up stairs. There were a number of people now collected from the neighbourhood, and then it was agreed to send the deputation to meet the armed men. About that time I went down stairs into the back room, and there I saw those two men whose arms had been taken from them: I did not see them come in. I then went up stairs again; this was the last time I went down stairs, till after the prisoners were released. I then saw those three men come with Shank-wyler. I did not hear what passed, but saw Mr. Horsefield and Judge Henry go to them. Sometime afterwards, I saw an armed force coming in, a great many on horseback, and many footmen with muskets on their shoulders: the horsemen had their swords drawn. The greatest part of those on horseback came from Bucks county. Afterwards, the marshal came up stairs and said that they were determined to have the prisoners, and he believed that Mr. Balliott and myself would be in danger of our lives if we went out of the house, and then desired me to undertake to guard the stairs, and told me to give orders that if anybody would come up with force, they should shoot them. I placed the guard on the stairs; at first there were but two. Some of the posse were at this time below talking to the people. After some time the guard told me that they had got violent, and threatened to come up stairs with violence, and requested of me that I might double the guard, which I did. As I was in the room, I looked out of the window and saw a company of riflemen, all with three-coloured cockades, marching Indian file round the house: I counted them; there were forty-two in that company; another person besides myself was counting them, but I do not recollect who it was, though I rather think it was Mr. Balliott: they marched twice round the house. Another time when I was walking about the room, a person who was along with me, I do not recollect who, told me that they were pointing their guns up to the window, and that he was sure it was dangerous for me to show myself at the window. There is not the least doubt upon my mind, from what I heard, and from what I saw, and from the marshal's testimony, that if I had gone to any place where they could have done it, they would have shot me; because the people in general appeared to be in such a rage that there was no reason in them. I abstained from showing myself at the window, or amongst the people, as much as possible. There was nothing particular that I saw, except at one time when I was in the room, I heard a terrible huzza: this was in the afternoon. On this I went to the window to see what produced this noise, and I saw that Captain Jarrett had arrived: he had just dismounted his horse, and had his pistols in his hand, and was walking up towards the stairs. I did not remain long at the window, but just looked out, and saw him come in, and shortly after he came up into the room where I was; he had not his pistols with him then: I had that moment received a letter from Mr. Rawle, attorney of the district, that Mr. Jarrett had surrendered himself and given bail, and that he declared he was a strong friend to government. I then said to him, "If you are a friend to government, as you profess to be, you ought to go down and tell your people to desist:" to which he made no reply at all. He walked about in the room for some time, and then went down stairs. I did not see anything more till the prisoners were released. The only time I saw Mr. Fries, the prisoner, was a few minutes before the prisoners were delivered up. I walked out of the room, and saw Mr. Fries upon the head of the stairs, speaking with the marshal: shortly after, the prisoners were requested to go down; but the minister, staying a little while up in the room, there was a call made for him particularly, and therefore I went and requested him to go down. Shortly after, the armed men went off. I looked out of the window, and saw Mr. Jarrett parading his light horse in rank before the door. He then gave orders to march, and they went off. That was the only time I saw the prisoner during the day.

I was one of the commissioners appointed to carry into execution two acts of congress; one for assessing houses, and the other for laying a direct tax. After I had received my commission, which was some time in August, 1798, I had received a letter from the secretary of the treasury, requesting me to take some pains to find out suitable characters to serve as assessors. I did, in consequence of that, write some letters to some of my friends, in the counties of Northampton, Luzerne and Wayne, which constituted my division: in Wayne and Luzerne, I found no difficulties whatever, but received a number of applications sufficient, and accompanied with recommendations. In Northampton county I was not so successful; I had but two recommendations from that county; it was, therefore, necessary for me from the best information which I could obtain, to endeavor to find men of suitable characters in each township; and likewise to get a number of blank commissions, in case some of those appointed should refuse to accept of the office. I received information at Reading, at the time the board of commissioners met, from the commissioner in Bucks, that he had received information from a gentleman in Philadelphia (Mr. Chapman) that he had travelled through a great part of Northampton county, and that in every tavern where he stopped, this tax law was the general topic of conversation, and that great pains were taken to find out who the persons were that were friends of the government so much as to be assessors, in order to persuade them not to accept of the appointment. Although I could not believe it was the case at that time, yet I found it was the case afterwards. Agreeably to my duty, I gave notice to the assessors to meet me at a certain place. I should have first said that I appointed the assessors agreeably to the best information I could collect; I took one man from each township, such as was thought qualified for the business. I sent them their commissions, and with them notices to meet me at a time and place appointed in order to receive from me their instructions. I appointed a meeting of the assessors of the third district of Nazareth, on the 3d Thursday in November; two of them did not attend, and some of the others who did attend begged to be excused from serving. I asked their reason, and told them I could not very well excuse them; they told me that the people in their different townships were very much opposed to the law; that they thought it was dangerous for them to accept of it. I found that they, as well as the people, had a wrong idea about the law; and I was so happy that day as to prevail upon all those that wished to be excused accepting the appointment, upon explaining the law to them, to accept it. The next day I met the assessors of the second district at Allentown, where all attended but one. I had the same difficulty there as at the other place, and it was not without much difficulty that those who did appear, were persuaded to accept of the appointment. I then left the blank commissions with Mr. Balliott, and requested him to appoint some persons in the room of Mr. Horne, who had refused. The Monday following I met the assessors of the other district at Chestnut Hill township. Previous to that, I had seen Mr. Kearne, who was the assessor appointed at Easton; when I mentioned to him that he was appointed an assessor, he told me that it would not suit him to accept of it. I requested of him that he might name some suitable person, and qualified for it, and I would be willing to accept him. He mentioned Jacob Snyder, and told me he would notify Mr. Snyder to meet me with the rest. When I came there, two of the assessors did not appear, and one from Hamilton did not appear willing to accept of it, but after a great deal of explaining and persuading he was prevailed upon. Just as we were going, Snyder came; he told me that he had received his notice, and that he was willing to accept it; that the people were very much opposed to the law, and he did not very well understand it himself; but he thought he would endeavour to get some information; and that when he came there, the information he received was such, that he was determined to go after me, and accept of the appointment, if he were to ride fifty miles in order to accept of it, for that he had been wrong informed about the law. I then went up to Wayne county, where I had no difficulty, except that one assessor told me that he was persuaded with difficulty to accept of the appointment. As I was going to Luzerne county, the assessor from Hamilton township (Nicholas Michael) came after me, and told me that he had been obliged to fly from his house in the night to save his life, and begged of me to accept of his resignation; I told him I could not accept of it, but that I would see perfect justice done. At my request he went with me to Easton, where we went to see Mr. Sitgreaves, attorney of the district; but not finding him at home, we went to Judge Trail, in order to take his deposition. He begged that I would grant the favour for him to consider of it till the next morning; I did, and next morning he came to me and begged me, "Mr. Eyerly, for God's sake, put me to jail, so that I may be secure of my life, for if I inform against these people, I and my family shall ruined." I told him that I would do no such thing, for that I had too much friendship for him; that I would give a few lines to the constable to request him to call a township meeting, and I would meet him in the township. I requested Mr. Henry to go there with me: I had reason to believe that this opposition arose from misrepresentation, which I supposed was given to the people by a few gentlemen, who had travelled through the country a few days since. When we came to Hamilton township, there were about sixty or seventy persons assembled, three or four of them in uniforms; their arms were behind the door at the house of Mr. Hellers. I then told them that I was come as their friend, and without any design of taking the least advantage of their conduct in opposing the assessors; that I had come to read the law to them, and explain it. I did so, and pointed out the impositions practiced on them. Mr. Henry assisted me as much as he could, but all to very little purpose. The assessor, after this, again begged me, for God's sake, to accept of his resignation. As there was a number of them that complained against the assessors, I proposed to them that, though I had no authority to it, yet if I thought it would be a favour to grant them that indulgence, to elect their own assessor themselves, I would grant him the appointment. They told me they would do no such thing, for, said they, "If we do this, we at once acknowledge that we will submit to the laws; and that is what we won't do." I then inquired for a suitable man, and John Hufton was mentioned, who was likewise elected assessor for the county rates. I called him into a room, and requested him to accept the appointment; he told me it was impossible at the present time, but he should, whenever things appeared more favourable, so that he could go through, be willing to do it.

The last week in December, or the first of January, I received a letter from Mr. Heckavelter, the assessor of Upper Milford; by which, he informed me that he was stopped by a regular deputation from the township meeting, consisting of three men. I sent a line to Mr. Heckavelter, and wished him to give notice to Mr. Schymer, Mr. Moretz, and some of the leading men in the township, that I would meet them at such a time, and explain the business to them. When I came, in consequence, within four miles of the place, I was requested by a friend not to go, for that the people were so violent, that if I did go I should certainly be killed: I replied to them that I would go; I was not afraid of any of them. I took Mr. Henry along with me; when we came there, I found about sixty or seventy persons collected at the house of John Schymer. I suppose about twenty of them had French cockades in their hats, red, blue, and white. Mr. Schymer then took me into his own room; there were about eight or ten in the room. Mr. Schymer asked me if I had seen the petitions; he gave one of them to me, and requested that I would read it, which I did in the presence of another person; there were but two in the company that understood English. While I was reading, these two men began to shake their heads; they said it was not such a petition as they had been told. I then asked them whether the general opposition was not on account of the stamp tax, and the house tax; they said yes. I then told them there was not a word in this petition against the stamp act; they seemed to be altogether satisfied, and said that they had been made to believe it was. I then went into the next room, where the people collected; some of them appeared to be extremely violent and very abusive. I told them I had not come there to be abused by anybody; that I had come there as a friend, to inform them of the law, which it was important should be understood. There was a report among them that it was no law; I read the law to them, and explained it in the German language, and told them it was their duty to submit to it. One of them of the name of George Shaeffer jumped up before me, and said, "Mr. Eyerly, it is no law;" I told them that if they did not believe me, they might inquire of Squire Schymer whether it was or not. Mr. Schymer told them it was a law; upon which Shaeffer replied, "admitting it is a law, we will not submit to it." He then further said, "Here I am, take me to jail; but you shall see how far you will bring me." Upon which a great many of them jumped up and said, "Yes, by God, if they shall only attempt to take any one to jail, we would soon have him out again." Some of them made use of very abusive language against the assessor, calling him a Tory rascal and the like; and as the assessor had requested me to accept of his resignation because it was not in his power to go through with it, I proposed to them, that if they had any objections against the assessor, they should elect one, and I would give him his appointment: to which some of the most sensible and most moderate replied, "No, if it must be done, Mr. Heckavelter shall do it;" and some of the others said, "We will do no such thing: if we do, we at once acknowledge that we submit to the law, and that is what we will not." I then went over to the tavern close by, with Mr. Schymer, when Mr. Heckavelter came to me and told me that he was in danger; that there were three of the Shaeffers were going to give him a licking; I requested him to stand by me, and I would see him safe. We then went off.

Cross-Examined.—All three of them came up to beat him. Mr. Heckavelter told them he would not have anything to do with them, and they charged him something respecting a liberty pole at Millars town. The liberty pole was erected two weeks before that, but after the dissensions arose, with a few exceptions, poles were erected nowhere but where this opposition prevailed. The law was not executed at Millars town, nor at Upper Milford, till about two or three weeks ago at farthest. I then agreed to go to Millars town, where one of the Shaeffers lived. Mentioning this to an assessor, (John Roming,) he requested I would not do it; he told me that the people were so violent that he would not go upon his duties if anybody would give him £500; if he did, he must run the risk of losing his life. I then desisted.—I then went to Mr. Trexlers, where I saw Mr. Bobst, who gave me information of Heidelberg, Wiessenberg, Lynn, and Low Hill: he told me that at a meeting at one of those places the people had drawn up a paper not to submit to the laws: he then told the people that they were certainly doing wrong, and that they would bring themselves into trouble if they went on that way: upon which they (the people themselves) destroyed the paper. He said the same of Heidelberg. He likewise informed me that in the township where he lives, it was impossible to execute the laws. The laws were executed in those four townships only since the troops have been there. All in the township opposed the execution of the law, except three or four. In Penn township the assessor did not meet us; he refused to accept the appointment, well aware of the difficulties that would occur; and a general rule was admitted to meet those difficulties. I received information from Mr. Balliott that he had found a man in that township who was willing to execute the office. At my request, he sent him a commission, but the man was obliged, before he took the oaths, to return it again, declaring it was impossible to do it. This was some time in January. Some time afterwards he wrote to me of another man who would accept. I requested him to sign his commission. I received information, while the marshal, Mr. Balliott and myself were about the country, that as soon as the people in the township knew that he had received his commission, they raised a mob. Penn township was assessed about ten days ago. Owing to the opposition in that township, the law could not be executed. In Moore township there was some opposition; but when the assessor was opposed, he called a town meeting. That township has been assessed about two months. On the first or second of March last, when the marshal came to Nazareth, and told me that he had process against a number of persons in Northampton county, he requested me to go with him; I went with him first to Lehigh township, where the marshal served process upon those people for opposing the assessments, without any difficulty: we then came to Bethlehem, and then to Emaus: the first subpoena the marshal had to serve was in a house upon George Syder, where, after being abused by the house, we were sworn at and abused by him; he had a large club in his hand.—He called us rascals, highway robbers and the like: the marshal told him he only had a subpoena to appear at Philadelphia to give testimony; to which he answered in German, he would be damned if he would go. The marshal, finding he could do nothing with him, requested Daniel Schwartz, sen., to read and explain it to him, and we left it with him to serve. We then went to Millars town to serve a warrant on George Shaeffer, but we were told he was gone to Philadelphia: we went to Seward's tavern. The marshal and myself then went to Shankwyler's, where there were at least fifty assembled in the room. Not knowing Shankwyler, Mr. Balliott pointed him out, and the marshal took him: while the marshal was talking with Shankwyler, the crowd closed upon us, and abused us very much, and in a very menacing manner, accompanied with an almost universal cry of "Strike! strike! strike!" so that for some time we did not know what would be the consequence. The marshal this time was persuading Sankwyler to submit, telling him the consequence of opposition: he at first declared he would not, but at length he said he would do as Jarrett did. Some of the people then said that if Shankwyler was to be taken out of his house, they would fight as long as they had a drop of blood in their bodies. The marshal then turned round to the crowd, when they were so violent, and told them that Mr. Balliott and myself were under his protection. I forgot to mention that, while the marshal was talking to Shankwyler in the bar, one of the persons present tore the cockade from Mr. Balliott's hat, while he was turning round to speak to the marshal: Mr. Balliott did not for the present know but it was a blow some one had given him. They then made back a little. Having found it impossible to do anything farther, Shankwyler promised to meet the marshal at Bethlehem. We then went out of the room, but before we came out of the house, there was a terrible huzza in the room. I then sent for a constable, at the request of the marshal, to go with him and show him the persons and places of those against whom he had process. I remained while he served the process at Mr. Irexler's, and it was there we first received information that an attempt would be made the next day to rescue the prisoners. We arrived at Bethlehem that evening, the 6th of March, and then the occurrences happened of which I have given testimony as far as I know.

Samuel Toon.—(The testimony of this witness being in entire accordance with the two immediately preceding, is here omitted.)

Andrew Shiffert.—I was one of the armed party that went to Bethlehem on the seventh of March, and belonged to Jarrett's company. I was informed by John Hoover that all the light-horse were to meet at Martin Ritter's at ten in the morning: I went to Ritter's the next morning, (on the seventh of March,) and when I came there, I asked what was to be done. Their answer was, that they were going to Bethlehem to release the prisoners from the marshal. I told them that if they were to do this, they would find what would be the consequences. The others said that if they got the prisoners clear that day, there would be noth ing done; it would be all over: that if the soldiers came with arms against them, it would be all at an end. At Ritter's I wanted to go home, but they would not let me, telling me that Fogle would be at Guise's tavern, whereupon I agreed to go so far with them. Coming there, Fogle was not there, and I and Samuel Toon wanted to go home, for there were no officers there. They then agreed to choose an officer, when the choice fell upon me; I told them I would not go with them without they would obey my orders, and not say any more about taking the prisoners from the marshal. They professed to do so, whereupon we proceeded to within half a mile of the bridge, and there we were met by four gentlemen from Bethlehem, and as they repeated again that they would have the prisoners, I said I would have no more to do with them. They then went into Bethlehem, but I did not go with them; but in about two hours I went in to see what they were about: I staid this side of the bridge till then. When I got to Bethlehem, I was informed that they had got the prisoners out. I remained there about half an hour, and then rode home, so that I know not what happened.

The evidence here was closed so far as related to the affair at Bethlehem: and the district attorney then proceeded to introduce the following testimony in regard to preceding and succeeding events to show the state of the country, and the prisoner's intention, the material portion of which is here given.

John Dillingher.—It was rumored in my neighbourhood that the marshal was coming up to arrest some persons; before he came, it was suspected that some persons would be arrested. The report was that they were to be taken to Philadelphia. It was said, that if any person was to be arrested innocently, it would be very hard for such a man, and he ought not to be suffered to suffer. And further, it was said that somebody had sworn against Shankwyler that he had two pistols and a sword on his table, and that he had sworn that if the assessors should come, he would shoot them.

William Thomas.—On the fifth of March we heard that the assessors were going round to assess the houses in Bucks county: they had assessed a few of the houses about already: my brother was at Jacob Hoover's, and I was there when he told me to tell two of our neighbours to let the assessors go round. On the sixth in the morning, I met Captain Kouder: he told me I must come down to the mill, that his company was assembling there. When we got there, several were met; part of them were armed. There were about fifteen in the whole. We went to Jacob Fries' tavern; then the people said they went to see the assessors, but I don't know what for. There were a great many more people there, I think about thirty. Two horesmen were sent to see if they could find the assessors. Their direction was, that if they could find them, they should bring them to Quaker town, or to Jacob Fries' tavern. After the horsemen were gone, then the order was for the company to go to Quaker town. A great many were armed, and many who were not, had clubs. I cannot tell how many were armed, but the greatest part had either arms or clubs. There was a drum and fife when we were at Quaker town.—We all stood in a rank, and fired off, and hallooed huzza. Soon after we were there, the assessors came along. They were Esquire Foulke, John Rodrick, and Cephas Childs. I was at Zeller's when they came along, and they all began to run out of the tavern. When I came out, they had Foulke by his horse's bridle, and him by one leg, and they told him to get off. It was Captain Kouder that had hold of him; then John Fries came up and told him to get off. Fries told Foulke to get off; he wanted to speak to him. Then another came up, and stood at the back of the others, giving one of them a knock with the butt of his gun, and told them to pull him off; Jacob and John Hoover told them they should not abuse the man, for he would get off without. With that the esquire rode up with them to the shed, and got off. They then went into the tavern together. Then John Fries told him that he had forewarned them yesterday not to assess the houses, and yet they had come to-day again; he then told him that he should show his writings, what he had done in the township. Which he did, and John Fries read them, and gave them to him back again. I then went into another room, and when I came out again, Childs, the other assessor, was sitting on the table, with five or six about him. When I came up to him, I told him that they should not abuse him, for I used to know him: at this time they were abusing him. I do not recollect what they said, but they told him he should not have gone about when they had forewarned him the day before, and they made him promise that he would not come again till farther orders—till they knew how the law was. They told him they thought they had as fit men in their township as what he was, and they wished to choose a man in the same township, if they must have it done. A travelling man named Captain Seaborn was there; he was drunk, and some of them asked him whether he was for liberty or government: he said government; some one said if he said that again, he should be whipped. They were all pretty well drunk, but I was not drunk. I do not recollect ever seeing Fries drunk: Kouder was, and so might Fries, for what I know; but I had known him some time, and knew he was a sober man. They talked of Tories and stamplers: Foulke was one they called a Tory, and so were several others. Next morning I went to Marks' tavern, in consequence of a message they had left for me that night before with my mother. By ten o'clock we were all there. John Fries was there. John Fries had the command; but he did not command till he got to Bethlehem; he gave no orders on the road. The substance of the conversation before we went from the tavern was, that they were going to Millars town: I did not know that they were going to Bethlehem. Should there be prisoners there, Marks said that he wanted us to show ourselves. The Northampton people had a mind to take the prisoners again: I understood that the night before at Fries', and along the road before we got there. About three or four miles from old Marks', we met young Marks; he said it was not worth while to go to Millars town, that the prisoners were up at Bethlehem, and that the Northampton people and the light horse had all gone there. Some were then for going back again: some, as they had come so far, was for going up to Bethlehem, to see what was going on there; so we went on. Old Marks and John Fries said so. Then we went on about a mile, and stopped at Ritter's: there was a liberty pole there. Then we went on to Bethlehem. When we came to the bridge, the people had stopped; there were some riflemen and some light horse. Some asked the reason why they stopped there: they said they could not get over, the bridge was shut: then John Fries rode up, and asked whether they required toll or not; they said—Yes. Then he told them to count his men, and told us to follow him. The words he used were, "Now, boys, follow me." I do not know whether he counted all or only his own men. I do not know who paid the toll; we did not; we were all mixed together. I did not hear of three men being sent forward. I heard of their having taken some prisoners. I believe only the Bucks county people followed Fries over the bridge, without it was some few of Staeler's riflemen, who came pretty soon after over the bridge. From Marks' to Bethlehem, it is about twenty miles. When we got over the bridge, two men met us, and said we should not hurt them: Fries told them that he should hurt nobody without they hurt him first. Then Judge Mohollan came and spoke with him afterwards, but I do not know what either he or Fries said. When we got up to the tavern at Bethlehem, the whole of Staeler's rifle-company were there. They marched round the house twice; we did not stand in ranks; we were separate. They wanted one to go up and talk with the marshal, and they from Bucks and Northampton said John Fries was more fit to go up than e'er a man that was there. Then John Fries and one Hoover went up stairs. After a while Hoover came down; Fries staid up; when he came down, he kept dashing and swearing, and said force should do: give him nine or ten of the best riflemen in the company, and he would storm the house; a great many of them told him he should not do it; he said he would. Jacob Hoover, Mitchel and Mr. Mohollan endeavoured to keep him off. Fries, when he came down stairs, fetched some writing down with him, that he got from the marshal, which he read to the company. He said the marshal dared not give up the prisoners, and therefore that they would take them by force of arms. At this time the Bucks county people were separate from the others. He spoke to the whole of them. Then he asked, "What shall we do now—take them by force of arms or how?" Several of them said, since they came so far now, they would have them. Frederick Henry said, since they were come so far, it was a damned shame not to have them. Then Fries went up stairs again, and said he would go and talk to them once more. When he came down again, he said that the marshal dared not give them up, without they took them by force of arms. They then told him that he should go and do something pretty soon, for it was getting late. Some of them said it was better to let Fries have the whole command of all the men. Then it was concluded to go into the house, and he spoke five or six times. Fries, when it was concluded to go into the house said, "For God's sake, don't fire boys, till I am fired upon first:" he said this three or four times over. Then we moved on to go in; he was before us. A good many at last followed him. I could not see who they were, the house was so full. Then Fries went up and talked to the marshal about half way up stairs. Henry told me that Fries was telling the marshal that if he did not give up the prisoners, they would fire on them, so that they should not see each other for smoke. After that, the door was opened, and I saw some of them come down.—Some came down while Fries was talking to the marshal. There was some not down; they called for them, and they came down. Fries said he was glad Hoover did not go in along with him, because he was too much of a fool; he thought this would not have done so well as it did: he did not want him there. We retired from Bethlehem altogether when we had got the prisoners. Fries went to the minister after he was released, in another room: he pulled off his hat to the minister, and told him he must thank him that he had got out; he said he was out, but he could not thank him, for all. The marshal was again called to reconcile some seeming difference in relation to the last conversation Fries held with the marshal, and of the prisoners coming down at once. The marshal said, that the last conversation he held with the prisoners was at the foot of the stairs. Mr. Fries declared that he would force his way up stairs, if I would not give them up; I told him that this would be punished with the utmost severity, but that if he was determined to rescue the prisoners, he should not go up stairs, but that I would, and order them down. Finding myself not in a situation to resist his force, I went up and ordered them down.

Cross-Examined.—At no time when I was in conversation with Fries, did the Lehigh prisoners come down stairs. There might be others that would not submit, but none from the room in actual custody: if they did, it must have been while I was speaking to them in the crowd; it was possible for them to do it at that time. They were in the room, and the guard remained there till I went up; it was placed there to prevent any person going up or down. After this conversation with Fries, I went up stairs to order the prisoners down. They were all in the room at that time, though I did not count them. Upon my order, they came down, and I came down with them.

George Mitchel.—I keep tavern in Lower Milford township, Bucks county. There was a great disturbance and discontent in my township respecting this house law; a meeting was advertised for the 8th of February, at the house of John Cline, to consult about the house tax law. No names were signed to the advertisement, that I recollect. A number of the inhabitants met; it was pretty late in the day; they all seemed discontented, but they were in doubt whether it had passed into a law or not. There was something in the newspaper of an amendment which made them doubt whether it was in force. They formed an instrument of writing, but I cannot recollect the particulars of it. It was drawn up by John Fries; I assisted him. We passed home after that. I had no particular conversation with anybody after the paper was signed; it was signed by about fifty or fifty-two of the inhabitants. Captain Kuyder was directed by the meeting to give notice to the assessors not to come forward till they had informed themselves farther, whether it was a law or not. I am not sure who put up the notice of this meeting; perhaps it was myself. John Hoover and several had talked about it, and we thought we would call a meeting. This was on Friday. On the Monday following, James Chapman came to my house, and told me I should tell Jacob Hoover that he should give notice over the creek (I live nearly at the end of the township), that if they would choose an assessor of their own, they should be welcome; and any man that was capable of the business would be admitted into the office. One Valentine Hoover came to my house that same day, he lives over the other side, and I told him what Mr. Chapman had told me; likewise I informed Jacob Hoover that day myself. Who opposed it, I don't know; but it was reported that it was not adopted. Squire Foulke sent me word to advertise a meeting. Israel Roberts and Samuel Clark called on me and told me. They informed me that Mr. Foulke was of opinion that the people were ignorant of the law, and he would read it for them, and explain it to them; this was the purpose of the meeting. So we advertised the meeting to be held at my house some time in February toward the latter end. It was on a Saturday, and there were a great many of the inhabitants at the meeting; Squire Foulke and Mr. Chapman attended it. The people behaved very disorderly; but I cannot recollect any of the conversation that passed. Jacob Kline came in and asked me what the meeting was intended for. I told him that I understood by Squire Foulke, that the Germans were very ignorant of the law, and that he called them together to read and explain it to them; I desired him to try to pacify the people; and I believe he did his endeavour, but it proved in vain: at least they did not read the law. I did not understand that anybody offered to read it; he thought it was in vain, there was such a clamour. After Mr. Chapman was gone, Marks asked me how I came to meddle with the advertisement. John Fries was not at the meeting. I don't recollect anything afterwards till the assessors came, which was the 5th of March. They took the rates of my house and my neighbours. The assessors were Mr. Childs, Mr. Foulke, and Mr. Rodrick.—I went from home the rest of the day, and the next morning when I returned, (6th of March), I heard there had been an uproar about driving away the assessors. It was talked of that they were going to Millars town the next day. Hearing of such an uproar, I concluded to go and hear what was going on; they said they were going to meet the Northamptons who were going for the relief of the prisoners. I do not know the names of any of the prisoners. There was a talk at Marks' house (7th of March) about going to the tavern above Emaus: Marks said his son would bring word. We went on then till we met young Marks, and he beckoned that we should halt or go back; so we did; he said he had been up at Ritter's tavern, and they had started before he came there. I do not know of any in particular who took the command. Some wished to go to see Bethlehem, some to see the bridge; so they concluded to go on. I cannot say who were for going on, and who were not. We were overtaken by several people going to Bethlehem. None were armed, that I can recollect. When we got to the bridge at Bethlehem, there were a great many armed men and light horse, and two rode over the bridge towards us from the other side. I did not hear the conversation that passed at the bridge; but after a while we went over to Bethlehem. A great many of the company was formed before the house, who seem to speak out that they would have the prisoners. Fries went in, I saw him start to go in; but I did not hear who ordered him, or who desired him. A short time after, in the course of five or ten minutes, Henry Hoover came out to us, and said he was sergeant of their company, and he was chosen to demand the prisoners. He said he went up stairs, and somebody gave him a push, and had like to have tumbled him down stairs, and he came out in a great passion. He went on in a great rage; he said if they would only give him ten men, he would storm the house. A short time after that, I observed Fries come out, and he said "Silence!" to the people there. He seemed to be as much among Staeler's company as among ours. He then afterwards said, "Gentlemen, an officer of the United States says he cannot deliver up the prisoners, unless they are rescued by force of arms; so, he said if you are willing, we will; I will go foremost, but if we do, I beg of you, none of you fire till they fire on us first, till I give the word, and if I drop, then you must take your own command." He repeated these words, at least once more. I heard nothing afterwards of the proceedings in, nor out of the house, that I recollect. Some time after this, on the 18th of March, a meeting was held at Marks'. The object of the meeting was to choose a committee of the three counties of Northampton, Bucks and Montgomery. The meeting was to consult what was best to be done, and it was determined to leave it to the committee. John Fries was there. After the meeting, I had some conversation with him: while the committee was sitting, I said to him: "John Fries, you never intended to resist the law, did you?" He made me answer, "Yes, I did." We did not in particular mention any laws. There was a meeting after this at my house, on Easter Monday, March 25th. The object of that meeting was to appoint an assessor. The one that was appointed was to do the business, if he pleased; if not, the person they chose was to do it, or both together. John Fries was at that meeting at the beginning of it, but I do not recollect that he was at the time they gave in their votes. He said it would not suit him to vote now, as he had been against the law throughout.

Cross-Examined.—At the meeting at Marks', it was generally agreed that there should be a submission to the laws. After the business was over, they made mention of it, but I do not know that they made any report of it. I believe the people never knew to the contrary but there would be a return made.

It was recommended to submit, and I believed it was agreeable to the meeting; I heard no opposition to it. The return was made in writing. On the 15th of March, we received the proclamation, and that evening I took it down to Frederick Henny's; I read the proclamation to Frederick Henny, and he agreed to submit; he made no opposition. When Fries said it would not suit him to vote for the assessor, he seemed rather opposed at that time to the laws, than the appointment of an assessor. This proclamation was communicated to the meeting on the 18th of March.

James Chapman.—I was a principal assessor under the act for laying a direct tax; I believe in all but Lower Milford, the assessments were carried into effect without opposition, or in a majority of the townships, except some little threatenings. The assessor of Lower Milford was taken sick, and did not proceed. His name was Samuel Clark; I called upon him afterwards, to know whether he was able to proceed or not: he thought he should be able in a few days: I had occasion to go to Newtown, and was several days from home, but found there was nothing done respecting it; I found the people had had a meeting, and there appeared to be great opposition to the rates being taken. The day after I returned from Newtown, Clark called upon me, and told me he thought it was not safe to go about, from the disposition of the people at that time. I told him that I would meet him the next day at Mitchel's tavern in Milford, and meet the people to know what their complaints were. I met Clark at a house just by, and he told me he would be in at Mitchel's in a few minutes. I examined Mitchel, to know what were their complaints: Mitchel signified that the people were dissatisfied that the assessor was appointed without their having a choice: for they wished to choose for themselves. I told Mitchel if they would choose a man of character, I would use my influence with the commissioner to have him appointed, and I desired him to give notice of it to Jacob Hoover. I wrote to the commissioner, stating the situation we were in, and told him what I had done; but he seemed not to be willing to indulge them with it. Seth Chapman was commissioner for that district.—I told him it would ease the minds of the people if it were done. At length he consented, but seemingly with reluctance. However, they never chose one. I do not recollect that it was made known to the people.—I met him at a meeting of the assessors which was held at the house on John Rodrick. On my return home I was told, I think by Squire Foulke, that the township was advertised to meet at Mitchel's. He said, if I would attend there, he would meet me. I got there between one and two o'clock. Just as I got to the house, before I went in, I saw ten or twelve people coming from towards Hoover's mill; about half of them were armed, and the others with sticks. I went into the house, and twenty or thirty were there. I sat talking with some of my acquaintance that were well disposed to the law. Conrad Marks talked a great deal in German, how oppressive it was, and much in opposition to it, seeming to be much enraged. His son, and those who came with him, seemed to be very noisy and rude; they talked all in German, which, as I did not know sufficiently, I paid but little attention to them. They were making a great noise; huzzaing for liberty and democracy, damning the Tories, and the like. I let them go on, as I saw no disposition in the people to do anything toward forwarding the business. Between four and five I got up to go out; as I passed through the crowd towards the bar, they pushed one another against me. No offer was made to explain the law to them while I staid; they did not seem disposed to hear it. They did not mention my name the whole time of my being there, but they abused Eyerly and Balliott, and said how they had cheated the public, and what villains they were. I understood it was respecting collecting the revenue, but I did not understand near all they said. I recollect Conrad Marks said that congress had no right to make such a law, and that he never would submit to have his house taxed. They seemed to think that the collectors were all such fellows; the insinuation was that they cheated the public, and made them pay, but never paid into the treasury. After getting through the crowd to the bar, I suppose I was fifteen minutes in conversation with Mitchel: he said perhaps they were wrong, but the people were very much exasperated. Nothing very material happened, and I asked Mr. Foulke if it was not time to be going. So I got into the sleigh, and went off; soon after they set up a dreadful huzza and shout. I stopped at Jacob Fries' tavern, and waited for Mr. Foulke, who soon came: Clark, the assessor, was likewise there. After talking a little more on the subject, Clark still persisted in not having anything to do with it, for he thought it was not safe for him. We thought it was best to give the other assessors notice, as their assessments were nearly finished, to meet us at a certain day to take the rates in that township. I then wrote to the other assessors, requesting them to meet at Quaker town, on the 4th of March. Rodrick, Childs and Foulke met me there: we waited till evening, but no others came; so we agreed to meet at my house next morning at 9 o'clock. We met, and I went with them to Milford, to Samuel Clark's, but he was not at home. It was thought best for me to go to look for Clark, as he was engaged in a moving. I went to Jacob Fries' tavern to wait for him; they went to Mitchel's to take the rates. Clark soon came: he told me he could not undertake to take the rates, for that he might as well pay his fine, if it cost him all he had, for they were so opposed to it at any rate, that he could not think himself safe, for at least he should receive some private injury. Finding he would not do it, I said no more. John Fries was coming up just then: he told me he was very glad to see me: he told me that he understood I had been insulted in their township, at one of their meetings: he was very sorry for it, he mentioned Squire Foulke as well as myself: had he been there, he said, it should not have been done: I turned it off by this: that there was not a person among them that spoke a word to me. I told him I thought they were very wrong in opposing the law as they did: he signified that he thought they were not, and that the rates should not be taken by the assessors. I told him that the rates certainly would be taken, and that the assessors were then in the township taking the rates. I repeated it to him, and he answered, "My God! if I was only to send that man (pointing to one standing by), to my house to let them know they were taking the rates, there would be five or seven hundred men under arms here to-morrow morning by sunrise." He told me he would not submit to the laws. I told him I thought the people had more sense than to rise in arms to oppose the law in that manner: if they did, government must certainly take notice of it, and send an armed force to enforce the laws. His answer was that "if they do, we will soon try who is strongest." I told him they certainly would find themselves mistaken respecting their force; he signified he thought not: he mentioned to me the troop of horse in Montgomery county, and the people at Upper and Lower Milford, and something about infantry, who were ready to join. He said he was very sorry for the occasion, for if they were to rise, God knew where it would end: the consequences would be dreadful; I told him they would be obliged to comply: he then said huzza, it shall be as it is in France, or will be as it is in France, or something to that effect. He then left me and went off. Fries did not appear to be intoxicated. I scarce ever saw him intoxicated. A short time after he was gone, on the same day, the assessors came to Jacob Fries' tavern. We then ordered our dinners there, and I believe it was Childs undertook to take the rates of Jacob Fries' house. We had not gone out of the room after dinner, till John Fries came in; he addressed himself to Squire Foulke, telling him he was very sorry to see him there; he was a man that he had a great regard for, but that he was opposed to the law himself. "I now warn you," said he, "not to go to another house to take the rates; if you do, you will be hurt." He did not wait for any reply, but turned himself about, and went off out of the room. I do not recollect anything farther was said to him. He seemed much irritated. The assessors concluded to proceed upon their business. Rodrick and Foulke agreed to go together, and Childs went by himself: this was an agreement between themselves. There had been no meeting of the assessors since Mr. Clark had refused, complaining that he found it inconvenient to proceed with the assessment. This new arrangement was not communicated to the board of assessors at all.

John Rodrick.—I was one of the assessors under the direct tax law, appointed for Lower Milford. I took the oaths the law directed. There were twelve townships in our district, and there were six assessors to serve them. We were all six sworn at a meeting held at my house, by the commissioner, Seth Chapman: Squire Foulke got his warrant afterwards; he was appointed, I think, in addition to Samuel Clark. We met the commissioner on the sixteenth of February, when it appeared all the other townships were nearly done, except Lower Milford; at that meeting all attended but Clark. The principal assessor, James Chapman, was likewise there. We were informed that Lower Milford was not done, for Clark was afraid to go about. The commissioner told the principal assessor that he must inform the other assessors, that if anything could be done in it, we must try to do it. We all agreed that we would. Mr. Foulke was appointed before this meeting, and was present at it. Not long after this, we got orders from the principal assessor to meet him at Quaker town on the fourth of March, and to go the next day to get the rates at Milford. Only three of us attended. We agreed to meet at the principal assessor's house the next morning, which we did, and thence we went to Clark's to have him to go with us: as he was not at home, however, we proceeded on, taking the rates, Mr. Childs, Mr. Foulke and myself. We had taken between fifty and sixty assessments when we came to the house of Jacob Fries. All were at home when we took the rates, I think, except one, and there we left a notice. When we came to Jacob Fries' we met the principal assessor. After dinner, while we were sitting at the fire, John Fries came into the room: we had a room by ourselves. He said he heard we were come to take the rates of the township; we told him yes. He said he would warn us not to proceed, else we should be hurt. He said he was sorry for Squire Foulke, and I believe Mr. Chapman he mentioned, for he always respected them very much. He said he was opposed to the law, and he would not submit to it. He then left the room. He seemed to be a little in a passion. We got on our horses, and proceeded at taking the rates: I and Foulke went together, and Childs by himself to some who, we thought, were quiet people. We proceeded on till about sunset, when we were going to the house of one Singmaster, and as we turned down a lane, out from the road, we heard somebody halloo to us: we stopped, and saw it was John Fries and five men more. We stopped, and they came walking towards us. John Fries was in the front. Fries said that he had warned us not to proceed and we would not hear, and now they were come to take us prisoners. I believe I asked by what authority: with that he made a grapple at the bridle of my horse; I wheeled my creature round, and he just catched hold of my great coat, but he could not hold. I rode off then: after I had got about two rods, I turned my creature round again; and he was a little way from the rest. I told him I was surprised at his conduct, that he had behaved so. He began to damn and curse, and walked back towards the other men: he mentioned that if he had a horse, he would soon catch me. He was about two or three miles from his own house then. I rode up nearer to those other men: they had stopped Squire Foulke: as Fries returned back to his men, he said, "Men, let Foulke go, as we cannot get Rodrick; to-morrow morning we will have him. I will have seven hundred men together to-morrow, and I will come to your house, and will let you know that we are opposed to the law." We then went and took the assessment of Singmaster's house. We had agreed, before we left Jacob Fries', that we would meet the principal assessor the next morning, to see what course we should take. Singmaster was at home, when we met: we said that it was not worth while to attempt anything more; we could not proceed. James Chapman then wrote a letter to the commissioner to state matters. We agreed to quit taking the rate at Lower Milford at that time, as we thought we should not be able to do anything. When we were going home through Quaker town (on the sixth of March) Cephas Childs rode before us. I and Squire Foulke rode together. When we came to Quaker town, Childs turned into Squire Griffith's: we found a great many people armed with guns and with uniforms; so I said to Foulke, "Here is Fries and his company." I said, we won't stop if we can help it: I rode through them, but when I had got half through them, they hallooed to me to stop; a great many hallooed, and came running on both sides the road, some with their clubs and muskets to strike me. They did not strike me. I rode quickly through them. I saw them running to come to strike. I had passed Roberts' tavern, and when I came to Zeller's tavern, there was John Fries at the porch; he hallooed to me to stop, for I was going to pass by, and not to stop and give myself up: there was another man with me. They followed me to stop me: I stopped, and wheeled my creature round, and asked Fries what he wanted. They damned me, and told me I should deliver my self up; I told him as long as he used such language, I would not. There was order then given to fire at me. I cannot tell who gave the order, but there were two men standing close together at Zeller's door; they pointed their guns: as I saw that, I rode off. I did not hear whether it was Fries or not who ordered them to fire. They hallooed to stop me: they hallooed out to get horses to pursue me, but they did not pursue me. I cannot say that Fries had anything in his hand at that time, but the others had clubs. Fries was from me at that time perhaps five or six rods. There was an old man standing with him.

Cephas Child.—I was one of the assessors under the act for the valuation of houses in Bucks county. (Witness showed his warrant, and proved his qualification, dated November 5, 1798.) At the meeting at Rodrick's, when we were qualified, we had our instructions given us by the commissioner; he informed us that there were six assessors to twelve townships, which we were all equally concerned in assessing, and it would be proper for us to point out which townships we would severally take. I think this meeting was about the latter end of December. Clark and myself fixed upon a day when I should come and assist him for two days, and another time was appointed for him to assist me. I had made some beginning in my own district before that day came. Before we separated, the assessor pitched upon an early day to make our returns of what we had done, in order to examine whether we had proceeded right or not. I went up to Clark's, agreeably to appointment, and found he was not able to go on: I therefore attended to my own district.

We met to make our returns at Rodrick's: Everhard Foulke, I think, met with us; I know nothing of his appointment. This was on the 5th day of the Bucks court (6th of February). Not having gone through our business, we were to meet on the 16th again. Foulke, I understood at the former meeting, had been appointed. When we met, Foulke told James Chapman that he dared not go into the township, for he understood that some threats were thrown out against him, and he rather wished that the people would appoint some other person, themselves, to do it. The commissioner did not seem to agree with it; finally, he consented so far as to intimate to James Chapman, that if they should make such an offer, and appoint one, he would recommend him; if not, he said we must go and assist in that township. There were some proposals made who of us should go, excuses were made, and then the commissioner informed us that we were all enjoined as much to assess that township as our own. Upon which he told the principal assessor that if it did not go on, he was to write to us, and we were to attend to the call. I received a letter about the first of March, or the last of February, from the principal assessor, that he had been to Milford, and it did not seem likely the assessments could go on, and I was ordered to meet the rest in Quakertown on the 4th of March. Accordingly, Foulke, the principal assessor, and myself, met there. We had word from two others that they were not able to come. We concluded to call upon Clark to go with us, and divide the township so as to complete it in a short time. The next morning we met to begin the business; we went to Clark's, but he was not at home. It was agreed, then, that we should go on with the rates, and James Chapman was to go to Jacob Fries' to wait for Clark. The first house we went into was Daniel Weidner's; I went in first, and told him I was come to take down the rates, under the revenue act of the United States: he appeared to be very angry; I reasoned with him, telling him, if he wished to read the law, he might; I told him the consequences of opposition, but he might have ten days to consider of it, and give in his account if he chose to take that time. He, seeing me thus, said, "Take it now, since it must be done." He gave me his account accordingly, and appeared contented. He said further, "We have concluded not to take it, as we expect the act will be repealed." He meant they had concluded not to take it till they knew what congress would do with the law. I made reply to him that I believed that was already done, for I had seen a report of a committee of congress, that it was inexpedient to repeal it, and it was not done. He made some remarks, but I told him it was very wrong. I cannot tell what he said in particular. One thing I think was, that the assessors were to have very extravagant wages. "It does not matter," he said; "you may as well give in my return." I did not get on my horse till I got up to Mitchel's, where the other two assessors were. Weidner went out a little before me, and he was there when I came, walking about, seemingly very angry. I again reasoned with him. Another objection he made was, that the houses of high value were to pay nothing, while smaller ones, and of small value, were to pay high. I forgot to say that, after the rates of Weidner's land were taken, he returned, and said he had forgot, there was another piece of land: he then sat down with a heavy sigh, and said, "They will play the devil with me; what shall we do?" I asked him what he meant; he made no answer. I told him I hoped every one would be as well convinced as he was. I took several houses in my way, and went to Jacob Fries. As I was going in at the door, I met John Fries, who shook hands with me, told me he was glad to see me, and asked me to take a drink. He came in again after we had done dinner, and said, "I forbid you going to any other houses in the township." He then mentioned that Foulke and Chapman, or Rodrick, were men he much esteemed. He said if we did go to any other houses, we should be, or would be, hurt. We then proceeded to assess. Where English people lived, there appeared no objection, except at one place. The people there said, that if they did give in the account, there were some ordinary people in the neighborhood, and they would be set on by them to do them an injury. That afternoon I went to David Roberts'; his wife seemed very anxious, and wished her husband had been there, for she said I should not go home alive. I went afterwards when he was at home, and he said he had no objection, only for his neighbours. After some conversation, he said the people there had agreed not to let the rates be taken yet: he said they had already chosen an assessor in their own township: I told him I wondered they did not let him go on: he signified that he was a person of an obnoxious character, and therefore they did not wish to accept of him. In our return home, I called at Squire Griffith's: as I got off my horse, his wife told me that they were come there to take us, and that there were forty or fifty men there, and she did not know what they were about. A little girl just after came in and said that they had hold of Squire Foulke's horse by the bridle, going to take him: I went to the window, and saw them all around him. I did purpose to go out; but at their persuasion I staid. The little girl came in again, and said they had taken Mr. Foulke into Enoch Roberts' tavern. After a short time Fries came over into the house where I was sitting: he took me by the hand, and I rose up; he said, "Mr. Childs, you must go with me to my men:" as we walked along, he said, "I told you yesterday that you should not go to another house, and if you did you would be hurt, and we are now come to take you prisoner, if we find that you will go on with the assessments." My answer was, we are obliged to fulfil our office, and we cannot do otherwise, unless we are prevented. I was endeavouring to inform him of the manner in which I had obtained the warrant, in hopes that I should prevail upon him to go on with the business, as Roberts had proposed, but he would not hear me. When we went into the house, he addressed himself to his men and me: "Here are my men—here is one of them." He appeared to be angry, but he did not appear to show any revenge to me, or to talk angrily. I do not recollect that I knew any one in the house, except the tavern-keeper. Some of them soon began to use rough language. A person then came behind me, and caught me by the collar over the shoulder, and said, "Damn you, Rodrick, we have got you now; damn you, you shall go to the liberty pole and dance round it;" the house was then crowded as full as it could crowd, and they pushed me up so close, that I could not turn round sometimes for a considerable time: the person who caught me, seemed to wish to keep behind me, but he still kept hold of me: during this time, I had several thumps, which seemed more with the knee than the fist. After some time, he got to see my face: he damned me that I was not Rodrick, but that I was the other damned son of a bitch that he saw sitting at Rock hill; he had mistaken me. A short time after this, a person came up to me and said, "Keep a good heart, and you will not be hurt." I turned, or endeavored to turn to them and said, "I am not Rodrick, nor did I ever assess in Rock hill:" he said, "You are a damned liar." With that there were still more of them came up, and pressed about me more, and more took hold of me. There was a good deal of talk, some in German, and some in English. I then told them that my name was Cephas Childs; that I was not a man known in the country; but I had no doubt many of them, though they did not know my face, knew my name: and that there were some there who knew me as coroner of the county. A man then said, "If he is Childs, he is no better than the other." He asked me where I assessed: I told him: a number of them asked how they liked it where I had been. I told them some of them had appeared dissatisfied in the first instance, but now, as I believed, every man almost in the townships where I assessed was satisfied; they again said I was a damned liar, for the people had told them that they would join them in the suppression of it, and my own neighbours would fight against me. I told them I thought I knew better than they; that if I was well informed, they would not do so. Then they began again at me. Then they asked me if I had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States of America: I told them I had: they asked me when: I told them I could not recollect the time, but I knew it was as soon as the law required it of me: they asked me if I was a friend to the government of the United States; I told them I was: they then began to damn the government, and the governor, and shoved me about, many of them taking their Maker's name in vain: there then was a person who spoke very good English: they damned the house-tax and the stamp act, and called me a stampler repeatedly: they damned the alien law and sedition law, and finally all the laws: the government and all the laws the present congress had made. They damned the constitution also. They did not mention what constitution, whether of this state or of the United States. They damned the congress, and damned the president and all the friends to government, because they were all Tories, for that none were friends to the present government except Tories. They asked me if I had been out in the last war: first I told them the law did not require me to go, and then I said I was under the tuition of my parents: they said they had fought for liberty, and would fight for it again. They said they would not have the government, nor the president, and they would not live under such a damned government: "We will have Washington;" others said, "No, we will have Jefferson, he is a better man than Adams: huzzah for Jefferson." They then insisted on my taking an oath of allegiance to them, alleging that, if I did so, I should not be hurt. They insisted on it several times, till at length I had no way to waive it, and then I asked them what their government was. One answered Washington: I said I had taken an oath of allegiance to Washington's government already. They then said Jefferson; "We will have none of the damned stamplers, nor the house tax." So they went on. They said they embodied themselves to oppose the government; they meant to do it, and that was their design in coming there. I do not know who said it, but the words were these: "We are determined to oppose the laws, and we have met to do it; the government is laying one thing after another, and if we do not oppose it, they will bring us into bondage and slavery, or make slaves of us: we will have liberty." And then they mentioned the number of men that had joined them, or sent them word that they would join them. They mentioned, some a hundred, some more, some less, than they had there, would do it; besides they said all Northampton county to a man would join them, except some Tories as they called them. Between Quakertown and Delaware river, I recollect they said they could raise ten thousand men, if they should be wanted, to oppose the sedition and alien laws. I cannot be certain, but I think he said (as he spoke in German) and fifty other damned laws. However, I am not certain as to the number. They likewise said that General Washington had sent them account that he had twenty thousand men all ready to assist them in this undertaking to oppose the laws. I begged them not to believe it, for it could not be, and somebody was endeavouring greatly to impose upon them: I thought I knew the situation of things better, and as for General Washington, I was sure he never would undertake such conduct as that. A great many of them spoke in German, but one or two of them spoke very good English, but they were altogether Germans. This passed while I was in custody.

Cross-Examined.—Fries took me in there, and leaving me in custody, went away. They said General Washington had certainly wrote to them so and so. One of them said he would be damned if it was not so, for he had seen the letter from Washington; or something to that effect. During this time, they were constantly pushing me; one would come to my back and get his knee up: they would endeavour to push me on the stove; one or two had hold of my hips, and endeavoured to throw me down; others seemed ready to lick me, and particularly after this conversation about Washington. About that time Captain Fries came toward me, and seemed very much surprised: he said, "Mr. Childs, I understand some of my men have abused and insulted you." He really did appear to be very serious; he said he would not allow me to be abused; he appeared to be really distressed for the usage I had received, and if I would tell him who it was, he said he would make him behave himself. He then told me to come into the room. He said he respected me, and did not wish me to be abused. I told him I thought it hard that he should leave me amongst a parcel of intoxicated people. I do not particularly recollect what I said, but he told me he hoped I would not impute that conduct to him: I told him I was not much injured, and, therefore, hoped he would not think about it. He said his men were civil men, and seemed to wonder such a thing had happened. I think he then gave me something to drink. He took me into a room, the farthest side of which seemed to be empty. When I got in there, he demanded my papers while I had been an assessor. While he was with me, no person insulted me; indeed, some of them, when he came forward into the room where I was, pushed off out of the way. I then told him all that I had done, and reasoned with him, but notwithstanding that, he insisted on my papers; I then told him I had no papers about me relative to the assessment. I do not recollect anybody particularly, but there were a great many crowded into the room after me. He insisted that I had the papers; I told him I had not got the papers; he said I had, and he would have them. I told him I had no papers about me, but what related to my office of coroner. I was going to deliver up to him my county tax papers; but he said I had other papers; I said I had not. He then looked on those I had given him, and saw Hilltown at the top; then he said, "Hoho! my boys, we have got what we wanted;" and then turned about, and went away. He left the pocket-book, taking the papers with him. There was a considerable huzza made, and they most of them followed him out of the room. They were gone but a few minutes, till they rushed in again as hard as they could rush, without Fries, and some got hold of me. They brought Daniel Weidner along with them: some had pistols, guns, clubs, &c., and some swords. They seemed very angry, and were pushing upon me, while some endeavoured to put them off. Weidner came up to me, and insisted on the return of the rate I took of him yesterday; he said he would have it. I desired him just to acknowledge to the truth—Did not he give it me freely yesterday? This while a person had hold of me. Some of them then stepped up, and said it was fair. I then asked him, Did I not say I would not take the measure of your house by force, but you gave me the rates with a free will? Yes, he said, "but I was not forced, and, therefore, I want it again." Some of them then went out, and directly others came in and shook me very hard: one came in and threatened me, and said I should be shot; some brought in their guns and showed them to me, and told me if I should be seen in Milford township on the business, I should be shot. Weidner went off. This person with the sword threatened a good deal. He was called Marks, the elder. I believe him to be the same man I have seen here. While I was in this conversation, William Thomas came forward, and said he knew me, and that they should not abuse me. That gave me an opportunity of talking farther, and then I reasoned with them of the bad tendency of such conduct, and told them that I really thought if I had the law with me, I should persuade them to allow of it. One of them who had abused me before, came to me and acknowledged he had abused me, and was sorry for it, and wished me to forgive him. I think his name was Smith, but I am not sure. After passing some time in conversation, Fries came back again with the transcript, and delivered it to me, and told me as near as I can recollect in these words: I must go home, and must never come back again to assess, or I should be shot; and insisted on my promising I would not do it. My reply was, that from the pains I had taken, I had left the township with a view of not returning to it, unless compelled by authority, and from their present treatment, if they ever catched me going back without that authority, I would give them leave to shoot me. He then told me, Foulke and you may inform the government what has been done as soon as you please; we can raise one thousand men in one day, and we will not submit to it. They said there were a number of laws they were opposed to, and one of those laws was now putting in execution, and they appeared to think if that was stopped, the others would be. This was how I understood it. The words were that they were determined to oppose the laws, and not let them be put into execution; there were so many laws coming on, it was time to stop them, and if they were known to oppose them, they expected the others would not be brought forwards. Fries was not present when these words were used.

Judge Peters (one of the bench) sworn.[5]

Ques. Will your honour please to give the jury an account of the circumstances of your issuing warrants in Northampton county, and of circumstances within your knowledge previous to the examination of John Fries on the 6th of April? Ans. The first time I heard officially of this uneasiness in the counties of Bucks, Northampton and Montgomery, was some time in February, I cannot precisely recollect what time. I had heard of it before as a piece of news, but this was the first time I heard it officially: it was by depositions being sent to me by the attorney of the district (Mr. Sitgreaves) relative to a number of persons. After that, I examined some witnesses relative to it, and upon the whole I concluded to issue my warrants against the parties charged. Being much engaged in the district court, the attorney of the district drew up the form of the warrants for my signature and approbation. We had concluded, by way of ease to the people, that these warrants should be drawn up in a form of order for the defendants to appear before some justice of the peace, or judge of the county, in order to give bail for their appearance at the circuit court of the United States. Neither of us then knew that those insurgents, as it turned out afterwards, had got to such a head. But I doubted myself of the propriety of the form and substance of the warrants, because I thought that the justice, or judge before whom bail was taken, ought to be acquainted with the whole case, and ought to have the proof of the fact before him, on which the proof of the warrant was found. I had some doubt, too, whether it was legally right for persons taken by my warrants to go before an inferior magistrate. For though a justice of the peace of any state has a right by the laws of the United States to take cognizance in the first instance of crimes against the United States, and bind over the offenders to the proper court, yet I did not think that, as such justice had not had the original cognizance of the matter, there would be a propriety in my ordering him to take secondary notice of it. While I was hesitating on this point, I received information of the length to which, at that time, this opposition to the law had arrived. I doubted very much, and this thought was afterwards clearly confirmed to me, whether the magistrates of those counties, and particularly Northampton, would choose to take cognizance of such offences, or would choose to do any business concerning them. There were two of the magistrates, one of them a justice of the peace, the other a state judge, who had done themselves much honour in persevering so far as they did, in endeavouring to bring those criminals to justice. But finally it turned out that they were obliged to abandon even every endeavour towards executing this business. So that the law and the public authority so far failed as it respected that county, that the judicial authority of the United States became entirely prostrate. I found that some of the very persons who were charged before me were magistrates, and I wish I could say that they were the only magistrates who were engaged in this business. These were the reasons that induced me to alter the form of my warrants. I found that too many magistrates were concerned in flattering the prejudices of the people, and engaging in seditious practices, and encouraging the people in their mistakes, for me to trust them; and I finally found that there were but two magistrates that could be depended upon, and they told me that they were insulted in the performance of their duty to the United States: of this I had good evidence. And further: it arrived to such a pitch that I could not get one of these gentlemen even to issue a subpoena to examine witnesses, and save them the great trouble and expense of coming before me. This was the opinion of those two gentlemen; one of them wrote me, and the other informed me, that they were afraid to perform such an act. They could not only not get persons to serve the process, but they could not get the witnesses to appear before them. This I do not bring as a charge against any particular person, but as a reason why the warrants were thus issued. Another reason was that those people had taken up the fallacious notion that they would not appear before me, and therefore I thought it best, though this should not have been my leading motive, to convince them that every person in this district ought to obey a warrant issued by me, and appear at such time and place as I directed; the whole district being to be considered the same as a county in respect to a state. The witness then produced the warrants, dated February 20, 1799. One of which was read. The marshal wrote to me official statements at sundry times, of the difficulties he met with, and at one time informed me that the prisoners had been rescued, by force of arms, from his possession. The account he gave me it is unnecessary to state, being much similar to what has been given in evidence: He took some engagement from those prisoners, particularly those of Lehigh township, that they would appear before me, which, the prisoners themselves told me, was cheerfully given. I understood from them, and other channels, that they several times attempted to come down before me and deliver themselves up; but they were prevented by persons who interrupted them, and would not let them come.

Ques. Was John Fries brought before you after you got up there? Ans. Yes: I had previously issued my warrant against him.

Ques. Was this the examination he signed in your presence? The witness was then shown Fries' confession, which was as follows:

The Examination of John Fries—6th April, 1799. The examinant confesses that he was on the party which rescued the prisoners from the marshal at Bethlehem: that he was also one of a party that took from the assessors at Quakertown, their papers, and forewarned them against the execution of their duty in making the assessments. The papers were delivered with the consent of the assessors, but without force; perhaps under the awe and terror of the numbers who demanded them, and were by this examined and delivered to the assessors. He confesses that, at the house of Jacob Fries, a paper was written on the evening preceding the rescue of the prisoners at Bethlehem, containing an association or agreement of the subscribers to march for the purpose of making that rescue; but he is not certain whether he wrote that paper: He knows he did not sign it, but it was subscribed by many persons, and delivered to the examinant:—He does not know where that paper is—The examinant confesses also, that some weeks ago, he wrote (before the assessors came into that township) an agreement which he, with others signed, purporting that, if an assessment must be made, they would not agree to have it done by a person who did not reside in the township, but that they would choose their own assessor within their township—A meeting has been held in the township since the affair at Bethlehem, for the purpose of making such a choice: the examinant went to the place of election, but left it before the election opened.—The examinant further acknowledges that his motive in going to Bethlehem to rescue the prisoners was not from personal attachment, or regard to any of the persons who had been arrested, but proceeded from a general aversion to the law, and an intention to impede and prevent its execution. He thought that the acts for the assessment and collection of a direct tax did not impose the quota equally upon the citizens, and therefore were wrong. He cannot say who originally projected the rescue of the prisoners, or assembled the people for the purpose—The township seemed to be all of one mind. A man unknown to the examinant came to Quakertown, and said the people should meet at Conrad Marks' to go to Millerstown. The examinant says that, on the march of the people to Bethlehem, he was asked to take the lead, and did ride on before the people until they arrived at Bethlehem—The examinant had no arms, and took no command, except that he desired the people not to fire until he should give them orders, for he was afraid, as they were so much enraged, that there would be blood shed.—He begged them, for God's sake, not to fire, unless they had orders from him, or unless he should be shot down, and then they might take their own command.—That he returned the papers of the assessors which had been delivered into his hands, back to the assessors privately, at which the people were much enraged, and suspected him (Fries) of having turned from them, and threatened to shoot him, between the house of Jacob Fries and Quakertown. John Fries. Taken 6th April, 1799, before Richard Peters.

Witness.—It is my constant practice to tell a prisoner that he is not bound to be evidence against himself: I did not make any promise or threats to extort it from him, but he chose to make a voluntary confession, which if they do not choose to do, I commit them without it. I am particularly delicate on this subject of confession, and I do not like to encourage it.

Judge IREDELL.—The gentlemen of the jury will observe that the law requires a judge to examine a prisoner, and it is left quite at the option of the man to confess or not.

The counsel for the prisoner hoped, as it was a case of treason, upon which the law and constitution were extremely cautious how evidence was admitted, the jury would consider that proof of the overt act must be given by two witnesses independent of any confession the prisoner might make.

Witness. The prisoner appeared to me to be not at all disinclined: his manner was that of a man not having done anything wrong, but perfectly collected, and possessed of his faculties. It was read to him afterwards, to which he accorded, and, thinking a part not fully enough explained, added the latter part. I have now brought it to my recollection that there were three magistrates in that county, instead of two, to whom we were peculiarly indebted for assistance.

Question.—Were any others applied to besides those three? Answer.—Some were, but we found much disinclination to do the business, and therefore thought it quite unnecessary to apply farther.

Question by Dist. Attorney to Judge Peters.—Did you not discover manifest signs of terror coming from the districts where the army had not marched? Answer.—Yes, in many instances—some very strong; it was even attempted to raise troops to oppose the army, if they went up. There were one or two instances of testimony given to me that troops were endeavoured to be raised, and nothing, I believe, but the rapidity of the progress of the troops prevented its execution. I did believe that unless the army had gone through the whole country, there would have been the most atrocious instances of violence. Did not some of the witnesses give their testimony under great reluctance, owing to fear? Yes, I had, in some instances, to state the protection of the United States, and their determination to lay hold of persons who should threaten, in order to stimulate them: some said, after they had given their testimony, that they were afraid to go home. I can really say, that, in general, they were the most unwilling witnesses I had ever examined. I got evidence that some of them were forming associations for actually opposing the troops. One man was even afraid because I was in his house, asking for some refreshment, as, he said, he should be suspected for harbouring me; however, after I had expressed my own security, he seemed satisfied.

Judge Henry again called.

I was an associate judge of the common pleas for the state. I issued a number of subpoenas about the 15th of January to make some inquiries respecting the opposition to the tax law: these were issued at the instance of Mr. Eyerly, one of the commissioners, as he and others could not proceed in the execution of their duty and particularly in Lehigh township. The witnesses generally appeared much afraid at opening themselves: and he could say, that among the people, there were many much opposed to the law. I agreed to meet a number of persons at Trexler's, commonly known as Trexler's town: there Captain Jarrett appeared with a part of his company of light horse. Shortly after the arrival of Mr. Eyerly, Mr. Balliott, and myself, the people seemed to be walking about, and looking in at the window, and seemed to make game at us and mouths; I observed Henry Shiffert in particular;—they were mostly in uniform. It was not muster day. I understood it was the general conversation there that Jarrett meant to display his consequence, and to intimidate. One witness in particular appeared to be in great terror: when he was called up to give his testimony, he cried like a child, and begged, for God's sake, that we would not ask him, for that the people would ruin him when he returned home. Indeed, all the witnesses were much agitated. I discovered a general opposition to the execution of this law, and was apprehensive of danger from the threats which were given.

Cross-Examined.—I sent for the captain, and requested him to keep his men in order, for all I wanted was to examine witnesses. There was nothing beyond insult offered to us. The captain assured me that he would do all that lay in his power.

Mr. Chapman and Mr. Childs were again called, at the suggestion of Mr. Dallas, to be asked how the measurement of a house was taken?

It was always, in every instance, given by the owner; we never measured any houses. Size, length, and breadth were told us, or the proprietor had ten days to send it in: we left a note for those people that were not at home. The people who were at home in Milford mentioned the dimensions of their houses.

Mr. Chapman here proved the letter which was mentioned in his evidence to have been written by him to the commissioner.

Mr. Sitgreaves produced and read the warrants under which those persons at Bethlehem were held; also the commission from the President of the United States, appointing one of the commissioners under that act.

Mr. Eyerly again called.

Question.—How were the principal and assistant assessors appointed? Answer.—At the time I received the notice from the first commissioner that was appointed in the commission, the commissioners were to meet at Reading on the 22d of October. After a board were met, every commissioner was desired to make a plan of his division, and to divide it into such a suitable number of assessment districts, as to have the law executed in a reasonable time; at the same time each commissioner was requested to make out lists of persons qualified for the office of assessors in each division. As soon as this was done, as the law gives a power to the secretary of the treasury to reduce the number of assessors if too large, the clerk made out a list, and sent it to the secretary of the treasury; a list was also entered in the commissioner's book. Some few alterations were made in some districts afterwards, but at the time the board was sitting. After this was done, the form of the warrant was agreed upon by the commissioners, and ordered to be printed. They were then filled up, and every warrant signed by all the commissioners. A rule was then adopted to call all the assessors together in each district, and the commissioners were to meet and qualify them, and give them instructions. The country was not in a pacific state, except where the army marched. After the president had issued his proclamation, I wrote up to the principal assessor in Northampton county, and to Mr. Balliott, to request them to go on, and have their returns made in a certain time, and to give notice to all the other assessors so to do. I received an answer from Mr. Balliott that he had received information that it was impossible to do the business in the execution of the law.

Mr. Dallas here remarked in substance that, though they wished to give as little trouble on the part of the defendant as possible, yet he should produce two or three witnesses, in order to show that this indisposition, which was manifested to permit the assessment, was owing to the uncertainty those people were in, of the real existence of the law; that the prisoner himself was under the idea that it was no law; and that they had no intention of opposing congress by force of arms, but that they wished for time, in order to ascertain its real existence, and if the law was actually in force, that they wished, agreeably to their former custom, to appoint assessors from their own respective townships. It could be shown also that Fries was perfectly quiescent after the proclamation, and that Mitchel was entirely mistaken as to the expressions said to be used by Fries, at the meeting at Conrad Marks'. As the defendant's counsel, however, wished to have time previously to examine the witnesses, he stated that they would not be able to produce them at this stage of the trial.

Mr. Rawle then opened the constitutional definition of treason, as consisting of only two parts: "levying war against the United States, and aiding the enemies of the United States." As it is only the first of these species of treason that the prisoner is charged with, it is only necessary to ascertain what is meant by levying war against the United States. Mr. Sitgreaves has stated that, levying war against the United States consisted, not only in a broad sense of rebellion openly manifested, with an avowed intention of subverting the government and constitution of the country, but also with force of arms, or by numbers sufficient for that purpose, to cause an impression of terror: either one of these, or altogether, used to prevent the execution of the laws, or of any particular law of the United States, from motives, not of a special but of a general nature—is treason. This position, I believe, is perfectly correct, and has already received the sanction of a court of the United States, respecting the insurrection in the western parts of Pennsylvania. See U. S. v. Mitchell [Case No. 15,788]. This doctrine is laid down in terms short and concise, and is such as is founded on the particular authority of all the writers on English law. "Bradford (Attorney).—The design of the meeting was avowedly to oppose the execution of the excise law; to overawe the government; to involve others in the guilt of the insurrection; to prevent the punishment of the delinquents, &c." "Patterson (Justice).—The first question to be considered is, what was the general object of the insurrection? If its object was to suppress the excise offices, and to prevent the execution of an act of congress, by force and intimidation, the offence, in legal estimation, is high treason; it is a usurpation of the authority of the government; it is high treason by levying war. Taking the testimony in a rational and connected point of view, this was the object. It was of a general nature, and of a national concern."

Let us attend, for a moment, to the evidence. With what view was the attack made on General Neville's house? Was it to gratify a spirit of revenge against him as a private citizen, as an individual? No:—as a private citizen he had been highly esteemed and beloved: it was only by becoming a public officer, that he became obnoxious, and it was on account of his holding the excise office alone, that his house had been assailed, and his person endangered. On the first day of the attack, the insurgents were repulsed; but they rallied, returned with greater force, and fatally succeeded in the second attempt. They were arrayed in a military manner: they affected the military forms of negotiation by a flag; they pretended no personal hostility on General Neville; but they insisted on the surrender of his commission. Can there be a doubt, then, that the object of the insurrection was of a general and public nature?

Patterson (Justice) in the charge against Vigol, says: "With respect to the intention, there is not, unhappily, the slightest possibility of doubt: To suppress the office of excise, in the Fourth survey of this state; and particularly, in the present instance, to compel the resignation of Wells the excise officer, so as to render null and void, in effect, an act of congress, constituted the apparent, the avowed object of the insurrection, and of the outrages which the prisoner assisted to commit. Combining these facts and this design, the crime of high treason is consummately in the contemplation of the constitution and laws of the United States." U. S. v. Vigol [Case No. 16,621].

This, you will perceive, gentlemen of the jury, is not preventing the execution of all the laws, or all the authority of the government, but of "an act of congress." It is a usurpation of the authority of the government, and thus it is levying war, and is high treason. Taking it in this point of view, this was the very object of the insurgents at Northampton, and was of a public, of a general, and not of a private or special nature. In the case I referred to, the prisoner acted different from the prisoner at the bar; he acted in a subordinate station; he does not appear to be a first character in that treasonable enterprise. Gentlemen, the law thus laid down by the court, upon that occasion, was derived from the English authorities to which I shall now refer you. 4 Bl. Comm. p. 81, defines that branch of treason of which we are now treating,—"Levying war against the king (substitute here the U. States for king), is, pulling down all enclosures, meeting-houses, prisons or brothels." [6] Although bawdy-houses are illegal, yet by any individuals not authorized, taking the authority which alone is vested in the government, it is a usurpation of the authority, and the act being of a general, and not of a special nature, is treason. Lord Chief Justice Hale, whose name will ever be endeared by the piety, the humanity, and the sound legal learning which characterized him, has a chapter upon this subject of levying war against the king. Hale, P. C. 105. He says, to march with colours flying, drums beating, &c., if on a matter of a public or general nature, is high treason; but if on a private quarrel or for a private purpose, it is not treason. Treason in levying war, by this definition, consists of two sorts. First, marching expressly, or directly against the king's forces: secondly, interpretatively, or obstructively; doing a thing of a general nature. If to pull down a particular inclosure, it is only a riot; but if to pull down all inclosures, it is levying war against the king, because it is generally against the king's laws. Insurrections, in order to throw down all inclosures, to alter the established law or change religion, to enhance the price of all labour or to open all prisons—all risings, in order to effect these innovations, of a public and general concern by an armed force, are, in construction of law, high treason, within the clause of levying war; for though they are not levelled at the person of the king, they are against his royal majesty, and besides, they have a direct tendency to dissolve all the bands of society, and so destroy all property and all government too, by numbers and an armed force. Insurrections, likewise, for redressing national grievances, and for the expulsion of foreigners in general, or indeed of any persons living here under the protection of the king; or for the reformation of real or imaginary evils of a public nature, and in which the insurgents have no special interest—risings to effect these ends by force and numbers, are, by construction of law, within the clause of levying war. Fost. Cr. Law, 211. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17, § 23, p. 37, is much to the same effect; and see also Doug. 590, in the case of Lord G. Gordon. The case there on the part of the prosecution was an attempt to force the repeal of an act of parliament, and this was called high treason, although the defendant was not convicted. J. Kel. 70, 75. So in the Case of Messenger, Appletree and others.

It will probably be said by the defendant's counsel that this should be simply considered as a rescuing prisoners from the custody of the marshal, and that is not treason, and that a number of crimes of a less degree must be committed in order to make it treason, as arson, burglary, and murder. But I would observe, that when these crimes are committed, one or more of them, they are not component parts of treason, but they lose their qualities and their name in the absorbing crime—treason. So when General Neville's house was burnt, it was said only to amount to arson: to that it was answered by Judge Patterson, were it not for the treasonable purpose with which this was done, it would be so; but the guilt rose to treason in the intention. Admitting it is a crime, and worthy of a punishment, the question is, whether or not it must be considered as one of the means made use of to obtain the end in view? If a man break open prison, except where a person is convicted for treason, it was ruled to be only a great riot: if several were rescued thereby, it was a riot and rescue, except those persons rescued were convicted for treason; and where it was without any particular view to the persons themselves, and where the prisoners were unknown, then the rescue becomes a part of the treasonable act, and that, with other facts, constitutes the person guilty of treason. 1 Hale, P. C. 133. In 4 Bl. Comm. you will find an answer to what Mr. Dallas said this morning ought to be in favour of the prisoner: to wit, an ignorance of the existence of the law. Suppose every man who would profess himself ignorant of the existence of a law was exculpated from the observance of it, or from the consequences of breaking it, to what would that doctrine lead! It would be for the interest of every man who wished to oppose a law, to keep himself under the shelter of this want of knowledge, in order that he might sin with impunity—without knowing it. This is a mistaken fact, and an error in point of law. I make these observations, not because I suppose that the defence will be seriously set up, or that, did it exist, you would be in the least guided by it, but under the impression, that when you come to examine all the facts, you will discover that it was not so. Unless these points which I have laid down are controverted, I shall not trouble you with more points of law, and shall leave the observations I am farther to make, to a later period of the case.

Mr. Dallas opened the defendant's case as follows:—It has become so uncommon in the state of Pennsylvania to be employed in a cause, upon the issue of which the life of a fellow-creature depends, that, I am confident, the court and jury, as well as the counsel on both sides, are prepared to give a solemn, candid and patient attention to the present investigation. It is, gentlemen, a question of life or death; and if what we have heard is true, that the prisoner is a husband and a father, it is a question whose importance extends beyond his own life, to the existence and well-being of a miserable family. If I should manifest, therefore, an extraordinary solicitude to secure the attention of the jury, as long as the occasion shall require, these considerations would, I think, furnish a sufficient excuse; yet, permit me to add to my justification another remark. It is not only the life of John Fries, and the well-being of his family, that are at stake on this trial; but, we all know, that the impressions made on your minds, and communicated to the public by your verdict, may reach the lives and families of many more unhappy men now under indictments for a similar crime. I must confess that I feel agitated by the prospect: for, if it appears so awful, so interesting, as it evidently does, to the court and audience, how must it affect us who are the counsel for the prisoner, charged with the development of every principle and of every fact, that can tend to an acquittal? As it relates to the counsel for the prosecution, the difficulties are comparatively small. They have had an opportunity amply to explore all the facts; to calculate the effects to be produced, and to point their testimony precisely to the object of the charge. We, who are counsel for the prisoner, are ignorant of the man and of his connections. Till you were impanelled, we knew nothing of the evidence to support the prosecution; and could, therefore, be little prepared to encounter and repel it. Besides, in all our inquiries for the means of defence, as well as in our examination of the witnesses, we have been embarrassed by the foreign language in which the parties have spoken. That some of you, however, as well as the opposite counsel, understand the German, has been a source of consolation to us; for, it is your province to decide on the facts. But these are not the only obstacles which we have to encounter. I am sure I shall not be misunderstood when I say, that the prosecution appears to be strongly marked with the authority and influence of government.

It is, I grant, incumbent upon the government to exercise its powers for the punishment of crimes; but it is essential to a fair discussion of every accusation, that the acts of the government should not be estimated as proofs of the prisoner's guilt. Thus, though you find by the proclamation of the president (which, doubtless, he thought, with a wise and upright intention, was required by the extraordinary circumstances of the times), that the disturbances in Northampton were deemed overt acts of treason by his advisers; and though this denunciation was followed by the march of a considerable army for the express purpose of subduing and apprehending the traitors, you will recollect, that you are to decide whether treason has been committed, from the evidence of the witnesses, and not from the opinions of the government. Again: great inconveniences have been experienced by many meritorious citizens, who relinquished the pursuits of business and the pleasures of domestic life, to assist in the suppression of the insurgents; but you will not allow the irritation and resentment proceeding from this source, to transfer from your judgments to your passions, the determination of the cause. Far be it from me to contend that outrages have not been committed, which are disreputable to the state or society at large, and to the character of Pennsylvania in particular; or to endeavour to shelter from the punishment of the law, the instigators and perpetrators of such offences. Every citizen is interested, and is bound to assist in detecting, prosecuting, and punishing the offenders; but every citizen, let it be remembered, is still more interested, that even the greatest criminals should only be punished in the manner and to the degree which the law prescribes. However we may differ on speculative points of politics abroad, however we may be disposed to approve or to disapprove the measures of administration, and however we may controvert or assert the constitutionality or the expediency of particular laws, all party spirit, all personal animosity, must be abandoned when we are called upon to act as ministers of justice; or we shall, in the indulgence of a moment's vengeance, overthrow those barriers which are our own security, and the pledge of safety to posterity. Whatever you may have thought, whatever you may have said, whatever you may have heard, in other scenes, must now be obliterated from your minds. The character of private citizens, with all the privileges of private opinion and feeling, is here exchanged for the character of public functionaries, with all the restraints of law and justice. Your opinions, as private men, will only be regarded according to their intrinsic merit; but your verdict, as a jury, will be forever obligatory, bearing all the authority of a precedent. Though, then, a proclamation has issued, an army has marched, and popular resentment has been excited, we claim an unbiased attention; and, circumscribing your view of the subject to the evidence, we confidently expect a fortunate result. What has happened in England upon a similar occasion, we think will happen here. The British privy council announced a traitorous conspiracy to the British parliament. The British parliament declared that the party recognized and confirmed the charge of high treason; and thus, the whole weight of public authority in that country, legislative and executive, instituted a prosecution, which was afterwards conducted with the greatest zeal and talents, with such zeal and talents as the present prosecution has displayed. What was the event? A jury (that inestimable palladium) without fear, and without favor, examined and pronounced that no treason had been committed. I allude to the recent cases of Horne Tooke, and Hardy.

I shall, I presume, be excused, if I intimate to you some other disadvantages under which the prisoner's case labours; for, it is not merely necessary to produce evidence, to explain, extenuate, or refute the charge; we must guard your minds against any previous bias, any latent pre-determination to convict. The accused gentleman and his companions, you will recollect, are not upon their trial among persons with whom they have been accustomed to live. This is a disadvantage which every candid man will acknowledge. They are to be tried likewise, by a jury, selected and returned by the marshal, the very officer who has been personally insulted, and whose appointment depends on the will and pleasure of the executive magistrate, that magistrate by whom the offenders have already been described as traitors. I mean not to cast the least reflection upon the laws of congress, nor upon the officers of the government; but to make a general remark on the defective state of our judicial institutions. The conduct of the marshal has, indeed, been highly exemplary throughout the transaction; and when, with such powers, he returned such a jury as I have the honour to address, he manifests an impartiality and independence of character that entitle him to the respect and plaudits of his country. Nor is it here that the prisoner's disadvantages terminate: but I hope, I believe, that never till this day, was the press employed in a base and sanguinary attempt to intimidate the jury and counsel from a faithful execution of their duty in a capital case! Since, however, the jury have been summoned; nay, since the court have been sitting upon this very trial, there have been the grossest, the most insidious practices in a public newspaper, to warp your sentiments, and to deprive the unfortunate prisoner of the benefit of the best talents which the bar of Pennsylvania can afford. On the other hand, a gentleman, whose abilities we all respect, and whose long residence in the offending counties must greatly facilitate the progress of the prosecution, is associated without censure, and certainly without being answerable, in the duties of the attorney of the district. While our ignorance of characters and circumstances perplexes the defence, his accurate information and experience enable him to probe every witness to the quick, and forcibly to combine and interweave all the incidents of the transaction. But his motives are pure; for, if he does arraign, if he does convict, if he does punish, it is because his patriotism and public spirit enable him to soar far beyond the little affections of a neighbourhood.

Gentlemen, in this situation we appear before you as advocates for the prisoner. I declare, that as far as my mind is capable of being impressed by a sense of duty, I feel a terror lest anything should be left undone or unsaid which is essential to the cause; and, therefore, complicated as the discussion must necessarily be, accept, I pray you, my sentiments under the following heads. First, I will endeavour to establish such points of law, as seem to me to be applicable to the facts which have been given in evidence. Secondly, I will consider the general state of the discontents, and how far the rescue at Bethlehem was connected with the previous disturbances. Thirdly, I will take a review of the conduct of the prisoner in particular.

Mr. Dallas here went into an examination of the law of treason, taking the same general grounds as those opinions maintained by Mr. Lewis, and thus proceeded:—

Now, gentlemen, I challenge the prosecuting counsel to say, in what part of the evidence it has appeared, that these insurgents went further than to declare that the law did not please them; that, though they did not mean to compel congress to repeal it, they had some doubts, and wished to ascertain whether it existed or not; to know whether the country in general had submitted to it; to know whether General Washington was not dissatisfied with it, and to see whether they could not get the assessor appointed by themselves. Under these impressions many irregularities occurred, but I ask the adverse counsel to point out, if they have discovered, through the whole course of the business, any insurrection existing, any traitorous design, till the meeting at Bethlehem; or whether, till that moment, the people of Northampton could be said to have been guilty of any crime? We are told that the Case of the Western Insurgents in 1794, is in point, and that the decisions upon the trials that then took place are precedents on the present occasion; but, with great deference, I declare that it seems impossible to bring cases more dissimilar into view, where violence has been committed in both. At this stage of the argument, however, I shall only remark, that whatever may have been the language of the judge who then presided, I am sure the attorney of the district will be good enough to recollect, and candid enough to state, that the opposition, though in its origin excited against the excise law, was conducted with the avowed purpose of suppressing all the excise offices, and compelling congress to repeal the act. See U. S. v. Vigol [supra].

Let us for a moment, gentlemen, trace the motives of the people by looking at their conduct, not at large, but in the lawless scene at Bethlehem. What did they do? why they rescued the marshal's prisoners; but the moment they had effected the rescue, did they not disperse? Their whole object then was consummated; for, I must presume that they contemplated nothing farther, as I see them attempt nothing more; and yet the time was very favourable to accomplish a more extensive design, if it had ever been meditated. Men intending to compel, by every hostile means, the repeal of a law, when they had in their hands the obnoxious agents of that law, (Mr. Balliott, Mr. Eyerly, the marshal and others,) would hardly have let the moment pass without some effort to triumph in their advantage. It was, indeed, rumoured to be their intention to dispatch Mr. Eyerly; but where does it appear? Was he not completely in their power? Was he not constantly in their view, though he incorrectly says that he was constantly out of their view? No: I repeat that the rioters, having accomplished the rescue, dispersed; and will you, under such circumstances, in a case of life and death, determine that they came to commit treason—rejecting the plain fact, and adopting a constructive inference? But if they proceeded no farther than I have stated, let us again look to the law of England, to define their crime, as distinguished from treason; and you will not cease to bear in mind that you must establish the distinction. 1 Hale, P. C. pp. 133, 134; 6 Bac. Abr. pp. 513–515.

2. Having thus delivered my sentiments upon the points of law that arise on the evidence, I shall now enter upon the consideration of the second proposition—"The general state of the discontents in the Northern counties; and how far the rescue at Bethlehem was connected with the previous disturbances." And here I find, gentlemen, that the source from which proceeds much, if not all, of our political good, discharges, likewise, much, if not all of our political evil: I mean the business of elections. You will recollect the testimony of Mr. Horsefield. That gentleman, when he wished to give you a description of the origin of all the mischief that we deprecate, pointed his finger emphatically at the election of 1798. Now, I pray that I may not be misunderstood in the progress I shall make through the scene which is thus disclosed: let it not be supposed, that I am depraved enough to justify the misconduct that has been exhibited, because I am firm enough to contend, that it did not proceed from motives directed to treason, nor lead to consequences that amount to treason. At the eve of our election, it is natural for the citizens of a free country to canvass what has been done by the public agents; to applaud the good, and reprobate the bad; and in doing this they exercise a right; nay, they perform a duty. No intelligent and candid man will say that the constitution of a representative republic can be preserved in a vigorous and healthy state, unless the people, from whom it derives its vital principle, are vigilant and virtuous in the exercise of the elective franchise. For this purpose they retain the right of opinion; and though they may use it upon mistaken, or erroneous grounds, if they use it fairly and peaceably, there is no power to control or obstruct them.

I ask, then, what were the ostensible causes of discontent? They will be delineated by the opposite counsel as spectres of the most visionary, yet most horrible aspect: but notwithstanding any sincere abhorrence of the manner in which the discontent has been manifested, I cannot admit that the causes did not afford a legal ground for exercising the right of opinion. For instance, the alien and sedition laws. They are a novelty in this country, and their novelty might alone attract the popular attention and displeasure. But were the inhabitants of the Northern counties of Pennsylvania the only dissatisfied citizens? Peruse the debates examine the files of congress, and you will find the most pointed declarations of the public opinion, the most unequivocal marks of dissatisfaction, throughout the United States. Exercising the right of opinion, the people disapproved the laws, and the law-makers. Exercising the right of election, they endeavoured to promote the success of those candidates who would regularly procure a repeal of the laws. Again: the stamp act was strongly objected to, and produced the nickname of "Stamplers," which was applied generally to the friends of government. Now, in my opinion, there cannot be a more convenient mode of taxation than an imposition on stamps; but that was not the opinion of the people of Northampton and Bucks. They had imbibed a prejudice against a stamp act in the year 1775, and not considering properly the ground of American opposition to the tyranny of taxation without representation, they confounded the name with the principle of the law. I repeat that I do not agree with them, but I contend that they had a right to speak freely on the subject.

Again. The house tax was objected to; not from the real, but from the imaginary burdens which it imposed; for if it had been intended to devise a tax for the relief of the poor, at the cost of the rich, for the benefit of the country at the expense of the city, there could not, I think, be a more ingenious plan than the present law exhibits. The opposition must evidently, therefore, have arisen from misconception or misinformation. But if their opinion of the law was sincere, however erroneous, it is entitled to indulgence. The fallibility of the human understanding, and the frailty of our passions, must be respected in every wise and benevolent system of politics, or law. A man who honestly acts under a false impression of facts, may be pitied as a weak man, but he ought not to be punished as a wicked one. Then, the rioters were under an evident delusion, as to the principle of the land tax, the purity of the government, and the compensation of public officers. They had not the ordinary access to information, since our laws are published in English, and most of them only understood German: and this being a question of property, they acted upon the first blind impulse of their avarice, proving the truth of Mr. Horsefield's observation, "that the Germans are fond of their money, and do not like to part with it." But still there is a criterion which, in applying a rule of law, ought always to be regarded:—I mean the moral character and mental attainments of the men who are arraigned. If a discontent exists, we cannot fairly expect the same mode of expressing it from illiterate, uncultivated men, the scattered inhabitants of a remote district, that we may reasonably exact from men of education and manners, formed by the luxury and refinements of a metropolis: these will take care, if they do express their discontents, to avoid personal indignity and legal embarrassments; while those without skill to ascertain the limits of the law, as without delicacy to respect the inviolability of the person, rarely act without being riotous, or complain without being abusive. Plain men, then, have but plain ways to manifest what they feel; and they ought not to be tried and condemned by a more perfect and, generally, a more artificial standard. A disturbance similar to the one under consideration is not uncommon in England; but the government, instead of entering prosecutions against the discontented, for treason, has sometimes thought it proper to acquiesce in the wishes of the people. We all remember the popular influence in depriving Lorth North of the reins of government. The attempt of a minister (Mr. Pitt) to involve that nation in a war with Russia, was a very unpopular measure; murmurs and complaints reverberated through the kingdom, and, finally, he was obliged to abandon his project. The shop-tax was sanctioned by all the branches of the parliament; but it generated clamours so loud and so acrimonious, riots so numerous and so outrageous, resistance to lawful authority so daring and so injurious, that the government itself might justly be said to be assailed; and the act of parliament to be repealed by force and intimidation; yet, not a single indictment for high treason was projected. Hence it is that I think risings of the people, like the present, should be viewed with the determination to punish, on account of delinquency, but, also, with the disposition to mitigate, on account of prejudice or ignorance. In a country where party spirit beats high, there should be peculiar caution on the subject; for, even in the present case, has not the joy testified by the triumphant majority at the late election, been classed with the symptoms of popular discontent and hostility to the government? Nor will it be denied that there actually did arise in the minds of the people a serious doubt, whether the law was in existence or not; and although, I repeat, that ignorance is not a legal excuse, yet you must take into view the state of information, before you can understand the degree of guilt. Under this ignorance, in this state of doubt, can the refusal to permit the assessors to enter a particular township, be construed into a fixed and deliberate intention of levying war against the government? Though the law had been enacted, we find that the subject of the law had been brought anew before congress, and petitions were sent in abundance, praying for a repeal. These discontented people might have supposed that a repeal was effected, or intended; though we, who were at the seat of government, knew the object of the revision was merely to amend, and not to rescind the law. At the meeting at Kline's, (acting, probably, under the mistake that I have suggested,) there was an express declaration that the people did not think the law was in force at that time: And here let me remark, that the prisoner, who is called the great parent of the discontents, was not present at Kline's, which appears to have been the first step in the opposition to the land-tax. Such was the state of information at that period. Mr. Horsefield has said that there were general discontents prevailing throughout the country: but his allegation is too vague, too comprehensive, to be understood or acted upon. The citizens of a free government have a right, if they apprehend that a violation of their constitution is intended, or if they think that any encroachment is made on the bulwarks of liberty, or property, to express their opinion; but is it practicable so to express that opinion as not to encounter from their political opponents the charge of discontent and sedition? How, in the present instance, was the popular discontent expressed? At first, petitions to the government were proposed, framed and subscribed. This was the result of Kline's meeting; and in this, I presume, no hostility, no levying war, can be discovered. At every subsequent meeting, whether convened by the assessors, or by the people themselves, the reliance on legislative redress was never abandoned; though, it is true, there was great intemperance of manner and of language. The assessors were sometimes interrupted in their journeys, and sometimes jostled in the crowd; and the unmeaning epithets of Stamplers and Tories, were rudely applied to the friends of government. But however censurable, where is the treason in such proceedings? A rioter and a traitor are not synonymous characters; and let us say what we please about nicknames and slander, the society that patiently submits to the scurrility of the Philadelphia newspapers, will never be disgusted or enraged at the indecorum or vulgarity of the northern insurgents. But the insurgents went further; they intimidated the assessors: and is that treason? No; it is the very gist of the offence for which the sedition act explicitly provides. Is it not the very phrase of that act, that if any persons shall combine to intimidate an officer from the performance of his duty, he shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanour, and be punished with fine and imprisonment? Now let us go step by step through the evidence, and I defy the most inquisitional ingenuity to discover anything beyond the design, and the effect, of a system of intimidation. Is there any actual force resorted to? No! I find the bridle of one assessor seized, and his leg laid hold of; but the man is not pulled off his horse, nor is he the least injured in his person. I find that a witness thinks that he heard the word "fire" given, and that he saw two men from a neighbouring porch present their rifles at another assessor: well, did the riflemen fire? No. They had guns; their guns were, probably, loaded; and if any thing more than intimidation was meditated, how shall we account for their not firing? But we hear a great deal of the personal jeopardy of the commissioners and assessors; and yet who of them sustained an injury? Mr. Chapman, Mr. Foulke, and Mr. Childs, are, generally speaking, treated as men of merit and consideration; and, in particular, wherever the prisoner met them, they were respected and protected; as at Jacob Fries' and Roberts' taverns. To repel the plea for favour founded on such correct deportment towards the officers, we shall be told that the prisoner was an artful man, that he was the leader; and it will be strongly urged against him, that he called on the officers to surrender the public papers. Of his conduct as a leader, I shall speak hereafter; and of his demand of the papers, it is surely sufficient to observe, that, in opposition to the sense of the rioters, and at the risk of his life, he returned the papers, privately, in the same state in which he had received them.

Having spoken of the assessors, I would wish, likewise, to review the evidence with respect to Mr. Eyerly, the commissioner, and Col. Nichols, the marshal. (Here Mr. Dallas entered into an investigation of the evidence, to show, that although the people acted violently at the several meetings which Mr. Eyerly had called to explain the law to them; that although Mr. Eyerly accompanied the marshal in his whole progress for serving process, and that although he was conspicuously present at Bethlehem, no personal violence was ever offered to him, or to the marshal; and all the ill-treatment they encountered, amounted to no more than an attempt to intimidate them, but which they both declared was without effect. Mr. Dallas then continued as follows.) And are we to be told, sir, that these acts without force, without any apparent object but to intimidate the assessors of a particular district; that distinct acts of inconsiderate riot and folly shall, when connected and combined, constitute a deliberate treason, by levying war against the United States? If no treason was actually perpetrated, if none was intended when the transactions occurred, I insist, that nothing previous to them, nothing ex post facto, can make the prisoner a traitor; the intention at the time must have been treasonable, or the act can never be punished as treason.

Let us now, however, proceed to inquire into the circumstances of the rescue at Bethlehem, and its connection with the previous disturbances. I think the evidence is strong in support of the assertion, that the sole, independent, consummate object of the assembling of the people at that place, was to rescue these prisoners. Is there any satisfactory proof of a combination between the people of Northampton and of Bucks? I know that an expression is said to have escaped the prisoner, that, in this general discontent with respect to the land-tax, certain persons of a part of Northampton would join the inhabitants of Lower Milford; but let the foundation of his opinions be tested by the facts, and it evidently arose, not from negotiation, conspiracy, and compact, as the prosecution supposes, but from a general knowledge, which he possessed in common with thousands, that the land-tax was unpopular throughout the adjacent country. It is enough, however, for the defence, that no combination or correspondence is proved; since the rule declares, that in legal contemplation, what does not appear and what does not exist are the same. You do not find the people of Bucks attending any meetings but in their own county, nor entering into the county of Northampton at all, previously to their appearance at Bethlehem. Gentlemen, it might surely be expected, that a concerted insurrection for treasonable purposes, prevailing throughout the three counties of Bucks, Northampton, and Montgomery, and cemented by common interests and passions, would have been inspired and conducted by one common counsel; but is there the slightest proof of such a co-operation? I am aware of the communication made by Captain Staeler to the son of Conrad Marks; but the communication itself was merely accidental, and amounts to nothing more than the request of one individual of Northampton to an individual of Bucks. I am aware, likewise, that a message was received at Quakertown (as one of the witnesses says), mentioning the arrest of the Northampton prisoners and inviting the people of Bucks to assist in rescuing them. Who brought this message, and to whom it was delivered, I don't recollect; but it seems, that a compliance was resolved on, and a paper expressing the resolution, was prepared and signed by Fries, with a number of other persons. But was the object of the invitation, or of the resolution to comply with it, treason, or rescue?—to commit a riot, or to levy war against the United States? I repeat, that the sole, independent, and exclusive purpose, was to rescue a particular set of prisoners. Now if, in the previous part of this transaction, nothing has struck your minds as traitorous in the acts, or the intention of the people, I beg you to follow me, gentlemen, with strict attention, to a consideration of the object that was actually effected, and the means of effecting it. The object was to obtain a rescue; a rescue was effected, but it was effected with circumstances of military array; will this alter the original character of the riot? No, sir: if the people did not repair to Bethlehem with a traitorous intention, their arms and military equipments will not convert them into traitors. As on the one hand, I grant, that the circumstance of military array is not necessary to an act of treason, if the intention is traitorous, so I insist, on the other hand, that the circumstance of military array will not constitute treason, without such intention. (Here Mr. Dallas entered into an investigation of the evidence in relation to the assembling of the people, their march to Bethlehem, and their conduct there. In the course of the detail, he endeavoured to establish, that the sole object of the rioters was to rescue the prisoners; that no injury was offered, or intended against the marshal, the commissioners, the assessors, or the posse comitatus; and that although the prisoner was forced into a conspicuous station among the rioters, his conduct had been marked with civility towards the public officers, and a solicitude to avoid the effusion of blood. On the last of these points, Mr. Dallas concluded as follows.) And here, permit me to remark, that if the conduct of John Fries was such as to justify his being selected as a subject for capital punishment, I cannot see the policy or justice of the selection, nor forbear from deprecating the consequences of the precedent. A good man may sometimes affect to join a mob, with a view to acquire and to exercise an influence in suppressing it; or an intelligent and temperate man may, for awhile, be associated for an illicit purpose, with a furious and ignorant rabble, who will naturally look up to him as a leader; but, in either case, the power and the disposition to avert or to limit outrage, will be dangerous to the prominent individual who displays them, and his only safety is in mingling with the crowd, whatever may be the direction or the devastation of the storm!

Gentlemen of the jury, I have now gone through two of the general propositions into which I divided the consideration of the defence; and, in the course of my observations, I have anticipated much that related to the third proposition, the particular conduct of the prisoner. I should here, therefore, break off, as I feel that my strength, and I fear that your patience, are exhausted, but that the proclamation of the president demands a moment's further attention. By the laws of the United States it is provided, that, under certain circumstances, the president may call out the militia to suppress an insurrection, having previously published a proclamation requiring the insurgents to disperse. This proclamation is obviously in the nature of an admonition; and if the admonition produces the effect, I ask, whether in the present, as in every other case, it ought not to produce impunity? Then I argue, on general principles, that if the rioters did peaceably retire to their homes upon this authoritative warning, they ought to be sheltered from punishment for any offence previously committed. Nor is the argument without a sanction from the positive authorities of the law. 1 Hale, P. C. 138. And the court will recollect, that the principle is incorporated into the statute, which is usually called in England, the riot act. There must surely be some object in requiring the president to issue his proclamation; and the one which I suggest is equally benevolent and politic. On the present occasion, it produced an immediate and decisive obedience to the laws. Besides, when we recollect that the president has the power to pardon offences, to discontinue prosecutions, and to grant a general amnesty, as in the case of the Western insurrection, why may we not consider the proclamation as emanating from that attribute of mercy, since no specific formula is prescribed, by which its exercise shall be expressed or announced?[7]

Mr. Dallas then proceeded to point out the differences in the nature, progress, and turpitude, of the Northampton insurrection, and of the Western insurrection—U. S. v. Mitchell [Case No. 15,788]; and analysing again the Case of Lord George Gordon, he contended that upon that authority alone, the prisoner ought to be acquitted. In the Case of Lord Gordon, the direct, the avowed object, was to obtain the repeal of a law; and as petitions and remonstrances were unavailing, a body of forty thousand men were convened and marshalled to surround, intimidate, and coerce the parliament. Riot, arson, murder, and every species of the most daring outrage and devastation, ensued; and yet, the only prosecution for high treason was instituted against the leader of the association; and that prosecution terminated in an acquittal. View, then, the riots of Lord George Gordon in their origin; estimate their guilt by the avowed object; aggravate the scene with the cotemporaneous insults and violence offered to the persons of peers and commoners; and close the retrospect with the horrors which the British metropolis endured for more than eight days; and then say (exclaimed Mr. Dallas) what was the guilt of John Fries compared with the guilt of Lord George Gordon? What is there in the English doctrine of treason that has justified an acquittal of the latter? What is there in American doctrine of treason, that will justify a conviction of the former?

Gentlemen, I can proceed no longer. The life of the prisoner is left, with great confidence, in your hands. There are attempts to make him responsible, under the notion of a general conspiracy, for all the actions and all the words of meetings, which he never attended, and of persons whom he never saw. But this is too, too harsh in a case of blood. It is inconsistent with the humanity, the tenderness of life, which are characteristics of the American people, and especially of the people of Pennsylvania. Nor is it called for by the policy or practice of those who administer our government. I believe that to the chief magistrate, to every public officer, to every candid citizen, it will be matter of a gratification, if after so fair, so full a scrutiny, you should be of opinion that treason has not been committed. Such an event will by no means ensure impunity to the delinquent; for, though he has not committed treason, though the punishment of death is not to be inflicted, the violation of the laws may be amply avenged upon an indictment of a different nature. The only question, however, now to be decided is, whether the offence proved, is like the offence charged, treason against the United States. The affirmation must be incontestably established as to the fact and the intention, by the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act; but remember, I pray you, what the venerable Lord Mansfield stated to the jury on Lord Gordon's trial, remember that it is enough for us in defence of the prisoner, to raise a doubt; for, if you doubt (it is the principle of law, as well as of humanity) you must acquit.

The counsel for the prisoner then called the following witnesses.

John Jamieson.—Some time after last February court, John Fries came to my house; I had heard, on my way coming to Newton, that there was to be a meeting at Kline's. I asked him whether there were [7] Judge Iredell, says the reporter, here interrupted Mr. Dallas, observing that he thought it irregular to make any use of the proclamation as a pardon, without pleading it. Mr. Dallas said, that he only meant to infer from the facts of the warning and the dispersion, that the insurgents never meditated treason.

many people there, and what they had done. He told me there were, and they had agreed not to allow the assessments to be made in the township as yet; he said the reason was, because they did not know whether there was a law passed on it or not; I told him I really believed there was, for though I had not seen it myself, I had heard of it. He likewise told me that Mitchel had undertaken to draw up an instrument of writing, but he could not go through with it, and that he called upon him to assist him to do it, which he did. On the sixth of March, I had occasion to go to the township meeting on account of a pauper which was likely to become chargeable, calling at Jacob Fries'. I had been there but a short time, before a parcel of men came there, some with arms, and some without. They called for liquor, freely. They then proceeded to make inquiry whether anybody knew whether the assessors were going about the township or not: I do not know whether they got any information or no, but they agreed to go up to Quakertown; after they were gone a little while, Jacob Fries and I concluded that we would ride up after them: we went to the house of Enoch Roberts. We went into a room, but nothing occurred there; and I then asked Jacob Fries if he would ride down to Daniel Penrose's: after we had been there some short time, one of the family told us that our horses were getting loose, so we went out, and there we saw Mr. Rodrick, who halted: he appeared to be much frightened; so I asked him what was the matter; he told me they had catched Foulke and Childs, and that he was afraid they would kill them, and insisted on my going back to try to prevent them being hurt: I told him I would not, except he would too; he said he would, if I would engage they should not hurt him; I told him I would not do that, for I did not know what they had against him. However, at his desire, I went to town, and when I got there, I think I was told they had Foulke in the stable; so I rode up, and called him by name, and I think he answered me. At my desire, he came into the house; while we were walking along, I told him it was a pity he should assess the township till they were more reconciled: I told him I thought the best way to quiet the people, was to show them the small assessments he had made, and promise not to go about again till they were satisfied. He said he was willing to do that. We then walked into the room, and soon after we were there, Conrad Marks walked towards us with a kind of sword in his hand, though I believe sheathed, and said to Foulke, "What! I hear you are going about this business again! did not I tell you not to do this business? but I cannot tell you in English like as I could in Dutch; but it is for the sake of those few dollars that you go about this business." Foulke answered him that he did not do it for the sake of the money. Marks answered, "Did I not tell you that if you could not do without, come to my house and I would keep you four or five days? but if you had to do this for half a crown a day, the devil would not send you about the township." I then told Marks what I had advised Foulke: he said if he would do that, he would use him like a gentleman. Then the affair of Captain Seaborne [8] took place, which seemed to draw the attention from Mr. Foulke. I saw John Fries looking over some papers, but I did not know what they were; I went away.

A day or two after the affair at Bethlehem, John Fries came to me and told me the circumstances, much the same as was related by the marshal, to the best of my knowledge: he then said he did not know what to do with these Germans, for that they had got it grafted in them that General Washington was opposed to this law, and that, so poor a man as he was, he would not grudge half the expense of a man to go and get his opinion on purpose to satisfy the Germans. The next knowledge I got about it, was from two gentlemen who came from Philadelphia in order to carry the proclamation about, and they gave me some proclamations, desiring me to do all I could to get submission to the laws. I spoke to many of them, and there was a meeting called at Marks's on the Monday following. There were one hundred and fifty people or more there from the three counties. It was agreed by several people that it would be best to have men chosen to form a committee, from the three counties, to consult what to do for the best. This was agreed to, and four men were chosen from each county. I was one of four chosen from Bucks, with George Kline, David Roberts and Conrad Marks. Dr. Baker, Squire Davis, and I think Squire Jarrett were some. We unanimously agreed to recommend to the people, as near as I can recollect, to desist from opposing any public officer in the execution of his office, and enjoined upon the citizens to use their influence, to prevent any opposition, and to give due submission to the laws of the United States. I did not hear anybody, but did not consent to what was done by the committee. The people of Lower Milford thought it would be necessary to have the assessments taken. David Roberts said, that he believed Mr. Chapman would agree for them to appoint an assessor in their own township. It was then agreed that we should ride to him to know; which we did next day: he said he had once made an offer, but it was now out of his power. He then said Mr. Clark had been first appointed, and that he had not yet given up his commission, and he did not know how another could be appointed now; that if Mr. Clark would go about it, it would answer the end. On returning home, I called at Frederick Henny's, and desired him to draw out some German advertisements, and send them over towards Marks's, to desire the people to meet, and consent to let Clark go about. I believe he did it. At the time of appointment, the people met at Mitchel's; perhaps there were about forty there. John Fries and Frederick Henny were there. The people in general agreed to let Clark go about; I believe Fries and Henny did not vote. I went to Fries and asked the reason: he said he had no objection to the people voting for him, and he wished it was done; but as he was first opposed to Clark going about the township, he thought it would not be right in him to vote. I believe Henny said about the same. I saw Fries again a few days before he was taken. He told me he had heard a report which troubled him more than anything in his life: I asked him what it was: he said that a report was in circulation that he was collecting up men to assist the French. He said, "Damn the French; if they were now to come to invade this country, so old a man as I am, I would venture my life against them; but I want nothing to do with them."

Cross-Examined.—I do not recollect any proposition made there about signing a submission paper. I recollect Fries said that if he was called upon, or summoned, he would come forward and deliver himself up. This he said at Marks'.

Jacob Huber.—I was at the meeting at Conrad Marks'. It was after the proclamation, and we were choosing the men to meet in the committee; Fries and I got to talking together. He says, "Now, Jacob, you see the error we got into by going to Bethlehem." I answered to him, that the assessors would have to go about and assess the houses; he said, they should not assess his before he gave them a dinner, then they might take the assessment of his house; and "If I am not at home," said he, "my son will give them a dinner." After this meeting, the general situation of the township was quiet. John Fries was as peaceable and quiet as any man could be; I never afterwards heard of the least opposition.

Cross-Examined.—I saw George Mitchel at Marks', but was not much with him: I had no conversation with him: he was clerk of the meeting.

Israel Roberts.—After the proclamation arrived in our neighbourhood, there was a statement in the next week's newspaper, stating the conduct of John Fries, which I procured, and took to John Fries. After looking over the paper, he seemed pretty submissive, but said nothing: he appeared, I thought, much distressed in his mind. I told him that I wanted to have some conversation with him relative to it. I then asked him whether he had rightly considered this matter, whether he had not run himself into danger inconsiderately, and told him the consequences I thought might attend it. He said he never had considered it so much as he had within a few days before. He said he had not slept half an hour for three or four nights, and that he would give all he was worth in the world if the matter was all settled, and he clear of it: he likewise said, if the government would send for him, he would go with him, even if a little child was sent. After the proclamation was read, there was still some little opposition to the law in Milford township; but I do not know that there was any made by the prisoner. I recollect that John Fries further expressed himself to me at that time, that he was charged with taking part with the French, which he took very hard, and signified his determination to defend the country against any invasion; if any army should invade our land, he would, at any time, lay all this aside, and turn out against them, and particularly France.[9] There was a meeting at Mitchel's after that, to choose an assessor; Fries was there: he was asked to vote, but he said he would have nothing to do with it. More than once I heard him say that he did not believe it was an established law, and therefore he was determined to oppose it. I think this was the 5th of March, not far from Jacob Fries' tavern, on the road. He said he would oppose it till he had known other counties had agreed to it—then, said he, we must submit; but he would choose Lower Milford should be the last. At the last meeting at Mitchel's, there appeared a disposition to wait till they should have assistance from any other place. It was said that a letter had arrived to George Mitchel from Virginia, stating that there were a number of men, I think ten thousand, on their way to join them: that letter was traced from one to another, through six or eight persons, till at last it came from one who was not there! Some of the company at that time were in arms and uniform. I do not recollect what was said when the letter was mentioned, but they appeared to be more opposed to the law than they were before. At the meeting at George Mitchel's, at which Mr. Foulke and Mr. Chapman were present, which was held for the purpose of explaining the law, there were a number (about twelve) came up in uniform, and armed with a flag and "Liberty" on it. They came into the house and appeared to be very much opposed to the law, and in a very bad humour. I proposed to read the law to them; they asked me how I came to advertise the meeting: I told them I did it with the consent of a few others: one of them asked me what business I had to do it: I told him we did it to explain the law. He looked me in the face and said, "We don't want any of your damned laws, we have laws of our own," and shook the muzzle of his musket in my face, saying, "This is our law, and we will let you know it." There were four or five who wished to hear it, but others forbid it, and said it should not be read, and it was not done. I saw Fries on the evening of the 5th of March. He asked me if they had assessed my house? I told him they had: he then asked me if I had told anybody of it; I said I had not: he then added that he had forbade them to come into the township, as he did not believe it was an established law, and others should be gone through with first. I think he then added that they could not get hold of Rodrick: they had got Foulke, but let him go, and added, if they had got Rodrick, they would have put him under guard for that night. He seemed very much opposed to the law. He did not express his opposition to any other law that I heard, but to the law for assessing houses, that night: in a conversation I had with him before, he appeared to be opposed to the alien and sedition law also. I know that he expressed himself a number of times, that he did not believe it was an established law. I took it that he did not believe the law had ever passed; he seemed to doubt of its being established.

Everhard Foulke.—As I was coming from the house of James Chapman with the other assessors (John Rodrick and Cephas Childs), when I came nearly opposite Enoch Roberts', I saw the prisoner at the bar, and a number of others with their arms, (though I don't know that he had any, but the others had). Some of them held them nearly as high as my horse's side, on a level, with their arms hanging down. I spoke to them as I passed, and rode on till I got nearly to the other tavern, David Zellers'. When I got there, a number run out and cried "Stop!" Some of them addressing me by name, desired me to stop; which I did in a pleasant manner. Before any of them got to me, I think John Fries came over from Roberts'; when he was about a rod from me, he called me by my name, and told me he had told me yesterday that he would take me to-day, and he was now come to do it, or it should now be done, I don't know which he said. Captain Kuyder then ran up, and seized my horse by the bridle, and a number of others came round me; the prisoner did not come himself. Some of the people there (Jacob and John Huber) came and took Kuyder off, and he then seized me by the foot, and endeavoured to dismount me, but he failed. He then again took hold of the bridle, but Huber released me again. Fries came up and said, "Foulke, you shall be taken, if you will get off; there shall no man hurt you." He took hold of the bridle, and ordered Kuyder to hold it; I rode up to the stable, got off, and went into the house. When in the room, which was very thick of people, the prisoner came and demanded my assessment papers. I told him that I did not like to give them up; he told me not to hesitate, but to do it. In that situation I gave them to him, and told him I was in hopes he would not take them away without giving them to me again when he had looked at them.—I then went into another room with some of them, who exclaimed much against the law. Huber said they were not willing to submit to it yet. Fries then gave me the assessment papers again unhurt, and told me that he had used me better than I deserved, and that if I had a mind I might return him to court, which I had before threatened. He then went with me to the bar, and took me to my horse through the mob, and held the bridle while I got on, and I rode off. I received no injury. The prisoner said he knew, or thought he had transgressed the law in such a manner as to endanger his life, and that I might return him if I would. The day before he spoke of force that was expected to assist him, when he attacked Rodrick and me in the road. He said there would be 700 men there to-morrow morning, pointing to Jacob Fries' house. I was appointed assessor for the whole district; my appointment was on the last day of the court (January 28).

Mr. Ewing.—You are now, gentlemen of the jury, in the discharge of the most important duty which possibly has, or ever can fall to your lot as members of society. This is a cause of the greatest magnitude, of the first impression. Its importance is derived not only from a consideration that the life of the prisoner is now at stake, but also from the precedent that your verdict will establish in similar cases in future. From this view of it, it claims the highest and most serious attention that can be bestowed upon it. When I address you on this occasion, I feel diffident lest my ideas should not be clothed with that perspicuity or clearness that I could wish, or my sentiments delivered with that ease or elegance that might insure success. I shall rely upon your goodness to forgive any inaccuracy of style or sentiment that your penetration may discover in my address to you. When I address you on this occasion, it is with an anxiety of mind which I never before experienced, when I reflect upon the possible issue of this cause with respect to the unfortunate prisoner at the bar. The situation of the public mind, now roused to resentment; the place where this subject is made matter of inquiry; together with the prejudices that may exist against the defendant, all conspire to form strong obstacles to the defence which I shall attempt on this occasion. But when I consider your characters, gentlemen, I am fully persuaded that you will suffer no circumstances of this kind to bias your impartial judgments, to destroy that inflexible integrity which characterizes you, or prevent this defendant from receiving from your hands (which is all he asks) a fair, a candid, and an impartial trial; that you will hear his cause under every presumption of his innocence, until the contrary is proved by the most incontrovertible evidence. That it is essential to the very existence of every government; that it is essential to the preservation of life, liberty, and property that offences should be punished, and that the crime of treason, the highest that a member of society can commit, is what I will admit; but I contend that it is equally essential to the existence of a government, and to our security as members of it, that every man indicted should have a fair trial; to have the offence defined with certainty, and proved in such a manner as to leave no possibility of doubt on the minds of the jury. That this man has been guilty of a flagrant violation of the law, an offence for which he deserves to suffer, and which the good of society requires should be punished, is what I readily admit; but I do contend, and I assert with confidence, because I think the law will bear me out, that no act the prisoner has committed can be construed treason by the most rigid or strained construction of law. Gentlemen, permit me to observe, that in proportion to the nature and magnitude of an offence, so ought the evidence to be. As the accusation against this man is of the deepest dye, as it is the highest possible offence against the laws and government that he could commit, so should the proof of it come from the purest sources, and be of that nature as to establish the crime beyond the possibility of a doubt. He is indicted for the crime of treason. Happy for us that we are not now left to the construction of judges, to the opinions of men of any kind, or we might be led astray in a variety of instances, and at times introduce accumulative treason. The people of this country, knowing the magnitude of this object, and the propriety of good security against such constructions, ingrafted into the constitution the definition of the crime, and transmitted it to us unimpaired. Congress recognized the constitutional definition, by ingrafting also the very words of the constitution into the act for the punishment of crimes; they have there prescribed the punishment; they have said that the perpetrators of this crime shall suffer death. We are now to consider how far the defendant is guilty of treason, as laid in the indictment. I had meant to have gone more largely and fully into this subject from the authorities of law writers of eminence, but my learned colleague has so ably, in so masterly a manner handled this cause, that less remains for me to do. I shall endeavour to show you what is to be understood by levying war against the government of the United States, and think I can rest on that ground with safety, to prove to your satisfaction that the prisoner has not been guilty of the crime of treason.

The defence rests upon three grounds. First. That he has not been guilty of the crime charged in the indictment. Secondly. If he has been guilty of any crime at all, the act of congress has sufficiently defined it, and prescribed the punishment not to be capital. Thirdly. I contend that the proclamation of the president should operate as a pardon to take off the guilt of actions done previously thereunto, if not continued in.

(Judge IREDELL here interrupted Mr. Ewing respecting the pardon, and said that a plea must be put in if that was insisted on, but the prisoner must plead guilty to plead pardon. The proclamation was read by Mr. Ewing, in which, he observed, there was no pardon promised. Mr. Dallas said he had begun speaking on this point before, but was interrupted from explaining his idea: he thought there was much difference between an assemblage before and after an admonition to disperse: it doubtless would have been treason had they continued in arms, but their future actions put a construction upon their past actions, and proved that they were guilty of riot and not treason.)

Mr. Ewing continued.—This opposition arose from ignorance: they did not know that the law was in force; and the first time they knew that, was by the proclamation, when they actually did disperse and submit to the law. The prisoner at the bar is not guilty of the treason laid in the indictment; for, first, there must be a traitorous intention; and, secondly, that intention must be carried into effect. In order to prove that, we must trace his conduct through Bucks county, and then proceed to Bethlehem, where the act of treason is said to have been committed. In order to discover what is meant by levying war, we are obliged to resort to the authority or decision of English courts on the statute of Edward the III.: but though everything that has been done there is not to be considered as a proper precedent for us here, yet there are some rules and constructions in England that will apply to particular cases here. Wherever a set of men take up arms to oppose themselves to the government generally, to subvert the laws, or to reform them, in that case they are said to levy war against the government. The great criterion to distinguish what amounts to this crime is the quo animo, or the intention with which the act was done. The object must be of a general nature, and not an assembly to do a particular act; this would not be treason. I shall now show, by the conduct of the prisoner, that his views were not of a general nature, and that it was by no means marked with that degree of malignity which the counsel for the prosecution have represented. You will consider that the residence of the prisoner was remote from the seat of government, and from that source of correct information which, as a member of society, he ought to have received, whereby to regulate his conduct. The people with whom he conversed were unacquainted with your language, warmly, and perhaps superstitiously attached to old established laws and customs of the place where they resided. Having been accustomed to be taxed and assessed by men of their own choice; men whose conduct they had a right to scrutinize, and whom they had used to bring to account, you need not be surprised that these people would at least hesitate at admitting innovations into their customs. The ideas which struck them naturally were, "From what source can this law arise, that should send a stranger into our townships to make assessments —a right which, exclusively, as we think, belongs to us?" They did not feel such prejudice against this law, considered as to its effects, but from the manner of its breaking upon their view. The introduction of this new principle alarmed them, but they assembled, not to oppose the law, but to gain time for information of the real existence of it. Under this delusion they laboured, because they had not the advantage we have of enjoying information, and the illiterate state they were in operated as a great source of their opposition. This ignorance and delusion were peculiarly manifested throughout all their conduct. Their first meeting was held to consider whether it was a law or not. Not being satisfied about it, and disappointed in their information, they met again, in order to tell the assessors not to come about their township to make the assessments until their doubts were removed. The assessors went on, however, and all this while the people were enveloped in darkness. They warn the assessors; they tell them, "We don't want to repeal this law by violence." No; if they had, arresting the assessors would not have done it; they must have gone to a higher source; and if they had gone there with a determination to repeal or oppose it, the act might have received the stamp of treason. I deny that they arrested any of the officers of the government in the execution of their duty. We have repeatedly asked upon what authority these men acted: we have asked, and have not obtained satisfaction, and we therefore presume the authority does not exist; and where there is no law, there is no transgression. But suppose they had produced their authority, to what would their opposition have amounted? To a riot, and no farther. What course did Fries take in this scene? Humanity and tenderness, wherever his interposition was necessary, and he was present, characterized him. So far from subverting the government; so far from preventing the execution of its laws; so far from injuring or punishing these assessors while entirely in his power, he prevented the very people who were with him from doing those acts, and he himself was industrious to release them, and lead them into a place of safety. If conduct like this is to be construed into the crime of treason, what act, I ask, will not by and by? If this is treason, it is unhappy for us, for thousands in the United States have been guilty of the same thing. Because a law exists, must we acquiesce implicitly? have we not a right, as freemen, to think? have we not a right to object to it? It is impossible that we should be all of one mind with respect to the beneficial consequences of a law; some difference of opinion will necessarily exist. The opposition was manifested in different places, but it was all to the same law. But the opposition did, in no instance, amount to a traitorous intention, nor was it ever manifested in their conduct from the beginning to the end. I ask you, if Fries ever took any active part in it, so as to distinguish him as their leader. It has been declared that he opposed the law, and likewise that he took men to Bethlehem to rescue the prisoners, but we do not find there was any command given. There was a difference of opinion on their way, whether they should go to Bethlehem or not. If he had commanded these men, and had intended to levy war against the government, some of them would not have returned; but he would have led them on to the object without consultation. Trace him towards Bethlehem: there were several who could not pass the bridge because toll was demanded. When he came up, he said "Count my men." No doubt he meant only the men of his own company, because we do not hear that he paid for more than his own. It does not appear that he had any communication whatever, informing him that such a party were to meet there that day, much less can it be imagined there were any treasonable communications. He went up with his men; but we find, while another company formed before the house, his men stood aloof: they did not form there in the ranks, nor did they come there for that purpose. The consideration that some of their country people were taken prisoners, and they thought it was unconstitutional and oppressive for them to be taken to Philadelphia to be imprisoned and tried, induced them to insist upon the rescue. What did they say, "We will bail them: if they are guilty, they ought to suffer." Bail is refused. The marshal could not have granted that request, but they did not know that. When they found this, their proposal, was rejected, they determine they will have the men. Then John Fries appeared: a man who had used the assessors respectfully: a man whose character was that of humanity: he was chosen to go in to the marshal to demand the prisoners. One said he should be commander of them; but it does not appear that he did take the command at all; but we hear of two others who commanded on that day. Fries went in and conversed on the release of the prisoners with the marshal, who, with great firmness, said that they must be taken from him. He went out again, and the men being pretty warm, he checked them: went a second and third time: all his aim was to prevent the shedding of blood. He pledged himself to the marshal that no harm should come to him from him or his company.

If the object of these people had been of a general nature, men so obnoxious in the county as Balliott, Henny, and Eyerly would not have escaped their vengeance or resentment, when they were so much within their power. Had their conduct been stamped with treason, they would not have been satisfied with rescuing the prisoners: the officers would have suffered; but not one, we find, was hurt. One strong trait, worthy your observation, is, that their view in going to Bethlehem was not to prevent the operation of the law, but simply to rescue the prisoners; and in this their conduct cannot amount to more than a riot and rescue: an offence defined, as well as its punishment, in an act of congress. As the overt act must be laid in the county where the offence was committed, and if it is true that treason was not committed at Bethlehem, where shall we look for it? The gentlemen will not attempt to prove, I presume, that the beginning of the treasonable act was in Bucks county, and its completion at Bethlehem. But Bucks has nothing to do with the present indictment at all, and ought not to be brought into view.

Mr. Ewing then referred to Fost. Cr. Law, 210, and 1 Hale, P. C. 143, and Lord George Gordon's Case, each of which, he said, far exceeded the case of the prisoner at the bar. But, he observed, as the time and patience of the jury, to which he felt himself so much indebted, had been so severely tried already in this lengthy trial; and as the defence had been so ably handled by Mr. Dallas, and what remained would be, he had no doubt, well conducted by the justly acknowledged great talents of another learned advocate, he should forbear enlarging. The verdict you give, gentlemen, said he, will not only be of vast moment to the prisoner, but will also establish a precedent for future similar cases, and it will be to your immortal honour if you preserve and decide with impartiality and firmness; while, on the contrary, it will be a source of shame and disgrace if you do otherwise, through the influence of prejudice or the operation of external circumstances. I can safely trust the life of my client in your hands, under a consciousness that those feelings of humanity, and a just estimation of the evidence, will outweight all other considerations, and thus will your righteous verdict gain you the gratitude of your country, the approbation of your own consciences, and the warmest thanks of the defendant.

Mr. Sitgreaves.—I acknowledge the propriety of an observation which dropped from one of the counsel for the prisoner in the course of his address to you: that is, that those who are concerned for the prosecution in criminal cases should not endeavour, by their eloquence or ingenuity, to divert the attention of the jury from the truth, or to stretch that truth so as to give them more unfavourable impressions on the facts than they will bear. This, I must acknowledge, would have been unnecessary advice to me, because the views I shall be able to take of this subject will be but feeble and imperfect. In the course of my limited and short experience, I have been but little conversant with criminal courts, and have paid but little attention to the Criminal Code, and never have been engaged in a case so important as the present, my public duties having, for some years past, drawn me from the bar. It may not be wondered, then, if I have not been able to bring into this court talents equal to meet those cared to the assistance of the prisoner. I must therefore say I shall not be able to do justice to the case. I confess I feel a desire that those persons who have been guilty of this second outrage and disgrace brought on the state of Pennsylvania may feel the punishment the law inflicts. I hope you and every one who hears me will join in this sentiment, for on it hangs much of our peace and security. I have no objection to going still farther. My lot is cast in that part of Pennsylvania where this unfortunate circumstance occurred. I feel particularly for the good order, peace, and prosperity of that part of the state; but I have unhappily seen it in such a situation that all the harmony of society was destroyed; and if I were not to feel a strong desire that peace, harmony, and good order should be restored, I should be destitute of humanity; for we all know that crimes can only be prevented by inflicting suitable punishments on the delinquents. I wish, gentlemen, that the law should be executed against those who were criminal; but when I say so, let me not say that I wish the prisoner at the bar to be executed. No: my earnest wish is that the general good of society may be procured. This man must be tried by the evidence that is brought against him, and upon that alone he must stand for his guilt or innocence.

Having said thus much, I begin now to premise one or two things which I think should be altogether set aside, but which have been much insisted upon. You have been told that the prisoner appears here on the charge of treason, under all the disadvantages of denunciation by the president of the United States in his proclamation. Any of the assertions in that proclamation are not to have weight on your minds, nor will it operate against the prisoner. He is to be tried by the evidence only, and you are not to regard anything you have heard out of doors before this trial commenced. Nothing should operate to doom the prisoner to a harder fate than the law, supported by fair testimony, provides. It is also as true, that nothing contained in that proclamation should operate to the benefit of the prisoner: if it should not convict him, no more should it acquit him. The analogy which has been drawn does not exist between this proclamation and the riot act of England, as you have been told; but even if it did, the inference would not be just. You were told that all who disperse on the reading of that Act are pardoned for crimes previously committed. It is not so. But more of that presently. The proclamation of the president was issued for one purpose, and the riot act of England, is read for another. The president has no authority to call forth a military power but under certain circumstances. Wherever a combination should form which is too strong for the civil power to quell, then the military may be called in to aid the civil, but with a humanity intending to prevent the effusion of human blood, and to call out military force as seldom as possible, the law has provided that a proclamation shall be previously issued, that the offenders may disperse peaceably to their homes; but there is not a syllable about pardon in it. The president has the power to pardon, it is true, but he has not done it by that proclamation. The riot act, which passed in the reign of George I., was enacted in order to prevent tumultuous assemblies: if people refused to depart within one hour after it was read, they were guilty of felony, for which they were to suffer death, although the offence before was only a misdemeanour, yet the refusal to depart makes it felony; but it cannot be pretended that any such departure excused them from the riot, but, on the contrary, prosecution and conviction frequently take place for that crime, although they should disperse; and therefore it does not affect the merits of the case. The proclamation is as a blank paper before us, and therefore we must examine this case upon its own independent merits.

Gentlemen, in summing up this case on the part of the United States, the method most natural to adopt is, First, to consider the law as relating to this subject; secondly, what was the amount of the offences perpetrated at Bethlehem: and, thirdly, inquire whether the facts produced in evidence are such as to convict the prisoner, and make him guilty of the charge in the indictment as applying to his particular case.

First, with respect to the law on treason. I should have expected it was so well understood that there would have been no difference amongst us, however we might differ on its application to the prisoner; yet unfortunately there is, and we must endeavour to meet those objections. The statement which was made to you at the opening by myself, and a statement by the attorney of the district, I believe to be correct: I am confirmed in that opinion, and have no doubt it will be given to you by the court in the charge as correct. We are not at this day to distract ourselves with theory: The law of Edward III. of England, called by some "the sacred statute," and by others the parliament who enacted it is called "The Blessed Parliament," that law and our constitution have adopted the same words. The judges in England, as eminent for their patriotism, as eminent for their tenderness, and as eminent for their ability as any ever were in this country, have solemnly settled this particular in a variety of instances, and unfortunately, young as this country is, there has been the necessity for a court of the United States for this district to settle the principle likewise. The adjudications under this statute were made by men all well known for their love of liberty. We have no need to conjure up a different exposition, or different form of construction, than what has already been admitted in both countries: indeed, it is what cannot be shaken at this day. It is, that all insurrections by a multitude of people with intention to usurp by violence or intimidation the lawful authority of the government in matters of a general and public concern, in which the insurgents have no interests distinct from the rest of the community, is treason. From the best consideration I have been able to give the subject, I have formed this definition, which I believe comprises the whole that can be said about it, and I believe no more: I think this assertion will appear to be justified by the best authorities. If this description is just, the offence is clearly settled, and amounts to "levying war against the United States." In the most essential parts, I think this rule has been settled by the counsel for the prisoner.

The intention, which constitutes the gist of the offence, is proved to have been to some general object; if the intention was to gratify some private concern or interest, even if there be all the apparatus of war, as guns, fifes, drums, &c., whatever violence should be committed under it, it cannot amount to treason, because the intention is not to a public matter, whatever other crime it may amount to, and whatever enormities may be committed. This may be the case, in order to gratify some particular passion, or some particular interest. It is the intention, which distinguishes treason from other crimes: Riot is generally much like it, but not being of a public nature, is only a misdemeanour: Treason, on the contrary, is the greatest crime known to the laws of any country. Lord Mansfield, at the trial of Lord George Gordon, expresses the same opinion. If this is a true position, it is certainly an irresistible inference, that insurrection for the purpose of suppressing and preventing the execution of a public law, is to prevent or obtain a public object, and of course must be high treason within the rule of our constitution. Yet this has been repeatedly denied by the gentleman to be high treason; nay, he even went on so far as to say, that in England no such thing had taken place; he says it must be a combination to oppose all the laws; or, at least, to force the repeal of a law. Gentlemen, I think I have stated enough to convince you that this is erroneous: If treason is the unlawful pursuit of an object of a public nature, then the suppression of a public law is treason. But I would not have you rest on my definition, if I cannot bring you full proof in favour of it. See 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17, § 25; 1 Hale, P. C. 133. And this position is confirmed still further by a precedent of our own. U. S. v. Vigol [Case No. 16,621], &c. I consider this settles the question beyond all doubt, and it ought to rest so forever, the decision was so serious and solemn in both countries. I shall assume this as an acknowledged point throughout the whole of my inquiry. I should have added the opinion of Mr. Erskine, in Lord George Gordon's trial. Speaking on the treason statute, he says—None of them have said more than this, that war may be levied, not only by destroying the constitution, or the government itself, but by assuming the appearance of war, to endeavour to suppress a law which it has enacted. It is certain that British cases go much farther, and if it was necessary, and the case required it, it could be justified by decisions in England upon points infinitely less strong than those I have quoted: points which were settled at a very early period, which neither the parliaments nor the courts have ever interposed to change. Cases of public grievances, whether real or pretended, whether they grow out of law or out of practice, as pulling down all enclosures, &c., which are the invasions of private right, from its universality—is high treason. Again, usurping the powers of the government by pulling down all bawdy houses, is high treason. The case referred to by Mr. Bradford, in Mifflin county, was, that a particular judge was driven from the bench: they did not oppose the sitting of the court, but they had a resentment against the individual, and therefore the prosecution was for riot. This will assist us in our farther inquiries upon the present occasion. This crime is said not to be treason, but a rescue and bare obstruction of process, and within the sedition law, or within a clause of the penal code, and therefore not treason. But whatever nature an offence may be of itself, if it is accompanied with this particular act of treason, the act becomes treason: I willingly admit that a rescue of prisoners may be without treason: a person may be willing to risk the law rather than his friend should suffer, and may therefore rescue him; this would be but misdemeanour: If ten men in arms go to an officer and rescue his prisoner, if it be done in a private manner, it is no more than a misdemeanour; but if these same ten men in arms go from motives of a public nature, then it becomes treason. The intention, therefore, makes the crime to differ. It is said farther, that the legislature of the United States have passed a solemn opinion upon it, and that they have called it no more than a combination of certain facts; a rescue, &c., against which it has provided; and therefore it cannot now be called treason. I think this received a good answer by Judge Wilson, —U. S. v. Mitchell, [Case No. 15,788],—and the objection was solemnly overruled by the court. The sedition act was not made at that time, to be sure; but if it had, there can be no doubt but it would receive the same answer, and meet the same fate by this judge if read in objection. But the first section of the sedition act describes a different sort of combination, and is not levying of war. There must be of necessity a conspiracy in levying war, but there may not be one in an unlawful combination.

(Judge PETERS.—Whatever the crime would have been without a treasonable intention, with a treasonable intention it would constitute the overt act.)

Mr. Sitgreaves.—The cases in the books are strongly demonstrative of this particular. In Benstead's Case, Fost. Cr. Law, 212, "certain unpopular measures having passed in the council, the odium was thrown on the Archbishop of Canterbury. A paper was pasted up in London, exhorting the apprentices to rise and sack the archbishop's house at Lambeth, and accordingly some thousands went with a declaration that they would tear the archbishop in pieces." It was not attacking the individual, but the officer, that became high treason. The same with respect to the attack on General Neville's house during the Western insurrection; the attack on him was, because he was an officer, and therefore being upon the office and not the man, it was upon the government, and high treason.

Such is the general opinion of treason: the great inquiry will now be, what was the intention with which the offence at Bethlehem was perpetrated? It is allowed to be a rescue; it is conceded also that there was an obstruction of process: If it was so, it was a part of the general system which, being of this public nature, obtains the magnitude and operation of treason. Before I go into the examination of this, I will make an observation on what has been said: that the overt act must be proved in the county where it is laid. I heard this position, but I did not discover any application of it, and therefore I am at a loss to know how to treat it. There exists in England, and in the state of Pennsylvania, a form in the direction to the grand jury, which deserves notice; they are sworn to inquire for the body of the county. This causes considerable difficulty, particularly where something done out of the county is required as an ingredient in the charge, and if the beginning of a crime was in one county, and its completion in another, the difficulty would be greater; but even those difficulties are remedied. The idea of his houour, Judge PETERS, the other day, appears to be sound. That a district is the same as it respects the United States, as a county is to a state, and, therefore, the grand jury are drawn, not from the body of the county, but from the body of the district, and the whole extent of the district is equally connected with the venue, if it be laid there. As to the evidence, therefore, I consider the crime may be laid in one county and proved in another. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 46, § 182. I consider whatever rule applies in England, or in our state governments relative to counties, is the same respecting districts under the general government of the United States; likewise, if the overt act be proved in the county where it is laid, you may go out of the county for evidence to show the intention with which it was committed. This, I think, cannot be denied. In Fost. Cr. Law, 9, we see that an overt act not laid, may be brought as evidence to support one that is laid, in order to show the intention.

With respect to hearsay evidence, the rule of law is, that the circumstance of the oral testimony is regarded, as it may tend to establish other evidence, though of itself it be no proof. There are a variety of instances in which it is necessary to be admitted, though there is a rule against it in others. In all cases where proof is to be made by evidence of general reputation, it is useful; so, upon this occasion, it is competent to us to prove the general state of the country; if proper to show the general state of a country where insurrection prevails, it is as proper in order to show the general combination, the design and intention, because it may be the only effectual way of coming at that knowledge. For instance; this information, which was received by the commissioner in the discharge of his official duty, is proper evidence to show why the law was not carried into effect, and, consequently, the criminal spirit of the country. Poph. 152.

Mr. Sitgreaves then went into the case of Lord George Gordon, which had not been represented to the jury by Mr. Dallas to his satisfaction. He related the circumstances of that riot at length. He said the acquittal of that gentleman was not a certain proof of his innocence; doubts might have arisen on the minds of the jury as to the sufficiency or character of the evidence, or there may have been a contradiction of testimony, by which all the credit of it would be taken away. Besides, it did not appear to him that the act of high treason was committed; the multitude who accompanied Lord George to the parliament house, did not go to compel a repeal of the law, or to overawe the parliament, but from a report that the numerous signatures were not rightly obtained, they went to stamp truth on the instrument, and convince parliament of the respectability of the signers. Besides, the main point of evidence of what a person heard Lord Gordon say in the lobby, was received doubtfully by the jury. Many things went to make the testimony not so unambiguous as it ought to be on a trial for life or death, and on that account, perhaps, the learned judge charged them, if a doubt hung upon their minds, to acquit the prisoner. Upon the whole, no inference can be drawn from that case.

Gentlemen, another extraordinary position was taken, by both the counsel, in defence of the prisoner. It was said, that it could be no offence to rescue prisoners who were taken up for acts committed against men who acted without authority, nor to oppose men who had not authority to assess under this law. It was attempted to be shown you that some of the assessors had not received their warrants agreeably to the act of congress, and, thence, all the outrages were tolerated! I do not suppose that the gentlemen, engaged for the prisoner, mean to go beyond the case in which they are engaged, but I must say that their zeal on this occasion, has introduced a dangerous principle. If the apostle of any insurrection had come reeking from the gore of Europe, and had preached up to you this doctrine, he could not have done it more completely than those gentlemen; agreeably to this, the whole country may raise themselves into array against those who, de facto, exercise the authority of the government and the laws, yet, if called to account, the court must be informed, if the ingenuity of the counsel can find a fault in the appointment of the persons engaged in the execution of the laws, that they have not transgressed the laws, and upon that account! Is not this at once sapping the foundation of society, and by a kind of encouragement of insurrection, striking hard at the root of all government? This is an opposition, in my opinion, upon a dangerous and destructive ground. I am not disposed, at this time, to enter into any argument whether it is necessary to prove the appointment of the officers, but, admitting it is true, that upon the indictment of persons for obstruction of process, or obstruction of a public officer in his duty, it is no offence without he prove his due appointment, yet it does not follow that facts given in evidence to prove an outrage, should require all that strictness of examination. You will observe that the prisoner does not stand charged with anything but the rescue at Bethlehem; he is not now charged with the offences he committed in Bucks, or anywhere else, much less with anything where he was not present. These previous transactions are given you to show the intention with which the last outrage was committed; it is only to show the tendency of the design. These gentlemen exercised the offices, and it does not appear that there was the least doubt expressed in those counties of their authority, neither by the prisoner nor any person whatever, who associated with him, at any time or on any occasion; their opposition was not founded on any such pretext, but it grew merely out of the law, and, therefore, it must appear that the outrage was an unequivocal fact, conducted with the intention, so far as we can collect, to defeat the law. On these grounds there is no necessity for proof of due appointment. But what are the objections, or what proof do they require? There is no pretensions to a doubt respecting the legal appointment of any officer but the two assessors at Penn in Northampton, and Milford in Bucks; Mr. Eyerly himself tells you, that all the rest were appointed by the board of commissioners, and that at Penn, the assessor refused, and Mr. Balliott had the blank to fill up. Respecting the other, Mr. Foulke supplied the place of Clark, who held his appointment, and Mr. Foulke was appointed to assist him. How, then, gentlemen, from those two cases, could a general inference be warranted that the appointments were irregular, and upon that ground, these outrages be justified? We have heard much about the danger of following English precedents, and about the words "high treason." There is a species of treason in England which cannot exist here; that is, conspiring against the life of the king, and speaking of mere words, which have frequently been construed into that crime. It has been a question of great doubt whether words can be called treason, but in that country or this, it is necessary to prove the intention with which a crime was committed; and, therefore, mere words, though it is true cannot convict, yet if a man has done a lawless act, we may exemplify the design by words, even of the prisoner himself. With respect to an action done publicly and notoriously, that is a matter capable of positive and absolute evidence, plain to the senses; those who see it can tell of it, but there can be no way of diving into the heart. If the party himself, from that recess, should develop his designs, these declarations made, either by himself or others who heard him, can prove the intention of his actions, and for that purpose is good evidence.

Gentlemen, I have now said all, which I think necessary, with respect to the law on treason. I am confident I have not done justice to it; but what I have omitted will be amply supplied by the attorney of the district, and their honours upon the bench. I shall now proceed to investigate the facts as they have appeared in evidence, and apply the law to those facts, in order to show you what share of guilt the prisoner transacted. In doing which I shall only select the most prominent features of the testimony which may go to prove my position.

First, with respect to levying war. I think it will require but few words to show that there has been an insurrection in the three counties; that at Bethlehem there was a multitude of people in arms, amounting to the full sense of the words of "levying war with arms;" the insurgents had all the apparatus and accoutrements of a regular military force, and they went there in military array. This is proved by fifteen witnesses, not by two, merely. It is farther certain that this multitude of people perpetrated atrocious and lawless offences, and in contempt of all legal authority, after solemn, reiterated, and repeated warning; that the marshal, conformably to that humanity which characterized him, sent a deputation to them, requiring them to go home and to abandon their purpose; that he selected persons who were most likely, from their political opinions, to procure the object: but, nothing would do for them short of what they set out upon, and the mission failed.

We will next consider for what purpose this outrage was committed. It was said to be simply for the purpose of releasing the prisoners; this was the abstract and naked design. If such is the fact, the prisoner must be acquitted: but if he had an object beyond that; if it should appear that this was one link in the chain of opposition to the laws, then it mounts higher, it mounts to treason. It is my purpose to show you that their object was higher than a mere rescue, and that it did not flow from any particular regard to the prisoners in custody, but it was a public opposition, and one means used with a view to prevent the execution of a law of the United States. Gentlemen, the mere recital of one or two facts will be sufficient to bring this home to the mind of any man who is not determined to shut his eyes against plain testimony.

It is in full and complete proof before you, that, in the counties of Northampton and Bucks, the opposition was almost general, and that in the township of Milford, all along the river Lehigh, and both sides of the mountain, there was a union in opposition to the law, uniformly conducted with system, menace, and threats; that the persons who thought proper to assist in the execution of that law, were previously intimidated not to accept of it, and after they had accepted, they were prevented from executing it, and in many places until the march of the army, the law did actually remain unexecuted. I shall not state to you the particulars of this evidence, but remark that the system was general, and that it was accompanied with threats and menace, and that the friends of the law, and those who were peaceably inclined, were prevented, under the influence of this terror, from speaking their minds on the occasion; and even the magistrates of the country were so impressed, or so intimidated, as not to perform the duties of their office: that the law was completely prostrate, and persons who would have given testimony against them for these proceedings, were afraid to do it. In the course of this proceeding, it was repeatedly declared, that if any person should be arrested for opposition to the law, they should be supported. This system of menace was general; it was not an opposition grounded particularly upon the obnoxious characters of persons who were employed in the execution of the law, but upon the law itself. There was an offer of a particular commissioner to use his influence, that they might choose their own officer, but that would not satisfy their object; no, they said if they accepted that offer, it would be approving the law, and that they would not do. Mr. Eyerly, the commissioner, had been for many years the representative of this district in the legislature. Mr. Balliott had been in the legislature, in the council, and in the state convention, which proves they were men of confidence in their district, and that the particular dislike now exemplified was not to them as men, but as officers under the law. One of the counsel for the prisoner went minutely into all their views, and the veins through which they acted, and endeavoured to palliate or excuse the conduct of these insurgents; while, at the same time, he appears to know what were the views of government in prosecuting the delinquents; but there is no necessity to answer that, because the prisoner is not on his trial for obstruction of process. I most solemnly disavow that political party spirit enters at all into this prosecution, and beg the jury will dismiss all party spirit and prejudice from their minds. However we may differ on points of law, we must agree with them that the people had a right to examine and explain the law, and express their dislike to this or any other law. Their opposition to this law might have been right or wrong; it does not alter the case; and God forbid that any motive of the kind should influence us to revenge. These are natural rights under a free government, which every citizen has a right to exercise. We are not now inquiring into the nature or grades of any or all those particular offences; whether this particular outrage is a riot or that a misdemeanour, or whether it amounts to treason; we are simply showing to you, from the evidence collected, the weight and force of those facts; to wit, that there was opposition to this law, and that universally, and that these people did their utmost to endeavour to stop the execution of the law; and that these acts were in strict union with the last act at Bethlehem, of the intention of which the previous acts collectively are plain proof; for, certain it is, that an act illegal in its nature, may receive color and complexion from one that is strictly legal. Suppose a man had reduced his thoughts on the subject to writing, without any intention of communicating it to any person; suppose, in that writing, his intentions are fully declared with which such writing was drawn; then this act, though innocent in itself, would be competent evidence to show the intention with which a subsequent outrage was perpetrated, and it would be in full proof to show that a violent opposition to the laws in that county, particularly to the act for the valuation of houses, and that it was not from a personal or private motive, but generally an aversion to the law itself, so that a long time after the period fixed for its execution, the law actually remained unfulfilled. In several parts, the people returned to a sense of their duty and submitted to the laws, and happy would it have been for the government as well as themselves if they had all done it; for, then, this investigation would have been prevented. But, in some parts, the marshal, and those who were with him, who were not volunteers as has been insinuated, but acted in conformity to their duty as public officers—these were insulted, arrested, and obstructed as officers. The marshal was abused by numbers of people at Millar's town, and he was not able, though he touched Shankwyler, to execute process on him. Gentlemen, all I ask of you is to connect the circumstances in your minds,—the general course of events which gave rise to what afterwards was consummated at Bethlehem. The prisoners who were rescued were desirous of accompanying the marshal to Philadelphia; they would rather not be liberated; they were taken from various parts of the country, unknown to each other, and more so to the persons who rescued them; there was no private attachment, regard, or resentment; what, therefore, could be the motive of the insurgents? Could it be interest? No! it would be bad policy to spend dollars to oppose a tax law rather than cents to support it. Was it a private, distinct interest they had, which did not concern the community? If not, agreeably to Judge Foster, it was treason. I have said that these prisoners were not known to the insurgents; I would make the exception of Shankwyler; but you will observe that he never did surrender himself to the custody of the marshal, and though some said they were come to see him as a neighbour, others to see his partner (accuser), &c., yet he was not de facto in custody. It could not be to rescue him that this large armed body met, because he could have been safe by keeping at home. But one solemn fact respecting the others demands a solemn inference. The Lehigh prisoners had cordially submitted to the law, and thus desired to recommend themselves to the mercy of the government by penitence, and actually at last gave the marshal their individual assurances to meet him at Philadelphia. I ask, then, by way of inference, what becomes of all the private object or the neighbourhood esteem necessary to vindicate these insurgents? It was not for the prisoners' sakes, but through opposition to the law, that they did this act, for it is plain that the persons in custody of the marshal were afraid as much to trust themselves in the hands of the mob, as Mr. Eyerly or Mr. Balliott were. They doubtless had a treasonable, a rebellious determination to oppose the government; the previous declaration of the party was, that "if any persons were there in confinement who were opposed to the law, they should be rescued," was a plain indication of their opposition to the law, and that this rescue was a part of the general opposition. Mr. Sitgreaves then went into a review of the evidence respecting the meetings at Upper Milford, and at Schymer's where, he said, opposition to the law marked the conduct of the people, but at Lower Milford, the prisoner at the bar by his own confession, eminently displayed his intention; and, after recapitulating the evidence, proceeded. Gentlemen, when these facts are taken into view, so immediately preceding and so directly pointing to what took place at Bethlehem, can you hesitate, as honest men desiring to do justice, and speak impartially between the prisoner at the bar and his country, that he went there, not merely to rescue prisoners, but to execute a part of the general opposition to that law of the United States? If he has done so, he is guilty of treason. Let us now attend to the evidence which grows out of the avowal of the parties themselves at Bethlehem, at the time of the outrage. These are previous indications, which certainly point as truly to the intention as the needle points to the pole.

After a full consideration of the testimony, Mr. Sitgreaves proceeded.—

Here, then, gentlemen, the evidence closes. We find this man is not of a yielding texture; he still continued in his opposition, even at the time there was a recommendation to submit to the laws: at a meeting at Marks', it was determined to recommend submission to the officers, and all the laws of the United States, and to desist from opposition to the laws. This is proof that there had been opposition to the laws in the three counties. When these things were done, Mitchel asked Fries if he ever did intend to oppose the laws. "Yes, I did," was his answer. In the testimony of Mr. Roberts, we have proved the general state of opposition, as well as the guilt of the prisoner: this witness was called by the prisoner's counsel. To be sure he proved the prisoner's penitence and submission. If he had not been guilty, he could not have been penitent. He said he had not slept for several nights: an acknowledgment so much the more pertinent to prove that he had been doing what he knew was wrong.

Gentlemen of the jury, I have endeavoured to show you this subject in all the points of view I am able, so as to give you a right understanding of the facts; and permit me to declare to you that I have not wilfully perverted either the law or the facts, to the best of my knowledge; yet it is possible I may have done it; if so, you will be undeceived in those particulars by the court. Gentlemen, you have a solemn duty to perform: we have all had a disagreeable and tedious undertaking: I pray you to do it in such a way as may do justice to the prisoner at the bar; and at the same time consider how much the happiness, the peace, and tranquility of your country depend upon a fair, impartial and conscientious verdict, which there is no doubt but you will deliver.

Mr. Lewis.—It is now become my duty to address you on behalf of the prisoner at the bar, who is arraigned before you on the important issue of life or death: I do it with the more confidence, because I have not been able to learn from the counsel for the prosecution, a single instance of English law that comes up to the present case, in good times or in bad times, so as to denominate it treason, except in a determination during the bloody reign of Henry VIII., and that is mentioned among the evils of the time: I have not been able to find it under any existing circumstances whatever, and yet any person who is the least acquainted with English history or law, must know that the excise law and the shop-tax, as well as some others, have led to riot and insurrections, and a variety of trials have been held upon them. It may be right to make the experiment upon the present case; but, unless this prosecution is warranted, established in good times, and upon solid grounds, I am sorry to say, but truth compels me to declare, that it is a burning torch in the hand of a madman; it is a flaming sword in the hand of a tyrant, and has done immense injury in England. I know there is no intention in the attorney, in this case, to do anything that is wrong; yet I wish more reflection had been used, before the prosecution had gone on. Thus it was in England respecting Hardy, Tooke, Thelwel, and others; those who most understood the whole of the charges were not satisfied to call their crime a misdemeanour, though there was no direct point, in ancient or modern law, warranting any other indictment, yet the experiment was tried; but an English jury appreciated it in its proper light, and they resolved to do nothing which their ancestors had not done, not even in the application of constructive treason; and, therefore, after a mature discussion, they returned a verdict of not guilty. When, on the present occasion, the causes and proceedings are duly considered, I am satisfied you will feel it a duty you owe to the prisoner now before you, and to your country, to pronounce a like verdict. It is not because a circumstance any way similar to this has once taken place, and been argued upon the same grounds, that therefore it is right it should take place upon the present occasion; adopting a principle of this kind has often made courts, in arbitrary times, take gigantic strides over the statute of Edward III., so that a man could not know how to look, act, speak, or even think, without difficulty and danger. I have said that I am not able, except during the mandatory reign of Henry VIII., to find the trace of a single instance where rescue, under any circumstances whatever, has been found to amount to treason, and if succeeding ages did not consider themselves bound by that practice, I trust you will not sit here to establish a law, but to give it such a construction as justice demands of you. I have undertaken this cause the more readily, because I do not undertake to justify, to palliate, nor to excuse; but I censure the transactions which have given rise to this trial as much as the counsel for the prosecution does: I am as sensible as they are, that those people violated the law without cause; and I came not here to set up a mock excuse for them: No, it is my opinion that they merit exemplary punishment, but that punishment must be comformable to law, or, when once the law is overturned, the consequences will be incalculable; offences higher than the present may be committed with impunity by some, while those of less grade will be severely punished in others. It is not for me to say that the prisoner is entirely innocent: To me, to the court, and to you, it is totally immaterial whether he has acted wisely or foolishly, guilty or innocently, if not guilty of the offence upon which he now stands upon his deliverance. I may be asked here, how I came to defend a man who, I had admitted, had violated the law, and in some degree set the government at defiance? My reasons are these: It is the privilege of every man to have a fair trial, and not to be condemned without being heard, especially in affairs of a highly criminal nature; few men are capable of defending themselves before a court, and in a capital case, from the perturbations of their minds, still less so than in any other: And woe betide that country, where a man so charged should not be entitled to every assistance that he can procure! By the statute of William III., which is the first that ever allowed counsel at all, the court were directed to assign counsel, who were obliged to render all the assistance in their power; the same is allowed by our act of congress (page 112, § 29); for without that, he may be considered as condemned unheard, and the public mind would be left unsatisfied as to the innocence or guilt of the accused. Those who have entertained the surprise I have hinted at, at my being thus engaged, have doubtless acted from the best of motives; but, not satisfied with this, and wishing to spill the blood of a man before he is proved guilty, some calumniating scoundrel has, in a public print, had the hardihood, during the present trial, to impute to the unhappy prisoner's counsel, the base influence of gold, when all concerned know very well that the prisoner has not a farthing to give, and not a farthing, nor even a promise of any, was ever given to those who have undertaken his defence. I will say no more respecting this vile attempt, but that the law says no publication shall take place which may tend to influence a court or jury, while a trial is pending, and therefore it is a high contempt thrown upon the court, and upon you, and the probability is that either the author or the publisher will be brought to answer for his conduct.

There is one thing, gentlemen, I would wish to caution you against. There are many citizens who suppose that the troops will never turn out again unless a conviction takes place on the present occasion, and that an insurrection will soon appear again: but this is paying a poor compliment to our volunteer troops, to suppose they would not be satisfied without shedding blood: Gentlemen, let no arguments or considerations have weight with you but what are supported by law, and then decide, regardless of the consequences. Another matter I would caution you against, is one with which I found very considerable difficulty to cope; but at length I divested myself of it, and I pray you to do the same: I mean all kinds of prejudice as to the party tried and trying. Our constitution and our laws are wisely calculated to preserve the happiness and interest of ourselves and posterity: our government is composed of tried patriotic characters, and our political bark, with such men at the helm, need not fear a storm; but notwithstanding this, it is vilified and abused. These are grounds for prejudice to work upon, and it is difficult, I can say by experience, to avoid its influence; but when we come to the sacred temple of justice, even if to decide between A and B, on a matter of trifling property, we are sworn to an impartial and unprejudiced decision; and how much more it is demanded of us in a case of life and death? It is necessary to enter that temple divested of opinion or bias, otherwise there is not a fair scope for our reasonable faculties to act, nor can our consciences be acquitted of guilt. I will take the liberty of reminding you that your oath is "that you will well and truly try, according to evidence;" this obliges you to expel everything from your minds which you might have heard out of doors respecting the whole business of the insurrection, excepting such only as proved by the evidence. Your present situation, gentlemen, imposes upon you a duty which is highly important; important as it concerns your country, the prisoner, and likewise yourselves: it concerns him, because his life or death is, in some measure, placed in your hands; it is upon your verdict it depends whether he shall continue with industry to spend the remainder of his life with his family and friends, or whether he must leave them all, and be suspended between heaven and earth to a gazing multitude. Your decision is of importance to your country, because we are now treading upon the dangerous and, I had almost said, unbeaten ground of constructive treason, and because it may and will operate as a precedent to future proceedings. Nor is it less important to yourselves, because, if, owing to honest intention and mistaken views, you should go farther than a reflecting moment would dictate, in some circumstance of a public nature which might possibly occur, the work would be irretrievably done, the reflection would come too late, and pardon would be out of the question.

I will now proceed to consider the particular offence imputed in the indictment to John Fries, the prisoner at the bar, by which he must be convicted, if at all. (Mr. Lewis here read the indictment.) To this indictment he has pleaded not guilty, and you are sworn to decide upon the issue. The question is not whether he has, or has not, been guilty of a riot or rescue: he may have been guilty of a high misdemeanour, of this or the other description; but the question is, has he ordered, prepared, and levied war against the United States? That is the language of our constitution, and the act of congress formed thereupon. In order to insure the conviction of this man at all events, it has been stated to you, and that with no small degree of confidence, that, as the framers of our constitution have adopted the words of the English statute, the courts are bound to admit the expositions which have taken place upon it from time to time in the English courts: though we have laws of our own, yet in order to know the true meaning of our constitution, we are to go back into the remotest and most dark ages of English history, to understand its meaning! The English statute, or the opinions of the courts of justice, are equally become part of the Code in that country, it is true, and it was as possible for the framers of our constitution to have extended the one as the other to this country, had they chosen so to do, but their not doing it, is a presumptive proof that it was not acceptable. To me it appears strange, that while the English statute is not in force here, the English construction of that statute should! That is a position I never mean to subscribe, but controvert it from the beginning to the end of this case. As we have enacted laws of our own, and have not extended the laws of England to this country, we must put our own construction upon them, and not the determination of an English court. Neither the English laws nor the opinions of English judges are to be regarded any farther than is consistent with our good, to appreciate which, the situation of the times when those opinions were given, and whether the judges were dependent or independent, are important considerations. I do not mean to find fault with English decisions in general: I believe that with regard to property, since the judges have been rendered independent of the crown, it is as wisely administered as the laws of any part of the globe are: but they were not always in a situation to give impartial opinions, when they held their station at the will of an arbitrary monarch, who could hasten or delay causes at his pleasure, to which the judges were the most obsequious tools. Such has been the decisions of some periods respecting treason. But it is not true that the very words of the English statute are adopted in our constitution: they very materially differ: the statute of Edward III. does not provide that confession must be made in open court if received at all; it does not specify that two witnesses shall be necessary to establish the fact, but it was left to the court upon principles of common law; nor does it say a single word about an overt act. Since, then, the two statutes are so dissimilar in important points, it would be very wrong to admit of the same construction in both. So careful was our government of the lives of our citizens, viewing the injuries other countries had sustained by indefinite laws, they provided that the crime should be put in the indictment, and supported by the testimony of two witnesses. In England there might be one witness to one overt act, and another to another.

But I shall now proceed to show what does, or what does not amount to levying war: in doing this, we are not to go back to corrupt times, under corrupt judges, nor do I think the observation of those judges are in the least obligatory upon our courts; but how far they will be respected, is another question; we may rest assured they will be regarded no farther than reason will suggest. This I consider of importance, not only at present, but to posterity. Most of our laws, it must be remembered, are from England, and were brought with our ancestors as their birth-right: this was the case wherever British subjects emigrated; but as soon as we became independent states, we enacted laws of our own, although in a great degree copied from British States, but they became new under our constitution. I think, gentlemen, I shall be able to show you, upon the opinions of men sound in law knowledge in England, that the definition of treason in our constitution will not bear the construction that has been put upon theirs at an early period. We have an express and distinct meaning of this crime in our own acts of congress; in the act passed 1790,—volume 1, p. 100 [1 Stat. 112],—section 1 shows what treason is, and particularizes wherein it shall consist. Section 5 defines the punisument which should be inflicted on a rescue of persons committed to custody, or in the hands of the officer. But there was another act passed defining the precise circumstances attending this case—this was passed after the declaration of the judges on the Case of the Western Insurrection—and from its being enacted subsequent to all others upon this species of crime, appears to me to be binding upon our courts: I mean the sedition act. It appears to reach the present case in the fullest extent; the language of that act is, whoever shall combine or conspire, &c., shall be guilty of a high misdemeanour; this act does not specify the number: a township, a county, or twelve counties equally are within the law. Combining to prevent the execution of the law: this reaches the action, whatever may be the number of force used: it is a misdemeanour, and shall be punished with fine and imprisonment, not death. Whether the object shall or shall not be effected, the law says the punishment shall be the same. Here, then, is a solemn declaration made by the legislature itself, the same body that enacted the punishment of death to what they termed treason by a prior law, and surely that authority had the greatest right to put a construction on, or make an alteration in their own law. If there is a legal definition of the crime committed by the prisoner at the bar, this act contains it: every case is here provided for by the punishment of fine and imprisonment, and had a prosecution taken place under this act, a conviction would have been certain, and the punishment would have been rigorous and exemplary.

Under this head of English construction, I would ask how it can apply to us, when we consider that before the act of William III., no person charged with high treason was allowed counsel to plead for him, unless he stated some objection in point of law which made an argument necessary, and even then he could not do it without first admitting the truth of the fact charged against him, and yet all the decisions of English courts alluded to were formed before that period! Further. Not only was the accused not allowed counsel, but if he had hundreds of the most respectable witnesses to prove the falsity of the allegations, he never had a right to bring them forward until the reign of William III. These decisions, gentlemen, of the English courts, which are called up as precedents for us to regard, were formed under these arbitrary circumstances. No counsel allowed, even though the prisoner was deaf and dumb, nor witnesses, if he could even prove he was hundreds of miles distant at the time. Further, to show what dependence can be placed on the sayings of these men, you will observe that, until the time of William III., all the judges held their commissions during royal pleasure only, and even until the first of George III., the judges were never completely independent, and of course were obliged to study the royal pleasure; their opinions being extorted before the trial commenced. The consequence of all this is plain, that no impartial opinion could be given. It was common before trial first to closet these dependent judges and bring them to submission, if their opinions ran counter. Bacon, the greatest, wisest, but meanest of mankind, thus stooped to become the tool of his master. Those who could not thus be brought over were deposed, and more obsequious persons placed in their room, and it was not till they could have a decision thus formed that persons were brought on their trial for high treason. And yet we are referred to these persons to tell us what is the meaning of our own statute on treason! Thus it was that many of the best citizens of England fell a sacrifice, and for no other purpose, many of them, than because they possessed exalted virtue. During the existence of this state of things, the judges would sit silent on their bench during a trial for life, and hear the crown officers, instead of acts and expressions of humanity to the unhappy prisoner, abuse him with the most opprobrious and insulting language. Influenced by this meanness, Sir Edward Coke, while attorney-general, descended to abuse the great and good Sir Walter Raleigh with the vile epithets of "traitor," "viper," and "spider of hell," &c., turning away from him with the greatest scorn: and this was the manner in which trials were commonly managed. See Fost. Cr. Law, 234.

It was well known that the statute of Edward III. made no provision whatever respecting the charging of an overt act in the indictment, nor does it say anything about proof: but a statute enacted in the reign of Edward VI. made two witnesses necessary in cases of high treason; but Foster says no great regard was paid to this better statute till near a century after, and the reason assigned was that it was not for the safety of the crown, or to the common well known rules of legal evidence. It was common to admit one witness of his own knowledge, and another by hearsay, if it was even from the mouth of that one, and at the third or fourth hand, and frequently the depositions were taken out of court to be read, rather than bring them into open court. This must appear an uncommon representation of the administration of justice, but it is a fair picture of the times under which the decisions took place which are brought against us. At the period in which the seven bishops were tried, Lord Camden declares that Justice Powel was the only honest man that sat on the bench. Blessed justice! I know that since the judges have become independent men in England, there has been as much independence in their conduct as in any country; but then, as Hale tells us, these decisions had already taken place, and therefore they must be abode by; but he takes care to caution future judges how they introduce new cases by putting new constructions. The question now is, whether this court and jury are prepared to be bound by judges thus principled and thus circumstanced, to form a decision upon our own law. I contend that these decisions are by no means binding upon us. We have the sedition law, which comprehends the whole case. In 1 Hale, P. C. 132, and 1 Bl. Comm. 69, it appears to be lamented that the independent judges of later days have no power to alter the rules of law established in the dark ages of English jurisprudence; otherwise, we have reason to believe, they would not be in existence at this day. Lord Kenyon, when counsel for Lord George Gordon, declared, that he did not think the parliament of Edward III. ever had any design that constructive treason should exist at all, or any wish to leave room for it to be introduced. We are certainly, therefore, untrammelled by every foreign rule; otherwise the question would be, what rules we should adopt, and what not. It is a rule in law that statutes affecting life, should never extend beyond the letter of the law, so as to leave the possibility of a doubt. If that is a rule respecting penal statutes in general, abundant more so is it necessary respecting the high crime of treason. Above all things, if bad times should ever happen in this country—and bad times may come here as well as they have in all other countries—it will be of vast importance that the law should be known precisely; it will be of consequence to a citizen to know on what law he is to be tried, if he becomes the devoted object of any one's resentment, or commits a crime: it is of consequence that the flood-gates of usurpation and tyranny should never be left open, and the liberties of our citizens be thrown away ad libitum on the uncertain ground of construction. 1 Bl. Comm. 88; Fost. Cr. Law, 5S, we read that it ought to be "clearer than life itself."

We now come to examine the true, full, just and reasonable meaning of our own treason statute; for I do not admit that constructive treason ought to exist at all. A line is drawn, and if we ever cross it, where are we to stop? Treason against the United States, we find, consists in "levying war against them," &c. The question is, what is levying war? Levying war may fairly extend to the three following things: First. Where a body of men take up arms, and array themselves in a martial manner against the government, with a view to put an end to its existence. This is its plain natural meaning, but cannot be said to have been transacted by the prisoner at the bar, and therefore requires no farther definition. Secondly. It is expressly levying war, if a part of the Union throw off all allegiance and authority of the United States, totally disregarding its laws and institutions, and act as a divided people as though they did not belong to them. Thirdly. Where laws have been enacted by the Union, pursuant to the constitution of the United States, and a number of people, being dissatisfied, should, of their own authority, by numbers, or force of arms, take possession of the legislative or executive authority, and by this force of arms or numbers should undertake to compel either of the departments of government to act as they dictate, thus robbing the government of its legitimate power, by assuming it themselves.

No doubt the good of posterity was intended in the constitutional definition of treason, and we are to touch it with a trembling hand indeed, lest it moulder, and grow into God knows what. Now, as this is an act which was deliberately formed, if we go upon the dangerous ground of construction, that cannot be done so deliberately: No; I say it was to be handed down pure to posterity, and we ought not even to depart from a letter of it. If liberty of construction is to take place in any degree, by so much it tends to render the constitution vague and uncertain, and we know not where it will end. If the constitution only intended the three definitions of levying war which I have laid down, it is clear that a man cannot overstep those constitutional limits without intending to do it. Go beyond this, and you leave jurors and judges to make the constitution anything or nothing—a mere nose of wax, to be moulded into any form at their will; and they may be excused, because left to exercise their own judgment upon it; but Lord Hale has charged you not to do this, even though encouraged by a parity of reasoning: agreeably to his apprehension, it is deducible that if ever we have a bad president, presidential encroachment may wrest the constitution to everything that may serve any particular purpose. But God forbid either should ever happen.

(Mr. Lewis then went into a full examination of the English law, after which he said): I shall now proceed more particularly to state my reasons for alleging that the crimes with which the prisoner is charged are fully comprehended, and punishment provided for them, in the sedition law. This I shall consider first, as it relates to the rescue independently; secondly, I shall make some observations on the law, independent of the rescue; and thirdly, both together.

It is admitted, that the mere rescue of the persons from the custody of the marshal at Bethlehem, would not amount to treason; and it would not be necessary for me to say a word about that, were it not for the following reasons. Speaking of pulling down meeting-houses, brothels, prisons, &c., the crime is defined (4 Bl. Comm. 129): "Offences against public justice, is obstructing the execution of lawful process." This, there can be no doubt, is an offence at common law, and persons found guilty of a rescue of a person convicted of a crime, are adjudged guilty of the same crime, and would be punishable accordingly, had it not been for our act of congress (the sedition act); but that act reduces a rescue, generally, to misdemeanour. But agreeably to law, persons rescuing others not committed for treason, are not guilty of treason. A case in 4 Bl. Comm. 86, the party himself was guilty of felony at common law by making escape, but I believe it to be an entire new doctrine to make the offence of the accessories or assistants higher than those who are rescued: Rescue of persons for felony has been always felony, for treasons, &c. I think, therefore, it is clear to prove that every exertion has been used to attempt to make treason of this crime, by the gentlemen, but it is as clear that they have searched and tried in vain.

But it is farther said, that this business assumed a generality, and that the object was to defeat a law of the United States, for which purpose a number combined and conspired together, and more effectually to accomplish this, they rescued the prisoners, and therefore committed treason. Were I to admit this, I might call upon the gentleman to support his conclusions by authority, to show that preventing the execution of process, or releasing prisoners before they were carried to jail, is treason. I repeat, that the only case mentioned, is in the disgraceful days of Henry VIII., which I think is inadmissible. But I deny the fact: I deny that there was any combination or conspiracy between the people of Lower Milford, in Northampton county, and those of Bucks county, at all upon the business. First, the people of both counties were alike averse to this law, and for similar reasons. I believe there are many unprincipled men who wish to injure their country, and go about preaching up sedition to the people, which, communicated in different directions, catch fire in the same manner, and perhaps at nearly one period; hence it is that their prejudices and opposition may appear from the same cause, without parties holding the least correspondence. I ask you whether there is a tittle of evidence to prove that ever the prisoner went into Northampton county till this circumstance occurred? was there any communication by writing, or any other way? No, not at all. Upon what foundation can a conjecture arise, then, that there was a combination? You are not to try by conjecture, or wild supposition: no, you are sworn to "well and truly try according to evidence." Does it appear, I ask you to recollect, gentlemen of the jury, that this conduct was instigated by any intercourse in any way held with Northampton county? No, it does not; but there is a strong presumption that the discontents took root and grew to that state without any combination at all. But whether or not treason was committed in Milford township, is not for you at present to say; the overt act is laid at Bethlehem, and there it must be proved, that he levied war upon the United States with a number, or by force sufficient for the purpose, and that with them he combined and conspired, &c. If he did this at all, he did it on the 7th of March, for it does not appear that he ever was there before in his life; now if there was a conspiracy, it must appear that he acted previously, and in concert with others, and the act would have been alike chargeable to all; but this does not appear. It is true Fries was heard to say "we will oppose you, and all the people of Northampton will join us;" but this could easily arise from his having heard that the people of Northampton were dissatisfied with the law, but it does not follow that, because there were discontents in Northampton county, he should be responsible for their actions, particularly since it all, at least, depends upon conjecture. Kelyng, 19, has a case to answer this, where rebellion existed in two parts at one time, but it was determined that this might happen without correspondence, since no such evidence appeared, and therefore no notice was taken of it. Then, gentlemen, if I were for a moment to admit that John Fries had committed treason in Bucks county, which I deny, it would be immaterial upon the present occasion, because upon every indictment for treason, the overt act must be proved in the county. But it is said that doctrine does not apply, each state being to the whole United States as a county to the state, because the grand jury have the district at large to inquire for; and therefore it is immaterial whether laid in one county or the other. If this be sound law, dreadful indeed must be the situation of the people of the United States, if the government should ever fall into different hands from those in which it is now happily placed, because an attorney may, at any time, keep a person, arraigned for a capital offence, in ignorance, till he comes to the place of trial, and of course not prepared to repel it at a very distant place from where the act is laid. But this, I will be bold to say, cannot be law. My reasons for thinking so are, first, the law of congress, called the judiciary act (section 29, vol. 1, p. 67), says, that in cases punishable with death, the trial shall be had in the county where the offence was committed: here I would remark that the law takes notice, not of a state or a district, but of a county, and therefore the analogy drawn by Mr. Sitgreaves, that a district to the United States is the same as a county to a state, is not in point. The trial is to be had in the county unless the judges shall determine that it cannot be had there without great inconvenience. See Fost. Cr. Law, 194. But let the offence be where it may, twelve jurors must be summoned from the county. See page 237 of the same book. If we examine these authorities, they will appear different from what they were represented. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 46, § 34, is an authority to prove that upon a plea of not guilty to a specific charge as to place, &c., in an indictment, if the least variance appears from that place, it is sufficient to acquit the party, and is fatal to the prosecution. It is not necessary for me again to say that you are totally to exclude from your views whatever the prisoner did in Bucks county, since the charge is laid in Northampton, and since an acquittal from that charge will not prevent a prosecution in Bucks county. If it appears that no treason was committed by him on the 7th of March at Bethlehem, you must pronounce him not guilty.

Mr. Lewis then reviewed the testimony of Dellinger on the circumstances which led to the expedition to Bethlehem, which, he contended, had nothing to do with it, save the quo animo. It appeared that they heard Shankwyler was to be there; but it is not pretended that going there upon that account would be treason, and particularly as Shankwyler was not in custody; and it does not appear that the prisoner knew of any others being there at that time. Then the object particularly was to see Shankwyler. When they came to the bridge, it appeared to them that two men were detained at Bethlehem, and it seems they went forward to rescue them. In this they were justifiable; for if the law was violated, it was by Major Nichols, in making an arrest which the law did not authorize him to do. They were illegally detained, and it was lawful for anybody to go and rescue them. 2 Ld. Raym. 1301. I am not disposed to blame the marshal; but I cannot justify him in point of law: his situation, no doubt, rendered it a prudent measure; but it was detaining men by false imprisonment, and was enough to alarm all the people of the state. I mention the circumstance only to prove that there can be no rescue, unless the persons liberated are legally confined. Instead of Fries being guilty for that action, a very worthy man (the marshal) was guilty of assault and battery in the act of detention. If this is fact, how does the affair stand afterwards respecting universality and design? I have justified Fries and the others in leaving the bridge to go up to Bethlehem, and the laws of their country will justify them, because it does not appear that they knew these people were discharged. When they got to Bethlehem, it appeared there were a number of persons under arrest; for, it does not at all appear in evidence that they ever heard before that Fox, Ireman, or the Lehigh prisoners, were there: the gentlemen on the other side only presume it; but you, gentlemen, must not go upon presumption. "You must well and truly try, and true deliverance make, according to evidence." It does not appear they knew of it; they came from a great distance, and from quite another part of the country than where the Bucks county people came from; Fox and Ireman had been just brought in, and none of them knew they were there; however, when they were got there, upon a lawful occasion, hearing of a number of persons being confined there, and that they were to be taken to Philadelphia for what they considered to be no crime, they generally waxed warm; but Fries was cool; he endeavoured to pacify them: he had brought his sword with him, but when he was appointed an ambassador of peace to treat with the marshal he left it behind him.

The whole of the transaction must be viewed as a sudden affray, like numerous cases mentioned in Hale, Foster, &c., where great and sudden riots arose. Where is the proof, I ask, of combination, of association, or of correspondence? None at all: they came there to a man without the least treasonable views, for it was merely by chance they came there at all. There was much rage among the people upon the first impression the knowledge of the prisoners in custody made, and had it not been for the cool conduct of the prisoner at the bar, blood and massacre would have been the immediate consequence, for, no doubt, liquor was operating pretty much in their brains. An altercation took place: they insisted on the prisoners; and in the prosecution of his delegation, from the peremptory demands of the people, he made use of language which I admit was unjustifiable, and violating the law, for which he ought to be punished, but not with death. 1 Hale, P. C. 153. But further: the persons were not in prison, they were only in custody of the marshal. These are materially distinct; the releasing of persons taken to prison, is only a misdemeanour, while releasing them after they are in prison, which is in some measure the sanctuary of the law, is felony. 4 Bl. Comm. 130. The breaking open of prisons generally is treason, but in no case is the releasing prisoners before they are taken there. J. Kelyng, 75, 63; Lord Gordon's Case, Demmaree's Case, 15 State Tr. 544, 600. It would not have been treason, therefore, if a number of persons had actually conspired to rescue these prisoners from the marshal, nor even if they had been confined in a jail, instead of a room, because it was not a general design to break open all prisons, but one only. But, on the contrary, they were not in prison; they were only in custody of the officer who served the process; how, then, in the name of reason and common sense, will it be made to amount to treason when it would not if they had been in jail. But, say the gentlemen, we will not call it rescuing of prisoners, but a general obstruction of the execution of the law, and the means here used were to support that general object. The rescue is of itself a specific offence, and of itself admitted by Mr. Sitgreaves to be only a misdemeanour. If it is so, how it it possible to convert a misdemeanour into a treason, and thus to take away the life of a man when imprisonment only is his desert! But what ground is there alleged for this position? It is said that the arming and arraying a number of men was with this intent. I deny the fact, and it has by no means been proved. The cases referred to in England are treason to a demonstration. Enhancing servant wages could not be done by force but by surrounding the parliament house, and this was justly denominated waging war against the king. Any rising to alter religion must be affected the same way. Religion is established by law in England, and that law must be altered by the parliament; therefore it could not be forcibly altered but by levying war. 4 Bl. Comm. 81. Reforming the laws must be done the same way, if at all. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17, § 25; see Erskine in Gordon's Case, 592. Not only open rebellion, but resisting the laws as enacted is treason. The laws are a proof of the authority of the commonwealth, and resisting those laws is making the parties independent of the commonwealth, and therefore a defiance of the authority of the state. Lord Mansfield, in the charge on the same trial, says, among other enumerations, that combinations, &c., to arrest the execution of militia laws, is treason. This strongly merits observation. Why does the learned and experienced Lord Mansfield particularly specify militia laws and no other? Why does he not say to arrest the execution of any law? Why the militia law? For the best of all reasons—the same reason as the taking or attacking a fort or a castle belonging to the king, because that is the place where he keeps his military forces, and because the military is the strength of the kingdom, and this is resisting the military authority. Therefore, it must be allowed, that a resistance of militia laws is upon a very different footing than any others, and, in time of danger, resisting this law would prevent the militia being drawn into the field when there is occasion for them. Now, gentlemen, these things all considered, plainly show, that what is now attempted is a novel experiment, like modern philosophy, an entire new thing, saving the solitary instance in the reign of Henry VIII., and it is clear that the resistance of no law is treason, but the militia law. I agree also with the doctrine Lord Mansfield lays down, that any attempt to oppose the laws, by intimidation and violence, is levying war, and treason.

It is unnecessary for me to turn to the books to prove that confession of the party, or words spoken by him, taken perhaps in the time of fear, are not to be regarded by you. This was so plainly improper, that the law of William III., making two witnesses necessary, or confession in open court, was enacted; I need only turn to our own laws (judiciary act). There must be one of two kinds of proof: the party in open court must confess, for confession out of court cannot avail, even if made before ten thousand witnesses; or else two witnesses must prove the same overt act, and he must be convicted upon that indictment, if any. If you are to go to all parts of the country for heated words, heard by anybody, in any circumstances, I must consider it as a very scandalous abuse of the statute of Edward III. I think it impossible to hesitate at what was the meaning of congress when they made this act, and, therefore, shall barely recur to the evidence. Here is a proof that the prisoner came up to Bethlehem, where he acted in a certain manner; but the gentlemen concerned for the prosecution, think that does not sufficiently indicate his design, and therefore they travel to Jacob Fries', to Kline's, and a number of other places: now suppose you convict him, I entreat you to inquire from what evidence you do convict him? Is it from the overt act committed at Bethlehem, or from that and other circumstances together? If this is the broad ground upon which you go, do you convict him upon the evidence of two witnesses, to the same overt act, transacted at the same place? No, you do it upon the evidence of two, and a number of other evidence besides, on a variety of circumstances. Let me suppose for a moment, that two witnesses had come forward, and given an account of his conduct at Bethlehem; but that evidence was not sufficient to answer the indictment: you hear of such and such conduct at Quaker town, at Kline's, &c. &c. I ask, would he have been convicted upon the evidence of those two, independent of any other? No, he would not. This is by no means agreeable to the statutes of William III., or Edward VI., and in my view totally inadmissible. What is the consequence of such a verdict? Why, a man charged with murder, assault or what not, may know who the witnesses against him are, while one charged with treason, the highest possible crime, may not know, if you can travel from town to town, and from county to county for the evidence, if you can bring correspondence, &c., from every part, of which the prisoner knew nothing until brought before the court. No man would be safe in the admission of such things, but you must form your opinion alone from the evidence of two witnesses relating to the act committed at Bethlehem agreeably to the indictment. The statutes, and our act of congress mean and intend to prevent this kind of rambling over the whole state for evidence; or, indeed, upon the doctrine of the gentlemen, notwithstanding the act says otherwise, they can with equal propriety go throughout the United States to collect evidence to support the prosecution, which was never seen nor heard of before.

I now contend, gentlemen, that the case of the prisoner at the bar does not come within the statute of treason; and I also contend that it does come within one of two other acts, for the judiciary act,—volume 1, §§ 22, 23, p. 109, [1 Stat. 117],—speaking of resistance of process and rescue, completely extends to the prisoner. No, say the gentlemen, it is not a mere rescue, but a rescue for certain intentions and designs. Have the congress distinguished any particular design, or have they not, in this law? No, they have not: then permit me to say, where congress have not distinguished it, nor the books, it is not for judges nor juries to distinguish: it belongs to congress to make or except such cases as they thought proper; they have not thought proper; and you have no right whatever to do it. But lest any objection should appear of weight to except it from the judiciary act, there is a very good law, but which has been shamefully vilified and abused, called the sedition bill, providing fine and imprisonment for any high misdemeanour, under which, as I observed before, the very actions of the prisoner are defined. This act has passed since the trials of the Western insurgents in 1794, so that the opinions of the judges respecting treason at that time, are most clearly and fairly superseded by this act, which has pointed out whatever has heretofore caused doubts about the meaning of treason in the statute, and thus put an end to any judicial construction. That act provides, that if any persons should combine and conspire together, to impede the operation of any law of the United States, or to intimidate any persons holding places or offices under the United States, (this last is one of the many little things collected together, in order that, when brought into a mass, they may amount to treason,) and that, if they should advise, attempt, or procure any insurrection, riot, or unlawful assembly or combination, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanour, whether it be carried into effect or not. The very crimes which are here enumerated are charged upon John Fries, the prisoner at the bar. Now, if any act of description can be more just than this, I should wonder; it answers precisely every part of the crime charged, and every concomitant circumstance. Now the question is, whether or not, as the constitution did not define the punishment of treason, and as a misdemeanour is described here to be what some have thought used to be levying war, and as the punishment is less than what the other law respecting treason enacts—whether this should not operate as a repeal of the former law, so far as related to these points. As to the cases of Vigol and Mitchell, Western insurgents, I should doubt whether it would affect them at all, even if the law had then existed, because the circumstances very much differed from the insurrection in Northampton county. Wells and Neville were inspectors, and their offices were strictly belonging to the United States, and were deposits of the United States, and equally under the protection of the law with castles or citadels: in addition to this, the officers of government were driven from their own homes, and upon pain of death, they dared not approach their homes. Their offices were burnt by the insurgents, and there was no law that touched their case but the constitutional act defining treason; on which account, they were tried and convicted under it. I would introduce these ideas, to show you, that the decisions then formed by the court, are inapplicable at this time, since the sedition act is since passed, and agreeable to these circumstances, which materially differ from those of 1794.

It is now time to close. Gentlemen, the task which you have to perform is very serious, and very important; but I will not insult your understandings, by saying more than my indispensable duty claims from me, in behalf of the prisoner. You will, I have no doubt, consider the case calmly, wisely, and deliberately. You know the law, under the direction of the court: and I have no doubt you will decide according to the impulse of your consciences. I will only add, that the prisoner received, and has held his life from the authority of Him who is allwise, great and good, and by Him only can it be destroyed, except he has violated those equitable laws made by his country for the preservation of peace and order in society: he is, therefore, entitled to an equitable verdict: if he has done the acts named in the indictment, I have no doubt you will pronounce him guilty: if he has forfeited his life, go he must, and if he is to go, it is not in the power of men to prevent it. I shall, therefore, rest assured, that you will give a conscientious verdict, upon which you are bound to answer.

Mr. Rawle after his exordium, in which he expressed the importance of his situation as public accuser—hoped that while his duty peremptorily imposed upon him the necessity of doing justice to the United States, he should not be divested of candour towards the unfortunate prisoner at the bar, to whom he hoped full justice would be done.

He proposed, in the first place, to collect the detail of transactions, in the clear and unequivocal train they had been testified by the several witnesses, not only called to support the prosecution, but unhappily for the prisoner, corroborated by the witnesses called by himself. In the second place he should apply these facts to the laws and constitution of the United States: from both of which he thought it would evidently appear to the jury that the prisoner was guilty of treason in levying war against the United States. The prisoner stood indicted for opposing, in a warlike manner, two laws of the United States, the one entitled "An act providing for the valuation of lands and dwelling-houses," &c., passed July 9, 1798 [1 Stat. 580], and the other entitled "An act for levying a direct tax within the United States," passed July 14, 1798 [Id. 597]. Agreeably to these acts, certain commissions and assessors were to be appointed to carry the provisions thereof into execution. It appeared in evidence that Mr. Eyerly, one of the witnesses produced, had received a commission conformable thereto in a part of Pennsylvania, which he received in August, 1798, together with a request from the secretary of the treasury, that he would find suitable characters to serve as assessors to act in the division assigned to him. In the execution of this request, Mr. Eyerly found very great difficulties, although there was a perfect acquiescence in all other parts of the Union. Many whom he nominated declined on account of the unpopularity of those laws, although Mr. Eyerly very industriously, and in a praiseworthy manner, endeavoured to remove those objections.

In order to show the general difficulties there was in the execution of these officers' duty, Mr. Rawle recited the testimony of Mr. Eyerly, and its confirmation by Mr. Chapman, Mr. Henry and others, and went into an examination of the testimony demonstrative of the difficulties the assessors found in the execution of their duty and the insult they frequently met with, when engaged in their pacific efforts to explain the laws to the misled rabble. But sorry was he to say, that these commendable efforts were outweighed by the influence of certain leaders, among whom he found several captains of militia, and Fries with the rest: he throughout the whole scene appeared the most prominent, and instead of attending to the good advice given him by his best friends, flew into a rage and renewed his opposition. A part of the effects of their hostility was accomplished in preventing Mr. Clark from fulfilling the office which he had undertaken, and the general reluctance there was in others, and indeed finally the abandonment of the assessments; for it appeared that, not only those who were unwilling to give their rates refused, but those who were willing were intimidated from doing it. To such a pitch was intimidation and disaffection arrived, that he was sorry to say, the very magistrates of the peace had so far neglected their duty as to join the opposition, and nearly all of them, from one or other of these motives, refused to issue process for the apprehension of delinquents, or examine persons who opposed the laws: and those who did attend to their duty, found the greatest difficulties to procure the attendance of evidences, who were prevented by the impulse of fear from coming forward. Many attempts were made to pacify these deluded people, who were under the most baneful advice, and the attempts accordingly miscarried, even though propositions were made in some townships to indulge them with the choice of their own assessors.

After a full and thorough consideration of the evidence, Mr. Rawle said:

These are facts; not founded on the testimony of a single witness, which is sufficient to convict a man in common cases; nor are they confined to the testimony of two witnesses, which is all the constitution requires; but they are corroborated by numerous witnesses, produced in order to remove every doubt from your minds as to the material facts of the crime. There is no case in our books more clear than the present; the evidence is so uniform that even the ingenuity and talents of the prisoner's counsel have not been able to contest one fact that has been related; indeed the whole is so fair, that the most incredulous must be satisfied of the accuracy of the charge, independent of the confession of the prisoner, which confirms the whole: it proves to a demonstration that his main object was nothing less than to prevent the execution of the laws which all men are bound to obey. Gentlemen, the counsel for the prisoner have endeavoured to diminish the force of that voluntary confession by telling you that no man can be convicted upon his own confession out of court, nor without the testimony of two witnesses; the same arguments have been used to nullify the expressions which we have produced proof that the prisoner frequently made use of, from which we evidently discover his intention. I allow that no man should be convicted for treason unless upon the testimony of two witnesses, or confession in open court; but when all the facts necessary to substantiate the crime are proved by two witnesses, the declarations of the prisoner, as well as his confession, may be produced as good evidence as to his intention, and this is not necessary to be proved by two witnesses; this tends to show the designs of his heart, which can only be known to his Creator and himself. These declarations should be known to the court in order to discover the intention with which the crime was perpetrated. In the Case of Lord Gordon, the words said to have been used by him in the lobby of the house were not rejected by the jury because it required two witnesses, but on account of the improbability of a declaration having been publicly used which no more than one individual could be produced to prove. We have proved by two witnesses that the overt act was committed by the prisoner, and have produced much corroborative testimony, in which we have not been confined to two, having heard it from twelve respectable witnesses. If we have succeeded to prove the intention, it is sufficient for the law, and if you believe the testimony, it indubitably substantiates the fact.

I shall now proceed to consider what is the law arising upon these facts, in going into the examination of which, I shall put out of the question two objections; one of them only has been produced, the other having barely been alluded to, rather than held up. A proclamation was issued by the president, on which Fries did then go to his home, whereupon it has been argued that no instance can be produced to prove a prosecution being commenced for acts committed prior to the reading of the riot act in England, if the mob thereupon dispersed, because they had complied with the proclamation. It is right in part: if the people do not disperse, the remaining mob are guilty of felony; but I ask the gentleman has the defence been at all set up on the ground of compliance with the proclamation? In the riot at Drury Lane Theatre by the footmen, and that which was held up in which the Earl of Essex and others were engaged, many of the rioters did disperse in consequence of the riot act being read, and yet were afterward punished for the enormities they committed while they were there. Alike trivial is the objection respecting the undue appointment of assessors. It is sufficient that such a person acts as commissioner or assessor; if he usurps that power, the law has provided a remedy by other means than the dangerous one of an insurrection to know merely whether A, B or C is regularly appointed to office. There are legal modes of application to ascertain the fact; there is the whole board of commissioners, or even a higher power may be applied to, to ascertain the authority, and no virtuous, honest citizen would think of opposition on that account. We do not think it necessary to trouble the court, since it was fully in the power of the prisoner's counsel to have brought the commissioners under this act before them; but not having availed themselves of it, nor pressed it home to your notice, gentlemen, why was such a scarecrow insinuated, but to mislead you? There can be no doubt of the legality of those commissioners; if there was, it would not alleviate the crime of rebellion. But that was never used, neither by the prisoner himself, nor any of the insurgents, as a ground for the rebellion; it was not even a colour for it, nor does it appear that the insurgents ever doubted in the smallest degree, the legality of the appointments; their declarations were repeatedly, "No assessors shall act in the township, nor shall any assessments be made." No doubt was ever made of the powers used by the officers, and therefore the opposition to the law is alone to be considered.

Having disposed of those two points, I wish now to impress upon your minds a most solemn conviction, to wit: That the law under which the prisoner at the bar stands indicted, without being in the least doubtful, ambiguous, obscure, or perplexing, is well defined in, and composes a part of, the constitution of the United States (article 3, § 3). It is certainly momentous that you should be fully satisfied of the true meaning of that part under which the present crime is placed, to wit: levying war against the United States. I would premise that the indictment is worded precisely in the usual form, and that the only question now is, what is that levying war with which the prisoner is charged? To ascertain what is levying war, it is necessary for us only to consider what is the nature of civil and political society in the United States. The government is the organ which the people collectively have thought it their duty and interest to establish for their mutual safety—their will, publicly expressed in the laws, is the legitimate will of the majority of the people; all our laws are the acts of this majority; and it is a radical principle which will not be controverted, that the will of the majority is always binding upon the minority, and should be acquiesced in quietly by them, whether the administration of that government be in the hands of one person, or of many; those, therefore, who do not choose to continue in that society, ought to withdraw quietly from it, rather than disturb the quiet of the whole. Allegiance is a quiet submission and acquiescence to the supreme power. In monarchical governments it is placed in the king; but the citizens of America know of no allegiance but to the laws, for they alone are the binding principle by which society at large is kept in domestic peace and security. If, therefore, deviating from this allegiance to the laws, measures are taken to disturb the public peace by a resistance of the laws, accompanied by force of arms, or by the intimidation of numbers sufficient for the purpose, and it be applicable only to a grievance of a public or general, and not of a particular or private interest, such resistance then becomes the crime of treason, and particularly so if the views are to bring about the suspension or repeal of any of the laws; for there is no particular kind of law liable to exception; it is treason, because it is an attempt to overturn the fundamental principles of society, by endeavouring to impose into the system the will of a minority which has no right to be there; it is creating a new agency, a new species of legislature, and eventually dissolving the powers legally ordained. This definition may apply as well to any one law as to all the laws, for each is equally stamped with public approbation, and to none particularly is sanctity attached, all proceeding from one power, those who undertake to resist any one, may with equal propriety resist the whole, and treason appears to me to be the inevitable inference; otherwise it would be impossible to ascertain the limits at which this dangerous licentious conduct must stop, we should be at once thrown back into a state of natural society, which God prevent. I ask the gentlemen who argued for this distinction, to point out to me which law may be resisted with impunity! If one may be, the evil principle will go on to another and another, and where will it stop?

I have no occasion again to recur to the authorities we have produced, which the gentlemen pass over as the acts of bad times, corrupt judges, a profligate court, &c. The counsel, with all their learning and industry, seem to be satisfied with this general discharge of our authorities; but whatever might have been the baseness of the attorney-generals of those times, the meanness of the judges, the profligacy of the court, or the merits of the prisoner, we stand upon broad, established and general ground, which is not pretended to be obligatory upon us merely because it has heretofore been decided, nor is it obligatory in England upon that account, although you have been so told, but we go upon it, because it is right. That Sir Walter Raleigh was grossly abused by Sir Edward Coke, is notorious; it was the bad practices of those times; but this reference more regards the proceedings on trials, than the decisions; the decisions uniformly were, that usurpation of public authority in a certain manner amounted to treason. What! shall a man be permitted to attack the government by piecemeal? to take out a plank here and a plank there, till our political ship sinks, and such conduct not be called a treasonable division of the government! With respect to the authorities wherein it was stated to be necessary that the design should be to pull down meeting-houses, brothels, &c., generally, in order to constitute high treason, it must be observable that it was the assumption of the legal powers which constituted the crime; to pull down meeting-houses as such, was interfering with the toleration granted by government, and therefore treasonable. With respect to bawdy-houses, government, and not individuals, have a right to correct them, and if individuals pretended to correct the evil, they were attainted of high treason.

We are told that no case is to be found in which a mere rescue is called treason. Hale, P. C. 133, in my opinion, is an authority in point. Bethlehem was the prison of the United States under the marshal; there the marshal held several persons in custody; and levying war, or attempting by force or intimidation to deliver those prisoners out of his custody, is certainly treason. Here we stand upon settled ground, we say, and I appeal, gentlemen, to your recollection, that there was no particular view to relieve any particular person, but that the words were "Shankwyler and others;" the claim was general, and the object was general—the repeal of the law was that object, and these were the means used to obtain it. This is declared to be treason even by that great and virtuous man who is held up to your notice as guarding us to beware of introducing more constructive treasons: Sir Matthew Hale, whose very name carried authority at the period of 1668, and with him all the judges, upon mature deliberation, have declared this to be sound law. As burglary, arson and murder may be made the means of treason, so may rescue; treason must have some means; sometimes the most atrocious, sometimes the means may be newly invented; but because newly invented, it cannot lessen the crime. With respect to the murder of Sir Theodosius Boughton by Captain Donnelan, in England, which was merely by a draught of laurel water, (which in that country is poison,)—a new invention for murder—the counsel might have argued against the conviction, because no former case had occurred, as well as that the innocence of this rescue should be held up, because new. But there was no such thing. A strong and important part of the combination was actually carried into effect, and it was not absolutely necessary to prove the rescue in order to prove the treason; it has been evidently shown to you in the transactions at Quaker town, that the rescue was only a part, and the termination of the general plan so far as it proceeded. I have no need to take up more authorities to prove that this is treason; it was so before the birth of our constitution; this principle was coeval with the reign of Edward III. in 1340. I take it to be a true and incontrovertible principle, that when we find an act on which previous decisions have been made, those decisions have been acted upon, and we should think proper to pass that act by ingrafting it into, and making it a part of our constitution, those decisions are of course adopted as our direction, whereby we are to understand the applications of that act. I would barely observe, that while those gentlemen are telling us that we are not to have recourse to those volumes of laws, (which we ought all to be acquainted with, as volumes of science, explanatory of the code by which we are bound,) they themselves resort to the same species of authority, to endeavour to prove that treason under the act of Edward III. is not treason in America. We have heard much about constructive and interpretative treason, and constructive levying of war. Agreeably to the form of government in England, the king is recognized as king in two capacities, one in his natural, as king, and one in his political, as sovereign: now, when that part of treason called compassing the king's death is mentioned, it refers to his natural capacity; but when of levying war against the king, it refers to his political capacity, and it was therefore necessary to show the distinction between different species of treason; this latter is termed constructive treason; but from the variety of its modes of introduction, cannot be so well defined; but its existence is necessary, in order to support society and preserve it secure: this is what is termed levying of war; it may consist in opposition to the king's forces, or by threats or force attempting to compel the king to remove his ministers or alter established laws. If you expunge what is direct levying of war, there can no such thing as treason be found; either the law is wrong, or the arguments used on the other side. Gentlemen, the law is established, but the arguments vanish like vapour before the morning sun; what, then, in England is called constructive levying of war, in this country must be called direct levying of war. The framers of our constitution were as learned and as wise as any gentleman now at the bar; they certainly saw that this was the only kind of direct levying of war that could exist in this country, and therefore if they had not intended that what was called constructive in England should constitute what they called "levying of war against the United States," they would not have introduced the crime at all: this is an absurdity they never would have been guilty of.

The learned gentleman admits that resistance against one particular law may be termed constructive treason, and may be the crime of treason here: he says that resistance to the militia law would be a restraint upon the principal dependence of the government, and therefore treason; gentlemen try our arguments by this test, and see whether resistance on the present occasion is not equally so. I ask you what is to become of the militia, the standing army, the eventual army, or the civil power itself, if you are unable to raise revenue? Who will fight, who will transact your civil concerns, if they are not paid? If by opposing revenue laws the government itself as well as the army is fundamentally undermined, is it not at least as much treason as though the militia law alone were more openly (but not more effectually) attacked? Nothing is so much entitled to respect and submission as laws which are the direct means of keeping society together. At the present time, when the feudal system is no more, but from necessity subsistence must be obtained from employment and labour, the defence and preservation of the country must come from the revenue, and to destroy that is to give a mortal wound to the government itself.

Mr. Rawle then went into a review of some of the circumstances, alluded to by the opposite counsel, which characterize the insurrection, and the trials thereupon in 1795, which he insisted, though those gentlemen would not allow it, were very similar in circumstances to the unhappy affair now before the court, in which he drew the following parity between the cases: In 1794, the disturbance was to prevent the execution of one law—the excise law: In 1799, the house and land-tax laws. In 1794, four counties were engaged in opposition. In 1799, but three: Northampton, Bucks, and Montgomery. In 1794, the excise officers were attacked and prevented executing their duty. In 1799, the assessors were the same. In 1794, the insurgents collected into an army, in battle array, displaying their ensigns of triumph, with numbers sufficient to procure their object; say, 6000 men in Braddock's field. The object of 1799 was to do it in a similar manner, and they actually did, by their military appearance and boasts of much larger increase, impress a general opinion of their power sufficient to accomplish their purpose. In 1794, the insurgents made public declarations that the excise law should never be executed. In 1799, were not declarations of the same nature made by these insurgents?—that other counties, and even other states, would support them, and that it should never be done? The object of 1794 was to obtain a repeal of a law—the excise law. In 1799, it was the same, so far as related to them—the house and direct tax. In 1794, the excise officers were compelled to promise that they would not execute the law in that part of the country. In 1799, the same promise is exacted, and obtained respecting Lower Milford and other parts. There was some difference, it is true, as the gentleman stated, some of the officers at that time being banished from their houses, on pain of death. It was farther argued, that there was this striking distinction—that General Neville's house might be considered as a castle of the United States, because it was an office of excise; but the analogy still holds good; it was General Neville's dwelling-house, however, that was attacked; the attack was made only because he was an officer employed in the superintendence of a tax they disliked: Mr. Levering's tavern at Bethlehem was made the prison of the United States, and there was an executive officer of the United States; it was as much so as any other prison in the Union: this was the castle, the fortress of the United States, to protect which the marshal had assembled his posse comitatus, provided with weapons of defence. I consider this, therefore, a more violent breach of the law than the attack upon General Neville's house, so far as it went,—admitting that no guns were fired, nor lives lost, nor was any house burnt, otherwise, so far as it went, the case was rather stronger than the former. Happy is it for the prisoners that the scene of riot was not farther from the seat of government! if it had been more remote from the power of government, we cannot calculate upon the consequences, or increase of revolt and excess which would have been evinced. I will not pretend to anticipate them, for I wish not to inflame my own mind by the sad calculation, nor the minds of the jury; I only wish the facts to appear in their native colours.

Why, then, can we entertain a doubt, viewing all these circumstances, that the prisoner is guilty of treason? There can be none. We are told that the legislature have passed a law, entitled the sedition act, which shows the offence of the prisoner; and that the opinion of the legislature was to bring under this law the constitutional definition of treason, making it a misdemeanour! To me, of all the weak arguments which have been brought in behalf of the prisoner, this is the weakest. This law, which has been cried up from one end of the continent to the other by some persons as unconstitutional, is now to be brought into court to explain away what the constitution positively defines to be treason. If this ever had been the intention of the legislature, there certainly would have been something like treason, something like levying of war, introduced into that bill, but we find no such thing; the words do not at all occur in it, and that it is not intended, I think is clear. Sedition and treason are two distinct crimes, and two distinct punishments are enacted to meet them. The description of crime in the sedition act, is—those who combine with intent to impede the operation of the law, and those who intend to raise an insurrection: these are to be considered as guilty of a high misdemeanour. Now, those who conspire to commit treason are not considered guilty of treason; the treason must have been carried into effect. It cannot be treason for a man to counsel, advise, or attempt to procure insurrection, with intent to impede the operation of any law of the United States; but this is declared to be a misdemeanour, whether executed or not. Besides, the word "treasonable" is not inserted in the sedition law: thus, if a man be indicted for taking the property of another, unless the word "feloniously" is introduced, he is not liable to the charge. So in this case, the act must be traitorously done, or it is not treason. To show the absurdity of this doctrine, we need only for a minute suppose, that in the commission of any of the crimes specified in the sedition act, lives should be lost, houses burnt, &c. The laws of the United States have previously declared, that such offenders should be punished with death, and surely it ought to be carried into execution—not be mitigated by a future law to the mere penalty of five thousand dollars, and five years imprisonment. If this was the intention of the legislature, might it not, at least, be expected that they would have declared so in the act; but they have manifested no such intention in that, nor in the present instance, with respect to which, had they done it, they would have overleaped their constitutional powers; for the constitution is an ark, into which the legislature itself dare not place its feet; if they were to do it, the judiciary have the power, and it is their duty to bring them back again, and say, "You have gone too far." They can as much restrain an unconstitutional act, as congress can make a constitutional act. This constitution gave congress the power to declare the punishment that should be inflicted on what it had defined to be treason. Congress had nothing to do with the crime, and if they have declared it, as the gentleman supposes, they have done it without authority, and it can be of no avail whatever. But no—they have rather, in the act alluded to, declared what should not be considered treason, or removed doubts upon that head. This being the case, the same opinion which operated on the judges in 1795, is still in force; because no legislative act has intervened to change it. Certain it is, that congress did not intend to enact an unconstitutional punishment for treason; but if they had intended it, they have not a right to do it, nor have they done it.

Now, gentlemen, whether these things are as we have represented, or not, is for you to judge, and decide upon your information; if you are satisfied that the prisoner at the bar was engaged in the affair at Bethlehem, and that affair was connected with your previous arrangements, you must convict him: otherwise, you must not. We consider, and think the evidence must prove to you, that all are parts of the same whole, were begun long before the 7th of March; and that they partly existed in Northampton and partly in Bucks counties. It must be upon a full conviction in your minds that the treason was committed by him in Northampton county, that you can convict the prisoner; and if you have not that full conviction, I firmly hope you will acquit him; if you have, you are bound to pronounce him guilty.

PETERS, District Judge (charging jury). Gentlemen of the Jury—As this case is important, both in its principles and consequences, I think it my duty to give my opinion, formed with as much deliberation as the intervals of this lengthy trial would permit, on the most prominent points of law which have been made in this cause. I have condensed my sentiments into as short a compass as possible. I shall leave remarks on the evidence, and more enlarged observations on the law, to the presiding judge, who will deliver to you the charge of the court. At his request, I state my individual opinion, though I do not always deem it necessary, when there is a unanimity of sentiment in the court.

1. It is treason "in levying war against the United States" for persons who have none but a common interest with their fellow-citizens, to oppose or prevent, by force, numbers or intimidation, a public and general law of the United States, with intent to prevent its operation, or compel its repeal. Force is necessary to complete the crime; but the quantum of force is immaterial. This point was determined by this court on a former occasion, which was, though not in all circumstances, yet in principle and object, very analogous to the subject of our present inquiries. I hold myself bound by that decision, which, on due consideration, I think legal and sound. I do not conceive it to be overshadowed, or rendered null, by any legislative construction contained in any subsequent act of congress. The law, though established by legislative acts, or settled by judicial decisions, may be altered by congress, by express words, in laws consistent with the constitution. But a mere legislative construction, drawn from any act by intendment, ought not to repeal positive laws, or annul judicial decisions. The judiciary have the duty assigned to them of interpreting, declaring and explaining—the legislature that of making, or altering, or repealing laws. But the decision of a question on the constitutionality of a law is vested in the judiciary department. I consider the decisions in the cases of Vigol [Case No. 16,621] and Mitchell [Id. 15,788] in full force, and founded on true principles of law. The authorities from British precedents and adjudications are used as guides in our decisions. I will not enter into a discussion whether we are bound to follow them; because they are precedents,—or because we think them reasonable and just. If numbers and force can render one law ineffectual, which is tantamount to its repeal, the whole system of laws may be destroyed in detail. All laws will at last yield to the violence of the seditious and discontented. Although but one law be immediately assailed, yet the treasonable design is completed, and the generality of intent designated, by a part assuming the government of the whole. And thus, by trampling on the legal powers of the constituted authorities, the rights of all are invaded by the force and violence of a few. In this case, too, there is a direct outrage on the judiciary act, with intent to defeat, by force and intimidation, the execution of a revenue law, enacted under clear and express constitutional authority. A deadly blow is aimed at the government, when its fiscal arrangements are forcibly destroyed, distracted and impeded; for on its revenues its very existence depends.

2. Though punishments are designated, by particular laws, for certain inferior crimes, which, if prosecuted as substantive offences, and the sole object of the prosecution, are exclusively liable to the penalties directed by those laws, yet, when committed with treasonable ingredients, these crimes become only circumstances or overt acts. The intent is the gist of the inquiry in a charge of treason; and is the great and leading object in trials for this crime. The description of crimes, contained in the act commonly called the sedition act [1 Stat. 596], lose their character, and become but component parts of the greater crime, or evidences of treason, when the treasonable intent and overt act are proved. So it is with rescue of prisoners; which, in the present case, was not an independent offence, but an overt act of the treason. These were crimes—misdemeanours—at common law; and might have been punished by fine and imprisonment when substantive independent offences. But, when committed with treasonable intent, they are merged in the treason, of which sedition, conspiracy and combination are always the harbingers. I do not think that the acts relating either to sedition or rescue have altered the principle, though they have defined and bounded the punishments. The law, as to treason, is the same now as if those offences were still punishable at common law. The sedition act cannot constitutionally alter the description or the crime of treason, to which the combination and conspiracy to perpetrate this offence, with force and numbers, are essential attributes. Numbers must combine and conspire to levy war. But if these indispensable qualities of the crime are, by the legislature, declared only misdemeanours, and separated from the treasonable act, the legislature nullify the description of treason contained in the constitution; and so indirectly alter and destroy, or make inefficient, this part of that instrument. The congress neither possess, nor did they intend to exercise, any such power. They could not (nor did they so intend) place the crime declared in the constitution to be treason, among the inferior class of offences, by describing some of its essential qualities in the sedition act, and prescribing punishments, when they solely constitute substantive and independent offences. Congress can only (as they have done) prescribe the punishment for treason, regulate the trial, and direct the mode in which that punishment is to be executed.

3. However indisputably requisite it may be to prove, by two witnesses, the overt act for which the prisoner at the bar stands indicted, yet evidence may be given of other circumstances, or even of other overt acts, connected with that on which the indictment is grounded, and occurring or committed in any other part of the district than the place mentioned. Although the prisoner be not on his trial, nor is he now punishable, for any other than the overt act laid, other overt acts and other circumstances, parts of the general design, may nevertheless be proved, to show the quo animo—the intent—with which the act laid was committed. Indeed, the treason would be complete, by the conspiracy, in any part of the district, to commit the treasonable act at Bethlehem, if any had, in consequence of the conspiracy, marched or committed any overt act for the purpose, though the actual rescue had not taken place. So we thought in the Cases of the Western Insurgents, that the treason, concocted at Couche's Fort, would have been complete, if any had only marched to commit the crime; though the design had not arrived to the disgraceful catastrophe it finally attained. Indisputable authorities might be produced to support this position.

4. The confession of the prisoner may be given in evidence as corroboratory proof of the intent, or quo animo. But, although proved by two witnesses, being made out of court, it is not of itself sufficient to convict. Two witnesses are necessary to prove the overt act. But the intent may be proved by one witness, collected from circumstances, or even by a single fact.

5. The doctrine of constructive treason has produced much real mischief in another country; and it has been, for an age, the subject of discussions, among lawyers, other public speakers, and political writers. The greater part of the objections to it are totally irrelevant here.—The subject of them is unknown, and may it ever remain so, in this country. I mean the compassing the death of the king. It will be found that the British judges, since the days of political darkness and bigotry have passed away, are to be found among the most able and decided opposers of the abuses of this doctrine. They do not follow decisions and precedents rooted in bad times, because they find them in their law books. On the contrary, on a fair investigation, it will be proved, that those contrary to justice, reason, and law are rejected. It is not fair and sound reasoning to argue against the necessary and indispensable use of construction, from the abuses it has produced. What is there among the best of human (and I wish I could not add divine) systems which has not been perverted and abused? That there must be some defined sense and interpretative exposition made of the terms "levying war," and when, and in what circumstances, it is levied "against the United States," cannot be denied. The able counsel, in this case, who has said the most on this subject, and traveled the farthest into the gloomy, dark, and tyrannical periods of the British history and jurisprudence, for melancholy and disgusting proofs of atrocious abuses, and even crimes, committed under colour of law, has, unavoidably, himself furnished also proofs of the necessity we are under of some constructive or interpretative expositions. He, at first, confined these expositions to three cases. Now, if there is a necessity of one, it shows that, without supplementary interpretation, the law would be a mere dead letter. Aware of the dangerous lengths to which the abuses of construction have been carried, courts and juries should be cautious in their decisions; but not so much alarmed about abuses as to restrain from the proper and necessary use of interpretation. I do not then hesitate to say, that the position we have found established, to wit, that opposition, by force and numbers, or intimidation with intent to defeat, delay, or prevent the execution of a general law of the United States, or to procure, or with a hope of procuring, by force and numbers, or intimidation, its repeal or new execution, is treason by levying war against the United States. And it does not appear to me to be what is commonly called constructive, but open and direct treason, in levying war against the United States, within the plain and evident meaning and intent of the constitution.

6. As to the objections, founded on want of proof of regular appointments under, and of the proper execution of the law called the house-tax law, I do not see that they apply. If the prosecution was definitely for opposing one or more officer or officers of this tax law, the proof might be more rigidly required. But, as all the necessary use made of these collateral and subordinate circumstances, relative to the tax law officers, is for the purpose of showing the quo animo or intent with which the treason alleged was committed, I consider them as not relevant in this cause. It is even enough in criminal prosecutions, more directly aimed at the specific offence of opposing an officer, that he was an officer de facto.

7. As to the disarming and confining the two videttes, or advance of the armed insurgents, by the marshal at Bethlehem, I think him legally as well as prudentially justified in his conduct. Even a constable has a right to restrain and confine, under strong circumstances of suspicion, persons whose conduct or appearance evidence an intention to commit illegal and violent acts. Much more so was the marshal (having notice of an intended rescue of his prisoners), justifiable in seizing and disarming two of the armed body, against whom existing circumstances raised strong and evident suspicion. But I think this has been made more important than it really is. Because the release of these men was not the object of, or even known to, the prisoner at the bar and his party, when they commenced their treasonable march for the release of the prisoners in the marshal's custody at Bethlehem.

8. The president's proclamation should have been pleaded as a pardon, if it was intended to be relied on as such. This not having been done, it is not legally before us. But, since it has been mentioned, I think it necessary to declare it as my opinion, that it does not operate as a pardon to precedent offences. It is directed by law as a step, preparatory to applying an armed force against those supposed to have committed crimes, and embodied for unlawful purposes. It is a humane warning, calculated to prevent the effusion of blood. Its allegations of facts, or its injunctions, have no operation in the trial of the prisoner at the bar. Whether the prisoner is or is not guilty of the treason laid in the indictment, in the manner and form therein set forth, it is your province to determine. It is the duty of the court to declare the law; though both facts and law, which, I fear, are too plain to admit a reasonable doubt, are subjects for your consideration. We must all obey our public duty, whatever may be our private feelings. Mercy is not deposited in our hands. It is entirely within the constitutional authority of another department.

IREDELL, Circuit Justice. Gentlemen of the Jury: I am persuaded that every person who has attended to the present very awful and important case upon which you are now called to decide, must be impressed with a just respect for the patience and attention you have shown, through the long period which unfortunately has been taken up; but this, though much personal inconvenience must have been experienced, not only by you, but by all concerned, is unavoidable; none of us can repent that, in a case of such moment as the present, the time which is absolutely necessary for a complete investigation has been employed. Gentlemen, it is with great satisfaction to me, on the present occasion, that my ideas on the points of law directing our conclusions, upon which it is the duty of the court to give opinion, absolutely coincide with that of the respectable judge with whom I have the honour to sit. Before I state to you any observation with regard to the facts which have appeared from the evidence, I shall previously deliver my opinion upon some points of law, so far as they are unconnected with the evidence; those which are, I shall speak to in their proper place.

This, gentlemen of the jury, is an indictment against the prisoner at the bar, for levying war against the United States; the first inquiry, therefore, is, what is meant by these words of our constitution—"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them," &c. These words are repeated verbatim, I believe, in an act of congress, called the judiciary act, defining the punishment of the crime of treason, pursuant to constitutional authority. This crime being defined in the constitution of our country, becomes the supreme law, and can only be altered by the means therein pointed out, and not by any act of the legislature; and, therefore, the repetition of the words of the constitution in the judiciary act is quite unnecessary, as the only power left to congress over this crime was, to describe the punishment: the same act, in another part, makes provision for the method of trial. Agreeably to their power, congress have described the punishment, and thereby declared the crime to be capital. It is clear, therefore, that, as the constitution has defined the crime, the congress, drawing its sole authority from that constitution, cannot change it in any manner, particularly as it is so declared; yet the counsel for the prisoner say, that the legislature have given it a legislative interpretation, and that their interpretation is binding on this court. They say that congress did not mean to include the offence charged upon the prisoner at the bar, under the definition of levying war; because the sedition act describes a similar offence, and because a rescue is provided for in another act, the punishment extending no further than fine and imprisonment. Several answers may be given to remove these objections:

First, if congress had intended to interpret these words of the constitution by any subsequent act, they had no kind of authority so to do. The whole judicial power of the government is vested in the judges of the United States, in the manner the constitution describes; to them alone it belongs to explain the law and constitution; and congress have no more right nor authority over the judicial expositions of those acts, than this court has to make a law to bind them. If this was not an article of the constitution, but a mere act of congress, they could not interpret the meaning of that act while it was in force, but they may alter, amend, or introduce explanatory sections to it. In this we differ from the practice of England, from whence we received our jurisprudential system in general; for they having no constitution to bind them, the parliament have an unlimited power to pass any act of whatever nature they please; and they, consequently, cannot infringe upon the constitution. The very treason statute of Edward III. itself contains a provision giving parliament an authority to enact laws thereupon, in these words: "Because other like cases of treason may happen in time to come, which cannot be thought or declared at present, it is thought that, if any such does happen, the judges should not try them without first going to the king and parliament, where it ought to be judged treason, or otherwise felony." On this point, Sir Matthew Hale was very careful, lest constructive treason should be introduced. This gentlemen, you will observe, only relates to any case not specified in that act. But, on the occasion now before you, it is not attempted, by any construction or interpretation, that anything should be denominated treason, that is not precisely and plainly within the constitution. No treason can be committed except war has actually been levied against the United States. But farther, nothing is more clear to me than that congress did not intend, in any manner whatever, to innovate on the constitutional definition of treason, because they have repeated the words, I think, verbatim in their own act; with regard to the rescue and obstruction of process, which are mentioned in the act alluded to, it will not be pretended, by any man, that every rescue, or every obstruction of an officer in serving process, or even both together, amounts to high treason, or else to no crime at all: No; the crimes are differently specified, and rescue or obstruction of process may be committed without that high charge. This, I think, was sufficiently explained by the counsel for the United States. Suppose one thousand men rise in arms, avowedly to destroy the government, and in the execution of their design commit murder, burn houses, purloin property, &c., does it make the design less evident, because they committed other atrocious crimes in order to obtain their main views? No; it was to destroy the government, and that crime would be charged upon them, being the higher crime, which the concomitant ones only tended to aggravate, as they were committed, not for the purpose of committing murder, but to intimidate the government, and accelerate their object. With regard to what is stated in the sedition act, combinations and conspiracies to raise an insurrection—these, gentlemen, may be committed without the parties being guilty of treason: men may combine and conspire for a private purpose; possibly to injure an individual, merely to gratify some private motive: if so, they come within that act, and that only. It is only when they carry their projects farther; when they aim at the destruction of the government, that the nature of the offence attains the aspect of, and essentially becomes, treason; and, therefore, it is necessary to prove the intention; otherwise there can be no treason. There can be no levying war without a number of persons unite, and that number cannot levy war without some previous intention; and, therefore, under this law, there being no previous intention defined, but merely an unlawful combination, the act termed treason in the constitution, it is plain, is not intended, nor is it of the nature of treason.

With regard to the authority from which the opinion of this court is founded, and of which you have heard much already, I shall trouble you with a very few observations. When this constitution was made, it was in the power of those who formed it either to define treason or not, or, if they thought proper to do so, to do it in what manner they chose, in which they might have followed the example of the country whence their ancestors came, to which they were accustomed, and in which they were most experienced in their own several states, where the crime of levying war was denominated treason. I believe this has been generally followed through the states: in some I know it has. This term of levying war is an English expression, borrowed from the statute of Edward III.; but, notwithstanding this, the principal provisions respecting treason are taken from an act of the British parliament in the reign of William III., which is principally calculated to guard the independence of the court against the power of the crown, and the prisoner against his prosecutors. Now, I must confess, as these able and learned framers of our constitution borrowed the act, in terms, from the British statute alone, an authority with which they were familiar, that they certainly at least meant that the English authorities and definition of those terms should be much respected. Those gentlemen knew as well as any counsel at the bar, the danger of constructive treasons: they knew how to guard themselves against the bad times of English history, and were equally acquainted with the better and more modern decisions. Would it not have been natural for men so able, so wise, so cautious, of their liberties, had they entertained a doubt of their insufficiency, to have introduced some new guards, some new interpretations, and not to have left us in later times in the dark, exposed to so much danger as the gentlemen of the bar apprehend? Gentlemen who know anything of that country, know that arbitrary times have existed, and also that a number of decisions have taken place since that period. I do not believe that any judge since the revolution in England has ever considered that he was bound to follow every arbitrary example of the English courts, or the crown laws which had taken place in dark ages. Can any man suppose that, if a man was to be prosecuted for either of the crimes referred to by one gentleman (Mr. Lewis), so absurd a prosecution would be for a moment indulged by the judges of this age? No, they would highly resent such an insult offered to an enlightened court. Such instances have ever been reprobated as much by the courts, as by the gentleman who quoted them.

With respect to this doctrine of precedent, I will take the liberty of submitting to you a case of a civil nature; suppose it a case of great moment; suppose in this court, or any other from which an appeal could not be had, a solemn decision had been had respecting a title to a piece of land; upon this adjudication a gentleman wishes to purchase this land; taking this title to a lawyer, he is confirmed in the opinion that the title is good, and that he is safe because of the decision of the court. On the faith of this decision alone the man lays his money out, and therefore it must be important how precedents are formed. If precedent is so important in a civil case, how much more so must it be in one like the present. If a case is new altogether, and no precedent can be found, it ought to be much in favour of the prisoner, but if a solemn declaration has once been made that such and such facts constitute a certain crime, that declaration ought to be abode by, and for this plain reason; every man ought to have an opportunity to know the laws of his country (if he will take pains to inform himself) lest he should involve himself in guilt ignorantly. The propriety and necessity of this must be manifest, and if so, it is as necessary that the proceedings of our courts should be uniform, otherwise there can be no dependence upon their judgment. If, therefore, a point has been settled in a certain way, it is enough to direct any court to settle a future case of a similar kind in the same way, because nothing can be more unfortunate than when courts of justice deviate in decisions on the same evidence.

This leads me, gentlemen, to point out to you a consideration of great magnitude: this is not the first time, as I have been informed, that these questions have been discussed in the court. During the trials of the persons concerned in the Western insurrection, they were discussed, and I have no doubt with great ability on both sides. Judges Paterson and Peters were then on the bench, and after all the display of splendid talent used in argument on both sides, and all the authorities produced that men were capable of, from the best judgment that could be formed, the court, without hesitation, declared itself in favour of the prosecution. As I do not differ from that decision, my opinion is, that the same declaration ought to be made on the points of law at this time. Vide U. S. v. Mitchell [Case No. 15,788].

It is, however, objected, that after this solemn decision had taken place, the legislature, by the sedition act, settled the matter differently, and that we are bound by that act. This has been answered, so as to remove it beyond all doubt, and concessions were made at the bar sufficient to remove the seriousness of this objection out of the way. It was acknowledged that, if it had been an opposition to the militia act, then the crime would have been treason; or if it had been done to compel the repeal of an act, it would have been treason. For my part, I cannot perceive what kind of sanctity there is in the militia act more than any other, that should make my opposition to that act particularly serious: all the acts of congress flow from the same authority, and all tend to the same end, to wit, the happiness and security of the community: individuals may differ in their views of the magnitude of them; some may think the militia law, some the revenue law, some another, but the legislature have thought all these laws equally necessary, and they having thought so, it is our duty to obey them all alike. But, if the opposition to the militia law, by force of arms, is to have this extraordinary sanctity, because it strikes immediately at the existence of the government, then I should be glad to know what can be said about a revenue law? Government cannot exist a day without revenue to support it! Farther: opposition by force to one law, is of the same nature as opposition to all the laws; the offence is levying war against the government; opposing, by force of arms, an act of congress, with a view of defeating its efficacy, and thus defying the authority of the government, is equally the same in principle, if done in one instance, as it could be in many. In monarchical governments it will sometimes happen that a rebellion breaks out in an endeavour to destroy one monarch, and set another on the throne: in such a case the treason plainly and unequivocally displays itself, and there can be no doubt about it; but this cannot occur in a republican form of government: men are seldom found who will be guilty of such open treason, as to come forward, in the face of day, and declare their design to destroy the constitution or all the laws. No, if men of sense go to promote insurrection, whether they mean to destroy the government or not, they must be wicked; they go about their design by more insidious means; art will be used, and pains taken to promote a dislike to a certain law; this evil prejudice is encouraged until it becomes general among the people, and they become as ripe for insurrection as in the present case. Nor would the evil cease with the destruction of one law: they may declare they mean to stop at that one act, but having destroyed it, and finding their power above that of the government, is it not to be apprehended that they would destroy another and another, and so on to any number they disapprove of? If they would not be particular in one case, they would not in another. During the Western insurrection, the excise law was unpopular: in this case it is the house tax act; and if this is permited, it will be impossible to know where we can rest secure, nor how soon the government itself will fall a prey. This reason may account for the introduction into the English statute book, and our constitution, with the determination of the courts in both countries, of the principle that an attempt by force and violence to impede the operation of a single act, shall be treason, and under the description of levying war, as much as what shall at first appear more dangerous, since the effect may be the same.

There is another preliminary point, meriting a few observations, that is, with respect to the proclamation of the president. It was contended that, because that proclamation required the people to disperse, and commit no more crimes, it amounted to a pardon of all they did before. It is sufficient to observe here, that, had this objection been seriously made, a plea of pardon upon the ground of that proclamation must have been preferred, or it could not have been admitted. But the plea was not made, nor if it had, would it have been effectual, because, if this did amount to a pardon, it did so only on certain conditions; the attorney of the United States and the party are both allowed to show whether or not the prisoner has complied with the conditions of the pardon. It is possible, also, that the pardon has not been offered in such a manner as the constitution permits, in which case the attorney must be permitted to put in a demurrer. Of the force of these objections the court are to decide, and of course the plea must be referred to them. Again, this pardon might have been pleaded in due season. Of this the counsel for the prisoner were informed, and had time to consider, but they did not choose to avail themselves of it. But if it had been proposed, nothing is more clear to me than its insufficiency; for in my view, the proclamation contained no pardon at all. The circumstances which gave rise to, and the nature of the proclamation, ran thus: Certain information was received by the government of a disturbance having broken out in that part of the country, which baffled the power of civil authority, but as it is necessary to prevent any insurrection with as little trouble as possible, after inferior means have failed, the law provides that the president shall make proclamation, inviting and commanding such disturbers of the public peace to disperse in quietness to their homes by a certain time; this must be done before the military can be ordered out against them. This is in order to prevent more people joining the standard of rebellion afterwards, and to admonish others not to commit farther crimes; but there is not a word in the proclamation implying an offer of pardon for anything committed before. The riot act of England was cited in support of this doctrine, but there is no similarity in the two cases: that act says, a magistrate shall go to the mob, and endeavour to prevail upon them to disperse. If he cannot do it, he reads the act, and if they still continue combined, they are guilty of felony, but then this felony is a crime created merely by that act, but even that act does not intimate that they should be pardoned for crimes committed before the magistrate came, even if they do disperse. Instances to the contrary might be cited.

Having now, gentlemen of the jury, stated my opinion in the best manner in my power on the law, independent of the facts, or the particular application of that law to the prisoner at the bar, I shall, agreeably to my duty, state to you in the best manner I am capable of, the nature of the issue which you are now called upon to determine. It is an issue of an aspect the most awful and important that any juror can ever be called upon to determine. It is your duty to divest yourselves of all manner of prejudice and partiality one way or the other. Dismiss from your minds, as much as you can, all which you might have heard or thought on this case before you came into this court, and confine your opinions merely to the evidence which has been produced. No extraneous circumstances whatever ought to have the least weight with you in giving your verdict: you ought not, and I hope you will not, take into your consideration at all whether the safety of the United States requires that the prisoner should suffer, on the one hand, or whether, on the other, it may be more agreeable to your feelings that he should be acquitted. It is solely your duty to say whether he is guilty of the crime charged to him or not. No man can conceive that the interest of any government can possibly make it requisite to sacrifice any innocent man; and I can rest perfectly satisfied, which I have no doubt you also are, that this government will not, and God forbid any considerations whatever should ever influence such an action. I do not think it necessary to go into a minute detail of all the evidence which has been produced; it would be only misspending time. The general scenes which passed at Bethlehem must be fully in your mind; these scenes are supported upon the evidence of twelve witnesses. But I think it my particular duty to bring to your recollection those parts of that transaction in which the prisoner at the bar was concerned, leaving the rest as much as possible out of view. On this occasion I must request the gentlemen of the bar, if in any instance I should err in stating the evidence, that they will correct me; but I shall endeavour to be accurate. (The judge here stated the prominent features of the evidence given by Messrs. Henry, John Barnet, William Barnet, Winters, Col. Nichols, Schlaugh, Horsefield, Eyerly, Toon and Mitchel, so far as related to the conduct of the prisoner at Bethlehem, which, he said, he thought proper to state first, because the offense charged in the indictment was said to have been committed at Bethlehem. Gentlemen, he continued, if you are not well satisfied that the overt act of treason was committed at Bethlehem, and that that overt act is supported by the evidence of two witnesses at least, you will not find the prisoner guilty.)

Now, gentlemen, is the proper time for me to state one or two points concerning the law of evidence, of which you have heard much from the bar. As I observed, there must be two at least to prove that the act of treason was committed at Bethlehem. It is the opinion of the counsel for the prisoner that you must be convinced, not only of the fact by two witnesses; not only that he was concerned in a certain act; but that you must have the evidence of two witnesses, at least, by evidence drawn from the same place, that it was done with a treasonable intention, before you can pay any attention to any other evidence whatever. The fact is that, when the overt act is proved by two witnesses, it is proper to go into evidence to show the course of the prisoner's conduct at other places, and the purpose for which he went to that place where the treason is laid, and if he went with a treasonable design, then the act of treason is conclusive. In this I am supported by a very respectable authority on crown law, Foster, in the Case of Deacon [Fost. Cr. Law, 246], from which it appears that it is enough, to prove that a rebellious assembly of armed men were there, and that the prisoner joined them. In order to prove to you fully the design with which the prisoner went to Bethlehem and joined in this great outrage, I shall select some of the evidence respecting those previous transactions; it is not necessary to state the whole. (The judge here read the evidence of James Chapman, John Rodrick, Cephas Childs, and William Thomas, respecting the conduct of Jacob Fries on the 5th of March, and respecting the meeting with Foulke and Rodrick near Singmaster's; and also the transactions of the 6th, at Quaker Town, which evidence, he said, so confirmed each other, that no doubt could be entertained.)

We now come to the confession of the prisoner, voluntarily made on his examination before Judge PETERS. Here is a point of law relied on by the prisoner's counsel—that no man should be convicted of treason but on the evidence of two witnesses, or upon confession in open court. This is the provision in England as well as here, and the meaning is, that no confession of the prisoner, independent of two witnesses, or without the facts have been established by two witnesses, should be sufficient to convict him: but if two witnesses have proved a fact, the confession of the party may be received by way of confirmation of what has before been sworn to. In former days in England, it was allowed that confession out of court, and the proof of the witnesses, should be sufficient to warrant a conviction; but happily our constitution would not admit it, if a hundred would swear to it: that danger is wisely avoided. Instances enough are in the recollection of the court, of a civil and criminal nature, where confessions have been received; but the jury are to judge from other evidence how far that is to be regarded. Evidence may sometimes be given which may be doubtful, and wants corroboration; you will judge whether that is or is not the case at present. But if the confession of the prisoner should go to confirm the evidence, if sworn to by two witnesses at least, it may be received, but unless it does go to corroborate other testimony, I do not think it admissible. You will consider whether any part of this confession has not before been proved by two witnesses: if it has, it goes to corroborate what they say; if it has not, you are to disregard it. I think there ought to be great caution in receiving, as evidence, a confession which any man makes himself, because it possibly might be obtained from him by artifice or intimidation: with respect to this confession, you have the testimony of my honourable colleague, Judge PETERS, that he gave the prisoner deliberate warning that he was not bound to convict himself, and that no intimidation was used. Whatever objections, then, there may be as to confession in general, it does not apply in this case, because it was voluntarily given. The prisoner on his part introduced some witnesses, thinking they would be favourable to him: one of them appeared to be so in his testimony, which I shall endeavour to relate; the other three did not answer his expectation. (The judge related the evidence of John Jamieson.)

With regard to the point of law stated respecting the sufficiency of the warrants, the evidence to this fact shows the general disposition of that part of the country to resist the execution of the law, and prevent it by force or intimidation; our means of showing that, is their conduct towards the assessors. Those who were appointed to that office, so far as they had it in their power, showed a disposition to act as such. It is contended that their warrant ought to have been produced. With respect to the blank commission, which there was a suspicion was unlawfully filled up, there ought to have been the books produced; but it was not material. This indictment, it will be observed, is not for any resistance to the assessors, or obstruction of them in the discharge of their duty. I suppose it is not necessary to show that these officers were de facto engaged in the execution of the law; that they were considered as assessors; and that no doubt ever was entertained that they were properly authorized to be assessors. This doubt, if there was any, could be removed by reference to a very respectable authority. It was sufficient if the warrants, given under the seal of the commissioner, were produced to the court.

The honourable judge entered pretty largely into the examination of the objection respecting Mr. Foulke's appointment in the place of Mr. Clarke, which, he contended, was not material, since the warrant was filled and he acted under it.

With respect to another point of objection stated at the bar, that the marshal, in detaining the two men at Bethlehem, was liable to an action, he said that, under the circumstances of that period, he could not, because, under certain circumstances, he was warranted to call out the posse comitatus, i. e. the power of the county, to assist him, if he was likely to be overpowered: it could not be presumed that the circumstance did not empower and warrant him to call them out, and therefore we may conclude that danger was really to be apprehended, and those apprehensions must be heightened by the arrival of those two men in arms. In the opinion of Judge Henry, who was present, the danger was such as to justify the act of detention of those two men. Was it with a view of depriving these men of their liberty? No; but supposing them to have come with intent to assist in the rescue which they acknowledged they had heard was contemplated. Gentlemen, in looking to the law on this point, I do not think it is encroaching at all upon the liberty of any man to take him in custody. An officer in such an action must be at his peril, and could only be justified on the exigency of the circumstance: if he did it unnecessarily, a jury would teach him to take care how he sported with the liberties of his fellow-citizens; but supposing, from good evidence, that he was in danger of assault, if he waited the united force of the assailants, shall it be contended as unreasonable, that the marshal should take measures of self-defence while it was in his power, and detain what he might reasonably suppose a part of them? He surely acted the part of a prudent man, and was justifiable in the act. Before I dismiss this general subject, I think it an indispensable duty which I owe, to declare that, excepting the single instance, wherein I do perceive some impropriety of conduct, in the filling up the blank commission, what has been disclosed in the course of this examination of the conduct of the commissioners or assessors, has reflected on those officers the greatest honour: at the same time they acted with industry, fidelity, and firmness, in the discharge of that duty, they did all in their power to make it easy to the people, accommodating themselves to endeavour to give full satisfaction, undeceiving the deluded, and removing the errors which the people had fallen into. If the people still continued in ignorance and opposition, those gentlemen acquitted themselves of blame, and their conduct merited high praise.

As to the plea of ignorance, the law says ignorance shall excuse no man; otherwise, how could it be possible to prove whether a person knew the law or not? If ignorance could excuse a man for crimes, no crime would be brought to justice, or there must be, what is not to be expected, some self-evident proof of the guilt. A complete knowledge of the laws cannot be expected in every corner of our country; but thus much we may say, to remove this kind of excuse. If a man does not know when a law is passed, he knows how to obtain that information, and the law itself; for if he cannot come to Philadelphia, or some other town where they may be purchased by himself, he has opportunity of sending from time to time. But in the present case, any doubt could have been removed by application to the assessors, who were ever ready and willing to show the law, and therefore no plea of ignorance can possibly be set up.

Having spoken in commendation of the conduct of the commissioners and assessors, perhaps it is also my duty to say that the conduct of the marshal has been equally exemplary: he did everything in his power, by fair and honourable means, to avoid going to extremity, and as long as he had a hope of retaining his prisoners, he displayed a degree of courage which few men would do. He even offered to expose his life to this armed mob, by proceeding with the prisoners to Philadelphia, which he would have done but for the advice of three or four gentlemen with him, who thought it madness to proceed. He accordingly desisted, and in the event delivered up the prisoners.

This trial has lasted so many days, that we must be all very much fatigued; and I declare, gentlemen, I have scarce had power to examine the various points with minute attention, much less to prepare so proper a statement of them as I intended to have done. The fatigue I have felt many nights at going out of this court has prevented me doing it. Under these circumstances, I have no doubt of your excuse, which I shall the more readily meet, since your fatigue must also be very great.

Gentlemen of the Jury:—The occasion is undoubtedly the most awful and important that ever could arise in any country whatever: the great question for you to decide is, whether the prisoner has been guilty of levying war against the United States at Bethlehem, in the county of Northampton, as charged in the indictment, or not. In order to discover the nature of his conduct, you must examine into the motive with which he went to Bethlehem: it is necessary for you to examine the whole of his previous actions relating thereto: if it should appear to you that the prisoner formed a scheme, either on the way or at Bethlehem, by any kind of force, to obtain this object, then, in my opinion, you ought to declare him guilty of the charge laid in the indictment. On the contrary, if you think he had no public and evil motive in view, he is not guilty of the crime. Before I dismiss you, gentlemen, I would remind you of one consideration which must impress your minds. A great and important end of bringing persons guilty of public crimes to justice is to preserve inviolate the laws of our country. Men who commit crimes ought to be punished; otherwise no safety or security can be had. On the other hand, it is of consequence that no man's life shall be taken away unjustly. If a man is not guilty of a crime, he ought not to be punished for it; and it cannot be for the interest of the country to put a man to death for what he has not committed: therefore you are not to regard the consequences, but determine merely by the facts in a manner for which you will be answerable at a future day, as well as myself, for all the conduct of our lives, as well as for the verdict you now give.

Mr. Lewis stated a question to the court, whether the overt act laid in the indictment in a certain county, must not be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, both as to fact and intention, in the same county, or whether the overt act did not include both fact and intention. To which Judge Iredell replied, that he considered Foster's crown law as settling that point. When two witnesses are produced, which proves the overt act laid in the indictment, there might be then evidence drawn from other counties respecting the intention: this is the opinion of Judge Foster, and it is my opinion. But there is another thing: it goes to a point which is inadmissible; it is not for the court to say whether there was a treasonable intention or act as charged in the indictment; that is for the jury to determine; we have only to state the law—we therefore should have no right to give our opinion upon it. Again, if no evidence could regularly be admitted out of the county until both the fact and intention were established where the crime is laid, the consequence would be, that there ought to be some way of taking the opinion of the jury, whether they believed that the crime was committed at Bethlehem, before the court could proceed to extraneous testimony! This cannot be done; a jury must give verdict upon all the evidence collectively; if the evidence is admitted, then the jury is bound to respect the weight of it: the competency of that evidence is for the court to decide, but the jury must estimate its weight. The question for you to decide at this time, gentlemen of the jury, is, whether, upon the testimony of two witnesses, there is ground to believe the act was committed; and whether, from the prisoner's conduct at Bethlehem or elsewhere, it is proved to be with a treasonable intention.

Judge PETERS.—I think the overt act and the intention constitute the treason; for without the intention the treason is not complete. If a man goes for a private purpose, to gratify a private revenge, and not with a public or general view, it differs materially. The intention may possibly be gathered at the place where the act was committed, or it may not; if not, evidence is admissible to prove it elsewhere.

The jury then withdrew, and the court adjourned for about three hours, when they returned with the verdict guilty.[10]

Motion for a new trial of John Fries, for treason.

May 14.—Mr. Lewis informed the court that, the other day, in coming into court, he received a slight information, which he thought it his duty, as advocate for the prisoner, to make further inquiries into; but it was not till this morning that he had been able to procure the depositions of witnesses to prove a fact, on which he meant to ground a motion. He read the depositions to the court, which imported that John Rhoad, one of the jurymen on the trial of John Fries, had declared a prejudice against the prisoner after he was summoned as a juror on the trial. He now found that he could procure other affidavits to the same fact, on the ground of which he "moved a rule to show cause why there ought not to be a new trial." [11] He expressed himself aware of the lateness of the period, verdict having been given, but the impossibility of proving the fact earlier was a sufficient apology. He should forbear to enter into the merits of the motion at present. Rule was granted, and made returnable to-morrow morning.

Wednesday, May 15.—Mr. Dallas said it became his duty, as advocate for the prisoner, to lay before their honours the grounds on which they had moved for a new trial in the case of their unfortunate client, in which he was sensible some little violence must be offered to his feelings in whose behalf it was made, and particularly if judgment should at last be pronounced upon him: but whatever the event, it became their duty to prefer it; and he was certain that, upon examination into the facts, they must be justified in producing them, as the event must alter the decision which had taken place. He was satisfied that the court, without direct reference to authorities, would be inclined to listen to anything that could be offered upon good grounds in favour of life, or the chance of life. With this confidence, he relied on the favourable attention which would be paid by the court, and that the intervention of any trifling error in the proceeding, may not expose the defendant to the danger of an unfavourable decision. In making the motion, Mr. Lewis had laid before the court some affidavits in order to prove that one of the jurors, after he had been summoned to attend the trial, did declare that the man should be convicted: in addition to that circumstance, the following reasons should have been assigned in favour of the motion: First, that the marshal has, without any order or direction from the court or judges for that purpose, returned a greater number of jurors than he was by law authorized to do. Secondly, that he returned them from such parts of the district as he thought proper, and without the direction of the court or judges. Thirdly, that the trial ought to have been held in the county where the offence was committed, except manifest inconvenience should appear; and it does not appear from any part of the record of the court that any inconvenience did prevent it, for whatever were the acts of the court, they ought to have been placed on the record, which, not being done, is good ground for a motion.

Judge IREDELL did not think that the court were bound to assign a reason for their judgment on the record of their proceedings; besides, it was a high contempt at this time to call for the renewal of an argument whereon a solemn decisive opinion was delivered: he asked what part of the law required it: if it was at that time omitted, it was not in the power of the court to order it now; or if they did not order the reasons to be inserted, the mere decision on the face of the record was enough to make it authoritative.

Mr. Dallas then addressed the court in an argument of great length on the questions submitted by Mr. Lewis, protesting at the outset that there was no intention of offering a contempt to the court; and if the court would attend, they would be convinced there was not. He next made a few observations on the conduct of the juror, which, he said, was not merely an expression of opinion, but a previous determination, and an expression of fear that the prisoner should be acquitted, so that it was impossible to doubt that, if this was true, the juror did not give verdict upon evidence, but was influenced by a previous bias, and prejudiced determination; his going into the box with this partial mind, deprived the prisoner of that chance which the law determines he shall have. It is necessary that every jury should enter this box free from malice; but it was not so: this juror laboured under particular impressions, unfavourable to John Fries, because he conceived he had been the leader of, and brought on this disturbance, and therefore ought to be hung: this will be proved to have been more than once the language of the juror, and that he indulged himself in those expressions. After running from place to place, influenced by a vindictive spirit of prejudice, to express his desires, can it be contended that he was capable of deciding on the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, by the weight of the testimony only? There cannot be found a stronger case in the books. It is not necessary or right to go into the testimony, or any of the circumstances of the crime of the prisoner, to see whether the verdict was right or wrong; but it is necessary to view the determination of this juror, who wished them all hanged, and particularized Fries. First, his words were, "We will hang them all;" then he said, "I myself shall be in danger, unles we do hang them all." This is not merely an opinion generally expressed, but the language of design to convict at all events. If eleven out of twelve jurors had been of opinion that an acquittal should take place, and this individual, supposing he was in danger, had declared this opinion, and pointed out his view of the probable consequences, would not the voice of the eleven be changed to guard against this danger? 4 Hawk. P. C. c. 43, § 28, p. 399, supports the doctrine generally, that if a juror has declared his opinions beforehand, that the party is guilty, or will be hanged, or the like, it is good cause of challenge: but if from his knowledge of the case, and not from ill-will to the party, he has only declared his opinion, it is no cause of challenge. But even resentment has not the influence upon a man's conduct which self-preservation has: ill-will is not the only ground of challenge; interest is as much so: if a man had laid a wager another would be hung, this is not ill-will, but would vitiate the juror. Therefore we must conclude that "ill-will," in the above authority, is put merely as an instance. Whether these words were spoken in warmth or not, is immaterial, for it would be no alleviation; it is impossible that they should have been expressed without ill-will; and therefore the man is not impartially qualified to pass upon the life or death of the prisoner. Salk. 645; 11 Mod. 118. Upon the general ground of what could be with propriety called misconduct in the person summoned to discharge the duty of a juror with impartiality, he observed there could be no doubt upon the propriety of their asking a new trial, nor upon the justice of one being granted.

[11] "The prisoner," says the reporter, "had been brought into court in order to receive sentence of death, but on Mr. Lewis' motion for a rule to show cause, judgment was suspended, and he was remanded back to prison."

Mr. Lewis mentioned 5 Bac. Abr. (Old Ed.) 251, 252, and 4 Bl. Comm. 354, 355, in order to show, that in criminal cases there should be no new trial, unless it should appear that the former trial had been attended with fraud, &c., and that a new trial in those cases might be granted after conviction. 11 Mod. 119; 5 Bac. Abr. 243; and 3 Bac. Abr. (Old Ed.) 258. If he has declared his will touching the matter, it shall be cause. 4 Bl. Comm. (Old Ed.) 346. The direction respecting the venire, he said, was entrusted to the law, and not to the marshal; and by that direction was exercised by the judges in 1795; and if that was neglected, it was not legally executed. The court could, as then, order the jury to be called from all parts of the state, and not to be left to the marshal. 5 Bac. Abr. 242, is an instance in which a son was sworn into the jury, (being the same name of John Pierce,) instead of the father, who was the person summoned to attend, whereupon a new trial was granted, because the trial was held by only eleven qualified persons as jurors. If the sheriff did not follow the direction of the law in respect to the venire, it was good cause for new trial.

Mr. Sitgreaves, in replying to Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, first doubted the power of the court to give a new trial in criminal cases, upon which,

Judge IREDELL said, he had not discovered any dictum which distinguished civil from criminal causes, so that equal justice ought not to be administered; but if either, surely a criminal case called most strongly for justice: it would never do to apply cases so far, as to say that, if one man upon a jury was discovered not to be fully impartial, a new trial should not be granted, when a man's life was at stake.

Judge PETERS said he always understood, that the power of granting a new trial was in the discretion of the court; and that its opinion ought not to be turned by any vagaries which should be presented, but be governed by a reference to legal discretion; but at the same time, he could not say that the court ought to throw entirely out of their view all the evidence which had been given in the trial and everything that had been done. If, in the scale of justice, there should appear to be any error, and the case is any way doubtful, then the court will take advantage of a trifle, in order to grant a new trial; but where the court has been fully convinced that the verdict is right, then the evidence ought to have some weight, as well as the law.

Mr. Dallas observed, that the motion was not in any regard to evidence; if so, the weight of evidence must be considered; but it was alone on the point of law, totally independent of evidence.

After Mr. Sitgreaves and Mr. Rawle had replied, it was agreed by counsel, and ordered by the court, that the deponents should give testimony, and be cross-examined in court, on each side; and also that the witnesses should be examined separately, and kept out of the court, so as not to hear the evidence given by each other. Five witnesses were then produced, who testified that John Rhoad, one of the jurors who sat on the case, had declared, at two separate occasions, after his being summoned on the jury, but before the trial, that Fries, the prisoner, "ought to be hung;" "that it would not be safe at home unless they hung them all;" &c. Rhoad himself was afterward called by the district attorney, and denied under oath that he had made use of the expressions imputed to him, or any other of a similar character. Some testimony, also, was produced for the purpose of showing his veracity and general good character.

Mr. Lewis then mentioned the grounds upon which the rule to show cause had been granted; whether either or all the grounds had weight in them, he would not undertake to assert; but certain it was that it was the duty of the prisoner's counsel to lay them before the court and wait the event, which, if favourable, would cause a new trial; if not, they should be satisfied with having discharged their duty; in either case they should cheerfully submit to the opinion of the court; and he was sorry to see that the last question, to wit, that the trial ought to have been held in the proper county, had given any discomposure to the court. He then explained the reason, to show the court that it was not agitated out of any disrespect to their former decision, which was that "manifest inconvenience" did prevent the trial being held there, but this did not appear on the record. In criminal prosecutions, and especially capital cases, it was usual for the prisoner's counsel to avail themselves of every slip and inaccuracy, and therefore he was excusable in the present objection. 4 Burrows, 252. It was common to the court to err, and in such a case he considered himself in duty bound to point it out to them; and he was satisfied, if that error was of consequence enough, the court would grant a rule thereupon, and thus retract from their former opinions, which they were fully authorized to do. 3 Bl. Comm. 391; 1 Burrows, 393. Mr. Lewis then went on to point out the propriety of granting a new trial in criminal as well as civil cases, although the prosecuting counsel had enforced the want of precedent as a reason against it; indeed, he said, it was evidently of more consequence, and therefore he supposed it had been the more strongly opposed; a man's life and his fame were of more value than a part of his property, and he had no doubt that whatever might have been the verdict, the court would go as far in granting it. It was admitted that the court had the power; if it had the power, there was no doubt but the honourable judges would exercise it according to their conviction. Mr. Lewis said the counsel for the prisoner did not come forward to prove that the verdict was given against evidence, but to insist that the prisoner had been tried by eleven jurors only, for the other stood indifferent as he stood unsworn; they went further—they went to prove that there was an essential error in the panel, and thus the prisoner was bereft of those benefits to which the law entitled him. If we prove this, said he, we do not address ourselves to the discretion of your honours; it is not a matter of will; it is a matter of justice to which we are entitled. As it respects the evidence, you are not at all to consider its weight; the evidence may be clear, and yet the verdict may be wrongly given, because of the incompetency of the jurors. The gentlemen have said the period of application is past—it is too late; but with all their talents and industrious researches, those learned gentlemen have not been able to produce a single authority to support the doctrine that it is too late; after conviction, or even after condemnation, the court have authority to order a new trial; no time is specified to limit the discretion, if the reasons are good. If the law has not distinguished the period, those gentlemen are certainly unwarranted in saying it is too late. In 2 Strange, 968, is a case where an argument was held on a plea for a new trial; but not a single argument is used, that a new trial could not be held on capital cases; that seems to be taken for granted.

It was argued against a new trial, in capital cases, that the court proceeded more deliberately, and more cautiously, and because the prisoner was allowed a challenge of his jury. The argument amounts to this: because the law requires more caution, and gives the prisoner more advantages where his life is at stake, for that reason he should have less advantage and less indulgence; or, in other words, because the benignity of the law allowed more benefits in the awful event of life or death, therefore in another point essential to the prisoner, he should be bereft of an advantage enjoyed by one indicted for an assault, or in a common civil cause. It may be argued, that the benevolence of the executive may extend mercy to the prisoner, because of any irregularity in evidence or proceeding; but this will not satisfy the law; it is a hazard at best, while the law gives him the certain advantage of a new trial The power and right of granting a new trial in some cases, are admitted; now, if any of the witnesses or jurors could be proved to have perjured themselves, the evidence being first given, and the verdict pronounced, this, it will be allowed, would have weight to grant a new trial; but the case before the court goes as far, if not farther; and if there should appear an extreme error in summoning the jury, or that one of the jurors had disqualified himself from wearing the characteristics of an unbiassed man, then it must equally appear that there has been an infringement of a legal right, sufficient to lay the foundation of a second hearing. Another doctrine that was insisted on was, that it was discretionary in the court; that, where they were satisfied with a verdict, although against evidence, no new trial ought to be granted. There may be instances of a civil nature in which that doctrine will be allowable; but they differ materially from the one now before the court, and therefore will not apply. That application may go to the favour of the court, where they see the evidence strong; but no favour can be exercised, nor is any asked in this case; we only appeal to the justice of the case.

It was said by one of the gentlemen, that this juror's declaring his sentiments was only cause of challenge to the favour, for which triers ought to have been appointed, and the qualification or disqualification of the juror been determined by them, but for which it was now too late. Mr. Lewis denied the position. He had already proved, both on his own declaration, and by the evidence, that it did not come to their knowledge until after the verdict was given, and therefore they came forward as soon as they were obliged: this was allowed a sufficient excuse in Salk. 645, and 11 Mod. 119, and therefore the objection was unimportant. The witnesses could not inform John Fries, for he was in jail; he could not know it until yesterday morning, when the motion was made in court, for the witnesses had no knowledge of each other, so as to be able to communicate it. 3 Bac. Abr. 258, 259, says: "It is particular cause of challenge, if a juror has declared his opinion touching the matter." In causes of particular challenge, the court is to inquire into the truth of the fact, and no triers are to be called: if they find the cause a true one, they are not to judge, nor to be left to discretion, but, they must try the issue again. This is the doctrine of ancient law and usage. Bac. Abr. 266. Then, all the argument about triers is out of the question; the question is, whether the juror stood indifferent, or whether he was under the influence of bias, and a prejudiced mind: the law compels the issue to steer clear of friends or enemies: no partiality whatever is to predominate: but can any man in the world say that Rhoad's mind was free from prejudice when he took opportunities to make such declarations?

Mr. Lewis then went into an examination of the evidence and depositions. Now suppose the court to believe the fact nearly as stated by the evidence, Mr. L. asked, whether it was possible, consistent with law or justice, to believe that a just verdict was given, or that any man ought to suffer under such a verdict? Suppose the whole twelve to have made similar declarations; it would require no argument to convince the unbiassed, that the consequence must be fatal. It has been attempted to be proved that even such a declaration was no ground of challenge, if it was not made from malice; but what is the meaning of an independent man? It means a man who stands on the high ground of justice and impartiality, and is not warped by prejudice nor warmed by resentment, quite free from interest in the issue; also, a man whose judgment has not been made up in favour of either the one party or the other; for, if it has, though he may be an honest and well meaning man, it is not likely that his mind would be freely given according to evidence. Without he is free from these entanglements upon his mind, he will, he must err. Now, it appears by the evidence of even Mr. Rhoad himself, that he was warm, and might have forgotten the expressions, and nothing can be shown but that Mayer, the witness, who has lived in this country, is a man of good character; however, he must be supposed so, until he can be proved otherwise. Mr. Lewis remarked, that the witnesses spoke of different conversations; Mayer of one, when Rhoad came first to town; the others, of two afterwards, in the room where they were sitting, and in the bed-room. He contended that no material, although a verbal, difference did exist; but the testimony of Rhoad differed materially from them all; his verbal testimony and deposition were also different, as might be seen. But, Mr. Lewis said, he doubted whether the testimony of Rhoad in this matter was legal evidence or not, because it was a matter in which he was materially concerned; however, they had not much objected, as there was a considerable difference in evidence going to a court, and to a jury; he had no doubt their honours would make the necessary allowance. Although Rhoad was not sworn at the time he used these expressions, he was summoned on this trial, and it was a high misdemeanor—whether it was indictable or not, he would not say—but it was a very imprudent disposition to encourage or even suffer. In Cooke's Case, Salk. 153, Chief Justice Holt holds, that if a man ought not to be compelled to prove that he is a party, neither should he be allowed to prove that he is not a party, by his own evidence. This applies to Rhoad giving evidence, in which his character is concerned. 15 State. Tr. 547, 548, the case appears more fully; such conduct is here declared to be scandalous, a misdemeanor, and the man ought not to be on any jury. By four witnesses, neither inconsistent with themselves, nor with each other, Mr. Lewis said this fact was clearly proved, and he thought incontrovertibly so; of the respectability of those witnesses he knew nothing; but nothing disrespectful had been proved, and, consequently, not their incompetency.

Judge PETERS said that he did not know about their swearing falsely, nor could he say anything about Mayer; but of the others, he well knew that one was extremely stupid, and the others deeply prejudiced, on which account, their evidence should be carefully scrutinized, and carefully received.

The necessity of great precaution and care, Mr. Lewis was willing to admit; but this stupidity was a good apology for their not revealing the fact until it was drawn from them. Their ignorance, indeed, was deducible from the whole of their conduct, and the opposition they made to the government, but it did not strike at their credibility; uninformed and misinformed as they were, their verity might be good. They were under indictments, and therefore perhaps afraid to speak; besides, coming from different parts of the country, they knew not John Fries; but let their offence or situation be what it may, they may be honest men, and men of truth and integrity, and, therefore, they must stand upon as good a footing as witnesses could stand. We must take it for granted, then, said Mr. Lewis, that the juror made these declarations; and if so, according to the law of England and of the United States, he is disqualified from the office; otherwise that most invaluable right, trial by jury, would be eminently impaired.

Mr. Lewis then examined some authorities which had been quoted by the prosecuting counsel, some of which were irrelevant, and some he thought not at all applicable. With respect to the Case of Ann Clifton, as quoted from the Pennsylvania Practices, the juror declared that "he did not know how anybody could do otherwise than bring her in guilty, but he did not speak as a juryman." The court were of opinion, it was not sufficient to grant a new trial. The objection of the court was, not because it was a capital case, but they gave as a reason, that these words were not sufficient to vitiate a juror; his mind as a juror, he declared, was still open to conviction.

It was stated that the application ought not to be listened to, because the prisoner had the challenge of sixty-eight in effect out of the whole panel; how this was meant to be applied he could not discover, but one fact was plain, that the smaller number there were summoned above thirty-five, the better choice there was for the prisoner, and therefore the whole number cannot be made to exceed sixty, agreeably to common law. Mr. Lewis then observed, that one remark of Mr. Rawle, that Mr. Rhoad was the last they could challenge, but they would rather have him than trust to the next, was a plain implication that they were ignorant of the fact, instead of militating against the motion. In order to remove every suspicion of inaccuracy from the former testimony, he said, he had happily been able to procure one whose respectability could not be questioned, and which he should now introduce to the court.

Here, an additional witness was introduced, to sustain the facts already sworn to on the part of the prisoner.

Mr. Lewis resumed his argument in favour of the evidence, which, he said, had not the last witness come forward, the others being suspected, would have been a question, whether the negative testimony of Mr. Rhoad, in which he was a party, or the positive testimony of four others who were not concerned, had the most weight. But now, taking it for granted that Rhoad is mistaken, it can be only accounted for in two ways: First, that his memory failed him; or secondly, that he was extremely prejudiced. Imputing nothing corrupt to him, still we cannot allow him to be less so than any one of the five witnesses we have brought to controvert his assertions; allowing him not to be free from prejudice, he cannot be supposed to be capable of judging for himself. Mr. Lewis concluded by examining at great length the other reasons submitted on the motion for a new trial.

After some aditional evidence had been introduced of the same nature as that already noticed:

Judge PETERS observed, that the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Trevy, in 15 State Tr. was much to the point; but that question was not determined by the court. In a question of so much national importance as the present, Judge PETERS thought it his duty to give an opinion. When a man lives in the county where insurrection has happened, his impressions of injury from the repetitions of such scenes will be stronger than might be expected in other men, and, therefore, all that Rhoad said about it being unsafe for the friends of the government to live there, is accounted for, and no way improper for him to speak. I think Rhoad an honest man, and do not think he had any malice against Fries more than any of the rest; but I think he must have forgotten. That which appeared to strike Mr. Lewis with such force does not appear to me important. I think the proceedings might have been more regular, but yet I think they were regular enough to stamp the event with a sufficient sanction. The proceedings were much the same as the court of oyer and terminer, when the sheriff summons a number more than is wanted, in order to have them ready, and when twelve are wanted they are taken out of that number. This venire issued by the same course as all others do, perhaps not knowing the offences would be capital, but it appearing otherwise afterwards, agreeably to act of congress some were summoned from the proper counties. The venire says the number is not to exceed sixty, yet these words do not designate more than those in the practice of England which directs twelve, but twenty-four is generally returned. To be sure the court might have given the order, but I do not see how this could be done without the defendant lying in jail, or a special court being held. There is some weight, to be sure, in the arguments on that point, but they are not so important as they were held up to be. The marshal having ready a certain number, when the issue was joined, then, and not before, was the number who did appear made to appear in court. The panel was returned, and furnished to Fries, on which the trial was suffered to proceed, and on that account I think it appears it was approved of by the court, which is a sufficient designation.

Judge IREDELL.—The question which the court have now to decide is certainly as important a one as ever was before a court. With regard to any interest the government could be supposed to have in the event, or the feelings of private humanity or compassion as men, for the very unhappy situation of the prisoner—these must both be sacrificed to that impartial justice which our duty peremptorily commands us to exercise according to the best of our capacities. Sure I am that it is always my disposition so to be influenced, as I am convinced it is also of the judge with whom I have the honor to sit on the bench. It is admitted, I believe, on both sides, that it is in the power of the court in criminal cases to grant a new trial in favor of the prisoner, though they cannot to his prejudice, and it must be readily admitted that it must be the most obvious considerations, which could possibly render it the duty of the court, lest they too readily grant a new trial: for if the power is placed in a court, it is proof that it must, or might be sometimes exercised, and if ever proper occasion arise for the exercise of it, it must depend on some particular, strikingly applicable circumstances. With regard to the particular circumstance now brought forward, that one of the jurymen made certain declarations unfavorable to the justice a prisoner has a right to expect, I must confess that until the evidence yesterday given by Mr. Yohe, I was not satisfied that he had said any such thing which could give the court full ground to believe him improperly biassed, so as to admit just cause for a new trial; but that testimony corroborating the testimony of those before given on which, independently, we could place but little dependence, strikes me with great force, otherwise I should have entertained some doubt, owing to their different relations of apparently the same event.

This caution was invigorated by the very excellent character which the juror had borne. From this I have every reason to believe that he has not wilfully done anything wrong, nor sworn to anything which he does not believe to be true. From the relation, it was difficult to arrange the particular parts of the conversation, so as to make it accord at any interval of time, on which account I was extremely desirous that Mr. Rhoad and Mr. Yohe should be confronted, and questions put to remind each other of the facts, so as both might accord; but it does appear that Mr. Rhoad's memory is extremely defective in some material points, and, therefore, without any impeachment, we may presume it was a gross mistake It is the clear opinion of the court in 15 State Tr. that if a juryman, not out of particular malice against the individual, but from any other cause, appears to have formed a predetermined opinion, he was not fit to be a juryman, and it was, therefore, good cause of challenge. In that case the expressions used were much similar to the present case: that opinion appears to be grounded upon the supposition that where a man, from any ill motives, or otherwise, forms an opinion strongly on his mind, an improper bias is extremely difficult to get clear of, and will influence an honest man unwarily to give a wrong verdict, and to these circumstances every man is liable. It is impossible for me to resist the impression, from the number of depositions produced, that Mr. Rhoad must, at different times, have used expressions similar to those related by Mr. Yohe, but I can readily conceive that such expressions were used with an innocent intention, and without meaning to prejudice himself from afterwards serving as an honest juryman; yet I cannot be certain but it might originate from a predisposed opinion of the guilt of the man, and, therefore, it must render him less able to discriminate facts; but if no such idea of guilt did exist, according to the authority stated, it would be good cause of challenge, if known, but if not known until after verdict is given, it would then be sufficient time, for what is good cause of challenge previous to trial, is good ground for a motion after verdict. It is very much to be regretted that the witnesses who heard these declarations did none of them communicate it to the counsel or the prisoner before the jury were sworn, because he might have been set aside, and much unnecessary public expense and distress to the unfortunate man, besides delay of the execution of justice, in this particular case, been prevented. It being admitted that the court may grant a new trial in criminal cases upon sufficient cause to show, and it following that they ought to do it if shown, I further think that if there is cause of challenge before, there is equal cause, if it is proved that the juror was biassed, to order it, after verdict is pronounced, whatever delay or inconvenience may result therefrom; for that can be no reason to withhold a privilege to which a prisoner is entitled. From these views, I think it my duty to vote for a new trial in the present case, as the fact appears too clear to be controverted. In this event, there will be still an opportunity for the prisoner to be freed, and justice be done between himself and his country.

With regard to the point of law, if my mind had not been clear on the evidence respecting the juror, I should have been decidedly against a new trial, and accordingly should have taken the trouble more fully to have delivered my sentiments; it being so. I shall now make but a few general remarks. As to the point, that the record should evince the proceedings of the court, otherwise they are invalid, with reasons why trial could not be held in the county, I think there is no necessity of the reasons appearing on the record of court. If the question had stood simply upon this ground, it would have been immaterial; but it did not. Application was made to this court, after several indictments were found, alleging that the trials ought to be held in the county, whereupon the court declared its opinion, that "great inconvenience" prevented a compliance with the motion: but further it appeared to be gone out of the power of the court, because the indictment had been found in this court, which must be considered a part of the trial; and the law means the whole proceeding shall be in one place, so that the indictment must have been found in that county, otherwise the trial by jury could not be held there. These were the reasons which operated to influence the court to refuse the application. In this dilemma, it was impossible for the court to say the trial should not proceed here; and, had it been removed, a new indictment could not have been found; if it had, the trial could not proceed upon two indictments. The only time for considering this question, I believe, was, when this man was charged with the offence, before he was committed, or even after the court sat, and before the indictment was brought into court. If it had been the opinion of the judge who committed him, that the trial could be held there, then it could have been referred to the supreme court, who, if they had been of the same opinion, would have ordered a special court. But from the state of that county, no one can believe that a trial could have been held therein any way conducive to justice, or so as to make the proceedings of the court such as they ought to be, because the president has declared, by proclamation, that the law could not be executed without military assistance, which I never wish to see guard a court of justice as matter of choice, though unavoidable necessity may sometimes make it prudent.

With regard to the summoning the jury, it is to be observed, that the practice now used, was an established usage of this court for many years past, which is a sanction sufficient, if no positive law nullifies it. The venire, issued in this form, in my opinion, did issue with the sanction of the court, and had the same effect as though the express order of the court had been annexed. It appears that it was not known, at the time the venire issued, that any cases were punishable with death, and of course not necessary to include a special provision for twelve to come from the county. Mr. Lewis made a concession, which, if right, did away the whole of this objection; he said, that upon the marshal's receiving information (whether it came from the judge or not) that a case punishable with death had occurred, he had a right, without any order from the court, written or verbal, to summon a greater number of men than in other cases: the words of the law are, not that he should summon twelve, but twelve at least; but he observed that this should not exceed, but be included in the number sixty. I do not know what authority he had to limit the number to sixty, in this or any other case. The law intends that a prisoner shall have a chance of men from his own neighbourhood; certainly then the greater the number which comes from it, his chance is proportionably increased; therefore it can never prejudice the prisoner. I think that if the marshal should extend the discretion given to him to an unnecessary number, it would operate to the vexation of the persons summoned, and they alone would have cause to complain. Formerly, by law, a sheriff was directed to summon twelve, but, by usage, he actually did summon twenty-four, yet all above the twelve appeared to acquiesce, and it could not be of disadvantage; so in the grand-jury for twenty-four, forty-eight were summoned; the power was assumed, and not complained of. I presume that if the marshal had authority to return that number, without a venire or precept, he was not limited as to number; and that when they came here, they formed the jury attending court. I am further of opinion, that when the panel was presented to the prisoner, that panel contained the full sanction of the court, as much as though they had given the order.

So far as to substance. With respect to form, the words are, after joining the issue, "let the jury come." That is a direction given by the court to the marshal to summon the jury; but as it would be inconvenient for him to summon the jury after this order, which is for him to do it without delay, those jurors already summoned appear in court, so that if it was entered upon record, it would appear that, after the prisoner was arraigned, and issue joined, the marshal had directed these men to come, and they had come. It appears to me that, whether the marshal summoned the jurors of his own accord, or whether they were summoned under the express order of the court after issue was joined, in substance and in form the law is so far complied with as to do perfect justice. Though I am not certain that my opinion on these points of law is right, not having had much time to examine, yet I am strongly of that opinion at present; however, I have thought less and said less upon them than if the main object of the motion rested on it.

Sensible of the importance of the question, and that if life is once lost, it can never be recovered; leaving aside the question which involves doubt, and resting on the facts which have appeared before the court, I deem it my duty to say that a new trial ought to be granted.

Judge PETERS then said: Although I am not perfectly satisfied with the testimony, which is contradicted by the juror on his oath, I will allow it to be taken for granted, and meet the question on principle. I am in sentiment against granting the motion for a new trial. Because, 1. The juror said no more than all friends to the laws and the government were warranted in thinking and saying as the facts appeared then to the public. Fries being generally alleged to be the most prominent character, it was on this account, and not with special or particular malice, that Rhoad's declaration was made. 2. If a juror was rejected on account of such declarations, trials, where the community at large are intimately affected by crimes of such general importance and public notoriety, must be had, in all probability, by those who only openly or secretly approved of the conduct of criminals. This would be unjust and improper, as it affects the government in its public prosecutions Little success could be expected from proceedings against the most atrocious offenders, if great multitudes were implicated in their delusions or guilt. 3. It is natural for all good citizens, when atrocious crimes, of a public nature, are known to have been committed, to express their abhorrence and disapprobation both of the offenses and the perpetrators. It is their duty so to express themselves. This is not like the case of murder, or any offence against an individual, or where several are charged, and none remarkably prominent. In this latter case, selecting one out of the mass might evince particular malice. 4. I have no doubt that declarations of an opposite complexion could be proved; and yet the jurors were unanimous in their verdict. The defendant has had a fair, and I think an impartial trial. But as a division in the court might lessen the weight of the judgment if finally pronounced, and the great end of the law in punishments being example, I, with some reluctance, yield to the opinion of Judge IREDELL. Although justice may be delayed, yet it will not fail either as it respects the United States or the prisoner.

Case No. 5,127.

*Case of FRIES.

[Whart. St. Tr. 610.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April 29, 1800.

TREASON AGAINST UNITED STATES DEFINED — INSURRECTION TO RESIST EXECUTION OF A LAW — INTENT — NUMBERS ENGAGED — PRINCIPAL AND ACCESSORY.

[1. An insurrection or rising of any body of the people to resist, or to prevent by force or violence, the execution of any statute of the United States for levying or collecting taxes, duties, imposts, or excises, or for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, or for any other object of a general nature or national concern, under any pretence, as that the statute is unjust, burthensome, oppressive, or unconstitutional, is "levying war" against the United States within the contemplation and construction of the constitution.]

[2. The assembling of bodies of men, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, for purposes only of a private nature, is not treason, although the judges or other peace officers should be insulted or resisted, or even great outrages committed to the persons or property of citizens.]

[3. The true criterion is the intention with which the people assembled. When the intention is universal or general, as to effect some object of a general public nature, it will be treason, and cannot be considered, construed, or reduced to riot. On the other hand, the commission of any number of felonies, riots, or misdemeanors cannot alter their nature so as to make them amount to treason.]

[4. If a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection to resist or oppose the execution of any statute of the United States by force, they are only guilty of a high misdemeanor; but if they proceed to carry such intention into execution by force, they are guilty of the treason of levying war, and the quantum of force employed neither lessens nor increases the crime; whether by 100 or 1,000 persons is wholly immaterial.]

[5. There are no accessories to the crime of treason; but all the particeps criminis are principals. All persons present, aiding, assisting, or abetting any treasonable act, or who are present, countenancing, and are ready to afford assistance, if necessary, to those committing a treasonable act, are principals.]

[6. If a man joins and acts with an assembly of people, his intent is always to be considered and adjudged to be the same as theirs; and the law judges of the intent by the fact.]

[This was an indictment against John Fries for treason, in levying war against the United States. For a trial on a former indictment, see Case No. 5,126.]

The prisoner was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty to the following indictment (the first having been withdrawn by the district attorney): "The grand inquest of the United States of America, in and for the Pennsylvania district, upon their respective oaths and affirmations, do present, that John Fries, late of the county of Bucks, in the state and district of Pennsylvania, yeoman, owing allegiance to the United States of America, wickedly devising, and intending the peace and tranquillity of the said United States to disturb and to prevent the execution of the laws thereof within the same, to wit, a law of the said United States, entitled, 'An act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling houses, and the enumeration of slaves within the United States,' and also a law of the said United States, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States,' on the 7th day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, in the county of Northampton, in the state and district aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, wickedly and traitorously intend to levy war against the said United States, within the same, and to fulfil and bring to effect the said traitorous intention of him, the said John Fries, he, the said John Fries, afterwards, that is to say, on the said seventh day of March, in the said year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, in the said state, district and county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with a great multitude of persons, whose names are to the said grand inquest unknown, to a great number, to wit, to the number of one hundred persons, and upwards, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, that is to say, with guns, swords, and other warlike weapons as well offensive and defensive, being then and there unlawfully and traitorously assembled, did traitorously assemble and combine against the said United States, and then and there with force and arms, wickedly and traitorously, and with the wicked and traitorous intention to oppose and prevent, by means of intimidation and violence, the execution of the said laws of the said United States, within the same, did array and dispose themselves in a warlike and hostile manner against the said United States, and then and there, with force and arms, in pursuance of such their traitorous intention, he, the said John Fries, with the said persons so as aforesaid, traitorously assembled, armed and arrayed in manner aforesaid, wickedly and traitorously did levy war against the said United States. And further to fulfil and bring to effect the said traitorous intention of him, the said John Fries, and in pursuance and in execution of the said wicked and traitorous combination to oppose, resist and prevent the said laws of the United States from being carried into execution, in the state and district aforesaid, he, the said John Fries, afterwards, to wit: on the said seventh day of March, in the said year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, in the state, district and county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with the said persons, whose names to the grand inquest aforesaid are unknown, did wickedly and traitorously assemble against the said United States, with the avowed intention by force of arms and intimidation, to prevent the execution of the said laws of the said United States, within the same; and in pursuance and execution of such their wicked and traitorous combination and intention, he, the said John Fries, then and there, with force and arms, with the said persons to a great number, to wit, the number of one hundred persons and upwards, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, that is to say, with guns, swords and other warlike weapons, as well offensive as defensive, being then and there unlawfully and traitorously assembled, did wickedly and traitorously resist and oppose the marshal of the said United States, in and for the said Pennsylvania district, in the execution of the duty of his office of marshal aforesaid, and then and there, with force and arms, with the said great multitude of persons, so as aforesaid unlawfully and traitorously assembled, and armed and arrayed in manner aforesaid, he, the said John Fries, wickedly and traitorously did oppose and resist, and prevent, the said marshal of the said United States from executing the lawful process to him directed and delivered against sundry persons, inhabitants of the county aforesaid and district aforesaid, and charged upon oath before the judge of the district court of the said United States, for the said district, with having entered into a conspiracy to prevent the execution of the said law of the United States, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States,' which process duly issued by the said judge of the said district court of the district aforesaid, the said marshal of the said United States, then and there had in his possession, and was then and there proceeding to execute as by law he was bound to do; and so the said grand inquest, upon their respective oaths and affirmations aforesaid, do say, that the said John Fries, in manner aforesaid as much as in him lay, wickedly and traitorously did prevent, by means of force and intimidation, the execution of the said laws of the said United States, in the said state and district of Pennsylvania. And further to fulfil and bring to effect the said traitorous intention of him the said John Fries, and in pursuance and in execution of the said wicked and traitorous combination to oppose, resist and prevent the execution of the said laws of the said United States, in the state and district aforesaid, he, the said John Fries, afterwards, to wit, on the said seventh day of March, in the said year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, in the state, district and county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with the said persons whose names to the grand inquest aforesaid are unknown, did wickedly and traitorously assemble against the said United States with the avowed intention, by means of force and intimidation, to prevent the execution of the said laws of the said United States, in the state and district aforesaid, and in pursuance and in execution of such their wicked and traitorous combination and intention, then and there in the state, district and county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with force and arms, with a great multitude of persons, to wit, the number of one hundred persons and upwards, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, that is to say, with guns, swords, and other warlike weapons, as well offensive as defensive, being then and there unlawfully and traitorously assembled, he, the said John Fries, did traitorously, with force and arms and against the will of the said marshal of the said United States, in and for the district aforesaid, liberate and take out of his custody sundry persons by him before that time arrested, and in his lawful custody then and there being, by virtue of lawful process against them issued by the said judge of the district court of the said United States, for the said Pennsylvania district, on a charge upon oath of a conspiracy to prevent the execution of the said law of the said United States, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;' and so the grand inquest aforesaid, upon their respective oaths and affirmations aforesaid, do say, that the said John Fries, as much as in him lay, did then and there, in pursuance and in execution of the said wicked and traitorous combination and intention, wickedly and traitorously, by means of force and intimidation, prevent the execution of the said law of the said United States, entitled 'An act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling houses, and the enumeration of slaves, within the United States,' and the said law of the said United States, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States,' in the state and district aforesaid, contrary to the duty of his said allegiance, against the constitution, peace and dignity of the said United States, and also against the form of the act of the congress of the said United States, in such case made and provided. William Rawle, Attorney of the United States for the Pennsylvania District."

Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, before engaged to act for the prisoner, on account of the conduct directed by the court to be observed by the counsel, withdrew their assistance; so that the prisoner was left without counsel; and on being asked by the court if he would wish to have some assigned, he did not accept the offer.[1]

Thursday, April 24. Before the jurors were sworn in, they were individually asked (upon oath) these questions: "Are you any way related to the prisoner?" They all answered, "No." "Have you ever formed or delivered an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, or that he ought to be punished?" The answer generally was, "Not to my knowledge." Some of the jurors said they had given their sentiments generally, disapprobatory of the transaction, but not as to the prisoner particularly. These were admitted. One of the jurors (Mr. Taggert), after he was sworn, expressed himself to the court to be very uneasy under his oath; he then meant that he never had made up his mind that the prisoner should be hung, but very often had spoken his opinion that he was very culpable; he did not, when he took the oath, conceive it so strict, and therefore wished, if possible, to be excused. The court informed the juror it was impossible to excuse him, now he was sworn. The court informed the prisoner that he had a right to challenge thirty-five without showing cause, and as many more as he could show cause for. Thirty-four were challenged, and the following admitted and sworn on the jury: Samuel Wheeler, foreman; Henry Pepper, John Taggert, Cornelius Comegys, Ephraim Clark, Thomas Baily, Lawrence Cauffman, John Edge, Charles Deshler, Henry Dubois, Isaac Dehaven, John Balliot.

Mr. Rawle and Mr. Ingersol, for the prosecution.

Mr. Rawle then opened the charge exhibited in the indictment. He observed that the jury must be aware of the very unpleasant duty he had to perform; he felt an extreme difficulty of situation,—called forth by his duty to exhibit a charge against the prisoner at the bar of the highest magnitude, who now stood to answer, unattended by any legal advice, he felt impressed with the necessity of sticking more than usually close to the line of his duty, which he should endeavor to discharge as faithfully as possible. And he trusted that, while the jury felt their relation to their unfortunate fellow-citizen at the bar, they would, at the same time, make all suitable allowance for any errors which might appear on his (Mr. Rawle's) part, though it was sincerely his desire to avoid any, either in laying down the facts or the law, which he should do under the direction of the court; and he hoped that the jury would carefully sift and examine the law and testimony which his duty called upon him to advance, in order to substantiate the charge. Mr. Rawle then proceeded to open the charge. He said, he should be able to prove, that John Fries, the prisoner at the bar, did oppose the execution of two laws of the United States, to effectuate which he was provided with men, who, as well as himself, were armed with guns, swords, and other warlike weapons, which, by their numbers and military appearance, were sufficient to accomplish their purpose, which was, not only to intimidate the officers of the government appointed to execute the above laws themselves, but to release from the custody of the marshal of Pennsylvania a number of persons who were held in prison by the said marshal, and to prevent him executing process upon others. All this was done, as stated in the indictment, by a combination and conspiracy to oppose those laws, by a large body of armed men, of whom the prisoner at the bar was the chief, and commander.

Mr. Rawle then proceeded, under the direction of the court, to state the law. The treason whereof the prisoner was charged was, "levying war against the United States." Const. U. S. art. 3, § 3. What, he asked, was levying war against the United States? He conceived himself authorized, upon good authority, to say, levying war did not only consist in open, manifest, and avowed rebellion against the government, with a design of overthrowing the constitution; but it may consist in assembling together in numbers, and by actual force, or by terror, opposing any particular law or laws. Again, there can be no distinction as to the kind or nature of the law, or the particular object for which the law was passed, since all are alike the acts of the legislature, who are sent by the people at large to express their will. Force need not be used to manifest this spirit of rebellion, nor is it necessary that the attempts should have been successful to constitute the crime. The endeavour, by intimidation, to do the act, whether it be accomplished or not, amounts to treason, provided the object of those concerned in the transaction, is of a general nature, and not applied to a special or private purpose. In order to effect the object of those embarked in crimes of this high nature, it is well known that various means are necessarily employed; various acts may be perpetrated to accomplish the main end: they may proceed by the execution of some enormous crimes, as burglary, arson, robbery, or murder, either, or all of them; but even if one or all of these crimes were committed, except the purpose should be of a general nature, they may form distinct and heinous offences; but the perpetrators may not be guilty of treason. If a particular friend of the party had been in the custody of the marshal; if even a number sufficient for the purpose should step forward and rescue such a person, if it was not with a view to rescue prisoners generally, it would amount to no more than a rescue; but, if general, it is treason. The views of the party fix the crime, and therefore only the design is necessary to be known.

To prove that this doctrine was well established in the United States, Mr. Rawle turned to 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 346, 355, stating the opinions of the court in the cases of Vigol and Mitchell,[2] charged with, and convicted for, treason. The attack on Gen. Neville's house was of this general nature, because he was an officer appointed to execute the obnoxious law; and being to the officer and not to the man that they objected, it was thought to be treason, and that decision was well grounded. He observed, that the clause in our constitution was founded on a statute which was passed in England, to prevent the ever-increasing and ever-varying number of treasons, upon the general and undefined opposition to royal prerogative: the situation of things was such, previous to that period, as to call forth from the statesman, from the philosopher, and from the divine, even in those dark ages, the most vehement complaints: in attendance to these reasonable and just murmurs, the statute was passed.

Mr. Rawle was then producing an authority, when Judge CHASE said, the court would admit, as a general rule, of quotations which referred to what constituted actual or constructive levying war against the king of Great Britain, in his regal capacity; or, in other words, of levying war against his government, but not against his person, because it was of the same nature as levying war against the United States would be applied here: so was that part called adhering to the king's enemies:—they may, any of them, be read to the jury, and the decisions thereupon—not as authorities whereby we are bound, but as the opinions and decisions of men of great legal learning and ability. But even then, the court would attend carefully to the time of the decisions, and in no case must it be binding upon our juries.

Mr. Rawle quoted Hawkins (book 1, c. 17, § 23) as an authority of authenticity to prove, that not only those who rebelled against the king, by taking up arms with the avowed design of dethroning him, but those who withstood his lawful authority, and who endeavoured to oppose his government; who withstood the king's forces, or attacked any of his fortresses—those, in fine, whose avowed object was of a public and general, and not of a private and personal nature, were guilty of high treason. He also read Sir John Friend's Case from Holt, 681, and Dammaree and Purchases' Case, 15 State Tr. 589.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, begged the counsel to read only those parts of the cases which referred to what could be treason in the United States, and nothing which related to compassing the king's death. It would be found, he observed, by an attention to the last case, that because the intention was a rising to demolish all meeting-houses, generally, it was considered to be an insurrection against the toleration act, by numbers and open force, setting the law at defiance. This would be found to be the opinion in Foster, 213.

Mr. Rawle said, that he conceived that, even if the matter made a grievance of, was illegal, the demolition of it in this way was, nevertheless, high treason, because of the people so assembled taking the law into their own hands; thus, in Foster, it would be seen that demolishing all bawdy-houses, as such, was high treason, as much as demolishing all meeting-houses, being equally an usurped authority. He also read Doug. 590, Lord George Gordon's Case, when it was Lord Mansfield's opinion that any attempt, by violence, to force the repeal of a law, or to prevent its execution, is levying war, and treason. He considered, from those few authorities, that he was justifiable in saying that a rising, with intent by force to prevent the execution of a law, as well as laws in general, preventing the marshal executing his warrants, and preventing the other officers charged with the execution of the laws in question, amounted to levying war, agreeably to the constitution of the United States. Mr. Rawle then proceeded to state the most prominent facts which could be produced in the course of the evidence, in which it would fully appear, he presumed, that John Fries, the prisoner, was the most active in his opposition to those laws and to every attempt to carry them into effect; that he in every instance showed his aversion of, and opposition to, the assessors, and determination by threats and menaces to prevent them doing their duty, and that whenever any force was used, or terrific appearances held up, he was the commander, and gave the orders to his men, who, at times in great numbers, joined him: and that finally, by threats and intimidation, equally the same in the eyes of the law as force, he, the prisoner, did attain his object, to wit, the release of a number of prisoners who were confined for opposing the execution of the law, and were actually in custody of the marshal in a house at Bethlehem, which, by reason of his having prisoners there, and his having an armed posse to protect his lawful authority, was to all intents a fortress of the United States; and further, that he did, completely for a time, prevent the execution of the laws intended, in those parts, and thus did bid defiance to all lawful authority.

Judge CHASE then said to the prisoner: "John Fries, you will attend to all the evidence that will be brought against you; will attend to their examination, and ask any questions you please of the several witnesses, or of the court; but be careful to ask no questions wherein you may possibly criminate yourself, for remember, whatever you say to your own crimination, is evidence with the jury; but if you say anything to your justification, it is not evidence. The court will be watchful of you; they will check anything that may injure yourself: they will be your counsel, and give you every assistance and indulgence in their power."

(The evidence adduced on this trial is of so similar a character to that reported on the former occasion, as to render a report of it unnecessary. The defendant produced no testimony.)

Mr. Rawle said he felt himself so very peculiarly situated in this case, that he would wish the opinion of the court. The unfortunate prisoner at the bar appeared to answer to a charge, the greatest that could be brought against him, without the assistance of counsel, or any friend to advise with. To me, said Mr. R., the evidence against the prisoner is extremely strong. It will be recollected, that, in opening the evidence, I informed the jury what points I shall prove: I opened my ideas of constructive law, and produced a few authorities in support of my opinions. I believe it will be found, that in no material point have I failed to substantiate what I first gave notice that I could prove. I therefore conceive the charges are fully confirmed. But although, if this trial was conducted in the usual way, and counsel were ready to advocate the cause of the prisoner, it would now be proper, on my part, to sum up the evidence as produced to the jury, and apply it to the law, in order to see whether the crime was fixed or not. Under the present circumstances, I feel very great reluctance to fulfil what would, in other circumstances, be my bounden duty, lest it should appear to be going further than the rigid requisition of my office compels me to. I therefore shall rest the evidence and the law here, unless the court think that my office as public prosecutor, demands of me to do it, or that I should not fulfil my duty without doing it.

Judge CHASE: It is not unfrequent for a prisoner to appear in a court of justice without counsel, but it is uncommon for a prisoner not to accept of legal assistance. It is the peculiar lenity of our laws that makes it the duty of a court to assign counsel to the person accused. With respect to your situation, sir, it is a matter entirely discretionary with you whether you will state the evidence and apply it to the law or not. There is great justice due to a prisoner arraigned on a charge so important as the present: there is great justice also due to the government. On the one hand, an innocent person shall not be made to suffer for want of legal assistance; on the other, a guilty person shall not escape through an undue indulgence, or the failure of the accuser in a duty his office may require of him. If you do not please to proceed, I shall consider it my duty to apply the law tc the facts. The prisoner may therefore offer what he pleases to the jury.

Prisoner: I submit to the court to do me that justice which is right.

Judge CHASE: That I will, by the blessing of God, do you every justice.

PETERS, District Judge: Mr. Attorney, while you are justifiable in considering the situation of the prisoner, that he might not suffer by any partial impressions you may make on the jury, there is another consideration deserving attention—there is justice due to the United States. Though I see no difficulty in resting it here, yet, possibly, persons who may have come into court since the trial commenced, may expect something of a narrative of the transactions, and such a narrative may be of great help to the jury. I wish it to be done for the due execution of public justice, and, God knows, I do it not with a desire to injure the prisoner, for I wish not the conviction of any man. It is a painful task, but we must do our duty. Still I think you are at liberty to fulfil your own pleasure.

Mr. Rawle would, then, under a solemn impression that it was his duty, take up some part of the time of the court and jury in relation to the prisoner at the bar, a task rendered far more painful on his part, from the circumstance of the prisoner's appearing there (unexpectedly) without counsel to plead his cause. In as few words as possible, he would endeavour to collect the most prominent features of the testimony which had been produced, and to apply it to the law. As he stated before, Mr. Rawle said, levying war in the United States against the United States, was a crime defined by the constitution; in relation to the republican form of government existing among us, it could only consist in an opposition to the will of the society, of which we all are members, declared and established by a majority; in short, an opposition to the acts of congress, in whole or in part, so as to prevent their execution, either by collecting numbers, by a display of force, or by exhibiting that degree of intimidation which should operate, in either way, upon those charged with the execution of the law, either throughout the United States or in any part thereof, to procure a repeal or a suspension of the law, by rendering it impracticable to carry such law or laws into effect in the place so opposing, or in any other part. This offence he considered to be strictly treason against the United States.

The question, then, is, how far the case of the prisoner and his conduct merit this definition. In order to be informed of that, it was necessary to call to recollection the evidence, so collected, as to display the train and progress which marked its footsteps from its first dawning till its arrival at the fatal deed denominated treason. It will first be observed by the testimony of several respectable witnesses (Messrs. Heckavelter, Ramich, Schymer, Ormond, and Williamson), that attempts were made and executed, by a combination, in which, unfortunately for him, the prisoner at the bar was very active, to prevent the assessors from doing the duty required of them when they accepted their office, and that this combination existed both in Northampton and Bucks counties, and to such a degree that it was impossible to carry the law into effect. In Lower Milford, more particularly, we have the evidence of four respectable gentlemen (Mr. Chapman, a principal assessor, and Mr. Rodrick, Mr. Foulke, and Mr. Childs, three assessors), who were employed in the execution of those laws. These gentlemen say that they met with such opposition at an early period of the insurrection, as deterred Samuel Clarke from undertaking the business at all, although he had taken upon him the office. From this difficulty, Messrs. Foulke, Rodrick and Childs determined that they would proceed to assess Lower Milford township together, which they attempted, and did not desist until compelled by the extreme opposition which their respective testimony relates to have happened on the 5th and 6th of March, in their progress to, and at Quakertown, which ill usage is all corroborated by other witnesses. This spirit of opposition to the laws, as exhibited generally, is also related by Mr. Henry and Col. Nichols, the marshal, wherein it appears that process could not be served, and that witnesses could not be subpoenaed, being deterred from the threats made to them by this extensive combination; and that, in the serving of process, personal abuse was given, as well as to the assessors who attempted to execute the law. In short the law was prostrate at the feet of a powerful combination.

Mr. Rawle here called to view the occurrences in Bucks county, as deposed by Messrs. Foulke, Rodrick, Chapman, Thomas, Mitchel, and Wiedner, exhibiting a disposition to insurrection by a great number of persons, and who engaged in its acts; he referred to the meeting at Jacob Fries', where John Fries, the prisoner at the bar, expressed himself as determining to oppose and continue hostile to the laws; also to the circumstance afterwards near Singmaster's, where Mr. Rodrick made his escape, and where, as well as at other times, the prisoner forbade those officers to proceed, under threats of personal danger. It appeared Mr. Rodrick had given offence, not by his conduct, but because he came from a distance of ten or twelve miles into that township to prosecute his duty. However, the assessors met the next day, but were stopped at Quakertown, where they were extremely abused. To be sure, while the prisoner at the bar was in the room, and whenever he was present, their abuse was suspended; when he absented himself, it was renewed. The papers were taken from Mr. Childs, and also from Mr. Foulke, but returned, because they were not the identical papers. Here it must be observed, in justice to the prisoner, that one more of his few good actions appeared, which Mr. Rawle wished in his heart had been more numerous. Fries assisted Mr. Foulke to get out of the house the back way, and advised him to keep out of the way of the men. On the evening of that day they went up to Millerstown: here Mr. Rawle called to mind the message delivered by John Dillinger for convening the meeting the next day; this message was the fruits of a consultation held at the house of Jacob Fries, after they left Quakertown, when they determined to proceed to Millerstown the next morning. The next morning they met and went on as far as Ritters, where it appeared they were stopped for a short period by young Marks, who had been sent forward, with information that the prisoners were gone on to Bethlehem: a doubt being started whether they would not be too late, it was debated, and at last determined to go forward: of this latter opinion was the prisoner at the bar. It was in evidence that none of those people knew the prisoners whom they were going to release: this, Mitchel and others swore.

Here, Mr. Rawle thought, commenced the overt act in the indictment. Hitherto only the general opposition to the law, and the intention with which the after conduct was perpetrated, appeared. They proceeded to Bethlehem, and here the officer of militia, the man who derived his power from the people, the prisoner, Captain John Fries, whose duty it was to support the law and constitution of the United States, made a most distinguished figure. At Bethlehem it appeared that the prisoner was to step forward to effect the surrender of the prisoners, and of course to lay prostrate the legal arm of the United States. These prisoners were in the lawful custody of the marshal; he had lawful process against them from the district judge; they were in the house appointed for their safe keeping until they should be removed; he kept guard over them, and in order to execute his office, he had provided, by virtue of the powers given to the sheriff in the several counties agreeable to law, an armed force called a posse comitatus, or the power of the county. This force (about sixteen or seventeen) he supposed sufficiently great to prevent the prisoners in his charge being liberated; it appeared, however, in the sequel that they were not sufficient for that purpose. The prisoner with an armed force arrived at Bethlehem, and proceeded on his mission to the marshal: he had a sword when he marched his men into the town; but it appeared that he left it when he entered on his other business, to wit, demanding the surrender of the prisoners; the marshal answered, that he could not deliver them up. John Fries then returned to his men; and from the testimony of Mitchel, Barnet, and Schlaugh, (this was an important part of his conduct,) he said, "They must be taken by force; the marshal says he cannot deliver them up; if you are willing, we will take them by force: I will go foremost; if I drop, then take your own command." Words were followed by actions; they went into the house, and the prisoners were given up. This, Mr. Rawle thought, was an unquestionable, full and complete proof of the commission of the overt act; and that overt act is high treason, as laid in the third and fourth counts of the indictment, to wit, that they did by force prevent the marshal from executing lawful process to him directed; and, secondly, that they did deliver, and take from him certain persons, whom he had in lawful custody; and, further, this was done by force and arms, by men arrayed in a warlike manner, and by a number exceeding one hundred persons. This the indictment justly calls levying war, and treason. To him, Mr. Rawle said, there was no doubt but the act of levying war was completed in the county of Bucks, independently of all those actions at Bethlehem; for there the prisoner and others were armed, and arrayed with all the appearances of war—with drums and fifes, and at times firing their pieces; and this to oppose the laws and prevent their execution; and there, by this force, they executed one, and the main part of their plan; they there did set the law at defiance. That was part of their grand object, and was done with a general, and not with a particular view, an essential ingredient in treason. Whether these actions were to be considered as a separate act of treason, or whether they were to evince the intentions of the party, it certainly must be considered as testimony, and such as must have an important weight towards the verdict.

Gentlemen, said Mr. Attorney, you will consider how far the individual witnesses are deserving your credit. If you consider them worthy of being believed, and if the facts related apply to the law which I submitted to your consideration, and which, from the silence of the court, I think you must consider as accurate—if not, I shall stand corrected by the court—there can be but little doubt upon your minds, that the prisoner is guilty: if it be not so, in your opinion, you must find him otherwise. I have endeavoured to do my duty with integrity. I have advanced nothing but what appears to me to be clearly substantiated; but with you, gentlemen, and with the court, I leave the truth of the opinion.

Court: John Fries, you are at liberty to say anything you please to the jury.

Prisoner: It was mentioned, that I collected a parcel of people to follow up the assessors; but I did not collect them. They came and fetched me out from my house to go with them. I have nothing to say, but leave it to the court.

CHASE, Circuit Justice (charging jury):—Gentlemen of the Jury: John Fries, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for the crime of treason, of levying war against the United States, contrary to the constitution. By the constitution of the United States (article 3, § 3) it is declared, "that treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." By the same section it is further declared, "that no person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court;" and that "the congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason." Too much praise cannot be given to this constitutional definition of treason, and the requiring such full proof for conviction; and declaring, that no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted. This constitutional definition of treason is a question of law. Every proposition in any statute (whether more or less distinct, whether easy or difficult to comprehend) is always a question of law. What is the true meaning and true import of any statute, and whether the case stated comes within it, is a q estion of law, and not of fact. The question in an indictment for levying war against (or adhering to the enemies of) the United States, is, whether the facts stated do, or do not amount to levying war, within the contemplation and construction of the constitution. It is the duty of the court in this case, and in all criminal cases, to state to the jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts; but the jury are to decide on the present, and in all criminal cases, both the law and the facts, on their consideration of the whole case. It is the opinion of the court, that any insurrection or rising of any body of the people, within the United States, to attain or effect by force or violence any object of a great public nature, or of public and general (or national) concern, is a levying of war against the United States, within the contemplation and construction of the constitution. On this general position the court are of opinion, that any such insurrection or rising to resist, or to prevent by force or violence, the execution of any statute of the United States, for levying or collecting taxes, duties, imposts, or excises; or for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, or for any other object of a general nature or national concern, under any pretence, as that the statute was unjust, burthensome, oppressive, or unconstitutional, is a levying was against the United States, within the contemplation and construction of the constitution. The reason for this opinion is, that an insurrection to resist or prevent, by force, the execution of any statute of the United States, has a direct tendency to dissolve all the bands of society, to destroy all order and all laws, and also all security for the lives, liberties and property of the citizens of the United States. The court are of opinion, that military weapons (as guns and swords, mentioned in the indictment) are not necessary to make such insurrection or rising amount to a levying war, because numbers may supply the want of military weapons, and other instruments may effect the intended mischief. The legal guilt of levying war may be incurred without the use of military weapons or military array. The court are of opinion that the assembling bodies of men, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, for purposes only of a private nature, is not treason, although the judges, or other peace officers, should be insulted or resisted, or even great outrages committed to the persons or property of our citizens.

The true criterion to determine whether acts committed are treason, or a less offence (as a riot), is the quo animo, or the intention, with which the people did assemble. When the intention is universal or general, as to effect some object of a general public nature, it will be treason, and cannot be considered, construed, or reduced to a riot. The commission of any number of felonies, riots, or other misdemeanours, cannot alter their nature, so as to make them amount to treason; and, on the other hand, if the intention and acts combined amount to treason, they cannot be sunk down to a felony or riot. The intention with which any acts (as felonies, the destruction of property, or the like) are done, will show to what class of crimes the case belongs. The court are of opinion, that if a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection to resist or oppose the execution of any statute of the United States by force, that they are only guilty of a high misdemeanour; but if they proceed to carry such intention into execution by force, that they are guilty of the treason of levying war, and the quantum of the force employed neither lessens nor increases the crime—whether by one hundred or one thousand persons, is wholly immaterial. The court are of opinion, that a combination or conspiracy to levy war against the United States is not treason, unless combined with an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into execution; some actual force or violence must be used, in pursuance of such design to levy war; but that it is altogether immaterial whether the force used is sufficient to effectuate the object—any force connected with the intention will constitute the crime of levying war. This opinion of the court is founded on the same principles, and is, in substance, the same as the opinion of the circuit court for this district, on the trials (in April, 1795) of Vigol and Mitchell, who were both found guilty by the jury, and afterwards pardoned by the late president.

At the circuit court for the district (April term, 1799), on the trial of the prisoner at the bar, Judge Iredell delivered the same opinion, and Fries was convicted by the jury. [Case No. 5,126.]

To support the present indictment against the prisoner at the bar, two facts must be proved to your satisfaction: First. That some time before the finding of the indictment, there was an insurrection (or rising) of a body of people in the county of Northampton, in this state, with intent to oppose and prevent, by means of intimidation and violence, the execution of a law of the United States, entitled, "An act to provide for the valuation of lands and dwelling houses, the enumeration of slaves within the United States;" or, of another law of the United States, entitled, "An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;" and that some acts of violence were committed by some of the people so assembled, with intent to oppose and prevent, by means of intimidation and violence, the execution of both, or of one of the said laws of congress. In the consideration of this fact, you are to consider and determine with what intent the people assembled at Bethlehem, whether to effect, by force, a public or a private measure. The intent with which the people assembled at Bethlehem, in Northampton, is a necessary ingredient to the fact of assembling, and to be proved like any other fact, by the declarations of those who assembled, or by acts done by them. When the question is, "What is a man's intent?" it may be proved by a number of connected circumstances, or by a single fact. If, from a careful examination of the evidence, you shall be convinced that the real object and intent of the people assembled at Bethlehem was of a public nature (which it certainly was, if they assembled with intent to prevent the execution of both of the above-mentioned laws of congress, or either of them), it must then be proved to your satisfaction, that the prisoner at the bar incited, encouraged, promoted, or assisted in the insurrection, or rising of the people, at Bethlehem, and the terror they carried with them, with intent to oppose and prevent, by means of intimidation and violence, the execution of both the abovementioned laws of congress, or either of them; and that some force was used by some of the people assembled at Bethlehem. In the consideration of this fact, the court think proper to assist your inquiry by giving you their opinion.

In treason, all the participes criminis are principals; there are no accessaries to this crime. Every act, which, in the case of felony, would render a man an accessary, will, in the case of treason, make him a principal. To render any person an accomplice and principal in felony, he must be aiding and abetting at the fact; or ready to afford assistance, if necessary. If a person be present at a felony, aiding and assisting, he is a principal. It is always material to consider whether the persons charged are of the same party, upon the same pursuit, and under the expectation of mutual defence and support. All persons present, aiding, assisting, or abetting any treasonable act, are principals. All persons, who are present and countenancing, and are ready to afford assistance, if necessary, to those who actually commit any treasonable act, are also principals. If a number of persons assemble and set out upon a common design, as to resist and prevent, by force, the execution of any law, and some of them commit acts of force and violence, with intent to oppose the execution of any law, and others are present to aid and assist, if necessary, they are all principals. If any man joins and acts with an assembly of people, his intent is always to be considered and adjudged to be the same as theirs; and the law, in this case, judgeth of the intent by the fact. If a number of persons combine or conspire to effect a certain purpose, as to oppose, by force, the execution of a law, any act of violence done by any one of them, in pursuance of such combination, and with intent to effect such object, is, in consideration of law, the act of all who are present when such act of violence is committed. If persons collect together to act for one and the same common end, any act done by any one of them, with intent to effectuate such common end, is a fact that may be given in evidence against all of them; the act of each is evidence against all concerned. I shall not detain you at this late hour to recapitulate the facts:—you have taken notes, and they have been stated with accuracy and great candor by Mr. Attorney. I will only remark, that all the evidence relative to transactions before the assembling of the armed force at Bethlehem, are only to satisfy you of the intent with which the body of the people assembled there. If either of the three overt acts (or open deeds) stated in the indictment, is proved to your satisfaction, THE COURT are of opinion, that it is sufficient to maintain the indictment; for THE COURT are of opinion that every overt act is treasonable. As to accomplices—they are legal witnesses, and entitled to credit, unless destroyed by testimony in court. If, upon consideration of the whole matter (law as well as fact), you are not fully satisfied, without any doubt, that the prisoner is guilty of the treason charged in the indictment, you will find him not guilty; but if, upon consideration of the whole matter (law as well as fact), you are convinced that the prisoner is guilty of the treason charged in the indictment, you will find him guilty.

The jury retired for the space of two hours, and brought in their verdict, "Guilty."

After the verdict was given, Judge CHASE, with great feeling and sensibility, addressed the prisoner, observing that, as he had no counsel on the trial, if he, or any person for him, could point out any flaw in the indictment, or legal ground for arrest of judgment, ample time would be allowed for that purpose.

Friday, May 2. THE COURT this morning called before them Charles Deshler, a juror on the above trial of John Fries, who, on the first evening of the said trial, on the adjournment of the court, separated from the jury and retired to his lodgings. Mr. Hopkinson, on behalf of Mr. Deshler, produced his own affidavit, and that of two others, which proved that, on the said evening, Charles Deshler was inadvertently separated from his brethren by the crowd, in going out of the jury box; that he did not know to what place the jury had adjourned: that he then proceeded to his lodgings, where he cautiously avoided all conversation respecting the trial depending. THE COURT, satisfied by this representation of the innocence of Mr. Deshler, ordered that he be discharged, and that the beforementioned affidavit be entered on the record of the court.

The prisoner being set at the bar, Judge CHASE, after observing to the other defendants that what he had to say to Fries would apply generally to them, proceeded:—

John Fries, you have been already informed, that you stood convicted of the treason, charged upon you by the indictment on which you have been arraigned, of levying war against the United States. You have had a legal, fair, and impartial trial, with every indulgence that the law would permit. Of the whole panel, you peremptorily challenged thirty-four, and with truth I may say, that the jury who tried you were of your own selection and choice. Not one of them before had ever formed and delivered any opinion respecting your guilt or innocence. The verdict of the jury against you was founded on the testimony of many creditable and unexceptionable witnesses. It was apparent from the conduct of the jury, when they delivered their verdict, that if innocent, they would have acquitted you with pleasure; and that they pronounced their verdict against you with great concern and reluctance, from a sense of duty to their country, and a full conviction of your guilt. The crime of which you have been found guilty is treason; a crime considered, in the most civilized and the most free countries in the world, as the greatest that any man can commit. It is a crime of so deep a dye, and attended with such a train of fatal consequences, that it can receive no aggravation; yet the duty of my station requires that I should explain to you the nature of the crime of which you are convicted; to show the necessity of that justice which is this day to be administered, and to awaken your mind to proper reflections and a due sense of your own condition, which, I imagine, you must have reflected upon during your long confinement. You are a native of this country—you live under a constitution (or form of government) framed by the people themselves; and under laws made by your representatives, faithfully executed by independent and impartial judges. Your government secures to every member of the community equal liberty and equal rights; by which equality of liberty and rights, I mean, that every person, without any regard to wealth, rank, or station, may enjoy an equal share of civil liberty, and equal protection of law, and an equal security for his person and property. You enjoyed, in common with your fellow-citizens, all those rights. If experience should prove that the constitution is defective, it provides a mode to change or amend it, without any danger to public order, or any injury to social rights. If congress, from inattention, error in judgment, or want of information, should pass any law in violation of the constitution, or burdensome or oppressive to the people, a peaceable, safe and ample remedy is provided by the constitution. The people themselves have established the mode by which such grievances are to be redressed; and no other mode can be adopted without a violation of the constitution and of the laws. If congress should pass a law contrary to the constitution, such law would be void, and the courts of the United States possess complete authority, and are the only tribunal to decide, whether any law is contrary to the constitution. If congress should pass burdensome or oppressive laws, the remedy is with their constituents, from whom they derive their existence and authority. If any law is made repugnant to the voice of a majority of their constituents, it is in their power to make choice of persons to repeal it; but until it is repealed, it is the duty of every citizen to submit to it, and to give up his private sentiments to the public will. If a law which is burdensome, or even oppressive in its nature or execution, is to be opposed by force; and obedience cannot be compelled, there must soon be an end to all government in this country. It cannot be credited by dispassionate men, of any information, that congress will intentionally make laws in violation of the constitution, contrary to their sacred trust, and solemn obligation to support it. None can believe that congress will wilfully or intentionally impose unreasonable and unjust burdens on their constituents, in which they must participate. The most ignorant man must know, that congress can make no law that will not affect them equally, in every respect, with their constituents. Every law that is detrimental to their constituents must prove hurtful to themselves. From these considerations, every one may see, that congress can have no interest in oppressing their fellow-citizens. It is almost incredible, that a people living under the best and mildest government in the whole world, should not only be dissatisfied and discontented, but should break out into open resistance and opposition to its laws.

The insurrection in 1794, in the four western counties of this state (particularly in Washington), to oppose the execution of the laws of the United States, which laid duties on stills, and spirits distilled, within the United States, is still fresh in memory: it originated from prejudices and misrepresentations industriously disseminated and diffused against those laws. Either persons disaffected to our government, or wishing to aggrandize themselves, deceived and misled the ignorant and uninformed class of the people. The opposition commenced in meetings of the people, with threats against the officers, which ripened into acts of outrage against them, and were extended to private citizens. Committees were formed to systematize and inflame the spirit of opposition. Violence succeeded to violence, and the collector of Fayette county was compelled to surrender his commission and official books; the dwelling house of the inspector (in the vicinity of Pittsburgh) was attacked and burnt; and the marshal was seized, and obtained his liberty on a promise to serve no other process on the west side of the Alleghany mountains. To compel submission to the laws, the government were obliged to march an army against the insurgents, and the expense was above one million one hundred thousand dollars. Of the whole number of insurgents (many hundreds) only a few were brought to trial; and of them only two were sentenced to die (Vigol and Mitchell), and they were pardoned by the late president. Although the insurgents made no resistance to the army sent against them, yet not a few of our troops lost their lives, in consequence of their great fatigue, and exposure to the severity of the season. This great and remarkable clemency of the government had no effect upon you, and the deluded people in your neighbourhood. The rise, progress, and termination of the late insurrection bear a strong and striking analogy to the former; and it may be remembered that it has cost the United States 80,000 dollars. It cannot escape observation, that the ignorant and uninformed are taught to complain of taxes, which are necessary for the support of government, and yet they permit themselves to be seduced into insurrections which have so enormously increased the public burthens, of which their contributions can scarcely be calculated. When citizens combine and assemble with intent to prevent by threats, intimidation and violence, the execution of the laws, and they actually carry such traitorous designs into execution, they reduce the government to the alternative of prostrating the laws before the insurgents, or of taking necessary measures to compel submission. No government can hesitate. The expense, and all the consequences, therefore, are not imputable to the government, but to the insurgents. The mildness and lenity of our government are as striking on the late as on the former insurrection. Of nearly one hundred and thirty persons who might have been put on their trial for treason, only five have been prosecuted and tried for that crime.

In the late insurrection, you, John Fries, bore a conspicuous and leading part. If you had reflected, you would have seen that your attempt was as weak as it was wicked. It was the height of folly in you to suppose that the great body of our citizens, blessed in the enjoyment of a free republican government of their own choice, and of all rights civil and religious; secure in their persons and property; and conscious that the laws are the only security for their preservation from violence, would not rise up as one man to oppose and crush so ill-founded, so unprovoked an attempt to disturb the public peace and tranquillity. If you could see in a proper light your own folly and wickedness, you ought now to bless God that your insurrection was so happily and speedily quelled by the vigilance and energy of our government, aided by the patriotism and activity of your fellow-citizens, who left their homes and business and embodied themselves in the support of its laws. The annual, necessary expenditures for the support of any extensive government like ours must be great; and the sum required can only be obtained by taxes, or loans. In all countries the levying taxes is unpopular, and a subject of complaint. It appears to me that there was not the least pretence of complaint against, much less of opposition and violence to, the law for levying taxes on dwelling-houses; and it becomes you to reflect that the time you chose to rise up in arms to oppose the laws of your country, was when it stood in a very critical situation with regard to France, and on the eve of a rupture with that country. I cannot omit to remind you of another matter, worthy of your consideration. If the marshal, or any of the posse, or any of the four friends of government who were with him, had been killed by you, or any of your deluded followers, the crime of murder would have been added to the crime of treason. In your serious hours of reflection, you ought to consider the consequences that would have flowed from the insurrection, which you incited, encouraged, and promoted, in the character of a captain of militia, whose incumbent duty it is to stand ready (whenever required), to assist and defend the government and its laws, if it had not been immediately quelled. Violence, oppression and rapine, destruction, waste, and murder, always attend the progress of insurrection and rebellion; the arm of the father would have been raised against the son; that of the son against the father; a brother's hand would have been stained with brother's blood; the sacred bands of friendship would have been broken, and all the ties of natural affection would have been dissolved.

The end of all punishment is example; and the enormity of your crime requires that a severe example should be made to deter others from the commission of like crimes in future. You have forfeited your life to justice. Let me, therefore, earnestly recommend to you most seriously to consider your situation—to take a review of your past life, and to employ the very little time you are to continue in this world in endeavors to make your peace with that God whose mercy is equal to his justice. I suppose that you are a Christian; and as such I address you. Be assured, my guilty and unhappy fellow-citizen, that without serious repentance of all your sins, you cannot expect happiness in the world to come; and to your repentance you must add faith and hope in the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ. These are the only terms on which pardon and forgiveness are promised to those who profess the Christian religion. Let me, therefore, again entreat you to apply every moment you have left in contrition, sorrow and repentance. Your day of life is almost spent; and the night of death fast approaches. Look up to the Father of Mercies, and God of Comfort. You have a great and immense work to perform, and but little time in which you must finish it. There is no repentance in the grave, for after death comes judgment; and as you die, so you must be judged. By repentance and faith, you are the object of God's mercy; but if you will not repent, and have faith and dependence upon the merits of the death of Christ, but die a hardened and impenitent sinner, you will be the object of God's justice and vengeance. If you will sincerely repent and believe, God has pronounced his forgiveness; and there is no crime too great for his mercy and pardon. Although you must be strictly confined for the very short remainder of your life, yet the mild government and laws which you have endeavoured to destroy permit you (if you please) to converse and commune with ministers of the gospel; to whose pious care and consolation, in fervent prayers and devotion, I most cordially recommend you. What remains for me is a very painful, but a very necessary part of my duty. It is to pronounce that judgment which the law has appointed for crimes of this magnitude. The judgment of the law is, and this court doth award, "that you be hanged by the neck until dead;" and I pray God Almighty to be merciful to your soul!

The "conduct directed by the court," which led to the withdrawal of Mr. Dallas and Mr. Lewis, afterwards became the subject of the first of the articles of impeachment on which Judge Chase was tried before the senate of the United States, in February, 1805. A fair view of the transaction may be gathered from the answer of Judge Chase, and the testimony of Mr. Dallas and Mr. Rawle.

Judge Chase's Answer.—The first articles relate to his supposed misconduct in the trial of John Fries, for treason, before the circuit court of the United States, at Philadelphia, in April and May, 1800; and alleges that he presided at that trial, and that, "unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation by which he stood bound to discharge them, faithfully and impartially, and without respect to persons," he did then, "in his judicial capacity, conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust." This general accusation, too vague in itself for reply, is supported by three specific charges of misconduct: 1st. In delivering an opinion, in writing, on the question of law, on the construction of which the defence of the accused materially depended; which opinion, it is alleged, tended "to prejudice the minds of the jury against the case of the said John Fries, the prisoner, before counsel had been heard in his favor. 2d. "In restricting the counsel for the said John Fries, from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite; or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client." 3d. "In debarring the prisoner from his constitutional privilege of addressing the jury (through his counsel) on the law, as well as on the fact, which was to determine his guilt or innocence, and at the same time endeavouring to wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law, as well as the question of fact, involved in the verdict which they were required to give." This first article then concludes, that in consequence of this irregular conduct of this respondent, "the said John Fries was deprived of the right secured to him by the eighth article amendatory of the constitution; and was condemned to death, without having been heard by counsel, in his defence." By the eighth article amendatory to the constitution, this respondent supposes is meant the sixth amendment to the constitution of the United States; which secures to the accused, in all criminal prosecutions, the right to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

In answer to these three charges, the respondent admits that the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Pennsylvania, was held at Philadelphia, in that district, in the months of April and May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred; at which court John Fries, the person named in the said first article, was brought to trial, on an indictment for treason against the United States; and that this respondent then held a commission as one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States; by virtue of which office he did, pursuant to the laws of the United States, preside at the above mentioned trial, and was assisted therein by Richard Peters, Esq., then and still district judge of the United States, for the district of Pennsylvania; who, as directed by the laws of the United States, sat as assistant judge at the said trial. With respect to the opinion which is alleged to have been delivered by this respondent at the above mentioned trial, he begs leave to lay before this honourable court the true state of that transaction, and to call its attention to some facts and considerations, by which his conduct on that subject will, he presumes, be fully justified. The constitution of the United States, in the third section of the third article, declares that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." By two acts of congress, the first passed on the 3d day of March, 1791 [1 Stat. 199], and the second on the 8th day of May, 1792 [1 Stat. 267], a duty was imposed on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, and various provisions were made for its collection. In the year 1794, an insurrection took place in four of the western counties of Pennsylvania, with a view of resisting and preventing by force the execution of these two statutes; and at a circuit court of the United States, held at Philadelphia, for the district of Pennsylvania, in the month of April, in the year 1795, by William Patterson, Esq., then one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States, and the above mentioned Richard Peters, then district judge of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, two persons, who had been concerned in the above named insurrections, namely, Philip Vigol and John Mitchell were indicted for treason of levying war against the United States, by resisting and preventing by force the execution of the two last-mentioned acts of congress; and were, after a full and very solemn trial, convicted on the indictments, and sentenced to death. They were afterwards pardoned by George Washington, then president of the United States. In the first of these trials, that of Vigol [Case No. 16,621], the defence of the prisoner was conducted by very able counsel, one of whom, William Lewis, Esq., is the same person who appeared as counsel for John Fries, in the trial now under consideration. Neither that learned gentleman nor his able colleague then thought proper to raise the question of law, whether resisting and preventing by armed force the execution of a particular law of the United States be a "levying of war against the United States," according to the true meaning of the constitution; although a decision of this question in the negative must have acquitted the prisoner. But in the next trial, that of Mitchell [Cases Nos. 15,788 and 15,789], this question was raised on the part of the prisoner, and was very fully and ably discussed by his counsel; and it was solemnly determined by the court, both the judges concurring, "that to resist or prevent by armed force, the execution of a particular law of the United States, is a levying of war against the United States, and consequently is treason, within the true meaning of the constitution." The decision, according to the best established principles of our jurisprudence, became a precedent for all courts of equal or inferior jurisdiction; a precedent which, although not absolutely obligatory, ought to be viewed with very great respect, especially by the court in which it was made, and ought never to be departed from, but on the fullest and clearest conviction of its incorrectness.

On the 9th of July, 1798 [1 Stat. 580], an act of congress was passed, providing for a valuation of lands and dwelling houses, and an enumeration of slaves throughout the United States; and directing the appointment of commissioners and assessors for carrying it into execution: and on the 14th day of July [1 Stat. 597] in the same year, a direct tax was laid by another act of congress of that date, on the lands, dwelling houses, and slaves, so to be valued and enumerated. In the months of February and March, A. D. 1799, an insurrection took place in the counties of Bucks and Northampton, in the state of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of resisting and preventing by force, the execution of the two last-mentioned acts of congress, and particularly that for the valuation of lands and dwelling houses. John Fries, the person mentioned in the article of impeachment now under consideration, was apprehended and committed to prison, as one of the ringleaders of this insurrection; and at a circuit court of the United States, held at Philadelphia, in and for the district of Pennsylvania, in the month of April A. D. 1799, he was brought to trial for this offence, on an indictment for treason, by levying war against the United States, before James Iredell, Esq., then one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States, who presided in the said court, according to law, and the above mentioned Richard Peters, then district judge of the United States, for the district of Pennsylvania, who sat in the said circuit court as assistant judge. In this trial, which was conducted with great solemnity, and occupied nine days, the prisoner was assisted by William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas, Esqrs., two very able and eminent counsellors; the former of whom, William Lewis, is the person who assisted as above mentioned, in conducting the defence of Vigol, on a similar indictment. These gentlemen, finding that the facts alleged were fully and undeniably proved, by a very minute and elaborate examination of witnesses, thought proper to rest the case of the prisoner on the question of law, which had been determined in the cases of Vigol and Mitchell above mentioned, and had then been acquiesced in, but which they thought proper again to raise. They contended "that to resist by force of arms a particular law of the United States does not amount to levying war against the United States, within the true meaning of the constitution, and therefore it is not treason, but a riot only." This question they argued at great length, and with all the force of their learning and genius; and after a very full discussion at the bar, and the most mature deliberation by the court, the learned and excellent judge who then presided, and who was no less distinguished by his humanity and tenderness towards persons tried before him, than by his extensive knowledge and great talents as a lawyer, pronounced the opinion of himself and his colleague, "that to resist or prevent by force the execution of a particular law of the United States, does not amount to levying war against them, within the true meaning of the constitution, and does not therefore constitute the crime of treason," thereby adding the weight of another and more solemn decision to the precedent which had been established in the above-mentioned Cases of Vigol and Mitchell. Under this opinion of the court on the question of law, the jury, having no doubt as to the facts, found the said John Fries guilty of treason, on the above-mentioned indictment. But a new trial was granted by the court, not by reason of any doubt as to the correctness of the decision on the question of law, but solely on the ground, as this respondent hath understood and believes, that one of the jurors of the petit jury, after he was summoned, but before he was sworn on the trial, had made some declaration unfavourable to the prisoner. The yellow fever having appeared in Philadelphia in the summer of the year 1799, the above mentioned Richard Peters, then district judge of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, did, according to law, appoint the next circuit court of that district, to be held at Norristown therein: pursuant to which appointment, a circuit court was held at Norristown aforesaid, in and for the said district, on the 11th day of October, in the last-mentioned year, before Bushrod Washington, Esq., then one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States, and the above-mentioned Richard Peters; at which court no proceedings were had on the aforesaid indictment against John Fries, because, as this respondent hath been informed and believes, the commission of the marshal of the said district had expired, before he summoned the jurors to attend at the said court, and had not been renewed; by reason of which no legal panel of jurors could be formed.

On the 11th day of April, A. D. 1800, and from that day until the 2d day of May in the same year, a circuit court of the United States was held at Philadelphia, in and for the district of Pennsylvania, before this respondent, then one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States, and the above-mentioned Richard Peters, then district judge of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania. At this court, the indictment on which the said John Fries had been convicted as above mentioned, was quashed ex-officio by William Rawle, Esq., then attorney of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, and a new indictment was by him preferred against the said John Fries, for treason of levying war against the United States, by resisting and preventing by force, in the manner above set forth, the execution of the above-mentioned acts of congress, for the valuation of lands and dwelling houses and the enumeration of slaves, and for levying and collecting a direct tax. This indictment, of which a true copy, marked "Exhibit No. 1," is herewith exhibited by this respondent, who prays that it may be taken as a part of this his answer, being found by the grand jury on the 16th day of April, 1800, the said John Fries was on the same day arraigned thereon, and plead not guilty. William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas, Esqrs., the same persons who had conducted his defence at his former trial, were again at his request assigned by the court as his counsel: and his trial was appointed to be had on Tuesday, the 22d day of the last-mentioned month of April. After this indictment was found by the grand jury, this respondent considered it with great care and deliberation, and finding, from the three overt acts of treason which it charged, that the question of law arising upon it, was the same question which had already been decided twice in the same court, on solemn argument and deliberation, and one in that very case, he considered the law as settled by those decisions, with the correctness of which on full consideration he was entirely satisfied; and by the authority of which he should have deemed himself bound, even had he regarded the question as doubtful in itself. They are moreover, in perfect conformity with the uniform tenor of decisions in the courts of England and Great Britain, from the revolution in 1688, to the present time, which, in his opinion, added greatly to their weight and authority. And surely we need not urge to this honourable court the correctness, the importance, and the absolute necessity of adhering to principles of law once established, and of considering the law as finally settled, after repeated and solemn decisions by courts of competent jurisdiction. A contrary principle would unsettle the basis of our whole system of jurisprudence, hitherto our safeguard and our boast; would reduce the law of the land, and subject the rights of the citizen, to the arbitrary will, the passions, or the caprice of the judge in each particuar case; and would substitute the varying opinions of various men, instead of that fixed, permanent rule in which the very essence of the law consists. If this respondent erred in regarding this point as settled, by the repeated and solemn adjudications of his predecessors, in the same court and in the same case; if he erred in supposing that a principle, established by two solemn decisions, was obligatory upon him, sitting in the same court where those decisions had been made; if he erred in believing that it would be the highest presumption in him to see up his opinion and judgment over that of his colleague, who had twice decided the same question, and of two of his predecessors, who justly rank among the ablest judges that have ever adorned a court; if in all this he erred, it is an error of which he cannot be ashamed, and which he trusts will not be deemed criminal in the eyes of this honourable court, of his country, or of that posterity by which he, his accusers, and his judges, must one day be judged. Under the influence of these considerations, this respondent drew up an opinion on the law arising from the overt acts stated in the said indictment, which was conformable to the decisions before given as above mentioned, and which he sent to his colleague, the said Richard Peters, for his consideration. That gentleman returned it to this respondent, with some amendments affecting the form only, but not in any manner touching the substance. The opinion thus agreed to, this respondent thought it proper to communicate to the prisoner's counsel; several reasons concurred in favour of this communication.

In the first place, this respondent considered himself and the court as bound by the authority of the former decisions; especially the last of them, which was on the same case. He considered the law as settled, and had every reason to believe that his colleague viewed it in the same light. It was not suggested or understood that any new evidence was to be offered; and he knew that if any should be offered, which could vary the case, it would render wholly inapplicable both the opinion and the former decisions on which it was founded. And he could not and did not suppose, that the prisoner's counsel would be desirous of wasting very precious time in addressing to the court a useless argument on a point which that court held itself precluded from deciding in their favour. He therefore conceived that it would be rendering the counsel a service and a favour, to apprise them beforehand of the view which the court had taken of the subject; so as to let them see in time the necessity of endeavouring to produce new testimony, which might vary the case, and take it out of the authority of former decisions. Secondly. There were more than one hundred civil causes then depending in the said court, as appears by the exhibit marked "No. 1," which this respondent prays may be taken as part of this, his answer. Many of those causes had already been subjected to great delay, and it was the peculiar duty of this respondent, as presiding judge, to take care that as little time as possible should be unnecessarily consumed, and that every convenient and proper dispatch should be given to the business of the citizens. He did believe that an early communication of the court's opinion might tend to the saving of time, and, consequently, to the dispatch of business. Thirdly. As the court held itself bound by the former decisions, and could not therefore alter its opinion in consequence of any argument; and as it was the duty of the court to charge the jury on the law, in all cases submitted to their consideration; he knew that this opinion must not only be made known at some period or other of the trial, but must, at the end of the trial, be expressly delivered to the jury by him, in a charge from the bench. And, he could not suppose and cannot yet imagine, that an opinion, which was to be thus solemnly given in charge to the jury, at the close of the trial, could make any additional impression on their minds, from the circumstance of its being intimated to the counsel before the trial began, in the hearing of those who might be afterwards sworn on the jury. And, lastly, it was then his opinion, and still is, that it is the duty of every court of this country, and was his duty on the trial now under consideration, to guard the jury against erroneous impressions respecting the laws of the land. He well knows that it is the right of juries in criminal cases, to give a general verdict of acquittal, which cannot be set aside on account of its being contrary to law, and that hence results the power of juries to decide on the laws as well as on the facts, in all criminal cases. This power he holds to be a sacred part of our legal privileges, which he never has attempted, and never will attempt, to abridge or to obstruct. But he also knows that, in the exercise of this power, it is the duty of the jury to govern themselves by the laws of the land, over which they have no dispensing power; and their right to expect and receive from our court all the assistance which it can give, for rightly understanding the law. To withhold this assistance, in any manner whatever; to forbear to give it in that way which may be most effectual for preserving the jury from error and mistake, would be an abandonment or forgetfulness of duty, which no judge could justify to his conscience or to the laws. In this case, therefore, where the question of law arising on the indictment had been finally settled by authoritative decisions, it was the duty of the court, and especially of this respondent as presiding judge, early to apprise the counsel and the jury of these decisions, and their effect, so as to save the former from the danger of making an improper attempt to mislead the jury in a matter of law, and the jury from having their minds pre-occupied by erroneous impressions.

It was for these reasons that, on the 22d day of April, 1800, when the said John Fries was brought into court, and placed in the prisoner's box for trial, but before the petit jury was impaneled to try him, this respondent informed the above-mentioned William Lewis, one of his counsel, the aforesaid Alexander James Dallas not being then in court, "that the court had deliberately considered the indictment against John Fries for treason, and the three several overt acts of treason stated therein. That the crime of treason was defined by the constitution of the United States; that, as the federal legislature had the power to make, alter, or repeal laws, so the judiciary only had the power, and it was their duty, to declare, expound, and interpret, the constitution and laws of the United States. That it was the duty of the court, in all criminal cases, to state to the petit jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts; but the jury, in all criminal cases, were to decide both the law and the facts, on a consideration of the whole case. That there must be some constructive exposition of the terms used in the constitution, 'levying war against the United States.' That the question, what acts amounted to levying war against the United States, or the government thereof, was a question of law, and had been decided by Judges Patterson and Peters, in the Cases of Vigol and Mitchell [supra], and by Judges Iredell and Peters, in the case of John Fries, prisoner at the bar, in April, 1799 [Case No. 5,126]. That Judge Peters remained of the same opinion, which he had twice before delivered, and he, this respondent, on long and great consideration, concurred in the opinion of Judges Patterson, Iredell, and Peters. That to prevent unnecessary delay, and to save time on the trial of John Fries, and to prevent a delay of justice in the great number of civil causes depending for trial at that term, the court had drawn up in writing their opinion of the law, arising on the overt acts, stated in the indictment against John Fries; and had directed David Caldwell, their clerk, to make out three copies of their opinion, one to be delivered to the attorney of the district, one to the counsel for the prisoner, and one to the petit jury, after they should have been impaneled and heard the indictment read to them by the clerk, and after the district attorney should have stated to them the law on the overt acts alleged in the indictment, as it appeared to him." After these observations, this respondent delivered one of the above-mentioned copies to the aforesaid William Lewis, then attending as one of the prisoner's counsel, who read part of it, and then laid it down on the table before him. Some observations were then made on the subject by him and the above-mentioned Alexander James Dallas, who had then come into court; but this respondent doth not now recollect those observations, and cannot undertake to state them accurately. And this respondent further saith, that the paper marked "Exhibit No. 2," and herewith exhibited, which he prays leave to make part of this his answer, is a true copy of the original opinion, drawn up by him and concurred in by the said Richard Peters, as above set forth, which original opinion is now in the possession of this respondent, ready to be produced to this honourable court. He may have erred in forming this opinion, and in the time and manner of making it known to the counsel for the prisoner. If he erred in forming it, he erred in common with his colleague and with two of his predecessors; and he presumes to hope that an error which has never been deemed criminal in them, will not be imputed as a crime to him, who was led into it by their example and their authority. If he erred in the time and manner of making known this opinion, he feels a just confidence that when the reasons which he has alleged for his conduct, and by which it seemed to him to be fully justified, shall come to be carefully weighed, they will be sufficient to prove, if not that this conduct was perfectly regular and correct, yet that he might sincerely have considered it as right; and that in a case where so much doubt may exist, to have committed a mistake is not to have committed a crime. And this respondent further answering, insists, that the opinion thus delivered to the prisoner's counsel, viz: that "any insurrection or rising of any body of people within the United States, for the purpose of resisting or preventing by force or violence, under any pretence whatever, the execution of any statute of the United States, for levying or collecting taxes, or for any other object of a general or national concern, is levying war against the United States, within the contemplation and true meaning of the constitution of the United States," is a legal and correct opinion, supported not only by the two previous decisions above mentioned, but also by the plainest principles of law and reason, and by the uniform tenor of legal adjudications in England and Great Britain, from the revolution in 1688 to this time. It ever was, and now is his opinion, that the peace and safety of the national federal government must be endangered by any other construction of the terms "levying war against the United States," used by the federal constitution; and he is confident that no judge of the federal government, no judge of a superior state court, nor any gentleman of established reputation for legal knowledge, would or could deliberately give a contrary opinion. If, however, this opinion were erroneous, this respondent would be far less censurable than his predecessors, by whose example he was led astray, and by whose authority he considered himself bound. Was it an error to consider himself bound by the authority of their previous decisions? If it were, he was led into the error by the uniform course of judicial proceedings in this country and England, and is supported in it by one of the fundamental principles of our jurisprudence. Can such an error be a crime or misdemeanour? If, on the other hand, the opinion be in itself correct, as he believes and insists that it is, could the expression of a correct opinion on the law, whenever and however made, mislead the jury, infringe their rights, or give an improper bias to their judgment? Could truth excite improper prejudice? Could the jury be less prepared to hear the law discussed, and to decide on it correctly, because it was correctly stated to them by the court? And is not that a new kind of offence, in this country at least, which consists in telling the truth, and giving a correct exposition of the laws?

As to the second specific charge adduced in support of the first article of impeachment, which accuses this respondent "of restricting the counsel for the said Fries, from recurring to such English authorities as they believed apposite, or from citing certain statutes of the United States, which they deemed illustrative of the positions upon which they intended to rest the defence of their client," this respondent admits that he did, on the above-mentioned trial, express it as his opinion to the aforesaid counsel for the prisoner, "that the decisions in England, in cases of indictments for treason at common law, against the person of the king, ought not to be read to the jury, on trials for treason under the constitution and statutes of the United States; because such decisions could not inform, but might mislead and deceive the jury; that any decisions on cases of treason, in the courts of England, before the revolution of 1688, ought to have very little influence in the courts of the United States; that he would permit decisions in the courts of England or of Great Britain, since the said revolution, to be read to the court or jury for the purpose of showing what acts have been considered by those courts as a constructive levying of war against the king of that country, in his legal capacity, but not against his person; because levying war against his government was of the same nature as levying war against the government of the United States; but that such decisions, nevertheless, were not to be considered as authorities binding on the courts and juries of this country, but merely in the light of opinions entitled to great respect as having been delivered, after full consideration, by men of great legal learning and ability." These are the opinions which he did on that occasion deliver to the counsel for the prisoner, and which he then thought, and still thinks, it was his duty to deliver. The counsellors admitted to practice in any court of justice, are, in his opinion, and according to universal practice, to be considered as officers of such courts and ministers of justice therein, and as such, subject to the direction and control of the court, as to their conduct in its presence, and in conducting the defence and criminals on trial before it. As counsel, they owe to the person accused, diligence, fidelity and secrecy, and to the court and jury, due and correct information, according to the best of their knowledge and ability, on every matter of law which they attempt to adduce in argument. The court, on the other hand, hath power, and is bound in duty, to decide and direct what evidence, whether by records or by precedents of decisions in courts of justice, is proper to be admitted for the establishment of any matter of law or fact. Consequently, should counsel attempt to read to the jury, as a law still in force, a statute which had been repealed, or a decision which had been reversed, or the judgments of courts in countries whose laws have no connection with ours, it would be the duty of the court to interpose, and prevent such an imposition from being practiced on the jury. For these reasons this respondent thinks that his conduct was correct in expressing to the counsel for Fries the opinions stated above. He is not bound to answer here for the correctness of those principles, though he thinks them incontestable; but merely for the correctness of his motives in delivering them. A contrary opinion would convert this honourable court from a court of impeachment into a court of appeals; and would lead directly to the strange absurdity, that, whenever the judgment of an inferior court should be reversed on appeal or writ of error, the judges of that court must be convicted of high crimes and misdemeanours, and turned out of office; that error in judgment is a punishable offence, and that crimes may be committed without any criminal intention. Against a doctrine so absurd and mischievous, so contrary to every notion of justice hitherto entertained, so utterly subversive of all that part of our system of jurisprudence which has been wisely and humanely established for the protection of innocence, this respondent deems it his duty now, and on every fit occasion, to enter his protest and lift up his voice; and he trusts that, in the discharge of this duty, infinitely more important to his country than to himself, he shall find approbation and support in the heart of every American, of every man throughout the world, who knows the blessings of civil liberty, or respects the principles of universal justice. It is only, then, for the correctness of his motives in delivering these opinions, that he can now be called to answer; and this correctness ought to be presumed, unless the contrary appear by some direct proof, or by some violent presumption arising from his general conduct on the trial, or from the glaring impropriety of the opinion itself. For he admits that cases may be supposed of an opinion delivered by a judge so palpably erroneous, unjust and oppressive, as to preclude the possibility of its having proceeded from ignorance or mistake.

Do the opinions now under consideration bear any of these marks? This honourable court need not be informed that there has existed in England no such thing as treason at common law, since the year 1350, when the statute of the 25 Edw. III. c. 2, declaring what alone should in future be judged treason, was passed. Is it perfectly clear that decisions made before that statute, 450 years ago, when England, together with the rest of Europe, was still wrapped in the deepest gloom of ignorance and barbarism; when the system of English jurisprudence was still in its infancy; when law, justice and reason, were perpetually trampled under foot by feudal oppression and feudal anarchy; when, under an able and vigorous monarch, everything was adjudged to be treason which he thought fit to call so, and under a weak one nothing was considered as treason which turbulent, powerful, and rebellious nobles thought fit to perpetrate—is it perfectly clear that decisions made at such a time, and under such circumstances, ought to be received by the courts of this country as authorities to govern their decisions, or lights to guide the understanding of juries? It is perfectly clear that decisions made in England, on the subject of treason, before the revolution of 1688, by which alone the balance of the English constitution was adjusted, and the English liberties were fixed on a firm basis; decisions made either during the furious civil wars, in which two rival families contended for the crown; when, in the vicissitudes of war, death and confiscation in the forms of law, continually walked in the train of the victors, and actions were treasonable or praise-worthy, according to the preponderance of the party by whose adherents they were perpetrated; during the reigns of three able and arbitrary monarchs who succeeded this dreadful conflict, and relaxed or invigorated the law of treason, according to their anger, their policy, or their caprice; or during those terrible struggles between the principles of liberty, not yet well defined or understood on one hand, and arbitrary power insinuating itself under the forms of the constitution on the other; struggles which presented at some times the wildest anarchy, at others the extremes of servile submission, and after having brought one king to the scaffold, ended in the expulsion of another from his throne? Is it clear that decisions on the law of treason, made in times like these, ought not only to be received as authorities in the courts of this country, but also to have great influence on their decisions? Is it clear that decisions made in England, as to what acts will amount to levying war against the king, personally, and not against his government, are applicable to the constitution and laws of this country? Is it clear that such English decisions on the subject of treason, as are applicable to our constitution and laws, are to be received in our courts, not merely as the opinions of learned and able men, which may enlighten their judgment, but as authorities which ought to govern absolutely their decisions? Is all this so clear, that a judge could not honestly and sincerely have thought the contrary? That he could not have expressed an opinion to the contrary, without corrupt or improper motives? If it be not thus clear, then must it be admitted that this respondent, sincerely and honestly, and in the best of his judgment, considered these decisions as wholly inadmissible, or admissible only for the purposes and to the extent which he pointed out. And if he did so consider them, was it not his duty to prevent them from being read to the jury, except under those restrictions, and for those purposes? Would his duty permit him to sit silently, and see the jury imposed on and misled? To sit silently and hear a book read to them as containing the law, which he knew did not contain the law? Such silence would have rendered him a party to the deception, and would have justly subjected him to all the contumely which a conscientious and courageous discharge of his duty has so unmeritedly brought on his name.

With respect to the statutes of the United States, which he is charged with having prevented the prisoner's counsel from citing on the aforesaid trial, he denies that he prevented any act of congress from being cited, either to the court or jury, on the said trial; or declared at any time, that he would not permit the prisoner's counsel to read to the jury, or to the court, any act of congress whatever. Nor does he remember or believe, that he expressed on the said trial any disapprobation of the conduct of the circuit court before whom the said case was first tried, in permitting the act of congress relating to crimes less than treason, commonly called the "Sedition Act," to be read to the jury. He admits, indeed, that he was then and still is of opinion, that the said act of congress wholly was irrelevant to the issue, in the trial of John Fries, and, therefore, ought not to have been read to the jury, or regarded by them. This opinion may be erroneous, but he trusts that the following reasons on which it was founded, will be considered by this honourable court, as sufficiently strong to render it possible, and even probable, that such an opinion might be sincerely held and honestly expressed: 1st. That congress did not intend by the sedition law to define the crime of treason by "levying war." Treason and sedition are crimes very distinct in their natures, and subject to very different punishments; the former by death, and the latter by fine and imprisonment. 2dly. The sedition law makes a combination or conspiracy, with intent to impede the operation of any law of the United States, or the advising or attempting to procure any insurrection or riot, a high misdemeanour, punishable by fine and imprisonment; but a combination or conspiracy with intent to prevent the execution of a law, or with intent to raise an insurrection for that purpose, or even with intent to commit treason, is not treason by "levying war" against the United States, unless it be followed by an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into effect, by actual force or violence. 3dly. The constitution of the United States is the fundamental and supreme law, and having defined the crime of treason, congress could not give any legislative interpretation or exposition of that crime, or of the part of the constitution by which it is defined. 4thly. The judicial authority of the United States is alone vested with power to expound their constitution and laws.

And this respondent, further answering, saith, that after the above mentioned proceedings had taken place in the said trial, it was postponed until the next day, Wednesday, April 23d, 1800; when, at the meeting of the court, this respondent told both the above-mentioned counsel for the prisoner, "that to prevent any misunderstanding of anything that had passed the day before, he would inform them that, although the court retained the same opinion of the law, arising on the overt acts charged in the indictment against Fries, yet the counsel would be permitted to offer arguments to the court, for the purpose of showing them that they were mistaken in the law; and that the court, if satisfied that they had erred in opinion, would correct it; and, also, that the counsel would be permitted to argue before the petit jury, that the court were mistaken in the law." And this respondent added, that the court had given no opinion as to the facts in the case, about which both the counsel had declared that there would be no controversy. After some observations by the said William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas, they both declared to the court, "that they did not any longer consider themselves as the counsel for John Fries, the prisoner." This respondent then asked the said John Fries, whether he wished the court to appoint other counsel for his defence? He refused to have other counsel assigned; in which he acted, as this respondent believes and avers, by the advice of the said William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas: whereupon the court ordered the said trial to be had on the next day, Thursday, the 24th of April, 1800. On that day the trial was proceeded in; and before the jurors were sworn, they were, by the direction of the court, severally asked on oath, whether they were in any way related to the prisoner, and whether they had ever formed or delivered any opinion as to his guilt or innocence, or that he ought to be punished? Three of them answering in the affirmative, were withdrawn from the panel. The said John Fries was then informed by the court, that he had a right to challenge thirty-five of the jury, without showing any cause, or challenge against them, and as many more as he could show cause of challenge against. He did accordingly challenge peremptorily thirty-four of the jury, and the trial proceeded. In the evening, the court adjourned till the next day, Friday, the 25th of April; when, after the district attorney had stated the principal facts proved by the witnesses, and had applied the law to those facts, this respondent, with the concurrence of his colleague, the said Richard Peters, delivered to the jury the charge contained and expressed in exhibit marked "No. 3," and herewith filed, which he prays may be taken as part of this his answer. Immediately after the petit jury had delivered their verdict, this respondent informed the said Fries, from the bench, that if he, or any person for him, could show any legal ground, or sufficient cause to arrest the judgment, ample time would be allowed him for that purpose. But no cause being shown, sentence of death was passed on the said Fries on the 2d day of May, 1800, the last day of the term; and he was afterwards pardoned by John Adams, then president of the United States.

And this respondent, further answering, saith, that if the two instances of misconduct, first stated in support of the general charge contained in the first article of impeachment, were true as alleged, yet the inference drawn from them, viz. "that the said Fries was hereby deprived of the benefit of counsel for his defence," is not true. He insists that the said Fries was deprived of the benefit of counsel, not by any misconduct of this respondent, but by the conduct and advice of the above-mentioned William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas, who, having been, with their own consent, assigned by the court as counsel for the prisoner, withdrew from his defence, and advised him to refuse other counsel when offered to him by the court, under pretence that the law had been prejudged, and their liberty of conducting the defence, accor ng to their own judgment, improperly restricted by this respondent; but in reality because they knew the law and the facts to be against them, and the case to be desperate, and supposed that their withdrawing themselves under this pretence, might excite odium against the court; might give rise to an opinion that the prisoner had not been fairly tried; and in the event of a conviction, which, from their knowledge of the law and the facts, they knew to be almost certain, might aid the prisoner in an application to the president for a pardon. That such was the real motive of the said prisoner's counsel, for depriving their client of legal assistance on this trial, this respondent is fully persuaded, and expects to make appear, not only from the circumstances of the case, but from their own frequent and public declarations. As little can this respondent be justly charged with having, by any conduct of his, endeavoured to "wrest from the jury their indisputable right to hear argument, and determine upon the question of law as well as the question of fact involved in the verdict which they were required to give." He denies that he did at any time declare that the aforesaid counsel should not at any time address the jury, or did in any manner hinder them from addressing the jury on the law as well as on the facts arising in the case. It was expressly stated, in the copy of his opinion delivered as above set forth to William Lewis, that the jury had a right to determine the law as well as the fact: and the said William Lewis and Alexander James Dallas were expressly informed, before they declared their resolution to abandon the defence, that they were at liberty to argue the law to the jury. This respondent believes that the said William Lewis did not read the opinion delivered to him as aforesaid, except a very small part at the beginning of it, and of course, acted upon it without knowing its contents: and that the said Alexander James Dallas read no part of the said opinion until about a year ago, when he saw a very imperfect copy, made in court by a certain W. S. Biddle.

And this respondent, further answering, saith, that, according to the constitution of the United States, civil officers thereof, and no other persons, are subject to impeachment; and they only for treason, bribery, corruption or other high crime or misdemeanour, consisting in some act done or committed, in violation of some law forbidding or commanding it; on conviction of which act, they must be removed from office; and may, after conviction, be indicted and punished therefor, according to law. Hence, it clearly results, that no civil officer of the United States can be impeached, except for some offence for which he may be indicted at law; and that no evidence can be received on an impeachment except such as, on an indictment at law, for the same offence, would be admissible. That a judge cannot be indicted or punished according to law, for any act whatever done by him in his judicial capacity, and in a matter of which he has jurisdiction, through error of judgment merely, without corrupt motives, however manifest his error may be, is a principle resting on the plainest maxims of reason and justice, supported by the highest legal authority, and sanctioned by the universal sense of mankind. He hath already endeavoured to show, and he hopes with success, that all the opinions delivered by him in the course of the trials now under consideration, were correct in themselves, and in the time and manner of expressing them; and that even admitting them to have been incorrect, there was such strong reason in their favour, as to remove from his conduct every suspicion of improper motives. If these opinions were incorrect, his mistake in adopting them, or in the time or manner of expressing them, cannot be imputed to him as an offence of any kind, much less as a high crime and misdemeanour, for which he ought to be removed from office; unless it can be shown by clear and legal evidence, that he acted from corrupt motives. Should it be considered that some impropriety is attached to his conduct, in the time and mode of expressing any of these opinions, still he apprehends, that a very wide difference exists between such impropriety, the casual effects of human infirmity, and a high crime and misdemeanour for which he may be impeached, and must on conviction be removed from office.

Finally, this respondent, having thus laid before this honourable court a true state of his case, so far as respects the first article of impeachment, declares, upon the strictest review of his conduct during the whole trial of John Fries for treason, that he was not on that occasion unmindful of the solemn duties of his office as a judge;—that he faithfully, and impartially, and according to the best of his ability and understanding, discharged those duties towards the said John Fries; and that he did not in any manner, during the said trial, conduct himself arbitrarily, unjustly, or oppressively, as he is accused by the honourable the house of representatives. And the said Samuel Chase, for plea to the said first article of impeachment, saith, that he is not guilty of any high crime or misdemeanour, as in and by the said first article is alleged; and this he prays may be inquired of by this honourable court, in such manner as law and justice shall seem to them to require.

Evidence on the part of the United States.

Alexander James Dallas sworn.

Mr. Nicholson: Please to state your knowledge relative to the trial of Fries.

Mr. Dallas: I will endeavour to be as correct as I can in stating the facts relative to the trial, and also the order in which they took place, as well as the language used; but from the length of time which has elapsed since the trial, it is probable I may be mistaken in some part of my relation, as to the language and the order in which the facts took place.—When the prisoners who were charged with having committed an insurrection in the counties of Bucks and Northampton, were brought to Philadelphia, Mr. Ingersoll and myself were applied to by some gentlemen in Philadelphia, to undertake their defence. Mr. Ingersoll being at the time attorney-general of the state of Pennsylvania, determined not to defend them. About this time Mr. Lewis was also spoken to, and engaged in their defence. This produced a meeting at the jail where the prisoners were, and we gave the necessary information relative to a preparation for trial. A Mr. Ewing, a gentleman of the bar, had been employed to defend some of the prisoners, and undertook the defence of Fries with us. This was the first trial, the circumstances of which have been related. On the morning of the second trial, I did not enter the court until some time after it was called. Fries was then in the box assigned for the prisoners. I pressed towards the bar, when my attention was attracted by an animated conversation which was taking place between Mr. Lewis and Mr. Edward Tilghman.—When Mr. Lewis observed me, he met me, and related what he has stated here; he said that Judge Chase had declared that the court had made up their minds with respect to the law relative to treason, and had ordered three copies of the opinion to be made out; one for the attorney of the district; one for the prisoner's counsel; and a third for the jury to take out with them. After having exchanged our sentiments, we entered the bar together; something fell from the court, which caused a reply from Mr. Lewis. I believe the question was, whether we were ready to proceed with the defence? Mr. Lewis observed that there were no doubts as to the facts, and as the court had made up their minds as to the law, he did not expect that he should be able to change them; and that he should decline acting as counsel for Fries. I at this time addressed the court, and recapitulated what had been told me by Mr. Lewis, thinking that there might be some mistake, for although I was certain that Mr. Lewis would not have related anything that was not true, yet I deemed it probable that I might have misunderstood him. After a moment's pause, in order that I might be corrected if in an error, I proceeded, and delivered some general remarks as to the powers of the court and jury in criminal cases; and concluded by stating to the court my determination not to consider myself as counsel for the prisoner any longer, under the opinion which the court had given. I remember to have heard Judge Peters say to Judge Chase, "I told you so; I knew they would take the stud." Judge Peters also on the same day expressed a wish that we would proceed with the defence, and to take any range we pleased. The bar and the audience appeared extremely surprised at the transactions of the day. On the second day, it became the subject of altercation whether we had a right to address the jury upon the law. Judge Chase then said, that, although he had before stated that we must not, yet that we might address the jury on the law, but it would be at the hazard of our reputation. This had the contrary effect rather than to induce me to proceed. In the evening of that day, Mr. Lewis and myself visited Fries at the prison. We stated to him that we had two objects in view; the first was that of saving his life, and the second to maintain our privileges as members of the bar. We told him that under the then existing circumstances, we had no hopes of an acquittal, as there were no doubts as to the facts, and the court having made up their opinion as to the law, and the jury having heard the declaration of the court, which would influence their verdict. And we told him that if he would consent to our withdrawing from his defence, and refuse to accept other counsel, it would be a strong recommendation to the president for a pardon. He appeared at first extremely alarmed, but after some time he agreed to our proposition. We told him, at the same time, that if he insisted on it, we would proceed to defend him at every hazard. On the next day, we both stated to the court that we were no longer his counsel, upon which both Judge Peters and Judge Chase spoke in the manner in which Mr. Lewis has stated it. We determined to adhere to our determination of withdrawing. Judge Chase then said that we might think to embarrass the court, but we should find ourselves mistaken. He then asked Fries if he wished other counsel assigned him. The prisoner replied that he did not know what was best for him to do, but would leave it entirely to the court. Judge Chase then observed, that, by the blessing of God, they would do him as much justice as the counsel who had been assigned him. I then left the court, and I believe Mr. Lewis did also. On the first trial of Fries, we were allowed to address the jury both on the law and on the fact—to read what authorities we pleased, both before and after the revolution in England, and also the statutes of congress, in order to show that Fries had only been guilty of a riot. Our law points were, that the constitution had defined the law concerning treason, and that the legislature nor the judges had the power of defining it. We argued that the judges before the revolution in England, held their office at the pleasure of the crown, and, therefore, would make anything treason. We took up the common law decisions to show, not what was the law, but what had been their decisions. We cited the case of the man whose stag the king killed, and who wished the horns of the stag in the king's belly, and also that of the innkeeper who kept the sign of the crown, and who said he would make his son heir to the crown, in order to show the great lengths to which the doctrine of constructive treason was carried. We then contended that, although the judges since the revolution in England, had become independent of the crown, yet they considered themselves as bound by these decisions of their predecessors, and, therefore, ought not to be considered as authorities to govern our courts on the subject of treason. We also read the statutes of congress, particularly the first section of the act called the "Sedition Law," in order to show that the legislature of the United States had declared the offence of which Fries was charged to have committed to have been only a riot, and punishable with fine and imprisonment. We attempted to show a difference between the case of Fries and the Western insurrection, and I was surprised that the cases should have been decided to be similar. After a new trial was granted, my attention was almost entirely directed to the object of showing a difference between the two cases at the second trial. This is all that I recollect of the circumstances; but whatever might have been my conduct in order to save the life of the prisoner, yet I never had the least intention of bringing the court into odium.

Mr. Nicholson: Was the jury present at the time that Judge Chase declared that the counsel on the question of law must address themselves to the court?

Mr. Dallas: I know not whether he made this declaration on the first day, as I before stated that I was not in court at the time, and it was related to me by Mr. Lewis.

Mr. Nicholson: When the judge observed that you might proceed at the hazard of your reputation, were the papers withdrawn?

Mr. Dallas: I know not; but I think the judge observed that they were.

William Rawle, affirmed.—Ques. Were you present at the trial of Fries? Ans. I was. Ques. What took place on that occasion? Ans. The circuit court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, met on the 11th of April, 1800. As the proceedings against John Fries were considered as not to be revived, without the interposition of an act of congress, it appeared best to me to move the court, on the first day of their session, to quash the indictment against him. This I accordingly did, and the court granted my motion. Upon the same day the court charged the grand jury, and I sent up to them, among others, an indictment against John Fries, which was returned a true bill. On the 16th of April, John Fries was brought to the bar, arraigned, and plead not guilty. I can't say whether Messrs. Lewis and Dallas were on that day assigned him by the court as counsel, or whether they continued to act, having been his counsel on the first trial. Copies of the indictment were furnished to Fries and his counsel. The trial was then postponed, on account of the absence of a material witness, and it was not assigned for the day which Messrs. Lewis and Dallas have given testimony of, and which has been called the first day of the trial. Fries might have been in the box, through mistake, because, that I had on a certain day directed the marshal to bring up a number of persons, charged with seditious practices, and Fries might have been brought with them. Shortly after, the court met. Judge Chase observed, that the court had made up their minds as to the law of treason, and to avoid being misunderstood, they had reduced their opinion to writing, and that they had directed three copies of the opinion to be made out; one for the district attorney, another for the counsel for the prisoner, and a third for the jury, to be delivered to them after the case had gone through, on the part of the prosecution. As these words were pronounced, several papers were thrown, I know not whether by the court or the clerk. I took up one of them and began to read; but casting my eyes up, I saw Mr. Lewis on the opposite side of the table, with one of the papers in his hand, which he looked at with apparent indignation, and then threw it on the table. I cannot call to my recollection anything further that passed between the counsel and the court on that day. I perceived much agitation among the gentlemen of the bar; but having a great burthen of criminal prosecutions on my hands, I could hear nothing until the court rose. In the course of that morning, twenty-one persons were brought to the bar for seditious combinations, and submitted to the court. The court rose early in the day, and requested me not to examine the witnesses on those cases of sedition. After the court rose, I understood that the counsel for Fries meant to decline acting in his defence. I have an indistinct recollection of hearing this from Mr. Dallas. Soon after I got home on that day, Judge Chase and Judge Peters came to my house. We went into another room from that in which I was sitting, when Judge Peters began by expressing an apprehension that the counsel for Fries would decline acting for him. Judge Chase observed that he could not suppose that that would be the case. I supported the opinion of Judge Peters, and stated that the gentlemen of the bar of Philadelphia were very independent, and that in my opinion the counsel for Fries would not proceed, unless the papers were withdrawn, and they were permitted to go on in their usual way. Judge Chase observed that he was sorry that the opinion had been considered in the light it was, and that it was not intended to preclude the counsel from going on in the usual manner, provided they thought proper. Both the judges then requested me to obtain all the copies of the opinion which had been taken, which I readily promised to comply with. I recollected to have seen Messrs. Tilghman and Ross taking copies of the opinion. I went to their houses and requested them, which they gave to me immediately, and I took them to Mr. Caldwell, the clerk of the court. I asked him whether he knew of any other persons taking a copy, and he answered that he believed that Mr. William Meredith had; upon which I requested him to go to Mr. Meredith, and try to obtain it. I did not at that time know that Mr. Biddle, who was then a student of mine, had taken a copy; nor did I then recollect that I had one of them myself. I, therefore, did not hand it to the clerk, but have it now in my possession. The papers which were thrown down did not appear to me to be read by any persons but those who copied them; and I entertained an anxious hope, on the next day, that the gentlemen who were concerned as counsel for Fries would proceed in his defence, and be satisfied.

I will now, with the permission of the court, refer to some original notes which I took upon the remaining part of the transaction. On the 23d day of April, John Fries was brought to the bar. The court then, addressing themselves first to me, and then to the counsel for Fries, asked if we were ready to proceed with the trial? to which I answered affirmatively. Mr. Lewis then observed, that if he had been employed by the prisoner, he would think himself bound to proceed; but having been assigned as his counsel—(He was here interrupted by Judge Chase, who said "You are not bound by the opinion delivered yesterday, but are at liberty to contest it on both sides.") Mr. Lewis answered, that he had understood that the court had made up their minds as to the law, and as the prisoner's counsel had a right to address the jury both on the law and the fact, it would place him in too degrading a situation to argue the case after what had passed, and, therefore, he would not proceed with the defence. Judge Chase answered with impatience, "You are at liberty to proceed as you think proper. Address the jury and lay down the law as you think proper." Mr. Lewis answered, with considerable warmth, "I will never address myself to the court upon the question of law in a criminal case." He then went into a lengthy argument upon the law of high treason in England, previous to their resolution, and contended that the courts, since that period, had considered themselves as bound by those decisions which were made prior to it. Judge Chase observed, that the counsel must do as they please. Mr. Dallas then rose, and went into a general view of the ground, which had been taken by Mr. Lewis, and concluded with his determination not to proceed as counsel for Fries. Judge Chase observed, "No opinion has been given as to the facts of the case. I would not suffer the witnesses against those persons charged with seditious combinations, to be examined before the trial of Fries came on, lest their evidence might have been heard by some of the jury. As to the law, I know that the trial before took a considerable time, and that cases at common law, and decisions in England before the revolution on the law of treason, such as the case of the man whose stag the king killed, and wished the horns of the stag in the king's belly, and the case of the innkeeper, who kept the sign of the crown, and who said he would make his son heir to the crown. These cases ought not, and shall not go to the jury. There is no case which can come before me on which I have not a decided opinion as to the law; otherwise I should not be fit to preside here. I have always conducted myself with candour, gentlemen, and meant to have saved you trouble by what I did. Is it not respectable for counsel to say that they have a right to offer what they please to the jury? What! would you cite decisions in Rome, in Turkey, or in France? You will now proceed, and stand acquitted or condemned in your own consciences as you conduct the defence, and go on in your own way. The case will be opened by the attorney—the manner must be regulated by the court." Judge Peters added, that the papers were all withdrawn. Mr. Lewis said, the paper was withdrawn, but the impressions remained with the jury; he, therefore, should not act. A pause then ensued for a few moments, when Judge Chase said: "You can't bring the court into difficulties, gentlemen; you do not know me if you think so." He then caused the avenue to the prisoner's bar to be cleared, and asked Fries whether he was ready for his trial, or whether he wished other counsel assigned him. Fries appeared very much alarmed, and replied, that he did not know what to do. I then informed the court that, as this was a remarkable case, I hoped the trial would be postponed until the next day, which was readily acquiesced in by the court, and Fries was remanded to prison. On the next day he was again brought to the bar, and asked whether he would have counsel assigned him; he replied with much firmness that he would look to the court to be his counsel. Judge Chase then answered: "Then by the blessing of God, the court will be your counsel, and will do you as much justice as those who were your counsel." The jury were then called, and Judge Chase took particular pains to inform Fries of his right to challenge, and that he might challenge thirty-five without showing any cause, and as many more as he could show cause against. After the jurors had been passed by Fries, Judge Chase, after asking them whether they were related to the prisoner, asked, "whether they had delivered an opinion as to the guilt of Fries, or that he ought to be punished." The first juror answered in the negative, and was sworn on the jury. The second observed, that in a conversation which he lately had, he had declared that Fries ought to be punished—he was directed by the court to be set aside. The question was then directed to be put by the clerk to each juror in this manner: "Have you formed or delivered an opinion relative to the guilt of the prisoner?" This was put to three jurors; when, by the direction of the court, it was changed, and put as follows: "Have you formed and delivered an opinion relative to the guilt of the prisoner?" Three persons answered affirmatively, and were set aside. The prisoner challenged thirty-four. Twelve jurors having been passed, were sworn. John Fries called no witnesses, but at the end of the examination of every one on the part of the prosecution, Judge Chase reminded him of his right to put questions to them; but charged him not to put any one which might criminate himself. After the evidence closed, I addressed the jury in as brief a manner as I could, consistent with my duty. The court then charged the jury, and they retired to their room, and in about half an hour returned with a verdict of "Guilty." These are the general facts which took place. If I am asked any question, I will endeavour to answer it.

Questions by Mr. Randolph: Ques. Did you hear Mr. Lewis, when he threw down the paper which was handed him, declare that his hand should not be polluted by a prejudicated opinion? Ans. I have no recollection of hearing Mr. Lewis say anything at the time. Ques. Mr. Lewis declared that he would not address the court on a question of law in a criminal case. Did you hear any opinion given by the court, which warranted Mr. Lewis in the opinion that he was to be precluded from addressing the jury on the law? Ans. The court said that they would not suffer such cases as I have mentioned to be read to the jury, to mislead them, but I did not hear the court say that the counsel should not address the jury on the law. Ques. You have stated that both the judges came to your house, soon after you returned from court the first day. Was that their place of abode? Ans. It was not. Ques. You have stated that Judge Peters declared his apprehensions that the counsel for Fries would not proceed in his defence, and that you concurred in opinion with him. Had you any reason for apprehending it but your knowledge of the independence of the bar of Philadelphia? Ans. I think I understood, from some of the gentlemen of the bar, that the counsel for Fries meant to decline acting, and I have an impression on my mind that I heard something of that kind fall from Mr. Dallas. Ques. Did you you express to the judges this knowledge? Ans. I believe I did not. Ques. Did you ever know an opinion to be given in a criminal case before counsel were heard? Ans. I never have, except so far as charges to grand juries may be termed opinions on the law. Ques. Did much conversation take place on the subject of this opinion? Ans. Situated as I was, I can't undertake to say that I had any conversation on the subject, until the court rose. Ques. Do you suppose that the conduct of the court and counsel attracted the notice of the jury? Ans. From the number of persons summoned, I conceive that a number of them knew not what was going on. Ques. From what did you infer the indignation of Mr. Lewis, if you did not hear any expressions that he used? Ans. From his countenance. Ques. Did that attract the attention of the court at the time? Ans. If they were looking at him, it must have attracted their attention. Ques. Did you hear Judge Chase say that the counsel must address themselves to the court on the questions of law? Ans. I have no recollection of hearing anything of that kind fall from Judge Chase. In criminal cases, however, there are a number of motions which must be made, exclusively to the court; such as a motion to quash an indictment.

Questions by Mr. Nicholson: Were your notes of the conversations which took place, made in the order of time in which they took place? Ans. Precisely so. Ques. What was there in Judge Chase's conversation that induced Mr. Lewis to think that he should be precluded from reading the statutes of the United States to the jury? Ans. I know not why Mr. Lewis thought so, unless from the strenuous opposition which was made to them, on the first trial of Fries, on the part of the United States. Judge Chase said, that no case could come before him on which he had not an opinion on the law. Ques. Was there anything in the conduct of the court which induced Mr. Lewis to believe that he was to be precluded from arguing the law to the jury, and caused him so often to declare, that he would not address himself to the court in a criminal case? Ans. It appeared to me to be a misapprehension of Mr. Lewis. He supposed that it was intended to withdraw the question of law from the jury, and I thought the court did not set him right as explicitly as they might have done.

Questions by Mr. Randolph: You say, Mr. Rawle, that, after the papers were called in, you entertained an anxious hope, that the counsel would be induced to proceed with the defence of the prisoner. I wish to know your reasons for having such a hope, and why you became the agent of the court? Ans. My reasons were, that I did not wish to be put in the situation in which I was afterwards placed, and in which I never wish my greatest enemy to experience the pain which I felt, that of being obliged to prosecute a man arraigned for a capital offence, and who was without the assistance of professional gentlemen. I therefore was anxious that the counsel for Fries should proceed in his defence, and save me from so painful a situation. Ques. Did you take any notes of the transactions which took place on the first day of the trial? Ans. I did not.

William Rawle cross-examined by Mr. Harper: Ques. Did Judge Chase say anything to restrict the counsel from citing any statutes of the United States? Ans. He did not, in my hearing. Ques. Did he say that he disapproved of the conduct of the court in the first trial of Fries? Ans. He did not. Ques. Have you the paper now which Judge Chase threw down? Ans. I have. (He here produced the opinion, and Mr. Harper read it to the court.) Ques. Did not the court, after the jury had returned a verdict of guilty against Fries, inform him that, if he had anything to say in arrest of judgment, he would be heard? Ans. They did, and the answer of Fries was, that he had nothing to say.

The paper containing the opinion of the court, as handed to the counsel for the defence, and referred to in the above testimony, is as follows:

The prisoner, John Fries, stands indicted for levying war against the United States. The constitutional definition of treason is a question of law. Every proposition in any statute (whether more or less distinct—whether easy or difficult to comprehend), is always a question of law. What is the true meaning and true import of the statute, and whether the case stated comes within the statute, is a question of law, and not of fact. The question on an indictment for levying war against (or adhering to the enemies of), the United States, is "whether the facts stated do not amount to levying war." It is the duty of the court in this, and in all criminal cases, to state to the jury their opinion of the law arising on the facts; but the jury are to decide on the present, and in all cases, both the law and the facts, on their consideration of the whole case. The court heard the indictment read on the arraignment of the prisoner, some days past, and just now on his trial, and they attended to the overt acts stated in the indictment. It is the opinion of the court that any insurrection or rising of any body of people, within the United States, to attain or effect, by force or violence, any object of a great public nature, or of public and general (or national) concern, is a levying war against the United States, within the contemplation and constitution of the United States. On this general position, the court are of opinion that any such insurrection or rising to resist or to prevent by force or violence, the execution of any statute of the United States for levying or collecting taxes, duties, imposts or excises; or for any other purpose (under any pretence, as that the statute was unequal, burthensome, oppressive, or unconstitutional), is a levying war against the United States within the constitution. The reason for this opinion is, that an insurrection to resist or prevent by force the execution of any statute, has a direct tendency to dissolve all the bonds of society, to destroy all order and all laws, and also all security for the lives, liberties, and property of the citizens of the United States. The court are of opinion that military weapons (as guns and swords, mentioned in the indictment), are not necessary to make such insurrection or rising amount to levying war, because numbers may supply the want of military weapons; and other instruments may effect the intended mischief. The legal guilt of levying war may be incurred without the use of military weapons, or military array. The court are of opinion that the assembling bodies of men, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner, for purposes only of a private nature, is not treason, although the judges and peace officers should be insulted or resisted, or even great outrage committed to the persons and property of our citizens. The true criterion to determine whether acts committed are a treason or a less offence (as a riot) is quo animo the people did assemble. When the intention is universal or general, as to effect some object of a general public nature, it will be treason, and cannot be considered or construed or reduced to a riot. The commission of any number of felonies, riots or other misdemeanors, cannot alter their nature, so as to make them amount to treason; and, on the other hand, if the intention and acts combined amount to treason, they cannot be sunk down to a felony or riot. The intention with which any acts (as felonies, the destruction of houses or the like) are done, will show to what class of crimes the case belongs. The court are of opinion that, if a body of people conspire and meditate an insurrection, to resist or oppose the execution of any statute of the United States by force, they are only guilty of a high misdemeanour; but if they proceed to carry such intention into execution by force, they are guilty of the treason of levying war; and the quantum of the force employed neither lessens nor increases the crime—whether by one hundred or one thousand persons, is wholly immaterial. The court are of opinion, that a combination or conspiracy to levy war against the United States is not treason, unless combined with an attempt to carry such combination or conspiracy into execution; some actual force or violence must be used in pursuance of such design to levy war, but that it is altogether immaterial whether the force used is sufficient to effectuate the object; any force connected with the intention will constitute the crime of levying war.

NOTE 2.

Proclamation.

By John Adams, President of the United States of America.

Philadelphia, May 23.

Whereas, the late wicked and treasonable insurrection against the just authority of the United States, of sundry persons in the counties of Northampton, Montgomery, and Bucks, in the state of Pennsylvania, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, having been speedily suppressed, without any of the calamities usually attending rebellion; whereupon peace, order, and submission to the laws of the United States were restored in the aforesaid counties, and the ignorant, misguided, and misinformed in the counties, have returned to a proper sense of their duty; whereby it is become unnecessary for the public good that any future prosecutions should be commenced or carried on against any person or persons, by reason of their being concerned in the said insurrection:—wherefore be it known, that I, John Adams, president of the United States of America, have granted, and by these presents do grant, a full, free, and absolute pardon, to all and every person or persons concerned in the said insurrection, excepting as hereinafter excepted, of all treasons, misprisions of treason, felonies, misdemeanours, and other crimes by them respectively done or committed against the United States; in either of the said counties, before the twelfth day of March, in the year 1799; excepting and excluding therefrom every person who now standeth indicted or convicted of any treason, misprision of treason, or other offence against the United States; whereby remedying and releasing unto all persons, except as before excepted, all pains and penalties incurred or supposed to be incurred for or on account of the promises. Given under my hand, and the seal of the United States of America, at the city of Philadelphia, this twenty-first day of May, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred, and of the independence of the said States the twenty-fourth.

John Adams.

This paper, which was followed by the pardon of Fries himself, was the cause of much dissension in Mr. Adams' cabinet, and among his immediate supporters. The petitions on which it rested are as follows:

Petition of John Fries.

To the President of the United States:

The petition of John Fries respectfully showeth:—That your prisoner is one of those deluded and unfortunate men, who at the circuit court of this district, have been convicted of treason against the United States, for which offence he is now under sentence of death. In this awful situation, impressed with a just sense of the crime which he has committed, and with the sincerity of a penitent offender, he entreats mercy and pardon from him on whose determination rests the fate of an unfortunate man. He solicits the interference of the president to save him from an ignominious death, and to rescue a large and hitherto happy family, from future misery and ruin. If the prayer of his petition should be granted, he will show by a future course of good conduct, his gratitude to his offended country, by a steady and active support of that excellent constitution and laws which it has been his misfortune to violate and oppose.

John Fries.

Philadelphia Prison, May, 1800.

The subscribers most respectfully recommend the petitioner to the president of the United States. They are warmly attached to the constitution and laws of their country, which they will, on every occasion, and at every hazard, manifest their zeal to defend and support. But when they reflect on the ignorance, the delusion, and the penitence of the persons involved in the late insurrection, their pity supersedes every vindictive sentiment, and they sincerely think that an exercise of mercy will have a more salutary effect than the punishment of the convicts. It is on this ground that the subscribers, knowing the humanity as well as the fortitude of the president, venture to claim his attention on the present awful occasion, in favour of the wretched father of a numerous family.

The views of Mr. Adams at the outset may be gathered from the following letters:

Mr. Adams to Mr. Wolcott.

Quincy, April 26, 1799.

If a real reformation should take place in Northampton county, in consequence of a conscientious conviction of their error and crime, it would be happy; but a cessation of opposition from fear only, may last no longer than the terror.

I am, sir, your most obedient, John Adams.

Mr. Wolcott to Mr. Adams.

Phila., May 11th, 1799.

After a very laboured trial, Fries, who led the armed party at Bethlehem, has been convicted of treason. He continued tranquil until the verdict of the jury was returned, when and since he has been much affected. His composure during trial was not owing to stupidity, for though an illiterate man, he is not deficient in sagacity. He confidently expected to be acquitted, and his hopes are supposed to have been founded on the opinion of Mr. Lewis, who, on all occasions, since the commencement of the trial, has declared that the offence did not amount to treason. Both of the judges were decided in their definitions of the crime, and the evidence was complete, both as to the acts done, and of the intention to prevent the execution of the law. It is admitted on all hands, that the trial has been fair and impartial; the jury was respectable, and two of them were persons, upon the bias of whose political sentiments, calculations favourable to the prisoners were made. The jury received the charge at about six o'clock in the evening, when the court adjourned till ten. At the time appointed the verdict was returned—guilty. I am told this morning of a circumstance which proves that the jury were governed by humane, delicate, and honorable sentiments. When they retired, it was agreed that without previous argument among themselves, the opinion of each person should be given by ballot. By this trial it was found that the jury were unanimous.

Mr. Adams to Mr. Wolcott.

Quincy, May 17, 1799.

I thank you, sir, for the favour of the 11th, which I received last night. The termination of the trial of Fries, is an important, an interesting, and an affecting event. I am unable to conjecture the grounds of Mr. Lewis' opinion, and wish I had a sketch of them. Is Fries a native or a foreigner? Is he a man of property and independent, or is he in debt? What has been his previous life? industrious or idle, sober or intemperate? It is of importance to discover, if possible, the great men alluded to by Fries in his observation to Mr. Wood, as at the bottom of the business, and the evidence of any agitator among the insurgents ought to be collected. It is of moment, also, to ascertain whether the insurgents had any general views, or extensive communications with others of similar dispositions in other counties, or correspondences with other states. We ought also to inquire whether Fries is the most culpable among the guilty, if that can be known. It highly concerns the people of the United States and especially the Federal government, that in the whole progress and ultimate conclusion of this affair, neither humanity be unnecessarily afflicted, nor public justice essentially violated, nor the public safety endangered.

I have the honour to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant, John Adams.

Mr. Hamilton, in his letter on the public conduct of Mr. Adams, p. 41, in treating of the pardon, says:—

"The last material occurrence in the administration of Mr. Adams of which I shall take notice, is the pardon of Fries, and other principals in the late insurrection in Pennsylvania. It is a fact, that a very refractory spirit has long existed in the western counties of that state. Repeatedly, have its own laws been opposed with violence, and as often, according to my information, with impunity. It is also a fact which everybody knows, that the laws of the Union, in the vital article of revenue, have been twice resisted in the same state, by combinations so extensive and under circumstances so violent, as to have called for the employment of military force, once under the former president, and once under the actual president; which, together, cost the United States nearly a million and a half of dollars. In the first instance it happened, that by the early submission of most of the leaders upon an invitation of the government, few offenders of any consequence remained subject to prosecution. Of these, either from the humanity of the jurors or some deficiency in the evidence, not one was capitally convicted. Two poor wretches only were sentenced to die, one of them little short of an idiot, the other, a miserable fellow in the hindmost train of rebellion; both, being so insignificant in all respects, that after the lenity shown to the chiefs, justice would have worn the mien of ferocity, if she had raised her arm against them. The sentiment that their punishment ought to be remitted was universal; and the president, yielding to the special considerations, granted them pardons. In the last instance, some of the most important of the offenders were capitally convicted, one of them, by the verdict of two successive juries. The general opinion of the friends of the government demanded an example, as indispensable to its security. The opinion was well founded. Two insurrections in the same state, the one upon the heels of the other, demonstrated a spirit of insubordination or disaffection which required a strong corrective. It is a disagreeable fact, forming a weighty argument in the question, that a large part of the population of Pennsylvania, is of a composition which peculiarly fits it for the intrigues of factious men, who may desire to disturb or overthrow the government. And it is an equally disagreeable fact, that disaffection to the national government is in no other state more general, more deeply rooted, or more envenomed. The late Governor Mifflin himself informed me that, in the first case, insurrection had been organized, down to the very liberties of Philadelphia, and that, had not the governor anticipated it, a general explosion would speedily have ensued. It ought to be added, that the impunity so often experienced, had made it an article in the creed of those, who were actuated by the insurgent spirit, that neither the general not the state government dared to inflict capital punishment. To destroy this persuasion, to repress this dangerous spirit, it was essential that a salutary rigour should have been exerted, and that those who were under the influence of the one and the other, should be taught that they were the dupes of a fatal illusion. Of this Mr. Adams appeared so sensible, that while the trials were pending, he more than once imprudently threw out, that the accused must found their hopes of escape, either in their innocence, or in the lenity of the juries; since from him, in case of conviction, they would have nothing to expect. And, a very short time before he pardoned them, he declared (of these two facts, my evidence is inferior to that which supports the other allegation of this letter, yet it is so strong that I feel myself warranted to state them), with no small ostentation, that the mistaken clemency of Washington on the former occasion, had been the cause of the second insurrection, and that he would take care there should not be a third, by giving the laws their full course against the convicted offenders. Yet he thought proper, as if distrusting the courts and officers of the United States, to resort, through the attorney general, to the counsel of the culprits, for a statement of their cases; in which was found, besides some objections of form, the novel doctrine, disavowed by every page of our law books, that treason does no consist of resistance by force to a public law, unless it be an act relative to the militia, or other military force. And upon this, or some other ground not easy to be comprehended, he of a sudden departed from all his former declarations, and against the unanimous advice of his ministers, with the attorney general, came to the resolution, which he executed, of pardoning all those which had received sentence of death. No wonder that the public was thunder-struck at such a result, that the friends of government regarded it as a virtual dereliction; it was impossible to commit a greater error. The particular situation of Pennsylvania, the singular posture of human affairs, in which there is so strong a tendency to the disorganization of the government, the turbulent and malignant humours which exist, and are so industriously nourished throughout the United States; everything loudly demanded that the executive should have acted with exemplary vigour, and should have given a striking demonstration, that condign punishment would be the lot of the violent opposers of the laws. The contrary course, which was pursued, is the most inexplicable part of Mr. Adams' conduct. It shows him so much at variance with himself, as well as with sound policy, that we are driven to seek a solution for it in some system of concession to his political enemies; a system the most fatal for himself and for the cause of public order, of any that he could possibly devise. It is by temporizings like these, that men at the head of affairs, lose the respect both of friends and foes; it is by temporizings like these, that in times of fermentation and commotion, governments are prostrated, which might easily have been upheld by an erect and imposing attitude."

"The conduct of the president," (in reply to this it is urged in an answer to Mr. Hamilton's letter by "A Citizen of New York," p. 25,) "in the pardoning of Fries and others, is truly meritorious. Notwithstanding the censure that his enemies have issued against him, he exercised a prerogative of mercy, and restored a number of unfortunate victims to their families, their friends, and the world. Public indignation would have been aroused by their execution, and consequences of an alarming nature would have ensued, in which even government itself would have received a wound. The genius of a republic is mildness; the wheel, the gibbet, the guillotine, may answer an advantage under the reign of terror; but with freemen they are objects of horror and detestation. They suit the calamitous reign of a Caligula, and not the enlightened period in which you demand their exercise. Recollect, sir, that this manly resistance to these laws, originated in a persuasion that they operated unequally, and plundered the public indirectly; that excisemen and public officers consumed the greatest portion of a tax that was collected by threats, by insults, and oppression; a tax that exposed the circumstances of men by daily visitations and nocturnal searches: a tax that has emanated from the criminal sentiment, that there is a swinish multitude who must be governed by deception; and who would raise up their heads against direct application. The public mind, at the time of resistance to the tax, was extremely agitated: it was penetrated with a sense of its injustice and the extent of its oppression. The military that was raised on that occasion, was in tenfold adequate to suppress the insurrection. On their approach to East Town disaffection was gone, and only a few scattered individuals could be seized as the violaters of the laws. The return of the military was attended with circumstances of disgrace, that will only be recorded in the pages of infamy and crimes. Every place they halted at some act of madness, licentiousness, or folly was perpetrated, to the lasting dishonour of the citizen soldier. Did the pardon of Mr. Adams, under the considerations that have been mentioned, seem like a concession to his political enemies? Can that be deemed a temporizing spirit which is regulated by justice and tempered by an amiable clemency? Could he lose any respect as executive magistrate, with discerning friends or the warmest enemies, by one of the most agreeable features of the administration? That he was at variance with himself as well as with sound policy, is, perhaps, no more than the vagrant sentiment of a sanguinary bosom and a disappointed enemy. Cruel measures are often ruinous, and a government is never better established, than when supported by the enlightened will of a country. Barbarity awakens enemies, mercy inspires friendship and ameliorates the heart. That insurrection has been organized down to the very liberties of Philadelphia, is the suggestion of guilty apprehension, or the extravagant sentiment of a disordered imagination. That Mifflin could have advanced such an opinion, will not, cannot be credited; but the dead can be quoted to justify a falsehood, whilst the living, to answer certain purposes, may injure their memory."

"I have one more case to mention, on which I shall be sparing of comments, and content myself with a brief statement of facts: it is the case of Fries of Pennsylvania, while convicted of treason, the second time, on a new trial, ordered on a supposed incorrectness discovered after the first conviction, and allowed by the court, though not affecting the facts on which the prosecution had taken place, nor the construction of the law applied to the facts; in other words, not affecting the merits of the case. Judge Iredell, of the supreme court of the United States, presided on the first trial, and was assisted by Judge Peters, the district judge of Pennsylvania. On the second trial Judge Chase presided, and Judge Peters sat with him. The first trial had occupied nine days. Judge Chase considered, that much irrelevant matter had been suffered to be introduced in the first trial, in respect to cases in English books, occurring in times and under circumstances which rendered them inadmissible on trials for treason under the constitution of the United States; and made known this opinion in writing, that such cases would not be permitted to be introduced in the trial of Fries. Upon this, William Lewis and A. J. Dallas, of counsel for Fries, refused to act; and advised Fries not to accept of any other counsel, should the court offer to assign any; which advice Fries accepted. On the 24th of April, 1800, the trial commenced. On the evening of the second day, the evidence was closed; and the court charged the jury; who, retiring for two hours, brought in a verdict of guilty. On the second day of May, (the last day of the session,) Fries was brought into court and received sentence of death. Mr. Lewis, in his deposition (to be used on the impeachment of Judge Chase), states, that, soon after sentence of death had been pronounced on Fries, Thomas Adams, son of the president, told him, that 'his father wished to know the points and authorities which Mr. Dallas and he had intended to rely on, in favour of Fries, if they had defended him on the trial. The attorney-general of the United States, Charles Lee, made the like request to Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas. These gentlemen made their statement accordingly, and sent it to Mr. Lee; who, on the 19th of May, acknowledged the receipt of it, and informed them that he had immediately laid the same before the president, who directed him to return to them his thanks for the trouble they had so obligingly taken.' It would not have been difficult to anticipate the consequence of consulting, in this case, only the counsel of the convict: Fries was pardoned. It was a popular act in Pennsylvania. My removal from office was on the 12th of the same month of May, as I have already stated, with its motives. I content myself with just remarking, that Mr. Adams sought not any information in this case from the persons best qualified to give it impartially—the judges of the court; especially when the presiding judge was Samuel Chase, his old congressional friend, of whom he gives this honourable character: 'I have long wished for a fair opportunity of transmitting to posterity my humble testimony to the virtues and talents of that able and upright magistrate and stateman.' Nor would it have been amiss to have applied to William Rawle, district attorney of Pennsylvania, who had conducted both the trials, and from whose fair mind might have been expected information quite as correct as that which could be derived from the counsel of the convict. But if to pardon was the object, it was expedient to consult the counsel only. Mr. Dallas in his deposition (also taken in the case of the impeachment of Judge Chase) avowed the leading motive with him and Mr. Lewis, in eventually refusing to act as counsel for Fries. He says, 'I may be permitted, likewise, to discharge a duty to the counsel, as well as to all the parties interested, in observing, that Mr. Lewis and myself were greatly influenced, in the conduct which we pursued, by our opinion of the means most likely to save the life of Fries, under all the circumstances of the case.' Judge Chase says, they refused to appear for Fries, 'because they knew the law and the fact to be against them, and the case to be desperate: and supposed that their withdrawing themselves, (under the circumstances above intimated,) in the event of a conviction, which from their knowledge of the law and the facts they knew to be almost certain, might aid the prisoner in an application to the president for a pardon.' General Hamilton (in the letter of 1800, on the conduct and character of Mr. Adams), noticing this case of Fries, and the extraordinary step of consulting only the culprit's counsel, makes this reflection on the pardon: 'We are driven to seek a solution for it in some system of concession to his political enemies; a system the most fatal for himself, and for the cause of public order, of any that he could possibly devise. It is by temporizings like these, that in times of fermentation and commotion, governments are prostrated, which might easily have been upheld by an erect and imposing attitude.' The reflections of Mr. Adams are of quite a different complexion. In his tenth letter in the Boston Patriot (May 17, 1809), remarking on his responsibility for all his executive acts, and, therefore, that it was his right and duty to be governed by his own mature and unbiased judgment, though unfortunately it may be in direct contradiction to the advice of all his ministers, he says, 'This was my situation in more than one instance. It had been so in the nomination of Mr. Gerry; it was afterwards so in the pardon of Fries; two measures that I recollect with infinite satisfaction, and which will console me in my last hour.' How much cause for satisfaction and consolation in the case of Mr. Gerry, the reader will be able to judge, from the proceedings exhibited in this review of that gentlemen as Mr. Adams's minister to the French republic. As to Fries, he having been at the head of a second insurrection in Pennsylvania, to prevent, by force, the execution of the laws enacted by congress for levying taxes laid in pursuance of the express provisions of the constitution, and, in 1798, of the most pressing necessity, for the common defence of the country, and the protection of its great and essential commercial interests, against the hostilities of the French republic; under these circumstances, the public welfare appeared to demand a signal example of inflexible justice. We see, however, that in various acts of President Adams, combined with their apparent motives, he can glory, and draw consolation, where other men would find cause only for profound regret."

The letter from Mr. Lewis and Mr. Dallas, on the grounds on which a new trial was asked for, I have obtained in manuscript from the papers of the late Mr. Rawle:

Sir: In compliance with your request, we shall now proceed, briefly, to communicate the points and authorities, which we intended to urge in the case of the United States against Fries, if the conduct of the court had not, unexpectedly, deprived us of every hope of success from these means of defence. It may be proper to premise that on the morning appointed for the trial, the presiding judge, in the presence of the prisoner, the jury, and a numerous audience, delivered to the clerk a paper which, he said, contained the opinions of the court, formed, after mature deliberation, upon the law of treason: directed copies of the paper to be given to the attorney of the district and the prisoner's counsel; and declared his intention to present a copy of it to the jury, as soon as the case was opened on the part of the United States. He referred, likewise, in terms of disapprobation, to the arguments which (as he was informed) had been used in favour of the prisoner on the former trial, and announced a determination to prevent his counsel from citing any authorities at common law, or, indeed, any authorities prior to the English revolution. The cause thus prejudged; the province of the advocate thus circumscribed; and the minds of the jury thus prejudiced; we deemed it a duty we owed to the prisoner, to the public, and to ourselves, to surrender the task, which the court had previously assigned to us; for, as there existed no controversy in relation to the facts, and as the jury would naturally rely on the judgment of the court in relation to the law, we had not the vanity to suppose, that any effort, on our part, could do more than give to the trial the form and ceremony of defence; while our acquiescence might afford some sanction to the establishment of a precedent, hostile to the rights of the citizens, ruinous to the trial by jury, and degrading to the character of the profession. The candour and humanity which have induced you to interpose in the present mode, have also, however, influenced our decision; and if you will allow for the different effect of arguments publicly delivered before a jury entitled, in a capital case, to decide both on the law and the fact (with whom even a doubt would lead to an acquittal), we confidently offer for your consideration the following general positions: I. That there has been a mis-trial. II. That offence charged is not treason. III. That a new trial ought to have been awarded.

I. That there has been a mis-trial:—1. By the judiciary act it is declared "that in all cases punishable with death, the trial shall be had in the county where the offence was committed, or where that cannot be done without great inconvenience, twelve petit jurors at least shall be summoned from thence." 1 Stat. (Swift's Ed.) p. 67, § 29. 2. The offence was committed by Fries in the county of Northampton, but his trial was in the county of Philadelphia. 3. The language of the act is mandatory "the trial shall be had in the county where the offence was committed;" and some "great inconvenience" must appear judicially to the court, before they can exercise a discretion of ordering a trial in any other county. No such inconvenience was suggested on the record or even stated at the bar; if it existed in the present instance, it must forever exist in all future cases and the law be rendered altogether void. 4. It is true that an ineffectual motion was made on the first trial to change the place of trial; but it was overruled on grounds which have no application to the second trial: For—1st. There was no inconvenience owing to the riotous state of the county of Northampton, at the time of the second trial. U. S. v. Insurgents [Case No. 15,442]. 2d. And the court (being bound to notice everything that was essential to an exercise of jurisdiction) might have ordered the trial in the proper county before it was commenced in Philadelphia, by the finding of a new indictment, a nol. pros. having been entered on the old one. 5. For any mis-trial, on account of jury process, or on any other account, the verdict must be set aside. 6 Coke, 146; Hawk, P. C., bk. 2, c. 47, § 11; Id. bk. 2, c. 27, § 108.

II. That the offence charged is not treason. 1. The constitution defines treason to be "levying war against the United States," &c., and the act of congress inflicts the punishment of death on the person convicted of the crime. 1 Stat. p. 16; Const. art. 3, § 3; Id. 100, § 1. 2. As the spirit of the constitution is opposed to implied powers, and constructive expositions, we are bound to take the plain manifest meaning of the words of the definition, independent of any glossary which the English courts, or writers, may have affixed to the words of the English statute. 3. The plain, manifest meaning then, is "A forcible opposition to the powers of the government, with the intent to subdue and overthrow it." 4. This meaning may embrace a forcible attack upon the legislature (or perhaps any other principal department) to compel the repeal of a law. 5. But it does not embrace the case of an opposition to the execution of a particular law. 6. It seems, indeed, upon principle, to be a confusion of crimes to include in the same class, a forcible attempt to subvert and overthrow the power of government, and a mere resistance of subordinate agents, in carrying a particular law or regulation into effect. 1 Hale, P. C. 146; Fost. 219. 7. If Fries and his companions had opposed in arms, the troops that were sent against them, it would clearly have been an act of treason: but in the conduct which they pursued, we can only perceive sedition, riot and rescue. 8. Such, likewise, has been the legislative construction and discrimination between the cases; for, unquestionably, the penal law and sedition act, define and punish the offences committed by Fries and his companions, as distinct from the offence of treason; and when an offence is classed under a particular head in the penal code, it is inconsistent to search for it, and furnish it under another head. 1 Hale, P. C. 146; Fost. 200, 201; Keilw. 75. 9. But even if the English decisions, and writers, are considered as giving a construction for our use, to the same words employed in the statute of Edward III. they do not extend so far as to pronounce an opposition to the execution of a particular law to be treason, by levying war. 10. At common law there is not a single case, or dictum to support such a doctrine; though, indeed, in the reign of Henry VIII. rescue was made treason by a statute, which was afterwards repealed. 11. Under the statute of Edward III. there have been many wild constructive treasons by levying war; of which Coke, Hale and Blackstone solemnly complain; but none, even in the bad times of judicial history of England, have gone so far as the present case. 4 Bl. Comm. 69, 75, 88. 12. We cannot trace a single instance of a riot in opposition to the execution of a particular law, being prosecuted as treason in England, though the history of that nation abounds with such insurrections. 1 Hale, P. C. 132; Id. 133, 134; Fost. 254-258; 3 Inst. 22, 23. 13. The constructive cases in England, turn upon universality of object, in opposition to the power of the government. The case of ——— v. ———, 4 State Tr. 844, 900, was decided on that ground; for, if the rising had been to suppress all bawdy houses, it would have been equally with the principle, as the rising to suppress all meeting houses. So, a rising to alter or reform religion, which can only be done by force or the legislature, is treason. But Lord George Gordon's trial and acquittal, established the doctrine for which we contend. It is true, Lord Mansfield there declares an opposition to militia law to be treason. But we apprehend the reason of this is, because, in effect it is the same to oppose the militia, or the execution of the militia law, as to oppose the regular forces, which has always been held to be treason, and the expression used by Lord Mansfield is confined to an opposition to the execution of this particular kind of law, and does not extend to any other, as would, we think, have been the case, had the rule been the same in other cases. 4 Bl. Comm. 81; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 17, § 28.

III. That a new trial ought to have been awarded. 1. After the jury were sworn, and the evidence partly given, one of the jury separated from his brethren, and slept at his own lodgings. Affidavit of Mr. Barnet. 2. During this separation, he conversed with one person on the subject of the trial, "declaring that the evidence of a certain witness went hard against the prisoner;" and being told by another person, that "he supposed the evidence would go hard against Fries." Affidavit of Isaac Roush. 3. Hence, in the contemplation of the law, he was committed by an expression of his own opinion, and influenced by the expression of the opinion of another. 4. The law and practice of Pennsylvania, (in the federal as well as the state courts,) have uniformly opposed the separation of the jury in a capital case, though necessity has compelled an adjournment of the court. 5. The law of England is peremptory, that a jury in a capital case cannot be discharged without giving a verdict, and that they cannot give a privy verdict. From Fost. 25, § 28, it appears that the meaning of the expression "can't be discharged" is, that the jury can't be permitted to separate, and the reason why a privy verdict cannot be received in a capital case, is for fear of tampering, and corruption, which is much stronger than the case of separating before they have agreed. Co. Litt. 227; Hawk. bk. 2, c. 47, §§ 1, 2; 4 Bl. Comm. 360; 2 Strange, 984. 6. It is true, that in civil cases, a separating works only a punishment of the delinquent juror; and in misdemeanors, the rule is not strictly enforced, though an able counsel has given a formal opinion, that the separation would be a mis-trial even in a misdemeanour. Barnes Notes Cas. 441; Canning's Case, 10 State Tr. (Harg. Ed.) 407 (n). 7. The cases put by Hale, will be found to admit of a clear explanation, consistent with present position. 1st. The first case is not stated to have been a capital one, and if it was a capital one, the jury was discharged in consequence of the separation and a new jury sworn. 2 Hale, 295. 2d. The second is either a case of misdemeanour or a trespass; and the whole proceeding was matter of consent. Id. 296. 8. But the law has been adjudged. On the question, "whether after a prisoner is upon his trial, and the evidence of the prosecution is given, the jury may separate for a time, which is the consequence of an adjournment to another day," the judges of England were decidedly in the negative. Lord Delamere's Case, 4 State Tr. (Harg. Ed.) 232; 3 Inst. 30. 9. And on the principle of this decision, the lord high steward declared that a verdict and judgment given after such separation would be erroneous, and liable to be reversed. 10. This remained the law of the land, so that there could be neither an adjournment of the court, nor a separation of the jury, in a capital case, till the late trials of Hardy, Tooke, &c. But the alteration then introduced was limited by the necessity that called for it—to an adjournment of the court, not extended to a separation of the jury. Accordingly, in none of the instances did the jury separate.

We are, sir, your most obedient humble servants.

[Signed,] Wm. Lewis.
A. J. Dallas.

The reception by the president of this memorial, is thus treated by Mr. Pickering in a letter to Mr. Wolcott, dated, Philadelphia, June 24, 1800.

In conversation, lately, with Mr. Liston, the pardoning of the three persons, Fries, Gettman and Hainey, Northampton insurgents, convicted of treason, and sentenced to be hanged, was mentioned, and the extraordinary measure of the president, in consulting Mr. Lewis and Mr.

Dallas, the prisoner's counsel, instead of the judges, to get information, either as to the law or the facts in the case; and, that Lewis and Dallas gave their statement and opinion in writing, expressing it to be done at the request of the president. "Yes," said Mr. Liston, "Mr. Dallas showed me their letter to the president;" and then spoke of its contents, mentioning the opinion of those gentlemen to the best of my recollection, that the acts of those insurgents amounted to sedition, but not to treason. But the fact of Mr. Dallas' showing the letter to Mr. Liston, was the principal and only thing you desired me to state, and of that I am certain.

With sincere respect and esteem, &c., T. Pickering.

In connection with Fries, a series of parties, supposed to be his confederates, were indicted, several for treason, and the remainder for misdemeanours in obstructing the course of justice. All were ultimately pardoned.

Fries, it is said, opened a tin-ware store in Phidadelphia, where, profiting by the custom his notoriety drew to him, he acquired a respectable fortune, and a respectable character. See Sawyer's Life of Randolph, 19.

FRINK v. PETRY et al.

[11 Blatchf. 422; 1 Ban. and A. 1. 5 O. G. 201; Merw. Pat. Inv. 142.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 27, 1874.

PATENTS—REFLECTOR FOR GAS-LIGHTS—INFRINGEMENT—CONSTRUCTION OF CLAIM—NOVELTY.

1. The first claim of reissued letters patent, No. 3826, granted to Isaac P. Frink, February 8th, 1870, the original letters patent having been granted to him, as inventor, April 17th, 1860, for an "improved reflector for gas-lights," namely, "In a reflector in which the illuminating rays are thrown down below the source from which they proceed, a reflecting surface, or series of reflecting surfaces, as set forth, lined, covered, coated or plated with either plain, corrugated or figured glass, in combination with another reflecting surface placed above or over the first surface, when suitable space is provided between the upper and lower surfaces for the passage of air and for ventilation, substantially as described," is infringed by a reflector in which the upper reflecting surface is of a black color and which has all the features of said claim.

2. The second claim of reissued letters patent, No. 3827, granted to Isaac P. Frink, February 8th, 1870, on the surrender of the before named original letters patent, namely, "The combination with the metallic body of a reflector, of a glass covering or lining therefor, applied in sections or panels, substantially as and for the purposes described," is infringed by a reflector in which there is a silvery coating on the outer surface of the glass, the inner surface of such coating acting as a reflecting surface, and the inner surface of the metallic body of the reflector having no capacity as a reflecting surface, and large parts of the metallic body of the reflector exterior to the glass being cut away, and the exterior surface of such silvery coating being covered with paint.

3. The said second claim of No. 3827 does not claim the use of glass in sections, in any and all reflectors, but claims a glass covering or lining for the metallic body of a reflector, applied in sections or panels, and combined with such metallic body, substantially as and for the purposes described. This means, the metallic body of such a reflector as is described and shown in the drawings—a reflector in which the illuminating rays are thrown down beneath the flame or source from which they proceed, and which has a metallic body, and in which such metallic body is lined or covered on the inside with glass, so that there is no intercepting of any of the rays of light by any part of the metallic body, in contradistinction to having part of the metallic body inside of the glass, so that such intercepting of rays of light is produced, and which is capable of having the glass lining to the metallic body applied by moulding or blowing the glass, if it be not attached in sections or panels, and which is manipulated and handled as a unit, and is supported and kept in position from above and not from below.

4. Although a reflector may have existed before, embodying all the features specified in the first claim of No. 3826, except the one of a glass lining to the reflecting surface or surfaces, yet, the employment of the glass, in the entire arrangement, being new, and being useful both in increasing the reflection of the light and in preventing the reflecting surface behind the glass from being scratched or tarnished, the entire arrangement in such first claim is patentable, all the features embodied in it having a mutual relation and interdependence, which make them patentable, as a whole. The claims above mentioned are new and valid.

5. Circumstances considered as bearing on the question of the prior existence of an alleged prior invention, such as, the failure of the alleged prior inventor to apply for a patent for it, when he was applying for a patent for kindred inventions.

[This was a bill in equity by Isaac P. Frink against George Petry and others, and is heard on motion for the dissolution of an injunction.]

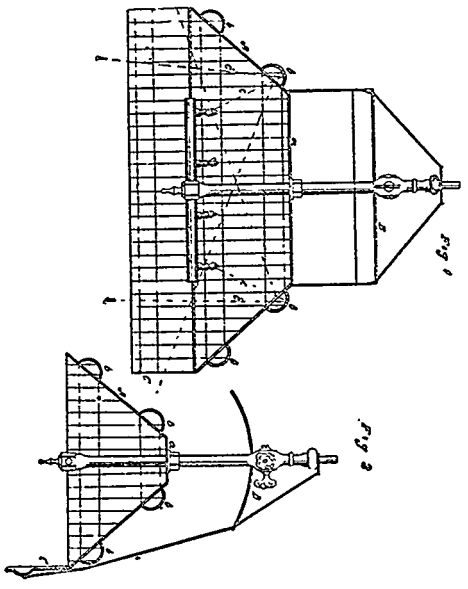
Edwin W. Stoughton and Miles B. Andrus, for plaintiff.

Samuel S. Fisher, Samuel A. Duncan, Frederic H. Betts, Solomon J. Gordon, and Daniel S. Riddle, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In August, 1873, a preliminary injunction was granted in this case, restraining the defendants from making, using or selling any reflectors containing the improvement claimed in the first claim of reissued letters patent granted to the plaintiff February 8th, 1870, and numbered 3826, or the improvement claimed in the second claim of reissued letters patent granted to the plaintiff February 8th, 1870, and numbered 3827. The original letters patent were granted to the plaintiff, as inventor, April 17th, 1860, for an "improved reflector for gas-lights." They were reissued to him December 24th, 1861, and again reissued to him, in two divisions, February 8th, 1870, Division A being numbered 3826, and Division B being numbered 3827.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge; reprinted in 1 Ban. & A. 1; and here republished by permission. Merw. Pat. Inv. 142, contains only a partial report.]

[Drawings of patent No. 3826, published from the records of the United States patent office.]



No. 3826 contains a drawing of two figures. Figure 1 is a longitudinal vertical section of one of the improved reflectors, showing a gas-pipe and burners in elevation. Figure 2 is an end or side transverse section of the same reflector, taken at right angles to figure 1. The specification says: "This improved reflector is designed for use in store windows, public buildings, halls, railroad- and ferry- or steamboat-stations, churches, theatres, and all other places in which the space to be lighted is large, and in which the light is required to be thrown down below the burner or burners whence it proceeds, and to be widely diffused in all directions. To this end my invention consists in the employment, in reflectors in which the illuminating rays are thrown down below the source from whence they proceed, of a reflecting surface, or series of reflecting surfaces, arranged as hereinafter described, lined, covered, coated or plated, with either plain, corrugated or figured glass, in combination with another reflecting surface placed above or over the first surface, with suitable space for the passage of air, and for ventilation, between the surfaces. In the example of my improvement illustrated in the drawing, A represents the body of the reflector, which may be made of tinned sheet iron, or of any other suitable material. It is lined or covered on the inside with glass, which may be either corrugated, or plain, or figured, on its surface. In the reflector represented it is corrugated, which is the mode in which I prefer to construct it, for the reason that the corrugations, especially when they run up and down the glass, as shown, instead of horizontally on it, enable the illuminating rays to be very widely and abundantly diffused, so that a reflector provided with glass having such a surface will light up a much larger space than when the corrugations are not employed. This glass lining or covering constitutes the lower or first reflecting surface of my improvement, and it may be composed of a series of surfaces, as x, x, x, Fig. 2, extending horizontally around the inside of the body of the reflector. It will be seen that the body of the reflector shown in the drawing is that of a rectangular truncated pyramid. This form is especially intended for use in store windows, and constitutes the subject of separate letters patent issued to me, of even date herewith; but, any desired contour, whether circular, conical or polygonal, may be given to the reflector, as its shape, as it is here described and claimed, is not material, and is designed to be varied to suit the particular situation in which it is placed, or the special purpose for which it is employed. In the upper part of the body of the reflector, an aperture or opening, a, is made, which serves to provide the necessary passage for air through the reflector; but, as some of the rays of light pass through this opening, I combine with the body, A, which constitutes the first surface or series of surfaces of the reflector, a second reflecting surface, shown at B, which is placed above the body, and intercepts and throws down nearly all the rays which would otherwise escape being reflected by the body, A, and would thereby fail of producing the best effect. This second reflecting surface may be secured in position in any desired way, but it will be found convenient to suspend it by chains, wires or cords from a support attached to the gas tube, as shown in the drawing. The distance at which it should be located above the body or lower reflecting surface, A, will depend upon the dimensions of the opening, a, and upon the effect which it is desired the light shall produce. The relative distance illustrated in the drawing will, however, be found to answer well in practice. The outline of this upper reflecting surface is not material, as it may be flat or curved. It is represented in the drawing as curved, and I prefer that it should be so, because, when it is, it will better reflect the rays of light through the opening, a, thereby increasing the illumination below the reflector." The first claim is in these words: "1. In a reflector in which the illuminating rays are thrown down below the source from which they proceed, a reflecting surface, or series of reflecting surfaces, as set forth, lined, covered, coated or plated with either plain, corrugated or figured glass, in combination with another reflecting surface placed above or over the first surface, when suitable space is provided between the upper and lower surfaces for the passage of air and for ventilation, substantially as described."

No. 3827 contains a drawing of three figures, figures 1 and 2 being severally the same as figures 1 and 2 in the drawing of No. 3826. The specification says: "In reissued letters patent bearing even date herewith, I have described and claimed several improvements made by me in reflectors of that class in which the illuminating rays are thrown down beneath the flame or source from which they proceed; and the invention here patented consists of a special form and mode of construction of reflectors of this class, which are designed for certain particular uses, such, for example, as the windows of stores, or for picture galleries and other situations in which the reflector is required to be of considerable length. In the drawing, A represents the body of the reflector, which may be made of tinned sheet iron, or of any other suitable substance. It should be lined or covered on the inside with glass or other diaphanous material, which may be either corrugated, or plain, or figured on its surface, though it is represented in the drawing as corrugated, which is the mode in which I prefer to construct it. The form of the body of the reflector is that of an oblong truncated pyramid, the sides of which should preferably incline in an angle of about forty-five degrees, and an aperture or open space, a, is provided in the top, to furnish the requisite draft to the flame and to permit of ventilation. The sides of the reflector may be perfect planes, or they may be concave on their inner surface, if desired. * * * The object of the lining of glass or other equivalent material is to increase the reflection of the light, and to prevent the metallic surface of the reflector from becoming scratched or tarnished, which would greatly impair, if not destroy, its reflecting power. It will be observed, by inspecting the drawing, Fig. 3, that the glass which constitutes the lining or covering of the reflector is made and attached in several strips, sections or panels, x, x, x, throughout the area of the inner surface of the reflector, instead of being applied by moulding or blowing the glass to correspond in figure with that of the reflector. This method of construction answers a very important purpose, inasmuch as, if the glass lining was put on in a single piece, by being moulded or blown to fit the reflector, great difficulty would be found in fitting it with sufficient accuracy and tightness, especially if the reflector be large, and skilful and expensive labor would be required for the work; and, when fitted, the glass would not have proper freedom to expand and contract without danger of breaking it, which would make the reflector nearly or quite worthless; and it would render the reflector, especially if it be large, so stiff and rigid that it could not be handled or transported without great liability to break or crack the glass. But, by my mode of inserting the glass in sections or panels, these evils are avoided, the different sections or panels can be rapidly put in place and secured, the requisite expansion and contraction provided for, and, if any of the sections or panels break, they can at once be easily and cheaply replaced by others, while the reflector is rendered so yielding, and so free from undue rigidity, that it can be moved or handled without any danger of cracking the glass." The second claim is in these words: "2. The combination with the metallic body of a reflector, of a glass covering or lining therefor, applied in sections or panels, substantially as and for the purposes described."

The defendants now move for the dissolution of the injunction.

Reissued patent No. 3826 first came before me in September, 1870, in a suit in equity brought thereon by the plaintiff against Charles F. Jacobsen and Charles E. Mabie, on a motion for a preliminary injunction. The decision I arrived at was, that the case on the part of the plaintiff was not so entirely free from doubt as to warrant the granting of the injunction, but that it was so strong as to require the entry of an order directing the defendants to file periodical accounts, under oath, of their sales or deliveries of the articles alleged to infringe the plaintiff's patent, and also to file a bond with sureties to respond for a recovery in the suit. An order to that effect was entered, and it directed that an injunction should issue on the first claim of No. 3826, unless the terms of the order should be complied with. The bond prescribed was not filed, and the injunction was issued. Neither of the reissued patents had been sustained in a suit. Various reflectors alleged to anticipate the invention of Frink were adduced on the motion—such as, some used in the store of one McKenzie, in Second street, New York, some used in a store in Main street, Poughkeepsie, and some used in churches in Williamsburg and Astoria. But, the principal reliance was on the alleged prior invention of one John Wyberd, in New York.

At the same time that the suit in equity against Jacobsen and Mabie was pending, a suit at law on both of the reissued patents, against them, in this court, brought by the plaintiff, was also pending. The two suits were commenced in May, 1870. The injunction continued in force, and, in November, 1872, the suit at law was tried. On that trial, on the question of novelty, patents granted in the United States to John C. Fletcher, March 30th, 1836, and July 12th, 1838, and a patent granted in England to Thomas Boyle, December 27th, 1854, and evidence as to the reflectors in McKenzie's store and as to Wyberd's alleged prior invention, were introduced by the defendants. Rebutting evidence was introduced by the plaintiff, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for nominal damages, on which a judgment was entered, December 20th, 1872, for $435 56, which was costs. It is alleged that this was not a real trial, and that the verdict was the result of a submission by the defendants, not to the force of the plaintiff's proved case, but to considerations aside therefrom.

The bill in the present case was filed in July, 1873. It is founded on both of the reissued patents. It sets up the recovery in the suit at law against Jacobsen and Mabie. Shortly before this bill was filed, I had granted preliminary injunctions in suits against other parties on the same patents, who resisted the applications very strenuously, and set up, on the question of novelty, alleged prior invention and use by Francis P. Doyle, John Cook, and William and Donald McKenzie, in New York. In opposition to the granting of the injunction in the present case, the defendants set up the English patent to Thomas Boyle, of December 27th, 1854. Prior to the granting of the injunction the defendants had been making and selling reflectors constructed precisely in accordance with the descriptions and drawings and model of the plaintiff's patents. After the injunction was granted, they varied the construction, by making the upper reflecting surface of a black color, still retaining all the features of the first claim of No. 3826. They made, also, another variation, whereby they sought to maintain that they no longer had a reflecting surface lined with glass, in the sense of the first claim of No. 3826, and that they no longer had combined with the metallic body of a reflector a glass lining therefor, applied in sections or panels, in the sense of the second claim of No. 3827. This variation consisted in putting a silvery coating on the outer surface of the glass, and making the inner surface of such coating act as a reflecting surface, and depriving the inner surface of the metallic body of the reflector of its capacity as a reflecting surface, and also, in cutting away large parts of the metallic body of the reflector exterior to the glass, and covering the exterior surface of the silvery coating with paint. On a motion for an attachment for violating the injunction by making reflectors with these changes, I held such reflectors to be covered by the two claims in question, and granted the motion.

On the present motion to dissolve the injunction, the defendants rely, in the first place, on the alleged prior invention of John Wyberd. Wyberd, on the 20th of December, 1859, made an application for a patent for an "improved night-light reflector." Although the petition, specification, drawing and model were filed on that day, the oath to the specification purports to have been made on the 21st of December, 1858. The application was rejected on the 31st of December, 1859. The claim was amended, and the amendment, and a new oath, made January 31st, 1860, were filed March 8th, 1860. The case was examined again March 22d, 1860, a patent was ordered to issue March 24th, 1860, and it was issued April 10th, 1860. The specification states that the improvement is called "the argento-crystal dioptric illuminator," and says: "The nature of my invention consists in suspending over the burner a reflector of octagonal shape, composed of series of inclined metallic plates, each series decreasing in circumference and placed above each other, and connected by standards of wire or iron, leaving the space between them open for ventilation. The surfaces of the plates are also corrugated, so as to assist in diffusing the light." The claim, as originally applied for, was in these words. "I claim the construction of the reflector with ventilating spaces between the plates, substantially as and for the purposes set forth." The amendment referred to consisted in erasing this claim and substituting the following, which is contained in the patent, as issued: "I disclaim the arrangement of surfaces as described, considered as mere ventilators, but claim, as new, the dome-like arrangement of a system of corrugated reflectors, with alternate ventilating spaces, as set forth." A certified duplicate of the model filed by Wyberd, on such applicaion, is part of the present case.

The application of the plaintiff was filed on the 6th of March, 1860, on a specification sworn to on the 3d of March, 1860. On suggestions made by the patent office, March 12th, 1860, amendments of the specification and drawings were filed on the 15th of March, 1860. On further suggestions made by the patent office, March 24th, 1860, amendments of the specification and claims were filed March 27th, 1860. The case was examined again March 30th, 1860, by the same examiner who, on the 22d of March, 1860, had examined and passed for issue the application of Wyberd. A patent was ordered to issue to the plaintiff April 4th, 1860, and it was issued April 17th, 1860. A certified copy of the model filed by the plaintiff on such application, is part of the present case. This model exhibits and contains everything that is presented in the descriptions and claims of the reissues Nos. 3826 and 3827.

Although neither the papers filed in Wyberd's application, nor his patent, nor his filed model, represent or indicate the use of glass in his night-light reflector, yet the attempt is made to show that, in fact, he made, before the plaintiff did, reflectors substantially like the plaintiff's reflector. Wyberd's story is, that he began making daylight reflectors, lined with glass, in 1856, under a patent granted to Bernard Goetz, October 2d, 1855, for an "improvement in corrugated reflectors." The specification of this patent states, that the object of the invention is to supply dark rooms with sufficient daylight, by means of a silvered metallic reflector, with an undulated or grooved surface, placed outside of a window, at such an angle to the plane thereof, as to reflect light into the room; and that the patentee takes the metallic substance commonly used in silver plating, and known in the arts as composition, and coats or plates it with silver, and then grooves the surface of the prepared sheet, and covers it with a sheet of plain or fluted glass. Wybred states, that, in the middle of 1856, he became associated in business with one Suter, now residing in Baltimore, and continued the reflector business at 68 Maiden Lane, New York; that their principal business was making daylight reflectors; that, shortly after, he having invented a night-light reflector, lined with glass, and having an aperture at the top, with a metal plate over it, he commenced to manufacture them in 1857; that some of those he made were circular and lined with glass, and others were oblong, four sided, and lined with glass in separate pieces; that, over the aperture in the top, especially of the large ones, he generally placed a metal plate of tin; that Suter left him early in 1857, and he continued the business alone until August 1st, 1859, making all the time such night-light reflectors as above, though, until 1859, his principal manufacture was that of daylight reflectors; that, in the latter part of 1858, he devised the improvement embraced in the patent granted to him April 10th, 1860; and that he continued to make and sell reflectors lined with glass in sections, until the latter part of 1861, part of the time in partnership with one Green, and part of the time associated with one Lauter, at which time he sold his patent.

An attempt is then made to show the use in Baltimore, prior to the plaintiff's invention, of reflectors like the plaintiff's. Robert Q. Taylor, of Baltimore, testifies, that he purchased and put up two (one of which is produced as an exhibit) in his hat store at No. 5 North Calvert street, Baltimore, prior to, or early in, 1857, which are still in use there. He fixes the time, by saying that one Hindes, now dead, went into business with Suter, in Baltimore, in 1857, in making reflectors, and that the two reflectors were put up before that. Suter testifies, that he went into business with Hindes, in Baltimore, in 1857, to make daylight reflectors under the Goetz patent; and that the firm was dissolved before the close of 1857. John L. Armiger, of Baltimore, testifies, that Hindes, who had a hat store at 100 North Gay street, Baltimore, put into that store, before 1858, two reflectors (one of which is produced as an exhibit) like those of Taylor, which are still in use there; and that such reflectors were there during the copartnership between Hindes and Suter. The son of Hindes testifies, that the reflectors were in the shop windows of his father in 1857, because they were there during his father's partnership with Suter. These affidavits do not, nor do any others produced by the defendants, undertake to show where these Baltimore reflectors were purchased, or from whom, or what was their history, or who devised them. No suggestion is made by the defendants that they are traceable to Wyberd.

In reply, the plaintiff produces a later affidavit from the same Robert Q. Taylor, in which he says that the statement he made in his former affidavit as to the time when he obtained the two reflectors, was based on his memory alone, and on certain statements made to him in reference to a business connection between Suter and Hindes; that he has now found, from an entry in his cash book, that he paid for the reflector December 6th, 1859, and has also found the bill therefor, which he produces, and which is dated New York, December 5th, 1859, and is made out as "bought of John Wyberd, agent for manufacturer of Wyberd's patent day and night light reflectors, 455 Broome street," and is receipted, for $35 00, by the signature of John Wyberd; and that he was induced to purchase the reflectors by seeing others in the store of Kirk. The same son of Hindes, at the request of the plaintiff, testifies, that his father's two reflectors were sent from New York or Philadelphia. One McKewen, who put up, as a gas fitter, the two reflectors in Hindes' store, testifies, that he understood, at the time, that they were sent from New York. Fischer Grossman testifies, that, in July or August, 1858, he entered into the employment of Wyberd, as a glazier, at 68 Maiden Lane, New York, and continued to work for him there until some time in the spring of 1859; that then Wyberd removed to Greene street, near Broome street, and carried on the business there for two or three months, and then removed to 455 Broome street; that about that time one Green became connected with Wyberd in the reflector business, and afterwards one Lauter was associated in it with Wyberd at 455 Broome street; that he, Grossman, continued in the employ of Wyberd, and his associates or successors, until 1861 or 1862; that he has examined the Taylor and the Hindes Exhibits, and knows that neither Wyberd nor his associates made or sold any such reflectors prior to some time in the spring of 1859, a few weeks prior to the removal from Maiden Lane; that only a very few of such reflectors were made in Maiden Lane; that no reflectors were made or sold by Wyberd, or under his direction, prior to the spring of 1859, which were lined with glass on the inside, so far as he knows or believes; that he did all the work for glass on reflectors after he went there in the summer of 1858, and knows that no reflectors, of the description above mentioned, were made or sold at Wyberd's place prior to the spring of 1859; that, when he so went into Wyberd's employ, Richard M. Eames was in Wyberd's employ at Maiden Lane; and that, some few months after that, Charles J. Eames went into Wyberd's employ at the same place. Charles J. Eames testifies, that, from in or about December, 1858, until the fall or winter of 1860, he was connected with Wyberd in the manufacture of reflectors at 68 Maiden Lane, 59 Greene street, and 455 Broome street, in New York; that he had charge of every form of day and night light reflectors made by Wyberd; that Wyberd first commenced making night light reflectors lined with glass in panels or sections, and having an upper reflecting surface, at 68 Maiden Lane, about February or March, 1859; that Wyberd did not, until February or March, 1859, make any night light reflectors which had glass connected with them, except locomotive head light and certain concave side light reflectors; that he has examined the Hindes and Taylor Exhibits, and finds the frames or bodies of them to be constructed of sheet zinc; that he recognizes them as reflectors made by Wyberd after February or March, 1859, as he, Eames, suggested making the bodies of sheet zinc; that some few of said reflectors had been made of sheet tin as early as February or March, 1859, but not earlier; that Wyberd moved from 68 Maiden Lane to Greene street near Broome street about the 1st of May, 1859, and remained there two or three months, and then removed to 455 Broome street, when one Green became associated with him in business; that he, Eames, remained in the employment of Wyberd and Green for a few months; that, some time afterwards, one Lauter became associated in business with Wyberd at 455 Broome street; that Marvin S. Buttles solicited orders for the sale of reflectors in Baltimore and Washington in the fall of 1859, and a number of said reflectors were sent to said cities to be put up for use therein; that said exhibits appear to be some of the reflectors which were so sent to Baltimore in 1859; and that said reflectors were numbered consecutively. Marvin S. Buttles testifies, that, in the fall of 1859, Wyberd and Green, or one of them, were engaged in making and selling reflectors at 455 Broome street, and he, Buttles, made an arrangement with one or both of them, to act as agent in soliciting orders and procuring sales of said reflectors for them in Baltimore and Washington, in the fall of 1859; that, during September and October, 1859, he was engaged in soliciting orders and making sales of said reflectors in Baltimore and Washington; that he remained in Baltimore several weeks canvassing to make sales, and visited every place making any pretension of show in the windows, where such reflectors could be advantageously used; that Kirk had two, and Robert Q. Taylor, 5 North Calvert street, had two, and other persons, on his, Buttles', solicitation, procured said reflector in the fall of 1859; and that he remembers calling on a hatter who had a store at 100 North Gay street and trying to sell him some, he then having none in his store. Walter D. Burnett testifies, that he is a brother-in-law of the plaintiff, who has been in California since July, 1873, on account of ill health; that, for the last 12 or 14 years, he has been well acquainted with the plaintiff's business; that he remembers certain suits brought by Wyberd, in this court, in 1861, on his reflector patent; that one was an action at law against the plaintiff, which was tried before Mr. Justice Nelson and a jury, in the fall of 1863; that the charge was that reflectors made in accordance with the plaintiff's patent infringed Wyberd's patent; that the jury found a verdict for the defendant on that issue; that, in 1861, Wyberd brought four suits in equity, in this court, on his reflector patent, one against the plaintiff, and the other three against persons who had used reflectors made by the plaintiff; that an application for an injunction in the suit against the plaintiff, made in the fall of 1861, was denied, on the ground, mainly, of of non-infringement, and none of the suits in equity were proceeded with after the verdict in the suit at law; that he, Burnett, has known Wyberd since 1861, and was acquainted with the plaintiff in 1858, and before that time, and was familiar with his operations in getting up his improvements in reflectors, which he afterwards patented; and that the plaintiff completed his invention substantially as patented, prior to December, 1858, and, prior to that time, made one or more reflectors containing said improvements, and made several more of them for sale in 1859 by the spring, and has ever since continued to make and sell them.

The affidavits on file in this court, in the suit in equity against Jacobsen and Mabie, are invoked by the defendants as papers to be used on this motion. Among those affidavits, produced on the motion for an injunction, before me, in that suit, are affidavits made by the plaintiff, and by said

Burnett, and by several other persons, clearly establishing the making of his invention by the plaintiff as early as the first half of November, 1858. But, on that motion, the affidavits presented on the part of the defendants in that suit, in regard to the time that Wyberd first made reflectors in substance like the plaintiff's, went to show, that Wyberd made such reflectors in 1857. The affidavits, hereinbefore recited, which overthrow this claim on the part of Wyberd, and show that he made no such reflectors until February or March, 1859, were not presented in the case against Jacobsen and Mabie. Hence, at that time, I could not but regard the plaintiff's case, in respect to Wyberd's claim of prior invention, as not free from doubt. But, on the case, as now presented, I can entertain no such doubt.

There are various considerations which lead to this conclusion. Wyberd never attempted to obtain a patent for a night light reflector having glass. He contented himself with applying for a patent for what he had devised, in the way of a night light reflector, by December, 1858. Night light reflectors, with glass, like the plaintiff's, were a very valuable thing, and soon made their way into use, to the exclusion of other kinds. If Wyberd was engaged, from February or March, 1859, until the latter part of 1861, in making and selling reflectors in substance like the plaintiff's, and the plaintiff was engaged during the same period, in the same city, in making and selling his reflectors, it is not to be believed that Wyberd was ignorant of that fact; or that, after April, 1860, he was ignorant of the fact that the plaintiff was making such reflectors under his patent of April 17th, 1860. If Wyberd devised the reflector in February or March, 1859, the fact that he did not, within two years thereafter, apply for a patent for it, and have his application put into interference with the plaintiff's patent, indicates that he was satisfied that the plaintiff was the prior inventor. If he himself adopted the arrangement from the plaintiff's reflectors, and began to employ it in February or March, 1859, it is a matter of course that he could not obtain a patent for it. If he devised, in 1857, a reflector like the plaintiff's, it is hardly credible that he should, in the latter part of 1858, have devised what is shown in his patent of April 10th, 1860, and have applied for a patent for that, and not have applied for a patent for what he so devised in 1857. All the circumstances of the case point to the conclusion, that, when, on the 21st of December, 1858, he swore to his specification, he had not devised any arrangement such as that covered by the plaintiff's patents. In addition to this, the plaintiff has the patent, and there is the direct evidence showing priority in the plaintiff.

The English patent of Thomas Boyle, of December 27th, 1854, specification filed June 27th, 1855, is adduced to affect the novelty of the second claim of No. 3827, and to show that the arrangement, before referred to, resorted to by the defendants after the injunction was granted, of using glass with a silvery coating, covered with paint, and cutting away large parts of the metallic body of the reflector, is, in substance, to be found in the Boyle patent. The specification of that patent says: "My improved reflectors consist of pieces of sheet or crown glass, made reflective by deposits of silver leaf on the back, and protected from air and damp by waterproof paint or pigment. This material, when properly prepared, possesses the brilliancy of glass itself, and can never tarnish. The surface of the glass may be either corrugated, figured, or plain. I apply this silvered glass to the construction of reflectors in movable pieces, of any required shape or size, and the pieces may be each framed separately or not, according to circumstances. Thus, for the ordinary street lamps, I use four sheets of reflecting glass, each sheet being framed and made to the shape and size, and fitting either over or in place of, the four top panes in the present lamps. Each sheet is fixed in such manner as to admit of its being readily removed for the purpose of cleaning. The employment of such reflectors in the street lamps would greatly increase the light, to the convenience of the public, and effect an important saving in the consumption of gas. For the ordinary internal gas burners or oil lamps, I use a suitably constructed wire or metal frame, similar to those generally used for supporting the paper reflecting shades. The outer circumference of this frame, instead of being circular in shape, is many sided, to accommodate any number of pieces of flat, reflecting glass arranged around it. The pieces of glass are cut of a triangular shape, in order to fit, without overlapping, around the frame, at the proper angle of reflection, and they may be made to fit quite close to each other, side by side, or be set apart, so as to leave a space between each two pieces, through which a portion of the light passes upwards and around the room, relieving the body of the apartment from the comparative darkness in which it is placed by the operation of the ordinary reflecting shades, while concentrating a strong light on the table or desk underneath the lamp or burner. The frame is so made that the pieces of glass may be fastened or unfastened at pleasure by a simple manipulation, such as turning a screw or pressing a spring. Thus the operation of cleaning is facilitated; and, if one glass be broken, the remainder of the reflector being still as good as ever, it only requires another glass to render it as perfect as before. * * * Figure 1 shows an elevation of a street lamp, having reflectors applied thereto, according to my invention; figure 2 is a plan thereof. The pieces of glass used for the reflectors may be silvered or rendered reflectors by any convenient means, coating the back with water-proof paint or pigment, to which I make no claim, my invention consisting of combining several separate and independent pieces of glass to act as a reflector, each piece of glass being so arranged, and connected or combined with the others and with a frame, that it may be separated from them and cleaned (or replaced, if broken,) separately. In street lamps, I prefer the reflectors to be exterior of the ordinary glass at top; but this is not essential. a, a, are the four pieces of glass which cover in the top of the lamp, and they may be each retained in position by any convenient means, so long as the arrangement admits of the parts, a, a, being taken out separately to be cleaned. For this purpose, the drawing shows ledges, b, b, and springs, c; but these may be varied. Figure 3 shows a section, and figure 4 a plan, of a shade for a lamp or burner, constructed with several separate pieces of glass, a, a, made reflectors by silver, and painted at back. The frame, in this arrangement, consists of two rings, c, d, with as many sides as there are pieces of glass. These rings, c, d, are connected together by rods, e, e. In the arrangement shown there are four such rods, e. The upper part of the upper ring, d, is made cylindrical, and it has a screw thread formed on the outside, to receive a ring, f, with a screw formed on the inside, by which, when the screw ring, f, is in its place, it will retain the ring, g, and thus clip the upper ends of the glass reflectors between the ring, g, and the inner ring, d, as shown, whilst the lower ends of the reflectors, a, a, will be supported by the lip or turned-up edge of the lower ring. c. * * * What I claim is, the manufacture of reflectors for artificial light, by combining in suitable frames separate pieces of glass readily capable of being separated from each other and from the frames, as described."

It is quite apparent that the Boyle patent does not contain what is covered by the first claim of No. 3826, for there is, in the Boyle patent, no upper reflecting surface.

The second claim of No. 3827 claims "the combination with the metallic body of a reflector, of a glass covering or lining therefor, applied in sections or panels, substantially as and for the purposes described." It does not claim the use of glass in sections, in any and all reflectors. Boyle's patent shows glass in sections, in a reflector. But the plaintiff claims a glass covering or lining for the metallic body of a reflector, applied in sections or panels, and combined with such metallic body, substantially as and for the purposes described. This means, the metallic body of such a reflector as he describes and shows in his drawings—a reflector in which the illuminating rays are thrown down beneath the flame or source from which they proceed; and which has a metallic body; and in which such metallic body is lined or covered on the inside with glass, so that there is no intercepting of any of the rays of light by any part of the metallic body, in contradistinction to having part of the metallic body inside of the glass, so that such intercepting of rays of light is produced; and which is capable of having the glass lining to the metallic body applied by moulding or blowing the glass, if it be not attached in sections or panels; and which is manipulated and handled as a unit, and is supported and kept in position from above, and not from below.

Neither one of the two arrangements suggested by Boyle has a metallic body to the reflector as the plaintiff's reflector has, or as the defendants' form of reflector had, even after the defendants had cut away large parts of the metallic body; nor is either one of them a reflector which is kept in position from above, and not from below. As neither one of them has a metallic body, so it has not a metallic body lined or covered with glass, or capable of being lined or covered with glass. The arrangement, suggested by Boyle, of what he calls a shade, in addition to not having the plaintiff's metallic body to the reflector, has the rods which connect its two rings inside of the glass, in a position to intercept the rays of light. Moreover, the street-lamp arrangement of Boyle cannot, as a reflector, be manipulated and handled as a unit. As a four-sided whole, it is rigidly fixed to the top of the lamp. It is entirely clear, I think, that nothing in Boyle's patent anticipates the second claim of No. 3827.

The defendants also bring up against the novelty of both of the claims in question a patent granted to John C. Fletcher, March 30th, 1836, and a patent granted to the same person July 12th, 1838.

Fletcher's patent of 1836 is for an "improvement in the double-reflecting lamp." It says: "The receptacle for the oil is made in the usual manner, of a spherical or polygonal concave figure, having any convenient number of burners placed in an inclined position, bringing the light to the apex, with chains for suspending it, and a glass tube or chimney, in the manner of Argand's lamp. My improvement consists in providing a receiver or trough for catching the overflowing oil, which, in the common lamp, usually falls on the floor or on the clothing of the company. This receiver is of the same figure as the lower edge of the lamp, and the lamp is suspended in it. The suspending chains are attached to the trough by brackets. Another improvement consists in arranging two sets of trapezoidal reflectors in a spherical or polygonal concave shape, one placed above the light, for reflecting it over the room, the other below it, for concentrating the light. The reflectors above the light are placed in a metallic frame, having an opening in the centre for the chimney, and suspended in the chains with the apex inverted or towards the light. The reflectors below the light are placed in the concave or inner side of the lamp." In this patent of Fletcher's, the illuminating rays are not thrown down below the source from which they proceed, in the sense of the first claim of No. 3826. The source of the rays is not below the lower reflecting surface, as in the plaintiff's reflector. The rays are not returned downward from the lower reflecting surface to their source, then passing on still further downward beyond such source, as in the plaintiff's reflector. This is an essential point in such first claim. In this patent of Fletcher's, no space is provided between the upper and lower reflecting surfaces for the passage of air and for ventilation. No air that passes upward through the interior of the lower reflecting surface and in contact with the flame, passes out under the upper reflecting surface. It is all carried upward in the glass chimney which passes into the opening in the centre of the upper reflecting surface. This feature of a glass chimney in this Fletcher patent makes it impossible for it to anticipate the first claim of No. 3826.

Under the construction hereinbefore defined as the proper one to be given to the second claim of No. 3827, that claim is not found in Fletcher's patent of 1836, because, in that patent the source of the rays is not below the lower reflecting surface.

Fletcher's patent of 1838 is for an "improvement in lamps." It describes a lamp which, it says, is arranged in every respect, like the one in his patent of 1836, except that it has an oil fountain on the top of the lamp, above the upper reflecting surface, with conductors passing from it to a receptacle at the bottom of the lamp, and that the conductors enable the chains extending from the bottom of the lamp to the frame of the upper reflecting surface to be dispensed with. Therefore, nothing more need be said in regard to this patent of 1838.

It is urged for the defendants, that, on the assumption that a reflector existed before, embodying all the features specified in the first claim of No. 3826, except the one of a glass lining to the reflecting surface or surfaces, such first claim presents no patentable feature of novelty. This position cannot be admitted, for, the employment of the glass, in the entire arrangement, being new, is certainly useful, both in increasing the reflection of the light and in preventing the reflecting surface behind the glass from being scratched or tarnished. Being new and useful, the entire arrangement in the first claim is patentable. All the features embodied in it have a mutual relation and interdependence which make them patentable, as a whole.

Much criticism is made on the alleged fact that Jacobsen and Mabie, on the trial of the suit at law, after the evidence was in, substantially ceased their resistance. They might well have done so, with no defence on the question of infringement, and with no more available materials on the question of novelty than the Fletcher patents, and the Boyle patent, and Wyberd's alleged prior invention, and the McKenzie reflector, which latter I have had before me in several of the cases, and which amounted to nothing.

The plaintiff commenced making daylight reflectors in March, 1857. He first gave his attention in May, 1858, to the idea of improvements in night light reflectors, which should include a glass lining, and the use of gas, and embody the other principal features now found in his patents. He embodied those improvements and features in a practical working reflector in the first half of November, 1858. He began immediately to make and sell to the public like reflectors. Following the granting of his patent, he went largely into the business, and has, in the succeeding years, carried it on successfully, so far as introducing his reflectors into general use is concerned, and has made it his only business. He has asserted his exclusive right in every reasonable method, and, since the reissues of his patent were granted, he has given no rest to those who were infringing his rights. It is not until since the reissues that any infringements seem to have seriously interfered with his business. The improvements embodied in his patents enable the brilliant light of gas to be used in its most effective way to illuminate objects underneath the source of light. The practical results of those improvements are familiar to every one, and, on the evidence before me, are due to the inventive genius and energy and perseverance of the plaintiff. The defendants have infringed with full knowledge of the plaintiff's patents, and of the claims asserted by him thereunder, and he is entitled to be protected by an injunction. The changes he made from previous arrangements may have been small to appearance, but they were such changes as produced practical success in what was before substantially useless. The Fletcher arrangement was worthless until the source of the rays of light was placed below the lower reflecting surface. The Boyle arrangements amounted to nothing, as a practical accomplishment of the purposes set forth by the plaintiff in his patents. The defendants accomplish the purposes so set forth in respect to the first claim of No. 3826, and in the way specified in said claim, no less by modifying, as they have done, the color of the upper reflecting surface, than if they had not so modified it. So, too, they accomplish the purposes so set forth in respect to that claim, and in respect to the second claim of No. 3827, and in the way specified in said claims, notwithstanding the modifications they have made in regard to the reflecting surface and the metallic body. Notwithstanding such modifications, the metallic body encloses, supports and protects the internal glass lining which is applied to such metallic body, and the source of the rays is below the lower reflecting surface, and no part of the metallic body intercepts any of such rays, and the reflector is handled as a unit, and is supported wholly from above, and the glass lining is applied in sections. It makes no difference, in regard to these particulars, whether the reflecting surface behind the glass is made a thin reflecting film applied to the back of the glass, so as to make it possible, in places, to remove the metal of the metallic body, or whether such reflecting surface is the inner surface of the metallic body. In each case the glass performs the offices of increasing the reflection and protecting the reflecting surface from being scratched or tarnished. In each case the metallic body, aside from reflecting, performs the same functions of enclosing, supporting and protecting, in the same way, the internal glass lining. A silvery coating, applied to glass, as a reflecting surface, was a known equivalent for the bright surface of a metallic body behind glass, as a reflecting surface, the reflection in each case being made through the glass; and there is nothing in the plaintiff's patents which restricts him to the use of the latter, as distinguished from the former.

I have attentively considered all the questions involved in this motion. In doing this, I have examined all the papers now to be found on the files of this court, in all the suits brought therein on the plaintiff's patents, for the purpose of satisfying myself that I have allowed no point to escape my notice. As against the prior patents referred to, the strength imparted to the plaintiff's patents, by the fact that his reissues of 1870 were granted, notwithstanding the existence of such prior patents, is sustained by a review of the questions involved, on principle. As against Wyberd's alleged prior invention, the result, as to the Baltimore matter, shows how little to be relied on is ex parte testimony which is brought as to such invention. I have said nothing more as to the alleged prior invention of Doyle, because, although it was referred to, it was not pressed on this motion, and I now allude to it only as a part of the history of the litigation on the plaintiff's patents, for the purpose of saying, that, although, heretofore, in some of the cases, it occupied a large share of my time and attention, and although Doyle may have come to believe in the existence of the alleged facts to which he testified, and although others may honestly have been induced to sustain him, I came to the undoubting conclusion, on the evidence, that such alleged facts had no foundation in truth.

My observations have been extended to great length, but I deemed nothing less to be properly commensurate with the importance to the parties, of the questions involved, and the earnestness and ability with which the views on the part of the defendants were urged.

The motion to dissolve the injunction is denied.

ACT OF BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNMENT—INVOLUNTARY PROCEEDINGS—NUMBER OF CREDITORS JOINING IN PETITION—DISMISSAL.

1. A general assignment for the benefit of creditors, without preferences, is an act of bankruptcy.

2. Under section 5021 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 12 of the act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. 180), the limiting by the bankruptcy court of the time to be allowed for the requisite number and amount of creditors to join in a petition in involuntary bankruptcy, and the peremptory provision for the dismissal of the petition, are consequent on the judicial ascertainment by the court that the requisite number and amount of creditors have not petitioned, and such ascertainment is to be made on reasonable notice to the creditors, and, until such ascertainment has taken place, further creditors may at any time unite in the proceedings.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Frank Frisbee and John McHugh.]

Thomas M. North and Henry A. Root, for creditors.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The substantive grounds upon which the reversal of the adjudication is sought have been already disposed of by the court in Re Beisenthal [Case No. 1,236]. It was there held, that a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, without preferences, was voidable by the bankrupt's assignee within the time limited by statute. Upon the same grounds such an assignment is an act of bankruptcy, as has been frequently held in the courts of the United States in this circuit.

The remaining question depends upon section 5021 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 12 of the act of June 22, 1874 (18 Stat. 180). By the provisions of that section, if the allegation of the petition as to the number or amount of the petitioning creditors is denied by the debtor, by a statement in writing to that effect, the court is to require the debtor to file a full list of the creditors, with the particulars pointed out by the statute, and is also to ascertain, upon reasonable notice to the creditors, whether one-fourth in number of the creditors, and one-third in amount of those having provable debts, have petitioned. If it appears that such number and amount have not so petitioned, the court shall grant reasonable time, not exceeding ten days, within which other creditors may join in such petition, and thus make up the number and amount required by the statute. The statute contains a very peremptory provision, that if, at the expiration of the limited time, the number and amount of creditors applying shall not answer the requirements of the section, the proceedings shall be dismissed. This limitation of time and this peremptory provision for dismissal, are consequent upon the judicial ascertainment by the court that the requisite number and amount of creditors have not petitioned. This ascertainment is to be made upon reasonable notice to the creditors, in order that they may take part, if they see fit, in the inquiry that the judge is to make. Until that ascertainment has taken place, the matter remains at large, and further creditors may come forward and unite in the proceedings.

We can only ascertain what has taken place in a judicial proceeding by consulting the written record of the action of the court. Otherwise, no certainty could be arrived at in respect to such proceedings, and it might become necessary for judges to enter the field of affidavit making, and be subject to the criticism which such a position involves. In this case the papers show the written denial by the debtors that the requisite number and amount of creditors had united in the petition. This was presented to the court on the 20th of January last, in proper time, and raised a proper issue in the case. No order thereupon appears to have been entered in the clerk's office, nor any decision by the district court upon the sufficiency of the petition. Upon the minutes of the judge, kept by himself in court, an entry appears of the presentation of the denial and of an order of reference. The known practice of the court, as well as the necessary requirements of the law, make it plain that this was intended as the authority to the clerk to enter an order of reference upon the inquiry whether a sufficient number of creditors, and for a sufficient amount, had signed the petition; and to notice of this proceeding creditors were entitled. No reference appears to have taken place and no order seems to have been actually entered. The case, therefore, did not arise in which the judge is called upon by the statute to fix a time within which additional creditors may join in the petition. The petitioners are, therefore, necessarily in error in supposing that the supplemental petition was presented, asking for the adjudication, after the time when the court had power, under the statute, to entertain the same.

The supplemental petition for adjudication having been presented, the debtors, on the 3d of March, put in their answer, in which they did not set up the want of a sufficient number and amount of petitioning creditors, but only put in issue the alleged acts of bankruptcy. At the same time the debtors presented an application asking the dismissal of the original and supplemental petitions for adjudication of bankruptcy, upon the ground of the expiration of the time within which such supplemental petition could be filed according to law, and claiming that the court had lost jurisdiction of the cause. But, as we have already seen, the proper foundation of fact was wanting, by which to support such application.

Subsequently, and on the 10th of March, the debtors presented a petition, stating, among other things, that on the adjourned return day of the order upon the supplemental petition, by inadvertence, no allegation was made that the requisite number and amount had not joined in the supplemental petition, and it is averred that neither in number nor amount were the requisite creditors included in the supplemental petition; and it was thereupon prayed that the petition should be dismissed. It was not averred, that, taking both petitions together, creditors to the requisite number and amount had not joined. Upon this petition an order was made by the district court, refusing to dismiss the proceedings for adjudication, whether the petition was to be regarded as an application for the favor of the court or as matter of right, which was duly entered March 10th. An adjudication of bankruptcy followed in due course. The only objections to it are those which have been already considered, and those, I am of opinion, do not avail. The proceedings and adjudication of bankruptcy must be affirmed, and an order will be entered accordingly and transmitted to the district court.

This was a petition by Cassander Frisbee to be declared a bankrupt. Objections were made that his inventory was not sufficiently distinct.

BETTS, District Judge. In mere matters of form, where the court has discretionary power, the utmost possible indulgence will be given. But many of the objections to the regularity of the proceedings are not matters of form, but of substance. They are, that the petitioners have not complied with the demands of the statute, which gives the bankrupt his discharge if he complies with them, but not otherwise. Petitioners come into court, some of whom apparently take a pleasure or pride in evading the law, by adopting what they think a better mode than that pointed out by the statute or the rules of court. But in doing so, they are irregular, for they are strictly bound to conform not only to the statute, but also to the rules as much as the statute, as the rules have been made to carry out in detail the requisites of the statute, and were not framed by the court with a view to its own convenience or that of the parties interested, but adopted under the express directions of congress, and therefore it is not optional with the parties to devise any better mode, if they could do so. And if they attempt it, they must run the hazard of throwing impediments in the way of their clients, and have to begin anew.

The objections in this case are, first, that the property is not properly described. The party should have seen what is required by the act and have complied with it. This is not mere matter of form, but is made by the law a condition that he should do so, and he can no more obtain his discharge without a proper inventory than he could without entering his petition. Counsel must thus see the importance attached to the inventory. By the act, the assignee must have such a description of the property as would fix its location and enable him to identify it.

This schedule is loosely drawn, and sets forth that the bankrupt is entitled to some real estate, one half of certain land, the whole of which is valued at $4000. "An interest in half a lot of ground in Buffalo, which your petitioner intends to assign to the assignee. The present value unknown, but which when purchased was estimated at $4000." This is no description at all. It only says that there is some ground at Buffalo which he had a claim to. The party had nothing to do but turn to the form of the act, which sets forth what was necessary to be done, when describing his real estate. If the ground is described as a lot in a certain part of Pearl street not now occupied, or a farm of land lying in such a state or territory and county, conveyed by such a person to the petitioner, so that the assignee can go and trace it out and see it, it would be then sufficient, but as it now stands, it is not. It is not optional with the parties not to comply with the law. There must be a compliance with it, and the court must insist that the parties shall do all that is required of them.

Another branch of this inventory which is objected to, is that of the household furniture. The petitioner merely says household furniture, but does not say where it is, or whether it is Buffalo, New Jersey, or Connecticut. With respect to this objection, similar objections have been raised in other cases before the court, and the parties are bound to set forth every part of their property, and the location of every part and portion of it, and furniture is not excepted. The law allows the assignee to set apart a certain portion for them, but it must be put in the description for the assignee; although the parties by doing so might subject it to an execution, that does not exempt them. The petitioner does his duty when he describes the property, and if the assignee cannot bring it into the general fund for all the creditors, it is not the bankrupt's fault, he does his duty. It is a matter of regret that delays in the proceedings should thus occur; but a rule having been laid down, it must be observed. In this case, the property is of small amount, but if the court let two or three hundred dollars pass, it might do so in a case which involved thousands. The inventory must, therefore, in all cases, designate the property so that the assignee can find it out, and identify it.

Counsel for the petitioner. Every article of the furniture is set forth in the inventory. The petitioner is now in New York, is it necessary to state the house in which the furniture is?

BETTS, J. I think it is.

Counsel. In regard to the description of the property. He never derived any interest from that property. It was conveyed to him on condition of his paying 8000 dollars, and he never paid it. And there is a penalty of 800 dollars incurred by his not paying, and therefore it is not a property but only a debt.

BETTS, J. Your observations are seemingly made in order to convince me that he had no interest in it, and if he had no interest in it, he should not come here and tell his creditors that he had such an interest. In his schedule he says, "interest in half a lot of ground in Buffalo, which your petitioner intends to assign to the assignee." If he had said he had but a verbal contract, it might do; but what he tells is a very different thing. He does not speak of a deed, but of an interest of which he has a deed.

Counsel. Can the petition be amended, if the commissioners say there is no fraud in it?

BETTS, J. You may make a subsequent motion in relation to it, but at present I deny the motion for a decree.

Counsel. I would then move to amend the description, if it is deemed insufficient, without going through the process of two publications.

BETTS, J. There is a deeper difficulty still to be considered. It is questionable whether the court can allow the amendment.

At a subsequent day BETTS, District Judge, referred to the question as to the competency of the court to allow amendments.

He thought that the United States courts, sitting in bankruptcy, had power to regulate and modify the proceedings, but the great difficulty would be to arrive at that point where the court could interfere. When does the court take cognizance of the matter? Not till the petition is presented and the order made. But whether, during the running of the first notice, the court could allow the petition to be varied does not arise here. Every power that the court can justly exercise over a suitor, it can exercise over a bankrupt. In this state, the court thought that the bankrupt might have the privilege of amending his schedule or inventory; but it was a privilege which would be granted with great caution. The court would not permit papers to be prepared loosely and carelessly, and then allow the petitioner to come in and ask for a remedy. The court must be satisfied that everything had been done in good faith, that the errors had occurred through inattention or inadvertence, that it was not an omission studied with a view to the privilege of amending. Proof must be exhibited to the court that it was an error of inadvertence. If there was any design, or symptom of it, the matter will be referred over. As a general rule, the court has power to authorize an amendment to the schedule, but only on very convincing proof that the error was unintentional; nor would it then be allowed, without payment of costs. In this case of Frisbee, the court said no amendments could be allowed, as that question had not been argued, nor was there any of that proof required before an amendment would be authorized. The court only relieved the bar from the difficulty as to the power of the court to allow amendments, but they would not be allowed on a bare motion, or on the statement of counsel.

In re FRISBIE.

District Court, E. D. Michigan.

BANKRUPTCY — RIGHT OF CREDITOR TO FULL DISCLOSURE — EXAMINATION OF BANKRUPT — PROTECTION AGAINST UNREASONABLE DEMANDS.

1. It is the right of a creditor to have a full disclosure, on oath, by the bankrupt of everything relating to his estate, and with such detail as will be necessary, or may be useful to the assignee in the discharge of his duties; and it is the duty of the bankrupt to submit to such examination promptly, on reasonable application.

2. A bankrupt who has fully submitted to examination, has a right to be protected against unreasonable demands upon his time for further examination; and where ample opportunity has been afforded, and an examination already had is apparently full, unless it is made to appear that such examination was collusive, or in some material and specified particulars deficient, an application for further examination may properly be refused.

Pending proceedings before the register for the bankrupt's discharge an ex parte order had been made by the register for the examination of the bankrupt [James W. Frisbie] on the application of creditors who had appeared to oppose his discharge. The bankrupt appeared, but objected to the examination, and his objections were certified into court for determination. The court referred the question back to the register for his opinion thereon. From the statement of the register it appears:

First. That the proceedings for the adjudication of said bankrupt were commenced on the 7th day of January, 1874, by his creditors; that the first meeting of creditors was held and an assignee elected on the 17th day of February, 1874; the whole number of creditors who, in the course of the proceedings, proved claims against said bankrupt's estate was sixty-six, amounting, as computed to the date of the bankruptcy, to the sum of one hundred and thirty-eight thousand and seventy dollars and twenty-one cents. Of these, fifty-seven in number, whose claims amounted, as computed, to the sum of one hundred and one thousand three hundred and seventy-four dollars and eighty-seven cents, were proved at or before the first meeting of creditors; an unusually large number of claims in this case (including those of E. S. Jaffray & Co. and D. Valentine & Co., amounting together to the sum of seventeen thousand eight hundred and twenty-six dollars and thirty cents), was proved so as to enable the creditors to participate in the election of the assignee. Only eight creditors whose claims amounted to four thousand five hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty-four cents (excluding from the enumeration the claim of Mrs. Frisbie), proved their claims after the first meeting. On the 13th of July, 1874, the second meeting of creditors was held, and after due notice that the assignee had filed his final account, and would at that meeting apply for its allowance and his discharge, the final order of distribution was entered.

Second. On the day of the second meeting, Oberholser & Keefer filed objections to the discharge of the assignee; on the 16th of July they filed a petition for the examination of the bankrupt, and on the 18th of July, a petition to expunge the claim of Mrs. Frisbie, the bankrupt's wife. No application for the examination of the bankrupt was ever filed by the assignee, nor any application for such examination by any other creditor, until that filed by E. S. Jaffray & Co. and David Valentine & Co. on the 15th day of June, 1875. The examination of the bankrupt on the application of Oberholser & Keefer, was commenced on the 23d of September, 1874, continued on the 25th and 29th, and was read to the bankrupt, and subscribed by him on the 19th of October, 1874. Mrs. Frisbie was examined on the 29th of September, and the bookkeeper of the bankrupt, Frank B. Webster, was examined on the 22d, 28th, and 30th of September. The examinations of the bankrupt and his bookkeeper, the books of the bankrupt being present, were conducted mainly by an expert accountant employed by the creditors for that purpose. On the 3d of October, an order was entered, fixing the 9th day of October for the hearing of the petition of Oberholser & Keefer, for the re-examination of the claim of Mary B. Frisbie. This hearing was continued from time to time until the 23d day of October, and from that day remained pending and undetermined until the 11th of March, 1875, when the proceedings for the re-examination of the claim of Mary B. Frisbie were formally discontinued by the parties who commenced them.

Third. On the 24th of April, 1875, the bankrupt filed his petition for a discharge. An order was entered on the 29th of April, fixing the 25th day of May to show cause against said petition; notice of which was first published on the 30th day of April in two papers in the city of Detroit; and notice was given to the creditors, including E. S. Jaffray & Co. and D. Valentine & Co., by mail, the notices being deposited in the post-office in Detroit on or before the 13th day of May. On the 25th day of May, the appearances of Jaffray & Co. and Valentine & Co. were entered to oppose the bankrupt's discharge; and on the 15th of June, an application was filed for an order for the examination of the bankrupt and witnesses. An order for their examination was entered, the proceedings under which were arrested by the objections of the bankrupt to any further examination, on which the questions arose which were certified to the court, and are now submitted to the register for his opinion.

The points made by Mr. D. M. Dickinson on behalf of the bankrupt, in support of his objections to any further examination are the following: He objects—

First. Because the application for such examination does not show any ground for such examination at this time.

Second. Because nearly two and one half years have elapsed since the commencement of these proceedings to the time of this application, and the bankrupt has submitted to all orders of the court, and has appeared, from time to time, for examination as required, and has submitted to a full, thorough, and exhaustive examination under said section, which was not abated or interfered with, prevented or stopped by any solicitation, payment, or other influence of this bankrupt, or in his behalf.

Third. Because the creditors applying for such examination have, by laches, forfeited all legal rights to any further or other examination, and the application now is made only after an application for a discharge has been made, and is oppressive and harassing to the bankrupt and his family.

Fourth. Because the estate is closed, and its assignee has received his final discharge from office, so that the result of such examination cannot benefit this estate.

By Hovey K. Clarke, Register:

The first three points submitted on behalf of the bankrupt turn mainly upon the question, whether the creditors, by laches, have lost the right to require the bankrupt to submit to a further examination. The fourth point,—that "the estate has been closed"—as a general rule does not appear to me to be conclusive, though perhaps it may be so in the case presented by these papers; because, if a creditor has a reasonable ground to believe that a further examination would disclose other property, the application for such examination ought to be entertained at any stage of the proceedings, upon a proper cause being shown for it. No such case, however, is made here, nor does this examination appear to be applied for with any such object.

In determining the question of laches, which the first three points made on behalf of the bankrupt present, it is important to consider the mutual rights and duties of creditors and bankrupts in bankruptcy cases. It is the right of the creditor to have a full disclosure, on oath, by the bankrupt, of everything relating to his estate, and with such detail as will furnish to the assignee all the information in his power to render, and which may be necessary or useful to the assignee in the discharge of his duties; and it is the duty of the bankrupt, promptly, on all reasonable applications, to submit to such examination. It is the right of the bankrupt, when he has submitted himself to such examination, that he should not be unnecessarily hindered in his business, or his efforts to support himself, or those dependent on him; and it is the duty of the creditor, when bankruptcy proceedings are commenced, to go forward with reasonable promptness with the prosecution of the case.

If these mutual rights and duties are here correctly stated, it will be seen that the right of a creditor to a disclosure from the bankrupt, is not an unlimited right to require the bankrupt to submit to an examination. If a full examination has been already had, either upon the application of the assignee, or of any other creditor, a subsequent application may be properly denied, unless it is made to appear that the first examination was either collusive, or deficient in some material and specified particulars. And the court, whenever such an application shall be made will exercise its discretion, whether, with proper regard to the rights of all parties and especially when a bankrupt objects that he has already fully answered, an order for such examination ought to be granted.

It may not be easy to prescribe definite rules for the exercise of this discretion; it may depend more, as I think it does, upon the facts of each particular case, than is usual in appeals to courts for the exercise of discretionary powers. But where creditors have seasonable notice of the pendency of the proceedings; where a full and apparently thorough examination of the bankrupt has been had, and a final distribution made; a creditor's application for a further examination must be supported by a showing of some deficiency, stating it, in the former examination, which is now sought to be supplied, and the object for which it is sought; and in the absence of any such satisfactory showing, it will be presumed that the object of the application is not one which will be favorably entertained by the court. Creditors are, perhaps, a little slow to admit that there are any honest bankrupts—as bankrupts are hasty to assume that all creditors are oppressive. The courts cannot sympathize in these general conclusions. A bankrupt who has made a full surrender of all his property, and is starting in his business life anew, has many very obvious difficulties to encounter, and his circumstances ought to be considered in any demand made upon his time and means (for, when required, he must attend at his own expense), in aid of the bankruptcy proceedings. The right of a creditor to a full disclosure, at any cost to the bankrupt, must be conceded and enforced when demanded. But the court must determine in any given case, when this right has been exhausted.

In this case, the examination of the bankrupt and his bookkeeper, which was conducted with unusual ability, covering apparently every subject which might throw light upon the business transactions and property of the bankrupt, and making over three hundred folios of testimony, was on file in the register's office in October, 1874. In April, 1875, the bankrupt filed his petition for a discharge. Notice of this petition was first published on the 30th day of the same month, and on, or prior to the 13th of May, 1875, notice was forwarded by mail to the creditors who made the application now under consideration. They took no steps for any further examination of the bankrupt until the last day for filing specifications of the grounds of their opposition to his discharge. They do not in their application impeach the thoroughness or the good faith of the examination on file; they do not set forth, except in general and vague terms, any defect or ambiguity in it, or any lack of detail which needs explanation or amplification. They do not even specify any general ground of objection to the bankrupt's discharge, concerning which they need data to frame a sufficient specification, except the single one that Oberholser & Keefer were influenced by a pecuniary consideration to withdraw from and discontinue the examination. To this, it may be said that no offer was made to renew the examination after the 19th of October, and, so far as the files in my office shed any light on the transaction, the stipulation to discontinue related principally to the reexamination of the claim of Mrs. Frisbie, and only, as an incidental result, to the examination of the bankrupt. These creditors wait until the very last day when such an application as the one they made could be of any advantage to them; they are obliged to invoke, and they have received the favor of the court, to enable them to make it, and, owing to causes which cannot always be controlled, and for which no blame need be imputed to either party, these proceedings, on their motion, have now been pending nearly five months. The fact that such delays are, to a considerable extent, unavoidable in proceedings like these—the disadvantage of which, whoever may be the occasion of them—falls upon the bankrupt, is, as it appears to me, a sufficient reason why such applications as this, unless supported by positive and undeniable merits, ought to be denied.

I have not noticed the question, whether all that has been here said does not apply more properly to the issuing of the order on which the bankrupt and the witnesses were summoned rather than to the right of the bankrupt to refuse to be examined when actually before the register, in obedience to the order. The point was expressly waived by the parties when before me, but, as a question of practice, it may be thought worthy of the attention of the court. Such orders are always granted ex parte. Convenience in practice makes it necessary that applications for such orders should be so entertained and disposed of; and being granted ex parte, the bankrupt, when appearing in pursuance to the order, should be allowed to make any objection, or raise any question which would be proper, if an opportunity to be heard had been afforded him before the order was granted. This practice, I think, a convenient one; and with this construction of the effect of the order, no injustice can result from it.

I am therefore of opinion that the creditors are not entitled to the general order for the examination of the bankrupt they have obtained; and that the objection of the bankrupt to an examination under it, ought to be sustained.

D. M. Dickinson, for bankrupt.

District Court, E. D. Michigan. 1871.

BANKRUPTCY—HEARING ON SPECIFICATIONS IN OPPOSITION TO DISCHARGE.

On filing the specifications in opposition to a bankrupt's discharge, the hearing upon the petition is at once transferred into court by section 4 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]; therefore there cannot be any examination of the bankrupt by the creditors before a register, on the application by the bankrupt for a discharge. If creditors desire a further examination of the bankrupt before the register, to be used by them in opposing his discharge, they must proceed under section 26 of said act.

I, Benjamin J. Brown, one of the registers of said court in bankruptcy, do hereby certify that in the course of the proceedings in this matter before me, a question arose pertinent to the proceedings, which was stated and agreed to by the counsel for the opposing parties, to wit: J. M. Smith and George B. Brooks, who appeared for the assignee and sundry creditors, and John J. Wheeler, who appeared for said bankrupts [S. F. and C. S. Frizelle]. On the joint petition of said bankrupts, it was ordered that a hearing be had thereon on the thirty-first day of December, eighteen hundred and seventy. By consent the hearing was adjourned from time to time to the fourth day of March inst. On that day counsel for the assignee and creditors asked to examine Seymour F. Frizelle, one of said bankrupts, as to the disposition of his property, to which counsel for said bankrupt objected on the ground that he had already been examined by them upon the subject; which, as a matter of fact, is true, said bankrupt having been examined at great length in the month of April, in the year eighteen hundred and seventy, by the same counsel. The objection being made, I declined to proceed with the examination except on cause shown. Thereupon Mr. Smith made the subjoined affidavit, which, in the opinion of the register, did not show such cause. If the right to enter upon the examination had existed at the day fixed for the hearing, it could of course be exercised on any day to which it was adjourned—the hearing being continuous. The showing, therefore, as to the inadvertence was immaterial; and the fact of any examination having occurred at the hearing assumed in the affidavit was not well founded. There had been no "former examination" or any examination whatever at the hearing. The register is not only desirous, but even anxious, that the fullest opportunity should be allowed for the examination of a bankrupt, but he is constrained to follow a rule which he deems not only reasonable, but well established. In re Adams [Case No. 40]; In re Isidor [Id. 7-105]. The bankrupt took the oath prescribed by section 29 of the bankrupt act, and the hearing was adjourned to the eighteenth instant, at nine o'clock a. m., without prejudice.

"Irving M. Smith, being duly sworn, says that he is the attorney of Farrand, Sheley & Co., Dr. D. Jaynes & Sons, J. C. Ayer & Co., and other creditors of said bankrupts; that on the former examination of said bankrupt, upon his application for a discharge, he, deponent, inadvertently omitted to examine said Seymour F. Frizelle upon a material point bearing upon the question as to whether he is entitled to the discharge asked for, and that as the attorneys for said creditors, he now desires to proceed with said examination, and further says not. Irving M. Smith.

"Sworn and subscribed to before me, this fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and seventy one. Benj. J. Brown, Register."

LONGYEAR, District Judge. On the entry of appearance of creditors to oppose a discharge, all proceedings upon the petition for discharge are suspended until specifications shall be filed under section 31, and rule 24, except perhaps that the oath to be taken by the bankrupt to obtain his discharge as prescribed by section 29, may be administered. In re McVey [Case No. 8,932]. On filing the specifications, the hearing upon the petition is at once transferred into court by operation of section 4. It will be seen, therefore, that there could not be any examination of the bankrupts, or either of them, by creditors, on the application by the bankrupts for a discharge, before the register; because, if no specifications had been filed, and the time had not expired for filing the same, all proceedings upon the application were suspended. If the time for filing the specifications had expired, then the case stood as if no appearance to oppose had been entered, and of course no examination of the bankrupts by creditors could be called for by way of such opposition. If specifications had been filed, then the application was no longer before the register. So far, therefore, as the motion was for the examination of the bankrupts on their application for a discharge, the same was properly denied by the register. In re Mawson [Id. 9,317]; In re Puffer [Id. 11,459].

If the creditors desire a further examination of the bankrupts, or either of them, before the register, to be used by them in opposing a discharge, or for any other purpose, they must proceed under section 26. Such a proceeding may be entertained by the register, and any question arising thereon, proper to be certified, may be certified by him. The granting of such an application is, however, entirely in the discretion of the court, and I should be very much inclined to adopt the views and opinion of the register as to the justice and propriety of allowing such further examination, all previous examinations having been had before him, and the circumstances having a bearing upon the question being personally known to him.

BANKRUPTCY — APPLICATION BY CREDITOR FOR LEAVE TO FORECLOSE HIS MORTGAGE —NOTICE TO THE ASSIGNEE.

A petition by a secured creditor for leave to foreclose his mortgage, will be dismissed where no notice is shown to the court to have been given to the assignee of such application, and no proof made of the existence of the debt nor the amount.

[Cited in Re Haskell, Case No. 6,191; Re Haake, Id. 5,883; Phelps v. Sellick, Id. 11,079; Re Hufnagel, Id. 6,837.]

Application of Helen L. Derby, a secured creditor, for leave to foreclose her mortgage. The petition states that the petitioner holds a mortgage on certain real estate of the bankrupt [S. F. Frizelle], given by him before his bankruptcy, for eight hundred and forty-nine dollars, purchase money, in part of the mortgaged property, and that the property is worth not to exceed nine hundred dollars, and that the debt for which the mortgage is so held has not been proven in the bankruptcy proceedings. No notice of the application is shown to the court to have been given to the assignee, and no proof is made of the existence of the debt, or of its amount. To grant permission for a sale without previous proof of the claim, would be to assume as proved the facts upon which the right to the order is dependent. The court, therefore, holds that the mortgage debt must be first proved in the usual manner before the register, in the bankruptcy proceedings. It must be so proved as a secured claim. No dividends of course can be made upon it until after the property mortgaged has been sold, and the proceeds deducted from the debt as proven, when dividends may be made upon the balance, if any. This is the true meaning of section 20 [Act 1867 (14 Stat. 526)], deduced by construing the second paragraph and the last clause of the last paragraph, and section 22 together. After the claim has been thus duly proven in the bankruptcy proceedings, the creditor may, on due notice to the assignee, apply to the court to have the mortgaged property sold. See, also, In re Bigelow [Case No. 1,396]; In re Davis [Id. 3,618]; In re Ruehle [Id. 12,113]; In re Smith [Id. 12,934]. For the reasons above set forth the petition is dismissed.

BANKRUPTCY—QUORUM OF CREDITORS TO JOIN IN PETITION.

In determining whether the requisite number of creditors have joined in a petition under the amendment of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 178], only those are to be counted whose debts are unconditionally provable. Those claiming liens or holding security cannot be reckoned.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of Jacob Frost.]

McClellan & Hodges, for petitioning creditors.

Grant & Swift, for respondent.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The petition in this case was filed by eight of the creditors of respondent, the aggregate of whose debts amount to $8,944. To this respondent filed an answer, duly verified, stating, in substance, that the requisite number of his creditors had not joined in said petition, and with his said answer filed what purported to be a schedule or list of his creditors with the amount due each, to which some amendments were afterward made. The petitioning creditors having suggested, by way of reply to this denial, that the list of creditors so filed by the debtor was in many respects untrue, both as to the nature and amount of his debts, a reference was made to H. N. Hibbard, Esq., one of the registers of the court, to take proof and report as to the correctness of said list, and the number and amount of the provable debts against said respondent.

The register has filed his report, to which no exception is taken, from which it appears that the total number of creditors to whom the respondent is indebted in sums over $250 each, is twenty-six, the aggregate of whose debts amounts to $48,141 excluding the demands against him for state, county and municipal taxes now due and unpaid for the past year. Of the creditors thus enumerated, four, the aggregate of whose debts amounts to $22,200, are secured by mortgages, which so far are in no way impeached or attacked by these proceedings. One of the creditors named in said bill had obtained a judgment for the amount of his debt $843, in due course of legal procedure, before the petition was filed, for which he claims a lien on lands owned by debtor, and since the petition was filed seven creditors, the aggregate of whose debts amounts to $9,120, have entered up judgments, upon warrants of attorney, against the respondent in the state courts of this county, where respondent resides and owns real estate, so that if these proceedings are defeated, said judgments will become a lien upon the property of the respondent and give said judgment creditors a preference over the remainder of respondent's creditors. This leaves fourteen creditors whose debts exceed $250 each and the aggregate of whose debts amounts to $14,782, who have no security and have taken no steps which may ripen into security or priority. There are in addition to these creditors twelve persons named in the list whose claims amount to less than $250 each, and the aggregate of whose claims is $1,150.

Do these facts show that the requisite number of the creditors of respondent have joined in this petition?

By the amendment of the 22d of June last, to the general bankrupt law, the petitioners must constitute one-fourth in number of the creditors of the debtor and the aggregate of their debts provable under the bankrupt law must amount to at least one-third of the debts provable against the estate of the debtor in bankruptcy. It is clear that if all the creditors of the debtor, secured and unsecured, are to be counted for the purpose of instituting proceedings under the law as it now stands the requisite quorum has not concurred in this petition. The total number of creditors over $250 each is twenty-six, and there are twelve holding smaller amounts, so that eight joining in this petition do not constitute a fourth of even the smaller number. The aggregate debts of the respondent amount to $48,141, excluding taxes; and the aggregate represented by petitioners is only $8,944, which is far short of one-third of the whole.

The question is, what is meant by the phrase "debts provable under this act," as used in the amended 39th section. If it is intended to describe all the creditors of a person, who under any circumstances may prove their debts against the estate of a debtor in bankruptcy, then this petition obviously falls far short of the requisite number, while if the four creditors, who hold security by mortgage for their debts and the one has obtained a judgment in time to entitle him to a priority are to be excluded from the reckoning, then the petitioners constitute over a fourth in number, and the debts, $8,944, are a third in amount of the aggregate of those remaining after deducting the four mortgage debts and one judgment debt.

As will be seen: Total debts.....		$48,141
Mortgage debts.....	$22,200
Judgment	843
		23,043
Balance unsecured.....		$25,098
One-third of which is.....		8,366
Amount represented in petition.....		8,944
Total number of unsecured creditors..		21
One-fourth of whom is.....		5¼

The amended act does not specifically define what is meant by the phrase, "debts provable under this act," and we are obliged to resort to the whole law as it now stands amended to ascertain its meaning.

The 19th section of the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517] describes the various classes of creditors who are entitled to prove their debts.

By this, all debts due at the time of adjudication or at a future day, all contingent as well as absolute liabilities and certain unliquidated claims for damages are provable against the bankrupt's estate; and after enumerating all the various classes of debts so provable, it declares that "no debts other than those above specified shall be proved or allowed against the estate."

The 20th section provides that "when a creditor has a mortgage or pledge of real or personal property of the bankrupt, or a lien thereon for securing the payment of a debt owing to him from the bankrupt, he shall be admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt, after deducting the value of such property, to be ascertained by agreement between him and the assignee or by a sale thereof to be made in such manner as the court shall direct; or the creditor may release or convey his claim to the assignee upon such property and may be admitted to prove his whole debt. If the value of the property exceeds the sum for which it is so held as security, the assignee may release to the creditor the bankrupt's right of redemption on receiving such excess; or he may sell the property subject to the claim of the creditor thereon, and in either case the assignee and creditor respectively shall execute all deeds and writings necessary or proper to consummate the transaction. If the property is not so sold or released and delivered up, the creditor shall not be allowed to prove any part of his debt."

By the 21st section, it is provided: "That no creditor proving his debt or claim shall be allowed to maintain any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, but shall be deemed to have waived all right of action and suit against the bankrupt; and all proceedings already commenced or unsatisfied judgments already obtained thereon, shall be deemed to be discharged and surrendered thereby."

Other clauses might be quoted, but it seems to me those cited are sufficient to show that any creditor holding a secured claim or demand against the bankrupt, cannot prove his claim without first exhausting or surrendering his security. His secured debt may be in one sense provable, but only on conditions. And those conditions can only be performed after there is an assignee to whom the surrender of security can be made, or by a sale of the property as the court shall direct, both of which contingencies can only occur after the debtor is adjudged bankrupt, or at least after the court has taken jurisdiction of the subject matter. True, a secured or lien-holding creditor may be allowed to petition for adjudication against his debtor but only on condition of offering to surrender his security, while an unsecured creditor may proceed without any such condition to petition for adjudication and prove his debt.

It therefore seems evident to me that by the term "debts provable under act" congress meant debts unconditionally provable without any release or other preliminary action, either by the court or assignee, being necessary. Any other construction would make it practically impossible to put a very large proportion of debtors into bankruptcy, as it would leave unsecured creditors entirely at the mercy of those who had, by their diligence or otherwise, obtained security. A case may be readily supposed where a debtor has given enough of his creditors security under such circumstances as to amount to a fraudulent preference, to break the statutory quorum of one-fourth in number and one-third in amount of all his debts, and thereby prevent proceedings in bankruptcy from ever being maintained. A debtor might fully secure three fourths in number of his creditors holding two-thirds in amount of his debts in defiance of all the provisions of the bankrupt law for the prevention of fraud, and yet be secure from bankruptcy proceedings if secured creditors who, so far as known to the court, insist upon their security, are to be counted for the purpose of determining the requisite number of petitioning creditors.

As this petition, therefore, is signed by more than a fourth of the unsecured creditors of the debtor, whose claims in the aggregate amount to more than one third of the debts unconditionally provable against the respondent's estate in bankruptcy, I find upon the admitted facts in this case that the requisite number of creditors have joined in this petition.

I have not felt called upon to consider and determine the position occupied by those creditors who have entered judgment by confession since this petition was filed, as more than a fourth of the unsecured creditors, counting those judgment creditors as unsecured, have joined in this petition. The respondent is still at liberty to deny the acts of bankruptcy alleged in the petition, as this decision only determines that enough creditors have petitioned to put respondent on his defense upon the merits.

NOTE. This opinion was approved in Re Green Pond R. Co. [Case No. 5,786]. Where a question is made as to whether a sufficient number of creditors have joined in an involuntary petition, the case may be referred to a register or commissioner to examine the proofs and report thereon. In re Sargent [Id. 12 361]. BANKRUPTCY—PROVABLE DEBTS.

Whether a married woman may prove against the estate of a bankrupt firm, of which her husband was a member, the amount of a promissory note given by the firm to him for his contribution to capital stock—the money having been furnished by her, and the note transferred to her soon after its execution: Held, the note was not an evidence of debt against the firm, but against her husband only. She may prove as against her husband and participate in the dividends of his individual estate, but not against the partnership estate.

Before Hovey K. Clarke, Register in Bankruptcy.

I, the said register, do hereby certify that in the course of proceedings before me, the following question arose pertinent to the said proceedings, and was stated and agreed to by counsel for the opposing parties, to wit: Mr. Lothrop, who appeared for Mrs. Sarah A. Frost, a creditor, who has heretofore filed proof of her claim against said estate, and Mr. Dickinson, who appears for creditors who object to the allowance of said claim, and on whose petition an order has been made for the examination, to wit: Upon the facts shown by the proofs in this case, is the note presented by Mrs. Frost valid against the partnership in her hands, and entitled to be proven and allowed as a claim against the partnership assets? And the parties requested that the same should be certified to the judge for his opinion thereon.

Facts: On the 1st of March, 1864, the bankrupts entered into partnership under written articles of that date, which partnership by its terms was to continue to the 1st of March, 1869. The articles also provided, that "the capital stock of said concern is to be thirteen thousand dollars, and is to be contributed as follows, to wit: R. H. Frost is to put in ten thousand five hundred dollars, and Lewis Westfall is to put in two thousand five hundred dollars, and the firm is to issue notes to the parties for said capital, and pay annual interest on the same, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum; said capital stock is to be left in the concern until the expiration of the copartnership." The profits of the business were to be equally divided. A note was delivered to each partner in accordance with the articles—one to Frost for ten thousand five hundred dollars, and one to Westfall for two thousand five hundred dollars. The note given to Frost is the claim which Mrs. Frost seeks to prove against the estate of the bankrupts. The following is a copy of it: "$10,500. Jackson, March 1, 1864. One day after date we promise to pay to the order of R. H. Frost ten thousand five hundred dollars, with interest seven per cent., payable annually, value received. (Signed) Frost & Westfall. (Stamped.)" Copy indorsement: "Pay Sarah A. Frost or order. (Signed) R. H. Frost." The testimony taken on the re-examination of the claim of Mrs. Frost, shows that for several years before the formation of the firm of Frost & Westfall, Mr. Frost, her husband, had been a member of the firm of Frost & Crittenden, the capital stock of which was composed in part of a sum or sums of money which Mrs. Frost had furnished her husband to put into the business. At the dissolution of the firm of Frost & Crittenden, Mrs. Frost held the note of that firm for money advanced by her and put into the business, for about the sum of six thousand dollars, which was taken to be the value of the property of Frost & Crittenden, which was transferred to the new firm of Frost & Westfall; that Mrs. Frost, about a month before this time, put into the hands of her husband to put into the business of the new firm, the further sum of four thousand dollars, which, with the six thousand dollars already mentioned, and perhaps some other items not specified, constituted the sum of ten thousand five hundred dollars, which Frost, by his articles of partnership with Westfall was to contribute to the capital stock of the firm of Frost & Westfall, and for which the note presented in this case was given. The precise time when the note was delivered by Mr. Frost to his wife is not stated. Mrs. Frost says, it was "at the time or very soon after it was made." Mr. Frost says that he did not have the note "until the firm had been formed," and he thinks it "was written a few days after it was dated." The date was March 1, 1864—the date of the articles of copartnership.

Opinion of the Register.

It is contended on behalf of Mrs. Frost that the note appended to her deposition is evidence of an indebtedness which existed on the day of its date from the firm of Frost & Westfall to Richard H. Frost, one of its members, from whom she received it for an actual consideration paid to him equal to the full amount of the note, and it is claimed that a debt due by a firm to one of its members, when evidenced by a note and that note in the hands of a third person bona fide, may be proved against the firm in all respects like any other obligation of the firm.

The first inquiry is, was this in fact an indebtedness on the date of the note by the firm of Frost & Westfall to R. H. Frost? The articles of copartnership show that Frost & Westfall had agreed with each other to become partners, that Frost should pay into the common stock of the firm ten thousand five hundred dollars, and Westfall should pay two thousand five hundred dollars, and that these sums, when paid, should be "left in the concern until the expiration of the copartnership," which was to be five years thereafter. By this agreement Frost & Westfall were each the debtors of the firm until the sum to be contributed by each was paid. The payment of the sum, therefore, did not create a debt from Frost & Westfall to Frost; it simply discharged an obligation from Frost to Frost & Westfall, and the note which was given was simply the evidence of that fact, given in the form which the articles required. The note, construed with reference to these articles, had no other legal effect than a receipt or certificate that the payee, R. H. Frost, held of the capital stock of the firm of Frost & Westfall twenty-one twenty-sixths of the whole. Westfall held a similar note representing five twenty-sixths of the stock. These notes were made payable one day after date. They were dated on the 1st of March, 1864, though written within, as Mr. Frost thinks, "a few days after." It cannot be possible that either of the partners supposed that these notes could properly be passed into the hands of a third party, and thus at any time enforced against the firm as negotiable promissory notes. To suppose this is to suppose that after having mutually agreed that the capital stock contributed by each should be "left in the concern until the expiration of the partnership," they should give each other notes by which either partner could, through the intervention of a third party, compel the surrender of the capital contributed by him at any time after four days, when the one day notes would mature, from the commencement of the five years of its proposed duration. If Mr. Frost delivered his note to his wife in order to enable her at her option to exercise any such power as this, it was in fraud of the rights of his partner, as well as against the creditors of the firm. If, however, he delivered the note to her as an evidence of his debt to her for money borrowed to "put into the business," as Mrs. Frost testifies it was, the delivery would probably operate as an equitable assignment of his interest in the firm to the extent that would be due upon it at the expiration of the copartnership. This would be a proper and legitimate use of it, but it would be no evidence of a debt against Frost & Westfall, and the attempt to employ it as such in this case is clearly against the rights of Westfall, and especially of the creditors of the firm.

There is, however, another inquiry necessary to a full consideration of the case—the claim being in the form of a negotiable promissory note, whether Mrs. Frost can claim the rights of a holder acquiring the note before maturity, and without notice of the equities affecting it. The proof is not clear whether she actually received it before or after maturity. It had but four days to run, and it would seem probable from Mr. Frost's testimony, that it was past due before it was made and signed. The probability is therefore against her having received it before maturity. She testifies, however, to some knowledge as to the true character of the transaction out of which the note grew. She had lent money before to her husband to put into the business of Frost & Crittenden, and she lends this for the same purpose. Just what this meant or what was the effect of lending this money to her husband for this purpose, as related to her husband's partner and the creditors of the firm, she may not have known herself. The whole affair was managed by her husband, to arrange when, and as he saw fit; and it becomes a very serious question, whether a married woman may employ her husband to manage her individual estate, and not charge herself with notice of all facts known to him, which may affect his transactions on her behalf. The power of a married woman to deal directly with her own personal property in the manner shown by this case, is of recent origin; and the books afford but little light upon the extent to which her husband may, by his acts, affect her rights when dealing with her property. But when the confidential relation of husband and wife is considered, and especially the extent to which wives confide to their husbands the management of their estates, it is easy to see that the grossest abuses may arise if a wife be allowed to assert her right against her husband's creditors, on the ground of ignorance of facts which were well-known to him. I strongly incline to the opinion, that in all such cases the knowledge of the husband of the facts affecting the wife's property, which he is managing by her consent, must be regarded as the knowledge of the wife. In this case, Mrs. Frost knew what her husband was going to do with her money. She knew he was going to put it into his business with Westfall. He put it in as capital contributed by him. So Westfall understood it. She, I think, must be charged with the knowledge of the disposition her husband made of it, and though she may not know the difference between lending money to a firm and contributing a partner's share to the capital stock of the firm, the law will determine her rights according to the facts, as they are shown to exist; and thus having knowledge, or being legally charged with the consequences of the knowledge, that the note she took was not evidence of a debt due from the firm of Frost & Westfall, she cannot be allowed to prove it against the partnership estate. As a debt against R. H. Frost, and entitled to participate in any dividend of the proceeds of his individual estate, I see no objection to its being allowed.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. I fully concur in and approve of the foregoing views and conclusions of the register.

CONTRACTS AGAINST PUBLIC POLICY—INDUCEMENT TO SEPARATION OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

[A father, in consideration of love and affection, gave a bond to pay to his daughter and her husband, if they should become reunited, $6,000 annually, one-half to each, so long as they should live together as husband and wife, and in case they again be separated, for any cause save death, he should then pay $50,000 to the husband. Held, that the two obligations were separate, and that the latter was void, as against public policy, and that, even if they were considered as connected, the effect would be to render both void.]

Action of debt on a bond. The declaration set forth the bond, which recited the consideration of love and affection for the obligor's daughter, who was the wife of plaintiff, and bound the obligor to pay, "during the term of my life, the sum of six thousand dollars annually, * * * one-half each," to the plaintiff and his wife, "provided that said payments shall be made and commenced only at and from the time at which the said" plaintiff and his wife "shall be reunited and live together as husband and wife, which is understood to be the day of the date hereof, and said payments shall continue only during my life, and the time during which the said" persons "shall live together as aforesaid, and, if at any time they shall, from any cause, or by the death of either of them, cease to live together as husband and wife, such payments * * * shall wholly cease and be at an end; and in the event of the ending of the conjugal relation as aforesaid between them from any cause whatever except by the death of either of them, I bind myself to pay to said" plaintiff "the sum of fifty thousand dollars"; it then alleged that after the execution of the bond, viz., in 1866, "the said plaintiff and his said wife did cease to live together as husband and wife, and the conjugal relation did end between them, and that without the death of either"; the death of the obligor in 1864, and administration of defendant, and the demand of and refusal to pay the said sum of fifty thousand dollars. To this declaration defendant demurred, and assigned for reasons: (1) For that said alleged agreement is illegal, against the policy of the law, and void; and (2) that the averment that said conjugal relation ended by the ceasing to live together of said plaintiff and his wife is not sufficiently made, and such ceasing to live together is not an ending of the conjugal relation.

Mr. Miller and Geo. W. Biddle, for demurrer, handed up brief, citing Jones v. Waite, 7 Scott, 317; Durant v. Titley, 7 Price, 577; Westmeath v. Salisbury, 5 Bligh (N. S.) 339; and Hitner's Appeal, 4 P. F. Smith [54 Pa. St.] 110,—but were not called on.

Mr. Sellers (with whom was Mr. Diehl), contra, argued: That the moving cause for giving the bond was evidently the "re-uniting" of the husband and wife; that it could not be said, as matter of law, that the receipt of the $50,000 was more advantageous to the plaintiff than the keeping up of the annuity; that unless the obligor intended to give an inducement to separation, the bond is good; and (in answer to a question by the court) that the $50,000 and the annuity should be taken together as an entire consideration.

THE COURT (CADWALADER, District Judge) entered judgment for defendant on the demurrer; being of opinion that, though the allegation that plaintiff and his wife "ceased to live together" was probably sufficient, as the instrument sued on seemed to define that as a "ceasing of the conjugal relation" by the words "as aforesaid," yet the demurrer must be sustained for the first reason assigned, the two obligations (viz., to pay the annuity and to pay the $50,000) being entirely distinct; and, even if they could be connected, the effect would only be to render both void.

PATENTS — EFFECT OF SURRENDER AND REISSUE ON PENDING SUIT FOR INFRINGEMENT.

After a bill in equity had been filed for the infringement of a patent for an invention, the patent was surrendered, and a reissued patent was granted. The plaintiff then moved for leave to file a supplemental bill founded on the reissued patent and for an injunction: Held, that the motions must be denied, on the ground that, by the surrender and reissue, the suit was at an end, and that the plaintiff must proceed by original bill founded on the reissued patent.

[This was a bill for an injunction by William F. Fry against Jeremiah Quinlan.]

George H. Yeaman, for plaintiff.

Charles Goepp, for defendant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The original bill was filed under a patent which has been since surrendered under the statute (Rev. St. § 4914). Upon the surrender, a new patent was issued according to the same statute. Thereupon, the complainant applies for leave to file a supplemental bill founded upon the reissued patent, and asks for an injunction.

In the case of Moffitt v. Garr, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 273, Mr. Justice Nelson, giving the opinion of the supreme court upon the effect of section 13 of the act of congress of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 122), says: "The construction given to this section, * * * and the practice under it, in case of a surrender and reissue, are, that the pending suits fall with the surrender. A surrender of the patent to the commissioner, within the sense of the provision, means an act which, in judgment of law, extinguishes the patent. It is a legal cancellation of it, and hence can no more be the foundation for the assertion of a right after the surrender, than could an act of congress, which has been repealed. It has frequently been determined, that suits pending, which rest upon an act of congress, fall with the repeal of it. The reissue of the patent has no connection with, or bearing upon, antecedent suits; it has as to subsequent suits. The antecedent suits depend upon the patent existing at the time they were commenced, and, unless it exists and is in force at the time of trial and judgment, the suits fail." It is true that the point decided in that case was, that the surrender barred an action at law for a previous infringement; but the ground upon which the decision is put is equally applicable to a suit in equity. The right is the same in either case; the remedy only is different. It is not perceived how a surrendered patent can be the foundation of relief in equity any more than at law. The case of Dental Vulcanite Co. v. Weth-erbee [Case No. 3,810] is referred to in support of the complainant's motion; but the case only shows that, in the district of Massachusetts, it is in fact the usual practice to file a supplemental bill upon a reissued patent, in aid of a bill based upon the original patent before its surrender. It does not appear how, or upon what view of the rights of the parties, that practice was established. The statute only declares that the reissued patent, with the corrected specification, "shall have the same effect and operation in law, on the trial of all actions for causes thereafter arising, as if the same had been originally filed in such corrected form." Rev. St. § 4916. But this declaration gives no countenance to the idea, that the reissued patent can be availed of to sustain and render effectual a suit the basis of which is taken away by the act of the party in surrendering his patent. It is not in general the function of a supplemental bill to restore or renew a cause of action which has ceased to exist. Such a bill, on the contrary, rests on the equity of the original bill, and seeks to apply it under altered circumstances, but in the enforcement of the same right. Taking this view of the law, the complainant is not entitled to file the supplemental bill, and, of course, is not entitled to the preliminary injunction prayed for.

In order to avail himself of any rights he may have upon the facts stated in the supplemental bill, the complainant must proceed by original bill founded on the reissued patent, as was done in Orr v. Badger [Case No. 10,587].

The motions must be denied.

COURTS — JURISDICTION — SUIT BY ASSIGNEE OF PROMISSORY NOTE—NEGOTIABILITY OF NOTE.

1. Where an action is brought by the assignee of a promissory note or bill, the declaration must show that the assignor could have sued in this court.

[Cited in Chamberlain v. Eckert, Case No. 2,577.]

2. A note for a certain sum payable in current bank notes is not negotiable.

[This was an action at law by George Fry against H. Rousseau. Heard on demurrer to the declaration.]

Mr. Hand, for plaintiff.

Mr. Butler, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought upon the following note: "Six months after date, I promise to pay to the order of W. T. Williard, at the Bank of Michigan, in Detroit, Michigan, six hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty-six cents, for value received in current bank notes, receivable at the counter of said bank."

To the first count in the declaration the defendant demurred specially. 1. Because the statement in the declaration does not show, that the court has jurisdiction of the cause. It contains no averment that the original promisee, W. T. Williard, through whom the plaintiff claims to recover, is an alien or citizen of another state. This is a fatal objection. "Where a suit is brought against a remote indorser, and the plaintiff in his declaration traces his title through an intermediate indorser, without showing that this intermediate indorser could have sustained his action in the courts of the United States, those courts have no jurisdiction." Mallen et al. v. Torrence, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 537; Bank of Kentucky v. Wistar, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 320. These decisions are made under the 11th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 78], which provides, that "no district or circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange."

The other ground of demurrer is, whether a note to pay a sum of money in current bank paper, is negotiable. There is nothing in the Michigan statute which regulates the negotiability of promissory notes, variant from the English rule. A note to be negotiable must be payable in money. Chit. Bills (Ed. 1839) 152. This point was considered and decided in Hasbrook v. Palmer [Case No. 6,188].

The demurrer is sustained on both grounds.

PATENTS—APPLICATION—FOREIGN USE.

[A statement by a person that he saw the process in question used in a foreign country before the date of plaintiff's application, and himself used it in this country subsequent thereto, is not proof that it had been patented, or described in any publication in this or any foreign country, within Act 1836, § 15 (5 Stat. 117), or had been in prior public use or sale with the applicant's allowance; and is not sufficient, as against the applicant's oath that he is the original discoverer, to justify the commissioner in refusing letters patent.]

Appeal [by Thomas Fry and Charles A. Seely] from the decision of the commissioner of patents, refusing to grant them a patent "for a mode of backing up photographic pictures on glass."

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The appellants state their claim to be for the process of using wax, stearine, spermaceti or other substances or compositions substantially the same for the purpose of backing up, and as a medium of color for the chemitype, and other pictures or designs on glass. The application was filed Nov. 22, 1855. The acting commissioner adopts the report of the examiners of May 11, 1859, in his decision dated May 12, 1859. The report after stating the references says: "We ourselves think after a careful examination and comparison of the references that it must be admitted that the process claimed by the applicants in its minute details, and the relations of those details with each other is not indicated by any of the references in unmistakable and exact terms, whatever they may imply or suggest. We are therefore indisposed in the face of declarations made under oath, especially in the absence on our part of a practical knowledge of the act, to determine that this officer would be justified in view alone of the references in still refusing the letters, and thus deprive the parties of all opportunity of testing the question in the courts. We should accordingly have recommended an allowance of the patent, but for the fact that we are informed by Mr. Woodly, an English artist residing in this city on E street near Pennsylvania avenue, that of his personal knowledge, Walter P. Davis photographist, then residing at Chelsea, London, practiced the plan of coloring photographic pictures on glass by applying the colors to the varnish with which the impression had been previously covered, as early as the spring of 1855, and that he himself has been constantly practicing the same method for more than two years. A reference to the claim of the applicants will show their process to be substantially, if not identically, the same device, if the applicants still show their qualities of refracting and transmitting rays of light cannot be considered other than an equivalent of wax. We recommend a final refusal of the patent."

The following reasons of appeal were filed: —Firstly, because the mere ex parte statements of an individual, not under oath nor even in writing are not evidence, and can never be regarded as such. Secondly, because the mere prior use of an invention or discovery in a foreign country without its ever having been patented there or described in some printed publication, will not prevent the issuing of a patent to an original inventor in the United States. Thirdly, in the case now under investigation there is not even an allegation, much less proof, that this invention or discovery was ever known or used in the United States. Fourthly, and lastly, because the present applicants filed their application for a patent for the invention or discovery in question long prior to the time at which the informant Woodly alleges that he first commenced to use and practice a similar method.

On this state of the case, all the original papers and documents were duly laid before me, and with the argument in writing of the counsel for the appellant submitted for consideration. The matter involved in and covered by the reasons of appeal appears to be the objection to the facts related by Woodly to the commisioner in a conversation with him on the subject of the invention claimed in this case as stated by the commissioner. What ought to be the legal course of the commissioner in his official examination of his inventions under section 7 of the act of 1836, I shall refrain from saying, intending to confine my remarks to the point before me, and only so far as made necessary for my decision. Suppose then the commissioner has as stated by him, correctly obtained the information, what effect is to be given to it? It does not prove that prior to the alleged invention in this case by the applicant, it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent or allowance prior to his application. The application in this case was made years before the time when Woodly says he used it. The oath of the party himself, made according to the requirements of the law and with its sanction, is entitled to some weight in considering a question of this kind, and he swears that he verily believes that he is the original and first inventor or discoverer of said invention set forth in his specification, and that he does not know or believe that the same was ever before known or used. The latter clause of section 15 of the same act, which of course must be taken together with section 7 just alluded to, is very explicit. It is in these words: "Whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that the patentee at the time of making his application for the patent believed himself to be the first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, the same shall not be void on account of the invention or discovery or any part thereof having been before known or used in any foreign country, it not appearing that the same or any substantial part thereof had before been patented or described in any printed publication." These provisions of the statute seem to me to be directly applicable to the facts constituting the point, and are conclusive to show that the commissioner erred in refusing to grant the letters patent, and the said decision is accordingly reversed, annulled and set aside, and it is hereby ordered and directed that a patent be accordingly issued to said applicants for their invention as prayed.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1828.

CONDITION OF ARBITRATION-BOND—AWARD.

When the condition of an arbitration-bond is to abide by the award of J. P. and S. B. ("and a third person to be chosen by them in case they should not agree upon an award,") the award need not state why it is signed by the three arbitrators, nor that the third person was appointed in writing; nor that the two named had disagreed before they appointed the third.

[This was an action at law by Nathaniel Frye, Jr., against Jesse Scott.]

Debt for $200, the penalty of an arbitration-bond to abide by the award "of Jacob Paine and Samuel Boucher, and a third person to be chosen or agreed upon by them, in case they should not agree upon an award, or any two of them."

Mr. Worthington and R. P. Dunlop, objected that the award, which was signed and sealed by the three arbitrators, did not state why it was made by three when only two were named in the bond; and that there was no written evidence of the appointment of Frederick Perley, the third person who signed the award; and cited Caldw. Arb. 42, and Still v. Halford, 4 Camp. 17.

Mr. Hellen, contra. Perley was not an umpire, but an arbitrator with the others, and equally within the submission.

THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objections, saying that it was not necessary that the appointment of Perley, by the two other arbitrators should be in writing; nor that the award should state that the two had disagreed before they appointed Perley. These facts may be proved by parol. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff.

FUENTES et al. v. GAINES.

[1 Woods, 112.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1871.

EQUITY—MOTION OR PETITION TO STAY PROCEEDINGS—WILLS—VALIDITY — CONCLUSIVENESS OF PROBATE — ADMINISTRATION OF STATE LAWS BY FEDERAL COURTS.

1. If, in a case in equity any circumstances exist which render it improper or inequitable to carry on proceedings in the court, they can always be brought to the notice of the court by motion or petition in the suit; or may be pleaded in bar or abatement. A formal bill for the purpose is needless litigation.

2. Under the law of Louisiana the probate of a will is not conclusive against parties in possession of property which is sought to be recovered from them by virtue of it, unless they were parties litigant in the probate proceedings.

3. When the validity of a will is brought in question incidentally on question of title to property, it is open for investigation in any court in which the title may be litigated, whether a state court or a court of the United States.

4. The United States courts in attempting to administer state laws must do so fairly, so as to secure to suitors all their just rights under those laws; otherwise, they may be the means of much injustice and oppression.

[See Bennett v. Boggs, Case No. 1,319.]

5. When, in a chancery suit in the United States courts, a question of title to property is involved in the validity of a will, parties to the suit who are not barred by prescription, waiver, estoppel or some other supervening cause, may contest its validity by answer, or by proceedings in the court of probate for a revocation of the probate, or in both methods.

Bills in equity, heard on motion for injunction.

E. T. Merrick and J. Q. A. Fellows, for complainant.

Miles Taylor and J. McConnell, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This is a bill for injunction to stay proceedings in this court.

I have been unable to find any precedent for such a bill; and I cannot see the necessity of it. If any circumstances exist which render it improper or inequitable to carry on proceedings in this court, they can always be brought to the notice of the court by motion or petition in the suit, or may be pleaded in bar or abatement. A formal bill for such a purpose seems to me to be needless litigation, and I shall direct the bill as such to be dismissed, but allow it to stand as a petition in the several suits sought to be suspended, not requiring the complainant to file any formal answer or other pleading thereto.

Supposing the matter to be properly brought before the court on petition and motion thereon, the question arises whether the proceedings in this court ought be stayed, pending the suit brought in the Second district court of the parish of Orleans for the revocation of the will of Daniel Clark.

The solution of this question depends upon that of a prior one; whether the defendants in the cases pending in this court are entitled further to litigate the will of Daniel Clark on which the complainant's claim is based.

From an examination of the law of Louisiana, I am satisfied that the probate of a will is not conclusive against parties in possession of property which is sought to be recovered from them by virtue of it, unless they were parties litigant in the probate proceedings. It may be and probably is prima facie evidence of the validity of the will, but it does not prevent the defendants from showing the will to be invalid. Bouthemy v. Dreux, 10 Mart. [La.] 1; O'Donogan v. Knox, 11 La. 389; Robert v. Allier, 17 La. 5; Rachal v. Rachal, 1 Rob. [La.] 115; Duplessis v. Lombard, 10 Rob. [La.] 193; Sophie v. Duplessis, 2 La. Ann. 725; Succession of Dupuy, 4 La. Ann. 571; Abston v. Abston, 15 La. Ann. 137. This is analogous to the rule which prevails in England and in several states of this country as to wills of real estate. In this state it seems to apply to wills of all kinds of property.

While this is the general rule, I do not mean to decide any subsidiary question which may arise in these cases—such as whether the defendants are prescribed by lapse of time to contest the will or the probate thereof. Such questions will be properly decided when they arise in each case. But being satisfied that the general rights of the defendants are such as I have stated, the next inquiry is, In what manner shall they be allowed to raise the issue?

If it were a new question, I should unhesitatingly say that they could raise it in this court; and could either require a decision upon it from the court itself, as upon one of the necessary questions in the cause or upon a separate issue of devisavit vel non. If the defendants are not concluded by the probate, I see no reason why they cannot contest the validity of the will in these suits. It was never supposed that the validity of a will of real estate could not be questioned in a chancery suit, where it was set up as a ground of recovery or defense. It is true that the court has refused to entertain a suit for setting aside a will on the ground of its having been obtained by fraud. But in all other cases the well known issue of devisavit vel non shows that the court has entertained jurisdiction of the validity of wills of land from time immemorial, whenever the question has properly arisen in an equity suit. If it has not entertained like jurisdiction with regard to wills of personalty, it has been because the probate thereof, in the ecclesiastical courts of England, and in the probate courts of the other states, have always been deemed conclusive upon all persons.

In the case of Gaines v. Relf, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 650, the court seems to consider that there would be no difficulty in testing in this court the will of 1811 by an issue of devisavit vel non: and from a careful examination of the opinion of the supreme court in the case of Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 553, I am satisfied that the court regarded the validity of the will of 1813 as open to contestation in the circuit court. It was expressly conceded that the admission of the will to probate did not exclude any one who might desire to contest the will with Mrs. Gaines from doing it in a direct proceeding, or from using any means of defense by way of answer or exception, whenever she should use the probate as a muniment of title. The court moreover says: "And the probate does not conclude Relf and Chew, or any other parties having an interest to do so, to oppose the will when it shall be set up against them, by such defenses as the law will permit in like cases. It was with those qualifications of the probate of the will of 1813 that the case was tried in the court below, and they have been constantly in our minds in the trial of the appeal here." Page 558. The court then says: "It is due to the merits of the controversy to advert to the decisions of the probate court of the Second district of New Orleans and to that of the supreme court, reversing it, more minutely than has been done, especially, too, as they are coincident with our conclusions upon the testimony regarding the execution by Mr. Clark of his olographic will of 1813, and the concealment of destruction of it after his death." It thus appears that the court was prepared to examine the question of the validity of the will on its merits, had it been directly attacked, and had the question been directly raised in the pleadings. But it was not so raised in that case nor in the subsequent case of Gaines v. City of New Orleans, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 642. In these cases the defendants contented themselves with contending that the probate was null and void, because the probate of the prior will of 1811 had not been directly revoked. This point being ruled against them, the will of 1813 stood unassailed upon the probate awarded by the supreme court of Louisiana, which was regarded as conclusive until the contrary should be shown. It is true that in the case of Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 703, it is said: "When a will is duly probated by a state court of competent jurisdiction, that probate is conclusive of the validity and contents of the will in this court."

But it was not necessary to decide this point in that case, and whilst the remark is strictly true with regard to wills of personalty in nearly every state in the Union, it is not true with regard to wills of realty in many states; and I do not suppose it to be true with regard to wills of either realty or personalty in Louisiana. If the state courts are not bound by the probate, I do not see why the United States courts should be bound thereby. I am referred to the opinion of this court delivered in May term, 1870, upon an application of Mrs. Gaines to remove into this court proceedings instituted in the Second district of the parish of Orleans by Fuentes and others for the revocation of the probate of the will of 1813.

We then held that we had not probate jurisdiction and could not entertain the questions which were raised in that case. Such is still my opinion. But that is where the direct object of the proceeding is the granting or revocation of probate; not when the validity of the will comes up incidentally on a question of property. The probate of the will is granted for the purpose of administering the estate of the deceased, and confers authority upon the executor to do all things necessary to that end.

But if the executor of any other person claims, by virtue of the will, property in the possession of a third person, who was not a party to the probate proceedings, and who claimed by a title adverse to the will, such third person is not concluded as to its validity by the probate.

Such I understand to be the laws of Louisiana, and when the validity of the will is brought in question in this incidental way, it is open for investigation in any court in which the title of the property may be litigated, whether a state court or a court of the United States.

If, then, the defendants are not concluded by the probate of 1856, but have still the right, unless barred by prescription, waiver, estoppel, or some other supervening cause, to contest the will under which the complainant claims, they ought in some way to have the benefit of the right. The United States courts, in attempting to administer state laws, must do so fairly, so as to secure to suitors all their just rights under those laws, otherwise they might be the means of much injustice and oppression.

We, then, come back to the question whether proceedings ought to be stayed in this court in the several cases referred to, until the defendants can bring to a termination the proceedings instituted by them in the Second district court of New Orleans for a revocation of the probate granted in 1856—of course, the application cannot be entertained in reference to the cases that have gone to a decree. They must be regarded as concluded. It can only be entertained in reference to those cases which are still undetermined, none of which, as I understand it, are now at issue.

Answers are yet to be filed therein.

In view of the considerations which I have before stated, it is competent for the defendants to contest the validity of the will, either by answer in these cases, or by proceedings for a revocation of the probate in the parish court, or in both of the methods. Under these circumstances stay of proceedings in this court is a matter entirely in the discretion of the court. Had the defendants promptly resorted to the district court for redress, I should have felt it my duty to suspend proceedings here until they could have had a fair opportunity to get the decision of the parish court. But, as the supreme court remarks, in Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 703, the probate has been allowed to rest now for twelve years (now fifteen years), and it seems to me unreasonable to tie the hands of the complainant. I think I am bound in all the causes to proceed if the complainant shall so elect; and if the defendants are successful in procuring a revocation of the probate in the parish court before the closing of testimony in this court, they will then have the benefit of it; otherwise they must depend on a contestation of the will in the causes pending here.

The application is refused.

SUIT BY ADMINISTRATOR—BOND TO HIS INTESTATE.

In a declaration by an administrator upon a bond to his intestate he must aver himself to be administrator, and make profert of his letters of administration.

Debt, on bond to Gerrard Fugate, by his administrator. The declaration commences thus: "Washington County, to wit: Jeremiah W. Bronaugh was attached to answer unto Joseph Fugate, administrator, &c., of Gerrard Fugate, deceased, of a plea that he render to the said Joseph $1000, whereupon the said Joseph, by C. C. Lee, his attorney, complains," &c. The declaration contains no averment that the plaintiff was administrator, nor a profert of the letters of administration. The defendant demurred specially for several assigned causes, but not for want of such an averment and profert.

But THE COURT, considering it a good cause of general demurrer, rendered judgment for the defendant, for want of an averment that the plaintiff was administrator, and for want of a profert of the letters of administration.

[2 Story, 327;[1] 5 Law Rep. 210.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1842.

WILLS — DEVISE OF REAL PROPERTY — WHEN IT TAKES EFFECT—ACCEPTANCE—DISCLAIMER—BANKRUPTCY OF DEVISEE—PROBATE.

1. In a devise of real estate, the title passes to the devisee at the death of the testator, and the probate of the will relates back to that time.

[Cited in Burns v. Travis, 117 Ind. 49, 18 N. E. 45.]

2. A devise by will vests in the devisee only upon his consent thereto; but when the devise is plainly for his benefit, as if it be of an unconditional fee, without trust or incumbrance, his consent will be presumed, and some solemn act is required to constitute a disclaimer or renunciation thereof.

[Cited in Drury v. Natick, 10 Allen 182; Allison v. Smith, 16 Mich. 420.]

3. The provision in the Revised Statutes of Maine (chapter 92, § 25), in relation to the probate of wills, is merely affirmative of the law, as it antecedently stood.

[Approved in Adams v. De Cook, Case No. 51. Cited in Brooks v. McComb, 38 Fed. 320.]

[Followed in Bridge v. Ward, 35 Wis. 692.]

4. Where a devise has been made to a bankrupt, and accepted by him, it is a fraud upon his creditors for him to disclaim, or renounce it, and the court will compel him to do all acts necessary to perfect his title to the devised estate.

5. An estate was devised unconditionally to A. and his sister. Subsequently to this, but before the will had been admitted to probate, A. filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt. Held, that the estate, so devised, became the property of the assignee appointed in bankruptcy, so that he might sell and convey the same, as a part of the estate of A.

This case came up in the district court [case unreported] on a petition by the assignee [Henry W. Fuller] for leave to sell one undivided half part of certain real estate in Portland, Maine, which was devised to Andrew Ross, a bankrupt, and his sister; and which was referred to in the original petition of the bankrupt, as follows: "David Ross, of Portland, Maine, grand-father of your petitioner, died at Portland, Me., the latter part of December, 1841, and your petitioner has reason to believe he may, by his wife, have bequeathed to him and his sister, a certain piece of property in Portland. The instrument purporting to be his last will and testament has not been presented for probate, and of course has not been proved, approved and allowed." Andrew Ross filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt on February 8th, 1842, and was declared a bankrupt on March 22d, 1842. David Ross, the grand-father of Andrew, died December 29, 1841, testate. His will was presented and filed for probate at Portland, March 15, 1842, and was proved, approved, and allowed, April 19, 1842. Andrew Ross, who was named in the will as one of the executors, upon being informed of the fact, declined accepting that office, and David Ross, Jun., the other executor, was appointed and qualified as executor. By the will, the estate in question was devised unconditionally and in fee, to Andrew Ross and his sister. The will was not filed for probate until after the filing of Andrew Ross's petition to be declared a bankrupt; and was not proved and allowed, until after he was declared a bankrupt. Andrew Ross, living in Boston, had nothing to do with his grandfather's estate, and did no act accepting or declining the devise. Upon this statement of facts, the following question was ordered by the district court to be adjourned into this court, namely: "Whether, upon the foregoing facts, the said real estate, devised as aforesaid to Andrew Ross, is the property of the said assignee, so that he may sell and convey the same as a part of the estate of the said Ross."

H. W. Fuller, as assignee.
Mr. Rogers, for the bankrupt.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Two questions arising upon the statement of facts are submitted to this court for decision. 1. In the first place, when upon the principles of the common law, does a devise of real estate take effect in the state of Maine? 2. Is it from the date of the probate of the will, or from the death of the testator, and as connected with this, whether any assent to the devise is required before the estate vests in the devisee? Now, upon this question, I cannot say that I feel any doubt. The probate courts of Maine (like the probate courts of many other states in the Union) have original and exclusive jurisdiction over wills of real estate, as well as of personal estate; and the decision of the proper probate court, original or appellate, as to approval or disapproval of such wills, is final and conclusive as to the validity thereof, and cannot be questioned or reëxamined in any other tribunal. In short, our probate courts generally possess the same exclusive jurisdiction over the probate of wills of real estate, that the ecclesiastical courts of England exercised over wills of personalty. This is admitted on all sides; and, indeed, is now too firmly established to admit of juridical controversy.

Now, as soon as a will of real estate, or personal estate, is admitted to probate, and approved, I take it to be clear, upon the principles of the common law, that the probate relates back to the death of the testator, and affirms and fixes the title of the devisee thereto, from that period. This would seem a necessary result; for no title can pass by descent or distribution to the heirs or next of kin of the testator, since the whole is disposed of by his will; and the title cannot be in abeyance, or in nubibus, at least, in contemplation of law. Thus, in every trial at the common law, involving a title by devise, if the devisee assents thereto, the title is in him from the death of the testator, by mere operation of law, if the will is established by the verdict of the jury; although the trial may not occur, until many years after the death of the testator. The like rule applies to the probate of wills of personalty in the ecclesiastical courts, where the title of the legatees, and of the executor, takes effect by relation from the death of the testator. It is wholly unnecessary to cite authorities upon such a point. But, if it were necessary, Co. Litt. 111b, is directly in point, where Lord Coke says, that, "In case of a devise by will of lands, whereof the devisor is seized in fee, the feehold, or interest in law, is in the devisee before he doth enter; and in that case, nothing, having regard to the estate or interest devised, descendeth to the heir." The same doctrine was firmly established in Massachusetts (from which Maine derives its jurisprudence) long before my time; and it is fully recognized in the case of Spring v. Parkman, 3 Fairf, [12 Me.] 127. The case of Shumway v. Holbrook, 1 Pick. 114, proceeds upon the admission of the like doctrine, and shows that no title can be proved to land by devise, in a court of common law, until the will has been proved in the proper court of probate.

As to the other point, there is no doubt that the devisee must consent, otherwise the title does not vest in him. But where the estate is devised absolutely, and without any trust or incumbrances, the law will presume it to be accepted by the devisee, because it is for his benefit; and some solemn, notorious act is required, to establish his renunciation or disclaimer of it. Until that is done, "Stabit presumptio pro veritate." That is sufficiently shown by the case of Townson v. Tickell, 3 Barn. & Ald. 31, cited at the bar, and the still later case of Doe d. Smyth v. Smyth, 6 Barn. & C. 112. Brown v. Wood, 17 Mass. 68, and Ward v. Fuller, 15 Pick. 185, manifestly proceeded upon the same foundation.

Now, in the present case, there is no pretence to say, that Ross has ever renounced or disclaimed the estate devised to him. The statement of facts is, that he has done no act accepting or declining the devise. If so, then the presumption of law is, that he has, by implication, accepted it, since it gives him an unconditional fee. But I think, that the very formulary, in which he has inserted a reference to it in the schedule of his estate is decisive to show that he intended to accept whatever estate should be devised to him by his grandfather's will. Until he filed his petition in bankruptcy, the presumption of his acceptance is irresistible; for it was clearly for his benefit; and after he had done so, I am of opinion, that he had no right to disclaim or renounce it. It would be a fraud upon his creditors; and a court of equity would compel him to do all acts necessary to perfect his title to the devised estate; and if he did not, no court of bankruptcy would decree him a certificate of discharge. The bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9, § 3 [5 Stat. 440], vests "all the property and rights of property, of every name and nature," of the bankrupt, by mere operation of law, in his assignee, upon the decree of bankruptcy. Nothing can be clearer, than that, at the time of his bankruptcy, the devise in the present case was a right of property vested in Ross. The law presumed his acceptance, until the contrary should be shown. His title could be devested only by his renunciation and disclaimer of the devise before that time; and the subsequent probate of the will, by relation, made the title complete in the assignee. If Ross's consent had been necessary to make it complete, he was bound formally to give it; and he may even be compelled to give it, by a court of equity. The right of property was inchoate, if it was not consummated, in the assignee from the moment of the decree in bankruptcy; and no subsequent act of the bankrupt could change it.

It has been suggested, that the devise was not beneficial to Ross, and therefore no presumption can arise of his acceptance of it. How that can be well made out, I do not perceive. Before his bankruptcy, it was clearly for his benefit; and that event has not changed the nature of the interest, but merely the mode of appropriating it. His own voluntary act has enabled his creditors to have the benefit of it. As an honest debtor, he must desire, that his creditors should derive as much benefit from all his "rights of property," as is possible. It would be a fraud on his part to withdraw any fund from their reach by a disclaimer or renunciation; and it ought to deprive him of a certificate of discharge. It is, therefore, clearly now for his benefit to presume his acceptance of the devise; rather than to presume him willing to aid in the perpetration of a fraud.

If this, be the true posture of the case, standing upon the general principles of the common law, the remaining question is, whether the Revised Statutes of Maine, of 1840, c. 92, § 25, have made any alteration in the operation of the common law, as to the probate of wills. The 25th section declares; "No will shall be effectual to pass real or personal estate, unless it shall have been duly proved and allowed in the probate court; and the probate of such will shall be conclusive as to the due execution thereof." The argument is, that under this clause, a will is a mere nullity before probate; that the probate gives it life and effect from that time, and not retroactively. It appears to me that this section is merely affirmative of the law, as it antecedently stood. The will before probate, is, in no just juridical sense, a nullity. The very language of the section prohibits such an interpretation. The will must still be the foundation of the whole title, inchoate and imperfect, if you please, until its validity is ascertained by the probate, but still a will, and not a nullity. It would be an anomaly in the use of language, to speak of the probate of a nullity. The probate ascertains nothing, but the original validity of the will as such. The fact of the testator gave it life; his death consummated the title, derivatively from himself; and the probate only ascertains that the instrument in fact is what it purports on its face to be. It might as well be said that a will of real estate, at the common law, is a nullity, until a jury has ascertained its validity; whereas the verdict ascertains only the fact that the title under the will is perfect, because it was duly executed by a competent testator, and therefore took effect by relation from the time of his death.

But if the argument itself were well founded, it would not warrant the inference attempted to be drawn from it. By the probate, when granted, the will, under the section, takes effect by relation back from the death of the testator. It recognises and vests the title in the devisee from that moment. It would otherwise happen, that if he should die before the probate, having accepted of the devise, no title could vest in him; but the bounty of the testator would be defeated. Such a construction of the section would be productive of the grossest mischiefs; and there is not a word in the section, which authorizes, or even countenances it. The section only provides, that no will shall be effectual to pass real estate, unless it shall have been duly proved; not, until it shall have been duly proved. When proved, it is to all intents and purposes a will; and it is to operate upon the interests of the testator, when he intended, that is, from the time of his death.

Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the question propounded by the district court, ought to be answered in the affirmative; and I shall direct a certificate accordingly.

District Court, D. Oregon. Aug. 1, 1870.

BANKRUPTCY—WHEN JUDGMENT VOID—CREDITORS OF BANKRUPT, WHEN NOT ENJOINED—STIPULATION IN JUDGMENT AS TO INTEREST.

1. A judgment taken contrary to the bankrupt act is not void unless a petition in bankruptcy is filed by or against the debtor within six months from the entry of the judgment.

[Cited in Re Brinkman, Case No. 1,884.]

2. A judgment by confession is not void under the Code for want of a sufficient statement of the facts out of which the indebtedness arose, except as to creditors who have acquired a lien upon the debtor's property before a sale upon the confessed judgment. Query, whether such judgment is even then void if it can be shown by evidence aliunde, that the judgment was in fact given in good faith and for an actual debt.

[Cited in Thames v. Miller, Case No. 13,860.]

3. The district court has jurisdiction to ascertain and liquidate all liens upon the bankrupt's property, and in the exercise of this jurisdiction may enjoin a creditor from enforcing a judgment in a state court against the property of the bankrupt, but after the process of the state court has been executed by a sale of property, the district court will not interfere.

[Cited in Re Mallory, Case No. 8,991; Re Moses, Id. 9,869.]

[See The Alexandria, Case No. 179.]

4. A stipulation in a judgment that the interest on it shall bear interest if not paid annually, is void and does not make such judgment usurious.

This was a motion to modify an injunction allowed on the petition of the bankrupt under section 40 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

Lansing Stout, for the motion.

M. W. Fechheimer, contra.

DEADY, District Judge. Price Fuller was adjudged a bankrupt in this court on December 20, 1869, upon his own petition therefor, filed on the 18th of the same month.

On March 27, 1869, the bankrupt confessed judgment without action in the circuit court for the county of Benton in favor of Green B. Smith for the sum of $2,665, with interest payable annually at one per centum per month, and if not so paid to be considered as principal and thereafter to draw the same rate of interest as the original principal.

The confession states the origin of the indebtedness for which the judgment was confessed as follows: "The facts out of which said indebtedness arose are these, for money, gold coin, borrowed of and in hand paid to me, the said defendant, by the said Green B. Smith."

At the date of this judgment the bankrupt owned two tracts of land in Benton county, one containing 640 and the other about 23

acres. The judgment was duly docketed on the day it was confessed and thereafter became a lien upon the real property aforesaid. On November 20, said Smith sued out execution upon said judgment, upon which the sheriff of the county aforesaid on December 2, 1869, sold of the personal property of the bankrupt what brought at such sale $50.50; and on December 24, 1869, said sheriff sold upon said execution the first mentioned tract of land aforesaid, to one Thomas Reed for the sum of $2,750; and on January 7, 1870, said sheriff levied upon the second mentioned tract of land aforesaid and was proceeding to sell the same on January 10 thereafter when he was enjoined by the process of this court.

On January 4, 1870, the bankrupt filed a petition in this court praying that the sheriff aforesaid be enjoined from paying over to said Smith any of the proceeds of the sale of the real property aforesaid, and from selling upon said execution any of the real property of the bankrupt. On reading and filing the petition, an order was made allowing the writ of injunction as prayed for.

In addition to other facts above stated, it was alleged in the petition, that the property aforesaid would not fetch so much at the sheriff's sale as upon a sale by the assignee, because of doubts existing as to the legality of a sale by the former, and that if the property already sold were resold by the assignee, it would, in the opinion of the petitioner, bring $3,000, and that said Smith at the time of accepting the confession of judgment aforesaid, "knew the petitioner to be insolvent." On July 11, Smith applied to the court for an order modifying the injunction so as to permit the sheriff to pay over the proceeds of the property sold before the service of the injunction.

By agreement between counsel for the application and the assignee (who had been appointed since the allowance of the injunction) the motion was heard on July 18. On the hearing, among other papers in the case, counsel for the assignee read a paper, verified by said Smith on January 27, setting forth the nature of his demand against the bankrupt, the consideration thereof, what security he had therefor, as above stated, and that the property aforesaid is not worth more than his claim, and "prays that the money in the hands of the sheriff and the property remaining unsold be released to him."

Upon these facts the reasonable inference is, that Smith took the judgment in violation of the bankrupt act. It was taken with a knowledge of Fuller's insolvency, and therefore must be presumed, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, to have been taken with the belief that a fraud on the act was intended. But as the judgment was given more than six months before the filing of the pettion by the bankrupt, it is not void although taken contrary to the act. The bankrupt act does not avoid a judgment except as declared and provided in section 35 of the act. Section 39 declares what conduct of a debtor shall be deemed an act of bankruptcy. It also imposes a forfeiture of his debt upon the creditor who participates in the act of bankruptcy, and gives the assignee a right of action to recover the money or property paid or transferred contrary to the act, by means of an act of bankruptcy. But it does not declare that a judgment or other act which is to be deemed an act of bankruptcy on the part of the debtor, is also to be held void as a judgment. Sections 35 and 39 must be taken together. The one defines an act of bankruptcy, and the other declares when and under what circumstances acts done or suffered by the debtor shall be void.

So far, then, as the bankrupt act is concerned, this judgment is valid, because not given within six months before the filing of the petition by the bankrupt. In other words, neither Fuller nor any of his creditors having petitioned to have the debtor adjudged a bankrupt, within six months from the confession of this judgment, it is cured by lapse of time.

This injunction was allowed without argument, and at the time I had an impression that the judgment was void under the Code, because the confession did not sufficiently state the facts out of which the indebtedness arose. There can be no question of the insufficiency of the statement, but upon examination of the subject, I am satisfied that the judgment is not therefore void. In Miller v. Earle, 24 N. Y. 110, the question was as to the effect to be given to a judgment like this, and the court said: "As between the parties themselves, however, the judgment confessed should be held legal and valid; that being so, the levy and sale of property under it was good as against the defendant, and all the world, except judgment creditors existing and having a lien upon his property."

In Lee v. Figg, 37 Cal. 336, the same question arose in relation to a judgment confessed in 1851 upon a defective statement by Barton Lee in favor of Henley & Hastings. Sawyer J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The judgment is good as between Henley & Hastings and Barton Lee, and was only subject to be attacked for fraud by creditors of Lee, who were defrauded thereby, and that in some direct proceeding before a sale of the property under it to innocent parties."

It is shown by these authorities, that a judgment, though confessed upon a defective statement, is not absolutely void, but only so, as to creditors who have a lien upon the property sought to be affected by the judgment. Indeed, in Lee v. Figg, supra, the learned judge maintained, that even as against lien creditors, the insufficiency of statement is only prima facie evidence of fraud, and that it was admissible to support the judgment by proof that the transaction was in good faith and the judgment confessed upon an actual existing debt.

At or before the filing of the petition it does not appear that any of the creditors of the bankrupt had a lien upon the property affected by this judgment, and therefore they were not then in a condition to question its validity. Nor does it appear that they have since obtained a specific lien thereon by judgment, or the like; but I think the act must be construed as giving the creditors who prove their debts, from and after the filing of the petition, such a direct interest in the property or assets of the bankrupt as to enable them, or the assignee for them, to attack such a judgment by suit as fraudulent in law or fact.

The judgment against the bankrupt having, by lapse of time, become valid, so far as the bankrupt act is concerned, Smith has acquired a lien thereby upon the real property in question. Upon the application of parties interested, this court has jurisdiction to ascertain and liquidate this lien (Bankrupt Act, § 1), and while so doing, to enjoin Smith from enforcing the same by execution out of the state court. But after the process of the state court has been executed, and the property sold thereon, it is too late for this court to interfere. The purchaser at such sale acquires a good title, and this is so, even if the judgment was fraudulent, provided the purchaser was an innocent one. For this reason, as well as upon general principles, this court could not set aside the sale upon the process of the state court and order the property re-sold, however apparent it may be that it was sold much below its real value. The remedy was in the state court, upon objections to the confirmation of the sale.

It is not necessary now to consider whether the assignee may maintain action to recover the proceeds of this property upon the ground that the judgment was void under the Code. This injunction is not ancillary to any suit for that or other purpose, but was allowed under section 40, to prevent "any person from making any transfer or disposition of the debtor's property" pending the petition to have the debtor adjudged a bankrupt. Here, however, there seems to be, at best, only a right of action in the assignee to recover these proceeds as money had and received to his use. It may also be questioned whether the injunction allowed by section 40, extends to a case of voluntary bankruptcy.

Objection is also made against this judgment that it is usurious. This objection is predicated upon the stipulation in the judgment that the accruing interest should bear interest if not paid annually. There can be no doubt but this provision shows that it was intended that this judgment should draw more than the legal rate of interest. But I do not think a judgment or decree can become usurious by any such means. The Code provides the rate of interest a judgment shall bear and the parties cannot change it by stipulations or terms inserted therein. Such stipulations are simply void—as, for instance, that the interest accruing on a judgment shall be paid annually, and if not shall bear interest as principal. The payment of a judgment confessed for a sum due may be enforced by execution, but if the creditor neglects or forbears to use this remedy he cannot recover interest on interest accruing in the meantime. Besides, in this case this stipulation never was attempted to be enforced, as the property was sold on the execution long before the expiration of the first year after the entry of judgment.

As to the money arising from the sale of the 640 acre tract, on December 24, I think the injunction was improperly allowed, and so far it must be dissolved and the assignee left to pursue such remedy in the premises, if any, as he may be advised that he has. As to the 23 acre tract a dissolution of the injunction is not asked for. There can be no doubt but that the court had power to enjoin the attempted sale of this property, but whether there is any sufficient reason for its continuance may be a question. This may depend upon whether the assignee may feel warranted in beginning a suit to set aside the judgment on the ground of fraud. If the judgment should be set aside on that ground, this tract of land would be discharged from the lien and become a part of the general assets of the bankrupt.

As to the $50.50 made on the execution on December 2, by the sale of personal property, it belongs to the estate of the bankrupt. The judgment gave Smith no lien upon the personal property of his debtor, and the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, on December 18, and the subsequent adjudication, avoided the lien of the levy made on November 20 previous.

FULLER v. COLBY et al.

SEAMEN—DEGREE OF PUNISHMENT ALLOWED—RETALIATION—USE OF WEAPONS.

1. A seaman stands in relation to the master of a vessel like a child to a parent, or an apprentice to a master, or a scholar to a teacher, so far as regards obedient and respectful deportment, and is punishable corporally for a deportment or language not obedient or respectful.

2. The punishment, however, must be not excessive, considering the nature of the offence, and a single blow with the hand, producing no wound, is not so.

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

3. A seaman on receiving such a blow for such an offence is not justified in drawing and brandishing a knife or an axe; nor is he justified in using them to prevent his arrest, whether for the original offence, or the use of the knife.

4. The master is authorized to order the mate to assist him to make such an arrest; and the mate and the master may seize deadly weapons in order to resist those of that character in the hands of the seaman, and to put down mutinous and insubordinate conduct in him and the rest of the crew, dangerous to the officers and the safety of the vessel, and to restore order and obedience on board; and if necessary may use them for this last purpose. A seaman has no right to refuse to lay down such deadly weapons, till the officers do theirs first, and is not protected from further violence in such case by law, if retreating to the prow of the vessel, or by any other course than obedience.

[Cited in Gabrielson v. Waydell, 135 N. Y. 13, 31 N. E. 969.]

5. But if then punished improperly, or too severely for a past offence, he has full redress on his return; or if attacked, without provocation or disobedience on his part, he can defend himself; and under all excessive blows and punishment for disrespect or disobedience, he can justify as a child or apprentice or scholar resisting the excess.

6. In the present improved condition of seamen, it is best not to punish corporally any except minors for slight offences, and unless in case of mutiny and imminent peril, it is better to delay all punishment till the parties have full time to become cool and apologize.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

This was a libel filed before Judge Sprague, in the district court, against the defendant and Reuben Frye. There was no service on Frye. That court rendered judgment for the libellee [Case No. 14,830], and from that judgment the libellant appealed. The case came on for hearing at the last May term; and the substance of the libel appeared to be as follows: B. C. Fuller having been hired as a seaman on board the ship Clarissa Andrews, on the 13th March, 1845, while engaged at sea in mending some sails, alleged that the master [E. C. Colby] charged him with sewing uneven, and struck him, and swore at him, and went to his cabin for his pistols, and called for his mate, and, both followed him, one with pistols and the other with a belaying-pin. The libellant took up an axe to defend himself, and refusing to lay it down, unless the mate first laid down the pin, the master fired at him, and wounded his face with shot, and put out one of his eyes, and endangered the sight of the other; and afterwards on the voyage inhumanly placed him in irons, to his great damage, in the sum of $1999.

The answer of the captain admitted the shipping of the libellant as alleged, but averred that he did not perform his duty faithfully, or obey orders, but tried to excite mutiny, and to use his knife against the enforcement of orders. It further averred, that while the libellant was mending the sail, and was asked why he did not sew straight, he replied, that he sewed it as directed by the captain. The latter told him to give him none of his insolence, and the libellant replied, "I am no more insolent than you;" which, being language not proper to his commander, on board a vessel in presence of the rest of the crew, the libellee struck, or slapped his head with his open hand; whereupon the libellant drew his knife, and the libellee called on the mate to assist in securing him. It averred next, that when the mate came forward for this purpose, the libellant made two passes at him with his knife, and the libellee then ordered the mate to knock him over with the capstan bar, if not able otherwise to disarm him; that the libellant then seized an axe and threatened to cut down whomsoever approached him, and retreated under a boat, and refused absolutely and unconditionally to return to duty. It stated further that all the crew then left their stations, and two of them refused any assistance to the captain, and one encouraged the libellant,—whereupon the libellee deemed it necessary to procure arms and subdue the offenders, and ordered him to put down the axe or he should fire; and the libellant replying he should not, he took aim at his right arm, by which the axe was held, and with a pistol loaded only with shot and standing eleven feet from him; that his wounds were carefully dressed as soon as the ship, which was drifting without anybody at the helm, could be got under way, and the men recalled to duty. In respect to the confinement of the libellant in irons, it was averred not to have been until his conduct indicated there was danger in his being at large; and on reaching the port of Havre, he was placed in the hospital till the vessel sailed for this country, when he was brought home in a cabin, and allowed to come on deck at times, and in no way treated with harshness, nor essentially injured.

Leave was asked and given to amend the answer; but as the amendment was offered since the testimony was closed, the libellant was allowed time to take further evidence and ask further questions of his witnesses, to explain or rebut it, if by filing an affidavit he expected he should be able to rebut it. The testimony in the case was mostly in depositions; and the court requested the rest of it, after hearing two witnesses orally, to be taken before a magistrate or commissioner, with notice to the opposite party.[3] The evidence will be stated in connection with the opinion of the court, and the conclusions formed from it, so far as they may seem to be material.

F. W. Sawyer, for libellant.
Bigelow & Clarke, for libellee.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. Most of the testimony in this case, as to the disputed points, comes, on the one side from seamen, and on the other from the mates, corroborated by two or three of the seamen. The former witnesses for the libellant give an aspect to the case more as set out in the libel; while the latter, for the libellee, tend strongly to sustain the averments in the answer. In relation to the points most material, the contradictions are not so strong as on some subordinate questions of very little moment in settling the rights of the parties. It must be admitted, from all the proof, that the libellant in the end suffered severely; was shot down, put in irons, and deprived for some time of his liberty. This was done by the respondent, and it is certain that he should be made to atone for it fully, unless showing a justification by the misconduct of the libellant, and the legal authority of the captain, either to punish him to such an extent, or to do the acts he did in the suppression of mutinous behavior by the libellant, and in the preservation of the vessel, crew, and cargo, under the captain's charge. The truth of the case can best be ascertained by examining the facts chronologically, and applying the law to them as we go along, after fixing what they are, as near as may be, amidst the conflicting testimony and circumstances with which the truth is surrounded. It is stated by both classes of witnesses, that the libellant first used language which, however usual in private life between persons in like stations, was, from a seaman to his commander, before the rest of the crew, and at sea, at least disrespectful if not insolent. It was of bad example to others, considering the relations which exist between officers and their men, and which relations demand towards the former a courtesy and obedience that are necessary, if not indispensable to preserve order and safety to both life and property on board.

The next material fact testified to on all sides, and admitted in the answer, is, that the captain returned or punished this language with a blow. Some of the witnesses say two blows; others speak of but one. The general character given of the captain is not that of harshness or quickness of temper and great severity, but rather the reverse; while that of Fuller, though not bad in the opinion of some of the witnesses, was such that, according to a part of the evidence, he had previously stated he would take no short answers from any of the officers. The voice of the captain on this occasion, is also sworn to have been mild; while that of Fuller was harsh and angry. I am inclined then to the conclusion, on all the evidence, that the blow struck by the captain was a single one, and not severe; nor was it cruel or unusual. He swears it was with the open hand. No one pretends it knocked the libellant over, or left any mark or bruise. It was not then a cruel punishment; and we all know it not to have been an unusual one. The conclusion is, that if not entirely justifiable, it was still not so much beyond what the disrespectful language of the libellant provoked for punishment, and excused, as to justify him in drawing a dangerous weapon, and making, as some of the witnesses testify, two passes with it at the mate when he came forward to secure the libellant, under the commands of his superior. At the time the captain called for the mate, according to some of the evidence, the libellant drew his knife, and said to the captain, "I will be damned if you flog me." And the truth probably is, from all the evidence as to this point, that he drew the knife rather to prevent further punishment anticipated than on account of the blow he had received, or in mere retaliation of it. Neither his life nor limbs were then in danger, and it was his duty to have obeyed the commands of the captain to lay down his weapon, and submit to the discipline of the ship; and if that had then been carried further, and into a severity not justified by the facts and the law, he would be entitled to, and would doubtless have received, ample redress on his return home. Thompson v. Busch [Case No. 13,944]; Thorne v. White [Id. 13,989]; Relf v. The Maria [Id. 11,692]. The acts of congress punish a captain for extreme severity and misconduct, as well as a seaman for disobedience. This court will always be quite as anxious to redress any wrongs inflicted on the less intelligent seaman, as on his more educated officer,—the law demanding a strict adherence to duty from both, proper language no less than proper acts, as the only means of protecting the rights of both, and rendering their situations respectable, and securing the interests and welfare of all concerned in the voyage. See U. S. v. Peterson [Id. 16,037].

So far, then, as this blow, standing alone and independent of the firing, and wounding afterwards, is now set up as a separate ground for recovering damage, it would seem, if technically unjustifiable, to warrant no damages but nominal ones—no others from it having been proved or pretended to exist. But so slight a blow as a punishment for insolence seems to me not a crime in a captain. In common cases between individuals, it is true that words do never justify blows; but between officers and seamen all blows are proper for disobedience and insolence, which are justifiable by a parent to a child. See cases cited hereafter. It is the peculiar relation between the parties, which changes their rights and powers. A parent may strike a child for disrespectful words, and, on a like principle, may a captain strike a seaman, notwithstanding what is said in Cushman v. Ryan [Case No. 3,515]. It must be done, however, mildly, moderately, judiciously, but still it may be so done, and not going beyond that—for that alone damages ought not to be given, where the seaman who is struck, first forgot his duties and treated his superior with disrespect, and especially as here, where no actual damages were sustained by the blow. In the present instance, by this blow no wound was inflicted—no blood drawn—no weapon used—no flogging given, nor whipping with rope, stick or cane. And though under sudden impulse and disrespectful words, Colby may have struck a slight blow with his hand, which had better have been omitted, and confinement, or some other punishment substituted, yet I could not say that a parent so acting was liable to damages to a child so offending, and the law is the same on these subjects between masters and seamen. It is a little singular, that as long ago as by the laws of Oleron, it was provided, "if any of the mariners impudently contradict the master, he (the seaman) also ought to pay eight deniers, and if the master strike any of the mariners, he (the seaman) ought to bear with the first stroke, be it with the fist or open hand; but if the master strikes him more than one blow he may defend himself." Article 12, 1 Pet. Adm. 26 Append.

[3] In admiralty cases, this court would have the testimony taken in writing, when convenient, if it is to go up to another court; otherwise oral. Dunl. Adm. Pr. 251, 252; 2 Br. Civ. Adm. Law, 428. In the supreme court it is heard only in writing. [The Samuel] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 77.

The first point made then, is, in my opinion, not sustained so as to show any right to damages for the blow then struck. The libellant, on the contrary, having committed the first offence by disrespect, and, not being punished for it with any severity or cruelty, or damage whatever. He was wrong in the second place, in drawing a dangerous weapon and brandishing it at his officers. Remembering this, we are prepared to proceed to the next ground set up in the libel and argument for recovering damages, in consequence of the subsequent firing of the pistol at the libellant by Colby. In deciding justly on this, it will be proper to examine the history and progress of the transaction after what has been already explained. Without discriminating as to these, with care, the facts existing at different times, and the rights existing under different states of things, and different powers and liabilities of the parties, will be in danger of confusion and of producing erroneous conclusions. It seems, that the master at once gave the mate orders to take Fuller into custody, and the next material evidence relates to the drawing of his knife by Fuller; to the seizure of the belaying pin by the mate; and then of the axe by the libellant; and his threats to use it against any one, including the captain or any officer who should approach to arrest or disarm him, and his refusal to lay the axe down, notwithstanding the repeated orders of the captain, unless the mate would first lay down the capstan bar, which he held in his hands. But the whole testimony shows that the mate had no orders or design to use the capstan bar unless it became necessary to disarm the libellant. His whole object with it was the arrest of Fuller. There was no danger, then, of great bodily injury from the mate or master using the bar, if Fuller had laid down the axe and knife and obeyed orders, whatever confinement or other and further punishment might be anticipated for his original offence. It was, therefore, his duty to lay down his weapons, as commanded; and he was in further wrong to stand out for conditions and terms with his officers before complying. His attitude in resisting them and disobeying them in this way, about which most or all of the witnesses agree in their evidence, was also of evil example on board. It led one of the crew to unite with him in disobedience. It induced another to cheer him on. It caused the man at the wheel to abandon his post—the last post to be left under any peril; and led to great disorder and danger in the whole vessel. Indeed, Fuller seems to have avowed principles as to subordination at different times after coming on board which compel the court, however unwillingly, to put an unfavorable construction on his acts, and often to credit the evidence for the captain when it conflicts with that of Fuller concerning his motives and conduct. Firstly, as testified, Fuller had expressed the determination to take "no short answers" from his officers; next, not to submit to any flogging; and finally, he would use and not lay down deadly weapons, and would disobey all orders to do it, until the officers should make terms with him and previously disarm themselves.

Such insubordinate resolutions naturally led to disorder and mutiny, and at last involved the whole crew in danger as well as the vessel and cargo. It is true, some cases say that the sailor may oppose a further infliction of personal chastisement by escaping and even by resistance, so far as to protect himself against injury. U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,345]. But this must mean resistance to protect himself against undeserved and great bodily injury, and not resistance to a moderate chastisement, to which he was legally liable for some offence. Because, if legally liable to it, a corresponding duty is imposed on him to submit to it, and on the master to inflict it. Any other reasoning or conclusion would be involved in absurdity, and hence courts say other seamen "are bound to assist the master to constrain, imprison, and bring to justice any disobedient, mutinous and rebellious mariners." Relf v. The Maria [supra]. That the master, in the heat of the moment, may have contemplated putting Fuller under arrest, and inflicting some further chastisement, is probable from the evidence. But that this was likely to be severe if Fuller submitted and apologized, unless he provoked more by brandishing the knife and axe at his officers, and refused to obey them by laying the latter down, does not seem probable from the evidence, and did not, in my view, justify him in persisting not to obey till others of the crew thus became insubordinate with him—the helm abandoned and the vessel in danger. If yielding submission, and afterwards punished immoderately, ample redress would have been given to him on his return home. Relf v. The Maria [supra]. But not submitting, in that exigency the master having armed himself, as described in the answer, deemed it his duty to disable the libellant so as to make the arrest, and put down anything like mutiny on ship-board, and restore order and security. Accordingly the captain then fired at him, and thus caused the injuries most complained of. If his firing became necessary to regain his authority, when disregarded and trampled on, and was required in order to restore obedience and to secure the vessel, at that time become adrift, however severe the course, and however painful the consequences, it is not punishable by law. U. S. v. Peterson [supra]. Considerable latitude of judgment must be allowed in such exigencies to him who is responsible for all the lives and property on board.

But at the same time, on such occasions, officers must exercise due clemency and firmness of nerve. The peril must be manifest—the disobedience clear—and the step taken not unusual, not immoderate, and not apparently uncalled for, in order to accomplish a justifiable end with sufficient promptness and certainty. Though in some respects questioned and questionable, the position of the libellee was probably of this last character. So a grand jury of his country have once found, and so the district court has once decided in this prosecution. [Case No. 14,830.] Whatever of impressions to the contrary might, in some particulars, have made me hesitate, independent of these findings, these last weigh something in matters of doubt. They do not and should not induce me to form any conclusion as to facts, which were not sustained by testimony entitled to credit. But decisions below in admiralty are often to be presumed correct till an error or mistake is clearly shown, else litigation would be encouraged. Cushman v. Ryan [supra]. Appellate courts in admiralty do not in general receive facts critically—the presumption being in favor of them as found by the court below. Cox v. Palmer [3 Fed. 16]. Better means of judging by the district court exists than by the circuit court and by the circuit court than by the supreme court. The former often knows the usages and witnesses, and these are at times on the stand. The Apollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 378. The conclusions in favor of the respondent are also strengthened by several other circumstances, such as the general considerations growing out of there being no proof of his having any previous hostility or grudge towards the libellant—of the mild and good character of Captain Colby generally—of his attention to Fuller's wounds subsequently, and placing him in a hospital while in port—of his keeping him in irons only while insubordinate—of his going before the American consul, at Havre, and exposing all the facts and courting an investigation—and of his not striking the libellant at all till disrespectfully treated, and of his not firing with balls instead of shot, nor so near to Fuller as likely to kill him,—nor at all, till every other mode had failed of producing obedience and restoring order, without making what he considered a derogatory compromise with an offender. I think the testimony competent, too, as a part of the res gestae, that Colby said at the time of the transaction, he meant not to fire at F.'s head, but the arm which held the axe, and that this goes far, with the other facts just named, to repel any idea of his intention to kill F., or to wound him so severely as he did.

If this was the first trial of this case, however, I should doubt whether the exigency was so very pressing and dangerous as to have required so strong a measure as using fire-arms without some longer delay, and some further attempts in the mean time to get the ship under her helm, and the rest of the crew on duty. I am also inclined to the conclusion, that, had he left the libellant till that was accomplished, and then returned and remonstrated against his dangerous course, after he had enjoyed time to become cooler, the firing would not have been necessary; nor would this have evinced any want of due firmness, but less of passion. Remembering, however, on such occasions, that in human bosoms passion must exist, more or less, on both sides—that men of different temperaments and habits will act differently in the same cases, and with equal honesty—and that obedience is often necessary to be prompt in order to command at all due respect and influence in captains of vessels (Thorne v. White [supra]), I yield something of my doubts on these matters to the latitude of judgment and differences of opinion incident to such positions—to the obvious fact that one present can judge of the danger better than the absent—and to the force of the two findings before referred to in his favor. In relation to the subsequent confinement and irons put on the libellant, they were natural and justifiable after the violence and disobedience he had been guilty of—the officers then justly believing him to be a dangerous man. Especially was it justifiable when the libellant, as is proved by some of the witnesses, still evinced an insubordinate disposition; and the irons were then continued on only till obedience was promised and confided in.

Many adjudged cases, which have not yet been cited, seem to lay down principles that fully sustain the views I have expressed as to the law on the facts, according to their aspect to my mind under the contradictions which exist. It may not be amiss to classify and present several of them. Thus, it is well settled that a master of a vessel may punish a seaman for disrespect, disobedience or disorder on board, as far as a parent may a child. U. S. v. Freeman [Case No. 15,162]; Bangs v. Little [Id. 839]; 3 Kent, Comm. 181; Thompson v. Busch [supra]. Other cases say as far as a master may an apprentice (Case of The Agincourt, 1 Hagg. Adm. 271), or a school master, a scholar (14 Johns. 123, by Thompson, J.). To stir up others to disobedience, or to refuse duty on ship-board, by a seaman, is, by express act of congress, made a crime. Act March 3, 1835 [4 Stat. 775]. The master has a right to respectful demeanor, as well as obedience. Thompson v. Busch [supra]; Butler v. McLellan [Case No. 2,242]; U. S. v. Smith [Id. 16,345]. But this right is of no use unless he is justified in reasonably enforcing it, when refused, by punishment inflicted by himself. U. S. v. Freeman [Id. 15,162]; Thorne v. White [Id. 13,989]. He may, therefore, chastise corporally, as well as confine, when treated impertinently or disobeyed. Michaelson v. Denison [Id. 9,523]; Thompson v. Busch [supra]. But he must not punish for mere immorality as a man, if conducting properly as a seaman. Bangs v. Little [Case No. 839]. Nor must he chastise for offenses as a seaman in a manner indecent. Cushman v. Ryan [Case No. 3,515]. All punishment, also, must be inflicted only to a reasonable extent, as well as in a reasonable and decent manner. Abb. Shipp. 176, note; Brown v. Howard, 14 Johns. 123; U. S. v. Freeman [Case No. 15,162]; Turner's Case [Id. 14,248]; Cushman v. Ryan [supra]; Lord Stowell in the case of The Lowther Castle, 1 Hagg. Adm. 384; U. S. v. Wickham [Case No. 16,689]. But when justifiable it may continue, with proper weapons, till submission or obedience is enforced, else the power becomes nugatory, abortive, and fails to produce the very object for which it was conferred. Michaelson v. Denison [supra]. As obedience should be prompt and uncomplaining (The Mentor [Case No. 9,427]), and the master sustained while enforcing obedience (Relf v. Maria [supra]), and as a master often has not physical power to enforce it, he may, if necessary, resort to weapons, and the law will protect him. But he must resort to proper weapons. Thorne v. White [supra]. And some cases limit the use of weapons, and especially deadly ones, to the prevention of mutiny or its suppression, and do not countenance it for merely punishing past offences. U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,345], and Hart v. Littlejohn [Id. 6,153]. But such weapons may be used as are necessary to effect the object (Abb. Shipp. 237, note), when it is to obtain obedience, and not to punish for a past offence (Curt. Adm. 89, 90; Jarvis v. The Claiborne [Case No. 7,225]; Roberts v. Dallas [Id. 11,898]). And much more may he do all this when the seaman resorts to violence—deadly weapons—himself; and the crew appear mutinous, and the vessel becomes in danger. U. S. v. Peterson [supra]; 1 Holt, Shipp. 430. If the captain was in such a case, to stop to consult others, or to argue the case long with the offender, or not use weapons when other means failed, the vessel might be lost. Butler v. McLellan [Case No. 2,242]. When punishment is merited, its extent cannot be weighed very nicely in the scale. It must be clearly excessive, or no damages are to be allowed. Thorne v. White [supra], and notes; Butler v. McLellan [supra]. In some cases the captain should take time and consult, when in others it is not safe. It is best to consult when he can, as it is more satisfactory to all parties, and allows reason, rather than passion, to speak and reign. Abb. Shipp. 136, 137; Whiteman v. The Neptune [Case No. 17,569]; Thorne v. White [Id. 13,989]; Jarvis v. The Claiborne [Id. 7,225]; Sampson v. Smith, 15 Mass. 365. See the rule in the marine ordinance of France (section 22). And the more especially was this consultation proper and necessary, in ancient times, when the crew and officers were often joint owners of ship and cargo, and all but nominally equal in education, and standing, and skill.

Here several appeals were made by the captain to Fuller for submission, and the mate was conferred with before firing; and time was again and again given to lay down the axe: and it was not till a crisis of disorder and disobedience, with others of the crew as well as him, and of peril to the vessel had arrived, that Fuller was disabled, and order restored. It will be seen, that the object of Colby, on this occasion, in firing, was not to punish for a past offence, where the instrument used should not be deadly, but was to make an arrest, procure submission and obedience, and defend himself and vessel against mutiny. Deadly weapons, thus used and thus necessary to accomplish a legal end, are not forbidden. They may be the only ones likely to accomplish it. Curt. Adm. 90; 15 Mass. 365; 14 Johns. 119.

Finally, it will be further seen, that though

Fuller retreated, and some ancient ordinances provide that the captain shall not follow a retreating mariner to the prow of the vessel, (Thorne v. White [supra]), yet I am not aware of any such distinction settled by principle or practice in modern times, when a seaman is pursued to arrest him for disobedience, and not in a mere unprovoked affray, and the more especially when, as in this case, the seaman is also pursued to disarm him while in a state of mutiny.

I have thus spoken of the law of this case, as it appears to me to be on the facts, impressing themeselves on my mind as the last do, amidst several contradictions, after much deliberation. What the law ought to be, and could be with safety and more advantage to the mercantile marine, is another question, and one which it does not belong to the judicial tribunals to decide, so as to make it a rule of action. A distrust of the necessity of flogging in the army and navy is certainly increasing elsewhere as well as in this country, and for punishment of crimes in the civil and municipal affairs of society has, by many states, been entirely abandoned in their penal codes. In the merchant service, if not in the navy, it would seem not very difficult or hazardous in the present improved and improving character of seamen in this country, for our legislatures to substitute other punishments for blows of any kind, especially on adults. And, considering this improved condition of morals and education among seamen, and especially American ones, considering also the greater privileges and rights conferred on all American citizens, however humble, and whether seamen or landsmen: considering further, that the authority to inflict personal chastisement in the case of parents or children, and masters or apprentices,—to which this has always been likened,—is to be exercised in most cases over minors only, it may well deserve legislative attention, whether the master of a vessel, except in the case of minors, should be allowed summarily and without any trial, to inflict corporeal punishment at all on his crew, or any beyond a very limited extent, unless it be necessary to repel personal assaults, or suppress a manifest mutiny or riot. For a time, as an experiment in other cases, a resort could be provided and limited to mere confinement—loss of wages, and prosecution in the courts on the return of the vessel. But my official duty requires me to say such is not the law now, and never has been the law in this country, or probably in any other; and it would be a usurped judicial legislation for any court to attempt to introduce it as law without a previous change and direction by another department of the government.

Let the judgment below be affirmed.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — ACTS INTENDED TO DEFRAUD CREDITORS—BONA FIDE CONVEYANCE IN TRUST FOR CREDITORS.

1. An individual may, bona fide, convey his property in trust for the benefit of his creditors.

2. But if previous to his assignment he has appropriated his funds, in the name of another, to delay and defraud his creditors, the court will set aside the assignment, and his previous conveyances or fraudulent investments, and make them answerable to his creditors.

[Cited in Danzig v. Saks, 20 D. C. 179.]

3. When an individual, having given acceptances to another with a view to his own indemnity, receives a large amount of property, which he applies to his own purposes, and leaves his acceptances unpaid, his acts are fraudulent.

Howard, Lockwood & Clark, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Walker, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a creditor's bill, which was filed the 3d of July, 1854, and which represented, that plaintiffs had obtained a judgment against defend ants on which execution was issued and returned no property found. That Ives had fraudulently conveyed his property, so as to place it beyond the reach of his creditors. The assignment was made in the following terms—"Whereas, I, Stephen H. Ives, of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, being unable to pay my debts and liabilities, and being desirous of having all my property finally distributed among my creditors—Now, therefore, in consideration of one dollar to me in hand paid by Jno. S. Wright, of said Detroit, I do hereby transfer, assign and set over to said John S. Wright with all my property of every name and nature, real, personal and mixed, including bonds, notes and shares in actions of every kind, excepting only such property assigned as is by law expressly exempt from sale by execution, which property so assigned I shall hereafter more particularly describe in a schedule to be attached hereto, for the following purposes, viz: First, to pay all debts or demands due from me for personal and family expenses; all debts incurred by me since the 20th of February, 1854, including all fees and charges for services, retainers and expenses due or to become due to my counsel, and all expenses connected with my litigation with George W. Markham, and all debts due Cyrus W. Jackson, J. S. and N. H. Wright or either of them. Second, to pay all my other creditors share and share alike. Third, to pay over to me or my assigns any surplus; and the said John S. Wright is fully authorized to turn all of said property, as soon as it can reasonably be done; and is clothed with all necessary powers to effectuate and promptly to carry this trust into effect, and for this purpose to use my name or otherwise as may be most desirable."

It appears from the statement of Ives under oath, on his examination by the master in chancery, the 30th of August, 1854, that on the 1st July, 1854, he executed an assignment in the evening at Mr. Walker's office, in the presence only of Mr. Walker, his counsel, and he left the assignment with him and has not since seen it. That during the year previous to the assignment up to the 14th of February, 1854, he had been engaged in the banking and broker's business, under the firm of S. H. Ives & Co., and on that day the firm was dissolved. He received from that firm for his good will, five thousand dollars. On the 20th of February he received a sum in a check on the bank for five thousand three hundred and five dollars, and near the same time a check for three hundred dollars. These sums balanced his account with the bank. He received on the 20th February, not included in the above, the sum of four thousand seven hundred dollars. C. &. N. Ives gave defendant a draft or certificate for three thousand five hundred dollars; and a certificate of Indiana bank stock for fifteen hundred dollars. On the 1st of August, 1853, he received for his quarter profit in banking, nineteen hundred and sixty-three dollars—for the ensuing quarter six thousand two hundred and fifty-six dollars, and for the two succeeding quarters ten thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven dollars. And the defendant received from G. W. Markham some twenty-nine or thirty thousand dollars in merchandise. His acceptances for Markham amounted to about forty thousand dollars. These acceptances the defendant alleges were the cause of his failure, and compelled him to assign his property.

From the above exhibit of moneys and property received by the defendant, the necessity for his failure is not perceived. On account of Markham he could not have lost more than fifteen thousand dollars, in converting the merchandise he received from him into money and paying the full amount of his acceptances. This would allow five thousand dollars loss on the merchandise, which was estimated at the wholesale prices. And the moneys he received from other sources very much exceeded the sum of fifteen thousand dollars. But we do not rely on this estimate only, to show the fact and motive of his failure. It does not appear that any part of the acceptances of Markham have been paid. Ives has received about thirty thousand dollars of merchandise and in addition a considerable amount of debts, for his indemnity, but he seems to have made some other appropriation of the means thus received, than the payment of the debts for which he was security. He being a banker in good standing, it is not to be doubted that it was in his power to have paid his acceptances, on a reasonable indulgence being given. But it does not appear that he proposed any adjustment to his creditors, or asked for any indulgence. But it does appear that he purchased a valuable real estate in Detroit in the name of a near connexion—the deed being made to this person. A valuable block of expensive buildings was constructed, which required a very large expenditure. His father-in-law, who received the deed, was shown to have been in limited circumstances, and wholly unable to buy the ground or build the block of buildings. The evidence is clear to show that the means were furnished by Ives in purchasing the ground and making the improvements.

The facts in the case, without going further into a detail of them, show satisfactorily to the court, that the assignment of Ives was made to hinder and delay his creditors, and we feel bound to declare it to have been fraudulent under the statute. The court will direct a decree to this effect to be entered, and will refer the matter to a master, &c.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct., 1874.[2]

PATENTS—SEWING MACHINE ATTACHMENTS—CONSTRUCTION OF CLAIM—INFRINGEMENT—NEW APPLICATION OF OLD PRINCIPLES — PATENTS CONSTRUED LIBERALLY.

1. The three suits were brought upon two patents, one granted to Henry W. Fuller, June 5, 1860, for an "improvement in mechanism for marking cloth in sewing machines," and the other, the reissued patent No. 3,218, granted to Israel M. Rose, December 1, 1868, for "tuck-creasing attachment for sewing machines." Upon the construction given to the patents by the court, the defendants were held not to have infringed.

2. The invention of Fuller was for a device for creasing and tucking cloth, by means of a notch and blade, constructed so as to be attached to the bed-plate of the sewing machine, and operated by means of the needle-bar. The notch could be above or below, and the device arranged in front of the needle or behind it, according to the function it was required to perform. The notch and blade were old: Held, that the invention of Fuller consisted in the application of the notch and blade, and the various other parts of the mechanism, to the sewing machine; that he could not claim the power of the needle bar in all its various applications, and that his invention must be limited to the particular device which he adapted, in its application to the bed-plate of the sewing machine and to the needle-bar, and that other devices, though with the notch and blade, could be made and applied to the bed-plate and needle-bar of a sewing machine, for the purpose of tucking and creasing, without infringing the Fuller patent.

3. No one can take something old, and apply it in a new way, or in a new form, so as to produce a particular result, and be protected by the patent law beyond the particular way, or form, or device and the application which he has made.

4. A patentee will be protected, when a device is subsequently used, which may be said fairly to come within the principle of the original invention, but an inventor cannot go beyond the legitimate bounds of his discovery, so as to exclude all other inventions within the same field of operations.

5. The claim of the Rose reissued patent, was for "a tuck-creasing mechanism, such as described, having its upper and lower parts connected, and together adjustable as to its relation to the needle of the sewing machine, and operated by the sewing machine, substantially as set forth:" Held, that this claim must be restricted to the unity of adjustment, in a tucker, of the mechanism described in the specification, and that it does not cover every kind of tuck-creasing mechanism, having its upper and lower parts connected and together adjustable, but only the particular kind of mechanism described, and that the words, substantially such as described, are material, and limit the claim to the particular form of mechanism described, or that which is substantially the same.

6. While patents should be construed liberally, a patentee must be limited within the claims of the patent, and the description of the particular mechanism, and the application he has made, by which the result is produced.

[These were bills in equity by Henry W. Fuller and others against Enoch S. Yentzer and others and against Herman B. Goodrich for the alleged infringement of two patents. The first, No. 28,633, was granted to H. W. Fuller, June 5, 1860; the other, No. 40,084, was granted to I. M. Rose, September 22, 1863; reissued, No. 3,218, December 1, 1868.]

S. S. Fisher, C. C. Bonney, and E. B. Barnum, for complainants.

Scates & Whitney, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. These three cases were argued upon the motion for a preliminary injunction, and I then declined to issue the injunction. They afterwards went to proofs and were argued upon final hearing, and having given them full consideration, I remain substantially of the same opinion as when the motion for an injunction was argued, having come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief they ask. The cases are by no means free from difficulty, but I will state the reasons why I have come to this conclusion.

I have no doubt of the validity of the two patents under which the plaintiffs claim; the first, the patent of Fuller, issued in 1860, and the other, is called the Rose patent, issued in September, 1863, and re-issued in December, 1868, and of which Fuller is the assignee. The original patent of Fuller, so far as it is material to consider it in connection with the questions involved in this case, was for a device for creasing and tucking cloth by means of a notch and blade. The original device of Fuller was constructed in such a way as to be attached to the bed-plate of the sewing machine, and the special device by which the creasing was performed was operated by means of the needle-bar. The notch might be above or below. The result was, of course, substantially the same, and it could be arranged in front of the needle or behind it, according to the function that it was required to perform.

The first question to be determined is: What is the extent of the invention of Fuller? He did not invent the notch and blade: that was an old device; nor springs: they also were old. All that he invented was the application of the notch and blade, the springs, and the various other parts of the mechanism to the sewing machine. He certainly could not claim the power of the needle-bar in all its various applications.

All that he could claim, and, I think, all that his patent, properly construed, can be considered to cover, is the particular device which he adapted in its application to the bed-plate of the sewing machine and to the needle-bar. Otherwise we would have to hold that wherever springs or the notch and blade were applied to the needle-bar, or any other old appliance was taken, by which the power of the needle-bar was used in the construction and operation of a creaser, his device would cover it. That, certainly, cannot be the proper construction of his invention. It is only the special mechanism which he has devised, in its application to the needle-bar and the other parts of the sewing machine, by which the result was obtained. The difficulty arises in the application of the invention. It is natural always, where inventors have discovered some special device or mechanism by which a useful result is obtained, and in the progress of the art various modifications are made, or new ones are invented, which produce the same result in greater or less perfection, to attempt to bring all subsequent discoveries within the scope of their device. It is perfectly right, where any device is subsequently used which may be said fairly to come within the principle of the original invention, that the party should be protected, but it would be wrong to stretch an invention beyond the legitimate bounds of the discovery, so as to exclude all other inventions within the same field of operations. For instance, in this case, it would be obviously an unsound doctrine to hold that no one else could take the notch and blade, or springs, in whatsoever form they might be used, and apply them to the bed-plate and to the needle-bar of a sewing machine.

Wherever any other person subsequently takes what may be substantially the same device or the same mechanism, and attempts to apply it to the needle-bar and to a bed-plate of a sewing machine, he may be said to be within the invention which Fuller first gave to the world.

As I understand the views of the plaintiffs, there is an effort in this case to bring within the scope of Fuller's device what is not legitimately within the true boundaries of that discovery, because we have to adopt substantially that rule in order to sustain the view of plaintiff's counsel, and to say that no one else could take the springs or apply the power of the needle-bar, or attach a form of notch and blade for creasing to the bed-plate without infringing Fuller's device.

So in relation to the Rose patent, of which Fuller is the assignee, and the validity of which, of course, he cannot question, and the value of which is not controverted.

It is admitted that Fuller's invention does not bring within its scope all forms of tuck-creasers when applied to the needle-bar and to the bed-plate of the sewing machine; otherwise Rose's invention must fall. But the ground upon which that can stand is, that it is substantially a different device. In Fuller's mechanism the act of creasing is performed as has been stated, and a model of which is before me. Under the Rose patent, and by the mechanism which he devised for creasing, there is a different arrangement of the various parts. There is no notch and blade as in the Fuller patent, but there are springs. The Rose device is attached to the bed-plate of the sewing machine. It is operated by the power of the needle-bar. There is a spring attached to a staff, and another, which together form the jaws which pinch the cloth as it passes through the sewing machine. A special contrivance presses the upper spring, brings the jaws together and the movement of the needle-bar down places the jaws upon the cloth which passes between them and an attachment of the bed-plate. It makes a crease upon the cloth; and it is said to have an advantage over Fuller's device, in that it does not perforate or destroy, or even impair, the texture of the cloth. Now the same principle I think, must be considered applicable to the device of Rose as to that of Fuller, namely: he must be confined to the special mechanism which he has invented and which he attaches to the sewing machine, and by means of which he performs a crease in the cloth, and thus enables the operator to make the tuck.

It will be observed that Rose attached his device to the bed-plate of the sewing machine, and operated it by means of the needle-bar as Fuller had done; and there was nothing in Fuller's to prevent the operation of the Rose device.

Now that being so, it simply become a question, when one uses any particular form of mechanism, whether or not, so far as these two patents are concerned, it comes within either of them. The theory is to bring all other forms of mechanism by which a crease is made and a tuck formed, within these two inventions of Fuller and Rose; and it is said these have been so far the only two known methods of forming the crease. Everything that is legitimately within them of course, includes the invention of these two patentees; but it cannot be said that because they form the crease by the notch and blade, and by the pincers, that no one else can form a crease by some other device different from that of Fuller or Rose; in other words, that they have patented a result or an effect, and not the particular form of mechanism which they have set forth in their specifications. If this is the true construction of these patents, then we shall not have so much difficulty in determining whether or not the defendants have infringed the two devices invented by Fuller and Rose.

To take the first case. The ground assumed by the plaintiffs is that the tuck creasers manufactured by Yentzer and Scates, infringe the first claim of Fuller.

The first claim of Fuller is: "The forming of one, two or more creases in cloth by means of markers on opposite sides of the cloth, which markers are the notch and blade or the notch and point, one connected with the bed of the machine, and the other operated simultaneously with the vibrations of the needle-bar in a sewing machine."

As I have said the notch and blade are old: the springs are old. It may be true—it is not necessary to controvert it in this case—that Fuller was the first person to apply the notch and blade and the springs to a sewing machine so as to form a crease, but I think that no one can take something old and apply it in a new way or in a new form so as to produce a particular result, and be protected beyond the particular way or form or device, and the application which he has made. Otherwise, as I have already said, any one could take an old device and make a new application of it, and prevent all other persons from taking the same, and making another and different application by which a like result is brought about. The question is whether Yentzer and Scates have done that. Let us look at one form of the Yentzer device and a tucker which they have manufactured. There is the spring and the power of the needle-bar applied to the spring. There is—if you choose to call it so—the notch and blade attached to the bed-plate. But the question is whether the springs and notch and blade are used in the same way as in the Fuller patent. Fuller covers by his own special mechanism anything that is fairly within it. He does not include other and different devices or mechanism by which the same result is reached; and I think there may be fairly said to be a difference—such a difference as does not bring it within the mechanism of Fuller; and so it may be said of other forms of manufacture by Yentzer and Scates.

In the second suit, which is also against Yentzer and Scates, the ground assumed by the plaintiffs is, that the creasers manufactured by them, infringe the 6th claim of the Rose patent, which refers to what is called the "unity of adjustment."

The claim is for "a tuck-creasing mechanism such as described, having its upper and lower parts connected and together adjustable as to its relation to the needle of the sewing machine and operated by the sewing machine substantially as set forth."

If the view of the plaintiff's counsel as to the construction of the Rose patent is correct, then all these various devices would be infringements of that claim. If, in other words, Rose had patented every form of mechanism by which a creaser is attached or adjusted to the sewing machine, and by which unity of adjustment is brought about, then there could be no question but the defendants have all infringed, but I think that the view of the counsel of the extent of this claim is not correct. I think the claim is narrower.

It is insisted on the part of the plaintiffs that this patent cannot be restricted to a unity of adjustment in a tucker of the mechanism such as described in the Rose specifications. I think it is so restricted. Let us see. It is said that in the claim the words are used "a tuck-creasing mechanism" and that it means, therefore any tuck-creasing mechanism. "A tuck-creasing mechanism having its upper and lower parts connected and together adjustable." If that were the claim, and it could stand as the invention of Rose, then it might be the defendants would all infringe: but that is not the claim. It is qualified; it does not mean every kind of tuck-creasing mechanism having its upper and lower parts connected and together adjustable, but any tuck-creasing mechanism substantially such as described, which words are very important and essentially qualify the preceding words. It must therefore mean the kind of mechanism—mechanism such as here described, not any form of mechanism however different it might be, but this particular form of mechanism, or that which is substantially the same.

We cannot strike out material words from the claim itself and enlarge the meaning of the invention, but we must limit it fairly, I admit, within the language of the claim.

The third suit is by Fuller as the assignee of the Rose patent and against Goodrich, and it is alleged that Goodrich infringes the first, second, fifth, sixth and eighth claims in the Rose patent.

There seems to be in forming the claims under the Rose patent a disposition to expand them unnecessarily. For instance, the first and second claims are substantially the same; one, to be sure, speaks of the mechanism by which the crease is formed, and the other of the method of pinching the fabrics by which the crease is formed, but of course they resolve themselves into substantially the same thing. The claim is: "The mechanism substantially as herein described for forming a ridge or ridges on fabrics to be afterwards folded in the line of such ridges."

The second claim is the method of nipping or pinching the fabrics to form ridges or creases thereon, by means of jaws opened and closed at intervals to seize and pinch the fabric when at rest, and then release it as the same is moved along by the feed in the sewing machine. But still it means the method produced or seen in the form of mechanism which is referred to in the first claim, and the only difference, therefore, between the first and second claim is, the one speaks of the device as the mechanism, and the other the method by which that mechanism produces the crease.

The fifth claim is the combination of the creasing device or devices of the tuck-marker with the jointed lever substantially as and for the purposes set forth.

The sixth claim I have already referred to and considered. The eighth claim is the combination of the lever and spring with the tuck-marker, having upper and under parts connected together adjustable as specified, substantially and for the purposes set forth. Now it is claimed on the part of the plaintiffs that this form of device used by Goodrich is an infringement, because it is said it is substantially the device of Rose, and that the crease is formed in substantially the same way, and that the parts are adjustable in the same manner; that is to say, that the mechanism of the parts is the same, because, as I have said, I consider that an indispensable element in the true construction of the Rose patent. I do not so regard it. Limiting the Rose patent to a substantial form of mechanism which he has described and the manner in which it operates and is attached to the bedplate of the sewing machine and the needle-bar, I think there is a substantial difference, such a difference between these two devices as is within the true construction of the patent law, and to hold otherwise is to leave subsequent inventors within very narrow bounds in the same common field of discovery and would, therefore, be attended with very serious consequences. If in any part of the mechanism of Fuller or of Rose there was some great, novel principle or discovery, which no one else could use without infringing that part, then it might be said that these cases of the defendants were fairly within its operation, but that would bring it within the principle, for example, of Howe's discovery in relation to the operation of the needle, and of Wilson's feeding device. There is something connected with Howe's discovery which no one else can use without our saying at once that, no matter in how different a form we put it, still Howe's invention is there. So in relation to the feeding device of Wilson. No matter how much you may change it or modify it, still it is Wilson's feeding device.

If that principle were applicable to these cases, then I should have no hesitation in holding there was an infringement.

There are two modes of construing the patent law, and it may be said, perhaps, without any disrespect, that there are some judges who adopt one mode and some another. There are those who are inclined to expand, beyond legitimate boundaries, the invention of the patentee. There are others who restrict it within narrower bounds, holding that the invention of the patentee must be limited by the particular mechanism and the application by which the result is attained, thus leaving the field of discovery open to all persons to explore it beyond the range of that particular mechanism and its application. I confess the latter seems to me the more correct rule and therefore hold that parties should be limited rather closely within the claims of their patents and the description of the particular mechanism, and the application which they have made by which the result is produced. Of course a change of form will not change the principle. And I do not dispute the rule that the invention is to be construed liberally.

A mechanical change does not prevent an infringement. In looking at Goodrich's device as I have said, it seems to me to be essentially different from the Rose patent, and therefore I hold that in that case, as in the others, there is no infringement. In these cases all the defendants, or Yentzer and Goodrich under whom these defendants are manufacturing, claim to be protected by patents duly issued. Of course if those patents are for something which has been previously discovered and patented to other parties, the patent is no protection, but it is at least evidence of the view which the patent office has taken of the rights of the defendants.

The application for the injunction is therefore refused and the bills dismissed.

[3 N. J. Law J. 240.]

District Court, D. New Jersey. July 1, 1880.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUD—LIMITATIONS.

1. A bankrupt, living in North Carolina, failed to include certain railroad bonds in his schedule. The petition in bankruptcy was filed May 28, 1868. Shortly afterward the bankrupt removed to New Jersey, and died there in 1877. His son, who was his executor, claimed these bonds as his own property, asserting that they had been transferred to him by his father in payment of advances. While this controversy was pending in the Essex Co. orphans' court, this suit was brought by the assignee claiming the bonds as the property of the bankrupt. It appeared that the bankrupt had delivered the bonds to C. in New York, some of them to be held subject to his order, others as collateral security for certain debts which were afterwards paid. The bonds were all delivered back to the bankrupt shortly after the petition was filed and he drew the dividends until his death. Held, that in the absence of all proof to the contrary, the deposit of the bonds with C. was a device to defraud creditors, and that the bonds belonged to the assignee.

2. There was no evidence of laches in the assignee, and the suit was not barred by lapse of time.

3. Where an action is brought to redress fraud concealed by the bankrupt, or fraud which by its nature remains secret, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the fraud is discovered.

In equity.

Guild & Lum, for complainant.

Elwood C. Harris, for defendants.

NIXON, District Judge. The bill is filed in this case by Robert M. Martin, assignee in bankruptcy of Edward Fullings, deceased, to recover twelve several bonds of the Atlantic, Tennessee and Ohio Railroad Company of the par value of five hundred dollars each, numbered respectively 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 55, 56, 57, 58, and 59, with coupons attached, from the 1st day of November, 1863, alleged to be the property of the late bankrupt and which he fraudulently omitted from his schedule and withheld from the hand of his assignee in bankruptcy. It appears that the said Edward Fullings, being a resident of the town of Charlotte, in the state of North Carolina, on the 28th of May, 1868, filed a voluntary petition in the district court of the United States for the district of North Carolina, to be adjudged a bankrupt, and that such proceedings were had thereon; that an adjudication took place on the 9th day of June following; that on the 22nd of July the creditors first chose his son, Edward B. Fullings, assignee, and that upon his resigning the office on the 6th day of August of the same year, a new meeting of creditors was called for the 8th of October, 1868, when the complainant was duly chosen assignee. Shortly after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy the said Edward Fullings left the state of North Carolina and removed to Irvington in the state of New Jersey, where he continued to reside until the month of September, 1877, when he departed this life, leaving a last will and testament, in which letters testamentary were first granted to his son Edward B. Fullings, and afterwards, upon his removal, to the defendant Abby Fullings, the widow of the testator. Whilst the said Edward B. Fullings was administering the estate of his father as executor, a controversy arose in the orphans' court in the county of Essex, between him and some of the representatives of the estate, in regard to the ownership of the twelve railroad bonds in suit. The executor claimed them as his individual property, asserting that they had been transferred to him by his father in his lifetime, in payment of certain advances made by him, while the opposing party contended that they should be accounted for as assets of the estate. The orphans' court decided that they belonged to the estate. Pending the litigation, the assignee in bankruptcy brought this suit claiming that they were the property of Edward Fullings at the time of the filing of his bankruptcy petition, and had been fraudulently omitted from his schedule and withheld from him as assignee. Two questions are thus presented. 1. As to the ownership of the bonds when the bankruptcy proceedings commenced. 2. Whether the assignee is barred from bringing suit by the statute of limitation.

1. As to the first, the evidence shows that the bankrupt obtained these bonds in the month of May, 1865, from one John M. Springs, in payment of moneys due him from a former partnership of Fullings, Springs & Co., of which he was a member and a large creditor. Previous to filing the petition in bankruptcy, to wit, on the 21st of December, 1867, Fullings left ten of the bonds in the hands of Emerson Coleman, in the city of New York, subject to his own order. Coleman says he knows of no purpose for which they were deposited with him, except to be afterwards called for by Fullings. The remaining two had been pledged by the bankrupt with two of his creditors in New York, as collateral security for the payment of debts due to them respectively. Through the instrumentality of Coleman these debts were subsequently paid by Fullings and the bonds surrendered by the creditors to Coleman. On the 25th of February, 1869, the whole twelve were delivered by Coleman to the bankrupt, who continued in the possession of them to the day of his death, receiving for several years the annual interest accruing upon them. In the absence of all contradictory proof, I have no hesitation in holding that the deposit of the bonds with Coleman was a device of the bankrupt to get the property out of the reach of his creditors, and that under the deed of assignment the bankrupt was entitled to have and receive the same as assets of the bankrupt estate.

2. I do not find evidence of laches on the part of the assignee in bringing the suit which should bar him from a recovery at this late date. The action was commenced within a few weeks after the assignee discovered the fraud. He had had some knowledge of the existence of the bonds, and none appearing upon the sworn schedule of the bankrupt, he made inquiry of him and was led to believe that they were not the property of the bankrupt, but belonged to his son. There is no proof that the assignee living in North Carolina had any information of the acts of ownership subsequently exercised by the bankrupt over the bonds in New Jersey. Nothing appears which ought to have put him on inquiry. The supreme court in Bailey v. Grover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 342, held that where an action was intended to obtain redress against a fraud concealed by the party, or which from its nature remained secret, the bar of the statute of limitations did not commence to run until the fraud was discovered. Any other doctrine, said Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the whole court, would make the law which was designed to prevent fraud the means by which it is made successful and secure. There must be a decree for the complainant, but as there is no evidence that the defendants, Abby Fullings, executrix, and George D. G. Moore, had any knowledge of the fraud, no costs are awarded against them.

SALVAGE—WHAT IS SALVAGE SERVICE—COMPENSATION.

[Towing oil barges, which have been cast loose from a burning wharf, and are still in danger, to a place of safety, is a salvage service, but, being rendered by a tug in the direct line of its business, and without danger to itself, is entitled to only a small compensation.]

In admiralty. From the libel, answer and depositions in this case the facts appear as follows: On the 12th of June, 1879, two barges were lying at a wharf on the Schuylkill taking in oil. A destructive fire had raged the day before among the neighboring wharves, sheds and shipping. On the 12th a vessel loaded with oil, which had been towed into the stream, burst, and burning oil floating from her on the water set fire to the wharf at which respondents' barges lay. The libellant's tug towed them out of danger, and now claims salvage $600. The respondents alleged that it was the farther end of the wharf that was on fire, and they left the wharf to drop down stream, being in no immediate danger, as a precautionary measure. That they could have readily effected escape by their own efforts; that they accepted libellant's offer "to throw them a line" simply as a "tow," and so considered the whole transaction, which only occupied a few moments. That they had offered and were still ready to pay libellant for towage service. And asked that the libellant be nonsuited as to salvage.

H. G. Ward and H. R. Edmunds, for libellant.

A. Sydney Biddle, for respondents.

BUTLER, District Judge. Although the vessels might possibly have escaped by the use of their poles, and the aid of the tide, they were, nevertheless, in peril. Their situation demanded assistance; that those in charge believed so is shown by their call for help at the time, and their statements, as witnesses, since. The services rendered were, therefore, "salvage services," and must be compensated accordingly. The testimony respecting the value of the vessels is conflicting and irreconcilable.

The libellant incurred no risk, and was detained but a few minutes. What he did was in the direct line of his business, and subjected him to no inconvenience. In view of all the circumstances, I think sixty-five dollars a just allowance; and a decree for this sum, with costs, will be entered.

DEMURRAGE—REASONABLE TIME—CUSTOM OF CHICAGO—DUTY OF CONSIGNEE—DOCK ROOM.

1. Damages in the nature of demurrage are recoverable from consignee without stipulation in bill of lading.

[Cited in Hawgood v. One Thousand Three Hundred and Ten Tons of Coal, 21 Fed. 685; The William Marshall, 29 Fed. 329.]

[Cited in Scholl v. Albany & R. I. & S. Co., 101 N. Y. 604, 5 N. E. 782.]

2. What shall be deemed a reasonable time must always be a question of fact, to be determined by the circumstances of each case. By the custom of the port of Chicago one day is allowed the consignee to provide a dock, and this custom, unless rendered unreasonable by controlling circumstances, should be considered a law.

[Cited in Lindsay, Gracie & Co. v. Cusimans, 12 Fed. 506; Bowen v. Decker, 18 Fed. 752; Houge v. Woodruff, 19 Fed. 138.]

3. A consignee is bound to give only such dispatch as is reasonable under the circumstances.

4. Consignees must provide such reasonable dock room as their business ordinarily requires.

5. A consignee who has provided sufficient dock room for vessels as they arrive is not at fault when from causes over which he has no control several arrive together. He is not obliged to procure other docks; vessels must await their turn at consignee's dock.

[Cited in The J. E. Owen, 54 Fed. 187.]

6. If a consignee had provided ample docks for the accommodation of vessels consigned to him, in their order, vessels arriving out of the time when they ought reasonably to have been expected must await their turn.

In admiralty. This was a libel in personam by N. C. Fulton, as owner of the schooner Kate Hinchman, against the respondents [C. A. Blake and others], as consignees, for damages in the nature of demurrage. The facts are stated in the opinion.

W. H. Condon, for libellant.

Mr. Judd and W. F. Whitehouse, for respondents.

As there was no charter party or express stipulation in the bill of lading for demurrage, this action cannot be maintained for demurrage as such, and the only obligation upon the consignees is upon their implied contract against an unreasonable detention. This detention must arise from the delinquency of the consignees. Wordin v. Bemis, 32 Conn. 268; Cross v. Beard, 26 N. Y. 85. If a vessel is unloaded in her regular turn, there cannot be any complaint for unreasonable detention. Robertson v. Jackson, 2 C. B. 412; Syers v. Jonas, 2 Exch. 111; Wordin v. Bemis, 32 Conn. 268. If the defendant had a right to require that the cargo should be delivered upon his own dock, he was guilty of no fault or breach of contract in delaying the plaintiff's vessel until she should come up to the dock by taking her turn. Cross v. Beard, 26 N. Y. 85. Consignees are not liable when vessel is loaded in her turn in a reasonable time. The vessel must be improperly detained to entitle owners to damages. Clendaniel v. Tuckerman, 17 Barb. 184. The question of reasonable time is to be determined on a consideration of all the circumstances. 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 311. It is a uniform rule that where there is no express stipulation as to the time of unloading, a consignee is not liable for delays occurring without his fault, or a failure on his part to comply with some of the obligations imposed upon him by law or a custom of the port as to unloading. Weaver v. Walton [Case No. 17,312]. It must be averred in the libel and proved by the libellant that the delay was due to delinquency of respondents. The burden of showing that the detention was unnecessarily caused by the respondents, is on the libellant. It is a material fact to show that it was not libellant's mismanagement or that of his agents. Cross v. Beard, 26 N. Y. 85. Ship owner must perform the voyage in the shortest time consistent with safety. The Gentlemen [Cases No. 5,323 and 5,324].

BLODGETT, District Judge. The essential facts, as I find them from the pleadings and proofs, are: That in the latter part of September, 1871, the firm of C. A. Blake & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., loaded on board said schooner Kate Hinchman, 426 tons Lehigh coal, consigned to Blake, Whitehouse & Co., of Chicago, at a freight of fifty cents per ton.

The schooner sailed with her cargo on the 29th of September, and arrived in the port of Chicago on the evening of the 16th of October, with her cargo on board, and on the morning of the 17th the consignees were notified of her arrival and readiness to discharge cargo. The bill of lading contained no stipulation in regard to demurrage. The consignees were engaged in the coal business in this city, occupying two docks—one on the north branch of Chicago river, near Indiana street, capable of accommodating two vessels at a time, and the other near Eighteenth street, on the south branch, capable of unloading only one vessel at a time. Their dock at Indiana street was injured by the great fire of October 9th, and nearly all the employés at that dock were burned out, and no efficient help to unload at said dock was obtainable for many days after the fire.

When the Hinchman arrived, the Indiana-street dock was occupied by other vessels unloading coal, and she was directed to proceed to the Eighteenth-street dock, her towage bill being paid by respondents. This dock was occupied by the schooner King, which had arrived two days before the Hinchman, although she had sailed from Buffalo eight days after, and the Hinchman did not get alongside the dock so as to commence unloading until the afternoon of the 21st, and completed unloading on the 23d of October.

The respondents' business was such that they expected to receive and unload at their docks during the months of September and October of that year about four cargoes per week, and they had ample facilities for unloading that number, The respondents unloaded vessels consigned to them in the order in which they arrived and reported themselves ready to unload. The great fire considerably deranged respondents' business, and deprived them of the use of their largest dock for several days. The usual time, at that season of the year, for a voyage from Buffalo to Chicago was twelve days. It was admitted that by a general usage and custom in Chicago the consignee of a vessel is allowed one day after notice of her arrival in which to provide a dock or place for unloading her. And it appears from the proof that the respondents had machinery at their docks, by which they were able to unload coal from a vessel at the rate of ten tons per hour from each hatch, which was much more rapidly than it could be done at any other dock.

The amount involved in this suit is not of much consequence to either party, but the principle is important to all freighters, consignees and vessel owners.

It is objected that a suit will not lie for damages against the consignee unless there is an express stipulation for demurrage in the charter party or bill of lading, and, technically speaking, the respondents' counsel may be correct; but when the consignee of goods is notified by the carrier of his readiness to deliver the goods, it is the duty of the consignee to either refuse to receive the goods, which under certain circumstances, not necessary now to mention, he may do, or to provide a place for the reception of the goods within a reasonable time, and what shall be deemed a reasonable time must always be a question of fact, to be determined by the circumstances of each case. By the usage of this port, one day is allowed the consignee of a vessel, after notice of her arrival, in which to provide a dock at which she can unload, and this usage, unless rendered unreasonable by controlling circumstances, should undoubtedly be considered as part of the contract.

It is also the duty of a person who is engaged in such business as to require him to expect or anticipate the arrival of vessels with cargoes consigned to him, to provide or arrange for sufficient dock-room to unload vessels as they arrive in port under ordinary circumstances within one day after arrival. That is to say, persons to whom vessels are consigned must provide such reasonable dock-room as their business ordinarily requires.

If a man's business is such that he would naturally receive two or three cargoes a week, he should provide dock-room for that number as they arrive in the order of sailing; but if, by reason of baffling winds or other delays, over which the consignee has no control, all of those vessels should arrive at once, instead of arriving in order of sailing, as he had reason to expect them, the consignee who has provided dock-room to accommodate three or four or a half-dozen vessels a week as they may successively arrive from day to day, is certainly not at fault if, from the poor sailing quality of some, or head-winds, or other causes over which he has no control, they all arrive on the same day, when he had a right to expect them on successive days in the order of sailing. And if, by reason of any such unexpected occurrence, several vessels arrive together, he is not obliged to procure other docks, but the vessels must respectively await their turns at the consignee's docks. This rule is more specially applicable to sailing vessels, which from their mode of propulsion are more uncertain in their times of arrival than vessels propelled by steam.

All persons engaged in dealing with ships, whether master, crew or consignee, are bound to give them dispatch, and whoever causes any unreasonable delay is answerable in damages.

A consignee to whom the cargo of a vessel is consigned should, within the time prescribed by the usage of the port after notice of the arrival of the vessel, furnish a suitable place for unloading, or he shall pay damages for detention, whether demurrage be noted on the bill of lading or not. It may not be what is technically called demurrage in the books, but it is damages for unreasonable detention, unless the vessel has arrived so far out of her expected time as to make such prompt dispatch unreasonable; in which case he must give her such dispatch as is reasonable under the circumstances. And probably as safe a general rule as can be laid down is that if the consignee had provided ample docks for the accommodation of the vessels consigned to him in their order, vessels arriving out of the time when they ought reasonably to have been expected, must await their turn at the docks. Although this rule may have its exceptions, and should never be vexatiously or unnecessarily enforced to the delay and damage of a vessel, the interests of commerce—and that term as used by the courts means the interest of the public—require that ships should be kept moving. "Ships," says one author, "were made to plough the sea, and not to lie rotting at the wharves." Tested by these general principles, I am clearly of the opinion that the libellant has not made out a case entitling him to relief.

The respondents had provided ample dock-room for unloading the vessels consigned to them if they arrived in the order in which they might reasonably be expected. By reason of slow sailing qualities or bad management on the part of her master or crew, the Hinchman did not arrive till at least six days after she was reasonably due, and respondents were not bound to keep a dock waiting for her all that time, or have one ready just one day after her arrival. They are only bound to furnish her a dock in a reasonable time after her arrival, and under the evidence of this case, I do not think the delay from the 17th to the 21st unreasonable.

The city had, only seven days before the arrival of this vessel, been visited by one of the most destructive fires ever known, destroying nearly half of its docks, two-thirds of its stores and warehouses, and rendering one-third of its inhabitants homeless. I deem this alone such an intervention of unforeseen circumstances as excused the delay which occurred. Admitting that under ordinary circumstances the respondents would have been bound to furnish the vessel with a dock within one day after notice, there were extraordinary circumstances controlling all persons doing business in this city at that time, to such extent, at least, as absolve respondents from the consequences of the delay charged in this libel.

Libel dismissed at libellant's costs.

NOTE. In a recent case in the Northern district of Ohio, it was held that by the custom of lakes the consignee had twenty-four hours after the arrival of a vessel at the docks to provide a place for her and prepare for unloading, and that in unloading at an elevator each vessel should take her turn in the order of arrival; that demurrage might be recovered where there was a breach of an implied covenant or duty on the part of the consignee, even without any stipulation for demurrage in the bill of lading; that the consignee is not liable for delays occurring without his fault, or a failure on his part to comply with some of the obligations imposed upon him by law, or a custom of a port as to unloading; and that a master is bound to know the custom of a port to which he undertakes to transport freight. MOTION TO DISCHARGE DEFENDANT FROM ARREST ON MESNE PROCESS—PRACTICE.

While the pleadings, practice, and forms in the circuit and district courts should conform as near as may be to the practice in the state courts, yet a commissioner of the United States may, as an officer under the state law, take the verification of all necessary papers in order to procure the arrest of the defendant.

[Cited in Sanford v. Portsmouth, Case No. 12,315.]

[This was an action at law by John A. Fulton against James J. Gilmore.]

Prentiss & Vorce, for plaintiff.

E. J. Estep, for defendant.

WELKER, District Judge. This action is founded upon a promissory note of the defendant for the sum of eight hundred dollars. With the petition the plaintiff filed an affidavit that the defendant had property, money and rights in action which he fraudulently concealed, and setting out particular facts as required in the Ohio Code, and asked an order of arrest, which was issued by the clerk of the court, and the defendant was arrested by the marshal. The affidavit was verified before George Wyman, a commissioner of this court.

The defendant moves a discharge from such arrest because the affidavit is not verified before an officer authorized to make the same. The authority of the commissioner to administer the necessary oath, presents the only question relied upon in the argument of the case.

The grounds for arrest of a defendant, and the mode of procuring it are provided in the Code of Civil Procedure of this state.

Section 146 of the Code provides that "an order for the arrest of the defendant shall be made by the clerk of the court in which the action is brought, when there is filed in his office an affidavit of the plaintiff, his authorized agent or attorney, made before any judge of any court of the state, or clerk thereof, or justice of the peace, stating the nature of the plaitiff's claim, etc., and establishing one or more of the following particulars: * * *

3. "That he has property or rights of action which he fraudulently conceals." The defendant claims that the affidavit must be made before one of the officers above named, and if not so done the order of arrest cannot be issued.

Section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that "the practice, pleadings and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes * * * in the circuit and district courts shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like cases in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held."

Section 990 provides that "no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any state on process issuing from a court in the United States, where by the laws of such state imprisonment for debt has been or shall be abolished. And all modifications, conditions and restrictions upon imprisonment for debt, provided by the laws of any state, shall be applicable to the process issuing from the courts of the United States to be executed therein; and the same course of proceedings shall be adopted therein as may be adopted in the courts of such state."

Rule 1st of this court provides that "actions shall be commenced and prosecuted, and process shall be issued, endorsed, made returnable and served in the manner provided in the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of Ohio, except as otherwise provided in these rules, or in the laws of the United States applicable to special cases."

It will be seen from the above references that the practice in this class of cases of the state courts has been adopted and recognized, not literally, but substantially, or "as near as may be," in like proceedings in this court.

The question then arises whether, in applying the state laws to cases in this court, the verification of the necessary papers required to be made, in order to procure an arrest of a defendant, must be strictly confined to the officers named in the section of the Code, that is, judge or clerk of a court of the state, or justice of the peace, or whether the officers of the court who are authorized to administer oaths and verify papers used in the court, may not take such verification?

Section 945 of the Revised Statutes provides that "bail and affidavits when required or allowed in any civil cause in any circuit or district court may be taken by a commissioner of the circuit court for the district." Under this section, the commissioner before whom the affidavit was made had complete authority to take affidavits to be used in this court in all civil cases. But it is claimed inasmuch as this proceeding restrained the defendant of his liberty by his arrest, the law must be strictly complied with, and the affidavit producing that restraint must be made before one of the officers named in the Code. This seems to me an exceedingly narrow construction of the United States statutes adopting the practice and mode of proceedings of the state courts.

It was only intended by them, in this class of cases, to require the same grounds for arrest of a defendant, and to be made appear by affidavit, as was required by the state law, leaving the verifications to be made before such officers as are authorized to take such affidavits or verifications in this court, as well as to use the officers of this court to serve and execute process, or, in other words, use the official machinery of this court instead of the state court.

Any other construction would require a plaintiff to find a state judge, clerk, or justice of the peace, who is unknown to this court, to take the verification, and also require the arrest to be made by a sheriff instead of the marshal, thus making it exceedingly inconvenient to use such state mode of procedure.

The motion to discharge is therefore overruled.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — ORDER BY STATE COURT — TIME OF REMOVAL.

[Where an equity case is pending in a state court for several years after issue joined, and has not been brought to hearing in consequence of the neglect of parties to enforce the rules of the court for the taking of testimony, held, that the petition for removal was filed too late when the case could have been first tried under the local laws and practice, at several terms before the filing of the petition.]

NIXON, District Judge. This is a motion to remand the above stated cause to the court of chancery of the state of New Jersey, whence it was removed under the act of March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 470]. Two grounds are assigned for the motion: (1) Because the record does not show that this court has jurisdiction of the case. (2) Because the application for removal comes too late.

1. With regard to the first it is sufficient to observe that the petition alleges that the amount in dispute between the parties, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of five hundred dollars outlay, and that the controversy in said suit is between citizens of different states—the petitioner, who is the sole party defendant, being a citizen of Pennsylvania, and the sole complainant, a citizen of the state of Delaware. A bond in the penal sum of two thousand dollars, with two sureties residing in this state, was filed with the petition, and as no question was raised in the state court or here as to its sufficiency, it must be assumed to have been in compliance with the requirements of the law.

It was suggested in the argument that the cause should be remanded, because it did not appear that the state court made an order of removal. There is nothing in the act of March 3, 1875, requiring such an order and none is necessary. The jurisdiction of the state court over the cause terminates with the filing of the petition and bond. Taylor v. Rockefeller [Case No. 13,802]; McMurdy v. Life Ins. Co. [Id. 8,903].

2. Whether the application for removal was made too late depends upon the construction of the last recited act, which materially changed the law in this respect. Under the 12th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 73] the application was required to be made by the defendant, "at the time of entering his appearance in the state court." He waived his right to remove the cause after he had in any manner submitted himself to the jurisdiction. The several acts of July 27, 1866 [14 Stat. 306], and March 2, 1867 [Id. 558], enlarge the time, and under them the petition for removal might be made "at any time before the trial or final hearing of the cause or suit" in the state court. But the 3d section of the act of March 3, 1875 [supra], again restricts the power of removal in reference to the time, and requires the petition in the state court to be made and filed "before or at the term at which such cause could be first tried and before the trial thereof."

What is the meaning of the expression "could be first tried?" Does it mean "could be first tried," by the legislation of the state and the rules and practice of the state court, when the parties have been diligent in preparing the case for trial or hearing? or does it mean "could be first tried" after the parties have put in their pleadings and got the case at issue, and have closed their testimony, years, it may be, after the suit was commenced? If the latter, then the right of removal would seem to depend upon the diligence or want of diligence of the litigants, rather than upon any designation of time in the law itself. It must be confessed that the section is very defective in precision of expression or obviousness of meaning; but the change in the phraseology shows, that congress meant to abridge the right of removal and to fix a definite time within which it was to be exercised. If the construction is adopted which the defendant urges, it would be in the power of the respective parties to keep a case pending through a series of years in the state court, by neglect to file the pleadings, or to conclude the taking of testimony, and then to procrastinate and still further delay the final hearing by removal to a federal tribunal.

The case under consideration affords abundant illustration of this. The bill of complaint was filed in the court of chancery of the state July 22, 1873, and the subpoena was returnable on the 5th of August following. The defendant put in the plea of the pendency of a suit between the same parties for the same cause of action in a court of law in the state of Pennsylvania, which the chancellor overruled, and the defendant was ordered to answer the bill within thirty days from the 9th of December, 1874. On the 13th of January, 1875, the answer was filed, and on the 16th of February following, the replication. The cause being thus at issue, February 16th, 1873, the rule of the court required that the complainant should begin to take testimony on his part within thirty days after issue joined, and conclude the same in thirty days (see 80th rule), within fifteen days thereafter, the defendant must commence taking testimony on his part and conclude the same in thirty days (rule 81). At the expiration of this time the complainant is required to proceed immediately, or by adjournment, not exceeding ten days, with testimony to rebut the testimony of the defendant, or to sustain testimony on his part impeached or contradicted by the defendant. The defendant may afterward produce counter-rebutting evidence on his part, but such evidence shall not be continued for more than five days on each side. Rule 83. By the 86th rule the time for taking testimony above limited shall not be extended except by written consent or by order of the court made upon notice. Under the provision of rule 15, if the complainant fails, within ten days after the expiration of the time to take the testimony, to notice the cause for argument, the defendant is entitled to an order, of course, directing the complainant to show cause why the defendant should not be permitted to notice the cause for argument and bring on the hearing thereof at the next stated term; and if cause be not shown to the contrary, the defendant is permitted to give the notice and bring on the hearing. The stated terms of the court are held on the first Tuesday of February, the third Tuesday of May, and the third Tuesday of October, annually. If the foregoing rules had been observed in taking the testimony the cause "could have been first tried" at the term of October, 1875. But it was not moved by either party, then, or afterward, although at least eight stated terms of the court intervened before the 31st day of May, 1878, when the petition for removal was filed. To hold that the application was in time would be to affirm that no term of the court of chancery had been reached during these two and a half years, at which the cause could be tried under the legislation of the state and the rules of practice made pursuant thereto.

My attention has not been called to a case where the act has received construction, or where it has been necessary to give it a construction in this respect. But Judge Dillon, in his treatise on the Removal of Causes, p. 57, and more especially in Ames v. Colorado Cent. R. Co. [Case No. 325], strongly intimates that where under the local law and practice a case could have been finally heard at a stated term, a removal is not in time after the expiration of said term. Much support also is given to this view by the reasoning of Drummond, J., in Scott v. Clinton & S. R. Co. [Id. 12,527], in which the learned judge deplores the ambiguity of the language employed in the statute, but cites with approbation a decision of his own, that an application for removal comes too late where a term is suffered to elapse by consent of parties after the issue has been formed by the pleadings.

It is the judgment of the court that the petition for removal came too late, and the motion to remand the cause must prevail, and it is ordered accordingly.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March, 1853.

APPEALS FROM COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS—REASONS OF APPEAL—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—INVENTION.

[1. The provision in the act of 1839 (chapter 88, § 11, 5 Stat. 354), that appeals from the commissioner to the judge shall be heard "on the evidence produced before the commissioner," does not take away the appellant's right to assign, as a reason of appeal, that the commissioner refused to hear certain evidence offered; and the commissioner, in stating the grounds of his decision, is bound to answer such reason, and the judge to decide it. And the judge in so doing may order the taking of such evidence for the purpose of determining by examination its relevancy and materiality, and, if satisfied thereof, may order a new trial.]

[2. The unopposed oath of the inventor, though not of itself sufficient, is some evidence of the novelty, invention, and usefulness of the improvement. The rule of law is that a patent granted on such unopposed oath is prima facie evidence in an action for infringement.]

[3. But slight evidence of invention is required when it is shown in what the invention consists, and where proof is given of practical utility.]

[4. While a mere change in the relative size of parts in a machine is not invention, yet, if a new effect is shown to be produced by a change of proportion, this is more than a mere change, and may involve patentable invention.]

[This was an appeal by Hugh H. Fultz from the refusal of the commissioner of patents to grant him a patent for an alleged improvement in a horse-power for cotton gins and other agricultural appliances.]

Appeal from the decision of the commissioner finally rejecting the application for lack of patentable novelty. The purported invention related to horse-power for cotton gins and other agricultural appliances; and the question was presented whether a change in the form and proportions of a machine is the proper subject of a patent. Applicant's machine did not differ from existing machines in the nature, number, or arrangement of its parts, but it was contended that certain changes in the relative size of the various parts of the gearing tended to reduce the friction of the machine to an appreciable degree and thereby to increase its efficiency. A denial by the office that this result was in fact produced led to extended argument on both sides as to the mechanical principles involved. The applicant submitted a comparative statement of the amount of friction developed in the two machines, respectively, showing the advantages possessed by his own machine in that respect. The accuracy of the calculation was challenged, it being pointed out in particular that no account had been taken in the estimate, of the greater friction likely to be developed in applicant's machine owing to the increased rapidity of rotation. In effect, the office contended that the alleged invention was but a mere change in the form or proportion of the machine, not producing any new result further than is always produced when the proportions of gearing are adapted to the speed required for the particular mechanical operation. Pending the decision the applicant was permitted, on motion, to submit affidavits to show that his changes in the proportions of the machine in fact produced a useful result.

Examiners Renwick and Parker and Chief Clerk Weightman, for the Commissioner.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. On the 1st of July, 1852, Hugh H. Fultz, of the state of Mississippi, applied to the commissioner of patents for letters-patent to be granted to him for a new and useful improvement in so proportioning the machinery as to produce the requisite speed and force concentrated upon the working-point to move a cotton gin, &c. On the 7th of July, 1852, the commissioner notified said Fultz that his said claim had been examined, and found to present nothing new and patentable, and referred him to several cases in which letters-patent for horse-powers had been granted having precisely the same arrangement of parts and from which the machine under consideration differed only in the size and proportions of its wheels. The commissioner proceeds to state "that he was also referred to the fact, as established by the practice of the office and the decisions of the courts that a change in the relative size of the parts of an old machine for the purpose of obtaining a required velocity could not be made the subject of letters-patent." The specification was then withdrawn from the office, the claim was altered so as to read as it now stands in the specification, in which he states: "My improvement consists in so proportioning the machinery as to produce the requisite speed and force concentrated upon the working-point to move a cotton gin, &c., with the minimum power, by which I have been enabled to effect a saving of more than one-half of the power required for ordinary apparatus to gin cotton. By the construction, proportion, and arrangement I have a force equal to that expended upon the prime mover at the working-point, minus the friction, there being no loss of power by erroneous proportion of parts, as would be the case by any deviation from my formula." He then proceeds to give the particular construction of the machine, towards the end of which he says: "By this proportion of parts it will be found that one hundred pounds force upon the end of the lever will produce one hundred pounds force upon the pinion (L), minus the friction; and at the ordinary ascertained travel of a mule it will make over one hundred and fifty revolutions with that force per minute, or sixty revolutions of the band-shaft to one of the master wheel, equal to what is required to drive a gin. This equalizing the force at the driving and working-points is the important feature of my invention." The report of the commissioner proceeds to say: "This specification thus changed was returned to the office for consideration, with an argument by Mr. Fultz's attorney, (No. 3,) and some calculations (No. 4) by Mr. Fultz intended to demonstrate the superiority of his machine over those to which he was referred. The argument opens with the following remarks: 'From your postulate that all horse-powers throw upon the working-point all the power of the prime mover, less the friction, we beg leave to dissent. Friction is but a single element of loss, and a very minor one, in many horse-powers, between the prime mover and the working-point, by which the power is wasted; and it is the avoidance of these and other errors, as well as the diminution of friction, that we base the merits of this invention upon.'" The commissioner proceeds: "No effort was made in this argument to show what were the 'other elements of loss,' or the 'other errors' spoken of, or how such errors had been avoided; but a simple 'dissent' from the fact assumed by the office was stated upon the assumption of the 'easier running' of the machine in question." To that part of the letter which refers to legal authorities to prove that if the result of the improvement was a superiority in utility over all those to which he had referred them, or might thereafter refer them, that would entitle Fultz to a patent, the commissioner says: "Advantages, which the office after the most careful and repeated examinations have not been able to discover, should not only be set forth specifically and plainly by the applicant in his specification or argument, but be demonstrated and proved actually to exist before precedents and authorities be adduced to show that letters-patent could be based upon them; the calculations made by Fultz must fall, because he has omitted the most important element in them, viz., the number of revolutions in a given space of time; and the calculations themselves will be found to be filled with mistakes, and are based upon the fundamental error that the friction of moving machinery is dependent upon the amount of pressure put upon the wheels, without reference to the number of revolutions made by the wheels in a given space of time." This matter, the commissioner says, was discussed in brief, in official letter of July 13th, 1852, and was replied to by applicant on the 14th. (See letter No. 6.) In that letter the counsel for Fultz says "that his letter of the 9th instant, addressed to the patent office in the case of H. H. Fultz, Esq., has been misunderstood. In that letter it was distinctly intimated that friction was not the only element of loss of power in this case. If it was, and your axiom contained in your letter of July 13th is correct, no change in the construction of the parts of a machine for transmitting power from the motion to the working-point would make any difference or decrease the effect." To support the position, he says that the best authorities he has been able to consult on the subject of friction leave it an uncertain matter, and the best experiments show but an approximation to the truth in any practical machine. He refers to various authorities on the subject. Towards the close of the last authority cited by him, it is said "no conjectural calculation should be relied on when the real loss of power can be obtained by experiment."

The commissioner proceeds: "If, then, the number of revolutions performed in a certain specified time be a grand essential in all calculations concerning moving machinery, the calculations of Mr. Fultz are based upon an entirely erroneous assumption, as the element of time, or rather the number of revolutions made in a given time, is excluded from them; furthermore, this matter is not now involved in the uncertainty which the letter No. 6 would lead to suppose. The recent experiments made by the French Academy, and allowed by the best English authorities to warrant implicit confidence, &c., have set the matter at rest. A reference is made to the 'Engineer and Machinist Assistant, Blackie & Son,' Glasgow, 1847, page 54." The commissioner further states: "Mr. Fultz has been referred to four-horse powers having precisely the same arrangement of wheels with his, and differing only in the relative size and proportions of the parts. This case comes clearly within the dictum of Judge Story, who says: 'It is not necessary to defeat the plaintiff's patent that a machine should have previously existed in every respect similar to his own, for a mere change of former proportions will not entitle a party to a patent,' (Woodcock v. Parker [Case No. 17,971,]) Mr. Fultz having entirely failed to demonstrate that his is anything more than a mere change of former proportions, or that any useful result has been produced by such change, other than is always produced when the relative proportions of gearing are adapted to the speed required for various mechanical operations."

The claim of Mr. Fultz being thus rejected, he notified the commissioner of his desire and intention to appeal, and filed in the office his reasons of appeal, five in number: 1. That the commissioner in his refusal to issue the patent gives no reason, but to the effect only that the application did not set forth such a case as would authorize the issuing of a patent, whereas the specification given and the model furnished in accordance with the acts of congress in such case made and provided set forth and demonstrated new and important results produced by a particular proportion of some of the mechanical powers in a mode and manner not before used or applied. 2. Reason is, in substance, the same with the first. 3. Because it was evident from the specifications and model aforesaid that in consequence of the particular size and mode of the application of the different parts of the machinery exhibited by said model that the improvement therein was new and useful in a high degree, producing results never before produced or attained. 4. Because the novelty claimed is the specific proportions of the machine, whereby a beneficial result is produced, and that result is due to the proportions of the machine. 5. The commissioner refused to receive additional proof of the new results claimed by the applicant as having been produced by his machine.

The commissioner, in more particularly stating the grounds of his decision touching the points involved by the reasons of appeal, says, in answer to the first and second reasons, that neither the specification nor the model set forth or demonstrate any new or important result produced by the particular proportions used, while the mode and manner in which the mechanical powers are used or applied are precisely similar to that found in the four machines referred to. It is not evident that the improvements produced new and important and useful results. To the third, the oath of the applicant is but one of the requisites which must be complied with before letters-patent can issue, and it is of no force except as a test of the honesty of the belief of the applicant as regards the novelty of the alleged invention. To the fourth, the applicant has failed to demonstrate that any beneficial result has been produced, and therefore the change of proportion is clearly not patentable. To the fifth, reference is made to letters S and 9, from which it will appear that the applicant was informed that the office was at all times ready to receive any evidence which he might see fit to offer, though it could not encourage him to offer any further evidence with a view to a reconsideration of the case.

After which the party (Hugh H. Fultz) presented to me his petition for an appeal, stating in substance his previous application for a patent, the grounds of it, and the refusal of the commissioner to grant the patent; also that he was willing and very desirous of offering the testimony of highly respectable gentlemen, who had seen his machine in operation, in further corroboration of the new results produced by his said machine. Yet the said commissioner refused to receive the same, and rejected his application for a patent; of all which due notice was given to the commissioner, and of the time and place appointed by me for the trial, at which time and place the petitioner, by Mr. Greenough, his counsel, and Mr. Weightman, chief clerk in the office of patents, and Mr. Renwick, the examiner, attended; and it appearing that from sickness the report had not been prepared, the trial for that cause was postponed from time to time until the 22d of September, when the petitioner, by his counsel (Mr. Carlisle) and an examiner on the part of the office, appeared with the report of the commissioner and original papers and models; and after the reading said report, on the motion of the petitioner's counsel and affidavit to show the commissioner's refusal to receive evidence on the part of Fultz, an order was made by me authorizing the said Fultz to take and file in this appeal the testimony of witnesses to prove the novelty of the results produced by his alleged invention, and the utility thereof, such evidence to be taken before any justice of the peace duly authenticated as such, and to be filed, &c., saving the question of its admissibility to the final decision; under which order sundry depositions of witnesses were duly and, from what appears, fairly taken, and have been filed with me; and on notice given to the commissioner of the party's offer to use the same on the trial of this appeal, the commissioner addressed the following note to me, dated the 16th of February, 1853: "Sir: Your note of the 14th instant, in regard to the hearing of the appeal of H. H. Fultz on Monday next, has been received. In this note you state that it is proposed to take additional testimony. This office would beg leave to call your attention to the following words in the act of March 3d, 1849: 'On the evidence produced before the commissioner,' and also to the orders in appeals made by you, '(3) the appeal will be tried upon the evidence which was in the case and produced before the commissioner.' "

The rule alluded to was intended to be in accordance with the provisions contained in the statute of congress of the 3d of March, 1839, c. 88, § 11 [supra], the proper construction of which will be an answer to the objection made by the office to the admissibility of the testimony which has been offered on this occasion. It provides "that in cases where an appeal is now allowed by law from the decision of the commissioner of patents to a board of examiners provided for in the seventh section of the act to which this is additional, the party, instead thereof, shall have a right to appeal to the chief justice of the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia, by giving notice thereof to the commissioner and filing in the patent office, within such time as the commissioner shall appoint, his reasons of appeal specifically set forth in writing, and also paying into the patent office to the credit of the patent fund the sum of twenty-five dollars. And it shall be the duty of the said chief justice, on petition, to hear and determine all such appeals, and to revise such decisions in a summary way, on the evidence produced before the commissioner, at such early and convenient time as he may appoint, first notifying the commissioner of the time and place of hearing, whose duty it shall be to give notice thereof to all parties who appear to be interested therein, in such manner as said judge shall prescribe. The commissioner shall also lay before the said judge all the original papers and evidence in the case, together with the grounds of his decision fully set forth in writing, touching all the points involved by the reasons of appeal, to which the revision shall be confined." The twelfth section provides for the taking of evidence—"that the commissioner of patents shall have power to make all such regulations in respect to the taking of evidence to be used in contesting cases before him as may be just and reasonable. And so much of the act to which this is additional as provides for a board of examiners is hereby repealed." Those parts of the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 117] not repealed by the law which I have just recited, and which relate to the question which I am now considering, are to be found in the seventh and eighth sections.

The seventh section, in effect, provides that on the presentation of an application for a patent, it shall be granted on the party's oath required to be previously made, unless on examination by the commissioner it should appear to him, first, that the applicant was not the original and first inventor or discoverer thereof; or, second, that any part of that which is claimed as new had before been invented, or discovered, or patented, or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country as aforesaid; or, third, that the description is defective or insufficient, in which case he shall notify the party, giving him briefly such information and references as may be useful in judging of the propriety of renewing his application, &c. But if the applicant shall persist in his claim for a patent, &c., he may, on appeal and upon request in writing, have the decision of a board of examiners, to be composed, &c. "Said board shall be furnished with a certificate in writing of the opinion and decision of the commissioner, stating the particular grounds of his objection and the part or parts of the invention which he considers as not entitled to be patented; and the said board shall give reasonable notice to the applicant as well as to the commissioner of the time and place of their meeting, that they may have an opportunity of furnishing them with such facts and evidence as they may deem necessary to a just decision. And it shall be the duty of the commissioner to furnish to the board of examiners such information as he may possess, relative to the matter under their consideration; and on examination and consideration of the matter by such board, it shall be in their power, or a majority of them, to reverse the decision of the commissioner either in whole or in part," &c.

The eighth section makes a similar provision for an appeal in the case of interfering applications, thus: "Whenever an application shall be made for a patent which, in the opinion of the commissioner, would interfere with any other patent for which an application may be pending, or with any unexpired patent which shall have been granted, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to give notice thereof to such applicants or patentees, as the case may be; and if either shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the commissioner on the question of priority of right or invention, on a hearing thereof he may appeal from such decision on the like terms and conditions as are provided in the preceding section of this act. And the like proceedings shall be had to determine which, or whether either, of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for."

Thus it appears that two classes of cases are provided for in the sections of the act of 1836 just recited—the one where there is no opposing party, and the other where there are interfering applications. In each case the applicant has a right equally to reasonable notice of the decision of the commissioner, in order to prepare to support his claim and to be heard upon the evidence or facts deemed necessary by him or them to a just decision thereof. I can perceive nothing in the repealing act of 1839 which takes away or impairs that right; on the contrary, every reason to infer that it was intended to be saved and secured to the fullest extent. The act, it is true, abolishes the particular tribunal, but it substitutes the chief judge of the district court of the United States for the District of Columbia in place thereof. The difficulty arises out of that part of the section which says "that the said chief justice shall hear and determine all such appeals, and revise such decisions in a summary way 'on the evidence produced before the commissioner;'" but rather than to conclude that there has been a casus omissus, every reasonable endeavor must be used to reconcile the apparent conflict in the different parts of the same statute. If, then, I have shown (as I think I have done) that the party equally in both classes of cases is still entitled to be heard upon the facts and evidence of his case, and the restrictive part of the eleventh section confines the judge, in trying the merits of the case, to such evidence as was produced before the commissioner, it follows that it is his duty, in a case like the present, to pursue, by reasonable regulations similar to those directed by the twelfth section, such a course as to afford an opportunity to the party to produce and lay before him on the trial his proofs to support his claim. If, then, the law be as I have stated it, the party has a right to insist, before the commissioner on the trial, on this privilege; and in offering competent and material evidence, if it is refused, or if his objection to inadmissible or incompetent testimony is overruled by the commissioner, he has a right to assign that as a reason of appeal; and the commissioner, in stating the grounds of his decision, is bound fully to answer such reason and the judge to decide it on appeal and afford relief, although the rule be as I have stated it when trying the cause upon its merits. In deciding upon such a reason of appeal, the judge must be satisfied of the relevancy, materiality, and competency of the testimony offered and refused, which he could not be satisfied of in the present case without permitting the ex-parte depositions to be taken and offered. There is no reason to believe that they have been unfairly taken. I will now proceed to consider the materiality and applicability of the evidence contained in the various depositions produced and offered.

The deposition of Thomas E. Warner (marked "J. S. M., No. 1") says he is a machinist. When in Washington, D. C., July, 1852, he examined Mr. H. H. Fultz's plan of a horse-power for driving cotton-gins or other machinery; that he believes it a very useful and important improvement in horse-power, requiring, in the first place, less power to set it in motion; second, it is more compact, easier to manage, and more durable in every respect, than any horse-power that has ever come to his knowledge. This appears to be taken before Wm. H. Sparks, commissioner of deeds, 31st December, 1852. The paper marked "J. S. M., 2," is the opinion of an expert and is an examination of the calculations made by Fultz. It was filed in the case at the time of the trial before the commissioner: "Judging from the model and diagrams before me, (the same filed in this case before the commissioner,) Fultz's machine combines correct proportions in the various parts constituting the whole machine. These parts again have the exact proportion for the purpose for which they were put together, performing the work intended with a great saving of power without additional transfer fixtures." He subjoins calculations by which a result is shown decidedly in favor of Fultz's improved machine over those of Emmerson, Fitzgerald, and Whipple. Maddison McAfee (J. S. M., 3) says that "he is familiar with the old mode now in use of propelling gins; that he has seen and examined the above-named power, (commonly called Fultz's propeller,) and is satisfied that it is decidedly superior to any power he has ever known for propelling gins, and, being a planter, has himself purchased one; and from the repeated and anxious inquiries by the farmers, and the expressed wishes to obtain one, he believes it will entirely supersede all others." William A. Purdom says "that he is familiar with the old mode now in use of propelling gins; that he has seen the power above named (Fultz's) in successful operation, and with two very ordinary mules it did the work which, with the old gearing, invariably required at least four good mules or horses; that deponent believes it to be the most useful invention of the kind that has ever been made, and from the repeated and anxious inquiries among the farmers and their expressed wishes to procure one, he believes that it will supersede all others." John M. West, James Simmes, Samuel Gibbons, R. A. Anderson, Wellington Jenkins, D. C. Sharpe, and forty-one other persons depose to substantially the same effect. There can be no doubt that the testimony stated in the aforegoing depositions would have been most material, if admissible and applicable, on the trial before the commissioner.

I have already stated the specifications, and the grounds of the commissioner's decision in answer to the reasons of appeal, one of which states that the letter (9) in answer to the application contained in appellant's letter (8) shows that the office was at all times ready to receive any evidence which he might see fit to offer, "though it could not encourage him to offer any further evidence with a view to a reconsideration of the case." If such an intimation can be understood as giving permission to offer his evidence for the purpose of a rehearing of the case thereon, it would seem from his affidavit that Fultz entirely misunderstood it.

With respect to the principles of mechanical philosophy stated by the commissioner, and which have been the ruling influence in his decision, the counsel for Fultz, in his argument, urged what he had before contended for, "that friction was not the only element of loss of power in the question before the commissioner before whom the arguments were made; that the best authorities on that subject leave it an uncertain matter, and the best experiments show but an approximation to the truth in any practical machine, while, upon the experiments of learned professors, under similar circumstances, the weight that overcame the friction was found to be nearly the same at all velocities," &c. Again, that "no conjectural calculation should be relied on when the real loss of power can be obtained by experiment;" that Mr. Fultz had tried practically, by actual experiment, the advantages of his machine over others, and found them to coincide essentially with his calculations," &c. The argument before me on the same point insists on the principle of the "loss of power by the indirect application of the force from the prime mover to the working point, and the loss very frequently resulting, as in this case, from the previous erroneous proportions of the machinery." This loss, counsel argues, has been saved by Fultz's improvement, and is the advantage over all the other machines referred to. And so with respect to the commissioner's objection to Fultz's calculations, because of his disregard of the time and number of the revolutions, he says that the fact is otherwise; that the assumption throughout those calculations was a given number of revolutions of the master-wheel, equal in all, which must necessarily be restricted to the speed at which the animal can walk. These are constant quantities, and need not therefore be brought into the account.

In connection with these arguments I think it would be proper to restate a part of Fultz's description, which may be taken as a part of the specification, to wit: "By this proportion of parts it will be found that one hundred pounds force upon the end of the lever will produce one hundred pounds force upon the pinion (F), minus the friction, and at the ordinary ascertained travel of a mule it will make over one hundred and fifty revolutions with that force per minute, or sixty revolutions of the band-shaft to one of the master-wheel, equal to what is required to drive a gin. This equalizing the force at the driving and working points is the important feature of my invention." This, in connection with the specifications, is intended to show a new proportion and arrangement of the parts between the driving and working points, which saves the loss of power over the horse-power referred to.

However forcibly I may feel myself affected by the aforegoing arguments, I wish it to be understood that it is very far from my purpose in this investigation to question the truth of the principles of mechanical philosophy stated by the commissioner and examiners, or to call in question the principle as settled by the officer and the courts, "that a mere change in the relative size of the parts of an old machine for the purpose of obtaining a required velocity is not patentable."

With respect to the party's own oath in the present case it is unopposed by the oath of any other party, and although not of itself sufficient, is some evidence of the novelty, invention and usefulness of the improvement. The rule of law is, that a patent issuing, grounded on the oath of the patentee, under such circumstances, will be considered as prima-facie evidence in an action for an infringement of a patent-right. And this brings me to the consideration of the answer of the commissioner to the fourth reason of appeal, in which he says: "It is only necessary to state that as the applicant has failed to demonstrate that any beneficial result has been produced, and as therefore the change of proportions is clearly not patentable, the action of the commissioner was fully in accordance with the decisions of the courts." What, therefore, are the decisions of the courts in like cases? But slight evidence of the invention is required when it is shown in what the invention consists, as has been done in this case, and where proof is given of its practical utility. This is a main and principal test, and this may be shown by the testimony of those who have seen the practical effect or result. To this point the proof offered by the appellant was very full and ample. It appears to me that the argument and authorities presented by the counsel for the appellant are conclusive.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Davis v. Palmer [Case No. 3,645], says: "It is not every change of form and proportion which is declared to be no discovery, but that which is simply a change of form or proportion, and nothing more. If by changing the form and proportion a new effect is produced, there is not simply a change of form and proportion but a change of principle also." Curtis (sections 14 and 15): "It appears, then, according to the English authorities, that the amount of invention may be estimated from the result, although not capable of being directly estimated on a view of the invention itself." "The utility of the change is the best to be applied for this purpose," &c. "When a real utility is seen to exist, a sufficiency of invention may be presumed, and it is said that whenever utility is proved to exist in a very great degree, a sufficiency of invention to support a patent must be presumed." Webster, Subject-Matter, p. 30; Webst. Pat. Cas. 71. Curtis (section 95): "The statute also makes a new and useful improvement of a machine the subject of a patent. A patent for improvement of a machine is the same thing as a patent for an improved machine. Improvement applied to machinery is where a specific machine already exists, and an addition or alteration is made to produce the same effects in better manner, or some new combinations are added to produce new effects. In such cases the patent can only be for the improvement or new combination. The great question, of course, when an alleged invention purports to be an improvement of an existing machine, is to ascertain whether it be a real and material improvement or only a change of form. In such cases it is necessary to ascertain, with as much accuracy as the nature of such inquiries admits, the boundaries between what was known and used before, and what is new in the mode of operation. The inquiry, therefore, must be, not whether the same elements of motion, or the same component parts, are used, but whether the given effect is produced substantially by the same mode of operation and the same combination of powers in both machines, or whether some new element, combination, or feature has been added to the old machine, which produces either the same effect in a cheaper or more expeditious manner, or an entirely new effect, or an effect that is in some material respects superior, though in other respects similar, to that produced by the old machine."

Upon the whole, I think a new trial ought to be granted.

District Court, D. California. Nov. 8, 1870.

BANKRUPTCY — COMPETENCY OF AN ASSIGNEE — FITNESS OF NOMINEE—THE LAW APPLICABLE.

[The discretion reserved to the court by the act of 1867 (14 Stat. 517) to approve or disapprove the creditors' election of an assignee is a legal discretion, and disapproval of an assignee elected by the great majority both in number and amount of creditors can only be warranted by the fact that the nominee is commercially dishonest, and has such a reputation in the commercial community; nor should the court take such action upon mere rumors, which, upon investigation, cannot be traced to any facts justifying them.]

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of J. Funkenstein & Co. Report of register.]

By Asher B. Bates, Register:

To Hon. Ogden Hoffman, District Judge: Pursuant to the order entered in this case on the 20th of October, A. D. 1870, I have taken the proofs offered in relation to the competency and fitness of E. Suskind to serve as assignee, and also the testimony presented by E. Suskind, to establish his good reputation and in rebuttal of the testimony introduced by the opposing creditors, and the same as herewith reported to the court. Before the examination took place, the counsel for the opposing creditors declared that it was their purpose to withdraw all opposition to A. Morris, the other person nominated as assignee, and that they admitted that E. Suskind was competent to act, being a man of commercial experience and pecuniary responsibility, and that they only desired to take testimony as to his fitness for the place to which he had been nominated. Preliminary to announcing my opinion upon the testimony taken, I deem it proper to state certain facts and principles, that have controlled me in the conclusions I shall announce.

First. The bankrupt act provides that a majority in amount and number of the creditors shall have the privilege of nominating and electing an assignee to take charge of the bankrupt's estate.

Second. It also reserves to the court the power of approval or disapproval of the nomination or election.

Third. It grants to the court the power to require of the assignee, when appointed, to give good and sufficient bonds for the faithful and honest discharge of the trust confided to him.

It was clearly the intention of congress, in granting to the creditors the privilege of nominating and electing assignees, that they should directly participate in the administration of bankrupt estates, and there is good reason why the bankrupt act should contain the provisions which I have stated. The creditors are alone interested in the distribution of the estate, and it is to be supposed that creditors having pecuniary interests will carefully canvass and inquire into the qualifications of the assignee, to whom they recommend the estate to be entrusted; they are supposed to be commercial men, intimately acquainted with the affair of the bankrupts, and the qualifications essential and proper to fit a man to act as their trustee; and unless good and strong reasons are presented to the court, it seems to me, that the opinion of the creditors representing a large majority in amount and number of the parties interested, is entitled to great weight in determining who is the proper person to administer the estate, in which they are interested. It is conceded that creditors may be ignorant or misled as to their rights, and when it is apparent to the court that they have acted under a mistake as to the law, and in ignorance of grave charges, that can be sustained against the person they have nominated, it would clearly be the duty of the court to disapprove of their nomination, if such facts should be made apparent, and refer the matter back again to the creditors for a new election, stating the reasons that controlled the court in disapproving of their prior decision; but until the court has before it clear and positive evidence that the parties nominated are commercially dishonest or disreputable in the commercial community, it seems to me it would be my duty to recommend their approval. In this case, a prolonged and earnest investigation has taken place as to the fitness of Mr. Suskind to discharge the duties of assignee, and the most liberal scope has been granted to the opposing creditors to introduce testimony to show that he is commercially dishonest, and has a bad reputation in the commercial community. It is apparent from the testimony as recorded, that there have been rumors afloat in some way affecting his reputation, but when they have been traced to their source, as far as it has been possible, in the opinion of the register they have been based upon no sufficient foundation; as far as they have been traced to their origin it is to be inferred that they grew out of litigations that transpired some years since, in which there were many parties interested, and some of them defeated. No facts were elicited showing commercial dishonesty, and the opinions that were given by the witnesses as to his character appear to have been based upon some indefinite rumor, without the witnesses being able to state any good and sufficient reasons for their believing the rumors to be true. If Mr. Suskind is commercially dishonest or disreputable, the presumption is that facts could be produced to establish such a reputation. It seems to the register, it would be grossly unjust on his part to recommend to the court to disapprove of the nomination made in this case upon mere rumors. All men in actual business have their enemies, and if a man's character for commercial honesty and integrity is to be destroyed or injured by the simple declaration that he is unfit to discharge the trust, it would be difficult to find a man, who by experience and business habits is fitted for the place, who could not be successfully attacked. Even the very best men in the community are liable to be spoken evil of, and it appears to the register that facts should be presented to guide the court in determining as to the fitness of any candidate presented, and that it should not be expected that the court would allow itself to be influenced in the least by mere public scandal. Upon a review of all the testimony in this case, the register is of the opinion that Mr. Suskind is fit to discharge the duties for which a majority in amount and number of the creditors have recommended him.

It was contended before me that the discretion vested in the court of approving or disapproving of an assignee was an arbitrary discretion, and it was not incumbent upon the court to give any reason, should it deem it proper, to disapprove of a nomination. I could not justify myself in recommending to the court to disapprove the nomination made in this case, unless I was able to state specific facts that justified me in so doing. In my opinion, the discretion invested in the court is a legal discretion, one that must be controlled, not by caprice, prejudice, partiality, likes or dislikes, or any other reason than the fact that the candidate is commercially dishonest, and has such a reputation in the commercial community, with whom he associates. Such being my opinion as to my own duty, I have come to the conclusions which I have stated; besides the bankrupt act, as I have already stated, provides for the protection of the minority, in granting to the court the power to require bonds of the assignee. In case I am mistaken in the opinion I have announced as to the fitness of Mr. Suskind to discharge his duty, the minority of the creditors, who have opposed his nomination, can be secured and protected in all of their rights by asking the court to require him to give good and sufficient bonds, for the honest and faithful discharge of the trust.

* * * * * *

It is claimed that Mr. Suskind is a candidate of the bankrupts, but there is no proof to sustain the allegation that he is in any way in collusion with them. He has heretofore been frequently in their company, and been on intimate terms with them, but he is a creditor without security, to a large amount, and the presumption is, that his interest would prompt him to be faithful in gathering in the estate, that his dividend might be increased. There is no evidence to show that he in any improper way sought for the nomination, or that the bankrupts were controlled in recommending him to one or two of the creditors to vote for him, by any other motive than a desire that their estate should pay the largest dividend practicable. I have no doubt that the opposing creditors were controlled by correct motives, and believed in the commencement of the investigation, and anticipated that they would be enabled to show that Mr. Suskind was commercially dishonest, and had such a general reputation among commercial men. I deem it proper to make this statement, that it may not be inferred that the opposition in this case was factious, or induced by a desire on the part of any one to acquire an unjust advantage of other creditors.

PETITIONING CREDITORS—REQUISITE NUMBER AND AMOUNT.

The judgment of the court that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned is final, and the matters so adjudged are not thereafter re-examinable, except in cases of fraud and imposition practiced on the court.

[Cited in Re Lalor, Case No. 8,001; Re Meade, Id. 9,370.]

In bankruptcy.

Joseph Naphtaly, for petitioning creditors.

David Freidenrich, for opposing creditors.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The petition against the bankrupt in this case was filed on the ninth of April, 1875. It contained the usual averment that the petitioners constituted one-fourth in number of the creditors of the bankrupt, and that the aggregate of their debts, provable under the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], amounted to at least one-third of the debts so provable.

On the return day of the order to show cause the bankrupt made default and he was adjudged bankrupt. The order was in the form prescribed by the supreme court under the original act. It was not modified to accommodate it to the provisions of the amended act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 178]. With respect to the allegations of the petition the court adjudged "that the facts set forth in the petition were true."

On the twenty-ninth of April the bankrupt filed his duly verified schedules, setting forth his debts and liabilities. On the twenty-first day of May, 1875, the bankrupt filed his petition for discharge. This was opposed by several of his creditors, who also moved that the adjudication be set aside, and the proceedings vacated and dismissed, on the ground that the requisite number of creditors had not joined in the petition, and the debts due them were not of the amount required by the act. The matter was referred to the register, whose report is admitted to be true. It appears that the petition was signed by seven creditors, representing in the aggregate $4,292 of indebtedness.

By the bankrupts' own schedules it appeared that the number of his creditors whose claims are undisputed are thirty-eight, and the aggregate of the indebtedness due them is $115,062.76. These schedules were offered in evidence before the register and their accuracy admitted. It thus appears that the petitioning creditors constitute less than a fifth in number of all the creditors, and the debts due them amount to less than a twentieth of the total indebtedness of the bankrupt. Had these facts appeared on the return day of the rule to show cause the petition would have been dismissed as of course.

The question presented is, can the court now take notice of them, and if so, what action should be taken. The statute provides that if on the return day the debtor "shall admit in writing that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned the court, if satisfied that the admission was made in good faith, shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final, and the matter proceed without further steps on that subject." And if it shall appear that such number and amount have not so petitioned, the court shall grant a reasonable time not exceeding ten days within which other creditors may join in such "petition." If, at the expiration of that time, the requirements of the statute are complied with, the matter may proceed. If not, it is to be dismissed.

It will be observed that these provisions contemplate two cases. The first where the debtor admits in writing the allegations of the petition with regard to the number and amount of creditors, and the second where those allegations are denied. No provision is made for cases where the debtor neither admits nor denies, but merely makes default. In the first case the court is required, if satisfied that the admission was made in good faith, to so adjudge, which judgment is final. In the succeeding section the provisions seem to embrace cases of default as well as those where the bankrupt admits the facts. It enacts in substance that if on the return day of the order to show cause the court shall be satisfied that the requirement of the act as to the number and amount of creditors has been complied with, or if within the prescribed time creditors sufficient to make up the required number and amount shall sign the petition, the court shall so adjudge, "which judgment shall be final."

It will be noticed that the form of the adjudication in the case at bar very imperfectly complies with these requirements. The act seems to contemplate a distinct and explicit judicial finding of the fact that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned. And the judgment of the court on that point is made final. The form used merely finds that the allegations of the petition are true. This form, as before stated, is prescribed by the supreme court. It has not been modified since the passage of the amended act. The propriety of inserting the more explicit judgment which the act seems to contemplate has been overlooked. But I do not consider that this irregularity is fatal to the proceeding. The judgment of the court that the allegations of the petition are true, embraces all the allegations of the petition, as well those relating to the number and amount of the petitioning creditors as the other necessary averments. The court has in fact passed upon the truth of those allegations as much as on that of the allegations of the residence of the plaintiff, and the date and existence of the act of bankruptcy, which are also facts necessary either to give the court jurisdiction or to authorize the proceeding. The mere circumstance that its judgment has not been so explicit on one point as the act would seem to contemplate ought not to defeat the proceeding. The inconvenience and hardship of so holding would be very great, for the same form has been followed in all cases of involuntary bankruptcy in this district, and it is presumed in many others. The clerks have no doubt very generally contented themselves with following the forms prescribed by the supreme court.

The briefs of counsel in the case at bar discuss the question whether the averment with regard to the number and amount of creditors is a jurisdictional averment. On this point the opinions of the district judges are conflicting. The learned judge of the district court for the Eastern district of Michigan, holds that to give the court jurisdiction, the petition must contain a clear, consistent and explicit allegation as to the proportionate number of creditors petitioning, and the amount of debts represented by them. For the want of such an allegation he vacated the order to show cause, and refused to allow an amendment. In re Rosenfields [Case No. 12,061].

In Ex parte Jewett [Id. 7,303], Lowell, J., the learned judge for the district of Massachusetts, held that the insertion of the name of one of the creditors instead of that of the debtor, by a clerical mistake, did not vitiate a proceeding under the act to effect a composition, and that notwithstanding the error there was "a case in bankruptcy pending against the debtor." In this case there had been no adjudication. The views of Lowell, J., were adopted by the learned judge of the Southern district of New York, in the recent case of In re Duncan [Cases Nos. 4,131, 4,132, and 4,133], where the point raised in the case at bar was distinctly adjudged. In the two previous cases the point upon which the judges differed was whether it was necessary, in order to give jurisdiction, that the petition should contain a clear, explicit, and consistent allegation that the requisite number and amount of creditors had joined in the petition.

In the case at bar as in that of In re Duncan the petition contains the requisite allegation, and the question really is, can the inquiry as to whether that allegation be true be reopened after the court has, on the return day of the rule to show cause, adjudged that it is? Blatchford, J., held that the provision of the statute, which declares that the judgment of the court on the point shall be final, forbids the reopening of the question at any subsequent stage of the proceeding, unless fraud be alleged and proved. His language is: "Unless this be so, there is no necessary limit to the number of times the court may be required to re-examine the question thus declared to be finally adjudged. I speak now of an allegation merely that the court has erred, and not of an allegation of fraud or bad faith."

In these views I concur. I think the finalty, attributed by the act to the judgment of the court, does not mean merely that no appeal shall lie from its judgment, but that the matters so adjudged shall not be thereafter re-examinable even by itself. But I do not consider that congress meant to deprive the court of its inherent right, where fraud and imposition have been practiced upon it, to apply the remedy. The ground upon which the present motion is based is merely the insufficiency in number and amount of the petitioning creditors. In the brief of counsel fraud and bad faith are charged. There is certainly much color for this accusation. The gross disparity between the aggregate of provable debts due the petitioning creditors, and the total amount of the bankrupt's indebtedness, vehemently suggests the suspicion that both parties must have known that the allegation that they represented one-third of his entire indebtedness was untrue. The creditors could have been at little pains to ascertain the facts if they supposed $4,292 to be one-third of an indebtedness which twenty days subsequently to the filing of the petition the bankrupt stated under oath to be $115,062 76.

For some reason the opposing creditors failed to prove their debts before the election of an assignee. The assignee was therefore chosen by the petitioning creditors. He reports that no assets whatever have come into his possession.

The counsel for the petitioning creditors intimate in their brief that the object of the opposing creditors in procuring the adjudication to be set aside, is to obtain the benefit of certain judgment liens on the real estate of the bankrupt. But if so, why has the assignee failed to find the real estate? and why have they failed to point out to the assignee of their own selection assets which it is his duty to collect and distribute amongst all the creditors? The bankrupt, about two years ago, was adjudged bankrupt, but denied his discharge. The debts set forth in his schedule seem to have been contracted since the former adjudication. He claims that the debts from which he then sought to be discharged are barred by the statute of limitations. Under all the circumstances, I think it proper that the opposing creditors should have an opportunity to allege and prove, if they can, fraud, bad faith or collusion in obtaining the adjudication.

I therefore deny the motion as it is now made, but leave is given to renew it on the ground of fraud, bad faith or collusion.

BANKRUPTCY—COMPROMISE BY ASSIGNEE.

An assignee in bankruptcy, jointly interested with others in certain judgments for a lien upon a building, is allowed to compromise his claim upon receiving a pro rata share, and not otherwise.

In bankruptcy. Petition by Seth M. Carter, the assignee, to compromise a lien claim upon a building in which he has a part interest.

Seth M. Carter, pro se.

FOX, District Judge. This is a petition by the assignee in bankruptcy to compound certain demands held by E. S. Coe, as surviving partner of S. R. Bearce & Co., and of

[1] [Reported by Thomas Hawes Haskell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

R. C. Pingree & Co., against the bankrupt's estate, the whole amounting to about $15,000, and also for authority to release any rights in certain collateral securities held by him.

The facts upon which the petition is based, I find to be, substantially, as follows: In July, 1873, [Albert B.] Furbish was a copartner with one Swett, engaged in business as contractors for erection of buildings. The firm entered into an agreement with the Catholic priest at Biddeford to erect in that place a large and expensive church, on a lot of land, the title to which was in the name of Bishop Bacon. This building contract was subsequently modified by a new contract in June, 1874, between Furbish alone and the priest.

Large expenditures were incurred by Swett & Furbish in the erection of this church; but it was not completed by them, and still remains in an unfinished state. The firm of Swett & Furbish was dissolved in 1874, and Furbish secured from Swett an assignment of all his interest in the copartnership affairs, and in October, 1874, Furbish assigned to Coe and R. C. Pingree & Co. his interest in the claims against the priest under their contracts as security for what he owed these parties, they agreeing to account to him for any surplus they might recover beyond their claims.

Writs were instituted against the priest in the name of Swett & Furbish, and of Furbish, in order to enforce an alleged builder's lien on the property, and the proper attachments and returns were made. The building was also attached as the personal property of the priest. These suits were referred to Chief Justice Appleton, who awarded as damages in the suit of Swett & Furbish $18,535; and in that of Furbish $1,089.09, with costs of each suit.

Before these suits were instituted, the Savings Bank in Saco and Biddeford had loaned some $20,000 upon the property, receiving as security a warranty deed of the property from Bishop Bacon; but giving him a writing at the same time, not under seal, to reconvey the estate on being paid its advances and interest. It is understood that the interest has been punctually paid. This loan was made, to aid in construction of the building, with the assent of Furbish, and he received the full amount. Bishop Bacon did not in any way render himself personally accountable for the amount of the loan. After his decease and the appointment of his successor, Bishop Healey, various interviews took place between him and Furbish relative to this church, and also some correspondence; and it is claimed that Bishop Healey became personally accountable to Furbish for the payment of the awards of Chief Justice Appleton, which is strenuously denied by the bishop.

The priest is understood to be entirely without means; and the only hope of payment of these awards is either by an enforcement of the statutory lien on the building, and by sustaining it as against the mortgage to the bank, or by collecting the same from Bishop Healey. Claiming to act in behalf of the parish at Biddeford, Bishop Healey is ready to aid in accomplishing an adjustment of the awards at a considerable discount, if the parties can be authorized to do so, which is the purpose of the present petition; and it is suggested that the court, in consideration of a nominal sum, should authorize the assignee to release to Coe, and Pingree & Co. all claim to any interest in the judgments recovered against the priest, and permit them to make any settlement they see fit.

It does not appear to me that the court ought to sanction such an arrangement, and for the reason that the estate in bankruptcy will derive no benefit therefrom. As these parties now stand upon their assignment, they are bound to enforce their claims against the priest, and account to the assignee in bankruptcy for any surplus they may obtain, beyond their demands against Furbish. If the whole of the judgments should be collected there would be more than $5,000 coming to the estate in bankruptcy for the benefit of creditors. Whether this full amount will be realized is subject to the uncertainties of litigation; and it may well be conceded that the claims as presented before me are involved in more than the ordinary perplexities of legal contingencies, so that the court can not see with absolute certainty that a successful issue will be the result.

The rights of both parties are each subject to this uncertainty, and the object of this petition is to avoid it by a compromise to be affected with the priest or Bishop Healey, by which a very considerable amount will be realized. It is for the common benefit of both parties thus to adjust these claims, provided the assignee's rights are duly regarded; and being so, it would seem that loss, which must result from this settlement, should be at the joint expense and burden of all interested, and should be borne in the same ratio by them that they would have divided the gain, if the whole of the judgments were to be eventually collected by legal proceedings for that purpose; otherwise, the advantage from this adjustment and compromise is wholly one-sided. Coe, and Pingree & Co. get all, surrender nothing, and the assignee utterly relinquishes, without any return, the chance which he now has of securing $5,000 if the demands can be collected.

It is asking altogether too much to require the assignee to surrender this possibility without an equivalent; and in the opinion of the court, Coe, and Pingree & Co., to secure adjustment and compromise, without rendering themselves responsible to the assignee, ought, and can well afford to make a fair division with him of whatever sum they may choose to accept in satisfaction of the judgment against the priest. The court, therefore, will sanction any adjustment by which these judgments will be discharged, upon a compromise, provided Coe, and Pingree & Co. enter into an agreement with the assignee that the amount received by them on such compromise shall be divided and apportioned between the assignee and Coe, and Pingree & Co. pro rata, according to their present respective interests in said judgments, in the same ratio they would be entitled to the whole amount of the judgments if they had been fully paid, less the cost of obtaining the same. If this is not acceptable to Coe, and Pingree & Co., this petition is denied, and each party will stand upon their respective legal rights under the assignment.

FURBISH v. SEARS.

[2 Cliff. 454.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1865.

MORTGAGES—PURPOSE OF THE SECURITY — POWER TO SELL—FORECLOSURE.

1. Where a mortgage for the security of certain payments, as well as for the performance of a certain specified agreement, further provided that it should also become security for the performance of a certain other agreement, if the mortgagor should elect to perform the second agreement, held, that after election and notice by the mortgagor, such mortgage became security for the performance of the second agreement, as effectually as if the same had been set forth in the mortgage.

2. By the conditions of the mortgage, it was stipulated "that on nonpayment of certain instalments, the mortgagee was authorized to sell the mortgaged property at auction, giving thirty days' notice, the proceeds to be applied to the payment of the instalments overdue and unpaid; and if at any time after such disposal of the mortgaged estate, any other instalments shall become due, and remain unpaid ninety days, the agreement shall become null and void, and no further obligatory in any way on either party." Held, that the power to sell was merely cumulative, and did not debar the party from foreclosing the mortgage.

[Cited in Lockett v. Hill, Case No. 8,443; Same v. Hoge, Id. 8,444.]

This was a writ of entry for the foreclosure of a mortgage, and the case came before the court upon an agreed statement of facts. The following abstract from the statement is sufficient for an understanding of the case: The demandant [D. H. Furbish] and one J. B. Cahoon were the proprietors of certain letters-patent on a machine, or on an improvement on a machine, for sowing seed and fertilizing material broadcast. On the 15th of January, 1860, they entered into an agreement with the defendant [Willard Sears] and one Warren Sparrow, by which they contracted, in consideration of $5,000, to sell to said defendant and Sparrow a certain number of machines made, and to be made, and delivered, as in said contract specified. The agreement was to continue in operation for six years, and was to embrace any and all improvements made on the invention within that period; it was also to include the exclusive right of manufacturing a certain description of machines for a certain territory, as therein described. The conditions were that the purchasers were to keep an account of machines manufactured by or under them, and to pay a certain sum for each machine so made within that territory. The purchasers also covenanted to furnish security by mortgage on real estate in Massachusetts, to the amount of $5,000, for the faithful performance of the unexecuted parts of the agreement. The agreed statement also showed that on the 17th of January, 1860, the defendant executed to the demandant the mortgage on which this suit was founded, in order to secure the faithful performance of the agreement. In the agreement was the following stipulation: "In case the party of the first part, on or before the 1st day of May next, shall elect to purchase the patent right for a certain territory, as specified by another agreement between the parties, of even date herewith, this agreement is to be cancelled, and all payments made under the same, are to be applied to, and constitute a part of, the payments stipulated for by such agreement, and the security of $5,000 above provided for is to stand as security for the performance of such agreement." Such "another agreement," it must be observed, described as "of even date herewith," bore date on the following, and not on the same day, as the agreement in which it was thus referred to and described; but the court said that they had both been duly executed before the execution of the mortgage deed; and from the reciprocal references in each to the other, the identity of the second, as the one referred to in the first, was established beyond controversy. The court understood the counsel of the tenant as conceding that proposition, and as assuming that the court would adjudge that the second agreement, was the one referred to in the mortgage. It was provided in the first agreement that the second agreement should not become operative unless the party of the second part should, on or before the 1st of May then next, elect that it should be so, and give written notice of such election; in that event, it was covenanted that "another contract, of even date herewith between said parties, shall be void, and the payment of $5,000 cash, to be made under the other agreement, shall be taken as the cash payment provided for by this agreement; and the security of $5,000, to be given by the party of the second part to the party of the first part, shall be held by them as security for the faithful performance of this agreement."

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Undoubtedly it is competent for the court to look at the situation of the parties, and the surrounding circumstances, in order to ascertain the true intent and meaning of a written instrument. Wilson v. Troup, 2 Cow. 200; Barreda v. Silsbee, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 147.

Viewed in the light of that principle, I have no doubt that the mortgage, after the party of the second part made the election and gave the notice, became a security for the faithful performance of the second agreement just as effectually as if the same had been fully set forth in the mortgage deed; or, in other words, it is a mortgage to secure the conditions and stipulations of the second agreement. Among the conditions and stipulations, was one for the payment of certain semi annual instalments of $2,000, annexed to which is the following condition: "provided in case two of such semi-annual instalments shall be due and remain unpaid, said party of the first part is hereby fully authorized and empowered to sell at public auction said security," giving thirty days' previous notice, &c., as therein required, the proceeds therefrom to be applied to the payment of the instalments overdue and unpaid. But the instrument further provides that, "if at any time after such disposal of the mortgage security, any other instalment shall become due, and remain unpaid ninety days from the date it becomes due and payable, the agreement shall become null and void, and no further obligatory in any way on either party."

The second proposition of the tenant is, that by the true construction of the agreement, if he paid the $5,000 in advance, and gave up the mortgaged property, he was to be relieved from all further liability on the contract. Consequently he insists that judgment should be entered for the tenant, inasmuch as he has paid $5,000, and the demandant may appropriate the mortgage security under the power of sale. The authority conferred however is an authority to sell the mortgage security, and it is very doubtful whether it can be lawfully exercised without selling the debt as well as the land; but it is unnecessary to decide that point, as I am clearly of the opinion that the power to sell, in this case, is only a cumulative power, and does not deprive the party from foreclosing the mortgage in the usual manner. 1 Hill. Mortg. (3d Ed.) 129; Walton v. Cody, 1 Wis. 420; Burdick v. McVanner, 2 Denio. 170; Shaw v. Norfolk Co. R. Co., 5 Gray, 181; Eaton v. Whiting, 3 Pick. 491. The parties agree that there has been a breach of the condition of the mortgage, if it secures the second contract.

Pursuant to the agreement of the parties, a conditional judgment for possession is to be entered for the demandant, according to the law of the state and the practice of this court. Unless the parties otherwise agree, the cause must be referred to an assessor to determine the amount of the conditional judgment.

COSTS—RULE ON PLAINTIFF TO GIVE SECURITY.

If the defendant has obtained a rule on the plaintiff to give security for costs, the court, at a subsequent term will presume that the fact of non-residence of the plaintiff was sufficiently proved, or admitted; and the burden of proof of residence is then on the plaintiff.

A rule, on the plaintiff, to give security for costs was laid on the 2d day of the last term.

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant, now objected that the rule was laid without any evidence being produced of the non-residence of the plaintiff; and that the defendant must now produce such evidence before he can obtain judgment against the plaintiff upon the rule.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said, that the rule being laid at the last term in open court, and not objected to, at that time, the burden of proof was now on the plaintiff to show that he was a resident of the county at that time. That the plaintiff, and his counsel were bound to take notice of all the orders made by the court in the cause.

[2 Brock. 14.] [2]

PLEADING—INCONSISTENT MATTERS — NATURE OF DEMURRER—AMENDMENT OF DECLARATION.

1. The law which governs pleading in Virginia is different from that which regulates it in England. In England, the courts exercise a controlling power over the defendant who seeks to plead inconsistent matters, conferred by 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, and it is discretionary with them to receive or reject the inconsistent pleas which may be tendered. But in Virginia, the right to "plead as many several matters, whether of law or of fact, as he shall think necessary for his defence," is expressly given by statute, and the courts cannot control that right, if the pleas be offered in time. Where they are not so offered, (as where the defendants permitted a writ of inquiry to be entered against them, and the term at which it might be set aside to pass away without pleading,) the English doctrine then applies, and the right depends upon the favour of the court. Hence, when in an action of assumpsit, the defendants at the rules pleaded both the general issue and demurred, and the plaintiffs took issue on the plea, but refused to join in demurrer, this was held to be a discontinuance, by virtue of the act of assembly, and the plaintiffs were nonsuited, though they were permitted to reinstate their cause.

[Approved in Tyler v. Hand, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 584. Cited in Gerling v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 151 U. S. 686, 14 Sup. Ct. 538.]

2. A demurrer is in its nature a plea to the action, and will not be considered as a plea in abatement, though the special causes alleged for demurring be matter of abatement. The court will disregard those special causes, and considering the demurrer independently of them, will decide upon it as if they had not been inserted in it.

3. The plaintiffs' counsel filed a memorandum with the clerk, and the latter in filling up the writ, mistook the name of one of the plaintiffs. The clerk also drew the declaration in which the same mistake occurred. Upon a motion to amend the pleadings, it was held: 1. That the memorandum of counsel was a document by which the error in the writ might be amended. on the ground of clerical misprision. 2. That the error in the declaration might also be amended, but not on the ground of clerical misprision. It is no part of the clerical duty to prepare the declaration for counsel. In such a case, the clerk must be regarded as the agent of the attorney, and the declaration is to be treated as if it was drawn and filed by the attorney himself. Therefore, though the court should give leave to amend the declaration, when amended, it must be considered as a new declaration, and the defendants should be permitted to plead de novo.

This was an action of assumpsit brought by Furniss, Cutler & Stacey, an English mercantile house, against Ellis & Allan, merchants and partners in the city of Richmond. The counsel for the plaintiffs left with the clerk a memorandum directing suit against the defendants, and the clerk, in filling up the writ, mistook the name of the plaintiff Stacey for Staney. The declaration also was drawn by the clerk, and the same error occurred in that. The variance was not between the declaration and writ, but between the declaration and writ on the one hand, and the memorandum of counsel on the other. The defendant at the rules pleaded the general issue of non assumpsit, and also craved oyer of the plaintiffs' writ and the memorandum of counsel, and demurred to their declaration, setting forth in their demurrer, as special ground of demurrer, matter in abatement, viz., that the persons to answer whose plea of trespass on the case the defendants were taken and were in custody, were not the same persons named as plaintiffs in their declaration. The plaintiffs took issue on the plea of non assumpsit, but refused to join in demurrer, and judgment was entered at the rules for the defendants upon the demurrer. Notwithstanding this, however, the clerk set the cause down for trial among the writs of inquiry. The plaintiffs moved the court to strike out the demurrer, and proceed to trial upon the issue joined. They also moved that they be allowed to amend the error assigned as cause of demurrer, on the ground of clerical misprision.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This motion is sustained by the allegation that the demurrer ought not to have been received by the clerk; and consequently admits of no inquiry into its sufficiency, farther than is necessary to determine on the right to offer it. It was offered at a time when the right to plead was complete and under a law which authorizes the defendant to plead as many several matters, both of law and fact, as he may think necessary for his defense.[2] From the comprehensive letter of this law, there would be some difficulty in excluding any plea which the defendant might offer at a time when he had a right to offer it. The sufficiency of the plea is not submitted to the clerk. He cannot judge of it. Consequently, it would seem, he must receive it if it be tendered in proper time.

But the plaintiffs contend that there is in the nature and fitness of things, an objection to the allowance of inconsistent matter to be pleaded in the same cause which must enter into the construction of the act of assembly, and control, or at least influence, the meaning of its words. There is, they say, this inconsistency in a demurrer to the whole declaration and a plea to the whole. The demurrer confesses all the facts, and the plea denies them all.

But a demurrer confesses those facts only which are sufficiently pleaded; and the plea, as the plea of non-assumpsit, though it admits nothing, is not false, though many of the facts alleged in the declaration are true. It amounts to pleading double, but not to a positive inconsistency. I cannot however admit, that it is beyond the power of the legislature to pass an act allowing inconsistent pleas, or that a court can disregard such an act.

The plaintiffs' counsel supports his argument by reference to several English authorities, to all which it may be observed, that the law which governs the practice in England, is different from that which governs the practice in Virginia. The statute of 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, allows the defendant to plead several matters only with the leave of the court. The English statute gives to the court a controlling power over the admission of the plea: the statute of Virginia gives the court no such power. In the exercise of this controlling power, the courts of England have prescribed rules by which they will be governed in granting or refusing an application to plead different matters. But the courts of Virginia can prescribe no such rules. The law declares that the defendant may plead as many several matters of law and fact as he pleases, without making any application to the court necessary. The defendant in England is, when he first pleads, in the same situation as to a double plea, that the defendant in Virginia is, after his right to plead depends on the favour of the court. But the cases quoted to show that the demurrer is not good, do not show that, even in England, it ought not to be received, if tendered in proper time. In 5 Bac. Abr. 459, it is said, "if a defendant demur in abatement, the court will, notwithstanding, give a final judgment, because there cannot be a demurrer in abatement." This does not prove that the demurrer itself shall be rejected, but that it shall be received and that the judgment upon it shall be final. A judgment on a plea in abatement, or on a demurrer to a plea in abatement, is not final, but on a demurrer which contains matter in abatement it shall be final, because a demurrer cannot partake of the character of a plea in abatement. 1 Salk. 220, is quoted by Bacon and is to the same purport, indeed in the same words. These cases show that a demurrer being in its own nature a plea to the action, and being even in form a plea to the action, shall not be considered as a plea in abatement, though the special causes alleged for demurring be matter of abatement. The court will disregard those special causes, and considering the demurrer independently of them, will decide upon it as if they had not been inserted in it.

These cases go far to show that the court would overrule this demurrer, and decide the cause against the party demurring, not that it should be expunged from the pleadings. (1 Tidd, Pr. 475.) "If the defendant plead in abatement, &c." These cases show that if a plea in abatement be tendered when it is not receivable, the plaintiff may proceed as if no plea had been offered, or he may move the court to strike it out. It is obvious that they do not apply directly to the case at bar. This demurrer was receivable when it was tendered. But the counsel brings this case within their reasoning, by considering the demurrer as a plea in abatement. Now, this it cannot be. The cases cited from Bacon and Salkeld, show that a demurrer cannot be in abatement. The court, therefore, can consider this only as a general demurrer, and, of course, it was offered in proper time. Tidd (484, 485,) shows, that where a defendant is under a judge's order to plead issuably, and he pleads a plea which is not issuable, or puts in a sham demurrer, the plaintiff may consider it as a mere nullity. But these defendants were not under a judge's order to plead. They were not acting under the guidance of the court, but acting by authority of the law of the land, according to their own judgment. Had they permitted a writ of inquiry to be entered against them, and the term at which it might be set aside to pass away; or had they been in a situation in which they could not plead but under the direction of the court, this doctrine would certainly be applicable to the case. At present, I think it is not. Tidd (482)[3] shows that the court will set aside irregular proceedings. But this is not an irregular proceeding. It is perfectly regular. The demurrer was offered in proper time, and though it may not be sustainable, it must be considered. Any plea in bar may be unsustainable; but it is not on that account to be discarded without being considered. The cases cited from the Term Reports only confirm the doctrines of Tidd.

In another book of practice which has been cited, it is said: "But if the demurrer be frivolous, only to put off the trial or for delay of the proceedings, they will not allow of such a demurrer, nor cause the other party to join, but will give judgment against the party upon his frivolous demurrer." It would require a person more conversant with the English practice than I am, to understand precisely the bearing of this dictum. The court must examine the declaration, to determine whether a demurrer be frivolous. Although the special causes assigned for demurring may be frivolous, the demurrer itself may be substantial. But be this as it may, the rule is inapplicable to this case, and perhaps to the practice of this country. The demurrer, according to our practice, can produce no delay, cannot put off the trial of the cause. Had the plaintiffs joined in demurrer, and it had appeared to be frivolous, a writ of inquiry would have been awarded and executed immediately; or the issue would have been tried without allowing a continuance. A frivolous demurrer, therefore, in this case, could not put off the cause, or have occasioned any delay. I do not know what delays, according to the practice of England, a frivolous demurrer may occasion. But this doctrine is founded on the controlling power of the courts of England over pleading, a power which the courts of this country do not possess. If the demurrer in this case was receivable, and I think it was, the refusal to join in it was a discontinuance which is provided for in the act of assembly. The plaintiffs must be nonsuited. This proceeding, however, is now under the direction of the court, and the cause may certainly be reinstated.

I come now to consider the application to amend. I have no doubt of the power of the court to allow amendments in all cases of clerical misprision, where there is any thing to amend by, but I had doubted whether the memorandum of counsel was a document by which an amendment would be made. The cases cited by Mr. Call have in a great measure removed that doubt, and [3] These references are to the second American from the eighth London edition of Tidd's Practice (1828).

I am inclined to permit an amendment of the writ. An amendment of the declaration will be allowed also, but not on the ground of clerical misprision. To copy a declaration in order to file it, is no part of the duty of the clerk. He acted as the agent of the plaintiff's attorney. It is to be considered as a declaration drawn and filed by the attorney himself. In every such case the amendment will be allowed, but it is a new declaration, and the defendants are permitted to plead de novo.

This motion involves no question about the recognizance of the bail. I do not at present perceive how that recognizance can avail the party, but I do not understand that the motion extends to it.

Case No. 5,163.

BUJAC v. SAME.

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1844.

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY—OBJECTIONS TO THE ACTION—DILATORY EXCEPTIONS—BOTTOMRY—MASTER AS WITNESS—INTERVENTION OF MORTGAGEE—REFERENCE—PRIORITY OF CLAIMS—WAGES.

1. Objections to an action merely formal in their character, cannot be taken on final hearing.

[Cited in Cohan v. The Rolling Wave, Case No. 2,959a.]

2. Exceptions, dilatory or declinatory, should be interposed on the return day of process, or at the day appointed for answering the libel.

3. If the objection intended to be made be, that the suit was commenced before the cause of action was matured, but it had become so before the hearing, the objection will be considered waived, particularly after an answer or claim is filed.

4. There would be still less reason for allowing such objection after the vessel sued had been condemned and sold, in another action, and her proceeds placed in court, subject to these actions and others in prosecution against her.

5. The master of a vessel who hypothecated her on bottomry, is a competent witness in favor of the holder of the bottomry—particularly if released by him.

6. A mortgagee of a vessel can intervene in a suit by a bottomry holder against the vessel, and contest the validity of the bottomry or its priority of lien, as against his mortgage.

7. Conditions preceding the authority of a master to hypothecate his vessel in a foreign port by bottomry.

[Cited in Burke v. The M. P. Rich, Case No. 2,161; The Rapid Transit, 11 Fed. 335.]

8. A bottomry is not rendered invalid because it covers items of advance not entitled to a bottomry lien. It will be good for the sums which are clearly claimed as marine hypothecation, and will be reformed by the court, rejecting the surplus in its final decree.

9. The court will order a referee to ascertain and report the actual constituents of a bottomry lien, the validity of which is contested.

10. Seamen's wages, in this case, entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the vessel, over the lien of libellants.

[Cited in The Antelope, Case No. 481.]

These two actions [by William R. Furniss & Co. against the brig Magoun, and by Daniel Bujac against the same], brought to hearing together, are instituted on separate bottomry bonds given by Haven, acting as master of the brig Magoun, for advances made for repairing and fitting her for sea. The first one was given at Bordeaux, February 4, 1843, for 4,000 francs, at a premium of 35 per cent., marine interest, payable three days after notice, at Philadelphia. The other to Furniss & Co., at St. Thomas, May 19, 1843, for $1,272 68, payable at New-York on the arrival of the vessel, with 6¾ premium on this sum. The notice in the first case was given at Philadelphia May 10, 1843. The material facts are, that the brig was on a voyage from New-York to Trieste, Bordeaux, Angostura, St. Thomas, and back to this port. On the voyage from Angostura to St. Thomas, 19th May, 1843, while in charge of the pilot off Angostura, she was run on a bed of rocks in the river at Orinoco. On arrival at St. Thomas, a survey was held on the brig, and it appeared that the copper was much broken, and some of the planks were damaged, and the false keel greatly injured. The surveyors ordered the vessel thoroughly caulked, and the damaged places to be repaired. All the money for these repairs was taken up at St. Thomas; part of the amount obtained was expended in payment of stores, shipping a crew and other expenses, which had been incurred in the port of Orinoco. The vessel was consigned to J. L. Furniss & Co., in St. Thomas. The money raised there was in part necessary for the immediate uses of the vessel, and it was in proof that she could not sail from St. Thomas without it. The master had no means of raising money, except by bottomry. After the vessel was repaired, she sailed for Mayaguez, (Porto Rico,) and thence to New-York, where she arrived on the 19th of June, 1843. It also appeared that a portion of the money raised at Bordeaux, on the first bottomry, was not for the necessities of the vessel then existing, but in anticipation of liabilities or necessities she might be subjected to if she prosecuted a voyage then projected.

J. W. Claghorn, a mortgagee of the vessel prior to either bottomry, appeared in both cases, and contested the validity of the hypothecations.

R. J. Dillon, for libellants, Furniss & Co.

F. R. Tillou and F. B. Cutting, for claimant and owner.

Charles C. Anderson and James A. Bayard, for Bujac.

Mr. Dillon, for Furniss & Co., denied that the claim put the bottomry in issue. He insisted that the proofs showed a legal case for a bottomry hypothecation at St. Thomas, and that it took priority of payment on the one given at Bordeaux. He cited: 1 Dod. 451; The Fortitude [Case No. 4,953]; Emerig. Ins. 87, 89, Index, iv.; [The Aurora] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; [The Virgin v. Vyfhius] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538; 8 Serg. & R. 98; 2 Phil. Ins. 78; 8 Pick. 14; 3 Hagg. Adm. 66.

Mr. Bayard, for Bujac, maintained the validity of his demand, and its priority to Furniss & Co.'s. He cited: The Fortitude [supra]; 2 Caines, 77; 7 Durn. & E. [7 Term R.] 481; 1 Starkie, 27; 1 Dod. 464; The Aurora [supra]; 2 Dod. 146; Liebart v. The Emperor [Case No. 8,340]; Rucher v. Conyngham [Id. 12,106]; 2 Dod. 143; Abb. Shipp. 125, note 1; 1 Hagg. Adm. 176; 1 Dod. 201; 2 Hagg. Adm. 377, 374; 2 Park, Ins. 879; 3 Hagg. Adm. 66; Crawford v. The William Penn [Case No. 3,373].

Mr. Cutting, for claimant, insisted that neither hypothecation had priority over the mortgage lien; and for the owner, he contended both bottomry bonds were invalid in law. He cited: Abb. Shipp. 125, note 1; 3 Hagg. Adm. 66; 2 Park, Ins. (Ed. 1842) 875-879; The Fortitude [supra]; 1 Hagg. Adm. 169; 1 Dod. 273-275; 2 Camp. 485, 486.

BETTS, District Judge. The defence set up against the hypothecations in suit contests the validity of both bonds, upon the ground that the repairs and expenditures upon the vessel were unnecessary, and that the master had other resources sufficient for her actual wants, and had no authority to resort to a bottomry for other than necessary supplies or expenses connected with the voyage, and that he obtained the money for other objects and purposes. No misconduct or fraud is imputed to the master in the pleadings, and no proof has been adduced to show a misapplication of the funds raised, or that he had any freights which the brig had earned previous to her bottomry. The master had been in command of the brig for three or four years, and enjoyed the full confidence of her owners. Bujac also controverts the validity of the bottomry to Furniss & Co., and claims the priority of his hypothecation.

The cause has been argued with great ability and a thorough examination of the facts and authorities bearing upon the questions raised on the issues. Two preliminary objections have been interposed by the claimant and owner, either of which, if sustained, may bar the action in the case to which it applies. It was insisted, that at the time of filing the libel in Bujac's case, the bond had not become absolute and suable, the condition being, that the sum received should be paid at or before the expiration of ten days after the arrival of the vessel in New-York, whilst the action was commenced previous to that time. This objection, which is in the nature of a dilatory plea, should have been raised on the return day of the warrant of arrest by way of exception. It does not go to the merits of the action, but merely alleges the prematurity of the suit, and amounts to no more than the dilatory or declinatory exception of the civil law. Browne, Civil & Adm. Law, 363; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 192. Moreover, when the claimant intervened and filed his claim, the bond had become absolute, and the vessel or her proceeds was then under actual arrest and in custody. She had been libelled and attached in this court on a suit for seamen's wages for the same voyage, and had been condemned and sold in that action, and her proceeds paid into court. These are adequate reasons for disregarding exceptions to the action of a merely formal nature, and first raised in the case on the hearing. The claimants may well be deemed to have acquiesced in the antecedent proceedings. The Neptune, 3 Hagg. Adm. 132.

An objection was also raised to the right of a mortgagee to intervene in an admiralty case and contest the validity of these hypothecations. As this point was not suggested on the argument, and not put forth in the pleadings, it would not be now regarded by the court, if it supplied sufficient cause for the exclusion of the claimant. But as a mere defect of pleading might be remedied by an amendment, it is proper to observe, that all holders of liens on a vessel or her proceeds, are competent parties to contest, in admiralty, the titles or claims of other lien holders upon the fund or ship. 3 Hagg. Adm. 331.

The second preliminary point is to the competency of the master to be a witness for the libellants, notwithstanding the release given by them on the hearing. His testimony is urged to be indispensable to the libellants, as without it they have failed in establishing the preliminary facts upon which their right to a decree is dependent. The production of the bottomry bond is not of itself sufficient proof of those facts as against the claimant and owner. It must be shown by extraneous evidence that the advances were made for repairs or supplies necessary for the instant use of the vessel, or effectuating the objects of the voyage, and that they could not have been raised otherwise than by resorting to a bottomry. The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96. It was insisted that the master had a direct interest in the suit, which was not removed by the release, as, if the libellants did not succeed, he would stand liable to them personally for the debt. And the case of The Fortitude [Case No. 4,953] was relied upon as sustaining the objection. This case is in conflict with Evans v. Williams, 7 Term. R. 481, note; Milward v. Hallett, 2 Caines, 77; and Rocher v. Busher, 1 Starkie, 27. And the eminent judge speaks with great reserve in giving his decision in the cause. He remarks, "I am ready to confess that I am not confident that this opinion rests upon grounds so clear that it ought not to yield to a settled course of practice; and I greatly fear that there is no authority which directly sustains it." It seems to me that the opinion of Judge Thompson, in Milward v. Hallett, presents the true rule upon this point, upon reason and authority. The interest of the master is balanced. If the libellants could recover of him upon the bond, for advances necessary for the ship, he would have his action over against the owners for the moneys so employed. He was merely an agent acting within the line of his duty, and if made liable in the first instance on his contracts for the loans, he would be entitled to indemnity and reimbursement by the owner. This interest, indeed, leans rather to the owner than to the libellants, for if the bottomry contracts are defeated by his testimony, his liability to the lenders would be discharged by their release, and they be limited to their rights against the vessel and owner for the moneys advanced for the necessary refitment of the vessel (U. S. v. The Kitty [Case No. 15,537]; Rucher v. Conyngham [Id. 12,106]), and the master would only be answerable to him for integrity and good faith in his conduct. The admissibility of the master as a witness to bottomry contracts is placed by the judges sometimes on the necessity of the ship. Judge Livingston says, unless masters be admitted as witnesses in cases of this kind, it will be extremely difficult to ascertain whether such a necessity existed as would justify their taking up moneys on their owner's account. 2 Caines, 77. The objection to the competency of the witness cannot, therefore, prevail; it can, at most, only go to his credibility.

There can be no doubt of the authority of the master to borrow money on bottomry of the vessel. Abb. Shipp. (Ed. 1829) 117–131; Curt. Merch. Seam. 175. The previous contingencies upon which his power may be exercised embrace his destitution of funds in foreign ports, and all the occasions occurring abroad, which render money necessary to enable him to complete the enterprise in which the vessel is engaged, whether the necessity arises from an extraordinary peril or misfortune, or from the ordinary exigencies of maritime adventures. The master, under like emergencies, may borrow money at marine interest, and pledge the ship and freight to be earned on the voyage for repayment at the termination of the entire voyage, or an intermediate port of it, and may also draw bills of exchange, which the owner is bound to accept. Milward v. Hallett, 2 Caines, 77; The Tartar, 1 Hagg. Adm. 3; The Nelson, Id. 179; The Jane, 1 Dod. 466. This general doctrine is not in question in this issue, but the owner and claimant contended that there was no necessity justifying a bottomry loan; that the master had funds in hand from freights sufficient to meet the wants of the vessel, and accordingly the loans were not warranted by the maritime law; that the loan was made by the consignee of the ship, and that the master had no right to hypothecate the ship in his favor.

This objection lies substantially to both hypothecations. Upon this latter point there was for a time some uncertainty in the books, because it was considered as conducive to surreptitious and covinous practices between the master and consignee in remote ports. 3 Johns. 352; The Aurora [supra]. No case of authority has, however, repudiated such bonds, and the decisions acquiesce in them, if not positively sanction them. The Tartar, 1 Hagg. Adm. 1; The Zodiac, Id. 320. Lord Stowell, in repeated instances, developes the policy and ethics of bottomry transactions. He says, the loans are to be taken when the owner was known to have no credit, nor resources for obtaining necessary supplies. It is that state of unprovided necessity that alone supports these bonds. The absence of that necessity is their undoing. If the master takes up money from a person who knows that he has a general credit in the place, or at least an empowered consignee or agent there willing to supply his wants, the giving a bottomry bond is a void transaction, not affecting the property of the owner, and only fixing loss and shame on the fraudulent lender. But where honorably transacted, under an honest ignorance of this fact, an ignorance that could not be removed by any reasonable inquiry, it is the disposition of this court to uphold such bonds, as necessary for the support of commerce in its extremities of distress, and, as such, recognised in the maritime codes of all commercial ages and nations. The Nelson, 1 Hagg. Adm. 179; 3 Hagg. Adm. 74, 163. The objection that the bottomry holders are consignees of the ship, is obviated by the proof that they were not so by the appointment of the owner. They did not know each other; had no commercial relations; and, also, that the owner had no funds in their hands. The necessity of the loan is proved by the master. He says, the ship had been greatly injured by rubbing upon the rocks in the river Orinoco, and that upon a survey, the surveyors required that she should be overhauled and repaired; that he was absolutely in want of money for supplies, and that he could not leave St. Thomas unless he could have the money; that he applied to various persons without success, and he could not get the money unless he could secure the loan by bottomry. He knew of no other resource; he had none himself, and without this advance he would be unable to prosecute his adventure.

The further objection is taken, that the moneys loaned were lent upon the personal credit of the master. That would make no difference, provided the advance was made on an engagement for a bottomry security; and it is clear, from the proofs and the circumstances of the case, that the understanding of the parties was, when the advances began, that they were to be secured by a bottomry of the ship. La Ysabel, 1 Dod. 273; The Virgin v. Vyfhius, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538. This is usually so, for it is difficult to ascertain the precise amount requisite until the repairs are made and the supplies obtained. Lord Stowell remarked, upon a similar objection, that it was the understanding of the parties at the time, that the money should be secured by means of bottomry; and that it was of no consequence whether the money was advanced at once, and the bond immediately entered into, or whether the master received it from time to time, in different sums, and gave a bond for the whole amount. 1 Dod. 273; Hurry v. Hurry [Case No. 6,922]; The Aurora [supra]. It is further objected, that the master disregarded the instructions of the owner as to the voyage, and that the lender, upon due inquiry, might have learned this fact, and his negligence in this regard should avoid his bottomry security. No fraud is any where charged in the pleadings, no connivance or unfair dealing is set up, nor is it asserted that the lender was aware of any instructions received by the master, from the owner, which had been disregarded. If the master had deviated from instructions, and there was no connivance on the part of the lender, he will not be affected by the fact, without clear evidence of notice to him before his security was taken. The proof shows no want of good faith on the part of the master. By his correspondence he kept the owner fully informed of his situation, and solicited directions. When he arrived at Bordeaux, no instructions were given, other than to exercise the broadest discretion. The lenders, also, are to be presumed to have acted in good faith. The necessities of the vessel, her want of repairs and supplies, that the master had no means of his own, and had in vain resorted to others for raising money on bottomry, were facts of notoriety. If, in addition to such circumstances, the lender is required to give positive proof that the necessity of the master was absolute and remediless but by a bottomry loan, the doctrine would be disastrous to commerce, by destroying confidence in such securities, or rendering it impracticable to negotiate them. It is well established by the evidence that one if not both the bonds were taken for a larger amount than was required at the time for repairs and supplies to the vessel. There is included in one the wages of the master and expenses of board here and at St. Thomas, and in the other, advances to meet liabilities or necessities it was anticipated the vessel might be under after leaving Bordeaux, and in her after employment.

These are not particulars for which the vessel can be subjected by the master to a bottomry charge, but such irregularity in the bond does not destroy its obligation. These items of excess may be expunged. A bottomry bond may be good in part and bad in part, and it will be upheld by courts of admiralty as a lien to the extent to which it is valid. Courts of admiralty are not, in this respect, bound to the strict rules of the common law, but decide upon the broadest principles of equity. The Augusta, 1 Dod. 283; The Tartar, 1 Hagg. Adm. 1; The Virgin v. Vyfhius [supra]. The reference to be made in the cause will provide for a specification of the particulars composing each bond, and when and for what causes the money was obtained.

Upon full consideration of the merits of the case, I am of opinion that both hypothecations are valid in law, and that the respective libellants are entitled to have their remedies enforced against the fund in court. That fund is brought into court upon a demand for seamen's wages earned on this voyage. Those wages are to be first satisfied out of the fund. 1 Dod. 40; 2 Dod. 13; 3 Hagg. Adm. 407; [Blaine v. The Charles Carter] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 328; The Mary [Case No. 9,187]. Both hypothecations being deemed by the court substantially valid, and no sufficient cause in the opinion of the court being shown for giving, between the two, priority of satisfaction to Bujac's or the elder bond, the ordinary privilege in bottomry cases (Abb. Shipp., Ed. 1829, 128; The Sydney Cove, 2 Dod. 1) must prevail here, and the bond to Furniss & Co. will be entitled to be first paid out of the proceeds. But both decrees in these causes are entitled to priority of payment over the mortgage lien of the claimant. 3 Kent, Comm. 358; 2 Hagg. Adm. 294. The clerk, on the reference, will ascertain and report to the court the particulars composing each bond, and the time and occasion upon which the advances were made by the obligees, to enable the court to reform, if necessary, the amount legally secured by the bottomry hypothecation.

It is therefore adjudged, that the libellants respectively recover the amount of their said bottomry bonds, with the marine interest reserved thereon, and six per cent. on the sum of such principal and marine interest, computed from the time of the falling due of the respective bonds to the day of this decree, together with their costs to be taxed, and that the decree in favor of Furniss & Co. on the junior bottomry be first satisfied out of the proceeds of said vessel, her tackle, &c., in court, subject to such deductions and reform of the amount as may be thus ordered by the court, on the coming in of the clerk's report in the premises, and it is referred to the clerk to ascertain and report the amount payable to the libellants, upon the said bonds respectively, conformably to the principles of this decree.

DEMURRAGE—DELAY CAUSED BY OTHER VESSELS.

1. The charter party stipulated that the ship should "be discharged as fast as the custom of the port will admit," and demurrage to be charged after the expiration of 10 days. Held, that after that time she was entitled to demurrage, although it was occasioned by the pre-occupancy of the wharf by other vessels.

2. Where a vessel is required to load or discharge her cargo at a particular dock, and she is there detained by reason of its crowded condition, the delay must be compensated by the charterer.

In admiralty.

J. Warren Coulston, for libellants.
Morton P. Henry, for respondent.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The charter party in this case provided for a voyage from an indefinite port in England to Philadelphia, and for the discharge of the cargo at a wharf to be directed by the consignee on the arrival of the vessel. It was also stipulated, that fifteen days should be allowed the charterers for loading the vessel (if she was not sooner dispatched), "and the ship to be discharged as fast as the custom of the port will admit, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said days, at seven pounds per day." The vessel reached Philadelphia on the 13th of September, 1871, when she was ordered to discharge her cargo at Willow street wharf. She accordingly proceeded to that wharf on the 19th of September, where she remained until October 9th, before she could begin the discharge of her cargo, on account of the pre occupancy of the wharf by other vessels. For the detention thus caused, the libellant claims the stipulated demurrage and damages in the nature of demurrage.

In view of numerous decisions of the English and American courts, and of the evident justness of the rule, it must be taken as now settled, that where a vessel is required to load or discharge her cargo at a particular dock, and she is there detained by reason of its crowded condition, the delay must be compensated by the charterer. The ship owner has done all that he was required to do when he has taken his ship to the appointed place of discharge. It is implied in his contract, that he shall then not be subjected to any delay, which is not necessary, to unload his vessel. Detention of the vessel for any other reason, may justly be regarded as the fault of the charterer, because she is placed in the circumstances, by which it is caused, by his act, without right on the part of the owner to escape from them. He is, therefore, rightly held accountable for the consequent loss to the owner.

In Randall v. Lynch, 2 Camp. 352, the ship was in the London docks, to which she was destined by her charter party, and could not be unladen within the stipulated time, by reason of the crowded state of the docks, and Lord Ellenborough said: "The question is, whether the detention of the ship, arising from the inability of the London Dock Company to discharge her, is, in point of law, imputable to the freighter; and I am of opinion, that the person who hires a vessel detains her, if at the end of the stipulated time he does not restore her to the owner. He is responsible for all the various vicissitudes which may prevent him from doing so. While the goods remained on board the vessel in the London docks, it was impossible for the plaintiff to make any use of her, and to all intents and purposes she was there detained by the defendant. When she was brought into the docks, all had been done which depended upon the plaintiff, and the dock company were the defendant's agents for her delivery. The defendant is as much responsible for a delay arising from the want of a berth, as if it had arisen from tempestuous weather, or any other cause." In conformity to the rule thus stated, many English and American cases have been decided. Bessey v. Evans, 4 Camp. 131; Barret v. Dutton, Id. 333; Hill v. Idle, Id. 327; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Northam [Case No. 11,090]; Davis v. Wallace [Id. 3,657], per Clifford, J. It is true, that Rodgers v. Forresters, 2 Camp. 483, and Burmester v. Hodgson, Id. 488, are in apparent conflict with these cases. But they were decided upon proof of a custom prevailing at the London docks, with reference to the discharging of the special kind of cargo with which the vessels were laden, and upon the effect under this proof of a stipulation, express or implied, in the charter party, that the freighter should be allowed "the usual and customary time," for unloading the vessels. Beyond this, they have not been followed in England, for, as was said by Boville, Chief Justice, in Topscott v. Balfour, Law Rep. Jan., 1873, pt. 1, 52: "The rule is, that when a port is named in the charter party as the port to which the vessel is to proceed, the lay days do not commence upon the arrival of the vessel in the port, but upon her arrival at the usual place of loading in the port; not the actual berth at which she loads, but the dock or roadstead where loading usually takes place. If, when she arrives there, the place is so crowded that she cannot load, the loss must fall on the charterer." The charter provided for the selection of the dock by the freighters, and they named the Wellington dock, and the chief justice says further: "Treating the charter, as I have before said it must be treated, viz., as though it provided that the ship should proceed direct to the Wellington dock, then any loss arising from the state of the dock must fall, according to the authorities, on the charterers, and not on the ship owner." He held, however, that delay arising from the exclusion of the vessel from the dock, in pursuance of its established regulations, was not imputable to the charterer, for the reason that the parties must be taken to have known such regulations, and to have made their contract in reference to them. But for detention caused by a fortuitous condition of the dock, which obviously could not have been foreseen or contemplated when the charter was made, the charterer was adjudged to be accountable. And such must be regarded as the rule which is established by the preponderating weight of authority.

The learned counsel for the respondent has, however, argued with great earnestness, that this rule is not applicable in this case, because of the terms of the charter. It contains this clause: "And the ship to be discharged as fast as the custom of the port will admit;" and it is urged that this means that the vessel must await her regular turn for a berth at the wharf appointed for her discharge. As a vessel seeking a berth to unload, has no right to displace another which is in it before her, she must necessarily wait her turn, and as the custom to do this is universal, every charter must be taken as made with reference to it. If the meaning ascribed to the clause then be its true meaning, it only expresses what is implied in every charter. And yet, in the numerous cases referred to, it was held, that the unavoidable observance of the custom did not relieve the charterer from accountability for the consequent loss. But I do not think it is to be so construed. It does not refer to the time when the discharge of the vessel is to be begun, but to the process of discharging her. If there should be any special custom at the port of Philadelphia, by which the unloading of the vessel would be delayed, the charterer was not to be accountable for it. And by this reference to it as a custom of the port of Philadelphia, it is not reasonable to regard it as applicable to a custom which is not peculiar to that port, but of general and universal prevalence. For the loss, therefore, resulting from the condition of the dock, the respondents must, therefore, be held liable. The whole loss, including the stipulated demurrage and damages, is accurately computed at $736.33, in the decree of the district court. [Case unreported.] That decree is therefore affirmed, and a decree will be entered in this court for the sum so adjudged by it against the respondents, with interest from June 7th, 1873, and costs.

FUZZARD WADDING MANUF'G CO. v. DICKINSON et al.

[6 Blatchf. 80; 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 289.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. April 3, 1868.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT.

The claim, in the reissued letters patent granted to William Fuzzard and James Hatch, April 5th, 1864, to "the employment or use of a heated metallic cylinder, B, or one having a metallic exterior or periphery, in combination with a heated pressure cylinder, C, one or more, and a polishing roller, G, or its equivalent, arranged as shown, for the purpose of surfacing and drying simultaneously, or at one operation, fibrous materials, as set forth," is not infringed by the use of a machine which employs a pressure roller that is not heated, and is not constructed so as to be heated, in any particular way.

[This was a bill in equity filed to restrain the defendants [Thomas N. Dickinson and others] from infringing letters patent [No. 41,214] for an improved machine for surface-sizing fibrous material, granted to William Fuzzard, January 12, 1864, assigned to William Fuzzard and James Hatch and reissued to them April 5, 1864 [No. 1,649], and assigned to complainants.

[The claims of the patent were as follows, although the first one, only, was in controversy: "The employment or use of a heated metallic cylinder B, or one having a metallic exterior or periphery, in combination with a heated pressure cylinder, one or more, and a polishing roller G, or its equivalent, arranged as shown, for the purpose of surfacing and drying simultaneously or at one operation, fibrous material, as set forth. Also, the distributing or throwing of the glazing or sizing upon or against the cylinder or upon or against a web without a cylinder, by means of a brush, substantially as set forth."

[A description of the invention and of the defendant's machine so far as involved in the suit, will be found in the opinion of the court.] [2]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The defendants, who are engaged, like the plaintiffs, in the manufacture of wadding, are charged in the bill with infringing the rights of the plaintiffs secured by this patent. The character of the machine used by the defendants is clearly proved, and, in order to determine whether or not it embraces the invention of Fuzzard, we must look into the specification and claim of the patent and see what is there set forth as such invention.

The object of the alleged new device is described, in the body of the specification, to be "for applying a glazing or size to fibrous substances, such as cotton, wadding, &c., in such a manner that a quite thin or attenuated sizing may be used and applied to the web or material to be glazed, sized, or 'surfaced,' as it is technically termed, and said material dried at the same operation. * * * To this end the invention consists in the employment and use of a smooth or polished metal cylinder, heated by steam, or otherwise, over a portion of which the web to be surfaced passes, and of a heated pressure roller bearing against the web upon the metal cylinder, the cylinder or web having the glazing or size previously distributed upon it by means of a revolving brush, or its equivalent, as hereinafter set forth."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission. The syllabus and opinion are from 6 Blatchf. 80, and the statement is from 3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 289.]

The machine is very simple, and may be briefly described as follows: First, a solid frame of suitable dimensions, near the central part of which is placed a hollow metal cylinder, of large size. This cylinder revolves upon a hollow shaft, the ends of which rest upon the two sides of the frame, and is heated usually by steam. The web to be sized is placed on a common roller at one end of the frame, and is, during the operation of the machine, made to pass over the upper portion of the cylinder, and off on to another roller, which receives it as it leaves the cylinder. Between the roller from which the web is taken to the cylinder, and the cylinder itself, and very close to the latter, is a small heated pressure roller, between which and the cylinder the web passes, and by which it is pressed into close contact with the cylinder. The sheet of web passes under this pressure roller and over the cylinder, and the former is so adjusted as to give the degree of pressure required. Underneath the cylinder there is a roller, attached to the frame, and made to revolve in contact with the cylinder. This is called a polishing roller. It has a surface of felt, or some other suitable material, and, as it revolves, with its surface in contact with the surface of the revolving cylinder, it cleans and polishes the latter. Between the point where this polishing roller and the cylinder come in contact, and the point on the cylinder where the web first reaches it, there is a size trough, in which another roller wallows, carrying the size into contact with a revolving brush, which takes it up and distributes it on the surface of the cylinder. The different parts of the machine are rotated in the usual way, by cog-wheels and endless aprons. When the machine is in motion, the size is thrown on the surface of the cylinder, (or it may be thrown on the under surface of the web, or on both that and the cylinder,) and the web passes under the pressure roller, on to, and in close contact with, the cylinder, from which it is peeled off at a point nearly opposite from where it is taken on, and wound on the roller which receives it after the sizing and glazing are completed. By this combined operation of the machine, sheets or webs of very slight strength or toughness are run through and glazed with a smooth surface.

I have thus given a description of the material parts of the machine and its mode of operation, without designating the parts by letters referring to the drawings. But, as these letters are introduced into the claim, it will be well, before citing that, to say, that the large heated cylinder is designated as B, and the small heated pressure roller as C, and the polishing roller as G. The claim is as follows: "The employment or use of a heated metallic cylinder, B, or one having a metallic exterior or periphery, in combination with a heated pressure cylinder, C, one or more, and a polishing roller, G, or its equivalent, arranged as shown, for the purpose of surfacing and drying simultaneously, or at one operation, fibrous materials, as set forth." There is a further claim touching the operation of the revolving brush, but that is not in controversy here.

Now, the frame and large cylinder of the defendants' machine are like those of the plaintiffs'. The defendants also use a pressure roller, which presses the web into contact with the cylinder. In place of the polishing roller of the plaintiffs, the defendants use a clearing bar, placed across the frame, and very nearly in contact with the cylinder. As the cylinder revolves, this bar catches, and takes from its surface, any portion of the wadding that may have adhered to it. A packing is thus soon formed between the clearing bar and cylinder, which wipes, and, to some extent, cleans the latter, as it revolves. It can hardly be said to polish it, though, for the purposes of this case, we may assume that it does.

By recurring to the description of the plaintiffs' invention, it will be seen, that it consists of three elements in combination, namely, a heated metallic cylinder, a heated pressure roller, and a polishing roller. The question now presents itself whether the defendants use the same elements, or their equivalents, in combination. If they do, they infringe the rights secured by the plaintiffs' patent. If they do not, then they do not infringe. The defendants' cylinder is the same as that of the plaintiffs, and we will assume, for the purposes of this case, that their clearing bar is an equivalent for the plaintiffs' polishing roller, though that may well be doubted. We have, then, two elements of the invention in combination. But the third is equally essential to the infringement. This third element is the pressure roller. In the specification it is described as a small metallic cylinder, and, in that, as well as in the claim, it is described as a "heated pressure roller" or cylinder. This heated pressure roller is described, in the body of the specification, as performing two functions, namely, drying and pressure. "The cylinder C," the pressure roller, "being also heated, dries off the steam that passes through the web at this point"—the point of contact of the web with the main cylinder—"and the web, passing over the upper part of the cylinder B, is glazed, or sized, and dried, the two processes being performed simultaneously, and finished before the web reaches the point where it leaves the cylinder B. The cylinder C," the pressure roller, "also presses the web to the cylinder B, and causes it to adhere to the glazing or sizing on cylinder B. One or more of these cylinders, C, may be used." Now, the defendants use, for a pressure roller, a common solid wooden cylinder, not only not heated, but not constructed so as to be heated in any particular way. The only function that it performs is to press the web into contact with the large metal cylinder, in order to make the sizing adhere to and glaze the surface of the sheet of wadding. But, I am asked to hold that this roller of the defendants is the equivalent of the heated pressure roller of the plaintiffs. This cannot be done, under any reasonable rule of construction. The patentees do not, either in the body of their specification, or in their claim, assert their exclusive right to any combination except one in which the heated pressure roller forms one of the essential elements. Wherever they describe their roller, they call it a heated roller, and, in setting forth its functions, they describe it as drying off the steam which passes through the web. It is true, that they also say that it performs the other function of pressing the web against the cylinder. But they nowhere intimate that they claim this roller when it is so constructed and used as to perform only the duty of pressure. It is clear to my mind, in view of the state of the art, that they deemed it essential to the validity of their patent, that the element of heat should characterize and qualify this member of the combination. In some branches of the wadding manufacture, the ordinary non-heated roller is nearly or quite as useful as the heated roller described in the patent; and this must have been perfectly obvious to the inventor, who was well acquainted with the state of the art. It is incredible that, with this fact before him, he should have omitted to claim simply a pressure roller, whether heated or not, had he deemed it within the scope of his invention. But, whether this is so or not, the specification and claim are so drawn as fairly to exclude the idea that any except a heated pressure roller was intended to be claimed. If Fuzzard was the first and original inventor of the combination of cylinder, polishing roller, and pressure roller, whether heated or not, the specification should have so described and claimed it. As it does not, either expressly or by fair inference, this suit fails, for the defendants do not use the combination described and claimed in the patent.

The F. W. GIFFORD.

[7 Biss. 249;[1] 9 Chi. Leg. News, 9.]

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Aug., 1876.

COLLISION — SEVENTEENTH RULE — RIGHT TO COURSE — ERROR, IMPENDING DANGER.

1. A collision, occurring in open sea, and in broad daylight between two vessels, easily seen when miles apart, and whose courses, on the tacks upon which they were sailing, necessarily intersected each other, cannot be attributed to unavoidable accident.

2. The above is a case where the seventeenth rule of the navigation act is applicable; that "when two sail vessels are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then if they have the wind on different sides, the vessel with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the vessel with the wind on the starboard side," neither vessel being free, but both being close hauled.

3. The vessel on the starboard tack must keep her course, in order that she may not mislead or baffle the movements of the vessel on the larboard tack, and she should only change her course when a collision seems otherwise unavoidable.

4. Where a vessel commits an error under impending danger, or in extremis, produced or brought about by another vessel, such error cannot be alleged as a fault by such other vessel.

5. English and American admiralty decisions cited and commented upon.

In admiralty. The libel in this case charged that on the 16th of August, 1873, the schooner Aetna, of which libellants were owners, was bound on a voyage from Buffalo to Chicago, laden with a cargo of coal; that on that day, when about fifteen or twenty miles southward of Thunder Bay, on Lake Huron, she was run into by the schooner Gifford, and that serious injuries were inflicted upon libellants' vessel by the collision; that at the time, the wind was blowing quite strong from the northwest; that the Aetna was sailing by the wind, with reefed mainsail, foresail and three jibs, "starboard tacks aboard," and that the Gifford was sailing by the wind, "port tacks aboard;" that the collision occurred in open lake, and in broad daylight; that the Gifford, had she been properly navigated, could have given way and avoided the Aetna, and that the collision was occasioned by the negligence, carelessness, and unskillful management of the Gifford by her master and crew.

The answer of the claimants admitted that at the time of the collision, the wind was northwest; that the Aetna had her starboard tacks aboard, and that the Gifford was sailing by the wind upon the port tacks; that at about six o'clock in the morning, the Aetna was sighted about a point and a-half or two points off the Gifford's starboard bow, heading about west-southwest; that the wind was strong and a heavy sea running; that the Gifford was carrying foresail, mainsail, and double-reefed mizzen sail, fore staysail and jib, and that there were on her deck the master, second mate, a man at the wheel and one seaman; that the Gifford proceeded on her course until the vessels were about one mile apart, when her master came to the conclusion that if both vessels proceeded on their respective courses, there would be danger of a collision, and for the purpose of avoiding it, he gave the order to light up the jib sheets and to put the wheel down slow, which order was obeyed, and the schooner came up into the wind, but for some unknown reason, missed stays, and hung in the wind; and that all on board did all that was possible to bring her around; but to no avail; that though the movements of the Gifford could have been easily seen by the men on board the Aetna, and her helpless condition fully understood, and though those on board the Aetna knew that the Gifford was thus in irons, they made no effort to avoid a collision, but continued on their course, running across the Gifford's bows and striking her jib-boom with her foresail; that the collision occurred without fault on the part of the Gifford, and without negligence or want of care or skill on the part of those on board, but that it was occasioned by the negligence, and want of care and skill on the part of those in charge of the Aetna; that after the Gifford had missed stays and became helpless there was opportunity for the Aetna to have gone clear of her, had any effort been made by those navigating her for that purpose, but nothing was done on her part to avoid the collision.

Wm. P. Lynde, for libellants.
H. H. Markham, for claimants.

DYER, District Judge. Upon some of the material questions of fact, there is no dispute. The collision occurred in daylight, between six and seven o'clock in the morning, and when the weather was clear. The wind was from the northwest, blowing a fresh breeze, and causing considerable sea. The Aetna was sailing close hauled on the starboard tack, at a speed of four or four and a half miles an hour, on a west-southwest course, under a single reefed mainsail, full foresail and three jibs. The Gifford was sailing on the port tack, close hauled at a speed of about five miles an hour, heading north-northeast, and carrying double-reefed mizzen sail, whole mainsail, foresail, staysail and jib. The captain of the Gifford testifies that when he first discovered the Aetna, she was three or four miles away, and from a point and a half to two points on the starboard bow of the Gifford. The captain of the Aetna says that when he sighted the Gifford, she was from four to five miles distant, and from three to four points on the port bow of the Aetna. It seems not to be disputed that each vessel could be seen from three to five miles away, and that they were continually in sight of each other, from the moment when first observed until the collision.

[2] [Concerning circumstances transpiring just before the collision, and the respective movements of the two vessels as they approached each other, there is disagreement. The master of the Gifford testifies that the vessels stood on their courses until they were about three-quarters of a mile apart, when he ordered the man at the wheel to give her a good full, preparatory to going about; that when he thought his vessel had way, he ordered the wheel put down slow, having first directed the men forward to get ready for stays; that the wheel was put down, the jib-sheets were let go, and the vessel came up into the wind, but did not swing around; that he thereupon ran aft and ported the helm; that he also called the mate from below, a collision being then imminent, and the mate immediately let go the fore sheet, when the Gifford having thus missed stays, the vessels struck. He says when he attempted to stay the Gifford, she was from one-half to three-quarters of a mile from the Aetna; that at the time of the collision, he thinks the Aetna was on her course, heading west southwest; that the effect of the collision was to swing the Gifford round so that she then stood on her starboard tack; that at the time the Gifford missed stays, and when the collision occurred, she stood head to the wind, with both jib sheets and the fore sheets gone, and the fore-boom half way out to the fore rigging, and the foresail with it. That he attempted to stay his vessel because he thought that, having room, and never having had trouble in staying her before, she would go around; that she did not fill away again after missing stays at the time of the collision; that the collision could have been averted by porting the helm of the Aetna and putting her in stays, but that no such movement was executed; that she was heading across the bows of the Gifford when they struck, and that, at the time of the collision, the Gifford had no headway. Corroborative of this testimony of the master, in various particulars, is that of the mate, wheelsman, and one seaman.

[The master of the Aetna testifies, that his vessel was kept on her course until a collision being imminent, he ordered her put in stays, but that before she got around the Gifford struck her; that he saw the jibs of the Gifford shaking when at some distance away, but could not tell what maneuver she was executing; that from appearances she might be in the wind, or might be lighting up her sheets; that he could not see that she was in a helpless condition, and that he supposed she was getting away from the Aetna's course; that her jib-boom struck the Aetna's foresail, carrying away her main rigging, breaking her rail and stanchions, springing the main mast head and inflicting other injuries. The witness, Charles Miller, seaman, was on the deck of the Aetna before and at the time the collision occurred, and testifies that it was thought by those on board the Aetna that the Gifford would tack and pass clear of the former's course; that, as the danger of collision increased, the wheel of the Aetna was put hard down, and the head sheets were eased up; that he saw the Gifford's jibs shaking in the wind, and that she filled away again, and at the time of the collision he thinks she had some headway. Henry Lang, mate of the Aetna testifies, that he saw the Gifford lighten her head sails, but could not tell whether she was going about or what she was doing, and that when he first saw the Gifford she had plenty of time to get out of the way. In a few moments he saw her head sheets hauled aft, and he says she filled away again. He testifies that he saw the Gifford coming toward the Aetna, when the captain of the Aetna ordered her wheel hard down, and the witness went forward and let go the head sheets, and as this was being accomplished, to put the Aetna about, the vessels struck. This witness says further, that when the wheel of the Aetna was put hard down, she answered her helm directly, and was coming up into the wind when the Gifford struck her.] [2]

It is plain that a collision thus occurring in open sea and in broad daylight, between two vessels easily seen miles apart, and whose courses, on the tacks upon which they were sailing, necessarily intersected each other, cannot be attributed to unavoidable accident. It is equally clear that the case is one where the 17th rule of the navigation act is applicable; that, "when two sail vessels are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then, if they have the wind on different sides, the vessel with the wind on the port side, shall keep out of the way of the vessel with the wind on the starboard side," neither vessel being free, but both being close hauled.

This rule has been not only frequently, but rigidly enforced by the courts. The Friends, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 483; The Chester, 3 Hagg. Adm. 316; The Woodrop-Sims, 2 Dod. 86; The Thames, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 345; The Celt, 3 Hagg. Adm. 327; The Jupiter, Id. 320; Allen v. Mackey [Case No. 228].

In the case of St. John v. Paine, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 579, Nelson, J., in his opinion, says: "The vessel on the starboard tack has a right to keep her course, and the one on the larboard tack must give way, or be answerable for the consequences. * * * When vessels are crossing each other in opposite directions, and there is the least doubt of their going clear, the vessel on the starboard tack should persevere in her course, while that on the larboard tack should bear up or keep away before the wind. * * * No one can look through the reports in admiralty in England, without being struck with the steadiness and rigor with which these general nautical rules have been enforced in cases of collision, under the advice of the trinity masters of that court, or fail to be impressed with the justice and propriety of such application, and the salutary results flowing from it."

In the case of The Kingston-by-Sea, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 153, it was an established fact that the two vessels had ample time to see each other at the distance of two or three miles, and had abundant opportunity to take measures to avoid a collision. The Kingston-by-Sea attempted to go in stays but missed, and the trinity masters held, first, that she had it in her power to choose the distance at which she would tack, and, secondly, if a vessel is put in stays and misses, it is the duty of those on board to so navigate the vessel as to let her pay off.

In the case of The Ann and Mary, 2 W.

Rob. Adm. 189, the rule was declared as one to be strictly adhered to, that the vessel on the starboard tack must put her helm aport to keep the wind, and the vessel on the larboard tack must do the same to bear away; and the vessel proceeded against was adjudged in fault because she put her helm alee and did not bear away. See, also, The Traveller, Id. 198; Holt, Rule of Road, 92, 100, 114; Bently v. Coyne, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 509.

That part of the rule, that a close hauled vessel on the port tack, must give way to one sailing by the wind on the starboard tack, close hauled, is not more imperative than is the further branch of the same rule, as enforced by the courts, that the latter vessel must keep her course. In the case of The Richard R. Higgins [Case No. 11,768], it was held that to relieve a vessel from fault in changing her course when the rule required her to keep it, she must show clearly that it was done after a collision had become inevitable, or at least, after a courageous and skilful navigator would have thought it so.

Justice Clifford in the case of Bently v. Coyne, before cited, says: "Persons engaged in navigating vessels upon navigable waters are bound to observe the nautical rules recognized by law in the management of their vessels, on approaching a point where there is danger of collision. Undoubtedly the same law which requires vessels having the wind free, or sailing on the larboard tack, to keep out of the way or give way, as the case may be, also imposes the correlative duty upon those close hauled on the wind, or sailing on the starboard tack, to keep their course, in order that the former may know the position of the object to be avoided, and not be baffled or led into error in their endeavors to comply with the requirement." See, also, New York & L. Steamship Co. v. Rumball, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 372.

Both vessels, in the present case, were in the precise position requiring compliance with the rule. There was devolved upon the Aetna the general duty to pursue her course, so that the Gifford might not be misled or baffled in her movements, and the duty imposed upon the Gifford was to keep out of the way of the Aetna. The burden was upon her of avoiding the danger of collision. The captain of the Gifford testifies that he sighted the Aetna when four or five miles away. The wind was fresh, causing about a six or eight-foot sea. Under these circumstances there can be no doubt that there was ample time and room for the Gifford to bear away under a port helm, and to have passed astern of the Aetna; and this is precisely the movement which the court in St. John v. Paine, supra, says should be executed under such circumstances. But the master of the Gifford took the responsibility to execute a different maneuver, which was to continue on his course until, as he says, his vessel was three-quarters of a mile from the Aetna, when he attempted to put her in stays, which she missed.

Upon the positive testimony in the case, my conclusion is, that the Aetna kept her course until a collision became inevitable. It is urged that the Gifford was three-quarters of a mile off when she attempted to go in stays and stood in the wind, and that there was a space of 1185 feet between the Gifford's bows while in the wind and the direct course of the Aetna at that distance; from which the conclusion is deduced that the Aetna must have fallen off from her original course. But this theory rests strongly upon conjecture and is against the positive testimony on both sides, and is, I think against the circumstances. The captain of the Gifford as positively testifies that the Aetna kept her course as does any witness for libellants. Then it cannot be assumed as a certainty that the Gifford was three-quarters of a mile from the Aetna when she attempted to go in stays. Capt. Berryman states the distance as one-half to three-quarters of a mile. One of libellants' witnesses also testifies that the effort to go in stays was made from seven to nine minutes before the collision, and that the jib-boom of the Aetna was then pointed to the fore-rigging of the Gifford, which would certainly bring the latter vessel very near to the Aetna's course. It is clear that the Gifford was nearer to the point where the courses of the two vessels intersected, than was the Aetna, when the effort was made to stay the Gifford. The evidence is that she would forge ahead some distance under a slackening headway, after her wheel was put hard down, and adding to that, the possibility of her filling away again, a point disputed by the witnesses, I am constrained to believe, that at the time and point where the attempt was made to stay the Gifford, the proximity of the two vessels made that maneuver hazardous. The captain of the Gifford says, that at the point where his vessel stood, there was room to get out of the way if she did not miss stays; but that there was not room to do so if she missed, which tends strongly to show that the movement was not made at sufficient distance. It is exceedingly difficult upon all the testimony and in view of the ample time, space and opportunity which the Gifford had for taking a course that should be entirely safe for both vessels, to resist the conclusion that she was in fault in the movement she did make. She had it in her power to determine at what distance she would attempt to go about, upon choosing that as the maneuver for avoiding the Aetna. The burden was cast upon her by the law of the sea, of keeping out of the way, and when, with the time and room she had for adopting a course which would beyond question avoid not only a collision but all danger, it must be held that when she chose another course attended with hazard, she did so at her peril. It is true that the captain of the Gifford had not before had any difficulty in staying his vessel, but he says he never before attempted to stay her in such a sea. He may have exercised what he thought at the time was proper judgment, but his judgment proved erroneous, because his vessel missed in the attempted movement.

The testimony on the part of the claimants is to the effect that the Gifford was head to wind, with shivered canvass at the time of the collision; and upon the point of proximity to the Aetna, it should be noted that the captain of the Gifford says she was in the wind four or five minutes or more, and when in that position was too near the Aetna then to try to stay her. Moreover, the spirit of the rule laid down by the trinity masters in The Kingston-by-Sea, is, that when a vessel misses stays under such circumstances, efforts should be made to let her pay off instead of standing steadily in the wind.

It is true that experienced seamen have testified that the movements of the Gifford, as they are given by her master, were proper, though most of them speak cautiously, and make the case depend on circumstances. It is evident that their approval of going in stays in such cases, rests largely upon the fact that time and distance are saved, which are considerations certainly not to be weighed against safety.

One of these witnesses is so clear in his view, that the suitable course is to go in stays, that he gives it as his understanding of the rule of the navigation act, that when two vessels are meeting on opposite tacks, close hauled, to avoid collision, it requires the vessel bound to give way, to put the helm down and go in stays, when, in fact, the rule says nothing about such a movement; and the diagram issued by the bureau of navigation, illustrative of the rule, shows that the port tack gives way to the close hauled starboard tack by porting. The captain of the Gifford gives as one of his reasons for going in stays, the fact that he would have lost time and distance if he kept his vessel off, a reason which cannot receive approval. Since it would have been entirely a safe and successful movement, in the time and space which the Gifford had, to have ported her helm and gone to the leeward of the Aetna, passing her stern, it seems clear that this should have been done. As some of the witnesses say, this movement would probably have carried her to some extent into the troughs of the sea; but the danger to the Gifford in this respect would have been less than the other course proved to be to both vessels.

The remarks of the court in Allen v. Mackey [Case No. 228], are applicable. The Gifford should have gone under the stern of the Aetna, "because by doing so the vessels would be constantly increasing their distance from each other, and because this course would not require on her part any calculation of the rate of speed at which the other vessel was going." The circumstance that, after the Gifford came up in the wind and did not go around, the captain then put the helm to port, is indicative of an attempt then useless, to do that which if done in proper season, would have avoided the collision.

But it is contended that the Aetna brought the injury upon herself, and that the collision was not averted because of her own recklessness. She stood on her course. In doing this, she was complying with the rule and with the principle laid down by the courts with so much emphasis, that when there is the least doubt of vessels on opposite tacks going clear, the vessel on the starboard tack should persevere in her course. The Aetna had the right to proceed upon the presumption that the Gifford would give way and was in the act of doing so. Under the rules laid down in the decisions, her duty was to keep her course until a collision was impending; otherwise, the movements of the other vessel might be baffled. It is said that the Gifford was disabled, that her sails were shaking in the wind, and that her condition of alleged helplessness must have been apparent to those on board the Aetna. But I am not convinced that her disability was so great, when first she missed stays, as to render her entirely helpless. And, moreover, the fact that she stood in the wind, and that her foresails were shaking, would not be a conclusive indication to those on board the Aetna that the Gifford had missed stays. Captain Norris testifies that if he had been on the Aetna, he could not have concluded, upon seeing her head sails lifting, that the Gifford had missed stays, until he should see her fall off and fill away. Other witnesses on both sides substantially concur with him. Upon all the testimony I regard it as reasonable that those on board the Aetna would, from natural observation, judge that the Gifford was endeavoring to give way, and would give way. An extremity was soon disclosed that forbade the Aetna from standing further on her course, and that brought her within the principle of the 24th rule. Special circumstances were presented which made it necessary to depart from the rule of adhering to her course, and which involved "due regard to the dangers of navigation." And I think the testimony and the circumstances establish that when peril was impending, measures were taken to put the Aetna about. Of course the Aetna had not the right to persist in her course so as to run the Gifford down. If it became the duty of the master of the Aetna to take measures to keep out of the way of the Gifford, the question is, when did that duty begin. Following the reasoning of Judge Longyear in the case of The H. P. Baldwin [Case No. 6,812], it will not do to say that it began when it became probable that the Gifford would not get out of the way, because by article 17 it was the duty of the Aetna to keep her course, and it would not do for her to change it so long as there was any room for doubt as to the intentions of the Gifford.

At what point did the duty arise requiring the Aetna to take steps to avoid a collision? She was where the law says she should be under such circumstances. Adopting further the language of Judge Longyear, "the master of the vessel stood there with all the circumstances before him, and no doubt used his best judgment and acted accordingly. And although it may be now apparent that if he had given the order he did give, a little sooner, a collision might have been avoided, yet in view of the doubts with which the matter was necessarily surrounded at the time, I cannot say it was his duty so to have given the order," and that the Aetna is responsible because the order was not sooner given. The H. P. Baldwin, supra. I consider the Gifford as then in a position where she was to be regarded as a vessel in motion, with the duty resting upon her to give way to the Aetna, and so bringing the case within the principle of the decision, "holding, that where a vessel commits an error under impending danger, or in extremis, produced or brought about by another vessel, such error cannot be alleged as a fault by such other vessel."

The positive testimony of the men on the Aetna, that she was going about, head to wind, when the collision became imminent, is fortified by the fact that the jib-boom of the Gifford struck her foresail and then carried away the main rigging, and that the first blow was not forward of the foresail.

The case of The Charlotte Raab [Case No. 2,622], has been cited by claimants' counsel. But there, both vessels were on the starboard tack, close hauled. The Wall properly went in stays to avoid ice on her lee bow. As to the Raab, the vessel proceeded against, the case was not within rule 17, and the situation was fully comprehended by her master, who chose to push his vessel on, without giving the Wall time to get away on her port tack.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1801.

PRACTICE AT LAW—APPEARANCE—SCIRE FACIAS—SERVICE—DISCONTINUANCE.

1. If a defendant appear to a sci. fa. it is not material by whom the writ was served. It is no plea for bail to say that the principal was in jail in Maryland at the time of the judgment against him and has remained in jail ever since.

2. Bail is not discharged by a discontinuance of the suit at the rules, if it be reinstated.

Scire facias. 1st plea: That Miller [special bail of Colquhoun], resides in Caroline county, in Virginia, and was served with the scire facias by the sheriff of Caroline county. To this plea there was a special demurrer. 2d plea: That Colquhoun was in jail in Baltimore at the time of the original judgment, and has remained so ever since. 3d plea: That the original writ against Colquhoun was discontinued by the plaintiff at the rules in October, and reinstated, at the motion of the plaintiff, at the next rules in November. 4th plea was the same in substance as the 3d. To these three last pleas there was a general demurrer.

Mr. Faw and Mr. Swann, for plaintiff.

Mr. Simms and Mr. Jones, for defendant.

On the part of the plaintiff, it was said; as to the first plea, that such a service of a scire facias is good by the laws of Virginia. Rev. Code, p. 95, § 30. And, at all events, it is cured by the appearance of the defendant. The second plea was abandoned by the defendant's counsel. As to the third and fourth pleas, the defendant in a scire facias, cannot plead that which the original defendant might have pleaded to the original action. Wraight v. Kitchingman, 1 Strange, 197. For the defendant, it was said, as to the first plea, that if the defendant comes and pleads the want of proper process, he shall not be prevented by his having appeared. 1 Bac. Abr. As to the third plea. If the plaintiff does any act by which the bail loses the right of taking the principal in order to surrender him, the bail is discharged. In this case the original action was discontinued one month, and during that time the bail would not have been justified in seizing the principal. It gave him an opportunity to escape. Judgment for the plaintiff.

GAFFNEY et al. v. GILLETTE et al.

[4 Dill. 264, note.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Colorado. July Term, 1878.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—WAIVER OF RIGHT—CAUSES PENDING ON ADMISSION OF STATE.

[1. The supreme court of Colorado refused to hear a cause which was pending therein at the time of the state's admission unless both parties should invoke its action, which they accordingly did by written stipulation of submission. Held, that this was a waiver of any right to remove the cause to a federal court after a reversal of the judgment and the return of the cause for a new trial.]

[2. After such reversal and return of the cause it was too late to remove it under the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. 470), even if that act was applicable to such a case.]

The plaintiffs move to remand this cause to the state court.

Mr. Johnson, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Webster, for defendants.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and HALLETT, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. At the time of the admission of Colorado as a state, this cause was pending in the supreme court of the territory on appeal from a final decree of one of the district courts of Colorado territory. The plaintiffs were then and still are citizens of Illinois, and the defendants citizens of New York and Colorado. The supreme court of the state, in consequence of the provisions of section 8 of the act of June 26, 1876 (19 Stat. 62), refused to entertain jurisdiction of the cause, or to decide the same, unless both parties should invoke its action and submit the same to its judgment. The parties did this by a written stipulation duly filed. The supreme court of the state, after argument, reversed the decree below and remanded the cause to the proper district court of the state, with leave to complainants to amend their bill, if so advised, and with leave to one of the defendants to file a cross-bill, if so advised, and dismissing the bill as to another defendant, unless the complainants should make him a proper party by an amended bill to be filed within such time as the court should direct.

After the case was remanded an amended bill was filed, and the same was demurred to by the defendants. At the same term the defendants filed their petition to remove the cause to this court, on the ground of citizenship of the parties, and the removal was ordered. The plaintiffs now move to remand the cause to the state court.

We hold that the defendants waived their right to a removal of the cause under the above mentioned act of congress of June 26, 1876, by their voluntary and deliberate submission of the same to the supreme court of the state.

We also hold that it was too late to remove the cause under the act of March 3, 1875, even if it be conceded that said act has any application to this cause. Remanded.

GAFFNEY'S ASSIGNEE v. SIGNAIGO.

[1 Dill. 158: [1] 14 Int. Rev. Rec. 95; 5 West. Jur. 450.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. 1870.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—LOANS TO INSOLVENTS ON SECURITY—VALIDITY OF.

1. There is no provision of the bankrupt act which avoids a security otherwise valid, because it is taken in the form of an absolute deed instead of a mortgage.

2. A person who is insolvent may borrow money, and give a valid security therefor on his property, if no fraud in fact be intended, and no fraud on the bankrupt act be effected.

This is an appeal from a decree of the district court for the eastern district of Missouri. [Case unreported.] Gaffney made an absolute conveyance of certain property in the city of St. Louis to the defendant, and this is a bill by the assignee of Gaffney to set aside this conveyance because the same was fraudulent, and in violation of the bankrupt act. The answer admits the making of the conveyance, but denies the fraud, and sets up that the deed was executed to secure a sum of money advanced at the time by the defendant to Gaffney, and actually applied by the latter to the payment of judgments, taxes, and debts which were liens on the property, and certain other judgments rendered by justices of the peace, which could at will be made liens thereon. The answer claims to hold the property as security only, and prays, by way of cross bill, that the amount of advances made on the security of the deed be declared a lien on the property. The district court found that the deed was made as security only, ascertained the amount of the advances, and entered a decree in conformity with the prayer of the cross bill, from which the assignee appeals.

E. T. Allen, for assignee.

Lackland, Martin & Lackland, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. 1. The fact is conclusively established that the money which the defendant loaned was applied to the payment of debts against Gaffney, which were either liens on the property, or could have been made so at any time, at the election of the creditors.

It is claimed by the assignee that an absolute conveyance, made for the purpose of securing a bona fide debt, though created at the time with a parol understanding between the parties that the land is to be reconveyed upon the payment of the debt and interest, is void against creditors, especially if the grantee is aware of the existence of other creditors, and knows or has reason to believe the grantor to be insolvent.

Such, however, is not the law, and the deed is valid as a security, and may be enforced as such, unless actually or constructively fraudulent. There is no provision of the bankrupt act which avoids a security otherwise valid, because taken in the form of an absolute deed instead of a mortgage. The fact that it is so taken may be a circumstance to show fraud, but alone does not establish it, and why it was thus taken, has, in the case at bar, been satisfactorily explained.

The case is unlike Lukins v. Aird, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 79, where a valuable right—that of possession—was secretly reserved to the failing debtor, contrary to the terms of the deed; here, there was no absolute sale in fact, and no attempt by the debtor to reserve a right at the expense of his creditors.

2. It is also claimed by the assignee, that Gaffney, being insolvent at the time the deed was made, and the defendant having reasonable cause to believe this to be the fact, that the making of any disposition of his property was fraudulent because in contravention of the 35th section of the bankrupt act.

But a person who is believed to be insolvent may borrow money bona fide and give a valid security therefor, on his property, no fraud in fact, or on the bankrupt act, being intended or effected. Darby v. Boatman's Sav. Inst. [Case No. 3,571], and authorities cited.

The court finds from the evidence in the case, that the defendant had money to loan; that Gaffney, learning of this, applied to defendant's agents to borrow it to pay off liens and debts as above mentioned; that defendant, on the agents' recommendation, at last consented to make the loan; that the agents advised the security to be taken by way of absolute deed, which was not done secretly, and that the whole sum borrowed (except a few dollars excluded from the decree by the district court) was by the defendant's agents actually paid over to the creditors of Gaffney, whose liens were extinguished and whose judgments were satisfied on the record.

Certain it is, therefore, that no fraud was wrought by the transaction, upon the creditors of Gaffney; and equally clear is it upon the evidence, that no fraud was meditated by the defendant. There is no evidence that he ever claimed to own the property absolutely. Gaffney was allowed to remain in possession, and the theory that the conveyance was taken in this way to deceive creditors, or to defraud them, has no support in the evidence.

Decree affirmed.

GAGER v. The A. D. PATCHIN.

[1 Am. Law J. (N. S.) 529.]

District Court, N. D. New York. Jan., 1849.[1]

SALVAGE — PROCEEDINGS IN REM AND IN PERSONAM—PREVIOUS AGREEMENT—JOINDER OF ALL SUITORS.

1. A suit for salvage in rem as well as in personam may be maintained in the admiralty for services, which, if rendered voluntarily would be salvage services, notwithstanding they were rendered in pursuance of a previous agreement specifying the amount of the remuneration therefor, and although the contract was made with the owner of the vessel saved, especially if the owner was also the master, and the fact of his proprietary interest was unknown to the other party.

2. Although all the suitors for salvage ought to join in the suit against the property saved, the non-joinder of the crew of the salvor vessel in a suit by the master and owner, is no impediment to the maintenance of such suit, especially if the services of the crew required no extraordinary exertions and were attended with no extraordinary personal danger.

3. Although the amount agreed to be paid for salvage services is not binding in a court of admiralty upon the party at whose instance, or for whose benefit the service was performed, and will be reduced by the court if exorbitant, and especially when assented to by such party under the pressure of alarm or distress, yet where the agreement has been deliberately entered into and does not appear to be oppressive, it will be enforced according to its terms.

This was a suit for salvage on account of services rendered by the steamer Albany, of which the libellant [Charles L. Gager] was owner and master, to the steamer A. D. Patchin, [Harry Whittaker, claimant], while hard aground on a ledge of rocks, upon which she had been carelessly run at Racine point, in the state of Wisconsin. The facts and circumstances of the case will be sufficiently manifest from the judgment of the court.

Eli Cook, for libellant.

George Underwood, for claimant.

CONKLING, District Judge. One of the objections urged against the libellant's right to maintain this action is, that the services for which he claims compensation, having been performed in pursuance of an express agreement between the parties, and for a stipulated compensation, this is not a case of salvage but a case of contract of which the court has no jurisdiction. In support of this objection, the counsel for the claimant relies upon the similar case of The Mulgrave, 2 Hagg. Adm. 77, in which Lord Stowell pronounced against the action on this ground, observing that it was not a case of salvage, but one of contract, and that he could not entertain the question. Lord Stowell did not, of course, intend to say that he could entertain no action arising ex contractu, but only that the case before him not being a case of salvage, he could not entertain it as a case of that character; and not being a case falling within either of the descriptions of contract embraced within the jurisdiction of the court, he could not entertain it as such. It is well known that the only contracts upon which, at the date of this decision, original suits were in fact entertained in the English high court of admiralty were those for seaman's wages and bottomry bonds, although it has always been conceded that the jurisdiction of the court extended to all such contracts as were made on the high seas and were to be there executed. But by a long series of American decisions, terminating with that of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, the principle is now firmly established that the jurisdiction of the American courts of admiralty does not depend on the decisions of the English common law courts, relative to the jurisdiction of the high court of admiralty of England, but that all contracts in their nature strictly maritime are cognizable in the admiralty. Such, certainly, is the character of this contract; and if the suit had been in personam, the jurisdiction of the court would have been unquestionable. But whether the contract created a lien on the Patchin, and may therefore also be enforced in a suit in rem, is another question not devoid of difficulty.—That a suit in the admiralty for salvage may be maintained in either form, has never been doubted, and this right is moreover expressly recognized and declared by one of the late rules prescribed by the supreme court. If, therefore, the salvor's title to remuneration in ordinary cases may be considered as founded in implied contract, it might, with great apparent force and propriety, be insisted that the remedial right of the salvor could not, in any degree, be impaired by an express contract, entered into before hand, for the mere purpose of fixing the amount of compensation, without any express or clearly implied intention of waiving the right to prosecute in either of the accustomed forms. But suits for salvage have generally been considered—though I confess it has always appeared to me with somewhat questionable propriety—as cases rather of tort than of contract. It would not necessarily follow, therefore, because the maritime law gives a lien in favor of the salvor in a case strictly of salvage, that it also confers one for services of the like nature rendered in pursuance of a contract. But it is a general principle of the maritime law, that from contracts made by the master which bind the owner, as all authorized contracts entered into by him on account of his ship do, unless otherwise expressly provided, there results an implied hypothecation of the ship. The master, undoubtedly, has authority to hire the services of others, when necessary, for the preservation of his vessel, and I imagine that such a contract, subject to the revisory power of the court, would constitute a lien on the vessel. It happens, however, in the present instance that the master was also the sole owner of the vessel to which assistance was rendered; and it is insisted that on this account, he incurred no other than a personal responsibility. Admitting the general principle thus asserted, it becomes necessary, nevertheless, to enquire whether the present is a case to which it is properly applicable.

The contract was originally entered into between the libellant in person and Lewis J. Higby, professing to act as agent for the claimant. It was in writing and is in the following words: "This article of agreement made this 13th day of June, 1848, between the steamer Albany and the steamer Patchin, Capt. H. Whittaker, in which Capt. Gager of the steamer Albany, agrees to do all he can do, to assist said Patchin, now on the rocks at Racine point, Wisconsin, and to stay with her until discharged by said Capt. Whittaker, and said Albany is to be paid four hundred and fifty dollars per day, and the time to commence four o'clock to-day, said Albany to have the privilege to make harbor in case of storm. H. Whittaker, Per L. J. Higby, agent. Milwaukee, June 13, 1848." The agreement was made at the place where it bears date, a few miles from the place where the Patchin lay, and on being soon afterwards made known to the claimant, was by him assented to. His residence was in Buffalo, in the state of New York. The claimant, it will be observed, is described simply as captain of the Patchin, and there is no allegation in the pleadings, nor any evidence that the libellant had any knowledge of his proprietary interest in the vessel. In the case of The St. Jago de Cuba, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 409, 5 Pet. Cond. R. 631, it was held that although for materials or supplies furnished in a home port, no implied lien in general attaches to the ship, the reasonable presumption being that they were furnished on the credit of the owner, yet that if a vessel comes into her home port, in a foreign guise, and obtains supplies, this principle is applicable to the case, and a lien in favor of the material men arises. "The questions," say the court, "then arise, on what does the privilege of the material men depend? on the state of facts, or on their belief of facts?" The answer given by the court is that it depends on the latter. "De non apparentibus et non existentibus, eadem est ratio"; and applying the principle decided in The St. Jago de Cuba to the present case, it would follow that the contract ought to be treated as having been made with the master as such, unless the libellant was bound to show affirmatively his ignorance of the fact, that the claimant was also the owner of the Patchin. But considering that the contract was made at a place remote from the owner's residence, and that the claimant is described in it only as master; and considering also that his ownership is now set up by him for the purpose of exempting his vessel by way of exception from the general rule, I am of opinion that the onus probandi lies upon him to show the libellant's knowledge of such ownership.

In discussing this point, I have thus far conceded that if the libellant had known that the claimant was the owner and had contracted with him as such, no lien would have resulted from the contract. But I infer that the late Mr. Justice Story entertained a different view of the law, and that he supposed it to be in this respect immaterial whether the contract was made with the master or owner. In The Emulous [Case No. 4,480], which was a suit in rem, the vessel was owned in Boston, and having struck on a rock within the waters of that state, one of the sets of salvors contracted to tow her into port for a specific sum agreed upon. The contract, it is true, was made with the master of the schooner, though, as already observed, in the state to which she belonged. But the learned judge in a formal exposition of what he understood to be the law applicable to cases of that nature, seems not to have recognized any distinction between contracts of this description entered into by the master and those made by the owner in person. His language is as follows:

"The court has been asked upon this occasion to lay down some clear and definite rule as to what shall be deemed salvage service, and what shall be deemed a mere common contract for labor and services. I take it to be very clear, that whenever the service has been rendered in saving property on the sea, or wrecked on the coast of the sea, the service is, in the sense of the maritime law, a salvage service. If it has been rendered under circumstances which establish that the parties have voluntarily and without any controlling circumstances on the side of the proprietors of the property saved, or their agents, entered into a contract for a fixed compensation, or upon the ordinary terms of a compensation, for labor and services quantum meruerunt; in either case it does not alter the nature of the service, as a salvage service, but only fixes the rule by which the court is to be governed in awarding the compensation. It is still a salvage contract and a salvage compensation. It is true, that contracts made for salvage services are not ordinarily held obligatory by the court of admiralty upon the persons whose property is saved, unless the court can clearly see that no advantage is taken of the parties' situation, and that the rate of compensation is just and reasonable. The doctrine is founded upon principles of public policy as well as upon just views of moral obligation. No system of jurisprudence purporting to be founded upon moral or religious or even rational principles, could tolerate for a moment the doctrine, that a salvor might avail himself of the calamities of others to force upon them a contract, unjust, oppressive or exorbitant, that he might turn the price of safety into the price of ruin; that he might turn an act demanded by Christian and public duty, into a traffic of profit which would outrage human feelings and disgrace human justice."

In The Centurion [Case No. 2,554], the learned judge of the district of Maine cites the case of The Emulous [supra] as in his judgment containing a just exposition of the law of salvage. It is quite "immaterial," he observes, "whether the salvors accidentally fall in with the wreck and volunteer their services, or are called upon by the owners or persons interested in the wreck to aid in saving it. It is the place where the property is situated, and the circumstances of exposure and peril in which it is found, that determine the question whether it is a case of salvage or not." But in a later case,—that of Bearse v. Three Hundred and Forty Pigs of Copper [Case No. 1,193],—which arose in the district of Massachusetts, and was finally decided on appeal at the circuit court, the objection was distinctly taken, that the services having been performed in pursuance of an express contract, no action in rem could be maintained therefor. The contract was made in that case not by the master, but by the proprietors in person, of the property saved; but this circumstance does not seem to have been considered of any importance even by the counsel for the claimants. The objection was that the service, though of a nature which would otherwise have been a salvage service, having been performed by contract, no right accrued from it to the libellants to proceed against the property. The district judge "held that as the respondents had denied in their answer that any contract subsisted between them and the libellants, at the time the property was recovered, which also appeared upon the evidence, the libel was rightly brought against the property, whether the principle contended for by the libellants was correct or not." The conclusion of Mr. Justice Story on the appeal also was, that the particular services in question were not embraced within the contract set up by the claimants, under which other salvage services had been previously performed by the libellants. But he adverts to the question only as one bearing upon the amount of remuneration to be awarded, and seems not to have considered it at all affecting the right of the libellant to maintain his action in rem. He refers also with apparent approbation, to his observations above cited in the case of The Emulous. The just inference, therefore, appears to be, that he considered all services, which if rendered voluntarily would be salvage services, as not the less so because rendered in pursuance of an agreement for that purpose; and as entitling the salvor to the like remedies, whether rendered in the one form or the other. If the salvor, especially after the performance of the service, should take a bond or receive a bill of exchange or a negotiable promissory note in payment, it may be conceded that his remedy would be limited to a personal action on the security so taken. But there does not appear to be solid reason for denying to the salvor, a lien on the property saved, merely because the salvage service was performed at the request whether of the master or the owner, and under a promise of remuneration, especially as a court of admiralty possesses an unquestionable power to shield the owners of property saved, against extortionate exactions, by reducing an exorbitant reward, promised under the pressure of alarm or distress. My opinion therefore is that this objection is invalid.

It is farther insisted by the counsel for the claimant, that the stipulated services were not faithfully performed, and that they were in fact worthless. I think this objection has not been substantiated. The witnesses for the libellant give a very exact and intelligible account of the services rendered and the means used by the libellant to relieve the Patchin from her highly perilous situation. This evidence in itself considered is entirely satisfactory, and leaves no room for doubt that the libellant did all that he could reasonably be expected to do, for the relief of the Patchin; that he contributed essentially to her rescue. The witnesses on the other side deal in general censures of the libellant's management; but when pressed to specify the particulars in which his misconduct consisted, they are unable to do so. Indeed, all the more important measures resorted to, were dictated by the claimant himself, and his directions appear to have been readily acquiesced in by the libellant. It was insisted also by the counsel for the claimant, that the persons composing the crew of the Albany ought to have been parties to the suit. When, as is commonly the case, salvage is claimed by the crew, as well as by the master and owners of the salvor vessel, and a suit is to be instituted in the admiralty therefor, it is certainly proper that all should join in such suit; and in case where the salvage service was highly meritorious, as, where it required exhausting labor, or was attended by great danger, if the master should designedly institute a suit in behalf of himself or of himself and his owner, alone, in the hope that through the ignorance of the crew, he might secure a large reward to himself at their expense, he would expose himself to just censure; and there may be cases in which it would be the duty of the court to enquire into the reason of the non-joinder of the seamen, and to see that their rights are maintained, unless they choose voluntarily to relinquish them. But in the present case the crew of the salvor vessel were exposed to no extraordinary hardships or personal danger. Their services were rendered chiefly on board their own steamer, and were substantially such as they had contracted to perform; and they probably and perhaps very properly deemed their stipulated wages a sufficient compensation therefor. If they had thought otherwise, it may be supposed that they would have applied to the court for redress, and it is a mistake to suppose that the right of the libellant, as owner and master of the Albany, to prosecute his suit, is prejudiced by their non-joinder in the action.

With respect to the amount of remuneration to be awarded, there are no circumstances attending the case, which demand the jealous scrutiny of the court, into the reasonableness of the stipulated reward. At the time the contract was entered into, the Patchin was in no danger of immediate destruction. The weather was fair and calm; a large number of persons were already engaged in endeavoring to get her off the rocks; steamers were frequently passing very near to the spot where she lay; the terms of the agreement seem to have been deliberately settled, and in order to determine the just measure of compensation, the books of the Albany were resorted to, for the purpose of ascertaining her ordinary earnings, and the amount to be paid was fixed accordingly. The circumstances of the case scarcely admitted of the indulgence of a spirit of rapacity by the libellant, and there is no evidence tending to show that he was actuated by any such spirit. To say nothing of the great value of the Patchin, the Albany herself was a large and valuable steamer. After transferring her numerous passengers to another steamer and refunding their passage money, she was constantly employed not altogether without danger to herself from hidden rocks, in rendering assistance to the Patchin, during four successive days and nights, and during a portion of the time in strenuous efforts, subjecting her to heavy strains to jerk or drag the Patchin from the rocks. For these sacrifices and services, I cannot say that the stipulated sum of $450 a day is an exorbitant or even an unreasonable compensation; and I am satisfied that the duty of the court will be best performed, by simply enforcing the voluntary agreement of the parties. I accordingly award to the libellant the sum of $1,800, deducting the sum of $300 already paid, with interest from the 17th day of June last, when the service was consummated.

[NOTE. The claimant appealed to the circuit court, where the decree of the district court was affirmed. Case No. 87.]

Case No. 5,171.

GAGER v. HARRISON.

[9 Chi. Leg. News, 377.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. July 23, 1877.

FRIVOLOUS PLEAS—DENIAL OF CITIZENSHIP WITH MATTER TO THE MERITS—ESTOPPEL—AMBIGUITY.

1. Denial of citienship of the plaintiff pleaded with matter to the merits becomes frivolous.

2. Ambiguity or uncertainty not a ground for motion to strike out.

3. A plea of estoppel which does not show that the defendant was misled by the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, is frivolous.

[This was an action at law by Edwin B. Gager against John Harrison to recover possession of certain real property.]

Charles Upton, for plaintiff.

Walter W. Thayer, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This motion is made on the grounds that the allegations asked to be stricken out are "sham, frivolous and irrelevant." So far as the first ground is concerned the motion is certainly not well taken and the last two may be considered as one. The first two allegations included in the motion are denials of allegations in the complaint—one, a denial of the alleged citizenship of the plaintiff, and the other of the value of the portion of the premises alleged to belong to the plaintiff.

An answer may always contain a denial of a material allegation in the complaint, and must do so if the defendant intends to controvert it. Civ. Code Or. § 71. But the subsequent denials and defenses in the answer are a waiver of the denial of the alleged citizenship of the plaintiff, as that matter must be plead in abatement, and not to or with the merits. If so it becomes frivolous and may be stricken out. Susquehanna & W. V. Railroad & Coal Co. v. Blatchford, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 177; Wythe v. Myers [Case No. 18,119]. The objection to the second denial is that it is ambiguous, as it includes in the same terms the denial of the value and plaintiff's ownership of the premises in question. But the answer to this is, that the denial is on a par in this respect with the allegation denied. Besides ambiguity is not a cause for striking out. The motion is allowed as to the first of these allegations, and denied as to the second.

The plea of ownership in the defendant is next asked to be stricken out, because it only alleges that he is the owner in fee of the premises, without saying in severalty, and therefore it does not appear but that he is only the owner of the undivided three fourths thereof not claimed by the plaintiff in this action. If this criticism of the plea is just, it only shows that it is uncertain, and the remedy for that is a motion to make certain and not to strike out. Civ. Code Or. § 84.

The remainder of the motion is aimed at the third defense, the same being a plea of estoppel The action is brought to recover an undivided one-fourth of certain premises alleged to be wrongfully withheld from the plaintiff by the defendant. This defense states that the plaintiff is the successor in interest of Nancy Northrup, the widow of John L. Northrup, and that the premises are a part of his donation claim, which, in 1863, and after the decease of said John L., were partitioned by the county court of Washington county among the children and certain grandchildren of said John L., as his heirs, and the said Nancy as his widow, upon the theory that she was only entitled to dower therein, and that the defendant is the successor in interest of said heirs. The facts do not constitute an estoppel. It is not alleged in the plea that the widow, at the time of the partition, was aware that she was entitled to an equal share of her husband's donation with his three children, or that any admission she may have made by her declarations or conduct in the partition proceeding were made with intent to deceive, or culpable neglect, or that the defendant or his grantors were deceived or misled by them, or that he or they had not the same knowledge and means of knowledge as to the interest of the widow in her husband's donation and the correctness and validity of said partition as any one. Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 40. The plea is therefore certainly frivolous, and must be stricken out. If the facts, or any of them, tend to show title in the defendant, they may be used as evidence in support of the plea to that effect.

GAGER v. HENRY.

[5 Sawy. 237; 11 Chi. Leg. News, 84.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Aug. 30, 1878.

PETITION TO SELL LANDS OF WARD—JURISDICTION TO SELL LAND OF WARD—KNOWLEDGE OF THE COURT—ADJOURNED SALE—JUDICIAL SALE.

1. A petition by a guardian to sell the lands of his ward, is not a proceeding between the guardian or ward and the next of kin and others to whom the statute directs that notice thereof shall be given and adverse to the latter, but a proceeding in the nature of one in rem conducted by the ward through his guardian, in the interest of and for the benefit of the ward.

[Cited in Sprigg v. Stump, 8 Fed. 217.]

2. Under the act relating to the sales of lands of minors (Laws Or. p. 738), a county court acquires jurisdiction of a proceeding by a guardian to sell the lands of his ward upon the filing of a proper petition therefor; and such court, when acting as a court of probate, being a court of general jurisdiction, its judgment or action upon such petition cannot be questioned collaterally for errors occurring in the proceedings thereon, after the filing thereof, except as provided by statute.

[Cited in Holmes v. Oregon & C. Ry. Co., 5 Fed. 535; Sprigg v. Stump, 8 Fed. 217; Goldsmith v. Gilliland, 23 Fed. 646.]

3. Section 20 of the act aforesaid, having provided that in an action relating to lands

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. Syllabus, only in 11 Chi. Leg. News, 84.]

sold by a guardian where the ward contests the validity of the sale, the same shall not be avoided for irregularity in the proceedings, provided certain particulars appear therefrom, the presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of the county court and the lawfulness of its exercise is thereby qualified and restrained accordingly, so that if any of such particulars, e. g., that the guardian gave notice of the time and place of the sale of the premises and sold them accordingly, do not appear from the record, the sale is invalid and void.

4. The court takes notice of the existence of the political subdivision of Oregon called Yamhill county, and that Lafayette is the county seat thereof, and therefore a notice to sell lands, upon the order of the Yamhill county court, at the court-house in Lafayette is notice of a place of sale in Yamhill county.

5. Where a guardian gave due notice of time and place of the sale of his ward's lands, and upon the day of such sale for good cause adjourned the same for four weeks and then made a sale which was duly confirmed by the court, such sale was in effect made upon the original notice; and this although the statute (Civ. Code, Or. § 290) forbid the adjournment of the sale for more than one week at a time.

6. A guardian's sale authorized by the county court is a "judicial sale"—that is, one made in effect by the court after getting a bid by means of a public auction conducted by the guardian under its direction, and such a sale cannot be questioned collaterally for an error in the adjournment thereof.

Action [by E. B. Gager against A. B. Henry] to recover possession of real property.

Charles B. Upton, for plaintiff.

E. C. Bronnaugh and Joseph M. Dolph, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the possession of the undivided half of fifty-one and eighty-two one hundredths acres of land situate in the northwestern corner of the donation of Joel Perkins and Laura Ann his wife, in Yamhill county. It was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. There is no conflict in the evidence and the material facts are as follows: That in 1847 Joel Perkins occupied the premises, and prior to 1851 became a married man and a settler thereon under section 4 of the donation act of September 27, 1850 (9 Stat. 497), and prior to 1855 complied with the provisions of said act so as to entitle himself and wife to the grant thereof and died in 1856, intestate, and before the patent issued, leaving a widow, now living, and three children, two of whom, Harriet Jane and Joan Minnette, died in infancy and prior to April 14, 1877, and the commencement of this action; that Dan Hawn Perkins, the remaining one of said children, was born in 1854, and on April 14, 1877, did convey all his interest in the premises to the plaintiff.

This is the plaintiff's case; and upon this state of facts he is, as the successor in interest of said Dan Hawn, the owner of the undivided one half of the premises and entitled to the possession thereof. The settlement being made under section 4 of the donation act, and the settler having died intestate before the patent issued, the case falls within that provision of said section 4, which provides: "In all cases where such married persons have complied with the provisions of this act so as to entitle them to the grant, as above provided * * * and either shall have died before patent issues, the survivor and children or heirs of the deceased, shall be entitled to the share or interest of the deceased in equal proportions." 9 Stat. 497. Under this act upon the death of Perkins, his share of the donation was granted over to his widow and three children in equal parts, and upon the death of Harriet Jane and Joan Minnette, without issue, their interests, under subsection 3 of section 1 of the "Act to regulate the descent of real property," etc. (Laws Or. p. 547), descended to the surviving child, Dan Hawn, and the mother in equal parts, whereby they two became the equal owners of the premises.

But from the evidence introduced by the defendant it appears that on September 7, 1865, one Hank W. Allen, was, by the county court of Yamhill county, duly appointed guardian of the three minor children aforesaid, and then and there duly qualified as such; that on December 4, 1865, said guardian filed a petition, duly verified, in said county court, setting forth therein that his wards' estate consisted wholly of real property worth about eight thousand dollars, and that it was incumbered with a debt of eight hundred dollars, which the income of the property was insufficient to pay after supporting said wards, and praying for a license to sell enough of said real property to pay said indebtedness; that upon the filing of said petition said county court made an order fixing the hearing of the same on January 5, 1866, and directing notice thereof to be given to the next of kin, and others interested, and that said notice be published in the Oregon Statesman for four successive weeks, that said notice was duly published in said paper "for three consecutive weeks, to wit, from the week commencing December 18, 1865, to the week ending January 1, 1866;" that on January 5, 1866, said county court made an order licensing said guardian to sell in the manner provided by law certain portions of the real estate of said wards not exceeding one thousand dollars in value, to pay the debts aforesaid, including a portion in the north-west corner of said donation not to exceed one hundred and forty acres which portion includes the premises in controversy, and which order recites that the notice aforesaid to the next of kin and others interested had been duly published in the Oregon Statesman "for three successive weeks, ending January 1, 1866;" and that no one objected or appeared to show cause why said license should not be granted; that said guardian published due notice that said property would be sold "at public auction" on February 6, 1866, between the hours of 9 a. m. and 4 p. m., at the court-house door in Lafayette, in the Oregon Statesman aforesaid, a paper of general circulation in Yamhill county, for four consecutive weeks, to wit, from the week commencing January 8, 1866, to the week ending February 5, 1866, and before fixing the time and place of such sale, gave the bond and took the oath required by law from guardians licensed to sell the real property of their wards; that afterwards, on April 4, 1866, said guardian reported to said county court that on February 4, 1866, after giving legal notice of such sale by posting written notices thereof in four public places in Yamhill county, Oregon, four weeks prior thereto, and by publishing a similar notice in the Oregon Statesman of the time and place of sale as aforesaid, he offered the premises for sale at the court-house aforesaid, and there being no bids therefor did, by proclamation, then and there publicly postpone said sale until March 6, 1866, between the hours aforesaid, and that on the day last aforesaid, at the court-house aforesaid, he again offered the interests of his wards in the premises, the same being the undivided three fourths thereof, for sale at public auction, and then and there sold the same to the defendant for four dollars and seventy-five cents per acre, that being the highest and best bid therefor, and prayed that said sale be confirmed, whereupon said court made an order continuing said matter until its next regular term; that afterwards, on May 10, 1866, said county court on consideration of said report found that said guardian had given due and legal notice of the time and place of the sale of said premises "by publication and written posted notices as required by law," and sold them at public auction accordingly, at the court-house aforesaid in the county aforesaid to the defendant, he being the highest and best bidder for the sum of four dollars and seventy-five cents per acre, that being the fair value of the same, and thereupon ordered that said sale be confirmed, and that said guardian upon the payment of the sum bid in gold coin, convey to the defendant all the interest of his said wards in the premises, by metes and bounds, as therein described, which was duly done upon the day last aforesaid.

Upon these facts the defendant claims to have acquired the interests of the children of Joel Perkins, deceased, before the death of Harriet Jane and Joan Minnette, aforesaid, in the premises, and to be the owner of the same. On the contrary, the plaintiff insists that the proceedings in the guardian's sale are invalid, and therefore nothing passed by his deed to the defendant.

The objections made to the proceedings are: (1) The order setting the petition down for hearing does not find that the sale was "necessary;" (2) said order does not require any one to appear and "show cause why a license should not be granted;" (3) neither the petition, the said order, nor the citation contain any description of the premises; (4) there was no sufficient service of the citation by publication; and (5) there was no notice given of the time and place of sale.

In considering these objections it must be borne in mind that according to section 1 of article 7 of the Oregon constitution, as construed by the supreme court of the state in Tustin v. Gaunt, 4 Or. 306, the county court of Yamhill county, when exercising this jurisdiction over the lands of these minors, was a court of general jurisdiction, and therefore its proceedings and judgments are to be considered in the light of the rule that prevails in such cases—the jurisdiction is presumed until the contrary appears; and that where the record is silent, that which ought to have been done is presumed to have been done, and rightly done. Neff v. Pennoyer [Case No. 10,083]; Gray v. Larrimore [Id. 5,721]; Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 341.

The first of these objections is based upon the fact that the statute (Laws Or. p. 739, § 7), provides in effect that if it shall appear to the court from the petition of the guardian for license to sell the real estate of the ward, "that it is necessary, or would be beneficial to the ward," that the property or some part of it should be sold, it shall make the order for the next of kin, or those interested in the estate, to appear and show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, and upon the assumption that the court must not only have found that the sale was necessary, but that such finding must be stated in the order. Now, it is an elementary rule that the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction need not state that the facts or conclusions of fact upon which it is founded or authorized. Grignon's Lessee v. Astor; supra. This it is which primarily distinguishes it from the judgment of a court of inferior jurisdiction. That which is necessary to the judgment of such a court is presumed to have been shown to it, and found or determined by it. Civ. Code Or. § 726.

But it is to be observed that the statute does not absolutely require that it should appear to the court that the sale was necessary, it is sufficient if it appears that it would be beneficial. No question is made but what the petition is sufficient. It states the character and value of the wards' estate, and the amount of the indebtedness thereon, and that the income thereof is not sufficient to pay such indebtedness and maintain the wards. This makes a case of apparent necessity, and the court in making the order found, and stated therein, that it was "proper and reasonable" that the petition should be heard. Of course, it was not proper that the petition should be heard, unless it appeared therefrom, either that it was "necessary" or "beneficial" to the wards, that the prayer thereof should be granted.

It is also objected that the order is insufficient, because it does not require any one to appear and show cause why the license should not be granted. It is true that the order does not contain such a direction in so many words, but it does require that notice be given to the next of kin, and all others interested, to appear at a proper time and place, when and where said petition will be heard and determined. This, we think, is the substantial equivalent of the language of the statute (section 7, supra), "to show cause why a license should not be granted," etc. The only purpose of the statute is to provide for giving notice of the time and place of the hearing of the petition to those most likely to be interested in the welfare of the minors, so that, if need be, the petition may be contested by them. But the court can not compel any one to show cause against the petition, or say aught against its allowance. When it has directed notice to be given to the proper persons of the hearing of the petition, the statute is substantially complied with, although such direction and notice should not require them, in so many words, to show cause thereon. Indeed, it seems too plain for argument, that when the next of kin, and others interested, are duly notified to appear at the hearing upon a petition by a guardian to sell a minor's land, that such persons are thereby in effect required, notified, to appear and show cause, if need be, why the petition should not be granted.

The order is sufficient. As to the third objection: The statute (Laws Or. p. 739, § 6) provides that the petition for a sale by guardian shall set "forth the condition of the estate of his ward, and the facts and circumstances under which it is founded, tending to show the necessity or expediency of such a sale." Section 1 of the statute (Laws Or. p. 738) authorizes the sale of the ward's "real estate," whenever his income is insufficient to maintain him. Section 6, supra, authorizes the guardian to file a petition to obtain a license for such sale; that is, the real estate of the ward, the whole of it, if need be. Doubtless the petition may ask for the sale of a specific portion of the estate, and in such case the order of sale should not go beyond such portion. But there is nothing in the statute, or the nature of the case, that requires the guardian to petition for the sale of any specific portion of the real property. Except by a sale ordinarily it cannot be known what quantity of the estate must be disposed of to meet the particular exigency. Upon the hearing of the petition the court will ascertain whether it is necessary or expedient to sell the whole of the property, or only a portion of it, and order accordingly.

The fourth objection is based upon the fact that the order for a hearing upon the petition directs the notice to the next of kin and others to be published "for four successive weeks," while the proof of publication only shows that it was published three weeks. This, at least, is a serious irregularity; and if the jurisdiction of the court did not attach upon the filing of the petition, but until due service of the prescribed notice of the time and place of the hearing on the petition, the subsequent proceeding would be probably void. The county court being one of general jurisdiction, its authority to license and confirm this sale will be presumed unless the contrary appears. But in this case the contrary does appear, for it is shown by the record that the notice was not duly served, and therefore, so far as it depends upon this fact, it affirmatively appears that the court did not acquire jurisdiction. But the better opinion seems to be that the proceeding by a guardian to obtain a license to sell his ward's land is not one between adverse parties, and of which the court does not acquire jurisdiction until due service is made of the notice of the application, but rather a proceeding in the nature of one in rem carried on by and in the interest of the ward through his legal representative—the guardian. Mason v. Wait, 4 Scam. 133; Fitzgibbon v. Lake, 29 Ill. 177; Fitch v. Miller, 20 Cal. 381.

In Fitzgibbon v. Lake, supra, the court, in considering the question of what gives jurisdiction in such a case, cites with approval the following from Young v. Lorain, 11 Ill. 637: "They all agree that enough must appear in the application or the order, or at least somewhere on the face of the proceedings, to call upon the court to proceed to act; and all agree that when that does appear, then the court has properly acquired jurisdiction, or, in other words, is properly set to work."

Now, upon the filing of the petition by Allen—it being a sufficient one—the county court was called upon to proceed to act, to make an order prescribing what and how notice should be given to the next of kin and others. In Fitch v. Miller, supra, the court say: "In order to render the sale (a guardian's) effectual to confer a valid title, the probate court must have acquired jurisdiction of the case by the presentation of a proper petition by the guardian."

It follows, that when the county court of Yamhill county made the order directing the publication of the notice to the next of kin and others, and afterwards heard the petition upon a publication of such notice for a shorter time, it had acquired jurisdiction by the presentation of a proper petition—and this fact itself would be presumed in the absence of anything to the contrary—and therefore its judgment cannot be questioned collaterally on account of any errors it may have committed in the course of its subsequent proceedings. And for the same reason, the first three objections already otherwise disposed of cannot be made in this manner.

Besides, so far as this action is concerned, all the errors or irregularities so far considered are cured by the statute (Laws Or. p.

740, § 20), which provides that when the ward or any person claiming under him shall contest the validity of a guardian's sale "the same shall not be avoided on account of any irregularity in the proceedings; provided it shall appear: (1) That the guardian was licensed to make the sale by a county court of competent jurisdiction; (2) that he gave a bond that was approved by the county judge; (3) that he took the oath prescribed by statute; (4) that he gave notice of the time and place of sale as prescribed by law; and (5) that the premises were sold accordingly at public auction, and are held by one who purchased them in good faith."

This statute was enacted in the territorial times (December 16, 1863) with reference to such proceedings in the probate courts, and appears to assume, as I suppose the fact was, that they were not courts of general jurisdiction, but that the evidence of their jurisdiction and its lawful exercise must appear on the face of their proceedings, and therefore provides that their jurisdiction shall not be questioned collaterally except for some of the errors specified in the aforesaid five particulars. But the constitution of the state having conferred the probate jurisdiction on the county courts and declared them courts of general jurisdiction, their judgments in this respect, without this statute, could not be inquired into collaterally upon any of these grounds except the first—was the court that granted the license for the sale competent to do so?—in other words, had it jurisdiction of the subject? The effect of the statute was to limit the grounds upon which such proceedings in the probate courts could be attacked collaterally while its application to them in the county courts operates to enlarge the scope of such attack. Assuming what was taken for granted upon the argument, that the statute is applicable to the proceedings for the sale of a minor's land in the county court, the result is that the jurisdiction and lawfulness of the proceeding is not unqualifiedly presumed, but it must appear therefrom not only that the license was granted by a court of competent jurisdiction but that in the exercise of that jurisdiction, the matters and things specified in the last four of the particulars aforesaid were had or done. But as to any errors or irregularities in other respects the statute operates as an absolute confirmation of the sale when it declares in effect that the sale shall not be avoided on account of them. Therefore the first four of the plaintiff's objections to the validity of the sale, even if otherwise sufficient, are obviated by the statute. Neither of them come within the category of objections which the statute permits to be made in this action to the validity of the sale. It only remains to consider the fifth and last objection—that there was no notice of the time and place of sale.

This objection as to place is based upon the statute (Civ. Code Or. § 289) which provides that all sales of real property shall take place at the court-house door, and the fact that the notice only states that by virtue of a license from the Yamhill county court, the guardian will sell the premises at the court-house door in Lafayette, without expressly stating in what county. Being established by law, it is a matter of judicial cognizance that there is a county of Yamhill in Oregon, and that the place where its court-house is situated and its courts held is Lafayette. Prima facie, then, a sale made at the court-house door in Lafayette, in Oregon, was made in Yamhill county, Oregon, because there is no other Lafayette in Oregon which contains a court-house or is a county seat. We think the notice of the place of sale sufficient. The report of the sale, showing that the sale was made "accordingly," is still more explicit. It states that the premises were sold at the court-house door in Lafayette in said county, meaning Yamhill.

This objection, as to time, is based upon the fact that the sale was adjourned from February 6 to March 6, 1866, for want of bidders, instead of one week, as directed by statute. Laws Or. p. 739, § 12; Id. p. 329, § 1110; Id. p. 168, § 290. The statute provides that the guardian shall conduct the sale as upon an execution. In making a sale upon execution, the officer entrusted with the process may postpone the sale for want of purchasers or other sufficient cause, "not exceeding one week * * * and so on for like cause, giving notice of every adjournment by public proclamation made at the same time." Page 168, § 290.

In considering this objection, it may be well to premise, that but for the statute (section 20, subs. 4, 5, supra) the irregularity upon which it was predicated would be cured by the confirmation of the sale, and it could not now be used to avoid it. This was a sale upon a decree of a court acting as a court of probate, and proceeding substantially as a court of equity—what is called a "judicial sale," as distinguished from one made by a ministerial officer upon process to enforce the judgment of a court of law. In such a sale, the matter is under the direction of the court and the proceedings are reported to it for its approval. The purchaser is simply a preferred bidder, and the court may accept or refuse his bid. The sale is really made by the court—it is a part of the judicial proceedings in the case—and the decree of confirmation, when the court has acquired jurisdiction, is conclusive of the regularity of the intermediate proceedings. Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 546; Freem. Ex'ns, § 311; Blossom v. Railroad Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 207. This being the case, this statute limiting the general rule as to the effect of a confirmation of such a sale ought not to be construed with a view of enlarging its operation, but the contrary. Passed originally with a view of sustaining the proceeding for the sale of a minor's land in a court of inferior jurisdiction, in the mutations of government and tribunals, it has come to be applied to the same proceeding in a court of general jurisdiction, so as to materially modify the presumption in favor of its validity. The question, then, upon which this case must now turn is, was the guardian's sale made upon a notice of the time thereof as prescribed by law? It is admitted that due notice of the time of sale was given originally, but it is denied that the sale was made "accordingly." It is admitted that the guardian had the power to adjourn the sale from week to week for more than four weeks, but it is denied that he could do so at any one time for more than one week. But if a sale made at an adjourned day is nevertheless made upon or in pursuance of the original notice thereof, then this sale was made according thereto—that is, conformably to, and not contrary to such notice. If so, the irregularity of continuing the sale for four weeks by one adjournment rather than by four, does not vitiate the proceeding. We think this sale was made conformably to the original notice. The terms and place of sale were not changed. Such notice was the foundation of the proceedings, and the adjournment by the guardian for good cause prolonged it until the day appointed.

All persons who attended at the place of sale in February were then duly apprized by the public proclamation of the guardian that the sale was postponed until March, and thereby the publicity imparted to the transaction by the original notice, was continued to the time of sale. The time of the sale is primarily fixed by the notice, but may be postponed by the guardian. This power is inherent in his office, and although the statute has prescribed limits to its exercise, we do not think a single postponement for four weeks, rather than four postponements for four weeks, is such an irregularity as makes the sale not according to the notice as to time. In Richards v. Holmes 18 How. [59 U. S.] 147, a trustee was authorized to sell real property on thirty days' notice, published in a certain newspaper. At the time and place designated, the sale was adjourned for want of bidders. The court held the subsequent sale valid, because there was an implied power in the trustee to adjourn the sale, and because the sale, although made without any other than the first publication of the required notice was, "when made, in effect, the sale of which previous public notice was given."

A question was made on the trial as to the sufficiency of the description of the premises in the guardian's deed. But by reference to the survey introduced by the plaintiff, and the calls in the deed for the adjoining premises, we find no difficulty in locating the land.

We think that the defendant has the legal title to the premises, and there must be a finding accordingly.

GAINES v. AGNELLY et al.

[1 Woods, 238.] [1]

PLEADING IN EQUITY—39TH EQUITY RULE — MATTER IN BAR SET FORTH IN ANSWER — OLD PRACTICE—PLEA IN BAR—SUFFICIENCY.

1. The well known rule of chancery pleading, that if a defendant submits to answer, he shall answer fully to all matters of the bill, is abrogated, in cases where the defendant might by plea protect himself from such answer and discovery, and in his answer sets forth the matter of such plea as a bar to the merits of the bill, by the 39th rule in equity established by the supreme court of the United States.

2. Under the old equity practice, if a plea in bar was filed, and issue taken upon it, and that issue decided in complainant's favor, he was entitled to a decree without proving the allegations of his bill. If the same matters were set up in an answer, he was obliged to prove his bill; but in aid of such proof he was entitled to defendant's answer to the whole bill.

3. The new rule in equity practice (the 39th) which allows a defendant to set up a bar in his answer, and excuses him from answering further, still leaves the complainant under the burden of proving his bill, and takes from him the benefit of the defendant's answer; but the defendant is liable to be called as a witness in the cause.

4. Under the new rule in equity (39th), where the answer sets up a bar to the whole bill, and claims the benefit of it, as a plea in bar, it is no longer a ground of exception, that it does not fully answer the allegations of the bill.

5. If the bar set up in the answer and claimed as such be insufficient, or if it be unsupported by proper averments, or by a proper answer to rebut allegations of the bill repugnant to the bar, the complainant may except for insufficiency, set the cause down on bill and answer only, or file a replication and proceed to proofs according to the exigencies of the case.

6. If the bar set up in the answer be insufficient as such, the complainant would be entitled to except as for want of a full answer; and to avoid answering the exceptions, the defendant in such case would require leave of the court before he could amend the bar. If instead of excepting, the complainant should go to proof, the burden would be on him to prove his bill, and on the defendant to prove his bar; each being entitled to examine the other as a witness. If however, he should set the cause down for hearing on bill and answer only, the answer would have to be taken as true, and the bar therein as proved; and though insufficient as a defense, the complainant could not have a decree, unless the answer admitted the allegations of the bill on which the prayer for relief was founded.

[Cited in McClaskey v. Barr, 40 Fed. 563.]

7. If the bar set up in the answer is a sufficient defense to the whole relief sought by the bill, it is immaterial whether the defendant answer the allegations of the bill or not. He is not bound to answer them; and the rule no longer applies that if the defendant does answer at all, even on matters outside of the bar, he must answer fully.

8. A plea which alleges just title, good faith, the requisite period of possession, and that possession continued peaceful and without interruption, sets out all the circumstances which the laws of Louisiana require to exist as the basis of a prescription.

9. If a title be obtained in good faith, and under the honest belief that the author was the real owner of the property, it is prima facie sufficient to lay the foundation of a prescription in good faith; any information, knowledge or belief to the contrary, obtained since the possession commenced, cannot under the laws of Louisiana impair the efficacy of such possession as a ground of prescription.

In equity. Heard on exceptions to the answer.

E. T. Merrick and J. Q. A. Fellows, for complainant.

Miles Taylor and James McConnell, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The complainant [Myra Clark Gaines] excepts to the answer of the defendants in this case for insufficiency. She complains that they have not to the best of their knowledge, information, remembrance and belief answered and set forth the matters required to be answered by the bill, especially those which were called for by the special interrogatories annexed to the bill.

The complainant claims certain lands, mostly in the city of New Orleans, which she alleges were the property of Daniel Clark at the time of his decease in 1813, were by him devised to her by a will dated July 13, 1813, and have since been taken possession of by the defendants. The bill describes the lands, sets out the will and the probate thereof granted in 1855, and calls upon the defendants severally to show the particular portions of property claimed by them. The bill also states several pretenses which it is supposed will be set up by the defendants: as first, title derived under a sale of the land by Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, executors of Daniel Clark under a prior will made in 1811, which was revoked by the will of 1813, and as attorneys of Mary Clark, the mother of Daniel Clark, who was devisee under the will of 1811; and secondly, prescription; but the bill charges that the sale by Relf and Chew was unauthorized and void, and would appear to be so on the face of the proceedings; all which must necessarily have been known to the defendants when they purchased. The defendants are called upon, according to the best of their knowledge, information, remembrance and belief to answer: First. Whether the property described was not a part of the estate of Daniel Clark, of which he died seized? Second. Whether the defendants, severally, claim to be owners of any portion of it? and if so, what portion, and by what right? setting forth metes, bounds and titles. Third. How long the defendants have severally been in possession, and what revenue the property has yielded? Fourth. Whether they have sold any part? if so, what, and for what consideration? These are in substance the interrogatories annexed to the bill, and all the defendants are required to answer them. The bill prays for a discovery of all the matters alleged, that the defendants may be decreed to hold the property as trustees for the complainant, may account for the rents and profits, and for general relief. The answers on the point of Daniel Clark's ownership and seizin of the property described in the bill simply say in each case that the defendant has no knowledge whether said Daniel Clark did or did not hold the legal title thereto, and that therefore he cannot admit, but denies that Clark was seized or lawfully possessed of the same.

The answers then severally set forth and describe by metes and bounds the lands claimed by the defendants, with a statement of the immediate title of the defendants, making the answer and such antecedent acts of title from which the same was derived, as are sufficient to carry back the defendants' title far enough to set up prescription under the laws of Louisiana, with averments on information and belief, that the successive owners purchased in good faith, believing their vendors to be lawful owners of the property; and had continuous, uninterrupted and peaceable possession for the time requisite for the prescription pleaded. The answers further state that proceedings have been instituted in one of the state courts for a revocation of the probate of the will of 1813, under which Mrs. Gaines claims the property; that a decree of revocation has already been made in the court of first instance; and that an appeal from that decree to the supreme court has been taken and argued, and the case is now under the final consideration of that court; and the defendants claim that if the decree of revocation shall be affirmed, it will have the effect to deprive the complainant of all foundation of any right to the land claimed. And they pray that they may have the benefit of such decree if it shall be affirmed. They submit that they are not bound in law to make any other or further answer to any matter or thing contained in the bill.

The answers fail to state, except as it may impliedly appear from the descriptions given by streets and by metes and bounds, whether the lands claimed by the defendants were or were not portions of the land described in the complainant's bill, or whether the defendants have any information or belief on the subject; or whether they have any information or belief on the question, whether the lands claimed by them belonged to Daniel Clark's estate, or to the lands of which he died seized, as set forth in the bill. The defendants were required to answer fully on these points, not merely upon personal knowledge (which at this day they could not be expected to have), but upon their information and belief as well.

The defendants, however, to obviate the force of this objection, refer to the 39th rule in equity, established by the supreme court of the United States, by which the well known rule of chancery pleading, that if a defendant submits to answer he shall answer fully to all matters of the bill, is abrogated in cases where the defendant might by plea protect himself from such answer and discovery; and in his answer sets forth the matter of such plea as a bar to the merits of the bill. The 39th rule declares that in such answer the defendant shall not be compellable to answer any other matters than he would be compellable to answer and discover upon filing a plea in bar and an answer in support of such plea, touching the matters set forth in the bill, to avoid or repel the bar or defense. The defendants claim that prescription is such a bar, and that having set that up in their answer, they are excused from answering further.

Under the old practice if a plea in bar were filed, and issue taken upon it, and that issue were decided in the complainant's favor, he was entitled to a decree without proving the allegations of his bill. If the same matter were set up in an answer, he was obliged to prove his bill; but in aid of such proof he was entitled to defendant's answer to the whole bill. The new rule, which allows a defendant to set up a bar in his answer, and excuses him from answering further, still leaves the complainant under the burden of proving his bill, and takes from him the benefit of the defendant's answer. But this disadvantage is compensated for, in some degree, by the liability of the defendant to be called as a witness in the cause. Still, the general effect of the new rule being such as I have stated, it seems to be no longer a ground of exception, where the answer sets up a bar to the whole bill, and claims the benefit of it, as of a plea in bar, that it does not fully answer the allegations of the bill. If the bar set up and claimed as such be insufficient, or if it be unsupported by proper averments, or by a proper answer to rebut allegations of the bill repugnant to the bar, the complainant may except for insufficiency, set the cause down on bill and answer only, or file a replication and proceed to proofs, according to the exigency of the case. If the bar set up should be insufficient as such, I think the complainant would be entitled to except, as for want of a full answer, and to avoid answering the exceptions, the defendant, in such case, would require leave of the court before he could amend the bar set up in the answer. If, instead of excepting, the complainant should go to proofs, the burden would be on him to prove his bill, and on the defendant to prove his bar, each being entitled to examine the other as a witness. If, on the other hand, he should set the cause down for hearing on bill and answer only, the answer would have to be taken as true, and the bar therein as proved; and though insufficient as a defense, the complainant could not have a decree unless the answer admitted those allegations of the bill, on which the prayer for relief was founded. These are the general rules which seem to me to govern the pleadings in equity, as affected by the introduction of this new rule.

From this view of the subject, it is manifest that if the bar set up in the answer is a sufficient defense to the whole relief sought by the bill, it is immaterial whether the defendant answer the allegations of the bill or not. He is not bound to answer them, and the rule no longer applies, that if the defendant does answer at all, even on matters outside of the bar, he must answer fully. If that rule did apply, it would have the effect of converting the answer, in such a case, into a strict plea in bar. Any divergence of statement, any notice of the allegations of the bill outside of the strict line of the defense would be held a waiver of the bar, and would subject the defendant to the old burden of a full answer. I do not think that this would be a sound construction of the rule. If there are any authorities favoring this view, I should have been glad to have had a reference to them. As counsel has not produced any, I feel the greater confidence in the conclusions to which I have come.

The question then is, whether the bar set up is, by the laws of Louisiana, a sufficient defense, and whether it is sufficiently averred. And I do not understand the counsel of the complainant to contend that it is not. It seems to me that the bar is very fully and carefully drawn. It sets out all those circumstances which the laws of Louisiana require to exist as the basis of a prescription. Just title, good faith, the requisite period of possession, and that possession continued peaceably and without interruption. All these circumstances are fully alleged. And the defendant has also traversed the effect of the interruption of prescription resulting from the litigation referred to in the bill. How far the proofs, when taken, will sustain the defense, is another matter, with which the court has at present no concern. Whether, if the complainant shows that the title of the defendants really originated in a void sale and conveyance by the executors of Daniel Clark, it will affect the defense, on the point of good faith, is a question I do not decide. In the cases of Gaines v. Hennen and Gaines v. New Orleans, 24 How. [(65 U. S.) 553], and 6 Wall. [(73 U. S.) 642], the answers admitted that the defendants obtained their title through the sales made by Relf and Chew; and the supreme court held that the illegality of the proceeding was apparent, and constituted a vice in the title, which took from the vendees all pretense of being purchasers or possessors in good faith; and that the interruptions in the prescription prevented its becoming a bar on any other ground. But in this case, the defendants do not set up any claim of title under the executors of Daniel

Clark. They rely on certain titles, which they exhibit as just titles, and which they allege to have been obtained with good faith, and under the honest belief that the author was the real owner. This is, at least, prima facie, sufficient to lay the foundation of the prescription claimed. Any knowledge, information or belief, obtained since the possession commenced, to the effect that the property once belonged to Daniel Clark would not, as I understand the law of Louisiana, impair the efficacy of such possession, as a ground of prescription. The Code expressly says: "It is sufficient, if the possession has commenced in good faith; and if the possession should afterwards be held in bad faith, that shall not prevent the prescription." Article 3448. Therefore, the allegations in the bill, that the property once belonged to Daniel Clark, and that he died seized thereof, are not inconsistent with or repugnant to the plea of prescription. Hence, any present knowledge or belief of the defendants on those points is perfectly immaterial. Their claim by prescription is independent of those facts, and perfectly consistent with them. These allegations, therefore, do not belong to that class of allegations which it is necessary for a defendant to meet and deny in order to support and maintain his plea in bar.

Had the bill charged that the defendants claimed title to the lands in their possession under Relf and Chew, acting as executors of Daniel Clark, it might, perhaps, have been incumbent on the defendants to have cleared their possession of the imputation thus cast upon it. But no such charge is made in the bill. On the contrary, the bill expressly states that the complainant is ignorant of the title and claim of title by which the defendants severally hold; and calls upon the defendants to show their title. The defendants do show title sufficient to lay the foundation of a prescription; and on that defense they take their stand. It seems to me that they are not called upon to answer further. The bar set up is prima facie a good defense; and the exceptions must be overruled. As to the answers which the defendants have brought into court and now ask leave to file, I shall allow them to be filed as of the 6th of May instant, without prejudice to the complainant as to proceeding with proofs in the cause, and bringing it on for hearing.

As to those defendants who are in default and now apply for further time to answer, I shall grant a decree pro confesso against them, subject to this qualification and these terms, to wit: that during the taking of proofs in the cause, they shall be at liberty, severally, to file with the master or examiner and serve on the solicitor of the complainant, a description of the property which they claim, with the chain of title thereto extending back to the period at which the complainant claims it belonged to the estate of Daniel Clark; and to prove, if they can, a legal prescription for the same; subject also to this further qualification, that if, before the proofs are closed, the decree of the Second district court of the parish of Orleans, in the case of Joseph Fuentes v. Myra Clark Gaines [25 La. Ann. 85], revoking the will of Daniel Clark of 1813, be affirmed by the supreme court of Louisiana, the said defendants may have the benefit of said decree for what it may be worth, as if they had pleaded the same. Provided, however, that any further answers of said defendants which may be filed before the first day of June next, may be filed as of the 6th day of May instant, as are mentioned in reference to answers above allowed to be filed as of said day.

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. June, 1870.

TRUSTEES—POSSESSION OF LAND BY ADVERSE BUT DEFECTIVE TITLE — POSSESSION NOT IN GOOD FAITH—RENTS AND PROFITS—CONSTRUCTION OF PRIOR DECISION.

1. The decision of the supreme court of the United States in these cases did not authorize this court to enter a decree for complainant against defendants for the proceeds of lands which were in their possession, but which they had sold before the filing of the bills in these cases.

2. Where a party is in possession of lands, claiming under an adverse but defective title, without any fraud either of himself or his grantors, he cannot be held to be the trustee of the party holding the true title, nor if he has sold the lands, made to account for the proceeds of the sale to the true owner.

3. The decree of the supreme court in these cases found that the defendants were not possessors in good faith of the lands sued for. They were therefore liable for rents and profits, and were not entitled to compensation for their improvements.

These cases had been taken by appeal to the supreme court of the United States, and a decree was rendered by the court in December term, 1867 (see the opinion [Gaines v. New Orleans] 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 642), and a mandate was sent to this court. But Judge Durell having recused himself on account of interest, no decree had as yet been entered to carry out the mandate. The case came up on motion to enter the proper decree.

John A. Campbell, for complainant.
McConnell & Taylor, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. These cases are before us on mandates from the supreme court of the United States, and motion is made to enter the proper decrees, pursuant to said mandates. By reason of the explicit manner in which the views of the supreme court are expressed in its opinions, as found in Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 642, and in Gaines v. De la Croix, Id. 719, and in Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 553 (which last is adopted in the present cases), very little discretion is left to this court. Some questions, however, have been raised, which it is necessary now to determine.

First, the complainant [Myra Clark Gaines] claims a decree not only for the lands of which the several defendants were possessed at the time of filing the bills respectively, but for the proceeds of lands formerly belonging to Daniel Clark, which the defendants had previously possessed and sold before the filing of said bills. She claims to hold the defendants as trustees for her of the lands thus previously disposed of, and elects to receive the purchase money, instead of following the lands themselves.

This claim, I think, is untenable. The claim of the defendants is adverse to that of the complainant. There is no privity between them. They stand and have always stood at arm's length. The defendants claimed the lands to be theirs by one title; she claimed them to be hers by another. There was no privity or trusteeship between them. Had the defendants, by any fraudulent practice, or by the fraudulent practice of their grantors or predecessors (known to them), procured the legal title to the lands, then they might have been held as trustees, and if they had disposed of the same, especially to innocent purchasers, might have been made to respond for the proceeds thereof. In such case the lands themselves might have been placed beyond the complainant's reach, and the proceeds might have been the only fund to which the complainant could resort. But in the present case the defendants never acquired the title of the complainant, nor legal title at all, but a spurious title; and their conveyance of the lands has transferred no title to the vendees; but the lands still remain subject to the complainant's title and are recoverable by her in whosesoever hands they may be. The conveyance thereof by the defendants to third parties has not in the slightest degree had the effect to place any barriers or obstacles in the way of the complainant to their recovery. Her title remains perfect and unimpaired. Had the legal title been transferred, though subject to her right to avoid it, her election to take the proceeds would have confirmed that title in the possessor, and her remedy would have been exhausted. But her election in the present case does not extinguish her title to the lands. Being the legal title, it remains valid; and a further act on her part, by way of release or other conveyance, in addition to the act of election, would be necessary to effectuate justice. And to whom should such release or conveyance be made? The persons that would have been entitled thereto have not been made parties to the suit; and the court does not know who they are, and can give no directions on the subject. And if they had been made parties, the difficulty would not have been surmounted; because they can never be converted into trustees for her by claiming a title paramount to hers without any actual fraud on their part.

The cases in which a person entitled to the possession of personal property has been allowed to waive his right to the specific property, or to damages for its detention, and to sue the wrongful appropriator thereof for the price of it, as upon a sale, do not bear upon the point in question. For a recovery either of damages for the detention or of the price as for a sale, changes the title of the property, and is itself an election to have the money instead. And the cases of Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 619; Hallett v. Collins, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 174; Oliver v. Piatt, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 333, Jenkins v. Eldridge [Case No. 7,266], and the other authorities, relating to real estate, referred to by counsel for the complainant, as far as I have been able to examine them, do not conflict with the views now presented.

The decrees, therefore, should be confined in each case to the lands of which the parties respectively, either by themselves or their tenants, were, or claimed to be, in possession at the time of filing the bill. As to lands which they may have possessed prior to that time, they are only liable for the rents and profits or fruits whilst thus in possession. In fact, the bill is nothing but what is sometimes called an ejectment bill, and this court has jurisdiction of the case only on the ground of discovery, and the complainant should be satisfied to recover what she could have recovered in an action of ejectment, or the equivalent action under the laws of Louisiana.

The next question relates to the accountability of the defendants for the rents and profits or fruits of the lands possessed by them respectively. The defendants contend that they are not liable for these, because they were possessors in good faith; or if liable at all, they are entitled to compensation for their improvements; and they rely on those provisions of the Code which declare: (1) The possessor in good faith is he who has just reason to believe himself the master of the thing which he possesses. Article 3414. (2) Every possessor has a right to gather, for his benefit, the fruits of the thing, until it is claimed by the owners, without being bound to account for them, except from the time of the claim for restitution. Article 3416. (3) He has also the right in case of eviction from the thing reclaimed, to retain it till he is reimbursed the expenses he may have incurred on it. Id. Whatever might be the views of this court on this point, were it open before us for discussion, is of no consequence. It seems to be entirely covered by the judgment of the supreme court.

To understand that judgment, it is necessary to premise that the lands in dispute belonged to Daniel Clark at the time of his death in August, 1813; that the said Clark left behind him a will dated in 1811, making Richard Relf and Beverley Chew his executors, and Mary Clark, his mother, his general legatee, which will was admitted to probate; that this was not his last will, but that he made another will shortly before his death, in which he acknowledged the complainant to be his legitimate and only daughter, and made her his universal legatee, giving to his mother an annuity, and to other persons certain legacies, and making Francois Duseau De la Croix, James Pitot and Joseph D. D. Bellechasse, his executors; that this will was suppressed, and did not, nor did her paternity come to the knowledge of the complainant till about 1834, when she applied for probate of said will, which was at first refused; that nevertheless, probate was granted in December, 1855; and this suit was therefore commenced in December, 1856. That, in the mean time, in or about 1820, Relf and Chew, claiming to act as executors of the will of 1811, and as attorneys of Mary Clark, the legatee under it, but without any authority from the proper court, undertook by action and private sale, to sell the lands of Daniel Clark, and did sell the same to various purchasers, from whom, mediately or immediately, the defendants claim title to the lands. That even after the complainant came of age, and discovered her paternity, and the fact that her father had made the will of 1813, she commenced various suits to recover the said lands, both against the city of New Orleans and others, and her claim became universally known.

These suits met with various fortune, but finally, in the case of Gaines v. Hennen, reported in 24 How. [65 U. S.] 553, a decree was made in the supreme court of the United States, which has been reaffirmed and adopted by the same court in this case, and which it is necessary to examine in order to understand fully the form and effect of the decree to be entered now. It seems to me that the decree of the supreme court in the case of Hennen thus reaffirmed and adopted in these cases, has fully answered the question as to the claim of good faith on the part of defendants, as bearing both on the matter of rents and profits, and on the matter of reclamation for improvements.

The decree in the Hennen Case declares: "That the said Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, at the time and times when, under the pretended authority aforesaid, they caused the property so described and claimed by the defendant, Hennen, to be set up and sold by public auction, on the 19th day of December, 1820, and when they executed their act of sale aforesaid, of the 28th of December, 1820, to the said Azelie Lavigne, had no legal right or authority whatever so to sell and dispose of the same, or in any manner to alienate the same; that the said sale at auction, and the said act of sale to Azelie Lavigne in confirmation thereof, were wholly unauthorized and illegal, and are utterly null and void; and that the defendant Hennen, at the time when he purchased the property so described and claimed by him as aforesaid, was bound to take notice of the circumstances which rendered the actions and doings of the said Beverly Chew and Richard Relf, in the premises, illegal, null and void; and that he, the said Hennen, ought to be deemed and held, and is hereby deemed and held to have purchased the property in question, with full notice that the said sale at auction, under the pretended authority of the said Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, and their said act of sale to said Azelie Lavigne were illegal, null and void, and in fraud of the rights of the person or persons entitled to the succession of the said Daniel Clark." The court further decreed that the complainant was justly and lawfully entitled to the property claimed and held by Hennen, together with all the yearly rents and profits accruing from the same from the time he went into possession, and they remanded the cause to this court with directions: (1) To cause Hennen to surrender all the property claimed and held by him into the hands of complainant. (2) To cause an account to be taken of the yearly rents and profits accrued and accruing from the property since it came into Hennen's possession, and to be paid to the complainant; such account to be taken subject to the laws of Louisiana in cases of such recovery, as is now decreed in favor of the complainant. Such was the decree in the Hennen Case.

In the case now before us, the supreme court, in their opinion, say that the sales made by Relf and Chew (under whose conveyance the defendants claim title), whether made as executors or as attorneys of Mary Clark, were void and conveyed no title [Gaines v. New Orleans] 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 711, 712; and after adverting to the fact that the defendants say they are purchasers in good faith for value without notice, or have acquired titles from those who were, add (page 816): "We cannot see, in view of the discussion already given to this case, how this plea can be true, but as it cannot avail the defendants, if true, it is unnecessary to discuss the evidence further in order to ascertain whether it is true or false. For the question at issue is only on the legal title."

The court further hold that the plea of good faith can only aid the defendants on the plea of prescription. They then add: "But the title of the complainant is not barred by prescription, according to the law of Louisiana. This defense was made in the case of Gaines v. Hennen [supra], and disposed of adversely to the defendant, and is no longer an open question in this court. The description relied upon by the defendants in this case is the same that was relied upon by the defendant in that, and as the proofs are common to both, it follows, as the plea of prescription was not available in the one, it is not in the other." The court, in conclusion, say: "The questions of law and fact applicable to those rights (the rights of the complainant) were determined in the case of Gaines v. Hennen. After argument by able counsel, and mature consideration, we have reaffirmed that decision." Thus, taking the opinion and decree of the supreme court in the Hennen Case, and their opinion in these cases, together, it is very manifest that the supreme court have adjudged against the plea of good faith set up by the defendants.

It is true that, in this case, the court, considering the legal title as the question involved, seem to regard the fact of good faith, except as bearing on the question of prescription, as not material; but they also, in conformity with the views expressed in Gaines v. Hennen, say that they do not see how the plea of good faith can be true, and they expressly adopt the decision in that case against the plea of prescription in reference to which they admit that the plea of good faith is pertinent, and I also understand them to adopt the definitive decree made in that case, which awards rents and profits to the complainant and against the defendant. And this (as we have seen from the Code) could not be done if the defendants were purchasers in good faith. The whole effect of their decision, therefore, is against the plea of good faith for any purpose whatever.

The judgment is that the titles attempted to be created and passed by Relf and Chew were bad—not only bad, but void—and that the defendants, claiming under and through them, ought to have known it. This judgment we are bound to carry out. We cannot inquire whether it is right or wrong. We are to presume that all the questions involved in it were duly and fully discussed, as we have no doubt they were.

The decrees presented to me seem to be in conformity with the views and mandate of the supreme court except that against the city of New Orleans, which will be so modified as to embrace only the lands which were in possession of the city at the time of filing the bill in this case.

GAINES v. LIZARDI et al.

FUENTES et al. v. GAINES.

[3 Woods, 77;[1] 9 Chi. Leg. News, 305.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1877.

PRESCRIPTION—ACTIONS FOR THE NULLITY OF TESTAMENTS IN LOUISIANA—OPENING AND PROVING WILL—REQUIREMENTS AS TO OLOGRAPHIC WILL—POSSESSORS IN GOOD FAITH.

1. Article 3540 of the Civil Code of Louisiana, which declares that actions for the nullity of testaments are prescribed in five years, refers to actions brought against parties who are in possession under a will, and has no application to a suit in which a will is relied on as a muniment of title by a party out of possession.

2. Articles 942, 943, La. Code Pr., prescribing what the proces verbal required to be made at the opening and proving of a will shall contain, do not, with the exception of that provision which relates to the order for executing and recording a will, apply to wills which are lost.

3. Where the proof showed that an olographic will was written, dated and signed by the testator, and bore date of some day in a designated month, but did not show of what particular day, this established sufficiently a compliance with the requirement of the Civil Code, that an olographic will shall be entirely written, dated and signed by the testator.

4. A discussion of the evidence to establish the fact that Daniel Clark duly executed a will in the year 1813, whereby he instituted his daughter, Myra Clark, as his universal legatee.

5. Discussion of the evidence to rebut the presumption that Daniel Clark destroyed said will, arising from the fact that it could not be found after his death.

6. Parties who claimed title to property of the estate of Daniel Clark, derived under his will executed in 1811, could not, in a suit brought by the universal legatee under his will executed in 1813, be considered as possessors in good faith and entitled to plead the prescription of ten years.

[In equity. These were suits by Myra Clark Gaines against M. J. Lizardi and others, and seven other suits by the same complainant against divers defendants, and by Joseph Fuentes and others against Myra Clark Gaines.]

Heard upon the pleading and evidence for final decrees. In the case of Fuentes v. Gaines, the complainants sought a revocation of the probate of the will of Daniel Clark, known as the "Will of 1813." In the other cases Mrs. Gaines, as complainant, set up title claiming as universal legatee of Daniel Clark, under his said will, executed in 1813, to real estate in the city of New Orleans, in possession of and claimed by the defendants respectively, charged them as trustees, prayed for discovery, and for a decree establishing her title and putting her in possession. By agreement of parties the cases were all argued and decided together.

W. R. Mills, for Myra Clark Gaines.

James McConnell, for Joseph Fuentes, complainant in the last named case, and for the defendants in the other cases.

BILLINGS, District Judge. The full argument of counsel, occupying seventeen entire days and an examination of the records, have satisfied me that the various decisions rendered by the supreme court of the United States have concluded me upon very many of the questions of law which have been presented. I shall first consider the suit for the revocation of the probate of the will.

The supreme court of the United States in their opinion pronounced in this case (Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10), in order to determine whether it was removable from the state to the United States court, has defined its nature and has characterized it as follows: "The action cannot be treated as properly instituted for the revocation of the probate, but must be treated as brought against the devisee by strangers to the estate to annul the will, as a muniment of title and to restrain the enforcement of the decree by which its validity was established, so far as it affects their property."

It is a suit which was instituted as an adjunct and means of defense to the numerous other suits for the recovery of real estate in which the complainant rested her title upon a will, the substantial allegation being that the will was admitted to probate upon false and insufficient testimony. It has now been cumulated with these other actions. It is therefore to be viewed and tried as if it were a pleading in these other actions, presenting the issue devisavit vel non. It presents the broad question, was there a will, unfettered by the restrictions of the Code relating to actions to annul the probate of wills? Before considering the cause upon the merits, I will dispose of the plea of prescription of five years. Civ. Code, art. 3540 (3505), provides as follows: "That actions for the nullity or revision of contracts, testaments or other acts are prescribed by five years."

I think this article refers to actions brought against parties who are in possession under a will, and that it has no application to a will invoked as here, by a party out of possession as a muniment of title against those in possession not claiming under the same will, and that whenever by and against such parties a will is relied upon to establish a link in the chain of title it may be attacked. I think, therefore, the plea should be overruled.

The other exception, viz., that the plaintiffs (complainants), Fuentes et al., could not maintain their actions, as strangers to the estate of Daniel Clark, is disposed of by the fact that in the supplemental petition they claimed to have derived title from Relf and Chew, executors, or as attorneys in fact of Myra Clark, universal legatee, under the will of Daniel Clark, known as the "Will of 1811;" and by the further fact that the consideration of this case with the others renders the petition or bill of complaint in this action in effect a plea interposed in the others, which may be termed direct actions.

This brings me to the question: Was there, according to the evidence presented before me, a will? Has the will of 1813 been established before me as an instrument executed by Daniel Clark, and clothed with the requisite formalities of a last will and testament according to the laws of Louisiana? It is urged by the complainants, Fuentes and others: 1. That the proces verbal which entitles this will to be received as a probated will is wanting. 2. That the will as probated is not shown to have been dated, and thus does not, in that respect, comply with the requirements of the law in respect to olographic wills. 3. That the evidence disproves, or fails to prove, that such a will ever existed; and, 4. That if such a will was ever executed, since it was not found after the death of the testator, the presumption of law is, that it was destroyed by the testator animo cancellandi, and that this presumption has not been rebutted by the proofs.

1. As to the absence of the proces verbal. Articles 492, 493, Code Pr., give the textual provisions of the law as to what the proces verbal shall contain; but it is clear they cannot, with the exception of that provision which relates to the order for executing and recording the will, apply to wills, which, as in this case, are lost.

The reasoning of the supreme court of Louisiana, and their decree in which they order the recording and execution of this identical will without any such proces verbal, and when in the nature of things no such recital as is pointed out in the requirements of the Code of Practice before referred to could exist, is an authoritative decision upon the law of Louisiana on this point. Succession of Clark, 11 La. Ann. 125. Judge Lee, sitting as a probate judge, while finding the proofs sufficient to establish the will, decreed against its being admitted to probate on the ground that the proof was not, in manner and form, such as the statute required. There was, therefore, no probate of the will in the lower court, but on appeal the supreme court reversed the decree and ordered the will executed. What they did in that case is a practical construction of the law upon the point as to how a lost will may be probated, and of its admissibility when so probated.

The second objection: "That the will is not shown to have been dated." Article 1588 (1581), Civ. Code, declares "an olographic will shall be enirely written, dated and signed by the hand of the testator." On this point of date the testimony adduced before me is precisely the same as that before the supreme court of Louisiana at the time the will was probated. They found it sufficient —that is—they must have found that the will was dated; that the year, month and date were written by the testator.

Again, the two witnesses who read the will were Mrs. Smythe and Mr. Bellechasse. Mrs. Smythe, at page 141, probate record, in answer to the twenty-sixth interrogatory, says: "The whole of this will was in Mr. Clark's handwriting; it was dated and signed by Mr. Clark at the time I read it." At page 143, in answer to the thirty-second interrogatory, she says: "It was dated in July, 1813." Bellechasse, at page 162, probate record, says in answer to interrogatory twelve:

"The last will of Clark, to wit, the will of 1813, was legal in form because it was written wholly in his (Clark's) handwriting, and was dated and signed by him." These witnesses both testify that the will was dated, and one of them adds, "it was dated in July, 1813." The fair meaning of their language is that it bore the year, month and day; and the meaning of the language of Mrs. Smythe, that it bore date on a particular day of July, Anno Domini 1813.

If a jury had found a special verdict that the will bore date on some day in July, 1813, though they did not specify what day, so long as being in July, left it the last will of Clark, would not a court be bound to give judgment that the will was dated? And the testimony of these two witnesses, uncontradicted, is on this point equivalent to a special verdict. It is proven that the will bore date on some one of the days in July, 1813, and this is sufficient.

The third objection, that the evidence disproves, or fails to prove, that this will ever existed; and, fourth, that if it was ever executed, since it was not found after the death of the testator, the presumption of law is that it was destroyed by him for the purpose of canceling, and that this presumption has not been rebutted.

The testimony which has been read before me is in almost all respects identical with that adduced before the supreme court of Louisiana (Succession of Clark, 11 La. Ann. 125, 126, 127), and is there stated with clearness and fairness by Judge Lee and by the supreme court, as follows:

"In looking for the testimony which might solve the question whether such a will had ever been executed or not, a reasonable inquirer would naturally turn for information to those who were most with the deceased in the latter part of his life, and especially (if they could be found) to those who were with him in the last moments of his existence, when the hand of death was on him. Such witnesses, if they had no interest in diverting his property into any particular channel, might be considered as the best and most reliable that could be produced, and it appears to be precisely testimony of this character that the petitioner presents in support of her application.

"It appears that Boisfontaine had business relations with the deceased, which brought him into frequent intercourse with him, and that for the last two days of his life, and up to the moment of his death, he was with him; that De la Croix and Bellechasse were intimate personal friends, and that they were with him shortly before his death. Now, these witnesses all concur in stating that Clark said he had executed a will posterior to that of 1811. They also testify that within a few months prior to his death he was making arrangements for the disposal of his property by a last will. He called on De la Croix to get his consent to act as executor, and also as tutor to his daughter Myra, expressing his intention of making a generous provision for her in his will. De la Croix further states that Clark afterwards presented to him in his (Clark's) cabinet a sealed packet which he declared to be his last will, informing him at the same time that in case of his death it would be found in a small black trunk which he had there.

"Boisfontaine, who was with Clark when he died, says that Clark in his last illness spoke of executing his last will; said it was to be found in a room down-stairs in a small black trunk; that he had left the greater portion of his property to his child, Myra; that Bellechasse, De la Croix and Pitot were to be his executors, and that about two hours before he died he instructed his confidential servant, Lubin, that in case of his death the small black trunk above referred to was to be delivered to De la Croix, and enjoined on him, as soon as he (Clark) was dead, to be sure and take it to him. He stated that Clark expressed his satisfaction that he had provided for his daughter Myra, leaving her all his estate, and that De la Croix had consented to act as her tutor. He also states that he was present about fifteen days before Clark's death, when Clark took from the small black case a sealed package and presented it to De la Croix, stating that it was his last will, recapitulating some of its provisions, and reminding him of his promise to act as tutor to his daughter. He further states that several persons, shortly before Clark's death, had seen the will, and corroborated Clark's statement as to its contents, and that Judge Pitot, Lynd, the notary, the wife of William Harper and Bellechasse were among the persons referred to." "Now," the judge a quo proceeds, "I think there can be no doubt, setting aside the testimony of Bellechasse and Mrs. Wm. Harper, that Clark did execute a will shortly before his death; that the principal object of making this will was to recognize as his daughter the present applicant, and to make suitable provision for her; that the executors of this will were Pitot, Bellechasse and De la Croix, and that De la Croix was appointed tutor of his daughter Myra; that this will must have been in existence until death, if not after that event, and that Clark within a very short time previous to Clark's himself died believing it was in existence.

"That such was the opinion of De la Croix himself at the time, is evident from the fact that twenty-four hours had scarcely elapsed after the probate of the will of 1811, before he made oath that he verily believed that Daniel Clark had made a testament posterior to that of 1811, and its existence was known to several persons, and he accordingly applied for and obtained an order of the court commanding every notary in the city to declare whether such document had been deposited with him."

If the foregoing facts may be considered as proved, independent of the testimony of Bellechasse and Mrs. Wm. Harper, the additional testimony of these last named witnesses, with reference to the form of the execution of the will and its contents, will rest upon a basis of probability, which must strengthen if it does not anticipate the conviction of its truth, for it is to be remembered that Clark knew how to draw an olographic will in due form, having already done so in the execution of a previous will, and knowing what was necessary to its validity it would be improbable in the extreme that he would omit any of the few necessary formalities.

When Bellechasse and Mrs. Harper, therefore, testify directly to the execution of the will, and having been written, dated and signed in the proper handwriting of the testator, they testify to the existence of facts which are, at least, probable, and upon the assumption that the will was executed, are matters approaching to certainty independent of their testimony; so with regard to the appointment of executors, of the tutor, and of the general dispositions of the will described in the petition.

They state that Clark did what he told others he intended to do, and what, from the whole tenor of his conduct, it was very probable he would do.

It does appear, however, that all the contents of the will as sworn to by Mrs. William Harper, are also sworn to by Bellechasse, and though the testimony of the latter does not contradict that of the former, but confirms it, yet his testimony does not relate to any portions of the will, except such as relate to its form, the institution of his daughter as universal legatee, and the appointment of De la Croix, Pitot and Bellechasse as executors. Indeed, the examination of witnesses does not appear to have been conducted with any reference to a detailed description of the will.

They, however, both state distinctly that they read the will; that it was wholly written, dated and signed by Clark; that he thereby instituted Myra Clark, his daughter, his universal legatee, and appointed De la Croix, Pitot and Bellechasse his executors. From an examination of the whole testimony, and considering the conduct of the deceased, his repeated declarations up to the very day of his death, together with his anxiety to make ample provision for his daughter, the judge of the lower court adds: "I feel satisfied that the legal presumption (which in the case of a lost will would necessarily exist) that it was destroyed or revoked by the testator, must be considered as satisfactorily rebutted."

In addition to the statement of facts and conclusions in regard to them of the judge of the lower court, it may be remarked that De la Croix states that the indorsement upon the will which he saw sealed up was in these words. "Pour être ouvert en cas de mort." This indorsement does not appear in the will of 1811, and the will which he saw was doubtless the will of 1813.

The chief testimony offered by the complainant Fuentes in addition to that which is there offered, is the testimony of Mazureau's probate record, page 432, and the answers of Relf and Chew. Mazureau's letter, cannot, in my opinion, be received as evidence. It is simply a statement in writing of a person not a party to, or a witness in these causes or in any cause, and not under oath, and I know of no principle of evidence upon which it is admissible. The answers of Relf and Chew are an emphatic denial, but they do not outweigh the force of the direct and circumstantial evidence in favor of the execution of this will. In this connection I will consider the testimony of Mr. Brown, which is urged to invalidate that of Mrs. Smythe, and the letter of Bellechasse to Mr. Cox, as tending to show uncertainty in his recollection of the terms of the will. Mr. Brown testifies that Mrs. Smythe visited in his family during the summer after Mr. Clark's death; that she spoke often and most particularly about his death and estate, and never referred to the will of 1813. If these statements are to be considered as properly in evidence, they are to be considered as urged against the witness, to whose attention they were never called, and who, therefore, never had an opportunity to explain, or by other testimony rebut them. Mrs. Smythe was evidently attached to Myra, now Mrs. Gaines, whom she had suckled, and may have considered that there was no good then to be derived by her in speaking of the will; or, what is equally possible, she may have made reference to it which was not understood or was forgotten by Mr. Brown. A number of witnesses attest her entire respectability and credibility, and taking Brown's testimony in the most favorable light, it does not necessarily contradict and cannot avail to materially weaken the testimony of a disinterested witness, clearly intelligent, and proved by numerous witnesses to be trustworthy.

As to the letter of Bellechasse to Mr. Cox, probate record, page 855, vol. 1, he is recorded as saying: "I was one of his executors, as well as Messrs. Relf, De la Croix and Pitot." Thus adding Relf to the executors whom he and Mrs. Smythe say were named in the last will. But in the next sentence, with reference to his avowal of having received a conveyance of fifty-one lots in secret trust for Myra, now Mrs. Gaines, he uses the same names and in the same order. This all appears as a translation, the French original having mysteriously disappeared. Now, it is quite possible that either in writing out the translation of the letter, the copyist may have fallen into the error of using all the three names in both collocations, though in the first, that of Relf might not have stood in the original, or in the original letter, if, as Bellechasse states, he wrote through an amanuensis and by dictation; the name of Relf may have by mistake slipped in in one of the collocations, although the writer never designed it to be there, and never observed that it was there.
