Now, as to Bellechasse, with the exception of this letter to Cox, there is nothing in the record to impugn or qualify what he says; his language and ideas throughout are those of an earnest, chivalrous man, who is entirely sincere. There is a further fact, that upon the death of Clark he avowed that the fifty-one lots of ground had been placed in his name in secret trust for Clark's daughter, now Mrs. Gaines. It seems to me that he appears not only as an unimpeached, but as a thoroughly upright witness, and I have never read testimony which has impressed me as uttering more frankly the truth.

I think, then, that the testimony of Mrs. Smythe and that of Bellechasse is unshaken, and they establish the will. But they are not alone. De la Croix himself was a witness in favor of the second will, though subsequently he sought to vary his testimony. On page 78 of the probate record, he says: "Clark, some months previous to his death, asked me to become tutor to Myra;" that a month or two after this conversation he, deponent, called to see Clark, who had his house on the Bayou road; he found him in his cabinet; he had just sealed up a packet, the superscription on which was as follows: "Pour être ouvert en cas de mort;" that Clark threw it down in presence of deponent and told him that it contained his last will and some other papers which would be of service.

It is to be observed, as the supreme court of Louisiana noticed, this superscription effectually proves that this envelope must have contained a will other than that of the will of 1811. The testimony of Boisfontaine, at page 79 of the probate record, states that Clark, in his last illness spoke to him about his last will and testament, and told deponent that he had left the greater part of his property to his child, Myra, and that he had made a disposition in his last will to that effect. He says Clark always told him (deponent) that Myra was his daughter; that he loved her, and would leave her all that he could as a father. It is to be observed that Bellechasse's testimony, at page 162 of the probate record, in reply to the 12th cross-interrogatory, states that Judge Pitot, the judge of the court of probate, at New Orleans, examined the will after it was finished. Mrs. Marian Rose Davis, at page 167 of the probate record, in answer to the 19th interrogatory, says, "When we were about to depart from Louisiana in 1812, Mr. Clark said that she, Myra, would be his heir; that he intended to leave his estate to her. He spoke in terms of great affection and pecuniary ambition about her, and again said that he should leave her all his estate; his ambition was stimulated to make her very rich." Again, in answer to the 21st interrogatory, "He spoke of her as his heir, and in speaking of her education said, he wished her educated in a manner suitable to take in society the standing of the heir of his estate."

Samuel B. Davis, page 172, in answer to the twelfth interrogatory, says: "Mr. Clark always did manifest the warmest affection and deepest interest towards his daughter; he has repeatedly told me that he intended to leave her his property, and I never doubted that he was entirely sincere." To the eighteenth interrogatory, on the same page, he says: "I heard him (Clark) on all occasions express himself in favor of her (Mrs. Gaines) as his daughter and heir; it was an everyday conversation when we met." In answer to the twenty-first interrogatory, at page 173, he says: "It was impossible for any father to have manifested more solicitude and affection than he did. In my last interview with Mr. Clark his conversation turned almost exclusively on the subject of his child; it was then that I received the instructions relative to her education, about which he seemed to be very solicitous, and about the place he wished her to take in society when she arrived at the years of maturity."

Wiliam Miller, at page 179 of the probate record, says, in answer to the twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth points: "That Clark frequently expressed much affection for the said child Myra, and stated that he intended to make ample provision for her as one of his heirs."

If human testimony can establish a fact, it is here proved by overwhelming evidence that it was the settled purpose of Clark to make Myra his heir by his last will; that for some reason, probably that stated by the supreme court in 24 How. [65 U. S.] 553 and 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 642, he did not, during his life-time, wish publicly to acknowledge her as his child, or admit the marriage with her mother, but that to all his friends he admitted that she was to be his heir. Now, can any reason be suggested why Daniel Clark, when the shadows of death gathered around him, should have changed his purpose to do this late justice to a daughter to whom he was so devotedly attached, and from whom he had withheld the enjoyment of the rights to which, as his child, she was entitled? It seems to me not. It seems to me that as his years advanced his attachment to his child and his purpose to provide for her by his last will, as was natural, continued to increase. Now, when we add to this the clear and undisputed testimony of Mrs. Smythe and Bellechasse as to the terms of this will, that it was a will made in Myra's interest, and precisely such a one as a father, with the settled purpose that the other witnesses testify he avowed to them with reference to her, would have made, that we have here conclusive testimony not only of his purpose to make this will, but that he did make it. And this testimony is drawn from precisely the sources where we would have supposed that it would be found to exist, viz., from the intimate friends of the testator.

I think if human testimony can establish the execution of this will, it is found in this record, and that an olographic will, such as is claimed by Mrs. Gaines, to have existed was made, written, signed and dated by her father, Daniel Clark. This brings me to the last question of fact, with reference to the will.

The will not being found after his death, is the presumption of law overcome by the evidence in this case? Is it proved that the will existed up to and after the death of Clark? It does not seem to me to be necessary to conclude that Relf destroyed it. Clark may have deposited it with some person who never produced it. What does the evidence show as to the continuance of its existence up to the time of his death? The mind of any one familiar with the evidence in this case, it being established by irrefragable testimony that he had made the will of 1813, would be reluctant to believe that a father who had by a last will given all his property to an only daughter, who from the reason probably that the acknowledgment of the marriage with her mother would have interfered with his personal ambition, had during his life time withheld such an acknowledgment from the public; had, in fact, lived a two-fold life, one part of which was necessarily inconsistent with the other, but who had centered upon this daughter all the affection which a father was capable of feeling, I say the mind of such a one would reluctantly receive the conviction that he had, without any change in his circumstances, and without any reason assigned or assignable, upon his death-bed, changed his plan and left his daughter penniless, excepting the provision which he had made for her through Bellechasse. I do not say that the presumption arising from these central facts in Clark's life would in law be sufficient to show that the will of 1813 survived him; but I do say that they prepare the mind to find in the record the testimony which will establish that fact. Such testimony is found in the statement of Boisfontaine. Boisfontaine, at pages 79 and 80, says that he was with Clark during the last two days of his life—he never left his bedside, and that during his last hours he spoke of this will and of the gratification it gave him that by means of it he had provided for his daughter. What more natural than this? What more credible? And it is testified to by a witness who is uncontradicted, excepting by a circumstance which has been attempted to be drawn from the testimony of De la Croix. De la Croix was made the tutor of Myra in the will of 1813, as well as one of the executors. De la Croix, in his testimony in the case known as No. 122, at page 536, states in substance, that the day before Clark's death he called at his house and had an interview with him; that nothing was said about the will of 1813.

The argument has been pressed with great force by the solicitors for Fuentes et al., that if Clark then had the will he would have delivered it to De la Croix, and I am asked to infer from the silence of Clark in this interview on the subject of the will, that it had ceased to exist. The conclusive answer to that argument is that whatever that interview was, it had not, in De la Croix's mind, destroyed, or at all shaken his belief that Clark had left the will of 1813 in existence at the time of his death, for at page 11 of the probate record, he presented to the judge of probate a petition sworn to by himself, in which he stated that he had strong reasons to believe, and did verily believe, that there was a subsequent will to that of 1811, whose existence was well known by several persons, and asked that the notaries of New Orleans be subpoenaed to see if they could not produce the duplicate of this last will—that is, the will of 1813. It is clear from this affidavit made within a day or two, or a few days after the death of Clark, that De la Croix not only believed that the will of 1813 survived Clark, but that it was executed in duplicate, and the clear implication is that he believed that one of these duplicate copies had been destroyed after the death of Clark. It further appears from this affidavit of De la Croix, that he was expressing, not only his belief, but the belief of the friends of Clark.

Now, I think the conclusion of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Gaines v. De la Croix, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 719, as to the effect which should be given to this statement of his, is unanswerable.

I think his subsequent testimony, given in 1848, after a controversy had arisen between him and Mrs. Gaines, goes for nothing as contrasted with his own affidavit made in 1813, and so far from the statements of De la Croix contradicting Boisfontaine, they are a powerful confirmation of his evidence upon this point, and go far to establish not only that he believed that the will of 1813 existed after the death of Clark, but that he believed it upon sufficient evidence. I think, therefore, that the presumption which under the law of Louisiana arises from the non-production of the will of 1813, and its disappearance, is most satisfactorily rebutted by the evidence in this case, and that it is proved that the will known as the will of 1813 was in existence after the death of the testator.

I, therefore, find as a fact, that an olographic will of Daniel Clark, in which Mrs. Gaines was recognized as his legitimate child, and, with the exception of the legacy to his mother, and some other small legacies, was made his universal legatee, was written, signed and dated by him; that this will was clothed with the requisite and legal formalities of a last will and testament according to the laws of Louisiana.

Let the decree, therefore, be, that the prayer of the petitioners in the case of Fuentes et al., etc., against Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines, be rejected.

I now come to a decision upon what may be termed the direct actions, viz., the suits in which Mrs. Gaines seeks to charge these numerous defendants as trustees, and to recover from them certain real estate, alleging that she was the legitimate child of Daniel Clark, and under his last will and testament his universal legatee. I have found as a fact, upon a fresh consideration of all the evidence, that her allegations as to the will and her heirship are established. This finding carries with it all the consequences which are necessary to establish her title to the property, and leaves nothing remaining to be considered but the plea of prescription.

The plea of the respondents is to the effect that they derived their title and have possessed the property in good faith, and that this possession has continued for more than a period of ten years. They have thus sought to dissever their title from its origin, and have sought to stand before the court simply as possessors with what they say seemed a good title, and that therefore they are possessors in good faith. It is claimed by the solicitors of the complainant, and by his analysis of the chains of title under which the several defendants hold, it is shown that the title of each and every one of them comes back, or traces itself back to the estate of Daniel Clark through Relf and Chew, as the executors of the first will, and as the attorneys in fact of Mary Clark, legatee, under the first will. Indeed, in the supplemental petition of Fuentes et al., which has been adopted by all these defendants under the agreement on file, it is alleged at page 48 of the Fuentes Case, 160 and 161 of the marginal paging, "that the said R. Relf and B. Chew were the testamentary executors of the said D. Clark under the will of 1811, and were also the agents and attorneys in fact of Mary Clark, mother and sole testamentary and legal heir of the said D. Clark, and as such were the parties through whom these petitioners derived title to the property now claimed by the said defendant."

It is not necessary for me to comment upon the effect of this judicial admission further than to say that it is a distinct avowal that they claim under Relf and Chew as the executors and attorneys in fact under the first will, and this leaves them in the situation of having denied what they were legally bound to know. See Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 615, 616; Gaines v. Mausseaux [Case No. 5,176], and what they admit in the Fuentes Case they did know.

These cases are undistinguishable in principle from that of the case of Gaines v. Hennen, supra. It is both proved and avowed in this case, which was admitted there, viz., that the title was derived from Relf and Chew by the sales under the first will. Such a title the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Gaines v. Hennen, decided was an illegal and vicious title, and that the vice of the title took from the vendees all pretense of purchasers or possessors in good faith. In that case the supreme court took pains to put into their decree, after reciting the conveyance from Relf and Chew through these intermediate grantees and the conveyance to Hennen, that "the defendant Hennen at the time when he purchased the property so described and claimed by him as aforesaid, was bound to take notice of the circumstances which rendered the acts and doings of the said Relf and Chew in the premises illegal, null and void; that the said Hennen ought to be deemed and held, and is hereby deemed and held, to have purchased the property in question with full notice," etc. This view is adhered to in Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 716, 717, where the court declare that the question is no longer an open one.

The evidence here on both sides as to the minority and the interruptions of prescription is precisely what it was in the case last referred to. Indeed it is all taken from the record in that case, and I think the supreme court of the United States have settled in the most solemn and authoritative manner that this plea cannot be urged by these defendants. Let there be judgment, therefore, for the complainant, Myra Clark Gaines.

Circuit Court. E. D. Louisiana. April Term, 1871.

DISCOVERY — RIGHT OF COMPLAINANT TO DISCOVERY OF DEFENDANT'S TITLE—MULTIFARIOUSNESS —FRAUD—EQUITY—PLEADING—DUPLICITY.

1. If evidence of defendant's title furnishes evidence of the complainant's, the latter may compel a discovery of it.

2. The fact that in Louisiana titles are registered in a public office does not affect complainant's right to call for such discovery.

3. A bill is not objectionable for multifariousness because it joins defendants holding distinct tracts of land, under distinct conveyances, if the main ground of defense is common to all the defendants.

[Cited in Jones v. Slauson, 33 Fed. 634.]

4. If fraud is charged against executors in proving a will, and acting under it, and notice of such fraud before their purchase of the property is alleged against the other defendants, a suit at law could not give adequate relief.

[Cited in Gaines v. Lizardi, Case No. 5,175.]

5. If a plea contain matter proper for a demurrer, for a plea in bar, for a plea in abatement, and for an answer, it is bad for duplicity.

These were bills in equity, and came on for hearing on demurrers and pleas.

E. T. Merrick and J. Q. A. Fellows, for complainant.

Miles Taylor and James McConnell, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. These cases come up on demurrers and pleas. The bills are similar in character, and a description of one is a description of all. They are all substantially in the same form, as were the bills in the cases of Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 553, and Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 642.

The complainant in each of these bills alleges that she is the legitimate daughter of Daniel Clark, deceased, who died in August, 1813; and that said Clark, by his will dated July 13, 1813, declared the complainant to be his legitimate and only daughter, and made her his universal legatee; that he died seized and possessed of several tracts of land and real estate in the city of New Orleans and its vicinity, a description of which is given: that in the year 1811, he had made another will (which was revoked by the will of 1813), by which former will he made his mother, Mary Clark, his universal legatee, and one Relf and one Chew executors; that the defendants claim the lands possessed by them, which are parcel of the lands described as belonging to Daniel Clark, under and by virtue of sales made by Relf and Chew as such executors; whereas the bill charges that such sales were void; that the requisite formalities were not observed to authorize executors to sell; that no orders to sell were made by the proper judges; that the proceedings were in divers other respects, specified in the bill, defective and illegal; and that the defendants were chargeable with notice of these illegalities when they became purchasers of the property held by them respectively. The bill sets out the probate of the will of 1813, and various collateral matters relating to the history thereof, and of the complainant, and prays for a discovery of the particular deeds and chain of title under which the defendants severally claim; and a discovery and account of the rents and profits received by them respectively; and a decree that the property be delivered to the complainant. The bill is objected to:

1. Because it seeks discovery of the defendant's title. It is undoubtedly, a general rule that the complainant cannot compel the defendant to discover the evidence of his (the defendant's) title when it does not also constitute evidence of the complainant's title. But if it does furnish evidence of the complainant's title, then it is not privileged from discovery. It is laid down distinctly that a complainant "is entitled to a discovery of everything which may enable him to defeat the title which it is expected will be set up against him." Pol. Prod. Doc. p. 22, vol. 77, Law Library. "If the defendant," says the lord chancellor, in one case, "pleads that a certain deed forms a part of his title, and withholds the deed, he cannot be compelled to produce it, because it is the defendant's title, and not the plaintiff's; but if the plaintiff alleges that the deed contains something which would show that the plaintiff is entitled, to support the plaintiff's title, the defendant is bound to answer that question. He may not be bound to produce the deed, if he negatives that ground on which the plaintiff claims the inspection of it; but then, although it is the defendant's title, it is part of the plaintiff's evidence, and may be the most important part of the plaintiff's evidence, who may find in a deed constituting the defendant's title a recognition of that which, if true, would supersede the title set up by this subsequent instrument." Attorney General v. Corporation of London, 12 Beav. 8.

This is precisely the case here. The complainant alleges that defendants hold under the void sale of Relf and Chew. If this be true, the complainant's case is established. For as both titles are derived from Daniel Clark; one through the will of 1811, and the other through the will of 1813; the latter title must be the best. It is important to the complainant, therefore, to show that the defendants do claim title under the will of 1811. This is a part of her evidence of title as against the defendants. Of this evidence she is entitled to a discovery. If the defendants do not, either immediately or remotely, derive title from Relf and Chew under the will of 1811, they can so state in their answer, and thus excuse themselves from showing how they do derive their title. But they must be careful not to deny what they are legally bound to know. The fact that, in this state, titles are registered in a public office, does not alter the case. The defendants may, possibly, rely on other titles than those which are registered. And, moreover, the complainant is not bound to search the records for the purpose for which she desires this discovery.

2. The next ground taken is, that the bill is multifarious, because it joins defendants holding distinct tracts of land under distinct conveyances. This very question was fully discussed in the first case which the complainant brought in this court for the recovery of her rights,—the case of Gaines v. Relf, commenced in July, 1836, and reported in 2 How. [43 U. S.] 619. The various tracts of which Daniel Clark died seized were described by the bill in that case, as in this; and recovery was sought against a large number of persons in possession thereof, as is sought here; and on demurrer in this court, the judges were divided in opinion. The case being certified to the supreme court, it was held that the bill was not objectionable for multifariousness in the respect referred to. The court say: "The main ground of defense, the validity of the bill of 1811, and the proceedings under it, is common to all the defendants. Their interests may be of greater or less extent, but that constitutes a difference in degree only, and not in principle. There can be no doubt that a bill might have been filed against each of the defendants, but the question is, whether they may not all be included in the same bill. The facts of the purchase, including notice, may be peculiar to each defendant; but these may be ascertained without inconvenience or expense to codefendants. In every fact which goes to impair or establish the authority of the executors, all the defendants are alike interested. In its present form the bill avoids multiplicity of suits, without subjecting the defendants to inconvenience or unreasonable expense." 2 How. [43 U. S.] 643, 644. Two distinct matters were introduced into that case, in which the majority of the defendants were not interested; namely, the claims of Catharine Barnes and her husband, and the account prayed against the executors, Relf and Chew. The court permitted the bill to be amended by the omission of these matters, and, with that amendment, held it to be unobjectionable. That case is precisely in point, and must be considered as governing this.

3. The next objection is, that the complainant has a sufficient remedy at law. This point, if well founded, could not have escaped the attention of the eminent counsel who argued the cases of Gaines v. Hennen and Gaines v. New Orleans [supra], before the supreme court. Some of the very cases now before me were before that court then. And the very same point was taken in the answers of the defendants in the latter case, and must have been passed upon by the court, although not formally discussed in the opinion.

The precise question was also raised in the before mentioned case of Gaines v. Relf, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 619. And although the executors of the will of 1811 were parties to that suit, and were charged with fraudulently setting up that will, yet jurisdiction was sustained, as well in view of the peculiar nature of the case, independent of that part of it. The point is discussed by the court on pages 647–650, and on page 649 the following observations occur: "But the controversy is rendered complicated by the numerous parties and the various circumstances under which the purchases were made. Besides, many facts essential to the complainant's rights are within the knowledge of the defendants and may be proved only by their answers. Of this character is the fraud charged against the executors in proving the will and acting under it, and the notice of such fraud before their purchase, alleged against the other defendants. If fraud shall be established against the executors, and a notice of the fraud by the other defendants, they must be considered, though the sales have the forms of law, as holding the property in trust for the complainants. Under these circumstances a suit at law could not give adequate relief. A surrender of papers and a relinquishment of title may become necessary. The powers of a court of chancery in this view are required to do complete justice between the parties."

In view of these considerations, the supreme court, in that case, returned for answer, the circuit court had jurisdiction of the case, and that it did not belong exclusively to a court of law. Add to this the discovery sought in relation to the claim of title by the defendants under the will of 1811, and in relation to the rents and profits received by them, and it will appear that the elements of equitable jurisdiction are sufficiently involved in the case.

4. Several matters are set up by way of plea. A glance at these pleas shows, however, that they not only contain matter not proper for a plea, but that they are bad for duplicity.

It is a general rule, that a plea must contain but one matter or point, and that only one plea can be filed to the whole bill, or to any specific part thereof. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 652–657. The pleas in these cases really amount to answers. The matters set up therein can as well be set up in answers as in pleas, and several of the points made are such as have already been disposed of on demurrer. Most of them are a jumble of different defenses. Take for example the pleas of Mrs. Matthews, in case [docket] No. 5,058:

"For her several and separate pleas," to use her own language, "she doth say" (I give the substance of the pleas that follow): (1) That the complainant has a complete remedy at law. (2) Prescription for thirty years. (3) That the defendant has made expensive and useful improvements for which she is entitled to compensation by the laws of Louisiana. (4) That a suit in chancery deprives her of a trial by jury to which she is entitled by the seventh amendment of the constitution. (5) That a suit is now pending in the state probate court (Second district court of New Orleans), in which the validity of the will of 1813 is called in question.

In this paper we have presented to us, mixed up together, matters proper for a demurrer, for a plea in bar, for a plea in abatement, and for an answer, and severally unsuitable for any other form of pleading. Such irregular modes of pleading cannot be tolerated. And when it is remembered, that every defense, whether in law or in fact, can be set up in an answer, I have no hesitation in overruling the demurrers and pleas in these cases.

An order will be made to overrule the several demurrers and pleas with costs, and requiring the defendants to answer the complainant's bill in each case, on or before the rule day in December next.

Circuit Court, E. D. Louisiana. April Term, 1871.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY — EXCEPTIONS TO MASTER'S REPORT — HEARING BY COURT — POSSESSION OF PROPERTY IN BAD FAITH — RENTS AND PROFITS — IMPROVEMENTS — PRESCRIPTION.

1. The rule of practice is, that no exceptions to a master's report will be heard by the court, which have not been made before the master; and in the absence of very special circumstances, the court will feel bound to enforce it.

[Cited in Hatch v. Indianapolis & S. R. Co., 9 Fed. 858; In re Thomas, 45 Fed. 790; Cutting v. Florida Ry. & Nav. Co., 48 Fed. 508.]

2. Unless some particular matter is pointed out in which the master has committed an error, or unless it be shown that he has adopted some erroneous principle on which his account or calculation is based, his report will be allowed to stand.

[Cited in Celluloid Manuf'g Co. v. Cellonite Manuf'g Co., 40 Fed. 477.]

3. In Louisiana, where the possession is in bad faith, the possessor will not only be charged with what he has received, but with what he might have received; in other words, with the worth or value of the property.

4. Possessors in bad faith cannot, by the law of Louisiana, claim the benefit of prescription with regard to rents and profits, any more than with regard to the land itself.

[Cited in Gaines v. New Orleans, 17 Fed. 30.]

5. Under the law of Louisiana, possessors in bad faith are entitled to compensation for improvements which they have erected, if accepted by the owner. The latter may require them to be removed.

[Cited in Jackson v. Ludeling, Case No. 7,139.]

6. Manner of estimating rents and profits on lands, buildings and draining machine in possession and use by the city of New Orleans.

These were cases in equity, and were heard upon exceptions to the master's report.

E. T. Merrick and J. Q. A. Fellows, for complainant.

Miles Taylor, H. M. Hyams, and J. McConnell, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. In these cases the defendants except to the master's report. It does not appear, by the report of the master's minutes, that the exceptions were taken before him. The rule of practice is that no exceptions will be heard by the court which have not been made before the master, so as to give him an opportunity of considering the same and correcting his report. But as counsel on both sides have evidently acted under a misapprehension of the rule, I will not overrule the exceptions on that ground, especially as some of them are of great importance to the rights of the parties. But it is desirable that the rule should be observed, and hereafter in the absence of very special circumstances, the court will feel bound to enforce it. It was declared by the supreme court of the United States, in McMicken v. Perin, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 507, and in other cases there referred to.

The principal exceptions are:

1. That the defendants did not realize the rents and profits which the master has charged them with. As this is a matter of fact arising upon the evidence, the court will not undertake to reexamine and retry the whole case; but will allow the report to stand, unless some particular matter is pointed out in which the master has committed an error, or unless it be shown that he has adopted some erroneous principle on which his account or calculation is based. It must be remembered that where the possession is in bad faith, the possessor will not only be charged with what he has received, but with what he might have received; in other words, with the worth or value of the property. The case of the city will be adverted to more particularly hereafter.

2. It is excepted, secondly: That the master has not allowed the defendants the prescription of three years for rents and profits received by them before the commencement of the suit. In this the master only followed the decree. The supreme court of the United States decided that the defendants were possessors in bad faith, chargeable with notice of the defectiveness of their title, and that they must severally account to the complainant for the rents and profits received by them, from the time that they severally came into possession; and, being possessors in bad faith, I think, by the law of Louisiana, they cannot claim the benefit of prescription with regard to rents and profits, any more than with regard to the land itself. There are repeated decisions to this effect, some of which are referred to in 2 Hen. Dig. tit. "Possessions," II. a, p. 1195, No. 5. And Touillier says: "Bad faith renders him (the possessor) liable to account for not only the fruits which he has received, but even those which he might have received, and which have perished by his negligence; and this obligation is extinguished only by the prescription of the thing itself; and restitution is due from the day when the bad faith commenced." 3 Droit Civile Française, pp. 71, 72.

The defendants' counsel have referred me to a provision of the Code of 1808, which declares that the prescription of 30 years may be pleaded even by a knavish possessor. Precisely the same provision is found in article 3438 of the present Code, only a little differently rendered in English. It reads thus: "The same species of property is prescribed for by 30 years, without any title on the part of the possessor, or whether he be in good faith or not." The species of property referred to is immovables.

It is a sufficient answer to the argument derived from this article to say that it was not overlooked by the supreme court of the United States, and that its rejection as applied to this case is res judicata. And it is hardly necessary to remind the defendants, that if Mrs. Gaines did not arrive at full age until December 31, 1827, as alleged in the bill, the 30 years had not expired when the bill was filed, letting alone the previous litigation of many years which had interrupted the prescription.

3. The defendants except, thirdly: Because the master charges them with the rents and profits of the buildings and improvements, as well as of the land in its original state as owned by Daniel Clark. They claim that they are entitled to the use of the improvements, whether erected by themselves or by their predecessors in possession, and are liable to the complainant only for the use of the lands as Daniel Clark left them.

This objection involves the general question of the defendants' right to compensation for improvements and the extent thereof and exceptions thereto. Generally speaking, according to article 500 of the present Code, which is identical with the corresponding article in the Code of 1808, and with article 555 of the Code Napoleon, when plantations, constructions and works have been made by a third person, with his own materials, the owner of the soil has the right to keep them, or to compel the author to take away or demolish them. If he keeps them, he must pay for the value of the materials and the price of the labor. In other words, he must pay for their original cost. From the moment he approves of and accepts the improvements, he is regarded as having ordered them. Locré, vol. 8, p. 181.

This rule is a modification of the Roman law, which made a distinction between necessary and useful works. If necessary to the preservation of the property, the possessor in bad as well as in good faith was entitled to compensation; but if useful only, whilst the latter was entitled to reimbursements, the former had only the right to withdraw and keep the gain which he had derived from the improvements. The Roman rule seems to be adopted in this state, in the case of improvements which cannot be separated from the property, and cannot, therefore, according to article 500, be removed at the owner's option, such as the clearing of wild land and rendering it fit for cultivation. In such cases the possessor is permitted to retire with the profits he may have made, but without any claim of compensation for his labor. Gibson v. Hutchins, 12 La. Ann. 547, overruling the previous case of Pearce v. Frantum, 16 La. 423.

The supreme court of this state seems also to have established another exception to the general rule laid down in the Code, namely, that a possessor, knowing that he has no title, that is, a mere trespasser or intermeddler, is not entitled to any compensation for improvements. This was held in the case of Herriot v. Broussard, 4 Mart. (N. S.) 267. The court say: "The defendant's claim for remuneration on account of ameliorations or improvements on the disputed premises was properly rejected by the court below. He is not one of those possessors to whom our laws accord such a right; he knew that he held no title, for he did not accept that intended to be conveyed, etc."

The same doctrine is laid down in Gibson v. Hutchins, 12 La. Ann. 547. Referring to a previous case not reported, the court say: "We said in Hemkin v. Overly, that we are unable to recognize the doctrine that one who makes improvements upon property to which he knows he has no title has any legal or equitable claim to reimbursement for such improvements."

The court applies the doctrine to the case of a settler, who takes possession with the hope of a preemption. "Until he actually makes his entry, he knows he has no title. He has an expectancy and nothing more. He is a tenant by sufferance. * * * When the government parts with the title to a third person, that title carries with it such inseparable ameliorations as the land may have received from the settler. The settler has no claim upon the owner. Of course the possessor, who knows he has no title, is a possessor in bad faith."

A subsequent case to that of Gibson v. Hutchins—Cannon v. White, reported in 16 La. Ann. 85–91,—leaves us in some uncertainty as to the true distinctions to be made on this subject. The defendant in that case had reason to suspect his grantor's title (which was a fraudulent one), and was held to be a possessor in bad faith. He went into possession in 1853, when only 250 acres of the land was under cultivation. He remained in possession 8 years, and made and erected improvements valued at $5,250. The court considered that the use of the 230 acres of additional clearing and the cord wood consumed, more than compensated for the expense of clearing, and set off one against the other. But they allowed him compensation for his other improvements. In other words, he was allowed for his inseparable improvements (the additional clearing) only what he was able to realize therefrom, in accordance with the doctrine of Gibson v. Hutchins, and for his constructions he was allowed cost.

In the cases before us, the bill charges and the decree declares that the defendants purchased with full notice that the auction sale of Relf and Chew was illegal, null and void, and in fraud of the rights of complainant, and the defendants are decreed to surrender the property to the complainant forthwith, and to account to her for all the rents and profits from the time they came into possession. No deduction or limitation is mentioned except this, that the account should be taken subject to the laws of Louisiana in cases of such recovery. The fair interpretation of this limitation is, that these laws are to determine what elements go to make up rents and profits, and what are the proper allowances to be made in estimating the same under judgments or decrees of this kind.

How is this limitation to be applied in this case? The bill prayed possession of the property and an account and payment of all the rents and profits. The decree grants both without restriction. The defendants, in their answers, did not ask for any deduction or allowance for improvements. They placed themselves altogether upon their title and the invalidity of the complainant's title. They defended the title only. Nothing was said about improvements; and even when they came before the master, no statement in writing is made setting up any such claim. The defendants, if they relied on such a claim, ought to have presented to the master a statement of facts in writing, setting forth their claim, and forming a basis for revisory action, if proper, on the part of the court. The claim of the defendants is full of embarrassments. Nevertheless, on account of neglect of the proper forms of presentation, if they are really entitled to compensation for improvements under the law of Louisiana, and if that subject has never been considered by the supreme court, it would be very hard to conclude them by the mere forms of law. The supreme court has expressly decreed that the complainant should have immediate possession of the disputed property. The claim for improvements, therefore, if it exists at all, cannot interfere with the surrender of possession. It must either be adjusted in the account for rents and profits or by a subsequent proceeding. A subsequent proceeding would be intolerable on account of the increase and protraction of the litigation that would ensue. The clause of the decree above referred to, requiring the account to be taken subject to the laws of Louisiana, opens a way for the adjustment of this question before the master, upon proper proceedings to be had on the part of the defendants.

Upon a careful examination of the law, I am of the opinion that the defendants, were it not for the difficulties presented by the pleadings, would be entitled to compensation for their improvements erected on the land. And as the question seems never to have been presented to the supreme court for adjudication, the want of a decree for such compensation is not necessarily to be regarded as res judicata against the claim. And although the fact that the defendants have never formally set up such a claim in their answers or in any proceeding in the case, presents a strong barrier to its allowance, and although it may be a great stretch of indulgence on the part of the court to allow it to be set up at this time, still the court may avail itself of that clause of the decree which directs the accounts of rents and profits to be taken, subject to the laws of Louisiana, as a basis for its allowance before the master on a proper presentation of the facts before him. But the defendants are in gross laches, and as a condition of referring the cases or any of them back to the master for this purpose, they must first severally pay the costs of the proceedings already had before the master; and when any case comes up before him, the defendant concerned must present a written statement of the facts on which he bases his claim, together with a statement of the cost of the improvements claimed, in order that the complainant may then elect within thirty days from the master's report thereon, whether she will keep the improvements, or have them removed at the expense of the defendant. Her election should not be regarded as made by reason of her taking possession of the property with the improvements on it, because no proper claim for improvements has ever been made in the cause. And the presentation of the claim under oath is not to be regarded as superseding due proof thereof. Of course the statement should show when the improvements were erected, and by whom, and if not erected by the defendant, that he purchased the same with the property. Where the grantor and grantee are both parties to the cause, the supreme court of this state has decided that the improvements should be apportioned between the grantor and grantee in proportion to the improvements made by each. Lejeune v. Barrow, 11 La. Ann. 501. But that will depend on the fact whether the grantee has or has not paid for them, and does or does not look to his grantor for indemnity.

In taking this account, I consider the decree of the supreme court as requiring, and the law of the case to be, that the entire rents and profits are to be accounted for by the defendants. As the accounts have already been taken by the master on this basis, with due allowances for all ordinary expenses for repairs, insurance, taxes, etc., that part of the work will not require to be repeated.

The case of the city is a peculiar one. The estimation of the rents and profits in that case is so uncertain and speculative, that I do not feel entirely satisfied as to the decision that should be made. The master evidently felt the same embarrassment. He says: "As the city received no rents whatever, and no profits, except by the increase of its revenue, it is difficult to fix the amount to which she (the complainant) is justly entitled. The master presents facts and figures which he trusts will enable the court to arrive at an equitable conclusion." He then gives the estimate of various witnesses as to the annual value of the premises, including the draining machine, the average of which was $8,000; and, after deducting the cost of the machine and all improvements and repairs, he brings the city in debt the sum of half a million dollars ($500,000). Another estimate based on the additional revenues derived from the lands reclaimed by the use of the machine, after deducting cost and repairs, shows a profit of two hundred and eight thousand, eight hundred and twenty-five dollars ($208,825). Both of these estimates are vague, uncertain, and somewhat speculative.

A third estimate is made, based on the value of the land and buildings, without the drainage machine, and giving credit for ordinary repairs to the buildings, independent of the machine. This makes the rents $157,600, and the repairs $32,333.21, leaving a balance of $125,267.79. As the master has not signified his adoption of either of these estimates, but has stated the facts to the court for its equitable determination, I have come to the conclusion that it would be equitable and just to set off the profits derived by the city from the drainage machine for the past 35 years against the cost of construction and repairs, and to charge the city with the rents of the building and land, less the ordinary repairs of the buildings, amounting, as shown by the report, to the sum of $125,267.77. Whilst the profits and advantages of the drainage machine were indefinite and uncertain in amount, there is no doubt of their reality, nor, if we can place any reliance upon the estimates, is there any doubt of their being amply sufficient to reimburse the city for all its expenditures, including even the rent with which it is charged.

A decree will be made confirming the report of the master in the Case of The City of New Orleans, upon the basis of the last alternative stated in his report; and also confirming his several reports in the other cases as far as they have gone, with leave, however, to each of the defendants in the other cases, upon payment of the master's costs respectively, to have a further reference to the master for estimating the compensation due to them for improvements, upon the terms and principles above stated in this opinion.

[NOTE. One of the respondents, the city of New Orleans, appealed from this decision to the supreme court, alleging for error—First, that the decree rendered by the circuit court was erroneous, in that it had the effect of giving to the plaintiff the buildings and machinery erected by the city, without paying the value of the materials and the cost of workmanship, or any other price whatever; second, that the sum of the rents and profits was made up, in part, by the allowance of interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on each year's rent from the end of the year, which is in violation of the doctrine of the Code of Louisiana; third, the refusal to allow the plea of prescription in bar of all rents or profits for the use of the square, which were received by the city more than three years anterior to the institution of the suit, December 26, 1856.

GAINES et al. v. SPANN et al.

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1823.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN—LEGACIES FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE WARDS.

1. A testator made his will in Virginia, disposing of his estate among his wife and children, which will contained the following clause:—"It is farther my will that my wife shall clothe, maintain, and educate my children, in the best manner that the circumstances of the estate herein or hereby given, or to be given or bequeathed to her, will admit; and that she shall consult my executors hereinafter named, as to the mode of my said children's education." The executors appointed by this will were the testator's brothers, J. and S. Some eighteen months after the date of this will, the testator made an additional will in England, ratifying and confirming his former will, disposing of property acquired subsequently to the execution of the first will. By the English will, the testator bequeathed pecuniary legacies to his children to be paid out of the subsequently acquired estate, and £50 per annum to his wife, chargeable on those legacies. He then added: "And do will and direct that the guardians of my said children, by my said former will appointed, shall, by their bond, of a sufficient penalty, &c., secure to be paid to my said wife, for her life, as aforesaid, out of the moneys coming to their hands, or which they shall be in the receipt of, for the use of, or in trust for, my said children, the said annuity or yearly sum of £50." The testator appointed by this will P. and H. (both in England) "guardians of the persons and estates of (his) said children, during and until such time as the several sums of money by (him) hereinbefore bequeathed to them (could) be paid, for their use and benefit, into the hands of the several persons by (him) nominated and appointed guardians of the persons and estates of (his) said children, under the said will and disposition by (him) made and executed, prior to (his) departure from America, as aforesaid." "And I hereby appoint the said P. and H. joint executors in trust of this my will." P., one of the executors and guardians under the English will, failing for a long period of time to account for the moneys which came to his hands, to a large amount, and eventually becoming insolvent, this suit was brought by the legatees, inter alia, to subject J. and S. to the payment of P.'s debt. Held, that the first will did not appoint the executors J. and S. guardians also of the testator's children. Though no form of words is prescribed for the appointment of a guardian, and such appointment may be made by words of implication, yet these words must convey the powers essential to the office.

[Cited in Desribes . Wilmer, 69 Ala. 25.]

2. Nor does the recognition, in the English will, of the executors under the Virginia will as guardians, amount to an appointment of them, by implication, to that office. It is true that the two papers constitute, in point of law, but one will, but they are not to be so considered in point of fact. Had the English will been written (by way of codicil) on the same paper with the Virginia will; or had the Virginia will been before the testator when the English will was written, the subsequent clauses could not have been founded in ignorance or forgetfulness of the provisions of the Virginia will, but would have shown the construction put by the testator upon his own words, and that those words were intended to appoint, and did in fact appoint, the executors, J. and S., guardians also. In such case, it seems that the court would be bound to adopt the testator's construction. But in this case, there is no reason to suppose that the Virginia will was before the testator when he drew the English will. The testator relied upon his memory, and this betrayed him into the error of supposing that, by his former will, he had appointed J. and S. guardians, when that will, in fact, contained no such appointment. The question is not, whether a testator has a right to construe his own language, employed in a former will, but whether a plain mistake respecting that language shall control its natural construction, and give to it a meaning which it will not bear? This is forbidden, both by authority and by general principles.

3. Quaere, whether the fact, assuming it to be true, that the executors under the first will acted as guardians, could influence the construction of the will? The proof that they did act in that character should at least be unequivocal. A general understanding that they were guardians, founded on the care taken by them of the infants and their estates, could not make them guardians: nor the fact of their signing their names (without adding their characters as guardians), to a direction to a clerk to issue a marriage license to one of the female infants, though it would have amounted to an acceptance of the guardianship, had the appointment been explicit.

4. But supposing J. and S. to have been guardians as well as executors, quaere if they would be chargeable, in their character of guardians, with legacies which they never received, and which, in strictness, never constituted a part of the ward's estate?

[Cited in Freeman's Appeal, 68 Pa. St. 156.]

5. Nor were J. and S. responsible, as executors, for the legacies which came to P.'s hands. P. was both guardian and executor under the English will, and he received the legacies in one of those characters: if as guardian, the executors had no right to sue him for money of the wards which came lawfully to his hands, if it was not required for the payment of debts: if as executor, his co-executors could not sue him. The English will, too, directed the money to be paid to the guardians in Virginia, and not to the executors. The legatees, and not the executors, were the cestui que trust, and they alone could coerce the execution of the trust.

Camm Garlick, Samuel Garlick, and John Garlick, citizens of Virginia, were the nephews of Edward Garlick, a subject of the king of Great Britain, residing in Bristol, from whom they expected considerable legacies. In 1780, Camm Garlick went to England for the purpose of visiting his uncle, who, some time afterwards, departed this life. By his will, Edward Garlick bequeathed to each of his nephews, Camm, Samuel, and John Garlick, £6000 sterling. In 1782, after the death of his uncle, Camm Garlick went to Portugal, on account of ill health, where he died some time in that year. Before his departure from Virginia, viz., on the 21st of May, 1780, Camm Garlick made his will, disposing of his estate among his wife and children. In that will is the following clause: "It is further my will that my wife shall clothe, maintain, and educate my children in the best manner that the circumstances of the estate herein or hereby given, or to be given or bequeathed to her, will admit; and that she shall consult my executors hereinafter named, as to the mode of my said children's education." The testator appointed his brothers, John and Samuel Garlick, executors of his will. On the 6th of December, 1781, Camm Garlick, being then in England, made an additional will, in which he mentioned and confirmed his will made before his departure from Virginia. By this additional will, he bequeathed to his son Samuel, and his two daughters, Sarah and Mary Camm, pecuniary legacies, to be paid out of the money bequeathed to him by his uncle Edward, and gave also £50 per annum to his wife, chargeable on the legacies to his children. He then added: "And do will and direct that the guardians of my said children, by my said former will appointed, shall, by their bond, of a sufficient penalty, or such other security as shall be thought reasonable and competent, secure to be paid to my said wife, for her life, as aforesaid, out of the moneys coming to their hands, or which they shall be in the receipt of, for the use of, or in trust for, my said children, the said annuity or yearly sum of £50." He also gave a legacy of £500 to Benjamin Pollard, who was then in England, and added: "And I do hereby appoint the said Benjamin Pollard, and the Reverend Mr. Thomas Hall (also in England) guardians of the persons and estates of my said children, during, and until such time as the several sums of money by me, hereinbefore bequeathed to them, can be paid for their use and benefit, into the hands of the several persons by me nominated and appointed guardians of the persons and estates of my said children, under the said will and disposition by me made and executed, prior to my departure from America, as aforesaid." The testator then directed the said Pollard and Hall, as his money should be collected, "and until the same can be paid and applied as before mentioned," to place the same at interest for the benefit of his children; "and I hereby appoint the said Benjamin Pollard and Thomas Hall joint executors in trust of this my will." He recommended it to his brothers to pay the sum of £100 yearly to the said Thomas Hall, for the space of three years, if that time should be required for the collection of the effects and settlement of the affairs of his uncle Edward; and if his brothers should decline to comply with this recommendation, so long as the said Thomas Hall should be employed as one of his executors in settling the accounts of his uncle, he gave him a sum equal in proportion to the said sum of £300.

In 1783, a commercial partnership was formed between Samuel Spann, a merchant residing in Great Britain, and Benjamin Pollard, for the purpose of carrying on a trade in Virginia, under the name and firm of Benjamin Pollard & Co., and under the management of the said Benjamin Pollard. Into this concern the moneys of the Garlicks seem to have entered, and the privilege was reserved to John and Samuel Garlick, to become members of the company. In 1784, Benjamin Pollard arrived in Virginia with a cargo of goods, and John and Samuel Garlick acceded to the proposition which was made to them, and became members of the company. The business of the firm was exceedingly disastrous, and ended in total insolvency. In July, 1799, the legatees of Camm Garlick instituted a suit in the court of chancery of this state, against John and Samuel Garlick, the general executors of Camm Garlick, and against Benjamin Pollard, the executor in trust, for the legacies bequeathed to them by Camm Garlick. In 1803, the executors of Samuel Spann instituted a suit in this court against John and Samuel Garlick, and Benjamin Pollard, as surviving partners of Benjamin Pollard & Co., for a debt due from that company to their testator. Before any answer was filed, John and Samuel Garlick died, and the suit was revived against their representatives. They stated in their answer the suit brought against John and Samuel Garlick, as executors of Camm Garlick, by the legatees of the said Camm, which suit was revived against the respondents; that it was a debt of superior dignity to that claimed by Spann's executors, and that they were ignorant of its amount. They therefore prayed that provision for this claim might be made in the decree. On the 17th day of December, in the year 1816, the cause came on to be finally heard, when this court decreed that the administrator of Samuel Garlick, deceased, should pay to the plaintiffs, a small sum mentioned in the decree, and that Edward Garlick, the administrator of John Garlick, deceased, should pay to the plaintiffs out of the assets in his hands to be administered, the sum of $16,238 92. Under this decree, a considerable sum of money was paid into court by Edward Garlick, administrator of John Garlick, deceased, under a stipulation that it should be applied in such manner as the assets of John Garlick ought to be applied, in a due course of administration, so as not to create a devastavit.

After a great number of abatements, revivals and reports, in the cause depending in the state court, the chancellor, on the 30th day of June, 1820, after the suit was revived by consent, as to all the proper parties, set aside all the orders directing accounts, and the last report of the commissioner thereon, and directed an account to be taken which comprehended every matter in controversy, and, especially, the administration of John and Samuel Garlick, of the estate of Camm Garlick, and the administration of their estates by their respective representatives. The commissioner stated an account between those parties on whom the case chiefly depended, which was received by consent, instead of the full report directed by the court. Some exceptions were taken which were in part overruled, and in part sustained; after which, the chancellor, by consent of parties, decreed that the defendant, Edward Garlick, administrator of John Garlick, should pay to Mary Camm Tunstal, one of the daughters of Camm Garlick, $5169 21, with interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, from the 1st of January, 1801, and to Sarah Gaines, the other daughter of the said Camm Garlick, the sum of $4393 47, with like interest from the same time. After this decree, the plaintiffs in that court, Mary Camm Tunstal and Sarah Gaines, filed their bill of interpleader in this court, to which Spann's executors and the representatives of John and Samuel Garlick, were made defendants, stating the superior dignity of their debt, and praying that the sums of money paid into this court by Edward Garlick, as administrator of John Garlick, deceased, and by the sureties in the administration bond of the said Edward, and which were under the control of the court, should be paid to them.

The surviving executor of Samuel Spann, pleaded the decree of this court, heretofore recited, in bar of the plaintiff's claim; and if this plea should be overruled, insisted in his answer that the decree in the state court ought not to affect him, because it was made by consent, and, therefore, could not be revised by a superior tribunal. He farther insisted that the money paid into court was applicable to this decree, if it ought to be so applied, and that it ought to be so applied, because his decree was prior, in point of time, and equal in dignity, the debt due to the plaintiffs, legatees of Camm Garlick, not being payable by John and Samuel Garlick, either as guardians or executors.[2] The other defendants submitted themselves to the court. The plea was overruled, "the court being of opinion, that, under the laws of this state, and on the sound principles of equity, the claim now set up by the plaintiffs ought to avail the representatives of John and Samuel Garlick, in like manner as if they had been able to establish it, before the decree was pronounced in favor of Spann's executors: but the court was also of opinion, that the decree of the court of chancery of the state, having been given by consent, was not conclusive as to the dignity of the debt, or against a creditor having obtained a prior decree," and therefore directed one of its commissioners again to take the accounts between the parties, and to report them to this court. In pursuance of this order, the commissioner made his report, and the cause came on at this term on the report and on exceptions to it. The commissioner stated his report according to the views of each party. The chief subject of controversy respected the debt due from Benjamin Pollard to the estate of Camm Garlick. The plaintiffs claimed to charge John and Samuel Garlick with Pollard's debt, as the guardians of the infant children of Camm Garlick, or as his executors. They insisted that it was in the power of John and Samuel Garlick to collect the money due from Pollard, their omission to do which was gross negligence, which rendered them liable for the money lost. No portion of the estate of Camm Garlick, received by Benjamin Pollard, by virtue of the authority conferred upon him by the will of Camm Garlick, was ever accounted for by Pollard.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This claim depends on two questions: 1. Were John and Samuel Garlick testamentary guardians of the children of Camm Garlick? 2. Were they bound, as executors, to collect the debt due from Pollard?

1. Were they the testamentary guardians of the infant children of Camm Garlick? His will, made in Virginia, empowers and directs his wife "to clothe, maintain, and educate his children, in the best manner that his estate, given to her, will admit," and desires her to consult his executors thereinafter named as to the mode of their education. It is admitted that a guardian may be appointed without using the term, and that no form of words is prescribed: but to appoint a guardian by implication, the powers essential to the office ought to be conferred. In this will, no power is given over the persons or estates of the orphans to John and Samuel Garlick. These remain with the mother, who is only to consult his executors as to the education of his children. She may follow or reject their advice, and they have no authority to enforce it. Nothing can be more clear, than that they are not appointed guardians in this will.

In his additional will, made in England, he ratifies and confirms the will made in Virginia, gives a legacy of £50 per annum to his wife, and directs that the guardians by his said former will appointed, shall, by their bond, of a sufficient penalty, "secure to be paid to his said wife for her life, out of the moneys coming to their hands, or which they shall be in receipt of, for the use of, or in trust for, his said children, the said annuity or yearly sum of £50. This is said to be a recognition of their character as guardians, and an appointment of them by implication to that office. This is a point on which I have felt no inconsiderable difficulty. The two papers making in point of law but one will, and the last ratifying, confirming, and establishing the first, I have supposed that they might be considered as if written on the same paper, at the same time; and as if the words of the last recited clause had been—"My will is, that the guardians of my children, herein by me above appointed, shall, by their bond, &c." Had this been the fact, it would have been very certain that the testator understood his words as appointing a guardian; and, although the powers of a guardian were in reality conferred on his wife, and not on his executors, the inference would have been very strong that the words of the last clause refer to his executors, and not to his wife, because the persons he supposed himself to have appointed, were directed to give bond, and to pay money to his wife. The allusion to his executors is almost as strong as if he had named them; and had he done so, had the language of such a will been—"It is my desire that my brothers, John and Samuel Garlick, whom I have hereinbefore appointed guardians of my children, shall, by their bond, &c., secure to be paid to my said wife, &c.," it would be difficult to resist the argument that such language would amount to an actual appointment. The subsequent clause, too, appointing Benjamin Pollard and the Rev. Thomas Hall guardians of the persons and estates of his children, until the legacies bequeathed to them in England could be collected and paid to the guardians appointed by his first will, would, under the same view of the case, afford an argument equally strong in favour of the construction for which the plaintiffs contend. I was the more disposed to yield to this construction, from perceiving that the chancellor, who decided the cause in the state court, treated John and Samuel Garlick as guardians. Had this point been directly made, and directly determined by him, the leaning of my own judgment to the contrary opinion would, probably, have yielded to my respect for his decision. But the point was not directly made; the report was not excepted to on this account; and the parties seem to have proceeded on the idea that John and Samuel Garlick were to be considered as guardians, and were, in that character, liable for Pollard's debt. Taking this view of the decree, I have felt it to be my duty to consider the question, uninfluenced by the proceedings of the state court.

[2] In Virginia, the executors or administrators, of a guardian, of a committee, or of any other person who shall have been chargeable with the estate of a ward, idiot, or lunatic, or the estate of a dead person, committed to their testator or intestate by a court of record, are required to pay so much as shall be due from their testator or intestate, to the ward, idiot or lunatic, or the legatees or persons entitled to distribution, before any proper debt of their testator or intestate. 1 Rev. Code 1819, p. 389, § 60; Id. p. 408, § 12.

I do not think that the case can be considered as if the two papers formed, in point of fact as well as law, one instrument. Had the provisions of the first will been before the testator when he wrote the last, the subsequent clauses could not have been founded on ignorance or forgetfulness of what he had before written, but would have shown his construction of the clause referred to. They would have shown his opinion, that the words he had previously employed were competent to the appointment of guardians for his children, and that he employed them with that intent. In such a case there would be great force in the argument requiring the court to construe these words as the testator himself obviously construed them. But in the case at bar, we have no reason to suppose that the will made in Virginia was in possession of Camm Garlick when he made his will in England. It rested only in his memory. We have, therefore, no right to suppose that the words used in it were used in a sense which they will not bear; we can only suppose that he was under a mistake respecting it; that he had no distinct recollection of it; that he supposed it to contain an appointment of guardians, when it contained no such appointment. I can find no case which decides that any thing passes by words used clearly under such mistake. In Wright v. Wivell, 4 Bac. Abr. 290 (reported in 3 Lev. 259, 2 Vent. 57, and Moore, 31), A. devised to his wife £600, to be paid to J. S., for the payment of lands he purchased from him, and are already settled on her for her jointure; the lands were not settled on her; and adjudged in favor of the heir; they did not pass by implication. The testator certainly supposed the lands were settled, but this mistake did not give the wife a right to them. So, in the same book, page 339, the following passages are cited from Godol. 282: "If a man says, out of the £100 which I bequeathed to A., I give B. £50; this is a good bequest of the £50 to B., because only a false demonstration in an immaterial circumstance, which shall not vitiate the legacy; but in this case, A. takes nothing; for words of diminution shall never be construed to give a legacy by implication. But if the demonstration be totally false, as if the testator says, I bequeath to A. the £100 which I have in my chest, and there is not any money in the chest, the legacy is void. So in the case at bar; a direction that money shall be paid to the persons who were, in a former will, appointed the guardians of his children, when no persons were so appointed, is a plain mistake, and can give no rights to those whom we may suppose the words allude to. Had his brothers been named, so as to render it absolutely certain that they were the persons to whom he alludes, this mere mistake would not, I think, under the authorities which have been quoted, or on general principles, have amounted to an appointment; their not being named would render it still more unjustifiable to put the construction on the will which is required by the plaintiff. If the words themselves be analyzed, nothing can be extracted from them intimating an intention in the testator to appoint; they only show the mistaken idea that he had made an appointment. This was completely an error in his recollection, and the court cannot, I think, supply the defect.

It is contended that they acted as guardians, and this fact is supposed to show their understanding of the will, and to have some influence on its construction. The proof that they acted as guardians is, I think, equivocal. Had the appointment been explicit, the evidence would be sufficient to show their acceptance of the office; but no regular appointment having been made, the evidence does not, I think, make out a clear case of their acting as guardians. Several witnesses depose to a general understanding, founded on the care they took of the infants and their property, that they were the guardians; but, I think, no fact, except signing a direction to the clerk to issue a marriage license for one of the young ladies, is proved, which is not entirely compatible with the relation in which they stood to the family, admitting them not to think themselves guardians. The testator had devised the whole of his estate to his wife during the minority of his children, charging her with their maintenance and education. There was, then, no estate for the guardian to manage. It did not belong to the children during their infancy, but to their mother. If their uncles attended to it, such attention could neither make them guardians, nor make the estate their property. It was an attention to be expected from their connexion with the family, and they would have been chargeable with want of natural affection had they refused it. To the authority to the clerk to issue a marriage license, they sign their names, but do not add their character as guardians. This cannot make them guardians; and although it would amount to an acceptance of the guardianship, had they been appointed, it was dated in June, 1798, before which time Pollard had become insolvent. But supposing John and Samuel Garlick to have been the guardians of the infant children of Camm Garlick, are they responsible in that character for Pollard's debt? A guardian is, undoubtedly, responsible for all the estate of the ward, real or personal, which comes to his hands; but is he responsible for moneys which he might, but did not collect, and which, in strict legal language, never formed a part of the ward's estate? A legacy is not a part of the estate of the legatee, until the executor assents to it. As a part of the personal estate of the testator, it is cast by law on the executor, who has a right to retain it till debts are paid. I have seen no case in which a guardian is charged with a legacy, until he has received it. I do not know that this point has ever been settled in the courts of the state. Were I of opinion that John and Samuel Garlick were really to be considered as testamentary guardians, I should think it necessary to look into this point, before I should feel myself justified in saying that they were chargeable with this legacy.

If John and Samuel Garlick are not chargeable with Pollard's debt, as guardians, we are next to inquire whether

2. They are chargeable as executors? This depends, I think, on the English will, and on the character held by Pollard, under that will. That John and Samuel Garlick were general executors, and that they are liable for this debt, if it was their duty to collect it, and if they had the right and the power to enforce its payment, are, I think, propositions not to be questioned. The whole inquiry, then, is, was it their duty to collect it, and could they coerce its payment? The clauses of the will which relate to this subject, are those in which Benjamin Pollard and Thomas Hall are appointed guardians of his children, and executors of his will. They are in these words: "And I do hereby appoint the said Benjamin Pollard and the Rev. Thomas Hall, guardians of the persons and estate of my said children, during, and until such time as the several sums of money by me hereinbefore bequeathed, can be paid for their use and benefit, into the hands of the several persons by me nominated and appointed guardians of the persons and estates of my said children, under the said will and disposition, by me made and executed prior to my departure from America, as aforesaid." "And I hereby appoint the said Benjamin Pollard and Thomas Hall, joint executors, in trust, of this my will." The legacies to which the plaintiffs were entitled, were in the hands of Benjamin Pollard, either as their guardian, or as executor. Let it be that the money was held by him as guardian. Have the executors a right to sue the guardian for money of the ward, which came lawfully to his hands, if it be not required for the debts of the testator? I believe he has no such right; I am persuaded that such a suit would be of the first impression. But on coming to America, Benjamin Pollard ceased to be guardian, and was bound to pay over the money to those who were entitled to receive it. But who were entitled to receive it? Not the executors, I think, because it had been paid by them to the guardian for the use of the infants, and had consequently become a part of their estate. The testator had shown his intention that the executors in Virginia should not receive it, for he directed specially that the money should be paid to the guardians in Virginia. Had the executors been really guardians, they would have received the money as guardians, not as executors. Had the guardians and executors been different persons, the money would have been payable to the guardians, not to the executors—if not required for debts.

But suppose the executors entitled to receive this money, would this circumstance attach responsibility to John and Samuel Garlick? Benjamin Pollard, who was in possession of it, was also an executor; if he is to be considered as a general executor, the law is clear that one executor cannot sue another, and that one executor is not liable for money in the hands of another. The question whether he is to be considered as general executor, or, if not, what limitations are imposed on his power, depends on the will. The words are, "and I hereby appoint the said Benjamin Pollard and Thomas Hall joint executors in trust of this my will." The particular paper which contains this appointment, contains also a reference to, and a confirmation of, the former will. The two papers make one instrument, and constitute one will in law, and I should feel some difficulty in determining the question, whether Benjamin Pollard was not executor in Virginia as well as in England; whether he was executor of the whole will, or of that particular paper only which was executed in England. But let it be conceded that he was to execute that part of the will only which was made in England. What is the extent of his power, and what the relation in which he stood to the executors in Virginia, and to the legatees of Camm Garlick? He was an executor in trust of the English will; his power and duty under that will were, to settle the affairs of Camm Garlick in England, collect the money due to him, and pay it to the guardians of his children in Virginia. The guardians were to become trustees of the money for the benefit of the infants. The beneficial interest, then, was, from the commencement, in the infants; the executors and guardians in England were trustees for them. Benjamin Pollard continued to be executor for the purpose of the trust; he received the money as executor and trustee, and retained those characters till the trust was executed. If, then, the money was in his hands as guardian, and the executors had a right to collect it, Benjamin Pollard might be considered executor of that part of the will, and being in possession of the money, his co-executors had no power over it. If this money which he collected is to be considered as remaining in his hands as executor, a part of the foregoing reasoning applies directly to the question. He was, it must be admitted, unfaithful to his trust as executor in trust; but he still retained that character, and could not divest himself of it till the trust was executed; the children, and not the executors, were the cestui que trust; the children, and not the executors, could coerce its execution; the executors, therefore, cannot be responsible for its non-execution. I feel myself constrained to say, that the representatives of John and Samuel Garlick, are not chargeable with Pollard's debt.

GAINES v. TRAVIS.

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1848.

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY —DISREGARDING PLEADING AFTER REPLYING TO IT — RESPONDENT'S BOND—ADDITIONAL STIPULATION — COSTS — IRREGULAR DEFAULT — WAIVER — SETTING ASIDE PROCEEDINGS.

1. A party cannot be allowed, after receiving a pleading and replying to it, to treat it, upon any ground of defect afterwards discovered, as a nullity, and proceed as if none had been served.

[Cited in The Ontonagon, 19 Fed. 800.]

2. After a bond has been given by a respondent to the marshal, in compliance with the rules of the supreme court, the libellant cannot exact any additional stipulation.

3. If the former rules of the district court respecting security to be given for costs may be considered as still in force for the purpose of protection to the officers of the court for the recovery of their fees, this is not a matter which affects the libellant, and he is not entitled to ground any proceeding on the omission of the respondent to give the security prescribed by those rules.

[Cited in Pope v. Seckworth, 46 Fed. 859.]

4. The libellant entered an irregular default against respondent, and moved the cause on for hearing on a reference to a commissioner. The respondent appeared, took no objection, but consented to adjournments. Held, that his appearance, &c., before the referee, constituted a voluntary consent on his part to waive the irregularities committed, and to submit the case to the determination of the commissioner. The court had power, however, to set aside the proceedings, and would do so, on terms, inasmuch as it was necessary to do so in order to enable the respondent to have the benefit of his real defence.

This was a libel in personam, by Levi Gaines against John H. Travis, to recover seamen's wages. The libellant having proceeded to bring the cause to a hearing before a commissioner as upon default to answer, the respondent now moved, on grounds which fully appear in the opinion of the court, to set aside the default and all subsequent proceedings for irregularity.

S. Sanxay, for motion.
Alanson Nash, opposed.

BETTS, District Judge. The respondent moves to set aside the default taken against him by the libellant, and all subsequent proceedings, for irregularity. Both parties also put in statements touching the merits of the case, but it is not necessary at this stage of the cause to discuss them. The monition in the cause was returned on the 25th of April. The respondent appeared by his proctor, and a few days' time were conceded him by the libellant's proctor to put in an answer. The answer was filed and served on the libellant's proctor on the second day of May, and on the same day a notice was given by the latter in conformity with the provisions of rule 88 of this court, to the proctor of the respondent, that the matters of defence set up by the answer would be contested on the hearing of the cause. The cause was thus properly at issue on the merits, and neither party could afterwards proceed in it, except in subordination to the rules governing the practice of the court in respect to issues duly joined. At this point in the proceedings both parties deviated from the established course of practice, and were each guilty of irregularities.

The libellant having ascertained that the answer was filed without the stipulation for costs required to be given by the rules of the court, regarded it as a nullity, and proceeded to a reference before a commissioner. Notice of the reference was given to the libellant, who appeared before the commissioner, and without making any objection to the course of proceedings, consented to adjournments of the hearing which were directed by the commissioner. The course pursued by the libellant, in bringing the cause on before the commissioner, was irregular and unauthorized in two respects. The answer had already been accepted, and an issue framed upon it as perfect; and the libellant was thereby precluded from disregarding it, and must appeal to the court to compel the respondent to take further steps, if required for his protection, or for an order that the answer be deemed a nullity. A party cannot be allowed, after receiving a pleading and replying to it, to proceed as if none had been served. If, indeed, he is not to be held in such case absolutely concluded from objecting to it, either as imperfect in form or as put in an improper manner, he must at least apply to the court for relief, and cannot take the decision of the question into his own hands, at discretion. The answer was, however, regular and complete as against the libellant; and this furnishes the second ground of objection to the practice adopted by him. After a bond has been given to the marshal, pursuant to the rules of the supreme court, the libellant has no power to exact any additional stipulation from the respondent. If the rules of this court conflict with rule 3 of the supreme court, they are superseded by it. The rule of the supreme court not only secures to a libellant all the protection provided by the rules of this court as to costs, but more than that, the sureties to the bond became bound absolutely for the performance of the decree of the court; that is, in a case like this, for the payment of the debt. Accordingly, if the libellant required from the respondent the stipulations directed by the rules of the district court, he would of necessity be obliged to relinquish the higher security held by him in the bond to the marshal.

There may, indeed, be a doubt whether the costs payable to officers of the court are secured by the terms of the bond to the marshal. The clerk might, therefore, be justified in exacting pre-payment of those costs, before receiving and filing an answer or other pleading on the part of the respondent, or rendering other services on his behalf; or possibly the rules of this court may be held to remain yet in force, hac tenus, in protection of the interests of the clerk and marshal. The duty of giving a security which shall enure to the protection of the officers is, however, a matter which in no way affects the libellant, and he is not entitled to look into it, or to ground any proceeding upon his part, on its omission or imperfect performance by the respondent.

Had the respondent rested upon his rights, the court must have set aside the proceedings as wholly irregular, and the entry of an order of reference as nugatory. But he having appeared upon the reference, on due notice thereof, and consented to adjournments ordered by the commissioner, he must be held to have waived the irregularity, and to have assented to the reference. The court would, accordingly, hold the respondent to his implied election, and leave the question of the accounts between the parties to the investigation and report of the commissioner, if it were not made to appear that the respondent relies for his defence on evidence showing a payment received by the libellant, in full satisfaction of his demand; while the libellant resists the admissibility of the evidence under the order of reference. As this is a matter which does not appropriately come within an order of reference, there is a formal difficulty in trying the question of award and satisfaction before a commissioner under a general order of reference; and, therefore, to save the respondent from the loss of all opportunity to prove his defence, I shall direct the order of reference to be rescinded, and that the parties proceed to final hearing before the court on the issue as it stands.

Stress was laid by the counsel for the libellant upon rule 40 of the supreme court, as limiting the authority of this court in setting aside defaults. That rule has reference to more solemn and definite decrees, if, indeed, it is not confined in its application to final decrees in the cause. Rule 29 would be the one most applicable to the subject, if the action of the court is controlled by either. The inherent powers of all courts enable them to regulate the incidental and interlocutory orders and practice in the progress of a cause, and this court, so far as it is not restrained by the supreme court, can do so at its discretion. Those rules of the supreme court are in affirmance and not in restraint of that power. The order of reference will, however, be revoked, on condition that the respondent pay the costs created before the commissioner appointed by it. He is to be regarded as a voluntary party to those expenses; for if he intended to avail himself of the irregularity committed by the libellant in taking out the order, he ought to have done so when first apprised of it; and he cannot thus, by his acquiescence, induce the accumulation of costs and then cast them upon the libellant. The court will not, upon the proofs, hold his assent and acquiescence as conclusively binding upon him; but there would be no equity in relieving him from their effect upon easier terms than the reimbursement of the costs accrued from his own act. The libellant will not, however, be allowed any costs except disbursements actually incurred by the reference. His preliminary steps being irregular in themselves, cannot be the occasion of costs in his own favor against the respondent.

Order accordingly.

NOTE. This cause came before the court again in November, 1848, on a final hearing. It then appeared that the payment relied upon by the respondent as his defence, was made upon a private settlement of the suit between the parties, out of court, and without the concurrence of the libellant's proctor, and that the libellant's proctor was now continuing the suit to recover his costs. Held, that the rule was settled that such a settlement of a suit is to be regarded as fraudulent as against the proctors and officers of the court; that the settlement could not exonerate the respondent from his liability for costs; that the proper mode for a proctor to recover his costs in such case was by prosecuting the suit commenced, as if it had not been interfered with by the libellant; and that, upon the evidence, the decree must, therefore, be that the libellant recover his taxable costs in the cause.

The cause came before the court for the third time, in January, 1849 [Case No. 5,180], upon a motion on behalf of the stipulator, to set aside the proceedings taken subsequent to the decree, and also to discharge him from arrest.

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 22, 1849.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY — NOTICE OF FINAL DECREE—EXECUTION WITHIN TEN DAYS — STIPULATORS—REGULATION OF PRACTICE IN CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS BY SUPREME COURT — IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—RULES OF 1845.

1. There is no rule of practice governing proceedings in admiralty suits in the district court which requires either party to give the other notice of a final decree otherwise than by adopting the proper means for enforcing it.

2. A decree from which an appeal may be taken, cannot be executed within ten days after it has been rendered; but the delay is for no other purpose than to favor the right of appeal, and the mere entry of the decree is notice to all parties.

3. Under the rules promulgated by the supreme court, execution properly issues against stipulators, summarily upon the decree rendered against their principals; the giving the stipulation being regarded as a submission by the stipulator to such decree as may be rendered against the party for whom he is bound.

[Cited in U. S. v. Seven Barrels of Distilled Oil, Case No. 16,253.]

4. The act of congress of August 23, 1842 (4 Stat. 518, § 6), conferring upon the supreme court, power to regulate the practice of the circuit and district courts, taken in connection with the rules promulgated by the supreme court under that act, in 1845, operates as a suspension of the acts of congress of 1839 [4 Stat. 321] and 1841 [Id. 410], abolishing imprisonment for debt on process issuing out of the United States courts in all cases where, by the local law, it would be abolished.

[Cited in The Wanata, 95 U. S. 617.]

5. Since the adoption of the rules of 1845, parties are liable to arrest and imprisonment on process issuing out of the United States courts, irrespective of subsequent legislation in the several states abolishing imprisonment on like process.

[Cited in Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co., Case No. 600; Hanson v. Fowle, Id. 6,041.]

This was a libel in personam, filed by Levi Gaines against John H. Travis, to recover wages as seaman. Former proceedings in the cause are reported in Gaines v. Travis [Case No. 5,179]. The cause now came before the court on a motion on behalf of the stipulator for the respondent, to set aside the proceedings subsequent to the final decree, and to discharge him from arrest.

S. Sanxay, for the motion.

Alanson Nash, opposed.

BETTS, District Judge. This is a motion on behalf of McKee, the stipulator for the respondent in the cause, to set aside all proceedings therein subsequent to the final decree, and also to discharge McKee from arrest on a capias and satisfaciendum issued upon the decree. It appears upon the papers and minutes of court, read on the motion, that the cause was brought to hearing upon proofs given in court, in September term last. The matter in contestation was the liability of the respondent to pay to the proctor of the libellant the taxable costs which had accrued in the case. Circumstances intervened after the argument which prevented the court considering and deciding the cause until November term last, when a decree was rendered in favor of the libellant. Early in December, his proctor served on the proctor of the respondent a copy of the bill of costs, with due notice of taxation. The bill was returned by the respondent's proctor with a note, stating that he had not yet received notice of any decision in the case, and saying, "when I do, if it is against me, I shall, I think, most certainly appeal." This note was dated December 5th. The libellant's proctor proceeded notwithstanding, to tax his costs, and having perfected the decree, issued a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum thereon. The decree entered was against the respondent, and McKee, his bail or stipulator, for the amount of taxed costs; and McKee was imprisoned upon the execution. These proceedings, it is alleged, are without warrant of law, and irregular; first, because the decree was inoperative against the respondent until a copy with a notice of its rendition and entry was served on the proctor of the respondent; and, secondly, because the libellant took a final decree summarily at once against the bail or stipulator, without any process against him or warning of the proceeding, and followed decree so obtained by peremptory process or arrest. It is further contended, that if the regularity of the practice is supported by the court, the respondent and his surety are, by the laws of the United States, exempt from imprisonment upon the judgment, and that the bail is accordingly entitled to instant discharge therefrom.

The first objection is not tenable. This court does not pursue the practice of the English admiralty and ecclesiastical courts in awarding edicts or monitions to parties to appear in court, and hear sentence or perform it, or admonish their fidejussors to do so. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 256, 407, 429; Clarke, Prax. 63, 65. The multifarious proceedings connected with the progress of a cause through its different stages in those courts, are here dispensed with, and after issue, an admiralty cause is put upon the calendar, brought to hearing, and disposed of substantially in the same manner as suits in the common-law courts. Betts' Adm. 98. The omission of the supreme court, in its code of rules adopted in 1845, to change the notorious course of the federal courts in this particular, strongly implies its sanction. No rule of this court, or of the supreme court, renders it necessary for either party to give the other notice of a final decree, otherwise than in employing the proper means for enforcing it, and no trace of such practice appears in any other of the United States courts. Dunl. Adm. Pr. 301; Conkl. Adm. Pr. 703. If the case is appealable, the decree cannot be executed in this court within ten days after it has been rendered (Dist. Ct. Rules, 152); but it is not made incumbent upon the party obtaining the decree to warn the other when that period of delay will expire. The entry apud acta, is notice to all parties. The delay or suspension of execution, is for no other purpose than to aid the party in exercising his right of appeal. In case of surprise or misapprehension, the court will always interfere on motion and due proofs, and enlarge the time or stay execution until a reasonable opportunity is afforded to perfect an appeal. Except to that end, the practice in this court extends no indulgence or privilege to the parties in the suit, to be notified or advised out of court of proceedings in respect to the final decree. The libellant is not, therefore, chargeable with any irregularity in omitting to serve a copy of the decree on the respondent or his proctor. In the present case, it is admitted that the respondent's proctor was informed by the deputy clerk that the decree was rendered before he received the bill of costs with notice of taxation, which of itself was sufficient intimation to put him on inquiry.

The proceeding excepted to by the second objection, is comparatively a novel one in the practice of this court, and therefore deserves more critical attention. Under the standing rules and usages of the court, it had formerly been necessary, in order to enforce the undertaking of stipulators, to proceed by independent orders and notices, after the lapse of ten days, to bring them before the court, to show cause why execution should not issue against them. Dist. Ct. Rules, 145; Betts' Adm. 98. The obligation of stipulators, as fixed by the rules of this court, and also the remedy against them, have, since the promulgation of these rules, been essentially altered by the rules of the supreme court. The bond or stipulation in this case was taken under the latter, (Sup. Ct. Rules, 3); and the condition prescribed by that rule is, that the respondent will appear in the suit, and abide by all orders of the court interlocutory or final in the cause, and pay the money awarded by the final decree rendered in court. And the rule provides that "upon such bond or stipulation summary process of execution may and shall be issued against the principal and sureties by the court, to enforce the final decree." It appears this is a well-considered direction of the court, for the same language is repeated in rule 4. The practice in the Massachusetts courts had long antecedently been in conformity with that provision, (Dunl. Adm. Pr. 301–303), and in this court, since 1838, execution issued summarily against stipulators if the original decree was not satisfied, (Dist. Ct. Rules, 59), although the stipulators were charged by distinct proceedings (Dist. Ct. Rules, 145). Under the supreme court rule, however, execution goes against stipulators upon the decree against the principal; the sureties subjecting themselves by force of their undertaking to abide and fulfil the decree against the principal. Conkl. Adm. Pr. 459–774. This practice may fall within the usages familiar also to courts of law and equity, of requiring parties who have a common interest in questions litigated in the same court, in several distinct causes, either by agreements or stipulations between themselves, or by express order of the court to abide the decision of the subject-matter made in one case only. Such judgment or decree thereby, has the same effect and is executed in like manner against all. The stipulator under this rule binds himself to pay the money decreed against the principal. There is nothing, therefore, left open for him to question, as between the original parties, after a final decree fixing the liability of the principal. If admonished or cited by sci. fa., he could not be permitted to set up error of any kind in the decree, or surrender the principal, or invoke prior execution upon his property, and all the advantage of such after-proceeding would be to afford delay to him in satisfying the terms of the decree. The court, however, accepts his undertaking as placing him in a common predicament with his principal, and as a submission of himself to the same processes upon the decree. Conkl. Adm. Pr. 774. The execution taken out in this case was, therefore, authorized by rule 4, and is in conformity with rule 21; and the objection to this method of proceeding cannot, therefore, be supported.[2] The term "summary," when used in relation to process, means "immediate; instantaneous." This in no way interferes with the authority of the court over it, whilst in progress of execution, but it is issued summarily in contradistinction from the ordinary course by emanating and taking effect, without intermediate applications or delays.

The last point discussed in the case relates to the effect of the non-imprisonment acts of congress and of this state, and whether a stipulator can now be made subject to arrest and imprisonment on execution upon a decree in the admiralty, for breach of a contract. A preliminary question was raised as to the regularity of the process issued, it being a fi. fa. against the property, with direction to arrest the person in case no property was found to satisfy the decree. This objection is not tenable. Under rule 3 of the supreme court, the stipulator becomes subject to the same decree and process with his principal, and this form of execution is authorized by

[2] See, also, on this point, Holmes v. Dodge [Case No. 6,637].

Sup. Ct. Rule 21. The two acts of congress abolishing imprisonment for debt on process issuing out of the courts of the United States, were passed February 28, 1839, and May 14, 1841 (4 Stat. 321, 410). The second act is supplementary to and declaratory of the first, and directs it to "be so construed as to abolish imprisonment for debt on process issuing out of any court of the United States, in all cases whatever, where, by the laws of the State in which said court shall be held, imprisonment for debt has been or shall hereafter be abolished." The act of 1839, in terms applied only to the laws of the states existing at the time of its enactment.

The Revised Statutes of New York, in force when both acts of congress passed, direct that no person shall be arrested or imprisoned on any civil process issuing out of any court of law, or any execution issuing out of any court of equity, in any suit or proceeding instituted, for the recovery of any money due upon any judgment or decree, founded upon contract, or due upon any contract, express or implied, or for the recovery of any damages from the non-performance of any contract. 1 Rev. St. 807, § 1. Regarding the state statute as thus incorporated into the act of congress, it would manifest the intention of the legislature to limit its application to arrests and imprisonments made on civil process issuing out of courts of law, and executions only issuing out of courts of equity. This court cannot enlarge the repealing force of the statute beyond the plain meaning of its language, nor suppose the legislature looked beyond the two descriptions of process specifically designated. The distinction between courts of law, equity, and admiralty, is pointedly marked in the constitution and laws of the United States. Const. art. 3; Process Acts of 1789. 1792, and 1828; 1 Stat. 93, 276. It is directed, that the forms of writs, executions, and other process, and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits in those of common law, shall be the same in each state, as used or allowed in the supreme court thereof, in those of equity, and in those of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction according to the principles, rules, and usages which belong to courts of equity and to courts of admiralty respectively, as contradistinguished from courts of common law. Act May 8, 1792; 1 Stat. 276, § 2. The act of May 19, 1828, is to the same effect in respect to states admitted into the Union since 1789 (4 Stat. 278); and section 3 of the latter act, which directs executions and final process issued on judgments and decrees rendered in any of the courts of the United States to conform to those of the state, plainly limits the decrees to those made by courts of equity. Manro v. Almeida, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 473; Hinde v. Vattier, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 398. Power is given the courts by these acts, to vary their processes at discretion, and so as to render them operative entirely beyond like process issued by state courts (Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 51), unless congress has regulated the subject by specific enactments (Duncan v. U. S., 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 435).

It is manifest upon this succinct summary of the acts of congress and decisions of the United States courts, that the state statute referred to has no application to arrests and imprisonments under process from courts of admiralty. Their practice remains as it was declared by the acts of 1789 and 1792, and as altered by the courts under the authorization of those acts and that of 1842, to be adverted to hereafter. Gardner v. Isaacson [Case No. 5,230]. On April 12, 1848, the legislature of New York passed an act "to simplify and abridge the practice, pleadings, and proceedings of the courts of this state." [71 Sess. Laws N. Y. 497.] By section 153 of that act, it is declared, that "no person shall be arrested in a civil action except as prescribed by this act," and then specifies the cases in which a defendant may be arrested; none of which include suits or contracts without fraud or deceit. A libel and warrant of arrest, in personam in admiralty, is a civil action within the proper classification of remedies; and this interdiction of arrest, in connection with the act of 1841, would give to defendants in admiralty the same exemption from arrest as defendants have under processes from the courts of law and equity. There is no doubt that congress may, by clear enactment, adopt the prospective legislation of the states, and impart to it the effect of an act of the national government. U. S. v. Paul, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 141. Upon the same principles, congress can confer on the United States courts power to regulate process in conformity to existing state laws, or direct it to be conformed to future legislation of the state upon the subject. Ross v. Duval, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 45. All regulations relating to processes of courts are regulations of practice. [Wayman v. Southard], 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1. In this, the United States jurisprudence is wholly distinct and independent of that of the states, and accordingly the local methods of proceeding govern the United States courts only in so far as they are sanctioned by authority of congress or the courts. This authority is expressed as well by rules which the courts are empowered to prescribe, as specifically by statutory enactment. The acts of congress to abolish imprisonment for debt, assume to act only over process, and are merely provisions regulating the practice of the United States courts. They are not placed upon high principles of humanity or public policy. They profess no more than a purpose to conform to the processes employed by the states where the courts exercise jurisdiction, forbidding the imprisonment of debtors when not allowed by the laws of one state, and permitting it wherever authorized by the laws of others. Accordingly, if the legislature of New York at its present session, should rescind the code of practice promulgated by the last, this provision, which is supposed to stand in connection with the act of congress of May 14, 1841 [supra], would eo instanti cease to have influence over the proceedings of the United States courts. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the act of congress of 1842, to ascertain whether this matter is not now withdrawn from the regulation of the state legislature, and specifically provided for by congress.

The act of August 3, 1842 (4 Stat. 518, § 6), confers upon the supreme court "full power and authority to prescribe and regulate and alter the forms of writs and other process to be used and issued in the district and circuit courts of the United States, and generally to regulate the whole practice of said courts." In January term, 1845, the supreme court adopted a body of rules governing the United States courts in admiralty proceedings, and the portions of those rules before cited fully appoint the form of process used in this case. The question then is, does the existing law of New York, in connection with the act of congress of May 14, 1841, prevent the operation of the act of August 23, 1842, and the rules of the supreme court established under its provisions? The act of congress of May 14, 1841, at the time of its passage, took effect the same as if it had incorporated the state enactment of 1848. It thus interdicted the arrest and imprisonment of parties prosecuted in matters of contract and debt in this court, suits in admiralty being civil actions. Upon the same principle, the rules of the supreme court of 1845, are to be regarded as acquiring the force and effect of a positive enactment. Congress can legislate prospectively through the action of the supreme court as well as that of a state legislature. Manifestly then, the act of 1842, carried out by embodying the rules of the supreme court of 1845, repeals or suspends so much of the act of 1841, and its complement of state laws, as stand in contradiction to it. The latter law regulates the form and effect of admiralty process, and reinstates the power of arrest and imprisonment under it for debt. The law of New York, passed subsequent to the act of 1842, cannot supplant or suspend the provisions and effect of the latter, and restore those of the act of 1841, congress having, by the act of 1842, substituted the supreme court in place of state legislatures as the law-making power in the future regulation of the processes and practice of the courts, the action of the court under that power necessarily annuls all antecedents and subsequent control of the state laws over the subject. So long as the supreme court rules remain unchanged by the court or congress, they must supply the absolute law of practice over the subject.

I do not enter into the discussion whether, upon this construction of the act of 1842, the supreme court may not also extend to courts of law and equity, the same power to arrest and imprison on process, that is given in admiralty cases. The point is not before me for adjudication; and although that is a legitimate and forcible consideration on weighing the probable meaning and intent of congress in the entire provision, it is not in my judgment of such force as to justify me in holding that the supreme court had misinterpreted their powers under the statute in relation to admiralty practice, or that the act of 1841 should be expounded to draw within its provisions cases clearly not covered by it at its enactment, and brought into existence by state legislation subsequent to the act of 1842, and the rules of the supreme court established under its authority. The known usage in the admiralty courts, up to the present time, to arrest for debt and hold to bail, or imprison for want of it, upon their processes, notwithstanding the acts of congress of 1839 and 1841, and the laws of state legislatures abolishing arrests and imprisonment for debt, is impressive evidence that congress acquiesced in the judgments of the courts, that those laws did not govern the practice in admiralty; more especially since the promulgation of the admiralty rules, in 1845, by the supreme court, in which the authority to arrest and imprison on admiralty process, was explicitly recognized and declared. And the practice having since been constant and open to arrest and imprison parties on mesne and final process, from the admiralty, it must be accepted that congress intended by the act of 1842, to place the regulation of this branch of practice under the direction of the supreme court, and not leave it subject to the changeable legislation of the states.

I accordingly pronounce against the motion on all the points raised, but they being of novelty and importance, the decision is without costs.

BANKRUPTCY — UNAUTHORIZED EXEMPTION MADE BY ASSIGNEE—EXCEPTION BY CREDITORS.

Where creditors claim that unauthorized exemptions are exempted to be made to the bankrupt by the assignee, they must except, under general order nineteen, to his report within the requisite time, as respects household furniture, necessary articles, &c., but as to real estate the attempted exemption is void, no title thereto passes from the assignee, and creditors need not except to the report but only to the account of the assignee, and hold him responsible for any deficiency.

[2] [District not given.]

The branch bank of Cape Fear, Fayetteville, North Carolina, creditor of said bankrupt [Elizur Gainey], by its attorney, John W. Hinsdale, excepts to so much of the schedule of exempted property filed by W. H. Morrow, assignee of the said bankrupt, on the 16th day of September, 1868, as sets apart to said bankrupt, as his own property, a homestead of fifty acres of land, described at length in said schedule, for the reason that the same is unauthorized by law. Question certified by Register Guthrie, to the judge for decision.

J. W. Hinsdale, for bank.

BROOKS, District Judge. The question presented by the certificate of Mr. Register Guthrie in this case, is the same presented from the Fourth district, in Re Harris [unreported], and in Re Farish [Case No. 4,647], and which have been fully answered by the opinion filed in the latter case. It is not necessary that I should repeat the same now. By the assignment of the register to the assignee of the bankrupt, Gainey, the title to the real estate attempted to be exempted passed to said assignee; the attempt to exempt was ineffectual; the title then remains in the assignee, and will so remain until the same shall be conveyed or divested in some one of the ways provided by law.

It is not required that exception shall be filed, and within the time prescribed, to the report of the assignee, to defeat the allotment of real estate as an exemption in this case. It would be otherwise if this exception was as to the value of articles comprehended by the terms "household or kitchen furniture, or other articles of necessaries." These exceptions must be made in the way, and also in the time, prescribed. But if an attempt be made to exempt a species of property which cannot be exempted (as real estate in the district of North Carolina, which was not saved from exemption by the laws in force in 1864), then no exception need be taken to the report of the assignee making such exemptions. But creditors may except to the account of such assignee, if he omits to account for the value of such property.

WITNESS—COMPETENCY—INTEREST—USURY.

1. In an action by the indorsee against the acceptor of an inland bill of exchange, the indorser is a competent witness for the defendant to prove usury in the plaintiff's discounting of the bill.

[Cited in Bank of Alexandria v. Clarke, Case No. 844.]

2. If a bill be drawn, accepted, and indorsed for the purpose of raising money upon it in the market for the use of the payee, and be put into the hands of a broker who obtains the money from the plaintiff upon it, at four per cent. per month discount, the transaction is usurious and the bill void.

Assumpsit against the acceptor of a bill drawn by John Wells, Jr., upon the defendant, and by him accepted payable to James Hodnett, or order, on the 29th of March, 1819, and indorsed by him and A. McIntire, for $350. The bill, having seventy-five days to run, was put into the hands of Mr. Nicholls, a broker, to raise money upon it for the use of the drawer. Mr. Nicholls procured the money upon it from the plaintiff, discounting $25 for the seventy-five days.

Mr. Marbury, for defendant offered Hodnett and McIntire, the two indorsers, as witnesses to prove usury; and cited Brard v. Ackerman, 5 Esp. 119; Chit. Bills, 397; and Jordaine v. Lashbrooke, 7 Term R. 601.

Mr. Key, contra. Those cases were decided upon the ground of state policy; but in this country the decisions have been contrary; namely, that a party on a note shall not be admitted to give evidence to destroy it. Coleman v. Wise, 2 Johns. 165.

Mr. Ashton, in reply, contended that the witnesses were competent to show any thing subsequent to the execution of the note, that would invalidate it. He admitted the bill to be good in its execution.

THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the objection and admitted the testimony.

Mr. Marbury, for defendant, then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the bill was drawn, accepted, and indorsed for the purpose of raising money upon it in the market, and was put into the hands of Mr. Nicholls by Mr. Hodnett, for that purpose, who procured the money from the plaintiff upon it, discounting $25 upon $350, the amount of the bill, which had seventy-five days to run, the transaction was usurious, and the bill void.

Which instruction THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) gave, upon the authority of the two cases cited by Mr. Marbury, namely, Jones v. Hake, 2 Johns. Cas. 60, and Wilkie v. Roosevelt, 3 Johns. Cas. 66; Id. 206.

Verdict for the defendant.

The plaintiff took a bill of exceptions to the instruction of the court to the jury, but not to the admission of the indorsers as witnesses for the defendant. No writ of error was prosecuted. The cause stood several terms upon a motion for a new trial on the ground of misdirection of the jury, but it was never brought to a hearing, and at October term, 1821, the cause was struck off by the plaintiff.

District Court, D. Michigan. Feb., 1859.

SEIZURE—CERTIFICATE OF PROBABLE CAUSE—PRACTICE—EVIDENCE IN SUPPORT.

1. A motion for a certificate of probable cause of seizure may be made subsequent to the decree, and upon the hearing of such motion the court is not limited to the evidence introduced upon the trial, but may receive any evidence tending to show that the collector acted upon a reasonable suspicion.

2. In determining the question, the court is not at liberty to consider the fact that the seizure was made at night, without proper warrant, and that the conduct of the officer was otherwise oppressive and cruel, as his certificate would not protect him in an action for a personal trespass. The court can only consider whether his action was malicious and groundless, or whether he acted upon a reasonable suspicion that the goods were smuggled.

3. The fact that the claimant was selling them at a low price in an obscure town, declaring them to have been imported, and that duty had been paid upon only a small portion, was held sufficient to justify their seizure.

Motion for certificate of probable cause.

Jos. Miller, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Alfred Russell, for claimant.

WILKINS, District Judge. The libel in this case embraced a large quantity of merchandise seized by the direction of the collector of the port of Detroit, in June 1857. The articles enumerated in the libel filled some twenty-two boxes, and consisted of gala plaid, merino, silks, dress goods, flannel, edging, muslin, lawn, silk veils, &c., in all numbering, in various quantities, some fifty different pieces and qualities of fancy merchandise of the value of about $1,000. The goods were all claimed by one John Larkin, who, with his family, emigrated to this country from England, in October, 1856.

The issue joined in the case was tried by a jury on the 14th of July, 1858, a little over a year after the seizure, and as appears by the record, no other testimony was introduced than that of Thomas Thayer, and Mary Ann Larkin, the daughter of the claimant. The former was the appraiser, called only to the identification of the articles.

The latter stated positively that all the goods enumerated in the libel were purchased from one Jackson, residing in a certain street in the city of New York, and as each article enumerated in the libel was separately called over by the district attorney, distinctly averred that the same was bought in New York, and she being the only witness for the government as to the fact of importation, the district attorney abandoned the prosecution. The jury gave a verdict that the allegations of the libel were not sustained, acquitting the goods, whereupon the court decreed a dismissal of the libel and a restitution of the property seized.

On the succeeding day a motion was made by the district attorney, in behalf of the collector, for a certificate of probable cause, under the acts of congress of 1799 [1 Stat. 627] and 1807 [2 Stat. 422]. The argument of the same was, by the stipulation of the proctors, postponed until the first week in November.

The practice of this court has generally been, on releasing after a hearing the property seized, to direct, with the decree dismissing the libel, this certificate of protection to the officer if the evidence warranted the presumption of a reasonable suspicion on his part that the goods had been illegally brought into the United States: the exoneration of this officer being placed by the law on the fact that, although the evidence did not warrant condemnation, yet there were sufficient circumstances disclosed to justify the seizure.

In this case the claimant was not called upon for any exculpatory evidence. The case was abandoned. The proctor of the claimant and the district attorney of the United States stipulated at a future day to present to the consideration of the court the present motion—a practice which does not meet the sanction of the court, which has led to much expense and confusion, and has only been tolerated with the view of doing justice to a public officer, who was not personally present at the seizure, and if any outrage was committed, either on the rights or feelings of others, is not at least morally amenable.

Had this course not been taken, I must have refused the certificate, for there was not, on the trial, a scintilla of evidence warranting suspicion.

When the motion came up for hearing, the district attorney offered in evidence the circumstances of suspicion upon which the collector directed the proceeding. This was objected to by claimant's counsel, on the ground that the trial was closed, and that it was not competent for the court on this motion to hear other proof, and that it was limited in the granting or refusing of this certificate to the testimony which had been submitted on the trial.

The testimony was heard under a reservation of the court, and after much consideration, I am satisfied that it was admissible at this stage of the proceeding, and on this motion, although the libel was dismissed and restitution decreed.

There is certainly nothing in the language of the statute that inhibits the motion being made subsequent to the rendition of the decree. In the case of U. S. v. Twenty-Six

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Diamond Rings [Case No. 16,572], the motion was made on a day subsequent to the dismissal of the libel, and Judge Sprague, it would seem, granted the certificate upon evidence of a fact, which if offered, was not pressed during the trial, namely, the concealment of the rings by the passenger when the manifest was made containing similar articles by the same person.

The statute does not limit the evidence to that offered upon the trial. It declares if it shall appear to the court before which such prosecution has been had that there was a reasonable cause of seizure, the court shall cause a proper certificate or entry to be made thereof—that is, the fact is to be certified. The time when the application is to be made for such certificate is not determined, and it is not clearly inferable as the intent of the act that such certificate should be based exclusively on the testimony offered antecedent to the decree. Had the statute declared that the final decree should embody such certificate, then the court could hear no other evidence than that given on the trial; but, omitting so to enact, the inference is strong that the design of congress was to enable the collector to come in at any time after judgment has been given for the claimant, and procure from the court the certificate contemplated, on such a showing as he may be enabled to make.

The statute prescribes that the court shall cause a proper certificate to be given or entry to be made. The alternative is with the court to give the one or direct the other—and it is not, therefore, a necessary part of the record—not an essential journal entry, and consequently not a part of the original proceeding, unless the court so chooses to order.

To sustain the prosecution, the evidence is given to the jury, under the direction of the court, and it is the evidence upon which their determination is made; but whether or not the prosecutor had probable grounds for instituting a suit, is another question, and solely for the action of the court, which may proceed to hear the matter, either during the progress of the trial after the testimony is in, or subsequently, upon the application of the officer for leave to exhibit his grounds of suspicion. The only direction of the act being that the subject-matter excusatory of the officer, and protective of him against the action of any other judicial tribunal, is, that such excuse shall be judged of by the court before whom the prosecution is had.

In the case of U. S. v. The Forrester [Case No. 15,132], the court acted at once on the application of the district attorney, the proofs on the trial being conclusive upon the point.

The court holding then that this inquiry may be properly gone into after the prosecution has closed, will now inquire into the sufficiency of the excuse set up and proved by the collector. It is alleged on the part of the applicant for this certificate, that the circumstance of vending these goods in an obscure town, but sparsely inhabited, distant from any large village or city, and selling them at a low price, under the declaration by the claimant, repeatedly made to purchasers before seizure, that he had brought them from the old country, and paid duty only upon part of them, was sufficient to warrant his suspicion and his official action. And it is further alleged that the place of deposit and mode of sale confirmed the impression that they had been fraudulently brought into the country.

There can be no doubt that on this application the court is confined to the circumstances existing prior to the seizure. It is an application based on an acquittal. The prosecution has failed to establish the charge, and that trial is ended.

The property has been released and restored, and the issue determined. The court, then, is to hear the cause of seizure, and nothing else. The court may be satisfied, on the testimony adduced on the application, that the district attorney was misled in abandoning the prosecution, that his witness was guilty of perjury, and that, had all the facts been brought to the notice of the court, a decree of condemnation must have been rendered. But all this is of no avail, except so far as corroborative of the circumstances of suspicion which led to the seizure.

Furthermore, I am satisfied that the conduct of the officer in making the seizure, cruel, uncivil, oppressive or otherwise, with or without warrant, has nothing to do with the merit of this application. It presents a single question to the court, and when resisted, a single issue, and that is: What were the grounds of suspicion which led the collector to direct his deputy to seize the merchandise in question? Was the seizure malicious and groundless, or had the officer a reasonable warrant of suspicion, based on circumstances and facts which came to his knowledge and existed prior to his official action in seizing the goods?

By the act of 1799, § 68 [supra], when the collector has cause to suspect a concealment of smuggled goods in a dwelling-house, he is bound to make application under oath to a magistrate, and obtain a search warrant, which can only be executed in the daytime, in obedience to the constitutional injunction, forbidding unreasonable searches, and guaranteeing the security of private dwellings. A seizure at night is unreasonable and prohibited, and these provisions so essential to peace and safety are re-enacted in 1815 (3 Stat. 232).

But the mode pursued by the officer, and his official action upon his suspicions, have nothing to do with the question whether his suspicions were groundless or otherwise. If the collector, having a just and reasonable suspicion, acts without warrant, or on an irregular warrant, or illegally in making the search at night, or oppressively in seizing what is not dutiable, such as articles of clothing, or commits a personal trespass, he certainly is amenable elsewhere to the parties injured, and is not protected by the certificate of the court, granted under the acts of 1799, 1807, or 1823 [3 Stat. 729].

Did I think so, I should be very loath to grant the certificate in this case. For although I am satisfied that the warrant is a genuine document, and not a forgery (as was supposed in the argument), yet I cannot sanction, by any act of mine, the conduct of Officer Cullen, in making an indiscriminate seizure of broadcloth and female chemises, of pantaloons, petticoats, French apparel, night-clothes, baby's clothes, &c., so completely stripping the apparel of the family that the children were left in nudity and the young women compelled to borrow from neighbors the requisite clothing for church.

Two exigencies are covered by the certificate: (1) The claimant cannot recover costs, although acquitted, because by his own conduct he misled the officer of the government. (2) He cannot recover damages in any action, because the proper tribunal determined that the officer was warranted in making the seizure. But, if the mode was unlawful and injurious, the certificate is but a blank piece of paper, as a shield of protection. The act of congress never designed to protect robbery, assault and battery, or midnight trespass under the cover of this certificate. It never designed to protect conduct forbidden by the statute itself. It means no more than this, that certain merchandise having been seized for a violation of the revenue laws, and that fact having been tried and the goods restored, the public officer had just grounds for his official action, and no costs are awarded to the claimant.

I recur then to the issue as stated, leaving with pleasure the outrageous conduct of the officer in performing his duty. In case of Locke v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 339, decided as far back as 1813, Judge Marshall says that the term "probable cause," as used by congress, does not signify prima facie evidence, which, in the absence of exculpatory proof, would justify condemnation, but simply evidence of circumstances which warrant suspicion. And, at a later period, what constitutes probable cause, was held by Judge Story, in The Rover [Case No. 12,091], to be a question of law for the court,—in the facts exhibited justifying the officer.

And, as a question of law, the circumstances of each particular case must govern the court. In the case of The Friendship [Case No. 5,125], a doubt as to the construction of the law by the officer was held to be a reasonable cause for seizure. In The George [Id. 5,328], Judge Story defines " 'probable cause' to import a seizure made under circumstances which warrant suspicion." And in the case of U. S. v. The Forrester [supra], this court held that the circumstances which occurred when the vessel was unladen at the dock, of the captain calling in the presence of the revenue officer, the merchandise, "Port Sarnia stuff," warranted his seizure.

In the case of U. S. v. Twenty-Six Diamond Rings [supra], a very slight circumstance induced Judge Sprague to grant the certificate, namely, that the claimant was apprised of the fact that the diamond rings had been entered by him on his manifest. When the steamer came to their moorings at Boston, the revenue officer was notified, by the captain, that there had been a robbery on board, and no passengers were to land until a legal search had been made. The claimant came to the purser on the deck, and handed him a small parcel, containing the twenty-six rings, with a request to enter the same on the ship's manifest. This being in the presence of the revenue officer, he at once seized them. The claimant had previously entered on the manifest four cases of jewelry. The question was, had the twenty-six rings been concealed? The court dismissed the libel, but held that the claimant was apprised of the fact that there was a manifest in which he had caused similar goods to be entered, and that, although he had not actually concealed the goods in question, the circumstance was sufficient to warrant the suspicion of the officer.

What are the circumstances in this case, as proved, on which the collector acted?

The informer, J. H. Terry, states to him by letter of the 20th of June, 1857, that the claimant is selling, in the vicinity of Tecumseh, at his dwelling-house, a large quantity of fancy goods, in all of the value of about $1,000. That he and his daughter say, that they recently brought these goods from England, on a greater part of which they did not pay duty; that upon certain artificial flowers duty was paid, but no duty on the residue. That the claimant was an Englishman recently come into the country; that he kept no store, but had the goods stored away in the garret of a one-story house; and that he was personally present, and heard, with other witnesses, the statement that they had not paid duty on them. Now, if this statement has been made out by the proof, there was sufficient ground for the seizure.

Terry himself was put upon the stand, and testified—that he was at the place where these goods were sold; that they were kept in the garret of a one-story house; that they consisted of the articles enumerated in the libel; that he heard Mary Ann Larkin say, that they did not pay duty on all the goods, and would sell cheap; that they had brought over from England twenty-two cases; that they had only paid duty on the artificial flowers; and that the reason why they escaped paying duty on all was that the officer did not know that they had any other goods.

This statement is corroborated by the evidence of Cullen, as to the account given to him by the claimant that the goods were brought from England, by the statement which he made to the collector himself when seeking the restoration of the property, by Holdrich, to whom claimant repeatedly said that the goods came from England, by Wheeler, who went to buy cloth, and to whom claimant said that he brought all the goods from England, and that he paid the duty only upon part, and by the affidavit of the claimant himself, made in October, 1857, in open court, when applying for the continuance of the cause, in which he solemnly states—"that he brought all the goods seized from Liverpool in the ship Bright, openly and without the least secrecy, and that he paid to the custom house officer at New York all the duties demanded, and that he could prove all these facts by his daughter Mary Ann and his fellow-passengers."

This affidavit was made on the 12th of October, 1857, and the daughter, as a witness on behalf of the government, swore on the trial, in July last, directly and particularly the reverse. One or the other is perjured. There is no room for charity, and the father's oath is supported by all the surrounding incidents of the case, by the declaration of the daughter to Terry, and by her testimony before the grand jury. It is true, the court must be governed on this application by the circumstances which led to the seizure; but the evidence of Cullen, Shoemaker, Holdrich and Wheeler, and the affidavit of the claimant are only used as corroborating, beyond all doubt, the testimony of Terry and the circumstances proved by him: That duty was not paid upon these goods, and that they could be sold cheap.

The circumstances of this case strongly illustrate the propriety of the ruling that the court should not, in all cases of seizure under the revenue laws, determine the propriety of the certificate on the facts elicited on the trial of the main issue.

Here the district attorney introduced only the evidence of the daughter of the claimant. Had he recollected, and called the attention of the court to this affidavit of John Larkin, the comparison between it and the barefaced, perilous, minute swearing of Mary Ann would have elicited from the court a course of procedure, calling peremptorily for the punishment of either the father or daughter for willful and corrupt perjury.

The court believed what appeared to be the frank statement of the woman, that each article was purchased in New York, and sympathized with the witness in the evident spoliation of part of her property, in a strange land, where she had sought a livelihood in the neighborhood of her relatives.

As the facts turn out, there should have been a condemnation. The proof then on file warranted it. The depositions of Dawson and Benedict, the custom house officers of New York, as to the non-payment of duty, the sworn avowal of John Larkin on file, and the proof of his declarations by Cullen, Wheeler, and Holdrich, with Mary Ann's avowal, would have overwhelmed her statement in court, and caused a condemnation. Motion granted.

The GALATEA.

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1871.

COLLISION IN HELL GATE—STEAMBOATS MEETING.

1. A steam-tug, with three barges loaded with coal fastened alongside, was going through Hell Gate eastward, on a flood tide, about half-past five o'clock on the morning of the 18th of December, 1869. She saw the lights of the G., a large propeller, coming westward, meeting her before she arrived at Negro Point, where the channel turns to the northward. She blew one whistle and was answered with one whistle. Both vessels had the proper lights, and the engines of both were stopped and reversed before the collision, which took place near Pot Rock, in the narrowest part of the channel, the vessels coming together nearly at right angles. The three barges were sunk by the collision: Held, that the steam-tug did not have too heavy a tow, and had a right to go through Hell Gate as she did, and went as far to the southerly side of the true tide as she could go, and was not in fault.

[See note at end of case.]

2. This being so, the G. was in fault, either in not stopping sooner than she did, or in not keeping to the northerly edge of the true tide.

E. H. Owen and T. C. T. Buckley, for libellants.

J. H. Choate, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. As the steam-tug Vim, a propeller, with three barges, loaded with coal, in tow of her, was proceeding from New York, through Hell Gate, on a voyage to New Haven, Connecticut, at about 5½ o'clock a. m., on the morning of the 18th of December, 1869, she encountered the steam propeller Galatea, then on a voyage from Providence to New York, directly off Negro Point, and between that and Pot Rock. The barges were lashed side by side with the Vim. The barge on the port side of the Vim was the Pottsville. On the port side of the Pottsville was the barge C. J. Hoffman. On the starboard side of the Vim was the barge Reading. The Vim, the Reading and the Pottsville belonged to the libellants Robert and Gladwish. The C. J. Hoffman belonged to the libellant McWilliams. The coal on board of the Reading and the Pottsville belonged to the libellants Benedict, Pardee and Benedict. A collision ensued, which resulted in the loss of the three barges and their cargoes, and this suit is brought to recover for such loss.

except as to the cargo of the C. J. Hoffman. The tide was at the middle of the flood, running with the Vim. It was not yet daylight, the night was clear and there was some moonlight. The Vim was 70 feet long and 17 feet wide. The barges were from 100 to 115 feet long, and carried an average of 300 tons of coal each. The Galatea was 245 feet long and 54 feet wide, and of 1,566 tons burthen. The starboard bow of the Galatea, a few feet abaft her stem, came in contact with the stem of the C. J. Hoffman, and the stem of the Galatea came in contact with the port bow of the Pottsville a few feet abaft the stem of the Pottsville. The Vim was not hit by the Galatea. Whether the Reading was hit by the Galatea is not clear. The barges projected ahead of the Vim. The Pottsville projected ahead of the C. J. Hoffman. As the result of the collision, the C. J. Hoffman and the Pottsville sank immediately, their bows being opened and their cargoes of coal being spilled out, as the water rushed in and their bows sank. The Reading got adrift, and was soon picked up by the Vim, and towed a short distance, but she was so injured, as the result of the collision, that she shortly sank.

The libel avers, that the Galatea saw the lights of the Vim when the Vim was opposite Astoria, and when the Galatea was on the east side of Ward's Island, and had not yet arrived at Negro Point; that, while the vessels were in these positions, the Vim blew one long whistle, for each vessel to keep to the right; that such signal was answered by one long whistle from the Galatea; that, when the Vim had got just above Hallett's Point, the Galatea blew one long whistle, which was answered from the Vim; that the Vim continued her course with her helm as far to port as was safe; that the rudder of the Galatea worked imperfectly, through an accident to her steering apparatus, and her propeller and keel had sustained injuries, and she was unable to be properly navigated in that part of the river, in view of the tide and other dangers of that navigation; that, owing to such defects and the want of proper care and skill on the part of those engaged in navigating the Galatea, the collision occurred; and that it was caused by fault and negligence, or the want of ordinary care and skill, on the part of those engaged in navigating the Galatea, and not by the fault, negligence or want of care of those in charge of the tug or of the tow. The libel avers, that the collision took place at or about Pot Rock, and while the tug and her tow were heading about east by south.

The answer alleges, that the Vim and the barges drifted down upon the Galatea, and struck her when she was not moving towards them, but had stopped and was backing her engine, after perceiving the danger of collision; that the collision occurred not at Pot Rock but about abreast of Negro Point, very near the shore; that the barges struck the Galatea on her starboard side a little abaft her stem, and thereby turned her around with her stern towards the shore, and the full force of the tide bearing upon her starboard side, so that her headway was lost, and she was drifted backward by the tide; that the Galatea and the Vim saw each other while the Galatea was abreast of Ward's Island, before arriving at Negro Point, and while the Vim with her tow were abreast of Hallett's Point or nearly so; that, while the vesels were in these positions, the Galatea blew one long whistle, for each vessel to keep to the right; that the Vim answered by one long whistle; that the claimants have no knowledge of any signal, prior to the one first given by the Galatea and answered by the Vim when she was about abreast of Hallett's Point; that, after such answer by the Vim, the Galatea put and kept her helm to port and kept to the right, very close to the shore on the right or north, or northeast side, and as close to the shore as it was at all safe or practicable for her to keep, and was in such position until and at the time of the collision; that the Vim did not, after her answering signal, continue or keep her course to the right, with her helm as far to port as was safe, or in anywise; that there was ample room for her with her tow, had she continued her course to the right as she ought to have done, to pass the Galatea far to the southward of her, and without coming near her, but, instead of keeping to the right or the southward, the Vim, with her tow, came across very near to the north or northeast shore, on her left; and that, when the collision occurred, the Galatea was so close to the shore on the north or northeast, which was her right side, that, on the sheer or turn which was caused to her on her bow being struck by the barges, her stern actually touched the rocks on the shore. The answer also alleges, that the collision was wholly attributable to the Vim with her tow having gone to the left instead of the right; that her doing so was either wilful or gross mismanagement, or was owing to her having a tow heavier than she had strength or capacity to manage, and consequently, becoming unmanageable, and being drifted out of her course by the force of the tide; that, as soon as the fact that the Vim and her tow were drifting or coming out of their proper course, and towards their left, and that there was danger of a collision, was discovered or discoverable on board of the Galatea, she keeping as close as possible to the north or northeast shore, her engine was slowed and stopped, the proper movements for backing were made, and all possible steps and precautions were taken to avoid a collision; that it occurred owing to the Vim and her tow coming and being carried so far out of their proper course, and so close to the north or northeast shore which the Galatea was hugging, and could not be avoided by any action on the part of the Galatea; that the steering apparatus of the Galatea was not disabled, and her rudder did not work imperfectly, and she had not sustained injuries to her propeller or her keel so that she could not be properly navigated; and that the collision was not due to any fault, misconduct or negligence on the part of the Galatea.

A great portion of the testimony taken on the trial was devoted to two points—the question whether the Vim could, without great peril, have gone to the southward of Pot Rock and to the right of the true tide; and the question whether there was any difficulty in steering the Galatea, arising from injuries to her propeller, her keel and the support of her rudder, which she had sustained two days previously by striking a reef of rocks off Tenth street, New York, in the East river. The evidence satisfactorily establishes, that the Vim, with her tows, could not, at half flood, have properly, or without peril, gone to the southward of Pot Rock, or to the right of the true tide. It also establishes, that there was no injury to the steering apparatus, or rudder, or propeller, or keel of the Galatea, which impaired or affected the facility of steering her. The case is, therefore, on the libel, left to the general allegation therein of fault and negligence, and the want of proper care and skill, on the part of those engaged in navigating the Galatea.

The testimony on the trial altogether negatives the statements in the answer, that it was the striking of the barges against the starboard side of the Galatea that turned her around with her stern to the shore; and that her headway was lost because she was turned around with her stern to the shore, and because the full force of the tide then bore upon her starboard side; and that, on a sheer or turn caused to the Galatea by the striking of her bow by the barges, her stern actually touched the rocks on the shore. The evidence shows, that, when the Galatea had just passed Negro Bluff, she saw the lights of the Vim, across the land at Negro Point, the Vim being then about abreast of Flood Rock; that the Galatea then gave one whistle; that the Vim replied by one whistle; that the Galatea shortly afterwards rang one bell and slowed; that, her helm being amidships, she kept it so till she reached Negro Point, when she hove it hard aport; that the vessels continued to approach each other until they had arrived within 500 or 600 feet of each other, when, the Galatea seeing the Vim and her tows coming rapidly with the tide, and presenting the port side of the port tow to view, the Galatea's engine was stopped; that, shortly afterwards, the engine of the Galatea was reversed; and that, as soon as the back motion of her engine commenced, her wheel still being kept hard aport, her head began to fall off to the south of west, and continued to fall off more and more rapidly as the tide began to take effect on her starboard bow, until, by the time of the collision, the head of the Galatea had fallen off four or five points. Her pilot says, that he hauled up around Negro Point, by porting, to a little north of west. A falling off of from four to five points from that, would bring her head, at the time of the collision, to southwest or southwest by south. The course of the tide was about east. The heads of the Vim and her tows, and of the Galatea were at about right angles to each other at the time of the collision. This would make the Vim and her tows head, then, southeast or southeast by east. The master of the Galatea says, that the Vim and her tows headed about east-southeast, a variation to the east of from one to two points; and the pilot of the Galatea says, that the Vim and her tows headed south-southeast, a variation to the south of from two to three points. The evidence also shows, that the Galatea continued backing for some time after the collision, and that, drifting with the tide on her starboard side, she touched bottom finally to the eastward of Negro Point, with her stern. It is fully established, that it was the backing of the Galatea before the collision, and not the blow of the collision, which turned the Galatea athwart the tide; that she, a vessel 245 feet long was, before the collision, turned across the tide, so that she was at an angle to it of about 45 degrees, in a channel-way where the width of the tide where vessels go, between Pot Rock and Negro Point, is about 300 feet; that her headway was lost by her stopping, and by the force of the opposing tide, and by her backing, and not by her being turned around as the result of the backing, or by the effect of the tide on her starboard side; and that she did not touch any rocks through any effect produced on her by the collision.

The contention on the part of the Galatea is, that the Galatea was on the northerly edge of the true tide off Negro Point, and at the place where she began to back, and as far to her right as she could safely go; that she had left nearly the whole width of the true tide to her left, for the passage of the Vim and her tows; that the Vim and her tows came drifting down with the tide, on the northerly edge of the true tide, and directly in the course of the Galatea, in violation of the agreement made by the signal whistles, heading, indeed, to the eastward and southward, but making no progress in that direction, because the Vim had not power enough to control the load she was towing; that, before the Galatea began to back, a collision was inevitable; that, if she had not backed, she would have struck the C. J. Hoffman about amidships on the port side of the latter, and would probably have destroyed the Vim herself, as well as all the barges; that the backing of the Galatea was a proper movement, and mitigated the force of the collision; that she would have been in fault, under the statute, if she had not reversed; and that, even if her backing was an error of judgment, it was not a fault, because it was a movement made in the moment of peril, to avoid a collision brought about by the fault of the Vim in keeping to the north, after she had agreed to keep to the south.

On the part of the libellants, it is contended, that the Galatea knew that the Vim could not pass to the southward of Pot Rock, and could not stop her headway when going with such a tide, and that the vessels would meet at about Pot Rock; that, therefore, the greatest caution was required on the part of the Galatea; that it ought to have been apparent to the Galatea, very soon after the Vim responded to her signal, that, if she kept on, merely slowing, she would meet the Vim at or near Pot Rock, in about the narrowest part of the tide-way; that, therefore, the Galatea, going against the tide, and so having control of herself, ought not merely to have slowed before reaching Negro Point, but ought to have stopped entirely before reaching there; that she could have safely done so; that, although her wheel was ported at Negro Point, it was so ported only to turn the Point; that such porting did not carry her to the northerly edge of the true tide; that she was not north of the middle of the true tide when she began to back; and that she was in fault in throwing herself across the tide by backing.

It is impossible to determine the question of the fault of the Galatea, without first considering the question of the fault of the Vim. The Vim had her proper lights set and burning. Her tow was properly made up and fastened to her, and it is shown to have been, in weight and burden, not equal to what she was in the habit of carrying safely through Hell Gate. She had a right to go through at half flood tide, and it was not unusual or improper to do so. If it required more care and caution than at any other stage of the flood tide, or than at slack water, that fact was or ought to have been known to the Galatea, and she knew, when she whistled, that the Vim was a tug with tows, coming with a flood tide that was running at the rate of seven knots an hour. When the Vim responded to the whistle of the Galatea, the engine of the Vim was slowed, and her helm and the helms of her barges were ported, and, soon afterwards, and when the position of the Galatea was seen, the engine of the Vim was stopped, and reversed. I think the weight of the evidence is, that the Vim and her tows were as far towards the southerly edge of the true tide as they could be required to go, in the dangerous and intricate navigation of the strait. If there was not room to the north for the Galatea to pass in safety, then it was the duty of the Galatea not to have allowed herself to meet the Vim where she did meet her. The Vim was going with a seven-knot tide and could not stop. The Galatea was a powerful steamer, going against the same tide, and could have stopped and remained in a line with the tide, at a point much further to the eastward, and where the channel was wider, and where she could have hauled to a further distance to the north, from the southerly edge of the true tide, and she could have refrained from presenting her starboard side to the action of the tide. The fact that the Galatea was, at the time of the collision, heading about southwest, while the tide was running about east, and that the tide-way was about 300 feet wide, and that the Galatea was 245 feet long, and that the extreme port bow of the extreme port barge struck the starboard side of the Galatea as far forward on that side as about six feet abaft of the stem of the Galatea, is satisfactory evidence, to my mind, that the Vim and her tows were well over to the southerly edge of the true tide, and as far over as could be required of them. I can see no fault on the part of the Vim. This being so, the conclusion necessarily follows that the Galatea was in fault, either in not stopping sooner than she did, or in throwing herself athwart the tide to the southward or in not keeping to the northerly edge of the true tide, or in not keeping her stem to the north of west, or in all of these particulars.

There must be a decree in favor of the several libellants, with costs, with a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the damages sustained by them severally by means of the collision.

[NOTE. The cause was next heard on exceptions to the commissioner's report, which exceptions were overruled, and a decree entered for libellants for the sum of $13,123.21 (Case No. 5185), and respondents thereupon appealed to the circuit court, where a decree was entered reversing the decree of the district court, and dismissing the libel (case not reported). On libellants' appeal, the supreme court reversed this decree, and remanded the cause, with directions to affirm the decree of the district court. Mr. Justice Clifford, in delivering the opinion of the court, after remarking that the evidence was satisfactory that the two vessels came to a distinct and clear understanding, by their signals, that each should port its helm, held that the steam-tug took every necessary step to carry that understanding into effect, and that she was as near to Pot Rock as the character of the navigation would safely allow. Concluding, the learned justice remarked that, "in the light of the whole evidence, the court is clearly of the opinion that the propeller was wholly in fault, and that the collision was occasioned by the negligence and want of due care on the part of those in charge of her navigation." COLLISION—DAMAGES—EXCEPTIONS.

1. Two barges, loaded with coal, were sunk by a collision in Hell Gate. The commissioner to whom it was referred to ascertain the damages caused by the collision reported certain sums as being the value of the barges and their cargoes, as being totally lost. The claimants excepted to the report, on the ground that no proper or suitable efforts were made to raise the barges: Held, that the exception must be overruled, because it appeared, on the evidence, that reasonable exertions were made to raise the vessels and save the cargoes by the use of such nautical skill as owners of vessels usually employ in such emergencies.

2. It appeared that a small quantity of coal was raised from the wreck, and appropriated to his own use by the libellants' agent: Held, that the libellants, and not the claimants, were chargeable with the loss of this coal.

3. The report of the commissioner reported a certain sum for freight on the cargoes. The claimants excepted to the allowance of that amount, on the ground that no deduction had been made from the gross freight for the expenses of completing the voyage: Held, that, as it did not appear from the report how the commissioner arrived at the sum which he allowed, or that he did not make the deduction referred to, the exception would not lie. The report should have been excepted to, as not stating the principle on which the sum was allowed, or a motion should have been made to send the report back for correction.

[Cited in The Gorgas, Case No. 5,623.]

[This was a libel by Frederick Robert and others against the propeller Galatea for damages resulting from a collision between the propeller and the steam tug Vim, by which three barges in tow of the Vim were sunk. A decree was rendered for the libellants (Case No. 5,184), and the cause referred to a commissioner to ascertain the damages.]

T. C. T. Buckley, for libellants.

C. H. Tweed, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The first and second exceptions on the part of the claimants relate to the barge Reading and her cargo of coal. The first exception is to the allowance of $2,000 as the value of the Reading at the time of the collision, and is made on the ground that "no proper or suitable efforts to save the said barge, after the collision, were made by the libellants, and there was no evidence showing that she might not have been raised and repaired for a sum less than her value when repaired," and on the ground that "the final loss of the said barge was occasioned by the negligence, fault and improper conduct of the libellants in reference to the same, subsequent to the collision." The second exception is to the allowance of the value of the cargo of the Reading at the time of the collision, on the ground that her cargo "might have been raised and saved for an amount less than its value when saved, and no proper or suitable efforts to raise or save the same were made in behalf of the libellants, and the same was finally lost by reason of the negligence, fault and improper conduct of the libellants, in reference thereto, after the collision."

The allegations of fact contained in these exceptions are not sustained by the evidence. The principle decided in the case of The Baltimore, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 377, is not applicable to this case, on the facts proved. In the case of The Baltimore, there was no proof of the fact of a total loss, further than that the vessel sank. The court said, in that case: "Evidence that the injured vessel is sunk is not of itself sufficient to show that the loss was total, nor is it sufficient to justify the master and owner in abandoning the vessel or the cargo, unless it appears that the circumstances were such that the vessel could not be raised and saved, or that the cost of raising and repairing her would exceed or equal her value after the repairs were made." It also said that the full value of vessel and cargo cannot be given as damages, on the ground of a total loss, "where, by reasonable exertions, the vessel may be raised and the cargo saved by the use of such nautical skill as the owners of vessels usually employ in such emergencies;" that the party injured must employ "reasonable measures" to stop the progress of the damage, and must not "wilfully and obstinately, or through gross negligence," suffer the damage to augment; and that the party in fault for the collision is not liable "for such damages as might have been reasonably avoided by the exercise of ordinary skill and diligence, after the collision, on the part of those in charge of the injured ship."

In the present case, there is much more proof of a total loss than merely that the vessel and cargo sank. The vessel and cargo were not abandoned. Reasonable exertions were made to raise the vessel and save the cargo, by the use of such nautical skill as the owners of vessels usually employ in such emergencies. The exertions were reasonable as to promptness, in view of the fact that the sinking took place in the middle of the month of December. They were reasonable as to character and extent, considering the fact that the sinking was in the swift tideway of Hell Gate. The usual appliances were employed, and the matter was put in charge of persons of competent skill. The result goes to prove the fact of total loss, and not the want of reasonable exertion.

The claimants do not appear to have had credit for the few tons of coal which were taken out of the wreck, six to ten tons. It fairly comes within the second exception, as lost by the improper conduct of the libellants. Their agent, after saving it, appropriated it to his own use.

The third exception of the claimants is to the allowance of $475.10, as and for the freight on the cargoes of the Reading and Pottsville, on the ground that "no deduction has been made from the gross freight on such voyage, for the expenses which would have been incurred by the owners of said barges, in having them towed by the Vim, upon the voyage on which they were engaged at the time of the collision." It does not appear, from the report of the commissioner, how he arrived at the sum of $475.10, or that he did not make the deduction referred to in the exception. This should appear by his report, before the exception above set forth will lie. The report should have been excepted to, as not stating the principle on which it allowed the $475.10, and how that amount was made up, or a motion should have been made to send back the report for correction, in those particulars. A report either for a gross sum, or for gross items, should be accompanied by an explanation of the principles on which the sums are given, if it is intended to question those principles by exception. The court is not called upon to conjecture the principles, by examining the evidence to see what the principles may probably have been. They must be stated in the report. The report must state explicitly whether the deduction referred to was made, or must state facts, as found by the commissioner, from which no other conclusion can be drawn than that he made no such deduction. The proper practice is laid down in the case of Murray v. The Charming Betsey, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 64, 124.

The same view disposes of the fourth exception of the claimants, which is to the allowance of $80, as and for the towage to be earned by the tug-boat Vim, from the owners of the barge Hoffman, on the ground that "no deduction has been made therefrom, for the expenses which would have been incurred by the owners of said tug-boat in earning such towage." It does not appear from the report how the commissioner arrived at the sum of $80, or that he did not make the deduction named in the exception.

All the exceptions on the part of the claimants, must, therefore, be overruled, save the second one, in the particular above stated, as to which a proper deduction must be made, but the report furnishes no means of stating what the deduction should be.

The first and second exceptions of the libellants Robert and Gladwish are to the effect that the report, in allowing $2,000 as the value of the Reading, and $2,000 as the value of the Pottsville, at the time of the collision, ought to have allowed more as the value of the two boats, and ought to have allowed at least $6,000 as their value. The first and second exceptions of the libellant McWilliams are to the effect, that the report, in allowing $3,000 as the value of the C. J. Hoffman, at the time of the collision, ought to have allowed more, and ought to have allowed at least $4,300. An examination of the evidence satisfies me, that the allowance in respect to each of the three boats is sufficient.

The third exception of the libellants Robert and Gladwish is, that the report should have allowed $594.97, as the net freight on the Pottsville and Reading, instead of $475.10; and the third exception of the libellant McWilliams is, that the report should have allowed $179.68, as the net freight on the C. J. Hoffman, instead of $125.68. As the report does not state whether the items allowed are net freight or gross freight, and, if net freight, how the sums were arrived at, and on what principles, and what deductions were made from gross freight, these exceptions present no point for consideration, and are overruled.

[NOTE. Subsequently, the claimants appealed to the circuit court (case unreported), where the decree of the district court was reversed, and the libel dismissed. The decree of the circuit court was reversed by the supreme court. The Galatea, 92 U. S. 439. See note to Id., Case No. 5,184.]

Case No. 5,186.

The GALAXY.

[Blatchf. & H. 270.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. May 13, 1831.

SALVAGE—AMOUNT—DERELICT—DIVISION BETWEEN OWNERS AND CREW.

1. In a case of derelict, where there are no peculiar circumstances, courts of admiralty award of moiety as salvage.

[Cited in The John Wurts, Case No. 7,434.]

2. In distributing the salvage money, in a case where the salving vessel was exposed to no extraordinary risk or unnecessary deviation from her voyage, and where the salvage amounted to less than $2,000, one-fourth was awarded to the owners of the salving vessel, and the remaining three-fourths were divided among her master and crew—the master receiving four shares, the mate two shares, and seven seamen, including the cook, one share each.

This was a libel in rem, for salvage, against the schooner Galaxy. The facts were these: The Galaxy sailed from Baltimore on the 4th of April, 1831. On the 16th of that month, off Cape Hatteras, she encountered a gale of wind, in which her masts and spars were carried away. Her master and crew remained by her until the 18th, endeavoring to work her into some port, and refused to leave her, although spoken by two vessels, and urged to do so. On the 18th, they abandoned her in latitude 35° 30′ N., and were taken into Charleston by a vessel called the Invincible. On the 20th, the Galaxy was discovered and boarded by the brig Union, in latitude 36° 9′ N., and longitude 72° 50′ W. She was then a complete wreck. Her spars, sails and anchors were all gone, and nothing could be found on board indicating where she sailed from, where she was bound, or to whom she belonged. She had a full cargo, consisting of flour, whiskey, hams, &c., which had received no injury; and it was resolved, by the master and crew of the Union, to attempt to save the vessel and cargo. Jury-masts were accordingly rigged, necessary sails were supplied from the Union, two or three men were put on board the wreck, and she was taken in tow by the Union. Both vessels arrived safely at New-

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and Francis Howland, Esq.]

York on the 24th of April. The Union was on a voyage to New-York.

BETTS, District Judge. The claimants do not deny that this is a proper case for the allowance of salvage. They only insist upon circumstances which they suppose should diminish the allowance. These are, that the Union was not diverted from her course or delayed; that no lives were saved from the wreck; that no additional hazard of life or health was imposed on the salvors, by their efforts to save the vessel; and that she was towed easily into this port in about four days.

Another particular is brought to the notice of the court, which, if proved, would deprive the salvors of all claim to salvage, namely, that there has been an embezzlement by them of some part of the cargo of the Galaxy. It appears, by the marshal's account of sales, that twenty-three barrels of flour and one barrel of whiskey less than the bills of lading given by the master of the Galaxy expressed, were found on board. So, also, some hams and dried beef were missing. The master of the Galaxy proves, that the Invincible, which took him and his crew off the wreck, took away thirteen barrels of flour, and, he believes, some hams and dried beef, for fear her provisions would be short for the whole company then on board. Not only does each individual of the crew of the Union deny that anything was taken by that vessel out of the wreck, but their testimony is very fully supported by that of a passenger on board the Union, who has no interest in this suit. If any embezzlement occurred after the wreck arrived at this port, it could be proved by the pilot, and by other officers who were constantly on board until her arrest in this case; but they have none of them been examined by the claimants. The wreck had been abandoned two days or more, before she was fallen in with by the Union. In that interval, as she was directly in the track of coasting vessels, she may have been boarded by other vessels, or the Invincible may have removed a greater quantity of supplies than the master of the Galaxy was apprised of or recollects, or the bills of lading may not have stated the true quantity on board. The testimony does not, in my judgment, fix the embezzlement upon the salvors, and they cannot be denied compensation for that cause.

The services of the libellants were eminently meritorious and important to the wreck. She had been wholly abandoned, and was left in a condition which must very soon have resulted in her total loss. She was navigated for three or four days, with great fatigue to the crew of the Union, and with some considerable degree of exposure both to them and their vessel. For, by dividing the crew, each vessel was so short manned as to require every individual to be constantly on duty, and an occurrence of boisterous weather would, probably, have been fatal to both vessels. The labor and hazard incurred in saving this property were, therefore, such as courts of admiralty always favor. The rate of compensation rests in the discretion of the court, and is made to conform to the particular equities of the case. It accordingly varies, in a case of derelict, from a very trifling per centage upon the property saved, to two-thirds of its value. Judge Story collects a numerous list of cases on the subject, and concludes that, in cases of derelict, courts of admiralty adhere to a moiety as the favorite amount, and require some peculiar circumstances to vary it. Abb. Shipp. (Story's Ed. 1829) 397, note 1. I perceive nothing in this case to vary the allowance from that standard. The reward it affords is sufficient compensation for the services performed, and is a reasonable premium to induce the rescue from like peril, of property similarly circumstanced. I shall, accordingly, after deducting from the gross proceeds the costs of the libellants and of the officers of court, decree to the salvors one-half of the net proceeds of the vessel and cargo.

The next inquiry respects the distribution of the salvage-money amongst the salvors. The vessel is entitled to share in the distribution on account of her services in the adventure; but the ratio in which the vessel shall take, as amongst the salvors, seems no more determinate than the one by which the salvage itself is to be measured. The vessel was the essential instrument in effecting the salvage, and shares as salvor because put to risk in the adventure; and, as an inducement to owners to permit their masters to use their ships in the relief of vessels or property wrecked, or in imminent peril, it is meet that owners should participate in the benefit in some ratio to the hazard and value of their property so exposed. Where the risk of the vessel is extreme, and the salving vessel and cargo are of large value, the owner's share should be proportionably enlarged. In the case of The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240, the court allowed the owners of the vessel and cargo one-third of the amount of salvage decreed. The exposure of the vessel in that case was greatly beyond that incurred by the Union; and, accordingly, that case aids the decision of this only by indicating that the measure of reward to the salving vessel should be generous. Where a master, in charge of a valuable vessel and cargo, abandoned his voyage to bring in a wreck found derelict, and the owner protested against his conduct, and immediately displaced him from his command, I considered the merit of the salvage service to belong to the vessel, and held that the master and his crew ought to receive no more than a quantum meruit for their services as laborers. The Waterloo [Case No. 17,257]. But there is no exception, in this case, to the conduct of the master and crew. The owner of the Union appears in court as a witness in support of their claim, and it must, therefore, be assumed that he ratifies and approves their conduct.

It does not appear whether or not the Union and her cargo were insured. But, if they were, and if the policy was forfeited, the deviation was merely technical. There was no wilful misconduct in the crew. The Union did not leave her voyage; but, finding this wreck off the coast, in the direct track of her homeward route, towed it into her port of destination. The Union and her cargo were valued by her owner at about $30,000. The wreck and her cargo brought, at auction, about $4,000. Had the vessels been of about equal value, the allowance to the salving vessel would be proportionably less. Under all the circumstances, I shall direct one-fourth of the amount of the salvage to be paid to the owner of the Union, and the remaining three-fourths to be divided into thirteen equal shares, to be distributed as follows—four shares to the master, two shares to the mate, and one share to each seaman, including the cook.

INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNMENT BY PARTNERS—PREFERENCES.

[A firm of merchants doing business at New Orleans and at Clarksville, Tenn., was composed of four members, two of whom resided at the former place and two at the latter. One of the partners at Clarksville, with the assent of the other, made a deed of assignment of the firm property to secure part only of the creditors. The New Orleans members had no previous knowledge of the assignment, and dissented from it as soon as they heard of it. Held, that the assignment was void under the bankruptcy act of 1841 (5 Stat. 440), as creating a preference; that it was an act of bankruptcy on the part of the Clarksville partners, and brought them and their effects under the operation of the bankrupt law, on the petition of their creditors; that the New Orleans partners were not personally affected by reason of the assignment; but that the firm and the partners, being insolvent, must, by reason of their insolvency, be declared bankrupts, under section 14 of the act.]

[Cited in Ex parte Hull, Case No. 6,856.]

Before BROWN, District Judge.

It appeared that Galbraith, Cromwell & Co. were partners in trade at Clarksville, and under the firm of Galbraith, Logan & Co., at New Orleans, La. In the month of April they failed in business and became insolvent. About the time of their failure Cromwell, one of the firm and the active partner at Clarksville, made an assignment of the partnership effects to secure certain creditors, leaving unprovided for a large debt due to the Planter's Bank, M'Keage, and other creditors. The claims of the preferred creditors amounted to upwards of $80,000, and the claims left out of the deed of trust to $100,000. Logan, one of the firm, was privy and consented to the assignment made by Cromwell; the other partners, Galbraith and Greenfield, were at New Orleans, and knew nothing of it when made, and dissented to the transfer of effects as soon as they heard of it.

It was held that the preference given by Cromwell in the deed of assignment made for the benefit of a part of the creditors, was in violation of the bankrupt law [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)], and on account of this preference the debtors being merchants, it was a fraud on the part of Cromwell and also on the part of Logan who consented to the transfer; that it was an act of bankruptcy on their part, and brought them and their effects under the operation of the bankrupt law on the petition of their creditors; that the deed of transfer made by Cromwell was utterly void; that Galbraith and Greenfield, who had no knowledge of the deed at the time it was executed, and dissented from the transfer as soon as they heard of it, were not personally affected by the act of Cromwell, and that they had not therefore committed an act of bankruptcy; and that Galbraith, Cromwell & Co., and the partners composing the firm being insolvent and partners in trade, the whole of the partners must be declared bankrupts by reason of their insolvency under the 14th section of the act of congress in relation to bankruptcies, and a decree was entered accordingly.

At law.

Wall & Ewing, for plaintiff.
Mr. McIlvaine and Richard Stockton, for defendant.

Mr. Wall moved to amend the declaration, by adding two new counts, one laying a demise by the state of New Jersey, and the other by a Mr. Hall. He referred to an act of the legislature of this state, passed at their last session, authorising the governor to prosecute and defend any suit for trying the jurisdictional line between this state and Delaware. The land in controversy, (an island in the Delaware river) was granted by the state of Delaware to the United States, on which a fort is erecting under the command of the defendant. The counsel also produced a letter from the governor, authorising this motion. In support of the motion, the following cases were referred to: [Blackwell v. Patton] 7 Cranch. [11 U. S.] 477, 478; 2 Caines, 260, 261; 5 N. J. Law, 851; Adams, Ej. 200–203.

The defendant's counsel stated that this cause had originally been brought in the state court, and was removed into this upon the ground that the plaintiff claims under a grant from the state of New Jersey, and the defendant under a grant from the state of Delaware; and they contended: (1) That the cause being at issue, and the amendments being to introduce entirely new titles, the motion is unprecedented. (2) That the act of assembly does not authorise the governor to interfere in this suit, the jurisdictional limits of this state not being in question.

THE COURT overruled the motion. The practice of amending declarations in ejectment by introducing new titles, would be highly inconvenient, and is altogether unnecessary; as distinct ejectments may be brought to try them. None of the cases cited are as strong as the present, and the court feels no disposition to encourage motions of this sort, particularly after the cause is at issue. Besides, this kind of action is instituted not by writ, but by service of the declaration on the tenant in possession, from which alone he is informed of the subject in controversy, and which he is to prepare himself to combat. In the instructions given to the counsel by the governor, he professes to act under the act of assembly; but it is perfectly clear that this case is not embraced by the act, as the jurisdiction of New Jersey can in no respect be involved in this action, or be affected by the decision either way. For whether the plaintiff or defendant prevails, the judgment can only affect the right to the soil, which is not claimed by New Jersey. The right of jurisdiction can only be settled by a suit between the two states. The amendment, in respect to the demise by the state of New Jersey, would be to make that state a party plaintiff in the cause, and the circuit courts of the United States have not jurisdiction in cases between a state and its own citizens, or citizens of other states; the judiciary law not having extended the jurisdiction to such cases. Motion overruled.

Cowles & Krum, for plaintiff.
Mr. Strong, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a motion for a new trial [in the suit of Gale against Norris and Burr], and it turns upon exceptions taken to a deposition at the last term, which was then, on the trial of this case, admitted in evidence. The motion was continued from that term. The deposition was introduced to prove a book account of the plaintiff, who resides at New Orleans, where the transactions, which led to this suit, were had, and where the books of the plaintiff now are. The witness states that he was clerk in the commission house of the plaintiff, at New Orleans; that he has examined the accounts on the book, and the items copied by him, and particularly designated, are correct. They are items advanced by the plaintiff to fit out a vessel, &c., and of which he had personal knowledge. There are some other items charged in gross, to wit: one for $361, and others, amounting to $700, which were entered by the bookkeeper, who is now deceased. Of these items the witness has no personal knowledge. They are such articles as are usually furnished on similar occasions, and they are set down at the customary prices; but the witness knows nothing of their delivery. This deposition was permitted to be read as evidence at the last term, and the question now is, whether it should have been admitted.

Books of accounts are not evidence at common law. But books are received as evidence under peculiar circumstances; as, where the entries have been regularly made by a clerk, who is deceased. In many of the states this subject is regulated by statute, and, in others, there have been certain rules established as to the admission of books in evidence, not entirely in accordance with the established law of evidence. The leading case on this subject is Lord Torrington's, reported in 1 Salk. 285. In that case it was held that, in an action of assumpsit, where the usual course of the plaintiff's dealings, who was a brewer, appeared to be, that his drayman should come every night to the clerk of the brewhouse, and give him an account of the beer delivered out by them, which he set down in a book kept for the purpose, and the drayman signed it. The drayman died: his entries, signed by him, were held to be good evidence, on proof of his hand-writing. If the person, who made the entry, was employed as shopman or clerk to deliver goods, &c., and he is since dead, an entry made by him will be evidence, under certain restrictions. Cooper v. Marsden, 1 Esp. 2, 3. The entries in a book are rejected, on the ground that they are mere hearsay, and can only be made evidence by some extrinsic circumstance. Some of the English authorities considered the evidence admissible, in Lord Torrington's Case, on the ground that the entry was made against the interest of the party making it. However this may have been viewed in certain cases, it is not the light in which the principle of that case has been generally considered. The rules of evidence were formed and modified to meet the exigencies of human transactions, and to conduct the mind to truth; that they should be matured and expanded, so as to meet the complicated and growing relations of society, was to be desired and expected. But these rules are not to be lightly departed from. Where they fail to meet the endless variety of facts in cases which arise, they afford principles susceptible of expansion, so as to apply to the leading facts in every controversy.

Mere entries in a book of accounts are not evidence, whether made by the party himself or his clerk. But where entries were made by a party against himself, they were held to be evidence, in case of his death. This was upon the ground, that he could have had no motive to make a false entry. And this principle was eventually applied to a clerk, where his entries were regularly made, and the books, upon their face, were fair. In the case of Nicholls v. Webb, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 337, the court say: "We think it a safe principle, that memorandums made by a person in the ordinary course of his business, of acts or matters which his duty in such business requires him to do for others, in case of his death, are admissible evidence of the acts and matters so done. It is, of course, liable to be impugned by other evidence, and to be encountered by any presumptions or facts which diminish its credibility or certainty." And it is now fully settled, that the entries of his deceased clerk, in the books of a merchant, are evidence in his behalf, the hand-writing being proved. Clarke v. Magruder, 2 Har. & J. 77; Welsh v. Barrett, 15 Mass. 386; Brown v. Brown, 2 Wash. (Va.) 151; Union Bank v. Knapp, 8 Pick. 96; Patton's Adm'rs v. Craig's Adm'rs, 7 Serg. & R. 126; Hood v. Reeve, 3 Car. & P 532; Halliday v. Martinet, 20 Johns. 168; Wilbur v. Selden, 6 Cow. 162.

Had the books of the plaintiff been before the court, the entries in the hand-writing of the deceased clerk would have been evidence, his hand-writing being proved. But the paper, attached to the deposition, contained a copy from the books. So far as the deponent could swear to the items delivered, this copy was a part of the deposition; but it was no evidence of the articles charged, of which the deponent had no knowledge. This paper, in regard to these articles, was incompetent evidence, on two grounds: First, it was a mere copy from the books; and, in the second place, some of the entries are in gross, not specifying the items. A new trial must, therefore, be granted. As the books of the plaintiff are at New Orleans, some inconvenience may arise from this decision. If his books are so connected that he can not, without injury, bring them to this court, it might, perhaps, be deemed proper by the court to appoint a commissioner to examine the books, and take testimony respecting them. This, however, is a mere suggestion, and not a settled rule of practice.

GALE et al. v. SAUERWEIN.

[1 Hughes, 332.] [1]

INTERNAL REVENUE—DUTY ON TOBACCO—PAYMENT UNDER PROTEST—ACTION TO RECOVER BACK.

Plaintiffs had their tobacco factory on Barre street, Baltimore, and their store and warehouse on Camden street. On the 1st July, 1864, they had on hand in Camden street a large quantity of tobacco removed from Barre street, on which duties had been paid before 1st July, 1864, as required by the act of 1st July, 1862 [12 Stat. 432]. After the later act imposing higher duties went into effect, the United States collector of national revenue (the defendant) demanded and received from them, under protest, the increased duties. Held, in an action to recover them back, that the increased duties could be recovered back, in view of the provisions of section 173 of the act of 1864.

William F. Frick, for plaintiffs.

William Price, Dist. Atty., and N. J. Thayer, Asst. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

GILES, District Judge. This action has been brought by the plaintiffs (who are tobacco manufacturers in this city) to recover back from the defendant the amount of certain duties on manufactured tobacco, paid by them under protest to defendant as collector of internal revenue for this district. The amount sought to be recovered in this action is the sum which plaintiffs were compelled to pay on the stock they had on hand on 1st July, 1864, which, when added to the sums they had paid on said stock before the last act went into operation, would make a sum equal to the increased duty imposed by said act. The case has been submitted to the court upon a case stated, which shows the following facts: That the plaintiffs have their factory on Barre street, and their store and warehouse on Camden street, in this city, to which they removed their manufactured tobacco for sale; that prior to 1st July, 1864, they made returns to the assessor of this district, of all the tobacco manufactured by them at the said factory, which was sold or removed for consumption or sale to their store, according to the form prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue; and they punctually and regularly paid upon the tobacco so returned the duties imposed by the act of congress passed July 1, 1862. That on the 1st day of July, 1864, the plaintiffs had in their store on Camden street a large quantity of manufactured tobacco (removed from their factory on Barre street) for sale, on which the duties had been regularly paid before the 1st day of July, 1864, to the defendant, as collector of the internal revenue for this district. That after the last act (which imposed higher duties) went into operation, the defendant required the plaintiffs to render to him an account of all their manufactured tobacco then on hand and unsold, and they were compelled to pay the increased duty on the same by paying a sum which, added to the duty paid by them on said goods before, made the sum equal to the duty imposed by said last-mentioned act. The facts of the case are stated at length in the "case stated," but I have thus briefly given sufficient to show the question which is submitted for my adjudication. The case has been ably argued by the learned counsel engaged in it, and is one not free from difficulty. The objection that has been raised to the plaintiff's right to recover in this case is, that the duties paid by them on the manufactured tobacco remaining in their store for sale on the 1st July, 1864, and which duties were paid from time to time as the said manufactured tobacco was removed from the manufactory of plaintiffs to their store for sale, were not due and demandable when paid; that no duty was imposed on it by the act of 1862 until it was manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or delivered to others than agents of the manufacturers; and that the payments therefor made by plaintiffs are to be considered as voluntary payments, and not the payment of duties required by the act of 1862.

This is undoubtedly the provision of the law of 1862 in reference to the tax on tobacco and other manufactures, in this respect differing from the provisions of the same law in relation to the tax on distilled spirits, which was required to be paid on the number of gallons distilled and sold or removed for consumption or sale. But in the view I take of this case, it does not depend upon the provisions of the act of 1862, but on the construction which may be given to the proviso in the 173d section of the act of 1864. It does not depend upon the question "whether the duties when paid were legally due and demandable," but whether they were actually paid before the 1st of July, 1864, as I shall endeavor to show. Now the general scope and intent of the act of 1864 is to tax only future manufactures and productions. Its general provisions and penalties only apply to future acts. This will appear by reference to the various sections requiring licenses, the sections imposing duties on distilled spirits, and the sections imposing duties on other manufactures and productions.

Now such being the general provisions of the law, if the provision in the 173d section had been omitted there could have been no duty collected from manufactured goods in the possession of the manufacturer on the 1st of July, 1864, in any case. Now in reference to tobacco, this is clear from the 90th section of the act, which requires every one engaged in the manufacture of tobacco to render a true statement of all his stock on hand on the 1st July, 1864; and then provides that every such person shall keep in a book an account of all the articles thereafter purchased by him, the quantity of tobacco, snuff, etc., sold, consumed, or removed for consumption or sale from the place of manufacture; and shall in every week furnish the assistant assessor of the district a true and accurate copy of the entries in said book during the preceding week; upon which an assessment of the duties due by said person shall be made and transmitted to the collector of the district, to whom the duties shall be paid within five days. And the same is equally clear with reference to distilled spirits. For by the first paragraph of the 55th section the duty is to be levied and collected on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale, on or after the 1st of July, 1864. And if the second paragraph had not been added to said section the duty would have been imposed only on spirits distilled since 1st July, 1864. That part of the section is as follows: 'And all spirits which may be in the possession of the distiller or in public store or bonded warehouse on the 1st day of July, 1864, no duty having been paid thereon, shall be held and treated as distilled on the 1st day of July, 1864, and so liable to the increased duty." This is the same in effect in reference to spirits as the proviso in the 173d section in reference to other manufactures, and I shall not further notice it. Now the proviso in said section is in the following words: "And provided further, that all manufactures and productions on which a duty was imposed by either of the acts repealed by this act, which shall be in possession of the manufacturer or producer, or of his agent or agents, on the day when this act takes effect, the duty imposed by any such former act not having been paid, shall be held and deemed to have been manufactured or produced after said date," and so liable to the increased duty.

Now, they become liable on two conditions, both of which must concur: They must be in the possession of the manufacturer or his agent on the 1st of July, 1864, and no duty paid on them. Now, if any other construction is given to this proviso, and the similar one in section 55, you nullify one of the very conditions which congress has said must exist before the manufacture is liable to the duty prescribed by the law of 1864; for the duties on spirits in a bonded warehouse, and the duties on goods in the possession of the manufacturer, held by him for sale, were not then due and demandable, although, in the case of specific duties—such as the duties on tobacco and spirits—the inspection and return had already given the data for calculating the duties. If you adopt the idea suggested in the argument, that there was no duty imposed on these manufactures in their condition on the 1st July, 1864, you strike down the whole of the proviso, for it includes only manufactures and productions on which duties were imposed by the previous acts, and the result is the same. I am gratified to learn that in the view I have thus taken of this question I am sustained by Judges Grier and Cadwallader, in the adjoining circuit. For although their decisions were made in cases involving the claim to impose the increased duty on spirits in the possession of the manufacturer or in a bonded warehouse on the 1st of July, the old or former duty having been paid, a careful perusal of these laws will show that in this particular there is no difference between those cases and the present one. The judgment will, therefore, be entered for the plaintiffs for the sum of $4,870.28, with costs.

GALE MANUF'G CO. v. PRUTZMAN et al.

[5 Ban. & A. 154;[1] 17 O. G. 743.]

PATENTS—CONSTRUCTION OF CLAIM—COMBINATION OF OLD ELEMENTS—PRODUCING NEW RESULTS—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The first claim of reissued letters patent No. 6,824, granted to Horatio Gale, December 28th, 1875, for an improvement in attachments to ploughs, namely: "In combination with the standard of a plough, a horizontally projecting arm carrying a jointer for the purposes set forth," being construed to be for a combination of old elements producing a new and useful result, there would be no infringement of the patent unless the defendants used all of the elements.

2. Where the defendants used all the elements of the combination claimed, with the exception of changing the points at which the vertical adjustment is made, from the standard to the lower end of the arm: Held, that they infringed the said first claim.

[This was a suit in equity, brought by the Gale Manufacturing Company against John P. Prutzman and others.]

Sprague & Hunt, for complainant.

Walker & Kent, for defendants.

WITHEY, District Judge. This is a bill for the alleged infringement of reissued letters patent [No. 6,824] of date December 28th, 1875,[2] to Horatio Gale, for an improvement in the attachments to ploughs, and consists principally in the construction and arrangement of the various parts. The letters patent cover three claims, which are stated as follows: "What I claim as my invention is: 1. In combination with the standard of a plough, a horizontally-projecting arm carrying a jointer, for the purposes set forth. 2. In combination with the serrated standard A, the curved arm C, carrying the jointer D, substantially as and for the purposes set forth. 3. The combination, with a plough-standard, of the jointer D, having arm C, and vertically adjustable upon said standard, substantially as described."

[Drawings of reissued patent No. 6,824, published from the records of the United States patent office.]

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The claim of infringement urged at the hearing was confined to the first clause. In order to understand what is embraced by this claim we must consider it in connection with the specification and description given by the patentee. He says: "The nature of this invention relates to improvements in the attachment of jointers to the standards of ploughs, and consists, principally, in the construction and arrangement of the various parts, so that the same are more readily adjusted vertically."

In describing the drawing, the patentee says: "This arm is curved, as shown, in order to bring the jointer into its proper position over the plough-point to readily cut the sward."

What, then, is the combination covered by the first clause of the claim? It is an arm attached at one end to the standard of a plough, carrying at the other end a jointer, and projecting horizontally on the land-side of the plough. The arm is curved so as to bring the jointer into its proper position over the plough-point, and has vertical adjustability at the point of contact with the standard, by which the depth of the cut made by the jointer is regulated. In other words, that which is combined is the standard of a plough, the curved projecting arm carrying a jointer, and adjustability, and this is done "for the purposes set forth." The patentee states that his construction and arrangement of the parts are to secure more ready vertical adjustability of the jointer, and to prevent clogging by stubble and weeds, which had previously occurred from the attachment of the jointer to the beam of the plough.

The alleged infringement consists in the manufacture and sale, by defendants, of a plough to the standard of which is attached an arm carrying a jointer, and having a projection, and occupying the position substantially as described in the Gale patent. The jointer is adjusted vertically upon the lower end of the arm, whereas in the Gale patent it is adjusted vertically upon the standard of the plough.

Defendants say that plaintiff's combination is not patentable, as being too abstract, or a claim for all ways of connecting jointer and standard. It is also claimed that plough colters and jointers had been used for more than three years anterior to plaintiff's patent in connection with the standard of ploughs; that attaching jointers to the standard is not a useful improvement, save when the beam of the plough is adjustable, and that the only claim of usefulness in complainant's patent is the prevention of clogging by means of the throat formed by the curved arm.

After such consideration as we have been able to give the case, we are of opinion that the prima facie presumption in favor of the validity of the Gale patent, assigned to plaintiff, has not been overcome. In brief, we conclude, that while attachment of colters to the standards of ploughs is much older than Gale's invention, which excludes the idea of originality in the mere attachment of jointers thereto, and that none of the elements of his combination were new at the date of his patent, still his combination was new, was invention, and produced new and useful results. In taking this view, we regard the construction and arrangement covered by Gale's letters patent as combination of the standard of a plough with the horizontally projecting and curved arm carrying a jointer, and vertical adjustment, for the purposes set forth. As all the parts were before known, the invention consists in such combination of them as produced a new and useful result. There would be no infringement of such combination unless defendants used all the parts or elements. This we have already indicated they have done. They have employed the horizontally-projecting curved arm attached to the plough standard, carrying a jointer, and vertical adjustability. Adjustability is secured at the lower end of the arm instead of at the standard. They employ, therefore, all the elements and the combination of the Gale patent with barely one difference—viz., the points at which the vertical adjustment is made being changed from the standard to the lower end of the arm. In the Gale patent, the slot is in the standard of the plough; defendants place it in the lower end of the arm. We regard this as producing the same result in substantially the same way.

Let decree for complainant be entered.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 11, 1879.[2]

BANKRUPTCY—WHAT PASSES TO ASSIGNEE — CITY MARKET LICENSES—ESTOPPEL.

A bankrupt had a permit from the comptroller of the city of New York to occupy a stand in a market, paying therefor a weekly rental. The license was revocable at the pleasure of the comptroller, and could not be transferred without written permission. It was the custom of the city to allow such a permit to be assigned. It bore a value, as an article of sale. The bankrupt paid $4,000 for his permit, to his assignor. He placed that value on it in a statement of his assets made by him, as a basis for credit, to a creditor who afterwards became his assignee in bankruptcy. The district court, on the petition of the assignee in bankruptcy, ordered that the bankrupt execute a transfer to the assignee of the right to the permit, and a request to the comptroller to consent to such transfer. On a petition of review, claiming that the permit was not property which passed to the assignee in bankruptcy: Held, that the bankrupt was estopped from asserting that the right enjoyed under the permit was not property in his hands; that the sale value of such right would, when realized by the assignee, under the transfer papers, be the proceeds of the property of the bankrupt; and that the order of the district court was proper.

[Cited in Lafountain v. Burlington Sav. Bank, 56 Vt. 333.]

On the 16th of April, 1879, Horace W. Day, assignee in bankruptcy of Martin Gallagher and Daniel Lane, composing the firm of Gallagher & Lane, presented to the district court, in bankruptcy, a sworn petition, setting forth as follows: "That, for many years past, your petitioner and one Paolo Sgobel have transacted, in said city, a general commission business in imported fruits, particularly oranges and lemons, under the firm name of Sgobel & Day; that, during said years, it has been the custom of your petitioner's firm, as well as all other firms transacting similar business in said city, to sell the greater portion of their fruits through a certain firm of auctioneers; that it has also been the custom of said business for the several importers to require of all persons buying their goods on credit through said firm, to deposit with said auctioneers, at the beginning of each year, a statement showing their assets and liabilities, which statement was duly verified, and was the basis of such person's credit; that, during said years, the bankrupts were retail dealers in fruits, and had their place of business at a stand in Washington Market, New York, and were buyers of the fruits of your petitioner's firm, and other firms, through the aforesaid auctioneers; that, on or about the 10th of January, 1878, the said bankrupts, for the purpose of obtaining credit during that year on their purchases of fruit through said auctioneers, deposited, as aforesaid, a statement showing their assets and liabilities; that, according to said statement, the said bankrupts were the owners of the said stand in Washington Market, which was, in said statement, valued at the sum of $4,000; that, by reason of said statement, and partially because of the alleged situation and value of said stand, the said bankrupts were permitted to buy on credit, as aforesaid, large quantities of fruit belonging to your petitioner's firm and said other firms; that, thereafter, and on the 4th of June, 1878, the said bankrupts then being indebted to said firms for said fruit, to an amount exceeding $10,000, a petition in bankruptcy was filed in the said district court against said bankrupts, who were thereafter, and on the 15th day of said month, duly adjudicated bankrupts, and thereafter your petitioner was duly appointed and duly qualified as assignee of their estate, and still remains such assignee; that, as such assignee, your petitioner has inquired into the title and interest of said bankrupts in and to the aforesaid stand in said market, and has ascertained from the authorities of the city and county of New York, that said city owns the fee of the land upon which said stand is erected, and, as such owner, claims title to the said stand; but deponent is further informed, that said bankrupts, at the aforesaid times, held and now hold a license or permit from said city to occupy and enjoy said stand and conduct their business therein; and that, because of certain long prevailing customs, said license is practically irrevocable, and the right to occupy thereunder may continue unquestioned for an indefinite number of years, subject to the payment of a small yearly rent to said city; and that it is the custom and practice of said authorities to allow the holders of such licenses or permits to assign the same, and for said city to transfer such license to such assignee, and thereafter recognize such assignee as entitled to occupy said stand; that said permits are held by the owners thereof at a large price or premium; that said bankrupts have informed your petitioner that they paid to the assignor of their permit, and as consideration for the transfer thereof to them, the said bankrupts, about the sum of $4,000, which was the basis of the value of said stand, as set forth in said statement of assets, and your petitioner verily believes that a purchaser could be found for said permit, who would pay nearly the above mentioned sum therefor, provided the same would be transferred to him by said city; that your petitioner has exhibited the general assignment of said bankrupt's effects by the register in bankruptcy herein, to said authorities, but they refuse to recognize the same, and refuse, by virtue thereof, to transfer the said license or permit now held by said bankrupts to your petitioner, but your petitioner is informed and verily believes, that, if said bankrupts should personally, under their own hands, execute an assignment of said license to your petitioner, the said authorities would recognize the same, and would thereupon transfer said license to your petitioner, and thus enable your petitioner to obtain the value thereof for the benefit of the creditors therein; that said bankrupts have, ever since the adjudication herein, continued to use and occupy said stand for their own benefit, and now are conducting their business therein; and that said creditors have received no benefit therefrom." The petition prayed for an order directing the bankrupts to severally execute an assignment to the petitioner of their interest in the said license, so that the value thereof might be secured to their creditors. The bankrupts answered the petition. The answer sets forth as follows: "That, prior to the year 1863, and under and by virtue of certain ordinances of the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the city of New York, passed under the authority of the charter granted to said, the mayor, &c., by an act of the legislature of the state of New York, passed April 14, 1857, (Laws N. Y. 1857, c. 446, p. 874), a department was created, called and known as, 'Of the City Inspector's Department,' which embraced a 'Bureau of Markets;' that the provisions of said ordinance, with respect to markets, are as follows:. Section 45, Revision of 1859: 'This bureau, the chief officer of which shall be called the "Superintendent of Markets," is charged with the duty of superintending the public markets, the inspection, regulation and management thereof, and of the transferring stalls and stands, and all other stalls and stands therein, and shall receive an annual salary of two thousand dollars;' that the said ordinances contain these further provisions respecting the occupation of stalls and stands in the public markets, to wit: 'Sec. 50. He may, with the consent of the city inspector, grant permits, in writing, to such persons as may be proper, at a daily rate, to be mentioned therein, to occupy stands in the public markets, and may, at any time, with the like consent, annul such permits.' 'Sec. 57. It shall be the duty of the superintendent of markets to prepare a register or list of all permanent stalls or stands of the several markets; the names of those occupying, and the fee or rent per week or month, paid for the same; and the superintendent, under the direction of the city inspector, for that purpose, shall have the power to arrange and renumber the stands or stalls in the several markets, and equalize the rents or fees thereof; and the occupants of such stands or stalls, shall immediately, at their own expense, cause numbers to be placed thereon. A copy of such register or list shall, immediately after the same has been prepared, be filed by said superintendent with the comptroller, and all returns of market rents or fees shall be made in accordance with such register or list. Sec. 58. No transfer or assignment of any stall or stand, in any of the public markets, shall be made without written permission of the city inspector and the superintendent of markets, and such transfer duly entered upon such register or list, and notice thereof given to the comptroller, who shall consent to such transfer before any removal can be made of such transfer. In case of any person being removed, or any permit being annulled, the party or parties in interest shall have the privilege of making an appeal to the common council on any decision made by the city inspector concerning such removal.' 'Sec. 65. They, (the clerks of markets,) may suspend any person having a stated stall or stand in the public market, to which they are respectively attached, or occupying a part thereof, or of the street adjoining the same, from occupying or using any part of such market or street, whether he be a licensed butcher or not. Sec. 66. Immediately upon such suspension, the clerk making the same shall report the facts thereof, with the reasons for the suspension, to the city inspector, who shall hear the same, upon sufficient notice to the person suspended, and an opportunity afforded him to be heard in his defence, and whose decision upon the matter shall be final, provided the mayor shall approve the same;' that, by section 1 of the act of legislature of the state of New York, passed April 24, 1863, and known as chapter 227 of the Laws of 1863 (Laws N. Y. 1863, p. 407), it was provided, among other things, as follows: 'The bureau for the inspection, regulation and management of the public markets of the city of New York shall hereafter be in the finance department of said city, and all laws and ordinances now in force relative to the bureau of markets, or superintendent or other officers thereof, shall apply to the said bureau as herein provided;' that, by the said city charter (section 22,) the comptroller is made the chief officer of the finance department, and that, under and and by virtue of the said statute, the word 'comptroller' has been substituted for the word 'city inspector,' wherever the same occurs; that, by a certain other act of the legislature of said state of New York, known as chapter 158 of the Laws of 1832 (Laws N. Y. 1832, p. 251), it was provided, in substance, that any and all ordinances of the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the city of New York might be read in evidence from a volume of said ordinances printed by authority of the common council of said city of New York; that, under said charter, laws and ordinances, and not otherwise, and on or about the 27th of September, 1873, a permit or license was issued to your respondents, in the following words and figures, to wit: 'No. ——. City and County of New York, Comptroller's Office, New York, September 27th, 1873. Permission is hereby granted to Martin Gallagher and Daniel Lane to occupy the stand Nos. ½ of 305, 306 and 307, 33, 35, 37, Country Row, in Washington Market, at the weekly rental of thirteen 75-100 dollars, or such other increased weekly rental as may be established from time to time, the said Gallagher and Lane stipulating and agreeing, in the use and occupancy of said stand, to be governed by and obey the ordinances, rules and regulations now established, or to be established hereafter, for the management of the public markets; the above stand to be occupied only as a stand for the sale of country produce. This permit is revocable at the pleasure of the comptroller, and cannot be transferred without his written permission. And. H. Green, Comptroller. Thos. F. Devoe, Superintendent of Markets;' that a permit or license given under the aforesaid provisions does not constitute property; that it confers upon its holder no right or interest cognizable by courts, or capable of being protected by them; and that courts cannot compel a permit to be given, nor prevent one from being annulled, nor in any manner review the actions of any of the officers mentioned in the ordinance, nor compel the recognition of one who should purchase or acquire a permit under its order or decree, nor put such a purchaser or party acquiring such license in possession, or protect him in his possession."

The case was heard on such petition and answer, by the district court [Case No. 5,197], and that court (Choate, District Judge) made the following decision: "This is a motion to compel the bankrupts to transfer to the assignee their license or permit to occupy certain stalls in Washington Market. The objection is taken, that it is not property which passes to the assignee under the bankrupt law. It appears, that the right to use and occupy a certain portion of the market is granted by the city for a certain fixed rent, without limit of time; that it is revocable at the will of the city; and that its assignment gives the assignee no rights, unless consented to by certain officers of the city. It appears, however, that such rights have a well established pecuniary value, and, by an established usage of the city in dealing with them, there is no practical difficulty in the transfer of them from one party to another; that, in a statement of their assets made to induce credit in their business, these bankrupts, within a year before their bankruptcy, put down these Washington Market stands as worth $4,000; that they cost about that sum, and can be sold for nearly as much; and that the creditors of the bankrupts were, in fact, induced to give them credit, partly on the ownership of these rights. The assignee, having applied, under his general assignment in bankruptcy, to the city, has been refused any recognition as assignee of the license, and now shows, by affidavit, that, if he shall have an assignment directly from the bankrupts, his rights as assignee will, probably, be recognized. I think the objection, as applied to this case cannot avail. It is obvious enough, that this license or right, or whatever it may be called, has a fixed pecuniary value. It was a part of the bankrupts' capital in business, in which they had invested their money, and on the faith and credit of which they incurred their debts. It is grossly unjust and inequitable, under these circumstances, that they should be permitted, on merely technical grounds, to withhold it from their creditors. If, in one sense, and for some purposes, it cannot be regarded as 'property,' as, for instance, for the purpose of being held by a receiver,—Barry v. Kehnedy, 11 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 421,—yet it seems to me that it is clearly property within the province of the bankrupt law. There is a distinction between this purely business right and the right of membership in a business exchange or company. Thus, it has been held, that the right of membership in a board of trade did not pass to the assignee, though having a pecuniary value,—In re Sutherland [Case No. 13,637]; but that case was not a case of a right of a purely business character. The element of personal choice of associates constituted a part of the basis of the membership. That element is wanting here. It is not to be presumed that any such consideration would or could affect the action of the city in giving or withholding its assent to an assignment. In an unreported case in this district, Judge Blatchford refused to make an order for the sale at auction of a seat in the stock exchange, solely, however, on the ground that he would not permit a public sale to be made under the sanction of the court, in a case where the assignee could not undertake with the purchaser to deliver the thing sold. The question raised in this case was not determined, and that case was more nearly analogous to the case of In re Sutherland, supra, than to the present case. The inclination of the courts in dealing with the question as to what passes by an assignment under bankrupt laws, has been to give a most liberal construction to it, for the benefit of creditors, in order to carry into effect their obvious purpose and intent. Thus, under the bankrupt law of 1800 [2 Stat. 19], it was held by the supreme court, reversing the decision of Mr. Justice Washington, that a claim against a foreign government, though a mere possibility of recovering through the future voluntary action of such government, was property that passed under the act. Technically, it was nothing which the law, for many purposes, could recognize as having any existence as property, yet it was within the purview of the act. Vasse v. Comegys [Case No. 16,893]; Id., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 193. And see Williamson v. Colcord [Case No. 17,752]. I see no greater difficulty in the present case. It is true, that the right of the bankrupts to assign is subject to the approval of the city, but so is the right of the lessee to assign his term often so subject to the approval of the lessor. The lease, nevertheless, passes in bankruptcy, if the assignee chooses to take it. It is, also, true that this permit or license is revocable at the will of the city. I do not think, under the circumstances of this case, this incident of the thing takes it out of the purview of the bankrupt law. The words denoting property, in the law, as it seems to me, ought not to be technically construed. There is an existing valuable right, perhaps, it may be called a chose in action or existing contract, of value, which, except in case of possible action by the city, would continue to be in their hands, and has, in fact, continued to be, for all practical purposes, business capital. To allow the bankrupts to hold it, would encourage such debtors as should be disposed to defraud their creditors to make similar arrangements with their landlords, and thus lock up their business capital for their own use, permanently, and make the bankrupt law, so far as they are concerned, a farce. It is suggested, on behalf of the bankrupts, that any order the court may make, will be a brutum fulmen; that the bankrupts are at liberty to procure, at any time, the revocation of their license, and the grant of a new license to some person friendly to them; and that this would defeat any action their assignee in bankruptcy may propose to take to realize on this asset, if it be such. It is enough to say, in relation to this suggestion, which, indeed, I do not understand to be, in any sense, a threat of what the bankrupts intend to do, but only an argument, from what they may, as it is claimed, lawfully do, that the consequences of any interference with the action of the assignee or the court, in turning into money what is held to be property, whether such interference is direct or indirect, are likely to be very unpleasant. Such interference as is suggested, if it were attempted, would, of course, subject the bankrupts to proceedings for contempt. The motion is granted."

Thereupon, on the 7th of May, 1879, the district court made an order that the bankrupts, and each of them, appear before the register in charge, and severally, but at the expense of the assignee, execute and deliver to him an assignment, in the usual form required by said city, of all the right, title and interest which they may have had on the 4th of June, 1878, in and to the stand Numbers ½ of 305, 306 and 307, 33, 35 and 37, Country Row, in Washington Market, New York City, occupied by them, and also in and to the license or permit to occupy the said stand, theretofore issued or granted to them by the city and county of New York, and that they also deliver said license or permit to the assignee. Subsequently, on the 26th of May, 1879, the district court made a further order, as follows: "The annexed paper, having been submitted to the court as a proposed form of assignment, to be executed and delivered by the bankrupts to the assignee, in pursuance of the order made herein on the 7th of May, 1879, (such paper being as similar to the usual form of transfer of market stands as the circumstances will permit of,) and the said bankrupts having objected to the said form because of the request to the city authorities contained therein, it is ordered that such objection be overruled, and that the bankrupts execute the aforesaid paper as required by said order." The following was the paper annexed: "The undersigned, owners of stand known and designated as numbers 33, 35, 37, Country Row, West Washington Market, request that a permit may be issued for the same, in the name of Horace W. Day, assignee, and respectfully apply for permission to have such transfer made, and that the stand may be occupied for the sale of fruits." "Whereas, the undersigned were, on the 4th day of June, 1878, duly adjudicated bankrupts by the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, and Horace W. Day was thereafter duly elected and confirmed as assignee of their estate, which office was accepted by him, and, whereas, by an order of said district court, duly made and entered on the seventh day of May, 1879, the undersigned were ordered and directed to execute and deliver to said assignee an assignment of all the right, title and interest which they, or either of them, had in and to the stand and permit hereinafter mentioned, on said fourth day of June, 1878, now, therefore, in pursuance of said order, we do hereby assign, transfer and set over unto said Horace W. Day, assignee, all the right, title and interest which we, or either of us, had, on said fourth day of June, in and to that certain stand known and designated as numbers 33, 35, and 37 West Washington Market, the particulars of our ownership of said stand being as follows: Right acquired by purchase. Permit issued by Comptroller A. H. Green. T. F. Devoe, Superintendent of Markets. In the name of Gallagher & Lane. Occupied for sale of fruits. Rent, per week, as paid to present collector, $13.50. Witness our hands." The bankrupts, after executing the papers provisionally, applied to this court, by petition, for a review of said orders, alleging that the license was not property to which the assignee in bankruptcy became entitled.

Gershom A. Seixas, for bankrupts.
Scudder & Carter, opposed.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. I think the bankrupts are estopped, by the facts shown, from asserting that the right enjoyed by them under the paper signed by the comptroller, dated September 27th, 1873, is not property in their hands. It may require the execution on their part of such papers as they have executed, dated May 28th, 1879, and the written permission of the comptroller that such right be transferred, before the property is in such a condition that its salable value can be realized. But, such value, when realized, will be the proceeds of the property of the bankrupts, owned by them when the petition in bankruptcy was filed, quite as much as an equal sum of money to be now received by them for the salable value of such right, on its transfer by them, with the permission of the comptroller, would be the proceeds of such property. That the latter would be the proceeds of such property, I cannot doubt. I concur in the views of Judge Choate in his decision.

and am of opinion that the order of May 7th, 1879, and the order of May 26th, 1879, were proper orders. The prayer of the petition of review is denied.

CONDON v. SAME.

[10 Ben. 290.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1879.

SEAMEN'S WAGES — CONDEMNATION OF VESSEL — EXTRA WAGES FOR DELAY IN PAYMENT.

1. A steamer left New York on a voyage to Nassau, N. P., thence to Cuba and back to New York. Just before reaching Nassau she struck a rock and was so injured that, after she reached Nassau, a survey was called on the application of her master, and the surveyors recommended that she be condemned as unseaworthy, and thereafter the owners abandoned her to the underwriters. After the survey the master discharged the crew and offered them a passage to New York. Seventeen of them accepted the offer and came home to New York. The other eight refused the offer, claiming that the ship could be brought home; and they remained at Nassau for more than a month, during which time the master allowed them to sleep on board and he provided food for them. On the arrival of the seventeen at New York they claimed to be paid wages up to the time of their arrival besides three months' extra pay. The owners of the steamer refused to pay wages after the day when she was injured. The other eight, after their return to New York, made a similar claim, and suits were brought against the owners to recover the wages: Held that, by the proceedings taken as to the vessel, she was "condemned" as mentioned in section 4582 of the United States Revised Statutes, and the sailors therefore were not entitled to the three months' extra pay.

[Cited in Kelly v. Otis, 23 Fed. 905.]

2. The sailors were entitled to be paid up to the time of their discharge by the master in Nassau, and no later.

3. The seventeen were entitled to the ten days' extra pay provided by section 4529, because there was no sufficient cause for the delay in payment.

4. The act of the master at Nassau, in allowing them to sleep on board, and furnishing food for them after their discharge, did not entitle them to claim wages after such discharge.

CHOATE, District Judge. These are suits in personam for seamen's wages, brought against the defendants, the owners of the steamship Cleopatra.

The Cleopatra left New York October 17, 1878, bound on a voyage to Nassau, N. P., and thence to a port or ports in Cuba and thence back to New York. Just before reaching Nassau she struck upon a rock and was injured, and most of her cargo and passengers were forwarded by other vessels. She then proceeded to the port of Nassau, where she has ever since remained. The accident happened on the 23d of October, and she got into port about seven days later. The crew were kept by the ship till December 11th, discharging their ordinary duties, such as there were for them to do in port. Meanwhile a survey was called on the application of the master. It was composed of the captain of the port and the agent of American underwriters, and they called in to their assistance an engineer and a ship carpenter. They made a written report to the effect that one of the boilers was thrown out of place, the keel was injured, bolts started, and that the vessel was badly hogged, and unseaworthy; and recommended that, in consequence of her machinery being thoroughly disabled and of there being no facilities for repairing her there, she be condemned. Afterwards, on December 18th, the owners in New York wrote a letter of abandonment to the underwriters. The evidence now produced sustains the case found by the survey, and shows that she had suffered such injuries by reason of sea perils that she was wholly unfit to continue her voyage, and that she could not be repaired so as to complete her voyage. On the 11th of December the master, by direction of the owners, called the crew together, and informed them that they were discharged, and offered them a passage home to New York in another steamer of the same owners. Seventeen of them, being the libellants in the first of these suits, accepted the offer and came home in the other steamer. The other eight refused to come home; took the ground that the ship could continue the voyage or be brought home, and remained at Nassau till about the 25th of January. The master permitted them to sleep on board and he provided board for them at Nassau. The libellants in the first suit now demand wages up to the time of their arrival at New York on the 11th of December, with three months' extra pay, on the ground that they were discharged at Nassau with their consent, and that the vessel was neither wrecked, stranded nor condemned as unfit for service. They rely on Rev. St. § 4582, which provides that the three months' extra wages due to seamen so discharged, shall not be required "where vessels are wrecked or stranded or condemned as unfit for service," but shall in no other case be remitted. It is claimed that "condemned" here means condemned by decree of an admiralty court. But considering the purpose of the statute, I cannot think the word was used in this restricted sense. Wreck, stranding or other fatal disability to the ship is recognized as discharging the contract between the ship and the seamen; but for the security of the seamen against possible imposition, it is required that where the case is not one of self-evident wreck or stranding, the proof of disability shall be shown by the condemnation of the vessel as unfit for service. The reference here is to that proceeding known in all ports, by which ships which have suffered disaster are condemned or pronounced unfit for service, the common method being by the report of a survey called by the consul of the nation to which the ship belongs, upon the application of the master. To give the words the restricted sense contended for by the libellants, would, in many ports and places, make performance of the condition impossible. In this case there was such a condemnation, and the claim for three months' extra pay is disallowed. As the master kept the crew on duty till December 11th, they are clearly entitled to their wages till that time. Tarleton v. Mallory [Case No. 13,753]. These seamen further claim that their wages should be paid up to the time of their arrival in New York. For this claim there seems to be authority in the case of The Elizabeth, 2 Dod. 411. But I think this is a case where the service of the seamen was terminated by reason of the wreck or loss of the vessel, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 4526, and therefore they cannot claim their wages after the day of their discharge, December 11th. When the seamen were informed that their services would not further be required, they were told that they would be paid in New York on their arrival. When they arrived a dispute arose as to the amount due, the owners claiming that the wages were due only up to the 23d of October, and the seamen insisting on being paid up to the time of their return. Rev. St. § 4529, imposes on the owner a penalty of two days' extra pay for every day not exceeding ten during which the payment of wages is delayed beyond the period when by law it is payable, provided the delay be without sufficient cause. I cannot think that there was sufficient cause in this case for the delay in payment. The only question which could be looked upon as doubtful was whether the wages should cease on the 11th of December or on the 17th, and if this had been the only difference it may well be supposed that it could have easily been adjusted. But the owners having made a wholly unreasonable claim, and thereby kept the crew waiting for their wages, I think they are chargeable with the twenty days' extra pay.

As to the seamen who stayed in Nassau, nothing which the captain did in sheltering and feeding them can be construed as a revocation of the discharge, as is claimed by the libellants. It was an act of humanity, for which the ship owner should not suffer. As these men refused the discharge and the offer of return to New York and put the master and the owners to unnecessary expense, there is no reason why their wages should be paid beyond the 11th of December, when they were discharged in consequence of the voyage being hopelessly broken up.

Decree for libellants with costs and reference to compute the amount.

PLEADING IN EQUITY — EFFECT OF VERDICT AND JUDGMENT AT LAW—FAILURE TO REPLY TO PLEA —DEMURRER—SET-OFF—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

1. If the plea be set down for argument by the complainant, without replying to it, the matter contained in it must be considered as true.

[Cited in Myers v. Dorr, Case No. 9,988.]

2. A verdict and judgment at law, is no bar to relief in equity, if an equitable ground of relief be laid, and that is not denied by the plea. If it be denied, the plaintiff may reply generally, and go into proofs to support the bill; and if he fail to make his proof, the plea will be a good bar, as if no replication had been put in.

[Cited in Wistar v. McManes, 54 Pa. St. 321.]

3. If a bill in equity contain no ground for relief, the defendant ought to demur.

4. When a bill of exchange is remitted to A, and the responsibility of the parties to it is released, by the neglect of A to give notice of its dishonour; although, as the bill was not remitted in payment to A, the claim against A being for damages, cannot be set off, yet it is a good ground for relief in equity against A.

To the bill of injunction filed in this cause [by Gallagher's executors], the defendant pleaded in bar, the verdict and judgment at law, and that the matters in issue before the jury, were the same as are now stated as the ground of relief, except as to the charge of management on the part of the defendant's counsel, and a slip on that of the plaintiffs', which is denied. The cause was set down to be argued on the plea.

Mr. Levy, for plaintiffs in equity, contended, that a verdict and judgment at law is no bar to relief in equity, unless the ground of relief is traversed in the plea. 1 Har. Ch. Pr. 361. Slip of the attorney at law good ground of relief. Prec. Ch. 233; 2 P. Wms. 425.

Mr. Hallowell, for defendant. The only ground of relief is, the management and slip which are denied in the plea. The ground of relief is not sufficient. 3 Abbt. 232.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The plea not being denied by a replication, but set down for argument, must be considered as true; and therefore we must now take it as a fact that the management and slip, if material, did not take place, because the plea denies them. A verdict and judgment is no bar to relief in equity, provided the bill lays an equitable ground for relief, and the plea does not deny the ground laid. If it does, then the plaintiff may reply generally, and go on to suport the facts stated in the bill, to entitle him to relief. If he do so, and fail in his proof, the plea will be a good bar, as well as if he had set down the causé upon the plea; which would have admitted the truth of the plea. If the bill contain no ground for relief, the defendant ought to demur. But in this case, the bill lays a ground for relief, which is not denied—namely, that the amount of the bill remitted to the defendant, was lost to the plaintiff, by his neglect in not giving notice of the protest. This defence was deemed inadmissible at law; because as it did not appear that it was remitted as a payment, the claim of the plaintiff, for the improper conduct of the defendant, was for damages only, which could not be offset at law. But it is a good ground of relief in equity. We shall therefore overrule the plea, and let it stand for an answer, if the defendant wishes it.

PAYMENT — PRE-EXISTING DEBT — BILL OF EXCHANGE—NOTICE OF DISHONOR—DISCHARGE.

1. A bill of exchange is not, in general, to be considered as a satisfaction of a pre-existing debt, unless it be paid or accepted as such; nor if remitted conditionally, unless the debtor sustain injury by the laches of the creditor who received it.

2. The strict rules of law relative to the presentation, and notice of the dishonour of a bill of exchange, do not prevail in the same manner against a creditor, to whom the bill has been remitted in payment, as they do against the holder of a bill under other circumstances.

3. Although notice of the dishonour of a bill may not have been received by the person who remitted it, it will be sufficient to discharge the holder, if he did all in his power to convey the information of it to him.

[Cited in Jennison v. Parker, 7 Mich. 363; Glenn v. Smith, 2 Gill & J. 493; Kirkpatrick v. Puryear (Tenn.) 24 S. W. 1133.]

[This was an action at law brought by Gallagher's executors against Roberts, Cadman & Co.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The case, from the bill, answer, and exhibits, appears to be as follows:—The testator, James Gallagher, being indebted to the defendants for goods shipped to him; remitted to them, in December 1793, a bill of exchange, at sixty days, for one hundred pounds sterling, drawn by Robert Morris, on Cazenove, Nephew, & Company, of London; which came to hand on the 24th of February 1794. The next day it was shown to the drawees, who declined accepting it at that time, but gave reason to think, that after hearing from Morris, they might do so. The bill was accordingly kept until the 24th of March following; when, the drawees still refusing to accept it, the bill was placed in the hands of a notary, who regularly protested it for nonpayment. The bill was retained by the defendants until the 7th of July 1794, when it was returned with the protest; previous to which, it is admitted, that notice of the hishonour of the bill, or of the drawees' refusal to accept, had not been given. This letter of the 9th of July, was put into the post-office at the time it was written. No evidence is given, in the cause, of the time when the drawer became insolvent, or indeed that he ever was so. But it is recollected by the court, that, on the trial at law, it was proved, and is so agreed by the parties, that Mr. Morris failed in the year 1794, or perhaps in 1795. No proof is given, that the above letter and bill ever came to the hands of Gallagher. It appears, by a letter from the defendants in 1796, that between 1794 and that period, he had frequently written to Gallagher, requesting payment of the debt due to him; to which letters no answer had been returned, nor remittances made. The defendants, at the same time, appointed an agent to call upon Gallagher, and collect this money; who, in 1798, informed them that they could do nothing with Gallagher, and that he insisted upon a credit for the above bill, supposing that it had been paid to Roberts.

A judgment having been recovered at law against the complainants, without the allowance of a credit for the above bill, relief is now sought for, on the equity side of this court, for the amount thereof. In the case of Clark v. Mundle [unreported], the doctrine is laid down in very broad terms, that a bill, given in payment of a precedent debt, is not considered as payment; unless it be part of the contract, that it be received in satisfaction; although the holder should have neglected to present it for payment, or to give notice of its dishonour. This doctrine is clearly founded upon a general principle of law, that the bill, in such a case, not being of superior dignity to the pre-existing debt, could not extinguish it; and consequently the bill was considered only as a collateral security. Kyd, in his treatise on Bills, seems to consider this doctrine as no longer existing, in consequence of the statute of Anne; which declares, that a bill accepted in satisfaction of former debt, shall be accounted a full payment of such debt, if the holder do not take his due course to obtain payment of the bill, and on failure, make his protest according to the directions of this act. But Chitty attributes the change of this doctrine, not to the seventh section of the above act, which relates to the particular kind of bills mentioned in the fourth section; but to the change of opinion in the courts of justice. To whatever cause the doctrine of the present day may be attributed, we think the doctrine itself amounts to this: that a bill of exchange is not, in general, to be considered as a satisfaction of a precedent debt, unless it be paid, and accepted as such, or in case it be conditionally paid; unless it appear that an injury has resulted to the debtor, who pays the bill in consequence of the laches of the creditor, who receives it; as, for instance, if, in the mean time, the drawers fail; or if the recourse of the person from whom the bill is received, against the drawer, or the endorsers, be thereby lost. Neither would such a bill, if received as a payment, be in all cases good as such; should the same be unproductive, from the circumstance of the drawer having no right to draw, and perhaps from other circumstances, which show that the debtor knew the paper to be of no value. We do not think that the rule, which prevents the holder of a bill from recovering upon it against the drawer or endorsers, unless he has proceeded regularly to have the bill presented and protested, and to give notice; applies to the case of a creditor suing for his original debt, to which is opposed a payment by a bill or note; because, in the former case, the bill is received by the payee, and all others who become the holders of it, upon a condition that he will use such diligence; and, therefore, his failure to perform such condition, is fatal to his recovery. In the latter case, the bill is not strictly an extinguishment or satisfaction of the pre-existing debt; though, if by the neglect of the holder, the amount of the bill be lost, it is fair to presume that he took it as a satisfaction, and agreed to run the risk of it. Neither will we say, that, if the bill be retained by the person to whom it is remitted as a conditional payment, for an unreasonable length of time, a jury may not fairly make the same presumption; though the drawer should not become insolvent. In the case of Darrach v. Savage, 1 Show. 130, the bill was retained for two years.

In all the cases which we have met with on this subject, the debt was lost by insolvency. Judge Buller, in his Nisi Prius (182), lays it down, that if a note be endorsed by a debtor to his creditor for a precedent debt, and a receipt be given as for so much money when the note shall be paid, and the creditor neglect to apply to the drawer in time, and by his laches the note is lost, the precedent debt is extinguished. So in the case of Chamberlyn v. Delarive, 2 Wils. 353, the same principle is laid down. In the case of Ward v. Evans, 2 Ld. Raym. 930, the general rule is laid down, that a note is not a payment of a precedent debt; being presumed to be taken on condition, to be payment, if paid in a convenient time; but if it be kept up without demand, and insolvency take place, the receiver must lose it. If this be the law of the case, what is the ground of equity, on which the court ought now to relieve the complainant? It appears, clearly from the answer and exhibits, that this bill was remitted as a conditional payment, and was received as such. The return of it to the endorser, Mr. Gallagher, is conclusive upon this point. Although the refusal of the drawees to accept, was not regularly noted, yet the bill was promptly shown to the drawee; and the defendant states that he forebore to protest it for non-acceptance, from a hope, which was induced by the declarations of the drawee, that they might accept it after hearing from the drawer. Though notice of the protest was not given, in such time as would have enabled the defendants to have maintained an action upon it, yet the bill was returned to Gallagher during the solvency of the drawer; and no injury appears to have been sustained by him in consequence of the delay. It is true, that no evidence is given that the bill ever came to the hands of Gallagher. His neglect to answer the repeated letters addressed to him by the defendants, which afforded him an opportunity to assert his right to this sum, as a credit, upon the ground of the bill not having been returned; affords strong ground to believe that he had received it, notwithstanding his declaration to the contrary, in 1798. But, at all events, the defendants were not answerable for the miscarriage of their letter covering the bill.

Upon the whole, we are of opinion, that the complainant is not entitled to relief; and, therefore, that the injunction must be dissolved, and the bill dismissed.

GALLAGHER v. The YANKEE.

[Hoff. Op. 456.]

District Court, N. D. California. Jan. 17, 1859.[1]

MARINE TORT—DEPORTATION—DAMAGES.

[1. The forcible deportation of a citizen to a foreign country in an American ship, commanded by an American master, in pursuance or execution of a sentence of banishment of an illegal and self-constituted body of men, is a marine tort.]

[2. The master of the vessel who willingly and knowingly carries such sentence into execution is liable for exemplary damages.]

[3. No damages can be recovered in admiralty for injury to character, etc., by such sentence, or from protracted exile caused by fear to return.]

In admiralty.

J. B. Manchester, for libellant.

D. Lake, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The libel in this case is filed to recover damages for a marine tort. The facts are clearly established by the evidence. It appears that the libellant, who was a night watchman in the custom house, was, on the 25th May, 1856, seized by certain persons acting under the order of the vigilance committee, and conveyed to the rooms of the association, where he was held as a prisoner for about a week. During his confinement a kind of investigation with regard to his character and conduct was made by the committee. The investigation, called by them "a trial," was conducted in the absence of the prisoner, by examining such witnesses as were produced against and for him. The result of the examination was the conviction of the accused, not of any particular offense, so for as it appears, but of being a "disorderly character," "a pest to society, and a nuisance." He was, therefore, sentenced by the committee to "banishment from the state, never to return, under the severest penalties," i. e. under penalty of death. In pursuance of this "sentence," the libellant, with several others, was taken by an armed body of men from his place of confinement in this city, and put on board a steam tug, which conveyed him and his guard to the Heads. The bark Yankee, which was beating out to sea, was there overhauled, and the libellant, with two other persons under a similar sentence, were placed on board of her.

Much testimony was taken, with a view of showing the particular conduct and language of the libellant, when he was going on board the vessel. It does not appear that either he or the other prisoners made any very strenuous opposition to going on board. Such opposition, they no doubt were aware, would have been fruitless; and it is probable that they were happy to escape in any way from the power of a body of men at whose hands they had for so long a time been under daily apprehension for their lives. It was evident, however,—and the fact was not seriously denied at the hearing,—that the master of the bark was fully aware of the circumstances under which the libellant and the other prisoners were placed on board his ship, and that an arrangement had previously been made with him to receive and convey them to Honolulu. He undoubtedly endeavored to evade the responsibility he was incurring, by attempting to obtain from the prisoners some declarations or admissions that they were willing to go. But he must have been aware that they could, in no sense, be deemed voluntary passengers, and that the answer of Gallagher, to the effect "that he supposed he had no choice in the matter," truly described his situation and expressed his feelings. During the voyage, the libellant and his companions appear to have been treated with kindness, and after their arrival at Honolulu a not unfriendly intercourse was kept up between them and the captain. They appear to have considered, and perhaps not unreasonably, that the principal authors of their wrongs were the vigilance committee, by whom they had been arrested, imprisoned, and sentenced to banishment, never to return, under penalty of death, rather than the master, who had lent himself and his ship to carry out the "sentence."

The facts which have been detailed show, however, beyond a doubt, that the respondent has been guilty of a marine tort of a very grave charcter. So long as our country remains under the dominion of law, and so long as the great constitutional provision which secures the citizen his life, his liberty, and his property, until deprived of them by due process of law, are prized by the American people, and are enforced by the courts, the deportation of a citizen to a foreign country in an American ship, commanded by an American master, in pursuance or execution of a sentence of an illegal and self-constituted body of men, must remain a marine tort of a most flagrant character.

But in estimating the damages which should properly be awarded against the respondent, a serious difficulty is encountered. It is obvious that by far the greater part of the wrongs which the libellant has sustained are matters over which an admiralty court, having jurisdiction only of marine torts, has no cognizance. His arrest, his imprisonment, and the so-called "sentence," which fixed an ineffaceable stigma on his name, were matters occurring on land, and wholly beyond the jurisdiction of a maritime court. For the redress of these wrongs he must look to the tribunals of the state of which he is a citizen; and the jurisdiction and remedial power of this court must be confined within its legal and constitutional limits, unaffected by any considerations as to the ability of libellant to obtain justice in any other form.

[1] [Affirmed in Case No. 18,124.]

It is urged that the libellant was unable to return to this city for a very long period, and that he remained an exile from his country, destitute and degraded, until permitted to return by the revocation by the vigilance committee of his original sentence. But it is clear, from the bare statement of the case, that his protracted banishment cannot be attributed to the mere fact that he was conveyed by the respondent to the Sandwich Islands, and of that act alone this court has cognizance. If the ship had landed him on a desert island, from which escape was impossible, or had left him on some remote shore where opportunities of returning to his country rarely occurred, we might justly ascribe to the marine boat the protracted exile, which was its natural and direct consequence. But in this case it is impossible to close our eyes to the fact that the mode in which the libellant was conveyed to the Sandwich Islands in no degree affected willingness to return. The true reason of his omission to do so was the fact that the power of the illegal association which had condemned him to banishment, and denounced death as the penalty of his return, still remained unbroken; and he feared that their threat would be executed if he attempted to disobey their decree. The same result would have followed, had he escaped from their hands while a prisoner, and had they, in his absence, passed a similar sentence against him. It is clear, therefore, that for these wrongs, which were not the acts of the master of the ship, and which were not marine torts, the libellant cannot against this respondent and in this court, recover damages.

It has been suggested that the respondent may have been influenced by humane and just motives. That knowing the only choice presented to the libellant was between death and banishment, he may have reluctantly assisted to carry into effect the latter, in order to save him from the more dreadful alternative. But the facts of the case do not justify this charitable hypothesis. For, in the first place, it is clear that the master of this ship willingly and knowingly made himself and his vessel the instruments whereby the illegal sentence of banishment was carried into execution. And, secondly, it does not appear that if this respondent, and the masters and agents of all other vessels sailing from this port, had been faithful to the laws of their country, and had resolutely refused to allow their ships to be used for the consummation of such great wrongs upon their fellow citizens, more just and humane counsels might not have prevailed with the vigilance committee, and their prisoners be set at liberty. It is at least not clear that they would have been willing to hang those whom they had adjudged to be worthy only of banishment, simply because they found it impossible to execute the milder sentence.

The counsel for the libellant has dwelt with much force on the disgrace and permanent ignoring which the proceedings of the vigilance committee have established upon Gallagher. To have been arrested and imprisoned as a criminal; to have been expelled from society as a pest and a nuisance; to have been transported to a foreign country, never to return, under penalty of death; to be known and published to the world as a vigilance committee exile, whose crimes had rendered his presence incompatible with the safety of a great city,—must, to a man of common sensibility, and of respectable character, constitute an injury, compared with which all ordinary libels, slanders, or other injuries to reputation sink into insignificance. Ample opportunity was afforded at the trial to the counsel for the respondent to show what were the crimes, or what was the character, of the libellant. It would seem from the evidence that up to the period of his arrest his reputation was fair, except that he had been concerned in two fights or riots, the newspaper accounts of which were by one of the witnesses stated to have been grossly exaggerated. No attempt was made to show that on any occasion he had been concerned in frauds at elections, though it was testified by a number of the vigilance committee that he was convicted by that body of being a ballot-box stuffer, of interfering with elections (it is presumed fraudulently), and of general bad conduct. Several respectable witnesses affirm that his reputation was good; that they never heard of his being charged with election frauds, and that they never knew him to have been an inspector or tally clerk at any election. If his character had been so notoriously bad as is represented, the fact could have been shown beyond all doubt; and had his general reputation been that of a person concerned in election frauds, some witness could surely have stated where and at what elections he was reported to have committed them. It is but just to say, that the charge that the libellant's reputation was "notoriously bad"; that he was "always engaged in election rows" and ballot-box stuffing,—is not only unsustained by the evidence as to what his character was, but unsupported by any testimony as to particular acts which might justly have given him that character. But, as has been already observed, for injuries to his character occasioned by the "sentence" of the vigilance committee, this court, in this proceeding, can afford no indemnity; for they cannot properly be said to be the consequence of that portion of the torts committed upon him, of which alone a maritime court has cognizance, viz. his abduction and transportation to a place beyond seas.

But although the respondent cannot in this action be held liable for all the injuries the libellant has sustained, he is nevertheless responsible not only for the marine tort he has committed, but for its natural and necessary consequences. By receiving on board his ship, and transporting to a foreign country, the libellant and his companions he has knowingly assisted in carrying out an alleged sentence, in violation of the most sacred rights of citizens, and has made himself a particeps criminis, so far as the execution of that sentence was concerned. It was not distinctly shown that the respondent was a member of the vigilance committee. It was testified by Carr that he had seen him in their rooms, and no proof was offered to show that he was not a member,—a fact which, if he were not a member, could have been established. But whether a member or not, it is clear that he must have known of their proceedings with regard to the libellant, and he willingly assisted in executing their decree. The libellant was brought on board the vessel to be transported to a foreign country, without money, and destitute of even a change of clothing. In this condition, and with disgrace attaching to him which was the necessary consequence of being put on shore under such circumstances, he was left at Honolulu to gain a subsistence as he could. The respondent must have been fully aware of the sufferings to which a man so landed in a foreign country,—destitute, without friends, with the brand of a criminal upon him, and brought there as a prisoner, unfit to reside in his own home,—must have been exposed; and if he, knowing these results to be the natural and inevitable consequences of the abduction, consented to commit it, the case is very different from that of abducting, or, as it is called, "shanghaiing," a seaman, who at the close of a voyage is left in no worse condition than when he commenced it. It has appeared to me that for a tort of this kind—high-handed and deliberate, in open and contemptuous violation of the hitherto supposed inviolable rights of the citizen—the court should award exemplary damages. It is of the last importance that masters and agents of ships should learn that, whatever be the power that in moments of popular excitement illegal bodies of men may usurp, and for a time exercise, and however important the local laws of a state may temporarily be found, yet, on American vessels on the high seas, the laws of the United States are still supreme; that the power of vigilance committees and similar bodies stop at least with the shore, and that the ocean is not to be the scene, nor American vessels the instruments, for the execution of their decrees.

I shall award to the libellant the sum of $3,000; for which, with costs, a decree must be entered.

PATENTS—VALIDITY—INFRINGEMENT—REISSUE TO COVER SEPARATE DEVICES—COMBINATION—NEW RESULTS—ABANDONED EXPERIMENT.

1. The claims of the reissued patent granted to Alpheus C. Gallahue, July 6th, 1869, (the original patent having been granted to him August 16th, 1853, and extended,) and of the reissued patent granted to said Gallahue, June 22d, 1869, (the original patent having been granted to him March 29th, 1859,) and of the patent granted to said Gallahue, August 26th, 1862, all for "improvements in machines for pegging shoes," considered.

2. A patentee, in his original patent, described a spring and a weight, acting conjointly to drive down an awl-carrier and a peg-driver. In a reissue of the patent, he claimed the use of the spring alone, for that purpose, without the weight. The defendant used, for the purpose, a powerful spring, equivalent to the spring and weight: Held, that the claim in the reissue was valid, and that the defendant infringed it.

3. A patentee, whose devices are new, is at liberty to claim each, by way of reissue, although he may have represented and claimed them originally as acting conjointly.

4. It is not true of a machine, as such, that, because every one of its members performs in it the identical office which it would perform howsoever used, their conjoint action in the new combination may not produce a result useful and never before attained.

5. Where one or more of the parts are new, and the combination is, for that reason, made to produce a new result, in the greater rapidity and economy with which the work can be performed, there is something more than mere aggregation.

6. Where the patentee drove his awl-carrier by a spring made to operate automatically, and the use of such spring, for such purpose, was new, and could not be usefully employed without the use of a gauge for the edge of the sole to rest against: Held, that the combination of a gauge with an awl-carrier driven by a spring was a new combination, and not a mere aggregation, although the gauge and the awl-carrier were old, and operated, in relation to each other, in no new manner, in the new combination.

7. Where a machine, not brought into effective operation, was cast aside and taken apart, without any intention to reconstruct it, portions of it being appropriated to other uses, and the remaining parts being wholly useless for any purpose within the purview of a subsequent patent: Held, that, as an answer to such patent, such machine must be regarded as an abandoned experiment.

S', S' represent a metallic plate, having uprights, 4s, 4s, between which the block m', m', is placed, it being secured by screws to S', S'. This plate forms a turn-table for the last, the pivot thereof being a shaft under the center of the heel, by which the ends of the shaft are reversed. The last is secured to the block and turn-table S' by a lever, n', passing entirely through m', m', and through slots in 4s, 4s, and having a hook for entering the staple O' in the last. By the driving of a wedge, q', in the slot 4s, the lever is depressed, and, drawing on the hook and staple, secures the last firmly on m', m'. x' x' is the base of the machine; w', a sliding table thereon, moving longitudinally by tongues and grooves, through the agency of racks and a pinion; v is a second table, vibrating back and forth on w'; u' is a rail supporting the turn-table S' and toe of the last. At each end of the rail is a square notch or stop, a', in which the spring-handle r of the turn-table drops on the alternate change in the position of the last in pegging each side. The straight portion of the rail on the edge of o supports the last-holder when the heel is being pegged. w, w are uprights secured to the base x', and are braced with a cross tie, J. u, u are sides of a sliding-gate, working in upright guides on w. r is a cross-head connecting u, u. P is the main or driving shaft, which, through a screw and cog-wheel operates the shaft 13. On the lower portion of shaft 13, slides a pinion, which has motion given it by a sliding key and slot in the shaft and pinion. Two racks, 6 and 7, one above the other, are extended horizontally, so that this pinion engages in one or the other, according as it is raised or lowered by a lever operated in connection with the helical spring k'. The raising of the pinion changes its gear in giving the table w' motion toward the right. After finishing the shoe, the table is returned by hand. The slight transverse motion of the table o, required on account of the inequality of width of the soles, is permitted by the extension and contraction of helical springs placed under v', one end being secured to the side of v', the other end to the side of w'. By means of these springs, the edge of the sole is always kept up to the gauge a, back of the awl d, under the peg-driver. The gauge a is made adjustable, so that by changing it, any desired number of rows can be pegged around the shoe, one after another.

[By the pinion D, on the horizontal shaft E, which carries a bevel-wheel, B, meshing in a second bevel-wheel F, on the upright shaft c, motion is given to the turn-table S', placed on the upper end of the shaft, when required in turning the last in pegging the heel. A lever, c' c', pivoted at 4f, and a pitman, y', attached to r, and a weight, bb, as a counterpoise to adjust the weight of the sliding-frame on the roller f, pressing on the sole, serves as a means of giving greater or less pressure to this frame. The lever 16 is held down by a catch, 3s, until it is relieved by the short projecting arm, 3t, striking against it when the spring k' lifts the lever 16 and pinion from rack 7 to rack 6. H is a flat spring secured to the base x', the upper end thereof resting upon the shoulder of the catch L. The pinion being now engaged with the rack, which slides by means of a slot therein on a screw z', projecting from the table w', carries with it the rack 5, and thus gives motion to the turn-table S'. The same arm, 3t, now is moved against the catch L, and throws it from under the spring H, which depresses lever 16, and throws the pinion out of rack 6 into rack 7. N is a trip-hammer secured to the front of the base x', and acts on the spring 50 and lever 51, placed under the spring-handle r', throwing said spring-handle out of the stop a', when the lever 16 is lifted by the helical spring k', and thus permits the turn-table to change the position of the last, while the pegs are being inserted in the heel after one side is finished; then the pinion 9, in gear with rack 7, continues moving the table w' and the last still further to the right, and finishes the shoe.

[The pegging portion is represented by h, a rod in Fig. 3; the lower end carries the awl d, and the upper end the head z. f' is a helical spring attached to the head, giving the awl-rod a quick stroke when released from the cam 53, Fig. 3. The arm having been lifted by an arm, 54, projecting from the square rod 52, is also connected with z. This cam also holds up the rod and awl while the peg is being inserted. The spring f' has its lower end secured by a staple to the ways 60, in which there is a series of holes for adjusting the staple up or down, and thus to regulate the tension of the spring so as to strike a heavier or lighter blow, as may be required. Y is a square hammer-head, sliding, independent of the peg-driver, on the awl-rod h, said rod moving in stationary ways 60. Its use is to drive the pegs into the sole, and it is lifted by the end of cam 2, acting on a projecting arm 1, being held up by this cam (a portion seen in dotted lines,) while the awl is in operation. g' is a helical spring, giving a quick descending motion to the hammer. i, Fig. 1, is the rod of the peg-driver, lifted by a stirrup n (connected at 17), and by the cam e, on the main-shaft P. It slides on the face of the peg-cutter R by means of a slot, 18, and screw. The lower part of i is rounded and reduced in size, so as to enter freely the tube below. The peg-wood passes through a slot in R, and stops against a spring gauge-plate, 10. At the mouth of this slot a knife is drawn upward, and splits the peg with the grain of the wood by the stirrup m, connected at 22, raising R, and forcing upward the wood against a stop pressing into a slot, in R, arrests it, and the peg is forced into the tube. This stop is adjustable, by a slot, to suit different lengths of peg-wood. T, the base-block, upon which all the sliding portions are secured, is swung to the frame-work by a screw, at its upper end, so as to admit of a slight change of position, to bring the peg over the previously punched hole in the sole, by means of the lever A, acted on by the side-cam o in its revolution. At g is the trough carrying the peg-wood, connected with this base. A finger forces up the peg-wood in g by the weight e, and cord passing over the stub on the side of T. L is a bent arm, on which the stirrups m and n are pivoted.

[The operations of the machine, and the advantages secured by it, are thus described in the patent. viz.:

["The last being turned toward the wheel and handle on shaft P, the toe thereof toward the right hand, the edge of the sole bearing against the gauge a, and the drop-bar r', in a', under the toe, the peg-wood supplied in strips in the holder g, turn the shaft P toward the right, or in direction of dart.

["The cam 53 raises the hammer z, and rod 52, by a projecting arm, 54, thereon, and the awl-rod h, sliding in ways 60, and awl d, on the arm, 54, being released from the cam, the spring f' quickens the descent of the awl, and drives it into the sole of the shoe.

["Then the cam e, through the stirrup n, lifts the peg-driver I sufficient to let the peg-wood under it against the gauge 10, and the cam o, Fig. 3, the peg-cutter, and the cam 2 lifts the arm 1 of the sliding hammer Y, keeping it until the awl is raised out of the way by the cam 53 again coming in play, and both hammers are kept up until the upper end of the lever A being moved to the right, in the revolution of the wheel carrying the cam o (see Fig. 5, where this change of position is shown), while the lower end of A, entering a hole in the lower end of the base-block T, carrying the peg-tube and driver, gives it and them a slight side movement, independent of the awl and awl-rod, for the purpose of bringing the charged tube and driver over the previously punched hole in the sole.

["By the turning of cam 2, the arm 1 is released therefrom, and permits the head Y sliding on the awl-rod h, moving in fixed ways of the frame 60, to give a quick descending stroke on the head of the peg-driver, and thus insure the perfect insertion of each peg successively into the sole of the shoe.

["It is obvious that, instead of using the hammer to operate the peg-driver, and attaching the spring g' to that, the spring may be applied direct to the peg-driver, the same as is done with the awl-carrier, either plan being used at will.

["By this method of constructing a machine, many advantages are gained over the machines heretofore made.

["In all machines of this class, as previously constructed, the shoe or boot, when being pegged, was simply moved forward in a straight line, and, instead of gauging the row of pegs, by having the edge of the sole bearing against a gauge, as I do, they had to use patterns, corresponding in size and form to the boot or shoe being pegged, to gauge and form the rows, and at every change in the size or form of the boot or shoe the patterns had to be changed also.

["By my plan the sole itself becomes the pattern, and thus my machine, without any change or alteration, will peg a boot or shoe of any size or form, and by simply adjusting the gauge so as to throw the last further in or out, successive rows may be formed in the same manner.

["In the previously made machines, where the shoe simply moved to and fro, they could only peg along the sides, leaving a space around both heel and toe unpegged, and which had afterward to be finished by hand.

["By my plan of pivoting the last-holder, so that it can be turned around, I am enabled to continue the pegging entirely around the heel, starting at the toe on one side, and continuing around to the toe on the opposite side, thus completing at one operation the entire pegging, with the exception of a small space at the toe, where it is usual to insert nails.

["By using a spring, and attaching it directly to the awl-carrier, or to the weight attached rigidly thereto (if a weight be used), I drive the awl by a quick percussive movement, and then, by using a cam to withdraw the awl, I make sure of overcoming any tendency of the awl to stick in the sole.

["I rely on the spring for driving the awl, and it is obvious that the spring may be used for this purpose, with or without a weight, as may be desired; and by regulating or altering the tension of the spring, the force of the blow can be adjusted to adapt the machine to the making of boots and shoes of any style, with soles light or heavy, thick or thin.

["I am aware that machines have heretofore been made in which a cam was used to force the awl and the peg into the sole, and a spring used to withdraw the awl, and therefore I do not claim broadly the use of a spring or cam in a pegging-machine."

[The other two patents are subsequent modifications of this machine by the same inventor.

[The decision of the court relates to some of the details of the machine, the nature of which are sufficiently indicated by the language of the court to render that portion of the decision intelligible without further explanation or description.][3]

C. M. Keller, for complainants.

G. L. Roberts, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The bill of complaint herein is filed to restrain the alleged infringement of certain letters patent for machines for pegging shoes. A patent was granted to the complainant Gallahue, on the 16th of August, 1853, which was extended for seven years, on the 18th of February, 1867, and was afterwards surrendered and reissued under date of July 6th, 1869. Another patent was granted to the said complainant on the 29th of March, 1859, for another improvement, which was afterwards surrendered and reissued under date of June 22d, 1869. A third patent was granted to the said complainant on the 26th of August, 1862, for another improvement or improved machine. The other complainant claims as assignee of three-quarters of the right, title, and interest of the patentee in or to these letters patent. The bill alleges an infringement by the defendant of these several patents, and prays an injunction and an account of profits, &c. The answer does not deny the granting of the letters patent, or the extension and reissues alleged in the bill, but denies that Gallahue was the first inventor of the alleged inventions, denies that they were either new or useful, denies that they were granted "according to law," alleges that the inventions were never reduced to practice, denies that the complainants have any exclusive rights under the patents, and denies that the defendant has infringed, alleging that the machines which he has been, and is now, selling are constructed under various other patents, which are specified, and which were granted at various dates, from January 17th, 1854, to October 11th, 1864. The answer also alleges, that the inventions claimed by the complainants were described, before the date of Gallahue's invention, in a very great number of letters patent mentioned in the answer, and were known to a great number of persons, also named therein; and, finally, the answer alleges abandonment of these inventions, by the patentee, to the public.

The time which I have devoted to the examination and consideration of the voluminous testimony and documents put in evidence, and to the elaborate arguments of the counsel in an anxious endeavor to reach a just conclusion, and the numerous cases which are now before me awaiting examination and decision, both forbid that I should detain the parties longer in this court, for the purpose of doing more than state the conclusions to which I am brought; and the statement of those conclusions in brief must not suggest any failure to consider the points urged upon my attention, though not here separately discussed.

(1.) First, I do not consider the objections urged to the validity of the reissues set up in the bill of complaint, tenable. On the contrary, the improvements described in the reissues were included in, and shown by, the original record; and I find also that the invention was complete, and was reduced to practical use and adaptation to the pegging of boots and shoes.

(2.) Except so far as hereafter indicated, I find that the patentee, Gallahue, was not anticipated, in his invention, in any particular material to the decision which is below stated, and that the proof establishes that he was the first inventor of the devices secured by his patents, so far as such patents are found by me to be infringed by the defendant.

(3.) I find it unnecessary to enter into a detailed examination of the machine made by Amos Whittemore, of which parts were produced in evidence, to ascertain whether, or to what extent, it included a device or devices like those invented by Gallahue, because the proofs show, in my judgment, that nothing in its history is any impediment to the force, effect, and validity of the patent of the latter. It was an abandoned experiment, within the rule on that subject, not brought into effective operation, cast aside and taken apart, and, without any intention to reconstruct it, portions of its machinery were appropriated to other uses, and the remaining parts were wholly useless, as a machine, for any purpose within the purview of the invention of Gallahue.

(4.) The foregoing conclusions lead to the consideration of the specific claims in the complainants' patents, and to the question of infringement.

1st. The first claim in the reissue of July 6th, 1869, No. 3,533, is as follows: "The use, in a pegging machine, of a gauge arranged in relation to the part that supports the boot or shoe, to form a bearing for the edge of the sole, and thus insure the insertion of the pegs at a uniform distance from the edge of the sole, without the use of patterns, substantially as described."

If this claim should be construed to include any and every gauge which may be used, in a pegging machine, as a guide to which the edge of the shoe may be applied, to regulate the distance, from such edge, at which the pegs shall be inserted, then it is clear it could not be sustained. A gauge for that purpose had before been used, in the hand machine patented to John C. Briggs, October 9th, 1845, and a gauge performing a like office is also found in the machine made by Leander Lackey, which was invented earlier than that of Gallahue. Indeed, the counsel for the complainants, in substance, concedes, that, if such be the construction of the claim, it must be deemed invalid, for the reason stated.

But, it is insisted, that, when read in connection with the whole specification, this claim may and should be construed as meaning the use of an adjustable gauge, in connection with the automatic movable support of the boot or shoe, while subjected to the operation of the automatic movement of the awl and driver described in the specification. The fact, that, in the Lackey machine, the gauge operated on the edge of the shoe, to guide it, while it was held to receive the awl and driver, acting automatically, to insert the peg, necessarily reduces even this construction of the claim to some extent, and requires that it be held to apply to those cases in which the specific kind of gauge described by Gallahue in this patent is used, or in which substantially the same movable support is given to the boot or shoe in the process, or, at least, in which substantially the same pegging machinery is used, for the insertion of the peg. The specific gauge used by the defendant has more resemblance to the Lackey gauge than to Gallahue's, and the support of the shoe employed by the defendant is a different mechanical structure from the movable table described in this first patent of Gallahue; and, though it may bring the machine within the range of Gallahue's exclusive right under his subsequent patent, it cannot be deemed an infringement of the claim under consideration, if such movable table be included in that claim.

There remains, therefore, only the suggestion, that this claim embraces an adjustable gauge when used in connection with a movable support to the boot or shoe, and in connection with the pegging apparatus, that is, an awl-carrier and driver operated by a cam and spring or springs. In this aspect of the claim, it may properly be considered in connection with the other claims which more specifically relate thereto.

2nd. The next claim of this reissue, alleged to be infringed, is the third: "The combination of the awl-carrier and peg-driver, each separately lifted by a cam, and driven down by a spring, substantially as described." This I find to have been a new device, and, if the machines sold by the defendant are, in substance, the same, in this respect, as that of Gallahue, then of this claim the defendant is an infringer.

In the machine of Gallahue, as described in his original patent, there was, besides the springs, a weight co-operating therewith, to give greater efficiency to the blow; but the spring was there, also, acting, and the awl-carrier and peg-driver were raised by a cam. In the defendant's machine, the awl-carrier and peg-driver are raised by a cam; but the downward blow is given by the spring, without any additional weight. Hereupon, the questions arise, whether, when an inventor employed both spring and weight, in his machine, as originally constructed, he is at liberty to claim, in his reissue, the use of the spring alone, as included in his invention, and whether another person may use the spring alone without liability as an infringer. My conclusion, in this case, is, that the defendant was not at liberty to use the spring, and, by increasing its power, render it practically equivalent to both spring and weight, as originally described. How far such a change, with a corresponding change in the details of the arrangement, may be an improvement, to which the defendant, or those whom he represents, have title, may depend upon the patentee's right to claim the spring separately, in his reissue; but, in my judgment, even if an improvement, it is an infringement. It is an appropriation of a substantial part of the actual invention shown in the original record. Nor do I perceive any sound objection to allowing the inventor, in his reissue, to claim the action of the spring alone. It is shown in the record of his patent; and, surely, a patentee, whose devices are new, is at liberty to claim each, by way of reissue, although he may have represented and claimed them originally as acting conjointly. In respect to this claim, therefore, I deem the machines sold by the defendant an infringement.

3d. The next claim in this reissue, of which infringement is averred, is: "The combination, in a pegging machine, of a gauge for the edge of the sole to rest against, and an awl-carrier driven by a spring, substantially as herein described."

It was not claimed, by the complainants' counsel, on the hearing, that, if this claim be regarded simply as a claim to "combination," as such, it was valid; and for this reason—a gauge operated in the same manner, and produced the same effect, by whatever means the awl-carrier was driven, and the awl-carrier driven by a spring operated in the same manner, and produced the same effect, by whatever means the boot or shoe was brought to the proper position for receiving the peg. In such case, (mere "combination" being the subject of the patent), the doctrine proceeds upon the ground, that the parts are old, and that nothing new results from their contiguous or contemporaneous action, which is due thereto. But, where one or more of the parts are new, and the combination is, for that reason, made to produce a new result, in the greater rapidity and economy with which the shoe can be pegged, as, where the use of the new device of driving the awl-carrier by the spring made to operate automatically, or, in the terms of the claim, "substantially as described," cannot be usefully employed without the gauge, then there is something more than mere aggregation, in the sense above stated. Then there is a new result, due to the employment of the awl-carrier, driven by a spring, and operating automatically, in connection with a gauge, without which it could not be operated to produce the advantageous results contemplated and, in fact, attained, by the use of both. All machines are, in a certain sense, combinations; but it is not true of machines, as such, that, because every one of its members performs in it the identical office which it would perform howsoever used, the conjoint action in their new combination may not produce a result new and useful, and never before attained. In this view, I deem this claim valid, and hold it infringed by the defendant.

4th. The next claim is: "Making the gauge, (a,) against which the edge of the sole bears, adjustable, for the purpose of enabling the shoe to be so adjusted as to have two or more rows of pegs inserted therein."

The Briggs hand machine had, as already stated, an adjustable gauge; but, it was only adapted to one change. This enabled the workman to insert two rows of pegs only; and it was not adjusted in the same manner as was that of Gallahue. The former was attached to the machine by a screw, which, being loosened, permitted it to be turned, so as to present to the edge of the shoe, first, its longer, and then, its shorter, end. The gauge of Gallahue was attached by a screw, which, being loosened, permitted the gauge, (in which was a slot, through which the screw was inserted,) to be drawn forward, or pushed back, so as to regulate the insertion of pegs at any desired distance, nearer or more remote, from the edge of the sole. But, this construction of a gauge was not novel, and the circumstance that it was here applied to a pegging machine, and guided the shoe, so that any number of rows of pegs could be inserted, does not make it patentable, except when used with other devices, so as to constitute either a new machine or a new and patentable combination. In such machine or combination, it may be a part of the complainants' invention, but, the making of the gauge adjustable not being new, the mere application of it to a new use is not separately and independently patentable. Others of the claims of the patent may embrace all to which the patentee is entitled in respect to the use of the gauge, but, the claim to the mere making of the gauge adjustable, as expressed in this claim, I think, cannot be separately sustained.

5th. The remaining claim in this reissue is: "The combination, in a pegging machine, of a gauge for the edge of the sole to bear against and a rotating last-holder or support, substantially as described."

I cannot find that this claim is infringed by the defendant, unless I should hold that it embraces every combination in which a gauge is used, for the edge of the sole to bear against, with a rotating last-holder. If I were so to hold, then I must find, from the evidence, that Lackey anticipated the complainants; and, if I hold that the claim is limited to the special device by which Gallahue effected the rotation, then I must find, from the evidence, that the defendant does not infringe. In either case, the complainants cannot prevail, in this case, upon this claim.

6th. The only infringement of the reissue of June 22d, 1869, relates to the second claim therein. The complainants insist that the last-holder connected with the machines sold by the defendant, though widely different in form, does, by the use of merely mechanical equivalents, embrace, in principle and mode of operation, the substance of this second claim of Gallahue to his last-holder. That claim is: "Pivoting the plate or frame, (g,) that supports the last, at or near its centre, and so arranging it, that it may turn on said pivot, during the operation of pegging, thereby so adjusting the boot or shoe as to present the various portions of the sole in the requisite position to the awl and peg, as the sole moves along, substantially as described."

The specific details of the arrangement by which this result is automatically produced, are, some of them, the subject of other claims in this patent, but it is not claimed that these details are copied in the defendant's machines. It is claimed, that supporting the last on a plate or frame pivoted at or near its centre, so as to allow an oscillating or vibratory motion of the last, and to present the uneven and curved surface of the sole in proper position to the awl, at the very place of its descent, so that it shall pass in the proper direction into the leather, was new and a patentable device, and that, in this particular, though without copying the supplemental means of moving the last forward and backward, by which such moving was automatically effected, the defendant has infringed the patent. It will be perceived, that the pivoting here claimed is entirely irrespective of the question, by what means, whether mechanical, or by the hand of the workman, the shoe resting on the holder is brought or held under the awl and peg-driver, and alike independent of the means by which it is moved along, so as to be pegged, from heel to toe, or from toe to heel, and it has no necessary connection with the instrumentality by which the shoe is to be rotated, so as to be pegged on both sides, and around heel and toe. All these are necessary to the full performance of the pegging, but they are not embraced in this claim. It is the raising and depressing of heel and toe alternately, and the oscillation side-wise, so that the surface, at the point where the peg is to be inserted, may receive the awl and peg in the right direction, which this claim contemplates. Gallahue's device consists in placing his last-holder on pivots passing through an arm on each side, so that either end, by the oscillation of the holder on the pivot, raises or depresses either end of the last, as it is moved forward or backward. The sidewise vibratory motion is effected in like manner, by pivoting the bed of the last-holder at each end, so that it may be turned towards or from the awl, and so change the plane of the surface of the shoe lying thereon. In short, by this combination of pivots, something resembling a universal joint is produced, or, perhaps, more exactly, an arrangement like the usual mode of suspending a mariner's compass. Such an arrangement, applied to a pegging machine, was new in its operation and effect, in the art of pegging shoes, and its utility cannot be deemed doubtful, upon the proofs herein. The last-holder used in the machines sold by the defendant has the same operation, and in substantially the same mode. It is true, that some of the proofs would, at first view, indicate that the latter is not the equivalent of the complainants' device, but such evidence includes in its scope more than the claim now under consideration, as above explained. As it respects the applying of the shoe to the gauge, and holding it in contact, the hand and power of the workman is required. As it respects the moving of the shoe forward, and turning it around the heel and toe, the serrated instrument or feed, co-operating with the power of the workman applied to the last-holder, are necessary. But, as already remarked, these are not the features which are the subject of this claim. The vibratory and oscillating motion of the last, by the means of what is, in substance, a universal joint, is what this claim contemplates and provides for.

It is urged, that, by the defendant's machine, operated, in this respect, partly by hand, the operation is more perfectly performed, that is, the surface of the shoe, at the point of the insertion of the peg, is more exactly at right angles to the line of the motion of the awl. That may, perhaps, be true, but that is due to the guiding power of the workman, employed instead of the automatic motion produced in the complainants' machine, and it is not those which are embraced in this claim. No prior machine had the capacity here in question. The Lackey machine moved the shoe in the arc of a circle, but had not two combined motions, producing the result referred to. Several last-holders, called "jacks," had been contrived, but none had this important feature, as I think the evidence fully establishes. This claim must, therefore, be held infringed by the defendant.

7th. The other and remaining claim of which the complainants insist that infringement is shown, is in the patent dated August 26th, 1862. That claim is: "Cutting off the pegs laterally from a strip of peg wood by the movable knife, (e,) being brought against the surface of v, figure 3, as set forth."

It is clear, I think, upon the evidence, that this was an original invention by Gallahue. Laying out of view, for reasons already stated, the machine of Whittemore, no evidence is produced of any prior device like that of Gallahue. All previous devices for cutting the strips of peg wood into pegs operated upon the edge of the strip, so as to split it, and, the grain of the wood being irregular, the split would follow the grain of the wood, and the pegs were of uneven and irregular form. By Gallahue's device, the knife, actuated by a lever, was made to bear upon, and penetrate, the strip of peg wood sidewise, and divide it into pegs of even, regular, and uniform size and form. By the like device in the machine sold by the defendant, operating substantially in the same manner, the pegs are cut evenly and regularly, without being affected by irregularity or obliquity in the grain of the wood. If there were any doubt in regard to other particulars, the infringement by the defendant in this seems to me clear.

I have not overlooked or failed to consider the objections urged to these conclusions, in the very able argument of the defendant's counsel. The failure to notice them herein in detail is not due to a want of appreciation of the industry and ability displayed in their presentation. Having reached the conviction expressed in the foregoing, I have no alternative but to say, that the complainants are entitled to a decree in conformity therewith.

Case No. 5,199.

GALLATIN et al. v. The PILOT.

[2 Wall. Jr. 592; 2 Am. Law Reg. 697.][1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. Term, 1853.[2]

LIEN OF PART-OWNERS FOR SEAMEN'S WAGES — EFFECT OF SHERIFF'S SALE ON IT.

1. The lien for wages of a seaman, who is himself a part-owner of the vessel on which he serves, is discharged by a sheriff's sale of her, on execution against her owners. And this, although as a general principle, a sheriff's sale of a vessel does not discharge the sailor's lien upon her.

2. The decision of the case by the district court, reported as Foster v. The Pilot [Case No. 4,980], deciding otherwise, is not law, and is here overruled.

[1] [Reported by John William Wallace, Esq.: 2 Am. Law Reg. 697, contains only a partial report.]

[2] [Reversing Case No. 4,980.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Western district of Pennsylvania.]

The steamer Pilot, navigating the western rivers, was the property of Gallatin, Wood, and several other persons. The boat was navigated for joint profit; Gallatin acting as first mate, and Wood as second mate—it being quite a common custom on the western rivers, for part-owners to assist in navigating their own vessels. As part-owners and quasi partners in the transactions of the boat, they became indebted to several persons, who recovered judgment at common law, in the state courts, against them; and on one of these, the vessel was sold at sheriff's sale as their joint property. While the vessel was under execution, Gallatin and Wood, who are the plaintiffs in this suit, libelled her in the admiralty for wages, as part of the crew; they having, as already stated, acted as her mates. And the case coming on, after the sheriff's sale, to be heard, the purchaser at that sale intervened, and, conceding the existence of the services, denied the right of the libellants thus to recover on their lien; which right was the question now before this court. Notice had been given by the libellants, at the sheriff's sale, of their claim to have a lien. No exhibition was made here of the state of accounts as between the owners of the Pilot.

Messrs. Shaler, Stanton, and Hamilton, for the purchaser, admitting fully the law as stated in Taylor v. The Royal Saxon [Case No. 13,803], that as a general principle, the lien of sailors' wages is not discharged by a sheriff's sale, submitted,

I. That part-owners have no lien for wages, as mariners; or, at most, that it could exist only inter sese, and could not be exerted adversely to creditors or third parties.

II. That by the sheriff's sale, all the interest of Gallatin and Wood, the libellants, whether as owners or by special lien for wages, had passed to the purchaser at sheriff's sale, and that against him the court would not set up a claim for wages.

Mr. Penny, contra. The navigation of the western rivers by steamboats, being attended with unusual risk, it is usual for capitalists building or owning boats to unite with them as part-owners, one or more persons known to be skilful and trustworthy mariners, whose interest in the vessel, though generally small, is sufficient to ensure a vigilance, which could not be expected of mariners bound to duty only by the prospect of ordinary wages. It is an excellent public policy, calculated to elevate the character of mariners, both in its requirements and its effect. And it does no harm to creditors, since it adds nothing to the wages which must be necessarily incurred in the voyage, the practice, therefore, deserves encouragement from the court. And why shall it not be encouraged? Is a seaman less a seaman, if he works the vessel, because he has some property; or because that property is an interest in the boat he navigates? Why is his lien as against other persons, less sacred than the lien of his fellow sailor, who has no such interest? Third persons know, as of course, that the vessel is bound for all seamen's wages. Why introduce an exceptional case? no policy of law, no motive of natural justice calling for it. The owners had liens inter sese. Doddington v. Hallet, 1 Ves. Sr. 497, decided by Lord Hardwicke, settled that. The chancellor there gave one party, who had paid the debts of the boat, a lien against the share of his deceased associate owner. The consequence of doing otherwise, he said, would be, that while one partner had paid all the creditors of the boat, other creditors of the other partner, "would run away with what the plaintiff laid out and expended, which the court would avoid and prevent." Independently, therefore, of a maritime lien for seamen's wages, Gallatin and Wood had liens on the vessel, as respected the other owners, for money due them in account for services. A sale of any kind for value, without notice, we may concede, would discharge such a lien; but here there was an express notice of a claim of lien: and the claimants still have their equity to be paid. In a recent Ohio case (McDonald v. Black, 20 Ohio, 198), the supreme court of that state were inclined to say, that the better opinion, as well as the weight of authority, was in favour of the lien. It is not true, that the libellants, Gallatin and Wood, were liable for all the debts incurred by the other owners of the ship. Persons navigating a ship, are tenants in common, and not joint-tenants or partners. This is the law as laid down by Chancellor Kent, in the leading case of Nicoll v. Mumford, 4 Johns. Ch. 522.

Reply. I. As to the lien inter sese. Doddington v. Hallet, decided by Lord Hardwicke, was overruled, after much consideration, in Ex parte Young, 2 Ves. & B. 242, and Ex parte Harrison, 2 Rose, 76 (and see Ex parte Gibson, 1 Mont. Partn. 102, note, and Ex parte Parry, 5 Ves. 575), by Lord Eldon; who decided that part-owners of a ship are tenants in common, not joint-tenants; and therefore that no lien on the share of one, a bankrupt, who had been managing-owner, freight, &c., was due to the others: and Chancellor Kent, in Nicoll v. Mumford, reviewing the law on this point, presents Lord Eldon's as the true view. Not being partners, therefore, there could be no lien inter sese. And if there was such a lien in law, it don't appear by any facts shown in this case, that on a settlement of joint account, the balance would have been in favor of the libellants. Whether or not, certainly a sheriff's sale on execution against all the owners, must discharge any lien one has against the other.

II. As to the absence of liability in solido. This position is fatal to the former one of lien inter sese, which could arise only among partners. The doctrine of Ex parte Young and of Nicoll v. Mumford, decided by Lord Eldon and Chancellor Kent, and which establish tenancy in common, as distinct from joint-tenancy or partnership, overrules Doddington v. Hallet, which established lien inter sese only as a consequence of previously establishing that the owners are partners. The two positions assumed on the other side, cannot therefore co-exist.

III. But whatever may be the relation of the owners of vessels, strictly speaking, this boat was navigated for joint interest, and the debts arose from the transactions of the boat in these voyages. Certainly as to her voyages, the owners were partners, whatever they might have been as to the boat herself. In fact none of the points considered in the three cases cited, properly arise here; for the vessel was sold on an execution against all parties. The bare question is, whether the owners of a vessel can take her away from their own creditors? Whether, by mortgaging her to themselves, they can defeat the claims of those who are entitled to all their property?

GRIER, Circuit Justice. How far one owner might claim a lien against the share of another, for advances made, labour done, or any balance of account as between themselves, when the other partner sells his share, or becomes bankrupt; or whether, in such a case, this court will adopt the doctrine of Lord Hardwicke, Doddington v. Hallet, 1 Ves. Sr. 497, who decided that he has, or the doctrine of Lord Eldon, Ex parte Young, 2 Ves. & B. 242, who overruled Lord Hardwicke, and decided he has not, are questions not arising before me; for the accounts of the partnership, or how the balance stood among the partners, makes no part of the case.

A sale by the sheriff confers all the title which the defendants in the execution have, and is equivalent to their own deed with special warranty. The case then, presents this bare proposition—can a vendor for a consideration paid, retain a lien against property which he has thus sold and delivered, in the hands of his vendee: and that, too, for a debt due by himself to himself? Certainly he cannot; for where a chattel is sold and delivered to the vendee, the vendor has neither jus in re, nor ad rem; neither property in nor lien on the thing sold. Admitting that there was, as between the partners, a balance in favor of the libellants, and that it would have been a lien inter sese, how could we maintain such a lien on a boat sold by themselves with special warranty? A tailor who makes a coat for customers who furnish the cloth, has a lien upon the coat while in his possession, for the price of his labour: but assuming the lien to continue even after a change of possession, it would be an absurd application of the doctrine, to say, that where A. & B. are in partnership, and A. furnishes the cloth and B. makes the coat, and both join in a sale of the coat, that B. has a lien for his labour as a mechanic, on the joint property sold.

The assumption that part-owners, when navigating a boat for their joint interests, are not liable personally, or in solido, for repairs, wages, provisions, &c., furnished to the vessel while trading, or earning freight for their joint profit, is entirely without foundation in law. Fland. Shipp. § 381. The dictum of Chancellor Kent to the contrary, if he ever made one to the contrary, in Nicoll v. Mumford, 4 Johns. Ch. 522, has been overruled by the chancellor himself. The libellants, we think, therefore, cannot, to suit their purposes, shift their characters as mariners and owners, so as to retain a claim on their own vessel for their own wages, after they have sold it for value; or, what is the same thing, the sheriff has sold it for them. They cannot sell their joint property, and charge the purchaser with a balance of accounts between themselves as co-tenants or co-partners. Decree reversed, and now made in favor of defendants, with costs.

GALLEGO v. CHEVALLIE.

[2 Brock. 285.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1826.

WILLS — CONSTRUCTION—ADVANCEMENT TO HUSBAND — LEGACY TO WIFE — PAROL EVIDENCE—RELINQUISHMENT OF HUSBAND'S RIGHTS TO LEGACY—SUIT IN EQUITY BY WIFE.

1. A court of equity will sustain the bill of a married woman, suing by her next friend, to recover a legacy bequeathed to her, where the husband has transferred all his marital rights in the legacy to his wife.

2. A legacy, until it is recovered, is a chose in action, and the marital right of the husband to his wife's legacy does not attach, until it is reduced into possession. He may, indeed, sue for it, and reduce it into possession, but so long as it continues a chose in action, it is the property of the wife.

[Cited in Percy v. Cockrill, 4 C. C. A. 73, 53 Fed. 881.]

[Cited in Wheeler v. Moore, 13 N. H. 482; Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 208.]

3. A relinquishment by the husband, of his marital right to a legacy bequeathed to his wife, is valid as to the creditors of the husband, and a court of equity will not interpose its authority to compel the husband to reduce the legacy into his possession, for the purpose of subjecting it to their claims.

4. Parol evidence is not admissible to affect the construction of a will, but it is admissible where its introduction is required by considerations extrinsic of the will, and which, necessarily, depend upon such evidence.

[1] [Reported by John W. Brockenbrough, Esq.]

5. Where the testator advanced money in his lifetime to a husband, whose wife was a relation, and would be, at his death, an heir and distributee of the testator, and directed that the husband should be debited with the amount, that it might be deducted, after the testator's death, "from the share coming to the family;" and the testator afterwards made his will, bequeathing a legacy to the wife: Non constat, that the testator designed that the advance made to the husband should be deducted from the legacy bequeathed to the wife. The whole legacy was decreed to be paid to the wife, without discounting the husband's debt.

[This was a bill in equity, brought by Manuela Grivignie Y. Gallego, wife of Henry Newman, by her next friend, against Peter J. Chevallie, surviving executor of Joseph Gallego, deceased.]

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. The plaintiff, who resides in Spain, claims a legacy bequeathed to her by Joseph Gallego, deceased. The executor admits assets, and submits the question to the court, whether the plaintiff, as a married woman, can properly demand this legacy? The demand is supported by an instrument of writing, executed by the husband, in which he transfers all his marital rights in this legacy to his wife, and gives her full authority to receive it. Under these circumstances, the course of a court of equity is, to sustain the bill of a married woman, brought by her next friend, and to decree that the legacy shall be paid to herself. But, admitting her right to sue, the executor contends that her husband was indebted to his testator, and that this debt ought to be deducted from the legacy. He also says, that a creditor of the husband has attached a part of this money in his hands in the court of the state, and he submits it to the court to say, whether he is not bound to retain a sum sufficient to answer this demand?

This defence makes it necessary to inquire into the right of the husband to a legacy bequeathed to his wife, and into the rights of the creditors of the husband to such legacy. The common law of England identifies the wife so entirely with her husband, as scarcely to tolerate the idea of her separate existence while they live together. She cannot acquire personal property by a direct conveyance to herself. Her interest is, by act of law, almost in every instance, transferred to her husband, and becomes vested in her. But this rule does not apply to personal estate to which a female is entitled before marriage, and which has not been reduced to possession. This remains her property, and does not vest in the husband by the marriage. The marital right does not extend to the property while a chose in action, but enables the husband to reduce it to possession, and thereby acquire it. The property becomes his, not upon the marriage, but upon the fact of his obtaining possession. The right of the legatee does not originate in the common law, and is not governed by the old rule, which disables the wife from taking for her own benefit. It is a right which cannot be asserted at common law, and can be sustained only in a court of equity. The personal estate of the testator vests in the executor for the payment of debts, who is a trustee for the legatee, after the primary trust for creditors shall be satisfied. As courts of equity grew up under the control of civilians, they have adopted the principles of the civil law, which views the rights of married women with much more liberality than the common law. Legacies, therefore, bequeathed to a married woman, have never been classed with conveyances at common law, but with choses in action, and vest an equity in the wife herself, in which the husband participates, so far only, as to assert her title in a court of equity. The property does not become his, nor is it subject to the liabilities which attach to that which is his, until it shall be reduced to possession. Till then, his creditors have no claim to it. If he dies, living the wife, before reducing it to possession, his power is not transmissible to his representatives, but dies with him. Since the claim of the creditor extends only to the property of the debtor, it cannot reach a legacy until it becomes his property. It follows, then, not only because mere rights cannot be taken in execution without the aid of some special legislative provision, but because, also, there is no title in the husband to the thing itself, that a legacy not reduced to possession, is not liable for his debts. Can a court of equity subject it to them?

The books furnish no case in which this naked question has been brought before the court. This is, of itself, a strong, we think, conclusive argument, against the right. That a creditor has never applied to a court of chancery to interpose in his favour, and subject the choses in action, or the equitable rights of the wife, to his claim against the husband, demonstrates the universality of the opinion, that equity affords no aid in such a case. It is true, that the assignees of a bankrupt are permitted to assert this right. But it is equally true, that they represent the bankrupt, as well as his creditors, and that all the marital rights of the husband are transferred to them. When they come into a court of equity, asserting a claim on the equitable interests of the wife, they exercise the marital right to reduce those interests to possession, not any pre-existing right of the creditors. In such a case, the court grants its aid, on such conditions as its own rules prescribe, and will never permit the husband, or his assignees, to receive the property of the wife, but on such terms, on making out of it for herself and children such provision, as, on a view of all the circumstances of the case, may be deemed equitable. This uniform course of a court of equity, would be incompatible with a previously existing right in the creditors. This rule has never been recognized, so far as we are informed, in the courts of Virginia, but it has never been denied, and we can conceive no principle on which it should be denied. That those who ask equity should do equity, is a fundamental rule of that court, which enters into, and mingles with, all its decisions; and that the property of a married woman should not be taken from her, without making some provision for her, is as equitable in Virginia, as elsewhere.[2] Our statute of distributions, does not, we think, alter the case, by making the husband a purchaser of equitable interests which may come to the wife during marriage. We can find no case in which a husband has been considered a purchaser of the equitable interests, or choses in action of the wife, without some specific agreement by which he becomes so; and the act of assembly contains no declaration to that effect. It would be unreasonable to put this construction on it by implication, because the consideration supposed to be given by law for her estate, remains in the power of the husband. The court of chancery will not enable a freeman of London [3] to obtain the personal estate of his wife, without a settlement on her. Suits have been brought to assert the marital right of reducing her property into possession, but in no case that we have seen, has her equitable right to a maintenance been doubted. Were this a suit by the husband and wife for her legacy, the court would, certainly on the application, in England, without such application, direct a reasonable provision for her maintenance. As the case stands, the husband has relinquished his marital rights in this subject, and the question is, whether a court of equity will disregard or control this relinquishment in favour of creditors. As a general question, we can find no precedent for doing so. The husband has no interest in the legacy; he has only a power to make it his by reducing it to possession. Till this power is exercised, the property remains hers. We can find no case, in which creditors have required the aid of the court, to compel the husband to reduce it to possession, or in which a court has restrained the effect of a previous relinquishment of this marital right on the part of the husband. As a general proposition, we should consider this relinquishment valid against creditors; and if it is not so on the present occasion, its invalidity must be produced by the particular circumstances of the case.

[2] The English books abound with cases establishing this rule of equity, and the principle has very generally been adopted in this country. See Ex parte Beresford, 1 Desaus. Eq. 263; Howard v. Moffatt, 2 Johns. Ch. 206; Glenn v. Fisher, 6 Johns. Ch. 33; Kenny v. Udall, 5 Johns. Ch. 464; Udell v. Kenney, 3 Cow. 606; Fabre v. Colden, 1 Paige, 166; Carter v. Carter, Id. 463; Mumford v. Murray, Id. 620; Smith v. Kane, 2 Paige, 303. This rule is adverted to and commented on by Green, J., in Gregory's Adm'r v. Marks' Adm'r, 1 Rand. (Va.) 372.

[3] Adams v. Peirce, 3 P. Wms. 11.

What are those circumstances? In August, 1814, Henry Newman, the husband of the plaintiff, drew bills on Joseph Gallego, the testator, for $2000, and at the same time, addressed a letter to him, soliciting his acceptance of them, and promising repayment. These bills, with the letter of Mr. Newman, were presented to Mr. Gallego, in Baltimore, in June, 1815, who accepted them, and made arrangements for their payment in Richmond. He communicated the transaction to Mr. Poiton, his partner in this place, in a letter which contains this sentence: "Be so good as to debit Mr. Henry Newman, senior, to notes payable, for the sake of form, and that the amount may appear against him or his heirs, when I am no more, to be deducted out of the share coming to the family." It also appears, that this debt was charged to Newman on the books of the testator, and remained on his books till his death. His will was made in the year, 1818. Some objection was made to the admission of the letter from Mr. Gallego to Mr. Poiton, the plaintiff considering it as irrelevant, since parol and extrinsic testimony, cannot affect the construction of a will. It is undoubtedly true, that this letter cannot affect the construction of the will, nor does the court look into it with that view. If it has any bearing on the question under consideration, it is on an entirely distinct part of it.

Although the legacy given to the wife does not become the property of the husband, unless reduced to possession, yet he has a right to reduce it to possession, and may demand the aid of a court of equity for that purpose, which aid will be furnished as of course, unless the court be restrained from affording it, by considerations which are never disregarded. These considerations are extrinsic of the will, and depend on parol testimony. Such testimony must be admitted for this purpose. In cases where the husband does not voluntarily relinquish his claim to a legacy bequeathed to his wife, but asserts that claim in equity, if a distinct claim be also asserted for the wife, the court does not, as a matter of course, settle the whole on the wife as her separate property, but secures the whole, or part of it to her, according to circumstances. Where, as in this case, the husband voluntarily relinquishes his marital rights, the court will, undoubtedly, sustain that relinquishment, unless it be made in fraud of the rights of others.

In this case, there is reason to believe, that the husband is insolvent, and that he has relinquished to his wife that she may receive and enjoy the legacy bequeathed to her, secured from his creditors. In this, there is no injustice; his creditors trusted to his own resources for payment of their claims, and had no right to count on the fortune of Mr Gallego. Creditors, generally, therefore, can not compel him to reduce the legacy of his wife to possession for their benefit: but the application of this rule to a creditor, who is in rightful possession of the legacy, and has probably trusted the husband in the confidence that the means to secure repayment are in his own hands, is very much questioned. The relinquishment of the husband, and the consequent separate claim of the wife, may be considered as parts of the same transaction, and if the relinquishment was iniquitous, the claim, so far as it depends on that relinquishment, cannot be supported. If it was perfectly clear that the testator, at the time of making his will, or at the time of his death, intended this advance to the husband to be set off against the legacy to the wife, the court would feel great difficulty in disappointing such intention. But this is not perfectly clear; the debt is due from Newman, the legacy is given to his wife. The debt, therefore, may still exist, and yet not be a set-off against the legacy. Had the money been advanced subsequent to the date of the will, there would have been more reason for considering it as satisfaction in part for the legacy, but even then, it would not necessarily be so considered.[4] But this advance being made anterior to the will, gives countenance to the opinion that the testator did not intend it as a deduction from the legacy. The will being subsequent, and to a different person, furnishes probability to the opinion, that if a provision for the debt had been in the mind of the testator, his will would have given some indication of his intention respecting it. It is also a consideration not to be disregarded, that the fund out of which this legacy is to be paid, does not comprehend the debt due from Newman. The circumstances of the parties, and, indeed, the two letters introduced into the cause, lead to the opinion that the testator made frequent advances to his relations, and that this particular advance might not be in his mind, when his will was made.

The court does not perceive in the case, any satisfactory evidence that equity ought to restrain the full operation of the instrument by which Henry Newman relinquishes his marital right in this legacy to his wife, and is, therefore, of opinion, that it ought to be allowed its full effect.

NOTE. The decree rendered in this cause, directed the defendant, Chevallie, to pay to the plaintiff her legacy, without discounting therefrom the $2,000, due from the plaintiff's husband to the defendant's testator, but left open for future consideration the remaining question in the cause, whether the sum of $1,600, stated in the defendant's answer, to be attached in his hands to satisfy a debt due, or claimed to be due, from Newman, the plaintiff's husband, by process of foreign attachment, pending in the superior court of chancery in the state of Virginia, at Richmond, be, or be not, justly liable to such attachment for such debt? In January, 1829, the court of chancery at Richmond made a decree in favour of the plaintiff in the foreign attachment, above referred to, directing Chevallie, executor of Gallego, to pay him the whole amount of his claim out of the legacy to Mrs. Newman, thus affirming, as it seems, that a creditor of the husband may subject a legacy to the wife to the payment of his debt, before it has been reduced into possession by the husband. The chancellor seems, too, not to have regarded the act of relinquishment of Newman, the husband, as of any validity. At the May term of this court, 1829 [case unreported], (present, Marshall C. J., and Hay, J.,) the cause was finally disposed of, and a decree was rendered, which, after reciting the above decree of the chancellor in the state court, and that the plaintiff had admitted by her counsel that she had received the whole amount of her legacy, except the portion which had been attached in the hands of the executor, directed the plaintiff to dismiss her bill, which was done accordingly.

Case No. 5,201.

GALLEGO et al. v. UNITED STATES.

[1 Brock. 439.] [1]

NONINTERCOURSE ACT — REMISSION OF FINE BY SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY—CONSTRUCTION.

1. The power conferred on the secretary of the treasury, by the act of congress of the 2d of January, 1813 [2 Stat. 789], to remit any fine incurred by any importer of goods, wares, and merchandise, from Great Britain, which were shipped between the 23d of June and the 23d of December, 1812, if it appeared to the satisfaction of the secretary, upon petition by the claimants, that the property was, bona fide, owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, extended to the case of a joint interest, between citizens of the United States and Great Britain, and might rightfully be exercised in favour of such joint owners, being citizens of the United States.

2. The construction of that law, was the peculiar province of the secretary of the treasury. The duty of the court was, simply to institute an inquiry into the facts of the case, and to transmit a certified statement of them, with the petition, to the secretary; and the court, in which the prosecution originated, had no authority to revise the acts of the secretary, done in execution of it.

Appeal from the district court [of the United States for the district of Virginia].

The ship John and Adam, Thomas Drake, master, arrived in the port of Norfolk, in Virginia, on or about the 21st day of October, 1812, from the port of London, whence she sailed, early in the August preceding, with a cargo of British goods, wares, and merchandise. The ship and her cargo, were seized by the collector of the customs for the port of Norfolk, and on the 19th day of December, 1812, the attorney for the United States, filed a libel in the district court of Norfolk, against the said ship, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and her cargo, reciting these facts, and praying the court to condemn them, as forfeited to the United States. The appellants, citizens of the United States, and merchants, carrying on trade at Richmond, Virginia, presented their petition to the district judge of the United States at Norfolk, stating, that they had, for several years past, had large transactions with John Gilliat of London; and that in November, 1811, a correspondence commenced between them, for the importation of goods and merchandise, to be purchased by him in England, some on joint account, and some on the sole account of the petitioners, and shipped to the petitioners in Virginia, as soon as free intercourse between the two countries should be lawfully restored. That the said Gilliat subsequently purchased the goods and merchandise, composing the cargo of the John and Adam, but before the news of the declaration of war was received in England, and that the said goods were shipped, and did depart from the port of London, between the 23d day of June and the 23d day of December, 1812, in the John and Adam, for the port of Richmond, Virginia, and that John Gilliat, and the petitioners, were joint owners of her cargo: that the shipment of the said goods and merchandise, was nearly completed, before information of the war was received in England: that the said ship sailed from the Downs, on the 9th day August, 1812; and having arrived at the port of Norfolk, the ship and cargo was seized by the collector of the customs, and libelled by the attorney for the United States, in the district court of Norfolk, as forfeited to the United States, for an alleged breach of the laws, interdicting commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain: that process of monition and attachment had been issued in the said libel, by virtue whereof, the said goods and merchandise, had been attached and taken into the custody of the marshal, and had since been surrendered to the petitioners, upon giving bonds in the usual form for their appraised value, duties, &c.: that the petitioners conceived themselves entitled to the benefit of an act of congress, of the 2d of January, 1813, entitled "An act directing the secretary of the treasury to remit fines, forfeitures, and penalties in certain cases," and prayed that the judge would cause an inquiry to be made into the matters aforesaid, and that the facts as they appeared upon such inquiry, might be stated and annexed to the petition, and transmitted to the secretary of the treasury, to the end, that such relief might be extended to them, as the law in such case provided. In the statement of facts, transmitted by the district judge, to the secretary of the treasury, with the petition, it was certified, that the petitioners were citizens of the United States, that the goods, &c., composing the cargo of the John and Adam, at the time of their shipment at the port of London, were the joint property of the petitioners, and John Gilliat, and that the same were shipped, and did depart from the port of London, between the 30th day of July, and the 9th day of August, 1812, and that they were not purchased on account of the petitioners, and the said Gilliat, after war was known to exist between the United States and Great Britain. The secretary of the treasury directed the remission of the fines, &c. which had been incurred by the petitioners, upon their several shares thereof, or interest therein, upon payment of costs, charges, and duties. The district court of Norfolk, after reciting that the secretary of the treasury had decided to remit the forfeiture of the goods, so far only as related to the interest of Gallego, Richard & Co., on the motion of the attorney for the United States, directed the libel to be dismissed, as to the interest of the said firm, but inasmuch as the exact extent of that interest could not be otherwise ascertained by the court, ordered the parties to file with the clerk, the entire correspondence between themselves and Gilliat, touching the purchase, shipment, &c. of the goods in question, the invoice thereof, and a statement, verified by oath, showing in detail, what part of the goods, &c. were shipped on the sole account of Gallego, Richard & Co., and their respective interest, in those shipped on joint account. The appellants having failed to comply with this order, the court, at a subsequent term, set aside the order dismissing the libel, as to them, and decreed, ordered, and adjudged, that the whole cargo of the John and Adam be forfeited to the United States, as the property of John Gilliat, or some other person or persons, subjects of Great Britain, and as such, liable to forfeiture, and condemnation to the United States. From this decree [case unreported] Gallego, Richard & Co. appealed to this court.

MARSHALL, Circuit Judge. A complexion unfavourable to the appellants has been given to this case, by their refusing, or failing, when required, to exhibit to the district court, any testimony, whatever, establishing the extent of their interest in the cargo of the John and Adam. This conduct is well calculated to impress on the mind, a suspicion that their interest was, in truth, less than the moiety which they now claim. If, when at the time sentence of condemnation was pronounced, this inquiry was open for the district court, the judge had certainly a right to expect, and it was his duty to require, full satisfaction upon it. If that subject was closed, then no inquiry ought to have been instituted; and the sentence of condemnation ought to have extended to that part of the cargo only, which was not comprehended in the remission of forfeiture, made by the secretary of the treasury, in pursuance of the act of congress of the 2d of January, 1813,—2 Story, Laws, c. 149, p. 1283 [2 Stat. 789, c. 7],—the extent of which, in that view of the case, must be ascertained by the instrument itself. Upon examining the act of congress, I felt much doubt whether it applied to any case of a joint interest, between American citizens and British subjects. The case described by the act is, "goods, wares, and merchandise, owned by a citizen, or citizens of the United States"; not, "goods, &c. owned in whole, or in part by a citizen." The act then speaks of the time of shipment, and adds—"and the person or persons, interested in such goods, &c., or concerned in the importation thereof, have incurred any fine, &c." "on such person or persons, petitioning for relief, &c." "in all such cases, wherein it shall be proved to his satisfaction, that said goods, wares, and merchandise, at the time of their shipment were, bona fide, owned by a citizen, or citizens of the United States, &c." the secretary of the treasury is directed to remit, &c. It might well be doubted, whether the power of the secretary of the treasury, is extended to any case where the specific articles are not wholly owned by citizens of the United States. But the language of the act is not free from ambiguity, and it refers to an act passed the 3d of March, 1797,—1 Story, Laws, c. 67, p. 458 [1 Stat. 506, c. 13],—which, in express terms, applies to any interest the petitioner may have. In construing the act, no reason can be perceived, for distinguishing between the interest of an American citizen, when joint and when sole; and it is an act intended for the protection of the citizen, which ought to be construed liberally, so as to effect that intention. In addition to these considerations, the act has already been construed by the district judges, I presume, from the proceedings in this case, and certainly by the treasury department, to embrace cases where American citizens are jointly concerned with British subjects. The construction put on the act by the department, entrusted with the power of remission, ought to be respected by the court. I shall, therefore, consider it as comprehending this case.

I am now to inquire, whether the secretary of the treasury has remitted any ascertained portion of the cargo of the John and Adam, or has remitted an undefined interest in that cargo, leaving it to the court to ascertain its extent. The act of 1813, directs the same proceedings on the petition of the party applying for relief, as are directed by the act of 1797. That act, directs the district judge, to inquire into the circumstances of the case, and to "cause the facts which shall appear on such inquiry, to be stated and annexed to the petition, and direct their transmission to the secretary of the treasury of the United States, who shall thereupon, have power to mitigate or remit," &c. By this act, the court is to put the secretary in possession of all the facts of the case, with the petition, before he exercises the power given him by congress. The act of 1813, enacts—"and on the facts being shown on inquiry had by such judge or court, stated and transmitted as by said act," (the act of 1797,) "is required; in all such cases, where it shall be proved to his satisfaction, &c."—"the secretary of the treasury is directed to remit all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, that may have been incurred," on certain conditions in the act expressed, and to direct the prosecution to cease. The legislature seems to have intended, that the act of the treasury department, should be final and conclusive, and that all the facts should be placed before him, before he performs that act. Those articles, the forfeiture of which is remitted, are of course restored to the proprietor. The prosecutions, if instituted, are to cease. It would seem to be a part, and an essential part, of the duty of the secretary, to define the articles on which this remission operates; or if it be only on a certain interest on those articles, to define that interest. If the statement of facts made by the court, did not enable the secretary to ascertain this interest, it would seem to be his duty, to require a more full statement; and the case should go back to him for a final decision. It seems to be a part of his duty, not only to say, that the forfeitures shall be remitted, but to define, with precision, the objects on which this remission shall operate. If this view of the law be correct, it would seem to follow, that the remission granted by the secretary of the treasury, ought to be construed to dispose entirely of the subject, if it can fairly be so construed. Let the remission itself, with the papers to which it refers, be considered, for the purpose of determining, whether it ascertains its own extent, or refers that point to the court.

The petition states an application on the part of the petitioners, to John Gilliat, a merchant of London, to ship goods, some on the sole account of the petitioners, and some on joint account; and that, in consequence of this application, the cargo in question was purchased, which the petition avers to have been the sole property of Gilliat, and the petitioners. The statement, transmitted by the judge with this petition, asserts, "that the said goods, wares, and merchandise, at the time of their shipment at the port of London, in the kingdom of Great Britain, were the joint property of the said Joseph Gallego, John Richard, Michael Benedict Poiteaux, and John Gilliat." The secretary of the treasury, after reciting this petition and statement, says: "and whereas, it has been proved to my satisfaction," (How proved? Certainly by the statement. The instrument refers to no other testimony, nor does the law authorize him to receive any other,) "that part of the goods, &c., were, bona fide, owned by citizens of the United States, &c.:" "Now, therefore, know ye, that I, &c., do hereby remit to the petitioners aforesaid, all the fines, &c., incurred as aforesaid, on their several shares thereof, or interest therein, upon the costs and charges," &c., being paid. "And do, also, direct the prosecution, or prosecutions, if any shall have been instituted for the recovery thereof, to cease on payment of the costs," &c.

There is nothing in the statement of facts, which shows any right in the petitioners, to any separate part of the cargo. The words, therefore, "their several shares thereof, or interest therein," must refer to their individed shares or interests, not to any distinct property, they might possibly hold in severalty. The remission is to take place, not on their ascertainment of their interest or shares, but on their paying charges and duties; and the prosecutions are to be discontinued, not on their proving to the court, the extent of their interest, but on paying the costs. These circumstances, as well as the view I have taken of the duty of the treasury department, lead to the opinion, that the secretary considered the extent of the interest of the petitioners, as already established, and did not mean to institute a new inquiry into that subject. It was considered as established in the statement submitted to him by the court, which represents them to have been jointly concerned with Gilliat. Suppose the law to have required, that the prosecution should have been instituted in one court, and the petition and statement to have passed through another. Could the court in which the prosecutions were depending, have proceeded to an investigation of the extent of the interest of the petitioners, after receiving this instrument of dismission from the treasury department? I believe it could not, if by any construction, the statement of the district court, and the act of remission, could be understood to define the extent of the remission. The whole subject passes, it is true, through the same court; but that court is to exercise different powers, in different stages of the proceeding, All which relates to the property, is to be completed before the statement is submitted to the secretary of the treasury. The secretary acts on that statement, and his acts cannot be revised by the court. Sentence reversed as to a moiety.

BANKRUPTCY—CREDITOR'S PETITION MAY BE AMENDED.

Where the proofs disclose acts of bankruptcy not averred in the petition of the creditor, the petition may be amended so as to conform to the proofs.

[In bankruptcy. In the matter of A. B. Gallinger.]

W. H. Rhodes, for petitioning creditor.

A. Rosenbaum, for alleged bankrupt.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. A petition having been filed against the above named party, praying that he be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt, the matter was referred to the register, to take proofs, and report the same, with his opinion, to the court. The report has accordingly been made, and the case now comes up on exceptions filed on behalf of the alleged bankrupt.

The facts, as disclosed by the proofs, seem sufficiently plain. Towards the end of the year 1868, Gallinger, who was a wholesale dealer in wines and liquors, in the town of Oroville, procured from various persons in this city, goods to the amount of $10,000. What representations he made as to his means of payment, does not appear; but he admits that he stated that he had $10,000 in notes due to him from Chinamen. He denies that he said they were good, but unless he meant it to be so understood, it is difficult to imagine his motive for making any statement on the subject.

Towards the end of December, he wrote to his creditors in this city that he was unable to meet his liabilities, and advised them to send to Oroville to collect what they could. His whole stock of goods remaining in his store at this time was worth only $4,000, including the furniture and fixtures. On the thirtieth or thirty-first of December, an attachment was levied, on behalf of Wurmser, one of his San Francisco creditors, on this stock. On the same day, at an earlier hour, an attachment had been levied on the same goods, for a small sum, at the suit of one Brock, a creditor in Oroville. At the solicitation of Brock, who admits that he was apprehensive that his lien might be defeated by proceedings in bankruptcy, he signed a paper which is not produced, but which authorized a judgment to be entered up against him at once and before the time for answering had expired or his default was due. The goods were subsequently sold under this judgment and that obtained by the San Francisco attaching creditor.

The only account given by Gallinger of the proceeds of the goods bought by him in San Francisco is, that he paid to one Kasel, $3,000; to Marks, about $1,000; to Raymond, about $1,750, and to other persons, from one to two hundred dollars. He also sold to Marks some book accounts, admitted to be good to the amount of $200. Both Kasel and Marks are brothers-in-law of the alleged bankrupt. He asserts that the debts due them were for money loaned. But these debts were not entered in his books. They were noted, as he says, in a memorandum book which he has lost. Nor is Marks able to produce the books in which the amounts loaned to Gallinger or paid by him are entered. The notes due from the Chinamen seem to be nearly worthless.

The respondent does not deny that he is now hopelessly insolvent, and he admits that his pecuniary condition has not altered since the time when he made the payments above referred to, and certain transfers or sales of real estate spoken of in his deposition.

The facts of the case thus seem to be that he has converted into cash the greater part of the goods obtained by purchase in this city, and applied the proceeds to the payment of certain alleged debts due to creditors in Oroville, who were to a considerable extent his relatives. That at the time he made these payments he knew himself to be insolvent, and that he intended to protect them at the expense of his other creditors is, I think, apparent.

As far as can be ascertained, the payments were made in the months of October, November and December, and up to the very time of the attachments. He could not have failed to know what was the probability of his obtaining the payment by the Chinamen of the notes held by him, and which with his stock of goods comprised nearly the whole of his available assets; and when he devoted the proceeds of so large a part of his stock of goods, for which he was indebted to the amount of $10,000, less only the sum of $50 which he had paid, to the payment of the debts said to be due to his relatives and friends, he must have been aware that he was giving those creditors a preference in direct violation of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

The attachment by Wurmser he admits that he not only suffered, but procured—for it was levied at his suggestion and in consequence of letters advising his San Francisco creditors of the state of his affairs. But this information he did not see fit to give them until after he had paid some $6,000 to his preferred creditors in Oroville. He denies that the attachment by Brock was procured by him.

If the word "suffer," in the thirty-ninth section, has any meaning or operation beyond that of the word "procure," it is clear that the bankrupt in this case suffered his property to be taken by Brock on legal process. In re Black [Case No. 1,457]; In re Craft [Id. 3,316]; In re Sutherland [Id. 13,638]; In re Dibblee [Id. 3,834]; In re Schick [Id. 12,455]; In re Haugton [Id. 6,223]; In re Craft [Id. 3,317].

But at all events the confession of the judgment by the bankrupt, when he knew himself to be insolvent, and with the intent to enable Brock to secure his debt, by converting his lien by attachment into a lien by judgment, execution and levy, and thereby obtain a preference over other creditors, was clearly an act falling within the terms and spirit of the bankrupt law.

The sale of book accounts to Marks would seem also to be an act of bankruptcy. It was not done in the ordinary course of business, but, as he says, to obtain money to pay debts—and this at a time when he knew himself to be insolvent. The money obtained from Marks he must have applied to the payment of creditors, whose claims he preferred and satisfied, in clear violation of law.

The facts, as developed by the proofs, were evidently imperfectly known to the creditor, by whom the petition was filed. I think, however, that the second and third specifications are sustained. If necessary, the petition may be amended; for it is the duty of the court, when acts of bankruptcy are clearly established, and especially in a case like this, where something more than a mere technical violation of the law may be suspected, to allow such amendments and further allegations to be made as may be necessary to sustain the proceedings.

The exceptions to the report of the register are overruled. The petitioning creditor has leave to amend his petition, by alleging further acts of bankruptcy, and on his doing so, an order, adjudging the respondent an involuntary bankrupt, may be entered.

Case No. 5,203.

In re GALLISON et al.

[2 Lowell, 72;[1] 5 N. B. R. 353.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1871.

BANKRUPTCY—PROVABLE DEBT—JUDGMENT AFTER ADJUDICATION—EFFECT OF DISCHARGE—CONDITIONAL JUDGMENT—OPPOSITION TO DISCHARGE.

1. A creditor who obtains judgment for his debt after an adjudication of bankruptcy has issued against his debtor, and takes out execution, cannot prove his debt in bankruptcy; and the judgment will not be affected by the certificate of discharge.

[Cited in Bourne v. Maybin, Case No. 1,700; Re Stansfield, Id. 13,294; Re Swift, Id. 13,693.]

[Cited in Gilman v. Cate, 63 N. H. 280; Bowen v. Eichel, 91 Ind. 25; Boynton v. Ball, 105 Ill. 630.]

2. Such a creditor, therefore, cannot oppose the bankrupt's discharge. The decisions on this point considered.

3. Where a creditor prosecutes his suit merely for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due, he should cause that fact to appear of record, and the judgment should be modified to correspond with the fact.

4. Where such a creditor proved his debt, and afterwards obtained an unconditional judgment, and took out execution, and appeared to oppose the discharge, no one having moved to expunge his proof,—Held, he would be heard against the discharge on filing a stipulation to cancel his judgment if the discharge should be granted.

Objections to bankrupts' discharge. The debtors' petition was filed Dec. 31, 1867; and their application for discharge, Jan. 21, 1871; and was opposed by S. Klous & Co., creditors, who had proved their debt, and had afterwards obtained judgment and taken out execution in a suit which was pending at the time of the bankruptcy. There were assets.

E. Avery, for creditors.

J. M. Baker, for bankrupts.

LOWELL, District Judge. The creditors have not taken the ground that the application for discharge should have been made within a year after the adjudication. The decision of Nelson, J., in Re Greenfield [Case No. 5,773], that the limit applies only to cases in which there are no assets, has been followed by me for the sake of uniformity of practice, until the circuit court here should pass upon the question, and has been accepted elsewhere; though as an original question its soundness is more than doubtful.

The debtors maintain that S. Klous & Co. are not interested in the question of their discharge; because they have obtained a judgment since the proceedings were begun, which will not be affected by the result. It has been one of the vexed questions of the law, whether a discharge in bankruptcy or insolvency will operate on a judgment obtained after the date to which the discharge relates, but before it is actually issued; that is, pending the bankrupt proceedings. In Maine and Massachusetts it has been held that the judgment merges the original debt, and cannot be proved in the bankruptcy, and will not be affected by the certificate. Holbrook v. Foss, 27 Me. 441; Fisher v. Foss, 30 Me. 459; Pike v. McDonald, 32 Me. 418; Sampson v. Clark, 2 Cush. 173; Woodbury v. Perkins, 5 Cush. 86; Faxon v. Baxter, 11 Cush. 35. See Wolcott v. Hodge, 15 Gray, 547.

On the other hand, in New York and Vermont the decision has been, that the judgment may be looked into; and, if it is found that the debt was one that would be discharged, the judgment will be barred. Harrington v. McNaughton, 20 Vt. 293; Downer v. Rowell, 26 Vt. 397; Dresser v. Brooks, 3 Barb. 429; Fox v. Woodruff, 9 Barb. 498; Clark v. Rowling, 3 N. Y. 216. A similar difference of opinion has already appeared in connection with the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517]. In re Williams [Case No. 17,705]; Bradford v. Rice, 102 Mass. 472; In re Brown [Case No. 1,975]; In re Crawford [Id. 3,363].

The argument for the side which the defendant assumes in this case appears to me much the stronger. It is not only the technical doctrine of merger which is involved, but the defendant has had his day in court and one opportunity to plead this defence; and I take it to be a rule of the highest importance, that a defence which might have been made to the original cause of action can never be made to the judgment. Now, the bankrupt act provides most carefully for a stay of suit until the defendant's discharge is passed upon; giving, by fair implication, a power to the district court even to enjoin actions in the state courts, contrary to the general practice. All this is for the very purpose of enabling the bankrupt to plead his discharge. If he does not choose to avail himself of this right, what possible ground is there for saying that the judgment shall not bind him? Are we to inquire in each case why his plea was not set up, or why it was overruled? It may be that the state court was of opinion that the discharge, if granted, would be no bar. We cannot impeach their decision collaterally. It may be that the bankrupt intended not to set up the discharge against this creditor. We cannot authorize him to reconsider this determination. It may be that he was surprised. If there were any failure of justice in the particular case, the remedy must of course be found with the tribunals of the same jurisdiction. Until they have reversed or set aside the judgment, it operates as a new contract; and cannot be barred by a discharge which distinctly relates, as does this, to a date two years earlier

Coming to the decisions, we find that the two leading cases in New York both contain dissenting opinions of great ability, by Allen, J., in 3 Barb. 429, and Bronson, J., in 3 N. Y. 216, besides decisions and dicta of inferior courts of that state, against the doctrine finally established there. I consider these dissenting opinions well worthy of examination, and refer to them as able statements of what I consider the true doctrine; and they cannot but weaken the force of these authorities. But the conflict is really explained by the difference of practice in the several states. In Massachusetts, the bankrupt could always obtain a continuance to enable him to plead his discharge; while in New York he could not. This difference is pointed out in Haggerty v. Amory, 7 Allen, 458; and is confirmed by the remarks of the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court in 3 N. Y. 224, where, in commenting on a remark of the chancellor at 11 Paige, 535, that the defendant ought to have pleaded his discharge at law, he says: "And this may be conceded where the defendant has an opportunity for that purpose, which was not the case of the defendants in this suit." In consideration of this concession, it may well be doubted whether the decision would have been the same under a law which gives the most ample "opportunity for that purpose," as ours does.

In truth, this is the source of the whole difficulty. It is seen to be unjust that a creditor should push his debt to judgment against a bankrupt who is using due diligence to obtain his discharge, and who has surrendered all his property. The early English practice gave the creditor an election to prove in bankruptcy or prosecute his action; and, if he obtained judgment and execution, he could dispute the validity of the proceedings in bankruptcy, by seizing the property in the hands of the assignees,—a practice which led to a vast amount of litigation and uncertainty. He might, instead of seizing property, take the debtor in execution. But it was enacted, as early as 1730, that, if a creditor did obtain such a judgment and take the debtor in execution, or detain him in prison, after he had received his certificate, he should be discharged on motion. St. 5 Geo. II. c. 30, § 13. And this was continued in force until 1869. The English practice has had an undue weight in some of the decisions in this country. See the arguments in Dresser v. Brooks, 3 Barb. 429. The law was so in England; but it was the statute itself which provided for the case, and not any general rule in bankruptcy. It is easy to see, by studying the English cases, that this practice was established by statute to meet the very difficulty which our statute meets by granting a stay of actions until the question of discharge is determined. The statute of 1869 will work an entire change of the practice in England, and bring it to the true position. It gives the court of bankruptcy full power to stay actions; and no summary motion will hereafter be made, nor any judgment be obtained in that country, excepting such as will not be discharged by the certificate.

By our law—section 21 (Rev. St. § 5106)—an action may, by leave of the court in bankruptcy, proceed to judgment for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due; and that judgment may then be proved, but execution shall be stayed. This exception strengthens the argument for the general rule; because it implies that an ordinary judgment, procured after the proceedings in bankruptcy are begun, cannot be proved in the bankruptcy. It is clearly the intent of the proviso, that it should appear of record that the suit is prosecuted only for the particular purpose of establishing the amount of the debt, and that the court in which the suit is pending should modify its judgment as may be necessary to meet this state of facts, and should take care that no execution shall issue; and, if the discharge should afterwards be granted, that court ought undoubtedly to vacate or discharge the judgment in some proper way, and I hold it to be the duty of the creditor to see that the record is rightly made up. This provision is useless if an ordinary judgment, not obtained by virtue of this proviso, can be proved in the bankruptcy. The objecting creditor here did not apply for leave to prosecute; did not record the fact that he intended to prove his judgment; did not stay his execution, but took it out, and now holds and intends to enforce it. It was argued in his behalf that the superior court may yet set it aside. But he cannot be heard to set up this possibility, when he himself is still relying on the judgment, which was obtained by his own act, and the validity of which he intends to maintain if he can.

For the reasons given and upon a careful examination of the decisions, I am of opinion that a judgment obtained after the adjudication in bankruptcy, creates a new debt which cannot be proved in bankruptcy; and that the judgment creditor cannot oppose the discharge, because he has no provable debt, and because the discharge will be no bar to the judgment.

These creditors proved their debt before they obtained the judgment, and have a standing in court which no one has undertaken to destroy by a motion to expunge. I hold it, therefore, within my power to say that they may keep their proof if they will file a stipulation to release their judgment, in case the final decision in bankruptcy should grant the bankrupt his discharge. This will meet the exact justice as well as the law of this case. If they shall do this within a week, I will hear the case further. If not, the objections will be dismissed.

MERCHANT SEAMEN—LIEN FOR WAGES—"STALE."

1. A seaman claiming a certain sum for wages due him, was refused payment of a portion of it, unless he would sign a receipt in full against the schooner and her owners, and look to the captain for the balance. Held, that his receipt, signed under such circumstances, was good only for the sum actually paid.

Appeal from a decree of the district court [of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania.]

In admiralty.

J. W. Coulston, for appellant.

R. P. Kane, for respondent.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. By the settled principles of maritime law, mariners' wages are secured by a specific lien upon the ship and freight, and by the personal liability of the master and of the owner. Priority is given over all other liens, and they are treated with the most liberal favor. In The Mary [Case No. 9,186], Livingston, J., says:

[1] [Reported by Benjamin Vaughan Abbott, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

"Few claims are more highly favored and protected by law than those for seamen's wages. They are hardly earned, and liable to many contingencies, by which they may be entirely lost, without any fault on their part. When they become due, the vessel, owners, and master, are generally all responsible until satisfaction be obtained. The liability of a vessel for wages may be considered as the law of every commercial nation." They take precedence of bottomry bonds, and in the language of Sir William Scott, they are "sacred liens, and as long as a plank remains, the sailor is entitled as against all other persons to the proceeds as a security for his wages."

These are familiar principles of maritime law, and they are restated here only to indicate the footing of preference, on which claims like the one in suit are placed, and the indulgent liberality with which courts ought to deal with them.

The libelant in this case has proceeded in rem against the schooner Galloway C. Morris, to recover his wages, as cook and steward, during several coastwise voyages, beginning about January 28, 1868, and ending October 28, 1869, which were prosecuted under William Artis, as master. His service was continuous during the whole of the period within these dates, but he now claims his stipulated compensation for the time only when Artis was in command, allowing credit for different payments made to him.

The amount of his claim is but feebly contested, but his recovery is resisted on two grounds:—1. That he agreed to release the vessel and its owners, and look to the master alone for his compensation. 2. That his claim is stale, and its lien upon the vessel has therefore been lost.

Of the first defense, it is sufficient to say that it is without any foothold by which it can stand. It rests upon the assumed effect of a receipt given by the libelant to John Clendeniel, the ship's husband, on September 7, 1869. He was then entitled to forty-two dollars and fifty cents for current service on a single trip of the vessel, and although he then asserted his claim to a larger sum for arrears of wages, he was refused payment for what was confessedly due him, unless he "would sign a receipt in full against the schooner and her owners, and look to Captain Artis for the balance." Under such circumstances the receipt is good only for the sum actually paid to the libelant. A court of justice will not sanction or enforce a concession which has no other consideration than a refusal to pay a debt confessedly just and owing.

The second ground has been more earnestly pressed, and therefore demands a fuller notice. Staleness is not susceptible of a precise definition of uniform application. It is predicable of the peculiar circumstances of each particular case. It does not operate to discharge the debt, but to deny to the creditor the enforcement of some security or form of liability, which the law holds him to have lost by laches. Simple forbearance does not constitute it; but the reason on which it rests is, that the creditor has unreasonably delayed the collection of his debt, so that some special equity or interest would be injuriously affected by the allowance of his claim. Hence it is, that it has been generally, if not always, interposed to protect a purchaser of a vessel, or a person having a like equity, against the lien of debts previously existing, the collection of which had been so long delayed as to justify a presumption that they had been paid, or at least, that the privileged hypothecation of the vessel for their security had been waived. "If a claim of this kind be not seasonably prosecuted, and the vessel become the property of another for a fair consideration and without notice, it seems reasonable that those who have been negligent should suffer, and not an innocent purchaser. Some rule of this kind appears the more necessary in a case where it is so difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain either the existence or the extent of demands of this nature. But however reasonable such a rule may appear, none has yet been adopted, either in England or this country, which requires a seaman to assert his lien in any given time, or which will justify the court in saying, that if he does not proceed by libel the very first opportunity which is afforded him, he shall forfeit all right of obtaining satisfaction in that way, unless the vessel shall still belong to the same person." The Mary [supra]. And in The Bolivar [Case No. 1,609], Judge Betts says: "By the marine law there is no fixed period of time within which mariners must proceed to enforce their lien for wages; yet such lien will become extinct or barred by unreasonable delay, if the vessel passes into the hands of a bona fide purchaser ignorant of such a claim." 3 Kent, Comm. 196. Judge Ware remarks: "It is not doubted that a seaman may lose his lien by lying by for a length of time, and suffering the vessel to be sold to a person ignorant of his claim, without giving him notice." The Eastern Star [Case No. 4,254].

It is certainly in harmony with the doctrine of all the cases referred to, to hold that, in a case when the ownership of the vessel has not been changed, and no appreciable injury has resulted to the owner, forbearance by a seaman to demand and collect his wages, will not be attended by a loss of his specific remedy against the vessel.

In this case the beginning of the service for which the libelant seeks compensation, is not more than about twenty-one months before the filing of his libel, November 2, 1869, and this service was rendered in different voyages along the coast of the United States, down to October 28, 1869, when he was discharged. The ownership of the vessel was substantially unchanged, and nearly every one of the libelant's voyages was begun or ended at Philadelphia, where the ship's husband and most of her owners resided, and the ship's papers were easily accessible to any of them. We are unable, under such circumstances, to say that the owners have any equity, which ought to subject the libelant to a forfeiture of his lien upon the vessel, and to the probable loss of his just wages, by reason of his pecuniary inability to pursue another remedy for them.

It is urged, however, that the ship was sailed on shares, and that the libelant's forbearance has operated injuriously to the owners. It is too well settled to admit of controversy, that the lien of seamen for their wages is not affected by a contract between the master and owners in reference to the sailing of the vessel. The Canton [Case No. 2,388]; Skolfield v. Potter [Id. 12,925]. The only aspect in which such a contract can be considered here, is as a reason for requiring greater promptitude on the part of the seaman in prosecuting his claim for wages, than it might otherwise be his duty to observe. Where, however, the owners had frequent opportunities, by examination of the ship's muniments, to ascertain the posture of the libelant's claim; where demand was actually made upon them for its payment a month before his discharge; where it does not appear that any settlement with the master, upon the supposition that these wages had been paid, was made, it is difficult to see how, in any aspect, such a contract can be used to affect the libelant.

In our judgment, the libelant is entitled to recover his wages, as stated in the schedule exhibited with his libel, to wit, five hundred and forty-nine dollars and seventeen cents, with interest from the filing thereof, and with his costs to be taxed, and a decree will accordingly be entered therefor.

Case No. 5,205.

GALPIN v. PAGE.

[1 Sawy. 309.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. Sept. 13, 1870.[2]

JUDGMENT SALE VALID, THOUGH JUDGMENT REVERSED—JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURTS PRESUMED—RECORD SILENT — RECITAL CONCLUSIVE —SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—CONSOLIDATED ACTIONS—JURISDICTION—EXECUTION BEFORE JUDGMENT ROLL MADE UP— DECREE IN ABSENCE OF INDISPENSABLE PARTIES.

1. A sale of lands regularly made under a judgment of a court of record, valid upon its face, is valid; and a subsequent reversal of the judgment, on appeal, will not defeat the title acquired by a stranger through such sale.

2. On a collateral attack upon a judgment of a superior court, the court will be conclusively presumed to have acquired jurisdiction, unless the record, on its face, affirmatively shows a want of jurisdiction.

3. If the record of a superior court is silent as to the proof of a jurisdictional fact, on a collateral attack, due proof of the fact will be presumed in support of the judgment.

4. The recital of a jurisdictional fact, there being nothing to the contrary in the record, is conclusive evidence, in a collateral proceeding, of the determination of the fact upon sufficient evidence, although the evidence does not appear in the record.

5. Where the statute authorizes service of a summons issued by a court of record, to be made with respect to a specific subject matter, by publication, the court issuing the summons has jurisdiction to determine the fact, whether the service has been properly made; and the determination is conclusive, when collaterally brought into question.

6. Where two actions are consolidated, in one of which the court has jurisdiction of all the parties, and the action in which the court has acquired jurisdiction, requires precisely the same decree and sale as is entered in the consolidated action; the decree and sale thereunder will be valid, as a decree and sale in the action in which the court has acquired jurisdiction, although the court failed to acquire jurisdiction in the other action.

7. Under the practice act of the state of California, an execution may be issued and executed as soon as the judgment is entered, and before the judgment roll is actually made up.

[Cited in Blaisdell v. Pray, 68 Me. 273.]

8. When a court proceeds to a decree, in the absence of an indispensable party, without objection from any source, and the decree is not reversed or set aside, and a sale of real estate is had under the decree, whether said decree and sale is valid as to the parties before the court, discussed, but not decided.

[This was an action of ejectment by Philip G. Galpin against Lucy B. Page.] A jury having been waived, the cause was tried by the court. The following facts necessary to understand the points decided, are condensed from the findings filed by the court:

Franklin C. Gray died intestate in the city of New York, July 15, 1853, seized of the lands in question, leaving a widow, Matilda C. Gray, who, subsequently, gave birth to a female child, Franklina C. Gray, the lawful issue of said Franklin. The said Matilda C. and Franklina C. Gray, under the statutes of California, were the heirs at law of the said Franklin, and, as such, succeeded by inheritance to the interest of said decedent in said premises. The said Matilda C., and Franklina C. Gray have always been citizens and residents of the state of New York, having never been in the state of California. On February 15, 1854, William H. Gray commenced a suit in the Fourth district court for the state of California, by filing therein a complaint against Cornelius J. Eaton and Joseph C. Palmer, as administrators of said Franklin C. Gray, deceased, and the said Eaton, individually, as claiming some interest in his own right in the estate of said deceased, and said Matilda C., widow, and James Gray, father, of said Franklin, as his heirs at law, in which complaint he alleged a partnership between himself and the said Franklin, during the life time, and at the time of the decease of the latter, the former having one third, and the latter two thirds interest therein; that said partnership embraced all transactions of said Franklin, both commercial and in real estate; that the business was carried on in the name of said Franklin alone, and all property, real and personal, was bought and sold in his name, but that all property, real and personal, a schedule of which is annexed to the complaint, including the locus in quo standing in the name of said Franklin, at the time of his decease, was partnership property, and held in trust for said firm. He prayed that the property might be adjudged to be partnership property; that an account might be taken, the affairs of the firm settled up, and that one third of the proceeds of the partnership property be adjudged to him, and the whole partitioned between the said William H. Gray, and the defendants, according to their respective interests. On June 27, 1854, said William H. Gray, complainant, filed a supplemental complaint, in which he alleges the birth of the said Franklina C. since the commencement of the action; that she is entitled to share in the estate as heir at law; and that she resides with her mother at Brooklyn, N. Y. He prays that she be made a party, that a guardian ad litem be appointed, that service by publication of summons may be had in pursuance of the statute of the state of California, upon said Matilda C. and Franklina C., and for the same relief prayed in the original complaint. An order for publication was made, as to both mother and child, and that a copy of the summons and complaint be sent through the post office addressed to said infant, care of her mother at Brooklyn, N. Y. The publication was made, and the copy of complaint and summons sent to said defendants Matilda C. and infant, Franklina C. as prescribed by the statute, and said order of the court. October 9, 1854, said defendant, Matilda C., by her attorney, Henry S. Foote, appeared, and filed her answer in said cause. December 16, 1854, complainant, William H. Gray, filed his petition, stating the infancy and non-residence of said Franklina C., that due service of summons had been made by publication, and asking the appointment of a guardian ad litem in pursuance of the statute on the subject. On the same day the court regularly appointed said Henry S. Foote, the attorney of defendant, Matilda C., as guardian ad litem of said infant defendant, Franklina C. The said H. S. Foote, as guardian ad litem, of said infant, filed January 2, 1855, an answer on her behalf, denying all the allegations of the complaint. The said administrators, Eaton and Palmer, having been duly served, also appeared, and filed their answers as such administrators, denying the allegations of the complaint. The said Cornelius J. Eaton, also, on his own behalf, answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and denying that the schedule annexed was a true statement of the property. He then, as new matter, entitling him, in his individual character to affirmative relief, alleged on his own behalf, that he was a partner with the said Franklin C. Gray in his life time, and, at the time of his decease, and that all the property was partnership property; that since the decease of said Franklin, he had been in possession of the same, both as surviving partner and as administrator; and that he had other demands against said Franklin. He annexes a schedule of the partnership property, also, including the locus in quo, and prays that he may be adjudged a partner, that an account be had, the partnership affairs settled, and a partition made.

The issues of fact on plaintiff's complaint in this action, were tried on the days from the sixteenth to the twentieth of January, 1855, inclusive, the said infant defendant appearing by her said guardian ad litem, H. S. Foote, and all other defendants by their counsel, and a general and special verdict on the issues was returned in favor of complainant, William H. Gray. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and, an appeal from the order denying the motion having been taken to the supreme court, the appeal was dismissed October 1, 1855. No judgment was entered on said verdict till after the following proceedings were had. April 14, 1855, the said Cornelius J. Eaton commenced a suit in his own behalf in the same court, against said Joseph C. Palmer, as administrator, and said Matilda C. and Franklina C. Gray, as heirs at law of said Franklin C. Gray, by filing a complaint in which he alleged a partnership, etc., substantially the same as in his individual answer, setting up an affirmative cause of action, filed in the said suit of William H. Gray v. Eaton et al., before mentioned. He sets up a claim to one-fourth interest as partner with said Franklin C., in all the property held by said Gray at the time of his decease, annexing a schedule thereof including said premises. He alleges the heirship of said Matilda C. and Franklina C.; the infancy of the latter, and prays that a guardian ad litem may be appointed for her; that he be adjudged a partner; that an account and settlement of the partnership affairs may be had, and the assets partitioned, etc. He afterward amended the complaint, making said William H. Gray a party defendant, alleging that he claims some interest in the partnership property. April 16, 1855, a summons was duly issued in said cause. Afterward an affidavit of the book-keeper in the office of the San Francisco Herald was filed, showing a publication of summons for three months in the said San Francisco Herald, but there are not now found in the record, or on the files, of this action, any affidavit for an order of publication of summons, nor any order for service by publication, or any affidavit showing a deposit in the post office of any copy of the summons and complaint addressed to said Franklina C. or her mother, the said Matilda C. Gray, at their place of abode. Upon filing the said affidavit of publication of summons in the Herald, September 3, 1855, said complainant filed a petition praying the appointment of said Henry S. Foote as guardian ad litem, and a consent of said Foote to act. The petition states the proper facts, and among others, "that the service of summons in the said action upon the said infant defendant has been completed upwards of ten days," and, thereupon, on the same day, the court made an order with the proper recitals, appointing said Foote guardian ad litem for said infant, and in said order, it is among other things recited, that it appears to the court "that the service of the summons in said action upon her" (said Franklina C. Gray) "has been completed upwards of ten days." Conceding the service of summons to have been properly made, this order was regularly made. September 15, 1855, said Foote, as guardian ad litem of said infant, filed an answer, denying all the allegations of the complaint. The said defendant, Matilda C. Gray, mother of said infant, also, by her attorney, the said Henry S. Foote, appeared and filed her answer, also denying the allegations of the complaint. The said Palmer, administrator, and said William H. Gray, also, filed similar answers.

On October 23, 1855, all the said parties in the said two actions, other than said infant, by their attorneys of record, and the said infant by the said Foote, as guardian ad litem, filed a stipulation in writing, duly signed by said attorneys and guardian ad litem, to consolidate said two actions into one. On October 27, 1855, the court made, signed, and filed in said consolidated actions, a judgment or decree, in which it was adjudged that said Franklin C. Gray, deceased, and Cornelius J. Eaton, were partners in business from January 1, 1851, till the decease of said Franklin in 1853, and that said partnership embraced all the property, real and personal, of said parties; and each of them, the said Franklin C. having three fourths, and said Cornelius J. Eaton one fourth interest therein, and adjudging to said Eaton one fourth interest; also, adjudging that there was a like partnership existing between the said Franklin C. and William H. Gray, but that said last partnership was subject and subordinate to said partnership between said Eaton and said Franklin C. Gray; that is to say, that said Franklin C. and William H. Gray were partners in the three fourths interest in the said partnership of said Franklin C. Gray and Cornelius J. Eaton, held in the name of said Franklin C., the said William H. Gray holding one third and the said Franklin C. two-thirds of said three fourths interest in said partnership between said Eaton and Gray, and adjudging such interest to said William H. Gray; also adjudging that said Matilda C. and Franklina C. Gray were each entitled to one half the interest which said Franklin C. would have if living. The judgment or decree ordered an account to be taken and stated, and appointed a commissioner to state the accounts of the said partners and to make sales of the property, real and personal, in pursuance of the directions of the judgment, or of any further judgment or order that might be made by the court. On March 25, 1856, the commissioner made a report, stating the several accounts and showing the partnership property on hand, real and personal, which included the premises in question. April 7, 1856, the court entered an order confirming said report, and directing a further judgment or decree to be entered in pursuance therewith. On the same day the court made, signed and filed in said consolidated action a further and final judgment or decree in pursuance of said order, in which, among other things, the commissioner before appointed was directed to proceed and sell said partnership property, in pursuance of the directions in the said prior judgment, receive the proceeds, and pay over portions of the proceeds and divide the remainder in a specified manner. The said judgment so signed and filed was regularly entered in the judgment book of said court as required by the statute. Afterward, May 3, 1856, the said commissioner in pursuance of the direction of said two judgments or decrees, after duly advertising the sale, sold the said real property, as directed by said two judgments, or decrees, including the premises in question. The commissioner having reported the said sale, the same was confirmed by the court, May 14, 1856. The premises in question were sold at their full value, and conveyed by said commissioner to Gwyn Page, and the title thus acquired has become vested in the defendant, Lucy B. Page. At the time of said sale, the said commissioner, for the purposes of said sale had in his possession the said original final judgment made and filed April 7, 1856, also, a certified copy thereof. He inadvertently failed to return said original to the files of the court, but retained it in his possession for nine years thereafter, when it was found and returned to the files, but the judgment had been duly entered, and was of record in the judgment book, as required by statute. The clerk neglected to attach together the proper papers and make up the judgment roll in said consolidated action as prescribed by the statute, till November 24, 1856, long after said sale, and at the time of making up said roll at said last named date, the said original judgment, made and filed on the said 7th of April, 1856, was in the possession of said commissioner, and not in the custody of said clerk, and was, consequently, not attached to said roll. No other evidence of a due service, or want of service of summons on said infant defendant in said case of Eaton v. Palmer et al., is now found in the record or the files of the case, than is hereinbefore, and in the opinion of the court stated. Subsequent to said sale and conveyance, an appeal to the supreme court of California from said decrees in said consolidated actions of Gray v. Eaton & Palmer, Administrators, et al., and Eaton v. Palmer, Administrator, et al., was taken by said defendants, Matilda C. and Franklina C. Gray, and upon said appeal, at the April term, 1858 [9 Cal. 616], the judgment, or decree in said cause of Eaton v. Palmer et al. was reversed, so far as it affected the rights of said infant defendant, Franklina C. Gray, on the ground that there had been no sufficient service of summons, but not reversed, as to the other parties, and as to the other action of Gray v. Eaton, Palmer et al., the judgment was reversed, as to both the defendants Matilda C. and Franklina C. Gray, on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to justify it, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

The statute in force at the time when the actions were commenced, and the decree or judgment rendered, by virtue of which the premises were sold, provided for service on non-resident defendants as follows, to-wit:

"When the person on whom the service is to be made resides out of the state, * * * and the fact shall appear by affidavit, to the satisfaction of the court, or a judge thereof, or a county judge, and it shall, in like manner appear that a cause of action exists against the defendant in respect to whom the service is to be made, or that he is a necessary or proper party to the action, such court or judge may grant an order that the service be made by the publication of the summons.

"The order shall direct the publication to be made in a newspaper, to be designated, as most likely to give notice to the person to be served, and for such length of time as may be deemed reasonable, at least, once a week; provided, that publication against a defendant residing out of the state, * * * shall not be less than three months. In case of publication where the residence of a non-resident * * * is known, the court or judge shall, also, direct a copy of the summons and complaint to be forthwith deposited in the post-office directed to the person to be served at his place of residence. When publication is ordered, personal service of a copy of the summons and complaint, out of the state, shall be equivalent to publication and deposit in the post-office.

"In either case, the service of the summons shall be deemed complete at the expiration of the time prescribed by the order for publication.

"Proof of the service of the summons shall be as follows. In case of publication the affidavit of the printer or his foreman, or principal clerk, showing the same, and an affidavit of a deposit of a copy of the summons in the post-office, if the same shall have been deposited."

The plaintiff has acquired such title as Matilda C. and Franklina C. Gray had to the premises in controversy, after the sale and conveyance made under said judgment, and the defendant has the title derived under said sale. The other facts necessary to comprehend the points decided are stated in the opinion.

J. B. Harmon, for plaintiff.

Williams & Thornton, for defendant.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. If the decree, or "judgment," as the statute of California terms it, in the consolidated actions of Gray v. Eaton, Palmer et al., was upon its face a valid decree or judgment, and if it authorized the sale under which defendant claims, at the time it was made, the sale is valid, and it passed the title; and the subsequent reversal of the decree by the supreme court of California on appeal, did not invalidate the title thus acquired, while the decree was in force. This is settled by the case of Gray v. Brignardello, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 633-637, in which this identical sale was under consideration. The question, then, is, was there a valid decree, or judgment, authorizing the sale in force at the time the said sale was made?

By some oversight, in the case of Gray v. Brignardello, only the interlocutory decree of the 27th of October, 1855, was introduced in evidence, and the supreme court, finding only this decree in the record, necessarily assumed that there was no other, and held that this decree, being interlocutory, only, did not authorize a sale. The sale was held to be void on the ground that there had been no final decree entered authorizing it. In the present case, as shown by the findings, it appears, that the commissioner on the 25th of March, 1856, made his report as required by the said interlocutory decree of October 27, 1855; that his report was duly confirmed, and a final decree in accordance therewith directed by order of the court, on the 7th of April, 1856, and on the same day, in pursuance of such order, a final decree was drawn up, signed by the judge, filed in the case, and afterward duly entered in the judgment book; and that the commissioner had the original decree so signed and filed, in his possession for the purposes of the sale, at the time of making said sale. The said decree of the 7th of April, 1856, in terms empowers the commissioner to sell. If these several decrees were valid, at the time of the sale, the sale under them is valid, and the title to the property has passed to the defendant, Lucy B. Page. Although the same title is in question, the ground upon which Gray v. Brignardello was reversed, is obviated in this case, by the introduction of the decree therein omitted, and the decision must depend upon other points not determined in that case. The question now is, whether it appears upon the face of the record, that the court had no jurisdiction to make a decree that should be binding upon all, or any, of the defendants, for, as expressed in a very old case, "the rule of jurisdiction, is, that nothing shall be intended to be out of the jurisdiction of a superior court, but that which especially appears to be so." Peacock v. Bell, 1 Saund. 74. The record in the consolidated action is here attacked collaterally, and, not on appeal, or in a direct proceeding of any kind to reverse, set aside, or vacate the decree. The rule is different in the two cases. When attacked collaterally, it is not enough, that the record does not affirmatively show jurisdiction, but on the contrary, it must affirmatively show that the court did not have jurisdiction, or the decree will be valid until reversed on appeal, or vacated in some direct proceeding taken for that purpose. Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391; Grignon's Lessees v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319, 340, 341, 343; Voorhees v. Bank of U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 449, 471–473, 475; Sargeant v. State Bank of Indiana, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 384–386; Huff v. Hutchinson, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 588; Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 193; Town of Huntington v. Town of Charlotte, 15 Vt. 46; Foote v. Stevens, 17 Wend. 483; Granger v. Clark, 22 Me. 128. If the decree under which the sale in question was made is void, it is on the ground that it appears on the face of the record, that there was no service, in any mode recognized by the statute, upon the infant defendant, Franklina C. Gray, who was, at the time, a resident of the state of New York, and the court failed to acquire jurisdiction of her person. Since the trial of other cases in this court involving titles derived under the same sale, the subject of the validity of judgments obtained upon publication of summons on a collateral attack, has undergone, in the case of Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, a more thorough investigation in the supreme court of the state of California than it had ever before received in that court. After an elaborate discussion of the whole question, prior decisions, upon some points, were somewhat modified, and the law upon the subject, so far as this state is concerned, was finally settled. This decision has been repeatedly affirmed by subsequent decisions, both before and since the change in the constitution of the court, and as it settles the law of California upon the subject, I regard it as binding upon this court, which, in the present action, is only administering the laws of the state of California.[3] Besides, I am satisfied that the decision rests upon sound and well established legal principles, often recognized by adjudications of the supreme court of the United States. Under the decision in Hahn v. Kelly, I have no doubt that upon the face of the record in the consolidated actions of Gray v. Palmer, Eaton, et al., and Eaton v. Palmer et al., when presented in a collateral proceeding, the court must be held to have acquired jurisdiction of the person of Franklina C. Gray, for the purposes of determining her rights in the subject matter of those actions. In the former case, there is no room for doubt. Besides, in that very case, on appeal from the decree now under consideration, the very question was directly presented to the appellate court, whether there was a valid service on said infant, under the laws of California; and it was held on said appeal to be a valid service, but the decree was reversed on other grounds. Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 616, 637. Thus, the question whether there was a valid service, under the statutes of California, was directly determined in the affirmative by the highest court in the state on appeal, wherein the question was directly made and decided. But it was held on the same appeal, that there was no sufficient service on the said infant, Franklina C. Gray, in the other case of Eaton v. Palmer, and the decree as to that case was for this error reversed only "so far as it affects the rights of the infant, Franklina C. Gray," and was not disturbed as to any of the other defendants. Id. 641. But this was after the sale in question, and the question on appeal is a very different one from the question presented when the judgment is attacked collaterally, as is the case now in hand; and it does not follow that the decree was not valid at the time of the sale, as to the infant, on a collateral attack, because it was afterward reversed on appeal on the ground stated. At the time of the sale, a purchaser was entitled to rely on the validity of the decree, unless it affirmatively appeared on the face of the record that the court had no jurisdiction of the infant. Does a want of jurisdiction so appear? I think not. Certainly not under the principles established by the supreme court of California in the case of Hahn v. Kelly, supra, and subsequent cases affirming it.

The provisions of the statute in force, at the time of the pendency of the action respecting service on non-resident defendants, who were necessary parties to actions, and respecting judgments, and judgment rolls affecting the question, are found in the finding of facts, and need not be repeated here. The statute, it will be perceived, does not provide what shall be done with the orders of publication, or the affidavits upon which they are based. They do not constitute any part of the judgment roll, as was held in Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 404, 429. We can only look to the judgment roll in a collateral attack, for that, and that only, is the record. Id. 404, 425, 429. Upon the same point, the supreme court of California, in Sharp v. Daugney, 33 Cal. 512, 513, says:

"The order of publication, and the affidavit on which the order was based, were also in evidence, but as neither the one nor the other constituted any part of the proof of service, they were both foreign to the record, by which, in a collateral attack upon the judgment, we can only be advised concerning the jurisdiction of the court to pronounce it. The circumstance that papers not belonging to the judgment roll are found commingled with it, or attached to other papers that do belong to it, can create no embarrassment. The case is one of mixture and not of fusion, and the papers not falling within the statute definition of a 'judgment roll,' must be treated as of no effect."

The record imports absolute verity, and cannot be impeached from without. See 34 Cal. 422 et seq. The statute in force when the judgment or decree in question was rendered, provided—Firstly, that the judgment should be entered in the judgment book; secondly, that "immediately after entering the judgment, the clerk should attach together and file the following papers, which shall constitute the judgment roll: (1) In case the complaint be not answered by any defendant, the summons, with the affidavit or proof of service, and the complaint, with a memorandum endorsed on the complaint that default of defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment; (2) in all other cases, the summons, pleadings and a copy of the judgment, and any orders relating to a change of parties."

Taking the view most favorable to plaintiff, and regarding the judgment in question as one by default, although there was a guardian appointed and an answer filed, and examining the papers which constitute the judgment roll, or the record, and we find an affidavit of the printer showing publication of summons. This is all we would expect to find in that affidavit. The printer's affidavit never covers any fact other than the publication of summons. That branch of the proof is fully covered. The affidavit of deposit of a copy of the complaint and summons in the post office, or of the statutory substitute, personal service of a copy at the residence of defendant abroad, covers a separate and independent fact, and is always made by a different party. In this case, no affidavit now appears on the record as to deposit in the post office, or personal service abroad as a substitute. The record, therefore, is simply silent on the subject. It does not affirmatively appear by the record, or by evidence on file, or otherwise, what was done, or that anything was done upon this point; nor does it appear that nothing was done. The record is simply silent. Nor does it appear by the record that the residence of the infant was known to the plaintiff, unless it can be inferred from the fact that because the plaintiff in the other case of Gray v. Palmer [supra] was aware of her residence, that Eaton must, also, have been aware of it. But, in a collateral attack upon the judgment, we are not authorized to arrive at conclusions in this mode, although this is the way the supreme court of California seems to have arrived at its conclusions on appeal. It does not appear, therefore, that it was a case requiring a deposit, or if it does, it does not affirmatively appear that the deposit in the post office was not made. The record is simply silent on the subject. It neither appears in the judgment roll nor record, nor even in the files or minutes of the court, so far as they have been presented in this case, whether there was a deposit in the post office; or a personal service abroad, as a substitute, or not. There is simply nothing on the subject, except what is shown by the findings. It is notorious that at that time papers were carelessly kept, and much negligence prevailed in making up judgment rolls. In this very case, the papers were not attached together and filed as a judgment roll, until November 24, 1856,—long after the time prescribed by the statute, and of the sale; and, even then, a copy of the final judgment was omitted from the roll, although the judgment itself had been duly entered in the judgment book. At that time, and for a long time afterward, the original draft of the judgment signed by the judge, and filed in the case, was in the hands of the commissioner, and, doubtless (though it does not so affirmatively appear), for the purpose of the reference, all the papers were, from time to time, also in the hands of the commissioner. Ample opportunity for loss was afforded, and no little neglect occurred. Some of the papers may have been lost during that time, and for that reason may have been omitted. If so, the rights of parties purchasing cannot be affected by the carelessness of the clerk in performing the manual duty of keeping and attaching together the proper papers designated by the statute as constituting the judgment roll. Lick v. Stockdale, 18 Cal. 223; Sharp v. Lumley, 34 Cal. 614. In this case, during the long delay in attaching together the papers to form a judgment roll, some were mislaid, and others may well have been lost. But however this may be, the court is a superior court, and under the authorities cited, when the records of such court is silent, all intendments are in favor of the judgment. In such cases, that is to say, when the record is silent, it certainly does not show affirmatively a want of jurisdiction. Looking to the judgment roll alone, in this case, a want of jurisdiction is not disclosed by the record. The most that can possibly be said is that it does not affirmatively show a service on the infant in any mode recognized by law; but as we have seen, this is insufficient to invalidate a judgment on a collateral attack.

If it is admissible to go outside of the judgment roll to the files and minutes of the court for the purpose of impeaching the record,—but it is not; Hahn v. Kelly, supra,—we find nothing more in this case of an affirmative character tending to impeach the judgment. We simply find the same absence of the material facts, that is found in the roll or record. But, upon looking at the order appointing a guardian ad litem in the case of Eaton v. Palmer [supra], in which the defective service exists, if anywhere, we find a recital in the order, that, "it appearing to the satisfaction of the court, from the said petition and consent (consent to act as guardian), and the other papers and certificates on file in said action, that the said infant defendant, Franklina C. Gray, is under the age of fourteen years; that she is a necessary party to the complete determination of the controversy in the said action; and that the service of the summons in the said action upon her has been completed upwards of ten days, it is, on motion of Glassell and Leigh, attorneys for the said plaintiff, ordered that Henry S. Foote be, and he is hereby appointed guardian ad litem," etc., etc. This is an express adjudication that there was a service, and the court, certainly, had jurisdiction to determine this question. The evidence upon which it acted may have been subsequently lost. The record certainly contains nothing to contradict it. And this adjudication is of itself sufficient to sustain the judgment when collaterally attacked, if we can look outside the judgment roll at all. Sargeant v. State Bank of Indiana, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 384, 385; Grignon's Lessees v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319, 340, 341; Voorhees v. Bank of U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 472, 473; Erwin v. Lowry, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 181; Landes v. Brant, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 370, 371; Lick v. Stockdale, 18 Cal. 223; Hahn v. Kelly, supra. In Erwin v. Lewis, the court say, "We hold that wherever a judgment is given by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter, the exercise of jurisdiction warrants the presumption, in favor of the purchaser, that the facts which were necessary to be proved to confer jurisdiction were proved." 7 How. [48 U. S.] 181. In Sargeant v. State Bank of Indiana, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 384, the recital was, "It appearing to the court now here, that proper legal notices having been given of the motion, it is by the court ordered," etc.; and the court say (page 385), "the real, veritable record informs us that legal and sufficient notice was given to the heirs of Samuel Sargeant, but whether by this paper (a paper found among the files) or in what other mode (except that it was legal and sufficient), we are not told, and are not at liberty in this case to indulge in inferences against the verity of the record. It is a principle well settled, too, in judicial proceedings, that whatever may be the power of a superior court in the exercise of regular appellate jurisdiction, to examine the acts of an inferior court, the proceedings of a court of general and competent jurisdiction cannot be properly impeached and re-examined collaterally by a distinct tribunal, one not acting in the exercise of appellate power. To permit the converse of this principle in practice, would unsettle nine tenths of the rights and titles in any community, and lead to infinite confusion and wrong." The syllabus in Grignon's Lessees v. Astor is: "It was for the court to decide upon the existence of the facts, which gave jurisdiction; and the exercise of jurisdiction warrants the presumption, that the facts which were necessary to be proved, were proved." 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319. And the court say: "The granting the license to sell is an adjudication upon all the facts necessary to give jurisdiction, and whether they exist or not, is wholly immaterial, if no appeal is taken; the rule is the same, whether the law gives an appeal or not; if none is given from the final decree, it is conclusive on all whom it concerns." Id. 340.

In Voorhees v. Bank of U. S. land of a non-resident debtor was sold under a proceeding in attachment. It was "contended by counsel for plaintiff in error, that all the requisitions of the law are conditions precedent; which must not only be performed before the power of the court to order a sale, or the auditors to execute it can arise, but that strict performance must appear on record." 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 471. But the court say on this point, "The process which they adopted was the same as prescribed by the law; they ordered a sale, which was executed, and on the return thereof, gave it their confirmation. This was the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction on all the acts preceding the sale, affirming their validity in the same manner as their judgment had affirmed the existence of a debt. There is no principle of law better settled than that every act of a court of competent jurisdiction shall be presumed to have been rightly done, till the contrary appears; this rule applies as well to every judgment or decree rendered in the various stages of their proceedings, from the initiation to their completion, as to their adjudication that the plaintiff has a right of action. Every matter adjudicated becomes a part of their record; which henceforth proves itself, without referring to the evidence on which it has been adjudged.

"In this case the court issued an order of sale, agreeably to law, which having been returned by the auditors, and 'being inspected, the court grant judgment of confirmation thereon.' It is, therefore, a direct adjudication that the order of sale was executed according to law. They had undoubted authority to render such a judgment; and there is nothing on the record to show that it was not rightfully exercised. If the defendants' objections can be sustained, it will be on the ground that this judgment was false; and that the order of sale was not executed according to law, because the evidence of its execution was not of record. The same reason would equally apply to the non-residence of the defendant within the state, the existence of a debt due the plaintiff, or any other creditor, which is the basis on which the whole proceeding rests. The auditors are equally silent on the evidence upon which they reported that debts were due by the defendant, as on the evidence and notice of due publication; but no one could pretend that the judgment that the debts reported were due, shall be presumed to be false. Though the able and ingenious argument of the defendant has not been directed at this part of the judgment of the court of common pleas, the grounds of objection are broad enough to embrace it; for, in resting their case on the only position which the record leaves them, they necessarily affirm the general proposition that a sale by order of a court of competent jurisdiction, may be declared a nullity in a collateral action, if their record does not show affirmatively the evidence of a compliance with the terms prescribed by law in making such sale. We cannot hesitate in giving a distinct and unqualified negative to this proposition, both on principle and authority too well and long settled to be questioned." Id. 472.

And in Lick v. Stockdale, 18 Cal. 223, the recital of service was held conclusive, even when the question was presented on appeal from the judgment. The court say: "Several assignments of error are made: 1st. That the judgment roll does not show that the court ever acquired jurisdiction over the person of Stockdale, one of the defendants; but the finding of the court is that the defendant was duly served with process, and this recital is sufficient to show that the court had jurisdiction. The judgment does not depend upon the performance of the clerical duty of making up the judgment roll, or the preserving of the papers. It is enough if the facts exist which are required to give jurisdiction to the court; and the finding in this case is that they do exist, though the summons and returns—the usual evidence—may have been lost or mislaid."

In Hart v. Seixas, 21 Wend. 40, the court went still further, probably too far, when the case is on appeal. So in the case in hand, the appointment of a guardian ad litem, the recital of the service of process in the order (or whether recited or not), the subsequent proceeding ordering a sale, confirmation of sale, etc., are as much an adjudication that the proper proceedings had been taken, as the several proceedings referred to were adjudications upon a similar point in the cases cited, and in several of those cases the defendants were non-residents. And there is nothing in the record, or even in the files, or other evidence introduced, outside the technical record, inconsistent with the adjudication. There is simply a failure to state in the record, as it now exists, what the evidence as to one particular upon the question of due service was, and under the authorities cited, and especially in the case of Hahn v. Kelly [supra], the presumption that the court had the necessary evidence and properly adjudicated the question, must prevail in this collateral attack.

It has been earnestly urged that this presumption in favor of the record does not prevail when it appears that the party to be served resides out of the state, and beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the court; that it only applies when the party resides, or is presumed to reside, within the territorial jurisdiction of the court; that when the record shows, as in this case, that the party to be served is not within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, the presumption is changed, and that the record must affirmatively show the performance of all acts necessary to give jurisdiction of the person in such an action, and this was once so held by this court. But aside from that case, I do not find this position thus broadly stated sustained by the authorities, and with deference to the opinion in the case referred to, I can find no substantial ground for making this distinction. The authorities cited by plaintiff's counsel do not appear to me to sustain the position. They are cases depending upon different principles, in actions purely and strictly personal, which will be briefly alluded to in the course of this opinion, but which, it appears to me, have no application to this case, or to the class of cases to which this belongs. The presumption in favor of the validity of judgments of superior courts in cases where there is a mode provided by law for acquiring jurisdiction for the purposes of the action, are not made to rest on the fact that the parties to the proceeding reside within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, but upon the character of the courts themselves, and the great principles of public policy which require that some confidence should be reposed in the proceedings of the higher judicial tribunals of the land. The law of California, as of most other states, provides means by which jurisdiction of the parties in certain cases may be acquired, both when they reside within and without the territorial jurisdiction of the court. The means in the case of residents may be, and they usually are, different from those prescribed in cases of non-residents. But the court can no more acquire jurisdiction of a resident without pursuing the course prescribed by law to acquire jurisdiction of such resident, than it can acquire jurisdiction of a non-resident, without pursuing the course prescribed for acquiring jurisdiction of such non-resident, and, in the latter case, it as clearly has jurisdiction to determine for itself whether it has acquired jurisdiction, as in the former. In determining that question it exercises the same kind of judicial functions as it would in determining whether it has acquired jurisdiction of a resident, and having jurisdiction to determine the question, and having determined it, in a case where the law provides for acquiring jurisdiction of a non-resident, is not the adjudication entitled to the same credit, and are not the same presumptions as to the correctness of the determination to prevail, in the one case, as in the other? Are not the same principles of public policy as applicable to one as to the other? If not, why not? It rests upon those who maintain a different doctrine to present some solid reason for making the distinction. In Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 426, 427, one of the justices observes on this point:

"The court exercises the same functions and the same jurisdiction in determining whether there was a service, whether personal, and the evidence is the certificate of the sheriff, or affidavit of a party competent to serve the process, or by publication, and the evidence is by the affidavit of the printer. And I see no reason why the same presumption should not arise in one case as in the other. It is a record in either case, for the statute makes it so in one case as well as in the other. And the record must be tried by itself alone. There is no new jurisdiction, either as to the person or subject matter conferred on the court by the statute authorizing service by publication of summons. The service is made in cases involving the ordinary process of the court. Only the mode of serving process is modified in certain cases within its ordinary jurisdiction.

"In some of the states a service was formerly, and, doubtless, now is, made by leaving a copy of the summons at the residence of the defendant, with some person of suitable age and discretion, or at his last known place of residence. I am not aware that any different rule of presumptions in courts of record was applied to the record of a domestic judgment on a service of this kind, from that applied to a service upon the party himself. Yet this can no more be called a personal service than a service by publication. The only question at last is, was there a service in any legal mode? and the court has jurisdiction to determine that question. If the court determining the question is a court of record, the judgment record imports absolute verity, and whatever that says must be taken as true. If the record in fact does not speak the truth, the only remedy of the party is to attack it directly on appeal, or in the court of which it is a record, if under the circumstances it can there be corrected, or by some direct suit or proceeding known to the law to vacate it." See, also, Id. 415; and Coit v. Haven, 30 Conn. 199 Voorhees v. Bank of U. S., 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 469; Sargeant v. State Bank of Indiana, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 385,—which were cases of non-residents and absentees.

I will now notice some of plaintiff's authorities on the points before discussed. In the case of D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 166, cited by plaintiff, the record stated affirmatively that there was no service. In Hollingsworth v. Barbour, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 466, the party "did not claim as locator" (Id. 473), and the case was not within the statute authorizing a service by publication. The whole proceeding was unauthorized, as the court was not empowered to obtain jurisdiction in the mode attempted. Id. 474–476. In Boswell's Lessees v. Otis, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 348, the court did not have jurisdiction of the particular subject matter in controversy, in the mode of procedure adopted, and there was no authority under the statute to proceed against the person, or against the land without a service on the person. The case of Harris v. Hardeman, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 334, was not a case of collateral attack. The court below upon a direct attack while the proceedings were still, "as it were, in fieri," by motion as a substitute for a writ of error coram vobis or audita querela, had set the judgment aside. Id. 345, 346. This action was thereupon affirmed upon writ of error. Besides the record disclosed what the service was. The court say, also, that there is "less show of objection to such action on the part of the court, as it affects the rights of no third parties, but is limited in its consequences to the parties to the suit only." Id. 346. And even in this case, it is worthy of remark, that three of the justices of the supreme court dissented. The inapplicability of the other cases cited on this point by plaintiffs, upon examination will be found to be equally obvious. They are, with but few exceptions, cases strictly personal, wherein judgments for money have been rendered against non-residents where there was no possibility of a personal service, and where, also, there was no provision of law whatever for procuring a constructive service; and the question has arisen in a subsequent suit between the same parties, upon the judgment, in the state where the defendant resides. The question is presented when the transcript of the personal judgment is offered in evidence in the foreign jurisdiction, and constitutes the very basis of a new action. In such cases it has been held that the judgment may be attacked collaterally on the ground of want of jurisdiction of the person, and this, even when the record affirmatively shows a personal service in due form—that the fact of service may be inquired into without regard to what appears in the record. In short, no force at all is given to the record on the question of jurisdiction beyond mere prima facie evidence. And in that class of cases, where the courts have gone so far in disregarding the record of a foreign judgment, it is not surprising that, on the issue, as to whether jurisdiction of the person has been acquired, proof that the defendant did not reside within the territorial jurisdiction, should be regarded as raising a presumption that there was no personal service sufficient at least to require the record to rebut it by an affirmative showing of service.

This would be but a reasonable presumption, and especially so, since the law of the state provided no mode of acquiring jurisdiction by even a constructive service. In such cases it has been held that the fact of an appearance, as well as a service, affirmatively shown by the record, may be disproved against the record. It is apparent that the ordinary rules relating to records do not apply at all to this class of cases. Those cases clearly depend upon a different principle from that involved in the case in hand, as was said in Granger v. Clark, 22 Me. 130; and this is the class of cases in which the presumption insisted on by the plaintiff has been indulged. The case of Borden v. Fitch, 15 Johns. 121, is one of the exceptions. The judgment in that case was for a divorce obtained in Vermont by publication. It was held invalid in New York, for want of personal service within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. But this decision would scarcely be regarded as law at this day.

The established doctrine now is, as I understand it, in cases of divorce, that the decree is regarded as acting upon the status of the parties. It is substantially treated as in the nature of a proceeding in rem, the status of the parties corresponding to the rem in proceedings in rem; and now, I believe, decrees of divorce upon service by publication against absent and non-resident parties in states where constructive service, in this mode, is authorized by statute, are, upon the principle indicated, regarded as valid in other states. If they are not, then thousands of citizens, at this day, must occupy very perilous positions. Besides, the question is a very different one, when arising between the same parties, upon the presumption of the record in evidence as the foundation for the recovery of a new judgment for the amount of money recovered by the old judgment, from that which arises when the judgment has been executed by a sale, and the question is, whether within the same territorial jurisdiction, a third party has acquired a title to land by virtue of such judgment and sale. In the first case, the question is, does the defendant in the judgment owe the money to the plaintiff? It is the old matter in litigation over again. If the demand is just, it may be established in some other mode; if unjust, a recovery certainly ought not to be had. In the other case, it is whether a stranger is entitled to consider the judgment of a superior court to be what it appears to be? May he repose any confidence in the action of courts? May he act on the presumption that a superior court has discharged its duty, and properly determined the question of its own jurisdiction, or must he deal with its judgments at his peril? But when a domestic judgment, even of the class referred to, is presented between the same parties, as a basis of a recovery in another action, the record cannot be contradicted, nor can its validity be impugned, unless the want of jurisdiction affirmatively appears on the face of the record itself. Town of Huntington v. Town of Charlotte, 15 Vt. 48; Granger v. Clark, 22 Me. 128; Coit v. Haven, 30 Conn. 199; Cook v. Darling, 18 Pick. 393.

It is insisted by plaintiff, that the decree in which the sale in question took place was purely against the person, and that no valid judgment against the person can, in any case, be had without personal service within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. While I admit that the proceeding is not strictly a proceeding in rem, I also think it is not strictly a proceeding against the person. The subject matter of the controversy was a partnership. The object was to establish a partnership, alleged to have existed within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, which had become dissolved by the death of one of the partners, to take an account of the partnership business, wind up and settle the affairs of the concern, and distribute among the parties interested the assets, which assets were also within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. The non-resident defendants were not themselves partners, but only interested as heirs of the deceased partner. The property claimed to belong to the partners consisted of both personalty and realty. There was no decree asked or made against the persons of the defendants, or affecting any property other than the alleged partnership property within the territorial jurisdiction of the court. The proceeding is quasi in rem, as it only operates upon specific property, like an attachment proceeding; a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage; or to quiet title to real estate. In Boswell's Lessees v. Otis the court say: "Jurisdiction is acquired in one of two ways; first, as against the person of the defendant, by the service of process; or secondly, by a procedure against the property of the defendant, within the jurisdiction of the court. In the latter case, the defendant is not personally bound by the judgment beyond the property in question. It is immaterial whether the proceeding against the property be by an attachment, or bill in chancery. It must be substantially a proceeding in rem. A bill for the specific execution of a contract to convey real estate, is not strictly a proceeding in rem in ordinary cases, but where such a procedure is authorized by statute on publication, without personal service of process, it is substantially of that character." 9 How. [50 U. S.] 348.

These observations are applicable to the case in hand. It is substantially, though not strictly or technically, a proceeding in rem. It is one of that class of cases wherein it is necessary to acquire jurisdiction of non-resident parties interested, for the purpose of affecting the status of the parties with reference to other parties, and to specific property, and the specific property itself, in some other mode than by personal service. Unless a constructive service could be obtained valid for the purpose, it would be impossible to wind up a partnership through the medium of courts by proceedings as to some of the parties in invitum, when the partners reside in different states. It is one of a class of cases everywhere recognized as proper for acquiring jurisdiction by constructive service, when the laws in terms authorize it. The statute of California provided for acquiring jurisdiction by publication of summons, and, I have no doubt, that when the statutory mode is pursued in such a case, the judgment or decree of the court disposing of the property is binding, as to the property, upon the non-resident parties. Jurisdiction is thus acquired for the purposes of the case in a lawful mode, although a party is absent. Whereas, in the case before referred to, of a purely personal judgment, there was no possibility of acquiring jurisdiction of the parties by any kind of service known to the law. In a collateral attack upon the judgment in such a case as that now under consideration, the question of jurisdiction must be determined upon the same principles as are applied when the question is, whether jurisdiction has been acquired of the person of a resident defendant. In the case of Hahn v. Kelly [supra], so often referred to, the defendant, Jones, in the action to foreclose the mortgage, was in Washington, D. C., at the time of the service, or attempted service, by publication. That case settles the law for the state of California; and, I believe, upon solid principles. From knowledge derived from a large experience, judicial and otherwise, in the state of California, I very much doubt, whether, under any rules less favorable to the sanctity of judgments of our superior courts, when presented for review in collateral proceedings, than that established in Hahn v. Kelly, a judgment could be found in the state, rendered during the first ten years of its judicial history, upon service by publication, that would stand the test of judicial scrutiny. And yet, owing to the transitory character of our population, during that time, the titles to vast amounts of real estate now depend upon the validity of just such judgments. Public policy demands that some confidence should be reposed in the judgments of our highest tribunals, and titles derived through sales sanctioned by judicial decrees, should not, years afterward, be lightly declared invalid. To adopt a different rule in this court from that established as the law of the state, would be to make the rights of the parties depend upon the particular court administering the laws within the same territorial jurisdiction in which the action is brought, and not upon the laws of the state of California, which we, in cases of this kind, are supposed to administer. Although this court may be regarded, as in some sense, a different jurisdiction from the state courts, yet it has the same territorial jurisdiction, and administers the same general laws as the state courts, and the judgments of the latter, in the said actions of Gray v. Palmer and Eaton v. Palmer, must be regarded in this court, for the purpose in hand, as domestic, and not foreign judgments. Since the decision in Hahn v. Kelly, it has not only been affirmed by the supreme court of the state in numerous instances, but it has also been heretofore followed in this court. Prieto v. Wells [Case No. 11,420].

That the papers constituting the judgment roll under the statute were not attached together by the clerk till long after the sale, and that a copy of the final judgment or decree was then omitted by the clerk cannot affect the rights of the parties. The law required the judgment to be entered in a book to be called a judgment book, and a copy to be annexed to the judgment roll. I take it that the original judgment, so entered in the judgment book is, at least, a record of as great solemnity as the copy attached to the judgment roll. Under the statute, the judgment is in a condition to be executed as soon as entered, and before the papers are attached together to form a roll, and before docketing. So held in Sharp v. Lumley, 34 Cal. 614, and other subsequent cases. See, also, Gray v. Palmer, 28 Cal. 419, 420. The latter case is an appeal from the final judgment of the district court dismissing the case involved in this controversy after the reversal of the judgment in question. But the appeal was not taken in time, and the question as to the propriety of dismissing the action could not be determined.

There is nothing in plaintiff's point that the commissioner's deed is void, because the sale is recited to have been made under the decree of October 27, 1855, when it was in fact made under the decree of April 7, 1856. In point of fact, strictly speaking, the recital in the deed is only that "James D. Thornton was appointed commissioner to sell," etc., under said decree, and this is strictly true. It was under that decree that he was appointed commissioner to sell. By the terms of that decree, he was directed to sell in pursuance of the directions in that decree, and of such further directions as the court should give.

And again in the final judgment, or decree, of April 7, 1856, the commissioner was directed "to proceed to sell all the property, real and personal, of the said partnerships, as directed in the former decree of this court"; and it was "further ordered" in said final decree "that in all things not otherwise herein provided the said commissioner do observe and obey the former decree herein rendered"; that is to say, the decree of October 27, 1855. The commissioner, therefore, did sell under the decree of October 27, 1855, as well as under the decree of April 7, 1856, for the latter decree so directed him to do, and referred to the earlier decree for specific directions. He in fact sold under both decrees, although he was "appointed" under the first. In selling under either he, also, necessarily, sold under the other. The deed does not in terms show under what he sold, but only by what he was appointed. In advertising the commissioner stated that he should sell under both decrees, expressly referring to both in terms, and the report of the sale embraced, as a part of the report, the advertisement containing said recitals of both decrees. The report, therefore, shows a sale under both decrees. The report of sale was confirmed, and the deed made in pursuance of the said sale. There is no contradiction of the recitals in the deed.

Another view, which seems to me to be entirely tenable, leads to the same result as to the title of the land in question. Conceding, for the purposes of this view, that the judgment or decree is invalid upon its face, as to the case of Eaton v. Palmer et al., I do not see why the decree and sale thereunder are not valid as a decree and sale in the case of Gray v. Palmer, Eaton et al. Although the two actions were consolidated for the purpose of a decree, after a trial of the main issues, in Gray's case, the decree is by no means joint. The claims of William H. Gray and Eaton are not joint, but several and adverse, and the portions of the decrees applicable to each are severable. In the case of Gray v. Palmer, Eaton et al., there can be no doubt as to jurisdiction of the infant on the face of record, and, as we have before seen, this was so held by the supreme court of this state on appeal. There was, then, in that case, jurisdiction of the subject matter, and of all the parties for the purpose, of that action. Eaton was a defendant in that action, and he set up in his answer as a defense in part, against Gray's action, and as a basis for affirmative relief, the same facts which are alleged in his complaint in his own action, and it was indispensable to ascertain all the facts as to his rights, in order to determine the rights of the plaintiff Gray, and decree the relief to which he was entitled; and it is by no means clear that, under the system in force in California, Eaton was not entitled to obtain his relief in that action. But, however this may be, in that case it was found that the partnership of W. H. Gray and Franklin C. Gray, was subordinate to the partnership of Eaton and Franklin C. Gray, and it was impossible to determine the rights of the plaintiff Gray, in the action of Gray v. Palmer, Eaton et al., without ascertaining all the facts, and taking the several accounts, precisely as they were ascertained and taken in the consolidated actions. It was also necessary to make the sale in order to distribute to plaintiff Gray, his share of the partnership assets in the same way it was made. So the findings, statement of the accounts and decree for a sale, are precisely as they necessarily would have been in order to afford William H. Gray the relief to which he was entitled, if Eaton had never commenced the suit of Eaton v. Palmer et al., or having commenced it, it never had been consolidated with the other. If there is anything wrong in the decree, the wrong does not consist in the statement of the accounts in determining the share belonging to Gray; or in ordering a sale and directing the share of Gray in the partnership assets to be paid to him; for all this would necessarily have been done in his own separate action, just exactly as it was done (the pleadings in that action required all this to be done), but it consists in erroneously distributing the balance after Gray received his share; and in this Gray had no concern whatever. He was only bound to look to his own rights, and having ascertained and secured them, he was not responsible for the disposition which the court might make of that part of the funds which belonged to others.

The facts determined, then, so far as Gray is concerned, and the decree of sale are precisely such as were necessary in the action of Gray v. Palmer, Eaton et al., and such as they would have been if the action of Eaton v. Palmer had never been connected with it. No good reason is perceived why the judgment and sale were not entirely valid as a judgment or decree and sale in that action. If the balance of the proceeds of sale, after setting apart to Gray the amount belonging to him, was improperly distributed, that was no concern of Gray's, or of the purchasers under the sale. They were not bound to look to the application of the proceeds. It is enough that the rights of Gray required just such a decree and sale, and that there was, in fact, such a decree as was necessary to afford him the proper remedy, and a regular sale in pursuance of the decree.

The decrees, in fact, were treated as several in the supreme court of California on appeal. In Gray v. Palmer et al. the entire decree was reversed on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain it; and in Eaton v. Palmer it was only reversed as to the infant, for error in appointing a guardian ad litem before a service of process, and, as we have seen, the exigencies of the case of Gray v. Palmer et al. required the sale of all the property and a determination as between Gray and the other parties of all the other matters adjudged in the decree.

There was, then, a valid decree and sale in the suit of Gray v. Palmer. Just such a decree and sale as would have been necessary had there been no consolidation, and no such suit at all as Eaton v. Palmer.

Defendant's counsel, also maintain that as the court had jurisdiction of all the parties in Gray v. Palmer, by the consolidation of that action by the consent of the parties to it, with the other action of Eaton v. Palmer, the court acquired jurisdiction of the parties in both, and cite Bustard v. Gates, 4 Dana, 436, to sustain the proposition. They also insist, that, although an infant be not served, yet, if a guardian ad litem be in fact appointed, and he appears and defends the action, the judgment is erroneous only, and not void; and the cases of Bustard v. Gates, 4 Dana, 430–437, U. S. Bank v. Cockran, 9 Dana, 395, and Benningfield v. Reed, 8 B. Mon. 106, appear to sustain this proposition, but, upon the view taken in this case, it is unnecessary to decide these points.

If wrong on the main proposition, as to the validity of the entire decree, at the time of the sale, the defendant claims, that, at worst, it was valid as to all parties except the infant, Franklina C. Gray, and that the sale passed the title to Mrs. Gray's half of, or interest in, the property; that defendant, therefore, has the title to one half the premises in controversy, and in any event the recovery must be limited to one undivided half. All the parties appeared in both actions except the infant, and there was a valid service and appointment of guardian ad litem, and appearance by said guardian in the case of Gray v. Palmer; and the other action of Eaton v. Palmer, in which, if in either, there was no service, the judgment was never reversed as to any of the defendants except the infant. The judgment in that case still stands as to all others. Is the judgment necessarily void as to all, because it did not affect the rights of one of the parties? Or was the judgment and sale valid as to the parties over whom the court had jurisdiction? If the latter is the true state of the law, then the title to the interest of all the parties, except the infant, passed by the sale, leaving the rights of the infant unaffected. In that case, she became a co-owner of the property with the purchasers instead of with her mother, and such a change in no way affects her legal rights to the property. It is legally a matter of no moment to her, who her co-owners are.

Evidently the supreme court of California, did not regard the judgment as void, as to all the parties because it was irregular as to the infant, for if this had been its view, the judgment when found to be void as to all, because irregular as to one, would have been reversed as to all. But it was not so reversed. It was only reversed as to the infant, and it stands to-day as to all the other parties, and this action of the court recognizes its validity. Does not this adjudication become the law of this case, whatever the rule may be as to others? Ex parte Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 206.

It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff, that the infant was a necessary or indispensable party to the action, and that being a necessary or indispensable party, the court had no jurisdiction to make a decree that would affect any of the parties without first acquiring jurisdiction as to such infant. There are many cases to the effect that the court will not proceed to a decree in the absence of a necessary party, but so far as they have been brought to my notice, the question in every case was raised somewhere in the progress of the cause, whereupon the court declined to proceed to a decree, or upon appeal from the decree. But assuming the infant to be a necessary party, the court in this case, did, in fact proceed to a decree, without any objection being made for want of parties, or want of service on the infant, and the decree was finally executed by a sale. No case has been called to my attention, in which it was held, that, as to those who were parties, such a decree is void, when called in question collaterally, or, that the parties, who were before the court, and permitted the court, in fact, to proceed to a decree, and the decree to be executed by a sale, without objection, were not bound by the sale. The rights as between them, or their successors, and the absent parties may not have been effectually determined, but why is it not sufficient to substitute the purchasers to the rights of those who were parties? Story, in his work on Equity Pleadings, states the rule as to when the objection for want of parties may be taken, and the consequences of not bringing the proper parties before the court, thus:

"If the proper parties are not made, the defendant may either demur to the bill, or take the objection by way of plea or answer; or (subject to the considerations above suggested), when the cause comes on to a hearing, he may object that the proper parties are wanting; or the court itself may state the objection, and refuse to proceed to make a decree; or, if a decree is made, it may, for this very defect, be reversed on a rehearing or on an appeal; or if it be not reversed, yet it will bind none but the parties to the suit, and those claiming under them, so that all the evils of a fruitless or inadequate litigation may sometimes be visited upon the successful party in the original suit, by leaving his title still open to future question and controversy." Section 75. If a decree is, in fact, made, and not reversed for want of necessary parties, there is no intimation here, that it would not be binding upon those who were parties, and suffered the decree to be made without objection. On the contrary, the inference is plainly the other way, for the learned author says, "it will bind none but the parties to the suit, and those claiming under them," and that the evils of a fruitless and inadequate litigation may be visited upon the successful party by leaving it open to future controversy. Had he supposed the parties brought in were not bound in any degree whatever, he would certainly have said so here, for the occasion called for it, whereas, what he did say, plainly indicates that he regarded the rule to be otherwise. The rule as thus stated is substantially repeated in sections 236 and 541. See, also, to the same effect, 1 Daniell, Ch. Pr.

341; Hickock v. Scribner, 3 Johns. Cas. 317; and cases cited in note 4 to section 236.

Judge Story further observes that, "the mere non-joinder of a proper party cannot avail the defendant in a bill of review, unless it appears to his prejudice; and there is the more reason for this rule, because the absent person is not barred by the decree, but may in another suit vindicate his rights." The case of Whiting v. Bank of U. S., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 14, cited, fully sustains the note. If the court would not sustain a bill of review on the application of one of the defendants, on the ground of error in proceeding to a decree in the absence of a party, it certainly ought not to be regarded as void as to those who are parties. In the case now in hand, suppose the absent party had chosen to acquiesce in the decree as originally entered, and had never attempted, or should never attempt, to reverse it, or set up any claim against it, in what particular would Mrs. Gray, or the other parties, who claim nothing in privity with the infant, have been injured or interested? They had their day in court, and their rights were disposed of; other parties succeeded to their interest, who thereby became jointly interested with the infant in their stead. In Whiting v. U. S. Bank, supra, the court say: "Breckenridge, the absent party, is not barred in the original decree, because he is no party thereto, and, therefore, his interest cannot be prejudiced thereby. But if they were, he, and he alone, has a right to complain, and to seek redress from the court; and not the plaintiffs, who are not his representatives, or intrusted with the vindication of his rights. Breckenridge has made no complaint, and sought no redress." These remarks would seem to apply as well to the position of the parties to this suit, and the infant defendant.

While I incline to the view that the sale is valid, as to all the other parties interested, even if void as to the infant, yet upon the view taken upon the main propositions involved, it is not necessary to decide the point now, and for that reason, I have not fully examined the authorities, and I do not desire to be understood as expressing a positive opinion upon it. I only allude to the point for the purpose of calling attention of plaintiff's counsel and the appellate court more particularly to it, in case the cause should be taken to the supreme court for review, and my view upon the main proposition be found erroneous.

My conclusion is, that the title to the premises in controversy appears to be in the defendant, Lucy B. Page, and that she is entitled to judgment. Let judgment be entered for defendant, with costs of suit.

[This judgment was reversed by the supreme court,—18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 350,—and the cause remanded to the circuit court for a new trial (Case No. 5,206), where judgment was entered for the plaintiff, with costs.]

UNITED STATES COURTS—STATE LAWS—RELATION OF NATIONAL COURTS TO STATE COURTS — PRESUMPTIONS IN FAVOR OF JUDGMENTS—PERSONAL JUDGMENTS ON SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION — HAHN V. KELLY DISAPPROVED—SUITS IN REM—INFANTS.

1. The courts of the United States are not bound by the decisions of the state courts upon questions of general law. It is only decisions upon local questions which are peculiar to a state, or adjudications upon the meaning of the constitution or statutes of a state, which the courts of the United States adopt as rules for their judgments.

2. Whilst the courts of the United States are not foreign courts in their relation to the state courts, they are courts of a different sovereignty, exercising a distinct and independent jurisdiction, and are bound to give to the judgments of the state courts only the same faith and credit which the courts of another state are bound to give to them. In all cases the jurisdiction of a state court may be inquired into when its judgment is made the foundation of a claim in the circuit court, but the inquiry can proceed no further; the jurisdiction existing, the merits of the controversy involved are not open to examination.

3. There is no presumption in favor of the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction, except as to matters and persons falling within the scope of that general jurisdiction. When the proceeding is special and outside of that general scope, either as to subjects or persons, the presumption ceases, and the record must show a compliance with the special authority, by which the extraordinary jurisdiction is exercised.

4. There can be no personal judgment upon constructive or substituted service by publication against a non-resident of a state, except as a means of reaching property situated at the time within the state, or of affecting some interest therein, or determining the status of the plaintiff with respect to the non-resident party.

[Cited in Seaverns v. Gerke, Case No. 12,595.]

5. When constructive or substituted service by publication in a personal action is authorized by statute in place of personal citation, the statute must be strictly pursued.

This was an action [by Philip G. Galpin against Lucy B. Page] to recover possession of a lot situated within the city of San Francisco, and was tried by the court before Mr. Justice FIELD, without the intervention of a jury. The court found the following facts and conclusions of law:

A jury having been waived by a stipulation of the parties in writing, duly filed, and the cause having been tried by the court without a jury, after hearing the testimony and argument of counsel, the court being sufficiently advised, finds the followings facts and conclusions of law, viz.:

First. On the fifteenth of July, A. D. 1853, Franklin C. Gray died in the city of New York, intestate, and seised and possessed at the time of his death of the premises in controversy.

Second. Said Franklin C. Gray left surviving him his widow, Matilda C. Gray. In December, 1853, said Matilda C. Gray gave birth to Franklina C. Gray, who was the lawful issue of said Franklin C. Gray; and under the statutes of California the said Matilda C. Gray and said Franklina C. Gray inherited the premises in controversy as heirs-at-law of said Franklin C. Gray, in the proportion of one-half thereof to each.

Third. At the time of the death of said Franklin C. Gray, and since then to the present time, said Matilda C. Gray, and since her birth, the said Franklina C. Gray, have both been citizens and residents of the state of New York, and neither of them was in the state of California in the years 1853, 1854, 1855, or 1856, and at the commencement of this suit, and ever since, the defendants have been citizens and residents of the state of California, and the plaintiff has been a citizen and resident of the state of New York.

Fourth. At the commencement of this suit, and on the first day of April, 1868, plaintiff was, and he now is, the owner in fee of the premises in controversy, through proper mesne conveyances and proceedings in the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, from said Matilda C. Gray and Franklina C. Gray, except in so far as the right, title, and interest of either of them of and to said premises were divested from them by virtue of a sale made by James D. Thornton, commissioner, on the third day of May, 1856, under a decree of the Fourth judicial district court of the state of California, hereinafter-mentioned, at which sale Gwyn Page became the purchaser of the premises in controversy, and a deed thereof was executed to him by said commissioner, under said decree, on the twenty-third day of May, 1856; and thereafter the interest of said Page in one-half of the premises sued for passed by proper conveyances from him to Joseph B. Crockett, and from him to defendant, Lucy B. Page, June 20, 1863, and the interest of said Page in the other half of the premises passed under his will to, and is now vested in, the defendant, Lucy B. Page.

Fifth. The plaintiff demanded possession of the premises of defendants before the commencement of this suit, and was refused by defendants; and defendant, Lucy B. Page, was in possession when demand was made and suit brought.

Sixth. The value of the demanded premises, which constitute water lot number seven hundred and fifty-nine, as designated on the map of the city of San Francisco, is ten thousand dollars. From six to eight months prior to the commencement of the suit, the lot in question was covered with the waters of the bay of San Francisco of considerable depth, and not in a condition to use. About eight months prior to the commencement of the suit, the defendant, Lucy B. Page, commenced filling the lot, and continued to fill it till it was completed—about the time of the commencement of this suit. It was filled with solid earth and thereby reclaimed from the sea, and made fit for use and put in a condition to rent, and the expense of such filling was paid by the defendant Lucy B. Page. Prior to the said filling and reclamation from the sea, the monthly value of the rents and profits of the premises was nothing. Subsequent to said filling and reclamation, that is to say, since the time of the commencement of this suit, April 17, 1868, the value of the rents and profits has been thirty dollars per month.

Seventh. The filling in of said lot for the purpose of reclaiming it from the sea and rendering it fit for use, is a permanent and valuable improvement, and the value of such improvement is fourteen hundred and ninety dollars. The said defendant, Lucy B. Page, has also paid street assessments assessed upon said lot to the amount of three hundred and seventy-five dollars and twenty-five cents; and the said street improvement is a permanent improvement, beneficial to said lot. Said defendant has also paid taxes, state, city and county taxes, on said lot, to the amount of five hundred and seventy-one dollars.

Eighth. That on or about the twenty-third day of January, 1854, Jos. C. Palmer and Cornelius J. Eaton, then residents of the city of San Francisco, were appointed administrators of the estate of Franklin C. Gray, deceased, by the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, and thereafter duly entered upon the duties of their trust as such administrators.

Ninth. That subsequently, in February, 1854, William H. Gray, a brother of the decedent, brought a suit in equity in the Fourth district court of the said state against said administrators, said Matilda C. Gray, and one James Gray, and subsequently the complainant added Franklina C. Gray as a party defendant. The bill in the suit alleged that a copartnership had existed between the complainant and decedent since 1848, and that it embraced all their business operations and all their purchases of real property, although the titles were taken in the individual name of the deceased, and that the interest of the complainant extended to one-third of all acquisitions of every kind and description of both copartners. The object of the suit was to settle up the affairs of the alleged copartnership and to obtain a decree for the one-third claimed by the complainant.

Tenth. That in January, 1855, said Cornelius J. Eaton, who had been a clerk of the deceased, resigned his trust as administrator, as aforesaid, and brought suit in equity in the same district court against Palmer, the remaining administrator, and against the widow Matilda C. Gray, and the infant Franklina C. Gray. The bill in this suit alleged that a similar partnership, from January, 1851, had existed between himself and the deceased, embracing all the real and personal property of both, and all their business, and that his interests in the partnership extended to one-fourth of the property possessed at the time, and of all future acquisitions. The object of the suit was to settle up the affairs of the alleged partnership, and to obtain a decree adjudging to the complainant one-fourth of the estate claimed.

Eleventh. That on the twenty-third day of October, 1855, upon the stipulation of the guardian ad litem, who had previously been appointed for the infant, and the attorney for the other parties who had appeared, the two actions were consolidated into one, and that four days thereafter a decree was entered in the action thus consolidated. Appended to this decree is the following statement, signed by the district judge.

"When the above decree was signed, it was stated to me in court, by the attorneys or some of them, that the above decree was by the consent and agreement of all the parties thereto. I think Governor Foote and Gwyn Page, Esq., were present when the statement was made. John S. Hager, District Judge. November 29, 1857."

By the decree it was adjudged that a partnership had existed between Eaton and the deceased which embraced all the property, real and personal, and all the business of both; that this partnership commenced in 1851, and that in it Eaton had an interest of one-fourth; that a similar partnership had co-existed between William H. Gray and the deceased, in which William H. Gray had an interest of one-third; that this latter partnership was subject to the partnership of Eaton, and that he should first take one-fourth of the property, and Gray one-third of the remaining three-fourths, and that the other two-fourths should be equally divided between the widow and the child. And by the decree James D. Thornton was appointed a commissioner to take and state an account of the business, profits and property of the two copartnerships, to make report thereof to the court, and, upon confirmation of the sale, to execute proper conveyances to the purchasers. On the first day of March, 1856, the said commissioner made his report of the accounts taken, showing that the deceased was largely indebted to each of his alleged copartners. By a decree of the court made on the seventh day of April, 1856, the report of the commissioner was confirmed, and a sale of the entire property, real and personal, of the alleged copartnership was ordered. The property was accordingly sold by the commissioner at public auction, and Gwyn Page purchased, as above-mentioned, and received from the commissioner a deed for the same.

Twelfth. That neither in the suit of William H. Gray, nor in the suit of Cornelius J. Eaton, above set forth in findings eighth and ninth, was there any personal service of original process on the infant Franklina C. Gray, nor did she ever appear in either of said actions; that an attempt was made in both actions to obtain service on the infant by a publication of the summons in a newspaper; that there was no affidavit made in either case as a basis for an order of publication, and in the action of Eaton against Palmer and others there was no order of publication. Afterwards a guardian ad litem was appointed for the infant in each action upon petition of the claimants therein. The other defendants in the two actions, except defendant James Gray, appeared by attorney, and answered the bills of complaint filed against them. The defendant, James Gray, was never served with process nor appeared in the action in which he was named as defendant.

Thirteenth. That in the fall of 1857, the widow Matilda C. Gray and the child Franklina C. Gray, took an appeal to the supreme court of the state of California, from the decree in the action consolidated as aforesaid, and thereafter, in April, 1858, the decree was reversed on the ground that no sufficient service of summons was made upon the infant Franklina, under the statute, in the case of Eaton against Palmer, and that until such service no guardian ad litem could be appointed for her; and on the further ground that the evidence presented had not established a copartnership between William H. Gray and the deceased, and the cause remanded to the district court for further proceedings.

Fourteenth. That after the cause was remitted to the district court, that court ordered, after hearing counsel for the respective parties, a new trial of all the issues as to all the parties; and upon this order the same remained on the calendar for trial until April, 1861, when the district court entered judgment for the defendants therein, dismissing the two suits consolidated as aforesaid for want of prosecution.

Fifteenth. That Gwyn Page, the purchaser of the premises in controversy at the commissioner's sale, was the attorney-at-law of William H. Gray, the plaintiff in one of the suits consolidated, and J. B. Crockett was his law partner, and the conveyance of the latter, of his interest to the defendant Page, was made after the reversal of the decree in the consolidated suit.

Sixteenth. That the action against the defendant, J. B. Crockett, was dismissed previous to the former trial, by consent of parties, and the action thereafter proceeded against the defendant Lucy B. Page alone.

And as conclusions of law from the above facts, the court finds: 1st. That the proceedings in the two suits of Gray and Eaton, and the decree rendered in the consolidated action, were void as to the infant Franklina C. Gray, for want of due and sufficient service of original process upon her; and that the ruling of the supreme court of the state, on appeal from that decree, was an adjudication that the jurisdiction of the district court over the infant never attached. 2d. That the title acquired by the purchaser, Gwyn Page, he being one of the attorneys of the plaintiff Gray, and that of his law partner Crockett, fell upon a reversal of the decree, and that the defendant, having acquired her interest after such reversal, possessed no valid title as against the plaintiff, the grantee of the original owners. 3d. That the value of the rents and profits of the premises to which the plaintiff is entitled are offset by the value of the permanent and valuable improvements made on the premises by the defendant; and, 4th. That the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the possession of the premises described in the complaint against the defendant Lucy B. Page.

John B. Harmon, for plaintiff.

Williams & Thornton, for defendant.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. The material questions presented for consideration in this case have already been determined by the recent decision of the supreme court of the United States. It is unnecessary, therefore, to repeat at large the facts of the case; they are given in the report of the decision in 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 350. It will be sufficient to state here its general features. The action is ejectment for the possession of certain real property situated within the city of San Francisco, both parties deraigning title from the same source, Franklin C. Gray, deceased, who died in the city of New York in July, 1853, intestate, seised of the premises in controversy. The plaintiff claims through conveyances executed by direction of the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, which administered upon the estate of the deceased. The defendant claims under a purchaser at a commissioner's sale, had under a decree of a district court of the state, having jurisdiction in that city and county, rendered in a suit brought to settle the affairs of alleged copartnerships between the deceased and others. The case turns upon the validity of this decree and the commissioner's sale had under it.

The suit in which that decree was rendered was one into which two suits, brought by different parties, had been consolidated. One of them was brought in 1854, by William H. Gray, a brother of the deceased; the other was brought in 1855 by Cornelius J. Eaton, who had been at one time a clerk of the deceased. Each of these complainants alleged a separate, distinct and dormant copartnership between himself and the deceased, which embraced the commercial business in which the latter was engaged and all his real estate transactions. Gray alleged that his interest in the business and property of the copartnership formed between him and the deceased was one-third. Eaton claimed that his interest in the business and property of the copartnership formed with him was one-fourth. Each of these complainants, alleging a universal and dormant copartnership between himself and the deceased, denied, one of them under oath, any copartnership of the deceased with the other. Subsequently, however, they consented to a consolidation of their suits; and four days afterwards, a decree was entered, and it would seem from the certificate of the judge appended to the decree that it was by consent of the parties, adjudging that each had been a copartner with the deceased as alleged by him, and that both of these copartnerships, dormant and unknown to each other as they were, embraced all the property and all the business of the deceased.

By the decree a reference was ordered to a commissioner to take an account of the business, profits and property of the two copartnerships, with directions, upon the confirmation of his report, to sell all the property, real and personal, of both copartnerships, and to execute proper conveyances to the purchasers. At the sale which subsequently took place, one of the attorneys of the complainant, Gray, became a purchaser of the premises in controversy. He afterwards conveyed an undivided half to his law partner, and devised the other undivided half to the defendant. His law partner some years later transferred his interest also to the defendant.

The deceased, Franklin C. Gray, left surviving him a widow, Matilda C. Gray, of whom a posthumous child was born in December following, named Franklina C. Gray. By the law of California the estate of the deceased vested in the widow and child in equal shares; and they both were made parties to the suits of Gray and Eaton; in the first suit the child being made a party by a supplemental bill. Both were non-residents of the state of California and residents of the state of New York; and their absence from this state and residence in New York were averred in the pleadings. Constructive service upon them, by publication under the statute, was therefore attempted. The widow appeared; and upon representation that service had been made upon the infant, a guardian ad litem was appointed for her, and he consented to the consolidation of the two suits, and, it would seem, to the decree rendered.

Subsequently, upon appeal to the supreme court of the state, the decree of the district court in the consolidated suit was reversed, on the ground that no sufficient service of summons had been made upon the infant Franklina in the case brought by Eaton; and that, until such service, no guardian ad litem could be appointed for her; and on the additional ground that the evidence presented had not established a copartnership between William H Gray and the deceased. The case was accordingly remanded to the district court; and subsequently the two suits, after being on the calendar for trial for nearly a year, were dismissed. The plaintiff acquired his interest and brought the present action after this dismissal.

When the case was originally here [Case No. 5,205], the circuit court decided that the record in the suits of Gray and Eaton, in the district court, did not show that due service of summons by publication had not been made upon the infant Franklina, and as the district court was a superior court of general jurisdiction, it must be presumed to have had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties in those suits;. and that, in consequence, the sale and conveyance under the decree, notwithstanding its subsequent reversal on the grounds stated, passed a good title to the purchaser; the court holding that where a record of a judgment of a superior court of general jurisdiction was assailed collaterally, it was not enough that the record did not affirmatively show jurisdiction, but that it must affirmatively show that the court did not have jurisdiction, or its judgment would be valid until reversed on appeal or vacated in some direct proceeding taken for that purpose. And so the court said that "at the time of the sale, a purchaser was entitled to rely upon the validity of the decree (in the consolidated suit) unless it affirmatively appeared on the face of the record that the court had no jurisdiction of the infant."

But the supreme court of the United States [18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 350] took a different view of the case, and held that the adjudication of the supreme court of the state, that no sufficient service of summons was ever made upon the infant Franklina, and that until such service no guardian ad litem could be appointed for her, was an adjudication that the jurisdiction of the district court over her had never attached, and that this adjudication was conclusive and binding upon the circuit court and every other court, when brought before it for consideration. Into its soundness the circuit court could not look; for it possessed no revisory power over the decisions of the supreme court of the state. The adjudication constituted the law of that case, and settled, for all possible controversies, the character of the decree of the district court. Rendered without jurisdiction, that decree was always void, so far as it affected the rights of the infant Franklina, and unavailing to support any proceedings under it affecting her title.

But the supreme court of the United States in its decision went still further, and held that the rule stated by the circuit court, as to the presumptions which the law implies in support of the judgments of superior courts of general jurisdiction, was subject to many exceptions and qualifications and had no application to the case at bar; that such presumptions were limited to jurisdiction over persons within the territorial limits of the courts, persons who could be reached by their process, and also over proceedings which were in accordance with the course of the common law. In these latter particulars, the decision was in affirmation of doctrines asserted by the circuit court in an elaborate and carefully considered opinion, delivered in 1865, in the case of Gray v. Larrimore [Case No. 5,721], which grew out of the sale under the same decree of the district court which is now before us. The doctrines there asserted were followed in the subsequent case of Gray v. Murphy [Case No. 5,725], and, until the decision of this case by the present circuit judge, were not regarded as open to contestation in the circuit court. In this case they were overruled by him upon the supposed obligation of the court to follow a decision of the supreme court of the state in Hahn v. Kelly, rendered in 1868 (34 Cal. 391). And to that case, frequent reference has been made by counsel on the present trial, and some of its positions have been pressed with great earnestness, as though they were decisive of the points now under consideration. That case was cited to the supreme court of the United States. Extracts from the opinion in the case constituted the principal argument before that court of one of the counsel of the defendants; and if its positions were not expressly mentioned in the opinion of that court, it was not because they had not been carefully considered.

That case was brought to quiet the title to a tract of land in Alameda county, and to restrain its sale. The plaintiff asserted title to the premises by virtue of a sale under a judgment recovered for the deficiency remaining of a mortgage debt, after application of the proceeds received upon a sale of the property mortgaged. The suit in which the mortgage was foreclosed and judgment for the deficiency rendered, was prosecuted without personal service upon the defendant, upon publication of summons; and the validity of the judgment was assailed upon the alleged ground that the attempted service of the summons by publication was defective and void. The decree, however, recited that it appeared to the court that the summons and complaint had been "duly served on the defendants according to law and the order of the judge of the court;" and the supreme court of the state held that this recital was a direct adjudication upon the point and was as conclusive upon the parties as any other fact decided, provided it did not affirmatively appear, from other portions of the record, that the recital was untrue. As there was no direct contradiction of the recital, and as no other objection than the one mentioned was taken, this ruling as to the effect of the recital disposed of the case and necessitated a reversal of the decree below. The court, however, in its opinion, did not confine its consideration to this point, but proceeded to lay down certain general rules as to the presumptions of jurisdiction attendant upon the judgments of superior courts of general jurisdiction, and to declare what constitutes the record in this state of such judgments, and the conditions upon which they may be collaterally assailed. Among other things, it is asserted in substance, and so far as anything in an opinion can be deemed an adjudication, which is not necessary to the decision, it adjudged:

1. That a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction could not be attacked collaterally, except for matters apparent upon its record; that it was not necessary that the jurisdiction of the court should affirmatively appear upon the record, but that, in the absence from the record of matters affirmatively disclosing a want of jurisdiction, either over the subject-matter of the action or the person of the defendant, such jurisdiction would be conclusively presumed; and that this conclusive presumption prevailed in all cases without reference to the character of the proceedings, or the residence of the parties against whom they were taken.

2. That in this state such record of the court consists only of the papers and proceedings which compose what is designated in the Code of Procedure as the judgment-roll; and, where jurisdiction is exercised over persons without the territorial limits of the court by constructive service upon them by publication of summons, and judgment by default is rendered upon such service, the record need not contain certain material proceedings, without which jurisdiction cannot attach, or any recital or evidence of such proceedings, because the legislature has not directed such proceedings to be incorporated in the so-called judgment-roll.

We do not regard the case at bar as one where any collateral attack is made upon a judgment of a superior court of general jurisdiction. The decree in the consolidated suit of Gray and Eaton is not here attacked collaterally in any proper meaning of that term. The adjudication of the appellate court in the same case upon the character of that decree is not offered by way of collateral attack; it is the exhibition of the result of a direct proceeding with reference to that decree had on appeal. When we speak of a collateral attack we refer to the presentation of grounds of invalidity other than those which have been established by the prosecution of a writ of error or an appeal or some other direct proceeding to vacate the judgment. We will nevertheless examine the positions advanced by the supreme court of the state in the case named.

Before proceeding, however, to this examination, it is proper to say a few words respecting the light in which the ruling of the state court in that case is to be regarded in this court, and the right of this court to look into the jurisdiction of a state court when its judgment is produced in evidence.

In the first place, the ruling of the state court in Hahn v. Kelly [supra], except so far as it gives a construction to the statute of the state, is not binding upon this court. In all that relates to the presumptions which attend the acts of the superior courts and the circumstances under which they may be assailed, it stands like the ruling of any other court, entitled to respect and consideration for the learning and ability of its members, but possessing no obligatory force. "Where private rights," says the supreme court of the United States, in Chicago City v. Robbins, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 429, "are to be determined by the application of common law rules alone, this court (and the same is true of the circuit court), though entertaining for state tribunals the highest respect, does not feel bound by their decision." "It is undoubtedly true in general," says the same court in another case (Olcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 687), "that this court does follow the decisions of the highest courts of the states, respecting local questions peculiar to themselves, or respecting the construction of their own constitutions and laws. But it must be kept in mind, that it is only decisions upon local questions, those which are peculiar to the several states, or adjudications upon the meaning of the constitution or statutes of a state, which the federal courts adopt as rules for their own judgments." The ruling of the state court in Hahn v. Kelly, except so far as it gives a construction to the state statute, relates to matters of general law, and not to questions of a local character peculiar only to the state. If the ruling of the court be correct, it applies not merely to judgments of the superior courts of general jurisdiction existing in California, but to the judgments of such courts existing in all other states.

In the second place, whilst the courts of the United States are not foreign courts in their relation to the state courts, they are courts of a different sovereignty, exercising a distinct and independent jurisdiction, and are bound to give to the judgments of the state courts only the same faith and credit which the courts of another state are bound to give to them. And it is well settled, that neither the constitutional requirement, providing that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state," nor the acts of congress providing for the mode of authenticating such acts, records and proceedings,—May 26, 1790 [1 Stat. 122], —and declaring that, "when thus authenticated, they shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from which the records are or shall be taken," precludes an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was given, or the right of the state to exercise authority over the parties, or the subject-matter of the judgment. As was said in Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 305, the judgments of the courts of one state are not foreign judgments in another state under the constitution and act of congress, nor are they domestic judgments in every sense; because they are not the proper foundation of final process, except in the state where they were rendered; and they are open to inquiry as to the jurisdiction of the court and notice to the defendant.

The act of congress goes, perhaps, further than the constitutional requirement, which relates to the faith and credit to be given in each state to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state, inasmuch as it declares the effect of the records and judicial proceedings of the states when authenticated, as provided "in every court within the United States," thus making its provisions applicable to the national courts, as well as to the courts of the states. The power of congress to prescribe the manner in which the records of the states shall be proved in the national courts, and the effect which shall be given to them, is independent of the constitutional provision. Still the law is to have the same construction in its application to the national courts as to the state courts. It leaves untouched the general principle that the jurisdiction of every court is open to inquiry, when produced in the courts of another sovereignty.

The circuit court of the United States for the district of California has the same authority to examine into the jurisdiction of a state court of California, when its judgment is produced, as the circuit court of the United States for the district of New York has, when the same judgment is produced before that tribunal. All the circuit courts of the United States have the same relation to the state courts; and each will take notice of and administer in proper cases the laws of the states. This court, for example, will take notice of, and, in a proper case, administer the law of New York, just as it will take notice of and administer the law of this state. In all cases the jurisdiction of a state court may be inquired into; but the inquiry can proceed no further; the jurisdiction existing, the merits of the controversy involved are not open to examination.

We recur now to the rulings in Hahn v. Kelly [supra]. The first position, that when a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction is produced in evidence, it can only be collaterally attacked for matters apparent upon its record, and that, in the absence of such matters, the jurisdiction of the court must be conclusively presumed, is with certain qualifications and exceptions undoubtedly correct. These qualifications and exceptions arise where the proceedings or the parties against whom they are taken are without the ordinary jurisdiction of the court, and can only be brought within it by pursuing special statutory provisions. As we had occasion to observe in a previous case, "All courts, even such as are designated courts of superior or general authority, are more or less limited in their jurisdiction; they are limited to a particular kind of cases, such as civil or criminal; or to particular modes of administering relief, such as legal or equitable; or to transactions of a special character, such as may arise upon the high seas; or to the use of particular process in the enforcement of their judgments." Norton v. Maeder [Case No. 10,351]. When we speak of a court of general jurisdiction in civil cases, we do not mean one which has jurisdiction over all subjects and all persons and of all process; but we mean one which exercises a general jurisdiction in law or equity, according to the well-established principles known to those departments of jurisprudence, over subjects and persons within certain defined territorial limits. When a judgment of such a court is produced, relating to a matter falling within the general scope of its powers, the jurisdiction of the court will be presumed, even in the absence of the formal proceedings or steps by which the jurisdiction was obtained; and such jurisdiction cannot ordinarily be assailed except on writ of error or appeal, or by some other direct proceeding. But when the judgment of such a court relates to a matter not falling within the general scope of its powers, and the authority of the court over the subject can only be exercised in a prescribed manner, not according to the course of the common law; or the judgment is against a party without the territorial limits of the court, who was not served within those limits and did not appear to the action, no such presumption of jurisdiction can arise. The judgment being as to its subject-matter or persons out of its ordinary jurisdiction, authority for its rendition must appear upon the face of its record. In other words, there is no presumption in favor of the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction, except as to matters and persons falling within the scope of that general jurisdiction. When the proceeding is special and outside of that general scope, either as to subjects or persons, the presumption ceases, and the record must show a compliance with the special authority, by which the extraordinary jurisdiction is exercised. This doctrine is an obvious deduction from principle, and is sustained by adjudged cases almost without number in the highest courts of the several states, and in the supreme court of the United States. There is running all through the Reports the emphatic declaration of the common law courts, that a special authority, conferred even upon a court of general jurisdiction, which is exercised in a mode different from the course of the common law, must be strictly pursued, and the record must disclose the jurisdiction of the court. On this subject the cases speak a uniform language, with scarcely a dissentient voice.

The tribunals of one state have no jurisdiction, and can have none, over persons or property without its territorial limits. Their authority is necessarily circumscribed by the limits of the sovereignty creating them. Any exertion of authority beyond those limits would be deemed, as stated in D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 174, in every other forum an illegitimate assumption of power, and be resisted as mere abuse.

But over property and persons within those limits the authority of the state is supreme, except as restrained by the federal constitution. When, therefore, property thus situated is held by parties resident without the state, or absent from it, and thus beyond the reach of the process of its courts, the admitted jurisdiction of the state over the property would be defeated, if a substituted service upon the parties were not permitted. Accordingly, under special circumstances, upon the presentation of particular proofs, substituted service, in lieu of personal service, is allowed by statute in nearly all the states, so as to subject the property of a non-resident or absent party to such disposition by their tribunals as may be necessary to protect the rights of their own citizens. In this state, the statute, in terms, allows a constructive or substituted service in all cases, whether upon contract or for torts, where the person on whom the service is to be made is a non-resident of the state or is absent from it, whether the action be directed against property within the state, or merely for the recovery of a personal judgment against the defendant. But so far as the statute authorizes, upon such substituted service, a personal judgment against a non-resident except as a means of reaching property situated at the time within the state, or affecting some interest therein, or determining the status of the plaintiff with respect to such non-resident, it cannot be sustained as a legitimate exercise of legislative power. A pure personal judgment, not used as a means of reaching property at the time in the state, or affecting some interest therein, or determining the status of the plaintiff, rendered against a non-resident of the state, not having been personally served within its limits and not appearing to the action, would not be a judicial determination of the rights of the parties, but an arbitrary declaration by the tribunals of the state as to the liability of a party over whose person and property they had no control. The validity of the statute can only be sustained by restricting its application to cases where, in connection with the process against the person, property in the state is brought under the control of the court subjected to its judgment, or where the judgment is sought simply as a means of reaching such property or affecting some interest therein, or to cases where the action relates to the personal status of the plaintiff in the state.

Aliens at peace with the United States are allowed access to the courts of the states, and unless the statute be limited in its application as stated, we must accept the conclusion that personal judgments for torts by one alien against another, neither of whom has ever been within our borders, may be recovered without personal service, by publication, and subsequently enforced against any property belonging to the defendant, that may by chance be brought into the country. It would certainly be a strange application of the statute if an inhabitant of Asia could recover in that way in our courts a personal judgment for an alleged tort committed against him in his own country by one of his countrymen.

An attachment of the property of a non-resident is allowed by the law of this state in all actions upon contracts, express or implied. This remedy, with the ordinary power of a court of equity to enforce mortgages and other liens, and to take property into its custody where there is danger of its removal beyond the state or of being wasted, and the information imparted to third parties by filing a notice of lis pendens where an interest in real property is the subject of the litigation, affords sufficient protection to citizens of the state without the assumption of any territorial jurisdiction over non-residents. Be this as it may, any such assumption can find no support in any principle of natural justice or constitutional law.

"Where a party is within a territory," says Mr. Justice Story in Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,134], "he may justly be subjected to its process, and bound personally by the judgment pronounced on such process against him. Where he is not within such territory, and is not personally subject to its laws, if, on account of his supposed or actual property being within the territory, process by the local laws may, by attachment, go to compel his appearance, and for his default to appear, judgment may be pronounced against him, such a judgment must, upon general principles, be deemed only to bind him to the extent of such property, and cannot have the effect of a conclusive judgment in personam, for the plain reason that, except so far as the property is concerned, it is a judgment coram non judice. * * * The principles of the common law (which are never to be lost sight of in the construction of our own statutes), proceed yet further. In general, it may be said that they authorize no judgment against a party, until after his appearance in court. He may be taken on a capias and brought into court, or dis-trained by attachment and other process against his property to compel his appearance; and for non-appearance be outlawed. But still, even though a subject and within the kingdom, the judgment against him can take place only after such appearance. So anxious was the common law to guard the rights of private persons from judgments obtained without notice and regular personal appearance in court."

"Jurisdiction is acquired," says the supreme court in Boswell's Lessee v. Otis, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 348, "in one of two modes: first, as against the person of the defendant by the service of process; or, secondly, by a procedure against the property of the defendant within the jurisdiction of the court. In the latter case, the defendant is not personally bound by the judgment beyond the property in question. And it is immaterial whether the proceeding against the property be by attachment or a bill in chancery. It must be substantially a proceeding in rem."

A substituted service is usually made in the form of a notice published in the public journals, as in this state. "But such notice," says Cooley (page 404), in his treatise on Constitutional Limitations, "is restricted in its legal effect, and cannot be made available for all purposes. It will enable the court to give effect to the proceeding so far as it is one in rem, but when the res is disposed of, the authority of the court ceases. The statute may give it effect so far as the subject-matter of the proceeding is within the limits and therefore under the control of the state; but the notice cannot be made to stand in the place of process, so as to subject the defendant to a valid judgment against him personally. In attachment proceedings, the published notice may be sufficient to enable the plaintiff to obtain a judgment which he can enforce by sale of the property attached, but for any other purpose such judgment would be ineffectual. The defendant could not be followed into another state or country, and there have recovery against him upon the judgment as an established demand. The fact that process was not personally served is a conclusive objection to the judgment as a personal claim, unless the defendant caused his appearance to be entered in the attachment proceedings. Where a party has property in a state, and resides elsewhere, his property is justly subject to all valid claims that may exist against him there; but beyond this, due process of law would require appearance or personal service before the defendant could be personally bound by any judgment rendered."

In Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 308, similar doctrines are laid down by the supreme court of the United States. In that case, the plaintiff had sued the defendants in Tennessee for false imprisonment, and upon the return of the sheriff that none of them were to be found in his county, sued out a writ of attachment against their property. Publication was ordered by the court, notifying them to appear and plead, answer or demur, or that the suit would be taken as confessed, and proceeded in ex parte as to them. Publication was had, and the defendants having made default, judgment was entered against them, and the attached property was sold under it. The purchaser having been put into possession, the original owner brought ejectment for the premises. In considering the character of the attachment suit, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller, said: "Its essential purpose or nature is to establish, by the judgment of the court, a demand against the defendant, and to subject his property, lying within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, to the payment of that demand.

"But the plaintiff is met at the commencement of his proceedings by the fact that the defendant is not within that territorial jurisdiction, and cannot be served with any process by which he can be brought personally within the power of the court. For this difficulty the statute has provided a remedy. It says that, upon affidavit being made of that fact, a writ of attachment may be issued and levied on any of the defendant's property, and a publication may be made warning him to appear, and that thereafter the court may proceed in the case, whether he appears or not.

"If the defendant appears, the cause becomes mainly a suit in personam, with the added incident that the property attached remains liable, under the control of the court, to answer to any demand which may be established against the defendant by the final judgment of the court. But if there is no appearance of the defendant, and no service of process on him, the case becomes, in its essential nature, a proceeding in rem, the only effect of which is to subject the property attached to the payment of the demand which the court may find to be due to the plaintiff.

"That such is the nature of this proceeding in this latter class of cases, is clearly evinced by two well-established propositions: First, the judgment of the court, though in form a personal judgment against the defendant, has no effect beyond the property attached in that suit. No general execution can be issued for any balance unpaid after the attached property is exhausted. No suit can be maintained on such a judgment in the same court or in any other; nor can it be used as evidence in any other proceeding not affecting the attached property; nor could the costs in that proceeding be collected of defendant out of any other property than that attached in the suit. Second, the court, in such a suit, cannot proceed unless the officer finds some property of defendant on which to levy the writ of attachment. A return that none can be found is the end of the case, and deprives the court of further jurisdiction, though the publication may have been duly made and proven in court."

The writer of the present opinion thought some of the objections taken to the preliminary proceedings in the attachment suit referred to were well founded, and dissented from the judgment of the court; but in the doctrine laid down in the above citation he always has concurred. It is, in our judgment, the true doctrine, and the only doctrine which is consistent with any just protection to the citizens of other states. Such is the constant intercourse between citizens of different states at the present time that the greatest insecurity to property would exist, if purely personal judgments obtained ex parte, without personal citation, upon mere publication of notice, which, in the great majority of cases, would never be seen by the parties interested, could be made available for the seizure of property afterwards brought within the state. That law would be intolerable, if valid, which would permit citizens of another state to come into this state and recover personal judgments for all sorts of torts and contracts, upon mere service by publication against citizens of different states who have never been within the state or possessed any property therein. If such judgments could be upheld they would become the frequent instruments of fraud in the hands of the unscrupulous, and be sprung on the property of the unsuspecting defendants when the transactions giving rise to the judgments have passed from their memory, or the evidence respecting the transactions has perished. We do not think it within the competency of the legislature to invest its tribunals with authority having any such reach and force; certainly no presumption in favor of their jurisdiction can arise when a judgment of this character is produced against a non-resident who has never been within the state, and did not appear to the action. 1 Hare & W. Notes to Smith, Lead. Cas. p. 838; Picquet v. Swan [Case No. 11,135]; Monroe v. Douglass, 4 Sandf. Ch. 182.[2]

The second position laid down in Hahn v. Kelly, requires us to consider what papers and proceedings constitute the record of a court of general jurisdiction, which may be looked into when a judgment of that court rendered against a person without the territorial limits of the court, upon constructive service by publication, is assailed collaterally for want of jurisdiction. In that case, it is held that such record consists only of the papers and proceedings which compose what is designated in the Code of Procedure as the judgment-roll; and that it need not contain the affidavit of the party and the order of the court, without which constructive service of the summons by publication cannot be made.

The statute authorizing constructive service by publication of summons upon non-resident and absent parties, requires certain facts to be presented by affidavit to the court in which the action is pending, or to a judge thereof, or to a county judge. If it appear upon such presentation to the satisfaction of the court or judge that the facts exist, an order may be made for the publication of the summons, and such order must prescribe the period and designate the paper in which the publication is to be made; and if the residence of the defendant be known, the order must also direct a copy of the summons and complaint to be forthwith deposited in the post-office directed to him at his place of residence. The service of the summons is deemed complete at the expiration of the time prescribed by the order for publication.

The statute, in the same title which treats of the manner of commencing civil actions, after stating the manner in which service shall be made in case of personal service, and in case of service by publication, provides in sections almost immediately following, that "proof of the service of summons shall be as follows: 1. If served by the sheriff, his certificate thereof. 2. If served by any other person, his affidavit thereof. 3. In case of publication, the affidavit of the printer, or his foreman or principal clerk, showing the same; and on an affidavit of a deposit of a copy of the summons in the post-office, if the same has been deposited."

[2] In Oakley v. Aspinwall, 4 Comst. [4 N. Y.] 520, Mr. Chief Justice Bronson, in delivering the opinion of the court of appeals of New York, said: "When the courts of any state render a judgment against one who was not a citizen of that state, and was not brought into court, the judgment is held absolutely void everywhere else, although it may have been expressly authorized by the legislature of the state where it was rendered. I doubt whether such a judgment is of any force in the state where it was rendered. Under our form of government it is questionable, to say the least, whether the legislature can, in any case, without an express license from the people, authorize a judgment which shall operate in personam against a defendant who neither appeared nor was in any way served with process. The state must not boast of its civilization, nor of its progress in the principles of civil liberty, where the legislature has power to provide that a man may be condemned unheard." In Webster v. Reid, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 459, it appeared that the legislature of the territory of Iowa had directed that suits might be instituted against the owners of half-breed lands lying in Lee county in that territory, and notice be given to the owners through the Iowa Territorial Gazette. Suits having been instituted by notice in that way, and judgments recovered, the supreme court of the United States declared that they were nullities. "These suits," said Mr. Justice McLean in delivering the opinion of the court, "were not a proceeding in rem against the land, but were in personam against the owners of it. Whether they all resided within the territory or not, does not appear, nor is it a matter of any importance. No person is required to answer in a suit on whom process has not been served, or whose property has not been attached. In this case, there was no personal notice nor an attachment or other proceeding against the land, until after the judgments. The judgments, therefore, are nullities, and did not authorize the executions on which the land was sold."

In another part of the same statute, in a different title and chapter, treating of a different subject, "the manner of giving and entering judgment," it is provided that immediately after entering the judgment, in case the complaint be not answered, the clerk shall attach together the summons with the affidavit or proof of service, and the complaint with a memorandum indorsed thereon, that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment; and that these papers shall constitute the judgment-roll in the case.

Now, it is evident that the language of the statute in the first title mentioned, declaring what shall be proof of service of the summons, must be limited to the action of the persons making the service or publication, of which the sections immediately preceding in the same title speak; as if the language were as follows: "Proof of the service of summons by the sheriff or other person, or by a publisher of a newspaper, as above provided, shall be as follows." The obvious meaning intended is, that the proof of service, which the parties performing the particular duty prescribed must furnish, shall be the certificate or affidavit designated. It does not mean that such certificate or affidavit shall be all that is required on the subject of service, but only all that is required of those particular persons. Any other construction would lead to this absurd result, that an affidavit could be used to establish conclusively a fact to which it makes no reference. Publication of a summons in a newspaper is not service of the summons, nor is an affidavit of such publication proof of service. The publication, to be of any avail, must be in a paper designated, and for the period prescribed by the order of the court or judge. The terms of such order must therefore be connected with the affidavit, or the proof will amount to nothing. The affidavit by itself is only a portion of the proof, a solitary link in the chain required. The printer is not supposed to know anything of the order, and is not called upon even to refer to it in his affidavit.

When, therefore, the record of the judgment comes to be made up, it must necessarily include the order of the court, or it will disclose no proof of service. And when the statute requires the clerk to attach with other papers the proof of service, it means not merely the affidavit which the publisher may furnish as part of such proof, but the order also, without which the affidavit establishes nothing. It is in giving to the provision, declaring the proof which the officer or person making personal service or the printer publishing the summons shall furnish of their acts, the effect of a declaration that no other proof of the service was necessary, that error in our judgment was committed in Hahn v. Kelly [supra].

That the ruling in that case left the judgment-roll a defective and imperfect record, seems to have been felt by the court, for it says: "In our judgment, it would have added to the completeness of the record to have made the proof of service by publication include, also, the affidavit of the party, and the order of the court directing publication to be made, for, in point of law, they constitute a part of the mode; but the legislature has not seen proper to do so, and we can no more add to their will than we can take from it."

For the reasons we have stated, we do not admit that the statute sanctions any such defective record; but, on the contrary, we are clear that, properly construed, it requires full proof of the jurisdictional facts to be incorporated into the judgment-roll.

If, however, we are mistaken, and the order, which is the foundation of and the only authority for the publication, is no part of such roll, or, if not mistaken, we are bound to accept as correct, the construction of the statute given by the state court, then inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court cannot be limited, on a collateral attack, to the contents of the roll. The remaining record of the proceedings would be of equal authority and verity, and could be equally relied upon. The record at common law, which imported absolute verity, was a history of all the acts and proceedings in the action, from its initiation to final judgment, enrolled upon parchment for a perpetual memorial and testimony. These rolls were called records of the court, and were, in the language of Blackstone, "of such high and supereminent authority, that their truth was not to be called in question." A record, professedly embracing only a portion of such acts and proceedings, cannot be entitled to similar implicit credit, and cannot equally close the door against collateral attack. The use of the same designation to indicate a different collection of acts and proceedings, cannot, of course, carry with it the same import. If the legislature should declare that only that portion of the proceedings in an action, which constitutes the judgment itself, should be enrolled, it would not be any less illogical to insist that to that enrollment parties should be confined when questioning the jurisdiction of the court, than it is that they shall be confined to any other defective record of the proceedings in the action.

When constructive service by publication in a personal action is authorized by statute in place of personal citation, the rule prevailing in all courts is, that the statute must be strictly pursued. We are not aware that this doctrine has been denied in any state court. It has been repeatedly asserted by the supreme court of this state in the most emphatic manner. "A contrary course," said that court in Jordan v. Giblin, in 1859, "would encourage fraud and lead to oppression." 12 Cal. 100. "A failure to carry out the rule thus prescribed," said the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Sanderson, in Ricketson v. Richardson, 26 Cal. 149, "in any particular is fatal where it is not cured by an appearance." In Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 342, decided in 1866, the same doctrine is recognized. There the objection to the insufficiency of an affidavit made to obtain an order of publication, was allowed on a collateral attack to the judgment under which the plaintiff claimed title in ejectment. As the statute only requires certain facts to appear by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court or judge, we should be inclined, in the absence of this decision, to hold that defects in the affidavit could be taken advantage of only on appeal, and could not be urged collaterally. We cite the case, however, not only because it reiterates the rule of strict construction, but because of the special reason it gives for its enforcement in this state, in the observation that there is probably "no state in which so many have waited and are still waiting for their adversaries to depart in order that suit may be brought and judgment obtained against them on publication without actual notice." "It may be important," continues Mr. Justice Sawyer, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, "to the interests of those who suppose they have acquired rights under this class of judgments, that they should be upheld. But it is equally important that the interests of parties who have only been constructively served with process, and who, in many instances, have had no actual notice till they have been condemned unheard, should be protected. If a judgment is void for want of jurisdiction, all those who have acquired interests under it have done so in full view of the condition of the record; while, on the other hand, a defendant is liable to have an unjust judgment rendered against him without any knowledge of the pendency of the action till it is too late to protect himself. An appeal is no adequate remedy where a party has no notice; for the time to appeal is very brief, and may expire before actual notice is obtained. In the language of the court in Smith v. Rice, 11 Mass. 512, 'The very grievance complained of is, that the party had no notice of the pending of the cause, and of course no opportunity to appeal.'"

Now, if the rule in Hahn v. Kelly be correct, we have this singular result: that whilst the statute must be strictly followed before jurisdiction can be acquired over the person, a party against whom a judgment is rendered is precluded from examining the proceedings, by which alone it can be seen whether the statute has been followed. In other words, the court says no jurisdiction is acquired by the court if the requirements of the statute be not pursued, but the record of the proceedings taken shall always be a closed book.

If the order of the court is no part of the judgment-roll it cannot be brought before the court on appeal, unless a statement or bill of exceptions be made up; and either of these proceedings supposes the presence of the parties or counsel. If any other direct proceedings are taken they might result in vacating the judgment; but under the ruling in the case cited, the record being regular on its face, the purchaser, if a third party, would be protected, and the wronged defendant be left to the doubtful chances of recovering the value of his property by action against the plaintiff.

From the examination we have thus been able to give to the case of Hahn v. Kelly, we do not find in it sufficient reasons to depart from the old and well-established rules formerly recognized in the supreme court of the state, the observance of which, as we are more and more impressed every day, is essential to the protection of the rights of all citizens, whether resident or non-resident of the state.

The proceedings for constructive service by publication, which the statute authorizes, are, as stated by Mr. Justice Sanderson in the case of Ricketson v. Richardson [supra], "in derogation of the common law"; that is, they are not in accordance with the course of the common law.

It was the boast of that law that it condemned no one in his person or his property without his day in court. That there must be citation before hearing, and hearing, or opportunity of being heard, before judgment, was a cardinal principle which pervaded all its judicial proceedings. And when the articles of compact contained in the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory declared that its inhabitants should always be entitled "to judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law," it was believed by them that they had in that guarantee the assurance of full protection to all their private rights; and that the language was not used "mainly for ornamental purposes," having a certain "rotundity of sound which is pleasing to the ear" but leaving "no definite impression upon the understanding."[3] Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 411. The common law recognized no such proceeding as a personal judgment without the appearance of the party, and probably in no other case than Hahn v. Kelly were proceedings to outlawry ever

[3] In speaking of these terms—"proceeding according to the course of the common law"—the court, in Hahn v. Kelly, uses this language: "Some words are used to express ideas, and others to ornament them. The more we turn this expression over, and examine it by the light of reason, for the purpose of determining to what use it has been put, the more we are inclined to the opinion that it has been used merely from force of habit, or mainly for ornamental purposes. It has a certain rotundity of sound which is quite pleasing to the ear, but leaves no definite impression upon the understanding. It is simply equivalent to a knowing look or a solemn shake of the head, and doubtless it was first used in that sense. When first employed, its use was harmless, for there was then no mode of procedure except such as the common law prescribed, but its continued use where the modes of the common law have been superseded is mischievous."

cited as a mode "amounting or equivalent to constructive service," by which a common law court obtained jurisdiction. "By the strict rules of the common law," says the supreme court of New Jersey, in Hess v. Cole, 3 Zab. [23 N. J. Law] (116) 123, "it was necessary in every suit, not only that the defendant should be served with process, but that his appearance to the action should be effected. Every student is familiar with the cumbrous machinery and complicated process by which the courts sought to compel the appearance of the defendant. He is familiar also with the principle, that if the defendant was contumacious and refused to appear to a mere civil action, the proceedings were at an end. No judgment could be rendered. Every common law record shows upon its face that the defendant was either in custody, or was summoned or attached to answer to the action. And however inconvenient may have been the strictness with which the principle was applied, and the extent to which it was enforced in ancient common law proceedings, the principle itself is by no means peculiar to the common law. It pervades, in fact, every code of law and every well-regulated system for the administration of justice."

The opinion in Hahn v. Kelly is not only singular in its reference to proceedings to outlawry for want of appearance of a party, but the citations from Blackstone, to show that the courts of chancery would proceed to judgment upon a constructive service of process at all analogous to service by publication, establish nothing of the kind; and only seem to do so because they are detached from their context in the volume. They relate to proceedings to compel the appearance of parties after service of the subpoena, which is the original process in chancery, as any one will see who will read the whole page in Blackstone from which the citations are taken.

Service of the subpoena could indeed be made by leaving a copy at the actual residence of the defendant, as well as by delivering a copy to him personally. And in special cases where an absent or absconding defendant had appointed a person to act as his agent in the matter litigated, substituted service upon such agent in lieu of the principal was, upon application to the court, sometimes allowed. Adams' Eq. 324; Hobhouse v. Courtney, 12 Sim. 140. But it was not until the statute of 5 Geo. II. c. 25, that proceedings could be taken by publication without service in one of the modes indicated. That statute authorized proceedings by proclamation published in the London Gazette, and read in the parish church, and posted in the Royal Exchange, where a defendant had absconded to avoid service. It did not apply to a citizen or subject of another government who had never been in the realm.

Passing from Hahn v. Kelly, we proceed to consider the other positions taken by the defendant to defeat a recovery. It is contended by her counsel: 1. That the cases of Gray and Eaton were suits in rem, and that the decree in the consolidated suit bound the property without reference to the defective service of summons upon the infant. 2. That the district court had authority to appoint a guardian ad litem for the infant without previous service upon her; and 3. That the decree in the consolidated suit was not reversed as to the widow Matilda.

1. Suits in rem may be divided into four classes: 1st, those which are directed primarily against particular property, and are intended to dispose of it without reference to the title of individual claimants; 2d, those which are instituted to determine the status of particular property or persons; 3d, those which are, in form, personal suits, but which seek to subject property brought by existing lien or by attachment, or some collateral proceeding, under the control of the court, so as to give effect to the rights of the parties; and 4th, those which seek to dispose of property, or relate to some interest therein, but which touch the property or interest only through the judgment recovered. Proceedings in admiralty for the forfeiture of the vessel or goods are instances of the first kind; the suit is there brought against the vessel or goods directly, without reference to the rights of persons, and all parties are notified to appear by a designated day and assert their claims, or the property will be condemned. Proceedings in the probate court upon the validity of a will are instances of the second kind; the judgment, when rendered, operating directly upon the status or condition of the instrument, determining its validity or invalidity. Proceedings by attachment against the property of debtors, or to foreclose a mortgage, or other lien upon property, or to partition real estate, are instances of the third kind. Proceedings to compel the execution or cancellation of a conveyance of real property in the state and proceedings to wind up and dispose of partnership property are instances of the fourth kind. The third and fourth classes mentioned are not strictly proceedings in rem; but so far as they affect property in the state, they are treated as substantially such proceedings.

In proceedings in rem notice of some kind is required, but as all property is supposed to be in the possession of its owner, either in person or by agent, a seizure of property is, of itself, considered to impart notice of the proceeding to the owner. Therefore, where the property is, at the outset, taken into the custody of the court, the law is less strict in requiring further notice, either generally by proclamation to all persons, or specially to the reputed owner. But where the property to be affected is not thus at the outset taken into custody, there is no constructive notice given by the proceeding; and the same notice, as provided by law, must be given to the defendant, as in actions where a personal judgment for damages is alone sought. "A proceeding," says the supreme court of Vermont, in Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt. 65, where the law on the subject of suits in rem is stated with great clearness, "professing to determine the right of property where no notice, actual or constructive, is given, whatever else it might be called, would not be entitled to be dignified with the name of a judicial proceeding. It will be a mere arbitrary edict, not to be regarded anywhere as the judgment of a court."

The suits of Gray and Eaton were partly in personam, and were, at the same time, intended to subject property in the state to the disposition of the court; but as the property was not taken into custody at the outset, there was no constructive notice given to the owners or claimants by the proceeding, and the absent and non-resident defendants could only be brought before the court by publication of summons, as provided by statute, and this, as the supreme court held, was never done, so far as the infant Franklina was concerned.

2. As to the authority of the district court to appoint a guardian ad litem for the infant without previous service upon her, it is sufficient to observe that the supreme court of the state on appeal decided that no such authority existed. The statute requires service of summons on all infants, before a guardian ad litem can be appointed, and makes no difference in this respect between an infant of a few months, and one nearly attaining his majority, and the service can no more be dispensed with in the one case than in the other. Besides, there is wisdom in the provision requiring service even upon an infant in its cradle, for the papers, through its nurse or relatives, would almost be sure in such case to find their way into hands of parties who would look after the interests of the child. Be this as it may, it is the proceeding required by the legislature before the jurisdiction of the court can attach; and as Chief Justice Taney said of a mere formal objection which was insisted upon in the supreme court, nothing is unimportant or to be disregarded which the legislature has prescribed as a condition for exercising the jurisdiction of the court. Where personal service cannot be made by reason of the non-residence in the state or absence of the infant, service must be made by publication as in other cases. Such publication is the prescribed condition to the exercise of jurisdiction over the infant.

3. The objection that the decree of the district court in the consolidated action was not reversed as to the widow Matilda, is not founded upon fact. There was but one decree, though the court speaks in its opinion as though there were two separate decrees before it. This is an evident inadvertence in the language of the court, arising from the fact that the objections to the validity of the decree were taken to the separate proceedings had before their consolidation. The case was remanded for further proceedings; and on filing the remittitur, the question evidently arose as to what proceedings should be had, and after hearing counsel for the parties, the court ordered a new trial on all the issues as to all the parties. Upon this order the case remained on the calendar of the district court for trial for over a year, and was then dismissed. The order of dismissal was entered in the consolidated suit, and it would appear for greater caution in the separate suits also.

The decree as to the infant Franklina being void for want of jurisdiction in the district court over her; all proceedings founded upon such decree, so far as her rights are concerned, necessarily partake of the same infirmity. The purchaser of the premises being one of the attorneys of the plaintiff Gray, the law, as held by the supreme court, imputes to him knowledge of the defects in the proceedings which were taken under his direction and that of his partners. The conveyance of the undivided half to his law partner was made after the reversal of the decree, and the latter also took his interest with similar knowledge of the defect. Independently of this fact, their title fell with the reversal of the decree. On this subject we can add nothing to what was said in the opinion of the supreme court, except that the doctrine of Reynolds v. Harris [14 Cal. 667] was reaffirmed in the late case of Reynolds v. Hosmer, reported in 45 Cal. 617.

As to the claim for rents, we are of opinion that the cost of filling up the water lot, which was a valuable and permanent improvement, is a just offset to the rents received or which might have been received by the defendant.

It follows from the views we have expressed that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the possession of the premises; and such judgment will be entered upon the findings filed, with costs.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—CITIZENSHIP—ALIEN AS PARTY.

A case was removed into this court, under the 12th section of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79), on the allegation that the plaintiff was a citizen of New York, and the defendant a citizen of Massachusetts. The plaintiff moved to remand the cause, on the ground that he was an alien. That fact was not denied: Held, that the motion must be granted.

Joseph J. Marrin, for plaintiff.
Noah Davis, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. As it is not denied, on this motion, that the plaintiff is an alien, I think the case ought to be remanded to the state court. It was removed here under the 12th section of the act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 79), on the allegation that the plaintiff was a citizen of New York, and the defendant a citizen of Massachusetts. I do not think it falls within the principle of Dennistoun v. Draper [Case No. 3,804], and Wood v. Matthews [Id. 17,955]. If the question of the alienage of the plaintiff were seriously contested, it would be proper to retain the case for a trial of that question, on the merits, on formal issues in the cause. There can be no doubt of the power of this court to remand the cause, if it sees that there is no jurisdiction. Witetiqui v. D'Arbel, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 692, 701. The exercise of that power at this stage of the cause is a question of discretion; and, in this case, I think a proper exercise of such discretion requires that the case be remanded. The motion is granted, on condition that the plaintiff stipulates that the defendant have thirty days' time to answer the complaint, after a certified copy of the order herein shall have been filed in the state court.

BANKRUPTCY—PAYMENT OF DEBT AFTER PROCEEDINGS BEGUN.

[Where a note is given in payment of a book account, after a petition in bankruptcy is filed against the payee, but before the adjudication, and the note at maturity is paid to a bank which holds the same, this is a discharge of the maker, and the assignee in bankruptcy cannot maintain a suit against him for the amount of the note.]

Rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence. Assumpsit by the assignee in bankruptcy of A. Benton & Co. upon a book account and promissory note, copies of which were filed. Upon January 31, 1877, the petition in bankruptcy was filed, and in March, 1877, the firm of A. Benton & Co. were adjudicated bankrupts. In re Benton [Case No. 1,333]. The book account contained charges for goods sold and delivered during August and September, 1876. The note for like amount was dated February 26, 1877, after the petition had been filed. The affidavit of defence alleged that the note was given in payment of the book account, and that a few days before its maturity the defendant was notified by the Union National Bank that it held the note and demanded payment, and that he paid the note at maturity, and now had it in his possession.

GAMBLE et al. v. MASON.

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. Nov. Term, 1858.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—TARIFF ACTS OF 1842 AND 1857—ARTICLES NOT ENUMERATED—ACTIONS AGAINST COLLECTOR—COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS.

1. The 20th section of the tariff act of 1842 [5 Stat. 565] is still in force, and is embodied in the act of 1857 [11 Stat. 192].

[Approved in Field v. Schell, Case No. 4,772.]

2. That whether an article imported into the country, and which is not specifically enumerated in the schedule of the act, bears a similitude in material, quality, texture or use, to one which is enumerated, is a question which a jury must determine.

3. In order to maintain an action against the collector of the port, the plaintiff must satisfy the jury that he has fully complied with all the requirements of the statute, both as to form and substance.

This was an action on the case brought by the plaintiffs to recover of the defendant $187. The plaintiffs [Joseph C. Gamble and David Gamble] are aliens and citizens of England, and the defendant [John T. Mason] is collector of the customs of the United States, at the port of Baltimore. On the 16th of April, 1858, D. McIlvain, as consignee and agent of the plaintiffs, entered at the custom house in Baltimore one hundred barrels of caustic soda, valued at $1,700. The defendant assessed and levied on the said caustic soda a duty at the rate of fifteen per cent. ad valorem; the consignee contending that caustic soda was liable, under the tariff act of 1857, to but four per cent. ad valorem, paid the above assessment of fifteen per cent. under protest in writing, and took the goods; the assessment, as paid, amounted to $255. Afterwards, on the 24th of April, 1858, McIlvain addressed a letter to the defendant, setting forth the grounds on which he protested against the said assessment of fifteen per cent., and the reasons why he considered that caustic soda was liable to a duty of but four per cent.; the defendant, still adhering to his decision, McIlvaine, as agent and consignee of the plaintiffs, on the 13th of May, 1858, appealed from his decision to the secretary of the treasury, and the secretary of the treasury on the 18th of May, 1858, notified McIlvaine that he had affirmed the decision of the defendant. The plaintiffs thereupon, on the 16th day of June, 1858, instituted the present suit.

The act of congress, approved March 3, 1857 [supra], being the latest tariff act, embraces eight separate schedules, designated by the letters of the alphabet from A to H inclusive; each of said schedules contains a list of enumerated articles, all articles in the same schedule being assessed at the same rate, and a different rate being assessed in each of the different schedules. Schedule I contains all articles that are free of duty. The act of 1857 also, provides that all articles imported from abroad into the United States, and not enumerated in said schedules, shall pay a duty of fifteen per centum. The act of 1857 is similar in its provisions to the tariff act of 1846 [9 Stat. 42], which was the tariff act next preceding the act of 1857, with the exception that the rates of duty are different in the two acts, and some changes made in the latter as to the relative position of some articles in different schedules. The 20th section of the tariff act of 1842, is in these words,—"That there shall be levied, collected and paid on each and every non-enumerated article which bears a similitude, either in material, quality, texture, or the uses to which it may be applied, to any enumerated article chargeable with duty, the same rate of duty which is levied and charged on the enumerated article which it most resembles in any of the particulars before mentioned; and if any non-enumerated article equally resembles two or more enumerated articles, on which different rates of duty are chargeable, there shall be levied, collected and paid on such non-enumerated article the same rate of duty as is chargeable on the article which it resembles, paying the highest duty; and on all articles manufactured from two or more materials, the duty shall be assessed at the highest rates at which any of its component parts may be chargeable."

The plaintiffs admitted that caustic soda was not enumerated in any of the before mentioned schedules of the act of 1857, but they contended that under the 20th section of act of 1842, caustic soda bears a similitude to soda ash either in material, quality, texture, or the uses to which it may be applied, and of all the articles enumerated in the different schedules of the act of 1857, it most resembles soda ash; and inasmuch as soda ash is made liable to pay but four per cent. by said act, (being embraced in Schedule H) that therefore caustic soda is properly chargeable with but four per cent., and having paid fifteen per cent. under protest on that entered on the 16th of April, 1858, that they are entitled in this action to recover the difference between fifteen per cent. on $1,700, and four per cent. on the same sum.

The defendant contended, 1st, that caustic soda is liable to pay a duty of fifteen per cent. as an unenumerated article under the act of 1857. 2d. That it bears no similitude either in material, quality, texture, or the uses to which it may be applied to soda ash, and that it does not most resemble soda ash of all the articles enumerated in the several schedules of the act of 1857; that therefore it is not properly chargeable with the same duty as is levied upon soda ash.

J. Mason Campbell and Bernard Caxter, for plaintiffs.

W. Meade Addison, U. S. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

HELD BY THE COURT (GILES, District Judge): 1st, that the 20th section of the tariff act of 1842 was still in force, and must be considered as embodied in the tariff act of 1857.

2d. That if caustic soda bears a similitude to soda ash, either in material, quality, texture, or the uses to which it may be applied, and most resembles soda ash of all the articles enumerated in said tariff act of 1857, that then caustic soda was under said act chargeable with but four per cent. ad valorem, and that whether or not caustic soda bears the said similitude to soda ash, and most resembles it as aforesaid, is a question for the jury to determine.

3d. That if caustic soda more nearly resembled carbonate of soda than it does soda ash, in the particulars mentioned in the said 20th section of act of 1842, which is a question for the jury to determine, then that caustic soda was liable to a duty of eight per cent., that being the rate of duty with which carbonate of soda is chargeable, under the act of 1857.

4th. That in order to maintain this action against the defendant, the plaintiffs must show, to the satisfaction of the jury, in addition to the other matter which they are required to show, that within ten days after the decision of the collector in this matter, they gave notice to him of their dissatisfaction with his decision, and set forth distinctly and specifically therein the grounds of objection thereto; and did within thirty days after the date of such decision, appeal therefrom to the secretary of the treasury, and did within thirty days from the date of the decision of the secretary of the treasury in this matter, institute this suit.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for one hundred and eighty-seven dollars, $187, (the amount claimed by the plaintiffs) and $6.88 interest from the 16th of April, 1858, making in all $193.88.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY — VERIFICATION OF ANSWER—SUIT FOR WAGES—SPECIAL INTERROGATORIES—INTEREST.

1. In causes on the instance side of the admiralty, the answer of the claimant should be verified by oath; [2] and in a suit for wages, the libellant may compel the adverse party to answer special interrogatories.

[Cited in The David Pratt, Case No. 3,597; Hutson v. Jordan, Id. 6,959.]

2. In suits for wages, interest is allowed from the time of a demand proved; and if no demand is proved, from the commencement of the suit.

[Cited in Mahurin v. Bickford, 6 N. H. 572; McIlvaine v Wilkins, 12 N. H. 481.]

This was a libel for mariners' wages. Some questions arose as to the practice in causes on the instance side of the court, and particularly in causes of this nature.

Mr. Selfridge, for libellant.

Mr. Townsend, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. In causes on the instance side of the court, the answer of the claimant should be verified by his oath. This is the general practice both of courts of equity and courts of admiralty; and indeed of all courts proceeding according to the course of the civil law. 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 416; Clerke, Praxis Adm. tit. 14, 24; Marr. Forms, 363. In suits for mariners' wages the libellant may compel the adverse party to answer special interrogatories, which are filed under the direction of the court, and are like the interrogating part of the bill in chancery. And in point of convenience this practice should be adhered to, for it brings distinctly before the court the points, on which the defence is intended to be rested. As to all facts denied, the burthen of proof lies on the plaintiff, except in the special case of the shipping paper and log book, as provided for in the statute regulating seamen in the merchants' service. Act July 20, 1790, c. 29, § 6 [1 Stat. 133].

Mr. Selfridge, for libellant, inquired, whether interest would be allowed on the amount of the wages due from the time of a demand made.

STORY, Circuit Justice. There is no difference in this respect between the practice of our courts of common law, and that of the admiralty. In the latter, interest is generally allowed from the time of a demand made for the wages; and if no special demand is proved, from the time of the commencement of the suit.

GANNON v. DONN.

[1 Hayw. & H. 346.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. 30, 1848.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE — JUDICIAL AND MINISTRIAL ACTS—NEGLIGENCE—SUPERSEDEAS TAKEN ON SUNDAY.

1. A justice of the peace is not liable in damages for judicial acts, and for ministerial acts only in case of intentional or gross negligence.

2. Sunday is not a day on which a supersedeas can be given.

3. But taking it as a judicial act, and the justice is not liable, though taken on a Sunday and from a minor.

At law. Action [by James P. Gannon] against [Thomas C. Donn] a justice of the peace for negligence or omission in the discharge of his duty under section 4 of the act of 1823 [3 Stat. 743]. The plaintiff had a fieri facias on a justice's judgment issued by defendant and laid on Gannon's horse after dark on Saturday; the legality of which levy being doubted, it was agreed the horse should be placed in the livery stable of the plaintiff until the judgment should be superseded. On the following day (Sunday) the recognizance was entered into before the defendant, and antedated on the preceding Saturday. The superseder was under twenty-one; but wanted only six or seven months of being of age. His appearance indicated full age. The horse was delivered to Gannon on the certificate of supersedeas. His residence was in Maryland, and afterwards he went to Mexico, but was seen in the District on the horse after the expiration of the time of the supersedeas. It was not shown that he had any other property. The surety in the recognizance refused on the ground of non-age, and no steps were taken thereon or on the original judgment. The plaintiff, representing to the defendant that he had lost his debt by his conduct, said: "Sooner than you shall lose it I will pay it." Upon this evidence the plaintiff seeks to recover against the defendant under section 4 of the act of 1823 for negligence or omission in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. Lenox, for appellant.
Mr. Giberson, for appellee.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. This is the first instance of a suit under this section. The terms are general and might comprehend any degree of negligence or any omission of duty; but the third and fourth sections of the law must be taken together, and the general expressions of the latter limited by the former. The expression in the fourth section is that "if any justice shall omit to keep a docket, or be guilty of any other negligence or omission, whereby the plaintiff, having obtained a judgment before such justice, shall lose his debt," the justice shall pay the same. The keeping of a docket is purely a ministerial act, and the general terms must be limited to acts of the same character, and cannot be extended to acts done or omitted in his judicial capacity. A justice is not answerable for his judicial opinions, though erroneous, and as to his ministerial acts there must be proof of intentional violation of duty or gross negligence.

"The acts complained of are: 1. That the recognizance was taken on a Sunday and antedated. 2. That the surety was a minor. Sunday is not a day for legal proceedings. 2 Inst. 264. But in taking the supersedeas the justice was acting in his judicial character, and might have supposed the consent of the parties had been given to consider it as done on Saturday. As to the age of the surety the justice might well be deceived by his appearance, and there was nothing to awake suspicion. Notice need not be given to the plaintiff of the time and place of taking the recognizance, nor is there proof that the debt has been lost by any other act or omission of the defendant. His promise is not obligatory on him. The plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—DUTIABLE VALUE—PORT OF SHIPMENT.

Where merchandise was shipped from Smyrna to the United States, via Liverpool, where it was to be, and was transferred to another vessel, it was held that an estimated freight from Smyrna to Liverpool, could not be added to the market value, and charges at Smyrna, to make up the dutiable value. In such a case, Smyrna, and not Liverpool, is the place from whence the merchandise is imported into the United States.

[Cited in Forman v. Peaslee, Case No. 4,941; Millar v. Millar, Id. 9,546.]

[This was an action at law by James Gant against Charles H. Peaslee.]

Mr. Griswold, for plaintiff.
Mr. Hallett, Dist. Atty., contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an action for money had and received, to recover of the collector of the port of Boston, money alleged to have been illegally exacted, in payment of duties on merchandise imported into that port by the plaintiff. The evidence showed that a parcel of figs, admitted to be the produce of Turkey, were shipped at Smyrna by the plaintiff, on board a steamer called the Melita, under a bill of lading, which made them deliverable in Boston. The Melita belonged to the British and North American Mail Steamship Company, and was one of a line plying between Liverpool and Smyrna, and other ports in the Mediterranean, in connection with the line of British steamers which ply between Liverpool and Boston and New York. And the bill of lading contains a memorandum, to this effect, that the goods are to be forwarded to Boston by the first British and North American Royal Mail Steamship Company's steamer, at shipper's risk, and company's expense. The freight stipulated is twelve pounds sterling per ton, for the entire transportation from Smyrna to Boston, via Liverpool. When the goods were entered at the custom-house, the defendant added to the charges shown by the invoice, the estimated cost of freight from Smyrna to Liverpool, at three pounds per ton, which amounted to $435.60, and on this amount, a duty was assessed. The plaintiff protested in writing, before payment, against paying a duty on the freight from Smyrna to Liverpool, and brings this action to recover it back. These duties were assessed under the tariff act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 42), but the question now before me, depends upon the provisions of a subsequent law, of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 629, § 1), in conformity with which, the dutiable value of merchandise was required to be ascertained. The law directs that there shall be added to the appraised value or price of the merchandise "all costs and charges, except insurance, and including in every case a charge for commissions, at the usual rates, as the true value at the port where the same may be entered, upon which duties shall be assessed."

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

The first question is, whether a charge for freight from Smyrna to Liverpool, could lawfully be added, as being one of the "charges" within the meaning of this act. The direction to add "charges" to the cost of the goods, to arrive at their dutiable value, was first given by the act of January 29, 1795 (1 Stat. 411), was repeated in the collection act of 1799, § 61 (1 Stat. 673), and in many laws on this subject since that date (3 Stat. 732, § 5; 4 Stat. 273, § 8; Id. 591, §§ 7, 15; 5 Stat. 563, § 16; 9 Stat. 42, § 8). And it has been uniformly held and practised by the treasury department, under all these laws, that freight was not a dutiable charge. It is so stated in terms by the circular of the secretary of the treasury of the 27th of March, 1851, which is found in 1 Mayo, p. 45, of Treasury Circulars. This practical construction placed on former laws, on this subject, and which had continued for more than half a century, when the act in question was passed, must be considered as known to, and silently adopted by congress, when it used in this law the same phraseology, employed in the former laws thus construed. I consider it, therefore, too late now to contend for the general proposition that freight is a dutiable charge within the meaning of the act of 1851. If so, it would seem difficult to maintain, that an estimated freight, pro rata itineris, is a dutiable charge, when the merchandise, instead of coming by the most direct route from the country of its production, and from which it is actually exported to the United States, comes by a more circuitous route, passing through a port of another country. For in such a case, it is still freight, paid for the transportation of the merchandise, to the United States.

The argument on the part of the collector is, that the act of 1851, has made it the duty of the collector, to ascertain the market-value, at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported into the United States, and to add thereto all costs and charges; that in this case England was the country from whence the figs were exported into the United States; that consequently, their market value there, and the costs and charges there, were to be ascertained; that if it was not lawful to add the cost of freight from Smyrna to Liverpool, as one of the costs or charges, yet that the expense of bringing the figs to England must have embraced their value in Liverpool, and that it is immateral to the plaintiff, whether that expense goes into the dutiable value in the form of costs, or charges on the figs, or as part of their market value in Liverpool. This is an ingenious view of the defendant's case, and seems to be the best which it admits of; but I am of opinion it is not consistent with the law.

If it were conceded that, in this case, England was the country of exportation, it could not be maintained that the freight paid for carrying the figs to England, was one of the costs or charges within the meaning of this act of 1851. Because, in that case, the act requires the market value in England to be ascertained, and the costs and charges added; now the cost of carrying the figs to England necessarily enters into and affects their market value in England, and is included, when that market value is ascertained; and, of course, is not to be again added as one of the costs or charges. Besides, there is no legitimate mode of ascertaining the amount of such a charge. No freight was agreed on, in this case, for transporting the property from Smyrna to Liverpool. The actual freight was paid, for the transportation to the United States; and when the collector added £3 per ton for freight to Liverpool, he did not add an actual charge, paid by the importer, but a supposed sum, estimated by himself, as being what it would have cost to carry the property to Liverpool, if that had been, as it was not, its place of destination.

Nor can it be admitted that the other position is tenable, that, the market value in England being the object of inquiry, it is immaterial whether the cost of carrying the property there is included in that market value, or is added to the invoice in order to ascertain it. It is obviously true that the cost of carrying the property to England, enters into and affects its market value in that country. But it by no means follows, that at any given date this cost of transportation enhances the value there precisely to the amount of the freight. Market value is affected by many causes, the chief of which is supposed to be the extent of the supply, compared with the demand; and it is plain, that to take the invoice cost and charges at Smyrna, and add to them the cost of transportation to Liverpool, would not be a legitimate mode of ascertaining the market value of figs, in Liverpool. So that conceding England to be the country whence the figs were exported, to the United States, the market value there was not ascertained, nor attempted to be ascertained. The collector undoubtedly treated the market value in Smyrna, as shown by the invoice, to be the true market value, and added £3 per ton as one of the charges, or costs, at Liverpool, which was the last port of departure to the United States.

But I am satisfied that there is another defect in the position assumed by the defendant's counsel. I do not think England, the country from which these figs were imported into the United States, within the meaning of the Act of 1851. They were purchased at Smyrna, and there shipped for the United States, under a consignment to the plaintiff's agent in Boston. When they left the country of their production, they were destined for the United States. It was not intended that they should enter any other market, or become part of the merchandise of any other country than the United States. When the figs left Symrna, if the question had arisen, to what country have they been exported, the answer must have been, to the United States. It would no more have been true, in point of fact, that they were exported to England, than that they were exported to Malta, or Trieste, or any other port, where the steamer, which carried them, might stop, as she came down the Mediterranean. Their going to Liverpool, and being transshipped there, affected only the route and means of their transit, not their place of departure, or destination. It is well known that large importations are made into the United States from Germany and Switzerland. Merchandise, the product or manufacture of those countries, is purchased in their markets, invoices made, and the property brought by land, or interior navigation to the coast, and there shipped. It appears by the treasury circular already referred to, that contemporaneously with the passage of this act of 1851, an interpretation was put on it by the department, under which the country of production was, in these cases, deemed the country whence the merchandise was imported into the United States. In my opinion, this interpretation was sound. It assumes that, though the merchandise passes through different countries, and the vehicles for its transportation are changed, and though it arrives in the United States in a vessel on board which it was placed in France or Belgium; yet if it was bought by the market of the country of production by the importer, and was sent by him thence to the United States, it was imported into the United States from the country of production, within the true meaning of this act; and I apprehend it can make no difference, in this particular, whether the change of the vehicles of transportation, is from one steamship to another, or from land to water carriage.

It may be urged however, and I suppose this is the ground, upon which the practice complained of in this case, has been adopted, that when merchandise is purchased in the country of its production, and transported to the sea-coast and there shipped, the cost of the carriage to the sea-coast is added, as one of the costs and charges. I suppose this is the practice, under this law, and I do not question its correctness. Viewing the subject logically merely, it might be difficult to distinguish those costs and charges of transporting merchandise from Geneva, for instance, to Havre, from the cost of transportation from Smyrna to Liverpool. So, reasoning a priori, it would be difficult to show that marine freight was not a cost or charge, which enhanced the dutiable value of merchandise, at its place of destination. But the law has made a distinction between freight for transporting property on the sea, and other charges; and while it requires these to be included, it requires that to be excluded; and whether the voyage be one passage only, or several passages between different ports, beginning at the place of exportation, and ending at the place of importation, and whether it be performed in one or two bottoms, what is paid for the whole transportation on the sea, is freight, and is not to be included as a dutiable charge, whether it be incurred in one port or another, or the whole of the voyage of importation. In the case of Grinnell v. Lawrence [Case No. 5,831], Mr. Justice Nelson had occasion to consider a similar question arising under the tariff act of 1842 (5 Stat. 548). Though not identical with this case, it has a strong bearing on it, and has materially aided me in coming to a conclusion concerning it.

In conformity with the agreement of the parties, a verdict is to be directed for the plaintiff, for the amount paid, on account of duties assessed on the charge for freight.

Case No. 5,213.

GANTT v. JONES.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1804.

BILLS AND NOTES — NOTICE TO JOINT INDORSERS —PAYMENT BY ONE—SUIT AGAINST THE OTHER.

1. Where there are two joint indorsers notice must be given to both.

2. If one of the joint indorsers pay the note, he cannot recover a moiety from the other indorser unless he was liable to pay the note.

3. Quaere, as to interest on money had and received.

One joint surety having paid the whole, sues the other surety for a moiety. Assumpsit for money paid for the defendant's use; and money had and received by the defendant for the plaintiff's use.

Case stated. The material facts of this case are, that the plaintiff and defendant being joint payees of Suter's note, dated 16th of June, 1800, payable twenty-four months after date, indorsed and passed it away. That the note being unpaid, and the plaintiff being arrested upon a joint writ, against him and the defendant, issued upon said note, eight months after it became payable, paid the full amount with interest and costs, being $452.60, to the holder, and took up the note. That he had before paid the defendant $250, for the purpose of paying half the said note, which defendant had not applied to that use. That the note was given and indorsed by the plaintiff and defendant, for a debt due from Suter to D. Happart, to whom the plaintiff and defendant indorsed and delivered it. That on 21st June, 1802, a notary-public demanded payment of the note at the last place of abode of Suter, and received for answer that he had sailed for the East Indies, and left no funds to take up the note, whereupon it was protested and returned to the holder. That the defendant, Jones, always did live and still lives within six miles of Georgetown, where the note was given. That F. J. Gantt returned to this country about the 15th of February, and the writ was served on him the 22d of February, 1803, when he paid the money. That the first writ was served on C. C. Jones, the defendant, on the 18th of December, six months after the note was payable. That Jones had not, in any manner, accounted with the plaintiff for the $250. Upon this statement of facts the plaintiff prayed the court to instruct the jury that plaintiff has a right in this suit to recover of the defendant the sum of $250, with interest thereon, from the 8th October, 1802, and also the further sum of $226.30, with interest thereon to be computed from the 22d of Feb ruary, 1803.

Whereupon THE COURT instructed the jury that, upon the above statement of facts, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the abovementioned sum of $250, with interest thereon, from the 8th day of October, 1802, upon the count for money had and received by the defendant to plaintiff's use. But that he is not entitled, upon either count in the declaration, to recover the other sum of $226.30, nor any part of it, for the moiety of the amount of the note so paid by the plaintiff, as aforesaid. Plaintiff took a bill of exceptions, but did not prosecute a writ of error.

The grounds of this opinion, as stated by THE COURT, were, that it did not appear that the plaintiff and defendant were liable at the time the plaintiff paid the money; and no assent of defendant to the payment made by the plaintiff is stated. That in order to make the plaintiff and defendant liable upon their indorsement upon the note, the holder must have given due notice to them of the nonpayment by the maker. That notice to Gantt, eight months after the note was payable, (although it should be proved to be given instantly on his return to this country,) was not due notice, the other joint indorser being a resident six miles only from Georgetown—nor was the service of the writ upon Jones, six months after the note became payable, reasonable notice.

Quaere, as to interest upon the $250 on the count for money had and received. See Tappenden v. Randall, 2 Bos. & P. 467; where the court held, that in an action for money had and received, nothing but the net sum advanced, (without interest,) could be recovered.

GARBER v. GLOBE MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

Circuit Court, E. D. Missouri. Sept., 1874.

LIFE INSURANCE — WAIVER OF CONDITIONS AS TO PLACE OF RESIDENCE AND PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS.

[1. Breach of a condition in the policy as to place of residence is waived when, with knowledge thereof, the officers or agents of the company who have transacted all the business relating to the policy accept premiums and issue renewal certificates.]

[2. Prompt payment of premiums on the date when due is waived by a previous course of dealing in respect to the particular policy, and to other policies generally, by which 30 days' time has been habitually allowed.]

[3. Where prompt payment of the premium has not been waived, the payment of a premium 11 days after it is due, and the issuance of a renewal certificate, without disclosure of the fact that the insured is then dangerously ill, will not effect a renewal of the policy.]

[This was an action by Eliza Garber against the Globe Mutual Life Insurance Company to recover the amount of a policy issued in plaintiff's favor upon the life of her husband, Charles H. Garber.]

DILLON, Circuit Judge (orally charging jury). On the 5th day of November, 1869, the defendant issued at its St. Louis agency the policy now sued on, by which it insured the life of the plaintiff's husband for her use, on certain conditions, for the sum of $5,000. The company defends the action brought to recover this sum upon two special grounds: 1. Because Mr. Garber resided within the prohibited district of country, contrary to the terms of the policy. 2. Because the premium which fell due on November 1, 1872, was not paid when it fell due. It is undisputed upon the testimony that Mr. Garber was taken sick in New Orleans about the 6th or 7th day of November, 1872, and died of yellow fever on the 11th day of November of that year, about 11:30 o'clock a. m. In the latter part of October, 1872, the agency of the company at St. Louis received from the home office of the company a notice, directed to Mr. Garber, that the premiums on the policy would become due on the 1st day of November, and there is evidence that on the last day of October, or the 1st day of November, the agents of the defendant at St. Louis directed this notice to the assured at New Orleans, and Mrs. Garber testifies that this notice was received there by her on or about November 4th, at New Orleans. On the 10th day of November a telegram was sent by Mrs. Garber from New Orleans to a Mr. Warne at St. Louis, directing the latter to go to the company's agency in St. Louis, (at which the policy was issued, and which had collected all the previous premiums,) and pay the premium. Accordingly, on the morning of the 11th day of November Mr. Warne called at the office of the company, and about 9 o'clock a. m. paid the premium and received a renewal receipt, renewing the policy for a year from November 1, 1872. Mr. Warne did not know that Mr. Garber was then sick, and did not, of course, state that fact to the company. On the other hand, the company at the time it received the premium did not make any inquiries concerning the health of the assured. In a short time the agents at St. Louis became aware of the death of Garber, and the circumstances, and communicated them by letter to the home company, and before hearing from it, the agents included the amount in their semi-monthly report to the home company of November 15th. Before this report reached the home company, the latter had telegraphed the St. Louis agency to return the premium and demand a surrender of the renewal receipt. Shortly afterward the agency here tendered to Mr. Warne the amount of the premium and demanded a return of the renewal receipt, but the tender was not received nor the receipt returned.

With this brief reference to some of the undisputed facts in the case, we now come to instruct in reference to the law as to the two special defences relied on by the company. First, as to the residence within the prohibited district. The policy provides that if between the first of July and the first of November the assured shall reside south of the 33d degree of north latitude without the consent of the company given in writing, the policy shall be null and void. The plaintiff admits that Garber did reside in New Orleans between July 1 and November 1, 1872, without the written consent of the company. This is a complete defense, and the plaintiff cannot recover unless the provision of the policy was waived by the acts of the company or its authorized agents. If you believe, from the evidence, that the officers of the company, transacting all the business of the company respecting this policy, knew that Mr. Garber had been and was residing in New Orleans from July to November, 1872, in violation of the condition of the policy as to place of residence, and received the premium on the 11th day of November with such knowledge, and issued a renewal receipt, then this ground of defense fails. But if the company received this premium without knowledge that the policy had been violated in this respect, then this defense is made out and the plaintiff cannot recover. Bliss, Ins. (2d Ed.) 344. Second, as to the defense arising out of the non-payment of the premium on the 1st day of November. It is admitted that payment of the premium was not made until November 11th; but the plaintiff also claims that this condition was waived by the company; she claims that the company, by its general course of dealing in giving thirty days' time in which to pay the premiums generally, and by its practice in respect to this particular policy—that the company waived payment of the premium to a period beyond the time when it was actually paid. Evidence has been given to show that the company's agency in St. Louis were in the habit of giving parties thirty days in which to make payment of their premiums. Whether this is satisfactorily established to be the general practice of the company in this respect at St. Louis, is for you to determine. As respects this particular policy, evidence has been given to show that the premium due November 1, 1871, was paid by note, and the premium due November 1, 1871, was paid by a note, December 14, 1871, which note was collected by the St. Louis agents of the company from Garber at New Orleans in July, 1872. In respect to the premium due November 1, 1871, a letter has been introduced in evidence from the company's officers at St. Louis, addressed to Mr. Garber at New Orleans, dated St. Louis, November 3, 1871, calling attention to the premium due on the first day of that month, requesting payment, and concluding with these words: "Please reply at once, as receipts can be held only thirty days, and then at risk of the assured." If you find from all the evidence that the company by its general course of dealing, and by its particular course of dealing with Mr. Garber, waived prompt payment of the premium, and led him to believe that he could have thirty days after the 1st of November to pay, then having received the premium within the thirty days, this ground of defense fails. Bliss, Ins. (2d Ed.) 299 et seq. If, however, there was no such waiver of prompt payment, then the payment on the 11th would not be effectual to renew the policy if Garber was then dangerously ill with yellow fever, and this fact was not disclosed to the company's agents to whom the premium was offered.

Verdict for plaintiff.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 157.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1856.

MEXICAN LAND CLAIM—GRANT.

A mere permission to search for and take possession of land did not bind the Mexican government to make a title: consequently, the United States are not required under the treaty to recognise this claim.

[Cited in Dodge v. Perez, Case No. 3,953.]

[See note at end of case.]

This claim [against the United States, for nine leagues of land in Mendocino county] was rejected by the board, and appealed by the claimant [Rafael Garcia].

[1] [Reported by Hon. Ogden Hoffman, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

E. L. Goold, for appellant.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty., for appellees.

Before HOFFMAN, District Judge.

In support of his claim the appellant exhibits an order of Micheltorena, dated Nov. 15th, 1844, which is as follows: "According to your memorial of the fourteenth instant, you ask for the grant of a passport to penetrate into the points of the coast on the northern line of this country, with the object of locating a tract of land of the extent of eight to nine leagues, since that which you now occupy, with your personal property, is so limited. By this order you are empowered to appear before the military commanding authority of that frontier, in order that after an examination you may proceed to your research after the tract of land you ask for as a recompense for the services rendered by you to the nation. If you should happen to select any tract of land, you are empowered to occupy it with your said property, and to take possession of it while the usual procedure is being prosecuted, presenting the requisite sketch. God and Liberty. Manuel Micheltorena. Monterey, Nov. 15th, 1844. To Don Rafael Garcia, at his Rancho."

Availing himself of the permission thus granted, the claimant appears to have selected a tract of land, and to have occupied and improved it to some extent. No steps, however, were taken by him to obtain a title until March 4th, 1846, when Garcia addressed a petition to Gov. Pico, in which, after referring to the order of Micheltorena, he solicits a grant of the land. Gov. Pio Pico, by a marginal order dated April 7th, 1845, referred the petition to the alcalde of San Rafael for the usual informe. On the twenty-ninth of April, 1846, the alcalde reported that the land did not belong to any private individual.

The foregoing constitutes all the evidence of title produced by the claimant. It is not pretended that any grant was ever issued for the land, or that any further action whatever was taken by Pio Pico on receiving the alcalde's informe. Whether he determined not to grant the land, or whether he omitted to do so in consequence of the distracted condition of public affairs, we are ignorant; one fact is clear—no grant was obtained by the claimant.

It is contended that the permission given by Micheltorena to search for a suitable tract, and to occupy it if found, "while the usual procedure is being prosecuted," gave to the claimant an equity which, when coupled with subsequent occupation, this court is bound to respect. But the permission in this case is widely different from the concessions or warrants of survey which in the Louisiana and Florida cases were held to constitute inchoate or equitable titles.

A brief reference to the mode of granting public lands in Louisiana and Florida, as compared with that established by the colonization laws, will show that the decisions applicable to inchoate titles under the former system can have no application to the present case.

In Louisiana and Florida, the granting officer, on receipt of the petition, issued a concession to the party, authorizing him to have his land surveyed by the official surveyor. If the surveyor found the land to be vacant, and that it would not interfere with the rights of others, he returned a plat or figurative plan, and the party thereupon obtained an absolute grant. The preliminary concession was, as its name imports, a grant, and usually conceded, as in Glen's Case, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 258, the land to the petitioner and his heirs. To these concessions conditions were commonly annexed, that a mill should be erected within a specified time, that the land should be cultivated, that the party should levee and ditch the river front in Lower Louisiana, etc. Where, then, a party had obtained a concession, but had omitted to procure the subsequent absolute title on the completion of the survey, the title acquired by the concession was held to be inchoate and imperfect, and the real equity of the claimant was deemed to consist in the performance of the conditions or contract specified in the concession. The implied promise or assurance contained in the concession, that the title should issue provided the party performed the conditions, was deemed obligatory on the conscience of this, as well as the former government, and the claims in such cases were confirmed.

Under the Mexican system no preliminary concession or warrant of survey issued to the party. The final and absolute title was, by the regulations of 1828, the first and only document which the petitioner received, and conditions subsequent were introduced into the final grant, by which, on their nonperformance, the estate of the grantee could be divested. A mere petition to search for land, such as that given to the present claimant, finds no place in the Mexican system; nor can a naked authority to take possession be likened to those preliminary concessions, under and on the faith of which the land was surveyed and the conditions fulfilled in Louisiana and Florida.

The application of Garcia to Micheltorena was for a passport to enable him to search for land. In granting this, and also the permission to put his cattle upon the tract he might select, Micheltorena in no respect bound himself or his successors to issue a final title. Such seems to have been the view of Pio Pico and the claimant himself, for a petition, accompanied by the usual diseño, is formally presented to that officer and by him referred for information as in other cases.

Had the order of Micheltorena contained any words which might be construed to import a present grant, the case might be different. But none such are to be found. If this claim is to be confirmed, every provisional license or permission temporarily to occupy land must be held to constitute an equitable title, provided the claimant has availed himself of the permission—a ruling which would astonish no one more than the old inhabitants of the country, by whom the importance of obtaining a "title" from the governor was well understood. For aught we know, Pio Pico, when the petition was subsequently presented, found it inexpedient to grant the land; and if the claimant, under a mere permission to occupy it with his cattle, has a house upon it, and for two years omitted any effort to procure a title, he must attribute the loss of the land to his own neglect.

Such was the view taken of this claim by the board, by whom it was unanimously rejected, and in that decision I concur.

[NOTE. The board of commissioners unanimously rejected the claim, from which decision Garcia, the claimant, appealed to the district court. There the judgment of the board was reversed on a division of opinion, Hoffman, District Judge, concurring with the board as above, and McAllister, Circuit Judge, deciding in favor of the claimant, and a decree was entered confirming the claim, from which an appeal was taken to the supreme court, where the decree of the district court was reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the petition, Mr. Justice Catron delivering the opinion. 22 How. Case No. 5,216.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1869.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—THE APPLICATION—RIGHTS OF CORPORATIONS—MEMBERS.

1. By section 12 of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 93] certain causes pending in the state courts can be removed into the circuit court for trial within the same district, and the act provides that the causes shall then proceed in the same manner as if they had been brought by original process.

2. By section 3 of the act of March 2, 1833 [4 Stat. 633], federal officers, or other persons, against whom any suit or prosecution was commenced in a state court, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or on account of any title or authority set up or claimed by such officer, under such federal law, might transfer the cause into the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which the defendant was served with process.

3. Section 2 of the act of July 27, 1868 [15 Stat. 227], provides "that any corporation or any member thereof, other than a banking corporation organized under a law of the United States, which suit at law has been, or may be, commenced in any court other than a circuit or district court of the United States, for any liability, or alleged liability, of such corporation, or any member thereof, as such member, may have such suit removed from the court in which it may be pending, to the proper circuit or district court of the United States."

4. Application for such removal must be by petition, and the petition may be filed either before or after issue joined, and must state that defendants have a defence under or by virtue of the constitution, or some treaty or law of the United States, and must offer sufficient surety for entering in such court, on the first day of the next session, copies of all process, pleadings, testimony, and other proceedings, and for doing such other appropriate acts as are required by the act to which that of July 27, 1868, is supplementary.

5. Considered grammatically, the word "which," in the clause, "any corporation, or member thereof, against which a suit has been or may be commenced," should refer only to the corporation; but the statements required to be made in the petition, as to the nature and character of the defence, which would justify the removal, indicate that such was not the intention of congress.

6. The clause in question cannot be admitted to apply to suit against any such corporation for any liability, or alleged liability, of any member of it.

7. The right of redress for acts of any member of a corporation is not founded upon any liability of the member, but upon the original liability of the corporation, which is created by the acts of the member in their behalf.

8. The word "which," in the clause referred to, must be considered as the antecedent of the word "member," as well as of the word "corporation," and the whole section be construed distributively, so that the several provisions respecting the removal of the suit shall be equally applicable, whether the suit removed be one against the corporation, or one where a member of the corporation is sued as liable for the debt or other obligation of the corporation.

9. When the corporation is defendant, the petition for removal is filed in their behalf; when the suit is against a member, on the ground that he is personally liable, he may file the petition, and claim to have the cause removed.

10. The true meaning of the alternative clause of the sentence is, that a member of a corporation, when sued as such for the debt of the corporation, has the same right of removal of the cause as the corporation would have had if they had been sued.

11. It would be contrary to any analogy, that a suit brought against a corporation could be removed by a member, not otherwise a party to the suit, without the consent of the corporation, and merely because he was such member.

12. The defendant in this case, not being sued for any liability as being a member of the Union Pacific R. R. Co., but for his alleged misuse of the funds of the company, and for his fraudulent acts as vice-president of the company, and not by reason of his membership of the corporation, his petition under the act of congress referred to makes no case for removal, and petition was denied.

In equity. Petition for removal of two suits [by Isaac P. H. Gard and others against Thomas C. Durant and others], from the supreme court of Rhode Island to the circuit court, under the act of July 27, 1868.

These suits were commenced in the supreme court of the state, and Thomas C. Durant, the first named respondent, having duly entered his appearance in that court, claimed that he had a right to remove the said causes into the circuit court of the United States for this district, because as he alleged in his petition addressed to that court, the respective suits were commenced against him for an alleged liability of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which was not a banking corporation, and was organized under a law of the United States, and also for an alleged liability of the petitioner as a member of said corporation, or as an officer thereof, and that he had a defence to said suits arising under and by virtue of the constitution of the United States, or of a treaty or law of the United States in that behalf made and provided. The pendency of the suits was not controverted, nor was it denied that the petition was duly verified by oath, nor that it was in all other respects in due form. Sufficient surety was offered by the petitioner for entering in such court, on the first day of its then next session, copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in said suits, and for doing such other appropriate acts as are required by law in such cases; and the prayer of the petition was that the court would pass an order accepting such surety, and proceed no further in said suits. But the supreme court of the said state refused to grant the prayer of the petition, and placed their refusal chiefly upon the ground, that some of the respondents did not concur in making the request. The application was filed in this court on the 19th of November, 1868. The respondent corporation objected to the removal of the causes as prayed for by the petitioner. The respondents in the first bill of complaint were the petitioner, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and the Credit Mobilier, a corporation created by the legislature of the state of Pennsylvania.

Among other things the bill of complaint alleged that the petitioner was the vice president of the railroad company, and that he was the original managing agent and officer thereof, and that he controlled the funds and business of the corporation; that he was also president of the Credit Mobilier, and that he also controlled the funds and the business of that corporation; that certain officers of the said railroad company paid him, as such vice-president, large sums of money, and that he, as such vice-president, disbursed the same as if for the railroad company, but really for himself and in fraud of the corporation; that he, as an officer of said railroad company, also invested in the Credit Mobilier, in his own name, the moneys so received by him, and which belonged to the said railroad company; and that said company ought of right to have the stock in the Credit Mobilier which the petitioner purchased with their money in his own name; that the railroad company neglected and refused to prosecute these claims against the petitioner, and that he, the complainant, being a large stockholder in both of those corporations, was obliged, in order to obtain redress, to proceed against the petitioner in his own name, making the said corporations parties respondents as allowed in equity suits. The prayer of the bill of complaint was, that the petitioner might account to the corporation for all the moneys so received by him belonging to the railroad company, and fraudulently converted by him to his own use, and that he might be decreed to hold the said shares in the Credit Mobilier, so purchased by him for the railroad company, and for an injunction. The parties respondent in the second bill of complaint were the petitioner, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Credit Mobilier, and certain persons, parties, to ascertain contract made with the railroad company for the benefit of the stockholders of the other corporation; that the Credit Mobilier earned large profits in that contract, which were paid in money and in the stock and bonds of the railroad company, standing in the name of the petitioner; and that the Credit Mobilier, and the complainant as one of its stockholders, were entitled to a lien upon that stock and the said bonds; and that they were entitled to a decree to that effect, to prevent the misapplication of the fund, and for an account and for an injunction.

Charles Tracy, for defendant and petitioner.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Provision was made by section 12 of the judiciary act for the removal of certain causes pending in the state courts into the circuit court for trial within the same district, and the directions were that the cause should then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process. 1 Stat. 93.

Federal officers, or other persons also, against whom any suit or prosecution was commenced in a court of any state, for or on account of any act done under the revenue laws of the United States, or under color thereof, or for or on account of any right, title, or authority set up or claimed by such officer or other person under any such federal law, might also, by section 3 of the act of March 2, 1833, transfer the same into the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which the defendant in such suit or prosecution was served with process, in the manner and through the proceedings therein mentioned and described. 4 Stat. 633.

Special provision is also made by section 2 of the act of July 27, 1868, "that any corporation, or any member thereof, other than a banking corporation organized under a law of the United States, and against which a suit at law or equity has or may be commenced in any court other than a circuit or district court of the United States, for any liability or alleged liability of such corporation, or any member thereof, as such member, may have such suit removed from the court in which it may be pending to the proper circuit or district court of the United States." 15 Stat. 227.

Strangely expressed as the section is, it is matter of some doubt as to what congress intended, and what they have accomplished by the provision. Nothing contained in section 1 affords any aid in ascertaining the meaning of section 2, as section 1 merely provides that the United States may prosecute writs of error from the circuit court to the district court, and appeals from the district court to the circuit court, without giving security, as previously provided in respect to writs of error and appeals returnable to the supreme court. 12 Stat. 657.

Application for such removal must be made by petition; but the petition may be filed either before or after issue joined, and it must state that the defendants have a defence arising under or by virtue of the constitution, or some treaty or law of the United States, and the defendants must offer good and sufficient surety for entering in such court, on the first day of its then next session, copies of all process, pleadings, depositions, testimony and other proceedings in said suit, and for doing such other appropriate acts as are required to be done by the act to which this one is supplementary. 12 Stat. 657.

Much of the difficulty in the case arises from the first clause in the section under consideration, which enacts that any corporation, or any member thereof, against which a suit has been or may be commenced, &c., may have such suit removed. Evidently the petition for removal must be filed by the defendant in the suit, but the question is whether the defendant is either the corporation or any member thereof, or only the corporation organized under a law of the United States. The language of the act is "any corporation, or any member thereof, against which a suit has been or may be commenced." Does the word "which" refer only to the organized corporation, or does it refer both to the corporation and to any member thereof, as the language, taken literally, seems to imply?

Considered grammatically, the word "which" should be restricted to the corporation, and yet the latter clause of the section pretty clearly indicates that such was not the intention of congress, as appears from the statements required to be made in the petition as to the nature and character of the defence which would justify the removal, as well as from the nature and character of the suit. By the language of the section, the suit must be one for a liability or alleged liability of the corporation or "any member thereof" as such member, and the defence must be one arising under or by virtue of the constitution or any treaty or law of congress.

No one doubts that a suit may be prosecuted against a corporation for its own liabilities, but it is past comprehension how a suit can be sustained against a corporation for the liability of one of its members.

Laws which subject a corporation to accountability for the conduct and acts of its members, as such, make the corporation itself liable, and a prosecution therefor would not be based on any liability of the member, but upon the liability of the corporation arising from the conduct and acts of the member as the agent of the corporation. Viewed in the light of these suggestions, it cannot be admitted that the provision in question was intended to apply to suits against any such corporation, for any liability or alleged liability of any member of the corporation.

Incorporated companies are made accountable for the acts and conduct of their members, when the members are acting on behalf of the corporation and by its authority, because their acts in that state of the case become the acts of the corporation itself. Redress for such acts, against the corporation, however, is not sustained, and does not depend upon any liability of the member, but upon the original liability of the corporation, created by the acts and doings of the member in their behalf.

Consonant with these views, the word "which" must be considered as the antecedent of the word "member," as well as the antecedent of the word "corporation," and the whole section must be construed distributively, so that the several provisions respecting the removal of the suit from the state court to the proper circuit or district courts shall be equally applicable, whether the suit pending in the state court be one against the corporation described in the section, answering for its own liabilities, or one where a member of such corporation is sued upon the ground that he is personally liable for the debt or other obligation of the corporation. When the corporation is the defendant, the petition for the removal must be filed in their behalf, but when the pending suit is brought against a member of the corporation upon the ground that he is personally liable for the debt of the corporation, he, as the defendant in the suit, may file the petition and claim to have the cause removed.

Statutes making the members of a corporation liable in certain contingencies for the debts of the corporation, in whole or in part, are familiar to the courts in all the states, and the true meaning of the alternative clause of the sentence is, that any member of the corporation, when sued as such member for the debt of the corporation, may have the same right to remove the cause into the proper circuit or district courts as the corporation would have had if they had been sued for the same debt. Construed in this way, the provision is a reasonable one, but it would be contrary to any analogy of the law to hold that a member of a corporation, by reason of his membership, might remove a suit brought against a corporation, without their consent, to which he was not otherwise a party than as a member of the incorporated company.

Control belongs to the corporation by the general rules of law, and it is believed that no example can be found where a legislature ever authorized a single member of an incorporated company to take the management of a suit against the company out of the hands of the corporation and of its directors, unless it were in pursuance of a decree in chancery, or other regular judicial proceeding. Such a rule of law, if admitted, would be productive of such great injury and wrong to the other members of the corporation and other parties interested, that the construction ought not to be adopted unless it is compelled by the most direct and positive language of the legislative department, which certainly is not the case in the provision now under consideration; on the contrary, the succeeding clause of the same sentence, "or any member thereof, as such member," affords a strong ground to conclude that such was not the intention of congress. Omit these words from the section, and it would read "any corporation or any member thereof . . . against which a suit at law or equity has been or may be commenced . . . for any liability or alleged liability of such corporation . . . may have such suits removed in the manner therein prescribed." If such had been the terms of the section, it is plain that it would have authorized any member of a corporation, as well as the corporation, to file the petition for the removal of the suit, but the words "any member thereof, as such member," are superadded to that clause of the sentence which describes the nature and character of the suit or suits to be removed, and it is quite clear that the sentence, taken as a whole, indicates that more than one description of suit is embraced in the provision, and that the intention of congress was not such as is supposed by the petitioner in the case.

Examined in the light of these suggestions, the better opinion is, that congress intended that suits against a corporation should be controlled by the corporation, but that any member of a corporation, when sued, as such member, in a state court for any liability or alleged liability of the corporation, might himself petition and have the suit removed into the proper circuit or district courts of the United States.

Guided by this construction of the provision in question, it will only be necessary to recur to the nature and character of the alleged liability of the petitioner, as set forth in the respective bills of complaint to show what disposition must be made of the petition. He is not sued, in either suit, for any liability or alleged liability by reason of his being a member of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. Neither of the claims, as alleged against him by the respective bills of complaint, is as a member of that corporation, but both are for his own alleged misconduct, and mismanagement of the funds of the company as an agent and officer of the same; and his liability as therein set forth is by reason of his own fraudulent conduct in his position as vice-president of the company, and not by reason of the fact that he is a member of the corporation. Assuming the true construction of the act to be as before explained, he does not present his case, as exhibited in his petition, as falling within the provisions of the act of congress on which he relies, and the petition makes no valid case for the removal of the suits.

Suppose that the facts were otherwise, and that the claims against the petitioner, as set forth in the respective bills of complaint, are for an alleged liability on his part as a member of the corporation, still the result in this case must be the same, as the petitioner is the only defendant requesting the suit to be removed, who under any circumstances could file such a petition, as the Union Pacific Railroad Company refuses to join in the petition, and protests against the removal of the suits. Undoubtedly the petitioner might claim to have the suits removed if he was the sole defendant, but he is joined with the railroad company, which protests against the removal, and with the Credit Mobilier, a corporation created by the state of Pennsylvania, and consequently it is not a corporation organized under the laws of the United States. 15 Stat. 227.

Such being the facts, the circuit court here has no jurisdiction of the case presented in the petition, as only one of the defendants requests the removal.

Causes pending in the state courts could never be removed by the defendants into the circuit courts, unless all the defendants joined in the request, except as provided in the act of July 27, 1866, which it is conceded has no application to the case before the court. 14 Stat. 306.

Prior to that act of congress, the rule was fully established that the removal of a suit from a state court to the circuit court could not be ordered unless all the defendants joined in the petition for the removal, and there is nothing contained in the second section of the act under consideration which can afford any justification for a departure from that well-established rule.

The express ruling of the court in the case of Beardsley v. Torrey [Case No. 1,190], was that the circuit court could not take cognizance of a suit, in a cause removed from a state court, where it appeared that one of the defendants had not joined in the petition for the same, into the circuit court, for the reason that it was not competent for one defendant to remove the cause without the consent of all the others. Precisely the same doctrine was laid down in the case of Smith v. Rines [Id. 13,100], and in the case of Ward v. Arredondo [Id. 17,148],—which cases are sufficient to show that the practice under the judiciary act was all one way. Kitchen v. Strawbridge [Id. 7,854].

Convenience is the principal argument in support of the opposite theory; but that argument was urged upon the court in the case of Beardsley v. Torrey [supra], and the reply then given to the argument is all that need be given at the present time, which was that the judiciary must execute the laws as they were passed, and the court cannot proceed upon the grounds of expediency.

Prayer of the petition for removal denied.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — SUBSEQUENT MOTION TO DISCHARGE ATTACHMENT—PRIOR HEARING IN STATE COURT.

1. After a cause is removed from a state court to the circuit court of the United States, the latter court has the power, where such a practice is authorized by the state law, to entertain a motion to dissolve an attachment or discharge the attached property.

2. The circuit court may, in such case, in the exercise of a sound discretion and in furtherance of justice, hear such a motion, although a similar motion was made and overruled in the state court, prior to the removal of the cause.

[Cited in Claflin v. Steinberg, Case No. 2,777; Bates v. Days, 11 Fed. 530.]

This action was originally brought in one of the state courts, and removed here by the plaintiff under the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558). The action was commenced by the attachment of goods pursuant to the statutes of the state. The ground of the attachment was an alleged fraudulent disposition of his property by the defendant. In the state court and under the practice therein (authorized as counsel conceded by the statutes of the state) the defendant had, prior to the application for the removal, made a motion to dissolve the attachment and discharge the attached property from the levy under the writ. Upon this motion both parties took testimony at large in the form of affidavits, and the motion was thereon submitted to the state court and overruled. Copies of these affidavits are on file and entered with the other papers pertaining to the case. The plaintiff subsequently removed the cause to this court, and has on file a motion for a continuance till the next term, based upon the absence of material witnesses to prove its corporate character and the justice of its demands. The defendant resists the motion for a continuance (because the suit ties up a large amount of property) unless the court will consider a motion he makes here, and which is in effect the same motion made in the state court, viz.: "to dissolve the attachment and discharge the attached property." He renews the same motion made in the state courts, and offers to submit it either upon the affidavits taken therein or upon new or additional affidavits to be produced by the parties. It is this motion which was argued to the court. The plaintiff contended that the court had no power to entertain it. The defendant maintained that the court had the power, and, under the circumstances, ought to exercise it.

Mr. Wakely, for plaintiff.

Mr. Redick, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This cause was removed by the plaintiff to this court under the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 558), amendatory in terms of the act of July 27, 1866 (Id. 306). It was commenced in the state court by a writ of attachment issued pursuant to the statutes of the state and by rule adopted in this court. Prior to the transfer, the defendant had moved to have the attachment dissolved or property attached discharged; upon this motion both parties took all the testimony they deemed essential, and submitted the question to the decision of the state court. This question was one of fact, viz: whether the defendant was guilty of the fraudulent act or purpose charged against him as the ground for the attachment. The court denied the motion, and subsequently the cause was transferred to this court, where the same motion was renewed, or a new motion of a similar character made, which the defendant offers to submit, either upon the former affidavits, or upon new, or upon additional affidavits, as the plaintiff may elect, or the court may order.

The first question made by counsel is whether this court, after a cause is removed to it, has the power in any case to entertain such a motion. If so, the next question made is, whether, under the circumstances, it ought to exercise it in this case.

That the court has the power to entertain such a motion, does not, it seems to me, admit of reasonable doubt, it being conceded that such a motion may be rightfully made in the state court, under the state practice, which by adoption is also the practice of this court. By the express provision of the act of congress, the cause is to proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally brought here; the attachment is to hold "in the same manner as by the laws of the state it would have been holden to answer final judgment, had it been rendered by the court in which the suit was commenced." And the power of the circuit court to "set aside or dissolve" an attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, is recognized, and the right of the opposite party to indemnity obligations filed in the state courts, expressly declared.

The intention of these provisions manifestly is to put this court, in administering such remedies, in the place of the state court and clothe it with its powers. Conceding that such a motion is authorized by the state law and practice, there can be but little doubt, under the abovementioned acts of congress and the rules of the court adopting the state statutes relating to attachments and to practice, that if no such motion had ever been made in the state court, and could have been made there had the cause remained, it could equally be made here upon its removal. Hence the right to make, and the power to hear, such a motion may exist after the cause has been transferred.

Assuming the power to exist, ought it in this case to be exercised? This is a matter which rests in the sound discretion of the court, under the special circumstances of the particular case. A decision on a motion in a pending suit is not res judicata so as to conclude the parties and the court from again re-opening the matter, in a subsequent stage of the cause.

As the parties were fully heard upon the merits of the motion in the state court, certainly there ought to be some good reason why this court should listen favorably to an application for a new hearing. I should myself in such a case feel a strong disinclination to sit in review upon the decision of the state court, when it was proposed to submit the matter upon the same evidence and no other.

Considering the special circumstances of this case, among which is one that the plaintiff removed the action after it stood for trial in the state court, thus causing delay, and is now asking for a continuance; that he has a large amount of property attached, to the great inconvenience and probable damage of the defendant, who is ready for trial. the court will make this order on the pending motion, to-wit: If the plaintiff is ready for trial at this term, the defendant's motion to discharge the attached property will be denied; otherwise it will be entertained, and both parties will be at liberty to produce additional affidavits, and be heard de novo upon the merits of the motion.

Ordered accordingly.

That suit commenced by attachment may be removed and attachment remain in force, see Barney v. Globe Bank [Case No. 1,031]; Clarke v. Chase [Id. 2,845]; McLeod v. Duncan [Id. 8,898].

Case No. 5,218.

GARDENER v. WAGNER et al.

[Baldw. 454.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1830.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—PERMISSION TO "OCCUPY AND DWELL" IN A HOUSE—RENTS, ISSUES, AND PROFITS.

1. In construing a will we must first look to the particular clause in question, at the same time taking into our view the whole instrument, endeavouring to give meaning and effect to every part of it.

2. Testator devised to his daughter G. two houses and lots, "she permitting, at the same time, her mother to occupy and dwell in the better of them for and during her natural life." This is not a grant of the beneficial interest in the house to the mother, so that she may either occupy it herself or let it to another, receiving from it the rents it produces. It is a permission to her to live and reside in the house, and entitles her to no other use and enjoyment of it.

3. The executors of the mother were ordered to account for the rents, issues and profits received by her from the house, allowing her for expenditures for repairs, &c., and provided that the account should not extend back beyond six years from the filing of the bill.

[Cited in Taylor v. Benham, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 263.]

This suit [brought by Grace Gardener, a citizen of Louisiana, against William Wagner and Jacob Wagner, citizens of Pennsylvania, executors of Grace Wagner, deceased] arose on the will of Jacob Wagner, in the following words:

"In the name of God, amen. I, Jacob Wagner the elder, of the city of Philadelphia, cooper, being very sick and weak in body, but of perfect mind and sound memory, thanks be to God, calling to mind the mortality of my body, and knowing that it is appointed for all men once to die, do make and ordain this my last will and testament; that is to say, principally, and first of all, I give and recommend my soul into the hand of Almighty God that gave it, and my body I recommend to the earth, to be buried in decent Christian burial, at the discretion of my executors, nothing doubting but at the general resurrection I shall receive the same again by the mighty power of God. And as touching such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me in this life, I give, devise and dispose of it in the following manner and form: Unto my eldest son, Jacob, I do give and bequeath my two lots on Cherry alley, with the arrearages of ground rent due on the same, as also that one of my lots on Wagner's alley, which adjoins a certain lot now in the tenure of Henry Nagel. Unto my two eldest daughters, Elizabeth and Mary, that certain three story brick house in which I now live, and the lot or lots thereunto belonging, being twenty-eight feet in front on Moravian alley, with all the appurtenances, to hold jointly. Unto my son George Washington, my houses and lot next adjoining the aforesaid, with all the appurtenance thereunto belonging, together with my cooper shop, tools and utensils of my trade. 'Unto my daughter Grace, my two houses and lots situate in German street in the district of Southwark, she permitting at the same time her mother, Grace, to occupy and dwell in the better of them for and during her natural life.' Unto my youngest son, Peter, that certain corner house situate on the corner of Sassafras street and Wagner's alley, with the lot on which it stands; also two of my lots on Wagner's alley, and one of the two vacant lots on Sassafras street. Unto my youngest daughter, Margaret, that certain house and lot adjoining the aforesaid house on Sassafras street, the remaining vacant lot on Sassafras street, and the two remaining vacant lots on Wagner's alley. Excepting always, nevertheless, that my wife, Grace Wagner, receive one-third part of the profits and rents issuing out of all and every the aforesaid estates for and during the space of her natural life; and also that she receive the whole and all of the rents and profits issuing out of each child's estate, until such child shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, for the maintenance of my children and in lieu of her dower. Also, it is my will, that should any of my children unluckily die before they shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, then their share shall be divided in an equal proportion amongst the surviving children. Further, it is my will that my house and lot on Third street, my loan office certificates, my stock and my outstanding debts, be applied to the purpose of paying and discharging my debts, and the residue, if any, to be paid to my wife. Lastly, I do hereby appoint my beloved brother, John Wagner, and my faithful relative, Peter Knight, my executors, and my beloved wife, Grace, my executrix. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this thirtieth day of November in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety."

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry Baldwin, Circuit Judge.]

Demurrer.

The case was argued on the following agreement: "It is agreed that upon the pleadings in this case, the question to be submitted for the opinion of the court is, whether under the will of Jacob Wagner, who devised two houses in German street to his daughter Grace, 'she permitting, at the same time, her mother, Grace, to occupy and dwell in the better of them, for and during her natural life,' the executors of the mother, Grace, who did not herself live in the house designated in complainant's bill, but rented it to others, are liable to account for the rents she may have received. If the court shall be of the opinion that she had the right to receive the rents, then judgment to be entered, on the demurrer, for the defendants. If they shall be of opinion that the executors are bound to account, then the demurrer to be withdrawn, and the defendants to be at liberty to answer the bill. April 26th, 1831."

Mr. Wheeler, for complainant.

The mother had only a right of occupation. If she did not occupy the house, she had no right in it. 2 Bl. Comm. 157; Co. Litt. §§ 325, 328, 329; Crickmere v. Paterson, Cro. Eliz. 146; Wheeler v. Walker, 2 Conn. 201; 5 Serg. & R. 375.

Mr. Kittera, for respondents.

This part of the will is a devise in fee to the daughter of the testator, but to that devise a condition is annexed, "she permitting her mother," &c., but to the estate given to the mother no condition is annexed; conditions must be clearly expressed. The estate of the daughter could be defeated by a breach of the condition; but no intention appears in the will to restrict the estate of her mother, the widow of the testator. One-third of the profits and rents of all the estate is given to the widow for her life, and she is also to receive the whole of the rents and profits of each child's estate, until such child shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, for the maintenance of the children. The clause in question was intended for the benefit of the widow; there is no reason why the condition now contended for should be imposed upon her. The words of the will are, "to occupy and to dwell." "And" may be construed conjunctively or disjunctively, so as to carry into effect the intention of the testator. To occupy, does not mean to live in the house, to reside in it, but to have possession of it, by yourself, or by another for you and under your will and right. If it was a condition, there must be an entry to defeat the estate; if a limitation, it expires of course. Plowd. Comm. 542, tit. "Occupancy" defined; 8 Petersdf. 320. The mother did make her choice between the two houses. If Grace permitted her mother to receive the rents and profits of the house, it was a permission to occupy; and in case of the death of Grace, it would go subject to this incumbrance. If Grace's license was necessary, the intention might be defeated, as she might survive her mother. 4 Kent, Comm. 114, tit. "Doctrine of Conditions."

Mr. Wheeler, in reply.

If the daughter refused, the mother could have enforced her right; she has the fee, subject to her mother's right of occupancy. Her only remedy is to claim possession. Did not the testator clearly intend that his widow might elect which of the two houses she would occupy herself? she would live and dwell in? Is it necessary to change "and" for "or," to give effect to the intention? The occupancy of the house is given to herself, not to her and her assigns. The daughter is to permit the mother to occupy and dwell,

&c. This may make her a trustee for her mother. If the daughter should forfeit by refusal of this permission, the only effect would be that the mother could enjoy at once, and there would be a reversion to the heirs of the whole estate. Hamilton v. Elliott, 5 Serg. & R. 384; 2 Conn. 201; 2 Chit. R. 529. No election was made by the widow.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. The question in this case arises on the following devise in the will of Jacob Wagner. After giving certain lots to his son Jacob, and a house and lot to his two eldest daughters Elizabeth and Mary, the testator devises as follows: "Unto my daughter Grace, my two houses and lots, situate in German street, in the district of Southwark, she permitting, at the same time, her mother Grace, to occupy and dwell in the better of them, for and during her natural life." The mother of the devisee is now dead; and the devisee sets forth in her bill of complaint, "that she (the devisee) came of age on the —— day of October 1800; since which time, until her decease, which took place on the 1st of March 1829, the said Grace Wagner (her mother), under colour of right, under the first clause of the said Jacob, the father's will, as above recited, claimed and received the rents, issues and profits of the easternmost house, and deforced the complainant of the said house, without ever residing in the said house or either of them at all." The bill prays for a decree, ordering the executors of the said Grace Wagner deceased, to "file an account, stating what rents, issues and profits the said Grace Wagner received from the said house, and disclose what estate she left," and that the estate which she left may be made liable for the payment of the claim of the complainant; and that the said executors may be compelled to pay her the net amount of the rents, issues and profits received from the said house.

We must observe, that other houses and lots than those above mentioned are given and devised to other children of the testator; and after all, there is the following clause in the will, "excepting always, nevertheless, that my wife Grace Wagner receive one-third part of the rents and profits issuing out of all and every the aforesaid estates, for and during the space of her natural life; and also that she receive the whole and all of the rents and profits issuing out of each child's estate, until such child shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and in lieu of her dower." To this bill the defendant has demurred, which, together with an agreement of the parties, submits the question to the court, whether, on the facts stated, and the true construction of the will of Jacob Wagner, the complainant is entitled to the relief she prays for. The rules adopted, in equity and at law, for the interpretation of wills, are well settled, and entirely consistent with justice and common sense. We must look for the intention of the testator in the particular clause in question; at the same time taking into our view the whole instrument, with a reasonable endeavour to give meaning and effect to every part of it. In this case the inquiry is, whether the permission, enjoined upon Grace, the daughter, and attached to her legacy of two houses, to be given to her mother to occupy and dwell in the better of them, is a grant of the beneficial interest in the house to the mother during her life, so that she might, at her pleasure, either occupy and dwell in it herself, or give the occupancy to another, and receive in lieu of it, the rents and profits it would produce; or whether it is to be taken strictly as a permission to her to reside in the house, and to be entitled to no other use or enjoyment of it.

We first look at the terms of the grant—the expressions which the testator has chosen to manifest his intention. The houses are devised, in fee, to his daughter; but it is a condition, or rather an appendage to the gift, that she shall permit her mother to occupy and dwell in the better of them. There seems to be no ambiguity here. If the testator had used only the word "occupy," which signifies "to possess," the uncertainty would have been greater; but he adds, as if explanatory of his meaning, "and dwell." To dwell, is to inhabit; to live in a place; to reside; to have a habitation. It is then as if the testator had said, "she permitting her mother to live in the house—to have a habitation there." Could there have been any doubt if these terms had been used? The defendant is entirely conscious that this is the proper meaning of the clause as it stands in the will, and endeavours to avoid it by changing the phraseology, and turning "and" into "or;" or rather by expunging the one and introducing the other into its place. But what right have we to do this? It is true it may be done when it is necessary to carry into effect the clear and manifest intention of the testator. How does this necessity appear here? There is nothing incongruous or unreasonable in the plain and ordinary interpretation of the words as they now stand. To say that the intention was different, would be to go directly in opposition to the language he has adopted to express his intention—indeed it would be to assume the very matter that is in controversy.

In looking to other parts of this will, we not only find them in full accordance with this construction of the clause in question, but truly not reconcilable with any other. After making all the devises we have mentioned of houses and lots to his children, the testator limits the fullness of these gifts by excepting that his "wife, Grace Wagner, receive one third part of the rents and profits issuing out of all and every the aforesaid estates for and during the space of her natural life." This provision includes the two houses given to his daughter Grace, now in question. What do we collect to be the clear and consistent meaning of the testator from both clauses in his will? What was his design? Assuredly this: my wife shall have a third part of the rents and profits of all and every part of my real estate; but, as to one of the houses, if she shall choose to live or dwell in it, she shall be permitted so to do, and, in this manner, have the whole use or enjoyment of it; but if she shall decline this permission or privilege, then the offer of it becomes inefficacious, and she must resort to the other part of the will which gives her one-third of the rents of all and every of the houses and lots before devised to the children. She may take or reject the permission or privilege as it is offered, but she cannot alter or enlarge it. The construction contended for by the respondents would make the testator say, as to the house in question, that he gives his wife all the rents and profits issuing from it, or one-third of them, at her option, which is incongruous and absurd. To say to her, you may live in a certain house, or take one-third of the rents and profits it may produce, is intelligible; but to say, you may take all the rents, or one-third of them, at your election, is senseless, or so nearly so that it should not be imputed to a sane testator, if we can escape from it.

On the 26th of December, 1831, this cause came on for hearing on bill of demurrer and plea, and the court, after hearing the arguments of counsel, do award and decree, that the defendants account for the rents, issues and profits received by the said Grace Wagner from the house mentioned in the complainant's bill, subject to the payments and expenditures made by her for repairs or otherwise in relation to the same. And they further direct, that it be referred to the master to report an account to this court, provided, however, that said account shall not extend back beyond six years from the filing of the bill.

NOTE. Before the above order and decree was made, the following agreement, signed by the counsel of the parties respectively, was filed of record: "It is agreed, that if the court shall be of opinion that the testatrix had not a right to receive the rents of the house, in the complainant's bill mentioned, to her own use, but was bound to account to her daughter, they shall also decide for what period of time her executors are bound to account; and under their opinion the case shall be referred to the master of the court to take and state an account between the parties touching and concerning the rents, issues and profits received by the Grace Wagner from the house mentioned in the complainant's bill, and the payments and expenditures made by her for repairs or otherwise in relation to the same; and that the said master report the balance which, on said account, shall be found due from either party to the other; and that the said master have power to examine the parties and witnesses on oath, and to compel the production of books, documents and papers; and that further proceedings be reserved until the coming in of the said report."

GARDINER et al. v. HOWE.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1865.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT ON HIGH SEAS — AMERICAN VESSELS.

Where the defendant, an American citizen, had, without license, used the patented improvement of the plaintiff, on the high seas, on board an American vessel, held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages for such use of his invention the same as if it had taken place within the territory of the United States.

This was an action on the case [by Charles L. Gardiner and others against Thomas Howe] to recover damages for the alleged infringement of a patent right. At a previous term the parties went to trial upon the pleadings in the case, and the jury, under the instructions of the court, returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. At this time the defendant moved for a new trial, and alleged the following reasons: First, because of the misdirections of the court. Second, because the verdict was against the evidence, and the weight of evidence in the case. The patent was on an improvement in the sails of vessels. The defendant was owner of the bark Robert, and the master applied the patented improvement to one of the sails of the vessel, on her passage from Liverpool to New York. She was an American vessel, and commanded by an American master. The evidence showed that the improvement was applied to the sail on the high seas, and without the jurisdiction of the United States. Some of the statements of the witnesses tended to show that the master used the improvement but once, and never after the vessel arrived within the jurisdiction of the state of New York, but other statements of the same witnesses showed that the sail, with the patented invention still on it, remained on the vessel, and in a condition for use, even after the voyage was terminated, and while the vessel was at the wharf in her port of discharge. Evidence was also introduced to show that the defendant authorized the master to use the invention on his vessel, and clearly showed that he suffered the same to remain on the sail, after he had knowledge of its use, without giving any directions that it should be removed. The defendant contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, even if he proved the use of the patented improvement as alleged, because the case showed that the use was only on the high seas, and consequently, that it was not prohibited by the patent law. At the trial the court gave the two following instructions to the jury: First, that if the jury found that the use was continued into the port of destination, then the reasoning of the defendant would not apply. Second, that the position, in any view of the evidence, could not be sustained if they found the use was without license, as it was on an American vessel bound to an American port.

Samuel Snow, for plaintiffs.
F. A. Brooks, for defendant.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Reference is made by the defendant to the cases of Brown v. Duchesne [Case No. 2,004], and Id., 19 How. [60 U. S.] 183; but these cases do not apply where, as in this instance, the vessel where the act of infringement took place was American. Were it to be held that in cases like the present the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, patents for improvements in the tackle and machinery of vessels, or in their construction, would be valueless. The patent laws of the United States afford no protection to inventions beyond or outside of the jurisdiction of the United States; but this jurisdiction extends to the decks of American vessels on the high seas, as much as it does to all the territory of the country, and for many purposes is even more exclusive.

The motion for a new trial is entirely without merit, as the evidence shows that the plaintiff is clearly entitled to recover. Motion overruled. Judgment on the verdict.

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—PUBLICATION.

Official communications, passing between officers of the government, are privileged from disclosure on the ground of public policy. Neither the sending of such an official communication, nor retaining a copy thereof, amounts to a "publication" within the meaning of that term as used in the law of libel.

[This was an action of libel by Thomas H. Gardner against Ephraim F. Anderson.]

A. H. Hobbs, for plaintiff.
A. Stirling, Jr., U. S. Dist. Atty., George C. Maund, and Geo. H. Chandler, for defendant.

Before BOND, Circuit Judge, and GILES, District Judge.

Communications in writing passing between officers of the government, in the course of official duty, relating to the business of their offices, are privileged from disclosure, on the ground of public policy, and the production will not be compelled by courts of law or equity. Neither will secondary evidence of their contents be admissible, whether in the form of copies or of oral statement of witnesses who have read and recollected the same. Consequently, an official letter from an appraiser of merchandise to the secretary of the treasury, recommending a person for appointment as clerk in the appraiser's office, in place of one whose removal is recommended for inefficiency and bad conduct, is a privileged communication within the rule, and cannot be admitted in evidence to sustain an action for libel brought against the appraiser by the person whose removal is recommended. The mere sending to the secretary of the treasury by an officer of the customs, in the course of official duty, of a communication reflecting upon the character and conduct of a subordinate, is not such a publication as is essential to maintain an action for a libel.

The plaintiff in this case, who had been a clerk in the office of appraiser of merchandise, and was removed from office in June, 1873, brought an action of libel in a state court against the defendant, who was appraiser, alleging that he wrote to the secretary of the treasury a letter recommending the plaintiff's removal from his clerkship, and reflecting upon his official qualifications and conduct in such a way as to show malice, per quod he lost his office and suffered great damage. The suit was by the defendant removed upon a writ of certiorari to this court under section 643 of the Revised Statutes, and the plaintiff made an unsuccessful motion to remand the case to the state court for want of federal jurisdiction. Plea, not guilty, under the general issue.

Previous to the trial, the plaintiff, to prove the sending of the alleged libellous letter and its contents, issued a commission to examine at Washington the secretary of the treasury and the appointment clerk, who were summoned to produce before the commissioner the original letter or copy. The secretary declined to appear before the commissioner or to produce any paper or copy, and sent a letter to him to that effect. The appointment clerk who attended and was examined, by direction of the secretary, declined to produce any paper or to speak of the contents of any. Upon the return of the commission, to which the secretary's letter above mentioned was attached, the plaintiff took out a subpoena duces tecum for the secretary and the appointment clerk to appear at the trial. The secretary declined to attend, and directed the district attorney (who had assumed the defence of the case) to state his reasons to the court. Thereupon the plaintiff moved for a writ of attachment against the secretary for a contempt in not obeying the subpoena. This the court declined to grant, but advised the plaintiff to apply to the secretary for a copy of the alleged letter, and, for this purpose, the case was postponed for a few weeks. Subsequently, the trial being resumed, and the jury sworn, the plaintiff, to lay the foundation for secondary evidence, produced a letter from the secretary in reply to his application for a copy of the alleged communication which was the cause of action.

The secretary's letter stated that, at the date of the alleged letter, the defendant was appraiser of merchandise, and any communications from him to the department were official in their nature, confidential and protected from disclosure, and he, the secretary, was not at liberty to furnish a copy of the same to enable the plaintiff to maintain an action against a late appraiser, whose defence the government had assumed. The plaintiff then called as a witness a clerk in the appraiser's office who had charge of the official letter-copying book in June, 1873, who testified that about that time he wrote, at the dictation of the defendant, a letter to the secretary of the treasury relative to the removal of the plaintiff from office. The letter was signed by the defendant as appraiser, and copied in the letter-book. It was not there now; a leaf was missing from the book, probably that containing the letter. Witness said he thought he could state the substance of the letter, and on being asked by the plaintiff to do so, the defendant objected, first, because the witness was not sure he could state the whole substance, and second, because the letter was a privileged communication, and protected from disclosure on grounds of public policy.

After full argument, the court decided that the witness' recollection was not sufficient, as the jury was entitled to have the whole letter repeated to them, if any, and the part omitted might qualify or explain the part repeated. And further, that the communication was in its nature an official communication, relating to public business, which it was sought to prove by means of a witness whose only knowledge of it was derived from his official employment, which was contrary to public policy and not to be permitted. The plaintiff then sought to prove by his own testimony that he saw the letter in question at the treasury department after his removal, by permission of the secretary, and could state its contents; but further offered to prove by a witness who was at one time a clerk in the appraiser's office, that while he was such clerk he read a copy of the said letter from the official letter-copy book in the office, and could repeat its contents. The court ruled that neither the sending of such a letter to the secretary, nor retaining a copy thereof in a letter book kept in the appraiser's office, amounted to a "publication" within the meaning of that term as used in the law of libel; that as the communication was official and confidential, written in the discharge of a public duty, it could not be said to be published by the defendant, by merely sending it to the officer to whom it was addressed, and if there was no evidence of publication beyond such sending, the plaintiff must fail at the outset of his case, and no evidence of the contents of the alleged libel can be admitted until after proof of technical publication. The plaintiff not being prepared with such proof, took exceptions to these rulings, and there was a verdict for defendant.

TRADE-MARK—INFRINGEMENT.

[A trade-mark for seamless bags, consisting of the word "Stark" over a semicircular arch with the letter A below, is infringed by a like device, except that the word "Star" is substituted for "Stark."]

The plaintiffs, owners of the Stark Mills, manufactured seamless bags bearing the word "Stark" over a semicircular arch with the letter A below. The defendants made and sold similar goods with the word "Star" over a semicircular arch with the letter A below.

THE COURT enjoined the defendants, and a jury subsequently gave a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for damages.

[Blatchf. & H. 356.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 5, 1833.

SEAMEN — INSUBORDINATION — PUNISHMENT—IMPRISONMENT—SEPARATE DEFENSES IN ACTION FOR JOINT TORT.

1. Where a seaman openly manifests insubordination, it is the duty of the master to apply such correction as may be required to subdue him; and, if there does not appear to have been any cruelty or needless severity, the court will not undertake to measure the degree of punishment which was necessary.

2. An action against a mate by a seaman, for false imprisonment, will not lie, where the imprisonment was ordered by the master through the advice and request of the mate.

3. Where, in an action against two parties, for a joint tort, the respondents put in separate answers, each respondent must rely for his defence upon his own answer and the proofs, without reference to the answer of the other respondent; but, unless the answers are excepted to by the libellant, for insufficiency or uncertainty, they will be liberally construed.

4. A single act of insubordination on the part of a seaman, particularly if it be only a refusal to give himself up to be imprisoned, cannot be considered as mutinous, or as justifying the imprisonment itself.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and Francis Howland, Esq.]

This was a libel in personam, by a seaman [Garrett S. Gardner] against [Anson Bibbins and Samuel Hurry] the master and mate of the schooner Nestor. As the Nestor was getting under weigh in the port of Gibraltar, the libellant was ordered by the master to let go the studding-sail halyards, but he let go another rope. The master, thereupon, asked him, if he did not know the studding-sail halyards yet; and the libellant replied, in an insolent manner, that he did, and had known them before he came on board that vessel. Thereupon, as the libel alleged, the mate, who was near, seized a handspike, and aimed a blow at his head, which was avoided by his dodging under the bow of the long-boat, but he received a severe blow from it on his shoulder, which fractured the bone. This charge was explicitly denied by the mate. The master then struck the libellant with a rope, and the libellant declared, that if he struck him again, he would knock him down. The master, thereupon, continued the chastisement until he had inflicted a number of blows. To a further charge of false imprisonment in the port of Laguna, the answer of the master alleged, that one of the seamen, by the name of Jay, had caused disorder and disturbance on board the vessel; that the master went on shore to consult the consul, and to obtain soldiers to assist in quelling the disturbance and compelling subordination; that, when the master returned on board, he ordered Jay and the libellant to come up out of the forecastle, which they both refused to do, saying they would not come up unless compelled by the soldiers; that the soldiers then came forward and ordered them up, and into the boat, and they were taken on shore; and that the master and mate, on account of such mutinous conduct, deemed it necessary, for their own safety and that of the crew, that these men should be removed from the vessel. The answer of the mate to this charge, set forth disorderly and mutinous conduct on the part of the libellant, during the absence of the master from the vessel to procure the soldiers on shore to remove Jay, and justified, upon this ground, his advice to the master to remove the libellant together with Jay. The evidence is sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the court.

Henry M. Western, for libellant.
Walter Edwards, for respondents.

BETTS, District Judge. The only instance in which both of the respondents united in committing any of the torts charged in the libel was at Gibraltar. The assault charged in the libel is denied by the answers, and the proofs upon this point are as contradictory as the pleadings. The deposition of Jay, one of the seamen on board the schooner, supports the allegations of the libel in every material particular. He says that he saw two blows given by the mate with the handspike, and saw the libellant stagger under them against the boat, and saw the master fall upon him before he had recovered himself, and flog him severely with a gasket. On the other hand, two other seamen, Clark and Stewart, support the representation of the occurrence which is given by the answers. Clark says, that the libellant replied to the master, on being chided for not knowing his duty, "I know more than you do about reeving studding-sail halyards, and you can't tell me anything about it"; that the master thereupon came forward and gave him two or three blows with the gasket, whereupon the libellant said, that if he struck again he would knock him down; and that the master then continued flogging the libellant till he had given him seven or eight blows. Both of these witnesses say, that the mate did not strike the libellant at the time, and Clark says, that the long-boat was not on deck, but was overboard. It is also to be remarked, that Matthews, another witness for the libellant, does not, in the version he gives of the affray, support Jay or the libel. He was standing by, and, if he did not see the whole affair, the account he gives of what passed in his presence stands in contradiction to the representations of Jay. He says, that after the libellant's answer to the master's reproof, the mate turned around and asked the master if he heard what reply the libellant had given him, and added: "If I was you, I would give him a flogging"; upon which, the master came forward and took a gasket and flogged the libellant; that the mate stood by with a heaver in his hand, and said to the libellant, "If you attempt to strike the captain, I will knock you down directly," but the witness did not see him strike or make a blow with the heaver; that the libellant said to the master, whilst being flogged by him, "If you strike me again, I will let you have it"; and that the master made a motion to strike him again, and the libellant to go towards the master, as if for fight, when the mate seized him by the shoulders to prevent his advance upon the master, and tore his shirt.

The testimony of Jay thus stands contradicted by the answers of both of the respondents, and by the testimony of three witnesses, who had the same opportunity to see the affray that he had. Upon this proof, I must consider the charge against the mate, of having struck the libellant with a handspike, as entirely discredited and overthrown.

This court has too frequently recognised the principle, that no unnecessary severity or oppression, by officers towards seamen, will receive countenance here, to render it necessary now to enlarge upon the subject. Still less, will the court interfere with the prompt and efficient exercise, on the part of the officers, of every power necessary to enforce strict discipline and subordination on ship board. In the use of this power, occasional excesses are no doubt committed. Men give way to transports of passion, or, forgetful of the rights of those under their authority, and of their own responsibility, gratify their resentment or pride of power by punishing without reason or commiseration. For occurrences of that character, this court will exercise, with an energy equal to the exigency, its corrective and remedial powers. It will punish the wrong and remunerate the injured, with a free and strong hand. The transaction at Gibraltar was, according to the decided preponderance of proof, no abuse of authority on the part of the master. The Agincourt, 1 Hagg. Adm. 271. The court will not attempt to adjust the degree of correction which the impertinence and contumacy of the libellant to the master's reproof deserved. Thorne v. White [Case No. 13,989]. There is no evidence that it was harsh in manner or excessive in degree, and both its continuance and its severity were justly provoked by the libellant, in threatening to knock the master down. After that open manifestation of insubordination, and of a disposition to commit violence upon the master, it was his duty to apply a correction of sufficient vigor to subdue the refractoriness or mutinous spirit of the libellant. No more than that appears to have been done, and both of the respondents are therefore acquitted of this charge.

The remaining charge is that of false imprisonment at Laguna. Neither the testimony nor the allegation in the libel connects the mate with that, so far as to render him liable to an action. It will not be necessary to consider how far one person may be made answerable for acts of violence committed by another at his instance or instigation, when he does not personally apply force or threats, inasmuch as, in this case, the instigation, if any, was from an inferior to a superior officer; and the suggestion of the mate merely led to an order or command from the master, to which the libellant quietly submitted, without the exercise of force or constraint. The subsequent detention of the libellant at Laguna, and not the act in which the mate participated, was the forcible restraint which constituted false imprisonment, so far as the case made by the pleadings and proofs affects the mate. But the mate could have had no power in the matter after the libellant left the vessel, and it must have depended solely upon the master, whether his confinement should be continued, or whether he should be received on board again. It seems to me, that this branch of the libel makes no case against the mate; and, without adverting to the answer and the proofs adduced in support of it, and which supply a full defence in this particular, I must pronounce for a dismissal of the libel, in all its parts, as to the mate, with costs.

The next consideration is, how far the master is affected by this charge. The pleadings and the testimony of the different witnesses give a somewhat entangled statement of the circumstances leading to the taking of the libellant away from the vessel. It is difficult to discriminate the parts of this answer which the master gives upon his own knowledge. The answer is so drawn as to leave it somewhat indistinct, whether the relation of the transactions is exclusively that of the mate, or whether the master is also to be understood as concurring in the statement of what occurred after he returned on board with the soldiers. It does not appear whether the libellant manifested any spirit of insubordination in presence of the master. Jay asserts, that he and the libellant went peaceably and directly into the boat, and ashore, when ordered by the soldiers. The master is not alleged to have interfered at all, further than to bring the soldiers on board. Matthews says, that the master ordered the soldiers to take both the libellant and Jay ashore. Stewart says, that the master went for the guard on account of Jay; that, as he was shoving off from the vessel, the libellant called out to him, "If you take one, you will take both of us," meaning himself and Jay; that, when the soldiers came on board, the mate ordered the men up out of the forecastle, but both said they would not come for him, unless the soldiers came for them; and that the soldiers went below, and had difficulty in getting them out, but, at last, they both came up, and went directly into the boat; and, as they pushed from the vessel, took off their hats and gave three cheers. Clark says, that the libellant called out to the master, as he was going on shore, "If you take one, you will take both"; that, when the guard came on board, and took Jay, the libellant again made the same remark, and thereupon the guard took him also; and that it was his own notion, and he went ashore of his own accord. This witness says he did not hear the master tell the guard to take the libellant, and did not understand that the master intended to send him ashore.

Although the testimony of the witnesses seems to make the leaving the ship the voluntary act of the libellant, without any constraint on the part of the master, yet the answer puts it on a different footing. That assumes that he was sent on shore by the master, in consequence of his insubordinate and mutinous conduct, either as witnessed by the master or as related to him by the mate. It must, accordingly, be considered, that the libellant was not merely permitted to go on shore with his comrade, but that he was forcibly sent out of the vessel, under arrest, and in charge of a guard of soldiers. The inquiry, then is, whether it was proper, for the support of discipline and subordination on board the ship, to resort to this measure. The answer of the mate cannot be read on the part of the master, and the matters therein set up by the mate solely, which might afford a justification, cannot be regarded as in proof on this branch of the case. We must, accordingly, look to the individual answer of the master and to the proofs, to ascertain what justification he had for his proceedings. As before observed, the answer is rather indistinct in this particular; but, as it was the right of the libellant to compel the master to give an exact and specific answer to the matters charged in the libel, and, as he has acquiesced in that filed by the master as sufficient, the court will be disposed to give all reasonable effect to it, by a liberal construction of its terms. Under this principle, I shall consider every fact alleged to have occurred, where the master might have witnessed it, to be averred by him on his personal knowledge, equally with the mate. The broad allegation upon which the imprisonment is justified is, that the master, in consequence of the mutinous conduct of the libellant and Jay, deemed it necessary to remove them from the vessel, for his own safety and that of the crew. The acts which constituted that mutinous conduct, so far as the libellant was concerned, consisted of what the mate states, of his own knowledge, was done by the libellant whilst the master was gone for the soldiers, and his refusal, together with Jay, after the master returned, to come up out of the forecastle, when ordered to do so, until compelled by the soldiers. The master was on board at this last occurrence, and it is to be intended that it passed under his notice. Still, a single instance of a neglect to obey an order of this character, the purpose of which must have been well understood by the party, can hardly be deemed mutinous or culpably insubordinate. It was not a call to the ordinary duty of a sailor, but a command to place himself in the custody of soldiers, to be imprisoned in a foreign port and under foreign authority. Reluctance, or a refusal to yield willingly to such an order, does not, in my judgment, amount to mutinous conduct, or present a case where the master is justified, by the conduct or declarations of the man, in considering the vessel or crew in danger. Nor can the libellant's conduct, if he was disobedient and disorderly while undergoing punishment, be brought up in justification of the punishment itself. He was not put under arrest for refusing to come on deck, but he was ordered on deck for the sole purpose of being delivered over to the soldiers. Besides, it is very plainly inferable, from all the proofs put in, that the master did not proceed against the libellant so much on account of conduct in his own presence as upon the information and charge of his mate. He so stated unqualifiedly in his declaration before the consul, to obtain the detention of these men, and all the testimony he offers goes to show that nothing transpired before him demanding a punishment of the severity of that which was imposed. I am constrained, therefore, to say, that no facts are in proof, or even pleaded by the master, which exculpate him on this head of the complaint. He forcibly removed the libellant from the vessel, and shows no adequate reason for so doing, and is, accordingly, answerable in damages in this action for that injury. The wrongful act also includes all consequences which directly flowed from or were dependent upon it. Such was the imprisonment of the libellant in the common jail of Laguna.

The master fails in proving any threats of personal injury to himself, or of a mutinous character which can excuse his leaving the libellant at Laguna. The evidence of the libellant's declarations is loose and unsatisfactory; and if, in terms of irritation and passion, he did use improper and menacing language respecting the master, it appears to have excited no alarm at the time, and the man continued on board and perfomed a long voyage, after the threats are supposed to have been made, without any exhibition of hostile or disorderly conduct. Neither is this cause for the detention of the libellant stated by the master in his deposition before the consul. He produces the evidence of a laborer, to prove that the libellant was in possession of a slung-shot on shore, which might have been used as a dangeous weapon, and also the deposition of Matthews, the cook, as to the libellant's threat on board; but he does not pretend, in his own deposition, that he ever regarded those circumstances as importing any danger to him or to the vessel. The general declaration of an apprehension of danger, subsequently made, and repeated in the consular certificate, is founded on the facts sworn to in the depositions of those witnesses, and not on any other particulars within the knowledge of the officers or crew of the vessel. It results, therefore, that the master improperly imprisoned the libellant, and also left him in confinement at a foreign port, without justifiable cause; and I decree damages against him, on account of these acts, in the sum of $100. Decree, $100, and costs.

GARDNER v. COLLINS.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1824.

DEED—DELIVERY—STATUTE OF DESCENTS — HALF BLOOD.

1. A delivery of a deed may be inferred from circumstances, and need not be proved by positive testimony.

2. Under the statute of descents of Rhode Island of 1822, brothers and sisters of the half blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood.

[Cited in Clark v. Sprague, 5 Blackf. 415; Cliver v. Sanders, 8 Ohio St. 506.]

[See note at end of case.]

3. A court is not bound to give an opinion upon a point of law, which the evidence does not raise.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Ejectment for lands in Rhode Island by the demandant [William C. Gardner], described in the writ as a citizen of Virginia, against the tenant, described as a citizen of Rhode Island. Plea, not guilty. At the trial the plaintiff to support his case, gave in evidence a certain deed-poll made by the said John A. Collins to George Collins Gardner and Mary Collins Gardner, dated April 3d, 1810, and duly proved the execution of the same, which deed included the land in controversy. The plaintiff then stated, that the said George Collins Gardner had since deceased, whilst a minor, and without issue, and therefore his share of the demanded premises descended to and vested in the said Mary Collins Gardner, his sister and heir at law, their father and mother having both, previously, deceased. That afterwards said Mary C. Gardner deceased, to wit, in the month of December, 1822, a minor, and without issue. Which statements were admitted by the defendant to be correct and to be received as evidence. The plaintiff further stated, that the said Mary C. Gardner was his sister of the half blood, that Samuel F. Gardner was also brother to the said Mary C. Gardner of the half blood, that Mary Clarke and Eliza G. Phillips were sisters of the said Mary C. Gardner of the half blood, which statements were also admitted by the said defendant to be correct and to be received as evidence. The plaintiff further produced and offered in evidence a certain deed-poll made to him by Audley Clarke and his wife the said Mary Clarke, the said Samuel F. Gardner and the said Eliza G. Phillips, not having date of any particular day, but acknowledged the 16th day of May 1823, and recorded as of that date. And to prove said deed the plaintiff produced the subscribing witnesses thereto, namely, Benjamin B. Mumford and W. A. Clarke. That said Mumford testified, that he saw said Audley Clarke and Mary Clarke, said Samuel F. Gardner and Eliza G. Phillips sign and seal said deed, that the plaintiff was not present at the execution thereof, nor any one in his behalf to his the witness' knowledge, that the deed when executed was delivered to the said Audley Clarke. The said W. A. Clarke testified to the same effect. The plaintiff also produced as a witness Charles Gyles, the town clerk of Newport and the register of deeds therein, who testified, that said deed was delivered into his office to be recorded by said Samuel Fowler Gardner. This witness further stated, that this deed remained in his office till the commencement of this action, when it was applied for by Richard K. Randolph, Esquire, (the counsel of the plaintiff,) to whom it was delivered. Upon being further interrogated upon whose behalf said Randolph applied for the deed, he answered, in Mr. Audley Clarke's, he supposed, but that said Randolph did not state in whose behalf he applied, and that he (the witness) delivered it without any order from any one, and on his own responsibility. The plaintiff also produced as a witness William Marchant, Esquire, who testified, that he had known the said Samuel F. Gardner to be the agent of his brother, the plaintiff, for a number of years last past, and as such agent to transact business of various kinds to a large amount for the plaintiff on his behalf. The plaintiff's counsel further produced and offered in evidence a letter of attorney made by the plaintiff to the said Samuel F. Gardner, dated the ninth day of October, 1817, appointing him his general agent. On the part of the said defendants, and in defence against said action it was stated, that at the date of the execution of said deed of Audley Clarke and wife, and Samuel F. Gardner and Eliza G. Phillips to the plaintiff, he, the plaintiff, was settled at Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, as a merchant, doing business there, and that previous to the execution of said deed there existed a controversy, as to the demanded premises, and conflicting claims of ownership thereto between the said John A. Collins on the one part, and the said Audley Clarke and wife, Samuel F. Gardner, Eliza G. Phillips, and the plaintiff, on the other part; which statements were admitted by the plaintiff's counsel to be correct, and to be received as evidence.

Hunter and Robbins, for tenant, contended in defence against said action, 1st, that there had been no delivery of said deed of said Audley Clarke and wife, said Samuel F. Gardner and Eliza G. Phillips to the plaintiff. 2dly. That the deed was a deed in trust, made for the purpose of giving said court a colourable jurisdiction of said case, when it had no real jurisdiction, it being a controversy between citizens of Rhode Island, and not between parties who were citizens of different states. 2 Dall. 431. And 3dly. That the plaintiff and the said Mary Clarke and Samuel F. Gardner and Eliza Phillips were not the heirs at law to the said Mary Collins Gardner.

Searle & Hazard, for demandant, argued è contra.

STORY, Circuit Justice (summing up to the jury). The first question is, whether there has been any delivery of the deed of Clarke and others to the demandant, or for his use. It is certainly not necessary to prove a positive, formal delivery. It may be inferred from circumstances. The execution of the deed by the grantors is fully established. It was then delivered to Clarke, one of the grantors, by the consent of the other grantors; it was subsequently found in the possession of S. F. Gardner, the demandant's agent, and by him placed in the registry for record. It is now found in possession of the demandant's counsel; and its due execution and delivery are not contested by any person, who was a party to it; but the objection is taken by a mere stranger. Under such circumstances I have no doubt, that the evidence is competent in point of law, from which the jury may presume a delivery to, or for the use of, the demandant; and I shall leave it as a question of fact to them accordingly.

As to the second objection, there is no pretence to say, that it presents any point as to the jurisdiction of the court. The demandant is described in the writ as an inhabitant of Fairfax county, and "a citizen of the state of Virginia." The tenant is a citizen of Rhode Island, and so described also in the writ. If the tenant meant to deny the allegation of the citizenship of the demandant, he should have done it by a plea in abatement, and brought the matter directly in controversy before the court. By pleading over to the merits, he admits the description in the writ to be true. It is not matter relevant or proper under the general issue. It has no tendency to prove the guilt or innocence of the tenant. Nor have I heard any evidence which shows that the demandant is not a citizen of Virginia. He claims the whole land in controversy; but admitting the deed is void, if his title by heirship is maintained, he is certainly entitled to recover his moiety, or one fourth part, as one of the heirs of Mary C. Gardner. To this extent, therefore, his writ is at all events good, since his citizenship has not been put in issue, and the controversy is between citizens of different states. The second point is therefore narrowed down to the consideration of that portion of the premises claimed by the demandant under the deed of the other asserted co-heirs. Whether a deed executed for the sole purpose of giving jurisdiction to the court, and without which it could not be maintained, be void or not, is a point upon which I do not feel myself called upon to deliver an opinion under the present state of the evidence. Not that I have any objection to stating my opinion, but I think it wrong to travel beyond the points which the evidence brings before the court. I cannot perceive any sufficient evidence in this case to raise the question. The onus probandi lies on the party taking the objection. Where is the evidence of any purpose of founding jurisdiction by this deed? Where is the evidence of witnesses or others, that the consideration in the deed was not paid, or that the purchase was not bona fide made by a party having perfect confidence in the title. Though controverted by the tenant, it does not follow, that it was matter of any legal doubt. Until therefore some evidence is introduced to lay a foundation for the presumption of the deed's being collusive, I do not feel myself called upon to express an opinion.

The more important point is that, which respects the heirship of the demandant and those, under whom he claims. It depends upon this, whether by the law of Rhode Island brothers and sisters of the half blood are entitled to inherit by descent in default of lineal descendants of the intestate. The statute of distributions of Rhode Island of 1798 (Dig. 1798, pp. 287, 288) declares, that where there are no children of the intestate, all the right, title, and interest in his real estate "shall vest in and be divided equally amongst the next of kin in equal degree, and those, who shall represent them, if any of them be dead, computing according to the degrees of the civil law." Upon this statute there would seem to be no room for legal doubt. By the civil law, brothers and sisters of the half blood are equally next of kin with those of the whole blood. This construction was put upon the statute of distributions of 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 10, which is far more general in its language, more than a century ago in Crooke v. Watt, 2 Vern. 124, and has ever since been adhered to in England. The same construction, at least as far as my knowledge extends, has been generally adopted in America. Hillhouse v. Chester, 3 Day, 166; Preston v. Hoskins, 2 Yeates, 545; Sheffield v. Lovering, 12 Mass. 490.

But the present case is not governed by the act of 1798. It has arisen since the general revision of the statutes in 1822, and is to be settled by an appeal to the text in that digest. The statute of distributions of 1822 contains a detailed enumeration of the succession of heirs, and in the fourth paragraph declares, that "if there be no father, then to the mother, brothers and sisters of such intestate, and their descendants, of such of them as there may be." The question then is, whether brothers and sisters of the half blood are not within the purview of this clause. No intention is shown on the face of this statute to alter the rule of the act of 1798, as to the half blood; and unless the court can say, that brothers and sisters of the half blood are not brothers and sisters in the general sense of law, it is impossible to doubt the title in this case. The statement of the proposition carries its own answer. Brothers and sisters of the half blood are recognized by law as of kin in the degree of brothers and sisters, and as the act contains no qualification as to whole or half blood, the words must be taken in their common and usual sense.

Verdict for the demandant for the whole of the premises. Judgment accordingly.

[NOTE. This cause was taken to the supreme court on certificate of division of opinion of the judges in the circuit court, and was heard on questions certified. The supreme court, Mr. Justice Story delivering the opinion, decided in favor of the plaintiff, holding that the words "of the blood" comprehend all persons of the blood, whether of the whole or half blood; and that the words "come by descent, gift, or devise from the parent or other kindred, etc.," mean immediate descent, gift, or devise, and make the immediate ancestor, donor, or devisor the sole stock of descent. The cause was certified back to the circuit court; the supreme court adjudging that the plaintiff and those under whom he claims the estate in controversy are heirs at law of Mary C. Gardner, intestate, and as such heirs are by the statutes of descent of Rhode Island, A. D. 1822, entitled to the same estate upon the facts agreed in the case, and that the judgment ought to be given for the plaintiff in this cause. 2 Pet. (27 U. S.) 58.]

GARDNER v. COLUMBIAN INS. CO.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1824.

MARINE INSURANCE—VALUED POLICY—COST—CONSTRUCTION.

1. In an action upon a valued policy on a cargo, the defendants will not be permitted to give evidence of its actual cost.

2. The policy was on a voyage "at and from Rio Janeiro to Santos, and two ports in South America, and at and from either of them to a port of discharge in the West Indies, or Europe, or the United States," upon goods "at and from Rio Janeiro," "until they shall be safely landed at Santos, &c., &c.," "valued at the sum insured," (viz. $3500,) "on her cargo of salt, and on the proceeds, as interest may appear." These words do not justify an inference, on the part of the underwriters, that the goods were to be laden on board at Rio Janeiro.

3. The cargo was lost between Rio Janeiro and Santos, and the plaintiff recovered for the loss, although the cargo was laden at Cadiz.

This was an action [by Richard Gardner] upon a policy for $3,500, on a cargo of salt in the brig Manufactor. The terms of the policy are stated above in the marginal note.

Mr. Taylor, for defendants, contended, that, by the terms of the policy, the salt was to be taken on board at Rio Janeiro, whereas it was laden on board at Cadiz, in Spain; which fact was not disclosed to the underwriters; and that this was a material misrepresentation, which vacated the policy. He also contended, and offered evidence to prove that the cargo cost, at Cadiz, only $450, whereas it was valued in the policy at $3,500; and that this was so gross an over-valuation as to authorize the defendants in considering it as an open policy.

But the court (nem. con.) refused to admit evidence of the actual value at Cadiz.

As to the first misrepresentation, Mr. Taylor cited Marsh. Ins., 321, 322; Murray v. Columbian Ins. Co. of N. Y., 11 Johns. 302.

Mr. Mason, for plaintiff, contended that the words of the policy did not imply that the salt was to be taken on board at Rio Janeiro; and every person trading to that port knows that salt cannot be taken on board there, by an American ship, and carried to Santos, which would be a prohibited coasting trade. The defendants were bound to know the laws and usages of the trade. Bell v. Hobson, 3 Camp. 272, 16 East, 241; Phil. Ins. 169.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the words of the policy did not justify an inference on the part of the defendants that the goods were to be laden on board at Rio Janeiro, and that the salt was covered by this policy, although not laden, nor bulk broken, at Rio.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 550.] [1]

MARINE INSURANCE — OFFER OF ABANDONMENT—VALUED POLICY—EVIDENCE OF OVERVALUATION.

1. An offer to abandon the insured vessel, made as soon as the assured obtains the preliminary proofs of loss, to be laid before the underwriters, is not too late.

2. Upon a valued policy, evidence of overvaluation is not admissible unless in support of an allegation of fraud.

This was an action [by Richard Gardner] upon a policy on the brig Manufactor, at and from Rio to Santos, valued at $3,200. The defendants, at the trial, contended that the vessel was fraudulently overvalued, and that the offer to abandon was too late. The policy was dated 20th November, 1821. The loss was known here on the 24th of November. On the 26th of December, the protest and offer to abandon were sent to the office of the defendants, and the offer to abandon was repeated in writing on the 23d of January. The master arrived in Philadelphia on the 12th of December. There was no evidence of the arrival of any authentic proof previous to that date.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said the offer to abandon was not too late. They also said that evidence of overvaluation could be given only in support of the allegation of fraud. That overvaluation is not, per se, evidence of fraud, but was a circumstance proper for the consideration of the jury in considering the question of fraud; and that if they should find that the vessel was fraudulently overvalued, the plaintiff could not recover, even the value of the property, for the fraud would invalidate the contract altogether. Verdict for the plaintiff, $3,200.

BANKRUPTCY — RECOGNITION OF LIENS BY ASSIGNEE—COSTS AND CHARGES FOR CUSTODY AND CARE OF PROPERTY.

1. The assignee in bankruptcy must recognize as a preferred claim any valid lien, even the costs of an attachment, if such costs are a lien by the state law.

estate as debts simply, not as preferred claims. For care and custody of property from the date of proceedings in bankruptcy to the taking possession thereof by the messenger or assignee, the assignee is accountable, as for expenses of like kind incurred by him after his appointment, having regard, of course, to their necessity and utility, and the reasonableness or exorbitancy of the charges therefor.

[Followed in Re Archenbrown, Case No. 503. Cited in Re Hatje, Id. 6,215.]

In bankruptcy.

I. E. Spink, for claimant.

Mr. Cook, pro ipse.

KNOWLES, District Judge. Upon a certain issue raised before Mr. Register Clark, and by him adjourned into court, I would now announce my conclusions upon the facts, as presented at the hearing, and the arguments submitted and authorities cited by the learned counsel of the parties. Those parties are—J. A. Gardner, a sheriff's deputy, petitioner or claimant, on the one side, and Lorin M. Cook, the assignee of A. B. Horton, a bankrupt, on the other; and the question presented is, to state it in brief, is an assignee in bankruptcy, who takes possession of a stock of goods which a creditor had attached upon process from a state court, bound to pay as a preferred debt the accrued costs incident to the attachment suit, taxed as they legally might have been had the attaching creditor's suit been prosecuted to final judgment against the bankrupt?

This question, which it is believed is now, for the first time, distinctly and pointedly presented for adjudication in this district, has, it appears, arisen elsewhere; and to the rulings upon it of several of my brethren of the bench, as well as to the language of the bankrupt act, my attention has been directed by the learned counsel of the respective parties. To these, as well as to the arguments of counsel, I have given due consideration, arriving at conclusions which it seems to me not at all necessary on this occasion to vindicate by elaborate argument, that would, of necessity, be substantially but a repetition of what has been repeatedly uttered by my brethren of other districts.

A satisfactory answer to the question is found, I think, when it is conceded, as it must be, that a sheriff under the laws of Rhode Island acquires no lien, in the true sense of that word, upon the goods he attaches. He is simply the agent and employee of the plaintiff in the action, who can, at any moment, discontinue his suit, and thus discharge the attachment. For his lawful costs, fees, custody, charges and expenses, his claim is against the plaintiff, not against either the defendant or the property attached. So far as regards the question at issue, I am unable to see that it matters at all whether the suit be discontinued and the attachment be dissolved by the plaintiff's order, or by an adjudication of bankruptcy against the defendant, as provided in section 14 of the bankrupt act. When, by the law of a state, a sheriff, by attaching goods, acquires a lien upon the goods specifically, (as it seems is the fact in New York, if nowhere else,) the question under consideration would, of course, be answered in the affirmative, as it was by the learned judge of the New York district, in Re Housberger [Case No. 6,734],—the case cited and mainly relied on by the learned counsel of the claimant Gardner. In consistency with this view, I must hold and rule that the claim of Gardner to a lien upon the goods is without foundation; and that having no lien upon the goods, his claim of costs, as for a preferred debt, the assignee cannot rightfully allow and pay.

Nor can it be conceded, as claimed in argument by counsel, in view of the law or of the authorities, that the plaintiff in an attachment suit in Rhode Island, acquires by attachment a lien upon his debtor's goods, which that debtor's assignee in bankruptcy must or can recognize. He acquires but an inchoate right to a lien, conditional upon his obtaining a final judgment; and the conclusive answer to any argument in his behalf is that the bankrupt act [of 1867], § 14 [14 Stat. 517], provides that all attachments on mesne process made within four months next preceding the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, shall be dissolved as soon as an assignee of the bankrupt shall have been appointed and qualified, and an assignment of the debtor's property been made to him by a register.

There are some propositions concerning which little or no doubt is now expressed, or intimated, by commentators upon the bankrupt act. One of these is, that a chief merit of this act is its tendency and efficiency in checking and preventing over-trading, by preventing, so far as possible, the giving of preference by the insolvent debtor, and the obtaining of preference by his creditor. Says Cadwalader, J., in Re Woods [Case No. 17,990]: "In this respect its operation will be gradual, but must be highly beneficial. When relations and friends of a debtor, and when capitalists, who, without affection or friendship, would make profit from his embarrassments, learn that they cannot be secured by a preference out of the wreck of his affairs, they will not furnish him the means of over-trading. So long as he could, by securing advances and accommodations, obtain them, the temptation to attempt to retrieve his losses, by doubling his investments, was before the enactment of the bankrupt law irresistible; and the system of business was that of mere gambling adventure. But when a debtor who suffers losses knows that he cannot prefer his relations and friends, and when capitalists know that they cannot, without risk, assist him to the injury of other creditors, he will stop his business in season, to give a fair dividend to all his creditors, and thus make a fair settlement with them in the court of bankruptcy, or, much oftener, out of it. Thus, in the course of time, few judicial bankruptcies will occur.

Now, an attachment of the effects of an insolvent debtor, it is obvious, is an endeavor on the part of a creditor to obtain a preference—nothing more, nothing less; and the bankrupt law, as I construe it, wisely and consistently prescribes that the creditor who, in this mode, seeks to defeat or delay the operation of the act, shall, out of his own pocket, pay the expenses of his experimental proceedings. If for a period of four months the debtor and his other creditors refrain from interference, very well; if not, then not so well for the attaching creditor. He must pay the bills of his sheriff and his attorney without hope of reimbursement from the bankrupt's estate.

Of the intent of the framers of the law, I can entertain no doubt, when it is remembered that the insolvent law of Massachusetts, of which the bankrupt law is in many particulars substantially a transcript, contains a provision securing to a creditor his costs of attachment as a preferred debt, when he chooses to prove his principal debt against the insolvent's estate, and when it is seen that the bankrupt act contains no analogous provision. In re Fortune [Case No. 4,955]. Says Judge Fox, of Maine, in Re Stubbs [Id. 13,557]: "The court in bankruptcy cannot allow a party the expenses incurred by him in the attempt to defeat the provisions and operation of the bankrupt law." This, it is true, was a ruling upon a claim of an assignee under a state law for his outlays and charges, prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against the assignor; but I unhesitatingly adopt the proposition as applicable to the case under consideration, having regard to the facts before me as agreed by the parties.

The question under discussion, it seems, has never yet been passed upon either by the supreme court or any one of the circuit judges; but in more than one of the district courts it has been a subject of allusion or of special consideration. And in view of the act itself, and of the commentaries upon it, which have come under my observation, the reasonable and just conclusions in regard to this question and its cognates, are these: First. A valid lien upon property the assignee in bankruptcy must recognize as a preferred claim—even the costs of an attachment, if such costs are by the state law truly a lien, as in New York—otherwise not. Second. The costs and charges against a bankrupt for care or custody of his property prior to the filing of a petition in bankruptcy by or against him, under contract with him, express or implied, are debts of his, provable against his estate as debts simply—not as preferred claims. Third. For care and custody of property from the date of proceedings in bankruptcy to the taking possession thereof by the messenger or assignee, the assignee is accountable, as for expenses of like kind incurred by him after his appointment—being bound, of course, to have regard to the necessity and utility of all outlays and services, and the reasonableness or exorbitancy of the charges therefor.

The result of my inquiries is, that the petition of the claimant Gardner must be dismissed, but without prejudice to any claim which the plaintiffs in the attachment suit (Griffin & Co.), after they shall have proved their debt against the bankrupt's estate, shall see fit to prefer against the assignee as just claims for outlays or services, beneficial to the estate, from and after the filing of the petition against the bankrupt Horton. When such a claim shall have been presented by them, the circumstances under which their attachment was made will appear, and the character and value of such services and outlays be ascertained and considered; and it is to be presumed justice be done, if not by the assignee, by the register; if not by the register, by this court; if not by this court, by his honor the circuit judge in the exercise of his revisory powers.

Among the reported cases other than those already cited, to which reference may profitably be made, as bearing upon the question under consideration, are the following, viz.: In re Stevens [Case No. 13,392]; In re Cohn [Id. 2,966]; and In re Preston [Id. 11,394].

GARDNER et al. v. GARDNER et al.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1823.[2]

WILLS — CONSTRUCTION — DEVISE CHARGED WITH PAYMENT OF DEBTS—NOTICE—PROCEEDS.

1. Where a testator devised to one of his sons in fee two third parts of a certain farm, "he paying all my just debts out of said estate," it was held that the debts were not a mere charge on the devisee, but a charge on the land devised also; but the charge being for the payment of debts generally, a bona fide purchaser from the devisee, who has paid the purchase money, is not bound to look to the application of it.

[See note at end of case.]

2. There is no difference in this respect between a charge on the land, and a trust created to pay the debts. Notice of the charge does not vary the rights of the purchaser.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

[2] [Modified in 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 498.]

3. If the purchase money is unpaid, it may be followed into the hands of the purchaser.

4. Real estate being assets for the payment of debts generally, in Rhode Island, by statute, the executrix may sue the devisee and the purchaser before payment of the debts, to compel them to appropriate the purchase money to the payment of the debts, and to exonerate the assets of another devisee entitled to be exonerated. If a purchaser, instead of paying over the purchase money, applies it, with notice of the charge, to the payment of the devisee's own debts, to the injury of the creditors of the devisor, it is misapplication of the purchase money, for which he may be made responsible in equity at the suit of the executrix.

This was a bill in equity [by Hannah Gardner and others against Ezekiel W. Gardner and Elisha R. Potter]. The facts were as follows: Peleg Gardner, of South Kingston, by his will, dated the 7th of July, 1817, having given his wife (one of the plaintiffs) a part of his mansion house and the use of one third of his stock, &c., for her life in lieu of dower, made the following devise: "I give and devise to my beloved son, Ezekiel W. Gardner, two third parts of all that my 'Ferry Farm,' so called, formerly owned by John Franklin, and now in the possession of the said Ezekiel W. Gardner; with two third parts of the sloop, boats, scow, wharf, rights and privileges, to my said Ferry estate belonging, of every kind whatever, to him, the said Ezekiel W. Gardner, and to his heirs and assigns forever, he my son Ezekiel W. Gardner paying all my just debts out of said estate." The testator then proceeds to devise the other third of the Ferry estate and some other real estate to his daughter Isabel in fee. He then devises other real and personal estate to his other daughters, Martha C. Gardner, Hannah Gardner, and Mary Ann Gardner in fee; and gives an annuity to his daughter Dorcas Gardner, of 300 dollars, payable out of the estates given to her four sisters. Then comes the following clause: "And I do hereby order, and it is my will, that my son, Ezekiel W. Gardner, shall pay all my just debts out of the estate, herein given him as before mentioned." He then gives the residue of all his estate, real and personal to his wife, Hannah Gardner, in fee, and makes her the executrix of his will. The testator died, and his will was duly proved in the court of probate, in April, 1818. A commission issued from the probate court to ascertain the debts of the testator in July, 1818, and the commissioners made a report of their doings in July, 1820, which was duly accepted. The report stated the debts of the testator at $7373.14; and rejected two accounts presented to the commissioners, one of which was an account of Ezekiel W. Gardner, the other of John P. Mann. In April, 1819, Ezekiel W. Gardner, having purchased the third of his sister Isabel, sold the whole to the defendant, Elisha R. Potter, for the asserted sum of 15,000 dollars. None of the testator's debts having been paid, and suits at law having been commenced against the executrix, to establish and enforce the rejected claims, the present bill was brought by the executrix and her daughters, Hannah Gardner and Mary Ann Gardner (two of the devisees in the will,) to enforce the trust in the will for the payment of the debts of the testator out of the Ferry estate, devised to the defendant, Ezekiel W. Gardner, and afterwards, fraudulently, as it was charged, conveyed to the defendant, Elisha R. Potter. There was also a prayer for general relief. The defendants put in their answers; and the cause came on for a hearing, after the general replication filed, upon the answers and other proofs in the cause.

Webster, Hazard, and Bridgham, for plaintiffs.

It is a well known principle, long established both in courts of law and equity, that in the construction of a will the intention of the testator is to be sought for and collected from the whole instrument, "ex visceribus testamenti," and when found is always to govern. It is a maxim of the English law, "quod ultima voluntas testatoris perimplenda est." 6 Cruise, Dig. (Eng. Ed.) 157; 7 Bac. Abr. 341, 342; Baddeley v. Leppingwell, 3 Burrows, 1533; Andrew v. Southouse, 5 Term R. 292; Strong v. Cummin, 2 Burrows, 770; Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 311; Cook v. Holmes, 11 Mass. 528. Every will ought to be so expounded as to give effect to every part of it; so that each word may have its peculiar operation and not be rejected. "Every string ought to have its sound." Barker v. Giles, 2 P. Wms. 282; 6 Cruise, Dig. (Eng. Ed.) 157; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 448, note; Chambers v. Brailsford, 2 Mer. 25. Applying this principle to the will in question we would ask what the intention of the testator was in regard to the devise to Ezekiel? Did he not mean that his debts should be first paid out of the estate devised to Ezekiel? or in other words, that the estate itself should be the fund out of which his debts should be paid? that the same estate should at all events be liable therefor, and thereby exonerate the whole of the personal and all the rest of the real estate from that burthen? To secure the payment of the debts out of this fund and not to put the payment of them off merely upon Ezekiel personally, who might fail to do it, he guardedly uses the words "he paying," &c. This expression amounts, we conceive, to a condition, and we contend that Ezekiel took under this will a fee simple conditional in the real estate devised to him. "He paying," or "upon paying," or "on condition that he pay," &c. are all terms importing one and the same thing, to wit, a condition precedent. Vide Co. Litt. 236b; Orphans' Leg. 364–366; Crickmere v. Paterson, 1 Cro. Eliz. 146; Id. 205, 379; 6 Cruise, Dig. (Eng. Ed.) 428; 2 Cruise, Dig. 47; Barnadiston v. Fane, 2

Vern. 366; Acherley v. Vernon, Willes, 153; Cary v. Bertie, 2 Vern. 333; Berty v. Faulkland, 12 Mod. 182; Grimston v. Lord Bruce, 1 Salk. 156; Turner v. Goodwin, 10 Mod. 153; Peters v. Opie, 1 Vent. 177; Large v. Cheshire, Id. 147. This testator meant that his debts should be paid out of the estate devised to Ezekiel; that he, Ezekiel, should not have it in his power to defeat that intention; that the other devisees should not be remediless in case Ezekiel should not pay, and therefore he annexed the condition to the devise. Not only the words of this particular devise show this to be the intention of the testator, but the whole tenor of the will confirms it, "Et interest reipublicae suprema hominum testamenta rata haberi." Blackstone, in his Commentaries (volume 2, p. 382), says, "that every will is construed with equal favor and benignity in courts both of law and equity, and is expounded rather on its own particular circumstances, than by any general rules of positive law." But should this devise not be considered as giving a mere conditional estate to Ezekiel, still the will creates a lien upon the land devised to him, to the extent of the testator's debts, and the land will stand charged therewith in whosesoever hands it may be. By the laws of England real estate is not liable or chargeable with the payment of simple contract debts unless made so by will. But in this country, the laws are founded on more just and equitable principles. The relics of feudal law are discarded; a more liberal policy prevails, and just debts of every nature stand on the same footing; and all the property of a deceased, both real and personal, is liable for the payment of them; the latter first, and in case of a deficiency in that, then the former, or so much thereof, as may be necessary to complete the object. This is a principle well known by every citizen of this state old enough to transact any business, and undoubtedly was well understood by the testator when he made his will.

Both in England and here the personal estate is in the first place to be applied to the payment of debts, but a testator may discharge his personal and charge his real estate with the payment of them. Freemoult v. Dedire, 1 P. Wms. 430; Masters v. Masters, Id. 421; Harris v. Ingledew, 3 P. Wms. 95, 98; King v. King, Id. 358; Davis v. Gardiner, 2 P. Wms. 190; Lypet v. Carter, 1 Ves. Sr. 499; Earl of Godolphin v. Penneck, 2 Ves. Sr. 271; Thomas v. Britnell, Id. 313; 4 Bac. Abr. 283–285; Shallcross v. Finden, 3 Ves. 738; 1 Madd. 474 et seq.; Kightley v. Kightley, 2 Ves. Jr. 328; Walker v. Jackson (in chancery) 1 Wils. 24. The debts being made payable out of the estate, is the same as if they had been made payable out of the profits or rents or income of the estate. So says Justice Wilmot in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Baddeley v. Leppingwell, 3 Burrows, 1541. Ezekiel is not therefore personally answerable or liable for the payment of the debts. The estate alone is chargeable and it is quite immaterial so far as relates to the present case, whether Ezekiel accepted the devise or not. If he had not accepted it, the estate would have gone to the heirs generally of the testator, subject however to the charge. But as he has accepted the devise, he takes the estate subject to the same charge. As words of limitation are used in this will, the estate being devised to Ezekiel and his heirs, no question can arise as to the quantity of estate or extent of interest, which he took. It was, we think, undoubtedly, either a fee simple conditional, as herein first attempted to be shown, or a fee simple subject to the lien or charge thereon for the testator's debts, as lastly above urged. Livingston v. Livingston's Ex'rs, 3 Johns. 189; Denn v. Mellor, 5 Term R. 558; same case decided in same way, 6 Term R. 175; same case decided in same way in house of lords, 2 Bos. & P. 247; Baddeley v. Leppingwell, 3 Burrows, 1541; Jackson v. Harris, 8 Johns. 109; Newman v. Kent, 1 Mer. 240. If Ezekiel had the power to sell as is contended for by the respondents, his power so to do must have been derived from the will, and must have been implied from the circumstance, that the testator's debts were to be paid by him out of the estate, and a sale was needful in order to raise the money out of the estate to enable him to comply with this provision. If this position is correct; if Ezekiel had the power to sell and did sell, for the purpose above mentioned, he could have acted in no other character than that of a trustee under the will, and in that case he was bound to respect the rights of the complainants as beneficially interested under a sort of resulting or constructive trust in their favour. Had not the estate been conveyed by Ezekiel, the complainants could have proceeded against it under a bill in equity, and compelled a sale, and thereby raised the needful sum of money out of it to enable them or the executrix to pay the debts. This being the purpose of the testator the estate is liable even in the hands of a purchaser. 1 Cruise, Dig. 547; Wynn v. Williams, 5 Ves. 130.

Again, viewing Ezekiel, for the reason already mentioned, in the character of trustee under the will, and the complainants as the cestuis que trust, the latter had such a vested interest in the estate as could not be impaired or destroyed by the voluntary act of the trustee, and therefore the trust followed the estate into the hands of Potter, he, as will be shown hereafter, having knowledge of the trust. Shepherd v. McEvers, 4 Johns. Ch. 136; 1 Cruise, Dig. 486, 540, 548, 549, 405, 406; Fearne, Rem. 479; 2 Vern. 5; Crewe v. Dicken, 4 Ves. 97.

Lord Hardwicke is reported to have expressed himself thus emphatically on this subject, "If a person will purchase with notice of another's right, his giving a consideration will not avail him, for he throws away his money voluntarily, and of his own free will." Potter purchased of Ezekiel under a full knowledge of this trust, if it may be called or considered such. The peculiar provisions of this will, taking the whole of it together, are such as to make it the bounden duty of a voluntary purchaser to look to the application of the purchase money, and Potter's failing to do this, in this instance, is such a crassa negligentia as renders him answerable to the complainants in the present suit. 2 Fonbl. Eq. c. 6, § 3; Hiern v. Mill, 13 Ves. 114; Lord Montfort v. Lord Cadogan, 17 Ves. 485.

We contend then, first, that equity will give relief against the person entrusted, and his heirs, and such alienees as have purchased either without a valuable consideration or with express notice. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 145, and note f; Id. 147, and note h; 2 Bl. Comm. 329; Willoughby v. Willoughby, 1 Term R. 763. Lord Bacon, in his readings on the Statute of Uses (page 312), says, that "the chancery looketh farther than the common law, viz. to the corrupt conscience of him that will deal in the land knowing it in equity to be another's, and therefore if there were radix amaritudinis the consideration purgeth it not, but that it is at the peril of him that giveth it, so that consideration or no consideration is an issue at common law, but notice or no notice is an issue in chancery." 2 Fonbl. Eq. 151; Fermor's Case, 3 Coke, 78b; Lord Bacon's Readings, 312. Secondly, that whatever is sufficient to put the party upon inquiry is good notice in equity. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 151, and note m; Id. 152; Bovey v. Smith, 1 Vern. 149; Ferrars v. Cherry, 2 Vern. 384; Dunch v. Kent, 1 Vern. 319; Draper's Co. v. Yardley, 2 Vern. 662; 1 Cruise, Dig. 546; Smith v. Low, 1 Atk. 490; Hall v. Smith, 14 Ves. 426. Thirdly, that notice is not confined to the time of the contract, for if a person, who has a lien in equity on the premises, give notice of such equitable lien before actual payment of the purchase money it is sufficient (2 Fonbl. Eq. 148, in note i; Tourville v. Naish, 3 P. Wms. 307; Story v. Lord Windsor, 2 Atk. 630; Hardingham v. Nicholls, 3 Atk. 304); or before the execution of the conveyance though the purchase-money be actually paid (Wigg v Wigg, 1 Atk. 384). Fourthly, that a person claiming as bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration must deny the fact of notice of the trust and of every circumstance from which notice might be inferred. Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566. He must deny it though it be not charged. Denning v. Smith, 3 Johns. Ch. 345; Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 302; Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough, 2 P. Wms. 491. Fifthly, that by taking a conveyance with notice of the trust, the purchaser himself becomes the trustee, notwithstanding any consideration paid. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 149; 1 Cruise, Dig. 485, 486, 492, 540, 541; 1 Schoales & L. 262; Saunders v. Dehew, 2 Vern. 271; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566; Fearne, Rem. 479; Pye v. Gorge, 1 P. Wms. 128; Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. Jr. 437. Sixthly, that it is true, that generally a purchaser is not liable in equity for misapplication of purchase-money where an estate is chargeable generally with payment of debts and vested in a trustee to sell, but that it is otherwise if an estate is made chargeable with particular debts. And that if there is any collusion between the trustee and purchaser, the purchase would be infected with the fraud or collusion. 7 Bac. Abr. 155, in margin, and the cases there cited; 2 Fonbl. Eq. 149, and note k; Dunch v. Kent, 1 Vern. 260; Spalding v. Shalmer, Id. 303; Crewe v. Dicken, 4 Ves. 100; Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. 152; Cotterel v. Hampson, 2 Vern. 5; Lloyd v. Baldwin, 1 Ves. Sr. 173; 1 Madd. 496; Culpepper v. Aston, 2 Ch. Cas. 115, 221; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 575; Sugd. Vend. 349, and the other cases there cited; Whale v. Booth, 4 Term R. 625, note; Hiern v. Mill, 13 Ves. 114; Crane v. Drake, 2 Vern. 616; Taylor v. Hawkins, 8 Ves. 209; Ewer v. Corbet, 2 P. Wms. 148; Burting v. Stonard, Id. 150; Lord Montfort v. Lord Cadogan, 17 Ves. 485. Seventhly, that a bona fide purchaser has, in equity, been postponed, in respect of his conniving at the subsequent fraud of him under whom he derived his title, and those instances are evidently exceptions to the general rule. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 147, in note h; Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. 152; Throughout the whole of these transactions Potter knew that the complainants intended to resort to this fund for the means of paying the debts, and he and Ezekiel both confess, in their answers, that the purchase money, as fast as paid, was applied by Ezekiel, with the knowledge and aid of Potter, to the discharge of Ezekiel's own debts, and that even in June, 1820, when all the first payment, being between six and seven thousand dollars, had been thus applied, Ezekiel was still so hard pushed by his creditors as to induce him to urge Potter so to alter the contract as to obtain more money to relieve himself therefrom, which was accordingly done. Eighthly, that it is the duty of a trustee not to bring the property to sale, until all information has been acquired by him for the benefit of the cestui que trust, under circumstances likely to make it yield its utmost value. Hart v. Ten Eyck, 2 Johns. Ch. 110; Ex parte Bennett, 10 Ves. 385. Agreeably to the above principle Ezekiel ought not in fairness to have sold (admitting he had power to sell) till the commissioners had made their report, and the amount of debts had been thereby precisely ascertained. And Potter, having full knowledge of the trust aforesaid (if trust it may be called), together with all the circumstances attending it, ought not, for the same reasons, to have purchased at that time. Ninthly, we admit that no schedule of the debts has ever been delivered to the respondents, or either of them; and that the commissioners had not made report of the debts at the time of the sale; but in answer thereto we say, firstly, that Potter, as well as Ezekiel, well knew the debts; and, secondly, that a commission of insolvency was then pending in order to ascertain the debts judicially, and that both the respondents were bound by every principle of justice and equity to take notice of said commission, and to govern themselves by it. It was a public proceeding, a sort of judicial proceeding, a proceeding in a court of record, of which all persons are presumed to be cognizant, and of which, in this instance, both the respondents had actual notice. It was a lis pendens, and a lis pendens is constructive notice, agreeably to the following authorities. Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566; 1 Cruise, Dig. 544; Culpepper v. Aston, 2 Ch. Cas. 115. Tenthly, that the law so guards the interests of all mankind that any collusion, by any person, in any transaction, prejudicing the rights of others, cannot and ought not to be supported either in courts of law or equity. Even the alienation of assets by an executor, who has by law complete and perfect controul over them, is not good, if there is collusion between him and the purchaser. Vide 2 Fonbl. Eq. 150, in note 1, and many of the authorities already cited under the ninth head. Eleventhly, the purchasing of assets of an executor for a pre-existing debt is a badge of fraud. Vide McLeod v. Drummond, 14 Ves. 361, and some of the authorities already cited under other heads. In applying this principle to the present case we will but just observe that Potter purchased, as is expressly confessed by him in his answer, for the purpose of securing his own private, pre-existing debt, due from Ezekiel.

Hunter and Searle, for defendants.

It is contended on the part of the defendants, that the complainant is not in a situation to maintain the present suit. She has not paid a single cent of any debt, for which the defendant, Gardner, is liable. A mere liability to pay gives no cause of action. There is no privity in fact, between these parties, and there can be none in law until actual payment has been made. The only relation in which these parties stand to each other, and which law or equity can notice, is, that both may be liable to the creditors of the devisor, and that relation may place them in the situation of quasi sureties, separately, for the same debts. But it will not, we apprehend, be seriously contended that a surety can either at law or in equity call upon his co-surety for indemnity, in any case whatever, nor for contribution, until actual payment. Indeed upon principle, and so far as it relates to creditors, the complainant, Hannah, is first liable, as having the personal estate, which is the fund first liable in point of law and equity. It has never yet been established, that an executor, as residuary legatee, or otherwise, could ever sustain a bill against an heir or devisee, to restrain him from selling the real estate of the original debtor, on the ground merely of its liability for debts in relief of the personal estate. It is not admitted that a bill under any circumstances would lie, but it is confidently contended, that none could be sustained until the executor had paid debts chargeable on the defendant to the bill by reason of the fund in his possession, and also upon full and plenary proof that the defendant was insolvent and wasting the fund Nor is it, we contend, competent even for a creditor to sustain such a bill generally. A creditor could not support a suit in equity, to restrain an heir or devisee from selling, merely because the land might ultimately be required for the payment of debts in case of a deficiency of personal estate. And for the same reason, if the sale had already been made, no bill, either by executor or creditor, would lie to restrain the payment of the purchase money to the heir or devisee. In the case at bar, the creditors are not parties, nor have they ever demanded payment of the defendant, Gardner; and the counsel for the defendants are utterly at a loss to discover any principle upon which the complainant can sustain her present suit, either with a view to set aside the sale of the estate, restrain the payment of the purchase money by the grantee to his grantor, or to appropriate it to any object or purpose whatever. Suppose the court should think the sale to be fraudulent in point of fact, or void in point of law, can they set it aside? For what purpose is it to be nullified? As between the parties, the sale is decidedly legal. If then it is to be set aside, it must be done at the suit of some party, who has a title paramount to that of the defendants; is this complainant of that description? Has she any claim to this estate or its proceeds? Can the court order it sold? Can they apply its avails to the payment of the testator's debts? No creditor is a party, no creditor has ever demanded his debts of the devisee of the land, and no creditor can, under the present bill, have any decree passed, touching himself or his debts. With the creditors, their rights and their remedies, the court has nothing to do, nor can it exercise a single judicial act in relation to either. It is therefore insisted that the court cannot legally exercise any jurisdiction over the subject matter of this bill. There are no competent parties before it, and no decree can be passed touching the defendants, the land, its sale, or its proceeds. It is also in proof, that the note given for part of the consideration, and also a part of the obligation for mortgages, had been negotiated for a valuable consideration long before the exhibition of the bill, and ever since has been the bona fide property of the endorsee, who is no party to this suit; and the lease has expired. There is, therefore, no part of the consideration money specifically remaining in the possession of the defendant, Gardner, as his property, except a part of the obligation to be discharged in mortgages. That the intention of the testator, to be collected from the whole will together, is to govern in the construction of his will, is a rule not susceptible of doubt, provided that intention is conformable to the rules of law. We are not permitted, however, to traverse the boundless fields of conjecture in ascertaining it. This legal intention, or that which courts are bound by the established rules of construction, to annex to his language, must undoubtedly furnish the rule of decision.

The counsel for the complainant have laboured exceedingly to show that an estate may be given upon condition, and that the devise in question is of that kind. But there is hardly a colour for such a pretence. It is, we contend, settled, both by principle, and by the uniform current of adjudged cases, that the devise to Gardner, the defendant, is not an estate upon condition, but belongs to a class of cases totally different, and governed by totally different principles. If, however, it should be judged to be an estate upon condition, that consideration alone is, we hold, fatal to the complainants' bill. If Gardner takes an estate upon condition only of paying the debts, he not having paid them, his estate is lost, and he, as devisee, has no interest in it. In such a case the fee is clearly in the heirs at law, who are not parties to this bill and who must be, before any decree concerning it can be passed. The court cannot deal with this estate as to payment of debts or other purposes, upon a bill by the present parties. If this be an estate upon condition, as the complainants' counsel insist, Gardner has forfeited it by non-performance of the condition; and there being no devise over of the estate, it descends to all the heirs at law; and all the heirs at law must be parties, before any decree for the disposition of the land or its proceeds can be passed by this court. That a testator may, by his will, exonerate his personal estate, and subject the devisee of his real estate, to the payment of his debts, is a principle so fully settled as to require, at this day, neither authorities nor arguments to support it. His discharging one fund and charging another, however, is a matter to be arranged between the legatee and devisee. The creditors cannot be affected by it without their consent. The testator may devise his land and impose on the devisee the terms of paying his debts in relief of the legatee of the personal estate; and if the devisee accepts the devise he is no doubt liable. But this by no means concludes the creditors. They have the same right to resort to the personal estate as though no such devise had been made. As to creditors, a testator cannot, in England, exempt his personal, nor in this state, his real or personal, estate, from the payment of his debts. He may direct, as amongst his legatees and devisees, how his debts shall be paid, and that direction will clearly bind all who accept the provisions and gifts in the will. It is also admitted that a testator may, by apt and proper language, charge specifically upon his real estate his debts, so as to create a lien thereon for the same. But none of these provisions can affect his creditors until they assent. They have a right to resort to their legal remedies and to seek the payment of their debts from the whole mass of their debtor's property according to the provisions of law, unembarrassed by any restrictions which that debtor may attempt to impose. By his last will, Peleg Gardner, amongst other devises and bequests, devises to his son, Ezekiel W. Gardner, and to his heirs and assigns forever, two thirds of the Ferry estate, he, Ezekiel, paying his, Peleg's, just debts out of said estate. Peleg Gardner, it is said, left debts to a large amount, and it is contended by the counsel for the complainant, that the language of the devise creates a specific charge and lien, on the land devised, for those debts. That it is a trust estate, and that a purchaser for a valuable consideration, takes it charged specifically with the payment of those debts. It is contended by the defendant's counsel, that Gardner, the devisee, took a clear, absolute, and unconditional fee simple, unincumbered as to his title, and unrestricted in his right to convey a fee simple estate, free of the debts. They insist, that the charge is personal upon the devisee, and not specific on the estate; that it may make the estate less valuable ultimately to him, to the full amount of the debts, but that it does not charge, impair, diminish, or restrict his title, or the nature of the tenure, and that he has precisely the same full and perfect right to sell the estate, exempt from all liability for debts, as though no provision had been made in the devise for the payment thereof.

It has already been observed, that the estate in question was devised expressly to Gardner, the defendant, his heirs and assigns, he paying the testator's debts out of the same. By this devise the fee simple is clearly vested in the devisee; and the only question is, whether the debts create an incumbrance, and a specific lien on the estate, in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. The counsel for the defendants hold the negative of this question, and they confidently submit to the court, that they are fully supported both upon principle and authority. Numerous cases have been cited on the other side upon the subject of devises to pay debts, and charges upon land, and the like, but not a single case reaches the point in controversy in the case at bar. The principal point in all or nearly all those cases was, what estate a particular devisee took, not whether the lands are chargeable specifically after a fair sale. In the present case no such question can arise, for, by the very language of the will, the devisee takes most assuredly a fee simple estate. The cases cited do not, it is believed, present a single instance of a devise similar to the one in the will of Peleg Gardner. There were no words of limitation in them, and the question before the court was, whether, by a sound construction of the will in the particular case, the devisee took an estate for life, or in fee simple, ascertaining the devisor's intention according to the rules of law. Amongst the rules established by law on this subject, is one giving to the devisee a fee simple without words of limitation, when he is personally liable for the payment of debts or legacies, and the question generally raised in the cases cited was, whether or not the will created a charge on the devisee. If it did he took a fee simple. If however there was no charge on the devisee, but on the land devised to him, the authorities are, we admit, not uniform, some few deciding that he takes a life estate only, and the others that he takes a fee simple. But all these cases are different in fact and principle from the one at bar. Here are words of limitation, and a fee simple undoubtedly passes. The two principal cases on which the complainants seem to rely are Doe v. Clarke, 5 Bos. & P. 342, and Jackson v. Bull, 10 Johns. 148. But these cases in fact or principle, hold no relation to the one at bar, and afford no countenance to the argument of the counsel.

In the case at bar the devisee undoubtedly takes a fee, and according to the principle of the complainants' own authorities, his estate is exempt from the charge. By reference to some additional authorities it will, we hold, be perfectly apparent, that Gardner, the defendant, took an estate in fee simple exempt from all charges for debts, and that the charge is on him personally. In Baddeley v. Leppingwell, 3 Burrows, 1533, Thomas Ives devised to Sarah Boreham certain estates, she paying thereout to Elizabeth Boreham 40s. a year. In this case Sarah took the inheritance, though the 40s. were payable out of the estate devised. And the court treat the charge as personal on Sarah, for they say the provision must be considered as a lasting one, to continue through Elizabeth's life and "not that she should be left to starve in case her sister Sarah should happen to die before her." The charge then is clearly on the devisee and not on her estate, for if it were, Sarah could not be left to starve on the death of the devisee, but the land would remain liable. Sarah then, under a devise of land to pay thereout 40s. yearly to her sister, took a fee simple, exempt from any specific lien or charge on it, but was personally chargeable therefor. So in the case at bar, the estate is given to the devisee, he paying thereout the testator's debts. Frogmorton v. Holyday, 3 Burrows, 1618. Margaret Hasselwood devises to her son John certain real estates charged and chargeable with the payment of £50 out of the yearly rents, issues, and profits of the estate devised. John took a fee simple estate. The court do not even intimate any specific charge or lien on the estate, but expressly say that at the age of 21 he might dispose of it himself. Doe v. Holmes, 8 Durn. & E. [8 Term R.] 1. Devise to Elizabeth Gibson, "she paying all my just debts." The devisee, says Lord Kenyon, "is bound to pay the debts at all events in respect of the real estate," and he was adjudged to take a fee simple. Goodtitle v. Maddern, 4 East, 498. Devise by husband to wife of personal and real estate, she to pay all his debts in good time. And if the personal estate was insufficient to pay the debts, she was to sell the house at Penzance first. The court adjudged her to take a fee simple, "for she is charged with the payment of all the debts." "The distinction has turned in all the cases on this; whether the debts &c. were merely a charge on the estate devised or a charge on the devisee himself in respect of such estate in his hands." To the same point the cases of Doe v. Richards, 3 Durn. & E. [3 Term R.] 356; Jackson v. Merrill, 6 Johns. 185; Denn v. Mellor, 5 Durn. & E. [5 Term R.] 561, 562,—may be cited. Andrew v. Southouse, Id. 292. Devise to E. Southouse of certain estates, charged and chargeable with the payment of £20 to T. Tooth during life. Southouse took a fee simple, and the charge was personal on him; for, say the court, if Southouse did not take a fee, and Tooth survived him, the annuity might be lost. Here the charge could not be on the estate; if it were, it would not be lost by the death of the devisee. Doe v. Snelling, 5 East, 87. Devise to George Snelling and Sarah, his wife, of certain real and personal estates, "after having thereout first paid and discharged all just debts &c." The court say that these words "impose a charge on the devisees personally;" and wherever the charge is on the devisee, to be paid at all events out of the estate in his hands, the devisee must take a fee. The payment thereout, say the court, means a payment by the devisee out of the estate in his hands, and imposes personal charges on him.

From the current of authorities then, as well as from the express language of the will, it is submitted that Gardner, the defendant, took an estate in fee; that the charge of the debts is personal on him and not on the estate; that he held the estate free and exonerated from all charge or lien for the testator's debts, and had a perfect right to sell it, and that the purchaser bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, has a right to hold it, fully discharged from all claims of creditors in law and equity. In point of principle no material difference can be discovered between the case at bar and the ordinary case of a devise of land. No new charge is imposed on the estate devised by reason of the will. By the law of this state (Dig. 1798, p. 305), the real estate of the deceased is liable for debts, if the personal is deficient, and while it remains in the possession of the devisee or heir. The will only limits the liability to the devisee of part of the estate instead of the whole, and requires the devisee to pay the debts out of it, in the first instance, without resort to the personal estate. But this, we contend, does not change or affect the devisee's title, or the nature of it, nor make a shade of difference in the principle of the cause. Here the devisee is liable by the declaration of the testator, and in the ordinary case he is liable by the provisions of the statute. In both cases the devisee is liable, and so the land would be, while in the devisee's possession, by express provision of the statute. Milnes v. Slater, 8 Ves. 306. But was it ever contended that a devisee could not sell before the devisor's debts were paid? or that the land passed to the purchaser, charged with these debts? or that he was liable to creditors for the purchase money, and that he could not pay the devisee? The statute of the state (page 306) settles all these questions beyond all doubt, and our whole system of laws, and the uniform practice under them, perfectly accord with the provisions of that statute. While the devised estate remained the property of the defendant, Gardner, it might, no doubt, have been attached for the testator's debts, not by reason of the will, but because it was a part of the debtor's property, and as such liable under the law of the state. But the will, we contend, imposed no incumbrance on the estate, nor restraint on the devisee as to his right to sell, and when he had sold in good faith, the purchaser will most unquestionably hold a clear indefeasible estate, exempt from all charges for the testator's debts, and the purchaser himself is accountable to no one for the purchase money, except to the devisee of whom he purchased.

The case seems analogous in principle to the case of the heir with assets descended at common law, and who is bound in the bond. In that case the heir is liable at law, and the land descended is liable in equity, while in possession of the heir, but after a bona fide sale even equity cannot reach it for the benefit of the bond creditor. 1 Cruise, Dig. 20, 21. It may be safely admitted, that courts of equity in England may exercise jurisdiction in case of estates devised, charged with the payment of debts, while the estate remains as the property of the devisee. But after a fair sale, equity has never attempted to charge the lands specifically with the debts in the hands of the purchaser. Nor has a court of equity, in such a case, ever compelled a purchaser, who has paid his grantor, to repay the purchase money to creditors, or for their use; although we need not deny that under particular circumstances and with proper parties before it, equity may decree the money, still unpaid by the purchaser, to be applied to the discharge of debts. And the principal reason for the interposition of equity in England is, that land there is not generally liable for debts. Without the aid of equity therefore, creditors might often be remediless in such cases. But in this state, where the will in question was made, and the land devised is situate, the creditors have abundant remedy at law, against the land, while owned by the heir or devisee, and against them personally after a sale. It may perhaps be doubted whether equity has jurisdiction; we are not anxious however to raise that question, until a case, proper for its discussion, shall arise. And in England, wh re equity has exercised the jurisdiction in question, it was not on the ground that the debts created any specific lien or incumbrance on the estate, or that the creditors have any legal vested interest in it, but it is owing to the peculiar powers of that jurisdiction. "A mere charge is no legal interest," says the lord chancellor, "it is not a devise to any one, but that declaration of intention upon which a court of equity will fasten, and by virtue of which they will draw out of the mass, going to the heirs or to others, that quantum of interest which will be sufficient for the debts." Bailey v. Ekins, 7 Ves. 323. If we recur to the powers of executors, in relation to the assets in their hands, to illustrate the principles by which the case at bar is to be decided, the result is conclusively in favour of the defendants. At common law the executors may sell the personal estate of their testator, and vest a perfect and clear title in the vendee. Pow. Mortg. 135, 136, 299; Nugent v. Gifford, 1 Atk. 462; Mead v. Lord Orrery, 3 Atk. 235; Farr v. Newman, 4 Durn. & E. [4 Term R.] 621. And the vendee is not liable either to legatees or creditors, Rayner v. Pearsall, 3 Johns. Ch. 578; Newland v. Champion, 1 Ves. Sr. 105, 125; Andrew v. Wrigley, 4 Brown, Ch. 125; 2 Ves. Sr. 429; 8 Ves. 208; 17 Ves. 165. Even if a chattel, so sold, is specially devised. 1 Cruise, Dig. 545; Ewer v. Corbet, 2 P. Wms. 148. And creditors have no specific lien upon the assets. McLeod v. Drummond, 17 Ves. 162; Nugent v. Gifford, 1 Atk. 463; 2 Ves. Sr. 269 [cited]. And under the statute of Rhode Island (Dig. 1798, p. 295), power is clearly given to executors to sell all the assets at public auction, or by permission of the court of probate, at private sale. In the case of executors, they are decidedly trustees, first for the creditors and then for the legatees and heirs; they have no interest beyond the purposes of the trust, and yet they may sell absolutely and vest a full and perfect title in their vendee. In the case at bar the devisee has an interest beyond the payment of debts; he has the fee simple subject to a personal charge on himself. This charge becomes perfect by accepting the devise, and he must bear it whether the estate is sufficient to reimburse him or not. If then the executor has power to sell and vest a good title in his vendee, for much better reason would the devisee have power to sell, and to convey a perfect title to, the devised estate. In examining the statute, in respect to the powers of executors, devisees, and heirs, over the estate of the testator, it is apparent that the legislature meant to invest them all with full authority to dispose of the estate, free, and discharged from all lien for debts, in the possession of fair purchasers. Should we resort to the particular intention of the testator, as far as it can be legally collected from the language of the will in relation to this devise, the result is equally in favour of the defendants. On reading the bill no one can possibly believe, that the debts were intended to be a charge on the estate devised, in the sense contended for by the complainants; the language is not such as would have been used to express such a purpose. Although the scribe, or the testator, might not have been familiar with any technical phraseology, pertinent to such a purpose, yet some mode of expression would have been selected, more fully indicating the intention; some circumlocutory provision would have been introduced, showing, plainly enough, the intention that the land should pay the debts, or be holden to pay the debts, or the like. But the plain unequivocal meaning and intention of the testator was, that the devisee, in consideration of the devise, should pay the debts; and he refers to the estate, in the words, "paying out of said estate," not with intent to charge the estate, but merely showing the devisee, he had given him a fund, from which he was, or might, be enabled to pay them.

Looking at the facts and circumstances of the case, it is apparent that the testator knew the devisee must sell. It is not pretended by either party that the devisee could have paid all his father's debts from his own property, exclusive of that devised to him. The testator therefore knew that his son must sell to be in funds to discharge the very debts, with the payment of which he had charged him. The testator therefore could have had no other idea in his mind but that the devisee had the power of absolute disposition. The words used in this will "he paying the debts out of said estate," have not, as has already been observed, ever been holden to create a specific incumbrance on the estate. They amount to no charge of any kind on the land. They have not the same legal import or effect, as the words "charge" or "chargeable," and yet these words by no means give a specific lien on the estate to which they refer. Elliot v. Merryman, Barnard. Ch. 78; Pow. Mortg. 293, and the authorities there cited. The words, "he paying the debts out of said estate," have no legal effect upon the devise; they neither enlarge, restrain, qualify, or in any manner whatever affect the title or interest which the devisee takes. His title and his interest are precisely the same, as to all legal purposes, as though these words had been omitted and he had been charged generally with the payment of the debts. And in the latter case, that he takes a fee with full power of absolute disposition is settled beyond a doubt. Upon the particular intention of the testator, therefore, upon the whole current of adjudged cases, and upon the soundest principles of law, it is contended, that the defendant, Gardner, took an estate in fee simple, with the power of selling it free of all incumbrances for debts or otherwise, and that the defendant, Potter, a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, has a right to hold it free from all claims of the creditors thereon, or for him, for the purchase money. The counsel for the complainant have also argued that the devise to the defendant, Gardner, is a trust estate, or in the nature of a trust estate for the benefit of creditors, and that it must be sold, subject to the trust. There is no foundation for this position. It is not of the class of cases denominated trust estates, nor is it governed by the same or similar principles. An estate in trust is one given by deed or will for a particular purpose, and the grantee or devisee has no interest beyond that particular purpose. He has no beneficial interest, but is accountable to the heir for any surplus beyond that particular purpose. The present is a devise in fee, subject to a particular charge on the devisee, and he has all the beneficial interest not exhausted by the particular charge. The former has no individual or personal right or interest. The latter has the whole individual and personal, right and interest, subject to the particular charge. King v. Denison, 1 Ves. & B. 271, 272. But admitting it to be a trust estate, for the payment of debts, the trustee has an undoubted right to sell, and the purchaser will hold, without accountability to the creditors, either for the estate or the purchase money. Sugd. 331, 132; 2 Fonbl. Eq. 148; 1 Madd. Ch. 352; 2 Madd. Ch. 103; 1 Cruise, Dig. 543, 544; Pow. Mortg. 193, 285, 289; 1 Salk. 158; 1 Ves. Sr. 173; 2 Ves. Jr. 215; Amb. 188, 676; 1 Brown, Ch. 186; Barnard. Ch. 78; Sut. 504, note; Jebb v. Abbott, Co. Litt. 290b [note], and the cases there cited; 1 Johns. Ch. 575; 2 Johns. Ch. 327, 628; 6 Ves. 654, note; 16 Ves. 150, 155; 2 Ch. Cas. 115, 221; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 358; 1 Vern. 260, 301; 4 Ves. 99. And amongst the other reasons of this rule, one assigned in the books is, that otnerwise the lands could never be discharged of the trusts, without a suit in chancery, which would be extremely inconvenient. Pow. Mortg. 298–300; Elliot v. Merryman, Barnard. Ch. 78; Culpepper v. Austin, 2 Ch. Cas. 221.

Upon the principles then which govern devises and conveyances, strictly in trust, the case is with the defendants. Indeed there never was a doubt in such cases, but that the trustee has a complete right to convey, and that the purchaser would hold. The question has been in relation to the purchase money, and to whom the purchaser was accountable, the trustee, or the cestuis que trust. It is however now settled beyond all doubt, we apprehend, that payment to the trustee is legal, and is a perfect discharge to the purchaser, who is not accountable for its application by the trustee. And upon the same principle it has been holden, that if the trustee mortgage the trust estate for his own debt the mortgage is valid. Pow. Mortg. 291, 300; Jthell v. Beane, 1 Ves. Sr. 216; Spalding v. Shalmer, 1 Vern. 301. And the mortgage is holden to be good, for this reason, we contend, that the trustee has a right to sell and of course to mortgage. He is therefore in the execution of his legal right and power; but how, or in what, he receives payment, is a question about which the cestuis que trust have no right to inquire as to the purchaser. The trustee is accountable to him for the value or amount of the sale, but the mode of payment is a matter exclusively between the vendor and purchaser. It has already been shown that the purchaser is accountable to the trustee for the purchase money, and is not accountable for his misapplication of it. To this general rule an exception, it is said, in some of the authorities exists; and that is in the case of scheduled debts, the purchaser must see to the application of the purchase money in the discharge of those debts. By scheduled debts is meant debts enumerated and specified in the instrument creating the trust, or in some other document referred to and making a part of that instrument. The existence of such an exception has however been denied; and Powell, in his treatise on Mortgages, says the exception is not warranted by the cases, and is unfounded in principle. Pow. Mortg. 311, and the cases there cited. And the master of the rolls, in Balfour v. Welland, 16 Ves. 155, says the doctrine of accountability in the purchaser "has been carried further than any sound equitable principle will warrant." It his already been shown, we presume, that the policy of the laws of Rhode Island is decidedly opposed to this exception. That policy, and those laws, clearly intend to protect purchasers from trustees, and to hold the purchaser accountable for the consideration money or the application of it to no one, except his immediate vendor. By those laws a guardian may sell the real estate of his ward to pay his debts, under the authority from the supreme judicial court. That authority is obtained upon his petition, accompanied by the statement of his ward's debts. But no judge or lawyer ever entertained a suspicion, that the purchaser of the guardian was ever accountable to the creditors of the ward.

So an executor, in particular cases, may sell the real estate of his testator. His power to sell is derived from a decree of the supreme judicial court, founded on his petition. The debts, for which he sells, are all scheduled debts, reported and allowed by the court of probate, and on record in that court; a certificate of all which accompanies and is filed with his petition. The executor sells pursuant to this authority. Is the purchaser's title defective or liable to be affected by creditors? or is he accountable to creditors for the consideration money paid to the executor? It is alleged on the other side, that the debts of the testator have been scheduled, of which Potter, the purchaser, was bound to take notice, and that there was something like a legal fraud in purchasing under such circumstances. By recurring to dates, we find however there was no schedule of debts existing any where at the time of the sale. The estate had, it is admitted, been represented insolvent, but no report made, and not a single debt allowed by the commissioners. They cannot definitively allow, until the time appointed for receiving debts has expired, for during all that time the executor has a right to be heard in opposition to them. And their allowance is nothing until the court of probate have accepted their report and allowed the debts. Long previous to this period the sale was made. The incipient proceedings, therefore, before commissioners amount to nothing, and have no legal effect upon the cause. Besides, both these defendants were strangers to all these proceedings. They were not, and could not be parties to them, and they have never been notified of their progress or result, and ought not, therefore, to be bound by them. But if the report of commissioners had actually been made and allowed, still it would not affect the purchaser. The report of commissioners gave the creditors no new lien on, or interest in, the devised estate. The amount and genuineness of the debts may be ascertained by the report, but no new or additional right or remedy, in relation to these debts, results to the creditors. They are, as to all parties, in precisely the same situation as when the testator died. The report of commissioners does not come within the rule relative to the scheduled debts. It is not that kind of scheduled debts, which binds the purchaser; those are debts scheduled by the testator, when he makes his will. They are his act, and a part of the devise. The report of commissioners gave the purchaser or devisee no new information. The will informed them both, that there were debts, and the amount makes no difference. The rule is one of construction, and is, I presume, founded, if it exists at all, on the idea, that where the debts are scheduled, it is evidence of an intention in the devisor, that the purchaser should see to the appropriation for their payment at the time of sale. So that the sale and the payment are to be considered as one indivisible object of the testator. Pow. Mortg. 311, 312, and the cases there cited. When this object exists, therefore, it must be from the sole and exclusive act of the devisor. In this case he has not done it, and did not intend to do it. And there is no intimation in any of the cases, that debts afterwards ascertained and scheduled in the course of settling the estate or otherwise, ever brought a general trust within the particular rule of scheduled debts. The case then is not one of a trust, in which the creditors have any interest in, or lien on, the estate, according to any principle of law or equity. And because they have no interest in, and lien on, the estate, any notice, which may immediately come to the defendant, Potter, cannot affect his title to the estate, or his accountability for the purchase money. The doctrine of notice relates to cases of equitable rights, which may be lost from want of it or preserved by fixing it on the party to be charged; but where no such right exists, there is none to lose, and notice is out of the question.

The authority from 4 Johns. Ch. 136, and the other authorities referred to in connexion with that, are, as will be seen, upon the most cursory reading, equally inapplicable. They belong to a class of cases depending upon distinct and different principles. Another attempt has been made to attach fraud to the sale, because it is said part of the consideration money (about $6000) was paid in demands against the grantor personally, which is charged as a misapplication of the fund, and is a fraud as to Peleg Gardner's creditors. It has, we hold, been established beyond controversy, that the estate conveyed was a clear, absolute, fee simple, which the devisee had a right to sell, and Potter had a right to purchase and hold free from all liens and claims. If this position be true, the sale is undoubtedly valid. A man may give away his own estate, and the gift is good against all the world except his own creditors. And as against them, he has assuredly a right to sell bona fide and for a valuable consideration, and receive payment in what he pleases; either in his own debts, negotiable paper, or other property. The sale is no fraud on the creditors in such a case. And if we admit, for the purpose of the argument, that it was a trust estate, still the purchaser is equally protected in his estate, and in the payment he has made. The right of the trustee to sell and of the purchaser to pay him the consideration money has already been shown. The law no where requires the payment to be made in money. If the sale is absolute, for a reasonable price, and the payment made to the amount, the kind and mode of payment are entirely out of the question. This is, we hold, settled by the case in 1 Pow. Mortg. 291 [Spalding v. Shalmer, 1 Vern. 301], and the authorities there cited, where the trustee mortgaged the trust estate for his own debt by bond, and the mortgage was adjudged good.

A further attempt is made by the complainant to prove a secret collusion between the defendants to enable Gardner to sell the estate and conceal and convert to his own use the proceeds with interest, to defraud the creditors of the testator. This charge is unceremoniously and coarsely made in the bill and reiterated in the argument with but little qualification. If we are right in our construction of the will, no fraud could be perpetrated; Gardner had a clear fee simple, which he had a right to sell, and Potter to purchase, upon such terms of payment as the parties agreed. Admitting, however, that it was an estate in trust, and the sale subject to be set aside for actual fraud, it is still contended, that the charge of fraud is unsupported by a title of evidence, positive or circumstantial. The answers of the defendants are evidence, and fully sufficient until disproved. They detail plainly, fully, and explicitly the whole transaction, and positively and unequivocally deny all the imputations of fraud. The complainant has appealed to the oaths and the consciences of these defendants, and by that appeal he must be bound, unless their answers upon their oaths and their consciences can be refuted by clear, conclusive, and indisputable testimony. The sale is fair or fraudulent according to the facts and circumstances attending the transaction and the intentions of the parties at the time it took place, and the deed is valid or void according to the character of that transaction at that time. No subsequent fact or circumstance can vitiate the sale or the deed, if fair and legal at the time of the sale and delivery of the deed. And we maintain, that there is not a single fact or circumstance connected directly or remotely with the sale, which indicates, in the least degree, any collusion, trick, or artifice in either of the defendants to defraud the creditors of Peleg Gardner, the complainants, or any other person. The sale was made long (nearly a year) after the death of the testator; it was attended with no secrecy, and was not made until the grantor had publicly and repeatedly sought other purchasers and could find none, who would give the price, paid by Potter. It was not solicited by Potter, nor agreed to by him, until the application had been repeated by Gardner. The consideration was fully adequate and actually paid, or secured to be paid by legal and negotiable notes of hand. The sale was absolute, without secret trust or confidence. The promise, made by Potter to Gardner in relation to any surplus upon a subsequent sale by Potter, was altogether gratuitous, without consideration, and was no part of the contract, or a condition of the contract, when the sale was made. It was subsequently relinquished and given up, as stated in the answers before the bill was filed. It never was of any value to Gardner, and clearly it was not at the time of its relinquishment, and he had at all times a perfect right to relinquish it upon such terms as he deemed proper.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This cause has undergone so able a discussion, and the authorities bearing upon the points in controversy have been so diligently collected, that the labor of the court has been materially diminished. My own researches have not added much to the mass of learning brought forth from the books; and if, in deciding this case, I do not enter into a minute commentary upon all the authorities, it is because full explanations have been already given of most of them at the bar; and because, after all, the principles, upon which the case must stand or fall, lie in a narrow compass.

The first question, and upon which the cause mainly hinges, is, whether, by the devise to Ezekiel W. Gardner, the debts of the testator are a charge upon the Ferry estate, or a mere personal charge upon the devisee himself. If the latter, then the present suit, supposing it free from all other difficulties, can be maintined only against the devisee, and must be dismissed as against Potter, the other defendant, who claims it by a purchase. If, on the other hand, the debts are a charge upon the estate, the lands, or the purchase money in the possession of Potter, may be reached, unless he can protect himself by some of the doctrines that have been urged in his defence. My opinion is, that the debts are clearly a charge upon the estate. I do not mean by this to say, that the devisee himself is not personally bound by his acceptance of the estate to pay the debts; for I have no doubt he is. But the estate is also charged with the payment, and may be reached in the hands of the devisee, or any person claiming under him, who does not stand in the situation of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, who has paid the purchase money. The terms of the devise are, in my judgment, as strong as if there had been an express charge upon the estate. The testator devises the estate to his son Ezekiel, "he paying all my just debts out of the estate;" and in another part he expressly orders his son Ezekiel to "pay all his just debts out of the estate therein given him." The estate is not given to the devisee upon the condition generally, that he shall pay the debts; but it is pointed out expressly as the fund, out of which payment is to be made. And the testator having disposed of all his other estate, real and personal, to other persons, his intention to relieve them from the burden would be manifestly defeated, if the court were to reject the plain meaning of the words, and to declare, that though the testator has appropriated a particular fund to the payment of his debts, that fund shall be held discharged from them. The argument of the defendant's counsel seems founded upon this position, that if the devisee himself is personally chargeable, that establishes, that the estate also is not charged. But this conclusion is utterly inadmissible. It is unfounded in principle, and the current of authorities is irresistibly against it. There is a very numerous class of cases, most of which have been cited at the bar, where an estate devised in terms, which would otherwise have been construed to give a life estate only, has been held a fee, upon the ground, that there was a charge for the payment of debts, legacies, &c. for which the devisee was personally liable.

The general doctrine, etablished in these cases, is this, that if the charge is upon the estate only, and there are no words of limitation, the devisee takes an estate for life; but if the devisee is personally chargeable in respect to the estate in his hands, he takes a fee. See cases collected in Cruise, Dig. tit. "Devise," c. 11, §§ 40, 50, et seq; Id. c. 13, §§ 25, 29. Whatever difficulty there may be in reconciling all the cases, there is no diversity as to the principle. The only conflict is in the application of it to particular cases. In some of the cases the charge is merely upon the person of the devisee; as in Collier's Case, 6 Coke, 16, where the devise was to A, he paying to one 20s. and to others small sums, amounting in all to 45s. and it was adjudged a fee simple. So in Doe v. Holmes, 8 Term R. 1 (see, also, Salmon v. Denham, 1 Comyn, 323), where the devise was of a freehold house and furniture to A, "whom I make my executrix, &c. she paying all my just debts, funeral expenses, and legacies," it was held, that A took a fee. But in by far the largest number of the cases the estate was clearly charged with the debts, &c.; and the only question was, whether the devisee was also personally charged. The observations of Lord Kenyon, in Doe v. Richards, 3 Term R. 356, and Denn v. Mellor, 5 Term R. 558, 2 Bos. & P. 247 (see, also, Merson v. Blackmore, 2 Atk. 341; Doe v. Allen, 8 Term R. 497), evince, in the most satisfactory manner, his opinion on the subject. His language in both cases shows, that he understood, that in the former there was a clear charge upon the land; and adverting to the terms of the devise in the same case, "any legacies and funeral expenses being thereout paid," he says, in Denn v. Mellor, that these words imported, that those sums were to be paid by the devisee out of the interest given to her; and if she had died immediately after the devisor, and had only taken a life estate, the fund, out of which she was to bear those charges, might have failed. In Doe v. Snelling, 5 East, 87 (and see Goodtitle v. Maddern, 4 East, 496), where the devise was to A, &c. all the testator's lands, &c. "after having thereout first paid and discharged all my debts and funeral expenses, also subject to the payment thereout all the aforesaid legacies," and it was held a fee in A, Lord Ellenborough said, that the construction of the devise was, that "the payment thereout was to be made by the devisees, and the word, 'thereout,' means out of the property before given to the devisees;" and he added, that where debts or annuities are to be paid "by the devisee at all events out of the estate in his hands, the devisee must take a fee, otherwise the charge might be greater than the estate devised, and he would be a loser." Mr. Justice Lawrence is still more explicit.

After stating, that where an indefinite estate is given to a person in lands, and that person is charged with the debts and legacies, he must take a fee (thus putting a case of a mere personal charge only,) he puts the very case now in controversy, and says, "It is the same thing, if such indefinite estate be given to one, and the debts are to be paid out of the estate given to the devisee; he must there also take the fee; for otherwise the estate may not be sufficient to pay the debt." Mr. Justice Le Blanc sums up the whole doctrine in a more precise manner. His language is, "According to all the determinations, the question, whether the devisee takes the fee or not, in respect of charges, must depend on this, whether he personally, or the estate given to him, be charged with the payment of debts; or whether the estate be given after payment of debts. If the devisee be personally charged with the payment of debts, or if the debts be charged on the quantum of estate given to the devisee, he must take the fee; otherwise, if he only take for life, he may be a loser, or the estate may be insufficient." In the case of Denn v. Mellor, in error before the house of lords (2 Bos. & P. 247), Lord Chief Baron MacDonald, in delivering the judgment of all the judges, alluding to the terms of the devise in that case, (which had been held in the king's bench to pass a life estate only,) said, "If these words are considered as charging the lands in the hands of the widow, in that case according to established principles she would take a fee, as she might otherwise be a loser by the devise;" which is a positive and authoritative declaration of the doctrine. He goes on to state, "that he formerly held an opinion, that the words of charge in this will were a charge on the lands in the hands of the devisee," and that he was "unable to distinguish the difference between devising lands to any one after paying his legacies, and his legacies being paid thereout. In both cases they are to be paid out of the land, which is the subject of the devise. A devise to an individual after paying debts seemed to him to mark the same intent of charging the lands in the hands of the devisee, as a devise to an individual, the testator's debts being paid out of the land devised. He concluded, however, by admitting the distinction, upon the weight of authority. See Goodtitle v. Maddern, 4 East, 496.

The case of Doe v. Clarke, 5 Bos. & P. 343, affords a still stronger illustration of the doctrine. The devise there was of several portions of the testator's real estate to different devisees, and the testator concluded thus: "And I charge all my estates, both real and personal, with the payment of the above as aforementioned legacies;" and it was held, that the devisees took estates for life only, because the charge was upon the estates only, and not upon the devisee. Sir James Marsfield, in delivering the opinion of the court, adverted to and disputed the doctrine of Lord Ellenborough, in Doe v. Snelling, 5 East, 87, who, he said, seemed "to think, that if debts and legacies are to be paid out of the estate at all events, there the devisee must take a fee. But what difference does it make, whether the testator directs the legacies to be paid out of the estate, or to be paid by the devisee out of the estate? In either case can the devisee be a loser, which is the only principle upon which a fee is given him." As to the value of this criticism upon Lord Ellenborough's opinion, I am not called upon to decide. But I quote the following words, standing in immediate connection with the former, to show the learned chief justice's own opinion (and he was an eminent chancery lawyer) on the point we are now considering. "To consider," said he, "such a charge as a personal charge is most extraordinary, since there can be no doubt, that if such devisee were to die before the testator, it would still be a charge upon the estate. That has been decided repeatedly in the court of chancery; and it is quite established, that the charge exists as a charge upon the estate, notwithstanding the death of the devisee in the lifetime of the testator." If we advert to the fact, that these comments were made in a case, where the charge was created by the direction, that the debts, &c. be paid "thereout," that is, out of the estate devised, it seems impossible to misunderstand the meaning of the language. In the very late case of Roe v. Daw, 3 Maule & S. 518, where the devise was to A, B, and C, "except £20 to be paid out of C's part of the lands to B," it was held that C took an estate for life only. Lord Ellenborough said, "It has been contended, that this is a charge to be paid out of the land, and therefore a fee shall pass; and I agree, if it be a charge to be paid out of the lands in the hands of the devisee, the argument is good." Mr. Justice Le Blanc said, "Where there is a devise of lands, generally without words of limitation, it will convey only a life estate, unless it be accompanied with a charge on the devisee, or on the lands in his hands." Mr. Justice Bailey said, "I agree to the rule, that unless there be words of limitation to denote the quantum of interest, or to charge the devisee, or the lands in the hands of devisee, a fee does not pass. That I consider as determined in Moor v. Denn, 2 Bos. & P. 247, and many other cases, and particularly in Doe v. C'a ke, 5 Bos. & P. 343, where, though the legacies were charged on the land, yet it was held clearly not an estate in fee. In this case I find nothing to make the £20 a charge on C, the devisee, or on the lands in her hands; but it is a charge on the lands in whatever hands they may be. The words neither import a charge on the person, nor on the interest, which she takes."

in respect to the estate, and that it may also, if apt words are used, be a charge upon the estate; and that, wherever the testator points out the fund of payment, a charge is created on that fund. The cases of Boddeley v. Leppingwell, 3 Burrows, 1533; Frogmorton v. Holyday, Id. 1618; Doe v. Holmes, 8 Term R. 1; Goodtitle v. Maddern, 4 East, 498; Andrew v. Southouse, 5 Term R. 292, which have been relied upon to shake this doctrine, all manifestly support it. They are explained by simply adverting to the qualifications of the general rule laid down in the cases already cited, and have been fully answered at the bar.

But it is argued, that all these were cases where the question was, whether the devisee took an estate for life, or a fee; and that no question arose as to the point, whether the estate was also charged; and that in the case now before the court, Ezekiel, by the very terms of the devise, takes a fee. This is true; but it is also true, that in all these cases no question could have arisen as to the fee, unless the debts were a charge on the estate; and that in every instance where it was decided, that, notwithstanding the charge on the estate, the devisee took a fee, it was necessarily decided, that the charge bound the person as well as the estate. It would be the most extravagant rashness to presume that the whole bar and bench, during so many controversies, should have discussed this question, and admitted the charge, as a charge on the estate, and yet none in reality have existed. But the doctrine is also entirely settled in equity, even in cases where, by the terms of the will, the devisee takes a fee, that if debts and legacies are payable by the devisee out of the estate, they are a charge upon the property. That was the decision in Miles v. Leigh, 1 Atk. 573; s. c. 4 Vin. Abr. tit. "Charge," D 463, pl. 21. There was no doubt in that case, but the devisee took a fee; and the only question was, whether it was a charge on the land. Lord Hardwicke said, "It is objected, that it is not said to be paid out of the estate, &c. nor is it said, by whom it is to be paid; but there are many cases, where it is neither said to be paid out of the estate, nor by whom; yet it has been considered as a charge upon the estate, where the general intent of the testator appeared." "The testator intended it should come out of both estates, and he has charged his son in respect of the whole estate he was to have;" and he affirmed the decree of the master of the rolls, which directed the defendant to pay what should be found due, or in default, to account for the rents of the land, and the land to be sold. Clowdsley v. Pelham, 1 Vern. 411, pl. 386 (and see cases cited Vin. Abr. "Charge," and 1 Mad. Ch. Pr. 474–488; King v. Denison, 1 Ves. & B. 260; Newman v. Kent, 1 Mer. 240; Cary v. Cary, 2 Schoales & L. 173–188), is a strong case to the same effect. But it cannot be necessary to multiply authorities. It is plain from the language of Lord Hardwicke, that where debts &c. are payable out of an estate, they are a charge upon the estate. This is the common sense of the words of the present will; and if we assume any other construction, we must strike from the will the words "out of the said estate," which no court can be justified in doing without necessity, and more especially, when it would defeat the obvious intention of the testator. I know not a single authority, that sustains the argument, that words like the present do not fix a charge on the estate. None has been cited on the present occasion. On the other hand, there are a series of authorities recognising the charge on the estate in cases of this nature; and it is difficult to turn to a decision, where the subject is before the court, that does not contain a direct or implied admission of the existence of the doctrine. In many instances indeed a charge has been created by implication from words and intentions far less significantly expressed. See Noel v. Weston, 2 Ves. & B. 269; Shallcross v. Finden, 3 Ves. 738. I agree that a mere charge is no legal interest. It is not a devise to any one; but as was observed by the lord chancellor, in Bailey v. Ekins, 7 Ves. 319, 323, it is "that declaration of intention, upon which a court of equity will fasten, and by virtue of which they will draw out of the mass going to the heir, or to others, that quantum of interest, which will be sufficient for the debts." Even as long ago as Lord Holt's time, that eminent judge declared, where a legacy was devised out of the testator's land, that it ought to be paid out of the land, for it was a charge on the land. Anon., 12 Mod. 242, pl. 586. The cases of Livingston v. Livingston's Ex'rs, 3 Johns. 189; Jackson v. Harris, 8 Johns. 109; Jackson v. Bull, 10 Johns. 148; and Jackson v. Martin, 18 Johns. 31,—decided by the supreme court of New York, do not, in the slightest manner, disturb any of these principles; but, as far as they go, confirm them; and the last case particularly contains an implied admission of the very point now under consideration. I have taken up more time than may be thought necessary in considering this question; but the earnestness and ingenuity, with which it has been argued, required some exposition of the grounds, upon which I hold the debts by the terms of the present devise to be a plain charge upon the estate.

It has been argued, that there is something in the peculiar jurisprudence of Rhode Island, which repels this conclusion, or at least prevents its application to the case now before the court. But I am not able to perceive any sound reason for such an opinion. By a statute of this state, the real estate of the testator is made generally chargeable with his debts, upon a deficiency of the personal assets; and the executor may, upon proper application and proof, obtain a license from the proper court to sell so much of the real estate, as may be necessary to meet such deficiency. But this statute creates a general charge only in favor of the creditors. It does not prohibit the testator from making a particular provision or appropriating a particular fund exclusively for the payment of his debts, which shall bind his heirs and devisees. It does not in the slightest degree interfere with the ordinary construction of wills. It leaves the testator at full liberty to dispose of his property upon such conditions, as he may please, and liable to such charges, as he may please. And when he creates a particular fund for the payment of his debts, and exonerates all the rest of his estate from the charge, as to all other persons except his creditors, that fund becomes exclusively appropriated for the purpose, as much so, as if he had devised it on the special trust. Unless therefore the court were prepared to declare, that the statute overturns all the general rights of testators on this subject, a proposition too extravagant to be maintained for a moment, it is clear that the general liability of the real estate to the payment of debts, created by operation of law, does not destroy the specific charge of the same debts upon the Ferry estate devised to Ezekiel.

This being so, the next question is, whether the land itself in the hands of the other defendant, Potter, or the purchase money now due, remains chargeable with the debts. The argument is, that Potter is a bona fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, and as such, he takes the estate discharged from the debts, and is not bound to look to the application of the purchase money, even if he had notice of the charge, and the non-payment of the debts. As to notice, it is quite clear, as well upon the answer of Potter, as the circumstances of the case, that he had absolute notice of the devise to Ezekiel, and that it stood charged with the payment of his father's debts, before the asserted purchase. I do not say, that he had merely constructive notice, knowing that the Ferry estate was his father's, and that the son derived it from him by devise, which would be sufficient to put him upon inquiry, and bind him to take notice; but in point of fact he had seen the will, known its provisions, and the opinions of counsel respecting the nature of the devise, at least as early as the time, when he made his purchase; and according to his own confessions he had notice of the material parts of the will at an antecedent period. But notice is of no importance in a case of this nature, unless the purchaser is bound to look to the application of the purchase money. As to this the settled distinction is, that if a trust is created for specific or scheduled debts, the purchaser is bound to see to the application of the purchase money. But if the trust is for the payment of debts generally the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money; and if he pays it over to the trustee, he, and the estate in his hands, stand discharged from the trust. But if the purchase money is unpaid, so much of it, as is necessary, may be reached in the hands of the purchaser to execute the trust. The question then arises, whether in this respect there is any difference between a trust created to pay debts generally, and a charge upon lands for the same purpose. There is an anonymous case in Moseley's Reports (page 96), where a distinction seems to be taken between a trust to pay debts, and a charge for the same purpose. It purports to have been decided by Sir Joseph Jekyll, and is thus stated: "If an estate is devised to trustees to be sold for payment of debts, the purchaser need not concern himself to see the money applied; but it is otherwise, if the debts are particularly specified; but if lands are charged with the payment of debts and legacies, the estate remains charged in whosesoever hands it comes." From this brief note it is not perhaps easy to decide what the real meaning of the latter clause is; whether, that the charge being legacies, as well as debts, the purchaser must look to the application of the purchase money,—a doctrine that cannot now be maintained (Jebb v. Abbott, Butler's note to Co. Litt. 290b, § 12; s. c. cited 1 Brown, Ch. 186, note; Rogers v. Skillicorne, Amb. 188); or whether it means to take a distinction (as seems more probable) between a trust and a charge. If the latter be the true meaning, that case is in conflict with subsequent decisions. In Elliot v. Merryman, Barnard. Ch. 78, 2 Atk. 41, where the debts were by the will charged upon the real estate without the intervention of any trustee, and the bill was brought by creditors against the purchasers of the land to obtain their debts out of the land, the bill was dismissed by the master of the rolls, upon the ground, that the purchasers were not bound to see the money rightly applied; and he denied, that there was any distinction between a trust to sell and a charge for payment of debts. And the like opinion was manifestly held by Lord Camden, in Walker v. Smalwood, Amb. 676; and in Jenkins v. Hiles, 6 Ves. 654, note a, Lord Eldon observed, "that it was long settled, that where a man by deed or will charges or orders an estate to be sold for payment of debts generally, and then makes specific dispositions, the purchaser is not bound to see to the application." Mr. Sugden (Sugd. Vend., Ed. 1818, p. 441, c. 11, art. 11, § 1. Mr. Patch holds the same opinion. Patch, Mortg. art. 11, § 1, p. 404), upon the authority of these cases, does not hesitate to affirm the same doctrine, and holds it equally strong upon principle. The same may be collected to be the opinion of Mr. Fonblanque (2 Fonbl. Eq. c. 6, § 2, note k, p. 149); and if I rightly understand the state of the facts (very imperfectly reported) in Beynon v. Gollins [2 Brown, Ch. 323] (compare that case as cited in Butler's note to Co. Litt. 290b, § 14, and 1 Brown, Ch. 186, note, and as reported in another point in 2 Brown, Ch. 323), that was also the determination of Lord Thurlow.

Looking to the principle, upon which the general doctrine is founded, I am not able to perceive any material difference between a direct trust to pay debts and a charge upon the lands for the same purpose. The one is a trust fastened upon the estate by a court of equity by implication to effectuate the intent of the testator. The other is a direct trust created by the testator for the same object. And there is great force in the observation, that the mode, by which the trust is created, cannot be material; for if it comes in esse, it is substantially to be executed in the same manner. Sugd. Vend. (Ed. 1818) p. 441, c. 11, art. 11, § 1. Lord Eldon indeed, on a recent occasion, said, "There is a great difference here between a devise upon trust, and a devise subject to a charge;" but he alluded, as the context shows, not to any difference in the effect of the lien, or charge, as to creditors, but to the nature of the interest taken by the devisee, whether beneficial, or a mere naked trust. And he added, that "the object is effected much in the same way, compelling the party to make good the charge, or trust, by very similar operations, as applied in this court." King v. Denison, 1 Ves. & B. 261, 272, 276. No authority has been cited, which establishes any distinction between the case of a trust and a charge as to seeing to the application of the purchase money; and my own researches have not enabled me to discover any, except those already referred to. I cannot but think, that the current of authority and the analogy of the law, ought to lead us to a rejection of any such distinction, as unsatisfactory in principle and inconvenient in practice.

But the most material question yet remains to be discussed; and that is, whether Mr. Potter stands in the predicament of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. It is very clear, that he has not yet paid a very considerable proportion of the purchase money; and if the whole purchase money be not paid, nothing is better settled than, that what remains, may be reached in the hands of the purchaser, to discharge the original trust, unless other equities intervene. And there is a still more salutary principle established by incontrovertible authority, viz. that, though a person, being a real purchaser, is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money, if he has bona fide paid it; yet he is not permitted to become a party to any misapplication of the fund, or knowingly to assist in diverting it to his own interest, as in payment of debts due to himself, and then to insist upon the protection of a bona fide purchaser. Even in respect to executors, who, as to personal assets, have a very large authority, but are deemed, in equity, trustees for creditors, legatees, and distributees, it is now clearly settled, that it is a misapplication of the assets to apply them to the payment of the antecedent debt of the executors; and a court of equity will reach them, as trust property, in the hands of any persons, who, knowing them to be assets, have so received them from the executors. There are numerous cases on this subject; and the doctrine was fully discussed in Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. 152, and McLeod v. Drummond, 17 Ves. 152, and Bonney v. Ridgard, 1 Cox, 145. But I may well be spared any examination of the cases, since the doctrine has been recently recognised in its fullest extent by the supreme court of the United States. Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 421. See, also, Adair v. Shaw, 1 Schoales & L. 243, 262.

It becomes material then to sift the particulars of the purchase made by Mr. Potter of the estate in question; and if it shall then appear, that he has been knowingly a party to the misapplication of the trust fund, the court is bound to apply the principles of equity to the case, whatever may be its own private opinion as to the general fairness of the transaction. And I take upon myself to assert, that the imputations in the bill of positive and actual fraud, by Mr. Potter, are not sustained by the evidence. His own answer explicitly denies it; and the other evidence falls far short of establishing any meditated contrivance to cheat the heirs or creditors. Still, however, if the transaction be one, which the law deems incorrect, and admonishes the court to repudiate, as inconsistent with well considered and salutary principles, it is its duty to declare it, and grant the parties an adequate relief. As to the principal facts there does not seem to be any real controversy. It may be gathered from the evidence, that Ezekiel, the devisee, towards the close of his father's life, was in indigent, if not embarrassed, circumstances, owing considerable debts, and among others a debt exceeding three thousand dollars to Mr. Potter. It is apparent also from the answer of the latter, that he was uneasy about his debts, and looked principally, if not entirely, to the bounty of the father for the means, by which it should be paid. Indeed, there is an irresistible implication throughout the whole record, that the son possessed no substantial means of discharging his debts except the Ferry farm devised to him, and a debt asserted to be due from his father, which was controverted and disallowed by the commissioners; and at all events became extinguished in equity by the acceptance of that estate upon the terms of the will. The actual situation of the son and the unascertained state of the debts of the father were fully known to Mr. Potter, and are not even pretended to be denied in the answer. In fact, Mr. Potter puts his chief reliance upon a defence springing from other sources; upon the estate's not being legally charged with the debts, and upon the purchaser's being exonerated from looking to the application of the purchase money.

In this posture of Ezekiel's affairs, Mr. Potter, in April, 1819, about one year after the testator's death, became the ostensible or real purchaser of the whole Ferry farm, and also of a lot of ten acres of land in Jamestown, for the asserted consideration of $15,800. To enable him to make this sale, Ezekiel purchased of his sister Isabel, one third of the Ferry farm and the lot in Jamestown, which had been devised to her by her father; and the value of the lot was, in the sale to Mr. Potter, estimated at $800, and the value of the third of the Ferry farm at $5,000. Neither of those sums has ever been paid to his sister, but it is admitted they both still remain due. The asserted consideration for the purchase of the two thirds of the Ferry farm devised to Ezekiel was therefore $10,000. The terms of the sale were somewhat extraordinary, as they are now stated by the parties. Mr. Potter was to advance the sum of $6,000 towards the payment of Ezekiel's debts, including that of Mr. Potter, and was to reserve the payment of the residue of the purchase money by a note payable on the 25th of March, 1822, without interest. In the mean time Mr. Potter was to be allowed interest upon all the advances made by him. In addition to this, Ezekiel was to have a lease of the whole estate for three years, commencing on the 25th of March, preceding the sale, and of course to end on the 25th of March, 1822, he paying a yearly rent of $948, which was equal to six per cent. upon the purchase money, and was estimated as the fair value of the rent of the estate. It was further agreed, that if Ezekiel could at any time within the three years sell the estate for a larger sum than $15,000, he should have the benefit of the surplus, after deducting all repairs and expenses, which might have been incurred on account of the estate. I observe, also, that it is stated in the answer, that the lease for three years was agreed to be allowed in lieu of interest upon the purchase money, and Ezekiel, in his original answer, asserts, that no rent was in fact to be paid, and that an acknowledgment of the receipt of the same for the whole term was endorsed upon the lease. This assertion is dropped in his second answer, not apparently from mere mistake. In point of fact, upon the original lease (which is annexed to Mr. Potter's answer), there is an indorsement without date, in the following words, "Received the money part of the within lease, it being taken into consideration in the purchase of the within mentioned estate. Elisha Potter." When this endorsement was made does not appear, and it is not in any manner referred to in Mr. Potter's answer. It is an omission somewhat singular if it was made at the time of the execution of the lease, and it constituted a part of the original agreement; and if no rent was in fact to be paid, it is strange, considering Mr. Potter was himself a lawyer, that there should have been inserted in the lease itself, a formal and exact covenant for the payment of the rent annually during the term, a covenant, which was utterly repugnant to the intention of the parties. Indeed I cannot but feel a very strong regret, that the transaction did not originally assume a shape more like the character, which the parties now give it; since the explanations of it are not so satisfactory, or so free from obscurity as to leave no room for hesitation. The reason assigned for taking the lease at all is certainly not very conclusive. It seems, that Ezekiel had previously, in 1818, hired a part of Dutch Island upon a lease of three years (one year of which was expired at the time of the sale of the Ferry farm,) at a small rent, not probably exceeding $70 or $80, and the possession of the lease is made the groundwork of the lease of the Ferry farm for a year beyond the term, at the substantial rent of the whole interest of the purchase money, and with the collateral engagement of Ezekiel to pay interest upon all intermediate advances. But I am content to leave the contract of sale, as it is stated by the parties, without farther observation; and stripped of all disguise, it is in its most favorable view a purchase of the Ferry farm for $15,000, of which $6,000 was to be advanced, or applied to the payment of the debts of Ezekiel, the residue of the purchase money (which was ultimately fixed at $8,806,) was to stand on a credit of three years without interest, and Mr. Potter was to receive interest upon all his advances in the intermediate period. I lay out of consideration the purchase of the Jamestown lot, and one third of the Ferry farm from Isabel, because they were never paid for, and added nothing substantially to the funds of Ezekiel, and do not constitute any part of the fund for the payment of the father's debts.

Here then we have a case, where the trust fund, for the payment of the father's debts, valued by the parties at $10,000, at the very time when the amount of those debts was in course of being judicially ascertained, and before it was actually ascertained, was applied to the exclusive discharge of the debts of the devisee. The father's debts were a known charge upon the estate, and the purchaser knowingly assisted the devisee, who, as to his charge, was also a trustee, to dispose of this estate in payment of his own debts, without in any shape providing for the principal charge. The surplus, after that charge was satisfied, was all that belonged to the devisee; and yet the purchaser assisted the devisee in misapplying the fund, in the first instance, to other purposes. The father's debts have been since ascertained to be about $7,400, not one cent of which has ever been paid by the devisee; and no part of the purchase money, as will be presently seen, has ever come to the hands of the devisee to enable him to discharge those debts. And all this transaction was negotiated and consummated between the parties, with the will before them, upon full deliberation, under their own exposition of the law, and up on the suggestion, that the purchaser was not bound to look to the application of the purchase money.

I agree to the doctrine, in cases of a general charge of debts, that the purchaser need not look to the application, if he has bona fide paid the same. When he has once, in good faith, paid it into the hands of the devisee, he is exonerated. But he is not at liberty to assist in its misapplication; he is not to buy the trust property in payment of antecedent debts, or to aid the devisee in diverting the fund from its proper uses; and if he does, a court of equity will fasten on the estate in his hands the original charge, which he has attempted to displace. It appears, in point of fact, that a sum a little short of $6,000 of the purchase money was, with Mr. Potter's assent, applied to the payment of Ezekiel's own debts, and of this sum more than one half went to extinguish a debt due to himself. But it is necessary to trace the transaction somewhat farther, in order to show, that the parties have always acted with the utmost indifference as to the rights of the father's creditors, and have sheltered themselves, under a supposed rule of law, for any misapplication of the fund. In June, 1820, Ezekiel, notwithstanding the relief already afforded him, was again pressed for some debts. He had then in his possession the note for the purchase money of $8,801. It was then agreed, that Mr. Potter should advance a farther sum to Ezekiel to pay his debts; that Ezekiel should surrender the right of selling the estate for more than $15,000, retained by the former bargain; that the note of $8,801 should be given up; and that the sum which, on a settlement, should be found due to Ezekiel, should be secured to be paid to him on the 25th of March, 1822, partly by a cash note, and partly by a note payable "in mortgages in the town of South Kingston, or in the state of New York." Accordingly Mr. Potter paid to Ezekiel's creditors, by his own notes about $3,705, and Ezekiel gave up the right of reselling the estate, and also the cash note of $8,801. Mr. Potter ascertained his advances, together with interest, to be $7,070.38, leaving a balance due from the purchase of the estate, of $7,929.62. For this last sum Mr. Potter gave two notes antedated as of the 25th of March, one a negotiable cash note for $4,000, the other a note for $3,929.62, payable to Ezekiel, or order, on the 25th of March, 1822, "in mortgages in the town of South Kingston, or in the state of New York." It is not my duty to comment on the wisdom or policy of such an extraordinary bargain, so far as it respects the pecuniary interests of the devisee. It does indeed seem to me utterly unaccountable, how a bargain so indefinite in some of its terms and objects, and so little suited to the exigency of his embarrassed situation, should have received the deliberate assent of the devisee. A readier scheme to disable him from the present means of discharging his debts, without great sacrifices, could have hardly been imagined.

The original note was negotiable, and capable of being turned into cash at any time at a reasonable discount; but by the exchange, nearly a moiety of the amount was invested in a security, not only not negotiable, but so loose in its terms and obligation, that its real value was incapable of any exact appreciation. It appears, also from the answer of the devisee, that the negotiable note of $4,000 was immediately indorsed over to his sister Isabel, and an assignment also made of $1,800, part of the other note, by way of payment, or security, for the estate bought of her by the devisee. And this arrangement was most probably contemplated by all the parties, when the negotiation, in June, 1820, was first entered into. It will at once be perceived, that deducting the amount thus justly secured to Isabel, the whole of the purchase money was exhausted excepting about $2,000; and the latter sum was locked up in undefined mortgages in South Kingston or New York. So that the whole trust fund was in effect gone from the reach of the creditors, the greater part being applied to the extinguishment of Ezekiel's own debts; and what remained was appropriated to other purposes. The very tenor of the note for the mortgages was calculated to embarrass, if not to defeat, any chance for redress; for the option, as to what mortgages should be taken or received, belonged to the parties, and could not be very easily, if at all, exercised by the creditors or strangers. The transaction was about the time, when the commissioners made their report of the father's debts to the court of probate; and as all the parties lived in South Kingston, the amount must have been in a great measure previously ascertained, and could scarcely have escaped the inquiry or attention of any persons interested in the estate. There is, beside, the still stronger fact, that controversies had then arisen between the plaintiffs and the devisee in respect to this very matter; and a suit was avowedly in contemplation to ascertain and adjust their respective rights. To no person was this better known than to Mr. Potter. Now, when he had notice of the non-payment of the debts, and of the application to the devisee to have them paid, of the negotiations for the purpose of an amicable settlement, and of the failure to accomplish that object, he was put upon legal notice and inquiry: and he could not farther negotiate with Ezekiel, in respect to the funds then in his hands, without being liable to have his proceedings scrutinized in a court of equity. There is much other matter in the case, which is open to observation; but the conclusion, to which the court has arrived, renders any discussion of it unnecessary. That conclusion is, that the sale by the devisee, under the circumstances, was a manifest breach of trust, in violation of his duty to the creditors, and subversive of the great object of the testator in the devise in question.

The next consideration is, whether Mr. Potter was conusant of this breach of trust, and, upon the facts already stated, it seems beyond all doubt, that he had full knowledge of the breach, was a party to it, and voluntarily assisted in the misapplication of the purchase money. He can shelter himself from responsibility in a court of equity only by showing himself to be a bona fide purchaser, who has not aided in such misapplication. In no proper sense can he be considered as such a purchaser. He has chosen to apply the purchase money, so far as it has yet been paid, or liquidated, to the exclusive payment of the devisee's debts, and not of the debts of the testator. In this way he has been privy to the expenditure and appropriation of nearly $8,000, according to his own account of the matter; and, as to the residue of the purchase money, so far from paying it to the devisee, or applying it to the discharge of the testator's debts, he has aided in closing it up in mortgages of an undefined nature, and thus precluded it from being applied as a present fund for the purposes of the trust. Unless the court, therefore, is ready to surrender its duty, it can have no difficulty in holding, that the Ferry farm, to the extent of the estate devised to Ezekiel, remains still charged and chargeable, in the hands of Mr. Potter, with the debts of the testator. I had some doubt, originally, whether Isabel, the daughter of the testator, ought not to have been made a party to the bill, since, according to the allegations in the answer, she has an interest in the outstanding purchase money for the debt due to her. But I am now entirely satisfied, that she is no necessary party to the bill. No decree can be made against her. She is no party to the asserted breach of trust; and has no interest, which can be affected by any decree between the present parties. If she has any lien on the estate for the unpaid purchase money, it is only upon that part of it, which was conveyed by her. As to her interest in any of the notes, the court will do nothing that can disturb her rights; it will act altogether upon that portion of the estate and purchase money, which does not interfere with her claims.

Having stated these results, it remains only to advert to the objection, that the present plaintiffs are not competent to maintain the present suit, because they have not yet paid the testator's debts. The argument is, that the creditors alone have a right to maintain a suit to enforce the charge, unless they have been paid by the executrix or the devisees. The right of the creditors to enforce the charge in equity cannot be doubted. See Green v. Lowes, 3 Brown, Ch. 218. But I am also of opinion that the executrix, who, by the law of the state, is responsible for the payment of the debts, where there are real or personal assets, has also a right to enforce the charge. She might procure a license from the proper authority to sell the real estate, upon a deficiency of the personal assets, pursuant to the statute. She might in this way, perhaps, reach the estate charged with the debts; but the remedy would be circuitous, and might be inadequate to all the purposes of equity. She is not compellable to adopt that course; but may directly, by the assistance of a court of equity, reach the fund, which, in the eyes of such a court, is appropriated for the payment of the debts. If she can do this after payment of the debts, there is no reason why she may not do it before, since she is entitled to avert an impending mischief, and is not bound to advance her own money to pay the creditors. Besides, the testator has disposed of all his real and personal estate by his will, and the executrix, who is residuary legatee and devisee, has no right to apply the personal estate, bequeathed to other legatees, to the payment of the debts, when there are other funds appropriated for the purpose; and she has a direct interest to relieve property devised to herself from the burden of the debts. The like remark equally applies to the other plaintiffs, who are devisees exonerated by the will from any contribution or lien. I entertain no doubt, therefore, that the plaintiffs are competent to maintain the present suit. It is the common case of a party subjected to a burden chargeable upon her in law; but from which she is entitled to be relieved in equity, by a paramount obligation on another to exonerate her from the whole burthen. Upon the whole, this is, in my judgment, a clear case for equitable relief, and I shall decree it according to the principles already suggested.

[NOTE. An appeal was taken by Elisha R. Potter to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was modified, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion, in which it was held that so much of the decree of the circuit court as may subject Potter to the payment of the debts of Peleg Gardner beyond the purchase money remaining in his hands, and beyond the money paid by him in discharge of the debts of Ezekiel W. Gardner, after deducting therefrom the amount of the estate purchased from Ezekiel by his sister Isabel, ought to be reversed, and that in all other things it ought to be affirmed. 12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 498.

[The cause being remanded to the circuit court, the decree of the supreme court was referred to a master who made a report, upon which exceptions were taken, but overruled, and a decree pro forma entered against Potter for the payment of $5,972.42, with interest on the same from the time the report was made, and also for the payment of $2,662.23, with interest from the same time, provided that same should not be paid by Ezekiel W. Gardner or collected from him by execution. From this decree, Potter again appealed to the supreme court, where it was held, Mr. Justice McLean delivering the opinion, that as the purchase money was not to be paid by Potter until the 25th of March, 1822, no interest should be charged against him prior to that time, and his objection to the payment of any interest on the ground that it was not in his power to pay the money and discharge his obligation before the final decree in the case was disregarded upon the ground that he could have discharged himself from the payment of interest by bringing into court whatever balance he conceived to be due, and paying it over under order of the court. As this was not done, it appears that the defendant below did not do all that was in his power to exempt himself from the charge of interest.

[The last decree of the supreme court was to the effect that there was error in so much of the decree of the circuit court as subjects Potter to the payment of interest from the 16th of October, 1820, and that said decree be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded with directions to enter a decree that said Potter pay into the registry of the circuit court, within 30 days from the next term, the sum of $3,929.62, with interest from March 25, 1822, to be paid over to the complainants or to the creditors of Peleg Gardner, and that a decree be entered that Ezekiel W. Gardner pay into the registry of the court, subject to its order, within 30 days as aforesaid, the sum of $1,751.74, with interest from March 25, 1822, for which he is in the first instance liable, and the said Potter ultimately. 5 Pet. PATENTS — VALIDITY — IMPROVEMENT IN CHAIR SEATS—ANTICIPATION—NOVELTY.

1. The reissued letters patent granted to George Gardner, William Gardner and Jane E. Gardner, July 4th, 1876, for an "improvement in chair seats," (the original patent having been granted to George Gardner and Gardner & Gardner, May 21st, 1872, on the invention of George Gardner,) are void.

2. The invention consisted in constructing chair seats of two or more veneers of wood, with the grains crossing each other, the veneers being glued together by an adhesive substance, and in perforating the seat with holes, for ventilation and ornament.

3. All except the perforations is described in letters patent granted to John K. Mayo, December 26th, 1865, for "improved material for roofing, tubing, tank, wainscotting, boats, and other structures," and in division E of the reissue of that patent, granted August 18th, 1868.

4. As to the perforations, the invention was not patentable, because sheet metal seats of chairs had before been perforated, also india rubber and gutta percha seats for chairs.

[This was a bill in equity by William Gardner and others against Martin Herz and John K. Mayo.]

Andrew J. Todd, for plaintiffs.

Frost & Coe, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This is a motion for a preliminary injunction, founded on reissued letters patent [No. 7,203] granted to George Gardner, William Gardner and Jane E. Gardner, July 4th, 1876, for an "improvement in chair seats," the original patent [No. 127,045] having been granted to George Gardner and Gardner & Gardner, May 21st, 1872, on the invention of George Gardner. The specification of the reissue states, that the "invention relates to bottoms for seats, and consists in constructing the said seats of two or more veneers of wood, with the grains crossing each other, the said veneers of wood being glued together by an adhesive substance;" that "veneers, when thus arranged, that is to say, with the grains crossing each other, or diversified, will make a seat which, for durability and economy, will be found to be a very useful improvement;" that the seat may be made "either solid or perforated;" that "the perforated seats are made by boring a round hole, of any design desired;" that "the perforated seats are desirable, as they are ventilated and ornamental;" that "the veneers, with the grains crossed or diversified and glued together, become homogeneous, thus making a solid piece of wood," from which the bottom of the seat is made, "which, when perforated and varnished, is ready for the market;" that "veneers, when thus arranged, that is to say, with the grain running crosswise or in diverse directions, will make a bottom for a seat, which, for economy and durability, will be found to be a very useful improvement;" and that "the bottoms thus made may be left solid, or perforated after some design agreeable to the fancy of the one having them made." The specification also states, that a slight concave configuration may be given to the seat, to add to the comfort of the party using it; and that the bottom thus made is secured to a frame, which surrounds it, and, through the latter, is secured to the frame of the seat. The claims are six in number: "1. As a new article of manufacture, a bottom for a seat, constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, with the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and the whole secured together with an adhesive substance, substantially as set forth. 2. As a new article of manufacture, a bottom for a seat frame, constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, with the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, said layers being secured together by an adhesive substance, and having perforations formed therein for the purpose of ventilation or ornamentation, substantially as set forth. 3. The combination of a seat bottom, constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, with the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and the whole secured together by an adhesive substance, with the frame of the seat, substantially as set forth. 4. The combination of a seat bottom, constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and the whole secured together by an adhesive substance, and provided with perforations for the purpose of ventilation or ornamentation, with the frame of a seat, substantially as set forth. 5. As a new article of manufacture, a wooden bottom for seats, provided with perforations for the purpose of ventilation or ornamentation. 6. As a new article of manufacture, a seat bottom constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and secured together by an adhesive substance, said bottom thus formed having a curved or concave configuration on its upper side, substantially as set forth." The defendants make seat bottoms constructed of two or more veneers or thin layers of wood, with the grain of the one layer crossing that of the other, and the whole secured together with an adhesive substance; and there are slots or slits cut through the seat, as long as the length of the seat bottom from front to rear, leaving longitudinal holes of that length, and thus forming ribs or slats, the effect of which is to make the seat bottom yielding and elastic.

A patent was granted to the defendant Mayo, December 26th, 1865, for "improved material for roofing, tubing, tank, wainscotting, boats and other structures." The specification of that patent states, that the invention is an "improvement in the manufacture of material for structures generally." The specification says: "The scale used in the ensuing description consists of a thin layer of wood cut from a board or log and forming a veneer. My invention consists in cementing together a number of these scales or veneers, with the grain of the successive pieces running crosswise or diversely. A number of these scale boards, their surfaces having been previously treated with cement or analogous materials, are so laid together as to cross the grain of the respective pieces, so as to form a firm material for the construction of houses, boats, ships, tanks, floors, pipes, drains, sewers, packing cases, boxes, barrels, sidewalks, cans, pails, tubs, firkins, measures, cheese boxes, trunks, valises, dry docks, canal locks, mill and factory flumes, masts, spars, outside covering and inside finish of houses, stores, shops, depots and warehouses, fences, covering of piles, railroad cars, railroad and suspension bridges, railroad tracks and sleepers, wagons, carriages and carts, bedsteads, sacking, mattresses and covering of beds, sofas and sofa bedsteads, divans, lounges, chairs and settees. In house architecture, the weather boarding and inside finish of the house may consist of this material, and in vessels of every kind it may be made the covering or lining of the ribs or skeleton, or, in some instances, may form the body of the articles, as, for instance, in pipes, in which the layers are united by an impervious cement, and so applied to each other that the grain of one will be lengthwise of the pipe, of another will be at the right angles to the former, and, if others are added, may be spirally around it. By the well-known processes of wet and dry heating, such a pliability may be given to the layers as to permit them to readily assume various figures, or be laid upon irregular objects, with the grain of the respective pieces running diversely, so as to prevent splitting. I cannot pretend to anticipate all the various uses to which this scale board may be applied, but, suffice it to say, that, by the means employed, I am enabled to make a very strong and light structure, of whatever shape it may be, or for whatever purpose it may be designed. It is capable of being made an effective and elegant substitute for the usual covering of the walls of rooms. For flooring it is also available, especially in cases where it is an object to make apartments air-tight, as in ice-houses, fruit chambers and other rooms which it is desired to isolate for any purpose." The claim of the patent is: "The application of scale boards or veneers in layers, the direction of whose grain is crossed or diversified, and which are connected together, forming a material for the construction, lining or covering of land and marine structures." This patent was reissued August 18th, 1868, in eight divisions, on eight separate amended specifications, to John K. Mayo, Andre Cushing and G. B. Cushing. Division E is a reissue for an "improvement in house decorations, furniture, fittings and the like." The specification says: "The invention consists in constructing various house decorations, furnishings and fittings of a plurality of scale boards or thin sheets or veneers of wood, cemented or otherwise firmly connected together, with the several scales or thicknesses so placed that the joints (ends or edges) shall be broken by each alternate layer, and the grain of the wood crossed or diversified, so that they will afford to each other mutual strength, support and protection against checking, splitting, swelling or shrinking. * * * In the chair, fig. 2, the bottom, B, may be formed of a flexible material, made up by the union of two or more thin layers of wood, having the grain crossed or diversified in direction, and united by suitable cement." Various other articles of house decoration, fitting and furnishing are specified, to the construction of which the invention is stated to be applicable. The claim is: "The employment or use of the compound scale board hereinbefore described, in the formation of the specified or analogous structures or articles of house decoration, fitting and furnishing."

What is claimed in the first claim of the Gardner reissued patent is clearly described in the two Mayo patents, both of which were issued prior to the original Gardner patent. The original Gardner patent claimed, "as a new article of manufacture, a chair seat constructed of veneers of wood with the grain running crosswise of each other, and glued together, all substantially as set forth, and for the purposes specified." The specification stated, that "the seats may be left solid, or perforated after some design agreeable to the fancy of the one having them made," but there was no claim in respect of any perforations. On what ground the patent office granted the claim of the original Gardner patent, or the first claim of the reissued Gardner patent, in view of the original and reissued Mayo patents, it is impossible to conjecture. The only conclusion can be that the Mayo patents were twice overlooked.

The next subject is the perforations. A reissued patent was granted to Isaac P. Tice, as assignee of Austin S. Smith, the inventor, June 27th, 1865, for an "improved chair bottom or back," the original patent having been granted to said Smith, May 25th, 1858. The specification of the reissue describes the making of the bottoms or seats of chairs of perforated sheet metal, and attaching the edges of the sheet of perforated metal to a supporting frame of wood or other stiff material of suitable form, by nails, tacks or other suitable fastenings. It states that the perforations may be of any suitable form, as circular or of a form resembling the reticulations produced by interlacing the strips of cane in a cane bottom; that the sheet metal is not only as good as cane in coolness and in the ventilation it affords to the clothing of persons, but is cheaper and more durable and so much smoother as to be less destructive to wearing apparel. A patent was granted to J. W. Cochran, May 22d, 1866, for a "chair, sofa and car seat." The specification states that the "invention consists in the employment of india rubber or gutta percha enamelled in whole or perforated (open worked) sheets for the seats and backs of chairs, sofas, car seats, carriages and lining thereof and for mattresses;" and that "the material may be attached either by lacing, gluing, cementing, screwing or nailing." The drawing shows a chair seat with circular perforations in it. A chair seat of perforated sheet metal, or perforated enamelled india rubber or gutta percha, has every feature of ventilation and ornamentation, as resulting from the perforations, that the perforated chair seat of the Gardner patent has. The perforations in the Gardner seat are not described as serving any other end than ventilation and ornamentation. In view of the prior perforated seats there was no patentable novelty in perforating a wooden bottom. No claim is made that the defendants have infringed the sixth claim of the Gardner reissue. As to the first five claims there is nothing new or patentable in them, in view of the above references.

The motion is, therefore, denied.

[NOTE. On February 24, 1880, a second reissue (No. 9,094) was granted. Subsequently a suit was brought for its infringement, the defendants setting up want of novelty of the invention, and denying the validity of both reissues. The court declared the patent void, and dismissed the bill. 12 Fed. 491. This decision was afterwards affirmed by the supreme court on appeal. 118 U. S. 180, 6 Sup. Ct. 1027.]

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY — SECURITY FOR DISCHARGE FROM ARREST—SUPREME COURT RULES OF 1845—WARRANT IN PERSONAM— STIPULATION FOR COSTS — NON-IMPRISONMENT ACTS — MARITIME COURTS.

1. The practice of the English admiralty and the former practice of the district court, in respect to the security required to be given by a respondent arrested upon bailable warrant, in order to authorize his discharge from the arrest, stated.

2. The standing rules of the district court relating to bail stipulations to be given on the execution of a warrant in personam, and to the method of enforcing them, are superseded by the supreme court rules of 1845, upon the same subject; and stipulations must now be exacted conformably to the supreme court rules.

3. A respondent, arrested in an admiralty suit, is not entitled, upon the return day of the warrant, to be discharged from arrest, on giving a stipulation for costs, pursuant to the rule of the district court, but he must remain in custody until he gives bond or stipulation to satisfy the decree made against him.

[Cited in Pope v. Seckworth, 46 Fed. 859.]

4. The non-imprisonment act of the state of New York (1 Rev. St. 807, § 1), is made to be within this state the law of the United States also by force of the acts of congress of 1839 and 1841 (5 Stat. 321, 410); but it does not embrace arrests upon process issuing out of a maritime court.[2] It is limited to civil process issuing out of courts of law, and executions issuing out of courts of equity.

[Cited in Hanson v. Fowle, Case No. 6,041.]

Three actions in personam were brought, by Joseph Gardner, Samuel Lockwood, and Mordecai T. Bunyan, respectively, against Michael Isaacson. The respondent was arrested on three warrants issued in the three causes, and was held in custody by the marshal. A motion was now made in each of the causes that the respondent be discharged from custody. The grounds upon which the motion was made appear sufficiently in the opinion of the court.

Griffin & Larocque, for motion.
W. Q. Morton and D. McMahon, opposed.

BETTS, District Judge. The respondent having been arrested on bailable warrants in personam, issued out of this court, in these three causes, and having given no bail to the marshal, was held in custody under the arrest. On the return day of the warrant, the respondent entered into stipulations, conformably to the terms of rule 38 of this court, adopted in 1838; and a motion is now made in his behalf, that he be forthwith discharged. The libellants insist that the marshal is bound to retain the respondent in custody until bail-bonds or stipulations are executed pursuant to the supreme court rules of 1845.

The question raised by the motion is, whether the respondent is entitled to his release, on giving stipulations, with sureties, that he will appear and pay all costs decreed against him, and will himself perform and abide all orders and decrees of the court in the cause, or deliver himself personally for commitment in execution thereof,—such being the course of practice in this court; or whether the rules adopted by the supreme court of the United States, in 1845, have established a different practice in this respect, which the respondent is bound to comply with. By the practice of the English court, as laid down by Clarke, and recognized by Browne, the respondent, on his arrest, is compelled to give bail to the marshal in a sum sufficient to cover the matter in demand, conditional for his appearance on return of the process. This stipulation was pronounced forfeited if he failed to enter his appearance on the day, and he was adjudged in contempt, and subjected to commitment or other process in satisfaction of the demand. This bail stipulation, it would seem, was originally regarded as a penalty, and its forfeiture was by way of mulct, and accrued to the admiral, and was not allotted to the satisfaction of the libellant. The appearance, according to the condition of that bond, was effected by entering into stipulation apud acta, with approved sureties, judicatum solvi; that is, to satisfy the final and all interlocutory decrees of the court in the cause. These are the fundamental properties and effects of an appearance in the English admiralty. Clarke, Praxis Adm. tits. 3, 4, 5, 9, 12; Browne, Civ. Law, 432. This was substantially so in the earlier maritime codes (Consulato del Mare, c. 40); and the regulations coincide with the course of the civil law in the same classes of procedure. Wood, Civ. Law. 245. The doctrine has also been embodied a long time in the rules of American courts. Dunl. Adm. Pr. 144; Greenl. Ov. Cas. This court, in its code of rules adopted in 1838, studiously varied the responsibility imposed on sureties by the antecedent practice. The appearance of the respondent was perfected by his becoming personally bound by stipulation to perform the judgment or decree rendered against him; but his sureties were placed on the same footing as those of the actor or libellant as to the amount they were to pay absolutely; in effect subjecting fidei jussores in admiralty in the position of bail to the action at common law. They could not be charged beyond the costs accruing in the litigation, if the defendant surrendered himself for commitment under the final decree. Betts, Adm. 40; Dunl. Adm. Pr. 147; Dist. Ct. Rules, 21, 38, 39.

The act of congress of May 8, 1792, § 2 (1 Stat. 276), designated the forms of process, and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits at common law, in equity and admiralty, with authority to the courts to vary them at discretion, "subject to such regulations as the supreme court of the United States shall think proper, from time to time, by rule to prescribe to any circuit or district court concerning the same." The act of August 23, 1842, § 6 (5 Stat. 518), if it confers no more ample powers on the supreme court to regulate the practice of the district and circuit courts of the United States, yet manifestly implies a mandate on the court to perform that duty. In January term, 1845, the supreme court exercised that power in relation to the practice of all the federal courts in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction on the instance side of the courts. 3 How. Introd. And accordingly those directions, in respect to practice, became the supreme law to all inferior courts, in the particulars regulated by them. Rule 2 authorizes, in suits in personam, a warrant of arrest of the person of the defendant, in the nature of a capias, with an attachment clause against his property or credits, in case he cannot be found, or by a simple monition, in the nature of a summons, to appear and answer the suit. Rule 3 provides, that when the warrant of arrest is executed, the marshal may take bail, with sufficient sureties from the party arrested, by bond or stipulation, upon condition that he will appear in the suit, and abide by all the orders of the court, interlocutory or final in the cause, and pay the money awarded by the final decree rendered therein in the court to which the process is returnable, or in any appellate court. And upon such bond or stipulation, summary process of execution may and shall be issued against the principal and sureties by the court to which such process is returnable, to enforce the final decree so rendered, or upon appeal by the appellate court. This is the established form of the undertaking of stipulators in the English admiralty. Marr. Form. 272, 316. The standing rule of this court was, that on warrants to arrest the person in admiralty and maritime causes, the marshal might take bail in the form of a stipulation, and in the sum endorsed on the warrant, conditioned for the appearance of the party on the return day to answer to the libellant in a cause civil and maritime, according to the course of the court. Dist. Ct. Rules, 21, 38. These rules are superseded and displaced by that of the supreme court, before cited. The marshal can no longer accept stipulations pursuant to the district court rule, but must exact them in the more comprehensive terms prescribed by the supreme court. Again: The object of the stipulation directed by the rule of the district court was to carry into effect the warrant of arrest, and nothing more. It contemplated no remedy beyond bringing the defendant personally before the court, and retaining him under its authority. When brought into court, rule 38 provided the manner in which the respondent should become a party litigant, which would perfect his appearance in the action. The subject-matter acted upon by rules 21 and 38 of this court is the same which is specifically regulated by rule 3 of the supreme court: the latter determines the course of proceeding on the arrest, and before return of the process, and also the method by which the appearance of the defendant is to be entered and perfected. The bond or stipulation to the marshal effects both, and after that is given, no further step is to be taken in court in order to subject the respondent to its authority, or to secure the fulfilment of judgments or decrees, and this necessarily rescinds or dispenses with all other procedures to those ends.

The counsel for the respondent contends, that as he remained in custody of the marshal till the return day of the process, and then gave stipulations for his appearance, pursuant to the rules of the district court, he is entitled to be discharged from arrest, and is not bound to execute the bond or stipulation prescribed by the supreme court rule, for three reasons: (1) That the bond demanded is in the nature of bail to the sheriff on an arrest at common law, and cannot be exacted after the return day of the writ, as the party is then in court, and the exigency of the writ is thus satisfied, and cannot act further in coercion of the defendant. (2) That rule 46 of the supreme court saves in full force the application and effect of the district court rules to an arrest so circumstanced, because the method of appearing is not fixed or regulated by any rule of the supreme court. (3) That rule 25 refers cases situated as these are, to the discretion of the court, to compel stipulations to be given for costs only.

The analogy of the common-law practice is not a very close one; but, so far as it goes, the argument from it rather tends to oppose than support the conclusion sought to be established by the respondent. The bail to the sheriff is similar in character to the civil law stipulation in judicio sisti. It only aims to secure the presence of the person in court. But the sheriff is not exonerated merely by producing the body. He must hold the party in custody until another and more stringent undertaking is entered into by him, consummating his appearance according to the course of the court, which is to abide there and perform the final order or judgment in the cause. So here, merely having the respondent under his authority on the return day of the process, or producing him in facie curiae, in no way satisfies the mandate of arrest or exonerates the marshal. The process continues in life and acting upon the defendant, until it fulfils the purpose of the arrest, which manifestly is to compel him to furnish a stipulation in the terms given by the rule, and to that end his custody must necesarily continue until the appropriate stipulation is produced, because the mandate of arrest is executed and made complete in that manner alone. In the view I take of the subject, the matter is specifically provided for by rule 3 of the supreme court, and there is accordingly nothing in these arrests outside the provisions of that rule, coming within the policy of rule 46, and still remaining under the authority of this court.

But it is insisted, for the respondent, that if this construction of the rules is adopted, that then rule 25 of the supreme court supplies the law of these cases, and relieves the party and his sureties from liability other than for costs; and whether that obligation shall be exacted, is left to the discretion of this court. The terms of rule 25 are, that in all cases of libel in personam, the court may, in its discretion, upon the appearance of the defendant, where no bail has been taken and no attachment of property has been made to answer the exigency of the suit, require the defendant to give a stipulation, with sureties, in such sums as the court shall direct, to pay all costs and expenses which shall be awarded against him in the suit, upon the final adjudication thereof, or by any interlocutory order in the process of the suit. This rule evidently has relation to the different modes of bringing a defendant before the court designated by the second rule. If he is proceeded against by citation or summons only, there is no compulsory authority acting upon him, and the libellant has no security, either against his person or his estate, for the demand in prosecution. All that is imposed upon the defendant by the rules in such cases is, that he shall indemnify the libellant against the costs to be created by his interposing a defence and contestation to the action. But in the coercive method of procedure by arrest of the body or attachment of property, the warrant being executed, rule 25 can, in no just interpretation, be understood as intending to deprive the libellant of the security thereby acquired, and set the defendant or his property free from the attachment on a mere stipulation for costs. Acting under the rule thus construed, the court could not interpolate a condition that the defendant should also surrender himself for commitment; and if it is interpreted conformably to the claim of the respondent, a defendant need only, when arrested, refuse to give bail before the return day of the warrant, and then he will be entitled to a free discharge on intervening and giving a stipulation for costs, and thus all the privileges and securities provided by the rules of the supreme court, as consequent to his arrest, will be abrogated or evaded. I am satisfied such construction of the rules cannot be sustained. It was obviously the purpose of the supreme court to place the admiralty practice, in each of the United States courts, substantially on the same footing of the English practice. That practice, under the first process act, in 1789, was adopted by congress. 1 Stat. 93. It had remained essentially the rule of practice since that period, in the various district courts, but some deviations from it existed. [Manro v. Almeida] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 486. The supreme court designed, by rules 2 and 3, to abolish such diversities of practice, and render the remedies and rights of parties uniform in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, in all the courts of the Union. The letter and spirit of the regulations of the supreme court, in my judgment, require that a defendant in custody, under a warrant of arrest in an admiralty case, shall so remain until he makes his appearance by giving bond or stipulation to satisfy the decree that may be rendered against him.

It is urged that the acts of congress abolishing imprisonment for debt govern this procedure, and that the federal courts have now no authority to hold parties under arrest on mere civil process. The acts of 1839 and 1841 (5 Stat. 321, 410), abolish imprisonment for debt, on process issuing out of any court of the United States, in all cases whatever where, by the laws of the state in which the said court shall be held, imprisonment for debt has been or shall hereafter be abolished. The act to abolish imprisonment for debt was passed in this state, April 26, 1831, and it enacts that no person shall be arrested or imprisoned on any civil process issuing out of any court of law, or on any execution issuing out of any court of equity, in any suit for the recovery of money, &c. 1 Rev. St. 807, § 1. This statute is made the law of the United States, also, by force of the acts of congress above referred to, and had the proceeding in these causes been on the law side of the district or circuit court, the defendant would have been exempt from liability to arrest, and to give surety to perform the decree of the court. The principle of the act would seem to include arrests by maritime courts (on matters of contract), and for the recovery of money, no less than when made by courts of law. But the words of the statute do not embrace both. They are limited to civil process issuing out of a court of law, and the legislature found it necessary to provide expressly for executions issuing out of chancery, as not embraced within the previous description of process from a court of law; much less can a maritime court be regarded as falling within the designation. The acts of congress of 1789, 1792, and 1793 demonstrate that laws relating to the practice of courts of law, do not include that of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Non-imprisonment acts, of the tenor of that passed in this state, had been very common, indeed almost universal, throughout the United States, previous to the promulgation of the code of rules by the supreme court in 1845. That court, in framing these rules, necessarily construed those laws as not applying to proceedings in maritime courts, and accordingly the antecedent scope and effect of that description of process was left in force.

It is unnecessary, and might be unbecoming, after the action of the supreme court upon the subject, to intimate what order this court might feel itself authorized or required to make, if the question as to the effect of those statutes upon its process [under the provisions of the acts of congress of 1839 and 1841 alone][3] had been brought to its consideration prior to the promulgation of the rules of the supreme court. That code must be regarded an authoritative exposition of the non-imprisonment acts in relation to admiralty process. The duty of the inferior court is limited to receiving and executing the law given by its superior. The highest tribunal of the land having, since the enactment of those acts, established the process employed in this case, I shall forbear any further general reasoning upon the subject, and hold these warrants of arrest valid, and and on all the points raised, deny the motion of the respondent for his discharge. Order accordingly.

4. After verdict it is too late to object the want of profert of letters of administration—or that the action is in the debet and detinet.

Debt [by Gardner's administrator] against the maker of a promissory note—Pleas nil debet, and a discharge under the insolvent act of Virginia.

THE COURT refused to admit the record of the discharge to be given in evidence because it was not authenticated by a certificate of the presiding magistrate, according to the act of congress (1 Stat. 122).

Mr. Mason, for defendant, contended that the act of limitations might be given in evidence on nil debet. Esp. N. P. 147, 262; Roades v. Barnes, 1 Burrows 9; Draper v. Glassop, 1 Ld. Raym. 153; Darby v. Boucher, 1 Salk. 278.

Mr. Woodward, for plaintiff. There is a difference between debt for rent, and debt on a bond or note. In the first case the debt arises only from the enjoyment of the thing demised. But upon a bond a debt is acknowledged. Esp. N. P. 233, 234.

THE COURT refused to admit the act of limitations to be given in evidence. See [Lindo v. Gardner] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 343; [note B., Append.] Id. 462, 465. After verdict for the plaintiff, it was moved, in arrest of judgment, 1st, That debt will not lie on a promissory note. 2d, That it does not appear that letters of administration were granted to the plaintiff. 3d, That the action is in the debet and detinet.

THE COURT, at a subsequent term, decided that debt would lie on a promissory note, and that the other two objections were too late after verdict.

Reversed by the supreme court of the United States (1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 343) because an action of debt will not lie in Maryland, upon a promissory note.

Mariners' wages and claim for short allowance. Also petitions of the master

[Cooper] and physician for payment out of remnants and surplus. The voyage was from Philadelphia to Canton, and back to Philadelphia, with liberty to go to other intermediate ports. A suit was commenced for mariners' wages, in which sundry disputes arose, of no general importance. The wages were decreed, and the vessel directed to be sold for their amount, together with a sum adjudged to the seamen for 26 days short allowance of provisions, at one day's pay to each mariner for every day full allowance was not served out. It was contended that, with respect to some of the mariners shipped in foreign ports, the voyage should be considered, so far as they were concerned, as commencing at the ports of shipping them respectively. And as the act of congress only contemplated voyages from the United States, the case of a seaman engaged in a foreign port was not within its purview. But this objection was overruled for the following reasons. The voyage was entire, and commenced at Philadelphia, and there ended. The intermediate circumstances became engrafted into the entire voyage, and this rode over all subordinate considerations. There could be no subdivisions, or apportionments, except as to the time of service of the respective individuals, which determined the amount severally due to them. Endless confusion and difficulties would arise, from such distinctions among the crew, each of whom participated in the general contract, and had the same rights to any benefits, as they shared in all disadvantages, arising out of that contract. The deficiencies of provisions accrued on the home passage, in which all the mariners were alike engaged. The decision in the case of Mariners v. The Washington [Case No. 9,086], was taken as the guide to determine the quantity and species of provisions required on a voyage from China; and the navy ration, the rule by which the allowance was adjusted. Substitutes for articles enumerated in the law on this subject, were allowed. The live-stock, though legally excluded, was, by consent counted in, and yet there was a large deficit on the whole. The payment for the short allowance, at the rate directed by law, was therefore decreed. The ship was sold by the marshal, under the decree; and the monies arising from the sale, were brought into court. There remained a surplus or remnant, after payment of all sums adjudged to be paid, and the costs and charges, accruing in the suit, and on the sale. A petition of James Cooper, the master, was presented, stating, that he had expended, during the voyage, for pilotage, mariners' wages, and other charges necessary for the use of the ship, $257, which remained unpaid. And that there were due to him, for wages as master, $827.60. Another petition, from William Baldwin, was also presented, stating, that he was employed as physician in and for the ship, on her voyage from Philadelphia to Antwerp, Canton, and back to Philadelphia. And that there remained due to him for his services on board, $167. The petitioners prayed that the sums due to them respectively, should be paid out of the surplus monies, remaining in court, after payment of all sums decreed, and the costs and charges thereon. The claim for payment to the petitioners was insisted on, under the authority of a dictum of Sir William Scott, in the case of The Favourite, which it was alleged, justified a payment to the master. 2 Rob. Adm. Cas. (Phila. Ed.) 197. The justice of his claim was farther enforced, by the reasoning in 2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 95, where the propriety of the master suing in the admiralty is advocated, though it is admitted not to be practised. Abb. Shipp. 94, was cited to shew, that money, paid by the master on a foreign voyage, was a lien on the ship. The general doctrine, that whatever court had possession of the principal, had power over all incidents, was relied on, to support the claim of the physician.

BY THE COURT. When I first came into this court, I made, in several instances, distribution of surplus monies, under the idea, that I had the power so to do, agreeably to the doctrine now stated, to justify me in granting the prayers of the petitions. But on experience, I found myself involved in many difficulties and mistakes, in the application of this doctrine. It was one among the mass of irregularities I had to encounter, before I established, by frequent decisions, and with much consideration, the general principles which now prevail. I found it best and safest, to fix some general rules, applicable to most cases, though at times, some anomalous instances should occur, inducing particular hardships. The rule, by which I have governed myself for several years past, is, that it shall appear, that a sum claimed out of the surplus or remnant, is either of itself, or in its origin, a lien on the ship, or other thing out of which the monies were produced. This rule is not only justified by the practice of the civil law, but in the English chancery, and even in their courts of common law, wherein they are governed, when the case requires, by the principles of other courts, having concurrent cognizance of the subject matter, either incidental, or in chief. Many authorities may be produced to support this position. In chancery, the monies arising from sales of lands, are distributed as liable to the same trusts or liens, to which the land itself was subjected; and so of the produce of any subject or thing, originating the suit, or matter, under the cognizance or the enquiry of the court. Whensoever the courts of common law have occasion to determine questions of admiralty jurisdiction or cognizance, the principles of decisions in the admiralty courts are pursued. Their strict adherence to preferences, given by liens at common law, is invariable. But it is rare indeed, if at all to be discovered, that liens on monies or other subjects, are attached by considerations not originally subsisting, or exclusively fixed.

With respect to the claim of the master, for sums paid abroad to mariners, or even here, I think, on principle, these, as well as monies advanced in foreign ports for necessaries, supplied to the ship on her voyage, (however it may be at the port of outfit, or where the owners reside) are liens, and the ship was hypothecated therefor. Claims of material men, for supplies afforded to a ship, are within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, and suable there, in England, as well as in other states. Pilotage is a necessary expenditure on a voyage. If a master pays demands for these claims, he represents the claimants, and the lien continues on the monies produced by the sale of the ship.[2] As to pilotage, the master is bound by the laws of Oleron, and other maritime laws, to pay it, for the safety of the ship and goods. In England a shipwright may sue in the admiralty, for building a ship for navigation on the sea (Rolle, Abr. 534), and for repairing a ship. Cro. Car. 296; cited in 2 Bac. Abr. (5th Ed.) 180. But as the laws of this state provide for shipwrights and material men at the port of outfit, and also regulate domestic pilotage, and the sums due and recoverable here, on that account I have generally referred parties exhibiting such claims, to the state jurisdictions; wishing to avoid all collisions and conflicts in such cases. I have confined this to domestic supplies and pilotage. Those furnished, or paid, in foreign ports, or here, on ships on their voyage, and not at a port of outfit, the owners being resident here, I have reimbursed, or distributed, out of surplus monies, where liens or hypothecations have appeared to me to have attached. I have also directed a surplus to be paid over to a master, where the owner or his authorized attorney or agent, did not appear. But this has been done with great caution. Wharfage has been allowed out of proceeds, as the wharfinger might detain the ship until payment.

I do not find any precedent or authority to warrant my granting the prayer of the master's petition, in the case before me, for his wages. His contract is clearly personal, and made with and on the credit of the owners resident here, and not on that of the ship. He is the owner's agent, and responsible to him for his acts, particularly those relating to mariners' contracts, and other transactions in the affairs of the ship. If in any thing he has done wrong, the owners may retain; and the contest is cognizable in another jurisdiction. If he is also answerable to those furnishing supplies by his order, and to the officers and mariners of the ship, he is indemnified by such claims being attached as liens on the ship, or the monies produced on sale, in addition to the owner's responsibility. He has a farther security in the right to collect the freight, and possess the fund out of which wages are payable. So that the law clearly distinguishes his case, as it respects wages, from those usually entitled to liens. I have paid out of surplus, the wages due to masters of Spanish ships, because the laws of Spain entitle them thereto: and I always am regulated, in the affairs of foreign ships, by the laws of the country to which they belong. I could discover no precedent for this in the laws of any other country.

The maritime laws of England,[3] existing before our Revolution, and consistent with our situation, are yet our laws. It is but recently that admiralty cases have been published. We have, therefore, unavoidably, recourse to their common law books, for authorities. These invariably shew, that the master "cannot sue in the admiralty court, for his contract is on the credit of the owners, and not, like that of the mariners, on the credit of the ship." 2 Rob. Adm. Cas. 196. These authorities, as well as the few maritime cases published, also point out what parties may sue in admiralty courts. See 2 Bac. Abr. (5th Ed.) 181, and authorities cited.

[2] Although, in strictness, it might be contended that the lien was discharged, by payment to those who only held it until satisfaction was made; I have thought myself authorized to give more latitude, from equitable considerations, in such cases, than the inflexibility of rigid legal rules would, perhaps, in general permit. These rules I venerate too much to take unwarrantable liberties with them. The allowance to the master in this case, was not opposed. He had the power to hypothecate the ship for necessaries, in a foreign port; and was under no obligation to advance his own money. Wherever these advances are made, every security for repayment should be encouraged.

[3] The maritime laws, when clearly adopted and settled, became part of the English common law, which is retained by us to this day, in all cases permitted by the principles of our government. In a former note on this subject,—Thompson v. The Catharina [Case No. 13,949],—I have either expressed myself improperly, or there was some mistake in copying. The words (after "the feudal parts of this law") "and such as are," should be struck out, so that it read, "the feudal parts of this law inconsistent with the principles," &c. So it may be said of any other parts of the common law, if such there be. But I do not mean to enter into any controversy, as to what parts, or in what cases, the common law is obligatory and directory in the courts of the United States, having on these subjects often declared my opinion. Whatever difference of sentiment there may exist, as to its being granted by the people—delegated to the federal courts—or it being required that so it should be—it must be indisputably known, to all who are well informed, that without the rules and provisions as settled and made by the common law, the courts would be inoperative. The parties having the privilege of suing therein, or those compelled to become suitors there, would find themselves in a destitute and hopeless condition. Proceedings must be new-modelled, and remedies defined and made efficient. Even crimes (as to the jurisdiction over which there is the most discontent and controversy) could not be

As to the reasonings and opinions of an elementary writer, (2 Browne, Civ. & Adm. Law, 95), whatever weight may be attached to them, as theories to shew what the law ought to be, I think it safest to be guided by what it is. I have had occasion to discuss, in several cases, the subjects of maritime jurisdiction. It will be found that I have endeavoured to establish it on similar principles, where from necessity I was compelled to reason, without a precedent to direct me. It is certainly founded, for the most part, on the subject matter, and not solely on the place of making the contract. But I do not wish to wander into theories, where respectable precedents can be found. All these are opposed to this writer's doctrine.

The authority of Sir William Scott, whose opinions I highly respect, where no diplomatic direction gives a bias to the judgment, is more to be depended upon. He seems to hold, that surplus and remnants have been distributed to the master; or rather, that "upon enquiry, no instance has been found, in which a master has been permitted to sue against proceeds in the registry, except in cases of mere remnants and surplus; and not even then, if there have been any adverse interests opposing it." I have a similar wish to that expressed by Sir W. Scott, to aid an unfortunate suitor. In that case, the bottomry creditor alone, appeared as adverse; and his lien reached the remnants and surplus.—So that Sir W. Scott was not under the necessity of explaining what he meant by "adverse interests," or whether he distinguished them, by such as were accompanied by liens, or general interests, without such preference. In the case under consideration, I am given to understand, that there are creditors of insolvent part owners, whose interests are adverse to the master's claim; and who certainly deem themselves equally entitled to payment; beside, if the master can obtain his object in this mode, it will establish a precedent for such applications in all future cases, wherein monies arising from sales of ships for wages, or other causes, are ordered into court. Thus a lien will be created; and, though not originally attaching directly, will be fixed by circuitous and indirect means. I shall continue to adhere to the principles I have endeavoured to establish, not to admit the distribution or payment of surplus, to others than those who originally had liens, or legal appropriations, on the object from which the monies in court were raised.

From what has been stated it appears, that there is no foundation for the claim of the physician. It is true that a court having possession of the principal, has power over its incidents. But these incidents must rise out of the principal, or be in connexion with it, or flow consequentially from it. Thus, if the original cause arises at sea, and matters happen on land dependent upon it, the admiralty has still jurisdiction. So of goods taken piratically, or as prize, at sea, and brought to land—sails, or other apparel or furniture, taken from a ship under cognizance of the admiralty, and brought to land. So of all questions consequential to that of prize, &c. See authorities cited, 2 Bac. Abr. 178–180. Thus if claims, or liens, are legally attached to things, or monies under the cognizance, or within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, this court has power to decide respecting them. But it does not follow, that claims independent of such things, or monies produced from them, and mere personal demands on their owners, are within the reason of, or entitled to the remedy, prescribed by this principle; and I deem it an exclusion from a distribution, or a claim to a surplus, unless a lien or appropriation is precedently and legally fixed, that those who claim such distribution, could not sue in the admiralty for their demands. There is no doubt that the physician has no capacity, as such, to bring a suit in the admiralty court for his demand, which is merely personal, on the owner, or owners of the ship. The amount of the master's claim for $257, as stated in his petition, for monies expended during the voyage, for the purchase of necessaries required in the service of the ship, and wages paid to mariners, is directed to be paid. The claim for his wages is disallowed; and the prayer of the petition of Dr. Baldwin cannot legally be granted.

described, prosecuted or punished, according to any other law now extant. Some of the highest, and most of the inferior crimes and offences, are undefined by any law of the United States. For what depends then on any other provision, they may be committed with impunity, if common law designations and definitions, and the forms of process, and modes of proceeding are rejected. We have experience sufficient to convince us of the inefficiency, and often mischief, apparent in attempts to substitute alterations, or supposed amendments, for the rules and principles of the common law. It would be more than human, if it were entirely perfect. If experience and change of circumstances suggest alterations, they are but few. In attempting reform in these, if we shake the whole fabric, it were better to suffer it to remain undisturbed. In another note on the same case—Thompson v. The Catharina [supra],—I have been also careless or unfortunate, in expressing myself, on another part of the subject. The two last sentences of the last paragraph of the first note should read thus—"an agreement not to bring a suit to enforce performance of a contract, if made for a time limited, is well; but if made posterior to the bond, contract, or agreement, indefinitely, it amounts to a general release." See Carth. 64; Comb. 123, 4.

GARDNER v. PEYTON.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1839.

PLEADING — NON ASSUMPSIT WITHIN FIVE YEARS UPON PROMISE TO COLLECT AND ACCOUNT FOR MONEY.

1. Non assumpsit within five years, &c., is not a good plea to an action of assumpsit upon a promise to collect money and account for it.

2. The cause of action does not arise until the money has been received by the defendant and demanded by the plaintiff.

Assumpsit by the defendant [F. Peyton, Jr.], as an attorney at law to collect a debt due to the plaintiff's intestate [Z. Gardner], and to account for the same when collected. The declaration avers that the defendant collected the money, but refused to pay it to the plaintiff on demand.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) on general demurrer, decided that the plea of non assumpsit infra quinque aunos, was not a good plea to an action upon such a promise.

At the trial, upon the issue on the plea of actio non accrevit, Mr. Neale, for the defendant, contended that the action accrued upon the receipt of the money by the defendant, and cited 3 Bl. Comm. 25; Laws Va. Nov. 19, 1792, p. 97, § 12; Laws Va. Dec. 19, 1792, for limitation of actions, p. 107, § 4; Taylor v. Armstead, 3 Call, 200; Kinney v. McClure, 1 Rand. [Va.] 284; 2 Har. Dig. 1458; Manning's Index, 57; 2 Tuck. Bl. Comm. 388, 430; and thereupon moved the court for an instruction to the jury to that effect.

But THE COURT refused, and stopped Mr. Taylor, for the plaintiff, who was about to reply; being of opinion that the cause of action did not accrue until demand of payment, and the defendant's refusal to pay.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

Case No. 5,235.

GARDNER et al. v. The ROSEDALE.

District Court, D. New Jersey. Feb. 11, 1879.

MARITIME LIENS—MATERIALS FURNISHED ON OWNER'S CREDIT.

[Where the proof shows that the credit for materials furnished to a vessel was not given to the vessel alone, but to the owner, the only action for the price of the materials is against the owner in personam.]

The libellants having proved that they furnished materials for a vessel upon the personal responsibility of the owner, the libel was dismissed.

NIXON, District Judge. This is a libel in rem to recover the amount due the libellants for furnishing seats to the steamer Rosedale. Both the libellants and claimant reside and carry on business in New York, and the steamer is owned and registered there. She was built at Norfolk, Va., in the year 1877, by George W. Beach for the claimant for the sum of $54,000. The putting in of the seats was in the original contract for her construction, and the seats were ordered by the builder, Beach, before the vessel was launched, but to save the transportation to Norfolk, she was brought to Hoboken, N. J., for the purpose of receiving the seats. After she reached there, and about the time the libellants began to furnish the articles, they learned that Beach had had trouble about paying his bills, and the work was suspended until some more satisfactory arrangement was made respecting payment for the same.

One of the clerks of the libellants called upon the owner's brother, Philemon Smith, who he understood was authorized to act for his brother in all matters pertaining to the steamer, and procured from him a promise that his brother would pay the bill if the seats were furnished. Mr. Gardner, one of the libellants, swears that it was in consequence of this personal guaranty by the owner that the debt was contracted. The claimant on the other hand insists that the materials were furnished and the work done on a contract with the builder, Beach, and as it came without the original contract for building and equipping the vessel, a libel in rem is not maintainable, because the contract was not maritime. The difficulty about the libellants' case is, that the proof which they offer, that Smith, the owner, agreed to pay for the seats, discharges the steamboat from all liability by a proceeding in rem. If the testimony is true, the credit was not given to the vessel, but to the owner, and in such cases the only remedy for the creditor is against the owner in personam.

All lien is lost, if any ever existed under the local laws, by lapse of time; and upon the proofs the libellants must be left to their personal remedy against the owner. The libel in rem is dismissed with costs.

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1826.

REAL PROPERTY — POSSESSION UNDER TWO TITLES —THE BETTER TITLE—ESTOPPEL—GRANT FROM PROPRIETARIES—SURVEY—LIMITATIONS.

1. The rules of law as to removal from one state to another, as the same affects judicial citizenship, and the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

[Cited in Doyle v. Clark, Case No. 4,053.]

2. The statute of 21 Jac. I. as to twenty years possession, was not adopted in New Jersey by force of the act of 1727; the action of ejectment having been always considered on the same footing as the writ of right.

3. To show a title out of the proprietaries, a grant, warrant and survey under the proprietors, or length of possession against them, may be shown.

4. A, being tenant in tail of the land in dispute, conveys the same in fee with a general warranty to B, who had a title to the land by a warrant and survey under the proprietaries, and who, on such conveyance by A, went into possession and retained it ever afterwards. In an ejectment by the issue in tail of A against B, the latter is not estopped to deny the validity of the plaintiff's title and to set up his own paramount title against him. Estoppels operate equally and reciprocally. The plaintiffs claiming per formam doni cannot be estopped: so neither can the defendant.

[Cited in The City of Aurora v. West, 22 Ind. 520; Evans v. Evans, 29 Pa. St. 279.]

5. How far a survey and report of a deputy surveyor, returned to the surveyor general's office and adopted by him, and by him reported to and accepted by the council of proprietaries and ordered to be recorded, passes the title out of the proprietors. When these things are done, the title of the party relates back to the survey.

6. If a man has two titles to land, one defeasible, and the other indefeasible, and he enters generally, the law adjudges that he entered under his better title.

7. The defendant, at the time he purchased and received a conveyance of the land in dispute from the tenant in tail, the ancestor of the plaintiff, had a regular survey under a warrant for the same land, which survey had been returned by the surveyor general to the council of the proprietors, and was by them accepted and ordered to be recorded, and was so. Having both these titles, the defendant entered in 1753, and has ever since retained the possession. The tenant in tail, died in 1775, leaving a son, the father of the plaintiff, who died in 1776. This suit was brought about 1815. Held, that this action is barred by sixty years possession under the first, and by thirty under the second of the act of limitations, of the act of the 5th of June, 1787.

This was an ejectment to recover a tract of land in the state of New Jersey. The declaration avers [Mary Gardner] the lessor of the plaintiff to be a citizen of Pennsylvania, and the defendant a citizen of New Jersey. The title of the lessor of the plaintiff was as follows: The will of John Kyd, dated the 16th of October, 1750, by which he devises to his son Isaac the land in controversy in fee tail. Deeds of lease and release dated in March 1737, by John Champness to John Kyd, for a tract of land, of which the tract in question is a part. A deed of bargain and sale for this land, dated the 9th of November 1753, from Isaac Kyd, the tenant in tail, (John Kyd the devisor being then dead) to Joseph Sharp in fee simple, with a general warranty.

Evidence was given that Isaac Kyd died some time in the year 1776, leaving Ebenezer his heir at law and issue in tail, who died, in the year 1777, leaving the lessor of the plaintiff, then four or five years of age, his heir at law and issue in tail; that she married under age, but came of age before 1795, in which year her husband died. In the year 1799, she married one * * *, who died in the year 1808, and in the same year she married one * * *, who died in the year 1814. In 1817, she married Gardner, who died some time in 1818 or 1819. Evidence was also given, that after the conveyance by Isaac Kyd to Joseph Sharp, the latter went into possession under that deed; and that the possession has ever since remained in the said Sharp and his family claiming under him.

The defendant gave in evidence a survey returned by Jacob Richman, deputy surveyor to James Alexander, surveyor general, dated the 27th of March 1753, signed by him as deputy surveyor, which paper is certified by the surveyor general to be a true copy from the return filed in the office of the surveyor general at Burlington. It sets forth, that by virtue of a warrant dated the 4th of August 1743, for fourteen hundred and fifty-nine acres, and of another for eight hundred and sixty-three acres, dated the 3d of August 1748, to the legatees of Thomas Lambert, and of an assignment by said legatees to John Beaumont of said parcels of land, and of a conveyance by said Beaumont to Isaac and Joseph Sharp for one thousand acres, part thereof, he had surveyed for Joseph Sharp ninety-one acres, part thereof, by certain metes, bounds and marks, all of which are minutely stated. He also gave in evidence a paper signed "James Alexander, Surveyor General," dated the 10th of December 1755, which certifies that by virtue of the two warrants, conveyance by Lambert's legatees to Beaumont, and by Beaumont to Isaac and Joseph Sharp, as set forth in the above report and survey of Richman, "he had caused part thereof to be surveyed for Joseph Sharp, in part of his share thereof, by his lawful deputy Jacob Richman." It then proceeds to state the boundaries by course and distance, precisely as they are stated in the report of the deputy surveyor, containing ninety-one acres. At the foot of this paper, above the signature of the surveyor general who certifies the copy, is the following authentication: "February 5th, 1756, inspected and approved by the council of proprietors, and ordered to be recorded." Evidence was also given by one witness, who had surveyed the land, that the above survey covers the whole of the tract conveyed by Kyd to Sharp. But this was contradicted by another witness who had also surveyed the land.

It was admitted that the title of Joseph Sharp, whatever it was, was regularly vested in the defendant, under a devise in his will. It was also proved that the possession of the land, in dispute, had continued constantly in the family of Joseph Sharp, from the year 1753 to the present time. The plaintiff then gave the following evidence to prove a title under the proprietors prior to that set up for the defendant under the above survey in 1753, viz.: A deed from Lord Berkley to John Fenwick, dated the 18th of March 1673, for one half of the province of New Jersey. Deed from Fenwick to Edward Champness and wife, dated the 14th of March 1674, for two thousand acres, to be taken and surveyed out of the undivided moiety of New Jersey, in such manner as he, or the governor and council in his absence, or the surveyor general should think fit, in the most equal way with the other proprietors. An assignment by Edward Champness to his son John in 1704, of the above two thousand acres. Deed, 30th of November 1676, by Fenwick to Hedges and wife for two thousand acres of land, similarly expressed with that to Champness. On the 2d of April 1725, under a warrant to Coxe for two thousand acres, and an assignment of twelve hundred and thirty-three acres, part thereof, to Hedges, there were surveyed for him ten hundred and sixty-seven acres, beginning at a corner of John Kyd's land. Hedges, by deed, 30th of November 1725, released to John Kyd all his right to two hundred acres, then in the occupation of said Kyd. A bond, 12th of October 1720, by John Champness and Sarah Hall, conditioned to convey to John Kyd two hundred acres, to be taken out of any part of the undivided estate, manors or lands of John Fenwick, deceased.

Points made by the plaintiff's counsel: (1) This court has jurisdiction of the cause, the weight of evidence being in favour of the averment that the lessor was a citizen of Pennsylvania when this suit was brought. (2) Upon the death of Ebenezer Kyd in 1777, the lessor of the plaintiff became entitled to the land in controversy, as issue in tail under the will of John Kyd. (3) The defendant having purchased and received from Isaac Kyd a conveyance in fee simple of this land, under which he took possession thereof, he is estopped to set up a paramount title under the warrant and survey to Joseph Kyd, or in any manner to controvert the title of Isaac Kyd. The title of Joseph Sharp under the warrant and survey was not perfected or vested in him until the year 1756, when the survey was approved by the board of proprietors, (the report of the surveyor general not referring to that of his deputy by its date) before which period, Sharp was in possession under Kyd. Rev. Laws, 81; Coxe [1 N. J. Law] 172, 432; 10 Johns. 293; 1 South. [4 N. J. Law] 260. (4) The deeds from Berkley and Fenwick, and the subsequent conveyances down to John Champness, show a title out of the proprietors prior to the warrant and survey under which the defendant claims; or if there be any deficiency in this chain of title, the jury ought to presume a grant and possession under it, as far back as 1674, to those under whom John Kyd claimed. (5) The plaintiff is not barred under the act of assembly of June 5, 1787 (Rev. Laws, 81), by a possession of sixty years; because, in this case, the limitation did not begin to run before 1775, when Isaac Kyd died; nor by thirty years possession, because Joseph Kyd's possession did not commence under a proprietary right, but under Isaac Kyd; nor was the possession obtained under a bona fide purchase from a person supposed to have a legal right to the land, as the demise in John Kyd's will, showing that Isaac was only tenant in tail, is recited in the deed of Isaac Kyd to Sharp. Nor is he barred by twenty years possession, under the act of 1799, because, after the number of years of the various disabilities of the lessor of the plaintiff are added together, and deducted from the whole time, since her right accrued, twenty years prior to the bringing of this suit have not run against her. Rev. Laws, 410; 2 South. [5 N. J. Law] 850; Willis, 9, 11; 4 Johns. 211; 2 Halst. [7 N. J. Law] 16–18. (6) The plaintiff has a title by possession of twenty years against the proprietors, which is a sufficient title under the act of 1727 (Allison's Laws, 72), which adopts all the English statutes of limitations, and amongst them that of 21 Jac. I. (7) At all events, the plaintiff is entitled to recover so much of the land conveyed by Isaac Kyd to Joseph Sharp, as is not covered by the warrant and survey of Sharp.

For the defendant it was contended: (1) That this court has not jurisdiction of the cause, the evidence clearly proving that the lessor of the plaintiff was a citizen of this state when this suit was brought. (2) The paramount title of Joseph Sharp under his warrant and survey returned, approved, and recorded, defeats that of John Kyd, in whom no title under the proprietors is shown, either documentary, or possessory. The title pretended to be set up under Fenwick is totally defective, not only because the recitals in the quinque partite deed, and in other documents stated in Leam. and Spicer, show, that Fenwick never had any beneficiary interest in West Jersey under the deed to him from Lord Berkley, but because, if he had, no title from him to the land in controversy is deduced down to John Kyd. (3) The possession of Sharp was under his warrant and survey. But whether so or not, the doctrine of estoppel does not apply, or if it does, as it must operate equally and reciprocally, it will estop the lessor of the plaintiff to deny that Sharp acquired a complete legal title in fee simple, under his deed from Isaac Kyd. Co. Litt. 352. (4) The title of Sharp, though not perfected till his survey was returned and approved and ordered to be recorded, commenced at the date of the survey; those acts when done, relating back to the survey reported to the surveyor general. 1 Halst. [6 N. J. Law] 11. (5) The plaintiff is barred by sixty years possession, which commenced in the year 1753. He is also barred by thirty years possession, even if the limitation began to run in 1776, for it then ran over all the subsequent disabilities of the lessor of plaintiff. It was founded on a proprietary right, and also it was obtained bona fide, from a person in possession supposed to have a legal right; for the deed of Kyd to Sharp asserts a legal fee simple estate in the grantor, which it conveys with general warranty, and no doubt both parties supposed that such was the estate vested in the grantor. 18 Johns. 355, 360; Pa. St. 447; Cowp. 217; Ball. Lim. 19. (6) The statute of limitations of 21 Jac. I. in relation to ejectments, was not adopted or introduced into this province by the act of 1727, and nothing short of sixty years, the bar to the writ of right, barred the ejectment; the latter having always been considered as on the footing of the former, prior to the act of limitations of 1787 and 1799. Elmer & Wall and L. H. Stockton, for plaintiff.

R. Stockton and Mr. Jeffers, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The first question for the consideration of the jury is, whether this court can take jurisdiction of the cause now under consideration. This depends upon the question, whether the lessor of the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania, as the declaration avers, at the time this suit was brought; or was a citizen of this state, as the defendant insists. And this is always a mixed question of law and fact. The decision of the former rests with the court; the latter must be determined by the jury.

In reference to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, citizenship means domicil—home—permanent residence. When a citizen of one state removes to another, and a question of jurisdiction arises, it must be decided by the quo animo which induced the removal. If it was to remain permanently in the state to which he has emigrated, it amounts to a change of domicil and of citizenship. If it was merely for a temporary purpose, he can be considered only as a sojourner in the state to which he has gone. Length of residence, although it may afford evidence of the real intention of the party in changing his place of residence, is not of itself a criterion of change of domicil. If the intention of the party be bona fide to change his domicil, the residence of a day at his new home constitutes him a citizen of the state to which he has removed. If, on the contrary, his removal was accompanied by the animo revertendi, he is considered in law but as a sojourner in the state where he has fixed his temporary residence, although that residence may have continued for years. If the removal be for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the courts of the United States, it is a fraud upon the constitution and laws of the United States; unless it was also accompanied by an intention in the party to change his domicil. For although such a motive, if proved, may subject the good faith of the transaction to suspicion; still it will not be sufficient to prevent the change of citizenship if that was bona fide the intention of the removal, and change of domicile was bona fide. Having laid down these general principles for the information of the jury, it will be for them to apply them to the facts of the case. (Here the judge summed up the evidence in relation to this point.)

We have now come to the merits of the cause, which involves the two following general questions: (1) Has the lessor of the plaintiff shown such a title to the land in controversy, as to entitle him to a verdict? And if he has, then (2) Is his right barred by the act of limitations?

1. The title of the lessor, as deduced by the opening counsel, commences with a deed in the year 1737, from John Champness to John Kyd, for three hundred acres of land, including that in dispute, then in the possession of Kyd. The will of John Kyd in 1750, by which he derives the land in controversy to his son Isaac, in fee tail. On the 9th of November 1753, Isaac conveyed the same to Joseph Sharp, in fee simple, with general warranty, who entered thereon in the course of that year. Isaac died in the year 1776, leaving a son Ebenezer, his heir at law, and issue in tail. In the year 1777, Ebenezer died, leaving the lessor of the plaintiff, then an infant, his heir at law, and issue in tail. In this chain of title it is manifest that an essential link is wanting, and that is, a grant, or something equivalent thereto, to pass the title out of the proprietors to some person under whom the lessor claims. This was to be effected by warrant and survey duly made and returned, approved by the council of proprietors, and recorded, or by length of possession. Whether the title could pass out of the proprietors by any other mode, need not be decided, as none such was alluded to in this case by the opening counsel. No warrant or survey in favour of any person under whom the lessor claims, has been given in evidence. But a title is asserted under the grant from Lord Berkley to John Fenwick, and sundry conveyances by Fenwick and others, claiming under him, which must now be attended to. Whether Fenwick ever had a title, otherwise than as trustee, to West Jersey, may, at least, admit of a doubt; but supposing his title to have been indisputable, it remains to be seen whether it passed, in respect to the land in dispute, to any person under whom John Kyd claimed. The deeds from Fenwick to his two sons in law, Edward Champness, and Samuel Hedges, and their wives, were for two hundred acres to each, to be taken out of the undivided moiety of New Jersey. These deeds could pass a title to no specific tracts of land until they were surveyed, and no evidence of any such surveys has been given. Neither does it appear to what tract of land the release of Hedges to John Kyd, of the 30th of November 1725, for two hundred acres, applied.

But it is contended by the plaintiff's counsel, that the jury may, and ought, to presume an ancient survey of the lands granted by Fenwick to his sons in law, founded upon those grants. Were it to be admitted that the evidence laid a sufficient ground for such a presumption, it is still open to be rebutted by other evidence, leading to the conclusion that no such survey was made. The following circumstances are now submitted to the consideration of the jury in support of this conclusion:

(1) After a thorough search of the records of the surveyor general's office, from the year 1686, the present surveyor general has deposed that he could find no survey of this land in favour of Fenwick, Edward or John Champness, John Kyd, or any other person, except Joseph Sharp, in the year 1753. He stated that the records in that office did not extend farther back than the year 1686.

(2) The bond of John Champness and Sarah Hall, before mentioned, to John Kyd, given as late as the 12th of October, 1720, affords strong evidence that no survey had then been made: since it obliges the obligor to convey two hundred acres of land, not by metes and bounds, or by any other description, but to be taken out of any part of Fenwick's undivided moiety.

(3) The assignment of Edward Champness to his son John, in the year 1704, (eighteen years after the year 1686,) of his interest in the two hundred acres granted to him by Fenwick, makes no mention of any such survey, and gives no description of the said land by metes and bounds, or otherwise.

(4) By the act of 1719 (Rev. Code, § 11) it is enacted, "that all surveys heretofore made, the certificates whereof are in the hands of any of the inhabitants of the province, or any of the neighbouring provinces, which are not within two years; and that all surveys heretofore made, the certificates whereof are in the hands of the people living beyond seas, which are not, within three years after the publication hereof, duly recorded, either in the recorder's office or in the surveyor general's record of the respective division in which such lands are surveyed; be for ever hereafter void, and of none effect; and any succeeding survey, duly made thereof and recorded, shall be as good and sufficient as if no former survey had been made." This was certainly a very awakening act, and it is to be presumed, would have induced all persons who had surveys of their lands previously made, to have them recorded within the prescribed periods. But admit that a survey of the land prior to 1719, instead of being presumed into existence, were proved by positive evidence, I am at a loss to imagine how the plaintiff could extricate himself from the effect of this law, which declares it to be void for want of being recorded, and gives validity to the subsequent survey made in 1753, for Joseph Sharp. This difficulty was foreseen by the plaintiff's counsel, and the answer given to it was, that the law can only make void such unrecorded surveys in favour of subsequent surveys, made without notice of such prior unrecorded surveys. Let this for the present be admitted. It may still be asked, what proof has been given that Sharp or the deputy who surveyed the ninety-one acres in 1753, had notice of a survey not now produced, nor evidence given of its existence, but which the jury are now called upon to presume did once exist?

As to a possessory right in John Kyd, or those under whom he claims against the proprietors, none is pretended beyond twenty-eight years, from 1725 to 1753, when Sharp's survey under his warrant was made. This, it is contended by the plaintiff's counsel, is sufficient under the act of 1727, which it is supposed adopts the statute of limitations of 21 Jac. I. of twenty years. But I take this question to be otherwise settled by the supreme court of this state, where it has been decided, that the action of ejectment had always been considered as on the same footing with the writ of right, and that the statute of Jacobus in that respect did not extend to this state. Den v. Pissant, Coxe [1 N. J. Law] 222; Den v. Morris, 2 Halst. [7 N. J. Law] 11.

I do not understand the plaintiff's counsel to have denied that a right by grant, warrant and survey from the proprietors, or length of possession against them, is an essential link in their chain of title. But they deny that it lies in the mouth of the defendant to question the validity of the plaintiff's title, or to set up an adverse paramount one against her; because he is estopped to do either by the deed from Isaac Kyd, which conveyed a fee simple estate in the land in controversy to Joseph Sharp. The answer given to this argument by the defendant's counsel is conclusive. If he is estopped to deny the title of the lessor to this land, because her ancestor, the tenant in tail, granted to Joseph Sharp a fee simple interest in it; she must be estopped to deny the title so conveyed by that deed, since estoppels operate equally and reciprocally. But the fact is, that the doctrine of estoppels has no application to this case. The deed from Isaac Kyd passed a bare fee to Sharp, and both of those parties were estopped to deny that title. But the lessor is neither party or privy to that deed, but a mere stranger, claiming, not under Isaac Kyd, the tenant in tail, but under John Kyd, the donor, per forman doni. She then is not estopped by that deed to assert her title as issue in tail, and consequently the defendant is not estopped to deny her right to the land, or to set up a better title against her. Whether the survey for Sharp in 1753 covers the whole of the land in controversy, may be a question of doubt. One witness has sworn that it does, and another witness that it does not. But if the jury should be of opinion that the plaintiff has failed in showing a title, this will be an immaterial point in relation to this branch of the cause, since the defect in the title of the lessor will be fatal to her recovery of any part of the land to which she sets up a claim.

2. The next question to be considered is, whether, if the plaintiff has shown a title to the land in dispute, it is barred by either of the acts of limitation? and this may in some measure depend upon the decision of two preliminary questions. (1) When did Joseph Sharp's title under his survey commence? (2) Under what right did he enter?

(1) On the 27th of March, 1753, Jacob Richman, deputy surveyor, having in his possession certain warrants, one thousand acres whereof had been regularly conveyed to Joseph Sharp, entered upon the land in controversy, and surveyed for him ninety-one acres by metes and bounds. This survey, with his report, he returned to the surveyor general, who placed it amongst the files in his office, as was the uniform practice of that department. He adopted the work as his own, after having made some immaterial formal alterations in the report or certificate of his deputy, such as omitting to state the corner trees, and specifying the names of Lambert's legatees, in whose favour the warrants issued. On the 10th of December, 1755, he made a regular certificate of the survey thus amended, and reported to the council of proprietors that by virtue of those warrants, and conveyances from the original warrantees to Sharp, he had caused part thereof to be surveyed for said Sharp by certain metes and bounds, by his deputy, Jacob Richman, containing ninety-one acres. He does not describe Richman's survey by its date, which he omits altogether; but the recitals, the courses and distances, and the beginning, are precisely the same in both reports, and it is admitted by the plaintiff's counsel that they both describe the same identical parcel of land. The survey and report of the deputy surveyor is a regular office paper, belonging to the archives of the surveyor general's office, and is the foundation of the surveyor general's certificate and report to the board of proprietors. The evidence of the surveyor general given in this cause is material. He stated that the date of the survey and report of the deputy is sometimes inserted in the certificate of the surveyor general, and is sometimes omitted. That according to the regular practice of the office the original survey and report of the deputy is put upon the files; for the purpose of being referred to by the surveyor general, to see when the survey was actually made, and to settle priorities of titles, where there are different surveys for the same land. He further stated that it had been, and continued to be, the practice for the surveyor general to alter and correct the report of his deputy, and that the report and certificate of the surveyor general, with these corrections, is returned to the board of proprietors; and if, after examination, it is there approved, it is ordered to be recorded. The result of all this then is, that the survey of this ninety-one acres of land was duly made on the 27th of March, 1753—was reported to the council of proprietors by the surveyor general on the 10th of December, 1755, and was approved and ordered to be recorded on the 5th of February, 1756. It is admitted on all hands, that the survey passes no title whatever unless it be approved by the council of proprietors and ordered to be recorded. But when this is done, we have the authority of the late Chief Justice Kirkpatrick for saying, that the title relates back to the survey; and this position, upon general principles of law, seems to be incontrovertible. The title then of Joseph Sharp to the ninety-one acres of land, commenced on the 27th of March, 1755.

(2) Under what title did Joseph Sharp enter? One witness, who was but nine years old in the year 1755, has deposed, that he entered under Kyd's title; but this is obviously an inference of the witness from the circumstance of Sharp having received a deed from Isaac Kyd in November 1755, after which he went into actual possession of the land; for he does not state any declarations or acts of Sharp to warrant his conclusion. But be this as it may, and admit that Sharp did not enter until after the date of Isaac Kyd's deed in November 1755. He then entered, having two titles to the land; one prior and indefeasible under his survey, and the other posterior and defeasible after the death of Isaac Kyd. In such a case, the law adjudges that he entered by his paramount and better title; and this entry was adverse to the title of Isaac Kyd.

Now what says the act of limitations? The first section of the act of the 5th of June 1787 [supra] declares, "that sixty years actual possession of any lands, &c. uninterruptedly continued by occupancy, descent, conveyance or otherwise, in whatever way or manner such possession might have been commenced or have been continued, shall vest a full and complete right and title in every actual possessor or occupier of such lands, &c. and shall be a good and sufficient bar to all claims that may be made or actions commenced by any person whatever for the recovery of such lands." It is not to be questioned that Joseph Sharp and those claiming under him, have had upwards of sixty years' actual possession of the land from the year 1753 to the institution of this suit. The case is equally clear against the plaintiff, under the second section of this act; which declares that thirty years' actual possession of any lands, &c. uninterruptedly continued as aforesaid, wherever such possession commenced or is founded upon a proprietary right duly laid thereon, and recorded in the surveyor general's office of the division in which such location was made, or in the secretary's office, agreeably to law, &c. shall be a good and sufficient bar to all prior locations, rights, titles, conveyances or claims whatever, not followed by actual possession as aforesaid, and shall vest an absolute right and title in the actual possessor and occupier of all such lands, &c. This act has the usual savings in favour of infants, femes covert, persons non compos, or without the United States at the time the said right or title first descended or accrued; who are allowed to bring their actions within five years after the removal of these disabilities. Under this section, it is quite immaterial whether Joseph Sharp entered under Kyd's title or not, or whether his title under the survey commenced in 1753 or 1755; for in the latter case, having a good title under his survey, his possession was founded upon a proprietary right, duly laid on the land, and recorded in the surveyor general's office, &c. although it might not have commenced upon such right. This possession began to run in 1776, adversely to Ebenezer Kyd, and consequently ran over all the subsequent disabilities of the lessor of the plaintiff, and so continued for more than thirty years before the bringing of this suit.

The jury found for the defendant.

GARDNER v. SIMPSON.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1823.

SLAVERY—FREEDOM.

A Virginian slave is not entitled to freedom, under the Maryland act of 1796, c. 67, by being hired to a resident of the county of Washington for a limited period.

[Cited in Maria v. White, Case No. 9,076.]

Petition for freedom. Upon the trial, the petitioner's counsel took a bill of exceptions, which stated that he offered evidence to prove that the petitioner [Vincent Gardner, a negro] was residing in the city of Washington previous to Christmas, 1821, and continued so to reside till the end of the year 1822. That the defendant [Thompson Simpson] was a citizen and resident of Virginia, and knew that the petitioner was so residing in Washington, and made no objection to his so residing. That the defendant offered evidence to prove that the petitioner was his slave, born in Virginia, and that he hired the petitioner to the petitioner's father, Tom Gardner, for the year 1821, who then lived in Virginia. And that in 1822, he hired him to one Barnes, for the petitioner's father, not knowing that the father was about to remove into the county of Washington in the District of Columbia, which he did in December, 1821, taking the petitioner with him, where he remained until the 22d of December, 1822, and was at the defendant's house in Virginia, on the 25th of the same month. That the petitioner afterwards returned to Washington, and did not return to the defendant at the expiration of the year, but remained in Washington, and claimed his freedom in consequence of such removal to Washington.

Whereupon, THE COURT, at the prayer of the defendant's counsel, instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that the importation of the petitioner into the county of Washington was with the intent that he should be hired to remain for a limited time only, and not permanently, it was not such an importation as is within the first section of the act of Maryland of 1796, c. 67. Verdict for the defendant.

A bill of exceptions was signed and a writ of error taken out, but not prosecuted.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1822.

ASSIGNMENT OF DEBT—PAYMENT TO ORIGINAL CREDITOR.

Payments made to the original creditor, after notice of the assignment of the debt, cannot be given in evidence in a suit brought by the assignee in the name of the original creditor.

Indebitatus assumpsit [by Gardner & Johnson] for the balance of an account for coal sold and delivered. At the foot of the account there was an order on Tennison to pay the balance ($76) to John O. Lay, of Richmond.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), on motion of the plaintiff's counsel, instructed the jury, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the account was assigned by the plaintiffs to Lay, and that the defendant had notice of such assignment, his payments to the plaintiffs after such notice, could not be given in evidence in this action.

SHIPPING—BOTTOMRY—POWERS OF MASTER—RATIFICATION.

[1. The master cannot make a loan on bottomry to pay purchasers of claims for repairs in a foreign port, contracted five months prior thereto under no expectation of bottomry security.]

[2. Where the owners, with all the facts before them under which a bottomry bond was given by the master in a foreign port, claim and receive their share of the general average from the underwriters, it amounts to a ratification of the making of the bond.]

[This was a libel in rem by John Gardner and others against the bark White Squall, to enforce a bottomry bond.]

BETTS, District Judge. The bark White Squall, commanded by E. J. Harding, master, sailed from New York for San Francisco on the 17th of February, 1855, and on the 25th of March thereafter put into Rio Janeiro, in distress, for repairs. The master consigned the ship to Graham Bros. & Co. Endeavors were then made to obtain money by bottomry sufficient to make the repairs and outfit necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage to San Francisco. The surveyors of the ship estimated the amount necessary at £2,500 sterling; but no loan could be obtained at a less premium than 75 per cent. The master wrote to the owners for directions from them and the underwriters. None had been received on the 1st of July. In the meantime, the vessel having been made nearly ready for sea, a call, by notice through the papers, was again made for an offer of a loan on bottomry to continue the voyage to San Francisco, to be addressed to the consul's office. No offer being given, the master then advertised for such loan to bring the vessel with her cargo back to New York, but obtained none for that voyage either. The master had sold part of the ship's cargo and applied the proceeds towards the repairs, and entered into a contract of charter for the vessel, when Mr. Lang came to Rio as agent of the owners, and brought £2,200 sterling, which was also expended upon the debts contracted for the repairs. Soon after Lang's arrival, Harding left the ship as master, and Burke, her first mate, was on the 1st of October appointed by Lang, master in his place. He executed the bottomry bond on the 5th of December, 1855. The vessel had been ready for sea for about five months. Burke executed the bond under the direction of Lang, without any knowledge of the necessities of the vessel, but because he was told that Lang must have more money.

Upon the facts in proof the master had no authority in law to give the bottomry hypothecation in question. The debts all accrued from separate credits given the master of the vessel, or her consignees, by mechanics, material men, and others, and were entirely incurred at a very considerable period before the treaty for this hypothecation was on foot with the bottomry lender. These facts were notorious. It was, therefore, well understood that the loan was made to extinguish antecedent debts not contracted under any assurance or expectation of a bottomry security, and was not made to the creditors themselves, but to others who bought in the debts in effect at an abatement of 33⅓ per cent. from the amount. The master could not bind the ship, her cargo, and freight, to the satisfaction of such debts. The Virgin v. Vyfhius, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 538; The Aurora, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 96; Abb. Shipp. 200 (note 1); [Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co.] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 386. But although the bond was signed by the master, yet he acted in the matter under the direction of the agent of the owners, and not on his own judgment and discretion. This agent was sent to Rio by the owners with funds for the use of the vessel, and, as must be implied, with general powers to act for the owners in respect to the ship. He displaced the original master and substituted another. He called in the bills of the ship, had them all adjusted, and authorized a composition with the creditors. He then arranged with the consignee of the ship for her hypothecation, for the purpose of raising money to satisfy the debts still outstanding. After the borrowing hypothecation was made, he had all the papers, including the protest of the master and crew, the particular bills and vouchers for all the expenses of the ship at Rio, with the bottomry bond, transmitted to the owners. They laid these documents before the adjuster of general average at New York, and obtained from him a computation and allowance of their share of the general average, and claimed and received that share from the underwriters. These facts, in my judgment, import that Lang possessed all the power of the owner to hypothecate the vessel, or, at the least, if such powers were not originally conferred upon him, that the owners ratified and assented to their exercise after being fully advised of his acts and the facts upon which he acted. Story, Ag. § 239. The authority of an owner to bottom a ship at home or abroad, without regard to her necessities, seems no longer a question with the authorities. Abb. Shipp. 192, note 1; 3 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) 361; Fland. Mar. Law, § 253. The principal cannot be allowed to screen himself from the unfavorable consequences following the doings of his agent, after taking to himself the benefits secured by them. Strong, Ag. §§ 250, 253, 258. The libellants are accordingly entitled to a decree in their favor for the due enforcement of the bond.

Under the act of 1841, the district courts are possessed of the full jurisdiction of courts of equity over all subject matters arising in bankruptcy..... 508
The district court has full power, as a court of equity, to settle all controversies between the bankrupt and his creditors... 616
The district court has the same power to restrain creditors in judgments at law against a bankrupt that a state court would have in case the debtor were not a bankrupt 616

Jurisdiction.

The residence or place of business must be within the district to give the court jurisdiction. The objection cannot be waived by the debtor..... 330
The bankrupt carried on business for nearly two years, and until it finally discontinued business, up to four months of the filing of the petition, in New York City and in Massachusetts, and nowhere else. Held, that the petition was properly filed in the Southern district of New York..... 521

Commencement of proceedings—Voluntary bankruptcy.

The pendency of a petition in involuntary proceedings, not carried to adjudication, a composition having been made, held no bar to a voluntary petition, where the composition was set aside..... 239
A petition by a corporation in voluntary bankruptcy should be authorized by a vote of a majority of the corporators at a legal meeting called for the purpose..... 760
Stock of an intestate, on whose estate administration has not been granted, is not to be counted..... 760
Such meeting need not be called in the manner prescribed by section 21 of Act N. Y. Feb. 17, 1848, in regard to the formation of corporations..... 760
Where the court has jurisdiction over the debtor, an adjudication on his petition cannot be resisted on the ground that he is solvent, as the filing of the petition is an act of bankruptcy..... 614 —— Rights, duties, and liabilities.

The assignee in bankruptcy of an insurance company has no power to waive the performance of conditions by the insured.. 72

Where no question of disputable right exists, assignees cannot obtain the instruction of the court whether to do a proposed act, which, if proper on their part, would be within their own discretion and power on the administration of their trust..... 715

An assignee, jointly interested with others in certain judgments for a lien upon a building, is allowed to compromise his claim upon receiving a pro rata share, and not otherwise 1007

The assignee of one partner becomes a tenant in common with the other partner, and his equities depend on the title of his assignor 464

Property of bankrupt—What constitutes.

A permit to occupy a public market stand held property of the bankrupt, and he was compelled to execute a transfer.....1082

Where a devise has been made to a bankrupt, and accepted by him, it is a fraud upon his creditors for him to disclaim, or renounce it, and the court will compel him to do all acts necessary to perfect his title to the devised estate..... 976

A note given in payment of a book account after the petition filed, but before the adjudication, held properly paid to the holder 1140

—— Exemptions.

Where no property is claimed under the specific exemptions of the bankrupt act, the claim for an allowance must stand upon the exemption granted by the state laws.... 821

Under the law of Georgia which exempts personal property of the value of $1,000 in specie, the bankrupt is not entitled to money the proceeds of articles sold by the assignee 821

Where the assignee ignored the specific exemption clause, and sold the property, held, that the bankrupt was only entitled to the proceeds of sale, and not to $1,000.. 821

Unauthorized exemptions of real estate are void, but, in the case of personalty, exception must be made to the allowance within the requisite time, under general order 19.....1065

—— Liens.

The assignee takes the property and rights of the bankrupt, subject to all the liabilities, and with all the rights, that would attach to them in the hands of the bankrupt, except in case of fraud..... 266

The assignee must recognize any valid lien as a preferred claim, though for costs of attachment, if made a lien by the state law 1165

The proviso in section 2, Act 1841, embraces all liens, equitable and legal, which are valid by the lex loci contractus; and is not restricted to such as can be enforced by state laws..... 266

Persons paying drafts drawn for the price of goods shipped to the drawer, under an agreement that the goods should be pledged as security therefor, have a lien as against the assignee in bankruptcy of the purchaser..... 266

A chattel mortgage authorizing the mortgagor to sell the property mortgaged is void as against the assignee..... 394

A delay on the part of the mortgagee in a chattel mortgage in taking possession after maturity is fatal to his rights, as against an assignee in bankruptcy..... 394

An attachment on mesne process, where a judgment is not obtained prior to the commencement of proceedings under the act of 1841, gives no lien enforceable in bankruptcy 508

The rent of mortgaged premises received by the assignee must be distributed to the general creditors. The mortgagee cannot have the rent applied to his lien unless he shows the insufficiency of his security, and actually intercepts it..... 572

The right to intercept the rent ceases with the completion of the foreclosure..... 572

Junior mortgagee, purchasing at a foreclosure sale, held not entitled to the rents collected by the assignee pending the foreclosure, or to reimbursement of the amount paid for taxes..... 523

A petition for leave to foreclose a mortgage will be dismissed where it is not shown that the assignee was given notice, and the debt has not been proved..... 965

—— Sale.

The court may order the assignee to expend money in finishing goods for sale, where beneficial to the estate..... 527

The bankruptcy court may order that mortgaged chattels in the possession of the assignee be sold free of incumbrance, and the mortgagee's lien is then transferred to the proceeds of sale..... 527

This power may be exercised, notwithstanding the mortgagee has, by his contract, a right of immediate possession, which he desires to enforce..... 527

Such order will not be made where the mortgagee's rights will be injuriously affected, as where the goods have no market value, or not more than the amount of the mortgage 527

A special order for leave to execute assignments of certain mortgages sold under order of court granted, though considered unnecessary 718

Proof of debts.

A note which is subject to an offset for a larger amount is not a provable debt..... 425

A tax collector will not be allowed to prove, against the bankrupt's estate, taxes which have been deducted from the value of property taken by creditors under attachments valid, as against the assignee, at the time of appraisal..... 554

The costs of an attachment, laid by the wife of the bankrupt in a libel for divorce, are not provable, and are not an equitable charge against the assets..... 649

A note given by the bankrupt firm to a member for his contribution to the capital stock, and by him turned over to his wife, who furnished the money, held evidence only of the individual debt of such member, and not provable against the firm..... 967

The mortgagee in a chattel mortgage of a stock of goods cannot prove his claim against a partnership formed after the making of a mortgage, and before its maturity.. 394

A clause in an insurance policy, limiting the right of action to one year from the loss, is valid, and binding even after bankruptcy of the company; but proof of the debt in bankruptcy is equivalent to the commencement of a suit..... 72

An adjustment of the loss before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy is a settlement and a waiver of the limitation clause..... 72

Where the proof was not submitted until after petition filed, the assignee cannot make an adjustment or agreement upon which an action can be maintained..... 72

A waiver of conditions, made in good faith by the company while solvent, is binding upon its assignee in bankruptcy..... 72

The creditor and the bankrupt cannot submit to arbitration the question of the amount due from the bankrupt's estate... 425

The submission of a claim by stipulation to the register to hear and determine does not make his decision final, as a reference under the New York Code..... 425

The holder and owner of a claim can alone make the proof..... 425
On a sale by several creditors to one person of debts proved, the actual owner can alone act, and can cast but one vote..... 704
Though proof of a debt has been regularly filed and accepted as satisfactory, the register may receive proof of fraud in relation thereto before election of assignee..... 704
On motion to expunge a proof of debt and to establish a set-off, personal judgment cannot be rendered against the creditor for money in his hands..... 394
A note given in the firm name in an individual transaction of one member in no manner for the benefit of the firm is not provable against the joint estate..... 465
Copartnership debts may be proved in proceedings instituted by a single partner, on an individual petition, whether there are any assets of the copartnership or not..... 738

Payment of debts: Priority: Dividends.

The costs and charges against a bankrupt for caring for his property prior to filing the petition, however incurred, are not a preferred claim 1165

Examination of bankrupt, etc.

The bankrupt cannot require the register to have his testimony taken down in longhand when the assignee furnishes a stenographer 812
After ample opportunity for an examination is afforded, and it is apparently full, further examination will be refused unless a specific defect or collusion is shown..... 961
A witness may be examined prior to the examination of the bankrupt, and though there be no question in controversy to be settled by testimony..... 740
The only parties to bankrupt proceedings are the bankrupt and the creditors..... 740
A witness cannot take the opinion of the judge on a certificate by a register, or be represented by counsel, except in a proceeding against him for contempt..... 740

Costs: Fees: Disbursements.

Where a suit has been commenced bona fide, and the defendant becomes a bankrupt, the actual costs are to be paid out of the estate, but no subsequent costs..... 508
The assignee is liable for proper charges for the care and custody of the bankrupt's property from the commencement of the proceedings 1165
Costs incurred by a sheriff for insurance, packing, etc., of goods on an attachment which has been dissolved by the proceedings in bankruptcy, where beneficial to the estate, will be ordered to be paid by the assignee 500
If the assignee has taken possession of packing-boxes, policies of insurance, &c., procured by the sheriff, he must pay for the cost of them..... 580
Where the assignee continues to occupy real estate leased by the bankrupt for manufacturing purposes, the landlord is entitled to compensation to the extent of the benefit conferred on the estate..... 613

Discharge—Proceedings to obtain.

A creditor, after a year, may require the bankrupt to have the question of his discharge determined..... 615
A creditor cannot be prejudiced by the loss from the files of his proof of debt. He is still entitled to notice of application for a discharge..... 817
The right to a discharge becomes fixed upon application, due notice given, and failure to object, though an order granting the discharge was not procured..... 615 —— Opposition: Acts barring.

The proceeds of the bankrupt's property in the hands of the assignee, and subject to be divided among his creditors, must be equal to 50 per cent. of claims. Act 1867, § 33 769
The debtor cannot have his assets appraised and determined as being in excess of 50 per cent. of provable claims, before debts are proved, or an assignee appointed.. 769
Section 9 of Act June 22, 1874, applies to cases of involuntary bankruptcy commenced before its passage. Reversing p. 697 696
A creditor who obtains judgment after the adjudication in bankruptcy, and takes out execution against the bankrupt, cannot prove his debt, and is not affected by the discharge, and cannot oppose it.....1109
The court allowed such creditor, who had proved his debt, to be heard in opposition on stipulating to cancel his judgment if the discharge should be granted.....1109
The fact that a suit is prosecuted against the bankrupt merely to ascertain the amount due should appear of record, and the judgment should be modified accordingly 1109
Charges, in general terms, of the destruction and removal of books and papers to defraud creditors, and of procurement of certain creditor's assent by pecuniary consideration, held too vague..... 750
After filing of specifications in opposition, there cannot be any examination of the bankrupt by the creditors before a register, on the application by the bankrupt for a discharge 964
Where proofs of debts have been lost, they must be supplied under Rev. St. §§ 899, 900, before the bankrupt can be legally discharged 817
The failure to keep proper books of account in a business which has been entirely closed out, there being no debts or assets arising out of such business, will not prevent a discharge..... 815
Nor will a discharge be prevented by the failure to keep proper books of account prior to the passage of the bankrupt act..... 815
A failure to insert in the schedule property fraudulently conveyed is not a false swearing where a receiver of all the bankrupt's property has been appointed by the state court..... 750
An assignment of a claim to secure a pre-existing indebtedness, made when insolvent, and forming no part of the transaction in which the indebtedness was created, is a fraudulent preference, barring a discharge 520
A discharge was refused in the case of a fraudulent preference, though the bankrupt had acted under advice of counsel, and the transferee had surrendered the goods without suit, it not appearing that the bankrupt had acted in good faith, believing he had a right to do what he did..... 72
A fraudulent conveyance, within section 29, Act 1867, must be a conveyance made as required by section 35, within four or six months before the filing of the petition by or against the debtor..... 750

—— Scope and effect: Annulling.

A discharge obtained before judgment rendered in a suit in which property was attached before the bankruptcy proceedings were instituted may be pleaded as a bar to such suit..... 508
Where a creditor, who neglected to file objections in due time, subsequently discovered fraud, he may require the bankrupt to take his discharge and then apply to annul it 615
The knowledge of fraud which will bar a right to annul the discharge must have been such as to have been available before the return day of the order to show cause 615 of such note, is an original undertaking, and need not express the consideration... 620

Negotiability.

A note for a certain sum payable in "current bank notes" is not negotiable..... 971

Acceptance.

An acceptance for the honor of the payee, after protest, is not binding..... 758

Indorsement and transfer.

The indorsement of a note placed in the hands of a third person for the benefit of a creditor of the indorser held to take effect from the date of the indorsement, and not from the date of its delivery to the creditor 506

Want of consideration for a promissory note is no defense, as against one taking it before maturity, without notice, as collateral security for an existing debt..... 334

The accommodation indorser of a renewal note given to a bank may show, in defense to a suit thereon by the bank, that the cashier promised, as consideration for his indorsement, that the bank would set off accruing claims for services rendered by the maker, so that he would not be held liable.. 85

In the case of a raised check, passing through several banks before it was finally paid by the drawee, the loss must fall upon the one who first gave it credit by indorsement 86

Demand: Notice: Protest.

A creditor holding a note whose proceeds are to be collected and applied to discharge the debt is bound to use due diligence to collect the note, and give notice of nonpayment 360

Where there are two joint indorsers notice must be given to both.....1145

If one of the joint indorsers pay the note, he cannot recover a moiety from the other indorser, to whom notice of dishonor was not given 1145

Notice of demand and nonpayment is necessary to charge the guarantor of a note or bill, whether his name be upon the paper or not; but in the latter case reasonable notice is sufficient..... 360

BOTTOMRY AND RESPONDENTIA.

Page

See, also, "Maritime Liens."

Conditions preceding the authority of a master to hypothecate his vessel in a foreign port by bottomry.....1013

The true grounds of a maritime hypothecation are the necessities of the case, and the want of personal credit..... 406

Bottomry bonds may be given for security of mercantile or other debts, either in places where the owners dwell, or in foreign places by their order..... 406

The master cannot make a loan on bottomry to pay purchasers of claims for repairs in a foreign port, contracted five months prior thereto under no expectation of bottomry security.....1202

Where the master has not suitable funds, or cannot obtain money on the personal credit of the owner, for reasonably fit and proper supplies and repairs in a foreign port, he may take it upon bottomry..... 479

As against the lender, it is sufficient if there is an apparent necessity, so far as he is able, upon due inquiry and due diligence, to ascertain the fact..... 479

Where there is an apparent necessity, the lender is under no obligation to ascertain the cause of the injury, or to inquire as to the manner of making the repairs..... 479

A regular survey, by competent and skillful persons, and repairs made in pursuance of their recommendation, is prima facie evidence of the propriety of making the repairs, to justify the master and lender on bottomry 479

The lender is prima facie presumed to have made inquiries as to the apparent necessity, and to have acted upon the facts and circumstances, as made known by the survey 479

The onus probandi, that the master has other funds, or that the owner has a personal credit in that port, is on the owner, who resists the bottomry bond..... 479

A bottomry covering items of advance not entitled to a bottomry lien is invalid only in part.....1013

The court will order a referee to ascertain and report the actual constituents of a bottomry lien, the validity of which is contested 1013

Where the owners, with all the facts before them under which a bottomry bond was given by the master in a foreign port, claim and receive their share of the general average from the underwriters, it amounts to a ratification of the making of the bond.....1202

A voyage to a foreign port, there to discharge cargo; thence to another foreign port, there to take cargo; thence to a domestic port,—is continuous with respect to liability of freight moneys to satisfy a bottomry bond given for repairs in the first part of the voyage..... 109

An agreement in a respondentia bond to have on board the amount lent, in goods, held not a condition precedent, but the lender could recover the deficiency on a loss..... 712

A collateral agreement to indorse bills of lading as further security held not a condition precedent..... 712

Questions as to the validity of bottomry claims will not be entertained on motion and notice..... 798

Creditors having obtained decrees against the proceeds of a vessel, where bottomry creditors come in and arrest the fund, may make themselves parties and contest the bottomry claims..... 798

A mortgagee of a vessel can intervene in a suit by a bottomry holder against the ves-

COLLISION.

Page

Nature of liability—Contributive fault.

An error committed under impending danger, or in extremis, produced or brought about by another vessel, cannot be alleged as a fault..... 1020

A change of course made by a sail vessel in response to a hail from an approaching steamer will not be considered a fault..... 448

Inability of the officer in charge of a steamer to give instant orders to the engineer when a collision is impending is negligence 448

Rules of navigation.

A failure to keep to the middle of the East river, as required by law, will not be considered a fault where the approaching vessel was seen in time to take the necessary steps to clear..... 741

Sail vessels meeting.

A collision in open sea, in broad daylight, between vessels on crossing tacks, cannot be attributed to unavoidable accident..... 1020

In the case of vessels close-hauled on opposite tacks, the vessel on the starboard tack must keep her course..... 1020

Steam vessel meeting sail vessel.

A steamer should stop promptly upon discovering in her course an indistinct object, which may be a sail..... 265

Where there is plenty of sea room, the steamer need not slacken her speed so long as the sail vessel is apparently keeping her course, and no danger is apparent..... 762

A steamer held in fault in starboarding blindly, in ignorance of course of sail vessel in a fog..... 702

Steam vessels meeting.

A steamer has the right to rely to the last moment upon the power of an approaching steamer to pass in accordance with a single blast given by her..... 741

The obligation to slacken speed under article 16 of the collision act was not intended to be contemporaneous with the duty of porting under article 13..... 762

Steamer having another on her starboard, and failing to give sufficient room to cross, considering the tide, held in fault..... 722

Vessels moored, etc.

Negligence in lying in the track of a vessel gives rise to the same degree of liability for collision as any other fault..... 107

A vessel which breaks from her moorings, and comes into collision with another at anchor, has the burden of showing vis major, or inevitable accident..... 771

Vessel at anchor held not at fault for omitting to set an anchor watch..... 771

River and harbor navigation.

Steamboat passing tow in narrow channel on the Hudson river at night held in fault for failure to slow down, and observe position of tow..... 192

Speed: Fogs.

A speed of nine miles an hour, in the East river, in a crowd of vessels, is an unreasonable speed..... 322

Speed of from seven to eight knots an hour in dense fog off Point Judith held excessive 702

The cases upon the subject of speed reviewed and criticised..... 762

Lights; signals, etc.

Failure to carry a light does not put a vessel at fault unless the discovery of her position to the colliding vessel was thereby delayed 265

A light, without reflectors, on a sail vessel navigating the lakes at night, is insufficient, under Act March 3, 1849, § 5..... 560

A vessel carrying the wrong light at the time of the collision has the burden of

Page
showing that it did not contribute to the loss 560
It cannot be said that a loss resulted entirely from the neglect of a vessel to carry a proper light, where the other vessel had not a competent lookout, and should have kept away 560
Particular instances of collision.
Between vessels close hauled, beating up a narrow channel, where the overtaking vessel, being on the port tack, failed to keep away, and the other made no effort to avoid the collision, and both were held in fault.. 802
Between a propeller aground on St. Clair flats, not exhibiting a proper light, and a tow whose tug failed to stop, where the tow only was held blameless..... 718
Between tows in East river, where tug attempted to pass between a drilling scow and piers, and failed to keep her tow on a parallel course..... 741
Between steamer and tow in Hell Gate near Pot Rock, where the former was held in fault in not keeping to the northerly edge of the tide.....1070 Procedure.
A suit is not barred within the time prescribed by the statute of limitations where there has been no change of ownership... 718
The rule giving greater weight to the testimony of persons on board a vessel, as to her movements, does not apply to the exhibition of a light..... 718
The running of a steamer in a thoroughfare of vessels, at night, with no more precaution than is usual in the daytime, raises an inference that she could have discovered an approaching vessel in time to avoid collision 107
Rule of damages.
Claimants are entitled to a deduction for the value of cargo raised by libelant's agent from the sunken vessel, and appropriated by him.....1073
The use of such nautical skill as owners of vessels usually employ in such emergencies sufficiently shows reasonable exertions to save a sunken cargo.....1073
Where it does not appear how the commissioner arrived at the sum allowed for freight pending, an exception to the report, as not showing the principle on which it is calculated, is the only way to bring up the question of the amount.....1073
Division of damages.
Where both vessels are held in fault, the loss will be divided equally between them.. 560 Appeal.
On an appeal in a collision case, where the question, on the proofs, is a close one as to which vessel was in fault, the decree will not be reversed..... 322

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

A state statute passed before the fourteenth amendment, prohibiting a white person from marrying a negro, and inflicting a penalty upon the former alone for its violation, is not rendered nugatory by the fourteenth amendment..... 699
The provision of the Georgia constitution of 1868 (article 5, § 17), that the courts shall have no jurisdiction to enforce a debt, the consideration of which was a slave or slaves, or the hire thereof, is void, as impairing the obligation of contracts, so far as it relates to contracts made before the emancipation proclamation..... 798

tution, unless sustained by some distinct adjudication of the highest court of the state.. 108
The federal courts are not concluded in a matter of general equity jurisdiction by a decision of the state court..... 202
State court decisions upon questions of general law are not binding upon the federal court 1126
In an action on railroad aid bonds, the federal court will follow the decision of the highest court of the state construing the statute under which they were issued... 95, 97
A decision of the state court construing a state statute where the case is pending on appeal in the supreme court of the United States will not be considered as one of authority 366
The circuit court of the United States must follow the decision of the supreme court declaring a state statute constitutional, rather than a later decision of the supreme court of the state declaring the statute unconstitutional..... 364

—— Procedure.

Defect of jurisdiction not patent on the record is available only by plea..... 772
The court will enjoin further proceedings pending determination of the plea to the jurisdiction, where the bill avers the jurisdictional requisites..... 772
Where a federal court has no jurisdiction of a case, it has no power to make any order in it, except to dismiss it for want of jurisdiction..... 149

COVENANTS.

The assignee of a covenant for title may enforce performance against the heir of the covenantor, to the extent of the interest inherited, although such covenant was the joint covenant of the ancestor and another, and such heir is not named therein..... 29
A covenant which runs with the land is divisible, and the grantee of any part or interest in the land may, as to the same, maintain suit upon the covenant against the original covenantor, or his legal representatives 29
A covenant to convey a particular title if after acquired by the covenantor may be enforced in equity, if such covenantor neglect to perform the same, without a prior demand and refusal..... 29
The interest acquired by the husband and children on the death of the wife of a settler under the donation act of 1850 held to be within a covenant to convey the title of the United States, if the covenantors obtained the same, in a deed by them made before the passage of the act..... 29

CRIMINAL LAW.

Where nearly the whole county is in a state of insurrection, and is occupied by a military force, a trial for treason may be held in another county..... 826
The court's decision that "great inconvenience" prevented the trial being held in the county where the crime was committed is conclusive after verdict..... 826
A prior conviction and nol pros upon a sufficient indictment at common law, though insufficient under the statute, is a bar to a subsequent prosecution on a new indictment sufficient under the statute, for the same offense 274, 275
The court has power in criminal, as in civil cases, to grant a new trial; but the new trial can only be granted in favor of the prisoner, and not to his prejudice..... 826
A new trial should be granted where it appears that one of the jurors, before the trial, had used expressions to the effect that the prisoners ought to be hung, and that the community would not be safe unless they were hung..... 826

CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Customs laws.

Section 20 of Act Aug. 30, 1842, in regard to the rate of duty on nonenumerated articles, was not repealed by Act July 30, 1846, or Act March 3, 1857.....24, 1140

Rates of duty.

Goats' hair, uncleaned and unmanufactured, held entitled to entry duty free, under Act March 2, 1861, § 23..... 44
Silk neckties held dutiable as "wearing apparel," under the acts of 1861 and 1862...*172
The rate on washed wool is computed by doubling the specific and ad valorem rates for unwashed wool. (Rev. St. § 2504, Sched. L.) 573
The question of similitude is one of fact for the jury.....1140

Invoice: Appraisal.

The collector is not bound to take the invoice valuation of goods, supported by the owner's oath on the entry, as their dutiable value 329
The place of shipment, as stated in the entry invoice, and the date of the invoice, may be assumed to be the place and time of purchase, in the absence of a written notice of a different state of facts..... 329
All goods subject to an ad valorem duty, though obtained otherwise than by purchase, are to be appraised at the period of exportation under Act March 3, 1851..... 452
In the case of iron purchased at Wales, and transshipped at Liverpool, held, that the "period of exportation" was the time when the iron left Liverpool..... 452
The cost of transportation from Wales to Liverpool is not a dutiable charge which can be added to the market price..... 452
Where merchandise is shipped from Smyrna, and transshipped at Liverpool, the estimated freight between such places cannot be added to the market value and charges at Smyrna to make up the dutiable value 1143
The appraisement by the official appraiser will be held conclusive, notwithstanding a protest, where the importer asserted that he did not desire a reappraisement, and did not offer the fees therefor..... 27

Payment: Protest: Appeal.

The time for filing a protest in the case of goods imported for warehousing is computed from the date of the original liquidation, which is made at the same time and in the same manner as when the entry is for immediate consumption 573
A protest held not sufficiently signed, where the importer's signature was on a distinct paper annexed by a wafer, not referring to the protest, nor in any manner made a part thereof..... 323
Prospective protests may be sufficient.. 620

Actions for duties paid.

A protest must point out specifically the particular omission or irregularity complained of, to be available in an action to recover back the duties..... 329
Grounds of objection not specifically stated in the protest cannot be raised in an action to recover back the duties..... 27
Plaintiff must satisfy the jury that he has fully complied with all the requirements of the statute both as to form and substance..1140
Interest may be allowed from the time of rendering the verdict until the judgment... 620

Bonded warehouses.

The owner of property seized as smuggled is not entitled to have the same bonded under Act March 2, 1799, § 89; but a delivery on bail is discretionary with the court 43

Goods entered for warehouse, libeled as forfeited and attached while in warehouse, may be bonded to the amount of their value, less the duties, under Act March 2, 1799. § 89..... 585

DAMAGES.

In an action against a carrier for the loss of laces, an heirloom, their value must be ascertained by a money standard, based on evidence 652
In an action for personal injuries, prospective damages may be given when they do not form the basis of a new action..... 475

DEBT, ACTION OF.

Debt will lie against the maker of a promissory note.....1191
Covenant, and not debt, is the proper action on a bond payable by installments until all become due; but debt may be brought if payment be secured by a penalty..... 355

DECEIT.

See, also, "Fraud."

Where part payment for property is made by a note of a third person, taken by the seller under the false and fraudulent representation of the purchaser that the maker was responsible, the seller may recover the amount thereof from the purchaser..... 579
An expression of belief by the seller of a note, that the maker is responsible, is equivalent to an assertion of the fact, if meant to be so understood, and if made with knowledge that he is not responsible..... 579

DEED.

A quitclaim deed is effectual to pass such title as the grantor has at the time of its execution, although he is not in possession.. 12
Delivery may be inferred from circumstances, and need not be proved by positive testimony 1162
A presumption of due delivery arises from the possession of the deed by the grantee.. 202
Deeds, however apparently formal, must be interpreted upon a view of the whole paper, and in subservience to what appears to be their scope..... 774
In construing a deed involving questions of science, the court may refer to the state of public knowledge and learning, and inquire into the actual knowledge of the parties 774
The designation of quantity will not control boundaries clearly indicated; but, where the true description is in doubt, the designation of quantity may be considered.. 12

DEMURRAGE.

Damages in the nature of demurrage are recoverable from consignee without stipulation in bill of lading..... 993
A consignee is bound to give only such dispatch as is reasonable under the circumstances 993
Consignees must provide such reasonable dock room as their business ordinarily requires 993
A vessel required to load or discharge her cargo at a particular dock, and there detained by reason of its crowded condition, is entitled to demurrage.....1017
Where the consignee has provided ample dock room for vessels as they are reasonably expected to arrive, vessels arriving out of time must wait their turn. He is not obliged to procure other docks..... 993

The custom of the port of Chicago to allow one day to provide a dock, when not rendered unreasonable by controlling circumstances, will be considered a law..... 993
A usage by which vessels allow a few days after reporting for a sale of the cargo will not deprive a vessel of the right to demurrage where her cargo is sold before arrival.. 464
A ship to "be discharged as fast as the custom of the port will admit," demurrage to be charged after the expiration of 10 days, held entitled to demurrage, notwithstanding pre-occupancy of the wharf by other vessels.....1017

DEPOSITION.

In common-law actions in the federal courts, depositions may be taken pursuant to the state law or the act of congress, as parties may elect..... 276
A deposition cannot be taken under the act of congress before a judge of a municipal court..... 443
Time of issue of commission to take deposition in a foreign country, and the filing of interrogatories and cross-interrogatories, and notice..... 811

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

Under the statute of descents of Rhode Island of 1822, brothers and sisters of the half blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood.....1162

DISCOVERY.

If evidence of defendant's title furnishes evidence of the complainant's, the latter may compel a discovery of it.....1049
The fact that in Louisiana titles are registered in a public office does not affect complainant's right to call for such discovery..1049
A bill of discovery will not be allowed in any case where the discovery will subject the defendant to a penalty, unless the bill relinquishes all claim to the penalty..... 54

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

The district attorney is not so far an officer of the court that the court can compel him to enter the appearance of the United States 43

DIVORCE.

The court has no authority under Act Or. Jan. 17, 1854, to give the property of either parent to the children, except during their minority, and as a means of providing for their nurture and education during such minority 172

Domicile.

See "Courts."

EJECTMENT.

An action of disseisin is authorized and regulated by the statute of Indiana..... 341
The statute of 21 Jac. I. as to 20 years' possession, was not adopted in New Jersey by force of the act of 1727; the action of ejectment having been always considered on the same footing as the writ of right...1196
Where a new trial is granted as of course in a state court under the state statute, the party cannot abandon the special remedy, and proceed in the federal court..... 725

Page

Ejectment held barred by 60 years' possession under Act N. J. June 5, 1787.....1196

Defendant cannot avail himself of an outstanding title in a third person, under whom he does not claim, where such title is barred by the statute of limitations, or by a descent cast 555

A conveyance by plaintiff pendente lite cannot be set up to defeat the recovery. The suit proceeds in the name of the original party 778

The declaration cannot be amended by stating a demise under a new title.....1077

A landlord has no right to apply to be made defendant in place of the tenant until the latter files his answer admitting his tenancy. Code Or. § 226..... 172

Defendant should state in his answer the nature and duration of the estate he claims in the premises, if any, but not the evidence of it. Code Or. 226, 227..... 172

The judgment in ejectment is not a bar to another action where the verdict for defendant only states that he is entitled to the possession. Code Or. 227..... 172

EMBARGO AND NONINTERCOURSE.

The power to remit fines (Act Jan. 2, 1813) extends to cases of joint ownership between citizens of the United States and citizens of Great Britain, so far as the former were concerned.....1105

The power is lodged entirely with the secretary of the treasury. The court has no revisory power.....1105

EQUITY.

See, also, "Injunction"; "Pleading in Equity"; "Practice in Equity."

Jurisdiction.

A party claiming rights under a contract must act at his peril. He cannot come into equity for its interpretation to save himself the consequences of a misconstruction.. 302

The rights of parties to an agreement for a license under letters patent, with a proviso for a corresponding reduction in the fee on a license to others at a lower rate, held to be purely legal, giving no right to the interposition of equity for the interpretation of the contract..... 302

Apprehension of a denial of the rights of a licensee to use a licensed invention, or a revocation of the license, will not justify application to a court of equity for an injunction 302

An averment of fraud in the sale of a promissory note, and a request for a discovery of facts accompanying the sale, furnish sufficient ground for jurisdiction.... 579

If fraud is charged against executors in proving a will, and acting under it, and notice of such fraud before their purchase of the property is alleged against the other defendants, a suit at law could not give adequate relief.....1049

A deed will not be rescinded for fraudulent misrepresentations by a stranger; but they may afford ground for relief on account of mistake..... 109

Payment will not be permitted in equity to operate as an extinguishment, as against those equitably entitled to substitution in place of the party receiving payment..... 355

A creditor with a right to two funds may be restrained to the use of one, if sufficient, in favor of a creditor of the other; or, where the former obtains satisfaction out of the common fund, equity will give the latter a lien on the fund not exhausted 62, 355

Equity may enjoin an action at law, on promissory notes, where complainant shows a prima facie title, although he is not a party to the action at law..... 134

A claim by the owners of a bill of exchange for damages for failure of one to whom it was sent for collection to give notice of dishonor to the indorser is ground of equitable relief against such person...1088

Jurisprudence.

The equity jurisdiction and jurisprudence administered in the federal courts are not regulated by the local jurisprudence..... 266

A verdict and judgment at law is not a bar to relief in equity if an equitable ground of relief be laid.....1088

A bill to rescind a deed, when filed after considerable lapse of time, must state sufficient reasons for the delay, where there has been a material change in the character or value of the property..... 109

Though lapse of time be not pleaded as a bar, the judgment of the court will be influenced by unexcused delay..... 109

Lying by, and acquiescence, may be sufficient to induce the court to refuse to rescind a deed, though not pleaded as a bar.. 109

A bill of discovery by an assignee in bankruptcy to recover property fraudulently concealed 10 years prior thereto, alleging that the facts only came to complainant's knowledge "within the past year," held sufficient..... 415

The objection that the remedy at law is adequate may be taken on demurrer when it appears on the face of the bill, but it is not too late at the hearing if, after an answer, no disclosure is obtained..... 579

Unless the inadequacy of consideration be so gross as to strike every person with a presumption of fraud, it is not evidence of unfairness 341

Fraud charged as the ground of relief must be proved. Proof of other facts, sufficient to constitute a claim of relief under another head of equity, will not prevent a dismissal of the bill..... 109

ESCROW.

A deed can never be delivered as an escrow to the grantee himself..... 202

ESTATES.

A conveyance "to J. M. and his generation, to endure as long as the waters of the Delaware should run," passes no more than a life estate..... 555

The purchase money, on a sale made jointly by persons having independent interests, will be divided according to their respective interests, in the absence of other countervailing circumstances..... 549

A tenant for life and a remainder-man in fee contribute to discharge a mortgage according to the relative value of their respective interests; the value of the estate of the tenant for life being calculated by the common tables..... 549

The same principle applies where a mortgagee devises the mortgaged estate to one for life, remainder over in fee..... 549

On a sale by a tenant for life with the consent of the guardian of minor remainder-men in fee, held, that the value of the estate of the former was to be ascertained by the common tables at the time of the sale, and was unaffected by the fact of his death shortly after the sale..... 549

ESTOPPEL.

See, also, "Judgment."

A person receiving a deed in fee from a tenant in tail is not estopped in eject-

Page

ment, by the issue in tail to deny the validity of plaintiff's title, as the alleged estoppel is not mutual.....1196
Declarations and conduct of party held insufficient to create an estoppel in pais.. 29

EVIDENCE.

The court will take judicial notice of the subdivision of the state into counties and the county seats.....1031
Oral evidence is not admissible to vary an agreement in writing..... 62
A will proved in another state, according to the laws of Tennessee, if recorded in that state, is evidence. The record may be made any time before the will is offered in evidence 257
The record of a court in Virginia must be certified by the presiding magistrate..1191
Entries made in the regular course of business by a person since deceased are evidence, but the original book must be produced, and the entries must upon their face appear fair.....1078
On the question of a boundary, hearsay evidence that a particular object (such as a spring) was on the land of one of the parties is inadmissible..... 723
In an action against a steamboat company for an injury to a passenger accidentally caused in a disturbance among soldiers on board the boat, evidence of a conversation between military officers, at about the time of the disturbance, held admissible as part of the res gestae..... 280
Person acquainted with parchment patents may be examined, as to the traces of a seal, on the question whether such a writing had been originally sealed..... 341
The person who took the acknowledgment was permitted to state, from his uniform practice in taking acknowledgments, he could not have taken it, in the case under consideration, had no seal been attached to the instrument..... 341
Acts and monuments, and judicial and professional tradition, in the absence of more direct testimony, will be regarded as an authoritative means of ascertaining ancient opinion of fact..... 115
Testimony of persons who have witnessed dawn and sunset at the place and season involved in the issue, together with that of eyewitnesses to the facts in dispute, outweighs the received opinions of geographers and navigators as to the time of such phenomena and the duration of twilight..... 265

EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF.

Order for leave to make a bill of exceptions was granted two years after the trial, where plaintiff had made a case by direction of the trial judge..... 383

EXECUTION.

See, also, "Judicial Sales."

The preliminaries required by Act Pa. 1836, § 75, for a levy on corporate property, are still essential to the validity of a levy under Act Pa. 1870..... 628
Under the California practice act, an execution may be issued and executed as soon as the judgment is entered, and before the judgment roll is actually made up.....*1113
A judgment assigned to one of the debtors after execution has been returned unsatisfied will not support a second execution against the codebtor's property..... 781
When the judgment is for a penalty to be released on the payment of a smaller sum, that sum must be ascertained before the execution can be issued..... 192

Page

Execution in the District of Columbia, on a judgment rendered in Maryland before February 27, 1801..... 192
The interest of persons to whom land was conveyed as trustees of an unincorporated association will pass, on execution sale, under a judgment for a debt of the association, recovered in an action against all the members, including such trustees.. 781

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

An executor under a domestic will is not liable for legacies which came to the hand of another as executor and guardian under a will made abroad.....1054
Proceedings for the sale of realty to pay debts to which nonresident heirs were made parties by publication under order of the court, as provided by statute, cannot be collaterally attacked..... 473
A stranger cannot object to the irregularity of proceedings for the sale of realty to pay debts, where the heirs make no objection 473
All the executors need not join in an action on a sealed note given to one..... 373
In a declaration by an administrator upon a bond to his intestate he must aver himself to be administrator, and make profert of his letters of administration..... 975
An executor may be ruled to plead before the expiration of the year after letters granted 737

Exemptions.

See "Bankruptcy."

FACTORS AND BROKERS.

The receipt and retention of an invoice of goods by the consignee, without objection, is evidence that the goods enumerated therein were received by him..... 23
If a consignee has rendered no account of sales of merchandise for many years, and at the trial offers no evidence to prove what part was sold, and at what prices, it will be presumed that the goods were sold at the invoice prices..... 23
Where the consignee gives acceptances for the value of the goods, and agrees to account for the whole price, guarantying the sales, and to receive a commission, the transaction is a consignment on sale, as distinguished from a consignment on del credere guarantee..... 247
On a consignment on sale, the consignor cannot, without special agreement, reserve a special property, in notes and accounts which the consignee may take from purchasers, as against other creditors of the consignee in bankruptcy..... 247
A supercargo is not bound to observe the exact terms of his instructions, if thereby the interests of the owner would be sacrificed, or his objects frustrated..... 459
In cases of necessity or great urgency, it is only necessary that the supercargo should act bona fide, and with reasonable discretion, to bind the owner..... 459
All sales by a supercargo except those by del credere commission are at the risk of the shipper..... 459
The owner ratifies a sale by the supercargo by receiving the proceeds without objecting 459
In the absence of a special contract, a credit sale is at the risk of the shipper, where the usage of trade allows discretionary sales on cash or credit 459
The validity of a sale on credit depends upon the usage of trade in the place where the sale is made, and such usage is a question of fact for the jury..... 459

In the case of a sale on credit, the factor is bound to exercise due discretion in enforcing payment, and must not sue or put the owner to expense unless there is reasonable ground to believe that he will be benefited 459
A failure to give notice of the insolvency of the purchaser will render the factor liable for all damages suffered in consequence of such failure..... 459
Under a written contract to pay a factor one-tenth of the net profits, after deducting expenses "that may appertain to the goods themselves," the expenses of clerk hire, advertising, and taxes are properly deducted 534
Construction of contract with a factor for a share of the net profits arising out of a general foreign trading and shipping business, and the computation of profits at the end of the period..... 534
Under a contract to pay a factor a certain per cent. of the net profits of the business, the owner is liable for the factor's proportion of an amount offered in settlement of a claim barred by statute, which the owner refused to receive..... 534

FRAUD.

See, also, "Deceit"; "Equity."

Notwithstanding fraud committed by one party to a contract upon the other, the contract remains operative until disapproved by the injured party..... 427

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

A trust, created by a parol contract, will be enforced in equity against a party, who does not insist upon the defense of the statute of frauds..... 202
A deed from an equitable mortgagee, and an assignment of a bond to reconvey to persons who had agreed to purchase on joint account, held to create a fiduciary relation between them, grounded on privity of title or estate, under which the purchase of an outstanding incumbrance or adverse title by one would be a trust for the benefit of both, taking the agreement out of the statute of frauds..... 202

Fraudulent Conveyances.

See "Bankruptcy."

GARNISHMENT.

See, also, "Attachment."

A judgment debtor is not liable to be attached as a garnishee under the foreign attachment act of Rhode Island..... 711
A bank is not liable on trustee process against a depositor for moneys paid out on his check on the day of, but before, the service of the writ on it, though the entry was not made on its books until some days later 583
Judgment against the garnishee is no defense in a suit for the debt, if the plaintiff in the original trustee process has, by his neglect to comply with the local laws, put his judgment in a state of suspension, so that execution can no longer issue upon it, and it cannot be revived by a scire facias 323

GRANT.

See, also, "Deeds"; "Public Lands."

The sovereign may, although an individual cannot, render valid a void act..... 818
The name of a grantee is not essential to the validity of a deed. A grant may be made to classes of persons, if sufficiently designated by descriptio personarum..... 818
Where a grant made by government refers in general terms to a certainty, it is the same as if the certainty had been expressed in the grant, though it be not matter of record..... 818
The grant to certain settlers in the village of Peoria, Ill., whose buildings had been destroyed by a military company, held to be for a consideration, and the heirs of a settler who died before it was made are entitled to the patent..... 473
To show a title out of the proprietaries, a grant, warrant, and survey under the proprietors, or length of possession against them, may be shown.....1196

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

See, also, "Wills."

A general guardian cannot voluntarily appear for minor defendants, but they must be served with process, and a guardian ad litem appointed for them, when brought into court..... 172
A petition by a guardian for the sale of his ward's lands is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and is not adverse to the next of kin, to whom notice is required to be given.....1031
The county court acquires jurisdiction on the filing of the petition for the sale of the ward's lands (Laws Or. p. 738), and its judgment cannot be collaterally questioned for errors in the proceedings, except as provided by statute.....1031
The defect in the title of a person purchasing at a guardian's sale can be taken advantage of only by the cestuis que trust.... 202
A guardian's sale was held to have been made upon the original notice, though, upon the day named, it was adjourned for four weeks, where the statute forbade an adjournment for more than one week at a time 1031

HABEAS CORPUS.

An order from a subordinate in the war department, directing a marshal not to produce a person in his custody on habeas corpus, held no justification for his disobedience. 1
A jailer who acted as mere servant of the marshal in disobeying the writ held not punishable 1

HOMESTEAD.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Homestead exemption must exist and be claimed at the time the writ comes to the officer's hands..... 759

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

So long as a legacy to the wife continues a chose in action, it is her property. The marital right of the husband does not attach until it is reduced into possession.....1102
The husband may, as against his creditors, relinquish his marital right in a legacy bequeathed to his wife..... 1102
A court of equity will sustain the bill of a married woman, suing by her next friend, to recover a legacy bequeathed to her, where the husband has transferred all his marital rights in the legacy to his wife.....1102
A husband who has borrowed his wife's funds may secure her by payment, pledge, or in any other proper way..... 815
In Wisconsin a married woman, by simply indorsing a note, does not create a liability which can be enforced against her separate estate, nor one upon which a personal judgment will be rendered against her..... 242

A husband, who has conveyed all his estate to a trustee for the sole and separate use of his wife, may join with her in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and in law would be entitled to the damages recovered 723

INDIANS.

A state court has no jurisdiction over a partition suit in relation to lands of the Shawnee Indians, which have never been conveyed with the approval of the secretary of the interior..... 392

INFORMERS.

The person who telegraphs the collector of customs that a certain vessel within his district has goods on board liable to forfeiture, and not the deputy collector, who receives and forwards it, and verifies some of its statements, is the informer..... 44

An inspector of internal revenue, who acted in co-operation with, and under the direction of, other revenue officers, and whose researches were within his duties, and resulted in forfeitures, held not entitled to share as informer 589

INJUNCTION.

A corporation defendant in a suit in a federal court may be enjoined, pending the suit, from taking proceedings for a dissolution, or for the appointment of a receiver, or for the distribution of its assets. Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 14..... 167

Act March 2, 1793, § 5, providing that an injunction shall not be granted to stay proceedings in any court of a state, applies only to proceedings commenced in a state court before proceedings are commenced in the federal court 167

In a suit to obtain a reduction of a license fee, an injunction was granted restraining defendant from terminating the license upon condition of plaintiff's depositing in court the amount of the fees in dispute. The bill was dismissed for want of equity and proper parties. Held, that the fund would be retained until the final determination of the controversy by a proper tribunal..... 310

INSOLVENCY.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

An insolvent debtor, arrested for a debt due before his discharge, can only be relieved by the court, or a judge, before whom the process is returnable..... 805

INSURANCE.

See, also, "Marine Insurance."

Policy held to take effect from its delivery, though premium was not paid, notwithstanding its condition to the contrary, where the agent was personally liable to the company. 706

A provision that "if the insured shall cause the property to be insured for more than its value, the policy shall be void," only avoids the policy in case of intentional overvaluation or fraudulent concealment..... 16

The burden is upon the company to show that the over-valuation was intentional... 16

A policy cannot be avoided under its terms because the exact interest of the insured in the property is not shown, where the company's agent knew the actual condition of the title, and neglected to make the proper note in the policy..... 16

Where the ownership of property lies between the husband and wife, and the husband is estopped from claiming it, the wife has a sufficient title to support an action on a policy under which it was insured as belonging to her..... 16

A married sister, in no way dependent upon her brother for support, and not his creditor, has an insurable interest in his life 657

In the case of a negative answer to the question whether the applicant ever had a rupture, it is for the jury to say whether a rupture, considered as cured, was material to his soundness of health.....*657

Statement of age held not to import absolute accuracy 657

The company held estopped to deny liability as against one who purchased policy after death of insured, relying upon the representations of its agent..... 657

Prompt payment of premiums on the date when due is waived by a previous course of dealing in respect to the particular policy, and to other policies generally, by which 30 days' time has been habitually allowed....1146

Failure to disclose the fact that the insured is dangerously ill will avoid a renewal certificate, issued on payment of a premium 11 days after it is due, where prompt payment has not been waived.....1146

Breach of a condition as to place of residence is waived when, with knowledge thereof, premiums are accepted, and renewal certificates issued 1146

If proofs of loss are presented in apt time, and substantially in compliance with the requirements of the policy, it is sufficient, unless the company asks for more specific proof 16

Proofs of loss will be considered as waived where the company's adjuster, after examining the premises, states that the company is not liable on the ground that the policy is invalid 16

Objections to proofs of loss, not made when the same were served, but first brought forward at the trial, will be considered as waived..... 706

Proof of the claim in bankruptcy is equivalent to the commencement of a suit against a bankrupt insurance company, under a clause in the policy limiting the right of action to one year..... 72

An insurance company has no right to divide its risks and capital into classes, and restrict the liability upon stock notes to the class in which they are placed..... 199

The fund deposited by a foreign insurance company as required by the Mississippi statutes is intended for the protection of domestic policy holders, and is to be refunded on its withdrawal from business, so far as it is not charged with unpaid losses and premiums due such holders..... 75

Such company, on withdrawing from business within the state, may assign such fund to a company succeeding to its business.... 75

Such an assignment, though made within four months of an adjudication in bankruptcy, held not void as to foreign creditors.... 75

A state treasurer held not personally liable for moneys paid out of a fund deposited by the company for the protection of its policy holders, where he acts in good faith under the advice of the law officers of the state that the claims paid are proper charges on the fund 75

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The United States cannot impose a tax on the salary of a judge of the superior court of the city of New York, by imposing a tax on such salary as the income of such judge.. 746

The fact that such salary is fixed by the board of supervisors of the county of New York, or that it is payable out of the treasury of the city of New York, is immaterial.. 746

Federal collection officers may be enjoined from claiming moneys of citizens, and levying for them as if for taxes..... 728

Tobacco removed from the manufacturers' factory to their store held not subject to increased duties under Act July 1, 1864.....1079

The secretary of the treasury has no power to suspend the issue of certificates to importers of distilled spirits, under Act March 2, 1799..... 568

The collector will not be allowed a per diem for watching seized property, where he fails to turn it over to the district attorney, to have proceedings commenced, for 37 days after the seizure..... 42

Judgment for defendant was ordered in this case upon the ground that the claim of the plaintiff was barred by the act of July, 1862, as construed by the supreme court... 689

JUDGMENT.

Rendition and entry.

Upon executing a writ of inquiry upon a judgment by default, the jury must find at least one mill in damages..... 737

Validity.

The judgments of a court not having jurisdiction are void ab initio.....*129

A judgment of a state court whose jurisdiction was acquired under a state statute, which was virtually repealed by the adoption of a treaty before the judgment was rendered, is void ab initio.....*129

A stipulation in a judgment that the interest on it shall bear interest if not paid annually is void, and does not make such judgment usurious 978

Judgment by confession under Act Cal. 1850 781

A judgment by confession held not void, under the Oregon Code, for want of a sufficient statement of the facts, except as to creditors who have acquired a lien before sale thereunder 978

Decree in consolidated action held valid, though the court failed to acquire jurisdiction in one of the actions so consolidated..*1113

Operation and effect.

The title acquired by a stranger through a sale of lands regularly made under a judgment of a court of record, valid upon its face, cannot be defeated by a subsequent reversal of the judgment on appeal.....*1113

Under a local law allowing a new trial as to some issues, without disturbing the findings upon others, a judgment supported by findings not vacated is not an estoppel as to matter embraced in a vacated finding..... 592

Notwithstanding the judgment might have been rested upon an issue upon matter of abatement, the matter upon the merits will be res adjudicata, where both issues are found for defendant, and the judgment is entered generally under a local law allowing all defenses to be set up in the answer..... 592

When the findings and judgment in a given case are conclusive on both parties if conclusive on one, the estoppel is mutual, within the meaning of the rule requiring estoppels to be mutual..... 592

A judgment based upon an estoppel by a previous judgment in ejectment held no defense on a new trial after reversal of the first judgment 778, 781

Relief against; amendment.

A court of equity has power to reduce the amount of judgments at law rendered on Confederate contracts to the equivalent in legal money..... 616

A court of equity may require the abatement of war interest embraced in judgments in Virginia 616

Of different jurisdictions.

The federal courts are bound to give to the judgments of the state courts only the same faith and credit which the courts of another state are bound to give to them....1126

Where the state court has jurisdiction, the merits of the controversy involved are not open to examination in the federal court after judgment 1126

The presumption in favor of judgments of courts of general jurisdiction only extends to matters and persons falling within the scope of such general jurisdiction. When the proceeding is outside of such general scope, the record must show compliance with the special authority.....1126

There can be no personal judgment upon constructive or substituted service by publication against a nonresident, except as a means of reaching property situated at the time within the state, or of affecting some interest therein, or determining the status of the plaintiff with respect to the non-resident party 1126

When constructive or substituted service by publication in a personal action is authorized by statute in place of personal citation, the statute must be strictly pursued..1126

On a collateral attack upon a judgment of a superior court, the court will be conclusively presumed to have acquired jurisdiction, unless the record, on its face, affirmatively shows a want of jurisdiction.....*1113

If the record is silent as to the proof of a jurisdictional fact, due proof of the fact will be presumed in support of the judgment *1113

The recital of a jurisdictional fact, there being nothing to the contrary in the record, is conclusive of the determination of the fact upon sufficient evidence, although the evidence does not appear in the record.....*1113

The determination by the court issuing the summons, that it was duly served by publication, as authorized by law, is conclusive when collaterally brought into question...*1113

Actions on judgments.

Facts, in opposition to the record of a judgment obtained in one state, cannot be alleged to contradict the judgment, in an action brought upon it in another state..... 15

In a suit founded upon the record of a judgment, where the court had jurisdiction, no error in the proceeding can be considered, nor can nil debit be pleaded..... 788

Defendant cannot set up in defense to a suit on a foreign judgment that he was not served with process, and did not appear in the suit in which it was rendered, where the record shows a general appearance by an attorney 15

JUDICIAL SALES.

See, also, "Execution."

A guardian's sale, authorized by the proper court, is a "judicial sale," and cannot be questioned collaterally for error in the adjournment thereof 1031

JURY.

Where a juror is taken ill during the opening address in a civil action, he may be discharged, and another drawn from the panel in his stead..... 373

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

Plaintiff can only recover upon the cause of action stated in the warrant..... 649

A judgment of a justice of the peace, being in part for a matter not within his jurisdiction, is void in toto..... 649

A justice of the peace is not liable in damages for judicial acts, and for ministerial acts only in case of intentional or gross negligence 1142

The justice is not liable for taking a supersedeas on Sunday, and from a minor...1142

LIBEL AND SLANDER.

It is actionable per se to charge a director of the bank with being a swindler..... 456

A breach of trust, accompanied by falsehood, does not amount to swindling unless there was an intent to defraud..... 456

Official communications between government officials are privileged, and neither the sending such communication nor retaining a copy amounts to a publication.....1158

All the facts stated in a plea of justification must be substantially proved..... 456

A verdict for one cent damages carries full costs 456

LIENS.

See, also, "Bankruptcy"; "Mechanics' Liens"; "Maritime Liens"; "Pledge."

By the common law, liens exist only where the party has actual or constructive possession of the goods; but in the maritime law, and in equity, liens exist independently of possession 508

A lien in equity is not a property in the thing nor does it constitute a right of action for the thing; but is a charge upon the thing 508

An equitable lien is valid (in Massachusetts), although no remedy for its enforcement is provided by the state jurisprudence. 266

Where a lien, or equitable claim, constituting a charge in rem, is a matter of agreement, it will be enforced in equity against the party himself, or his personal representatives, or persons claiming under him, or assignees in bankruptcy..... 266

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Parties cannot, by a contract, agree upon a limitation different from the statute, within which suit shall be brought, or the right to sue be barred..... 788

Civ. Code La. art. 3540, limiting the time to sue to annul a will, is not applicable to a suit in which the will is relied upon as a muniment of title by a party out of possession 1042

Non assumpsit within five years, &c., is not a good plea to an action of assumpsit upon a promise to collect money and account for it, as the cause of action does not arise until the money has been received by defendant and demanded by plaintiff.....1196

The act of limitations cannot be given in evidence upon the plea of nil debet.....1191

LIS PENDENS.

Lis pendens is created in equity by filing a bill and actual service of subpoena. At law, suing out the writ without service of the same is sufficient..... 616

Page

The author of letters, of whatever character, has a property therein; and no person has a right to publish them without his consent, unless such publication be required to establish a personal right or claim, or to vindicate character 342

No private person has the right to publish official letters, addressed to the government, without its sanction..... 342

Maintenance.

See "Champerty and Maintenance."

MARINE INSURANCE.

See, also, "Average."

The applicant is not bound to communicate intelligence known to the insurer, nor the expectations, opinions or speculations of such party, based upon facts known to the insurer 349

A policy insuring a vessel from a past date will cover a loss already accrued, of which neither party knew when the policy was issued, though it does not contain the words "lost or not lost"..... 349

The omission of the master to telegraph the loss of a vessel held not to vitiate the policy 349

Construction of valued policy as to place where goods were to be taken on board....1165

An offer to abandon made as soon as the assured obtains the preliminary proofs of loss, to be laid before the underwriters, is not too late.....1165

The defense of concealment of material facts must be made out affirmatively by the insurer 349

In an action upon a valued policy on a cargo, defendants will not be permitted to give evidence of its actual cost, except in support of an allegation of fraud.....1165

In the absence of any claim of fraud or misrepresentation, held, that the application for insurance, when merged in the policy, was properly excluded from evidence when unaccompanied by any offer of evidence of misrepresentation 352

MARITIME LIENS.

Nature and grounds.

A lien arises for repairs in a foreign port, where apparently reasonable and proper, although not absolutely necessary. All that is required on the part of material-men is good faith and reasonable ground for action. 479

There is no lien where the materials were furnished to a vessel upon the credit of the owner 1196

The sums advanced by a master during a voyage for necessaries supplied to a vessel, for claims of material-men, or for pilotage are liens upon the fund before a court of admiralty 1192

The contracts of the master and physician of a vessel are purely personal, and their wages are not liens upon the fund....1192

A court of admiralty will not favor an indirect lien upon the fund in hand by those claimants who cannot sue originally in such court, especially where there are adverse interests 1192

Priority and enforcement.

Seamen's wages are entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the vessel, over a bottomry lien.....1013

The time of bringing suit determines the priority of payment of claims which are of like character, without extrinsic priority; otherwise, as to claims of seamen, pilots, and bottomry lenders 798

Page

To impound a fund in admiralty until a decision can be had upon the validity of a contested claim, the creditor must have sued out attachment or pleaded his lien to an antecedent action 798

A surplus fund in a court of admiralty arising from the sale of a vessel is subject to the same trusts and liens as the vessel itself was subject to.....1192

Waiver: Discharge: Extinguishment.

The lien of a material man is not waived by taking the negotiable paper of the owner or master of the vessel..... 190

The departure of a vessel from port on Sunday on a trial trip, and again secretly Sunday night, will not discharge the lien.. 743

A sheriff's sale of a vessel on execution against the owners discharges the lien for wages of a seaman who is a part owner. Reversing page 569.....1100

A mortgagee is a bona fide purchaser where a present valuable consideration is given, or money subsequently advanced or liability incurred on the faith thereof... 190

Liens under state laws.

A state statute, giving a preferential lien for materials or supplies furnished in the construction or repair of a vessel, held valid and operative as to surplus proceeds in the registry after satisfaction of maritime liens 678

The successive decisions of the supreme court abrogating the practice of enforcing such liens by proceedings in rem, reviewed and explained 678

Person furnishing supplies in home port on a credit held to have a lien where satisfactory paper was not given as agreed..... 743

MARSHAL.

The marshal is entitled only to his actual necessary expenses for ship-keeping, which must be established by vouchers or otherwise to the satisfaction of the court..... 769

MARTIAL LAW.

The president had authority to issue his proclamation of September 24, 1862, proclaiming martial law and the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in the case of military arrests 1

The two orders issued by the war department August 8, 1862, one "to prevent the evasion of military duty, and for the suppression of disloyal practices," and the other "authorizing the arrest of persons discouraging enlistments," held unconstitutional 1

MASTER AND SERVANT.

The rule which exempts the employer from liability for the negligence of a fellow servant is not applicable to the case of a minor servant ordered to a dangerous service wholly outside the contract of employment 475

MINES.

Under the act of 1866, the right to purchase a mining claim to a silver or gold bearing lode is in the nature of a pre-emption right, and was granted to the one who, under the local laws and regulations, was recognized as entitled to the possession.... 592

The state statute of limitations relating to mining claims constitutes a part of the local laws by which the rights of parties are to be determined 592

MORTGAGES.

Page

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

The question, whether a conveyance amounts to a mortgage, does not turn on the question whether there be a defeasance. 202

Courts of equity are not governed by the same rules as courts of law in declaring whether there be a mortgage..... 202

Where a transaction resolves itself into a security, it will be treated in equity as a mortgage, regardless of its form, and the parties cannot, by agreement, limit the rights of the mortgagor, or cut off his equity of redemption..... 202

A quitclaim deed and a bond to reconvey on the payment of a certain sum held to constitute an equitable mortgage, and not a conditional purchase, giving the grantor an equity of redemption subject to conveyance 202

Quaere if a bond given by a grantee to one of several grantors, in order to defeat and make void the conveyance, if executed at the same time with the conveyance, will amount to a technical defeasance..... 202

A mortgage is governed by the law of the state where the land is situated when executed and sought to be enforced there, though payable in another state..... 181

The remedy by a sale of the mortgaged property to pay overdue installments given in the mortgage held to be merely cumulative, not preventing foreclosure.....1009

A provision that the mortgage shall become security for the performance of a certain agreement at the election of the mortgagor becomes of binding force after election and notice.....1009

The right of the mortgagee to foreclosure or possession is barred, in Connecticut, where the mortgagor has been permitted to remain in possession for 15 years without payment on the debt, or recognition of the mortgage 624

A junior mortgagee, out of possession, may, in such case, sue to have the first mortgage canceled, as barred by the statute.... 624

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

Construction of the Virginia laws of 1779 and 1796, in relation to corporations..... 606

Powers, duties, and liabilities of the corporation of Alexandria, Va..... 606

A corporation aggregate, having, or supposed to have, a common fund, is liable in an action at common law for negligence in its duty 606

Municipal corporation (Washington, D. C.) held to have power to fix a prohibitory license tax on the lottery business..... 660

Failure of mayor or register of Washington, D. C., to publish monthly notice of price of flour, held a good defense to suit for penalty for selling short weight bread.... 822

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

The landing of a cargo contraband of war on the shore of the country of one belligerent at a point not blockaded, is not an act of hostility against the other belligerent..... 321

NEW TRIAL.

It must appear that the newly-discovered evidence was unknown to the party at the time of the trial, as well as his counsel..... 50

An objection to testimony as a whole will not raise the point that part of it was incompetent 280

NUISANCE.

A livery stable in the residence portion of a city is not, as a matter of law, necessarily to be considered as a nuisance to the improved property adjoining or near it..... 286

Where the facts stated in the bill showing that the erection and use of a livery stable would be a nuisance to the adjoining property were denied by the answer, a preliminary injunction will be refused..... 286

OATH.

A commissioner of the United States may, as an officer under the state law, take the verification of all necessary papers in order to procure the arrest of defendant..... 995

PARDON.

A proclamation by the president ordering people in insurrection to disperse to their homes does not operate, even when it is obeyed, as a pardon of offenses already committed 826
An alleged pardon for treason in raising an insurrection by the operation of the president's proclamation ordering the people to disperse, to be available, must be pleaded.. 826

PARTIES.

In a suit to obtain the reduction of a license fee, held, that all of the joint owners of the patent and grantors of the license were necessary parties defendant, and no decree can be made without bringing them in. 302
An objection for want of proper parties defendant, not made by demurrer, plea, or answer, will be held too late, where a decree can be made granting the relief sought without affecting the rights of absent parties; otherwise not, though they are beyond the jurisdiction of the court..... 302

PARTITION.

A parol partition executed by taking actual exclusive possession of the portions respectively assigned is valid, and the parties cease to be tenants in common..... 592

PARTNERSHIP.

See, also, "Bankruptcy."

Participation in profits is prima facie proof of partnership, rebuttable by showing that they were received as wages or interest for money loaned..... 664
A partnership held to exist where the transaction was intentionally, and for collateral reasons, disguised under the cloak of a pretended loan and employment as bookkeeper 664
A note signed with a firm name after dissolution will not support assumpsit against the partners 726

PATENTS.

Patentable inventions.

An art is entitled to protection, as well as the machinery or processes which the art teaches, employs, and makes useful..... 790
A combination of known elements in new proportions, where a product possessing distinct properties and new uses results, is patentable 685
A combination which, by the addition of a new part, produces a new result with greater rapidity and economy than before produced, is patentable.....1093
A new effect, produced by a change of proportion, may involve patentable invention. 998
To make a valid claim for a combination, it is not necessary that the several elementary parts of the combination should act simultaneously 423
Nor need all parts of the machine which are necessary to its action be included in the claim, save as they may be understood as entering into the mode of combining and arranging the elements of the combination. 423
A new and useful combination of known elements is patentable, though two out of three of them have been combined in a prior machine 423
Decisive evidence that a new mode of operation has been introduced is shown where the practical effect of a new combination is either a new effect, or a materially better effect, or as good an effect, more economically attained 423
In such case, the amount of thought, time, expense, or experiment required to make the change is not material..... 423
The inventor has a right to use any means, old or new, in the application of the new property to produce the new and useful result, to the exclusion of all other means.... 385
Increasing the curve of a wagon reach, and diminishing the diameter of the wheel, so as to allow it to pass completely underneath, where before it only passed partly under, held not a patentable invention.... 289
The application of the principle of the expansion and contraction of a metallic rod by different degrees of heat, to the regulation of the heat of a stove, is the subject of a patent 373
The previous application of the principle to the regulation of heat, and a suggestion of its use in stoves, will not invalidate the patent to one who first practically applied it. 373
A machine never brought into effective operation, and taken apart without intention to reconstruct it, held an abandoned experiment 1093

Who may obtain patent.

The commissioner of patents is not disqualified from obtaining a patent after expiration of his term of office, for an invention made during such term..... 362

Foreign invention: Printed description.

Defendant may show prior invention in a foreign country, and knowledge thereof by the patentee, though such foreign invention has not previously been patented or described in a printed publication..... 423
Evidence of mere use in a foreign country prior to plaintiff's application is not alone sufficient to justify refusal of a patent. Act 1836, § 15..... 972

Application and issue: Interference.

The jurat to an application for a patent need not be dated..... 790
The drawings are a part of the description, and are to be considered with the specification 503
The duplicate drawings, required by Act 1837, § 6, are unnecessary until the patent issues, and need not accompany the application 790
The invention need only be described in terms which will enable persons skilled in the art to produce the invention..... 395
Where the application here is made before the issue of a foreign patent, it does not bear the date of the foreign patent, though the latter is first issued..... 790

Appeal from commissioners' decisions.

Appellant may assign, as a reason of appeal, the refusal to hear certain evidence offered, and the court may order such evidence to be taken to determine its relevancy and materiality..... 998
The unopposed oath of the inventor, though not of itself sufficient, is some evidence of the novelty, invention, and usefulness of the improvement..... 998

But slight evidence of invention is required when it is shown in what the invention consists, and where proof is given of practical utility 998

Extent of claim.

Rules for construing patents..... 685

The patentee must be limited within the claims of the patent, and the description of the particular mechanism, and the application he has made, by which the result is produced 987

The patent is not limited in its scope to the patentee's theory of his invention..... 503

A claim for an entire machine does not deprive the patentee of his right to claim the parts also..... 503

Where only approximate proportions are named in the specification for the several elements of a given composition of matter, the right to vary these proportions is not unlimited 685

Reissue: Disclaimer.

If a reissue is invalid for want of authority to make it, the surrender is ineffective.. 790

There may be more than one reissue of the same patent. Reissues are favored where the patentee is more specific or more modest in his claims..... 790

A patentee, whose devices are new, is at liberty to claim each, by way of reissue, although he may have represented and claimed them originally as acting conjointly.....1093

The patentee need not describe and claim, in the specification of a reissue, either in words or idea, just what he described and claimed in his original..... 790

But the specification must describe the same invention, and the claim cannot embrace a different subject-matter than that which he sought to patent originally..... 790

The sufficiency of a disclaimer, as to whether or not the patentee stated in it "the extent of his interest" in the patent, as required by Act March 3, 1837, § 7, considered 373

The action of the commissioner in granting a reissue has more than prima facie influence in finally deciding the question of identity of invention..... 790

A pending application for a reissue does not supersede the original letters..... 395

A surrender and an application for a reissue may be withdrawn, by leave of the commissioner, for good cause shown, at any time before the proceedings are fully completed and duly recorded..... 395

A presumption as to the regularity of the surrender and reissue of the patent will prevail, in the absence of controlling evidence to the contrary..... 395

Interfering patents.

In a suit under Rev. St. § 4918, concerning interfering patents, the court may declare either one or both of the patents void on any ground which, in a suit for infringement, would invalidate it.....556, 558

The answer in such a suit may allege a want of novelty in complainant's invention. 556

Where the court holds that either one of the patents is void, a decree should be entered annulling it..... 558

Infringement—What constitutes.

A patent for a combination of several distinct parts is not infringed by a machine which does not embrace all of such parts.. 122

A patent for a machine composed of new parts is infringed by the use of any one of such new parts..... 503

A change which constitutes a mechanical equivalent, though accomplishing something useful beyond the effect accomplished by the patentee, is nevertheless an infringement, as respects what is covered by the patent..... 503

Page

The mere substitution of one known device for another, though complex, is an infringement 563

The fact that a machine is an improvement on a patented machine will not prevent its being an infringement if it is substantially the same..... 395

What is technically a combination, and how it may be infringed, though improved.. 563

A knuckle metallic joint in a hydraulic mining apparatus held to be a known mechanical substitute for one made of India rubber, or other flexible material..... 122

—— Who liable.

Damages may be recovered for the use, without license, of plaintiff's patented improvement, by an American citizen on an American vessel on the high seas.....1157

—— Preliminary injunction.

The application may be granted or refused unconditionally, or terms may be imposed on either of the parties, as conditions..... 422

The state of the litigation, where the plaintiff's title is denied, the nature of the improvement, the character and extent of the infringement, and the comparative inconvenience which will be occasioned to the respective parties, by allowing or denying the injunction, must all be considered..... 422

The exclusive possession for eight years under a patent for a useful machine, affecting an extensive business, held sufficient prima facie evidence to entitle a patentee to an injunction..... 563

—— Procedure.

Nonjoinder of licensees in a bill for an infringement of a patent constitutes no defense after the cause has been set down for final hearing..... 395

A surrender and reissue puts an end to a suit pending on the original patent, and plaintiff must proceed by a new bill. He cannot file a supplemental bill..... 970

A feigned issue will be awarded in a suit for an injunction founded on a verdict, in an action at law, on newly-discovered evidence tending to show a want of novelty, and defendants will be allowed to amend their answer on payment of costs by inserting the new matter..... 384

When the effect and operation of mechanical contrivances enter into the question of the extent of a patented combination, it is a mixed question of law and fact, and, therefore, a proper one for the jury..... 373

Prior knowledge and use is a question of fact, and the burden is upon defendant to show the same by satisfactory proof..... 148

On a reference to take an account, defendant cannot be examined as a witness in his own favor, if objection be made by plaintiff, though he was first called and examined as a party by plaintiff..... 391

Although the broad claim of plaintiff's reissue covers defendant's device, the court will look into the body of the specification of both the original and reissued patents, to ascertain whether there is any invention to support the claim..... 468

A juror will not be withdrawn on defendant's motion, on the ground of surprise, arising out of the exclusion by the court of evidence offered under a defective notice of special matter 373

On a reference to a master to ascertain damages and profits, where the bill is taken pro confesso, the master can report only nominal damages where complainants fail to make satisfactory proof..... 168

Where, in such case, complainant's exceptions to the master's report are overruled defendant will be allowed costs subsequent to the interlocutory decree, to be set off against complainant's costs up to such time. 168

— Evidence. Page

A disclaimer must be properly proved, before it can be admitted in evidence, either as an original paper or by a certified copy.... 373

The indorsement on a patent of a disclaimer held inadmissible for defendant, without proof that it was made by the patentee 373

A reference to a dictionary, without specifying the place, held not sufficient notice of special matter 373

Nor is the book admissible under a notice stating that the patentee's invention was previously known to the author..... 373

In such case, it is not competent to prove by experts that they could easily find in such dictionary the parts relating to the subject-matter, without specific reference.. 373

A notice in a special plea, stricken out before the trial, is not sufficient to admit a public work in evidence to show want of novelty 373

A decree will be entered for complainant where the facts averred, showing the validity and infringement of the patent, are admitted by defendant, who also admits the want of any valid defense..... 721

Review.

A judge of the circuit court, sitting at chambers, has power to allow a writ of error under Act July 4, 1836, § 17..... 383

Various particular inventions and patents.

Bag ties. No. 135,899, for improvement in ties for grain bags, held valid and infringed 362

Chair seats. Reissue No. 7,203, for improvements in chair seats, held invalid.... 1186

Coffins. Patent to Fish for a metal air-tight coffin, held valid and infringed..... 395

Corset skirt-supporters. Nos. 22,532, 39,910, 39,920, 45,296 (reissued No. 4,831), 54,323, and reissue No. 2,654, for improvements, held valid and infringed..647, 648, 648

Furnaces. No. 92,822 (reissued No. 7,254), for an improvement in hot-air furnaces, held valid, and infringed..... 284

Glove-fastenings. No. 155,077, for improvement, construed, and held not infringed 14

Hand mirror. No. 92,942, for improvement, held not infringed..... 297

Hydraulic mining. No. 110,222 (reissued, No. 5,193, for an improvement in hydraulic mining apparatus. held valid and infringed.. 122

Inking rollers. Reissues Nos. 1,771, 1,772, for composition for printer's inking rollers, held valid, but not infringed..... 685

Knitting machines. No. 99,426 and reissue No. 7,368, for improvements, held valid. 721

Mouldings. No. 74,068, for an improvement in machine for forming sheet metal mouldings, held valid and infringed..... 103

Pegging machine. Nos. 9,947, 23,361, and 36,292, and reissues Nos. 3,533 and 3,517, for improved machine for pegging boots and shoes, construed, and held valid and infringed 1093

PAYMENT.

The taking of new notes in place of others temporarily delivered up, and their renewal, held not a payment or discharge of a mortgage given as security for the original notes. 812

A bill of exchange is not payment of a pre-existing debt unless paid or accepted as such, or the debtor sustain injury by the laches of the creditor receiving it.....1089

If the holder of a bill remitted as payment of a pre-existing debt does all in his power to notify the one remitting it of its dishonor, he is not liable.....1089

A decree for freight payable in sterling money will be for the amount of such money in gold and silver coin of the United States. 415

PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Liens and mortgages are good as between the parties and against creditors, although the possession is not changed, if there be no fraudulent intent..... 266

PILOTS.

A vessel that is within pilotage ground, but disabled so that she cannot get into port without steam, is not bound to accept the offer of a pilot, or pay his fee..... 246

A pilot is not bound to take charge of a disabled vessel for the usual pilot's fee.... 246

PLEADING AT LAW.

Mistake in plaintiff's name in declaration drawn by the clerk must be regarded as the mistake of the attorney, and amendment allowed only on defendant being permitted to plead de novo.....1010

A plea of estoppel which does not show that the defendant was misled by the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, is frivolous 1031

Defendant has the burden of sustaining, by record evidence, his plea of another action pending..... 616

Matters of abatement alleged as special causes for demurring will be disregarded, and the demurrer will be considered independently of them.....1010

On a general demurrer, unless for misjoinder of actions, judgment must be given for the plaintiff, if there is one good count in the declaration..... 801

In Virginia defendant may demur and plead to issue to the whole declaration.... 606

Where, in Virginia, defendant pleads the general issue, and demurs, and plaintiff joins issue only on the plea, he will be nonsuited. 1010

Denial of citizenship of the plaintiff pleaded with matter to the merits becomes frivolous 1031

Ambiguity or uncertainty is not a ground of motion to strike out.....1031

After receiving and replying to a pleading the party cannot treat it, upon any ground of defect afterwards discovered, as a nullity, and proceed as if none had been served....1060

An exhibit is no part of a pleading in an action at law; a record or instrument should be stated in a pleading either according to its tenor or legal effect..... 172

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY.

Page

Exceptions, dilatory or declinatory, should be interposed on the return day of process, or at the day appointed for answering the libel 1013

An exception that the suit was commenced before the cause of action was matured, not taken until after its maturity, will be considered waived 1013

In causes on the instance side, the answer of the claimant should be verified by oath.. 1142

Where, in the case of a joint tort, separate answers are put in, each respondent must rely for his defense upon his own answer and the proofs 1159

PLEADING IN EQUITY.

A bill is not multifarious because it joins defendants holding distinct tracts of land, under distinct conveyances, if the main ground of defense is common to all 1049

If the bill contain no ground for relief, defendant ought to demur 1088

A corporation must answer under its common seal, and not on oath 786

The corporation is not required to answer interrogatories, where the bill requires its president, cashier, and agent to answer... 786

Where the officers of a corporation are not parties to a suit against it, they cannot be compelled to answer the interrogatories, but the bill may be amended to obtain a discovery from them 786

An allegation in an answer, which is not responsive to the bill, is not evidence; and the onus probandi is on the defendant to establish it 202

Defendant may, under equity rule 39, set up a bar in his answer to excuse him from answering further 1036

Where the bar set up is insufficient for any reason, complainant may except, and set the cause down on bill and answer only, or may file a replication, and proceed to proofs 1036

In the former case, the answer is taken as true, and the bar therein as proved; and, though insufficient as a defense, complainant cannot have a decree, unless the answer admits the allegations of the bill on which the prayer for relief is founded 1036

If the bar set up is a sufficient defense to the whole relief sought, it is immaterial whether the defendant answer the allegations of the bill or not 1036

A plea containing matter proper for a demurrer, for a plea in bar, for a plea in abatement, and for an answer, is bad for duplicity 1049

A plea set down for argument by complainant, without replying, must be considered as true 1088

Plaintiff, suing to enjoin infringement of a trade-mark belonging to a firm of which he alleged that he was the sole member, allowed to amend to bring in another, whom the proof showed was also a member..... 806

An amendment will be allowed when its refusal will put plaintiff out of court, and defendant can avail himself, on appeal, of the matter on which he objects..... 138

The staleness of the demand, or the want of proper parties, is no objection to amending the bill..... 138

The averment of citizenship may be added at any stage if the amendment be moved for in a reasonable time after the defect is suggested 138

Where a plea of the statute of limitations is overruled, it cannot be again put in by the same parties or their privies..... 138

It cannot be objected at the hearing that there was no replication to the answer, where proofs in support of the answer, and proofs in contradiction thereof, and in rebuttal, have been put in without objection.. 103

PLEADING UNDER STATE CODES.

Matters arising since the complaint, which increase plaintiff's damages, but do not change the cause of action, may be alleged by supplemental complaint..... 805

Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. does not authorize a demurrer unless it is to the whole complaint or to a separate cause of action alleged therein 805

PLEDGE.

A bill of sale intended for security operates (in Massachusetts) as a pledge and not as a mortgage, and does not require, or admit of, registration 185

Delivery to the pledgee may be either actual or constructive..... 185

Possession may be kept by an agent, and that agent may be the pledgor..... 185

Railroad coupons held by a creditor as security were converted into land, the unrecorded deeds for which were deposited with the creditor in place of the coupons. Held, that such creditor had an equity in the land superior to the lien of a general judgment creditor 81

PRACTICE AT LAW.

A mistake in entitling a referee's report in the district court, where it was duly filed in the circuit court, and no one was misled, will be disregarded, or the report amended nunc pro tunc..... 604

Plaintiff is entitled to judgment by default where defendant does not plead by the rule day, though the term continues beyond such day 610

On a trial before a jury the court has no power to grant a nonsuit against plaintiff's will 373

The courts of the United States, in actions at law, can require the production of books and papers in the hands of the adverse party only where the relief might have been had by a bill of discovery, and as a substitute therefor. Act 1789, § 15..... 54

An action, discontinued at a preceding term for want of appearance of defendant, will not be reinstated unless the omission was by neglect of the clerk..... 802

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY.

See, also, "Admiralty"; "Maritime Liens."

A vessel under arrest by attachment from a state court is entirely withdrawn from the cognizance of the federal courts, whether sitting in the same or a different state..... 136

A creditor cannot proceed against a vessel both in the state and federal courts on the same claim..... 136

A respondent arrested must remain in custody until he gives bond or stipulation to satisfy the decree made against him. Rule 3 1188

After pertinent evidence offered involving the merits, plaintiff cannot become nonsuit, so as not to be barred, except by consent of the opposite party, or on leave given by the court for sufficient reason..... 335

On an appeal in admiralty, after the case is entered, plaintiff, who is appellant, and recovered judgment below for less than he asked, cannot become nonsuit without prejudice, on payment of costs, if defendant object 335

Page

A new trial is not ordered in an admiralty suit, on the mere ground of oversight in not putting in evidence which might have been put in..... 692

An application will not lie to set aside a sale by default in admiralty, where it is not entitled in the same cause, and it does not appear that the promovents were parties or privies to that action..... 753

Irregularities in entering default are waived by the voluntary appearance of respondent before the commissioner without objection, but such default will be set aside to permit a real defense.....1060

Objections to an action merely formal in their character, cannot be taken on final hearing 1013

After the respondent has given a bond to the marshal, as provided by the rules, libelant cannot exact any additional stipulation 1060

Libelant is not entitled to ground any proceedings on the omission of respondent to give security for costs.....1060

No notice need be given the opposite party of a final decree before proceedings to enforce it.....1062

Execution issues against stipulators summarily upon the decree rendered against the principal.....1062

In a suit for seamen's wages, libelant may compel the adverse party to answer special interrogatories.....1142

PRACTICE IN EQUITY.

A motion or petition in the suit is the proper method to stay proceedings, where it is not properly prosecuted in the federal court. A formal bill is not necessary..... 973

A question of fact, essential to the decision, may be referred to a jury upon an issue framed..... 202

Where defendant fails to pay the examiner's fees, plaintiff cannot compel defendant's proofs to be filed without paying such fees 809

When a witness has been cross-examined by a party, with a full knowledge of an objection to his competency, he will not be allowed to raise the objection at the hearing.. 202

Exceptions to a master's report, not made before the master, will not be heard by the court, in the absence of special circumstances 1051

Unless a particular error is pointed out, or an erroneous principle is shown to have been adopted, the master's report will not be disturbed.....1051

A complainant, residing in another state, but in the same circuit, cannot be required to furnish security for costs, except at the first term 579

PRACTICE UNDER STATE CODES.

Supplemental answers are in the nature of pleas puis darrein continuance under the former practice, and like such pleas, should be interposed at the first opportunity after coming to the knowledge of the parties.... 778

Leave to file supplemental answer, setting up good technical, though inequitable, defense, refused where there was unreasonable delay 778

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

See, also, "Factors and Brokers."

A contract made by an agent in excess of his power, by means of false and fraudulent assertions, is void, and may be rescinded, or, where the principal receives the benefit and proceeds, he is liable in damages..... 579

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

Equity will not hold a surety liable, when he is discharged at law..... 26

On the death of the surety in the case of an obligation joint, and not joint and several, the remedy at law is gone, as against his legal representatives..... 26

No state statute, enacted after the making of such an obligation, can change the contract of the surety to his prejudice..... 26

A debtor has a right, without the assent of his surety, to convey his property, fairly, in payment of his debts..... 62

PRIZE.

See, also, "War."

A naturalized citizen of the United States, domiciled in the enemy country at the breaking out of war, is deemed an enemy, and his property is confiscable as such..... 673

If a party so domiciled puts himself in itinere, to resume his acquired country, he is deemed to have returned to its domicile.. 673

In war, property cannot change its hostile character in transitu..... 670

A shipment made by an enemy shipper to his correspondent in America, to belong to the latter at his election, in 24 hours after arrival, is liable to condemnation as hostile property 670

All goods found on board an enemy's ship, are presumed to be enemy property unless a distinct neutral character is impressed upon, and accompanies, them..... 326

If the shippers in a hostile ship neglect to put on board any documentary evidence of its neutral character, they will not be allowed the benefit of further proof..... 326

Cotton purchased during the Civil War with the proceeds of debts collected by a citizen of a loyal state, who went south before the war to collect such debts, captured while water borne in Texas, held not enemy's property. (Reversing) 49

In the case of a joint shipment from enemy country, the share of the partner domiciled in the enemy country was condemned. 674

In the absence of notice of a blockade, an inquiry at a blockaded port excused..... 446

An entry into a blockaded port to obtain necessary supplies excused..... 446

A prize court of the United States has no jurisdiction on the capture of a British vessel by a French privateer, within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States..... 57

Vessel condemned for attempting to violate a blockade where, having been chased at sea, she was beached, and set on fire.... 256

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for an attempt to violate the blockade of Little River inlet..... 321

Vessel sailing under neutral flag, whose open papers show neutral ownership, was condemned upon other papers found, artfully concealed, tending to show enemy ownership 494

A part of the vessel condemned as enemy property; the rest of the vessel restored... 446

The vessel will not be condemned to the United States for failure of the captors to bring in the master of the captured vessel, where he was released from motives of compassion 326

Cargo restored, being neutral property, and there having been no attempt to violate the blockade, but no costs or damages awarded, as the vessel was confiscable in part 446

As to costs to be taxed on several claims in one information, upon a remission of the forfeiture 672

PUBLIC LANDS.

Page

The donation act of 1850 does not include settlers upon the public lands in Oregon, who died before its passage..... 29

A grant to a settler under such act does not take effect prior to its passage, although made in consideration, or on account, of prior residence and cultivation thereon.... 29

Though a married man limits his settlement under the donation act to the quantity of land granted to a single man, one-half thereof inures to the benefit of the wife, and she takes the same in her own right as the direct donee of the United States, and not subject to any of the previous acts or contracts of the husband..... 29

On the death of the wife of a settler under such act, her interest passes directly to her husband and children in equal parts, as donees of the United States, and not as her heirs 29

A quitclaim deed by the occupants of land in Oregon before the passage of the donation act, containing a covenant of warranty against all claims except that of the United States, and a covenant to convey the title of the United States, if obtained by the covenantors, will transfer only the possession 29

The possession delivered with the deed is a sufficient estate to carry the covenants therein to the assignee thereof..... 29

The prohibition contained in the proviso to section 4 of the act does not include covenants or contracts made prior to the passage of such act..... 29

The rights of vendees of a married settler under the act, on a partition of the wife's share after her death, determined... 29

The notice of settlement given to the proper officer under such act relates back to the commencement of the application, unless the same was prior to the passage of the act 193

The donation act was a present grant to the settler thereunder, but the completion of "a settlement" was a condition precedent to the vesting of any estate or interest in the land, in such settler..... 193

A wife divorced before notice and proof of a claim is not entitled to share in the settlement, although the land was occupied before the divorce was obtained..... 193

Intermediate the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the admission of California into the Union, no military officer of the United States could make any alienation of the public land 818

A mere permission to search for and take possession of land did not bind the Mexican government to make a title, and the United States are not required under the treaty to recognize such claim.....1147

QUIETING TITLE.

A title acquired under a statute of limitations will be quieted in the adverse holder on bill filed for that purpose, even against the holder of the paper title barred..... 592

RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Construction of Act Mo. March 24, 1868, amending the charter of the Louisiana & Missouri River Railroad Company, in relation to municipal subscription for stock.... 530

The provisions of the Missouri constitution as to aid to railways, amendatory acts, and titles to acts, discussed..... 530

A railroad company, or its assignee with notice, cannot enforce bonds issued to pay a subscription to stock, where a condition under which the city was authorized by statute to issue them has not been complied with 368

A purchaser under a decree of foreclosure of a railway mortgage held not a bona fide purchaser as to municipal aid bonds, given on a subscription to stock under a condition with which the company has not complied.. 368

A railroad contractor, taking aid bonds from the company in good faith in payment for work, is a purchaser for value..... 363

The purchaser of railroad aid bonds need not look behind their recitals, where the bonds, on their face, do not put him on inquiry 363

The bona fide purchaser of railroad aid bonds is entitled to rely upon a recital therein that the conditions precedent to their issue have been fulfilled..... 363

A person who has succeeded to the title of a bona fide purchaser of the bonds, is entitled to stand on such title, though not a bona fide holder of them himself..... 363

A person can recover on coupons on the bonds, although his sole purpose, in buying them, was to bring suit on them in the federal court 363

In a suit on railroad aid bonds, defendant cannot impeach the order of the county judge reciting the proceedings under which the commissioners to issue the bonds were appointed 363

A provision in a statute under which railroad aid bonds were issued, that they should be registered in the office of the county clerk, held directory merely..... 95

In a suit on railway aid bonds, evidence of declarations made to taxpayers before they assented to the issuing of the bonds, inducing such assent, held inadmissible.... 95

The assent by majority taxpayers to the issuing of railway aid bonds, once duly made under Laws Vt. 1867, No. 1, cannot be withdrawn, though attempted to be made before the assent has been certified..... 98

Duties and liabilities of the parties in the case of a man walking along a railroad track in front of an approaching train, stated in a charge to a jury..... 69

REAL PROPERTY.

Distinct actions may be brought in California to recover possession of land, and for damages for withholding its possession.... 12

The period prescribed within which actions for mesne profits must be brought in California is three years; but if the statute be not pleaded, mesne profits for a longer period may be recovered..... 12

The value of permanent improvements cannot be set off against damages for withholding possession in California unless defendant held the land not only in good faith, but under color of title..... 12

Any instrument gives "color of title" which, by apt words of conveyance from grantor to grantee, in form passes what purports to be a good title..... 12

A plea of set-off for permanent improvements in an action for mesne profits must allege that the same were made while holding under color of title adversely to the claim of plaintiff, and in good faith. Code Or. 227..... 172

One in possession, claiming under an adverse but defective title, without fraud, cannot be held to be the trustee of the true

Where a person, having permission by will merely to reside in a house, leased the same, held, that her executors should account for the net income for six years back 1154

REFERENCE.

Following the practice of the state courts, the judgment upon a referee's report may be entered without an application to the court 604

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

See, also, "Courts."

Right of removal.

Under Acts Sept. 24, 1789, § 12, July 27, 1866, and March 2, 1867, the right of removal is made to depend upon citizenship or alienage 149
All those connected with the suit on each side must be citizens of different states from those on the other side..... 729
A suit to quiet title to real property against several defendants, who claim to be the owners of the same as tenants in common, "is one in which there can be a final determination of the controversy," as to each defendant, without the presence of the other 20
Where there is a separable controversy, each defendant has the right of removal without reference to the status of his codefendant 20, 27
A suit may be removed under Act March 2, 1867, by a defendant who is a citizen of a different state, although there be other defendants who are citizens of the state in which it is brought.....*298
Act March 2, 1867, only adds another cause for removal, and does not repeal the act of 1866..... 27
In an action on the mortgage note of a resident corporation, held that a controversy between plaintiff and a nonresident defendant, who was a mortgagee of the company, and had purchased its entire property, was merely incidental to the main controversy, and the cause was not removable..... 88
Under Acts March 2, 1833, March 3, 1863, and June 27, 1868, the right of removal is made to depend upon the subject-matter.. 149
Under these acts, the entire suit is removed if any part of it is removed..... 149
The act of July 27, 1868, is constitutional. 149
Act July 27, 1868, § 2, construed, as to what suits are removable under it, and at whose instance, and what is the mode of removal 149
A member of a corporation, sued for a debt or liability of the corporation, may have the suit removed under Act July 27, 1868, § 2.....1149

Page

But a member sued for alleged misconduct as an officer of the corporation cannot have the suit removed under such section.....1149
The fact, that questions may arise, in the course of the litigation, besides those under the acts of congress, and which depend upon general principles of law, cannot withdraw the cause from the jurisdiction of the federal courts..... 164
Nor can the suit be withdrawn from such jurisdiction, by joining defendants who are not within the limitation prescribed by the statute with those who are within such limitation 164
Rev. St. § 643, providing for removal to the federal court of prosecutions against federal revenue officers, held constitutional... 67
Such section is applicable to an indictment of such an officer in a state court for an act done under color of the United States revenue law, but charged to be in violation of the criminal law of the state..... 67
A colored citizen, when sued by another citizen of the same state, cannot remove the cause because of local influence or prejudice 621
A written stipulation of submission of a pending cause held a waiver of the right of removal after reversal and return for a new trial.....1026

Time for removal.

After a decree in the probate court, the case cannot be removed to the federal court under Act 1875..... 729
The petition is too late where filed several terms after the cause could have been tried but for the neglect of the rules of the court for the taking of testimony..... 996

Proceedings to obtain.

The right of removal under any act of congress is not dependent upon the volition, or action, or nonaction of the state court..... 149
The federal court has no jurisdiction to issue a mandamus to compel a state court to allow a removal, as a mandamus is not necessary 149
When the proper petition is presented with the proper surety, so that the state court acts upon the matter judicially, it loses jurisdiction of the cause eo instanti, unless its refusal is placed upon a valid defect in the petition, or insufficiency in the surety..... 149
After presentation of the petition, and a compliance with the act, the state court cannot take any proceedings in the suit except to perfect the removal, as other defendants may appear and present their petitions.... 164
The application to the state court is ex parte. No notice need be given, and no affidavits can be read in opposition..... 164
The averment in the petition, that defendants have a defense arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, must be accepted as true in the federal court, until disposed of on the trial..... 149
The affidavit for removal and bond having been filed in term time, but during a temporary recess of the state court, and the record not having been filed in the federal court, held that the state court, on a proper case being shown, had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver..... 88
All the defendants need not apply at the same time for the removal.....20, 164
Defendants not served or appearing in the state court when the order for removal is made are not affected by it, and as to them the cause is still pending in the state court.. 20
The federal court must determine for itself the question of its jurisdiction; the allowance of the petition for removal by the state court cannot confer jurisdiction..... 20

Effect of removal: Subsequent proceedings.

A case was removed in the circuit court of the southern district of New York on the allegation that plaintiff was a citizen of New York, and defendant a citizen of Massachusetts. Held, that a motion to remand on the ground that plaintiff is an alien should be granted, the fact not being denied.....1139

The averment in a petition that the suit has been brought for a cause of action specified in the act of July 27, 1868, cannot be tried on affidavit on motion to remand.... 164

When a suit has been removed under the act of 1868, as respects all the parties and all the subject-matter, the court will not make an order staying all proceedings in the state court, as such order is not necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction..... 149

After removal, the federal court may entertain a motion to dissolve an attachment or discharge the attached property where such practice is authorized by the state law 1153

The court may hear such motion, though a similar motion was overruled by the state court prior to the removal.....1153

A bill filed after the removal, naming as a party defendant a person who was not a party to the suit as brought in the state court, will be stricken from the files on motion.. 166

A declaration filed in the federal court after removal of a bill in equity, asking relief at law against some only of the defendants, if within the allegations of the complaint filed in the state court, will not be stricken from the files, nor will complainants be compelled to elect whether to proceed at law or in equity..... 166

A counterclaim which might have been interposed in the state court may be set up after removal..... 706

REWARD.

To entitle a person to a reward agreed in writing to be paid for recovering certain property, which was subsequently returned by the police, he must show that it was recovered through information furnished by him 709

By the general maritime law, a seaman taken sick during the voyage is entitled to be cured at the expense of the vessel..... 443

Where the seaman is removed ashore, or where there is no person on board the vessel who can safely administer medicine, the vessel is liable for medical advice and attendance, though she carries a medicine chest, as provided by Act July 20, 1790, c. 56, § 8..... 443

A general averment that a vessel was supplied with a medicine chest according to law is not, of itself, sufficient evidence to discharge a master from his liability for a physician's bill for attendance upon a sick seaman 754

An express promise by a sick seaman to pay the amount of a physician's bill for attendance is without consideration and void 754

Where the mates and crew of a vessel discharge ballast into a lighter or barge so carelessly as to load her on one side, and cause her to sink, they are liable to the owner for the loss..... 332

Seamen are liable where a loss is caused by their strict obedience to orders which they know are improper, where they fail to remonstrate 332

When the fault or negligence is not clearly fixed on any particular one connected with the ship, all must contribute in the ratio of wages..... 332

Where a vessel sails without the statute quantity of bread, and the crew are put upon a short allowance of bread, it is no defense to their claim for double wages that flour was furnished as a substitute..... 572

Where double wages are allowed, under the statute, for such short allowance, damages may also be given for a deficiency of other food..... 572

The owner is bound by his contract to furnish the seamen suitable subsistence. What is suitable depends upon what is usual in similar voyages..... 572

A seaman engaged at a foreign port on the homeward voyage has the same rights as to wages and food allowance as one shipping at the point of original departure..1192

The navy ration is the measurement of a food allowance on a merchant vessel....1192

The measure of damages for a wrongful discharge in a foreign port held to be the contract wages and expenses to the time when the seaman might have reached the home port, less what he actually earned, or might have earned, on the passage home.. 650

A stipulation, in shipping articles for whaling voyages, that the owners may ship catchings home on freight, is valid..... 726

The owners are not liable for their value, as of the time when received, where, in good faith, they held them waiting for a rise in the market..... 726

Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen.

A seaman is, in general, entitled to recover damages for an assault and battery from the officer of a ship where personal violence is inflicted, not excessively, but wantonly and without provocation or cause; where there was provocation or cause, but the punishment was cruel or excessive; or when the punishment is inflicted with a deadly, or dangerous, weapon..... 417

The law which governs the deportment of men to each other on shore, cannot be applied to their habits and intercourse on board of a ship..... 417

A seaman is punishable corporally for deportment or language not obedient or respectful to the master..... 980

The punishment, however, must be not excessive, considering the nature of the offense. A single blow with the hand, producing no wound, is not excessive..... 980

A seaman on receiving such a blow for such an offense is not justified in brandishing a knife or an axe, nor in using them to prevent his arrest..... 980

If a seaman is attacked by master or mate without provocation or disobedience on his part, he may defend himself..... 980

The master and mate may seize deadly weapons to put down mutinous and insubordinate conduct, and to restore order and obedience 980

In the absence of cruelty or needless severity, the court will not measure the degree of punishment inflicted for insubordination 1159

A single act of insubordination on the part of a seaman cannot be considered as mutinous, or as justifying an imprisonment 1159

The second mate may refuse obedience to an order of the master to slush the masts, or take in light sails, as a punishment, when no offense has been committed that would justify it.....650, 650

The master has no right to imprison him, for such refusal..... 650

A person who, shipping as cook, is unwilling or unable to do his duty, and keeps the galley in a filthy condition, may be punished 417

A blow with a dirty frying-pan, or wiping a dirty knife on the face of the person whose duty it was to keep those articles clean, held not an aggravated or cruel assault 417

An action against a mate by a seaman, for false imprisonment, will not lie, where the imprisonment was ordered by the master through the advice and request of the mate 1159

Actions for aggravated assaults upon seamen are in personam only..... 980

Wages—Right to.

Seamen absent from a ship without any fault of their own, are nevertheless entitled to full wages..... 201

A vessel abandoned to the underwriters on report of surveyors that she be condemned as unseaworthy is "condemned as unfit for service," under Rev. St. § 4582, relieving the vessel from liability for the three months' extra wages where seamen are discharged abroad.....1087

Feeding and caring for sailors after their discharge cannot be held to be a revocation of the discharge.....1087

A seaman, having drawn the full wages due under an oral shipment cannot, after leaving the vessel, demand a greater sum.. 770

A seaman, though at the time of service a part owner of the vessel, is not thereby precluded from libeling for wages.....*569

No statute prohibits the filing of any libel within ten days after the discharge of the cargo 677

Act July 20, 1790, § 6, prohibiting actions for wages within a certain time, does not apply to actions in personam..... 754

The right of a seaman to sue in personam for his wages, is perfect as soon as the period of his service is completed..... 754

A seaman discharged before the delivery of the cargo may sue in personam at once 754

Owners of fishing vessel held liable for the wages of the seamen to the extent of the proceeds of the sale of the wreck, though the vessel was hired by the master for the season, and he had undertaken to pay the wages 237

A lien for wages is discharged by a sale on execution against the owners, of which the seaman is one. Reversing page 569...1100

The fact that a vessel has made several voyages since the contract was terminated will not discharge the lien where the seaman exerted himself to follow the vessel, and commenced suit at the earliest moment 758

Where there has been no change of ownership in a vessel, forbearance by a seaman to enforce his lien for wages until after 21 months' continuous service does not render his claim stale.....1111

A seaman was refused payment of a portion of the sum claimed unless he would sign a receipt in full against the vessel and owners. Held, that the receipt was only good for the sum actually paid.....1111

Interest is allowed from the time of a demand proved; and if no demand is proved, from the commencement of the suit..1142 —— Deductions: Extinguishment, etc.

A deduction will not be made where, because of illness, the seaman left the vessel after the voyage was ended, but before the cargo was discharged..... 677

If any part of the cargo be missing, all the seamen contribute to make it good, unless the guilt can be placed..... 741

Forfeiture of wages is not given merely as a compensation to the owner for actual loss suffered by the seaman's misconduct; it is enforced also by way of punishment... 295

The seizure and carrying away of the ship's chronometer by a mate, to force the settlement of his claim for wages, held not an act of misconduct, working a forfeiture 295

Page

Wages are not forfeited by leaving the vessel after the voyage is ended, and before the cargo is unladen..... 677
Going ashore to apply to an American consul for redress for alleged cruel treatment on board does not work a forfeiture of wages..... 754
The performance of his duty after the forcible return of a deserting seaman is a condonation of the offense, and a remission of the forfeiture, regardless of stipulations in shipping articles..... 754

SEIZURE.

A doubt of law is a proper case for a certificate of probable cause of seizure. In what cases such a certificate ought to be allowed 825
A motion for a certificate of probable cause of seizure may be made subsequent to the decree, and upon the hearing the court is not limited to the evidence introduced upon the trial.....1067
In determining the question, the court cannot consider the fact that the officer acted in an oppressive manner, and without a warrant.....1067
The fact that the claimant was selling the goods at a low price in an obscure town, declaring them to have been imported, and that duty had been paid upon only a small portion, was held sufficient to justify their seizure 1067

Public regulation: Title to vessel.

A bona fide purchaser of the whole interest in a vessel, subsequent to a forfeiture incurred by a sale to an alien (Act Dec. 31, 1792, § 16), is not within the proviso of such section 316
The forfeiture takes place at the moment of sale or transfer to an alien, and any subsequent judgment of forfeiture relates back to that time..... 316
The title of the alien purchaser, if he acquires any, is divested eo instanti by the statute, and he has left in him no interest which can be seized on execution..... 316
A levy on the forfeited property, under an execution against the alien, previous to the prosecution of the forfeiture, will not prevent the forfeiture..... 316
Such forfeiture does not avoid the lien of seamen and material men, existing at the time of forfeiture..... 316

The title of a sunken vessel passes to the one who pays the full value of the vessel to the owner, whether after a decree or not.. 638
The title will pass to the defendant, in a suit for collision, who pays the full value on a decree against him, as against underwriters to whom the owner has previously abandoned the vessel..... 638
A part owner may sustain a petitory suit against a merely fraudulent possessor, without joining the other part owners, and have a decree for possession on proving his title 822
A part owner, though his name is omitted from the registry and enrollment procured by the others, held entitled to ask security for the safety of the vessel on a voyage not approved by him..... 642
Where the owner of one-eighth disapproved of the proposed voyage, the other part owners were ordered to secure him in double the value of his share..... 642

Carriage of merchandise.

Duty of the ship master, where consignee refuses to pay freight, and there is no proper place for storage at the port of destination 630
A vessel employed generally to carry stone to a certain port held a general freighting vessel as to return cargoes collected by the master under a custom of the business 630

Liability of vessel or owners, etc.

By the general law maritime, the vessel is bound to the shipper for the performance of a contract of affreightment made with the master, whether by charter-party, by bill of lading, or by parol..... 252
A vessel equipped in a manner which renders her competent to encounter the ordinary perils of a voyage is seaworthy..... 196
The fact that the mizzen sail of the vessel gave out in the extraordinary storm, and that she had no spare mizzen sail, does not show that she was unseaworthy when she sailed..... 196
A vessel is not responsible in rem for cargo lost from the pier through negligence of her officers, but after delivery to the consignee 20
A scow will be held liable for the conversion by its master of a lighter used, without authority, in carrying wood from the shores of Lake St. Clair to the scow..... 294
The vessel owners are not liable for supplies furnished to a vessel while frozen in, and in charge of the mate as ship keeper, except for implements for necessary and permanent use on board the vessel..... 630

The master.

A master in possession of a vessel absent from her home port will be deemed to have been master until his actual displacement after return of the vessel, notwithstanding the vote of a majority owners to discharge him 630
The master of a vessel, frozen in before the return voyage was commenced, and left in charge of the mate, may contract for cargo for the return voyage after the vessel is released..... 630
A master is personally liable on a contract for the transportation of goods in discharge of a debt due from him, part of which does not rest on a maritime contract 630
The master has authority in a foreign port to procure all supplies and repairs necessary for the safety of the ship and the due performance of the voyage..... 479
This authority includes all such supplies and repairs as are reasonably fit and proper, although not indispensably necessary.. 479
A master, acting with reasonable diligence, discretion, and skill, upon the advice of competent persons, will be protected, though more skillful persons would have advised a better course.....479

TREASON.

Congress has no power to change, in any way, the crime of treason, as defined by Const. art. 3, § 2, and acts of congress cannot be considered as legislative definitions of the crime..... 826
Opposing by force of arms, an act of congress, with a view of defeating its efficacy, and thus defying the authority of the government, is levying war against the United States, and constitutes treason.... 826
Treason in the assembling of bodies of men, armed or arrayed in a warlike manner, is determined by the intent. If the purpose be of a private nature, it is not treason, regardless of the acts actually committed; otherwise, where the intent is to effect some object of general public nature 924
An insurrection to resist by force the execution of a federal tax law, or the militia called out to enforce it, on any ground whatever, is a levying of war against the United States..... 924
A conspiracy to raise an insurrection to resist the execution of a federal statute by force is only a misdemeanor. Treason is not committed until the persons proceed to carry the intention into execution by force 924
There are no accessories to the crime of treason; but all the particeps criminis are principals. All persons present, aiding, assisting, or abetting any treasonable act, or who are present, countenancing, and are ready to afford assistance, if necessary, to those committing a treasonable act, are principals 924
If a man joins and acts with an assembly of people, his intent is always to be considered and adjudged to be the same as theirs; and the law judges of the intent by the fact..... 924
Where the overt act has been proved by two witnesses, evidence is admissible to show the course of the prisoner's conduct at other places, and the purpose with which he went to the place where the treason is laid; and, if he went with a treasonable design, then the proof of treason is complete 826
A voluntary confession made by the prisoner on his preliminary examination may be received in corroboration of matters already testified to by two witnesses; but, as to matters not thus testified to, it must be disregarded 826
